THE POTTER'S SONG.

Turn, turn, my wheel! Turn round and round
Without a pause, without a sound:

So spins the flying world away!
This clay, well mixed with marl and sand,
Follows the motion of my hand;
For some must follow, and some command,
Though all are made of clay.

Turn, turn, my wheel! All things must change
To something new, to something strange;

Nothing that is can pause or stay;
The moon will wax, the moon will wane,
The mist and cloud will turn to rain,
The rain to mist and cloud again,
To-morrow be to-day.

Turn, turn, my wheel! All life is brief;
What now is bud will soon be leaf,

What now is leaf will soon decay;
The wind blows east, the wind blows west;
The blue eggs in the robin's nest
Will soon have wings and beak and breast,
And flutter and fly away.

Turn, turn, my wheel! This earthen jar
A touch can make, a touch can mar;

And shall it to the potter say,
What makest thou? Thou hast no hand?
As men who think to understand
A world by their Creator planned,
Who wiser is than they.

Turn, turn, my wheel! 'Tis nature's plan
The child should grow into the man,

The man grow wrinkled, old, and gray;
In youth the heart exults and sings,
The pulses leap, the feet have wings;
In age the cricket chirps, and brings
The harvest-home of day.

Turn, turn, my wheel! The human race,
Of every tongue, of every place,

Caucasian, Coptic, or Malay,
All that inhabit this great earth,
Whatever be their rank or worth,
Are kindred and allied by birth,
And made of the same clay.

Turn, turn, my wheel! What is begun,
At daybreak, must at dark be done,

To-morrow will be another day;
To-morrow the hot furnace flame
Will search the heart and try the frame,
And stamp with honor or with shame
These vessels made of clay.

Stop, stop, my wheel! Too soon, too soon
The noon will be the afternoon,

Inquiry has been made as to whether or not the "Journal of History," will be sent free to General Conference appointees. It is decided not to do this. Conference appointees take notice and act accordingly.

President R. M. Stewart announces that the winter term at Graceland College will be open Monday, January 6. Classes will open promptly at eight o'clock. Friday afternoon and Saturday, the 3d and 4th, will be registration days.

Too soon to-day be yesterday;
 Behind us in our path we cast
 The broken potsherds of the past,
 And all are ground to dust at last,
 And trodden into clay!

A SHORT NEW-YEAR'S SERMON ON REFORMING.

Public reformers had need first practice on their own hearts that which they propose to try on others.—Charles I.

There is one refreshing feature about this season of the year, when time starts over again: it is the season when people think to reform themselves. True, most of us are would-be reformers the year around; but most of the time most of us want to reform the other fellow.

We do not begin the reformation near enough home. Our grammar of reform is deficient—it has no first person. You and I meet and talk about Bro. Absent, and we decide that he has faults that need correcting. We say, "he ought to reform." But that is reform in the third person! In a moment of candor I begin to point out your faults, and I say, "You need to reform." Yes, "even thee is a bit queer." But that is reform in the second person. Let us first of all look the proposition in the face and put it in the first person. The reason that many reformers are regarded by their neighbors as obnoxious "cranks" is because they go about "cranking" every one else around to their way of thinking when they themselves need to be "cranked" about to a better way of living. We have a right to seek the reformation of our neighbors, and the uplift of the community, but only after we have begun to travel the road ourselves.

Some things indicate that the average man believes in a changed life. One fact is this: The average man demands that a woman shall be pure, clean, virtuous, and modest. If he does not think that she is all of these he counts her out of the circle of women whom he respects. A man may swear like a pirate; he is shocked to hear a profane woman. He may be a sodden drunkard; his wife must remain sober. He may chew tobacco and spit on the floor; he would be horrified to see a woman do the same.

Now, all that simply shows that the average man feels that the human soul should occupy a higher plane. He sees the need of living up to an exalted standard; the trouble is that he wants his wife, his sister, his mother, or his sweetheart to do the living. In a spiritual sense he wants to "let the women do the work."

Yet do we read anywhere that a woman is a lady because she is clean and good, while a man can be a gentleman without these qualities? Do we read anywhere that a man's ideal of what a woman should be will blind the eye of God to what the man is?

In order to bring home to us at this time our own faults, let each of us ask himself this question, gleaned from one of the church papers:

"What kind of a church would our church be, if every member were just like me?"

We will start out like this: "I am one of those people who gets offended at my brethren about once a month." Now put the question, "What kind of a church would our church be, if every member"—ha! we hear a groan from the priests and teachers. They do not want any more of that kind. Christ knew what to do with the man who was cold; he knew what to do with the man who was hot; but if he knew what to do with the man who is hot one day, cold the next, indifferent the third, and the fourth comes up for the sacrament, he has never revealed it.

Again: "I never pay any tithing, though I might if I chose." Now the question, "What kind of a church would our church be, if every member were just like me?" It would be a dead church. No missionaries would go out from the next General Conference. We would hear no more splendid sermons preached by ministers who are supported by people more generous than we.

If we have the courage we may carry out the examination along other lines to our advantage. (The editorial we is not used in a merely conventional sense.)

Professor Iyenaga of the University of Chicago, while lecturing on the customs of the Japanese, said that when they first adopted European dress they made some queer blunders. For instance, it was not uncommon to see a man in full evening dress, at some social function, wearing a pair of heavy, high-topped, cowhide boots.

Perhaps when we begin to reform and put on the robe of righteousness, the angels, while rejoicing, may see some things that would be amusing if they were not pathetic. Here is a man wearing a beautifully embroidered cloak of piety, zealous in his attendance at church, yet not on speaking terms with a certain brother. He is still wearing some of the old suit, and it does not match the new. He should have his "feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace."

Reformation should begin with the first aspiration to be something that one is not, and it should be continued until one is "reformed"—remade,—the old man put off and the new man put on. It is a work in which man and God each has a part; and God will never forsake the man who is doing his part.

What we do upon some great occasion will probably depend on what we already are; and what we are will be the result of previous years of self-discipline.—H. P. Liddon.

A UNIQUE ASSOCIATION.

There may be some items of interest to our readers in connection with the recent meeting of the Smith Family to celebrate the anniversary of the birth of Joseph Smith the Martyr. One year ago December 23, members of the various branches of the family met at the home of Alexander H. Smith to celebrate the one hundred and first anniversary of the birth of the man whose name is had for good or evil in all the world. This meeting was in line with others that had preceded it; but it having become evident that some system and order was necessary in this as in other matter, the assembly proceeded to effect a permanent organization.

President Joseph Smith and Patriarch Alexander H. Smith, the two surviving sons of the Prophet, were elected as presidents. A committee, consisting of Heman C. Smith, R. S. Salyards, and B. M. Anderson, was appointed to prepare a program for the next annual meeting, to select a name for the association, and to draft rules to govern it.

The committee selected the following name: "The Family of Joseph Smith the Martyr." The rules which they drafted provide that the membership shall consist of direct descendants of Joseph Smith, and husbands and wives, and widows and widowers of descendants.

This is not a secret society. It has no grips, signs, or passwords, and imposes no oaths or obligations upon its members. In fact, in the very nature of the case, there are only two ways to obtain membership. The first of these is the way that was adopted by Joseph Smith himself when he joined the family, December 23, 1805. At first glance this might seem an inadequate way to keep up the membership; but so far as the family is concerned it has proved quite effectual in the past. The second way is the good old way that was followed by Emma Hale when she stood up before Squire Tarbill, in South Bainbridge, New York, January 18, 1827. It has been charged that Joseph Smith stole his wife on that occasion; but she was of age and gave her consent, and so the family can not be classed with the Gadianton robbers on that score.

The object of the family association appeals to us as being above reproach. It is stated thus in the rules adopted by the committee: "The object of the Association shall be to promote among his family the faith embraced by Joseph Smith, to commemorate his birthday anniversaries, and also to promote friendly and social intercourse among the members of the family."

In his report for the year the secretary says: "Nature and God provide our recruits; but how about expulsion in case a member goes wrong? There is no way to get out of the family except to die out. The only recourse seems to be for all the members to walk the path of rectitude and honesty, and this we ought to do for the honor of the family name, if for no more weighty reasons."

Sr. Vida E. Smith has written an account of the late annual meeting, which appears below.

E. A. S.

The meeting was opened with singing by those present of the original song, "Our Heritage." Following this President Joseph Smith offered prayer.

ADDRESS OF WELCOME BY HOST, B. M. ANDERSON.

(Reported by Estella Wight.)

As a part of the family I can say that I am glad to see so many of you here to-night. I feel that I am hardly worthy of being a member of the family that has been chosen to do such a great work; however, as your host, I feel to welcome you one and all, and am very glad to be permitted to be here with you. Whether I shall fail or fall, I know enough about the family, which meet together as such, that it will not be their fault if I should fail or fall. I believe I have become better by having been associated very nearly to you, and in behalf of our family we welcome you to-night.

RESPONSE BY ALEXANDER H. SMITH.

(Reported by Estella Wight.)

Bro. Anderson, our host, it affords me a degree of pleasure to be thus welcomed to your home in this our family gathering; and while I recognize the fact that we, as a family, are few in number as compared to the multitudes of the world, yet I am pleased to remember that the prophet and patriarch, Lehi, in the blessing of his youngest son Joseph, being influenced under the spirit of prophecy, made the promise to Joseph that his seed would never be utterly destroyed, but they would continue unto the end as a factor in the great work of God. And I realize that thus coming together as we do to-night to commemorate the birth of the man chosen of God to introduce this latter-day work, that we are but moving in harmony with the spirit of the work so long ago begun, and that we are forming a link in the great chain of generations that have existed and are existing and do exist upon this land, and that the importance of the great event that we commemorate is little understood by the world, and I am prone to say that it is little understood by those who are really included in this great latter-day work, a great many of them.

I rejoice to see so many of the family present to-night. I have the assurance of the promise given in the declaration made by the prophet, Lehi, that the name will continue, and that as generations multiply, and the time of the coming of the Lord approaches, our family will then be recognized among those who shall welcome the Lord Jesus at his coming; and I cherish the hope that when he does come we shall see our father among those who shall come with him to dwell upon the earth. Notwithstanding his life's period of work was short, full of trial, full of trouble, full of hardships, yet the work which he accomplished in the years of his labor stands to-day as one of the grandest monuments of the power received by the man through the influence of the Spirit of God for the benefit of the human race—the whole race—and I rejoice, dear brother, that we are permitted thus to meet in your goodly home and celebrate the event of the birth of our progenitor. And I hope and trust that in the future as we shall, from time to time, meet, our numbers shall increase, and we shall appreciate more and more the benefits of love and union that bind us together as a family. Thus I feel to respond to the kindly welcome, and trust that our meeting will be profitable.

This was followed by reports of officers, and minutes of last meeting. Paper by Elbert A. Smith: "Character Sketch of Joseph Smith the Patriarch." Read by H. Hale Smith.

Music,—Piano: Bertha Anderson.

Paper by Fred M. Smith: "The possibilities of the rising generation." Read by R. S. Salyards.

Address by President Smith: "The purposes of the organization."

Song by Sr. Audentia Anderson.

Benediction by Patriarch A. H. Smith.

The paper by Elbert A. Smith and address by President Joseph Smith, both being historical in their nature, were by vote of the body placed in the hands of the editors of the "Journal of History" for publication there.

Three new members were joyfully welcomed. Lois Audentia, daughter of Fred M. and Ruth L. Smith, Karl Kendall, son of Arthur M. and Stella Danielson-Smith, and Smith DeWalt, son of Jesse and Lucy Smith-Lysinger, who arrived the morning of the anniversary.

Out of town guests: President Joseph Smith, and son Israel.

VIDA E. SMITH, Assistant Secretary.

OUR HERITAGE.

Like bands of gold the race to hold

Are the ties of family,

And to loved who breathe the blest ones leave

Some treasured legacy;

No palace grand, nor wide-stretched land

Is the heritage we claim,

No gleam of gold, nor silver old,

Nor a laurel wreath of fame.

Not the heritage of some great sage

Whose name men love to tell,

Ours to spread with grace 'mid the human race

What our fathers loved so well;

Where the weak shall need we have voice to plead

And a hope when skies bend low,
Where is sad distress, reach a hand to bless
And a song as we forward go.

While the waters run 'neath earth's great sun,
Ours to tell the way to find Sweet sounds, O ear, that vibrate near
And glorious sights, O blind!
There's a balm of rest, O troubled breast,
And a work, O restless hand;
Our heritage gleams in fact and dreams
And reaches to every land.

A GOOD MAN TO SEND AFTER DELINQUENT SUBSCRIBERS.

A Chicago business man who last year made a trip to the Philippines, brought back with him a Filipino youth, whose mental alertness had made quite an impression upon him. The Oriental was installed in the Chicago man's office as a clerk, and he did very well, notwithstanding the fact that he was a trifle shaky as to his English.

One day the Chicagoan handed the Filipino a bill for some goods purchased by a customer a long time previously. "As this gentleman seems to have no intention of settling this account," said the business man, "I want you to typewrite a letter to him, stating that an immediate adjustment of the indebtedness will soon be expected."

In a few moments the Filipino laid before his employer the following effort:

"MY DEAR SIR.—This is to advise you that if you do not instanter send us the money you owe us, we shall be compelled to take measures that will cause you the utmost astonishment."—Harper's Weekly.

CURRENT EVENTS, SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS.

Lord Kelvin, the noted scientist, died at Glasgow, December 17. He was at one time president of the British Scientific Association, and was president of the Royal Society for four successive terms. He at one time expressed the sentiment, "In the beginning of all life God has reserved a place for his own appearing."

The thing we fear is the thing that gets us, as is illustrated by the following press dispatch from a prominent daily:

"NEW YORK, December 13.—Nervousness and superstition regarding Friday the thirteenth brought dangerous injury to three of a gang of thirteen workmen on the Third Avenue elevated structure at Seventy-third Street to-day.

Oscar Anderson and Tony Tiznosiski were putting rivets in the tracks when Anderson remarked its being Friday, the 13th, and said there were just thirteen men in the gang. Tiznosiski gave a start.

His hammer touched the third rail. An explosion followed instantly, and a second later the man's clothing was in flames. Anderson rushed to his aid, but his clothing caught fire also, and both men were horribly burned.

Foreman Daniel Murphy managed to tear the blazing garments from the pair and was himself badly burned.

That Harry H. Booker, leader of the "tongues movement" and superintendent of the Open Door mission, died literally of a broken heart, was the statement yesterday of Ezra Temple, until recently head of the sect at Perry, Iowa.

"The doctors say that death was directly due to a hemorrhage of the lungs, but I am of the opinion that his life blood from the heart, which was broken by his one time friends, and not from the lungs," he said.

At the bier of her dead husband Mrs. Booker yesterday afternoon in the little mission in Jennings Street preached to approximately three hundred adherents and friends of the sect. Mrs. Booker said she had not the slightest doubt that her husband's death was hastened by the persecutions of former members of his congregation. She felt his demise was due rather to mental strain than to physical ailment. Others who spoke were Reverend E. H. Stevens, pastor of the First Baptist Church, of which Mr. Booker was once a member, and Mr. Temple.

With a faint smile overspreading her features Mrs. Booker spoke in the afternoon for nearly an hour. She noticed a marked change for the worse in her husband's condition early last summer, she said, when, as a result of the "holy kiss," introduced by him, a large number of his co-workers severed their relations with the congregation. The kiss was imprinted by the leader upon the lips of all followers of the religion. It was persons who objected to seeing the women so saluted who deserted the ranks, she said, and placed obstacles in the path of Mr. Booker.—Sioux City Journal.

Say what we will, we may be sure that ambition is an error. Its wear and tear of heart are never recompensed; it steals away the freshness of life; it deadens our vivid and social enjoyments; it shuts our souls to our youth; and we are old ere we remember that we have made a fever and a labor of our raciest years.—Butler.

Elders' Note-Book

A MINISTERIAL ANECDOTE.

When the writer was prosecuting missionary work in Utah, he once boarded the train at Salt Lake, en route to Provo, Utah.

Before the train started, a gentleman came into the coach and shared a seat with the writer. He was a member of the Utah faction, and he and the writer were soon engaged in an animated controversy concerning their respective beliefs.

Across the aisle, directly opposite us, sat an elderly gentleman who, thrusting his body into the middle of the aisle, made no effort to conceal his desire, as the train sped along, to hear the strenuous religious controversy being waged.

At the first station, my opponent left the train. His face beaming with satisfaction, the elderly gentleman said to me, in substance: "Why, that fellow did not make a single point. You beat him at every turn." I replied: "I am glad you can see we have the truth." Continuing to applaud my arguments, and berate those of my opponent, he suddenly paused and asked: "Who was that fellow, anyhow? a Josephite?" Astonished and indignant, I answered with unpremeditated emphasis: "Why, no; I am a Josephite." The old gentleman sank back in his seat as if struck by a bullet. All attempts at further conversation proved useless. He was a Brighamite.

OUR FIRST SPANISH TRACT.

Dear Brother: Yesterday I finished the translation of the "Epitome" of our faith and doctrine into Spanish; also some matter which I first prepared in English and sent to the First Presidency for their examination and approval, to be printed on the reverse side of the Spanish "Epitome."

I sent both manuscripts yesterday to the HERALD Manager for publication.

I inclose you herewith the English manuscript of the matter to be printed in Spanish on the back of the Spanish "Epitome." It contains nothing new, of course, and the only thing that might give it interest is the fact that it is, (so far as the writer knows, at least,) the first tract the church has published in the Spanish language.

Your brother,

WILL S. PENDER.

BISBEE, Arizona, December 4, 1907.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION OF THE SPANISH TRACT.

RESTORATION OF THE CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST. THE ANCIENT GOSPEL, AS TAUGHT, PRACTICED, AND ENJOYED BY THE PRIMITIVE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, REVIVED. WORK ACCOMPLISHED BY AUTHORITY AND INSTRUCTION OF MESSENGERS FROM HEAVEN.

Reader, do the above statements astonish you? Have you understood from your childhood that the church established by Jesus Christ and his apostles at Jerusalem has continued to exist, from generation to generation, with the favor and approval of God, until now; and that it will continue so to exist until the end of time? And because of this understanding, are you prepared to condemn, without investigation, the affirmations contained in the title to this leaflet, as untrue, and lay the leaflet aside as unworthy further consideration?

INVESTIGATION COMMANDED OF GOD.

If you condemn without investigation, you disobey the counsel of God's word. "He that answereth a matter before he heareth it, it is folly and shame unto him."—Proverbs 18: 13.

"Prove all things; hold fast that which is good."—1 Thessalonians 5: 21.

How, then, shall we secure "evidence" to prove the matter before us? Shall we appeal to the pastor or priest for information? But these men do not agree among themselves. Ministers of the Protestant and Catholic churches differ in opinion, and ministers of the Latter Day Saints differ from them all!

WARNED AGAINST MEN; THE SCRIPTURES TO GUIDE.

No wonder Jesus said: "Take heed that no MAN deceive you. For MANY shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ; and shall deceive MANY."—Matthew 24: 4, 5.

How can we avoid deception? How can we know the true servants of God? "Search the scriptures."—Jesus; John 5: 39.

"What is written in the law?"—Jesus; Luke 10: 26.

" whatsoever things were WRITTEN aforetime were written for our learning."—Paul; Romans 15: 4.

"He whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God."—Jesus; John 3: 34.

"To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them."—Isaiah 8: 20.

DESTRUCTION OF CHRIST'S CHURCH PREDICTED.

"From the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force."—Jesus; Matthew 11: 12.

Examine also the following texts: Daniel 7: 21, 25; Revelation 12: 17.

After the destruction of God's servants, the doctrine of Christ was changed and corrupted, the covenant broken. (See Isaiah 24: 5; Acts 20: 28, 30; 1 Timothy 4: 1, 3; 2 Timothy 3: 1, 5; 2 Timothy 1: 1, 4; 2 Thessalonians 2: 1, 4.

RESTORATION OF CHRIST'S CHURCH PREDICTED.

Testimony of the Apostle Peter: "Whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began."—Acts 3: 21.

A time of loss and a time of "restitution" of all things "pertaining to life and godliness" (2 Peter 1: 3) before the Savior comes in glory.

Reader, you are living in the "times of restitution." The angel promised in Revelation 14: 6 has come and restored the primitive gospel and church.

The work predicted by the Savior is now being done. (See Matthew 24: 14.) We are sounding the warning voice (See Revelation 18: 4.) Isaiah's prophetic "ensign" is now raised. We earnestly invite you to "see" and "hear." (Isaiah 18: 3. See also Isaiah 5: 26; 11: 12.)

John the Baptist has returned, as a heavenly messenger, and conferred the priesthood upon men, as the Savior foretold. (See Matthew 17: 11, 13; also Malachi 3: 1, 5; Isaiah 40: 1, 5.)

Being thus authorized, the "baptism" and all other official acts in the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, are "of heaven" and not "of men." (Mark 11: 30.)

PRIESTHOOD CONFERRED BY ANGEL. BRIEF ACCOUNT, BY JOSEPH SMITH, THE PROPHET.

"In the ensuing month, (May, 1829,) we . . . went into the woods to pray and inquire of the Lord respecting baptism for remission of sins. . . . While we were thus employed, praying, . . . a messenger from heaven descended in a cloud of light, and having laid his hands upon us, he ordained us, saying unto us, 'Upon you my fellow servants, in the name of Messiah, I confer the priesthood of Aaron, which holds the keys of the ministering of angels, and of the gospel of repentance, and of baptism by immersion, for the remission of sins; and this shall never be taken again from the earth, until the sons of Levi do offer again an offering unto the Lord in righteousness.' . . . He commanded us to go and be baptized, and gave us directions that I should baptize Oliver Cowdery, and afterward that he should baptize me. . . . The messenger who visited us on this occasion, and conferred this priesthood upon us, said that his name was John, the same that is called John the Baptist, in the New Testament."—Church History, pp. 34-36, vol. 1.

LEAVES FROM LIFE.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF ELDER ISAAC P. BAGGERLY.

I was born at New Providence (now Borden), Clark County, Indiana, December 21, 1841. My father's name was David Baggerly, a minister of the Christian or Disciple Church. He began his religious life as a Universalist, which faith he abandoned for the Baptist faith, becoming a minister of the latter church at the age of eighteen. When Alexander Campbell began his reformatory movement, father joined his church and lived and died a preacher of Campbellism.

In 1845 or 1846, two missionaries of the Latter Day Saints made their advent in his neighborhood. Their names were Tibbett and Hoyt. He granted them the use of his pulpit and listened to their message. He asked them where the New Jerusalem was to be built. They said, "In Jackson County, Missouri." He did not oppose them; but did not join them. They left church literature, which he read, pronouncing it advanced theology. He died in 1847.

My mother was Miss Emily Scott, who married my father in 1832. Six children resulted from this union, namely: Elder John Scott Baggerly, Cynthia A. Baggerly, Elizabeth Baggerly, Isaac Perry Baggerly, Indiana Baggerly, and Elder Vardaman David Baggerly.

I was raised on a farm, and did the usual hard work required of boys in those early pioneer days. I was raised in a religious atmosphere, in the reform and radical religion zone of North America.

At the age of fifteen I united with the Church of Christ, called Campbellites.

About 1866 I was ordained an elder in the Church of Christ. Soon after, I began to investigate the literature of the Latter Day Saints, left at my father's home by Elders Hoyt and Tibbett. These books impressed me that the work was divine. Through my uncle, Elder John A. Scott, I learned of the SAINTS' HERALD, at Plano, Illinois, where I sent for the Book of Mormon and Orson Pratt's works.

I became more and more impressed, and sought, by prayer, for evidences of its divinity. In answer to my prayer I was shown the following vision or dream: I saw the old Campbellite church at Mount Eden, Indiana, and saw the body of the building disappear, except the floor and foundation. Then appeared a man in uniform, with a sword at his side. He had a grand, imposing appearance. His name was given to me as W. W. Blair. He came and stood upon the foundation of the old church and rallied my father's family.

In 1870, Elders W. W. Blair and Elijah Banta came to Mount Eden church, where they preached for two weeks, and held a debate with my uncle, Elder Vardaman Scott, of the Campbellite Church. My uncle met with a severe defeat. He confessed defeat by joining the church.

During this debate Bro. Blair dreamed that Vardaman Scott became unruly, and that he was compelled to use the sword on him. The sword, no doubt, referred to the word of God, "the sword of the Spirit," and thus my dream was completely fulfilled. About this time I, with thirty others, was baptized by Elder Blair. My mother, and brothers and sisters united with the church at this time, except Elder John S. Baggerly, who is still a Campbellite, and resides at West Fork, Indiana.

I was ordained an elder in 1870 by W. W. Blair. Persecution ran high. I was inexperienced, and hardly knew how to meet the opposition. One night I had the following vision: I saw the vineyard of the Lord. It looked like an orchard. There was a stone wall around it. It had a large gate which was thrown open, and President Joseph Smith stood in the gateway. (He looked just as he did when I afterwards met him, in 1876, on the prairies of Decatur County, Iowa.) I was standing in the vineyard idle. He said to me: "Why are you not pruning the vineyard?" I said nothing. The vision passed. The result was that I began preaching right away, and visited all that region of the country, and baptized many.

In 1875 I emigrated west, stopping in Illinois till 1876, then came on to Pleasanton, Iowa. I had not been there long till I was chosen president of the branch.

In 1876 I moved to Harrison County, Missouri, near what is now known as the Lone Rock Church. In 1877 the Lone Rock Branch was organized by Elders Moffet and Harder, and I was elected president, holding that position a number of years.

About 1886 I was appointed on a mission to Indiana. I preached in Jefferson, Perry, and Crawford Counties, baptizing a large number. Returned to Missouri and farmed till 1890, when I sold my farm and moved to Lamoni, Iowa. In 1890 I was appointed by the General Conference on a mission to Indiana and Kentucky. In 1891 I was appointed to Indiana and Kentucky. Was associated with my brother, Elder V. D. Baggerly, and found the work in Kentucky very arduous and trying. In 1892 I was ordained a seventy and was given a mission to Illinois. My mission in 1893 was Southern Indiana and Southeastern Illinois.

In 1894 I again took a mission to Southern Indiana, and was appointed by the Presidency minister in charge of the field. In 1895 I was returned to Southern Indiana.

In 1896 I was appointed to Texas; also in 1897, in charge of the field. In 1898 I was appointed to Texas and Indian Territory. In 1899, Texas; held a successful debate with Elder J. W. Chism this year.

In 1900 was appointed to Southwestern Texas. My mission in 1901 was Oklahoma; also in 1902.

In 1903 was appointed to labor in Spring River District, Kansas, and Missouri. In 1904, also 1905, my mission was Southern Indiana.

In 1906 was appointed to Ohio and Eastern Kentucky. In 1907 was appointed to West Virginia.

ON THE BOOK OF MORMON.

There has come to us in this age a most wonderful book, known as the Book of Mormon. It is not like any other book, for it has come to us as a revelation from God, that we might know concerning the people who dwelt on this land of America in the long ago; and that they knew all about Jesus Christ, for he visited them and taught them the very same gospel of glad tidings that he taught the Jews. And to leave all mankind without excuse, he called a jury of men to witness to the truth of it. The decision of twelve men is accepted as fact for law by the people of the United States of America. God's law is three witnesses. There are the three that saw the plates of gold and declare they saw the angel and heard the voice of God commanding them to bear witness to the truth; and these three, with the eight men who saw the plates and handled them, with Joseph Smith, make twelve men, a jury that bears witness to these facts. What excuse can men offer, on God's judgment day, who reject the book?

This book is above price, for the wonderful knowledge it contains; more especially from the facts admitted, that the Jesuits, when they came among the natives of America, for some reason, best known to themselves, burned all the books the natives had in their possession, and this act is much regretted by men of the world.

We learn from the first book of Nephi that those people had the Bible, as we have it, the five books of Moses, the other books, and some we have not. And when Jesus visited them, he gave them the last two chapters of the book of Malachi, saying, These scriptures which ye had not with you, the Father commanded I should give unto you, for it is wisdom in him that they should be given unto future generations. This and other parts of the book are what has made some men accuse Joseph Smith of copying from the Bible.

Moroni, in commencing his abridgment of the book of Ether, tells us the Jaredites had the Bible down to the time of the tower of Babel, and that he knew we had that, also; therefore he did not abridge it. These people kept the laws of Moses till Christ came; but they also lived the higher life, and, therefore, had the enjoyment of the spiritual gifts mentioned by Paul in his first epistle to the Corinthians. Moroni, in the last pages of the book, tells us of the same gifts four hundred years after the coming of Christ; and Amaleki makes mention of their enjoyment more than one hundred years before the coming of Christ, showing us that men may lose the light of truth and spiritual enjoyment by disobedience, but that God changes not and his blessings have ever been for the willing and obedient.

Our mother earth, the common heritage of all mankind, was held in common by the people. This once was so over all the earth, till what was known as the Dark Ages, when the rule of kings prevailed, and they then divided the lands among their favorites.

This book gives us a much clearer, better explanation of the state of the dead than other books; for it says that when our bodies die our spirits go right up to God, the heavenly Father. The good he sends to a place called paradise, a place of rest in peace, free from care and sorrow. But the disobedient, if they only knew, if they would only believe, they would not be wicked, for they are sent, or rather cast, into outer darkness. "There shall be weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth." How fearful are the judgments of the great eternal Father!

This book is most plain on the fullness of the gospel. Some have supposed that obedience to what is known as the first principles was all that is needed by the children of God. The book tells us they had all things common. And there were no contentions and disputations among them, and every man did deal justly one with another; and they had all things common among them, therefore there were not rich and poor, bond and free, but they were all made free, and partakers of the heavenly gift."—3 Nephi 1:2. Would not this be Zion? Can Zion be built up in any other way? What about the revelation on Fishing River? Here is the word of the Lord to people in our age:

Hearken, O, ye Gentiles, and hear the words of Jesus Christ, the Son of the living God, which he hath commanded me that I should speak concerning you, for, behold he commandeth me that I should write, saying, Turn, all ye Gentiles, from your wicked ways, and repent of your evil doings, of your lyings and deceivings, and of your whoredoms, and of your secret abominations, and your idolatries, and of your murders, and of your priestcrafts, and your envyings, and your strifes, and from all your wickedness and abominations, and come unto me, and be baptized in my name, that ye may receive a remission of your sins, and be filled with the Holy Ghost, that ye may be numbered with my people who are of the house of Israel.—3 Nephi 14:1.

If they do not repent, what then? To those interested it would be good to read the everlasting decree of God concerning those who dwell upon the land we call America; for some say the decrees are about to be fulfilled in this our day. Read book of Ether, chapter 1, verse 4, small edition; then the Bible, Micah, chapter 5, verse 8 to end of chapter; then turn to the book of 3 Nephi, chapter 9, verse 12; then read book of Ether chapter 3, verse 13. There read a warning cry against that which we as a nation are doing, and what will happen to us for so doing; for, of a truth, the decrees of God change not.

WHERE IS ZION, THE GATHERING PLACE OF THE SAINTS?

Should this question have been asked the faithful Saints who lived prior to and at the time of the death of Joseph the Martyr, we feel assured that their answer would have been in harmony with the Doctrine and Covenants 83:1, 2, (Utah edition, section 84, paragraphs 2, 3, 4), which states plainly that the Saints were to gather to Zion, which is the city of the New Jerusalem, which city should be built beginning at the temple lot in the western boundaries of the state of Missouri, dedicated by the hand of Joseph.

In Millennial Star, vol. 14, p. 327, also Times and Seasons, vol. 5, p. 707, we read the following: "The people of the Lord have already started gathering together to Zion which is in the land of Missouri." Let us also consider a statement from the pen of Orson Pratt, as found in "A Series of Pamphlets," page 18, published after the death of Joseph the Martyr, which reads as follows: "But where is the spot where the city of Zion or the New Jerusalem shall stand? We answer, in Jackson County, Missouri, on the western frontier of the United States. It is there that the city of Zion shall be built. All the other cities that have been built by the gathering of the Saints are called, not Zion, but stakes of Zion."

There are a multitude of other citations that could be presented to carry out the above position; but, as sufficient has been quoted, I now desire to present for the consideration of the reader the statement of a great usurper and a man who has done so much to mislead the people in regard to the position of the early church concerning the subject in hand, as well as many other positions and doctrines sanctioned by him (Brigham), although contrary to the mind and will of God. Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 253, Brigham Young states: "When our elders go out to preach the gospel they tell the people to gather to Zion. Where is it? It is at the city of the Great Salt Lake in the valleys of the mountains in the settlements of Utah. There is Zion."

In the life of Brigham Young we find a statement uttered by Wilford Woodruff, who was one of the thousands blinded by the influence of Brigham, and who with him wandered, to locate Zion, hundreds of miles west of the place dedicated by the hand of Joseph. Woodruff says, August 6, 1847: "We came into the valleys to locate and build up Zion here."

Inasmuch as the Lord has spoken, Doctrine and Covenants 98:4 (Utah edition, section 101, par. 17, 20), "Zion shall not be moved out of her place . . . neither shall there be any other place appointed . . . for the work of the gathering of my saints," will not the attempts of these great leaders and their thousands of followers ultimately result in failure, and will it not prove as difficult a task for these people to move Zion out of her place as it has been for them to prove a justification of polygamy on the Lord's part when he had so emphatically proclaimed it an abomination? DIVORCE.

I am disposed to make a statement of my views on the question of marriage and divorce.

I have not in my possession any conference resolutions on this subject; but the subject itself is not shorn of its importance by this fact. It occurs to me that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," and the sanctity of the home is the chief bulwark of the church and nation, and that any action of General Conference must be to the safeguarding of the church, and enforcing the divine law upon its members. It necessarily follows that an observance of God's law by all would render such action unnecessary. The further fact that we have the evil of divorce among us is sufficient cause for the adoption of pacific measures to meet present needs as circumstances demand. Those measures, as I view the situation, must be broad in their scope.

The fact that the church is making converts in the world continually, and as it is claimed that in the last twenty years one million divorces have been granted and two hundred and fifty thousand denied in the courts of the United States alone, it gives us a sort of basis to figure from; and in order to make myself understood I will illustrate thus: Suppose two persons are divorced; the one who sues and obtains, also, is the first to get married again; and the scriptural cause is not had in obtaining the decree of annulment of the first marriage. Then the one who was put away gets married the second time, also; making four persons involved. Those four persons hear the gospel and believe and repent, so far as they can, but there is no room for repentance for the act of divorce, and further, they both have committed offense by remarrying, justifying divorce. It manifestly is the duty of the church to receive all of these, tell them to love each other with all their hearts, and sin no more. And further, when one gets a divorce without the scriptural cause and remarries, the act of marriage frees the other, or the put away person; but the put away person is not justified in marrying prior to the aggressor taking the step; except he or she has positive proof that the aggressor is also an adulterer or adulteress. In case the parties are both at liberty yet, and those two should come for baptism it manifestly is the duty of the church to receive the one who is put away if he or she repents of all sins; and to refuse the aggressor until proper restitution is made.

We will turn now to those who are in the church, and for illustration; the law of God justifies the execution of murderers, and should such escape the death penalty and be confined in the state's prison, I believe divorce is justifiable without mercy; but in cases of theft and extortion and confinement in state's prison for these or other crimes of similar nature, if the offender repents "in sackcloth and ashes," and desires not to be put away, and it is manifest that such repentance is genuine, the other is bound by the law of God to forgive. Under what law has the one who truly forgives the companion who violates the contract a right to procure a divorce and marry again, is a question I will propound to you, and all others who believe that justice executes the law; but if they do not repent after due labor, and it is clearly manifest that a hardship will be worked on the innocent, I believe divorce justifiable.

Fornication and its meaning in the day it was used is quite clear. When the Jews said to the Savior, "We be not born of fornication. We have one Father, even God." Also by the saying of Paul, the apostle, in which he said, "It is commonly reported there is fornication among you, and such fornication as is not even named among the Gentiles, that a man should have his father's wife." It is far evident when Moses gave commandment that when a man treacherously said he found his wife not a virgin, and her parents proved him deceitful; and in this case the commandment of Moses was, "he may not put her away all his days," I say it is far evident Moses knew what he was talking about.

You may say to me: You seem to be lenient to the man who repents in prison, and yet are willing to give the wronged person a divorce whose companion does not repent. My answer is this; there are no loose women in state's prison, and adultery is impossible. I say, turn the impenitent loose among evil women and the penitent also loose among them and see which will give the scriptural cause first.

I will not stretch this out too long, nor get profound in the matter, for you have all agreed among yourselves that you are qualified and have more wisdom on these lines than others, by the fact that you acknowledge yourselves as those appointed to give light to the world. In conclusion I earnestly hope that a check will be put to the further spread of this evil.

Yours in the truth,

GEORGE DALY.

[Apropos of the above views on the question which will occupy the stage at the next session of Conference, we are fain to acknowledge that we all are agreed that none of us have yet reached that condition of self-esteem and self-laudation that makes us to think or to claim that we know all that is to be known on the subject, or to cause us to be unwilling to learn what others may know and be advised thereby when its value and applicability have become familiar to us.—EDITOR.]

ORIGIN OF THE RELIGIO SOCIETY IN THE SOUTH SEA ISLANDS.

Every now and again in our church papers there has appeared during the past year references to my work of organizing the Religio in the South Sea Islands, as being premature. It would seem that the organizer of that work there ought to know something about it and should have been the one to write up the account, hence I write.

I do not think the work was premature at all, as facts and subsequent events will show. Furthermore, I was divinely directed to organize it, after many seasons of prayer for light to know how to relieve conditions there.

Had the work been continued as it was started, it would doubtless have been a blessing to the Saints and others and have prevented much of the opposition and rebellion that has arisen since. They would have better understood the law.

Not all the facts concerning this matter have been brought out. Especially is this true concerning the literature they had access to in the islands. Bro. Burton had published a monthly periodical in the native language called the Orometua. Besides various articles of interest taken from the SAINTS' HERALD, there were published the history by Lucy Smith; "Joseph Smith and his Progenitors"; also the laws concerning, and duties of the various officers of the church, from the First Presidency down to the leader of the singing; how members should act, what they should and what they should not do; how difficulties should be adjusted, and how to proceed against transgressors; elders', bishops', and other courts, including that of the high council. The baptismal, marriage, and sacramental formulas, etc., etc., with T. W. Smith's instruction as a basis. But the paper was not sent direct to the subscribers, but kept in the office till the end of the year and then bound in a book. Some of these books were delivered or sold to the natives at conference, and others to the various branches during the year, as the missionary could get from island to island. I delivered dozens of these books myself, but found the former volumes had not been read, and upon visiting the islands again found the same to be true of the last ones. The branch and district officers, and especially the members, scarcely ever read them.

There was far more necessity to organize a class to study the history and laws of the church among the natives in the islands than to organize one in America to study literature. Happy thought, however, that the Book of Mormon was made the basis of study in America. It was well that in the islands they study other things first. The Doctrine and Covenants was almost all translated, and would soon be in the hands of the natives. The Mormons had finished the translation of the Book of Mormon, and that was soon to be printed in Tahitian. The time, therefore, was fully matured to study the Orometua. If it was premature to study the Orometua, was it not more premature to have published it? Am I to be blamed by those who launched the paper for getting people to read it?

In less than a year the "society," as the Religio is called there, had given the natives a better understanding of church history than all the years of missionary work before. The natives enjoyed it and learned remarkably. Brn. A. H. Smith and Leon Gould were agreeably surprised at the familiarity of the natives with our church history. Bro. Alexander often remarked that he hardly expected to hear the names of his grandfather's family and the places of their residence as familiarly spoken of among the Islanders as among the Americans. There was sufficient material in the Orometua to furnish them study for five or six years. So the society was not premature for want of material, unless the material was premature. But why has it been thought necessary from time to time to write of my work as premature, and cast a reproach on the wisdom of my actions? If it was done, it is enough to know it there. It does no one any good here and I am not benefited by it. The facts are, it was not a premature work but a necessity, and doubtless had I neglected my duty my successors would gladly have attended to it.

As long as we were in the islands all went well with the Religio. This fact the correspondents from the islands voluntarily admit. Clearly, then, the fault was not ours, and the work not premature. The fault, if any, was in changing the lessons from the Orometua to the Book of Mormon, and assuming too great a burden in getting out lesson leaves on a mimeograph. The burden was too great for the missionaries, much as their hearts may have been in the work. The matter was too complicated for the native mind. Had it continued as organized it would have been a blessing after we left, as it had been before.

Besides the literary side, there was instituted in the islands, as in America, a social part to the Religio. The natives show their greatest talent in arranging dialogues on religious topics and Bible parables, in singing, and in singing contests, and so it was a source of light to outsiders and a joy to the Saints to engage in some of these after their study hour. My wife, as is done in America, taught the children many drills, and to march to music, to stand and sit in unison. Sometimes the older ones took part in this.

As I wrote shortly afterward, we made one mistake, in the mind of the Saints in Tahiti. We should have organized the Religio in Papeete rather than on the coral islands. There has always been a kind of smothered jealousy between those who live in Tahiti and those who live on the coral islands. But we organized when we were shown our duty, and we were then on the coral islands. After organizing a few societies I was called to Papeete to pay for the translation of the Doctrine and Covenants and to assist Metuaore to get off to America with it in his possession. The stormy period coming on, I was detained four months in Tahiti, but my wife traveled from island to island, organizing Religios, helping with Sunday-school work, and answering questions concerning church work—month after month without seeing a white person, sometimes sick nigh unto death, sometimes wading water to her waist, and only natives to care for her. She assisted them in their drills and dialogues and helped them to prepare for the coming convention in Papeete. While in Tahiti I mentioned the Religio to the Saints there, but they did not seem to care for it, and so none was organized. When the Saints and members of the Religio began to gather from the coral islands, for the conventions and conference and to practice their drills and matutus, the Tahitians, realizing they would not be represented in the Religio convention, began to find fault with the drills, calling them dances, and the matutus as too severe on other churches. Both parties asked me to go and test (hiapoa) them and regulate them. I went and investigated every drill and every dialogue before it was brought into the conventions, and with one exception (one drill), found them to be perfectly legitimate and proper. But it did not satisfy the Tahitians, who joined with the Protestants and Catholics to find some fault. But the matter passed off, as many a similar incident at home. When, however, Alexander and the new missionaries arrived, the matter was by a very few mentioned to them. The matter was talked over and, so far as I knew, no blame attached except to the faultfinders. Had I remained, I probably would have regulated still further the points of offense, and eliminated as much as possible their jealousy. This would have narrowed rather than broadened the breach between them. Regulation is often needed among the Islanders, and the Religio was not the only branch of church work that needed it. As long as we were on the ground all went well, with a little regulation. The Lord recognized this and advised more help to be sent, and that the natives be dealt with in kindness.

I was a year and a half in the islands before I saw the need of the Religio, and even then it was forced upon me, contrary to my purposes. Owing to the peculiar French laws, many couples in those islands are living together unmarried, so far as the laws of the land are concerned; yet many times they are the best people in the islands. They have chosen their own companions and are living with them faithfully; but because some relative or officer will not give consent they can not be married. Time and time again these parties have come to me and plead with me to baptize them, and when I informed them I could not because of their marriage relations, they have gone away sorrowfully. Often I prayed over the matter. One time, when one of the best women in the islands had requested baptism, after a sermon I had preached, and she had informed me that she and her companion would get married if the governor (a Catholic) would give consent, I could see more plainly than ever before the need of doing something for that class. But I could only refuse her. As she went out from my house weeping and saying, "What can I do? What can I do?" I was moved to do something to help them. This class is permitted to take but little part in Sunday-school, and none at all in church work, and all avenues are closed to them to help in the work which they believe to be true. Owing to a custom fostered there of giving the elders and their wives the front seats, and grading them back to deacons and members, these people usually occupied the back seats. They wanted to help, and I was commanded to help them out of their difficulty. I went to work to study out how. I first decided to treat such cases as we do common law marriages in America, and baptize them. But the First Presidency had advised me to change no custom of my predecessors, and besides that the Spirit did not indicate or approve of such a course; and not till I thought on the Religio and giving these parties an equal chance with all others did I receive the evidence of the Spirit, and I am willing to leave the matter with my heavenly Father, whether I did right or whether my work was premature.

In some places the outside element may have, after our return, outgrown the others, and drawn away the exercises from the original plan, and caused some trouble, even with the government, but that is no new thing. That often happened with church-work and Sunday-school work in the islands. What was needed was regulation, and not to have their heads chopped off.

The outsiders wanted to help financially, and I told them that tithing was the only plan God would accept, and so in some places they appointed a treasurer to receive the moneys of the society and bring it to the conventions, where it could be voted for whatever purpose they desired. If they afterward proceeded in an irregular way the "ir" might have been cut off and their heads left on.

I was not to blame for what they did after I left. If a crop is planted it must be cultivated. The work should be regulated and not destroyed; any work may be termed premature that is not cared for. I only state the facts. Conditions may be to blame, and not individuals. J. W. PETERSON.

[EDITOR'S NOTE.—This is a case where judgments differ, even when motives may accord. The wisdom of Bro. Peterson's course having been publicly questioned, we have considered it only fair that he should be heard in regard to the matter. Both sides have now been heard from, and so far as the HERALD is concerned, the incident may well close.—ASSOCIATE EDITOR.]

FULFILLMENT OF PROPHECY.

But I command you, all ye my Saints, to build a house unto me; and I grant unto you a sufficient time to build a house unto me, and during this time your baptisms shall be acceptable unto me.—Doctrine and Covenants 107: 10.

In the language of this prophecy, we learn that it was the Lord's will that a house should be built, and a baptismal font placed therein, that the Saints might be baptized for them that were dead. For he says this ordinance belongs to his house. We learn from same section, paragraph 11, if the house was not built at the appointed time, they were to be rejected as a church with their dead. Time passed by, until the dark day came, when the Prophet, according to Lyman Wight and others (see Church History, vol. 2, p. 790), announced from the stand that baptism in the river for the dead was no longer acceptable. Suspending baptism for the dead, was then of necessity a rejection of them as a church. And now come the dark days, or the widowhood of the church. Alienated from God, what must they do? The Prophet and Patriarch go now to their martyrdom. The Saints mourn their loss, and say, What must we do? Is there any hope?

Can we find consoling words from the pen of the prophets? We turn to the Prophet Isaiah and we find a statement that might be comforting:

Fear not; for thou shalt not be ashamed: neither be thou confounded; for thou shalt not be put to shame: for thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth, and shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood any more.—Isaiah 54: 4.

Though she were rejected, yet the Lord would speak and comfort her, that she might not remember her widowhood any more. In verse 7, the Lord says, "For a small moment have I forsaken thee; but with great mercies will I gather thee." And did the Lord not for a short time forsake the people, when the different usurpers were using their influence over the people, and while Young, Strang, Brewster, William Smith, and Joseph Wood claimed the leadership of the church, and all the Saints felt forsaken? How true the words of the Prophet in this seventh verse, when the Lord speaks to Zenos H. Gurley, to rise up, cast off all that claim to be prophets, and go forth and preach the gospel, and say that God will raise up a prophet to complete his work. As early as 1833, the Lord, speaking to the people through the Prophet, puts forth a parable which we will find in Doctrine and Covenants 98: 6-8. Here we find the time would come when they would be at variance one with another, and would not hearken unto the commandments of their Lord; and the enemy should come upon them, and the noblemen should become frightened and should flee, and the enemy should destroy their works. Ah, thou Nauvoo, once beautiful city on the banks of the Father of Waters, do not your old ruins tell the history of the past, and bear witness to the fulfillment of prophecy, both ancient and modern? Hear the words of the old prophet:

Though afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted, behold, I will lay thy stones with fair colors, and lay thy foundations with sapphires.—Isaiah 54: 11.

As much as to say, Though I have forsaken you for a short time, now, to fulfill ancient prophecy, I will lay thy stones with fair colors. Who was it that was afflicted? Those that felt the sting of the apostasy. Knowing it was God that must speak and call one forth to complete his work (for the promise had been made, that through the seed of Joseph, or his posterity, all the nations of the earth should be blest, the legal seed being then only about twelve years old), those noblemen should have done as they had voted, should have sustained the Twelve in their calling, instead of becoming affrighted and fleeing, some to Utah, some to Texas, some to Beaver Island, some to one place and some to another, not being able (or willing at least) to see that they, the noblemen of the church, were fulfilling prophecy in fleeing (see Doctrine and Covenants 98: 6), and also in gathering together "but not by me." (Isaiah 54: 15), with the many "lo heres" and "lo theres." The Savior said, Go not after them. (See Matthew 24: 23.)

And now comes the time for the Lord to lay their foundations with sapphire. Now those afflicted ones, tossed with the tempest, begin to see the brilliant rays of light coming from him who had hid his face from them for a moment. He begins to speak to Z. H. Gurley and others, telling them that young Joseph would in due time come forth and take his father's place. Why? The Prophet had said, "And while a stone points out a sacred spot where a fragment of American liberty once was, I or my posterity will plead the cause of injured innocence."—Times and Seasons, vol. 5, p. 395.

Though the bands following false shepherds should gather together, it would not be by him; for he says again in the sixteenth verse: "Behold, I have created the smith that bloweth the coals in the fire, and that bringeth forth an instrument for his work."

Then, together with the testimony of Z. H. Gurley, E. C. Briggs, and others, we also have the testimony of this instrument that the smith brought forth; and, even as Abraham had been blessed, so Joseph Smith had been blessed, that "in thee and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed"; and as the blessing had been put on the head of Joseph, the blessing should be put on the head of his posterity. (See Doctrine and Covenants 107: 18.) His testimony is as follows: "In Liberty Jail the promise of a life of usefulness to the cause of truth was pronounced upon our head by lips tainted by dungeon damps, and by the Spirit confirmed through attesting witnesses."

Upon other occasions the blessing was also pronounced upon his head by his father. (See Exegesis of the Priesthood, page 26.)

Though the olive-tree had been broken down by the enemy in Missouri and Illinois, yet the Lord was to call upon one of his servants, and tell him to gather together the residue of his servants, young men, and the middle-aged, and all the strength of his house, which was weak at that time, and was to go straightway unto the land of his vineyard and redeem it, and to break down the walls of the enemy, and throw down their towers, and scatter their watchmen. The prophet that the Lord was to call or raise up to complete his work, comes to the conference convened at Amboy, Illinois, April 6, 1860, and in his own words: "I come by a power not my own." What for? In fulfillment of prophecy to call upon the residue of the servants to begin to gather together unto the goodly land, and while many weapons have been formed against the Reorganization, and many false doctrines added to the true church, yet they have not stood. Though Brigham Young did make the statement, and call it a prophecy, that polygamy would sail over, and ride triumphantly above all the prejudice and priestcraft of the day, instead of it sailing over, and riding triumphantly above all, we find the evil spoken against, and their ministers dare not teach it today. So in fulfillment of the prophetic words of Isaiah 54: 17:

No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; and every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment thou shalt condemn. This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord, and their righteousness is of me, saith the Lord.

Have those weapons formed against the true doctrine of Christ stood? such weapons as polygamy, Adam-god theory, and blood-atonement? Have they not met the servants of the heritage, and those damnable heresies been condemned? And the true light still shines.

Of General Interest

IS HONESTY THE BEST POLICY?

We have upon a former occasion reproduced from the Kansas City Journal editorials and lay sermons, or portions thereof, which have been excellent in their character and have stated principles and truths worthy of consideration. We here give the Saints one from a secular standpoint, that is valuable for that reason. It does not come from the pulpit in ostensible arraignment of wrong-doers, holding men to ridicule for their peculiar peccadilloes and lapses from right thinking and right conduct, but places before the mind the natural consequences which would result from bad advice arising from a too easy yielding to the influences of the things of this world. We commend the reading of this editorial, taken from the Kansas City Journal of the 15th, to the readers of the HERALD.—EDITOR.

Honesty is best, of course; but is it the best policy? We have been consulted by two or three young men lately. One aspires to "succeed" in politics; another in journalism; another in medicine, etc., etc. They wish to know how.

Suppose we had said to the young preacher: "The controlling desire, after all, of your people is to be amused, made comfortable and easy in their minds. They love to feel virtuous. Help them to feel virtuous without the pains and sacrifices of being virtuous. Your master's creed was, in fact, somewhat stern; gloss it over; soften it, mellow it, explain it away.

"Don't study your Master's creed, but find out what your hearers already incline to, and preach that—hard. Stir their emotions, please their tastes, come out strong on the sins of other classes and other climes. Invent your own illustrations, state things as you would like them to be. It is not necessary to be truthful or accurate, provided your illustrations and statements of facts move the right feelings and lead to the conclusions your hearers like."

Suppose we had said to the young doctor: "The main thing is bluff and nerve. Nine out of ten of the sick would get well if you never went near them, but never admit that. Let every ailment corrugate your brow with care; draw a long face before your paymaster; be assiduous, active, energetic; let every one of the nine recoveries appear to be the result of your skill and attention. Be agreeable. Never tell a woman she is lazy or a man that he has eaten too much. Talk about overwork, etc., etc."

Suppose we had said to the political aspirant: "Make friends of the many; enemies of the few. Go to church; join the Y. M. C. A.; preach beautiful sermons; talk loudly for virtue, and so win the innocent and virtuous many. Then do whatever is necessary to win the vicious. Count noses; count noses; count noses! Preach enforcement of the law with a loud voice, but if there is a very numerous opposition, condemn the law. Oppose men supposed to be bad, but never bolt a ticket. Lecture on temperance, but set 'em up to discreet friends who understand politics. Preach with the preachers, pray with the prayers, and damn with the condemners. Talk reverently of Jesus Christ, but pursue your enemies with a big stick. Preach civil reform, but give the appointments to practical party workers. Speak soft, but whale your enemies! Keep in the limelight. Talk reform all the time, but get your money where you can," etc.

Or suppose we had said to the journalist: "Fear nothing and nobody—least of all your conscience. Let it be known—quietly—that you have no principles; that you are restrained by nothing but your own will and interest. Let it be known that you bite; that you strike and strike hard, and strike in the back if need be.

"Compel people to subscribe and to advertise: Compel them. A newspaper is publicity. Teach the community the advantages—and disadvantages—of publicity. Sell your advertising, sell your news, sell your editorial opinions. Sell every inch. Sell your speech, and above all sell your silence. It is well enough to have men like you; but it is necessary to have them fear you. Cause them to fear you and then sell to them. Sell, but sell high.

"Watch your space. Mention no non-subscribers except in connection with the police court. Give praise to no man who does not advertise. Coax the advertisers, bully the advertisers. Coax the politicians, bully the politicians. Coax the corporations, bully the corporations. Let all men know that it is wise to pay tribute.

"Play on the fears and vanities and weaknesses of all men. Make every single word in the paper pay something and a lot of words not there pay a good deal. This is the way to success, but you must be bold and intelligent."

If we had said all this, should we not have described with great accuracy the means to complete success practiced by very many men?

He that has never known adversity, is but half acquainted with others, or with himself. Constant success shows us but one side of the world; for as it surrounds us with friends, who tell us only our merits, so it silences those enemies from whom only we can learn our defects.—Colton.

An Experience.

Being in great agony of mind one night, I was preparing to retire. I was putting up the shades, that the early morning light might stream into the kitchen and living rooms. I looked up at the stars and the heavens in which they were set. My heart leaped up! There was always left to me the trust in my Redeemer. As I stood there looking up, with eyes overflowing with tears, these stanzas came to me; later I wrote them:

MY REDEEMER.

Oh, great and holy art Thou,
Thou Lord of peace and love,
Who help and comfort giveth,
From thy blest home above.

Look down upon and bless me,
As Thou dost see me now;
For gracious recognition,
My soul to thee doth bow.

My heart o'erflows with praises,
To thee, the lovely One,
Thou art my dear Redeemer,
Thou art my Father's Son.

HORTENSE SELLON CRAMER.

Against a Thorn.

"Once I heard a song of sweetness as it cleft the morning air, Sounding in its blest completeness like a tender, pleading prayer:

And I sought to find the singer whence the wondrous song was borne,

And I found a bird sore wounded, pinioned by a cruel thorn.

"I have seen a soul in sadness, while its wings with pain were furled,

Giving hope, and cheer, and gladness, that should bless a weeping world;

And I know a life of sweetness was of pain and sorrow
born;

And a stricken soul was singing with its breast against a thorn.

"Ye are told of One who loved you, of a Savior crucified;
Ye are told of nails that pinioned, and a spear that pierced
His side;

Ye are told of cruel scourging, of a Savior bearing scorn;
And He died for your salvation with His brow against a thorn.

"Ye are not above the Master; will you breathe a sweet refrain?

And His grace will be sufficient, when your heart is pierced with pain;

Will you live to bless His loved ones, though your life be bruised and torn,

Like the bird that sang so sweetly with its breast against a thorn?"

"And I found a bird, sore wounded, pinioned by a cruel thorn." Sorrow, heart-grief, is so wondrous in its touch upon the soul that it reaches down through the outer emotions, the selfish cries for carnal satisfaction, to the deeper feelings, the delicate heart-chords, that need alone to be moved to vibrate and bring forth the grander, the sublimer harmonies of life.

Only a girl-life sheltered in the soft radiance of a beautiful home. There is the wealth of light and joy showered at her feet—the music, the art, the poetry. Then follow the years of free, untrammelled life culminating in the great joy of earth-love. There is the entrance into the new life—the home created by her own hands, the deepening of the joy as there enters her life as a gift from God, two child-lives. The sudden eclipse of joy, of life—the darkness when, as it were, in one night the Master reached down and took again from earth his gifts. Hours of that deep soul-darkness when a sound penetrating all earth-cries, the refrain of all her grief, mingled and deepened into one note reaches the depth of feeling, causing to vibrate the latent chords of sympathy, of supreme compassion for a lost world.

And from that darkened room that shadowed life arises with the higher soul-beauty that the touch of sorrow reveals upon her face, to be the evangel of love to the prisons of the land—to carry the message of the light, the joy, of heaven that reaches, regardless of the darkness of physical environment, the life of the earth. Rose from the chamber of supreme earth-sorrow to set in vibration the mighty movement for the salvation, the uplift, of the fettered, trammelled life—the real spirit of the great reformatory ideals of the age, and through the years she has sung her

"Song of sweetness, as it cleft the morning air, Sounding in its blest completeness, like a tender, pleading prayer,"

"With her breast against a thorn."

The thorn of deepest heart-sorrow, subdued longing for the touch of the baby hand, the vision of a face.

Jenkin Lloyd Jones, in a sweep of vision, gave a picture of two heart-lives that became beautiful through the realization of earth-sorrow of wondrous ministry:

"In the Italian town, Sienna, was born Catherine, into the home of a dyer; early she saw visions; gladly she vowed herself to silence and to service; preferred to sleep on a pine board with a log for a pillow. In a vision she took a crown of gold and jewels from her head and placed thereon a crown of thorns. To her was given the gift of tongues. Perhaps she was the first of that long line of women who have swayed people by public speech. Art and poetry join with history in glorifying the life of St. Catherine of Sienna, the poor girl, who rose to be a power in king's palaces and to be a bishop of bishops. Now a guide and anon a terror to cardinals and popes—and she won her power by renunciation.

"Then there was born into the home of the king of Hungary, Elizabeth, who entered into the joys and delights of a palace. She became a happy bride and a devoted mother; and through all this, not in spite of it, became the 'Mother Bountiful,' the benignant hand, the willing feet, that carried sunshine into hovels, that nursed the plague-smitten, cheered the dying, sheltered the orphan, and encouraged the lonely, in such a fashion that she is known in history as 'Saint Elizabeth.'"—Mary P. Denny, in Christian Home.

Editors Herald: After an absence of seven months in South Dakota, I have returned to my home, and realize the import of the poet's words, "Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home." But this does not in any way reflect on the Saints and friends in my mission, in whose homes I ever felt welcome, and have been treated with great kindness.

With the coöperation of my associate, we had contemplated a series of meetings in Brookings, South Dakota. It was our intention to rent a store building on a business street and have a reading-room in connection with it, to contain our church publications, open to the public during the day for reading, and for preaching at night; and in connection with it we had fifteen hundred copies of "Good News" printed. Its first edition was especially for our mission, with a cover designed suitable to our needs. When the time came for our effort, fate was against us, or Providence for us; which it was the future may reveal. A desirable location could not be obtained at any price; and for undesirable ones the price asked was exorbitant. Missionaries can not stop because of difficulties. They must be resourceful and get around them. By an agreement with my companion, L. G. Wood, we concluded to separate, and make a systematic distribution of "Good News." He went to Madison and I to Salem, a railroad junction point, and from there reached Sioux Falls, Parker, Montrose, Letcher, Mitchell, and Scotland, and by going to the people's homes and using the mails we reached about three thousand people, an average of two to a family, and among that number was more than one hundred preachers and fifty school teachers. The total cost about thirty dollars, or one cent each. This included the booklets, postage, expressage, and special railroad trips.

How much good it may do is an unsolved problem. We have the satisfaction of knowing that we gave that number of people an opportunity to read the equivalent of eight well condensed sermons, and it can not result in less than has come from the efforts of the missionaries in this mission in the last twenty years,—not a branch or Sunday-school in it, about one hundred members. Of that number about thirty-five have been baptized; the others moved in from other States. And during that time the mission did not lack good preachers.

It may be an opportune time to say something about distributing tracts from the standpoint of our experience. The public have gained most of their incorrect ideas about our people from what is printed in books, papers, and magazines. It is easy to determine that at the rate we are reaching the people by public preaching, it will take one thousand years for the people of this country to hear a correct statement about us. In my work I assume that people are about as I am, and so govern myself accordingly. If in business or other labor I would resent any effort on the part of an individual to come and talk religion to me. If I were a woman, and a stranger wanted to come in my home and talk religion to me, I would not receive him. It is a privilege that none but an invited guest has a right to use; and a self-intruded visitor is in no sense a guest. It is necessary to reach the greatest number of people in the most convenient and economical way, because of no opportunity for public preaching. The best months are April, May, September, and October in the Northern States; the best time of the day between nine and twelve o'clock in the morning, and one and three o'clock in the afternoon. The women are in their kitchens, the doors are open, it is easy to attract their attention, and, with a pleasant good morning or afternoon, remark that you have something for them to read. They will usually thank you for it. In this way we avoid annoying them by calling them from their work to answer a call at the front door.

Sometimes there is no response to your knock; the mailbox on the front of the house is a convenient place to leave the message. In this way it is easy to reach three hundred families in one day. By this method one person can distribute twenty-five thousand in a season, or reach fifty thousand people, at a cost not to exceed two hundred and fifty dollars, or one half cent each. It is also important what we give them to read. A tract on a specific subject is of little value as an introduction. The question will always be asked, Who and what you are, and so long as there is a possibility of connecting us with the people of Utah, our efforts will have poor results. Many people prefer to take their chances of hell in the next world to being classed with the people of Utah and their abominations in this life. A simple statement of who and what we are, put in the hands of every person in our country, would bring good results, and we would learn that most people are disposed to treat us fairly, after they know who and what we are. We will find it a valuable asset to make friends with the public, if we can not convert them. These ideas carried out, with such improvement as experience would suggest, would make it possible, at a cost of five hundred dollars per year, to reach one hundred thousand people, and in no way interfere with the work of a missionary, but be of great aid to him. And this does not in any way come in conflict with the missionary who may have tracts on special subjects to give to those who may attend his meetings, or the members at home who may want to give to their neighbors.

In parts of October and November I visited the Saints of Salem, Spencer, and Letcher, and held meetings on Sundays. On November 15 I went to Springfield, and in the country, at the home of Sr. S. A. Allen, held ten very interesting meetings, and some seem to be almost persuaded to obey the truth. On the 25th I went to Fairview and made a short visit among the few Saints there, and then passed over to Akron, Iowa, and remained one week, and made my special theme the temporal law, and how to prepare to go to Zion. My efforts were appreciated, and I saw good results before I left, and feel assured of more in the future.

The past year's labor has resulted in some good. The Saints have aided more generously in the financial needs of the church, and we have reached more non-members than in any other year. Because of the season for farm work being short, and the winters long and cold, and an abundance of snow, the period for the missionary is very limited.

Your brother in gospel bonds,
EDWARD RANNIE.

BURLINGTON, Colorado, December 12, 1907.

Editors Herald: On November 28 I was requested by the W. C. T. U. to give a talk on temperance to the people of this vicinity, which I did, and at the meeting a prominent doctor and a Sunday-school teacher joined that organization. I was given a membership in the organization, but as they refused to take the dollar for my dues, I apply it on my subscriptions to HERALD Office publications, feeling that it is badly needed there.

I am preaching every Sunday to the people of a union Sunday-school, five miles from my farm. We have the meetings in a sod schoolhouse, and the average attendance is about fifty. My wife and I are the only Saints that go, and we feel a great need of help. Will the Saints please pray for us? For over a year I had no place to preach after coming here from Far West, and I wondered what I was here for, and what would become of me if I did not preach this gospel to the people. I know that many have had these feelings, and find them uncomfortable to say the least; but thanks to God, I am happy now!

I will tell you how I got this opening. A union Sunday-school was organized there last summer; but for some time I did not feel like asking for the privilege to preach, as the patrons and pupils of my day-school attended, and I feared that teaching and preaching to the same class, would not go well together. But one day when returning from the Sunday-school a feeling came on me, something like this: I imagined I could see some of them going away to the prison-house and they spoke words to me such as these: "Here you are an elder, and you knew this would be our doom if we did not accept the way of life which you could have taught us. Why have you not told us this, that we might have avoided such a doom?"

What the result will be, I do not know; but I intend to continue making an effort to reach them.

Your brother,
FRED B. SHUMATE.

Fox, Colorado, November 17, 1907.

Editors Herald: I would like space in your valuable columns for a few words. We are still trying to hold fast to the faith, which is the only way to life and salvation. Our branch was torn up several years ago, but now is reorganized and we have Sunday-school and prayer- and testimony-meeting, and preaching by Bro. G. E. Crofford as priest, and Bro. W. M. Allison as teacher. Sr. L. M. Johnson is our Sunday-school superintendent. We long to see our brother and sisters who left us some years ago, Bro. O. B. Thomas, and others.

I would ask if any one knows of some good brother and sister without children, who would like to lease a place with stock on it. I would like to get some one that is good with stock and would work for his interest as well as mine. I will furnish the place with everything, and board them, and give them a good lay out. Write for particulars.

Hoping to hear from some one soon, and with best wishes to all Saints, I am,

Your brother in Christ,

J. O. COLPITTS.

PAPEETE, Tahiti, December 7, 1907.

Editors Herald: We have been under the necessity of waiting seventy-two days for news from America, which has been very trying on the French people and merchants, as well as upon us; but it is all over now, yet there are many HERALDS, Ensigns, and other papers unread; for we only have a short time to answer correspondents, so we do not have any time to spare.

The government will open the diving season for pearl-shell on April 15 next, which would not give the Saints time to attend conference and return to the diving islands, at the opening of the season, which of course is the best part of the diving times, so we called the brethren together to consider the advisability of changing the time of conference. This we did, there being quite a number of the Tuamotus Saints present, especially from Makatea. After a free and full consultation it was decided to meet here on March 6 instead of April 6, which was unanimously agreed to on October 20 last. Yesterday I received a letter signed by eight of the leading officers in the branches of a district in the Tuamotus, asking to not change the date of the conference, but change the place from Papeete to Hikueru.

Bro. and Sr. Lake are at Aratika now, but expect to be at Kaukura for the Christmas holidays. They are well and are very kindly received by all the native brethren. They probably will be here some time in January or February.

Emma also is fairly well, and Bro. Mills' prophecy concerning the dark-skinned sisters of other nations often presents itself to my mind as I hear them telling her of their complaints.

May peace and the blessing of God rest upon all the Israel of God here and in all the world.

Your brother in Christ,
JOSEPH F. BURTON.

HOLDENVILLE, Oklahoma, December 16, 1907.

Editors Herald: The debate at Holdenville, between Bro. W. M. Aylor and J. W. Crumley, closed last night with a crowded house; standing room at a premium. The interest was good throughout. The debate lasted twelve sessions. We believe a grand victory was won for our work.

Bro. Aylor's deportment, together with his sound arguments, won the respect of the people. Many were heard to say, That man Aylor is a gentleman, a Christian, and has the truth.

Mr. Crumley represented the non-progressive Christians, and is the hardest man to meet that I ever heard in debate. But the everlasting gospel is like gold, it shines brighter all the time. The Saints were encouraged, and feel that much good was done. The debate closed with a good feeling on both sides.

Yours for the advancement of truth,
WILLIAM DAVIS.

KNOBNOSTER, Missouri, December 23, 1907.

Editors Herald: For the last few weeks I have had the pleasure in my weakness of assisting Elders W. S. Macrae and R. O. Self in missionary work in the Northeastern Missouri District. The greater part of the time we were holding services in a school building near Keytesville, having had good attendance, the best of order, and seemingly good interest.

We believe in the near future we will have in that part a more convenient place of worship, as we have found the people to be an intelligent, intellectual class, ready and willing to assist the good cause. I have had some experience, during my short stay in the field, that has been educational to me. I can say that in most of my feeble efforts to proclaim this work, God has blessed me wonderfully; but at times it seemed as if I were left alone to fight my own battles, thus showing me that without his help I could do nothing. Then, when feeling disappointed over the failures I had made, the Evil One, seeing his opportunity to attack the weakest point, would step in and seemingly almost say in words, You are not called; you are wasting your time. Then thoughts would arise in my mind: Oh! can it be possible I am deceived in my calling, and, also, in the divinity of this work, after receiving the many evidences I thought I could never doubt! But only a few hours did these doubts confuse my mind; for by going to God in humble prayer several times during the day, at last, in the evening about dusk, I received a new evidence from above which thrilled my soul with joy; and then I wondered why I was caused to doubt. But the power of the Evil One is great, and I know we can all expect to be tried; for God has declared he would have a tried people. As I realize these trials will strengthen us and prepare us for a greater work if we will only live humble and faithful, I am now ready to say, Let the trials come; but, O Lord, give me grace sufficient that I may stand. There is one thing that gives me comfort and consolation, and that is that God has promised he would not allow his children to be tried beyond what they would be able to bear.

Our meeting closed Sunday evening, December 8, and shortly after retiring the same evening I was studying how simple the gospel of Jesus Christ is, and how plain it is being made to the people, yet so few accept it. While those thoughts passed through my mind I beheld a light in the north side of the room. In the light was a closed book. In the center of the lid was a plate of gold, almost square. It remained quiet for a moment and then passed on eastward. Following it was an open book, and following the two was an angel. I realize it means something concerning the carrying of this gospel message, but as yet I have not received an interpretation. If any one is blessed with the interpretation, I would be glad to hear from them.

I am thankful I have been permitted to live in an age when the everlasting gospel has been restored, with all its gifts and blessings; and it is my earnest prayer, my desire, and my intention, by the help of God, to so live that I may be worthy of greater blessings and new evidences of this work from time to time.

I realize, as I have just started in this work, that there is a great battle before me; but I am ready and willing to bear my cross; for I know where there is no cross there is no crown. And even though this life should be full of trials and difficulties, our time here is only momentary compared with our life on the other shore, where there shall be nothing to hurt or molest; where there shall be no parting or good-byes, but where all shall be peace, joy, and happiness; for charity, the true love of God, will be ours to enjoy.

May God bless all who are engaged in this work, and encourage to press forward and fight the good fight of faith until we shall lay these mortal bodies down, or until Christ shall come to reign as King of kings and Lord of lords, is my prayer, OAKLEY RAYMAN MILLER.

SAREPTA, —, December 20, 1907.

Editors Herald: We have not had any preaching since last March, when James Pycock preached a few sermons, which inspired the zealous Roman Catholics to come to our meeting armed with books in support of their faith; also their Bible. We are out in the cold, being about thirty miles from our branch. We live near a summer resort, where, if our district president thought it advisable to come next year, about the first of August, or to send some good speakers, they might be able to preach to some of our wealthiest people.

We love to read both HERALD and Autumn Leaves.

Yours in the faith,
ROBERT GRAY.

SOUTH SCOTT, Indiana, December 23, 1907.

Editors Herald: Ere the old year expires, and is consigned to the hecatomb of the past, I wish to jot you a "wee dotty dimple." We began services here last Wednesday eve, and audiences have enlarged nightly, but the Christmastide is now on, and interest turns toward "Santa." He is more popular than I.

We are on one of the battle-grounds of Northern Indiana, made famous by the Scott-Braden debate. Its echoes have not faded away yet. The people do not tire of talking of the event which occurred thirteen years ago, during the verdancy of my youth. Well, virtues are often buried with men; faults live long.

The Saints at this place are endeavoring to keep in the line of faith and duty. Their kindness to me will not be forgotten. May their blessings be abundant. The little band has stood up well under the opposition and calumny heaped upon them by religious zealots. Sr. Walberry, as also Bro. and Sr. Healy, have passed along to the paradise of rest, and the remaining number are striving to keep the cause of Christ foremost.

Bro. and Sr. Maxton, whose hospitable home I now share, are the same staunch, true children of God, as in days agone. Sr. Maxton has not forgotten how to prepare things palatable, nor has she forgotten to emphasize, as she calls up stairs, and down, "breakfoost."

Bro. and Sr. Cassel have located in Angola. Bro. and Sr. Kissinger, Bro. and Sr. Petrie, Sr. Deller, Zimmers, et al, are standing as sentinels.

Many here believe the work; but protracted efforts are few and far between. The Disciples still maintain the rock-ribbed prejudice against the cause, and their chief effort seems to be to make the restored gospel look little, when they know it is the biggest proposition they ever confronted. The long-expected debate between the Disciples and the Saints is now made possible by Fremont citizens paying the expenses of the Disciples, and is booked for Fremont opera hall, in February.

Our services at Ithaca, Michigan, were enjoyable to both Saints and outsiders. We are to resume the work there next month. The winter has been beautified for services, so far; earth all robed in white, and track for sleighing just fine, with temperature just right. What is there to hinder the bells from jingling?

Ever hopeful,
S. W. L. SCOTT.

VINCENNES, Indiana, December 23, 1907.

Editors Herald: We are still trying to keep the campfires blazing, and doing our utmost to get the angel's message before the people of this community. We had Elders C. E. Harpe and P. A. Flinn here, and they held forth six nights to large crowds, with the best of interest. Bro. Harpe preached five sermons under the influence of the Spirit, and a great deal of prejudice was removed, and many friends made. I believe a good work can be done here, if we can get them back before the interest dies out. Saints of Southern Indiana, let us rally to the aid of the elders and their families, and see if we can not pay enough into the Bishop's hands so that more laborers may be sent into this field. Pray for me that I may hold out faithful to the end.

J. A. DAVIS.

HOLDENVILLE, Oklahoma, December 17, 1907.

Editors Herald: I have just closed a twelve-session debate at this place with J. W. Crumley, of the Church of Christ, non-progressive wing, and will send a little statement of the affair, to let those that are anxious to hear about it know that the Saints are well satisfied with results. Our prayers were answered. We used the man to get our work advertised at this place. The outsiders thronged nearly every night, congratulating us on our work, and expressing themselves that it is light to them. I gave out tracts to those who were anxious to have them, which were many.

Crumley was the greatest mixer I ever heard. He would misquote our books in nearly every instance. But I was there to turn on the light, and the people could see it. Our people are well thought of here as citizens. Brn. T. J. Sheppard, S. W. Simmons, C. T. Sheppard, R. B. Hixson, the Goodwin brothers, and others of whom we are not ashamed, live here. They have bought a church, built by the Methodists I believe, that will seat about three hundred people. We held the debate in it. I am to meet a man by the name of Young, of this same faction, at Davidson, Oklahoma, January 14. Bro. Case is to measure swords with a C. C. Parker, at Morrison, Oklahoma, I think some time in February. So you see we are into it. But the Lord is taking care of his work, and we are rejoicing.

Yours in the conflict,

W. M. AYLOR.

FALL RIVER, Massachusetts, December 24, 1907.

Editors Herald: Some time past, while in Cleveland, Ohio, I received orders from Bro. Greene to report to him in person, for the purpose of assisting in the evangelistic services planned for the Massachusetts District. Arrived in Providence, Rhode Island, all right, except perhaps being very tired by the long journey, and found Bro. Greene administering "bread of life" to some hungry souls. Assisted him during the evening session, and next day we journeyed to Attleboro, Massachusetts, where Ralph Farrell and Arthur Phillips were sowing the seed. The efforts in both places were conducive of good, and some were brought, or conducted, into the kingdom. Boston was next in line. Here is where Bro. Greene had his little "set-to" with a couple of elders from the land of salt. It is quite comical, yet disgusting, to note that in private homes, in sacred edifices, or in personal conversation on the street-corners, these men, when driven to their last defense, will always resort to bearing their testimony, "that Joseph Smith was a prophet of God, and the church which they esteem is of divine origin."

After the lecture upon "The naked truth about Mormonism," one of the Utah elders arose and requested that we give him a few minutes behind the pulpit. The request was granted. He arose and declared that they were not Mormons, and after this the familiar testimony was then rendered. After taking his seat, Bro. Greene arose and propounded a few questions. "My dear brother, didn't you hold a Mormon conference here in Boston last fall?"

"Yes, sir," was the reply.

"Did you not advertise with hand-bills that this was a Mormon conference?"

"Yes!"

"Do you not assert when visitng that you are Mormon elders?"

"Yes, sir!"

"That's all, thank you!"

Good interest was manifested by outsiders during the progress of these lectures, and evidently they were convinced as to our position relative to Mormonism.

Fall River was our fourth point in view. The second Sunday of the services, there were approximately forty outsiders in attendance, and about the same number out the third. Good attendance prevailed all through the third week of the series, and on the last Sunday we were somewhat surprised to note the largest crowd of the series. About fifty outsiders present. The writer was very much surprised one evening, after one of these services, being presented with thirty dollars to purchase a suit of clothing. I had been somewhat puzzled of late as to the cause of my drooping spirits. Now I know. I feel somewhat better. Thank you!

Practically all the Saints here are poor; and toil hard for a livelihood, and it was with great exertion that I could refrain shedding tears, as they bestowed upon me this gift. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples."

I note that we are in need of more men to take charge of singing and solo work in the field. Believe this is one of the essentials to successful missionary work, as the past as well as the present has proved this to be a fact. I wish I could persuade all young men in the church, who are not as yet affiliated with us boys in the field, to cultivate the gift of song, and to be proficient along all lines of music. It is very essential, as the Lord has suggested, that we proceed two by two, in the field; that one should be capable of handling the song-service part of the sessions, and, if possible, to have the voice cultivated to do effective solo work. In our rural districts, for instance, we find in many cases that an organ, or an instrument of any kind, is not to be had, hence we are obliged to rely wholly upon our vocal organs. And in the towns or cities, as the case may be, to make the services attractive, it is necessary that we make a specialty of both song-service and solo-singing. In some of our branches, solo work is scorned. Well, some ought to be,—the kind that simply shows the skill of the individual singing. This is all right, however, in its place; but selections must be rendered that will appeal to the congregation as an instructive part of the program, and will carry conviction to the heart of the sinner.

During a service in Dayton, Ohio, I heard the song entitled, "Will there be any stars in my crown" rendered. As the spirit rested upon this individual and the sweet strains were echoing through the structure, I noticed while gazing over the assembly that every one was in tears, and Elder C. Scott's face was illumined with that unction which emanates from God.

The "song" had done its work. I have heard with thanksgiving the prayer of the righteous, the strengthening sermons of the elders of Israel; but have never felt with such uplifting force the Spirit of God, as when listening to a song or solo rendered by one who was materially assisted by our Creator. Solo work of a right character should be promulgated in our church, because it is conducive of good, and in some respects more beneficial to the audience than some of the discourses we hear.

Our next place in view is Plymouth, thence to New Bedford and Haverhill. Only a few have entered the fold of safety; but we are convinced, by hearing statements of outsiders, that many have a better impression and understanding of our work than previous to these meetings.

The Saints in Fall River, and some of the other places, deserve credit for their assistance in these meetings.

We are here for good; and good we must accomplish, that right may prevail.

Your brother,
ARTHUR KOEHLER.

EVANSVILLE, Wisconsin, December 26, 1907.

Editors Herald: We wish space for a few lines regarding the dedication of Southern Wisconsin churches. According to previous arrangement Apostle J. W. Wight arrived in Wisconsin, from Chicago, December 13, and, as previously arranged, stopped for one night at Evansville, where the writer, together with the local force of the branch, had been holding forth in our rented hall for over a week. The little hall was well filled, and Elder Wight gave them an interesting discourse, which was followed by nearly an hour of answering questions propounded by the audience. The following day we took our departure for Lancaster, Grant County, and thence eight miles west to Flora, by team, where Bro. J. W. Wight filled an appointment for preaching that night in the Saints' new church.

The day following, December 15, the regular Sunday-school took place at ten in the forenoon, and at two in the afternoon, the dedication service. J. C. Edgington, presiding priest of the branch, was in charge of the service. Following the opening hymn, prayer was offered by G. J. Brookover, of the missionary force. A solo by the writer followed; and hymn by the audience. The dedicatory sermon was preached by president of the mission, J. W. Wight, and was enjoyed by all present. Dedicatory prayer by J. O. Dutton, and benediction by G. J. Brookover.

We hope that this church, which has cost so much labor and sacrifice on the part of Saints of the Flora Fountain Branch, and their friends, may remain for years as a place where the restored gospel may be preached, and thus the true light of the gospel radiate till many in that section of the State shall bask in the divine light of God's eternal truth.

Elder Wight remained with the Flora Branch holding meetings till the following Thursday, when he came to Oak Ridge Church, eight miles east of Lancaster, where the writer had gone on Tuesday and held two services before his arrival, together with the local force of the Buckwheat Ridge Branch. The audience that greeted Bro. Wight here was not as large as we had expected, owing to various reasons; but all present enjoyed the service. Bro. Brookover remained at Flora after Bro. Wight's departure and held one service or more.

We had a five-mile ride after that service to the home of Bro. August Gratz, and upon Friday, Bro. Wight and the writer departed for Soldiers Grove, arriving Saturday. We were met there by Bro. Wesley Davenport, and taken to his father's (Philip Davenport), where we made our home for the most part. Appointment was out for service that night, and Bro. Wight spoke to an audience that quite well filled the little church.

The following day, Sunday, December 22, at two o'clock in the afternoon, the dedication took place. Branch president, J. W. Whiteaker, being detained at home by ill health, Bro. Arthur Davenport, presiding priest of the Wheatville Branch, was in charge of the service. Following the opening hymn, prayer was offered by Bro. Philip Davenport, presiding teacher. The dedicatory sermon was by Elder Wight. The house was well filled; and again in the evening it was filled to its whole seating capacity. The writer offered the dedicatory prayer; benediction by Bro. Arthur Davenport.

The following Monday, Bro. J. W. Wight took his departure for Lamoni, for over Christmas.

We hope that the new church at Oak Ridge may be fully paid for in 1908, and dedicated to the Lord.

This writing finds me at home for a few days. We feel that the Lord's work is onward in Wisconsin.

We noted one sad thing while at Soldiers Grove. The home of Bro. and Sr. Frank Montgomery caught fire from a defective flue and burned to the ground, very little being saved. We hope that all Saints who have been blessed with plenty will send them a little means toward a new home. Address Frank Montgomery, Sr., Soldiers Grove, Wisconsin.

Your brother and servant,
JASPER O. DUTTON, District President.

WALFORD, Ontario, December 16, 1907.

Dear Herald: I still find it hard to work to bring the pure gospel of Christ before the people. The enemy is at work on both sides. After taking much pains to get out bills of my own handiwork, and tacking them up in somewhat of a storm of snow, they are then torn down by some evil one, or many, who do not love truth. But we go forward. The gospel is to be a witness before the end comes. So we try to struggle on, sowing the seed by the way, believing some will find its way into good ground, or true hearts.

I expect to organize a Sunday-school in this new opening, before I leave.

Yours in the struggle for truth,
R. B. HOWLETT.

Gleanings.

Editors Herald: I like this part of my field all right, and believe I can do some good here. I shall be satisfied, if I can only keep up the record in the future that I have made in the past week. I have married one couple, preached eight sermons, baptized and confirmed two. The weather has been good for this time of the year. Climate is fine. It seems like springtime to me. I go from here to Benson, and intend to go to Abbeville, Louisiana, soon. I have more openings than I can possibly make, more requests for meetings than I can accommodate; but if there are any Saints in Louisiana who read this letter, and desire a missionary to come and hold some meetings, if you will write to my home address, 2211 East Avenue, Springfield, Missouri, I will answer your letters and place you upon my list of correspondents, and will get to you as soon as possible. I hope to be returned to this field another year. There is certainly lots of opportunity for doing good. I hope to be remembered by the Saints in their prayers, that I may be able to do an effectual work in this part of the vineyard. Ever praying for the welfare of Zion and her cause, I remain,

CHAS. E. ERWIN.

Request for Prayer and Fasting.

Dear Herald: I would request the Saints everywhere to fast and pray, January 5, that my mother may be restored to health, if it be God's will. She has been afflicted for most a year with a cancer, inwardly. She suffers terrible pain at times. The doctors can not help her.

GERTIE BIGGER.

NIAGARA FALLS, Ontario, December 26, 1907.

News From BranchesDES MOINES, IOWA.

The Midwestern, a monthly magazine published here and devoted to the interests of the city, in the December number, has an article, "Des Moines as a church center." The article is nicely illustrated with many of the leading churches of the city and portraits of the ministers. Among the ministers are fine half-tone portraits of Elders J. F. Mintun, our city missionary, and E. O. Clark, our branch president.

The Sunday-school Christmas exercises were held on Christmas Eve, and were a success in every way. A large number of the pupils of the school took part in the program. The church was nicely decorated, a Christmas house occupying the pulpit, in which all the presents were placed. All the scholars of the school were remembered by their teachers, or the school, and the teachers were remembered by their classes. The Christmas of 1907 will long be remembered by our school as one of the enjoyable seasons of the year.

The president of our Religio, Bro. Ray Chandler, reached his twentieth birthday on December 19. On that evening the Religio members, en masse, went to his home, without apprising him of their coming. They presented him with an illustrated red-lettered International Teacher's Bible and a copy of the Book of Mormon; and as they were presented, were spoken of as the stick of Joseph and the stick of Ephraim being placed in his hands. The evening was enjoyed by all present.

Elder H. A. McCoy, who has been laboring in Minnesota for the year, and who was stricken with paralysis while in his field, is now at the home of his son in the city. He has improved much, and the Saints have hopes of his final recovery.

The branch officers have recently addressed a letter to all the members of the branch, thus showing their interest in the welfare of all those under their care. In this letter they call the attention of the members to the duty of attending the church service, the necessity of assisting in spreading the gospel, and the necessity of assisting the church work financially. Recent additions to the branch have placed the membership over three hundred. It was only an army of three hundred with which an ancient worthy chose to do a great work. We know of no reason why the church here in the city should not continue to prosper and build up.

A. A. REAMS.

LAMONI, IOWA.

J. R. Lambert was the speaker at the chapel Sunday morning; D. A. Anderson in the evening. C. J. Peters occupied at the Saints' Home; John Spaulding at Liberty Home.

Darkness and storm interfered somewhat with a few of the evening appointments. Despite threatenings the following is reported: S. D. Shippy at Ellston morning and evening; V. W. Gunsolley at Greenville in the evening; E. E. Long at Oland in the evening.

Some weeks ago the choir, Sunday-school and Religio appointed a joint committee to consider the advisability and to devise ways and means of purchasing a piano for the church. An instrument was placed in the auditorium on trial. The committee has decided to purchase it, and arrangements are being made to that end.

The Christmas offering of the Star of Bethlehem Sunday-school amounts this year to almost two hundred dollars, and will probably reach that figure when it is all in.

The Religio Society is holding its sessions in the upper auditorium for a time. It has been thought that the work may be made more interesting and more to the advantage of the society by so doing. If the venture proves a success the arrangement will be permanent.

The Sunday-school conducted appropriate Christmas exercises as usual. On the afternoon of Tuesday, children furnished the entertainment, which is spoken of commendably. In the evening the choir rendered the oratorio, Bethlehem. Both occasions were largely attended.

J. F. GARVER.

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

The branch held its regular election of officers in November, which resulted in all of the same officers being sustained with the exception of the clerk, who is now Bro. G. S. Trowbridge.

Sacrament-service enjoyed by all. A goodly portion of the Spirit was present. One of our young men was given words of encouragement by one of the priesthood.

District conference convened here November 14 and 15. Same officers were sustained for the following term. The afternoon prayer-service, conference Sunday afternoon, was reported as being exceptionally good. Three from the Oak Hill Branch were baptized.

Sr. Barraclough, of Edwardsville, Illinois, passed away December 1, leaving her aged husband and eight children to mourn. Bro. Tanner preached the funeral-sermon.

A splendid program was rendered Christmas Eve by the Sunday-school. The committee are to be commended for their efforts.

The first Sunday of the New-year will be "rally day," when our pastor desires every member of the Branch to attend services.

We wish all a Happy New-year.

Your sister in Christ,
2739 DeJong Street. E. M. PATTERSON.

Fire.

On the 14th of December, 1907, the home of Bro. and Sr. Montgomery, Soldiers Grove, Wisconsin, was totally destroyed by fire, with most of the contents. Out of an insurance of $250 they get but $227! They are thus left to contend with the rigors of a Wisconsin winter in a small, temporary home, now being constructed as a "makeshift." If the Saints will generally respond to this appeal, even with their mites, it will be the means of helping those who are both worthy and in sore need, as a result of their loss. Let at least a part of your New-year resolutions be in the form of money addressed to F. A. Montgomery, Soldiers Grove, Wisconsin.

May this appeal be responded to by every one who can.

Correction.

In HERALD for December 4, 1907, page 1132, in a letter with the heading, "A trip to the Bayard reunion," by Sr. Minerva Johnson, the second line should read "Srs. Payne, Newberry, and Barks," etc., instead of "Bn. Payne, Newberry," etc. The error was made in copying.

The January "Housekeeper."

The Housekeeper begins the New-year by presenting a well-rounded number with an especially strong, heart-gripping story, "The revealing mirror," by Herbert D. Ward. "The outsider," by Mary Heaton Vorse, is continued. The pages are largely given over to instructive articles on present day Indians. The first is entitled, "Hiawatha's people" and is written by Marian Bonsall, Associate Editor, who has spent the past year in studying Northwestern Indians. The Indians of the Southwest are represented in "Ramona's people," by W. B. Chamberlain. The photographs are especially good. The departments devoted to the home are carefully edited, being entirely up to date and practical. The Housekeeper Corporation, Minneapolis, Minnesota. Sixty cents a year.

The "Arena."

The December Arena, which closes Volume Thirty-eight of this leading review of original opinion, is a red-letter number, containing one hundred and sixty pages, filled with a variety of deeply interesting and valuable essays which will appeal to men and women who think. It is magnificently illustrated, containing among other artistic features almost a score of finely executed half-tone pictures of people prominent in the public mind. Among its leading literary features we mention the following: "The unrest in India: its genesis and trend," by Saint Nihal Sing, a graphic pen-picture of conditions in the Far East and the causes that have led up to the present revolt, by a scholarly East Indian; "The coming electrical home for America's millions," by B. O. Flower, beautifully illustrated with a number of exceptionally fine half-tones illustrating electricity in actual use in reducing household drudgery and adding to the comfort and attractiveness of the home; "One hundred years' battle with the poison trust," by Charles R. Jones, a masterly historical survey of the rise and growth of the temperance movement in America and of the astonishing advance of the prohibition sentiment during the past score of years; "A survey of contemporary American literature," by Francis Lamont Pierce, Ph. B., one of the most reaching and severe critical papers that has appeared from the pen of an American thinker, and a contribution that is likely to call forth some sharp retorts; "The good and the bad of the president's policies," by W. B. Fleming, a very interesting survey of President Roosevelt's administration by a writer who is disposed to give the President full credit for the good he has done, though he finds it impossible to concede that he has accomplished anything like what he might have achieved in the cause of good government and for the relief of the people from the burdens of monopoly; "The growth of a social nervous organism," by Allan L. Benson, an exceptionally strong and thought-stimulating paper in which the author compares the development of life from the simple to the complex with that of the growth of the social organism; "The public works high school," by William Thum, an exhaustive paper advocating a municipal high school that shall give opportunity for the education of all youths who

D., chief justice of North Carolina, a strong paper that exposes the absurdity of the recent undemocratic craze on the part of certain reactionary Americans for genealogies that proves that they may have descended, legitimately or otherwise, from royalty or nobility; "The teachings of Christian Science in regard to mesmerism," by Alfred Farlow, head of the Committee on Publication of the Christian Science Church, a reply to some things that appeared in the October Arena, giving an authoritative statement of the teachings of the Christian Science Church in regard to hypnotism and allied phenomena; "Professor Pfeleiderer's luminous exposition of higher criticism," by the Editor of the Arena, one of Mr. Flower's justly popular extended book-studies which gets at the heart of the content matter and presents it in a fascinating manner; "Men, women, and books of the hour," a magnificent literary section filled with interesting and informing matter that all book lovers and persons interested in men and women in the public eye will desire to read. Here also are found, among almost a score of exceptionally fine half-tone pictures, portraits of Professor Pfeleiderer, Honorable Walter Clark, Saint Nihal Sing, James Whitcomb Riley, Kellogg Durland, Octave Thanet, F. Hopkinson Smith, David Graham Phillips, Anne Warner, and Herbert Quick. "The Christmas spirit" is a delightful extended editorial for the Yuletide season by the Editor of the Arena. The frontispiece of this issue of the Arena is a portrait of Mayor Tom L. Johnson of Cleveland, who is the subject of an editorial in "The Mirror of the Present." These are only a few of many interesting features of this issue. The Christmas number of the Arena is one of the best issues that has ever appeared.

IN BEHALF OF THE MANAGEMENT OF THE

JACKSON COUNTY BANK

I take the liberty of soliciting your patronage as we are in a position to do BANKING BUSINESS BY MAIL very satisfactorily. Open accounts can be placed with us for safety at your convenience and command. We have opened a savings department, paying interest on accounts of $1 or more and each member of the family should become interested in having a bank account building for future needs. We also pay interest on time deposit certificates. A number of the brethren are living here, others are looking forward to this location as a future home, and late revelation and admonition foreshadow coming events, adding materially to our spiritual holdings necessary to signs of the times, and in this connection our Board of Directors propose to safeguard the financial interests of the Saints by offering to them a depository proof against graft, greed, or calamity, governed by a kindred feeling born of the interest we have in common. It is not popular men, large capital, heavy deposits, National or State laws, that offer absolute security to depositors, but directors and officers progressive and conservative, possessed of the virtue of true manhood, shorn of all political ambition, with no taste for frenzied finance or mining speculation, and no inclination to furnish funds for others in that line. I point with considerable just pride (I assume) to our Board of Directors as named below. Feel at liberty to write us on matters that concern you in Jackson County, Missouri.

OFFICERS: Ellis Short, President; M. H. Bond, Second Vice-president; William Crick, First Vice-president; J. D. Briggs, Cashier.

DIRECTORS: Ellis Short, William Crick, M. H. Bond, J. D. Briggs, G. H. Hilliard, Doctor Joseph Mather, Doctor O. H. Riggs, Horace Sheley, A. L. Yingling.

EMOTIONAL INSANITY.

In these days of murder, suicide, arson, riot, and every other considerable sin by which human life is held cheap, pleas are made in extenuation in the world of violent killing under the names of emotional insanity and the unwritten law, meaning the right of an individual, the peace of whose home may have been disturbed by another, to take the law in his own hands for the punishment of the offender. Excellent lawyers and the judges of the courts have repeatedly stated from the bench that there is no such law as "The Unwritten Law," known to American jurisprudence. Every day the strangest of travesties on justice and right dealing are enacted, through which murderers are enabled to escape justice. Last year Harry K. Thaw was tried in New York for the killing of an architect by the name of Stanford White. Being wealthy, the ablest attorneys were employed in his defense, and the plea of emotional insanity was set up. The jury disagreed and in January of the present year there will be another trial, and it is presumable that the same plea will be set up, and it may be effectual in cheating the gallows or the electric chair.

It is almost unthinkable, the ease with which so-called experts known to the medical fraternity as alienists, are secured to testify in such cases. The general public does not believe that Harry K. Thaw was so insane that he did not know well what he was doing. And to that same public the plea of emotional insanity has become a synonym for the condoning of the taking of human life and the effort of misguided lawyers and doctors to save from just condemnation murderers who have perpetrated their crimes evidently with the thought clearly established in their minds that they may, by liberal use of money, secure at last an acquittal at the hands of a jury. These efforts and their frequent successes have joined together to make trials by jury in criminal cases seem, to the general public, as expensive farces, the expense of which is met by the taxes of the sober and industrious people of the nation.

Anger, aroused for any cause, is partial insanity. If the cause is just it comes under the name of just indignation, and the plea of self-defense, defense of one's self, his family or his friends, may be relied upon to secure a discharge without conviction. In such cases the "unwritten law" is not appealed to for the reason that the statutes governing human conduct have provided enactments under which a taker of human life under such conditions is excusable from punishment. There is no need in such cases, to plead the unwritten law. This plea is made where the perpetrators of the wrong are conscious that their conduct has been inexcusable under the application of human statutes, so an appeal is made to the law of "Might makes right," and under its influence individuals give way to their destructive passion and destroy life, entailing suffering upon those who may be deprived of friend or relative by their act, distress, sorrow, as well as expense. Unjustifiable in almost every case, this appeal to the unwritten law has, of late, been made in some instances upon the shallowest pretenses; pretenses which, if they had been pushed to examination in a proper court, would have been shown clearly to have been improper and unjustifiable, applied to the act for which the appeal of justification because of the unwritten law is made. It will be continued to be made and its application will be sought for in a wider range of crimes committed against humanity, until it will almost seem that society is returning to the days of barbarity, when the stronger ruled at the expense of the weaker.

Not long since, a small band of murderous robbers undertook to hold up and rob a company of Greek laborers. Some of those disliked the idea of being robbed, and so they made defense, and one of the attacking party was wounded and subsequently died. After this, another of those Greek laborers was arraigned before the court for carrying concealed weapons, and he admitted before the court that he had bought and carried a revolver and did so for the purpose of protecting himself from a repetition of the murderous attack made upon his comrades, if not himself. The fine would have been very heavy, but in view of the circumstances which impelled the man to carry a means of self-defense, it was not enforced against him.

It is a very striking condition of society in the large cities, of which the exemplification may be found in Kansas City, Missouri, as that condition of things is seen in the occurrences chronicled in the daily press, in which the sober, law-loving, law-observing, and law-abiding part of the community are absolutely at the mercy of the lawless and disturbing element, regardless of life and property, who violate the law and carry weapons by which they assault, rob, kill, and murder whoever stands in their way. It seems unfair and unjust, and if there is a case in which the unwritten law might be applied, it would be in such cases as are occurring every day and night in those crowded places of human existence. No man, no woman, is safe from assault and injury. If they are law-abiding, they carry with them no means of protection, and their lives are forfeited to the slug element lying in wait to attack them. There should be an earnest protest from every quarter against the application of this principle called the Unwritten Law, and an equally strong protest against that unsubstantial and unsupported plea of emotional insanity. We do not say that there may not be cases of such insanity, where men's minds may have been unbalanced because of fancied or real wrongs, but we are sure that if there was a more determined application of the principles of justice in the treatment of thugs and murderers, the plea would not have so much of a hold upon the lawless element as it has. The law-abiding portion of society is entitled to protection. Every force in society should be arrayed in their behalf, and no plea by which the ends of justice are defeated should be permitted of an insufficient or ephemeral character. So long as judges, lawyers, and juries may be collected at the expense of the public for the purpose of punishing crime, and criminals are allowed to escape the proper application of the severest law by which they may be punished, just so long will society suffer from these frequent and continually increasing crimes of felons against property and persons.

Emotional insanity is only a constructive condition of mind, and its existence in the mind of any individual is only established upon hypothetical questions skillfully arranged by astute lawyers and established by the testimony of so-called experts who are evidently first sounded, then subpoenaed, and feel it their duty to testify in behalf of the client in whose defense they are called. A man once excused for murder because of emotional insanity, is turned loose upon society to repeat his spasm of insanity, and consequent murder. It would be better, the proper course, in such cases that such emotionally insane person should be put where he can not do violence to human life while laboring under such emotional insanity. Only a short time since, in the city of Providence, one of our sisters was shot down to death by her husband, under the influence of jealous rage, without cause so far as known, and urged to the act by drink, and at a time when he was evidently emotionally insane. His deed is none the less cruel and wicked because that he slew himself after he had destroyed the life of his wife. And one can scarcely pick up a daily paper published in any city but what there is the report of similar deeds portrayed before the public for their reading. And while the preachers may say that the world is growing better, and it may be true so far as the great mass of mankind is concerned, the evidences are patent which go to show that there is an evil or unruly element among man which, if it is not increasing, is certainly being brought more permanently to light in these constant destructions of human life through unbridled passion, emotional insanity. Jealousy inflamed by drink, exaggerating every act of its victim, continues to rankle in the mind until lust for blood, or vengeance brings to pass the tragedy; and when the tragedy is completed and remorse sets in, then the effort is made to condone the act by the plea of emotional insanity, or the principles of the unwritten law. We hold that men are inexcusable for allowing themselves to be carried into such conditions of unbridled disregard of law, the safety of persons and the rules of right dealing among men, and we warn our people to be on the guard against the in creeping of any such element among them.

There is a clause of the written law, disregard for which puts the violator of it into jeopardy of divine justice, judgment, and condemnation. "It is written, thou shalt not kill; he that killeth shall die." Not long since we received notice of the suicide of a bright, intelligent, innocent girl, who, through some unknown cause, and suffering from nervous disturbances of body, continued to brood over her condition until she took her own life, leaving her parents to mourn for her and to wonder what would be her condition on the other side of the vale, beyond which she had gone by her own ill-judged deed. Our courts would hold that such person would not be held subject to condemnation as having committed the unpardonable sin. Such a case would come under the term of emotional insanity, if any case could. In this instance the only life at stake was her own, and through long continued distress of body the proper exercise of mental faculties was in abeyance. Human indulgence and mercy say that such individuals would not be held accountable for the deed which ended her life. It is fortunate for us that God is more just than we are; hence we may argue with a degree of justness that he will not hold this sister to her infinite loss for having ended her earthly existence by her own hand. Is man more just than God? This question has been decided centuries ago in the negative. Man derives his conception of the influences of mercy and justice from his contemplation of those qualities resident in God. As a consequence we have a right to hope and be established in the belief that if justice may now and then demand the taking of human life in self-defense, in defense of homes, family, and friends against assaults of evil-minded and wicked men, he who is more just than men, will look upon such taking of human life with leniency; and where, by the unfortunate wear and tear of human toil and human existence, the mind of an individual becomes unbalanced, the power of self-restraint is broken down, and one takes one's own life under such conditions that human justice would not hold the sufferer to punishment, so will not the God of all the earth hold such an one accountable, and put him in a condition of continued and insupportable punishment.

The Saints should be careful that in their homes, their associations with their fellow beings, they avoid those things which, in their nature, are calculated to destroy the stability of their own minds and the minds of others, that they do not give offense. It is written, "Offenses must come, but woe to him by whom they come." This refers to the cause giving rise to the offense. Let us take heed, therefore, that we give no occasion for offense in any wise, nor give cause for offense upon the part of others.

CRIME IN KANSAS CITY.

Within the last four months there have been some fourteen killings in Kansas City. Nine of these have been within, or adjacent to, saloons where liquor is sold by license. These nine murders have deprived the victims of life, and in most instances have left families of the victims, large or small, to their own efforts for support and the wavering charities of the public. They have also involved the municipality in costly prosecutions for the purpose of bringing the murderers to justice. In some instances the effort has failed and the murderers are still at large, undetected.

This is an object-lesson in more ways than one. Aside from the moral attitude against the crime of murder that must actuate all healthy communities, there is the added common-sense, every-day objection to the saloon business, the establishment of places where liquors are sold under the lawful guise of the license issued by either the municipality or the county, that the traffic foists upon the community, and series of consequences that the community should not only foresee but forestall by a refusal to legalize the causes. Two thirds of these murders are the direct product of the sale and use of intoxicants; and the municipalities or the counties issuing the licenses are indirectly parties to the crimes committed under the influences of that, the sale of which has been authorized by law.

An Indiana judge not long ago took the ground that the state could not legalize the sale of intoxicants; that the traffic was unlawful and that the state could not make an unlawful act lawful. It can not be denied successfully, that more than half of the crime in any community where liquor is licensed to be sold, is directly or indirectly traceable to the use of intoxicants. All the consequences which follow those acts of criminality, from the putting of the community to an expense in prosecuting the transgressors and the taking care of them, or punishing them when convicted, to the providing for the care and sustenance of those who are left in the community deprived of their natural protectors and providers, and the care and providing for those who are thrown upon the community for support, by the crimes committed. Every sober and industrious man in every community ought by every means in his power, protest and keep protesting against being taxed either directly by the state or indirectly by the demands of humanity for charity to provide for the evil consequences of the liquor traffic. We hold that it should not in any community be legalized, because of the results which follow to the community in the way pointed out above, if for no other reason. Taken with an article recently appearing in the HERALD, on the traffic subject, this item of what is transpiring in Kansas City is an object-lesson of evil.

HAVE YOU PAID UP?

A story that is apropos of the Sunday revival meeting is told by the Kansas City Journal as follows: A preacher at the conclusion of his sermons said: "Let all in the house who are paying their debts stand up." Instantly every man, woman and child, with one exception, rose to their feet. The preacher seated them all and said: "Now every man not paying his debts stand up." The exception noted, a care-worn, hungry-looking individual, clothed in a last year's summer suit, slowly assumed a perpendicular position. "How is it, my friend," asked the minister, "that you are the only man not to meet his obligations?" "I run a newspaper," he meekly answered, "and the brethren who stood up are my subscribers, and——" "Let us pray," exclaimed the preacher.

GENERAL CHURCH ITEMS.

Elder Alma B. Hanson died, December 30, at the Printers' Home, Colorado Springs, Colorado. Elder Hanson was at one time foreman of the press-room in the HERALD Office. He resigned that position in the spring of 1900 and accepted an appointment from the General Conference as missionary to Eastern Colorado. He will be remembered as an active leader in the Students' Society of Lamoni, forerunner of the Zion's Religio-Literary Society.

By a letter from Bro. J. H. Tyrrell, of Chatham, Ontario, to the Canadian Messenger, we learned that the Canadian Customs officer at Chatham called on Bro. Tyrrell for a copy of the Book of Mormon, to be sent to the general customs officer for examination as to its rights to be subject to duty, through the mails or otherwise. Bro. Tyrrell sent an explanatory letter with the Book of Mormon. Bro. Tyrrell states in his letter, "On December 13, 1907, the General Manager of the Customs here notified me that the head office of the Canadian Customs had granted the Book of Mormon entrance into Canada free of duty, thus helping to fulfill the Lord's promise to favor his people."

We call attention to this, so that those of our brethren who have desired to send the Book of Mormon to their friends in Canada may feel an assurance that they can do so without subjecting the receiver to the payment of custom duties on the book. It is a good thing for us to be thus recognized.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

Reverend R. J. Campbell, in a recent discourse in the City Temple, in London, characterized the city in very uncomplimentary terms, yet it is not unlikely that other large cities might vie with London for his attentions. He declares: "If London is not hell it is a very good imitation of it. Who makes that hell? I make it. You make it. We all do our little to help to make it, not willingly, but thoughtlessly."

It is reported that recently Doctor Piesen, a department superintendent employed by a Chicago packing-house, fell in the laboratory of the packing-house and fractured his nose. Tetanus germs entered the wound and soon developed. He diagnosed his own case, directed his family to send him to the hospital, and then sent for a lawyer and made his will. Great is Diana of the physicians.

The details of the plans of Mrs. Mary Baker G. Eddy, head of the Christian Science Church, in relation to the million dollar charitable institution which she is to found, have been announced.

The institution will be known as "Mary Baker G. Eddy's Charitable Fund." The plan and scope of this fund will be an educational opportunity by which indigent persons will be taught gratuitously the "Science of Christ healing as practiced by Jesus and as made known through the writings of Mrs. Eddy." It will be open to all "who are genuinely interested in Christian Science for its truth's sake and who shall present to the board of directors of the fund, satisfactory certificates of their indigence, their religious views, and their moral character."

In a recent speech in New York City, Jacob H. Schiff pointed out the dangers which threatened organized charitable institutions during times of financial stringency, and the sufferings which come to dependent ones as a result. He declared that our charities should be the last subject of economy. He said: "Those who hoard their money by cutting off their charities, because they are in a panic and are victims of fright, are in many ways as unthinkingly brutal as the men who tread down women and children to escape from fire or from a sinking boat." The church is not a charitable organization, and the missionary's family, the church publications, the sanitarium, the children's home, are not objects of charity—yet perhaps they are in line with what Mr. Schiff had in mind.

According to the January Delineator, charity in Chicago is put to a novel purpose. Mrs. Potter Palmer has been the acknowledged leader of society in that city, but rivals are arising. It has been her custom to give an annual "charity ball." These rivals are now giving rival annual charity balls in the hope that the one who gives the most unique, popular, and profitable ball will obtain social supremacy and also stand in well with the recording angel.

This curious tale of how the English poet, Francis Thompson, was once very near to suicide, is related by a recent writer: "For years Thompson had been one of the 'submerged,' selling matches, calling cabs, anything to obtain the pence necessary to buy food. At last he yielded to despair, and, having for some days saved up all he could earn, he devoted it to the purchase of a single dose of laudanum sufficient to end his troubles. With this he retired at night to his haunt, the rubbish plot in Covent Gardens Market, London. Then by his own narrative the following incident occurred:

"He had already taken half the fatal draught when he felt a hand upon his arm, and, looking up, he saw one whom he recognized as the dead poet, Chatterton, forbidding him to drink the rest, and at the same instant memory came to him of how, after the poet's suicide, a letter had been delivered at his lodgings which, if he had waited another day, would have brought him the relief needed.

"It happened so with Thompson. After infinite pains, the editor of a magazine who had accepted and printed an essay and a poem of his, but could not discover his address, had that very morning traced Thompson to the druggist's shop where the drug was sold and relief for him was close at hand."—Chicago News.

A bit of news in a late Chicago Tribune is to the effect that the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railway has directed the conductors of their dining-cars that they must serve no liquors at their meals in the state of Iowa; and that it is presumed that other roads will follow the example, and probably other States will likewise be included in the prohibition.

THE RETURNED MISSIONARY.

May 22, [1879] bidding good-bye to many noble souls, whose hearts are true to the cause, I started on the long journey homewards. Met with good company, and time bore us on in safety over two thousand miles.

On the 31st we reached Council Bluffs, having traveled in nine days over nearly the same road that we went over with an ox-team twenty-seven years ago. At Leon [Iowa] I took the stage for Davis City, ten miles of very rough road, and a heavy rain. Arriving there I called on Bro. Cunningham, whom I had known in England. He had gone to conference, but I was kindly entertained by Sr. Cunningham.

June 1, at nine o'clock a. m., I saw my two dear boys. They had come for me. Glaud was not so much changed, but Joseph I did not know. We started in a wagon for home, about eight miles, where I met the rest of my family. Thank God for his love and favor—all spared in life and health to meet again! My little girl did not know me, and only for her golden, curly hair, I should not have known her. It was some time before we could get well acquainted. I said then, "Five years and seven months is too long to be away from home." Glaud's wife and two children were present, also Janie's little girl, all added since I left home.—Autumn Leaves, vol. 3, p. 417.

THE BLESSEDNESS OF HOME.

Did you ever leave the fairy-land you love to call your home,
Away on distant shores to stand, or as a pilgrim roam,
To battle with a world of sin, without an earthly friend,
In all your toils to sympathize, or lend a helping hand?
If not, you scarce can realize the blessedness of home!

Did you ever feel her burning brow upon your throbbing breast,
To whom you pledged your holiest vow—she whom you love
the best?
Or have you seen those scalding tears plowing that burning cheek,

Or read the anguish of her heart,—anguish she could not speak,
 Because her one bright, guiding star, must wander far from home?
 Did you ever give your tender babes the last, fond, parting kiss,
 Then tear yourself from wife and child—from all domestic bliss,
 To traverse mountains, plains, and seas, to bless your fellow man,
 Then hear them direst curses hurl, and spurn the gospel plan?
 If not, you scarce can tell the blessedness of home.
 But if your lot has thus been cast, for God, and truth, and heaven,
 And willingly forsaking all, to spread the sacred leaven—
 To build God's kingdom on the earth, and bless the pure in heart, Keeping yourself from every stain, performing well your part,
 You've learned to know the real worth and blessedness of home.
 And He who looks with pitying eye upon his suff'ring ones,
 Will not forget the sacrifice made by his faithful sons;
 Nor will his daughters be forgot, a crown awaits them all—
 In that celestial home of light, he'll crown both great and small,
 And each will then enjoy the peace of that eternal home!

LETTER OF A BRANCH OFFICER TO AN ERRING MEMBER.

Go after the wandering sheep with the shepherd's crook and not with a club.

Dear Brother: We have not seen you at meeting since our talk with you in the church building, August 7. We fear that you did not understand the spirit that moved us to talk with you.

We did not wish to dictate to you or injure you. We have enjoyed your association in the church meetings, and love you as a brother. We were simply doing what the law required us to do, as officers of the church, and we tried to do it with a kindly spirit. We have prayed for you earnestly and often in this matter, that it might be well for you. Let us earnestly exhort you to move wisely, and let no little thing turn you aside from the cause. Let no weakness of the flesh or failings of your brethren prevent your doing all you can to advance the cause.

God grant that your heart may be softened to do what you know to be right, and you will be happy.

You are at the parting of the ways now; consider well the road you will take. You will find friends who will welcome you elsewhere; but they will drag you down to destruction. You have friends here who will help you if you wish it, and nothing they teach you or give you or lead you into, will ever make you ashamed afterward, when you think of it.

Pardon us for speaking plainly, dear brother, ten years from now we would find you, if we live, a good, wise man, respected of all who know you; we would hate to find you as we have found some of the Saints in the past, who in much less than ten years have made themselves anything but respected. Let us hear from you, how you feel in this matter, and if we can help you we will.

Your brother in Christ,

POSSIBLE HISTORY.

The Campbellite school was just out. The teacher buttoned his coat and donned his hat, took a last look at the motto over his desk, "Where the Bible speaks we speak," and departed.

Upon the lawn he was surprised to see a group of his pupils surrounding two combatants.

The horrified teacher thrust the spectators aside, and addressed the two thus, "Stop, this is no way for Christians to do!"

The larger of the two, having just gouged out the eye of his opponent, wiped his thumbs and sat up to argue the question.

"We never can be united and see alike, unless we are permitted to canvass every question of difference in a brotherly way," he declared.

The weaker brother sat up, and nursing his injured head, expressed this thought, "We sure can't see eye to eye until I git one of his. I'm entitled to a reply."

A Latter Day Saint elder passing by, scratched his head. "It seems to me that I have heard those arguments before," he cogitated. E. A. S.

MINISTERIAL ANECDOTES.

ABSENT TREATMENT.—A local physician said yesterday that a great deal depends on the way of looking at things and cited the following incident reported by Doctor Guest in a medical magazine. The doctor's brother-in-law suffered every summer from hay fever. One of his relatives, a Christian Scientist, persuaded him to write daily to another Christian Scientist who could cure him. He did so and felt better daily until his fever had about gone by the third day, when he received a letter from the Christian Scientist stating that she had been away from home but would commence his treatment the next day. He relapsed.—Exchange.

LEAVES FROM LIFE.

LIFE OF NANCY POLINA PARK.

NANCY POLINA PARK.

"No one ever heard a word of gossip from her lips. She has no time for it."

A shadow, a rift of light, a faint quiver, and lo, a little life—a gift from God—has smiled for the first time on this beautiful old earth. Two tiny hands to clasp and hold; two tiny feet to tread life's untried paths; a future all untried. Yet as the pages unfolded, one by one, a record was made whereon are written only noble deeds, acts of kindness. Deeds that prove a heart responsive to all others' ills; befriended those dependent on her care; and most of all making her Master's cause her greatest joy.

To us who know her childlike, simple spirit, her power of sympathy, the hospitality of her mind, and her unerring vision of truth, it seems that words can hardly present our sister as she is, and only eternity will reveal all that she has accomplished. One will always remember the first greetings from her, for they come in words so sisterly and sympathetic that they are as a light that has newly shined out from the darkness. But few women have such power and perfect gentleness combined, that implicit confidence in all that is good, and above all that spirituality that will cause you to feel how near she is to the invisible. In her we see a sister owned and acknowledged of God, one who by her walk and conversation has preached Christ in the home, in the church, in every path of life, and with a God-given inspiration in the thirty-one years of membership in the church militant, she has gathered to her the tenderest sympathies of her own family, the admiration and good will of every member of the Des Moines Valley Branch, and the citizens of the community in which she has lived for over half a century.

I saw a saint—how can'st thou tell that she Thou sawest was a saint?
I saw one like to Christ so luminously
Made by patient deeds of love, her mortal taint Seemed made her groundwork for humility.

No one has ever heard a word of gossip from her lips. She has no time for it. Ever looking ahead and above, her life motto is, "We are saved by hope." She expects each to do well, and at the evening of a long and beautiful life we see her sitting in the sunshine, calm and sweet, at sixty-five years of age; and methinks to ask her what she would have done differently as a mother and as a sister if she had her life to live over again, and we will hear her say, "I would blame less and praise more."

Often this household saint expresses in words her gratitude to her heavenly Father for the long life so rich in blessings, friendships, and affection. Each passing season, as the years speed on, finds her more and more a child of hope, notwithstanding she has had her seasons of sorrow and mourning. In that home, bright with her presence, one always finds her with a smile on her face and a word of cheer on her lips. On the tables around her, are grouped her favorites in the way of pictures, and her constant companions, the Bible, the Book of Mormon, the Doctrine and Covenants, together with the SAINTS' HERALD, Zion's Ensign, Autumn Leaves, the Sunday School Exponent, and the Quarterlies. These lead her to "Come up higher," and, looking ahead, she knows that "It is better farther on."

"A soft sweet voice from Zion stealing,
Such as to angels known,
Hope's cheering song is ever thrilling,
It is better farther on."

Also, methinks I hear her say, "Why can not we, slipping our hands into His each day, walk trustingly over the day's appointed path, thorny or flowery, crooked or straight, knowing that evening will bring us sweet peace and home." Trustingly she says, "We leave all with Thee. We would know many things that thou hast not revealed, but we can only love and trust and wait." In the supreme hour of the entrance into life with God may we have faith to look above and say, "We give thee joy, dear sister. All hail, but not farewell. Our faces are set the same way, blessed sister: we shall follow after—it will not be long."

Nancy P. Freel was born in Indiana in 1841. Her father, James Freel, was born in Ohio, as was also her grandfather. Her mother, Mary Guinn, was born in Virginia, being of German descent. The mother died in Indiana, and the father, with a family of six children, came to Warren County, Iowa, in 1849. By a second marriage a family of nine children. On the farm in Warren County the father of our subject lived until his death, in 1906.

Mother Park was first married to James Duncan, who enlisted in the United States service, starting for the scene of the war in the South, but was taken with the measles at Burlington and died there in 1862.

By a second marriage our subject was united with James Park, in 1865. The Park family came to Iowa in 1849, the same year that the Freeland family came; one family of emigrants starting from Ohio and the other from Indiana, they joined company soon after starting, and traveled the entire distance together. At the time of the marriage they settled on the farm in Camp Township, Polk County, Iowa, and this was the family home until the removal to Runnells in 1898.

As to the religious training of our subject, her grandfather was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, her father uniting with that church when ten years of age. Her mother was a member of the Presbyterian Church until her marriage, and then she joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. Sr. Park united with the Methodist Episcopal Church at Hartford, Warren County, at seventeen years of age, having been baptized when a child. After uniting with the church she lived an earnest, Christian life, striving to serve God. As she studied the plan of salvation revealed by the Savior of men, she reached that point wherein she was not satisfied with her baptism as a child, and during seventeen years of membership in the church she could not reach that condition to receive the communication with God which she desired. Having that supreme confidence in a loving Father then that has ever characterized her life, she loved him, trusted him, and waited on him, and looking ahead she believed that "It is better farther on."

In 1873, E. D. Bullard, whose parents had been connected with the Latter Day Saints at Nauvoo, located at Hartford, in Warren County. He soon learned of members of the Reorganization living at Newton, and invited the elders to visit him. During the years 1873 and 1874, Elders Isaac N. White, Alfred White, and William C. Nirk did local missionary labor at Hartford, and during the latter year organized a branch at this place, known as the South River Branch. This was in the immediate vicinity of where the Freeland family was living. From Hartford, in Warren County, the elders were invited to preach in Camp Township, Polk County, the services here being held in the Brockett Schoolhouse.

It was here that Mother Park attended the services, and first heard the everlasting gospel. In considering it in the light of truth and as the plan of salvation, it brought to her mind that which she had hoped for, that which she had waited for, and that which brought satisfaction to her mind; and, believing that new light had shone in her pathway, she was willing to walk therein, to take one step forward and enter the door into the sheepfold.

Elder William C. Nirk, together with Brn. Alfred and Isaac N. White, had opened the gospel work in this vicinity, and on January 24, 1875, he baptized into the Reorganized Church, the church and kingdom of God on earth, Mahala J. Moorman, Edwin Moorman, and Nancy P. Park. The next day he baptized Nancy A. Freeland; on February 14, he baptized Ancil Freeland and Benjamin F. Clark; February 28, Sarah C. Cushman, and March 28, Hulda Longbottom.

Elder Nirk, who baptized our sister, and who now resides at Rhodes, Iowa, has spoken that as he administered the ordinance of baptism, on raising her out of the water, her face bore an angelic likeness. The Lord has instituted the ordinance of baptism, the servant of God duly authorized, officiated in this solemn ordinance, receiving one who desired to become a child of God, and at the moment of her regeneration the Lord acknowledged her as his child. Bro. Nirk, in a letter of September 11, 1906, speaking of this event of the years ago says: "I have mentioned to you concerning her baptism as she appeared to me as she came out of the water. It is stamped on my mind's eye, to see her come forth out of her watery grave as pure and innocent as an angel, or a child indeed. And her life has been a life of usefulness. And never have I seen any, or been acquainted with any, who have continued so steadfastly in godly examples, wherever she was found, among those of her own faith, or others, not of the same. May I be worthy to be in her association when the Master shall reign on the earth!"

Bro. Nirk is a man of few words, but in the above he has said enough that we could well end this sketch with his words. He says that she has continued steadfast for over thirty years, and expresses the desire that he may be worthy of association with her during the millennium.

Soon after our sister united with the church, a branch was organized at the home of Bro. and Sr. William Tulley, who had been baptized a short time before, said branch being known as the Des Moines Valley Branch, and the organization then made has continued until this day. Here, as elsewhere, when the work of God is planted, the power of the Evil One is made manifest, and at this time false and slanderous stories were told and re-told concerning the church and the man, and men who had been instrumental in bringing it forth. And here, as elsewhere, the prophetic statement of Joseph Smith, that his name would be held for good and evil in all the world, was fulfilled. Those here who had accepted the gospel as restored through him were said to be of unsound mind, and when the ice of two and one half feet in depth was cut to baptize our sister there was no doubt, in the minds of some, that she was mentally unbalanced.

Soon after coming into the church, she realized the fulfillment of the promise that "he that doeth the will of the Father shall know of the doctrine," and the testimony of the Savior that "flesh and blood hath not revealed this unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven," was made the rock upon which she has stood. While the cruel hand of persecution was being swung, and the life, character, and work of Joseph Smith were being assailed, one day while reading in the Inspired Translation, and having made the matter of the divine mission of Joseph Smith a subject of prayer, she bowed her head on the book and continued to plead with God to acknowledge the work of his servant, if he had been divinely commissioned for the work he claimed to have done, and in that hour God did hear and answer the pleading of our sister. Not in the thundering tones that testified of God from Mount Sinai, not in opening the heavens to her spiritual eyes, but in the inner whisperings of the Holy Spirit that filled her entire being and testified to her of the divine calling and work of Joseph the Seer, and from that hour she has affirmed the knowledge received at that time.

Our sister has endeavored to live by every word that has proceeded from the mouth of God. Receiving a knowledge of the divine calling of Joseph Smith, having unshaken faith in the Book of Mormon from the first, the gathering of the Saints in latter days she has looked forward to, and the law of tithing has been very faithfully observed, she at one time during the past year paying one hundred dollars into the church treasury. She bears a strong testimony to the healing power of God through the administration of the elders. Her voice is always heard in the social meetings of the Saints, testifying to the goodness of God, and expressing a desire to hold fast to the rod of iron. Her home has ever been the resting place of the servants of God. For years she has been the primary teacher in the Sunday-school, and here she continues her work.

EDUCATION.

The writer of this article knows from experience in coming in contact with the busy world what it is to have a very limited education, and thus being unable to take up any special line of work. The obstacles were many and the difficulties were great; it was necessary to take the most menial kind of work, the hardest, the poorest pay, and in an environment that was not congenial to religious, moral, and intellectual development.

It is necessary that we apply the term education in its broadest sense, not in a contracted form (which is often done), making it apply only to what we learn in text-books at the public schools and colleges. What is learned there is only the preliminary work, the tools placed in our hands to prepare for greater usefulness. Webster defines education thus: "Instructing; enlightening the understanding, and forming the manners. Education comprehends all that series of instruction and discipline which is intended to enlighten the understanding, correct the temper, and form the manners and habits of youth, and fit them for usefulness in their future stations."

It matters not what our occupation may be, it is necessary to possess a certain amount of knowledge, or we can not mingle, socially, with our fellow man, and we will be placed at a great disadvantage in our business relations; without it we would feel strange, as though we were in a foreign land, unable to converse intelligently with our fellows.

In connection with our general education, we need special education for our chosen life work. Our young people should prepare themselves to take up the professions and trades requiring skilled labor,—civil engineers, electrical engineers, architects, doctors, dentists, lawyers, college professors, school-teachers, stenographers, merchants, and mechanics, and artisans of all kinds are always in good demand. There are three special reasons that make this class of labor very desirable: the compensation is such that the family can better be cared for; the opportunity to render greater financial aid to the church; and with but few exceptions the environment among this class is better than in other occupations, which will continue until we are in a gathered condition and become more exclusive as a people. The young lady who is a school-teacher, music-teacher, or saleslady, will find herself in a better environment than the one who works in a factory or packing-house; the young man who is an architect or civil engineer will find more congenial surroundings than are found in digging sewers or killing cattle.

The man or woman on the farm, educated according to the standard of Webster, will find life much more happy, a greater degree of contentment; and the life of drudgery, (that is the bane of farm life,) will be entirely removed. The preacher and Sunday-school teacher that has an enlightened understanding, that possesses a store of knowledge (such as is stated in Doctrine and Covenants 85:21, coupled with the conditions stated in section 11:4) will be able to render an efficient and valuable service to the church, while those who neglect to qualify themselves according to God's instruction will find their work a bitter disappointment.

Our young people should not deceive themselves with the idea that their parents, or some one else, got along and made a success without an education, or that it is the self-made man that is making life a success in the gainful occupations. If in the former you measure them by the amount of wealth accumulated, it is a false measure; there are men and women in and out of the church who have only the necessities of life supplied them, and without a home of their own, who are rendering a greater service to their fellows than many whose wealth in dollars may count up to many thousands. In the latter, careful investigation shows it to be an error, as a few facts will show. Note the following statement from the pen of William W. Smith, chancellor of the Randolph-Macon System:

The editors of Who's Who in America have rendered the country a service by inducing more than ten thousand of the men now living in the United States who are "most notable in all departments of usefulness and reputable endeavor" to report their education. These men have won enviable distinction and the facts they give will help answer the questions, "Does education help one to success?" and "What amount of school training helps most?"

According to the last census there are in the United States 14,794,403 males over thirty years old. The United States Bureau of Education estimates that these are divided educationally as follows:

Class 1. Without education	1,757,023
Class 2. With only common-school training or trained outside of organized schools	12,054,335
Class 3. With regular high-school training added..	657,432
Class 4. With college or higher education added...	325,613

Omitting the few persons under thirty years old, the report from 10,704 notables shows: Without education, none; self-taught, 24; home-taught, 278; with common-school training only, 1,066; with high-school training, 1,627; with college training, 7,709, of whom 6,129 were college graduates. That is:

From the 1,757,023 of Class 1 no notable reported.

From the 12,054,335 of Class 2 came 1,368, one for every 8,812 [24 of these report themselves as self-taught; 278 as privately taught.]

From the 657,432 of Class 3 came 1,627, one for every.. 404

It thus appears:

1. That from 1800 to 1870 the uneducated boy in the United States failed entirely to become so notable in any department of usefulness and reputable endeavor as to attract the attention of the Who's Who editors, and that only 24 self-taught men succeeded.

2. That a boy with only a common-school education had, in round numbers, one chance in 9,000.

3. That a high-school training increased this chance nearly twenty-two times.

4. That college education added gave the young man about ten times the chance of a high-school boy and two hundred times the chance of the boy whose training stopped with the common school.

5. That the A. B. graduate was preëminently successful and that the self-educated man was inconspicuous.

From the nature of the case it can not be claimed that these classifications are exact, but they are based upon the fullest statistics ever obtained, and the necessary estimates have been made by Government experts. It is also doubtless true that other circumstances contributed to the success of these trained men, but after all reasonable allowances are made the figures force the conclusion that the more school-training the American boy of that period had, the greater were his chances of distinction. How will it be in this century?

It is unnecessary to extend this inquiry to woman. Education is practically her only door to eminence.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF EDUCATION,

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 22, 1904.

The above estimates have been verified carefully in this office and are believed to be substantially correct.

W. T. HARRIS, Commissioner.

From my experience in life, it seems reasonable to me that I can safely advise the young to secure the best general education obtainable in our public schools and colleges. Prepare yourself for some special line of work; the ranks of common labor are crowded in all nations of the world.

If you are called to enter the ministry, prepare for it; do not harbor the thought that God will withdraw his Spirit from you because you are seeking to improve your mind, and store it with knowledge to be used in his service. The more diligent and humble you are, the more of his Spirit you will enjoy. If you are to follow the ancient and honorable pursuit of a farmer, become a specialist in some particular branch of it, and lift it above the humdrum of common drudgery. If you are inclined toward medicine, or law, or dentistry, qualify yourself so well that your service will be in constant demand. If mechanical pursuits is the bent of your mind, get an education in the branch you desire; serve a faithful apprenticeship and you will not stand at the foot of the hill all your life, while others pass by you on the road to success.

A successful business career is open to the one who properly prepares for it, and, by honesty and fair-dealing, wins the confidence of his fellows.

If, to this special preparation, you add a life of honesty, integrity, faithfulness, humility, and kindness, you will have that kind and measure of success that will meet God's approval and receive the approbation of good men and women.

Unless you have special and good reasons for going elsewhere, you should patronize Graceland College. Be loyal to our own institution. Help make it a beacon light, a place of hope for the aspirations of an army of useful young men and women.

Do not get an education with the idea of avoiding work; but that you may do more, and do it better. Banish all fear that the number of well educated people will be too great, if you join their ranks; the crowd is at the foot of the hill; the ranks grow thinner as you get near the top.

EDWARD RANNIE.

ENVIRONMENT.

Some sixty years ago a disreputable wretch, whose bleary eyes and low forehead were hedged in and obscured by a bloated face and moplike growth of stubborn hair, a slave to tobacco and a fiend for strong drink, had been swayed to and fro, back and forth, by reckless throngs of dockmen, soldiers, and sailors, until no character was discernible.

A slight change of environments reflected a ray of light into his wretched heart, and he commenced to climb. He broke fealty with his kind, and sought environments free from crime. The results are, that his head has taken on another story, his thin, soft, silvery locks now adorn firm, finely-wrought features, and he is a staunch defender of all that is good and true: a veritable "rock in time of storm."

For centuries past man's character has been determined by the company he has kept and the books he has read.

No one is so adamant as not to think on the things around him; and he partakes of their nature as naturally as the flowers partake of the sunshine, for, "as a man thinketh, so is he." If we could only see the things of the spiritual and mental world we would see that our environments are as much a part of us as the air we breathe, the water we drink, or the food that we eat.

Our physical bodies are altogether made up of our physical environments; that is, of what we breathe, drink, eat, and absorb. The same is true of the mental man: we can no more think the thoughts that are foreign to our mental atmosphere than we can breathe the ozone of the Andes. And what is true of the physical and mental is also true of the spiritual. God's Spirit can not dwell in unholy temples. "Intelligence cleaveth unto intelligence: wisdom receiveth wisdom; truth embraceth truth; virtue loveth virtue; light cleaveth to light; mercy hath compassion on mercy and claimeth her own." "There is no space in the which there is no kingdom." And, "All kingdoms have a law given"; and "That which is governed by law, is also preserved by law, and perfected and sanctified by the same."

Yes: If we are ever "governed," "preserved," "perfected and sanctified" at all, it will be done by the environments thrown around us.

It is thought that you can change men and women by a different environment. That by statutes enacted, conference resolutions passed, etc., you can change the environment and hence change the subject. My friends, the doctrine of environment was smashed to pieces in the Garden of Eden. So long as there is a disposition to make the slum, the slum will exist.—SAINTS' HERALD for October 9, 1907, lower left hand corner of first page.

If this be true, vain are all our hopes. Then our beloved Graceland, with her supposed saintly environments, has no preëminence over the slum districts of the great city; then our daughters may as well be associated with the vice and crimes of slums and saloons as with the angels of heaven. If "the doctrine of environment was smashed to pieces in the Garden of Eden,"—then is the entire fabric of the gospel of Jesus Christ a farce, and man may as well be in the company of demons in hell as with God and Christ in the glories of heaven: and we may as well feed our baser passions, and glut our souls with vice as to cultivate the immaculate character of the Son of God.

If "the doctrine of environment was smashed to pieces in the Garden of Eden," or anywhere else, why need we pray, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth"?

But, thank God, it is not so: for we have no hint of any temptation, or any demand for anything evil on the part of our foreparents, until they were entwined about with devilish environments.

Our environments are so much a part of us that we can not free our own souls from the taint of selfishness as long as we are compelled to secure our living by selfish methods.

If we fill our lives with the pure love of God that "seeketh not her own," if we obey the divine injunction to "prefer one another," we will be considered shiftless; and, as all commodities are gobbled up and hoarded away by the hogs of commerce, we should be left to beg and starve.

God demands of us to create new environments. It is man's business to see to his material and mental environments as God directs; and it is God's business to look after the spiritual.

What was there in Egypt that displeased God when he bared his mighty arm and transplanted Israel to Canaan? The answer thunders down from Sinai, "Environment."

What is there in Babylon that displeases the Lord so that he says, "Come out of her, O my people," and gather to the Zion of your God? Every revelation given through the Seer of Palmyra roars forth the answer, "Environment."

What clothes heaven with supernal glory of eternal day and shrouds the lower regions with the awful gloom of despair? Every atom of inspiration since Eden, in one mighty peal, answers, "Environment."

Numerous are the futile efforts, and miserable are the failures to "smash the doctrine of environment to pieces." And as long as God reigns, he will continue to thwart their efforts.

RAVENDEN SPRINGS, Arkansas. D. R. BALDWIN.

"THE PATRIARCH IS AN EVANGELICAL MINISTER."

The above statement is found in Section 125, paragraph 3, Doctrine and Covenants, dated April 15, 1901. Therein in my judgment, a flood of light came to the church upon this important subject. Duties and prerogatives of the office are made plain in said revelation that hitherto were little understood:

The duties of this office are to be an evangelical minister; to preach, teach, expound, exhort, to be a revivalist, and to visit branches and districts as wisdom may direct, invitation, request, or the Spirit of God determine and require; to comfort the Saints; to be a father to the church; to give counsel and advice to individuals who may seek for such; to lay on hands for the conferment of spiritual blessing, and if so led, to point out the lineage of the one who is blessed.

From the above we learn that the patriarch is an evangelical minister, but we are not warranted in concluding that all evangelical ministers are patriarchs, for the same reason that apostles are elders, but all elders are not apostles. (See Doctrine and Covenants 17:9.) In 1 Peter 5:1, the apostle acknowledges that he was an elder.

Webster gives us some valuable information on the term patriarch, also evangelical minister. "Patriarch.—The father and ruler—of a family; one who governs by paternal right. It is usually applied to the progenitors of the Israelites, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the sons of Jacob, or to the heads of families before the flood; as the antediluvian patriarchs." "Evangelical, according to the gospel; consonant to the doctrines and precepts of the gospel, published by Christ and his apostles: as evangelical righteousness, obedience, or piety. Contained in the gospel; as an evangelical doctrine. Sound in the doctrines of the gospel; orthodox; as an evangelical preacher."

The Utah Mormons have much to say in support of Webster's statement, viz., "A patriarch, one who governs by paternal right." They maintain that none but the seed of Hyrum Smith can hold the patriarchal office, and refer to section 107, paragraph 29: "That my servant Hyrum may take the office of priesthood and patriarch, which was appointed unto him by his father, by blessing and also by right, that from henceforth he shall hold the keys of the patriarchal blessings upon the heads of all my people," etc.

What are the reasons assigned why he should be a patriarch? First, by blessing, also by right of lineage. Second, because of his acceptance before the Lord. (See paragraph 5, same section), "And again, verily, I say unto you, Blessed is my servant Hyrum Smith, for I, the Lord, love him, because of the integrity of his heart, and because he loveth that which is right before me, saith the Lord."

The history of the past speaks in unmistakable voice, that the Lord will not confer the power of the priesthood upon the sons of men unless they honor and keep his commandments—lineage or no lineage. Paul says, "All are not Israel, which are of Israel."—Romans 6:9. Neither are all Saints, that call themselves Saints.

The fact that there has been a restoration of the priesthood in this age, is evidence that because of transgression it had been taken away from the sons of men. The lineage may have continued on down through the ages, hidden from man, but known to God, and unworthy in his sight, because of transgression, to receive the power of the priesthood. Had the sons of Hyrum and others lived in harmony with the laws of God, they would have been honored and respected by the church in their respective fields.

It will not be out of place to refer here to the dying blessing of Father Joseph Smith, Senior, as found in second volume of Church History, pages 462 and 463. Of Hyrum he says, "My son, . . . I seal upon your head your patriarchal blessing, which I placed upon your head before, for that shall be verified. In addition to this, I now give you my dying blessing. You shall have a season of peace, so that you shall have sufficient rest to accomplish the work which God has given you to do. You shall be as firm as the pillars of heaven unto the ends of your days. I now seal upon your head the patriarchal power, and you shall bless the people. This is my dying blessing upon your head in the name of Jesus, Amen." To Joseph he said, "Joseph, my son, you are called to a high and holy calling. You are even called to do the work of the Lord. Hold out faithful, and you shall be blessed, and your children after you," etc.

No promise made to the children of Hyrum, in the above. The reason is that God foresaw that they would depart from him, which they have done in the following and supporting of Brigham in his abominations.

To Joseph the promise was made, that he should be blessed and his children after him. Notice the wording, "Your children after you." He was not permitted to live to see his children grow up to the age where they could assist him in the great work, but he was given to understand that they would be blessed after him. How true the promise. I wish the same could have been said of the sons of Hyrum. The Lord will not sanction sin. He has in the past dethroned kings who were of the lineage of the chosen seed, because of their wickedness.

If, as the Utah Mormons say, the office of the patriarch belongs to the sons of Hyrum, by lineage, then will not the same rules apply to the sons of Joseph. Where is the consistency and justice to claim for the seed of Hyrum that which they will not concede to the sons of Joseph, who have been faithful to the angel's message. Of Joseph the Lord says in Doctrine and Covenants 107:18: "That his blessing shall be put upon the head of his posterity after him."

The Utah church makes great pretensions to the world, by idolizing the name of the Prophet Joseph Smith; but trample beneath their feet many of the divine and sacred truths delivered to him by angelic messengers and the spirit of revelation, and ignore his sons in their legitimate calling and work of righteousness.

I am not a man-worshiper, but I am proud of the record that the faithful sons and grandsons of the martyred Prophet have made. Truly did the first patriarch of the church speak by revelation when he said to the Prophet, "You shall be blessed, and your children after you."

As evidence that others than the sons of Hyrum Smith could legally be ordained to the office of patriarch or evangelical minister, we refer to section 104, paragraph 17: "It is the duty of the twelve, in all large branches of the church, to ordain evangelical ministers, as they shall be designated unto them by revelation." From the above it is plainly seen that it was the Lord's will that others than those of the sons of Hyrum should occupy in the patriarchal office. Had the Twelve carried out the instructions, there would have been several ordained to the above office.

In section 122, paragraph 8, some sixty years later, the Lord again speaks to the Twelve of this church to observe the law already given, to ordain evangelical ministers, but for reasons given in section 125, the quorum did not comply with the instructions, viz., because the duties and prerogatives that attach to the office were not understood by those whose duties it was to ordain. And the Lord says, "Let my servants [the Twelve] take heed, and hesitate no longer."

The duties of the patriarch, in revelation 125, are very plainly presented. Not as some have believed, only to give blessings by laying on of hands. That is a small part of the work outlined. The patriarch is to preach, teach, expound, exhort, to be a revivalist, and to visit branches, districts, to give counsel and advice to all that seek for the same. There is a wide field to labor in, and the more time there is spent in the discharge of the above duties, the better prepared will the Saints be to receive the blessings by the laying on of hands. In paragraph 4, of the same section, we learn that the patriarch is to be free from responsibility—ministerial—as a traveling minister, and from the care of the local branch or church and district affairs. When traveling and preaching, holding revival meetings, he is to labor in connection with the branch and district officers, not subject to the ministerial control of the missionary in charge, except he should transcend his bounds and teach false doctrines, or be found in transgression. He is not to meddle with branch affairs or district affairs. He is not to listen to complaints made by individuals to him; but if persons insist upon presenting their troubles, he is to request them and require them to make them in writing, signing the name, giving time and place, and character of the trouble, with the witnesses, which it will be his duty to present to the branch or district officers, as the case may require. He is not to be put in charge of either branch or district.

These are the privileges which attach to the office of patriarch and evangelical minister. Other evangelical ministers, besides the patriarch, have similar duties in the districts where they are appointed.

Respectfully,

WM. LEWIS.

"IS" OR "MEANS"?

And when the hour was come, he sat down, and the twelve apostles with him. And he said unto them, With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer: for I say unto you, I will not any more eat thereof, until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God. And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and said, Take this, and divide it among yourselves: for I say unto you, I will not drink of the fruit of the vine, until the kingdom of God shall come. And he took bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave unto them, saying, This is my body which is given for you: this do in remembrance of me. Likewise also the cup after supper, saying, This cup is the new testament in my blood, which is shed for you.—Luke 22:14-20.

Though a layman of our Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, I feel impressed to write something about the small word is, contained in the above speech of our Lord and Savior. In the German States, and, as I suppose, throughout the whole globe, where Christian denominations exist, the differing creeds quarrel about the sense of this small word. Some say, like several reformers, Zwingli, Calvin, Melancthon (contemporaries of Luther), that our Savior ought to have said correctly means instead of is, and a number of church scholars and similar people, boasting to have authority in ecclesiastical affairs (in German ironically named Kirchenlichter—church lights,) accept this explanation, with the understanding that in reality we only enjoy bread and wine. Whereas, the head reformer for Germany and the Scandinavian countries, Luther, formerly a Roman Catholic monk and priest, took over into his new-founded Lutheran Church that Roman Catholic comprehension, the belief of the transformation of bread and wine into flesh and blood of our Savior in the very same moment when the ministering priest consecrates these ingredients and offers them to the congregation. Whereas now the last mentioned church remains in its belief of full transformation, Luther only believed in the latter, but in the meantime let exist bread and wine! An inconceivable contradiction! No logically thinking man comprehends that. Either there is a transformation or there is not. Two different kinds can not be the same. Which is right now?

The Catholics say that the reason a transformation is denied comes from the fact that because one will evade this wonder of transformation, one does not consider Christ to be a constituent part of the God-head, and therefore the wonder must fall away. How does now the real church of Christ place itself in regard to these differing comprehensions? A Catholic relative of mine, to whom I sent our German tract, "Der weg der Seligkeit" (way to salvation) wrote to me in answer thereupon, that in the main he agreed with the contained principles in regard to faith, repentance, baptism, etc., but with respect to the Lord's supper he stood on the quoted standpoint. At first I was unprepared in my mind against this objection, not being acquainted with it till that moment. In my reflection I came to the conclusion, that as Christ says, "I will not drink of the fruit of the vine," the wine remains fruit of the vine, and that there did not occur any material transformation. But with this I was at an end with my Latin. Therefore I proceeded in the next nights to pray, in the sense of James 1: 5, 6, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God," and in answer thereunto one night there instantly flashed through my mind the words of our Savior to his disciples, John 15: 5: "I am the vine, ye are the branches," etc. And on the following night, using the prescription of James, there came to my mind our Lord's words, John 6: 34-48: "I am the bread of life: he that cometh to me shall never hunger," etc.

I could not but consider these prompt ideas as coming from the Holy Ghost, who will lead you into all truth, according to our Lord's words. And from this time it was no difficult matter to make the further conclusions. Christ in one case calls himself the vine, and in the other places he speaks of wine as the fruit of the vine, and therefore I concluded that in the latter symbolic sense he has named wine his blood.

Under bread of life is to be understood the gospel, just as in his conversation with the Samaritan woman, John 4, he spoke of the gospel as "living water." Now, Christ is the embodied representative of the gospel (bread of life), and from this we can not but conclude that bread of life is in the symbolic sense, the body of Christ. John 6: 58 we read: "He that eateth of this bread will live for ever," as much as to say that he that accepts this gospel (and me as his Savior) will partake of salvation.

If we accept this comprehension we need not believe in the Catholic doctrine of transformation of bread and wine into flesh and blood, nor in any wonder where there is no wonder. Both are additions of the human spirit in the sense of Revelation 22: 18, of which we must beware. Men have no right, but God only has the right to give supplements to his doctrines whenever he pleases. In this sense I answered my Catholic relative. Was I right? I fully believe this, with said testimonials received on hand.

We, therefore, need not to make hair-splitting differences between is and means. The Holy Scriptures declare all things very plainly to those earnestly and sincerely investigating, according to James 1: 5, 6, and John 5: "Seek in the scriptures, for you think you have eternal life therein, and it testifies of me." (I only have a German Lutheran Bible on hand, therefore this is freely translated.)

With preference, too, people refer to tradition which relates that the ancient Syrian church, of the second and fourth centuries after Christ, has already maintained said belief of transformation of substances in the Lord's supper. They quote the most literary treatises and records of said times. But what do we with traditions if they are not in accord with the gospel, with that which is written, to which referred our Lord during his temptation by the Devil? (See Matthew 4.)

Wishing everybody to regard the words, the type kills, but the Spirit makes living, ["The letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life"] I am, with kindest regards,

Those who mistake the excitement and agitation of reform for the source of danger, must have overlooked all history. We believe in excitement when the theme is great; in agitation when huge evils are to be reformed. It is thus that a state or nation clears itself of great moral wrongs, and effects important changes. Still waters gather to themselves poisonous ingredients, and scatter epidemics and death. The noisy, tumbling brook, and the rolling and roaring ocean, are pure and healthful. The moral and political elements need the rockings and heavings of free discussion, for their own purification. The nation feels a healthier pulsation, and breathes a more invigorating atmosphere, than if pulpit, platform, and press, were all silent as the tomb, leaving misrule and oppression unwatched and unscathed.—P. Cooke.

Of General Interest

[We have seen a small tract entitled "The trial of Jesus," a sort of quasi-judicial examination of the apparent evidence in the case; but we give the following, from the columns of the Glad Tidings for December, as perhaps the only strictly legal examination of the trial, from what may be called a legal standpoint, by a lawyer. We commend it to the reading of the missionaries, as it is instructive, and may help some of them in an examination of the matter, if they are called upon to discuss the question with infidels or unbelievers or scoffers.—EDITORS.]

WAS IT MURDER?

LEGAL STATUS OF THE CRUCIFIXION OF CHRIST AS EXPOUNDED.

(From the Grand Rapids Evening Press.)

ANN ARBOR, November 30.—Was the crucifixion of Jesus murder or justifiable homicide? Was he hung on the cross in violation of human law or under due process of the law?

Professor Jerome C. Knowlton, of the law department of the University of Michigan, recognized as one of the world's leading authorities on criminal law, after an exhaustive study of Jewish jurisprudence, answers these questions.

Characterizing the trial of Jesus as the greatest in the history of criminal law, Professor Knowlton, adhering strictly to legal aspects of the case, finds that Jesus on the charge of blasphemy, Sabbath-breaking, or false prophecy, all of which were punishable by death, could have made no defense on the merits. He finds the trail replete with errors, most of them errors against the fundamental provisions of the Jewish code. He declared that Jesus was tried four times, once convicted and three times acquitted, and was then punished, not for the crime of which he had been convicted, but for the crime of treason, of which he had been thrice acquitted. He asks, "Was this justifiable homicide or judicial murder?"

Professor Knowlton step by step follows the events of Jesus' arrest, trial, condemnation, and death. He casts aside all sentiment and prejudice in his review of the case, making this introductory remark:

"One's faith in Christianity is in no way involved in the answer to this inquiry, if Jesus' crucifixion was justifiable homicide or judicial murder. We have been interested in noticing how some writers have struggled to magnify the errors in the trial of Jesus. One learned layman finds what he calls twenty-seven irregularities, and then congratulates the Christian world upon the fact that Jesus was not judicially tried and condemned. Suppose he was not, then what of it? Nothing, except a historical fact.

THE TRIAL OF JESUS.

"Jesus Christ came into the world with a definite mission. This may have involved violations rather than observances of human law, then known as Rabbinical traditions. He might have been regularly tried, convicted, and condemned to death, without casting a doubt upon his accepted mission. Christianity rests upon a firmer basis than the mistakes of the Jews. The criminal proceedings against Jesus may have been right or wrong. It matters very little whether it was done legally or illegally under human law."

Opening with a recital of events a few days before his crucifixion, Professor Knowlton leads up to the arrest of Jesus on the Mount of Olives by the Roman soldiery. He then begins his review of the trial before the Sanhedrin.

The trial was opened in the dead of the night preceding his death on the cross. Describing the corruption of the court officials and the state of religious and political excitement through which Judea was passing, Professor Knowlton continues as follows:

"Again, this court was prejudiced against Jesus. He had been condemned to death before he was tried. During the first month preceding this Thursday night, the Sanhedrin had met three times to discuss the teachings of Jesus, and in his absence and without giving him a hearing had determined on his death. All of this was in violation of these maxims found in the Talmud: 'Testimony must not be heard in the absence of the party concerned,' and again, 'No man shall be condemned unless he is present.'

"Had Jesus so violated the law of the state so that he was guilty of an offense punishable by death?

"Jesus had ignored the traditions of the fathers. He had broken the Jewish Sabbath. He had called the priests and scribes a wicked and adulterous generation—a generation of vipers. He had said he was the Messiah. He had denounced the Jewish sacrifices and prophesied the destruction of the temple. During every day of his active life he had passed by word or deed beyond the boundary of the Jewish law. As against the charge of blasphemy, Sabbath-breaking, or false prophecy, all of which were punishable with death, Jesus could have made no defense on the merits, and all of this because he came into the world with a definite mission, and the fulfillment of a higher law than any known in Jewish jurisprudence.

"No definite answer can be given to the question, 'On what charge was Jesus tried?' Some facts point to a charge of blasphemy, others to Sabbath-breaking, still others to false prophecy. However, after this question, 'Art thou the Son of God?' from Caiaphas, the high priest, and the accused one's answer, 'You have said, I am,' conviction was secured.

COURT PROCEEDINGS IRREGULAR.

Professor Knowlton holds that there is no doubt that the entire court proceedings were irregular.

First.—What ought to have been done when Jesus appeared before the Sanhedrin? The trial of a capital case was conducted as follows: The court assembled after the morning sacrifice and sat in a semi-circle. The high priest sat in the center and at either side sat the scribes. In front and looking into the semi-circle of the judges sat the accused, guards, and witnesses. The judges were supposed to be the defenders of the accused. The accusation was read and the witnesses called to support it. Each witness was taken into an adjoining room and admonished at length. Then he was carefully examined and cross-examined by the judges. Two witnesses were required to the same overt act. The defendant appeared and offered witnesses to refute the case of the prosecution. The accused might speak in his behalf. The testimony having been concluded, the accused and the witnesses withdrew, and the court commenced to discuss the case.

In a capital case no one could speak until some one of the judges first spoke in behalf of the prisoner; then the argument pro and con was freely advanced. After deliberation the voting commenced. The scribes kept the record. The votes of the younger members of the court were taken first, that they might act unprejudiced by the votes of their superiors in age and rank. A majority of one voting, "I absolve" was required for an acquittal, and a majority of two voting "I condemn" was required for a conviction. A result having been arrived at by the judges, the prisoner was brought in and the result announced. If the verdict was, guilty, no judgment could be pronounced until the afternoon of the following day. One night must intervene between the verdict and the sentence. In the meantime the judges partook of no food. Early the next morning they assembled and again heard the witnesses and the accused. As the day wore away, they discussed and pondered over the serious character of their duty. Late in the afternoon they took their final vote. If the requisite number again voted for conviction the accused was at once sentenced and led forth to execution.

Was Jesus thus tried? Certainly not. The records show that the judges were his accusers rather than defenders; that the witnesses were not admonished or separately examined; that their testimony did not agree as to any overt act. More than this, Jesus was compelled to be a witness against himself. He ought not to have been called upon to incriminate himself. Upon his own testimony he was convicted and condemned. In spite of this fundamental maxim in Jewish jurisprudence, "No man convicts himself." These are some of the irregularities of the trial, but such irregularities do not vitiate the judgment inquired into collaterally.

NOT PROPER COURT-ROOM.

First.—Jesus was tried for a capital offense in the palace of the high priests; but the Jewish law strictly enjoins that every trial for a capital offense should be heard in the hall of hewn stone within the palace. The court which sat at the palace of the high priest Caiaphas had no jurisdiction whatever over the crime with which Jesus was charged.

Second.—The entire proceedings against Jesus was taken on a festal day, on Friday, a day of the Passover. Jewish law forbade the rendering of judgment in any criminal case on the Sabbath or any festal day. The proceedings against Jesus on that Friday were as null and void as would be a trial, conviction, and sentence of a criminal in our courts on Sunday.

Third.—It was a rule of law that a criminal case should be tried during the day and suspended at nightfall. In no case was a man to be tried for a capital offense in the night time, but Jesus was arrested and condemned when all Jerusalem was in darkness.

Fourth.—There was a wise provision in the Jewish law to the effect that in a capital case a trial could not conclude and the sentence of death be pronounced on the same day. This condition was not fulfilled in the trial of Jesus. In less than twelve hours' time he was arrested, tried, and condemned to death. There were other errors, such as the taking of the verdict, but enough has been said to show that Jesus was condemned in a court, the great Sanhedrin, which had no jurisdiction over him or the crime with which he was charged. Their sentence was null and void, and, strange to say, it was not executed. In the early hours of Friday morning they took Jesus before Pontius Pilate, the Roman procurator.

JEWISH RABBIS CUNNING.

Pilate, after asking the Jews, "Take ye him and judge ye him according to your own laws," consented to take charge of the prisoners, insisting upon knowing the accusation against him. The priests were troubled. They could not charge Jesus with being a blasphemer or a false prophet, for Pilate would have snapped his fingers at such charges and said, "Away with you." All the cunning of the Jewish rabbis was demanded in this great emergency that they might accuse Jesus of some political offense over which Pilate would assume jurisdiction. Accordingly Jesus was charged with forbidding his followers to give tribute to Cæsar, and with saying that he himself was Christ, the King. That is to say, Jesus was charged with treason against the Roman state. Pilate entertained the charge and, taking Jesus aside, questioned him. Then he appeared before the priests and said to them: "I find no fault in this man." Thus Jesus was acquitted.

He ought to have been set free, but the priests would not permit this. They made a frightful din before the palace, insisting on his condemnation. Pilate then directed that Jesus should be taken before Pilate, [Herod 2] and no fault found with him. Still the Jews clamored for his crucifixion. Any further detention was illegal imprisonment, but the Jews still cried out, "Crucify him, crucify him." Pilate weakened before the power of the mob, and condemned Jesus to die.

Within twelve hours Jesus had been arrested, tried, and convicted, of either blasphemy, Sabbath-breaking, or false prophecy; then he was taken before Pilate on the charge of treason and was acquitted. He was taken before Herod on the same charge and was acquitted, and then brought a second time before Pilate on the same charge and was again acquitted. Still the priests thirsted for his blood, and he was crucified. There is a fundamental rule of law that no man shall be tried twice for the same offense. After all this, Jesus was not punished for the crime of which he had been convicted, but for the crime of treason, of which he had been thrice acquitted. Was this judicial murder, or justifiable homicide?

THE GAIN OF RIGHT LIVING.

"I have spoken about the things we must give up," said Dr. Chapman, the evangelist, in Des Moines recently. "Now what is the gain? Some of you say; 'What did Peter give up?' And you try to figure it up, and all that you can find that he ever did give up was an old boat that was not seaworthy, and an old net that needed mending, and an old father that was ready to die, and you say to-day: 'I would be willing to give up things like that.' But you must remember that that was all he had. The only boat he had was old, the only net he had was almost useless, and the only father he had was ready to die; and he gave up everything. And, all is all, whether you live in a hut or a palace. God always blesses those who give up everything for him. Peter gained culture. Here was a man, a poor fisherman, ignorant and unlearned. And here is a man writing the epistles in the purest Greek that is to be found in the New Testament. Where did he get that? At the feet of Jesus, in complete surrender. The third thing he gained was fellowship with Jesus, with him in the home of Jairus; with him in the garden of Gethsemane; with him on the mount of transfiguration. Oh, thou man of nets and boats, what would I not give up if I could have a fellowship like thine? I believe that I may have the same, if I make a sacrifice as complete."

When We Pray.

Early in the morning, let us pray
For strength, to bear the burdens of the day.

What we ask we may receive,
If we only will believe;
God will surely help us onward when we pray.

At noontime, while we tarry by the way,
In a place secluded, let us kneel to pray.

God will surely hear our cry;
He will not pass us by;
He will give us strength and courage when we pray.

When the sun is sinking in the west,
And from our daily toil we sweetly rest,

For blessings we receive,
Thank God, whom we believe
Doth answer when in faith to him we pray.

When darkness hangs its mantle over day,
Ere we slumber, let us kneel again to pray

That an angel through the night,
Until the morning light,
Will guard our sleeping moments—when we pray.

Volume Seven of Birth Offering Series.

From Mr. C. H. Engle, publisher of the "Queen of the Woods," we have received the following letter, written upon receipt of a copy of "The Indian Maiden," sent him from our publishing house:

"HARTFORD, Michigan, December 25, 1907.

"My Dear Mrs. Walker: Books sent me came duly to hand. 'The Indian Maiden' is certainly a beautiful book, tastefully and beautifully bound. I have read it through carefully. In fact I found it so interesting I could not bear to lay it aside until I read the last word. I can not help but feel that an unseen power has prompted you to publish it. I am fully satisfied in my heart that your effort in publishing the little volume will be richly repaid—far beyond what gold can do. I am fully satisfied that no child or adult can read the little volume and not be made stronger in the great cause of temperance. Your stories are so well and naturally told that no reader of any sense can peruse it and not be deeply interested in the strong facts set forth. If properly brought before the public it will become as popular as 'Black Beauty,' the horse history. Your introduction is strong, and forceful to impress what follows. No one could produce such a wonderful book of its kind, unless their whole soul was in the temperance cause. Your selections of poetry heading each chapter are marvelous. No one, unless they have read much, and unless they possess a love for poetry and its appropriateness, could ever have made such selections.

"I wish I could meet and shake hands with every one who made birth offerings to aid in publishing the work. May God bless them and you is my sincere prayer, and that the little volume may go marching on, sowing the seeds of temperance in the hearts of its readers through all our loved land.

"Many thanks for the book, and now wishing you a Merry Christmas and a Happy New-year, I am sincerely yours, C. H. ENGLE."

Dear mothers and teachers, you who come nearest to our boys and girls, it is not because of any compliment to ourselves which the above letter contains, that we insert it here, but because we wish you to see the opinion of one not of our faith and in every way an entirely disinterested party—as to the value of the latest addition to our Birth Offering Series. But especially we wish to call your attention to the kindly sentiment expressed for all who, by sending in birth offerings, have contributed to the publishing of this book.

From time to time in this column, we have called the attention of mothers to this offering. It is not—as some think—a birthday gift, which may be repeated from year to year as they come and go, but a birth offering, which may be made but once in life. It is years now since the thought first came to us, and this is how it came.

We had been thinking long and seriously of the great mistake our people were making, in failing to win the hearts of their children to the latter-day work, while those hearts were yet young and tender. Where were our Daniels, our Shadrachs, our Meshacs, and Abednegoos? Alas! could there not be found an army of these who had drifted outside of the church, because no special effort had been made to hold them there? How very, very different it had been with these Jewish youths, who had been taken captive to Babylon!

Then the question arose, were those Jewish mothers endowed with more intelligence, and had they greater facilities for instructing their children than have the mothers of our own day? Surely not.

How, then, came it about? For there is no one at all familiar with this people but knows how almost impossible, even to this day, it is to win a Jew from the faith of his forefathers. So thought followed thought, and there was borne in upon our mind that among all the multiplicity of books published in our day for boys and girls, there was not a single volume issued from our own press—not a juvenile book intended to win them to the faith or to impress upon their young minds that ethical culture without which no well rounded-out character can be formed.

Then upon one occasion, when we were reading the beautiful story of the Christ-child and his mother, we came to where Mary took him up to Jerusalem and went into the temple to present him to the Lord: "And to offer a sacrifice according to that which is said in the law of the Lord, a pair of turtle-doves, or two young pigeons." Then the thought came to us: "God no longer requires sacrifice and his soul is weary of burnt-offerings; but if our mothers, upon such occasions, were to send a free-will offering to help in publishing books for their children—books calculated to win them to the gospel the Christ-child taught, as well as to all that is holiest, best, and purest in life, would it not be an offering in which his soul would delight?" And from this mental experience sprang the Birth Offering Series, of which our temperance story, "The Indian Maiden," is the seventh volume. All mothers have not responded—but many have contributed to this fund, and the names of their little ones will be found in these books. Our publishing house is now better equipped than ever before for getting out these books, and for the advancement of this enterprise we do most earnestly bespeak the coöperation of both parents and teachers, as well as the faith and prayers of all who are laboring for the advancement of the cause of truth.

Send all offerings to Mrs. M. B. Nicholson, treasurer, Lamoni, Iowa.
FRANCES.

Our Source of Strength.

"The ideal set before us for our attainment is not Adam and Eve, in their childlike innocence, before the fall; but Jesus Christ, in his strength of purity, his victory over temptation and human lusts."

I am sure, very sure, that by the things we suffer, by the things we conquer, are we made strong in the strength of the dear Lord Jesus, our wonderful example.

And he understands! for was he not tempted in all points like as we are?

Jesus Christ was tempted,—but his divine nature was so great! Our nature is such a mixture of the human and the divine, that we are prone to fall where he would have been strong to resist. "Temptation is not sin, but the yielding." Our victory seems ever side by side with defeat.

But "we have an advocate with the Father, even Jesus Christ the righteous." And after great temptation and weakness there may still be left to us the "strength of purity."

It seems to me part of God's plan, that, at times, we feel our weakness before him, and our dependence upon him. And it often happens that when we feel confident in our own strength, and become elated over it, that something occurs to make us feel our littleness in the sight of the Lord, and our weakness before him. Then are we humbled, and we cling to him for support.

It is good to be well and strong in body; but sickness and weakness serve to remind us of the dependence we must place in the God of all strength. We are led to think upon him and his goodness to his creatures, even while we are suffering; to pray to him from the depths of our hearts that we may recover, and to rejoice in him the more when we become strong.

And so, through the things that we suffer and by the things that we conquer are we made strong. God's plans for his children are all good, and we may rest in his promises, and know that "all things work together for good to them that love the Lord."

Editors Herald: Inclosed please find one dollar and fifty cents for SAINTS' HERALD for 1908. The Saints of Weyburn hold Sunday-school and prayer- and preaching-services in three different places, as we now number sixty-three, and some have moved thirty miles away from the schoolhouse where we were organized into a branch, and others were baptized into the branch fifteen miles away.

We expect a visit from Bro. J. L. Mortimer soon. We always welcome a visit from him. He is our missionary in charge, and looks after his business well, and gives good counsel.

We have some faithful, earnest, working Saints here. We regret to note that our branch president has moved his family to Tyven, as they will be missed very much, and he was our only elder in the neighborhood, a young and worthy servant of our Master.

While Satan seems, sometimes, and in divers manners, to assert himself, yet we can still report a goodly work, and many living righteous lives, trying to assist the weaker ones. We held a long-to-be-remembered reunion in July, at Weyburn. Bro. and Sr. R. C. Evans, J. L. Mortimer, and several other officers, and a goodly number of Saints, and several not of the faith, were in attendance. The effort was well received by the town.

Faithfully,

Editors Herald: I am not able to attend church and Sunday-school to-day, being compelled, on account of rheumatism, to stay at home; but I have preached one Sunday in each month, and attended Sunday-school all summer. Now I look through the windows and see the ground covered with snow. It reminds me that the holidays are here, and the young people are enjoying themselves at weddings and festivals; but I am getting too old to attend such gatherings.

Our grandson, Jesse A. Donaldson, a student in Graceland College, is at home on a vacation. He will return to Graceland for the winter term. Best wishes to all the Saints and friends.

ST. CLAIR, Michigan, December 25, 1907.

Dear Herald: It is merry Christmas time, when all the world is supposed to be ringing with Christmas joy. One day out of three hundred and sixty-five, when the great world consents for one whole day to stand still and lay aside selfishness, and take time for cheerful greetings and a renewal of the old ties. Christmas has its sad as well as merry side. There are those who are alone even in the midst of the gayety and mirth of merry gatherings, who realize all the more keenly their own heart-solitude at this season of the year, as they look on the reunion of dear friends, and think with a pang of regret of their own loved ones far away.

I may be pessimistic, but to me there is a note of sadness in the jingle of the merry Christmas bells, as my thoughts go out to the lonely and heart-broken, sadly recalling the merry voices that will never again give them Christmas greeting. How the sad, lonely heart longs for kind words of sympathy! The mission of our Savior was to bind up the broken-hearted. Who is able to minister to a heart silently suffering under the burden of the sad mistakes of the past? None but sweet, low-voiced charity. This is the mission of the angels of God. See how tenderly they approach the bruised and bleeding breast! Look how lightly they lay their fingers on the wound, lest they should crush it! Surely this is the grandest of all missions, to minister comfort to a wounded, lonely heart.

Elder Daniel MacGregor, of Stratford, Canada, has concluded a series of grand and instructive sermons, in fact a rare intellectual treat, illustrated by charts, showing forth the marvelous fulfillment of prophecy in connection with the history of the past and present. The speaker's arguments were clear-cut and forcible, and were presented with powerful logic, the Holy Spirit bearing witness to a remarkable degree at times. The world-wide work of the great apostasy was seen in all its appalling forms of darkness, when not a ray of light penetrated that long, black night, until the bright, gentle moonlight of the reformation paved the way for the blazing sunlight of the great restoration of gospel glory.

BROADWATER, Missouri, December 1, 1907.

Editors Herald: As you have not heard from me for some time I shall venture a few thoughts that I hope will be placed on record. Myself and family are well, and I am in the true faith, the gospel faith, and have a great desire to do good. Just how much good I can do I can not tell, but hope to be led by the Spirit of the living God. I have been on back ground for some time! had no idea that I should ever pray to do good; but God has taken the lead of my mind, and I find to duty I shall have to go. This will be quite consoling to the Saints, for I have been in quite a helpless condition for some time; but all I can say is, that the same Spirit that used to work in my mind will continue to work. I have great hopes of eternal life, and for this I feel to rejoice in the spirit of the true gospel of Jesus Christ, and ask that the Saints rejoice with me; for I feel that I was lost and am found. All Saints that know me will rejoice with me in the true gospel. From this time forward my mind will be toward Zion. With these few words I shall add no more.

D. A. HOPKINS.

QUINCY, Ohio, December 8, 1907.

Dear Herald: Being one of the isolated ones, I can not get along without the silent preacher. There are no Saints here in Quincy, and I am doing all I can to remove prejudice. Expect Elder Ebeling here this coming week to baptize some. The road seems rough and dangerous, yet we hope for victory. I am a widow and am caring for my father. He is all I have, and is eighty-two years old, and a great care. I would like to do more for the cause we so much love, but am helpless now. We are saving all we can for the expenses of the elder coming here.

J. E. GRAHAM.

LLOYD, New Mexico.

Dear Herald: The HERALD is the paper for me. It is so full of gospel news that I love to read it. I see letters in it often from those I used to know. Then I wish I were back on the old stamping-ground, so I could see them. Still, I believe the Lord sends me from place to place to do what little I can, and then call for some one to help out. There are several here that would like to hear an elder. They have heard my scattering talk till they want to hear some one that can explain things. The Christian preacher was asking lots of questions one night. Finally I answered two or three for him and got into quite a dispute with him. One was, What is the difference between the baptism of the Holy Ghost and the gift of the Holy Ghost? I told him there was not any, and he said there was quite a difference; so I asked him to prove it to me by the Bible. So we had the same over the next night; still he would not prove it; so I would like to have some one come to explain to him. He claims to be college-educated for the ministry; and he says he knows more in five minutes than a common man knows in five weeks; so I shall let him rest till some one comes that is able to hold him. Still I will not run; but go to hear every time he comes. That is the first Sunday in the month. And the Freewill Baptist minister comes the fourth Sunday.

Your brother in Christ,

JAMES O. COSHAW.

LAMONI, Iowa, December 7, 1907.

Editors Herald: Knowing as I do that those who aided in building the two homes for the aged and afflicted would like to hear how we are prospering, I give you an extract from my diary for some two weeks as follows:

On the 23d, in company with Elders Stamm and Hastings, I visited the HERALD Office. At night in the men's prayer-service at Liberty Home the gift of singing in tongues and the interpretation was given through Elder Hastings to Elder George Hicklin. It was comforting to us all. On the 24th I attended Sunday-school and church in the forenoon. In the afternoon I was at the prayer-service at the church. At night I assisted at the Saints' Home, Elder George Hicklin being the speaker. On the 25th was rejoicing in Christ my Savior. I experienced much pleasure reading the book entitled "A dream of heaven." In the evening, in company with Elder Hicklin, I went to Bro. Joseph Lane's and administered to James M. Blood, who was troubled with sunstroke. By so doing I missed the Religio lesson. On the 26th I was weak in body, fairly strong in spirit. Book of Mormon study at night. On the 27th I was fairly well. I went in the evening, in company with five others, to the evening prayer-service at the church. I assisted President John Smith in presiding. On the 28th (Thanksgiving) I fasted. Felt well in doing so. I was at church in the morning. Sermon by Apostle Heman C. Smith. At night prayer-service at Liberty Home, presided over by Elder Carlile and myself. Bro. Hastings had the gift of tongues, and Sr. Phipps the gift of prophecy. On the 29th I was not so well, but went in the afternoon to the men's prayer-service at the Saints' Home. It was good. A lengthy prophecy was given relative to the gospel being preached to the nations, and God's power as manifested among them, and the might of the Lord being with those who went out to preach the word. At night I attended a lengthy entertainment given at the church by the Religio, most of which was very good, yet I thought some things were not good, especially in the church house. On the 30th I was not as well as common. At the men's evening prayer-service I was better. In the gift of tongues and interpretation it was manifested that many of our friends in the spirit world had embraced the gospel. Sabbath morning, December 1, being requested to do so, I, in company with Elder H. A. Stebbins, administered to Thomas Stewart for stomach trouble. Not being very well I did not attend the service at the church. At night I was at preaching at Liberty Home and administered to Bro. Stewart, being assisted by Elder A. S. Cochran. On the 2d I helped wash, went to the HERALD Office with Sr. Dalley, and attended home class Religio. On the 3d I visited with the afflicted neighbors and presided at Book of Mormon study. On the 4th I visited with Sr. Salyards, editor of the Sunday-school Quarterly, and in conversation with her I was much pleased to find that she believed in so changing the texts of the Quarterly that the subject matter treated of would relate principally to this dispensation. At night I attended prayer-service at the church. On the 5th I fasted and remained indoors most all day. I was feeble in body, but blessed in spirit. At night, at the Liberty Home prayer-service, a prophecy was given by Elder Hastings, in which we were told that the temple would soon be built, and we would be baptized for our dead friends. On the morning of the 6th, in company with Elder W. Hastings, we administered to Grandma Patrick, as we call her. I went in the afternoon to the Saints' Home and attended the men's prayer-service, when the tongue given the night previous at Liberty Home, relative to the building of the temple and the baptizing for the dead, was confirmed. A prophecy was also given by Bro. Atkins, in which we were told not to be gluttonous, but to be temperate and kind, and not to speak lightly.

I will also state that at these homes we are well cared for temporarily. I have been here a little more than a year. I am very weak, but am gradually improving.

C. J. SPURLOCK.

PORTLAND, Oregon, December 30, 1907.

Editors Herald: Just two months ago I wrote that a new opening had been made at Riverside, in this city, and that a fine interest was manifested. Yesterday, the 29th, about seventy people assembled on the banks of the beautiful stream in Hawthorn Park, where four were baptized, a direct result of this opening. Not many days hence, more will follow. On the 28th, we went by request to another part of the city and made an appointment for New-year's Eve, to begin the work among strangers to the truth. And thus the work moves along. But truly, while the harvest appears great, yet the laborers are few. Let us pray the Lord to send more laborers to the city of Portland.

Your brother in hope,

723 Broad Street.

W. A. GOODWIN.

Editors Herald: In October I was permitted to attend the conference, at Traverse City. Friday, October 4, services commenced at nine o'clock in the morning, in town hall. I noticed by the reports that the Religio work is not making the progress that it should on account of interest dying out. This I am sorry to see; for I think this is a grand part of the work, and is a great help to us, and helps to fit us to come up higher in the work here on earth, and also to meet one's God when we pass beyond. The afternoon session seemed to be better,—Sunday-school convention. Several good speakers, and good instruction given to the workers. October 5, prayer-meeting commenced at half past eight. It was a prayer-meeting long to be remembered by myself, and I think I am justified in speaking for all present. Bro. J. W. Wight spoke in tongues, also interpreted, and it was a comfort to the Saints to see that God recognizes his people when they gather together. The rest of the day was spent in reports, etc.

October 6, meeting commenced at half past eight. Prayer-meeting held until fifteen minutes after ten. Preaching by E. K. Evans. Baptism at half past one in Traverse Bay. Three baptized by Bro. Ellis. Preaching at half past two by Bro. Ellis. Text, Matthew 4: 4: "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Preaching at four by Bro. Cornish. He preached on the violence that took the gospel away from the earth. Seven o'clock, preaching by Bro. Wight. He preached on the restoration of the gospel.

We enjoyed this trip very much, were well treated by all the Saints, and are not sorry for the little sacrifice that we made to go. Hope I shall live to attend many more such meetings, and my prayer is that the Saints will so live that when they gather together God will recognize them as his children with the manifestation of his Holy Spirit.

Dear Saints, pray for me that I may so live that I may be numbered with them; also my family. I want to live to be an example to them, and to bring them up in the right way.

Your brother,
THEO. CAFFEY.

EUNICE, Louisiana, December 22, 1907.

Editors Herald: I love to read the good letters from the brothers and sisters. I am away down here in the lowlands of Louisiana, where I never have a chance to hear the gospel preached; nothing much but Catholicism, and it has not a bit of Christ in it. It has been six years since I heard the gospel preached. I hope some of the elders will come this way soon. I will do all I can to get a place in which to hold meetings. I ask the prayers of the Saints that I may live faithfully, and love God and keep his commandments to the end.

Yours in the faith,
W. A. HELMS.

Extracts from Letters.

T. S. Martin, Shattuck, Oklahoma: "I am running a restaurant, and would be glad to have Latter Day Saints call on me."

S. T. Ridley, Toronto, Ontario: "President Evans is still preaching to a crowded house on Sunday evenings. Two baptized last Sunday afternoon."

News From Branches

LAMONI, IOWA.

Heman C. Smith occupied the stand in the chapel Sunday morning; C. E. Harpe in the evening. George Day spoke at the Saints' Home, F. M. Weld at the Liberty Home. W. R. Dexter occupied at Oland morning and evening.

A series of meetings are being conducted at Greenville. These meetings were opened Sunday evening by Wardell Christy and S. K. Sorensen, and are being continued by S. K. Sorensen and Eli Hayer. A series is also being held at Andover in charge of Moroni Traxler and J. F. Garver. They are assisted this week by George Day and C. E. Harpe.

At their semi-annual election Friday evening the local Religio chose the following as officers: C. B. Woodstock, president; Rufus Willey, vice-president; Jessie Cave, secretary; Letha Tilton, treasurer; Jessie Morant, librarian; Frances White, chorister; Edna Fike, organist; Estella Wight, correspondent. Hereafter the society will hold its sessions in the lower auditorium. The society recently changed to the upper room, but the change has proved undesirable.

The Sunday-school chose the following officers for the ensuing year: J. A. Gunsolley, superintendent; J. A. Lane, E. F. Hall, Anna Salyards, and Callie B. Stebbins, assistants; Oscar Anderson, secretary; W. A. Grenawalt, treasurer; Alta Mather and Nina Grenawalt, choristers; Mary Hill and Bertha Anderson, organists; D. F. Nicholson, librarian.

The following from the superintendency of the Lamoni Sunday-school was read before the school, Sunday morning: "Recognizing that the work of teaching and directing the development of the young is an important work, and to those permitted to engage in it a sacred trust; and realizing that one can not so effectually teach and direct except he teach both by precept and example, and these be in harmony; and believing that strong drink, tobacco, card parties, public skating-rinks, and the dance halls are all detrimental to the best moral and spiritual development of the young; and feeling the weight of responsibility placed upon us as the superintendency of the Star of Bethlehem Sunday-school; and desiring to leave nothing undone that we ought to do in order to carry out as effectually as possible the responsible duties imposed upon us; we hereby publicly declare:

"That we do not believe that any one may indulge in strong drink or tobacco, or frequent the card-table, the skating-rink, or the dance hall without materially impairing his influence for good among the young; that we do therefore look with disfavor upon any officer or teacher of the Star of Bethlehem Sunday-school indulging in the things or frequenting the places heretofore mentioned; that in the selection of teachers and in the performance of our other duties we shall, so far as practicable, be guided by our convictions as herein expressed."

J. F. GARVER.

NEW ALBANY, INDIANA.

Saints have continued progress for the month of December. Many blessings of the Spirit are received from the loving Father. Non-members are getting interested, and our hope is that soon they may embrace the gospel.

We have changed our meeting, by having Saints' meeting only the first Sunday in each month, so as to have preaching both at eleven o'clock in the morning and at half past seven in the evening, every Sunday, on account of the outside interest.

Bro. J. W. Metcalf is holding the fort at Louisville, with increased interest. We hope that Louisville may soon be connected to Southern Indiana District, and that God may place a high priest here to take charge of the district. Louisville is in no district, and certainly there would be a great advantage in a combined effort. There are over five hundred Saints scattered about here, with scarcely any local organization.

Brn. C. E. Harpe and P. A. Flinn were with us on the 8th, staying till the 11th. Bro. John Scott, of Hebron, Indiana, was with us last Sunday, giving us a helpful talk at the morning service. Bro. Metcalf delivered the evening message.

On Christmas night we had special service in remembrance of our Savior, who died that we might live, if we comply with that which is his will. The hour was occupied by the writer.

On the night of the 23d the Saints joined with the Louisville Saints, and gave a Christmas entertainment in Odd Fellows' Hall, Louisville. All report a good time.

A Box of Hay Will do Your Cooking.

The discovery that will preëminently command attention this winter is the new cooker that prepares food and cooks it thoroughly without fire or force of any kind, says the Delineator for January. People who first talked about it were regarded as demented. But in June, 1907, the United States Government issued from the Cornell experiment station a bulletin recommending the fireless cooker. It is now selling in the stores from fifteen to thirty-five dollars.

The public appreciates most what it pays best for. The fireless cooker that you buy is a handsome box of mission oak divided into compartments of padded felt. Your fireless cooker may just as easily be made at home from a dry-goods box packed with hay. For either, you must first start the cooking over the fire, then remove the pot, pack it snugly and close it tightly in the cooking-box, where the operation of cooking will be completed through the utilization of the contained heat. This means that the dinner set to cook while the housewife visits a neighbor will be ready for serving on her return.

It is a well-known fact that business men are growing to demand very much better work than they did a few years ago. Consequently if the work done by their present help does not measure up to the standard of their needs, they will eventually look for other help who will do the work better. Strange as it may seem, they often offer to the newcomer a larger compensation if the work, after a trial, is done as they want it. This is why many old operators are obliged to resort to employment agencies for assistance and why less experienced operators with systems well mastered and with good educations walk in, demand—and receive—better pay.

To win the larger measure of success, it is necessary for one to adapt oneself to the requirements of those who instruct and of those who employ, from the time of entering school to the close of the business career. People do not voluntarily help pupils or employees who do not help themselves. The world always respects the man who respects himself. On the other hand, it is always a pleasure for an instructor to push forward a pupil who works hard and does well the work assigned. It is also true that business men are equally anxious to help their employees who take an interest in their work; they take a delight in having in their employ individuals who do not watch the clock, individuals who do things without being everlastingly told, individuals who appear with a smile in the morning, and who will keep that smile even when the routine work becomes very tiresome. The operator who wants to hold the job must realize the importance of doing his or her whole duty all the time without murmurings or frowns. The stenographer who acts as a private secretary must also learn the importance of always keeping in strict confidence his or her employer's work.

In closing I want to say I owe any success I may have achieved as a speed operator to a determination to undertake and to perform my work at all times a little better than the demands made upon me by my superiors.—From the Business Circle of the Circle for January.

The January number of the Travel Magazine contains many articles of interest to the stay-at-home, as well as the traveler who plans to go to foreign lands or to places in America enjoyable during the winter season. The cover, attractively colored in orange and blue, shows a man, a child, and a small dog thoroughly enjoying the pleasures of tobogganing.

In Dresden, a city of music and art, Laura Lindsay Carter tells of the quaint German city where the visiting or resident American lives in comfort without undue expense. Lawrence Lews describes for us "the Royal Gorge of the Arkansas River in Colorado," picturing the wonderful canyon, deep and narrow, through which a transcontinental railway runs. In "tobogganing at St. Moritz, Switzerland," we have the joys and thrills of sliding a mile a minute on the Cresta Run. "Housekeeping near the north pole," by Blanche Nesmith, is the story of home life on the Yukon, when the thermometer registers 70 degrees below zero. Walter Quackenbush convinces us of the joys of winter walking in "climbing the snowbound Catskills." "A Calendar of travel," by P. Harvey Middleton, describes some attractive Southern winter resorts for chilly Americans. F. L. Harding's description of "the menageries of Europe" acquaints us with some queer pets in the different Zoos on the Continent. May B. Rasmussen pictures vividly to us the quaint customs of the inns of the Flower Kingdom in "hotel life in Japan." A. M. Barnes in "modes of travel in Mexico" tells of the primitive conveyances used on land and water. In the "falls of Zambesi" we have an interesting description of a natural wonder in the heart of Africa. Percy Francklyn satisfactorily answers for us the question, "have Northerners a nearby winter playground?" Many short articles complete a most interesting number.

IN BEHALF OF THE MANAGEMENT OF THE JACKSON COUNTY BANK

I take the liberty of soliciting your patronage as we are in a position to do BANKING BUSINESS BY MAIL very satisfactorily. Open accounts can be placed with us for safety at your convenience and command. We have opened a savings department, paying interest on accounts of $1 or more and each member of the family should become interested in having a bank account building for future needs. We also pay interest on time deposit certificates. A number of the brethren are living here, others are looking forward to this location as a future home, and late revelation and admonition foreshadow coming events, adding materially to our spiritual holdings necessary to signs of the times, and in this connection our Board of Directors propose to safeguard the financial interests of the Saints by offering to them a depository proof against graft, greed, or calamity, governed by a kindred feeling born of the interest we have in common. It is not popular men, large capital, heavy deposits, National or State laws, that offer absolute security to depositors, but directors and officers progressive and conservative, possessed of the virtue of true manhood, shorn of all political ambition, with no taste for frenzied finance or mining speculation, and no inclination to furnish funds for others in that line. I point with considerable just pride (I assume) to our Board of Directors as named below. Feel at liberty to write us on matters that concern you in Jackson County, Missouri.

WHO MAY ADMINISTER THE BREAD AND WINE.

It seems difficult for the average officer to understand the provisions of our church law for administering the sacrament, although it has been explained frequently. Questions arise as to what is an administration of the sacrament. Is it the blessing of the emblems, alone, or is it the passing of the emblems, which constitutes the administration? Who are authorized to administer? It has been held by some that the administration consisted in asking a blessing on the emblems, and that the right belonged to the Melchisedec priesthood; that the passing of the emblems was no part of the administration. It has been held by others, (not many, however,) that the mere asking of the blessing upon the emblems did not constitute the administration, but that the passing of the emblems and the partaking of them from the hands of the administrator was the act of administration. These views are held, notwithstanding the apparent clearness of the statements and provisions found in section 17 of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, edition of 1880, which provisions are as follows: "An apostle is an elder, and it is his calling to baptize, and to ordain other elders, priests, teachers, and deacons, and to administer bread and wine—the emblems of the flesh and blood of Christ—." This is the elder's duty, as all officers of the Melchisedec priesthood come under the common appellation of elders. This is clearly seen in paragraph 9 (following paragraph 8 from which we have quoted the duty of an apostle under the appellation of elder), "Elders are to conduct the meetings as they are led by the Holy Ghost, according to the commandments and revelations of God." It must, from this, be understood that the administration of the sacrament must be conducted in accordance with those rules and regulations given in the commandments and revelations. Paragraph 10, in reciting the duties of the priest, makes provisions thus: "The priest's duty is to preach, teach, expound, exhort, and baptize, and administer the sacrament"; and at the close of the paragraph, after the recitation of the priest's duties, it is stated that in all of the duties which are enumerated, the priest is "to assist the elder if occasion requires." There is no restriction in this paragraph 10, upon the office of the priest in administering the sacrament. Paragraph 11, in reciting the duties of the teacher and deacon, makes this restriction: "But neither teachers nor deacons have authority to baptize, administer the sacrament, or lay on hands." It will be seen, therefore, that the authority to administer in the sacramental service is confined to the Melchisedec priesthood (so far as the word elders may define this office), and the priest, who is understood to be of the Aaronic order; and there should be no dubiety nor misapprehension as to who may officiate in this ordinance.

It is a good divine that follows his own instructions. I can easier teach twenty what were good to be done, than be one of the twenty to follow mine own teaching.—Shakespeare.

The quality of mercy is not strained; it droppeth, as the gentle rain from heaven upon the place beneath; it is twice blessed; it blessing him that gives and him that takes: 'tis mightiest in the mightiest: it becomes the throned monarch better than his crown. Mercy is an attribute to God himself; and earthly power doth then show likest God's, when mercy seasons justice. Consider this,—that, in the course of justice, none of us should see salvation: we do pray for mercy, and that same prayer doth teach us all to render the deeds of mercy.—Shakespeare.

As to the manner: Paragraph 18 of the same section has this direction to the officers in regard to the restricting of membership in partaking of the sacrament: "The elders or priests are to have a sufficient time to expound all things concerning the Church of Christ to their understanding, previous to their partaking of the sacrament, and being confirmed by the laying on of the hands of the elders." This has reference to the members as they are baptized into the church. Paragraph 22 makes these provisions in directing in reference to the administration:

And the elder or priest shall administer it; and after this manner shall he administer it: He shall kneel with the church and call upon the Father in solemn prayer, saying, O God, the eternal Father, we ask thee in the name of thy Son Jesus Christ, to bless and sanctify this bread to the souls of all those who partake of it, that they may eat in remembrance of the body of thy Son, and witness unto thee, O God, the eternal Father, that they are willing to take upon them the name of thy Son, and always remember him and keep his commandments which he has given them, that they may always have his Spirit to be with them. Amen.

The same provision is made in regard to the blessing of the wine. This refers to the blessing of the wine and the bread, and from this peculiar phraseology the position assumed by some heretofore referred to has been taken, that the administration simply means the blessing, and has no reference to the partaking; but it must be borne in mind that paragraph 18, from which we have quoted, refers to the partaking of the sacrament, and the form of the blessing is that it shall be blessed to the souls of all those who partake of it, referring to the bread; and referring to the wine, the blessing is to the souls of all those who drink of it. It is reasonable to suppose that the membership would not partake of the bread nor drink of the wine unless it should be passed to them in the assembly or gathering where they may be meeting, in some form, and that the partaking of the sacrament is not completed until the bread has been eaten and the wine has been drunk by those to whom the bread and the wine have been passed.

It is clear that the elder or the priest may bless the bread and the wine, and it would follow that if neither the teacher nor deacon was permitted to administer the sacrament, that the presentation of the bread and wine, the emblems of the body of Christ, must reach the members through the act of passing them to the membership by the elder or the priest, that the act might be complete.

In chapters 4 and 5 of the Book of Moroni, the provisions for the administration of the sacrament are given almost verbatim, so far as the blessing of the bread and wine is concerned. And at the close of chapter 6, the statement is made that the church did meet together oft, to fast and pray and partake of the sacrament, the bread and wine, in remembrance of the Lord Jesus.

The Lord's Supper, as administered by the Master, according to the statement found in Matthew 26, verses 26, 27, and 28, reads like this:

And as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples, and said, Take, eat; this is my body. And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it; for this is my blood of the New Covenant, which is shed for many for the remission of sin.

It is evident that this shows that Jesus, after blessing the bread and wine, passed it directly to the disciples. And the feeding of the multitude upon the two occasions, which are recorded in the New Testament scriptures, shows, that after the bread and fishes left the Savior's hands they were distributed by his brethren, his associates, and his officers, to the multitude. And it seems safe for us to follow the similar example. There should be no hesitancy in regard to this. The relation in reference to the supper, as given in Mark, is practically the same as that given in Matthew. The relation of Luke is similar to that in Matthew and Mark, with this exception, that it is stated he took the cup and gave thanks and said, Take this and divide it among yourselves; and that this is stated before the breaking of the bread. But the twentieth verse of the twenty-second chapter of Luke seems to make it appear that the blessing of the cup occurred after the breaking of the bread. We do not undertake to reconcile this apparent discrepancy, but simply give it as we find it, as it is the method that we are seeking for rather than the apparent relationship.

In the eighth chapter of the Book of Nephi, Book of Mormon, the history of the administration of the sacrament, that is, the partaking of the bread and wine among the disciples upon this continent, by the Savior upon his visit to this continent, is given, beginning at the sixth verse, in the small edition, and closing with the seventh verse. We quote:

And when the disciples had come with bread and wine, he took of the bread, and brake and blessed it; and he gave unto the disciples, and commanded that they should eat. And when they had eaten, and were filled, he commanded that they should give unto the multitude. And when the multitude had eaten and were filled, he said unto the disciples, Behold, there shall be one ordained among you, and to him will I give power that he shall break bread, and bless it, and give it unto the people of my church, unto all those who shall believe and be baptized in my name. And this shall ye always observe to do, even as I have done, even as I have broken bread, and blessed it, and gave it unto you. . . . And it came to pass that when he had said these words, he commanded his disciples that they should take of the wine of the cup, and drink of it, and that they should also give unto the multitude, that they might drink of it. And it came to pass that they did so, and did drink of it, and were filled; and they gave unto the multitude, and they did drink, and they were filled.

This shows clearly that the administration, as understood by the Master, included both the blessing of the emblems, the passing of them to the membership, and the partaking of the bread and wine by those to whom it was presented.

It is clear that in the different congregations of the church, now numbering over four hundred, at their different places of assembling, it would be impossible for one only to hold the authority and power of blessing the bread and breaking it, and blessing the wine and pouring it, and passing them to the disciples as the Savior did to his chosen twelve; and this difficulty the Master foresaw. When upon this continent, he set the example by blessing the bread and the wine and giving it to the disciples and directing them to pass it to the multitude as they were seated before him. Our conclusion is that the administration of the sacrament includes both the breaking of the bread, the consecration of it or asking that it be blessed to the souls of all who eat of it, and the blessing of the wine unto the souls of those who drink of it; and the absolute passing of it to those who are to partake of it; and that these duties are to be performed by the elders and the priests, or by the priests in the absence of the elders, and that it can not be said that the sacrament has been administered when the blessing only has been pronounced upon the emblems, but that it must be passed, and that each participant must receive it from the hands of the one who may be designated at the time, to present it to them after the blessing by those who may be in charge.

It is a pleasant thought, and worthy of consideration, that where the number is small, consisting of but few, and where it may be done easily, that the elder or other officer presiding, should bless the emblems and pass them with his own hands to those who may be present to partake. Where the number is larger, as it is in any moderately sized branch, this would involve too much of a delay, and a sufficient number of elders and priests, or elders or priests, should be designated to pass the emblems to those who are present and who expect to partake.

It is also a pleasant thought, and worthy of consideration, that as food is designed for the support of the physical body, so the partaking of the sacrament is intended to increase or reinvigorate the spiritual man by an actual and perceptible confession of a willingness to take upon the disciple the name of Christ, and to keep his commandments, that they may have his Spirit to be with them. We believe, further, and we think it is somewhere stated in the books, that by thus commemorating the sacrifice and mission of Christ in the sacramental service, we receive a continued remission of our sins, for if we confess our sins, the Savior is just to forgive us our sins; and perhaps nowhere else, except in the closet and under the influence of sacred converse with God, does the disciple come so near to the Master as at the communion table, and in the meetings of the disciples. We remember lately hearing a member make the statement that nowhere else did he experience so complete a cessation of care, of fear and anxiety, or receive so much of the enjoyment of the Spirit, as at the communion services, when the emblems were partaken of, and the Saints engaged in their testimony-service.

We trust this will be sufficient to remove from the minds of any who may have doubts in regard to who shall administer the sacrament, or the manner. While the command is direct, both in the Book of Mormon and in the revelations, there is sufficient latitude given in the declaration that the elders are to direct the meeting as they are led by the Spirit, to provide for every degree of appropriateness, and against every inconvenience any congregation of Saints may be subjected to, that everything may be done in an orderly and quiet and spiritual manner. It is considered more convenient to break the bread before asking a blessing upon it, and to pour the wine, but this is a technicality, and no one should hesitate to partake in either case, whether the bread is first broken, then blessed; the wine first poured, then blessed; or whether the bread is unbroken at the time of blessing, or the wine unpoured before a blessing is asked upon it. Nor should any act of inadvertence upon the part of those in charge, or any mishap occurring, prevent the faithful devotee from exhibiting his faith in the partaking of the sacrament.

The ones who pass it should first partake from those who bless it; then these should present the emblems to the elder or priest blessing, and then present them to the waiting members of the church. Let us learn our duty, and when we have it learned, let us perform it without question or disputation.

EXCUSES.

And when one of them that sat at meat with him heard these things, he said unto him, Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God. Then said he unto him, A certain man made a great supper, and bade many: and sent his servant at supper time to say to them that were bidden, Come; for all things are now ready. And they all with one consent began to make excuse. The first said unto him, I have bought a piece of ground, and I must needs go and see it: I pray thee have me excused. And another said, I have bought five yoke of oxen, and I go to prove them: I pray thee have me excused. And another said, I have married a wife, and therefore I can not come.—Luke 14: 15-20.

Most people have had some experience with excuses, either in listening to them or in making them. Program committees in the Religio, superintendents in the Sunday-school, branch presidents, and especially missionaries know something of the subtle sophistry that may be presented in lieu of duty done.

The attitude of the world toward our message, when not one of defiance, is quite likely to be one of apology. At one time we were holding preaching meetings in connection with Elder T. S. Brown, at Hemet, California. Following one of Bro. Brown's efforts we interviewed an old gentleman who was loud in his praises of the sermon. He said, "That was fine. If I could preach like that I would never work another day; I would just travel and preach."

"Well, I suppose if you like it so well, you will be out again, to hear some more?"

"Well—er—no. I don't think I can get out again."

We got some amusement out of this experience, at least, because we were "batching" at the time, and when one would mix up a particularly atrocious lot of pancakes the other would remark, "Those are fine. If I could make such cakes I would never work another day—but no more of them, thanks."

So it goes. People say, in effect, "I know your church organization is after the Bible pattern—but excuse me from becoming a part of it."

"You certainly teach the first principles all straight—but I'm not quite ready yet."

"Your elders are good talkers and I like first-rate to listen to them—but I belong to the Go As You Please Church, and I don't get much time to go to other churches."

Times, seasons, and conditions are seized upon to act as a buffer between man and his duty. When Paul stood before Felix, procurator of Judea, and reasoned with him regarding "righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come," Felix was "under conviction" and trembled within himself, as many other politicians have done, but the ready, time-honored excuse came to his lips, "Go thy way for this time; when I have a more convenient season, I will call for thee."

Thus he bowed himself out of the gospel lime-light and was seen no more. That was the end of Felix.

A more convenient season than God's season never comes. Yet the excuse did not vanish with Felix; men still wait for a more convenient season; it is too hot in the summer and too cold in the winter, and seed-time and harvest occupy the spring and autumn months.

Jesus met similar conditions, and touched on them in his "parable of the excuses" wherein "all with one consent began to make excuse." One had bought a piece of land—he was a "landed proprietor," if you please. The gospel does not seem to reach the "landed proprietor" very readily. Go to the door with a tract and you are met by the servant. Get past the servant to the "landed proprietor" and you are met with a stare. The man who gets and holds more than a fair share of this world's goods has no time to invest in mansions in the sky.

The second man had bought five yoke of oxen—"a business man," if you please. Barring the many business men who are among the honorable men of the earth, business men generally fall into two classes: There are those who are making a failure, and they are so distracted with business cares that they have no time to listen to any call of religion; and there are those who are successful and are so drunken with the heady wine of success that they look with supreme contempt on the man who throws business to the winds and goes out to preach the gospel. Shares in the New Jerusalem are not quoted in any stock-market report, and so they do not appeal to him as being of value; perhaps when we get a good working model of the New Jerusalem we can interest him.

The third man had married a wife—he had an "affair of the heart." Well, come on, and bring the wife. Scores and hundreds of women have led out in gospel work, and because of their faith and prayers, the husbands have come trailing in years later. We recollect baptizing one such, who came out of the icy water and with chattering teeth declared, "I feel pretty good. I ought to have done this years ago." All because his wife did not shirk her duty and plead the excuse, "I have married a husband."

Jesus was speaking at the dinner-table, in response to the sentiment, "Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God," so the connection shows that these people excused themselves from the privilege of eating the bread of life in the kingdom of God. That is quite the character of excuses in general. We fancy that we are evading duty, but it is a blessing that we evade.

Naaman, captain of the hosts of the king of Syria went down to Elisha to be healed of his leprosy. He was a favorite of the king, yet Benhadad himself, with all his kingly power, could not heal him. And yet when he presented himself for divine healing he felt entirely competent to dictate terms and conditions, and when these did not suit him he began to excuse himself for not complying with them. He complained of the treatment accorded him, and thought it folly to overlook Abana and Pharpar to dip seven times in the muddy Jordan. But his servant said, "If the prophet had bid thee do some great thing, wouldst thou not have done it?"

Truly we often reject the counsel of God because we do not like the terms or the greatness of the calling. If we can not be president of the branch or district, or one of the Twelve Apostles, we will be and do nothing. Why not do the simple things and the little things when commanded to do them? What difference whether it be great or small, if God has required it?

Naaman went from home a leper, eaten with disease, unfit to kiss his own child; he returned clean and whole. But what a narrow escape he had—how nearly he came to excusing himself into a leper's grave.

Those heretofore mentioned, excused themselves on the ground of adverse conditions. Moses presented his own imperfections as a plea and asked God to use some one else. "I am not eloquent, neither heretofore, nor since thou hast spoken to thy servant." Moses had need enough of eloquence before his mission was ended, it is true, but what he needed first was more faith. He needed self-confidence, but he also needed confidence in God. An old colored preacher once said that if the Lord commanded him to butt his head through a stone wall he would start for the wall; that was his part; it was the Lord's part to help him through the wall.

Others have looked beyond themselves and their environment and have put the blame upon their companions and fellow men.

Adam, when confronted by his guilt said, "The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat." The woman in turn declared, "The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat."

Their example has been diligently followed. When Thomas B. Nast was fighting a corrupt "ring" in New York, he drew a cartoon representing the prominent politicians standing in a circle, each pointing his thumb at his right hand neighbor; so the blame went all around the circle and stopped nowhere. That is the custom of the world. It is so invitingly easy to shoulder the blame onto some one else.

Adam and Eve were so ready with their excuses that we are almost convinced that they were made up for the occasion—as children do sometimes. A little boy was called to his dinner but did not respond. Presently, while the family was eating, he came strolling in. No one remarked his delinquency, but he had his excuse all made up and he hated to waste it, so he challenged the family thus: "I didn't hear papa call me."

"Well, how did you know that he called?"

"Well, it sounded like it."

How will it be in the judgment-day? We fancy some pleading, "I did not hear the gospel when your elders preached it in my town."

"How do you know that they preached it there?"

"Well, it sounded like it."

Will some one say, "I did not see that law of tithing when I read the Book of Covenants"?

"How do you know that it was there?"

"Well, it looked like it."

We know full well that there are reasons that individuals can advance for not doing certain things. If asked to sing a solo we could give a reason for not complying. Some have made it a rule to not refuse to do whatever appealed to them in the name of duty. That is a mistake, because one may accept so many subsidiary positions that his time will be taken up, and the primary, important work that is his will be neglected.

A reason may be a good excuse, but an excuse is not always a reason. An excuse may simply be masquerading as a reason. The best answer when challenged regarding our duty, is to show that duty done, or to point to the fact that we are doing it to the best of our ability.

When Booker T. Washington presented himself at Hampden to plead for an education, he was given a room to sweep and dust. He swept the floor four times and dusted each article of furniture three times. When his teacher inspected his work she passed her fine white lace handkerchief over some of the furniture and it was absolutely unsoiled. Booker T. Washington remained at Hampden. His work had more weight than any excuses that he might have offered.

God requires nothing impossible, and those who go forward in any field of church work and do their best will receive a blessing. The duty that now looks mountain-high will be surmounted one step at a time.

JOURNAL OF HISTORY.

As has been previously announced, it has been decided to publish a new magazine, devoted exclusively to the history of the Church, and it is now expected that the first number will be issued in January. It is to be a quarterly of about one hundred and twenty-eight pages. It will be printed on a good quality of paper, and will be sewed instead of stapled, so that it will be in good shape for binding.

This magazine is not to interfere in any way with any of our present church publications, but will occupy an entirely new field. In order that we may be able to send this publication out as second-class mail matter, at one cent per pound, we are required to make sworn affidavit in regard to the number of paid subscriptions, and we are not permitted to print more than double the number of paid subscribers which we have on our list.

We feel confident that we will have a large number of parties who desire this publication, and who will try to secure back numbers, but it will be readily seen, from the above, that unless we have a good, hearty response at once, to our request for subscribers, that many will be disappointed. It will also be seen, that it is important that a remittance accompany the order, if for only fifty cents, in order that we may make our affidavit when we apply for reduced postage rates.

It is to be regretted that the magazine can not be sent free to the missionaries, and perhaps at some future time the subscription list may justify it, but at present the cost of publication will be so heavy, compared with the number of subscribers, that it will be an impossibility to have a free list.

We would appreciate it if all branch presidents and missionaries would take an interest in this matter and urge upon the Saints the necessity for prompt action, for their own benefit.

CHILD LABOR DAY.

A LETTER TO PASTORS AND CHURCHES.

The National Child Labor Committee takes this opportunity afforded by the kindness of the SAINTS' HERALD, to invite the pastors and churches of America to set apart Saturday, January 25, or Sunday, January 26, 1908, as CHILD LABOR DAY.

The awakening of America against the evil of child labor is evidenced by the enactment of improved laws in eighteen States and by the Congressional authorization of an investigation of the conditions of working women and children, within the past year. Such improvement has been made, under the light of public criticism that many sensational tales of little working children, true a decade ago, are based upon a description of conditions that no longer exist.

Despite these signs of improvement, there are to-day hundreds of tender children among the two million employed, engaged in forms of labor that deny opportunity for health and education and that offer a serious menace to the moral and spiritual life. This sacrifice of childhood lays upon the church a heavy responsibility: It calls for a presentation of the subject in general and for special discussions of its local aspects.

Many ecclesiastical bodies and the religious press of all denominations have spoken with emphasis against this national wrong. The Protestant Episcopal House of Bishops, at the recent meeting held in Richmond, Virginia, issued the following declaration:

Whereas, The evil of child labor is apparently on the increase in the United States, and it is known that the employment of children in factories, mines and shops reduces wages to the child's standard, disintegrates the family, deprives the child of the natural right to a period of training, and,

Whereas, We recognize the profound responsibility of the church for our ethical as well as our spiritual standards, therefore,

Resolved, That we call upon employers and parents to exercise their influence toward better legislation and better enforcement of the laws, to the end that the exploitation of the labor of children shall become impossible in this Christian country.

The editor of the New York Observer wrote (November 14, 1907):

It is very fitting that once a year at least a Child Labor Day should be observed, with references of a special character, in press and in pulpit, to this great evil and abuse, in order that public sentiment should be focused on this pressing social question and proper agitations and campaigns be initiated for the correction of the evils that exist. . . . The church must find some way to correct the evils of child labor and other social wrongs, or it will itself be lost in the general destruction sure to overtake a bumptious and brazen Babylon.

Resolved, That we look with shame and abhorrence upon the labor of defenseless little children in our factories; that we indorse and stand ready to cooperate with every agency for child labor reform, and we especially commend the National Child Labor Committee. That we recommend to the next conference one special Sunday to be set aside in the coming conference year as Child Labor Sunday, on which our preachers shall all be asked to present the subject to the people in special sermons.

The Congregational Association of New York State, in May, 1907, adopted the following minute:

The churches of this country command the intelligence, the religious enthusiasm, and the financial resources to put an end to this great evil of child labor, but they are not equipped with the definite machinery to conduct the most effective campaigns in this direction. It is this humbler service which the National Child Labor Committee and its State and local committees aim to render. To do so effectively we must depend upon the applied Christianity of the churches in interest and financial support.

To avoid the appearance of any intrusion upon the regular work of the churches, and that our plan might have the benefit of wise counsel from within the church, a special committee of clergymen in New York was appointed by the National Child Labor Committee to give the matter due consideration. Following is the letter of these distinguished leaders in the church:

NEW YORK, December 25, 1907.

Reverend and Dear Sir: We join with the National Child Labor Committee in asking you to unite with your brethren in other churches in all parts of the country on Saturday, January 25, or Sunday, January 26, in bringing to the attention of your people the subject of child labor as a national evil and menace to good citizenship, education, and normal industrial life. We believe it is an imperative duty of the church everywhere to discuss social questions where the moral consequences are so serious as in the case of the premature employment of children.

We hope that you will present this subject in a way to arouse the active coöperation of your people to secure a higher regard for the children of your own community, for the better enforcement of the child labor laws of your State, and the enactment of better protective legislation if that is needed.

Yours truly,

The National Child Labor Committee is an organization of American citizens devoted to the study and prevention of Child Labor. The work is maintained entirely by voluntary contributions and includes investigations of child labor, efforts to secure more adequate laws and their enforcement in various States, and coöperation with school authorities for the readjustment of the school curriculum to the needs of an industrial age. That this work may be carried on effectively, the Committee invites the churches throughout the country to aid by such offerings from the people as may be deemed wise, either on this special Child Labor Day, or at a more convenient time.

A multitude of organizations working independently can accomplish little against this widespread evil, but a coördination of the churches of America will be irresistible. It is our mission to represent you and to declare your convictions before Congress and before the governments of the Commonwealths of our Republic.

Addresses, essays, and reports from the leading American authorities on Child Labor are published by the Committee. These publications describe the conditions of working children in various industries, the relation of child labor to family, to health, to education and morals, and the efforts that are being made to protect our working children. These, together with a pamphlet containing special themes for pulpit addresses and for Sabbath-school and Young Peoples' services, will be cheerfully sent upon application to the National Child Labor Committee, Owen R. Elders' Note-Book

AN INTERESTING AND VALUABLE LETTER; OLIVER COWDERY ON THE SUBJECT OF POLYGAMY.

OLIVER COWDERY.

"What that doctrine and faith is, and was, I ought to know."

[Editor's Note.—Herewith appears a letter from Elder Richard Ferris, followed by a verified copy of the Cowdery letter, which he referred to, taken from the photos which he forwarded to us. We have delayed the publication of this letter, hoping to reproduce the photos in question, but have found it impossible (owing to their size, and the fact that they are blue prints) to secure a legible reproduction. However, the photos are on file with the Editors, and may be seen by those who choose.—ASSOCIATE EDITOR.]

OAKLAND, California, August 5, 1904.

Bro. Elbert Smith;

Dear Sir: I forward you photos of the Cowdery letter, which you will find on analysis to totally refute the story of the Brighamites that polygamy was a part of the doctrines of the church during the Martyrs' time. You see that Daniel and Phoebe Jackson, and Phineas Young lived in Montrose, Iowa, in 1846. They were sisters of Cowdery (that is Phoebe Jackson and Phineas Young's wife). Phineas Young's wife got a letter from Cowdery asking if it was true that some were practicing polygamy in Nauvoo. She would not answer, but turned the letter over to her sister, who did answer it. The photos are of the reply from Cowdery. I knew Phoebe Jackson in Sacramento, when I lived there, twenty-five years ago. On visiting there, Mrs. Quigley, her daughter, loaned me the letter. Bro. Kelley has it now. Mrs. Jackson showed me the letter when she was living and told me its history as I gave it to you. I did not know its value then, as I had but lately come into the church, and she told me it had been published.

Your brother in the gospel,

630 Chestnut Street.

RICHARD FERRIS.

TIFFIN, Seneca County, Ohio, July 24, 1846.

Brother Daniel and Sister Phoebe: Phoebe's letter mailed at Montrose on the 2nd of this month, was received in due time, and would have been replied to immediately, but it came in the midst of the toil and business of court, which has just closed; and I take the earliest moment to answer. It is needless to say that we had long looked for, and long expected a letter from you or Sister Lucy.

Now, Brother Daniel and Sister Phoebe, what will you do? Has Sister Phoebe written us the truth? and if so, will you venture with your little ones, into the toil and fatigue of a long journey, and that for the sake of finding a resting place when you know of miseries of such magnitude as have, as will, and as must rend asunder the tenderest and holiest ties of domestic life? I can hardly think it possible, that you have written us the truth, that though there may be individuals who are guilty of the iniquities spoken of,—yet no such practice can be preached or adhered to, as a public doctrine. Such may do for the followers of Mahomet; it may have done some thousands of years ago; but no people, professing to be governed by the pure and holy principles of the Lord Jesus, can hold up their heads before the world at this distance of time, and be guilty of such folly—such wrong—such abomination. It will blast, like a mildew, their fairest prospects, and lay the axe at the root of the tree of their future happiness.

You would like to know whether we are calculating to come on and emigrate to California. On this subject everything depends upon circumstances,—and of those circumstances it is not necessary for me here to speak. We do not feel to say or do anything to discourage you from going, if you think it best to do so. We know, in part, how you are situated. Out of the church, you have few, or no friends, and very little, or no society—in it you have both. So far as going west is concerned, I have thought it a wise move indeed. I could see no other; and though the journey is frequently attended with toil, yet a bright future has been seen in the distance, if right counsels were given, and a departure in no way from the original faith, in no instance countenanced. Of what that doctrine and faith is, and was, I ought to know, and further it does not become me now to speak.

On the 27th of May we had an addition to our little family, of another daughter, who died on the 3d of this month. So we are left again, with Mona, and Mona only—we have lost five children.

Brother Lyman visited us on the 15th of May, and Brother Warren and Sister Patience on the 25th of June. They are well, and as we learn by letters, our friends in Kirtland are well. Father and mother enjoy good health, and hold out well, for persons of their age. Lawrence is postmaster. Lyman has recently moved from the William Smith house to the [illegible] up near by Russels. Warren still lives on the Bailey farm. Franklin is clerk in the stage office of Niel, Moore & Co., at Wheeling, West Virginia, and he often complains, in his letters to us, that he has written you, but gets no reply. You ought to write to him.

Now, Brother Samuel, I shall expect, for the receipt of this, that you will write them and explain to them why you do not write oftener. When you see Lucy, give our love to her. I shall write Phineas, and direct to Nauvoo. I have not written any of you for a long time, thinking it doubtful whether you would receive letters, when exiled, persecuted, &c.

Now, don't forget to write to us. May the Lord have mercy on you, and protect and spare you.

Truly your brother and friend,

OLIVER COWDERY.

P. S. Elizabeth and Mona send love.

MINISTERIAL ANECDOTES.

SHE GAVE HIM HOPE.—Twenty-five or thirty years ago the Reverend Charles G. Finney, president of Oberlin College, was carrying on a series of revival meetings in Boston. One day a gentleman called to see him on business, and was admitted by Mr. Finney's daughter, perhaps five years old.

"Is your father in?" asked the stranger.

"No," replied the demure maiden; "but walk in, poor, dying sinner! Mother can pray for you."—Detroit Journal.

PIE AND PIETY.—A well-known Episcopal bishop, while traveling through his diocese, was entertained by a New England woman famous for her good cooking. As the bishop, like most of the clergy, was very fond of good things to eat; he partook freely of the delicious mince pie which was made in his honor. Not long after, the bishop was taken suddenly ill and seemed to be undergoing great mental as well as physical suffering. The woman went to him and said: "But, my dear bishop, surely so good a man as you can not be afraid to die."

"Oh, no," the bishop replied; "not afraid to die, only ashamed to die."—Harper's Weekly.

THE "FOOT AND DOOR" METHOD.

The Lord Bishop of London, now in this country, is a person of very great importance, with two palaces to live in and a rank among the first peers of the kingdom. And he was created bishop, as General Booth of the Salvation Army said, because he had been "the servant of the poorest." Probably never before has a "slum clergyman" been lifted to so high a place. His lordship delights to tell how one of his old parishioners in the East End of London, meeting him after his elevation, remarked, "Lor', Mr. Ingram, but ain't you got on! Who'd 'a' thought it!"

All his life "the breezy bishop," as he is called, has lived and labored among the poorest people of the appalling slums of London. He was the head of Oxford House, one of the largest settlements, for many years. Mr. Ingram never put on gloves to do his work. He tells of what he called his "foot and door" methods of reaching people. Knocking at the door of a home where he had no reason to think the clergy were usually welcomed, as soon as it was opened he would gently insinuate his foot in the crack to prevent its being slammed in his face, and would count on finding the right thing to say and getting a welcome. He recommends this method highly, although he admits that it is "ruination to boots and sometimes hard on the toes."—Delineator, January, 1908.

IMMERSION VS. SPRINKLING AND POURING.

The following sermon was written by a minister of the Methodist Church in this town who, wishing to convince me that sprinkling was the mode of baptism, sent it to me shortly after I accepted the Latter Day Saint faith. I had been a member of his church. Following it is my answer to him, which I have sent him.

LEONARD RHODES.

A SERMON IN SUPPORT OF SPRINKLING, ETC.

"Of the doctrine of Baptisms."—Hebrews 6: 2.

That there are differences of opinions as to the "mode" of administering baptism, to different candidates, that present themselves for baptism at our several churches, is unquestioned. This fact exists in every community of any size,—and often comes to us the question: "Why these differences?"

It is our purpose to show you some of these reasons at this time; and while we may cover but a small portion of the ground, yet I trust that we may give to you reasons that will show you the grounds that are taken by the different "schools" upon this question.

We do not come to you with a purpose to antagonize another branch of Christ's work that may differ from us in the administration of this sacrament. Indeed we point to our record of the past, that we have avoided this question lest it lead to a disunion between the two societies that have worked together in such union during our pastorate in this place. But there comes a time, in each of our lives, when silence denotes lack of courage,—and further silence ceases to be a virtue,—such a time has come in my pastorate among my people here, and if I failed to meet such an issue it would be the first incident of the kind in my life. We are willing to receive from those that may differ from us, criticism, if offered in the same spirit that we present this question.

As we approach our subject we are confronted by three different modes of baptism—immersion, pouring, and sprinkling. But to simplify my subject this evening, the first of these modes of baptism has been fully discussed, of late, by Reverend ———, during his meetings here in this place, so we will confine our remarks in the most part to the two other modes spoken of.

First. Is “pouring and sprinkling” taught in the Bible?

Let us for a moment turn to our text. Paul here begins in this sixth chapter of Hebrews with a purpose of leading the Hebrews into a fuller acquaintance with the deep mysteries of redemption, and thus go on unto perfection. “Leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ,”—repentance, faith, and of the doctrine of baptisms. Paul here gives his evidence to the fact that there were various baptisms in the Hebrew Church in the sixtieth to sixty-sixth year of the Christian Era; that is, the various washings, whether by immersion, ablution, or by sprinkling; or John’s baptism, or that of Christ, or traditional baptisms of the Pharisees. As we turn to the nineteenth chapter of Acts, the third verse, we find him inquiring of those at Ephesus, “Unto what then were you baptized?” showing differences existing in the baptisms of that day.

These differences, however, did not in any way do away with baptism, for we believe that baptism by water is clearly set forth in the work of the church established by Christ and his disciples.

Much of the difficulty upon this question has arisen over the interpretation of the word baptism, and the several words that go with this word in the original Greek, and to this we call your attention first.

The word baptism is from the word baptize, baptizo, and this from the word bapto, and it is not claimed by any one that there is any difference between the two words so far as mode is concerned.

Let us for a little look at this word baptizo. It is not a word that is specific, or a specific word that denotes a mode; but is a word of a class,—to illustrate what is here implied, let me say: “I rode from Seattle to Portland.” A fact which took place; but it does not tell us how I rode. It may have been by boat, or upon the cars, or by team, or upon horseback,—we have simply told you of the fact that we rode to Portland, and for you to learn how I rode must be obtained by some other method. Such is the word under discussion,—we do not learn from the word baptizo what the meaning of the mode was by which it was applied; but must learn, if learn we can, by words that go with it in its use of the word.

But how shall we determine the character and meaning of the word that is before us? Some one says the lexicons or Bible dictionaries; but these are but the echo of their authors, and are intended simply as helps in the reading and understanding of the word. The late Alexander Campbell, whose learning has never been questioned, says: “No learned man will ever rest his faith upon dictionaries.” Again he says: “I say the dictionaries are sometimes wrong, and that I can prove.” So say all philologists and critics of eminence. The lexicons frequently contradict each other on various points.—Debate with Rice, pp. 96, 106. Then, passing the lexicons as secondary, let us turn to the usage of the Bible,—to the Bible use of the word.

Let us take a few quotations that can not mean “immerse” where the word bapto is used. Leviticus 14: 2-7.

This shall be the law of the leper in the day of his cleansing: He shall be brought unto the priest; and the priest shall go forth out of the camp; and the priest shall look, and, behold, if the plague of leprosy be healed in the leper; then shall the priest command to take for him that is to be cleansed two birds alive and clean, and cedar wood, and scarlet, and hyssop: and the priest shall command that one of the birds be killed in an earthen vessel over running water: as for the living bird, he shall take it, and the cedar wood, and the scarlet, and the hyssop, and shall dip them and the living bird in the blood of the bird that was killed over the running water: and he shall sprinkle upon him that is to be cleansed from the leprosy seven times, and shall pronounce him clean, and shall let the living bird loose into the open field.

In this passage bapto is rendered “dip”; but it can not be understood in the sense of “immerse”; nor would it do to translate it “immerse”; for the living bird, the cedar wood, the scarlet, and the hyssop could not all have been immersed in the blood of one bird.

As we turn to Daniel 4: 33, we read:

The same hour was the thing fulfilled upon Nebuchadnezzar: and he was driven from men, and did eat grass as oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hairs were grown like eagles’ feathers, and his nails like birds’ claws.

The word translated wet is bapto, and can not admit of immersion.

As we read Revelation 19: 13, we find bapto in the figure of the Son of God, as a conquering warrior, clothed in a “vesture dipped in blood.” The imagery is evidently taken from the Prophet Isaiah’s description of the same person (see Isaiah 63: 1-4). It tells of the treading of the wine-press,— “and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my garments.” The idea in both passages is the same. The vesture dipped in Revelation is the garment stained in Isaiah.

Immersion is also out of the question: “Give a sop when I have dipped it.” The idea is not immersion; but smearing. (See John 13:26.) So also in Matthew 26: 23: “He that dippeth his hand with me in the dish,” does not mean immersing his hand in the food that was to be eaten.

In these various examples bapto means not to immerse; but to wet, dye, stain, moisten, smear, and that without expressing mode.

Let us now take for a little while some of the Greek prepositions.

It is asserted that the Greek prepositions translated in, into, and out of are conclusive proof of immersion. But we find the very same prepositions translated: to, at, from, by, and with scores and hundreds of times. Thus the word en, (n) rendered in is translated at in more than one hundred places, with in one hundred and fifty places, and by in about one hundred places in the New Testament. The word eis (ice) rendered into, is translated to or unto five hundred and thirty-eight times. The word ek (ek), rendered out of, is translated from one hundred and eighty-six times. The word apo (apo), is rendered out of forty-five times, but translated from three hundred and seventy-four times. Thus, looking at the original of these words, we find the arguments to sustain immersion so feeble, that they are abandoned by some of the ablest Baptist writers. Reid, a Baptist writer, says: “No intelligent Baptist will base his arguments for immersion upon the prepositions into or out of. Doctor Campbell (of Aberdeen), says: “We should not lay much stress upon the preposition in which may denote with as well as in.”

Thus we have as much right to read: “John baptized at Jordan,” “The eunuch went down to the water,” and “Jesus came up straightway from the water.” Thus is it not clear to any candid, thinking man (or person) that taking our subject from this single standpoint,—that of the original meaning of the Greek words touching this question,—that there will always be differences of opinion as to the mode of baptism?

Let us now, for a little, turn to another baptism. Look to Acts 1: 5 and find these words: “John truly baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost.”

Here we are taught that John's baptism was but a type of the baptism of the Holy Ghost. Now it would look reasonable that if we could learn the mode with which God baptizes with the Holy Ghost, or how we were to receive the spirit baptism, then we might learn the mode of man's baptism. Opening our Bibles we learn that the mode of the Holy Ghost baptism is always by affusion, never by immersion. Thus we read of the Holy Ghost “descending” in Matthew 3: 16; Luke 3: 22; “poured out,” Acts 2: 17; Proverbs 1: 2, 3; Ezekiel 39: 29; Joel 2: 28, 29; “pour upon (poured upon)” Isaiah 32: 15; “sent upon”; Luke 24: 49; “coming upon,” Acts 1: 8; “shed on,” Titus 3: 6; “shed forth,” Acts 2: 33; “shed abroad,” Romans 5: 5; “falling upon,” Acts 8: 16; “falling on,” Acts 10: 44; 11: 15. These passages do not suggest the first idea of immersion, and yet the Bible calls it “baptism.”

But one other thought: “It harmonizes with the blood” in the mode of its administration. The “blood of the passover” was “sprinkled” (see Exodus 12: 22; Hebrews 11: 28). The blood of the “atonement” was “sprinkled” (see Leviticus 16: 14). The blood of the dedication of the first testament was “sprinkled” (see Hebrews 11: 18-22). The blood of Christ was, surely, poured out, for the sins of the world, called the blood of sprinkling in Hebrews 12: 24; 1 Peter 1: 2.

We surely are not taught by the “blood shed by Christ” for us, that it in any way was an antitype of immersion. Yet we have a very suggestive verse in 1 John 5: 8: “There are three that bear witness in earth, the spirit, the water, the blood, and these three are one.”

Let us now take a rapid survey of the baptisms recorded in the New Testament, so far as we have time.

“Baptism of John”: The record is brief, and begins so abruptly that it implies that the people were familiar with the rite before the Baptist began his ministry. His was a “baptism of repentance for the remission of sin.” It was not Christian baptism; for that was not yet instituted. Those that were baptized by John, and afterwards became disciples of Christ, were “rebaptized.” The arguments for immersion from John's baptizing are all drawn from the locality where he baptized. They are: First, he baptized in the River Jordan; second, he baptized in Ænon, near to Salem, because there was much water there; third, and some that were baptized “went down into the water, and came up out of the water.”

Yet in view of these facts, there are those that have doubts that this teaches immersion. Let us look at some of these reasons.

Why did he go to Jordan to baptize? He didn't begin there, or at least Mark says that he baptized in “the wilderness”; he also baptized “beyond Jordan.” However, after he began his ministry, a great excitement was created, and the news went abroad that a great prophet had arisen in Israel. The people came out to see him and to hear him in such large numbers that he would have been compelled to have resorted to the river's side, whether he baptized or not, for the accommodation of the people. In that dry country, where no rain fell from May to October, if "all Jerusalem, Judea, and the region round about Jordan," estimated at three millions, were baptized, there would be imperative demand to be by the river's side. The impossibility to immerse but a small part of the inhabitants of that region, alone, gives a strong argument to anti-immersionists.

In answer to the second thought that he baptized at Ænon "because there was much water there." Ænon was not a river; but a place of many springs, and there is no proof that there was a stream large enough to immerse a person.

In answer to the third reason: The explanation in regard to the prepositions answers this question; and when we turn to John's own words, in Matthew 11: 11; 3: 11, "I indeed baptize you with water,"—not in water—which would have seemed the most natural, if immersed.

The time of John's mission is supposed to have not been over one year's period of time.

"Baptism of Christ": And John baptized Jesus. We do not question but what he baptized him as all the others. He went down into the water—so far there was no baptism. After he was in the water he was baptized—then he came up out of the water—there is no dispute about the fact that he was baptized in the river. Much stress is laid upon his act as an example; but he was not baptized as an example for anybody. He did not go to John's baptism until late in the ministry of John—a strange way to set an example—one of procrastination. Let us note the design of his baptism:

First, it was not a baptism "unto repentance"; second, it was not to show faith in the world's Redeemer—he was that Redeemer; third, it was not Christian baptism—that was not instituted till after the resurrection of Christ; fourth, it was not a sign of regeneration, for no such change had taken place in his heart.

Let us turn to Christ's words: "Suffer it to be so now, for thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness," and a little later, in Matthew 5: 17, he says: "I came not to destroy the law but to fulfill."

The question that next presents itself is: "What was there in the old Jewish law that would require an application of water?" Turn to Exodus 29: 4 and 7, we find the priests of the Mosaic dispensation were consecrated to their office by the application of water, "And Aaron and his sons thou shalt bring unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and shall wash them with water." "Then shalt thou take the anointing oil and pour it upon his head and anoint him." (See Leviticus 8: 6, 12.)

Numbers 8: 7: "And thus shalt thou do unto them, to cleanse them: sprinkle the water of purifying upon, and let them shave all their flesh, and let them wash all their clothes, and so make themselves clean."

It is to this law that Jesus undoubtedly referred when he speaks of "fulfilling all righteousness."

And thus we say, and in accord with his word, his baptism was a "priestly consecration," or public induction into his office as priest and minister. That such was the design of our Lord's baptism appears for the following reasons: First, Christ was a priest—a "great high priest," and as such he was an antitype of all the priests of the old dispensation. Second, the Jewish priest was required to enter upon his office at the age of thirty years. Numbers 4: 3: "From thirty years old and upwards, even until fifty years old, all that enter into the host to do the work of the tabernacle of the congregation." And this was the age that Christ began his ministry.

Third, the Jewish priest was first consecrated with water, then anointed with oil; Christ was first consecrated with water, then anointed with the Holy Ghost. Luke 3: 21, 22: "Jesus also being baptized, and praying, the heaven was opened, and the Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon him, and a voice came from heaven, which said, Thou art my beloved Son; in thee I am well pleased." Christ entered at once upon his public ministry.

One of the oldest paintings that are of the apostolic times that is known, is one representing the baptism of Christ by John, and here he is represented as kneeling in the water, while John is sprinkling him with water.

Let us now turn to the first "Christian baptism." It was on the day of Pentecost, where three thousand were baptized. The record is brief, but full of instruction, if we study all the facts. The apostles preached the gospel, and many were cut to the heart and inquired what they should do. They were told to repent and be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of their sins. And it is said that "they that gladly received the word were baptized: and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls."

Now we are called upon in this short account, to decide in our minds the mode used by the apostles in baptizing this large company, as the word baptize does not tell the word.

The apostles were all Jews and the converts were Jews, and were all used to the use of water to the "divers baptisms" still practiced, in their religious services, and needed no instruction as to what baptism was, or how it was performed. As we study the Old Testament, we find that they were familiar with "sprinkling," and there is absolutely no proof in existence that any of them were by immersion.

The new converts therefore most naturally would expect baptism by sprinkling.

If not, how much time was there for immersing that large multitude? It was nine o'clock before they began to preach, it is not likely that the preaching was over, and the inquiry made, and the counsel given, and the real penitents selected and examined, so that the baptism would not begin till the afternoon. This would leave the time too short to handle so large a company of believers by immersion.

Where did they find water? There was no river there, Jordan was twenty-eight miles distant. The brook Kedron was small, dry in dry weather, and always dry in the time of wheat harvest, when the day of Pentecost occurred.

There were the "pools." Yes, there were a few pools, and water pipes to conduct water to these reservoirs; but there is no probability that they were or could be used to immerse the people.

There were two pools in the vicinity—Siloam and Bethesda. The first was perhaps a mile distant, with flowing water used for family purposes, and can hardly be supposed available for immersing a throng of people. Siloam is in the beginning a tank or reservoir, some five or six feet broad; to this you descend by stone steps, under which the water runs to the main pool, which is some fifty feet long and eighteen feet broad, and about the same depth. It is never filled with water, hardly ever more than three to four feet deep, and passes from this into other small tanks and ditches, that irrigate the orchards and vinelands below it.

It is surely out of the question that a very large company could be immersed in a tank not twice the size of this room—a deep tank, with only three to four feet of water in it.

Bethesda held water enough; but it was not in condition, or available. It was within the precincts of the temple, and under the control of the priests, and used for washing the animals offered in sacrifice.

The public pools were all in the hands of those that, fifty days before, had crucified the Savior; and, of course, they would not suffer them to be used by the disciples of the one they despised.

There was no preparation for immersion, the crowd came together in great confusion, not thinking of baptism, hence they were entirely unprepared for dipping in the water.

And again, many of those were strangers in the city from distant lands and different countries, and would be much less prepared for immersion than those living in the city.

As we consider the season of the year, the circumstances surrounding the baptism, is there not some reason to suppose that that vast company was baptized by a different mode than by immersion? Was not fulfilled the words of the prophet when he uttered the words of Isaiah 52:15: "So shall he sprinkle many nations"?

The next case that comes to our attention is that of the eunuch, Acts 8:26-40. This is called the strong, if not the strongest case in the Bible, that teaches dipping, or immersion. Let us look at this with care. First, the baptism took place on the road from Jerusalem to Gaza, a place that was desert—that is, untilled, rough, and uninhabited. The road crosses quite a mountainous region, there is no river on the road—Judea does not abound in rivers and streams. There is not the slightest probability that there was a stream there large enough to immerse a man in. And yet there was water: "They came unto a certain water,"—that is all—whether a fountain, spring, well, brook, or cistern, we do not know. The fact is, that there are no streams or water in that desert, of any note, or that has been found large enough to immerse a man, raises a question about his being immersed.

Again, turn to the record of the event, and the exclamation of the eunuch shows surprise at finding water, as riding along, listening to Philip. He exclaims: "Idou hudor?" "Behold water?" Nothing is said of the quantity—the participle ti means some or any, and would scarcely have been used of a living stream.

Again, let us look at the words: "They went down into the water, both Philip and the eunuch, and he baptized him." The going down was not the immersion; for they "both went down into the water." "He baptized him." How, the word does not tell us.

Let us again turn to the preposition eis. As we have shown you upon the chart, it not only means into, but is used as to and unto five hundred and thirty-eight times in the New Testament. We can receive a good illustration of the use of this word if we turn to the account of the coming to the sepulcher, in John 20:1-8.

Mary Magdalene came when it was yet dark eis the sepulcher. Seeing the stone taken away ek (from not out of). Peter and that other disciple, and came eis the sepulcher. Out ran Peter and came first eis the sepulcher. Here we have eis in every incident, and yet in these they entered not in.

Now I wish not to be misunderstood, for I know that eis is sometimes used as a preposition and not as a prefix to a verb where there is an entrance, as when one is going to a city; but in all such instances the entrance is implied, in the nature of the case. Here the force of the preposition does not express it, not so much as to the wetting of the sandals.

Again, let us turn to the scripture being read by the eunuch when Philip appears. It is the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, the fifth verse: "He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities," and just six verses above those words are these words: "So shall he sprinkle many nations." Was not his heart saying: "I belong to one of those nations, what was there to hinder my being baptized in his name?"

Our next example is the baptism of Paul. There are two points in this case that are hard to harmonize with immersion. The first is that he was baptized in a house—a private house. The account is given in Acts 9:17-19:

And Ananias went his way, and entered into the house; and putting his hands on him, said, Brother Saul, the Lord, even Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, hath sent me, that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost. And immediately there fell from his eyes as it had been scales: and he received his sight forthwith, and arose, and was baptized, and when he had received meat, he was strengthened.

We all know the story of Paul's journey and his being stricken down blind and taken to the house of Judas, on Straight Street. The Lord sent a vision to Ananias to go to Saul, and the passage relates the interview. Saul was a Jew, and needed not to be told what baptism was, or how performed. Ananias found him in the house, and no doubt prostrate with fasting and grief; without delay he performed his mission, for approaching him, he said, "Brother Saul," and laid his hands on him and pronounced the words recorded. Immediately the scales fell, and forthwith he received his sight, and arose, and was baptized. There was no delay, or leaving of the house. The words forthwith and immediately are employed to show the rapidity with which the event occurred—with no going out to search for a pool to immerse the body.

Second thought. (15) "He arose and was baptized"—the word anastas is precisely the same expression in regard to Peter, where there can be not doubt that he stood upon his feet "and in those days Peter stood up in the midst of his disciples," anastas.

And this was the command given by Ananias (16): "And now why tarriest thou? Arise and be baptized." The original anastas baptisal is literally: "Stand up and be baptized."

Paul was baptized in a private house, and standing on his feet, and here we leave his case for you to think over.

Cornelius and his friends: Acts 10: 44-48, and 11: 15, 16.

How minutely every part is recorded, but not a word or hint of leaving the house, or plunging into water. Immediately, before mention of leaving the room, Peter inquires "Can any man forbid water that these should not be baptized?" We read that the "Holy Ghost fell upon them," was "poured out." How natural that water should be used in the same way.

A German divine has well said that this inquiry of Peter put in modern language would run thus: "Will some one present be kind enough to furnish us a little water that these may now be baptized therewith; seeing that they have already been baptized with the Holy Ghost?"

We are all acquainted with the story of the jailor; how at midnight he was aroused (see Acts 16: 25-34), supposing that the inmates of the prison had fled; but Paul cries out to him: "Do thyself no harm." The jailor was baptized, he and all his, straightway. Let us note several things concisely:

1. Peter and Silas were in prison, under a strict charge that they might be kept in safety.
 2. Under this order they were put into the inner prison, and their feet put into stocks.
 3. They sang and prayed until midnight, and the earthquake came.
 4. The jailor slept where he could see the door of the inner prison.
 5. As he saw the doors open, in alarm he was about to slay himself.
 6. Paul could see him from this inner prison, showing that the keeper lived in the same building, and cried out to him to desist.
 7. The keeper calls for light;—while Paul could see him he could not see Paul,—the inner room was darker than the outer room.
 8. He springs in from his room to the inner prison and falls down before them and asks what he shall do?
 9. He brings them out, not out of prison, but into the common jail, between his rooms and the inner room.
 10. Here the household gathers, as would be most natural under the excitement. Here Paul preached to them Christ; here the stripes were washed, and without doubt the family was baptized.
 11. The language next day, when word was sent to depart, Paul says: "Do they want to thrust us out privily," does not indicate that he had been outside during the night to hunt up a body of water large enough to immerse the entire family.
- Baptism and burial. Romans 6: 4, and Colossians 2: 12.

These two texts are often quoted by those that are immersionists because of their supposed allusion to immersion. But it is wrong (1) in argument, (2) in exposition, (3) in symbol. A careful reading of the text and context will let all water baptism out of the texts. That these references have no reference to the mode of baptism may be seen from the following considerations:

1. Christ was not buried by being lowered into the ground and covered with earth, as we bury in modern times. He was carried into a vault, or room in the rock and laid upon a shelf, or table prepared for the use. What is the resemblance between such a burial and plunging the body into the water? Is there a liquid grave or a water tomb.

2. Read the chapter and you will see that it speaks of a spiritual death, a spiritual resurrection, burial, and spiritual life—he makes a comparison. As Jesus died and rose again, so we die to sin and rise to holiness. Our old, wicked life, is not only dead, but buried, and after that we live a new life, and this death and burial, with the new life, is publicly acknowledged by baptism—no matter in what mode. We are baptized “into death” not into water. It is the body of sin that is buried, not the body of flesh—we are raised to newness of life.

3. If we take the burial in a literal sense, instead of spiritual, what becomes of “planting” in the next verse (Romans 6:5) “crucifixion” in the sixth verse, and “circumcision” in the eleventh and twelfth verses of Colossians, second chapter?

In view of these facts, is it to be wondered at that the Reverend Robinson, a Baptist historian, and Reverend Judson, their noted missionary, both admit that this passage has no reference to the mode of baptism?

THE REPLY.

Brother ———: I have waited quite awhile for you to come and claim your papers, which you left with me, and also to discuss some of the points of difference between your religion and mine; and, as you have not come (probably through some unavoidable circumstance), I thought it would be well to answer your articles in this way.

Whatever I may write in the following I do not write in a spirit of controversy, or for the sake of argument; but rather for the sake of truth, with true regard for your position, and with the idea of building up and not tearing down any one's faith, and adding to rather than detracting from any one's knowledge.

In answer to Hebrews 6:2, might it not be reasonable to suppose “baptisms” was incorrectly translated, or to go still farther back, miscopied, seeing you find so many mistranslations in the scriptures?

“Unto what were you baptized?” Paul (I suppose he was the speaker) might have finished his statement and said: “Unto the baptism of repentance, or for the remission of sins”? We find somewhere in the scriptures that there is a careful explaining of the difference between John's and that of the apostles; not a difference of mode.

In quoting from Leviticus you made the statement that bapto was translated “dip.” Is bapto a Hebrew word? Was not the Old Testament written in Hebrew at first and translated from that tongue?

Now if bapto has so many meanings, as have also the Greek prepositions, how in the world did a Grecian know what a friend of his meant when he used those phrases? Further, if there is doubt about the proof of the meaning of those words, how do you know they are not already right? or, would it not be reasonable to suppose that the King James translators, being nearer the time when Greek was used, and was still used then in the East to some extent, would have a better chance to translate correctly than we, so far down the stream of time? In Latin we know how to translate prepositions oft-times by the construction of the sentences. I have no doubt that it is the same in Greek.

A minister visited Greece several years ago and he states that all their churches baptize by immersion. Mr. R. Robinson also says they ought to know more about their native tongue than European lexicon writers, and that they baptize by immersion.

Again, in the baptism of the Holy Ghost, would it not be well to use your own weapons and say that if baptizo has so many meanings that this tells us nothing? It only shows the diversities of ways that the Holy Ghost has of acting, as mentioned by the scriptures.

In many places where sprinkling is used in the Old Testament, its purpose is far from the purpose of baptism; so is the sprinkling in Hebrews 11:18, 22. You will notice that sprinkling is not mentioned as a form of baptism in the New Testament, and you will also notice in Hebrews 10:22 this:

Let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water.

In this case, and in others, sprinkled is not translated baptize, and it seems certain that the translators knew what it meant. To come to the point, rantizo is the Greek word for sprinkle, and leaves no doubt that, if sprinkling would have been the method, the writers of the New Testament would have used it instead of baptizo.

“The baptism of John.” This was undoubtedly written after the church was well established, and shows that they had become familiar with the method, and those writers probably never thought of the trouble there would be in translating, and may never have thought their work would be translated.

As to baptizing in Judea by John, if that is no proof for immersionists, neither is it for anti-immersionists. They could have gathered there for immersion as well; and, further, it does not take much longer to immerse than to sprinkle. John must have preached quite awhile; nor do I believe all Judea was baptized of John.

Neither is there any proof that there was not a stream large enough to immerse a person at Ænon. If you will find a good map, you will find that Salim and Ænon are on creeks and Ænon is on the public road. Palestine has passed through nearly one thousand nine hundred years of drought, and been exposed to divers elements of weather since those events took place.

"I indeed baptize you with water." That is no proof either way; besides, you have evidently forgotten your statement concerning the uncertainty of translating Greek prepositions, for, by your statement, the Greek word for in might sometimes mean with; why not vice versa?

Concerning Christ's baptism: you will notice that that was the first thing Christ did when he set out on his mission. No difference if he did go late in John's mission, it was one of Christ's first acts, and you must remember it was John's mission to precede Christ.

"I came not to destroy but to fulfill." Yes, to fulfill prophecies; to give a perfect law in exchange for the old one; as it was not perfect, you remember.

In Exodus and Numbers, as you mentioned, preparing man for the office of priest is foreign to baptism or anything pertaining to it; and so is "making clean" in Numbers foreign to the idea of forgiving, or remission of sins.

As to fulfilling all righteousness: Does not a father try to be righteous before his children in order to set them an example? Because Christ was better than the rest did not give him authority to enter the kingdom of God by a "window." To have failed to be baptized would have been an open boast that he was better than the rest, and that would have made him a sinner. That is the righteousness he means.

Christ was a priest after the order of Melchisedec, which was above Aaron, consequently the method of entering office would be different. And Christ claimed his authority to preach to be from God, before he (Christ) came to earth. Quite different is it not from the way some modern people get authority to preach?

Christ began his ministry at thirty because in those days, in accordance with the Jewish law, they remained with their parents till thirty. They must have had the advantage in the days before Christ, being anointed with oil and the Holy Ghost (Spirit), too, for they were filled with the Spirit before Christ as well as after. Besides, the Holy Ghost came on Christ in the form of a dove; that would leave it in poor condition to anoint with, unless its head were cut off and the blood drawn.

You have no proof that the artist knew the method of baptism. And why was it necessary for Christ to kneel in the water and get himself wet if sprinkling only was needed? Christ did not do unnecessary work; so, if that painting be true, it would make it necessary for all to kneel in the water to be sprinkled. Do you do it? Further, those who are about to be baptized sometimes put water on their heads and hands to lessen the shock of cold water.

The very fact that three thousand souls were added unto them proves that there were Christian baptisms before Pentecost; and if you will look to John 3:22 and also John 4:1, 2, you will find that Christ's apostles baptized more than John.

With some one leading the people out to him, a minister can baptize a person in about two minutes; that would be three hundred and sixty an hour for twelve, or three thousand in eight and one-third hours. They could have baptized until ten o'clock at night, with no inconvenience, in that warm climate. Nine to eleven would have been time enough to preach. In their enthusiasm they would not have hesitated to have gone in without changing their clothes. If from eleven until two were not time enough to change—many have done it. Again, if there were not time enough for twelve to do all the baptizing, the seventy elders had authority to baptize. How quickly they could have done it! Remember the changes that could have taken place in all these years in reference to a place to baptize. A foot and a half of water is enough to baptize one in. Remember how the chief priests and scribes feared the people; and there was a host of people present on the day of Pentecost.

Now turn to Isaiah 52. The prophecy in which you obtained, "So shall he sprinkle many nations," is of the last days, or concerning Christ's second coming. Read the first verse. Zion is not Jerusalem. There is sufficient proof of that,—one proof is Zechariah 1:15. (If I had references to the others I would give them.) Coming back to Isaiah 52:1, the prophet, you will notice, addresses the two cities separately. Where was Zion in Christ's days? Besides, the uncircumcised did come unto Jerusalem long after Christ left the earth.

Now verse 2: There you will notice Jerusalem has been lowered to the dust or perhaps captive. In the first case, Jerusalem had not been destroyed prior to Christ's coming; in the second, Christ did not free them from the Roman rule.

In the fifth verse: Have not the Jews been much oppressed? Is not God's name daily blasphemed? Even though the Jews were oppressed under the Romans, they had not been taken away then, had they?

In the sixth verse: Did he redeem Jerusalem then? If so, why did Christ make that heartbreaking statement: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, . . . how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not"!—Matthew 23:37.

In the 10th: Did God lay bare his arm then to all the nations; and did all the ends of the earth see the salvation of God? No; far from it.

In verse 13: Did the Jews exalt or extol Christ? No; though he was humble, they humbled him more, and insulted and murdered him. Would you call his position high?

In verse 14: Was Christ's visage marred when he came the first time? The New Testament writers say something to the effect that he was very graceful. He was not marred until he was crucified.

In verse 15: It said he would sprinkle many nations, not you, or me, or some one else. Were kings showed many wonders in those days? Did they shut their mouths about him then.

Chapter 53 is another prophecy, and it does not follow that 52 be of his first coming because 53 is; besides, it says in Ezekiel, he shall sprinkle with clean water (water mixed with the ashes of a three-year-old heifer unblemished). Do you do that? And he says he will sprinkle them to cleanse them of their idols, etc. Will any Methodist admit he is sprinkled to be cleansed of his idols?

I answer that concerning the eunuch and the condition of the mountains, as I have answered such as that before; however, I may add that as God is all powerful, he could have sent showers to fill a pool before that, or otherwise if he desired.

In Paul's case, what was the matter with being baptized in a tank? If there is no proof that he left the house, neither is there any that he did not. Paul undoubtedly had heard how the saints baptized while persecuting them.

I answer the case of Cornelius and his friends in the same way as I did the previous; and remember what I said of the Holy Ghost. The German divine's opinion is not worth more than that of the translators, and their translation does not hint of Peter asking for water. Most likely he wants to know if parents or guardians have objections to any being baptized that they control.

In the jailor's case a tank would come handy again, would it not? We neither have proof that the prisons were in that shape nor that they did not go out in the night. That would be the best time to avoid suspicion.

Baptism and burial: If wrapping one in clothes and spices, and putting them into a vault, in a tomb, is not burying them, what is? If I were lying on the ground, and some one covered me up with dirt, would I not be buried?

If the old, wicked life is dead, it has yet to be buried, has it not? And water serves the purpose; and we come from the water as Christ comes from the tomb. John Wesley, on Romans 6:4, says that Paul, in his text, refers to immersion, which was the mode practiced in the primitive church. (See Pengilly on Baptism.)

The planting in Romans 6:5, is a repetition of the symbol, and strongly emphasizes the method. If you want to plant any seed, say a potato cutting, do you put a pinch of dirt on it? No; you cover it up, whether in a hole—modern graves—or on the ground—ancient tombs. Now notice the 6th: Our old person is crucified with him—repentance, that the body (now dead) might be destroyed—planted, buried, or immersed.

In Colossians 2:11: One is put off or cut off from the sins of the flesh, (not cut off from the body) in this is a form of repentance pure and simple. I do not see how that could aid proof on either side, at least it does not destroy immersion proof. The twelfth verse affirms what I said of Romans, and shows that one must have faith in God.

You overlooked John 3:5: "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit he can not enter the kingdom of God." How can one be born of the water unless he first goes into it? Reading the preceding four verses makes that plain. This verse also does away with the spiritual burying idea; for it shows one must be born of the Spirit (Holy Ghost) also. Did not the sound of the Holy Ghost fill the whole room? Because the tongues of fire were on each apostle's head (at Pentecost) does not determine that the Holy Ghost did not fill the whole room. What then? They must have been born of the Spirit.

If you wished to reconvert me, or convince me that sprinkling was the mode of baptism, why did you send me another proof (?) that pouring was the method? That showed me that one proof was as good as the other, and that you were both likely to be wrong. It is my opinion that some of our Christian friends, who do not believe Joseph Smith to be a prophet, should pray for one to straighten out this matter of baptism, and many other things; as Charles Wesley said:

Once he in the Baptist came,
 And virtue's paths restored;
 Pointed sinners to the Lamb;
 Forerunner of the Lord.
 Sent again from paradise,
 Elijah shall the tidings bring
 Jesus comes; ye saints arise,
 And meet your heavenly king.
 Previous to that dreadful day
 Which shall thy foes consume,
 Jesus prepare thy way;
 Let the last prophet come.

You sent me a clipping from a paper. That is of the Utah Mormon church, and we resent the name Mormon. However, Mormon means more good. We are the original Latter Day Saints, with headquarters in Lamoni, Iowa. But even if that story had been one in our church, what difference would that have made? Judas transgressed.

You also sent me doctrines of the Utah church. We do not believe in celestial marriage, polygamy, Adam-God worship, atonement by blood, or anything of the kind. Neither did Joseph Smith. If he did, and wrote the Book of Mormon and Doctrine and Covenants, as you believe, why did he so positively forbid polygamy in them. If you wanted information concerning the Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, or any other church, would you not go to their records and works? Then why not treat us just as fairly, and come to our records, works, and churches, and see for yourself, instead of going to encyclopedias, histories, and newspapers, who, not being for us, are against us, and are therefore our enemies? I know by actual experience that the newspapers lie about us. In court the defendant is always heard and all doubts are in his favor. Even a heathen king gave Paul a hearing. Are Americans the kind to judge without hearing both sides? Christ says: "Come, let us reason together." In another part of the Bible it says: "Prove all things."

If you want some positive proof concerning Joseph Smith and our doctrine, read Joseph Smith Defended, by Elder J. W. Peterson, and do not read some "anti-Mormon" book, in which the writer does not know or does not care what he says, just so it is bad, and merely makes assertions without proofs. Remember, we are not in this for fun or money; and we get neither, to be sure, from the world. Nor do we, as a church, believe anything without proofs. We are careful not to misrepresent others, being often misrepresented ourselves.

Come down whenever you wish, and I will discuss religion with you. I do not come there, because I want my parents to hear both sides, and judge for themselves.

Do not feel ashamed to come to the tent and hear Elders Thorburn and Davis preach, and hear our side of the story. All our doctrines are open for inspection, and the elders will answer any questions you ask, if they can, and if they can not they will say so.

Yours truly,

LEONARD RHODES.

God mend his heart, who can not feel
 The impulse of a holy zeal,
 And sees not with his sordid eyes,
 The beauty of self-sacrifice.—Whittier.

From Lawton, North Dakota, comes the following:

"Dear Sister Hulmes: Inclosed find five dollars for the dear orphan's home and five dollars for the sanitarium. This money I made cooking from half-past three o'clock in the morning until ten o'clock at night.

"Will be so glad to see those institutions completed. I must add that I enjoy the Mothers' Column very much. Wishing you all a Merry Christmas and Happy New Year,
 Your sister in the one faith."

As the letter was not intended for publication we withhold the name. It is enough that God and the angels know it.

And is it not well, too, well for us all that here and there throughout the church of God, are found such Saints? For ten righteous men, God would have spared Sodom. In the midst of our slowness to believe and obey, who may say that it is not because of the few faithful and obedient ones that we as a people are spared? To give out of our abundance, when our storehouses and barns are overflowing with plenty, does not mean what it does to give that for which we have toiled, even in the small hours of the night—as this sister toiled. If the idler shall not in Zion eat the bread of the industrious, shall they who never have laid upon God's altar a gift sanctified by the sacrifice of self, partake of the joy or share the same glory with those who have forsaken all and followed him? What think you?

And here is another and a different voice calling unto us. It is the voice of one suffering, faint, and weary, coming from the wilderness of the world and appealing to our hearts in behalf of those for whom God has commanded us to provide a refuge—an abiding place in our midst. It is truly the glory of Christianity that it cares for those not able to care for themselves. How long then shall the chosen people of God leave to others the care of their own helpless ones? How long?

Homesick Longings.

I have been wondering if the well ones really know what a blessing the new sanitarium will be to the suffering ones? where they can find help and care with those of like precious faith! A great deal of my last two years have been spent behind hospital walls, and the last four months in one of the "best in the world" controlled by the "sisters," where I received all the care and kindness one could have, and where, too, I learned to love those faithful souls very much, and I never shall forget their tender kindness to me as they bent over me day and night for weeks after the cruel knife had done its work. And I know God will reward them for it all. But so often I felt as if I were "alone," though my room was just across the hall from the chapel, where I could hear the sweet voices of trained singers. That "homesick longing" for one's own would come, and it seemed if I could be as near the voice in song or prayer of our own, it would be much easier to endure pain.

I never shall forget when they took me from the hospital bed to the ambulance bed, and took me to the "old farm home." It seemed I could endure all, if I could only be home with loved ones. The very word home thrilled my being; and, though the sufferings were fearful, the trip home was one of the happiest of my life. And I find even now that pain is much easier to bear if loved ones share it with me.

So I believe with regard to our sanitarium. The suffering will be easier to endure if we have kind, loving, true Christian love of our own faith to administer and care for us, and the "homesick longing" will be unknown.

Do not misunderstand me in regard to the hospitals of our land. Indeed no one appreciates them more fully than I do. And I believe they are God-given institutions.

But we all know, no matter how kind strangers are to us, or how much we care for and appreciate them, if we are compelled to stay with them long and be away from our own home, the old homesick longing will come, and so I think it is the case with hospital life in the world, and church. And if it is ever my lot (which God forbid) again to enter the doors of such an institution, I pray it may be our own sanitarium. May God bless it, and all others, is my prayer.

MIDLAND, Michigan, January 6, 1908.

Dear Herald: I joined the Latter Day Saints' church April 29, 1891. I used to go to meeting a great deal at that time, and felt happy to think I had come into the church which I should have been in years before. Work did not seem so hard to me, as it did before I joined this church. I hope the Saints will take courage, and do the good that is before them to do. I wish the Saints to pray for me that some day I may meet them all where parting will be no more.

HENRY GATEMAN.

DES MOINES, Iowa, January 3, 1908.

Dear Herald: I remember that it has been some months since I have written to our paper that brings to me so much encouragement, and feel that in this I have been somewhat neglectful, for which I ask pardon.

After rendering what assistance I could at the Des Moines District and Moorhead reunions, where I truly enjoyed a spiritual uplift, I returned to the special work appointed me. But before I returned home I visited Magnolia, my birth-place, both into the world and out of the world into Christ, where I enjoyed the sight of old friends with whom I had associated from childhood days, and where I saw for the last time, under present conditions, some who have since left the shores of time. I hope and expect to meet them in a more favored sphere than this. I also stopped over night at Woodbine, and met with the neighbors and Saints whom we left when we moved to the city about a year ago. I then spent two days at Dow City, where I ministered at night, and was with my co-laborer, and brother, Romanan Wight, during the day time. At all of these points I was remembered in a way that gave me encouragement that my services had not been in vain in the church.

Through the kindness of Bro. F. A. Brown and family I held a series of services at Enterprise, a new opening, which effort resulted in good, and expect in the near future to return and make another effort. One colored sister was baptized as a result of the effort and of previous correspondence, and the reading of church literature.

During the latter part of October I held meetings at Norwoodville, but not much interest shown. Just at that time the miners were intensely excited over their pay, whether they would take part in checks or not, and this subject occupied the whole attention of a great many. I hope to continue services there when conditions are more favorable. I believe that God has a few he wishes to gather out at this place.

I assisted Bro. W. Christy at Sandyville the first of December, and very much enjoyed breathing the free air of the country, and associating with my brother in such an interesting meeting, where four were baptized, three of whom had formerly been members of the Christian Church there, and were workers while with that church. While there a Sunday-school was organized, and left in the charge of Brn. Joseph Knox and Fred Wells, two of God's noblemen, of whom I heard many good words spoken. We left many that were near the kingdom, but whether the good seed will be choked out or not can not be determined as yet.

The greater part of my time in the city mission is spent in private work, and there is more of that than one can do. I receive letters from Saints out of the city to call and talk with some of their friends and relatives in the city, and this with the calls for administration, and to preach funeral-sermons out of the city has engaged all my time, excepting when I have been compelled to care for my companion in her severe illness, which for the last two months has been nearly half the time. Thanks be to God she is better at present writing.

Several have been baptized as a result of the private work done. This gives me encouragement. Several demands for a series of meetings will be responded to, beginning the coming week, does my wife's health permit. Arrangements are being matured for a series of missionary meetings at the church during the month. The spirituality of the Saints in the city is improving, and some who have been in spiritual darkness seem to be slowly emerging therefrom, for all of which we feel thankful.

On Christmas Eve the Sunday-school held a very beneficial entertainment, and the spirit of liberality toward the missionary and family was something remarkable; but it was done not to be seen of men, and truly God will reward them. These remembrances toward us has made it possible to do more in the interests of the work in the city. I spent something over a week assisting in building a small addition to our home that seemed to be a necessity, and through the kindness of the brethren the work was all donated that entered into this improvement. This also has made it possible for us to assist in some ways that previously we could not. To God be all the praise. Anything that adds to the possibility of doing more for this glorious work increases our joy.

Already preparations are being made for the coming General Conference and the quorum work. Reports of labors of some of the brethren from various parts are indicative that this year has been one of many variations, and while some have been successful in one direction others have in others, and yet others have been compelled to give up the struggle to abide in the active service by reason of adverse circumstances. There is one thing to be universally noticed, and that is the devoted desire on the part of all to do more, and to see the work shorn of some of its complications, and the hindrances that now exist, and secure a more united understanding among the leading ministry upon several important topics of present interest.

If there are any who have knowledge of Saints in the city whom they have reason to suspect are not in touch with the work here, or have not acquainted themselves with the branch, it would be a help to be so informed and to know of their whereabouts. If any have friends in the city whom they would desire visited, or that would be willing to read some of the church literature, please to inform me at your earliest convenience. Since we are nearly ready for a continuous effort of gospel services we wish to specially invite such ones as have friends in the church to these services.

Several inquiries have been made as to whether blanks will be sent to the First Seventy for reporting to the quorum, to all of which inquiries I answer, Yes. We request those receiving them not to mislay them, but at the time specified make out their report as complete as possible and remit to me. These blanks will be sent out before the first of February, so that all will receive them in time to report. If any of the brethren of the quorum have any special subjects that they would desire canvassed in the quorum for the good of the brethren of the quorum, or of the church, please send them to Brn. James McKiernan, Box 225, Farmington, Iowa, or W. E. Peak, 1225 West Walnut Street, Independence, Missouri. These brethren are the program committee.

While from every home comes evidence of trials endured, and burdened spirits, yet there is a greater desire to seek, and abide by the counsel of those who have had greater experiences, and to whom the Lord directs his Saints to seek for counsel. There is a better understanding among the children of God as to their privileges to secure spiritual help, and less of complaining, or of the feet saying to the head, "I am wiser than thou." And there is a prayerful consideration of the counsel given, ere it is fully accepted, or if the Saint can not see the wisdom of the instruction, inquiry is made for light both from the Lord and the one giving the instruction, so that they may not reject what may be to them a blessing. This is as it should be. In this way the branch officials and the missionary are both aided in the good they would, and are trying to do.

The officials in this mission are laboring together in perfect harmony and in several things that have transpired we have seen the results of inspiration, even though at the time we could not so plainly see the wisdom of what we were led to do, or not to do. Every day there is evidence of the need of more laborers, and the assistance that will render their efforts more effectual.

By invitation, I, with Bro. J. R. Epperson, attended a banquet and meeting of the trustees and members of the Anti-Saloon League of the State, and the evidence that the Saints are growing in grace and favor with people was shown in that the writer of this was selected as one of the permanent trustees; since which time W. C. Barber, superintendent of the League, gave us a lecture upon the Constitutional amendment issue, in which he presented some strong points why we at this time should unite in such a movement; and gave much encouragement in the evidences of the increasing temperance movement in the State and Nation. While the day was stormy there was a good audience, and Mr. Barber said that he was particularly pleased with the marked attention of the audience, and the kindness we had shown him. He spoke very complimentarily of the stand the Saints have taken in the temperance movement. Surely the Saints are a temperance people. Wherein there are those who indulge in using intoxicants in the least degree, there is evidence that they have not brought themselves to all the evidences that they are Saints indeed, and that there are yet some things for them to overcome.

With bright anticipations for the work in this mission for the year of 1908, I subscribe myself,

J. F. MINTUN.

BELGROVE, West Virginia, January 4, 1908.

Editors Herald: The Saints at Cabin Run Branch have built a nice little church, twenty by thirty feet, and have it completed, with a debt of only fifty dollars. We held our district conference in it the 23d and 24th of November. The Lord was present by his Spirit to own and bless the sacrifice made to build the house to his honor. The meetings were spiritual throughout the conference. Brn. D. L. Shinn, O. B. Thomas, and Joseph Biggs were the speakers. At the close of the conference Bro. Thomas remained and continued the meeting for eight days. The writer went with the Saints to Shinston and other places to attend to church work, and returned to act as moderator for Bro. Thomas in a debate with a Campbellite, December 8, at Pensboro. The truth lost nothing in the debate. Bro. Thomas was called home on account of sickness, and left the night of the 15th. That leaves the writer as the only missionary in this district.

From the debate I went to Adamston, and held a few meetings, and from there to Orlando, Braxton County, where Bro. W. O. Skinner baptized some last summer. I found some lively Saints there, though young in the cause. There is an opening for a good work to be done. Returned to Adamston, and spent Christmas with Bro. Shinn, and on the 27th started for home for a rest.

In regard to the condition of the work in the district, the Saints are in a scattered condition. There is no branch in the district that has more than six to ten that are close enough to the place of meeting to attend regularly. As district president, I try to keep run of them and visit them once a year; and it takes all my time. I have rode three hundred miles horseback this year to visit the scattered Saints. The membership seem to be alive to the work, but are not in a working condition, owing to being so badly scattered. We are hoping and praying for a better condition of affairs in the near future. I ask the prayers of the Saints for myself and the district.

Your colaborer,

G. H. GODBY.

HARDIN, Missouri, January 1, 1908.

Editors Herald: W. G. Roberts, of Anti-Organ Christians, arranged to hold debate at Norborne, Missouri, with Bro. F. M. Slover, beginning December 24. No building being secured, Bro. Slover and I did not go. As soon as the opera hall was secured they telegraphed and phoned for us. We went next day. Roberts made arrangements with our brethren to pay his half of hall rent, before they sent for us. He and his brethren refused to pay their half, so debate closed; and the third night, instead of the debate, I preached. No backout by Bro. Slover. We were anxious for the debate to go on, Bro. Slover offering to repeat the debate in their own church, in the country, where they have a congregation. Bro. Slover told the people he was ready to go on with the debate. We held two sessions, and it was as complete a victory for our side, as I ever witnessed in any debate. Many compliments were received by Bro. Slover from outsiders, and one a lawyer. I want the church to know that Bro. Slover is qualified to handle Roberts, and do it successfully; he is prepared for him.

Bro. Slover and I had nothing to do with renting the hall. The Christians being the challenging party, our brethren did not think they should pay fifty dollars, since the challenging party had agreed to pay half. We have outsiders to prove this. I will quote rule 1, which Roberts signed, then you can judge who backed out:

"The discussion shall be held in the town or vicinity of Norborne, beginning December 24, 1907, and continue twelve sessions, two hours to each session, and only one session shall be held each day till debate is ended."

Our brethren told Roberts before the debate began that there would be only one session a day, and that at night.

The good Spirit was with Bro. Slover, in his four speeches. Here is a letter from the two brethren who arranged for the hall:

"NORBORNE, Missouri, December 31, 1907.

"Elder F. C. Keck.

"Dear Brother: We were the parties that came to an agreement with W. G. Roberts in regard to the expense of the debate between Elder F. M. Slover of the Latter Day Saints' Church, and W. G. Roberts of the Christian Church, and the contract was as follows:

"W. G. Roberts came to Norborne and made complaint because Bro. Slover was not here. We stated to him that Bro. Slover would not be here until they had made some arrangement to secure a building to hold the discussion in, and as they were the challenging party it was their place to furnish the building. Roberts stated that he thought we should bear one half of the expense. As the manager of the hall made us a proposition that he would furnish the hall for fifty dollars for the twelve nights, we agreed to pay twenty-five dollars, and he agreed to pay twenty-five dollars, and stated that we had settled fair. So we sent Bro. Slover a message to come at once, as the arrangements were all made for the discussion. Bro. Slover came the next day, December 25, and the debate started the night of the 26th. After the debate started Roberts began talking about wanting to hold a day session, when the rules signed called for twelve sessions, one session a day. This we refused to grant, and the next night he positively refused to pay any part of the hall rent unless we should agree to hold day sessions. We told the elder that we expected him to abide by the rule he had signed, and that if he would not put up his twenty-five dollars for the hall he could not make another speech until it was done. This he failed to do, and the debate stopped because Elder Roberts failed to keep his word in regard to the hall, and also because he would not stand by the agreement he had signed, to hold one session a day. This shows that he was very glad to find some excuse to close the discussion and slide out of town.

"J. N. CATO.

Roberts seemed to be bound in both sessions, and Bro. Slover was wonderfully blessed, until the Spirit was felt by many. Roberts saw the audience was against him, and wanted to leave.

Respectfully,
F. C. KECK.

ITHACA, Michigan, January 2, 1908.

Editors Herald: Elder S. W. L. Scott was with us the week of December 1, and we expect him again this month. He is certainly a good and faithful worker, and as I have listened to him expound the word of God so clearly, and with such power, I have thought many times, Surely the world ought to recognize that this is a man of God.

I have been trying for three years to get the work opened up here; but owing to the fact that the laborers are so few, and the calls so many, I have been unable to do so. Since opening the work here, we have run across a brother and sister who have been exiled from the church for about fourteen years, Bro. and Sr. Joseph Saleno, formerly of Nebraska. Although they have been dormant for these many years, still the knowledge of the truth has not departed from them. They have taken new courage, and are now trying to help us lift high the royal banner in this place. Oh, how thankful I am for the new courage they have taken. May God have all the glory.

Pray for us, dear Saints, that we may overcome, and come off victorious.

News From Branches

DES MOINES, IOWA.

On December 29 the Sunday-school selected the following officers: Superintendent, Hattie Clark; assistant, Pearle Shannon; secretary, Orpha Emslie; treasurer, Bertha Charters; librarian, Elmer Redfield; J. R. Epperson was continued as a member of the library board.

January 5, the Religio elected officers as follows: President, Ray Chandler; vice-president, Orpha Emslie; secretary, Bertha Charters; treasurer, J. W. Rudkin; librarian A. A. Reams. Joseph G. Carpenter was continued as a member of the library board.

Sunday, December 29, Reverend W. C. Barber, superintendent of the Iowa Anti-Saloon League, was the speaker at the morning service. His address was full of interest to the Saints, and we believe that the church here is almost unanimous in favor of the movement of the Anti-Saloon League to submit the question of a Constitutional Prohibition Amendment to the people of our State.

The district conference will convene with the Des Moines Branch on Saturday and Sunday, February 15 and 16. The district Sunday-school and Religio conventions will be held the two days previous to the convening of the conference.

The superintendent of the Des Moines District of the Iowa Children's Home Society, Mrs. L. C. McGarry, was present at the church on the evening of January 5, and spoke in the interests of this society. Mrs. McGarry has spent twenty years in this line of missionary work.

The Sunday-school has put into working order a card system for the several classes, the same as outlined in a recent number of the Exponent. Each member of the school has a card, on which his attendance and credits for the year are shown. The system will be tried and its merits and demerits noticed with interest.

A. A. REAMS.

FIRST BRANCH, CHICAGO.

The awakening of spring with all its sweetness is scarce fairer than the unbroken quiet of the elements which for the past week or more has given a rest from the rain and the snow and La Grippe, which for three weeks held us under an iron hand.

The first Sunday, our regular sacrament day, was one to be remembered by the many who met to partake. Though the cares of the world weigh down upon us, and the days seem long and the nights weary, sin an ever increasing burden, and the good there is in the world a dream and a mockery to us, God is mindful of his people, and his word will not return to him void. Those who love him, will not be left comfortless, even though trials do scourge and temptations ravage. The tinner must first scrape away the rust before applying the solder, so must the incumbrances of the spirit be removed before the Lord's Spirit will congeal with ours.

A Bro. Passman, of Detroit, brother of our branch president, has lately located with us, and expects to make Chicago his home for a season.

The 18th and 19th of this month is our district conference, and as it will be held in the hall of the First Branch, it has been voted to extend the District an invitation to attend. Bro. James Keir, Guy Fairbanks, and the writer are a committee to locate and care for visitors, so any one who wishes to visit will please write me, and I will see to their lodging.

Bro. F. G. Pitt is in the city, and has preached for us some.

A FORCIBLE ARGUMENT.

Joseph and Hyrum Smith were killed June 27, 1844. That same year, whether before or after their death is immaterial, an edition of the Book of Covenants, containing the article on marriage which provided for but one companion in the domestic relation, was published. Whether the final issuing of the book was before or after the Prophet's death, the presumption is good that the contents of the book were known to him, as also to John Taylor, the then editor of the Times and Seasons, who was in active charge of the publishing office.

It is incredible to accept the idea, urged by some, that Joseph Smith, through whom it was alleged the so-called revelation on plural marriage was given in 1843, eleven months before his death, suppressed the knowledge of such revelation through fear of consequences because of the "prejudices of the people." This is practically a charge of moral cowardice against the Seer; a charge which is radically inconsistent, as every act of his life prior to the alleged date of the so-called revelation, gives the lie to any such charge or even the supposition that he was at any time moved by fear of consequences, or hesitated to declare what he had received and believed to be the word of God. It is entirely incomprehensible how men can expect honorable men to accept such a conclusion.

The fact that the so-called revelation was not presented to the church publicly, or to any council of the church of which public record has been kept and presented, and that the entirely opposite rule of marriage was published in the Book of Covenants in 1844, either during his lifetime or immediately after his death, and the contents of which book he must have been acquainted with officially as the leading officer of the church, is an evidence absolutely irrefutable that no such rule of marriage as that presented in the so-called revelation, was known to him or acknowledged by him. The further fact that the same John Taylor, still in charge of the office of publication of the Times and Seasons, republished in 1845 a Book of Doctrine and Covenants still having the declaration of the monogamic rule contained in it, carries the presumption still farther and makes it stronger if needed, that this was the rule of the church, and the only rule governing in the case.

If you have no friends to share or rejoice in your success in life—if you can not look back to those to whom you owe gratitude, or forward to those to whom you ought to afford protection, still it is no less incumbent upon you to move steadily in the path of duty; for your active exertions are due not only to society, but in humble gratitude to the Being who made you a member of it, with powers to serve yourself and others.—Walter Scott.

When certain persons abuse us let us ask what kind of characters it is they admire. We shall often find this a most consolatory question.—Colton.

While writing this article, we have in hand a Book of Doctrine and Covenants, published by S. W. Richards, 15 Wilton Street, Liverpool, England, for Orson Pratt, in 1854, said Orson Pratt being at the time of this publication in charge of the publishing interests of the Utah Mormon church in England. In this edition occurs the section on marriage, numbered CIX, exactly as it was given in the editions of 1844 and 1845, as accepted by the church in its assembly of August 17, 1835.

It has been urged as against the validity of this monogamic section, that it was introduced by W. W. Phelps before that assembly, and has not the value or force of revelation. This statement is rendered valueless from the consideration of two facts: In the edition published by Orson Pratt in 1854, the title-page states as follows: "The Book of Doctrine and Covenants of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints; selected from the revelations of God by Joseph Smith, President." This is the fourth European edition. A previous edition, published by Orson Pratt himself at the same number, 15 Wilton Street, Liverpool, and dated 1849, contains the same section on marriage, numbered CIX, the title-page of which is given as the same, and is marked as the second European edition. A pertinent inquiry may be based here; how did it happen that Elder John Taylor should have personally superintended the publication of two editions of the Book of Covenants, one in the year 1844 and one in 1845, containing such marriage covenant, if it was not known to have been approved by the leading men of the church and to have correctly represented the attitude of the church on the domestic relation, and to have stated correctly the faith of the church. These are facts of which it is not easy to dispense or to make non-effective by the statement that Joseph Smith was restrained from presenting the so-called revelation on plural marriage "because of the prejudice of the people."

The other fact to which attention may be called, and it is also pertinent, is this: The first edition of the Book of Covenants and Commandments was presented to a solemn assembly of the church on the seventeenth day of August, 1835, by a committee composed of Joseph Smith, Jr., Oliver Cowdery, Sidney Rigdon, and Frederick G. Williams. This committee had been appointed by an Assembly of the church held September 24, 1834. The record, as stated in the minutes of this General Assembly, as published in the edition of 1835, shows that the entire book was accepted as the work of the committee, and was approved unanimously, including the section on "Marriage" said to have been introduced by W. W. Phelps, marked Section CI, and an article on "Government and Laws in General," presented to the assembly by Oliver Cowdery, both of these articles being adopted and ordered to be printed in the book, by a unanimous vote. If the validity of the article on marriage was vitiated and was of no force or value because it was presented to the assembly by W. W. Phelps, does not the fact that the article on government was introduced by Oliver Cowdery also prove it to be of no force or value; both of these articles being approved by a unanimous vote of the assembly? This question will be given added consequence by the following, taken from the preface of the original edition of the book, (the one published in 1835,) written by Joseph Smith, Oliver Cowdery, Sidney Rigdon, and F. G. Williams, the committee of compilation; and three of them acting presidents of the church at the time. This preface contains the following as its opening paragraph:

We deem it to be unnecessary to entertain you with a lengthy preface to the following volume, but merely to say that it contains in short, the leading items of the religion which we have professed to believe.

The second part contains items or principles for the regulation of the church, as taken from the revelations which have been given since its organization, as well as from former ones.

There may be an aversion in the minds of some against receiving anything purporting to be articles of religious faith, in consequence of there being so many now extant; but if men believe a system, and profess that it was given by inspiration, certainly, the more intelligibly they can present it, the better. It does not make a principle untrue to print it, neither does it make it true not to print it.

The church viewing this subject to be of importance, appointed, through their servants and delegates the High Council, your servants to select and compile this work. Several reasons might be adduced in favor of this move of the Council, but we only add a few words. They knew that the church was evil spoken of in many places—its faith and belief misrepresented, and the way of truth thus subverted. By some it was represented as disbelieving the Bible, by others as being an enemy to all good order and uprightness, and by others as being injurious to the peace of all governments civil and political.

We have, therefore, endeavored to present, though in few words, our belief, and when we say this, humbly trust, the faith and principles of this society as a body.

We do not present this little volume with any other expectation than that we are to be called to answer to every principle advanced, in that day when the secrets of all hearts will be revealed, and the reward of every man's labor be given him.

It will be noticed here that the men who made this compilation, did so fully understanding the work which was imposed upon them to do by virtue of their appointment as a committee, and that they expected to answer for every principle advanced. The books published from 1844 to those we have mentioned heretofore as published in 1845, 1849, 1854, (and to these may be added the editions published in 1856 and 1869 in England,) all contain the same rule and publish the same article on marriage adopted by the assembly in 1835, and all containing revelations upon which the articles referred to on government and on marriage were predicated by the committee when they compiled the book. A certain significance may be added to the fact, as stated in this article heretofore, by stating that in a Compendium of the Faith and Doctrines of the Utah Mormon church, published by Orson Pratt at Islington, England, in 1857, in an appendix containing important chronological data, gives under the date of 1835 the following item: "August 17; at a General Assembly at Kirtland, the Book of Doctrine and Covenants was accepted as a rule of faith and practice"; and that in a Hand Book of Reference published at the office of the Juvenile Instructor, Salt Lake City, in 1884, under the head of Chronology of Church History, under the date of August 17, 1835, is the following item of information: "At a General Assembly of the Church in Kirtland, the Book of Covenants was approved, and thus became a law of faith and practice to the Church." The current issue of the Messenger and Advocate for 1835 contains a published statement of the meeting of this General Assembly referred to in this article.

We submit that no just minded man or woman can take this little circle of facts and successfully sustain the assumption that any other rule of faith and practice concerning the marriage relation was known to the church or operative as a rule of faith and practice known to Joseph Smith and obtaining during his lifetime.

ANOTHER FAILURE OF SOCIALISM.

It is with regret that we note failures in socialistic or communist or coöperative movements. Here is one that we had quite good hopes would make a marked success. The reason assigned for its failure, a dissension among its operating members over the question of equal rights and equal wealth, has been the rock upon which many of these efforts have gone down. It seems almost impossible to get any aggregate number of men together without there being some in their midst who would be dissatisfied with a carrying out of measures to which they at first gave their unqualified approval. We commend it to thinkers.

SOCIALIST DREAM IS O'ER.

WILKESBARRE, Pennsylvania, January 12.—After an experience of five years Socialism has failed dismally at Coaldale, a mining town near here.

Saturday the sheriff seized the coöperative store on executions issued by the creditors and the political power of the Socialists here has dwindled so that they are expected to lose every office they now hold at the municipal election next month.

Coaldale became a socialistic town at the election following the mining strike of 1902. At first things ran smoothly, but for the past three years there have been dissensions, owing to disputes about equal rights and equal wealth.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

A reader of the Hawk-Eye has sent to it a cutting from a recent issue of the Wall Street Journal, which is rather remarkable, coming as it does from a paper devoted solely to financial affairs, and printed amid the fever of the world's greatest financial and business mart. The extract is as follows:

"What America needs more than railway extension and western irrigation, and low tariff, and a bigger wheat crop, and a merchant marine, and a new navy is a revival of piety, the kind mother and father used to have—piety that counted it good business to stop for daily family prayer before breakfast, right in the middle of harvest; that quit field work an half hour early Thursday night, so as to get the chores done and go to prayer-meeting; that borrowed money to pay the preacher's salary and prayed fervently in secret for the salvation of the rich man who looked with scorn on such unbusinesslike behavior. That's what we need now to clean this country of the filth of graft, and of greed, petty and big; of worship of fine houses and big lands and high office and grand social functions. What is this thing we are worshiping but a vain repetition of what decayed nations fell down and worshiped just before the light went out? Read the history of Rome in decay and you will find luxury there that could lay a big dollar over our little doughnut that looks so large to us. Great wealth never made a nation substantial nor honorable. There is nothing on earth that looks good that is so dangerous for a man or nation to handle as quick, easy, big money. If you do resist its deadly influences the chances are that it will get your son. It takes greater and finer heroism to dare to be poor in America than to capture a battery in Manchuria."—Hawk-Eye, January 5, 1908.

We were handed the following slip from the Kansas City Times of January 2. It may induce a shudder among some of the readers of the HERALD, but, as believers in prophecy, we need not be fearful of the effect that a prophecy of this kind may have, as while we believe in prophecy, we believe also that many false spirits have gone out into the world and from these false prophecies may emanate. As time moves it will not be long till it will be known whether such awful prophecy is worth regarding or not. At all events, if we put it on record in our journal, if it comes to pass we can not take shelter under the idea that we did not hear it or had not seen it in print. "If that which is prophesied come not to pass, that is the thing which the Lord hath not spoken."

"WASHINGTON, December 30.—A great battle between the fleet of the United States and a powerful navy flying the red flag of Japan is to be fought midway between Guam and Hawaii July 16, 1908. The Japanese fleet will be destroyed. The Atlantic fleet will be badly crippled, but nine of the nineteen American vessels to take part in the engagement will make their way back to San Francisco—the other ten being destroyed.

"This startling information was conveyed to Commander Chas. C. Rodgers, head of the hydrographic office of the Navy Department, to-day at noon by Professor William S. Baker, astrologer and meteorologist. Professor Baker, who has a reputation as an unofficial announcer of great world events, called at the Navy Department to-day and asked Commander Rodgers for charts giving the ocean depth at a point midway between Hawaii and Guam. He was furnished with the maps he wanted. Pointing dramatically to a spot which he indicated on the map, he said:

"Right here is what is known as Nero's deep. It was discovered some years ago by the collier Nero. It is one of the deepest points in the Pacific. It is over five miles deep. Here, on July 16 next, just as dawn is breaking, the sixteen battleships then in the Pacific, augmented by the Nebraska, Oregon, and Wisconsin, will go into combat with the fleet of Japan, with eleven battleships and forty destroyers. The battle will last from dawn until noon, when every Japanese ship will have been sunk or disabled.

"The United States fleet will be in a sorry plight. Ten American ships will be sunk. Nine will be able to crawl back into San Francisco. Japan will be swept from the sea and the United States crippled for years to come."

"Taking his hat, the professor bowed himself out dramatically, and Commander Rodgers pinned a red standard over Nero's deep and went out to lunch, waiting for July 16 to roll around."

There seems to be but three ways for a nation to acquire wealth: the first is by war, as the Romans did, in plundering their conquered neighbors—this is robbery; the second by commerce, which is generally cheating; the third by agriculture, the only honest way, wherein a man receives a real increase of the seed thrown into the ground, in a kind of continual miracle, wrought by the hand of God in his favor, as a reward for his innocent life and his virtuous industry.—Franklin.

The Straight Road

SUCCESS.

To the hand that is the first held out
To help an erring mortal stand,
Whose master knows not fear nor doubt,—
The generous, firm, yet gentle hand:
Success!

To the brain that thinks no evil thing,
But daily with the Spirit filled,
Wrestles with that the day may bring,
And conquers it as the Lord has willed:
Success!

To the heart that has itself affixed
Unto the gospel's perfect plan,
And has its daily task to mix
The blood of a good and honest man:
Success!

A MESSAGE FROM HEAVEN! WILL YOU HEAR IT?

The Bible says: "He that answereth a matter before he heareth it, it is folly and shame unto him." —Proverbs 18: 13. Persecution and misrepresentation are never resorted to by fair minded people. A one-sided story is never a fair and impartial story; hence, it does injustice to some one, and even if the misrepresentation be not intentional, yet it causes innocence to suffer.

People who are not properly informed or else did not care to state the truth, have said that the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints are the same church as the "Mormons of Utah." Such statements are absolutely untrue. They are entirely distinct and separate churches. Their religions are as widely different as are Christianity and Mohammedanism.

In 1830 the true Latter Day Saints' Church was organized by command of God, who sent an angel from heaven in fulfillment of Revelation 14: 6, and the church as anciently organized, was restored according to the New Testament pattern (see 1 Corinthians 12: 28 and Ephesians 4: 4-13), with a ministry called of God to preach the complete gospel including the six principles of Christ's doctrine as taught by Paul (see Hebrews 6: 1, 2 and 2 John 9), and the promise of the gift of the Holy Spirit in 1 Corinthians 12: 1-11.

The angel appeared, first to Joseph Smith, then to Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer, and Martin Harris, all of whom to their dying day, solemnly bore witness to the fact.

The angel also showed them a record, written on golden tablets, that gave the history of an enlightened people who inhabited America many hundreds of years before this continent was discovered by Columbus. The record was translated into English and is known as the Book of Mormon. The Latter Day Saints believe the book to be a true record, but they do not accept it as taking the place of the Bible.

The Book of Mormon does not teach polygamy. It does not teach anything contrary to the Bible in any sense. The Bible is the belief of all true Latter Day Saints.

After the death of Joseph Smith, the putative founder of the church, which was in 1844, a portion of the members apostatized from the church under the leadership of Brigham Young. He led them to Utah and formed another church, and began to teach and practice polygamy, and claim that Adam is God. They did not get their teaching from the Book of Mormon, but from a pretended revelation presented to them by Young. They called themselves Latter Day Saints, but their teachings were as different from the true Latter Day Saints as heaven is from hell.

The true Saints met in conference and disfellowshipped Young and his followers; hence they no longer formed a part of the original church, which never at any time taught, practiced, or believed in polygamy or any other of the abominable teachings of Young. They proved this before the courts of the United States, and were awarded the rights and property of the church.

The Ohio court said: The church in Utah, the defendant, has materially and largely departed from the faith, doctrines, laws, ordinances, and usages of said original Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and has incorporated into its system of faith the doctrines of Celestial Marriage and a plurality of wives, and the doctrine of Adam-god worship, contrary to the laws and constitution of said original church.

The U. S. Circuit Court of Missouri said of polygamy: "It was never promulgated, taught, nor recognized as a doctrine of the church prior to the assumption of Brigham Young."—Decision, p. 26.

Senator Burrows stated the difference between the "Utah Mormons" so-called, and the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. Of the latter he said: "The courts have repeatedly declared this organization to be the legitimate successor of the original Mormon Church, and its adherents, numbering some 50,000 peaceable, patriotic, and law-abiding citizens scattered throughout the United States in small church societies, conforming to the laws of their country wherever they may be and adhering to the faith of the founder of their creed, repudiating and denouncing the doctrine of polygamy and its attendant crimes, without temple, endowment house, or secret order, worship in the open like other organizations, unquestioned and unmolested."—Congressional Record of December 13, 1906.

Senator Dubois speaking of the true Latter Day Saints as "Josephites," said: "The Josephite Mormons, with their headquarters at Lamoni, in the state of Iowa, and wherever they are, no matter in what part of the country, are among the best of our citizens in all respects. They do not believe in polygamy; they never practiced polygamy. They discountenanced it. They do not believe in church dictation in political affairs. They are the same as other church organizations, and to their religion no one has any objection. I am glad to call the attention of Senators to it, so that in future we may not confuse the Josephite with the Brighamite Mormons."—Congressional Record of December 17, 1906.

You can obtain these speeches entire at nearly all public libraries, by inquiring for the issues named. These sources of information should for ever silence the tongue of slander.

Come and hear the angel message, and you will never have cause to regret it. You will hear that which will enlarge your faith, make plain many Bible truths, and increase your hope in God. If our message is from God, does it not mean much to you? Will you condemn it without hearing it? In every age God's messages have been a surprise; many because of this have rejected them. We plead with you to come and hear, and afterward, judge if it is untrue.

THE DANCE,

"I have been told by those who say they know, that this is a harmless pastime, and that it is a pleasant way for young people, and for older people, too, to pass an evening together. I have neither the time nor the inclination to discuss this question at length. I am persuaded that many people dance without a thought of harm, or a suggestion of impurity. I have only this to say, that for every good thing you can say about the dance many harmful things may be said, and my work has so constantly been with the public the past ten years, I have been thrown so constantly in contact with all classes and conditions of people, that I know that you will permit me to say this afternoon that I have heard from the lips of those who represent all grades of society, from the highest to the very lowest, that the dance had been the cause of their downfall. If this be true, and I believe it to be, then you will clearly understand that I can only say if dancing is simply questionable it is frequently dangerous; if it is sinful we ought not to allow ourselves to yield to it in the least."—Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman.

Original Articles

SHALL I TRY AGAIN.

If at first you don't succeed,
Try, try again.

Let a man try faithfully, manfully to be right, he will daily grow more and more right. It is at the bottom of the condition on which all men have to cultivate themselves.—Carlyle.

In 1903, the writer wrote a short article under the caption of "Right, or too particular? which?" In this article it was claimed that the ministers of this church are under obligations to administer the sacrament in accordance with the instruction and formulas given in Doctrine and Covenants 17:22, 23. Is this correct? If it is, why is it not observed by presidents of stakes and branches, and all others? I do not ask that the position be complied with because I wrote that article, but because the position is right; and it was right, before the article was ever written.

On the other hand, if the position assumed, that we are required to comply with the instruction and formulas given, be an erroneous one, why is it not made apparent to the readers of the HERALD? Surely, a friendly interchange of views can not injure the position that is right, and therefore true. Truth and right are stronger and more lovely than error and wrong, hence are more attractive to the children of light.

It is painful to those who discern it, and never fails to bring to us a degree of loss, for ministers of the church, especially leading ones, to go into the sacred desk, and when offering prayer over the sacramental emblems, add to, take from, and change that which has been given by inspiration, indorsed by the church, and printed in one of the sacred books of the church for our guide!

In this same seventeenth section of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, the ministers are instructed how to baptize. They are to go down into the water, call the candidates by name, use the given formula, and then immerse. Now, is there any proper authority for changing any part of this? And if we have authority to change the formula of words which the elder or priest is to "say," can we not change the mode of baptism by the same authority?

If it be said, "We do not like to read a prayer from the book," we reply by asking: Is the prayer less sacred, or efficacious, when read, than after it has been committed to memory and repeated? Is it not better, and more pleasing to God, to read just what we are instructed to say, than to leave a portion of it unsaid and say something else?

When it comes to baptism, we are conscientiously particular, as we should be, that all things shall be done in accordance with the instructions which we have received. Is baptism more sacred than the sacrament of the Lord's supper? On April 11, 1878, the following resolution was adopted by the General Conference (see General Conference Resolutions, page 47, No. 212) :

That all baptisms, in order to be legal, must be done by both the administrator and the candidate going down into the water, according to the instructions in the Bible, Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants; and if there are any now numbered with the church who have received the ordinance with any less than the above requirements, that they are hereby required to receive the administration of the ordinance in the above form.

Does it not place us in a very embarrassing attitude, before the church and the world, when we manifest such conscientious scruples concerning the manner of administering one of the ordinances of God's house, and such a degree of indifference and carelessness in the administration of another?

What excuse, if any, can be furnished for not complying with the instructions found in Doctrine and Covenants 17:22, 23? Some of us would like to know, for if we are wrong, we are not only willing, but anxious, to be set right.

My former article, referred to above, is found in the SAINTS' HERALD for February 25, 1903, pages 176, 177.

THE FOUNDING OF LAMONI AND THE WORK OF THE ORDER OF ENOCH.—NO. 1.

(Reprinted from Autumn Leaves.)

The name Lamoni, as applied to the locality which is now known thereby, had its origin with the "First United Order of Enoch," a corporation composed of a number of men of means connected with the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

The stockholders of this organization held their first meeting at Council Bluffs, Iowa, September 19, 1870, at which meeting Elijah Banta, Israel L. Rogers, David Dancer, David M. Gamet, Alexander McCord, Calvin A. Beebe, and Phineas Cadwell were chosen a board of directors. These men further organized by choosing Elijah Banta as president, Israel L. Rogers treasurer, and Henry A. Stebbins as secretary.

The purpose of this organization is clearly set forth in Section 2 of the constitution of the organization, which reads as follows:

"Section 2. The general business and object of this corporation, shall be the associating together of men of capital and those skilled in labor and mechanics, . . . for the purpose of settling, developing and improving new tracts of land which tracts of land shall be selected and purchased by a committee to be appointed by the Board of Directors . . . to take cognizance of the wants of worthy and industrious poor men who shall apply therefor, and provide them with labor and the means for securing homes and a livelihood and to develop energies and resources, of the people who may seek those respective localities for settlement."

At the first meeting of the Board of Directors

ELDER ASA S. COCHRAN.

Author of this article. Formerly a secretary of the Order of Enoch, and one of the few remaining members of that organization.

Elijah Banta, David Dancer, Israel L. Rogers, and Phineas Cadwell were appointed a committee to seek a suitable location for the purchase of land and the operation of said company. The stock certificates of this corporation were issued from Lamoni, Iowa.

This committee visited several localities in the states of Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa, finally locating in the township of Fayette, Decatur County, Iowa; the post-office being Sedgwick; the nearest store being at Davis City, seven miles distant; and Leon, eighteen miles away, being the nearest railroad station. The first report of the secretary, dated September 1, 1871, showed that the capital stock amounted to $44,500 and that two thousand, six hundred and eighty acres of land had been purchased at a cost of $21,768.84. Subsequent reports show that the capital stock had been increased one hundred dollars more, and a total of three thousand, three hundred and thirty acres of land had been purchased at a cost of $30,673.94. Twelve new houses had been built costing $7,678.40, and about sixteen hundred acres of prairie land had been broken at a cost of $4,040.00, a nursery planted and various other improvements made. The shares in the company were $100 each. Those holding the largest amount of stock were David Dancer $9,000, Elijah Banta $5,000, Israel L. Rogers $5,000, Phineas Cadwell $3,400, Moses A. Meder $3,000, William Hopkins, Simeon Stivers and family, T. J. Andrews and family, Ephraim Rowland, Marietta Walker, Alexander McCord, and Calvin A. Beebe, $1,000 each, the remaining $12,200 stock being held by upwards of sixty different individuals.

The organization continued about twenty years, paying ninety per cent in dividends and returning the original stock also.

It must be remembered that this covered a period of twenty years and it will be seen that the average yearly dividend was not high, especially when we recollect that money commanded a high rate of interest at that time. The work of these men has been misunderstood by many, which was unnecessary for those who were conversant with publications of those times, for their constitution and by-laws were published in the HERALD, I believe, although the title might indicate to those not posted in the history of its organization, something different from what was shown in its constitution. Its leaders were men who had the good of the latter-day work in view all the time, and have passed to their reward. Their motives were good. They believed their work was approved of the Lord. While the locating committee were seeking a location, they attended a prayer-meeting in Nebraska City when the Spirit was manifested in the gifts, commending their work. Bro. A. W. Moffet, one of the pioneers of Decatur County, who was one of the first to preach the gospel in this vicinity, gives a beautiful testimony in regard to it, as found in Autumn Leaves, volume 2, page 19, as follows: "By request of Bro. W., I write a dream or vision I once had, for I do not know whether I was asleep or awake. Some little time prior to the reorganization of the church, my mind had been running on church matters, and wondering what the result of all the factions of the church would be. I saw in the night myself and three other men on a high rolling prairie. We had a team with us. One of us had a spade, and with it we were spading in the ground. It seemed that a question was asked by some one (not of our number for there was no one present but the four of us),

'What are you doing?' The answer was, 'We are preparing to lay the foundation for the redemption of Zion.' We looked up from our work, and looked to the northeast and saw two covered wagons coming toward us. In a short time I saw others coming from all directions, until the prairie was covered with emigrants. I often thought of the dream or vision, whichever it was, and wondered what it meant, until it passed from my mind. I thought no more about it until some time after the committee on location came here, and I took my team and a spade, and drove them over on the prairie in Fayette Township. In the committee were just the number that I saw in my dream or vision. We took the spade to try the depth and quality of the soil. . . . I think Brn. Ackerly and Ross were the first two families in covered wagons that came onto the prairies, and they came from the northeast. . . . I saw this before I was indentified with the Reorganization."

The following from the Doctrine and Covenants was understood as referring to the order, as well as others, as it was one of the most prominent organizations of those times: "Behold, if my servants and my handmaidens, of the different organizations for good among my people, shall continue in righteousness, they shall be blessed, even as they bless others of the household of faith."—117: 12.

These evidences were encouraging to them and indicate the watchcare of the Giver of all good. The leading men of this organization had the good of the church constantly in mind; and were ever ready to aid in any enterprise that was originated for its good. Had the organization been continued it would have been useful and of much benefit to the work; but this movement had its opposers. Some of those whose work was in other than financial lines were busy talking in opposition to their work, intimating that the leaders were "feathering their own nests," etc., which was uncalled for and unkind.

Bro. Banta, who was the first president of the order and was continued as such until nearly all of the land was purchased, never had anything like a salary. In one of the busy years, ending August 1, 1875, I find the following items of expenditures:

To officers of the board and secretary.....	$223 25
To HERALD office for printing.....	45 91
For all other expenses (incidentals I suppose).....	7 58

Bro. Banta was president and Bro. Henry A. Stebbins secretary until that time. At the meeting of the board of that year Bro. David Dancer was chosen president, and continued as such until the affairs of the association were closed up. In 1876 Bro. Dancer moved to Lamoni, and in September of that year A. S. Cochran was chosen secretary and continued until the close of the business. Neither of the secretaries were stockholders in the order, and I notice that in the financial report for the year 1885 the president and secretary were paid $55 for their services; so that the charge of selfishness on the part of the leading men of this institution would be unjust and unkind. Each of the presiding officers bought about two sections of land, and Elijah Banta could have invested his $5,000 and David Dancer his $9,000 that was put into stock just as profitably elsewhere.

A resolution passed by the Board of Directors in 1874 shows one thing had in view by them that concerns our subject. It is as follows: "Resolved that we proceed to locate a town-site upon or near the land belonging to the association as soon as it is found practicable." But town-building will be considered later.

The elders of the Decatur District, principally of the Little River, now Pleasanton Branch, had been busy preaching in Fayette Township, and several had been baptized, so that on November 12, 1871; in pursuance of a resolution passed by the Decatur District conference, the district president, Bro. A. W. Moffet, organized the Lamoni Branch which was composed of fifteen persons who had formerly been members of the Little River Branch, and had been baptized by Brn. A. W. Moffet and Zenos H. Gurley, Jr.: Charles, Harriet, and James R. Walker, William and Eliza Bunt, Robert L. Simpson, Adam,

Angeline, Francis M., Caroline, and Susan Dennis, Andrew J. Green, James D. and George R. Dillon, and John E. Ackerly, also four persons whose standing as members was vouched for by Bro. E. Banta, namely Charles H. and Margaret Jones, Z. H. Gurley and James P. Dillon. Bro. Charles H. Jones was chosen president. Bro. and Sr. Jones had come from Northern Illinois, Bro. Dillon from Northern Iowa, and Bro. Gurley from Wisconsin. During the next year, 1872, the membership of the branch was increased considerably. Bro. Samuel Ackerly, George Ross from Wisconsin, George Braby, Peter B. Johnson, and Andrew K. Anderson from Illinois, I. N. W. Cooper from Pennsylvania, William Hopkins from

Bro. Jones as president of the branch. Bro. O. B. Thomas, an elder, was acting as priest, and Andrew K. Anderson as teacher. Meetings were held in two schoolhouses at the same hour. One of the houses is part of the one near the Evergreen Church, and the other was four and a half miles east.

As the president was suffering from a severe attack of rheumatism, the priest would attend one meeting and the teacher the other, and the following Sunday they would change. This continued until the following spring, when the president's health having improved, he called a union meeting on Sunday, and appointed the meeting for the following Sunday in the new church.

AN OLD LAMONI LANDMARK.

This is one of the three houses that stood on the present site of Lamoni when the town was founded. It stands just north of the Barr Hotel. The author of this article is seen in the foreground.

California, James Shaw, Robert and John Johnston from Canada, who with their families and numerous baptisms by the elders had increased the membership of the branch to nearly seventy. In the year 1873 their members were still further increased by the arrival of O. J. Bailey from Michigan, George W. Bird who had been with Lyman Wight in Texas, Richard Elliker from Canada, Daniel P., David D., and Alburn B. Young, George Adams and E. J. Robinson from California, each with one exception having families, a companion at least; also many were baptized.

By this time they were in need of a place for meeting. When the writer came here in the fall of 1875, Bro. Daniel P. Young, a high priest, had succeeded

The following week was a busy one. No lumber nearer than Leon, twenty miles away. Monday and Tuesday lumber was hauled from Leon, and blocks for foundation from the timber. Wednesday and Thursday, carpenters, of whom I remember Alexander H. Smith, who had moved that spring from Nauvoo and settled near where Andover, Missouri, now is, and H. R. Harder and Hiram Dougherty, who came from Kansas, and perhaps others, framed the building and laid the foundation. Friday and Saturday any one who could wield a hammer or saw was invited, and before the sun set for the last time of the week, the building was up, shingled, inclosed, windows in, and door hung. Meeting was held the next day, according to previous appointment. No floor, no seats, except rough lumber, wagon seats, or chairs brought in for temporary use. The building was located near the center of the township, on land furnished by Bro. E. J. Robinson. In the fall, as the cool weather came on, a floor was laid, walls plastered, and it was made comfortable for winter. The size was probably about twenty-four by thirty-six, about ten feet to the eaves. It was never painted, and was abandoned as a church and sold after a church was erected in town.

Bro. Joseph visited us once on his returning from the west, and called it a "temporary tabernacle." Some designated it later as "the sheepshed." Humble as it was the Saints were pleased with it, and I think the Lord was, as many blessings were received in it.

In 1875, I think, Bro. Samuel H. Gurley started a small store in what had been a schoolhouse, keeping a limited supply of such goods as he deemed suitable. There were no other stores or wagon or blacksmith shops nearer than Davis City until about 1877, when Bro. Peter Harris arrived from Wisconsin and erected a blacksmith shop not far from the church-building. This was afterwards moved to town, also the dwelling he also built, and they are now part of the dwelling and mill now owned by Bro. James Allen.

Conditions remained the same, it being only a farming community until the year 1879. A company was formed somewhere east, known as The Leon, Mt.

Ayr & Southwestern R. R. Co., formed principally of men connected with the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company, their purpose being to extend the railroad from Leon through Mt. Ayr, and it has now been extended to St. Joseph, Missouri. Work was pushed forward to Davis City and west to what was afterwards known as Bethany Junction, now called Togo. From there they designed to take a northwesterly course, and commenced the work of grading and would have passed about two or three miles north of where Lamoni now stands, when Bro. Samuel V. Bailey chanced to meet some of the leading men of the company and conversed with them in regard to changing their course so as to reach "The Colony," as the locality was then named. This proposition was favorably received by them in case sufficient aid was guaranteed to justify them in changing their course.

Several individuals almost immediately entered into an agreement to obligate themselves each in proportion to the value the assessor had placed upon his property to furnish the aid the company required. They were David Dancer, Elijah Banta, The First Order of Enoch, S. V. Bailey, J. R. Smith, and I think N. H. Riggs, George Adams, and W. Hudson. Meeting with the railroad men, they obligated themselves to furnish them two hundred acres of land for a town site, also the right of way through the township, also the right of way to the State line, provided they should wish to make a junction at Lamoni at some future time. The railroad men were to build and operate a railroad, establish and maintain a depot on the land furnished them, and pay fifteen dollars per acre for the land, also deed them one hundred average lots when the town was laid out and platted. The Order of Enoch furnished one hundred and twenty acres of land which lies on the south side of Main Street, and bought eighty acres of a Mr. Frank Drummond, which lies on the north side of Main Street. The land purchased of Mr. Drummond cost them six hundred dollars more than the railroad men allowed them. They furnished three miles of right of way. But eventually the one hundred lots sold for enough to reimburse them for their outlay.

There was one dwelling on the land furnished by the Order of Enoch which stood where the elegant residence of W. A. Hopkins now stands, and was occupied by Bro. I. P. Baggerly, now of the missionary force, and who is still a resident of Lamoni. He had the land now north of the railroad planted in corn, which was ready to cut up when trains commenced running and the building of the town commenced. On the other side of Main Street on the eighty acres were two houses. One stood on the block immediately south of the one afterwards occupied by the HERALD Office, and was occupied by Mr. Drummond who maintained a bachelor's hall therein. This house was occupied by Bro. Frank Criley while he lived in Lamoni, and was more recently moved onto the HERALD Office block and occupied by Bro. D. J. Krahl, and now is occupied by Bro. C. E. Blair, present manager of The Supply Store. The other house, a much older one, a cut of which appears in this issue, stood very near where the Barr Hotel now stands, and has been removed a little farther north, and is soon to be removed or torn down. It was occupied by Mr. E. B. Teale, now vice-president of the Farmers' Bank of Lamoni. Much of this land was planted in corn. That part of town where the Methodist church and J. R. Smith's residence now stand was a corn-field. The first dwelling-house erected was by Bro. Volentine White, now owned by Bro. James Jennings.

ARE APOSTLES FIRST OR SECOND IN THE CHURCH?

In answering the criticisms of my letter in HERALD No. 40, pp. 908 and 909, of which papers appear from two of the brethren, it will be observed that one can not make answer to all that is involved in these criticisms in one short article; and as we are expected to advance constructively safe positions, as well as to answer criticisms, it is important that positions be defined which are easily understood, to begin with. The following view will help to enlighten the way.

At the formative period of the Church of Jesus Christ (restored) the "common consent" rule was avowed under divine mandate, and was respected. Freedom of the will and personal choice were not interfered with, but defended. The instruction given reads:

And all things shall be done by common consent in the church.—Doctrine and Covenants 25: 1.

I give unto you that you should fill all these offices and approve of those names which I have mentioned, or else disapprove of them, at my general conference.—Doctrine and Covenants 107: 46.

As an example and precedent given, we have:

And my servant Joseph shall be appointed to preside over the conference by the voice of it.—Doctrine and Covenants 27: 4.

Why should Joseph Smith preside by the voice of the people? Because he was the greatest, the chief in authority; yet it required the consent of the people in order that he preside over them. The church was then in its kindergarten state. No one knew the proper course to pursue; this instruction was given to guide in order that no mistake might be made as to the proper procedure at the outset. A sample of procedure and precedent established would safeguard the rights of the faithful and preserve order and harmony if followed. Strange that any should flatter themselves with the idea that they can beat it. The history as given recites:

We were, however, commanded to defer this our ordination until such times as it should be practicable to have our brethren, who had been and who should be baptized, assembled together, when we must have their sanction to our thus proceeding to ordain each other, and have them decide by vote whether they were willing to accept us as spiritual teachers, or not.—Church History, vol. 1, pp. 60, 61.

Having opened the meeting by solemn prayer to our heavenly Father we proceeded (according to previous commandment) to call on our brethren to know whether they accepted us as their teachers in the things of the kingdom of God, and whether they were satisfied that we should proceed and be organized as a church according to said commandment which we had received. To these they consented by a unanimous vote.—Church History, vol. 1, pp. 76, 77.

This teaching is in harmony with the scriptures, which teaches that the truth shall make men free. It was also in harmony with the feelings and sentiments of a free people, who had at great sacrifice broken the political yoke of bondage and made themselves free. The right to the exercise of the elective franchise is the pride of American citizens, the foundation of things governmental in the United States; and here is where the rights of men have been fought out and recognized beyond that of any other nation or people; and here is where the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints was being established, and that according to the laws of the country and in harmony with the political and social feelings of a free people; a corresponding likeness existing between the two: the "common consent" rule obtaining in the church, which was in perfect keeping with the political ægis prevailing in the state; tersely expressed in regard to the latter: "A government of the people, by the people, and for the people."

According to the ideal President, "No man is good enough to govern another man without his consent." These sentiments find a happy response in the heart of every free man. They are recognized in the church under the "common consent" rule and had it always been adhered to it would have safeguarded it in the hour of peril against the influx and invasion of its rules by sycophants, ambitious and unprincipled tyrants and bigots, upstart leaders, who secured a blind following of a devoted but too credulous people, who were led on to dishonor and disaster.

Let us take warning (those who have not) and follow in the way of law and order, of progress and safety, the cultivation of an enlarged view of duty, right procedure, and loyalty to the splendid inheritance we have received of law, example, and precedent. With so much to guide we will venture upon an examination of the criticisms referred to. (See HERALD, 1907, pp. 1004, 1005.)

This writer, it will be observed, deals largely in interrogatives. That is easy, a luxury. A single question sometimes may involve an article in answering. He asks:

First, Why is it that this matter of who shall preside is limited to district conferences?

Reply to this is made in Yankee style, by asking another question: Who has so limited it? It seems to be a man of straw set up. In our letter we state to the contrary, but can not agree to the extremes to which the brother pushes it; for there would be neither necessity, feasibility, law, sense, nor practical workings for such an extreme view. We consent that it would furnish all of these orders with competent presiding officers, but it is not required. Besides, most of the matters considered by the various orders named are had under review at some of the business-meetings, in the open, for criticism, by either branch, district, General Conference, or other assemblies.

Second, What is it to regard and consider these men "as the leading representative authorities of the church"?

Answer! Do you not know? It means this much at least: that they should be recognized in their official rights at important assemblies of the church constituents, as per rule set forth; that they should be permitted to take the lead without contention or sullen opposition, and not be subjected to others or dictated to by them; their counsel and advice be sought and adhered to whether it pleases or displeases, subject of course to appeal in case there is dissatisfaction. It means all this, perhaps more. Again he says:

Where an officer of higher rank appears upon an active field, at no time does he take the place of the lesser officer.

Who said he did? Another man of straw. Being the ranking officer and thus appearing upon the active field, he assumes command. All are under his control and direction, captain and all. He takes nobody's place but his own. Just as should missionaries in charge, each occupying in his own office and appointment, being the highest officer present they should be expected to take the lead and direct; but acting in the church instead of the state, then leadership should be recognized by the "common consent" rule prevailing in the church. He is not put up, and no one else is put down, simply fellow laborers recognizing each other in their sphere of action. Did the brother really think that the writer, who has been a soldier himself, wished to convey the idea that a general coming upon the field of battle would have to don the captain's suit and badge of office in order to command the regiment?

But the elder goes on:

When the writer was in charge in England, he was nearly always requested to preside when present at a district conference, but always declined in favor of the district president, and never took his place excepting when urged to do so for some special reason by those in charge of the district.

I did this because I believed I could do the work required of me better by sitting beside the presiding officer, than if I had been in his place.

Well, it seems that the local officials in England knew better what church proprieties are than did the one in charge. They were ready to recognize the leading authority. What did he want to get into the district president's place for in order to preside? He held an office and appointment superior to his. He outranked the president of the district and presided over him. Why not preside in his own right and office? Or did he think he would have to occupy the district president's office and don his trappings? The district president was right. It was proper that the one in charge should have been recognized, and that by vote of the assembly. The district president could have presided as an associate, and the one in charge could have sat by him, or could have vacated with him in the chair and gone on the floor as often as he wished, without losing his right as a presiding officer of the meeting.

This writer says he was in charge, yet informs us that he did not preside without special request of those in charge of the district. But was he not in charge of the district and mission? In charge, and still not in charge until some one put him in charge? Why did not this officer preside as recognized and invited, with the district president or some other associated with him? He did not need to be in the chair all the time conducting the business in order to preside. I fear this being in the chair is confusing to some minds. Did you never see any one presiding at a meeting and not be in the chair receiving motions and conducting the business routine? You might see it at most any gathering where there is more than one appointed to preside. For illustration, take the General Conference. Three are appointed to preside. The senior of the three may or may not occupy the chair, but does he not preside? If he does not, the showing is a farce. One takes the chair and conducts in the business analysis going on, aided by those sitting by. All preside. Any proper officer may be selected from the body to take the chair and conduct the examination of the business, under the guidance of the responsible presiding officers.

Had this missionary presided at a conference as requested, with the district president associated with him, or some other, he could have left the platform at any time he wished, leaving the other officer in the chair if not already in, and gone on with his speech-making, just as occurs in most all assemblies where there are two or more presiding officers. There is something a little amusing about the idea of turning an assembly over to another in order to better control it, and taking a seat on the floor. Wonder if Uncle Joe Cannon ever does that while presiding over the House of Representatives in order to control it? It is not common for a political ruler to abdicate and take a seat among his subjects in order to control and direct them.

Again:

Does that mean that they shall preside over every assembly when they shall be present? If so, what does the Lord mean when he says, "In both branches and districts the presiding officers should be considered and respected in their offices"?

Answer: It means that those officers should receive proper treatment in their sphere of action by those in higher authority; and does not mean that the lesser officers, even if so minded, can assume to do the work of the traveling high council, or so manipulate by resolutions or otherwise as to bar them from the proper performance of their duties or directing in their assemblies.

It may not be necessary that they preside over every assembly where they are present, in the sense of taking the chair and conducting the business detail as presented; but they being the ranking officers present, the presidents, it should be left discretionary with them as to how they can best serve the interests of the occasion; and this they can determine when their authority is recognized properly by the assembly according to rule. The writer referred to says, "They do preside in a sense." Why not recognize it then—who is injured? But again:

If the Lord had said that a high priest could take the lead of meetings when there was no apostle present, all would have been clear.

Answer: Does any one question that a high priest may preside if there is no apostle present? No; no use of saying anything about it then. He had already advised that the counsel of the traveling councils of the church should be sought and respected. To do this it is necessary to respect these councils in their position, and place them in an attitude where they can advise and counsel according to church usages. No; it is better as it stands. Occasions may frequently arise when others than the one in charge should preside, or be associated with him in presiding, and help conduct the business routine under examination when he is present; but in the view presented he would be barred from either choice or assistance. Too bad the Lord does not make things plain. It may be it is because we have been following in another way, the wrong way, so long that we can not hear. Such things occur sometimes.

We all recognize the fact that an apostle is a leading officer of the entire church, and when he is present in conference and sitting on the platform or off, in a sense he is presiding not only over the body, but also over the one who may be in the chair. So that if the chairman goes wrong, he has the right to correct him, and that, too, without "butting in." The law gives him that right.

Here the brother has well nigh confessed the whole truth; all that is sought in this investigation. If the law gives them that right, then they are in authority, and why not recognize it? Let the "common consent" rule prevail and the voice of the people be heard. That is all that is asked, that order and harmony may appear. But how any one sitting by in an assembly, unrecognized, can proceed on his own motion to correct things going wrong in the body, with its accepted officers in control, or proceed to do anything in the way of correcting, directing, or encouraging without "butting in" passes our powers of comprehension. One writer says it would be "butting in." Another says no. Which? Such a person assuming to control or direct would be considered a disturber, a crank, and no attention would be paid to him; besides, he would be subject to arrest for disturbing lawful assemblies. Suppose you were present at a district conference, or other meetings, with their chosen officers installed and carrying on business; a disturbance arises by some one "butting in"; Who would be arrested by the officers of the law? Ah, it would be the one "butting in." He had no recognition there; was unknown. It is a common practice to welcome visiting brethren at both branch and district conference meeting—officials and non-officials—by vote to the privileges of the meeting, extending voice and vote to them. Then why not proper notice and formal recognition be given to the missionary in charge, thus recognizing him in his place? Ah, some of us have been traveling in a different way; that seems to be the trouble.

But why agitate these matters at all? Well, it arose largely from the action of district presidents themselves in not being willing to give proper recognition to those placed in charge over them and the work where they occupy; refusing to recognize the missionary in charge when he was present, not even inviting him upon the platform or to preach a sermon, literally ignoring him and impressing the people with the idea that that was a proper procedure and doing the right thing. With such examples before us, the brother's exhortation to leave out "love of preëminence" in this investigation, desirable as it may be, comes with poor grace. A name has to be given it. If "love of preëminence" will not fit, we can think of no other quite so euphonious that will.

Further, the brother says:

It is just possible that in this matter, extreme ground has been taken on both sides.

But how can there be two sides, when all that the traveling high council, who usually are the ones placed in charge, asks, is that their authority and appointment should be recognized under the common consent rule which has obtained in the church, and not be barred, ignored, or left to "butt in," in order to perform their work among the Saints, or be subordinated to others. They take no pride in the "butting in" business. It is time enough to consider that when conditions arise where anarchy and rebellion are rife to an extent when it becomes necessary to declare something like martial law, and by authority proceed independently to regulate or reconstruct things. Yes, there have been cases where the district president has stood in the district conference with his associates, opposed the recognition of the missionary in charge, had influence enough to carry his point, and so went out on and presided and controlled everything, the missionary in charge having no more to say than one baptized but yesterday.

District presidents preside under other presidents. The branch being the primal organization, it has a president, or elder; but he presides also under other presidents, the district president being one. The district is a kind of federation of branches, sustaining a president, but his relation to the branches and district is not just as that of the traveling high council. The traveling high council may set the district, with its president and branches, in order, and the district president may not interfere nor change it. Branch presidents should respect him as their president, and he should respect those whom the law and the selection of the General Conference have appointed over him. Why not?

But here another writer appears on page 1103 of the HERALD; so some of the ground will have to be gone over again. He tells us that on an occasion referred to that he and Bro. ——— were presiding and they invited the missionary in charge upon the stand to form a part of the presidency. The occasion referred to has nothing to do with solving the general principle involved in this discussion; it is but incidental, and will only receive notice further as it may give point and potency to the inquiry in hand.

It is proper to explain that at the time referred to the missionary in charge did not hear the words, "and form a part of the presidency." But it would not have changed conditions if he had. He took a seat on the stand, said nothing, consented to nothing. He was soon informed, however, that there was a resolution on the district records requiring the president of the district to preside over its conference sessions. If this was correct, then the district president had no authority to invite any one to form a part of the presidency. To do so would be to prove renegade, breaking with the district by refusing to do its bidding; playing hide-and-seek with the district and missionary in charge in a make-believe that he was serving the district and properly recognizing the missionary in charge, when he was doing neither, but simply posing as the chief representative authority present at the assembly and in full control—assuming to direct the one in charge and everything else.

If it be correct that it was intended that the missionary in charge should form a part of the presidency (which in this case the president of the district had no right to extend), then the missionary in charge being the ranking officer present should have been so recognized in his place and others regard his counsel and advice. But no, we are told: "the intention was to ask him (not dictate to him) to take the chair in the afternoon and complete the business. . . . This, to my way of thinking, was giving to the brother all the recognition necessary so far as presiding is concerned." It appears that other people had a different way of thinking. Every accepted rule of procedure had been violated, including the resolution on the district records, and the district president was tactfully assuming to control the missionary in charge and subordinate his appointment to the control of the district president. To permit the missionary in charge to occupy the chair in the afternoon and conduct the unfinished business, in the opinion of the district president, was all the recognition the missionary in charge needed. This was the part intended when it was proposed that he form a part of the presidency, thus subordinating the general authority at work in the church to that of the local, which is the very thing objected to and protested against in this investigation.

It must be considered a great privilege extended to permit the missionary in charge to occupy the chair and conduct business awhile under the supervision of the district president. The gist of the matter was brought out when a motion was made to properly recognize the missionary in charge, in this same meeting, by the common consent rule. The district president did his utmost to defeat its passage, and in his letter characterizes the missionary in charge as "butting in," "interfering." Who was interfering? Why, the man whom the General Conference had put in charge of the mission field, whom the law makes a traveling counselor to regulate affairs in all the world. He expresses an opinion that things were not in order. The district had been misled into the adoption of a resolution that was out of order, so believed by the district president; but because he could not find anything but "precedent for the baptizing of babies," he just let it stand. But where did he find a precedent for the baptizing of babies? Not in the Holy Scriptures did he find it; one precedent there would be quite sufficient to establish the custom; but this is found only among sectarian theories and practices. The common consent rule had been evaded, the voice of the assembly closed, the missionary in charge assigned to duty by the district president—that is, to finish the business in the afternoon. All authority had been concentrated in the hands of the district president, and for the missionary in charge to attempt to advise him was “butting in,” “interfering” with his prerogatives; when the law expressly states of the traveling high council “when present in either district or branch” they “should” “be regarded and considered as the leading representative authorities of the church, and be respected as such, their counsel and advice be sought and respected when given.” (Doctrine and Covenants 120: 4.)

The district authorities were in control here. When the missionary in charge had something to say, it was “interfering”; and when the resolution was passed recognizing the missionary in charge, the locals refused to go on and finish the routine business. They must control the missionary in charge and the conference, or refuse to do anything. Yet we are exhorted to leave out “love of preëminence.” What will you call it?

This question at issue was settled (supposedly) some years ago, being sanctioned by the General Conference, a few dissenting. Presumably it was by the advice of one or more of these that the district referred to was misled into the adoption of the resolution suspending the operation of the “common consent” rule and barring the proper recognition of the traveling high council when present at the business sessions of the Saints; leaving them in the hands of local officials to receive such courtesies as they in their plenitude saw fit to extend, and which in this particular case was to finish the business in the afternoon under the instruction of the district president and vice-president. Did you ever know the president of a bank to go into the bank and await the action of the cashier to assign him to duty under his supervision, or the principal of a business call to be given orders and directions by the clerks of the institution? It is not very common to see it, is it?

The brother writes:

Now, I am sure that I do not know why he did it. No one asked him to, and I really think, after due deliberation, that it would have been better for all concerned, if he had not “buted in.”

Of course; all authority was assumed by the district president; the rights of the people to exercise the elective franchise had been eliminated under the ban of a previous resolution, acknowledged to have been out of order, and the district president was presuming, even without a vote, to support it—to direct the missionary in charge, the very thing he had no right to do. After due deliberation the president of the mission concluded they had gone far enough in wrong tendencies and thought proper to set them right. But no, it was “butting in,” “interfering” with other people’s business. Preceding missionaries in charge seem to have winked at these conditions rather than to take responsibility of putting them right; easier perhaps to court favor and let it pass. But some one has to take responsibility, sooner or later, and act, whether it please or displease, or else continue in wrong tendencies.

From the assumptions being made, district presidents are being put up all over the country to take their own initiative in everything, subject to nobody’s advice and direction; ready to preside over, instruct, and direct the missionary in charge, assign him to duty, and if he assumes to occupy in his place as the president and one in charge, he is “interfering.” Is that not a tale to tell? What about the General Conference appointees, the traveling presiding high council, charged with the duty of regulating affairs of the church in all the world, to say nothing of others? Apostles first? No; they are a kind of back number, dependent upon the courtesy of local officials, to be extended or not, as they see fit, in order to perform their official duty in the church abroad. Did you ever see the general in the army taking orders from the captain? And if the general did not choose to take them, but saw fit to give them, he was “interfering,” out of place?

Presidents of districts preside over a federation of branches by their consent. Branches being the primal organizations have a president, or elder; they preside under other presidents, the district president being one. The traveling, presiding high council are the lawfully constituted presidents in all the world, with authority to regulate and control. They usually are the ones appointed in charge of mission fields for order’s sake. They are not subject to local officials of any name. Branch presidents preside, and so do district presidents, but both under other presidents. The traveling high council is the presiding authority abroad in all the world and subject to the direction of no one but the First Presidency. They are to regulate affairs, and when set in order, no district or branch president or any other president can interfere with it. But:

Is presiding over district conferences a part of the district president’s duty? If so, then he should not be disturbed in his work.

Ah! he must be the whole thing or nothing. No one must interfere with him, in his opinion, right or wrong; he must have his way and proceed. If any correction is attempted it is “interfering,” butting in.” But he is a subordinate president, and when the ranking authority is present and ready to act, he is not in control. But as laborers together in the Lord’s work the ranking officer should be recognized, his appointment honored, advice sought and honored, not antagonized. Should he be arrogant and fail to do the right thing, appeal or report. In this view every one’s rights are respected.

It will be time enough to consider the question of United States and county board, etc., when there is a traveling presiding council appointed by the Government to regulate all the affairs of the States and counties, as the church has to regulate its affairs in all the world. No relevancy here at all—no similarity between the arrangement of state and church here at all.

But the brother says, after quoting a long passage from the Book of Covenants; "Notice: 'And not as local presiding officers.'" Just so. What missionary in charge has been trying to be a branch president or district president? If there is one, report him to the chairman of the traveling high council for discipline.

Again, he says:

So I conclude that in case one is elected to preside over a district, that it is his duty to do so.

Of course; but in case he presides over the district conference, it should be by the voice of the district conference. Should the missionary in charge and traveling high councilor be present, he presides over the district and the district president. Then what? Why, the thing to do is for the conference to stand for its elective right, support the missionary in charge first. Why? Because he is first. It was agreed at the General Conference when he was put in charge that he should be first; besides, the law makes him first. "First apostles," is the way it reads. What next? The president of the district may be associated with him. If he refuses to act, some other elder or high priest may be selected instead, by the voice of the conference. In either case, some one may be selected to occupy the chair, if thought wisest, and conduct the business of the meeting; but all under the guidance and direction of the missionary in charge. That is, he, being ranking president, is the final appeal in case of a difference. Just a little difference between this view and the one making the district president the director of the president of the mission.

But he goes on:

I find no law which says the president of the district may preside if certain others are not present.

Answer: Did you find any law which says he should preside if certain others were there? No.

But again:

Is presiding over conferences a part of the district president's duty? If so, then he should not be disturbed in his work, according to Doctrine and Covenants 122: 8; will not be if the law is adhered to.

Same old inconsistency involved here. In their opinion no one can interfere with district presidents; they can hold conferences, and dictate to the traveling high council and missionary in charge. If this is interfered with, it is a transgression of law. There is not a thing said in the text alluded to about holding any kind of conferences. It simply provides that when districts are organized they may be left in their sphere of operation and those in charge go about other work. But now, when the traveling high council returns and are present on important or unimportant occasions, then what? Has there been a tumble in things and the missionary in charge is now to be directed and dictated to by the president of the district, or the law is not carried out? We say no.

To conclude then:

1. We object to the elimination of the elective franchise or common consent rule from the assemblies of the Saints—that which is so well fortified by law and precedent, the common consent rule.

2. We object to the formulation and indorsement of a rule or set of rules or a creed that serves to place in the hands of local officials power to bar and hamper the work of the traveling high council in their work abroad, or exempt them from extending to members of the high council proper civilities, respect, and recognition.

3. We object to the theory that seeks to subordinate the members of the traveling high council to local authorities and which excuses them from properly respecting the general church authority by absolving them for disrespecting her chief representatives.

4. We insist that "in charge" means "in charge"; and when the appointments are made and officers sustained, they are entitled to respect, and are not subordinate to any authority abroad.

5. We insist that local presidents, of whatever name, who seek to antagonize and refuse from any incentive to respect this authority are out of order and liable to be dealt with, whoever they may be.

6. We insist that a proper recognition and support of the general authority of the church abroad is no reflection upon or humiliation of any one.

7. That recognizing this authority is not sustaining a few leading officials to lord it over the people for advantage, but to effect unity, in order that faith, theory, and practice may be established throughout the world; honoring the office by respecting the men whom God has chosen and the Saints have sustained at the General Conference to represent the general church abroad and guide the work in all the world.

Bennie's First and Last Whipping.

Mrs. Seaton expected company to take tea with her. She looked very sweet in a dainty white dress with fragrant roses at her belt.

Little Bennie, her only child, looked even sweeter than his beautiful mother, although the resemblance between them was striking.

The child was not quite four years old. He had recently put on pants, but his golden curls had not been cut off. He, too, was dressed in white. He had on tiny white knee-pants and a fine waist elaborately trimmed with embroidery. There was a rosebud fastened to his waist.

Mrs. Seaton almost idolized Bennie. She was exceedingly proud of the bright and lovely child. As she put the last touch to his attire—pinning on the rose—she kissed him proudly, saying: "Now, Bennie, darling, keep clean; the company will soon be here."

Bennie, being an obedient child, meant to do what his mother said. He went out into the shady, breezy yard, happy and content, intending to play there on the soft, clean, green turf while his mother was putting the finishing touches to the dining-room table. Then she intended to read to him out of his new book with the colored pictures, while they were waiting for the company. His face was as sweet as a cherub's as he sat down on his rustic chair. He was anticipating the reading of the story with great delight. He loved stories, and the one he wanted to hear the most was that about the picture of a blue-eyed, rosy-cheeked baby with his dimpled arms around the neck of a magnificent dog.

Cæsar, the cook's little boy, came dancing around the house. Seeing Bennie, he called out excitedly:

"Lookee dare, Massa Bennie, heah comes a po stray wid er no-count white trash a chasin' him."

The command to "keep clean," the promised story, the expected company—all were forgotten and no wonder; for Bennie had a most loving heart.

To open the gate for the poor little persecuted dog that was trying to get away from his cruel pursuer, was the first thought that came to Bennie's mind. Of course he did it. The grateful creature rubbed against the small legs appealingly. He was shaking with fear and, presently, Bennie had him in his arms, essaying to comfort. "Poor 'ittle doggie! Poor 'ittle doggie!" he said in his wondrously sweet way. "The bad boy can't get you now." He put his rosy, dimpled cheek close to the dog's head. "I'll take 'ou to Kizzie, 'ou poor 'ittle doggie," he promised with gentlest compassion.

Little Cæsar danced along beside Bennie and the dog. Kizzie was Cæsar's mother.

"Mammy ain't goin' ter be oberjoyed ter see dat dorg," he chuckled, turning somersaults to relieve his spirits.

The two children went around the house towards Kizzie's domains, walking slowly because—although the stray was not a large dog—the burden was a heavy one for baby arms.

"Land o' Goshen!" exclaimed Kizzie, aghast at sight of Bennie's clothes after the stray dog had been put down gently before her, "you'd orter not lifted dat dirty, no-count dorg. What yo s'pose yo mammy'll say when she sees yo?"

Bennie, as yet, had not thought of clothes—his loving heart still dwelling on the needs of the dog.

"Please, Kizzie, get something real good for doggie," he pleaded.

And she did. Bennie's dear little face was smiling again as he watched the starved dog eat hungrily.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Seaton, being ready to read the story to Bennie, was searching for him in vain for some few minutes. When she discovered him in the kitchen doorway, her face darkened.

"You bad boy!" she exclaimed angrily, "didn't I tell you to keep clean? Just see that beautiful new suit."

For the first time Bennie noticed his clothing. He tried to explain, but his mother would not listen. She ordered Kizzie to remove the soiled clothing and wash the child's hands, after which she took him upstairs. She finished undressing him, and for the first time whipped him. Of course he cried as if his heart were broken. What child would not? Then she bathed the tear-wet face and put him to bed. He lay there sobbing while she went downstairs to welcome her guests who had just arrived.

There was an awful (I really mean awful) pain at Bennie's heart as he laid there, hearing the company voices and thinking of himself not "in it." There was a place all ready for him at the table—such a dear place with dishes and silver and fresh rosebuds—just like the "big folks" places.

"But I won't be there," he thought, "I'm a bad boy for gettin' my clothes soiled. I ought to've 'membered, but—" with a sob, "the poor 'ittle doggie was so scared an' hungry I fordot, an' mamma wouldn't listen when I tried to tell her 'bout it, an' she whipped me"—with a long, shivering sigh, "she don't love me any more, an'—an'—I don't love her."

How the world had changed! He had been put to bed supperless—without a kiss—without a prayer. And he had been whipped—whipped and he was a "bad boy"—his mamma had said so.

He cried himself to sleep.

Mrs. Seaton, coming up softly after her guests had gone, felt a great tugging at her heart at thought of Bennie. She felt remorseful as she looked at the dear little face with the tear stains on it.

"I was too harsh," she told herself sorrowfully, but she did not disturb him.

When she awoke the next morning, she wondered that Bennie slept so long. Usually he awoke early and came to her bed for a frolic. She arose softly and went over to his crib. His eyes were wide open, but there was no love-light in them.

"Good morning, darling," was her loving greeting. There was no answer.

"Are you sick, dear?" she asked anxiously, worried by the look and the stillness.

"I isn't your dear—I'se a 'bad boy'—a 'bad boy'—'ou said so."

Mrs. Seaton's heart ached.

"Don't you love mamma, Bennie?" she questioned sadly. Bennie sat up in bed—looking at his mother with a strange gleam in his wide, blue eyes.

"I'se a 'bad boy'—don't 'ou 'member? So 'ou isn't my mamma any more. I don't love 'ou now. I'se goin' to be Kizzie's boy an' call her 'mammy' just like Cæsar does. I love Kizzie a whole lot an'—an'—Kizzie loves me a whole lot."

"Oh, Bennie, dearest, no one loves you as your own loving mamma does."

"Kizzie div de 'tittle doggie such a good supper. Kizzie's dood. 'Ou whipped me 'cause I didn't 'member," he said, reproachfully, "an—an,—said I was a 'bad boy.' 'Ou put me to bed without any supper. I didn't mean to be a 'bad boy.' I was goin' to mind, but I ffordot when the poor 'tittle dog come rubbin' 'gainst my 'tockins."

"I was too hasty, Bennie, darling. I am sorry. Will you forgive mamma?"

The boy looked surprised. "I forgib 'ou?" he stammered, questioningly.

"Yes," she said, "I was the bad one to get so angry for a little thing. Please forgive me and love me again."

The child looked wistfully into the tearful, pleading eyes and—reading the great love there—suddenly responded. Throwing his small arms around his mother's neck, he said, with a quiver of the lips and a long sigh of satisfaction:

"I love 'ou, mamma."

"I shall never again allow clothes to outweigh my child," was the mother's thought.—Ernest Gilmore in American Motherhood.

"One enormous field of what we call naughtiness in our little ones, lies in offenses against things. First and foremost, clothes. Wetting, soiling, and tearing clothes,—what a sea of tears has been shed, what wails and sobs, what heavy and useless punishments inflicted, because of injured clothing! Yet almost every accident to clothing comes from the interaction of two facts: first, the perfectly natural clumsiness and carelessness of childhood; and second, our interminable folly in dressing a child in unchildish garments, and placing him in unchildish conditions. There is no naughtiness involved except in the parent, who shows a stupidity abnormal to her age.

"Children are frequently reproached for wearing out their shoes. What does the intelligent parent expect? Is the child to sit in a chair, lie down, or ride the bicycle continually? If the child is seen to cut his shoes with knives, or grind them on a grindstone, that may be discouraged as malicious mischief; but the inevitable stubbing and scuffing of the eager, restless, ungoverned little feet should have been foreseen and allowed for. We do strive to buy the heaviest possible mass of iron-shod leather for our boys, and then we scold them for being noisy.

"But the great majority of acts for which children are punished are not at all evil. Carelessness, for instance, is incidental to the young brain—essential to it. The power always to correlate and remember is an adult power, and not always strong in the adult. We need, of course, to encourage a growing carefulness, but not to expect it or to punish for its natural lack.

"To surround the growing creature with artificial difficulties, to fail to understand or allow for the natural difficulties of his age, and then to punish with arbitrary retribution the behavior which is sure to appear, this is not the kind of discipline which makes wise, strong, self-governing citizens."

"Simplicity of living, in all its phases, bespeaks the highest taste and culture, just as the truly great are most approachable in manner. More than this, it shows an appreciation of the values in life. The best painter is one who properly judges shade, of color and contrast; so the best artist in the great profession of living is the one who can weigh the various interests that enter into the problem and can put aside the trivial and evanescent for the weighty and the enduring.

"The one important thing in life is character; your own character, the character of your husband, your children, your friends. All other things should be judged by their bearing upon this important matter. Things may be delightful in themselves; but if they tend to add to your worries; if they are a barrier between you and your loved ones; if they interfere with the development of the higher faculties of your children, they become undesirable, inadvisable, and should be classed with the superfluities of life.

"The mother who prepares for her baby dainty, hand-made garments, wonderfully trimmed with lace and embroidery, in the majority of instances is depriving that child of personal love and care that rightfully belong to him. What does he care for such finery? He wants his mother's companionship, and for himself perfect freedom for all forms of activity. To so attire him that he must be constantly cautioned, 'Now, don't get your dress dirty,' is to interfere with one of his inalienable rights. The wise mother will make her baby's clothes simple, to serve as a background for his infantile charms, instead of taking the attention away from him to center it upon elaborate ornamentation. . . .

"To be our best selves calls for omitting the superfluities, and devoting ourselves to those things which shall feed our souls. The world needs men and women more than it needs things; then let us determine to keep always in mind what are the truly important matters, and refuse to be troubled by the superfluities of life."

Questions on February Reading.

What is naughtiness? Give illustrations of offenses against things. Do you think it is ever proper to punish for injury to clothing? Under what circumstances? What two facts are responsible for most accidents to clothing? How is this folly made manifest? What instruction may be given to prevent a child from injuring shoes and other clothing? When should this be given? What is to be gained? What acts are children punished for that are not evil? What effect may such punishment have upon the child's power to distinguish between right and wrong? How is carelessness an essential to the young brain? What are some of the artificial difficulties with which a child may be surrounded? What bespeaks the highest taste and culture? What are the greatest values in life? What are the weighty and enduring things? What was the lesson learned by the mother in the story? What is the most important in life? How are other things to be judged? What are some of the superfluities of life? How may we be our best selves? What does the world need? By our refusing to be troubled by the superfluities of life how may we and our children help to supply this need?

Probably the happiest period in life most frequently is in middle age, when the eager passions of youth are cooled, and the infirmities of age not yet begun; as we see that the shadows, which are at morning and evening so large, almost entirely disappear at midday.—T. Arnold.

Have Miracles Ceased?

While doing missionary work in Crescent City, Iowa, during this fall, I called upon and visited some of the members of the church, among them Sr. Rasmussen. In talking over the blessings of God to his people, and the wonderful manifestations of his power in cases of healing, she related one which, being rather lengthy, I requested her to write for me, in order that others might know how the Lord is still confirming his words by signs following the believer.

As an evidence of our appreciation of God's love and watchcare over his children, as manifested on various occasions, and in divers manners, I believe such extraordinary cases should be placed on record, that others might read of them, and also that they might be a matter of history for future generations. For these reasons, and to the honor and glory of God, I herewith submit Sr. Rasmussen's account of that to which she was an eye-witness.

"CRESCENT CITY, Iowa, December 31, 1907.

"Dear Brother Sorensen: You will remember I promised to write the following testimony for you.

"At Hazel Dell, Iowa, December 18, 1889, a daughter was born to Bro. and Sr. Frank Hough. Two or three days after Sr. Hough was taken very sick; her husband sent for the doctor, who relieved her for a short time, but her trouble returned in the evening, and she requested her husband and me to unite in prayer for her (I was taking care of her). We prayed earnestly for her; she was relieved at once and seemed to go right to sleep. I took the baby and lay down, her husband staying by her. He soon came and said, 'Bertha wanted we should pray for her again.' We did so with the same result, the Spirit being present in much power; but again her trouble returned, and she asked for prayer the third time. I looked at her. Her eyes were sunk back in her head, and she was very pale. She almost frightened me. I said, 'Bertha, what is the matter with you?' She said, 'Kneel down and pray for me, quick, for I am dying.' As we did so the Spirit was poured out upon us with great power, and I was led to pray that God would send a messenger and wake the elders up and send them on the way; for I realized that if God did not intervene in some miraculous way, our sister would be dead before the elders could get there.

"As we arose from prayer, she turned to her husband and said, 'Farewell, Frank, I am going.' As I stood there looking at them, her two little children crying at the top of their voices, her heartbroken husband weeping, I prayed to God with all the faith and strength I had, that he would not take her from them, but spare her life to them.

At once the Spirit rested on me with such power that it drew me up to her and laid my right hand on her head, and took one of her hands in my left hand, and gave a prophecy to her, telling her that God had sent his angels there to care for her; that he had heard our prayers, and her life should be spared; that she should live to raise her little ones, as she had earnestly prayed for. At once the Spirit came over her and she broke out singing, 'The spirit of God like a fire is burning.' She asked me to sing. We both sang and wept. She sang the first verse and chorus, and then sang, 'O God, give strength to all thy Saints.' She is one of the sweet singers in Israel, and being so filled with the Spirit it was almost heavenly. She said she was very happy, for she was just filled with the Spirit, and now she knew she would live. Then at once all power was taken from her body, but we knew the angels were with us and all would be well with her. Then her speech was taken from her, and in this condition she remained till the elders came; we had sent for them.

"Elder J. J. Christensen stated that some power woke him up,—it was at the same time we were praying. He arose and dressed at once. He was given to understand that some one was very sick and that he would be sent for to administer. This was between two and three o'clock on a cold winter night. He stood by the window looking out, not knowing which way to go. Presently Elder Hans Petersen drove up and called to him to get ready quick, for Bertha was very sick and they were sent for, to administer.

"Elder Petersen had been out late, and had just got home when they were sent for. He stated that even the horses were moved by some unseen power, they went so fast.

"When they came in, Elder Petersen went to her, and felt of her pulse, and looked at her. He shook his head and said, 'She is dying; it is no use to administer.' I told him that we had the testimony that she should live and get well. (We had not told them what had transpired).

"The elders requested we should all unite in prayer before they administered, which we did.

"Her stepmother had the gift of tongues and interpretation, which was in substance the same as the prophecy given through me. They then administered, Elder Petersen anointing and Elder Christensen confirming. The Spirit of prophecy rested on Elder Christensen for some time, giving instruction and encouragement to all, and telling us again that our sister should live. He spoke also to Bro. Hough, telling him, if faithful, he should soon preach the gospel with power, and be the means of bringing many to the church. He is now preaching, and has baptized quite a number. As soon as they took their hands off her head, her speech returned, and she spoke and praised God for all he had done for her.

"Before she was taken sick she was warned in a dream. She saw two men standing at the foot of her bed, whom she now recognized as the elders, who spoke to her and said, 'O ye of little faith, put your trust in the Lord.'

"Our sister was healed, and is to-day enjoying health and strength.

"The names of those who were present are: Elder J. J. Christensen, Elder Hans Petersen, Frank Hough, Bertha Hough, Henry Scott (her father), Carrie Scott (her stepmother), and Christina Rasmussen.

"Your sister in the gospel,

"CHRISTINA RASMUSSEN."

The parties named above are all known to the writer; some of whom, as well as Sr. Rasmussen, have related to me the case of Sr. Hough.

Have miracles ceased, or will they ever cease? If so, it will be because of unbelief, and that because of unbelief the Lord has ceased to bless the people. S. K. SORENSEN.

TORONTO, Ontario, January 1, 1908.

President Joseph Smith: After quite a protracted silence, I take up my pen to wish yourself, your esteemed partner in life, your son Frederick M., daughter (Sr. B. M. Anderson), the "younger sons," and all my beloved fellow readers and correspondents—not even omitting the HERALD "comps," the editorial staff, and even the "printers' devil,"—a very Happy New-year!

Apropos of the family gathering alluded to in the current HERALD, at the home of Sr. B. M. Anderson, I think the time has now fully arrived when the birthday of our departed Prophet, Seer, and Revelator, and your father, should be celebrated by the entire church as an annual festival. Nor do I think I am very far at sea in the conviction that hundreds, nay, possibly thousands, who are not Latter Day Saints, in England, in Canada, and in the land of the "Stars and Stripes," would only too gladly and willingly join with the Lord's people in celebrating the birthday of one whom it is the heartfelt desire of many, many thousands to honor,—as thus rendering "honor to whom honor is due."

I had advanced some little distance in the preparation of one of my old time astronomical articles upon the "Conservation of solar energy," thinking that perhaps many of your numerous readers would have concluded that, like one of old, I had resolved to "speak no more upon this matter," when I received a kind letter from a lady at Palmyra, New York, informing me that a volume had been drawn up, and printed, under the auspices of the Ladies' Society of the Western Presbyterian Church, Palmyra, New York, in which the history of that very pretty and picturesque place (town or village) is portrayed in strong and simple, but entrancing language (as I can truly testify from a personal perusal of its pages) from the period of its first inception when, "In the winter of 1788-9, John Smith and Colonel John Jenkins, purchased tract 12, range 2, now Palmyra, and began the survey of it into farm lots in March." Thus wrote Orsamus Turner in his "History of the pioneer settlement of the Phelps and Gorham purchase."

The book in question, although but a small one of eighty pages, contains sixty illustrations, and fairly bristles with quaint, pithy, and interesting historical items of the place; even when "in the year 1816 Joseph Smith, Sr., moved here from Vermont, with his wife and nine children (page 29)," "Then he moved his family to a tract south of the village, which within the present year (1907) the Mormons have bought as the well-kept farm of William Avery Chapman."

The entire volume is one into which I can, in my mind's eye, behold our beloved and respected Church Historian, Heman C. Smith, taking brief but absorbing glances from time to time, and making, peradventure, some most useful and valuable notes and comments upon.

That privilege, then, can readily be his, or that of any of our people who care to review—even in fancy mirage—the sweet and tranquil scenes of Palmyra, or of Cumorah's lonely hill; for Miss Sarah Riggs, of Palmyra, New York, who wrote to me, says that she can supply the work on demand at one dollar per copy; so that any one who wants the little volume has only to send to that lady for it.

Of course our own brethren and sisters will readily understand that the volume in question, being of Presbyterian origin, does not attempt or pretend to advocate or champion the claims of Joseph Smith as an apostle of God, or as a prophet. It merely gives what it purports to do, viz.: the early history of the settlement of Palmyra, and its growth, expansion, and development up to the present moment of time. It brings in many names made familiar to us as a people in the revered and sacred pages of the Book of the Lord's Doctrine and Covenants.

To those among us who were privileged to travel up and down the streets of Palmyra, to enter some of its stores and business places, and particularly to listen to our dear President R. C. Evans' lucid and inspiring address upon the actual site of Cumorah's hill, and in the grounds of the very farm where the angel of God appeared to Joseph Smith, the very sight of this little volume will conjure up such solemnly sweet, yet sweetly solemn scenes that the sponge of time will never efface them from our memories, particularly as the volume literally teems with surprisingly accurate copperplate engravings of these very scenes and these very places.

The work in Toronto is onward, and the undiminished crowds at the Majestic Theater Sunday after Sunday evidence the undiminished, nay, increasingly cumulative, interest of Toronto's masses in the angel Moroni's message. I question whether even that great inquisitor, Torquemada himself, with all the lurid fires of the Spanish Inquisition at his back, could have extinguished the flame which has by God's grace been lighted in Toronto, and which by God's grace will never be put out. Many of the best, the quietest, the most thoughtful and intellectual of Toronto's many citizens are, Sunday by Sunday, conspicuous by their presence; and not merely so, but by their evident attention, and by their eagerness to gain a seat,—for they are in the opera building at least full one half or three quarters of an hour before the service begins.

The Saints in Toronto, old as well as young, are, in my humble opinion, worthy of the greatest praise for the spontaneous and effectual manner in which they have from the very first sustained these able and interesting lectures at the opera.

I had much more to say; but a feeling of respect for my esteemed brethren and sisters in the true gospel faith forbids my trespassing upon the proportion of your valuable space which more rightly belong to them. I remain, dear brother,

Yours in the commonwealth of Israel,
F. R. TUBE.

PIPE CREEK, Texas, January 12, 1908.

Editors Herald: Seeing nothing from this part of the moral vineyard for a long time, I will pen a few lines. I am glad that I learned to love this latter-day work. I have never regretted the step taken a little over five years ago, and it is my earnest desire to continue faithful until the end. I can remember when, in search for something to read, I would get angry when I could find nothing but HERALDS: but now the HERALD, Autumn Leaves, and Ensign, are my choicest literature. When we are isolated, we can receive so much encouragement from them. I often wish I could be in a large branch of the church, where the Saints meet together often. Though, in this far west Texas district, I still feel it is good to be a saint in latter days, and we can never get so far away but that we can do much good, if we will only make the effort. Pray for me, dear Saints, that I may be found among God's faithful children, when life's battles are fought.

In the faith,
EXIE HODGES.

NECEDAH, Wisconsin, January 12, 1908.

Dear Herald: Your weekly visits are welcomed up here among the pines. We are still trying to keep the work moving in the Searles Prairie Branch. Hold services regularly, though the weather is sometimes cold and stormy, and it takes several miles of travel to meet. Sunday-school, Religio, young peoples' prayer-service, and preaching every Sunday, make a busy day; but we like to be busy. Bro. A. J. Fisher is superintendent of the Sunday-school; Bro. John Moore, president of Religio. Bro. Archie Hook, our branch president, has his home near, but works at Nekoosa, and to meet with us every two weeks he has to walk fourteen miles at night, after a hard day's work on Saturday. Then he returns on Monday.

Bro. W. P. Robinson and Bro. Lester Wildermuth just closed a two weeks' series of meetings here. Bro. Robinson has been here a week; the two go on north to-morrow. We think these meetings have done good to all here. There is a schoolhouse four miles north where, on three Sundays, we have held services, with good interest. Never have any of our elders preached there before.

We are all glad to see Graceland College taking up the manual training work, etc., and glad "boys" from our State are helping. Hope to send more soon. RILLIE MOORE.

News From Branches

LONDON, ONTARIO.

Our Sunday-school entertainment was a grand success. Quite a lengthy program was carried out, the special feature of which was the exhibition drill by the boys' brigade, under the direction of Sergeant Gray. Elder Evans presided, and presents were in abundance upon the arch erected for that purpose.

Elder Walter Bennett and wife, of Detroit, were the guests of Bro. and Sr. Philippin, Christmas week. Elder Bennett occupied the pulpit Sunday morning.

Elder B. St. John, missionary, preached for us the last Sunday evening of the old year.

At the business-session of the Sunday-school the following officers were elected for the ensuing term: Superintendent, O. W. Cambridge; assistant superintendent, W. A. Hardy; secretary, Sr. L. Gray; assistant secretary, Bro. F. Gray; treasurer, Sr. M. Harrison; organist, Sr. M. Cambridge; assistant organist, Bro. G. Gray, librarian, Bro. J. Winegarden; janitor, Bro. R. Farthing. The school is in a prosperous condition, having fourteen classes and a staff of good teachers.

The district superintendent, Sr. D. MacGregor, and R. C. Evans, presided over the Sunday-school session and election of officers on Sunday the 22d. W. HARDEY.

FIRST KANSAS CITY BRANCH.

The weather here this fall and winter is delightful, just like what is called Indian Summer; but, notwithstanding such good weather, many of our members are afflicted with the grippe.

We feel quite proud of our effort in our Sunday-school. Our average attendance is less than fifty, yet our Christmas Offering was over one hundred and fifty dollars last year. That shows that live officers make a live school. Our Religio is conducted after the order of the school of the prophets, and excellent progress is being made. With the New-year we have some change in officers: H. Sandy, president; W. S. Barrett, vice-president; A. G. Larkey, secretary; Grace Palmer, treasurer; L. M. McDonald, librarian; W. S. Barrett chorister, and Miriam Warnky, organist.

During the last month we had with us the stake presidency. Brn. Garret and Bond spoke in the morning. Their efforts were good and well appreciated. Subject: "We are co-workers with God; our effort is to save." They were also with us in the afternoon prayer-meeting. At night Bro. Harrington preached. Subject: "Divine living the success of divine healing." His effort was excellent, and listened to with marked interest.

Bro. Robert Winn, who has been absent for some time, is home, and meets with us. Bro. Frank Smith, of St. Louis, worshiped with us.

The work at Centropolis, largely composed of members of this branch, is progressing nicely under the direction of Elder Henry Ashbaugh. Preaching every Sunday night, and Sunday-school at two o'clock in the afternoon, Bro. Selbe superintendent. Bro. and Sr. Drice have kindly offered their house for meeting. Prayer-meetings are held on Thursday evenings at different houses. Last Tuesday Sr.

Warnky, superintendent of home class Religio work, organized a large class at the home of Bro. Selbe, where they will meet every Monday night: Bro. Henry L. Ashbaugh, teacher; Sr. May Givens, secretary; Sr. Ella Crum, treasurer. Our new church, bought from the Methodist Church, on Ninth Street and Lydia Avenue, is expected to be opened the first Sunday in February. Many of our members feel like young race-horses on the race-track, anxious to assist in the progress and success of the work to be established there, and may God crown the efforts with success. About two years ago God, by his Spirit, manifested to us that there were thousands of men and women in this great city who were honestly desiring to know the truth. May God help us as fishers and hunters to find them and catch them in the gospel net. But remember that a fisher is not successful in catching fish by throwing rocks and clubs into the water, neither is a hunter successful in finding the game by going into the woods and sounding the Indian warwhoop: but God says, "Be ye wise, devout, and harmless as doves." That means a good deal. Never try to tear a man's house down. If you do he will get mad and fight you; but build him a better house than what he has, and then invite him to come in and occupy it, and he will love you and be your friend.

F. C. WARNKY.

The Bishopric.

APPOINTMENT OF BISHOP'S AGENT.

Central Michigan District.—The Saints and friends of the Central Michigan District of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, please take notice that, on the resignation of Bro. E. S. White as Bishop's agent, in and for said district, and the recommendation of the appointment of Elder George W. Burt as agent, the Bishopric hereby give notice of the appointment of Elder George W. Burt, of Beaverton, Michigan, as Bishop's agent, in and for the Central Michigan District. We ask for Bro. Burt the help, coöperation, and prayers and faith of the Saints and friends of the Central Michigan District. Let it be said of every one of the district that he has performed his part, and thus be found to be laborers together with the Lord in his service in this godly work.

The Bishopric also take pleasure in commending the work of Bro. E. S. White, who retires from looking after the work of agent in the district on account of the fact that he can not devote time and energies to this work at the present time. Bro. White has been faithful, and a true worker in the cause in the past few years. We trust the Lord will bless him in his local work in the years that may be ahead.

Ever hopeful in the advancement of the cause of truth, I am, in behalf of the Bishopric,

Very respectfully,

E. L. KELLEY, Presiding Bishop.

INDEPENDENCE, Missouri, January 10, 1908.

Church Secretary.

DELEGATE CREDENTIALS TO GENERAL CONFERENCE.

Delegate credential blanks, provided for by action of General Conference, have been sent to presidents or secretaries of the various districts, also to officers of branches not in districts. Said officers are requested to forward credentials of delegates appointed to represent their districts or branches at the General Conference of 1908, to the Church Secretary, as soon as possible, that a complete roll of delegates may be prepared, as provided for by resolution of General Conference, to facilitate prompt organization and work of that body. Credentials of delegates appointed at fall or winter conferences should be forwarded without delay, and those yet to be appointed, immediately after appointment. It is desired that all credentials be in hand as early in the month of March as possible.

One certificate for each delegation, with number of members in district or branch, and names of its delegates, signed by the president and secretary of district or branch appointing, with name of district or branch and place and date of conference or business-meeting, is sufficient. Separate, individual credentials to delegates are not necessary. Please insert "total membership" in all cases; also report if delegates are authorized to cast a majority and a minority vote.

Any failing to receive blanks will be supplied on application to the undersigned.

The rules governing "representation" and the "restrictions of delegate voting" provide as follows:

"Each district shall be entitled to one delegate for every twenty-five members of said district, and one vote in conference for each delegate to which they may be entitled. (Scattered members in districts, including those enrolled on records of disorganized branches, who are not recorded as members of other districts, including those enrolled on records of disorganized branches, who are not recorded as members of other districts, may be included in the enumeration of membership.)

"The delegates present at conference from any one district shall be entitled to cast the full vote of the district of which they are delegates, unless otherwise instructed by their district conference:

"Provided, that in case of a disagreement of views among the members of said delegation (the full delegation not being present), they shall be entitled to cast only their individual votes as said delegates.

"No one delegate shall be entitled to cast, as representative in the same conference, more than twenty votes.

"Each regularly organized branch of the church not included in an organized district, shall be entitled to one delegate, who shall have the same privileges as delegates of districts. But when the membership of such branch exceeds twenty-five it shall be entitled to one delegate for each twenty-five members."

For further information concerning representation, choice, and instruction of delegates, etc., see Book of Rules, chapter 17.

R. S. SALYARDS, Church Secretary.

LAMONI, Iowa, January 13, 1908.

ENROLLMENTS IN QUORUMS.

The law provides that all elders, priests, teachers, and deacons shall be enrolled in quorums. At the General Conference of 1907 action was taken which provided for reorganization of quorums composed of the officers named. The action contemplates organization of such quorums according to territorial location of those who shall comprise their membership: in missions, stakes, districts, or large branches, where enough members shall be found to justify it. All not already enrolled and who wish to be enrolled should make application therefor. Application blanks will be forwarded on request to the undersigned accompanied by stamp to cover postage.

R. S. SALYARDS, Church Secretary.

LAMONI, Iowa, January 13, 1908.

CLERGY CREDENTIALS.

Trans-Continental Association.—This certificate is good only upon roads parties thereto named below and their connections, as follows:

Section 1. Locally between points west of a north and south line consisting of the eastern boundaries of Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, and New Mexico.

Section 2. From points west of the line designated in section 1 to points east thereof to and including Chicago, St. Louis, Memphis, and New Orleans, and vice versa.

Exception: Certificates will not be honored as follows:

(a) Between points in Colorado and territory east thereof.
(b) Between points in Wyoming east of and including Cheyenne and points east and south thereof.

Section 3. Certificates will not be honored locally for tickets between points east of the north and south line designated in section 1.

(The list of about fifty roads is omitted.)

Southwestern Association.—Annual Clergy Certificates will be issued only to those coming within the requirements of the Clergy Rules as printed on the application blank, and who desire to travel locally in the states of Texas and Louisiana, or to make interstate trips between those two States.

(List of roads omitted.)

Central Association.—"The roads identified with the Central Passenger Association have, by reason of the reduction of passenger fares by legislative action of the states in which they operate to a basis of two cents per mile, decided to discontinue all special rate concessions, including those heretofore gladly made to the ministry; hence, its clergy bureau, maintained for several years for issuing and supervising joint clergy certificates, was abolished on the 1st inst.; therefore, the lowest existing obtainable rate to clergymen is that established by law, namely, two cents per mile. As the policy inaugurated in this relation is one of necessity, under present legal regulations, it is not probable that past practice will be reinstated."

Other Associations.—The Southeastern Association still maintains its clergy bureau, as heretofore. Individual lines of the Trunkline Association issue as formerly to ministers located on their lines. The status of the Western Association was given in notice in HERALD of January 1, 1908.

It is not popular men, large capital, heavy deposits, National or State laws, that offer absolute security to depositors, but directors and officers progressive and conservative, possessed of the virtue of true manhood, shorn of all political ambition, with no taste for frenzied finance or mining speculation, with no inclination to furnish funds for others in that line. BISHOP FALLOWS AND HEALTH SCIENCE.

Under the head of Christian Psychology, practically another name for Christian Science, Bishop Fallows has entered the list of disputants, evidently with intention to preserve the unity of his church by conceding practically the discussion of the merit of the methods employed by faith healers of every stamp, whether in or out of the church. The following lay sermon presents the view which one practical mind takes of the situation, as provided by the attitude of Bishop Fallows. It is somewhat strange that this lay preacher would lay such stress upon the Christian idea involved in the position assumed by Bishop Fallows, and accept the apparent concessions made by the Bishop, and then stop short of stating the absolute teachings of the Savior in regard to this philosophy of faith cure as given in the New Testament Scriptures. To the ordinary mind, it does not appear to be any more of a stretch of credulity to accept the teaching and command of the Savior in which provision is made for the healing of the sick through the laying on of hands, as well as the exercise of faith and prayer, manifested through the act of laying on of hands, than it does to indorse and endeavor to reduce to practice the simple exercise of faith through prayer and suggestion. Bishop Fallows certainly shows weakness in assuming that healing may follow association with a body of believers called a church, or by suggestions for the exercise of faith upon the part of the pastor of said body, and absolutely failing to point the inquiring believer to the provisions made by the Savior for the healing of the sick through the actual physical anointing of the sick person with oil, a remedy known to possess medical qualities and medicinal properties, the same anointing to be accompanied by the official action and sanction of such anointing through the official characters and officers of the church. The Savior himself administered in the rite of laying on of hands, and commanded his disciples so to do, as found in the sixteenth chapter of Mark, and as observed by the apostles called during the lifetime of the Savior, and others called as out of due season, as testified to by Peter and John, in their action, and by Paul and James. While agreeing with the main contentions of this lay preacher's review of Bishop Fallows' position, we can hardly repress our risible faculties when reading the Bishop's advice to those who seek him for his influences to aid them in their recovery of health. If a Latter Day Saint elder should assume the same attitude that the Bishop has, as shown in his advice to these applicants, it would be seized upon by those contending against us that it was a practical abandonment of the main claim; that is, healing through the laying on of hands.

Bishop Fallows, peradventure, would hold that the doctrine of laying on of hands for the healing of the sick, as believed in and taught by the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, is fanaticism, pure and simple, the result of credulity and superstition. What shall we say, what can be said of the position assumed by this eminent reverend gentleman who starts an innovation in his church of healing by suggestion, by the exercise of faith, who, when persons seek him for relief from ill health, advises them in reference to their diet, and to seek the advice of a competent physician, and to have "faith in God that they shall be healed"? Take courage, brethren! The world moves and the doctrines of the church are gaining ground. In the language uttered by a loving and loved brother in a late sermon delivered by him, "If you are in the line of duty—if you are where God wants you to be and where he has called you or put you—stay there; no matter what takes place, your experiences are a part of God's discipline by which you are to be perfected and be prepared to meet in a perfect world, a perfected people in the presence of a perfect God."

A LITTLE LAY SERMON.

Bishop Samuel Fallows of Chicago is attracting a great deal of attention at this time by his so-called "Christian Psychology," which he employs as a healing agency. For want of a more definite term, it is called a healing agency, but strictly speaking it is not. The Bishop's new application of something that is not new at all is being attended with a degree of sensationalism for which the good Bishop himself should not be blamed. He does not pretend to have discovered anything, but merely to apply certain suggestive features of Christian Science and adapt them to certain other features of Christianity, emphasizing the virtues of faith and the power of suggestion, but causing them to supplement, if not be subordinated to, the usual medical curative agencies.

There can hardly be any charge of quackery, superstition, egotism or irreverence in the Bishop's methods, so far as the press reports of his announcement and subsequent "treatments" explain them. For instance, a report of a "treatment" preceding the services Sunday night says that he applied the principles of "Christian Psychology" to fifty men and women, whose ills ranged from dyspepsia to suicidal tendency. The account is so illuminating that it is here-with reproduced:

"A young man suffering from the grip drove to the church in a cab and asked the Bishop to heal him.

"Your ailment is functional," said the minister, 'and possibly I can not cure it, but I can help you. Have faith and use a hot water bag.'

"To a woman suffering from dyspepsia he said: 'Be careful of your diet. Do not over-eat. Consult a physician and believe in the power of God to heal you.'

"No," said Bishop Fallows afterward, 'I did not heal anybody, but the effect was almost like healing. I sent them away filled with a new, strong spirit and with their faces radiant. The faith I instilled into them had changed them as by magic. My new work is accomplishing wonders. All my time is taken up in healing under the new system.'

If there were not something so inherently pathetic in any manifestation of the pitiful human search after health, there would be something almost ludicrous in this account. There is a saving precaution in the advice to have faith and use a hot water bag for the grip, or to be careful of one's diet in cases of dyspepsia, to consult a physician and have faith in the power of God to heal. Yet the element of the ludicrous is eliminated when the philosophy underlying this "Christian Psychology" is studied. Might not the mists which enshroud so much of this "mental healing," "divine science," etc., be dissipated, and might not what the skeptical call "the cant" of most of it be reduced to terms of practical but reverent optimism? It is manifestly in accord with the great plan of things, whether we call it the will of a personal God or what not, that men should live rather than die; that good rather than evil should triumph; that people should be healthy instead of sick; that the tendency of the world is upward and onward and not downward. What stronger faith could there be than a clear, ringing belief in this goodward trend of things, this Godward progress, if it sounds better? The main thing is to be intelligently optimistic; names and phrases mean little.

In the light of science, therefore, pessimism is unscientific, and in the light of religion it is un-Christian. Less than an active distrust or despair may be pessimism. Pessimism may be a mere negative lack of faith or failure to recognize the fact of the upward plan. May not "Christian Psychology" and "Christian Science" and all the other radiations of this central concept be, in the last analysis, this optimism that "gets right" with the great scheme and trend of the world? Such harmony is of immense psychological efficacy; it is eminently scientific; it is Christian and it is divine.—Kansas City Journal, January 12, 1908.

The term "agnostic" is only the Greek equivalent of the Latin and English "Ignoramus"—a name one would think scientists would be slow to apply themselves. Agnosticism is the philosophical, ethical, and religious dry-rot of the modern world.—F. E. Abbott.

As winter strips the leaves from around us, so that we may see the distant regions they formerly concealed, so old age takes away our enjoyments only to enlarge the prospect of the coming eternity.—Richter.

Admiration must be kept up by the novelty that at first produced it; and how much soever is given, there must always be the impression that more remains.—Johnson.

Elders' Note-Book

THE ANVIL CHORUS.
(After the "Knockers.")

First:

I on my favorite street corner stand,
Jack-knife and pine-stick in my hand,
Regulating other people's lives.
Observe, I pray, the elders' wives:
Wasting their allowance (per mo.) of eighteen dollars,
Buying potatoes, flour, sugar, eggs, butter, coal, and after that new hats and collars.

Second:

Now Lord, I know that you have said,
As in section one twenty-six I've often read,
That the financial law as stated by the Bishopric should be acceded to; that's plain, maybe,
But their interpretation don't suit me;
So, Lord, excusing your oversight,
We'll set the matter right.

Third:

Good friend, this fire burns cheerful,—
Poke it up!
Outside the storm is fearful;
Draw 'round the table; we will sup.
I think a lot of home all right,—
Never have been away a single night.
Wife and the children set great store by me,
As any one can see.
You were speaking of the elders? Yes?
And their work?
Their most arduous task, I guess,
Is coming home to shirk.
There's Elder A ———, home again, after six months or less;
And he's
One of the Twelve Apostles, if you please.

Fourth:

Mr. Editor: You mutilated my last communication;
Do you think you're the boss of the nation?
'Twas Bro. Jones I was writing about,—
I gave him a pretty good dig, and you marked it out.

All:

Now in conclusion, notice this,
(And we're not the kind to make complaint)
Everything that hadn't ought to be is,
And everything that ought to be ain't.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

EFFECTIVE PREACHING.

There are advantages, not lightly to be set aside, in the written over the spoken address, though there are few who can write with the congregation always in mind, and a fewer number who can read their address in a way to command the attention of the audience. But the most successful reader of a sermon must respect the statement credited to Dr. Wayland, who, on a sick bed, where he had had the opportunity for a careful review of his life, said: "If I should be permitted to preach again, I will certainly do what is in my power to learn to preach directly to men, looking into their faces, and not looking at the paper on the desk." That is the sine qua non of effective preaching, so far as manner is concerned, that the speaker shall look in the faces of his hearers. The man who can not do that is always seriously handicapped, no matter how numerous or great his excellencies in other respects. —Northwestern Christian Advocate, June 1, 1907.

LORD KELVIN ON THE ORIGIN OF LIFE.

Mathematics and dynamics fail us when we contemplate the earth, fitted for life but lifeless, and try to imagine the commencement of life upon it. This certainly did not take place by any action of chemistry, or electricity, or crystalline grouping of molecules under the influence of force, or by any possible kind of fortuitous concourse of atoms. We must pause, face to face, with the mystery and miracle of the creation of living creatures.—Outlook, January, 1908.

THE FOUNDING OF LAMONI AND THE WORK OF THE ORDER OF ENOCH.—NO. 2.

(Reprinted from Autumn Leaves.)

BISHOP I. L. ROGERS.

One of the directors of the Order of Enoch, elected treasurer in 1875 and vice-president in 1877.

Of his visit to Lamoni, mentioned in our last number, President Joseph Smith wrote in the HERALD as follows:

"A party from the conference lately held at Council Bluffs, visited Lamoni, Decatur County, Iowa, on their return east. The party consisted of Brn. I. L. Rogers, David Dancer, E. Banta, H. A. Stebbins, W. W. Blair, D. H. Smith, Duncan Campbell, Samuel Bailey, N. W. Smith, Stephen Stone, A. Hayer, Ole Elifson, and Joseph Smith, all of whom went to view the country, see the people, and attend the Decatur District conference. It was a very enjoyable trip, and resulted in satisfying the excursionists that the land was excellent, the crops this year good, the people agreeable, the conference was a pleasant one, and the country a delightful one to live in. Everybody, myself included, had a strong attack of the farming and pastoral fever. Now don't rush into that region all at once, but go cautiously, carefully, and with all things prepared before you; as the law directs. . . .

"There are a hundred and fifty-three members in the Lamoni Branch this fall, with a constant prospect of increase, as an interest is awakened all over the district. At their conference it was resolved to build a chapel for worship, and a building committee was appointed, with instructions to proceed at once to the completion of the work. From the character of the committee we are safe in assuring those interested that a strong effort will be put forth to make it a success.

"We are also authorized to say that no one, be he Saint or otherwise, who will not consent to the righteousness of God and the rules of right dealing between man and man, is wanted there—nor will such be welcome there, either to those in or out of the church. But men—honest men—true men and women will find warm hearts and good neighbors. There is neither justice of the peace nor constable in the township where the Saints are settled; neither has there been a lawsuit there during the five years of their settling there; so says rumor."—The SAINTS' HERALD, vol. 22, pp. 625, 626.

Editorial mention of a later visit to Lamoni is made in the HERALD of October 15, 1880, as follows:

"On a recent visit to Lamoni, Decatur County, Iowa, we found a very decided improvement in the state of the country. A town of over two hundred inhabitants; with stores and business houses; blacksmith, wagon, and harness shops; with an active grain and stock business, give an appearance of thrift and enterprise quite gratifying to those interested. We found a most excellent feeling prevailing in regard to the settlement of the locality, and active preparations being made for a further increase. Crops this year have been fair, though hurt some by dry weather; the absence of frost up to October 2 greatly aided in overcoming this, however, and corn matured well. There has been considerable sickness the past summer, chiefly bilious and typhoid fevers; but the approach of cooler weather seemed to have a beneficial effect on the people. The air on some days was clear and bracing, seeming to impart snap and vigor to the system.

"The Saints, as a whole, were and are anxious to know when the press is to be removed into their midst; but we could not assure them as to the time and event. We believe that a better community would be hard to find; we quite fell in love with the people and the country. We spoke to the Saints at their meeting-house (old quarters), and also spoke at Davis City, in the union church, owned by Mr. John Clark, a pleasant man, past middle age, and so liberal in view as to have erected a house in which all may meet and worship, without regard to denominational name. Bro. Z. H. Gurley fills regular appointments in this church each two weeks, and the interest is good.

"Bro. O. B. Thomas held a debate with one Elder Ryan, down in the edge of Missouri, while we were at Lamoni, and acquitted himself well for the cause, so at least says report. Two good rains fell during our stay, and we saw the country wet and dry."

Among the early comers to the new town were William Officer and J. T. Dixon, Brn. L. A. Fowler and B. L. Merritt; and Miss Josephine Officer has been here longer than any other person that has moved into the town since it was laid out.

The first business houses were erected by Thomas

Teale and Bro. Samuel H. Gurley; the first, where Bro. D. C. White & Sons have their store, is still owned by Mr. Teale; the latter one is occupied by the Lamoni Hardware Company.

There was an effort made by some who were opposed to the Saints to have the new town named Sedgwick, as that had been the name of the post-office here up to that time; but those who had this matter in charge said it should be Lamoni for ever.

Lamoni was a busy place that fall and winter (1879). Ten thousand bushels of corn from the cribs of the "Order" were sold and shipped. Carpenters were busy in all directions. A lumber-yard was started by David Dancer, Albert P. Dancer, and A. S. Cochran. In the fall of 1880 Henry A. Stebbins became a resident of Lamoni and succeeded Albert P. Dancer in the lumber business.

At this time Bro. I. L. Rogers was bishop of the church and David Dancer and Henry A. Stebbins were his counselors.

The church for some time had been contemplating a removal of the principal place of business from Plano, Illinois, and had appointed a locating committee. Lamoni was selected, so in 1881 bricks were burned for the HERALD Office building, under the supervision of Bro. S. V. Bailey, and rock and sand were hauled for foundation and plastering, Dancer & Company weighing all the rock and sand, paying all the workmen for making the brick, all the carpenters and masons for building the HERALD Office, and furnishing all the lumber; and in the fall the HERALD Office, and the business connected therewith, was removed to the new building. With it came Brn. Joseph Smith, John Scott, William H. Deam, Lawrence Conover, and William Crick, all of whom were employed therein. These with their families made quite an addition to the population of the town and membership of the branch.

The HERALD for October 15, 1881, the last number issued from Plano, Illinois, contained the following editorial comment:

"President Joseph Smith left Plano on October 7, with his family and household effects, for Lamoni. . . .

"This issue closes the stay of the HERALD in Plano, Kendall County, Illinois. It came here in 1863, and was kindly received by the leading citizens of the place. It began its career here with a list of three hundred subscribers, many of them free; and some of them taking several copies. It had a press and fixtures costing about $275; and occupied one room about eighteen by twenty feet square. It had Bro. Isaac Sheen for its editorial force, with Bro. William D. Morton, Sr., as its foreman, compositor, and pressman; with a Washington Medallion No. 4, handpress, as its machinery. It will reach Lamoni, Decatur County, Iowa, and begin a new departure (on the old way) with an eight-horse-power engine, two cylinder power presses, and a job press, with type and other fixtures to match, and office two stories high, thirty by sixty-five feet in size (engine room attached), an editor, bookkeeper, superintendent, and five compositors."

On November 1 the first number of the HERALD issued from Lamoni, Iowa, contained the following in its editorial columns:

"We sit down amid the debris of building, and the unorganized chaos of an office removed, to greet our readers from our new home in Iowa. We bid our contributors and correspondents a hearty welcome to our new quarters.

"We have not yet succeeded in getting things in order, but shall do the best we can to keep the HERALD in motion. The weather at our arrival in Lamoni was horrible; the elements having organized for a ten days' rain, which was fairly fulfilled. We succeeded, however, in transferring machinery and office furniture with but little delay and loss by breakage, and shall soon be turning the press wheels again, merrily as ever."

The first person born in Lamoni after the town was established was Bertie Lamoni White, son of Volentine and Mary A. White, now of St. Joseph, Missouri. The first couple married were Earl D. Bailey and Katie Harris, now of Tulsa, Indian Territory. The history of Lamoni as published in the history of Decatur County gives the first marriage as Cornelius D. Hammer and Lillian W. Brown, now of Creston, Iowa, which is not correct, as the first occurred January 10, 1880, the second December 15, 1880, the writer officiating in both cases. The first person that died was Nehemiah D. Smith, father of Bro. Henry C. Smith, which occurred February 7, 1880. The first preaching-services were held by Bro. John H. Lake. They were held in an upper room over Bro. E. C. Dobson's furniture store, which stood where Sr. Greer's sanitarium now stands.

In the summer of 1881 Sr. Rosalia H. Dancer erected a building suitable for holding meetings in and rented it to the branch for a very small sum per month. This building was afterwards converted into a dwelling-house. In the fall of 1882 the last semi-annual conference was held here in a shed erected in the HERALD Office yard. This was the first general meeting of the church held in Lamoni. About this time the excavation for the brick church was made, and the rock work for the basement was put up, and it was finished later.

From the foregoing it will readily be seen that the work of the "Order of Enoch" laid the foundation not only for the organization of the Lamoni Branch but for the establishment of the town, which is known throughout the world and will in all probability be known for many years to come by reason of the Herald Publishing House, the Saints' Home, Liberty Home, and Graceland College being located here, and by reason of its being one of the stakes of Zion.

LEAVES FROM LIFE.

LETTERS OF ELDER GLAUD RODGER.

It is always pleasant to reflect upon the lives, teachings, and labors of those who have gone on before. Hence these letters, written by Elder Glaud Rodger, are submitted to the readers of the HERALD—partly for their historical value, but mainly because of their spiritual tone.

NORTH IPSWICK, Queensland,
August 15, 1877.

MR. WILLIAM MCLAUGHLIN.

Dear Brother: I have for some time been impressed to write to you, but have put it off from day to day, and even now my hand trembles. I have been quite unwell—mostly severe attacks of headache and fever. I caught a severe cough which seems to hang on, and altogether, I feel sometimes good for nothing and wish I was nearer home. I came here to see my brother, who is overseer of the waterworks under the government and can not leave. I expect it is our last meeting in this life.

I do not like this climate; some fever and ague. The country is totally dried up; no rain for seven months. I sailed from Sydney to Brisbane, four hundred and fifty miles, and came here on railway, twenty-four miles. The people here are quite a church-going people—more so than any place I have been in Australia. Last Sunday I attended the Congregational Church. The minister read the fourteenth chapter of Revelation, but made no comments. There is quite an excitement at the English church—a Rev. Longley is giving mission meetings every night and is having great success. I went twice and got aroused a little; though sick I could hardly sit still. O, the total darkness of priests and people, and to hear many say how grand the sermon made me feel I ought to cry aloud. Had I my health to stay and preach I believe there are many sincere people who are seeking the truth. I have talked to a few and given tracts. If my health is no better my stay will be short here.

My brother is not very well and his son and daughter want to move to Sydney. What they call the Darling Downs, sixty or seventy miles from here, they say is fine healthy country; but so far as I have seen, no place looks as healthy and cheering as the Manning. But in sickness everything looks gloomy, and only in the gospel is there hope. The language of the poet seems the inmost sentiment of my heart:

"What is this life at best
But a troubled ocean;
I often wish myself at rest,
Far from its dire commotion—
But let its troubled bosom heave,
Its surges beat around me—
To truth, eternal truth, I'll cling,
Its floods can never drown me."

I hope, dear brother, you and all my friends in Manning are earnestly seeking more of the true light, and growing in grace and the knowledge of the latter-day work. I was pleased to hear of your efforts made in meeting, to often speak of the good things of the kingdom of God. God and angels are those who love to serve and keep the law. Be patient in the hours of darkness and temptation, and the good Lord will bear you up. Ever keep in view the great end, and the reward of faithful service ('twill be) in a reign of peace with Christ, the great law-giver, where the wicked can not trouble, and all sickness, sorrow, and death shall be no more.

I suppose you saw in the Evening News and Town and Country Journal the letter headed "The mysterious disappearance of an American judge, etc." I send you a copy of my reply. Like my last letter to the Manning River Times, it was not published—at least not before I left Sydney. How ready to publish a falsehood but suppress the truth. Well may the Lord say his anger is kindled against this generation.

I held a private meeting of the Saints in Sydney, but have not had time to call on your sisters. I hope all at home, mother, brothers, and sisters, likewise your honored father, are all looking into this truth. Give them my kind regards; also remember me to Martin and family, and James. Also to Mr. Wallace and family and all the church with you. Our parting picnic, the kind acts of friends, with all my travels on the Manning, hold a warm place in my memory. Neither shall those friends be forgotten in the day of accounts when the King shall say, "Inasmuch as you did it unto one of the least of these my brethren ye did it unto me." Matthew, twenty-fifth chapter. Yes, all will know me better then, both friends and foes. (Here this letter ends, without conclusion or signature. The rest has been lost.)

The compiler has had the privilege of visiting Ipswich and can confirm what Bro. Rodger says. The people are still great church-goers. The place is sometimes called "the holy city." A number of sects are represented, but the prevailing religion is Congregationalism. It consists of a union made up of the Central and outlying congregations. The pastor of the Central church draws a salary of four hundred pounds (two thousand dollars) per annum. When I was there the people were fighting the liquor traffic, had succeeded in preventing an increase in the number of drinking places, and hoped to secure local prohibition within two years. The commercial interests of the town are largely monopolized by a firm that belongs to the Congregational Church. The population is about ten thousand and the place is on the average a very conservative, selfish one. Religious towns usually are. I do not, therefore, wonder at Bro. Rodger's feelings. I have often wondered why he did not preach there. This letter gives the reason. I tried to find some members of his brother's family but failed. Had I possessed the information I do now, my search would have been successful.

SYDNEY, December 30, 1878.

Dear Brother: When I wrote to you last I fully expected to be at the Manning by New-year Day, but receiving a telegram from Bro. Buckman to come to Sydney, as he wished to see me, I came here a few days ago. Arrangements are made for me to return with him to Nambucca, so we expect to start in a day or two. Am indeed very anxious about home, and only for the good of the church in that place do I sacrifice my feelings one month longer. I intend to stay there only one month at the farthest. Then make my way to the Manning and Myall and to Newcastle and Sydney. May the Lord guide my steps and grant me a spirit of wisdom to finish my long mission with honor to the cause, is my earnest prayer.

I mailed your HERALDS two days ago; one more parcel will end this volume. Then I suppose yours will come alone after Bro. Ballard's family leaves you. I hope to see you and arrange all matters. I hope, Brother William, you will stand firm even if you should stand alone on the Manning for the present. God's purposes can not fail, his work will roll on, and if we expect salvation with the people of God we must look to man (only as) the servants of the Most High (who) may by authority hold the words of salvation. This he may have obtained by the ordinance (of) the gospel. One can hold it in no other way, neither get it except through the angel message of the latter days; and blessed are those who have received the gospel and have been ordained to the priesthood. If faithful they shall grow in the knowledge of the truth, shall receive more light, shall know the signs of the times, and prepare and be prepared for what is coming. But the unfaithful will get darker, and stumble and fall, and in a future day will weep and mourn and confess their great loss—perhaps when too late. O my dear brother, when I look at the uncertainty of human life, and how little there is to live for in this life, and at a never ending eternity, I wonder at the Saints who have made a solemn covenant with their God at the waters of baptism to live to him, to serve him. Why are they not afraid of his anger? He is not a man that we may deceive and trifle with. His hand will soon be shown in greater power than for ages past to the salvation and deliverance of his people. We are liable to err, and may at times fall into wrong-doing, but if we as Saints confess, repent, and return, our God is a kind and loving Father, and great is his mercy. He will not cast us off unless we continue in the wrong and acknowledge him not in all things. We are in the presence of angels—spirits, good and bad—and all our works and ways are watched by a cloud of witnesses. Read Hebrews 12:1. We are one with the good angels, if faithful, and under the counsel and direction of the church of the Firstborn, the church of Enoch, whose high courts sit in that city once taken away. See Genesis seventh chapter. This is the abode, the home, the palace of Christ. See Hebrews 12:22, 23. This heavenly Jerusalem will return to this earth. Revelation 21:2, Genesis 7:70-74. (The latter reference is to Inspired Translation.) When shall this be? When the Saints keep all the commandments. See Genesis 9:21-24. Who shall be prepared to enter into that rest? Surely none but those who observe the laws and order of the heavens. Confusion is Babylon, but with God there is order and the mystery of godliness spoken of by Paul is to know the order, scheme, plan of man's redemption, as well as the redemption of the earth.

Can any man find it out merely by reading the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament? Folly in the extreme. Revelation from God alone can unfold the curtain and open up to our view the glories of eternity. If we abide in the grand school of perfection we shall become perfect. But take the way of man in preference (and) we shall for ever remain in the dark under the dominion of him whom we serve. Well might the disciple of old say to Jesus: "To whom shall we go; thou hast the words of eternal life." My dear brother, be faithful to your calling, mind not what the world says, and God will bless you and your house as he did Abraham, and you may yet be a savior to your father's house. The Lord works very strangely. Look at Joseph when sold into Egypt.

The servants of God who receive the holy priesthood have a great work to do. Can sectarian clergy tell us the meaning of saviors on Mount Zion when the kingdom is the Lord's? See Obadiah, verse 21. Can they tell us why baptism for the dead was administered in the apostles' days? Can they teach the mystery of the seven seals? Can they tell the the age of the ushering in of the dispensation of the fullness of times? Will they tell us why they administer in the name of the Lord without authority when Paul says "No man taketh this honor (priesthood) unto himself"? He must be ordained by one having authority. Even Joseph, though called of God and acting as a prophet, seer, revelator, and translator, took not on him this priesthood, but waited the call of God and the ordination of the angel sent to administer. This same authority you hold in common with the elders of Israel to teach and not be taught by a blind world. To proclaim the glad tidings of salvation as taught by servants of God in other ages, who held the same priesthood. And I am proud, William, that you have taken a stand for the right, and that you have been such a help (in) keeping together the little flock who listen to your counsel. It has been a cross; and you had a hard trial when you joined the church, but you see the Lord has borne you through thus far, and I feel assured he will bear you up and you will triumph over all your enemies.

Fear not, let your faith be strong, and the good Spirit will be your friend and constant guide. I am a witness of his everlasting care—five years a wanderer in a strange land, and often among strangers, yet ever provided for, and all my family preserved in life. Content to suffer and sacrifice for the future reward, I can say the Lord is my God—all praises to him.

I have extended my letter more than I intended when I began, but I think I am in Bungay, conversing face to face. Many pleasant times we have had, and happy I shall be to see you all again. My kind love (to) your father's house, also (to) all the Saints. My love to Father Walker and James if you see them. I hope they will return to the fold.

May the proof of the gospel ever be found in you all is the prayer of your humble servant for Christ.

A happy New-year to all.

G. RODGER.

P. S.—I see by last week's paper, Mr. G. Day was to preach in Sydney on Sunday.—Subject, "Nothing new under the sun." If his religion is not new then the Bible is false, unless it originated with Cain and came down through each succeeding age in common with all that is opposed to God and the way of life. "He that seeketh to save his life shall lose it, but he that loseth his life for my sake and the gospel shall find it.

G. R.

There seems to have been another letter between these two, but it has evidently been lost.

Father Walker and James, his son, were two of the Saints that were drawn away to the Christian Church through Mr. G. Day, who is mentioned in the postscript. They entertained the mistaken notion that if they "opened their mouths wide" the Lord would fill them without proper study on their part. They acted accordingly and were defeated in arguments by the gentleman referred to. They then concluded he was right and the Saints wrong. Bro. and Sr. George Scrivner, of Taree, New South Wales, were at that time members of the Disciple Church, and were instrumental in bringing about the aforesaid argument. In later years one of the Walkers accused them of being the cause of his separation from the church. They replied that he should not have attempted what he was not able to carry out, and that Mr. Day said he was the most ignorant man he had ever met in Bible argument. This shows the unwisdom of novices trying to combat the positions of shrewd, clever antagonists. Mr. Day was a well qualified representative of his church. Was from America, if I mistake not. Such instances as this we are sorry to record. We are absolutely certain, however, that though truth may now and then lose a battle, it can never lose a war.

"Truth crushed to earth will rise again,
The eternal years of God are hers;
While error wounded, writhes in pain,
And dies amid her worshipers."

LAGUNA, Laguna Canyon,
Los Angeles County, California,
August 25, 1881.

Dear Brother McLaughlin: Australia is far in the distance, but often on the mind, with old friends and brothers and sisters in Christ. I have not forgotten you and all kindness had at the hands of friends in Bungay, nor I never shall; but hope the wheels of time will bring us together again, and if we abide in the light Christ has given us we shall all meet again where parting shall not trouble us and death not interfere. The times are strangely in our favor. (They prove) that our mission is not in vain though the elements are at war both within and without. Still the work of purifying is going on and all that endure to the end shall be saved.

I am glad to hear that you and yours are firm in the faith. I am sorry, however, that you are alone in that part. I was in hopes Bro. Gillen would sound the trump among you. He is an able man in the cause, but, perhaps, circumstances were not favorable. I have hoped conference after conference more help could be sent to Australia, but home calls have been so great and laborers (so) few you have been left, but not forgotten. What this conference may do I know not, but Bro. Gillen will likely return, as he says, in April. But let things move as they may for the present. Be faithful; seek unto God and his spirit will guide you, and give you comfort, and prepare you to stand, for great changes are at hands. Fifty-one long years has the Lord been pleading with this generation to repent and prepare for what is coming. But few heed the warning, though troubles and perplexities accumulate all around them. You may see much in the papers, but can't feel it as we do in the great land. The great fires bringing destruction of life and property (are) surely fulfilling the words of the Book of Mormon, 2 Nephi 11:16. And Isaiah tells plainly the character of those that shall stand the day. Chapter 33, verses 13 to 18. Storms, tempests, great thunder, and extraordinary heat (have) taken away many of late. From the 10th to 16th of July (there were in the city of Cincinnati 262 sunstrokes and 152 died (of) heat, and in proportion in other places. Astronomers (are) astounded by unexpected appearances in the heavens, and hundreds—yes thousands—crying there is no God, while murder, robbery, and suicide (are) around us on all hands. If the harvest is not ripening for the burning of the tares, and the bundles getting bound up stronger than ever, I am mistaken. All opposing the truth (are) trying to prove (there is) no God and no Devil.

See again the state of the Old World and the determination to destroy the rulers of the nations; also the infernal machines, filling the thoughtful with fear of momentary destruction. And look at the bands, long, strong and powerful in Russia, and the restlessness of the nations to find something in the North. All these combined strengthen our faith, and we rejoice while others weep, for we know the hand that rules will do all things well. Read Genesis seventh chapter, sixty-seventh to seventy-fifth verses. Here we see God's people will be preserved and gathered. Read also the ninth chapter, verses 21 and 24. So my beloved brother, we stand only by our faith in Christ, and our good works, ever keeping our eyes on the signs of the times. Come what may we know our Father's hand will save us.

Forget not to call upon him, and in after years you will fill your place in the priesthood of the living God. Fear not—all is well with the church in Zion.

I have been traveling in California this nine months. The climate here is much the same as in Australia, only less rain in summer, but a fine healthy country and abundant in fruit and grain. In this lower part, the land ranges from five to one hundred pounds ($25.00 to $500.00) to the acre. Some good chances to get comfortable homes. In the Eastern States and around the borders of Zion the winters are cold, but healthy climate generally and a pretty country. The church prospers and Saints are all the time gathering in, building, planting, and improving—every man minding his own business. My family (is) in Lamoni. I left them last October and don't know when I may return. Find old age creeping on and am not as able to stand travel and fatigue as in years gone by, but it seems my lot, and sometimes I take it hard, especially when the people are so indifferent to the great and important call. Often (have) much to put up with, little known only to a traveling elder, but thanks to God for all his mercy and loving-kindness, and for moderate health, I still intend to keep along and wish you to say to my old friends that (I) am still at my post and not ashamed of the gospel of the latter days, and hope to so stand till we meet again. Give my kind love to Mrs. Wallace. God will surely reward her for her kindness to me; and remember me also to Mr. Wallace, the boys, and Sarah Ann. May they all see the truth before too late. When shut from the schoolhouse, Mr. Wallace opened his door. He shall not lose his reward. Remember me to the folks up the river. I have forgotten none who kindly entertained me. To father Walker and family, also not forgetting your kind mother, brothers and sisters. Tell Martin and the Mistress I often think of them. I hope all will continue to search into the latter-day work and forget it not, if they should forget me. (When I read this letter in Sr. McLaughlin's presence she remarked, "Never, never shall we forget him.")

I hope you take the HERALD still. Don't neglect them. The life of the prophets, two dollars at the office, is a work you ought to have. It is grand. My circumstances are pinching or I would send it to you as a present. O how much your mother and family would like to read it. ('Tis) confirming to the faith. Send for it if you can. Bro. Gillen can get it for you.

I hope this may find you all well and prospering temporally and spiritually. My prayer is that you may be able to be saved in the kingdom of God. I was sorry to hear of the death of your little one, but such are safe in the kingdom. Be faithful.

We'll meet with all the dear departed ones by and by. I have three gone on before. I hope to go where they are and intend to so live as to meet that blessed privilege. My kind regards to Sister McLaughlin. Tell her not to grieve, but look to the better day. It may not be very far off.

I had a good letter from Bro. Ballard and one from Bro. Scrivner. (Brother to George Scrivner whom I have mentioned.) Am glad they have got homes and are well. I think all of us will long remember the picnic and the good spirit enjoyed at our meetings around Bungay. How much greater the joy when we meet in the better life—with Adam, Enoch, Abraham, Christ, and others in the great millennium. But I must close. May God bless and watch over you both, and your little flock, and give you your kindred yet, is the prayer of your humble brother in Christ,
G. RODGER.

The last sentence of this letter and a similar one in one of the previous letters are evidently prophetic. At the present time nearly all Bro. McLaughlin's relatives are members of the church. Those who are not members are believers. In this country McLaughlins are as much in evidence as Scotts ever were in Indiana.

The following letter was written to a sister in Sydney.

BUNGWALL, Myall Lake,
November 27, 1877.

Dear Mother Carr: As the pastoral care of the little flock in Australia still lays on my shoulders, and as all the Saints are on my mind, I have not forgotten the Saints at North Willoughby. (North Willoughby is a suburb of Sydney.) Far scattered is the field of my labor, and I can not visit all as oft as I would like to do. But in my absence and without meetings I hope you take comfort from the HERALDS and strive to enjoy the good Spirit, which is ever near to the humble and faithful. I have been on another trip to the Manning River and found the little branch there doing well. The branch at this place is also prosperous.

Last Sunday I baptized five more and one respectable old lady gave her name for baptism soon. But one of our dear brethren, Bro. Hogg, a useful priest in this branch, has been called away in death, leaving a wife and four children to mourn his loss. Sr. Hogg is a noble woman and a true Latter Day Saint. May the good Lord remember the widow.

If all's well I leave here to-morrow for the Hunter River District. Seventy miles on horseback. So far the Lord has been kind in opening up the way of the weary wanderer far from home and hearts most dear. Ofttimes I gaze over the rolling deep, but the other side and those I love are hidden from my view. Four years ago the third day of this month we parted, perhaps to meet no more in this life; but thank God we are all still in health and living in hope. This short life is but a day of preparation anyhow, and soon it will pass as a dream of the night. We shall all wake to a deep sense of what we have been here, when the poor body of clay is laid in the silent tomb. We shall all find when called to judgment that its value is small compared with the soul, the undying spirit. Then why should we care so much for this life when eternity stands before us? but we are poor, naked, and blind. Often too proud to be taught, and grasping after the perishing things of earth, our duty to God is forgotten. How fast the world seems hastening to its destruction! Shall we not take warning and live so that the angel of death may pass us by in an evil hour?

I hope this will find you well, likewise your children. You have long felt the responsibility and care of a mother and seen the ups and downs and changes of many years. You have borne the heat and burden of the day; now the night finds you in the service of your Maker, an heiress of the kingdom of God. O how bright the hope, compared with those who reject the gospel and continue in sin! Be firm, be steadfast in the faith; and when the night closes and the lamp of life takes its flight, your place will be found among the spirits of the just to await the glorious day of Christ. Be not fearful, but counsel your children to walk in the narrow way, and to remember their God and keep his law, and when you are no more on earth they will think of your kind and loving words given for their good. The seed sown to-day may sprout to-morrow.

Remember me kindly to Lizzie, Jane, Emily, and all the babes, also Sr. Brown and family. She has a heavy charge and needs to be very humble and faithful; she has much to pass through and God alone can lend the helping hand. My kind love to Bro. and Sr. Farmer, James, and Bro. McDowell. I hope all will stand firm and seek earnestly the happier way, and prepare for what is coming—a day of great trouble to the wicked. I hope your sons in Utah will, in years of experience learn wisdom, know yet the hand that guides the ship, and in time find their way to the Zion of the Lord's appointment.

I am sorry to say no news yet from General Conference. A letter from wife this mail says the Bishop and Bro. Blair called on her and said they had no man they could send to fill my place. Thought I had done a good work. They could not ask me to stay longer, but I hope one has been found ere this and now on the way. My family all well. Saints generally well in this colony, but pressed with hard times. Miners about the coal works can hardly live. Men with large families working only two days a week. May the Lord soon bring deliverance to his own.

With kindest regards for your happiness and peace of mind I remain,

Your brother in Christ,

G. RODGER.

P. S. A line will find me at Waratah, via New-castle, care of D. Marriott. Should be happy to hear from you any time.

In copying these letters I have taken the liberty of an editor. Have corrected the punctuation and grammatical construction, left out a few words such as the, and, etc., and have also inserted a few. All words in parentheses are mine except the word priesthood in one of the quotations. All the rest of the language is his, and the emphasis, too.

Without further comment I submit this record of Bro. G. Rodger's testimony. "By it he being dead yet speaketh."

THE PRIESTHOOD DEFENDED.

(Being a reply to the article entitled, "The folly of the Mormon priesthoods," by James W. Darby, of McArthur, Ohio, which was published in the Christian-Evangelist, St. Louis, Missouri, issue of July 25, 1907.)

In discussing the question of "Priesthoods," Mr. Darby refers "both to the Utah Mormons and the reorganized Mormon Saints," and associates them together as one in their understanding of the subject of priesthood. He says,

If there is any one thing that shows Mormonism to be a false religion, it is the priesthoods. No one can even hastily investigate their system of priesthoods without being forcibly impressed that it is out of harmony, not only with common sense, but with Bible truths.

His chief objection seems to be directed against the idea of there being high priests in the church now. He contends that there never was but one high priest at a time, and he must have Jewish blood in his veins. He further adds: "So now Christ is high priest and there can be no other." And, with ridicule, he remarks, "Can you tell what a Mormon will not claim?"

At the close of his article he suggests that "Disciples who have the question of the Mormon claims to meet so frequently, will do well to awaken on this point." We might suggest to Mr. Darby and his Disciple people, that it would be well if they would just take the further trouble to see whether or not the system of priesthood as established in the Disciple or Campbellite Church, as instituted by A. Campbell, is in harmony "with Bible truths." Here are a few other gleanings from the article in question:

"The Mormon that assumes to be high priest is assuming the position that Christ holds." Quoting from Hebrews 2: 16-18, also 4: 14-16, and 10: 21, he adds: "These and many other scriptures show the folly of the Mormon claim, and the assumption of this office is blasphemous." Again he says:

Melchisedec, who held a priesthood to which the words for ever may be applied, was a type of Christ. Jesus became a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec. . . . Christ has the qualifications for this priesthood, he continues in that office without change, and no one can fill it or succeed him. Here the Mormon usurps the place of our Savior. But what is it that a Mormon elder will not claim?

Again he says concerning the Melchisedec and Aaronic orders:

These two priesthoods never existed together and never can. Perhaps I should take the last statement back, for Joe Smith and Oliver Cowdery were first made Aaronic priests and then later made priests after the order of Melchisedec. Joe did not hesitate to assume the Savior's station. What is it that Mormonism does not assume?

It may be a bold presumption on my part to undertake to make answer to a man who asserts so much. The article in question was sent to me for review and doubtless Mr. Darby was prepared for criticism when he made his onslaught. If Mr. Darby does not know that there is a vast difference between the priesthoods of the "Utah Mormons" and the "Reorganized Church" he could find it so by investigation. The difference, however, could not be greater than the church of Christ in the first century as compared with its would-be imitation as founded by A. Campbell in this age. Here I must point the reader to a freak in Mr. Darby's article which speaks for itself. Was Joseph Smith such a man that his name could not properly be mentioned in print? Mr. Darby, as may be noticed, designates him as "Joe." How would it appear to Mr. Darby and his coreligionists, if, in speaking of the system of religion as founded by Alexander Campbell, I should use a derisive nickname? Would this be proper? What strange things a Campbellite will do!

In the gospel as recorded by John we are told:

And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written.—John 21: 25.

So it is, there are many things which if they had been clearly stated would leave all men without excuse for doubt. We are told in the New Testament of the marriage covenant; but as to how the covenant is to be solemnized, or as to who is to perform the ceremony, nothing is said. That there were bishops in the church of Christ anciently, is doubtless true; but as to the institution of that office, and how men were qualified and chosen for such position, and as to what their various duties were, there is but little said directly, and much to be inferred. So with reference to the priesthood, there is much that must be inferred concerning it or else we are left in darkness so far as we are able to understand from the writings in the New Testament. We are told of the Melchisedec order and the Aaronic order. Melchisedec was an high priest, and the order to which he belonged was called after his name. A great number of men, we have reason to believe, were members of this order. This order was evidently known in the days of the Psalmist, for in prophetic expression he says of Christ, "Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec." Of the work of the high priests and the lesser priests, as spoken of in the scriptures, nothing need be said. Their work under the law given by Moses was specific and detailed, while the various duties of the priesthood under the law of Christ were altogether different. However, Christ said to his servants, "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you." Again Paul teaches concerning the priesthood: "And no man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron." Mr. Darby doubtless rejects the doctrine of revelation, and now the question arises, From whence came the call to the clergy of the Campbellite persuasion? If the so-called "Mormon Saints" are to be condemned for having an alleged excess of priestly offices, can Mr. Darby and his church stand acquitted if we can show where his church lacks the most important ones mentioned in the New Testament?

In Paul's teaching, Ephesians 4:11, we are told of some of the priestly offices. He mentions there: evangelists, pastors, teachers, and also apostles and prophets. By investigation of Mr. Darby's so-called Christian or Campbellite Church, I find men called pastors, and also evangelists. But why do we not find the apostle and the prophet in this institution that claims to represent "primitive Christianity"? The church of Christ had also bishops in it; but, alas! the Campbellites have them not. Moses, "was admonished of God," when he instituted the priesthood which operated in his day and afterward. He and the priesthood which he established were not destined to continue for ever; but they were to serve "unto the example and shadow of heavenly things." He was to make all things according to the "pattern" shown to him. Consequently, the officers or priests chosen by him were typical figures of the chosen ones to come.

When Christ began to set up his church, similar numbers of men were chosen for various duties in the church to those chosen in the Mosaic church. The pattern had been given, and its stipulations must be carried out, or else the plan would be imperfect. The high priesthood being a part of this pattern, the church to-day would be wanting and imperfect without this function. As God admonished Moses, so he also admonished the first elders of this church concerning this matter.

Moses was admonished by the spirit of revelation

—the spirit that leads, teaches, and inspires the minds of the servants of God. The spirit of the everlasting, unchangeable God works with men of faith to-day as ever. The priesthood of God is, likewise, everlasting and unchangeable in its appointments. It was in operation before the law of Moses was given; and after that institution had served its appointed time the true priesthood survived. Paul's reference to the two orders of priesthood, "the order of Melchisedec" and "the order of Aaron" (Hebrews 7:11), is sufficient evidence to convince us that the priesthood was thus divided under these two notable heads. The duties of this priesthood under the law of Moses were manifestly different than when operating under the gospel. Christ became a member of this holy order on earth, though a priest, "for ever," yet he was "called of God an high priest after the order of Melchisedec." It is noteworthy that it is said of him, "So also Christ glorified not himself to be made an high priest." Paul had before stated that, "No man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that is called of God"; and Christ our Lord modestly made himself no exception to this or any other divine law. In the organization of his church, those whom he called to the sacred service in the priesthood were called as they were indicated to him by the Spirit of God. He said to them, "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you."

He was truly the "chief shepherd" of the sheep, but the other officers of the church were each recognized as under shepherds. They were to feed the flock of God and take oversight over them, and this by reason of the priesthood and authority conferred upon them. We read: "Wherefore, holy brethren, PARTAKERS OF THE HEAVENLY CALLING, consider the apostle and high priest of our profession, Christ Jesus."—Hebrews 3:1.

Here we are reminded of the admirable statement of our Lord to his chosen disciples, "Henceforth I call you not servants . . . but I have called you friends." They were to partake of his Spirit, to partake of his heavenly calling, to be workers together with him, and consequently to hold offices in the priesthood with which he was endowed.

Let the reader take notice that Christ is recognized as an apostle as well as an high priest. In this connection consider this statement: "And he ordained twelve, that they should be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach."—Mark 3:14. This would surely argue to us that Christ did confer upon these men the same priesthood he held himself; they were to continue in the same work which he had done. To reason that the organization of the Church of Christ was so unstable that it could be supplanted by something more fitting to the customs of our day is unwarranted folly. "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever," tingles in our ears; and, as Christ is unchangeable and the priesthood unchangeable, so the church of Christ is unchangeable.

Whatever its officers were in the primitive age, they must be found in the church to-day that claims to be the church of Jesus Christ. But Mr. Darby remarks: "Here the Mormon usurps the place of our Savior." The same objection might have been urged against the ancient apostles. Some like Mr. Darby might have accused them of usurpation of the Savior's office; for he was an apostle. Again it is said that Christ is the "bishop of our souls." According to Mr. Darby's logic any man who holds the office of bishop usurps the "Savior's station." There can be no reasonable doubt that there were numerous apostles and many bishops in the church of Christ; and it is far from being an improbable thing that there were those who held the office of high priest. If not, the "pattern of heavenly things" was incomplete, which we can not afford to believe.

As Christ was a priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedec, it follows that this priesthood was at least as ancient as the institution of priests of God upon earth. Evidently it was held by Adam, by Enoch, Noah, Abraham, and many other of the ancient worthies. As it is everlasting, it will surely continue until the end of time. According to the theories of Discipleism, the true order of Christian teaching and practice was lost—buried beneath the rubbish of human tradition, during the Dark Ages. It, therefore, remained for their champion and leader to gather together the fragments of the lost church. We will admit that they have some things in their teaching which are distinctly primitive. However, there are very many important things which they have not got, which they ought to have, before they condemn others and hold themselves up for favorable view. The angel which was to come (see Revelation 14:6) with the everlasting gospel in the last days, would have undertaken a useless mission, had he not also conferred upon men the powers of the priesthood, that the laws and ordinances of the gospel might be divinely administered. Consequently this church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints is not a fragmentary relic of apostolic Christianity, but is the church of Christ in organization and doctrine. Its ministry have never claimed to fill the "Savior's station." They have not been so ignorant as to think of making "Christ's sacrifice over again." They have never claimed to have the qualifications of Christ, or to fill his place, or succeed him in any way; Christ's life and work were unique in themselves. No one could do what he did, as he is the Lord of all, the one altogether lovely, the only Savior of mankind. In exercising the various duties pertaining to the office of high priest, there is no clash with that of any other. Their duties are of a spiritual character. They are as shepherds to the flock, as judges in Israel, as watchmen upon the walls of Zion.

Mr. Darby concludes his article by saying:

The study and understanding of the priesthoods as revealed in the Bible, compared with the claims and practice of the priesthoods of the Brighamites and Josephites, for ever condemns Mormonism as pretension and delusion.

We have no defense to make for the priesthood of the "Brighamites." Their practice condemns them, more than their organization. So far as we know, by reason, by "study and understanding," the "priesthoods as revealed in the Bible," are duplicated in the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. W. E. LARUE.

Of General Interest

GREAT DISCOVERY IS TOLD.

CHICAGO, December 30.—A new saying of Christ, lost to the world for thirteen centuries and found in Egypt, was given to the world for the first time to-day by Professor Henry A. Sanders of the University of Michigan, addressing the members of the Archæological Institute, now in session at the University of Chicago. The fragment is part of an old Bible dating back to before the Moslem conquest of Egypt in the eleventh century, and on its face so authentic as to disarm hostile criticism.

The long-lost fragment belongs in the sixteenth chapter of the gospel of Saint Mark and follows the fourteenth verse. It relates to the story of Christ's appearance, following his death, to eleven of his apostles who were gathered together in a room in Jerusalem. Its harmony with the context is regarded as perfect, coming in to soften an abrupt transition from criticism to fervent exhortation.

With the new verse, which is designated as Mark 16:14 a, the Bible reads thus:

Mark 16:14: "Afterward he appeared unto the eleven as they sat at meat and upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed not them which had seen him after he was risen."

Mark 16:14 a: "And they answered, saying that this age of unrighteousness and unbelief is under the power of Satan, who does not permit the things which are made impure by the (evil) spirits to comprehend the truth of God (and) his power. For this reason, 'Reveal thy righteousness now,' they said to Christ, and Christ said to them: 'The limit of the year of the power of Satan has been fulfilled, but other terrible things are at hand and I was delivered unto death on behalf of those who sinned in order that they may return to the truth and sin no more, to the end that they may inherit the spiritual, indestructible glory of righteousness (which) is in heaven."

Mark 16:15: "And he said unto them, Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature."

In discussing the new verse Professor Sanders said: "This newly discovered paragraph was known to Saint Jerome, and the first few lines of it are cited in Latin translation. It has long been claimed that Mark 16:8-20, was a later addition to the gospel, thought to have been borrowed from some other unknown gospel near the end of the second century. This new manuscript probably presents the original form of that part of the lost gospel which, mutilated, was added to Mark. The reason for the omission is quite apparent, as the new verse contains the statement that the destruction of sin in the world is near at hand. This idea is found in the epistles of Peter and Paul, but the four gospels do not have it and it is avoided by the later church writers."

"The newly found Bible also contains what is known as the liturgical ending of the Lord's prayer, reading: 'For thine is the kingdom, the power and the glory,' " continued Mr. Sanders.

The section of the manuscript containing the saying of Christ was reproduced, in the original Greek, on a stereopticon slide and read to the audience first in Greek and then in English by the professor, who related a part of the history of its discovery.

The text was found, he said, by Charles L. Freer, a Detroit man who makes freight cars and who was traveling in Egypt in search of additions to his art collections. At the time Mr. Freer secured the manuscript the British museum was after it and offers also were in from other persons. Both before and after purchase, the text was examined by Greek scholars of note, who pronounced it undoubtedly authentic. The text as a whole consists of four parts, to be known to the world henceforth as manuscripts I, II, III, and IV.

"Manuscript I contains Deuteronomy and Joshua," said Professor Sanders. "Genesis to Numbers, which it once contained, are missing. It is next to the oldest of the four manuscripts, and presents an exceptionally accurate text of this portion of the Septuagint.

"Manuscript II contains the psalms. It is the oldest manuscript of the four and is badly decayed. Manuscript III contains the four gospels entire. It was probably written in the first or sixth century and contains many interesting variant readings.

"Manuscript IV is only a decayed fragment. It once contained Acts and the Epistles, but not Revelation. It is an older and better manuscript than the four gospels and its readings will be of great value to the text wherever they can be deciphered.

"In conjunction with Mr. Freer's art collection, the manuscripts have been examined by government experts, who pronounce them genuine."—Burlington Hawk-Eye, December 31, 1907.

Meditation.

I have been very ill,
And as I lie here on my bed
Gazing at the sweet, pictured face
On the wall, of her now dead,
I feel a longing in my heart
That I might have known her while on earth,
And have mingled with her loved ones
As they gathered round her hearth.

Then a fear creeps o'er me,
That brings sadness to my heart,
As I think that among that happy throng
I might have felt as one apart.
But again, as I gaze at the picture
Of my husband's mother's face,
I feel that in that loving heart
Surely there would for me have been a place.

Who Was to Blame?

A case of real life experience having come to my knowledge since coming to the West this time, one that I think may be illustrative of many others in other parts of this country, and in all other countries, I have been prompted to write it up for publication in the Mothers' Home Column, so that if the experience of one good mother will cause reflection in the minds of others who have not had the same sad experience, and if these few lines may be suggestive only to those who think innocently of the effects of bad environment, I shall feel amply repaid for my contribution. A Japanese proverb says, "Genius hears one and contemplates ten."

The case in point is that of Lawrence Mangren. He is soon to have his thirteenth birthday. He is a bright boy, not small for his age. He has always been regarded as the head pupil in his class. Upon two different occasions he has passed on and left his class behind him to learn by hard study that which was apparently very easy for Lawrence. The oft-repeated compliments heaped upon his head were listened to by the fond mother, and occasionally referred to by her in his presence. Being that he is endowed with far more than ordinary ability, the thought has more than once suggested itself to her, "I wonder what he will be when he gets to be a man." He is her idol. He was affectionate and sympathetic, agreeable in play, and honest in his dealings among his playmates. Although a leader in his class at school, he was not always the general in the directing of games. Being a willing worker in his studies, there was no fear or apprehension on the part of his mother, as to what might happen.

However, in some way it came to his knowledge that boys who sold candy, peanuts, lemonade, and cigarettes in the theaters received a commission for all sales made, and besides they got a free admission to the play. Free show and spending money combined looked like compound interest to Lawrence. He became anxious. But how to get the job was a question that caused him no little anxiety. For there was no vacancy, and he could not see it was possible that one would ever come. To compress all of his meditations and anxiety within his own breast was more than he could do, so he voluntarily told his mother of the great things that were being done at Lyon's theater, in the way of selling the articles above mentioned. He now made it incumbent upon himself to be ever present at the theater door, and sometimes on the inside—whenever there was a theatrical company in town. Willie Barrett, one of Lawrence's playmates, was already employed as a vender of those catch-penny theater luxuries. One evening one of the boys, or I should say two of them, did not appear at their posts.

In the meantime, Willie Barrett was not forgetful of his friend Lawrence, but communicated the conditions and had him go to the man that employed those boys. Willie Barrett called Mr. Root's attention to the fact that two of the regularly employed boys were not present. He, too, represented Lawrence as a competent substitute for one of the absent ones. After asking a few questions, Lawrence was engaged to ply in the occupation of his choice. It is needless to say that he felt glorified, and that he put all his energies into line to the achievement of a permanent appointment. It was no idle dream, for from that time forward he was in evidence, attending to his business. He would tell his mother of the amount of money he made by his commissions upon his sales. This seemed very satisfactory to his mother for a time. His being out till a late hour every night the theater was occupied, while not meeting with her approval, was permitted to continue, with the hope that all would be well.

However, Lawrence began to lag in his studies. It was noticeable to his teacher, and possibly to his classmates. He became conscious of it, too, or else his too frequent going to the theater, and the influence of his immediate associates had alienated him from the influence of the schoolroom. He now began to play truant. His repeated absences from school caused inquiry. He was brought to the principal, who talked kindly, and with a fatherly sympathy, but all to no avail. The principal asked his mother's permission that Lawrence should stay with him for the day, to which she assented. When leaving the office she went to embrace her beloved Lawrence. With both hands raised, he resented her approach, and utterly refused to permit her to kiss him. His mother, with tearful eyes, turned to the principal and said, "A year ago I buried my only daughter. She was eighteen. It was a great loss, and caused me much grief; but this boy has caused me much more sorrow than the loss of my daughter did."

The principal prevailed upon Lawrence to return to the school. At present there are grave fears that he will return to his truancy. His resentful attitude toward his mother gives but little hope of redeeming him.

It is well to encourage your children to be industrious, and to earn cents, dimes, or dollars; but watch the source from whence the rewards for labor come. Those changes in Lawrence's life came about gradually, almost imperceptibly; yet they came. Now, who was to blame?

Hear one, and contemplate ten.

Editor's Herald: As the year 1907 soon will exist in history only, I feel like writing a few words to the readers of this valuable paper. By the heading it will be seen that I am now in Denmark, having left my native land in order to assist the brethren here, and at present am associated with Bro. H. N. Hansen, whom I find to be a pleasant, congenial companion, and a faithful, wise servant of the Master.

The work is advancing in Norway as well, and as fast perhaps as could be expected under the present condition, and with the force of one whole man (myself). I have not accomplished as much as I should like to see done, or hope and trust may be done, still I am neither disappointed nor discouraged; for I have done as much or more than I expected when I came six years ago, and I am glad to say that in spite of my lack of experience and qualifications and different defects in my make-up, for some of which I am responsible, and which will in a degree at least hinder the work of any man, the Lord has blessed me in many ways, by which my weak and imperfect efforts have proven a blessing to many honest-hearted people, some of whom are now with us in the covenant, while others are near the kingdom. This is what ought to encourage me and make me stronger as a warrior for the Master; for we all love to see our fellow men accept the work and be made able to rejoice with us. So long as we feel and realize the loving and almighty hand of our heavenly Father extending and operating toward and with us, we certainly have reason to feel safe and happy and satisfied that we are not laboring in vain.

This last year we have not been able, apparently, to accomplish as much as the previous years of my experience in Norway. There seems to be a spirit of indifference toward religious matters taking possession of the people, and while many are quite church-going and seemingly anxiously engaged in serving the Lord, they seem to be asleep as to how that service should be performed. They may come to our meetings, listen intently to our story, and express their satisfaction and even delight over that which they have heard, and yet they may never come back to hear more, or sometimes not for months. The influence of the Evil One seems to be too strong for them. We hope and pray for the time to come when the divine influence and power may be manifested more strongly than at the present time, when our efforts may yield a richer harvest as to saving of souls, and bring more honor and glory to him whose servants we are.

Perhaps as a people, and as ministers, we are not in the proper conditions for the reception of any special blessing; we may have too many reservations mentally, financially, socially, or otherwise, which may be the hindering cause of spiritual lack or insufficiency. While some of us are blessed wonderfully, yea, marvelously, we would like to see a more liberal distribution of the blessings in store for God's people. But taking Christ as our pattern we see the need of entire and complete consecration of ourselves and all that we have, are, and will be, to him. His will must be ours in all things, and all ways, and at all times, in order to receive his aid and his blessings in full measure. We must not use our time, talent, and means for our own comfort and benefit first, and if we have a surplus to spare, leave that to him. We must love him first and above all else in order to be his disciples and children, his friends, and as such receive his fatherly love and care. Have we placed ourselves in this condition? Not only when accepting his invitation to come to him, but are we daily placing ourselves in this attitude toward him? If not, let us now, upon the New-year, waken to a full realization of this our duty; for it is the duty of one and all of those who have made a covenant with him. May we do all in our power to advance the work during the New-year, and thus use our means, time, and talent to his glory who sent his Son to redeem us from the sinful world to himself.

Some years ago some kind-hearted Saints in the States, who had love for their own race and wanted to assist us in our work here, sent us money (two different parties sent us one hundred dollars) which we have tried to use as wisely as possible, and which has been of wonderful help to us in renting halls and otherwise; but I am sorry to say that we are now in need, and would be very thankful for any donation sent us for this purpose. You Scandinavian Saints who have been blessed with the knowledge of this great latter-day work, are you not willing to help us in giving this same opportunity to others of your people? Can you be happy and satisfied in possession of means without sending us some to assist us in our efforts? Are you able to help and unwilling, and still pose as a follower of Christ who gave his all to save you? Surely no one wishes to be so inconsistent. None can bend his knee, thanking God for his salvation, and yet be unwilling to help others coming in possession of the same, or at least no Latter Day Saint, surely. We need your support for our little mission paper, which is doing a good work; but we are much in debt to the printer, which we would like to have paid upon the beginning of the New-year. I appeal, therefore, to you, my fellow Saints of Scandinavian blood, and all others who feel for us, to send us according to the willingness of your hearts, and pray God to bless your gift, that it may enable us to bring many precious souls into the kingdom. Send all donations to me, addressed, Porsgrund, Norway, and we will acknowledge it through the paper. Remember us also in your prayers, that we may enjoy the Spirit of the Master, and be found faithful and qualified for whatever God's purposes are with us.

Will say for the benefit of all who are acquainted with us that Sr. Emma, our three boys and myself, are all well and striving to do what we can for the advancement of Christ's kingdom. More than six years have passed since we saw your dear faces, but they are yet fresh in our memory, and we are anxiously waiting to meet again, though years may pass before this be granted us; but may God help us to be faithful wherever we are, we will then meet sometime, never more to part.

Wishing all the readers, our friends included, a blessed New-year, I remain for the advancement of truth,

P. MUCEUS.

LANCASTER, Wisconsin, January 10, 1908.

Editors Herald: While under the impression that we as Saints of God are one body in Christ, we pen these lines. And like the little vine that so gently creeps up the side of the building, entwining itself with whatsoever object it might come in contact, so we can truly say the Spirit of God is gently entwining itself in the hearts and lives of many Saints in the field where we have labored during the present conference year; consequently, under this influence, and the environment (which is the result of influence), we have been forced to believe in the divinity of Christ, and this great latter-day work. And, truly, we have been made to sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus our Lord. For such have been our experiences with the Saints among whom we have labored.

And again, the presentation of the gospel, in comforting and encouraging the Saints, has proven a fruitful source of strength. Thus we feel to rejoice, because our heavenly Father has so wonderfully blessed us in our associations. Oh, that our lives might be in touch with these words:

"Have a blessing ready, as you pass along;
Have a word of kindness, or a cheering song;
Many ever struggle 'neath a frowning sky;
Give them hope and courage ere you pass them by."

And we long for the time, when we shall arise from self and carnality, and be of one heart and mind.

I love to be engaged in the work of the church, and my only desire is to be a source of strength to my brothers and sisters; and I hope to so live that I shall be able to exemplify, and make effective the law of Christ.

Owing to sickness in my family during the greater part of this year, I have had to devote considerable time at home. And while at home, during the time when my wife seemed to be so discouraged, I was somewhat inclined to partake of the same nature, although I tried to be cheerful. But one day, on my way home from town, feeling depressed in mind, and wondering why it was that we should be caused to pass through such an ordeal as this, I thought I could not bear the burden any longer, so I found a secluded place by the wayside, and there I poured out my soul to God, and through blinding tears I begged for a ray of light. And while thus engaged in prayer, an open vision was presented to me, in which I saw the angel of God go to my home and remain for a short time, and leave the so-much-needed blessing; and then that voice, Gird up the loins of thy mind, and be ye strong, for every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it that it might bring forth more fruit. I can now say in the language of Job, when he has tried me, I shall come forth as gold. So, through the love of our heavenly Father, he will purge us, and at times it may seem grievous; but he has said: "My grace is sufficient for you." Oh, that we could always retain that.

And to-day, dear Saints, the gospel seems brighter than at any time in my life; so we are trying to have a perfect trust in the word of God. Ever hoping and praying for the welfare of Zion and her children, I remain,

GEORGE J. BROOKOVER.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, Iowa, January 12, 1908.

Editors Herald: Our branch seems to be taking on new interest, and the work looks prosperous at this, the beginning of the New-year. We have had with us of late, of the missionary force, Elder J. W. Peterson, assisting our worthy missionary, S. K. Sorensen, in conducting a series of meetings on the outskirts of the city on the old semi-annual camp-ground, known formerly as Park's Mills. Attendance was light, but the preaching was good, and those who did come were interested and gave good attention.

Bro. and Sr. Bracken, who live in this neighborhood, secured the use of the chapel, and arranged for the meetings, and cared for the elders. Bro. Bracken is only a year old in the gospel, but is evincing a zeal in trying to get the work before his neighbors that is worthy of imitation. At the close of these meetings, Elder Sorensen left for the eastern part of the district, and Elder Peterson remained over Sunday and preached twice for us in the city chapel; also gave a lecture on Tuesday evening on the habits and customs of the people of the South Sea Islands. The lecture was interesting and instructive, and enjoyed by a good sized congregation.

Bro. J. R. Sutton and Bro. J. S. Roth were our next visitors. They came over from Omaha, where they had been holding forth for a couple of weeks. They report good interest in the meetings at Omaha. Bro. Roth returned to this side of the river Wednesday to attend to the baptism of Sr. Peterson. This sister had gone forward a week or two prior to this time in the Christian Church and given in her name for membership; but she said a very depressing feeling came over her, and something told her she was not joining the right church. How different she seemed to feel the night she was baptized into the church and kingdom of God. She looked happy, and I believe was happy. After the baptism Bro. Roth gave us another good sermon. A collection was taken up for Elder Roth, and he was sent on his way rejoicing. I forgot to mention that a collection was taken at the lecture for Bro. Peterson, and a little surprise is awaiting Bro. Sorensen on his return; and so we are trying to be partial to none.

Elder Arber was our next visitor. He remained over Sunday, and preached two excellent sermons. Bro. Robertson, of the missionary force of the district, is with us now. Has been sick at the home of Sr. Stewart, but is some better, and able to be out again. Last Sunday evening, just as we were coming away from Sr. Stewart's, we ran onto another missionary, Bro. W. B. Smith, smiling just as usual. He was just in time to occupy Sunday evening, which he did. He said he would like to have about seven weeks to spare to talk to us in Council Bluffs some time; so you can see about how he has us sized up.

The subject of who should preside at district conferences seems to have been cast into the sea with a rope around its neck. I would like to ask a few questions, if you will permit them, and perhaps some one will fish the old thing out again.

The questions are:

1. Is not the district conference a temporary body?
2. Is not the conference made up of a new delegation elected by the branches each time of convening?
3. Is it proper for a temporary body to make rules providing for the government of future gatherings?
4. Has the district conference the right to make any law or rule to govern contrary to the constitutional law as found in Doctrine and Covenants?
5. Has it not been a cherished doctrine of the Reorganized Church, that the highest in authority present should preside?
6. Does not the General Conference, when it convenes each year, organize the assembly and elect its chairman and officers?
7. Is not a member of the Quorum of Twelve appointed by the president of the whole church, appointed as a president over his field of labor, and should he not be respected as such when present at any of the gatherings in the field under his jurisdiction?

Perhaps these questions are not worth answering; but we ask them, thinking some one may throw more light on the subject, if any should essay to answer them.

As stated in Bro. Burton's letter, so we say; we enjoy the splendid editorials of Bro. Joseph and Bro. Elbert Smith, not forgetting the good things we have had from the pen of L. A. Gould.

Wishing the HERALD a prosperous New-year.

PHILADELPHIA, Pennsylvania, January 7, 1908.

Editors Herald: We expect to hold another series of special revival services in February. Those held in the spring and fall of last year were a success in more ways than one; the work is becoming more generally known, and we have made many friends in the vicinity of our church. We are commencing now to baptize, as the result of our efforts made in our special meetings.

Yours respectfully,

E. B. HULL.

CLINTON, Oklahoma, January 13, 1908.

Editors Herald: The New-year opens finely in mission work, in the sunny land of Oklahoma. I baptized four more on the third day of the month, and more are near the kingdom at Head Schoolhouse. There is where Bro. J. R. Lambert first sounded the gospel trumpet in this State. Now we have a fine band of workers there, near Piedmont, where Bro. Aylor joined me, and now we are on our way to Davidson to meet the Non-progressive Christians in debate. We stopped off a few days at Weatherford, and preached to a very much interested crowd, some of whom will obey, I think, ere long.

I hope Bro. George Steele will see this letter, as I have lost his address, and I wish him to know his book, "Instructor," was sent to his address in Oregon. I trust he may not lose it. I sent orders for quite a number of books which were not sent to the parties, because of our loss in HERALD Office fire; but I suppose now they will soon be sent, if they have not already been.

This has been my banner year in Oklahoma, so far; our work is attracting more attention than in any year previous in this mission. My debate at Morrison with C. C. Parker, will begin about February 19.

Your brother,

HUBERT CASE.

BOZEMAN, Montana, January 12, 1908.

Dear Herald: In looking back over the year that has just closed, we see that we have made some advancement in spiritual lines in some parts of this field; but in other places I see no improvement. Taking the work as a whole, I think we can safely say that we are advancing, and honest souls are being brought into the kingdom of God. This has been a hard year for missionary work in this field. The season has been very short so that we could not use our district tent, and for that reason we did not make as many new openings as we had hoped to do. However, we have not made an entire failure along this line, but we have broken the message of life to those that have never before heard the angel's message. New openings have been made at Helena, Straw, Summit Valley, Red Lodge, Luther, Hanlem; Sears, Beaver Tail, and Strickland Schoolhouses; and in several other places a few sermons have been preached, which could not be considered openings. Success crowned our efforts in one or two places, as some were brought into the church and are proving themselves to be energetic workers in the cause of Christ.

Our missionary in charge made us a visit that was enjoyed by all the Saints. While we would have been glad to have him remained longer in the field with us, yet we realize that there are others that would appreciate his presence as well as we; and, believing in the adage, "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you," we could hardly insist upon his staying with us longer. We had the pleasure of accompanying him throughout the district; and, judging from the expressions that we hear from those both within and without the church, good was effected. Come again Bro. Frederick A., and a hearty welcome will be given you.

Our district conference will convene the 18th and 19th of this month, at Deer Lodge. We hope to have a spiritual time, and trust that the Saints from different parts of the district will be in attendance. If we would make a greater effort to attend our conferences, there would be a marked improvement in all branches of the work, or at least we think so, looking at it from our view-point.

We are contemplating making provisions for a reunion in this district to be held some time next year. We trust the Saints will take hold of the matter with a determination to make it a success. In our opinion great good would come from such a movement, if it received the proper support. Watch the church papers, Saints; and, if we do attempt to hold a reunion, try to arrange your affairs so that you will add to the success of it, by being in attendance. You will never regret the time spent and the outlay that will enable you to be present.

Trusting to the divine one for spiritual guidance, and praying for the advancement of the Master's cause,

L. G. HOLLOWAY.

PLYMOUTH, Pennsylvania, January 12, 1908.

Dear Herald: I am going to have a little chat with you, as I feel so lonely. Two months to-day my dear husband died. We were only a little family, my mother, husband, and I. Two years ago last August my dear mother was taken away by death. Now my husband has been called. Only one left now. How soon the next call will come, who can say? Oh, how I wish some one could be sent to do some work in this place while I am here to help. There are no Saints in Plymouth. There was once a good branch, but they have all passed away. I have a good home, and the elders would be welcome, and it would make it pleasanter for me. How I do wish I could enjoy the company of the Saints. I take the HERALD, Autumn Leaves, and Ensign, and I love to read them, and often think what a good time you Saints have where you meet together. I am going to try to get out to General Conference at Independence. I would like to know who intends going from the East. Let me know, some one who can, as I should like company.

MRS. M. A. ISAACS.

WAMSLEY, Ohio, January 12, 1908.

Editors Herald: I was reading this morning in HERALD of January 8, the letter by Bro. C. J. Spurlock about a temple of the Lord to be built, and baptizing for the dead to be done. May God hasten the time when every house will become a house of prayer, and every heart a fit temple for the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. This will have to be brought about by obedience to the gospel of Christ, which is the power of God unto salvation; not a perverted gospel. We are living in a place where we do not have the gospel preached. We live in a land of persecution. I read in the HERALD of the services held in different places and of the Holy Spirit being present, and it does me good. I want to see all live so as to have this abiding Comforter present all the time. I was reading a letter this morning in HERALD of the 8th from Bro. D. A. Hopkins. Dear brother, let me say to you as one that loves your soul, as also I love this work, to stand firm in this faith, as it will stand the test. If we fall, let us get up and try again. Remember, to live in this faith is a continual warfare. Paul said just at the time of his departure, "I have fought a good fight and kept the faith"; and there was a crown for him. So it is only those who endure unto the end who are saved in the celestial kingdom. The celestial kingdom is for those who keep the celestial law, and live by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. (See Matthew 4:4.)

Dear Saints, the gathering time may be near. Let us be doers of the word as well as hearers, and let no man deceive us. The writer was baptized in Beach Fork, near Otway, on the 3d of July, 1904, by Elder T. J. Beatty. Bro. Beatty has gone to rest, to await the first resurrection, in which the dead in Christ will rise. (See 1 Thessalonians 4:16.) The writer is still rejoicing in the restored gospel. I would love to live where I could enjoy church privileges; but the Lord's will be done. There is great need of laborers in the vineyard, for the harvest is great. My prayer is that all the honest in heart may be gathered in due time. May God bless the Editors, and comfort them with the Holy Spirit.

J. T. MITCHELL.

META, Missouri, January 12, 1908.

Editors Herald: I came from East St. Louis to this place, November 25; got the New Light church and preached eleven times, with from seventy-five to two hundred out to hear me. They seemed to be well pleased. I went home for Christmas, and while I was gone a man by the name of Ben Clark told that I was a Mormon, and that I had two to three wives everywhere I went; and a New Light preacher said I was a Mormon just from Salt Lake City, and I did not preach the gospel of Christ, and he would not go to hear me. This man never saw me. I came back here the first of January, and the people were very cool. Things had changed to what they were when I went away; but they let me have the church again. The first night there were only five out to hear me, and I told them I was not a Mormon, and that I never was at Salt Lake, and they seemed to be well pleased. The next night I had about sixty out. I was told that I could have the Congregational church to preach in. This place (Meta, Missouri,) is one hundred and thirty-five miles west of St. Louis on the Rock Island Railroad. Bro. Charley Litton lives here. Any of the elders passing this way would be welcomed at his house. I shall stay here a few days and leave it with the Lord. I like this district to labor in. I have baptized twelve, preached one hundred and thirty-five times, and done other church work. Bro. Henry Sparling was with me about three weeks. May the Lord bless all in the HERALD Office.

In bonds,

S. J. MADDEN.

NIAGARA FALLS, Ontario, January 8, 1908.

Dear Herald: I was called here by telegram to administer to Sr. Bigger, who is suffering with a cancer. I find the work in good condition, and prospects are favorable for an ingathering. The Saints are united, and a good feeling seems to prevail.

God has manifested himself here by marvelously healing Sr. Chown, under the hands of Elder Place. The attending physician said, "A divine power has healed you, and not my medicine."

I have been laboring since the October conference, at Marston, holding the fort in a union church. The Baptist parson, by the name of McQuarrie, lectured three nights against us, and I took the good advantage to reply, and by so doing made many friends to the cause. I am hopeful of a good work being done there.

G. C. TOMLINSON.

CALGARY, Alberta, Canada, January 15, 1908.

Dear Herald: I would like to speak a word for Alberta through your columns. I have lived here eight years next spring. I feel sure it is the best poor man's country I have ever seen. I have lived in the States and in Ontario, but they can not compare with this country, in my judgment. Any one with a little money and some energy can soon be comfortably well off. I speak from experience.

Any one desirous of purchasing land or gaining information regarding this country, if they will write to me I will be pleased to give them all the information asked for. I joined the church when I was about eleven years of age, and, although we have no other Saints here except my mother and sister, I have not parted from the faith.

Trusting these lines will help some to a home in the West, I remain,
Yours in gospel bonds,

BANTRY, North Dakota, January 15, 1908.

Editors Herald: As I am sending in my renewal for Autumn Leaves, I thought a few lines from this part of the vineyard would not be amiss. Though few in number, our little branch is striving to keep in the faith. We were glad to have Bro. H. O. Smith with us a few days last week. He preached a few good sermons for us, and we feel strengthened by them. We have Sunday-school and preaching every Sunday; prayer-meeting every Thursday evening. All seem to be interested, and take part in the meetings. We are sorry to lose Bro. and Sr. Surbaugh from our branch. They will be missed, as they were loved and respected by all. They left for Missouri the 14th. May they live long, and faithfully, and may God's blessings attend them, is our prayer. I ask an interest in the prayers of all, that I may overcome the trials and temptations of this world.

Your brother in faith,
WM. H. HAGOOD.

MANCHESTER, England.

Editors Herald: November 1, I went to Leeds, where Bro. Rushton met me and took me to his home. The next day, in company with Bro. Rushton, left for Glasgow, Scotland, where we were welcomed at the home of Bro. and Sr. Murray, at Burbank. Bro. Murray is a real Latter Day Saint. He met with an accident while at work in one of the coalpits here, and the doctor said it was a miracle that he escaped being killed; he rejoices in the power of God that so wonderfully preserved his life.

On Saturday we went to Hamilton, and on Sunday evening met about twelve Saints and friends gathered for worship in Victoria Hall. At this meeting two, who had formerly been baptized, were confirmed.

After holding a few meetings, one for a more perfect organization of the branch, Bro. Rushton left for Stockport, England, leaving me feeling rather lonely, but determined to go to work. I continued holding meetings, and distributing tracts, and inviting people to the hall where we held our services. After the services Saturday evening, the 19th, we went out to the street and started to talk about the gospel, and soon had a big crowd interested. After talking for one hour to them on the first principles of the gospel, we gave opportunity to ask questions. No sooner was this privilege announced than a big man stepped forward and said: "I want to ask the speaker, Is your soul saved, and is it saved now? and I want answer, Yes, or No." I asked him what he meant by the word soul, and he started an oration of fifteen minutes on the blood of Jesus, but failed to give any explanation of the soul. Then some of the people wanted us to define it for them, so we explained, and there was perfect silence, everybody seeming to indorse the explanation, and we felt to thank God for the power displayed. After answering questions until twenty-five minutes after nine, we announced meeting for Monday night, and bade them good-night. We filled the appointment, as announced, and talked till nearly nine o'clock on the kingdom of God, and how we might know it. Questions were again invited, when a young man stepped forward, holding a tract that I had given him on Saturday night, and said that the tract taught that we could be saved by the blood of Jesus only, and that I had been preaching that men must believe and obey. But I think that he and all standing around were convinced that he had made a wrong interpretation of the tract. We continued to answer questions till twenty minutes of ten.

Rain, frost, and snow interfered with the outdoor meetings for several days, but indoor meetings were held through the week; and on Sunday, after the indoor services, we went outside and talked to a large crowd with good liberty. Even though rain began falling, the people seemed eager to hear, and so we talked till nearly nine, and then answered questions till ten minutes of ten, and bade them good-bye for the winter months. On Monday night we had a meeting at the home of Bro. and Sr. Moore, and blessed five of their children.

On the 27th we left Scotland for home, feeling that we had been blessed of God in doing a little good. Some seem almost persuaded, but are rightly counting the cost.

Will the sister who gave me the names, in Lamoni at conference last spring, forward to me her name and address, and the names and addresses of her friends living in Scotland, and we will look them up.

HOISINGTON, Kansas, January 18, 1908.

Editors Herald: Inclosed you will please find money order for five copies Voice of Warning, paper bound.

I find that this book is very plain and explains the Bible so clearly, and opens the truth so plainly, that there is no room for doubt as to the truthfulness of our gospel.

All I ask people to do is to read the book and refer to the Bible, and if the Bible reads that way accept it.

There are no Saints here that I know of, except my wife and I; but should any come this way our house is open to them, for I believe they do much good wherever they stop, if only to the one they stop with, for they strengthen us who are weak, both spiritually and mentally.

Your brother in the faith,

RAT, Missouri, January 3, 1908.

Editors Herald: While sending for the Ensign, Autumn Leaves, and HERALD, I would tell you we have reorganized our Sunday-school again. We have six Saints here now. We elected all the officers we need. There were twenty-one present.

May God's blessing rest upon his people.

Your sister in bonds,

RIVERTON, Iowa, January 23, 1908.

Editors Herald: At this date some of the Saints, including myself and family, are on the sick list. We ask the prayers of the Saints in our behalf. Our faithful brother, Jonas H. Drury, of Nebraska, is with us. He is preaching, and caring for and helping us while we are sick. We are looking for Bro. Joseph Arber to visit us this week.

Request for Prayer.

Dear Saints: As a brother and sister of the Latter Day Saint church, we would request that, on the first Sunday in February, fasting and prayer be observed in behalf of our daughter, Miss Gladace, Warren, who is very low with consumption of the bowels.

Extracts from Letters.

A. A. Baker, Bandon, Oregon: "The Saints here held meeting in their new church Sunday, for the first time. They do not have it completed yet; but will have in a few days. I have been helping them some. Saints are all well here, and the work is in a fair condition. I look for some additions to the branch in the near future."

News From Branches

ST. JOSEPH, MISSOURI.

Another Christmas with its spirit of gladness and good cheer is numbered with the past, and we have once more taken up the quiet routine of our lives. Christmas was observed in right royal fashion. The school presented a pleasing program, entitled "Shepherds of long ago," which was well rendered, and universally commended. The decorations in the Sunday-school were the most elaborate and beautiful ever attempted here, and the decorating committee certainly deserve praise for their work in this line. The children were well remembered by the school and by their teachers, and a generally happy time was had.

On the last Sunday in December, the semi-annual election of officers took place, and the present corps of officers was sustained for another term. The school is prosperous, and lively, with a bright outlook for the future.

On a recent Tuesday, in the parlor of Bro. Goodrich's home, Bro. Charles Perrin, of Beetown, Wisconsin, was united in marriage to Sena Tindell, of Caldwell County, Missouri, Bro. Goodrich officiating, assisted by Bro. Hale Smith.

Brn. Goodrich, Smith, and Pickering are holding a series of meetings in South St. Joseph. The Second St. Joseph Branch has a neat little church there, recently purchased, in which the meetings are held. Good sermons, good interest, and good attendance are reported.

Bishop G. H. Hilliard preached for us on a recent Sunday. On next Sunday, Bro. Goodrich will preach on the subject of "Spiritual gifts, as manifested among us." In the evening Bro. Hale Smith will occupy the pulpit.

At our last business-meeting, Bro. H. D. Ennis resigned as correspondent for the Ensign, and Sr. Mary Kinnaman was appointed.

The Religio held its annual election of officers the first week in January. All the officers were reelected. We are looking forward with pleasure to our district conference, which convenes here some time next month.

EDITH M. COCHRAN.

COLUMBUS, OHIO.

Elder F. J. Ebeling occupied the stand on Sunday evening, January 19, preaching a good, spiritual sermon, to a crowded house. Bro. Ebeling, through ill health, was forced to leave the missionary force one year ago; but through the grace of God is now restored to health, and Sunday evening marked his return to the active work.

The Sunday-school is making splendid progress, under the skillful management of Elder J. E. Matthews, its superintendent. Bro. Matthews has introduced several innovations, which have awakened a greater interest in the Sunday-school work. This applies to both teachers and pupils.

Elder C. H. Rich is building up a good Religio local; and, while only a few weeks old, it seems to be a very energetic youngster.

We have glowing prospects for next season's tent-work; and at present are considering a series of cottage-meetings.

The spirituality of the membership is increasing, under the faithful service and watchcare of the priests and teachers. May the good work continue.

HARRY E. FRENCH.

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

A large number were in attendance at our sacramental and rally day service the first Sunday of the New-year, and all present enjoyed a goodly portion of the blessed Spirit of the Master. Two little buds of promise were blessed at this service by Brn. Russell Archibald and S. A. Burgess, Bro. Archibald being spokesman: Margaret Elizabeth, the little babe of Bro. and Sr. M. L. Masten, and Elizabeth Euphrosyne, daughter of Bro. and Sr. A. P. Burgess.

The marriage of Sr. Bessie Roberts, of Cheltenham, and Mr. Baker, of Nashville, Tennessee, was solemnized at the church Christmas day, by Bro. R. Archibald. The young couple left for Nashville, where they will make their home.

Bro. Woodstock, of Lamoni, was a visitor with us recently, and addressed the Religio, December 27. Bro. R. Etzenhouser and little son were also with us a few days in December, Bro. Etzenhouser being enroute to his field in the East. He gave us two instructive and interesting sermons on the twenty-ninth.

The Sunday-school and Religio held their regular elections of officers, which resulted in placing those whom we believe are thoroughly competent to conduct the work for the ensuing term.

Our normal lessons, in charge of Bro. Tanner, are well attended and very interesting.

A surprise was tendered Sr. Tanner the afternoon of January 17, by the mite society, in honor of her birthday. All expressed themselves as having had a splendid time. Another pleasant social function was the entertainment of the members of the choir at the beautiful home of Bro. and Sr. S. R. Burgess, the evening of January 21.

Bro. Frank Smith, we regret to say, has left us, to work in Kansas City. But our loss is their gain, and we wish him success.

Bro. Russell D. Archibald, of Centerville, Iowa, is a late arrival in our midst, and we find his voice quite an addition to our choir service.

Your sister in Christ,

ELIZABETH M. PATTERSON.

2739 DeJong Street.

LAMONI, IOWA.

W. H. Kelley was the speaker at the chapel Sunday morning; Eli Hayer occupied in the evening. W. R. Dexter spoke at the Saints' Home; F. M. Weld at Liberty Home.

D. C. White occupied at Davis City; A. S. Cochran at New Buda; Frank Hackett at Andover; William Anderson at Pawnee; and H. A. Stebbins at Thompson.

President John Smith has been laboring at Cleveland, Lucas, and Norwood the past two weeks. S. K. Sorensen went to Ellston, Saturday, where he would conduct services over Sunday, continuing during the week, and then on to his field.

At the January branch business-meeting recommendations from the branch presiding officers advising the ordination of C. B. Woodstock to the office of elder and W. R. Dexter to the office of priest were approved, and referred to the stake high council.

Had been expecting such a summons, and was ready. She was baptized at Bay City, Michigan, in 1886, by J. J. Cornish, and lived a devoted life. Came to the home in 1900. Her husband died in 1870. By her request, H. A. Stebbins preached the sermon. R. M. Elvin in charge, and A. S. Cochran offered prayer.

LANYON.—At the Saints' Home, Lamoni, Iowa, December 12, 1907, of quick consumption, Bro. William C. Lanyon, aged 68 years, 6 months, and 21 days. He painted at the HERALD Office, October 16, and was taken with hemorrhage the same night. He was a nephew of Sr. Josiah Ells, of Pittsburg; was the father of eight children, five of whom are living. Stebbins.

VOTAW.—Sr. Isabelle W. Votaw, at Forest Hill, California, November 28, 1907. She was born January 22, 1864, at Forest Hill, October 21, 1894, she was united in marriage to Bro. A. S. Votaw, who now mourns her loss. She was baptized February 26, 1902. She had a great desire for relatives and friends to have the opportunity to hear the restored gospel; but in life this was denied her. SHORT.—The hearts of the Saints were made sad on December 15, to hear of the death of our beloved Bro. John Short, who for many years, has lived in Joplin, he being one of the charter members at the organization of the branch, and by his long and faithful life making many friends both in and out of the church. He was over seventy years of age, and his bereaved companion, and stepson, desire to render their thanks to the Saints and friends who gave them such noble assistance in their affliction. A Preacher who Really Practised.

Mayor Jones was large and powerful; he had a splendid physique, the development of a rugged constitution, of hard manual labor in early life, of abstemious living, and of constant exercise; he was of an athletic build and prowess, and he was a Welshman, naturally quick to resent injury or insult, and of a temperament prompt to take fire. By all the ordinary rules of human intercourse, the man who insulted him on a certain occasion would have received a tremendous thrashing; but Mayor Jones turned away and departed without a word. He came to me a few minutes afterward in my office, and I saw that he was striving hard to master some unusual emotion. I shall never forget him as he sat down, and how after a moment his face broke into that beautiful smile and he said:

"Well, I have won the greatest victory of my life; I have won, at last, a victory over myself and over my nature. I have done what it has always seemed hardest for me to do."

"What?" I asked.

And then he told me the story, and when he had done, after a period of silence, he said:

"You know, it has always seemed to me that the most remarkable thing that was said of Jesus was that 'when he was reviled, he reviled not again.' It is the hardest thing in the world to do."

After that his life seemed sweeter and gentler than ever, although it had been exceedingly sweet and gentle before; he seemed to have reached a higher altitude and a loftier conception than he had known before. A few months later he was dead. And when I stood at his bier and saw the thousands and thousands of weeping people standing on his wide lawn, in the streets before his house, and lining the streets all the three long miles to the cemetery, and then other hundreds waiting at his grave, all of them mourning the friend who had gone, it seemed that there was a visible manifestation of that love which he had poured out in his life, and more than all a great proof of the validity of the higher law which he understood and by which he lived in accepting the golden rule.—From "The golden rule in real life," by Brand Whitlock, in the Circle for December.

Locking Up One Hundred Millions.

Never before in the history of this country has the mania to hoard money deprived the people of so vast a sum as that which has been withdrawn from circulation since the opening days of the October panic. It has been a most curious, unreasoning, but picturesque movement, with which the banks of the great cities have ever had to deal, and now that the different phases are becoming better known, it is clear that all sorts and conditions of men have engaged in the practice, and that thousands of big and little banks throughout the United States have helped it along. The movement has been too broad for any one to trace closely, but it is safe to say that, taking the country as a whole, fully $100,000,000 in currency has been locked up by timid individuals, banks, and corporations. It has been estimated that fully half of that sum was withdrawn from the banks and trust companies in the immediate vicinity of New York during the excitement attending the unprecedented runs on three or four trust companies of the metropolis.

The movement was given great impetus by the action of the New York Clearing House banks in authorizing the issue of loan certificates on October 26 last. It is true, however, that hoarding had begun two or three weeks before this action was taken. The banks were obliged to authorize loan certificates because of the tremendous drain of currency to the interior, which largely accounted for $12,900,000 cash loss shown in the bank statement of the day that the loan certificate expedient was resorted to, and by the heavy withdrawals of currency by individual depositors. As soon as the newspapers announced that cash settlements by the banks had been temporarily suspended the safe-deposit companies received applications for thousands of "one month boxes." That meant that the hoarders wanted a safe place to store their money pending the resumption of normal conditions, and that they thought that the situation would be sufficiently settled within a month to enable them to either redeposit their funds or invest them permanently. What was true of New York applied in a way to other centers, and as loan certificates were taken out by the banks of Philadelphia, Chicago, Boston, Pittsburg, St. Louis, and other points, the hoarding mania extended, and soon developed into a national movement of grave consequence.—From "The story of the hoarders," by William Justus Boies, in the American Review of Reviews for January.

FARMERS' STATE BANK

LAMONI, IOWA

IN BEHALF OF THE MANAGEMENT OF THE
JACKSON COUNTY BANK

I take the liberty of soliciting your patronage as we are in a position to do BANKING BUSINESS BY MAIL very satisfactorily. Open accounts can be placed with us for safety at your convenience and command. We have opened a savings department, paying interest on accounts of $1 or more and each member of the family should become interested in having a bank account building for future needs. We also pay interest on time deposit certificates. A number of the brethren are living here, others are looking forward to this location as a future home, and late revelation and admonition foreshadow coming events, adding materially to our spiritual holdings necessary to signs of the times, and in this connection our Board of Directors propose to safeguard the financial interests of the Saints by offering to them a depository proof against graft, greed, or calamity, governed by a kindred feeling born of the interest we have in common. It is not popular men, large capital, heavy deposits, National or State laws, that offer absolute security to depositors, but directors and officers progressive and conservative, possessed of the virtue of true manhood, shorn of all political ambition, with no taste for frenzied finance or mining speculation, with no inclination to furnish funds for others in that line. I point with considerable just pride (I assume) to our Board of Directors as named below. Feel at liberty to write us on matters that concern you in Jackson County, Missouri.

Personally Conducted Parties to Pacific Coast

These parties leave principal Burlington Route stations almost every day, and they are personally conducted by a Burlington representative through to California; it is his business to relieve the members of the party of the worries and inconveniences ordinarily incident to a trip of this kind when made alone, and to assist in every way in making the trip both pleasant and interesting.

A splendid opportunity to travel in comfort and with congenial company.

Let me tell you all about these parties and also give you a fine map of California.

TO THOSE WHO CAN READ, AND WILL UNDERSTAND.

The closing words in one of the paragraphs of a revelation in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants are these: "Behold, here is wisdom." To that class of men, readers and thinkers who can read the English language and will understand what they read, we commend the following from the pen of Joseph Smith, the Seer of Palmyra. The man whose sayings, whether uttered under the inspiration of the Spirit with a "thus saith the Lord" attending the utterance, or whether spoken in daily conversation, have been construed by some to be always the result of direct inspiration, writing under the solemn stress of confinement in a jail with others of his brethren, in daily conversation upon the things of the Spirit, singing the songs of Zion, and spending the tedious hours in prayer and communion with themselves and God, wrote to the Saints, directing his instruction to the church direct, through Bishop Partridge. This instruction was published in the Times and Seasons, volume 1, pages 131 and 134.

We further caution our brethren against the impropriety of the organization of bands or companies by covenants, oaths, penalties, or secrecies; but let the time past of our experience and suffering by the wickedness of Doctor Avard suffice, and let our covenant be that of the everlasting covenant, as it is contained in the holy writ, and the things which God has revealed unto us; pure friendship always becomes weakened the very moment you undertake to make it stronger by penal oaths and secrecy. Your humble servants intend from henceforth to disapprove everything that is not in accordance with the fullness of the gospel of Jesus Christ, and which is not of a bold, frank, and upright nature; they will not hold their peace as in times past when they see iniquity beginning to rear its head, for fear of traitors, or the consequences that shall follow, from reproving those who creep in unawares that they may get something to destroy the flock. We believe that from the experience of the Saints in times past they will henceforth be always ready to obey the truth without having men's persons in admiration because of advantage; we ought to be aware of those prejudices (which are so congenial to human nature) against our neighbors, friends, and brethren of the world, who choose to differ with us in opinion, and in matters of faith; our religion is between us and our God; their religion is between them and their God; there certainly is a tie to those of the same faith which is peculiar to itself; but it is without prejudice, gives full scope to the mind, and enables us to conduct ourselves with liberality towards those who are not of our faith; this principle, in our opinion, approximates the nearest to the mind of God, and is godlike. There is a duty which we in common with all men owe to governments, laws, and the regulations in the civil concerns of life; these guarantee to all parties and denominations of religion equal and indefeasible rights, all alike interested; and they make our responsibilities one towards another in matters relating to temporal affairs and the things of this life; the former principles do not destroy the latter, but bind us stronger and make our responsibility not only one towards another, but unto God also: hence we say that the Constitution of the United States is a glorious standard, it is founded in wisdom, it is a heavenly banner, and is to all those who are privileged with the sweets of its liberty, like the cooling shade and refreshing water of a great rock in a thirsty and weary land: it is like a great tree under whose branches men from every clime can be shielded from the burning rays of an inclement sun. We are deprived of the protection of this glorious principle by the cruelties of those who only look to the time being for pasturage; and who forget that the Mormons, as well as the Presbyterians and every other denomination, have equal rights to partake of the fruits of the great tree of our national liberty; yet notwithstanding we see what we do, and feel the effects of the cruelty of the enemies of freedom, that fruit is no less precious and delicious to our taste; we can not be weaned from the milk, neither can we be drawn from the breast; nor will we deny our religion because of the hand of oppression, but we will hold on until death. We say that God is true, that the Constitution of the United States is true, that the Bible is true, the Book of Mormon is true, that Christ is true, that the ministering of angels is true; and "we know we have a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, whose builder and maker is God"; a consolation which our oppressors can not feel when fortune or fate may lay its hand on them as it has on us. We ask, What is man? Remember, brethren, that time and chance happeneth to all men.

Logic is a large drawer, containing some needful instruments, and many more that are superfluous.—A wise man will look into it for two purposes, to avail himself to those instruments that are really useful, and to admire the ingenuity with which those that are not so are assorted and arranged.—Colton.

We subscribe ourselves your sincere friends and brethren in the bonds of the everlasting gospel, and prisoners of Jesus Christ.

The signatures of the companions of the Prophet attached to this quotation are an equivalent indorsement and sanction of the principles contained in this instruction. The force of this instruction is found in the declaration that the claims of true friendship are weakened by oaths and bonds given to our fellow men, especially if these are characterized by secrecy; and that the disciples of Christ are not required to work in secrecy or the dark, but that they should do what they do in the work of the Lord, frankly, openly, and fearlessly, keeping in mind the statement made by the Savior that he had spoken openly in their temples and had not wrought in secrecy or in the dark. There is a deep and prophetic meaning to be taken from this statement written by the Prophet under the circumstances then governing.

THE LOGIC OF PRAYER.

(Synopsis of a discourse.)

Is the habit of prayer logical? Many people with a predilection to skepticism will answer no, because they doubt the existence of the being to whom prayer is addressed. Some Christians will answer no, because they say that God knows our needs, and they assume that it is unnecessary to explain them to him. It might seem, then, that prayer is illogical, but only so to one who has given the matter a superficial investigation.

Many of our best customs and emotions might seem unreasonable at first glance. Why should each parent esteem his particular child so highly? Others see the freckles, the up-titled nose, the traits of character that seem even worse than any facial defect, and discern little to love. Yet the parents think more of that child than of any other in the world. Are they illogical? No. They are in harmony with a deep, strong law of nature, designed to preserve the race, and to secure for each child a welcome, a home, protection, love.

One who gives money or effort to succor another who is in need or distress is lessening his own store, and there is no visible earthly reason why he should do so. Is he illogical? No. The race must move upward as a whole. And when he gives he gets. He enjoys sweet pleasure that is better than anything he could have bought had he kept the donation. The logic of the act is not discovered until one makes the experiment.

Here is a mother who is praying for the boy that is out in the world. She wants Providence to protect him. Has Providence time to single out her boy from a million others and watch over him? Perhaps her act seems unreasonable; but what would you think of her as a mother if she did not pray for him? A nation of mothers who would forget to pray for their boys would be a calamity. They would mother a race of men who would not be worth praying for. The prayer is logical if for no other reason than because it is the spontaneous fruit of love, and because of its effect upon posterity.

Prayer is among the customs that have their roots deep in human need. It must not be lightly condemned.

As the incentive and authority for prayer, we have the promise, "Ask and ye shall receive."—John 16: 24. The method of asking and the character of the suppliant are considered, and the promise is thus conditioned: "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much."—James 5: 16.

First, the character of the prayer is mentioned. It must be a fervent prayer; one that is from the heart, and not from the lips only. This generation is especially condemned because the Lord says, "This people draw near me with their mouth, and with their lips do honor me, but have removed their heart far from me."—Isaiah 29:13. Again the prayer must be effectual, and the only prayer that is effectual has faith back of it, because we are told, "Let him ask in faith, nothing wavering. For he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed. For let not that man think that he shall receive anything of the Lord."—James 1:6, 7. It is also specified that the man must be righteous. To ask favors of one with whom we are out of harmony is offensive, and we are told, "He that turneth away his ear from hearing the law, even his prayer shall be abomination."—Proverbs 28:9.

Of course, to offer a faithless prayer while living unrighteously would be illogical; but to live a life of righteousness and cultivate a habit of fervent prayer is, we maintain, not only logical but most desirable, both from a religious and a civic viewpoint. In support of this view we propose to present four arguments selected from among the many that we might offer.

Prayer in its simplest form is asking for something. In a little higher form it is returning thanks for something received.

Is it logical for God to demand that we ask him for something that he knows that we need, and return thanks for it when he knows that we are thankful? It seems to us that by our own conduct toward our children we commend him in this action. The intelligent parent knows that his child has need of many things. Some of those wants he supplies freely. But there are many other things concerning which the parent thinks that if they are worth having they are worth asking for. When they are asked for and given, it is a matter of good training that some expression of thanks shall be made. On the other hand, the parent who anticipates every desire and lavishes gifts upon his child, even before the child realizes the need, will ruin him. Such a course will breed ingratitude, one of the meanest of traits.

In like manner, God grants us many blessings daily, but there are many others that we must ask for. We thus come to realize our needs, and to realize the source of supply. Having received them we must return thanks. If we do not take time to express our gratitude, soon we will not take time to be grateful.

His commandment then is just where he says, "In everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known to God."—Philippians 4:6.

Prayer leads to self-examination. The man who pleads for forgiveness is confronted with the question, Have I forgiven others? The man who pleads for the poor can scarcely avoid the thought, Is there anything that I can do to help them? The man who asks that his wife and children may be protected can not escape the thought, Am I true to them in thought and act?

Thus, whatever his petition, the man who comes to the throne of grace comes not face to face with God alone, but face to face with himself. He sees his own duty as no sermon, lecture, or printed document could explain it to him. Prayer is logical because of its effect upon the suppliant.

Prayer is the only avenue by which we establish communion with God. When the father and son talk over the needs of the son and plan together regarding them, there is close and pleasant companionship; it is the same with the heavenly Father and his children.

On these four points, then, prayer justifies itself: As a means of asking, as a means of thanksgiving, as an incentive to self-examination, and as a means of communion with the source of all wisdom and purity.

There is also a reason for our custom of assembling ourselves together in prayer-meetings, or appointing days to be observed throughout the church to pray for certain things.

Two little girls were close friends. But there was something that came between them; one was white and the other was black. One day the little white girl said, "I have been praying a long time for you to turn white." "Oh, you mustn't do that," the little colored girl cried, "for I have been praying for you to turn black."

You see they were praying at cross purposes, and had God answered them they would have been no better off than before. When Saints are far scattered and each pursues his own desires, regardless of others, there is no unity of action. But when they are assembled together, or when a day is appointed to pray for certain things, there is an intelligent coöperation. There is no danger that their desires will conflict.

But whatever our earnestness and whatever our petition, we should always make the concession that the Master made, "Nevertheless, not my will but thine be done." Any other course denies the supremacy of the intelligence above. The thing that we esteem a curse to-day, and try to escape, to-morrow we may esteem a blessing. We can but express our desires fully and freely and then, recognizing that a knowledge of futurity is denied us, leave always the final decision with the one in whom is reposed a knowledge of futurity, coupled with all wisdom.

We can not indorse the idea of prayer contained in a little tract recently issued by the Evangelist

Torrey, entitled, A Call to Prayer, in which he says, "When God called me in 1901 to go around the world preaching the gospel I felt my utter unfitness for the work and sent out letters to my many friends who believed in a God who is a Father and answers prayer, to bear me up daily before our Father in earnest, persistent, believing prayer that would not take no for an answer."

Prayer does not ask for the setting aside of law, and so the quarrel that scientists have essayed to pick with the prayerfully inclined is groundless. In fact, when viewed from the correct standpoint, the suppliant is found to be cooperating with law toward the desired end. One Latter Day Saint elder was called to a hospital to administer to a sister who was very ill, and in a nervous and feverish condition. The physician in charge rather objected to the proceeding, because he anticipated some wild incantation that would excite the patient. He was invited to put the matter to a test and take the temperature and pulse of the patient both before and after administration. He did so. And after the patient had been anointed with oil and a quiet prayer had been offered, it was discovered that both pulse and temperature were much nearer normal than before.

Why not? God made no mistake in ordering the observance of that ordinance. (James 5: 14, 15.) The physician in question often afterward came in contact with the elders, at the sick bed, and later made a statement, that, in his opinion, aside from any miraculous blessings coming from on high, there was a quieting and comforting influence around the one who felt that his case had been placed in the hands of God that was decidedly beneficial to the patient.

Doctor T. B. Hyslop, superintendent of the Royal Hospital, London, writing on this very subject, says, "As an alienist and one whose whole life has been concerned with the sufferings of the mind, I would state that of all hygienic measures to counteract disturbed sleep, depressed spirits, and all the miserable sequels of a distressed mind, I would undoubtedly give the first place to the simple habit of prayer. Let there be a habit of mighty communion, not as a mendicant or repeater of words adapted to the tongue of a sage, but as a humble individual who submerges or asserts his individuality as an integral part of a greater whole. Such a habit does more to clean the spirit and strengthen the soul and to overcome mere incidental emotionalism than any other therapeutic agent known to me."

Is prayer logical?

It is, when we pray in the way indicated above, which is the way outlined by the Master in his sermon on prayer. We are not to go to the throne of grace as a beggar, and we are not to be mere repeat-ers of words. Those ideas accord with the method of prayer introduced by the Master, who addressed God as a Father, and who said, "Use not vain repetition."

His injunctions have been flagrantly disregarded. As an example, we quote from the Book of Common Prayer, of the Church of England. Turning to the Litany, a prayer that is to be repeated three or more times each week, we read:

O God the Father, of heaven: have mercy upon us miserable sinners.

O God the Father, of heaven: have mercy upon us miserable sinners.

O God the Son, redeemer of the world: have mercy upon us miserable sinners.

O God the Son, redeemer of the world: have mercy upon us miserable sinners.

O God the Holy Ghost, proceeding from the Father and the Son: have mercy upon us miserable sinners.

O God the Holy Ghost, proceeding from the Father and the Son: have mercy upon us miserable sinners.

O holy, blessed and glorious Trinity, three persons and one God: have mercy upon us miserable sinners.

Thus six columns in the prayer-book are taken up. In the face of the Master's admonition against repetitions the name of the Deity is repeated over fifty times. The words, "We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord," are repeated twenty-one times.

We do not quote these words to make light of the faith of others; it is not a matter for smiles. The church that issues and uses this prayer-book is everywhere regarded as standing for aristocracy, wealth, and learning; and the method of praying here examined merely shows how far the learned may stray from the simple ways of Christ.

Nor is the fact that the prayer is faulty, the only point that we wish to note: the whole system of repeating prayers is wrong. Only in a very few instances has a set form of words been given to use in certain ordinances. When our personal devotions are concerned, even divinity has not essayed to put words into the mouth of the suppliant. Christ said, "After this manner therefore pray ye." Better a few halting sentences that come from the heart, prayed in this manner, than a glib repetition of the finest prayer ever written by an archbishop.

Nor can we see that the attitude of mind in prayer recommended by Christian Science is in harmony with the scriptural idea. We are asked to deny the existence of sickness, sin, and death. Yet everywhere in the Scriptures their existence is plainly recognized. The blind men whom Jesus healed were blind; the lepers were lepers. They are not referred to as men who were under "an error of the mortal mind" and thought that they were blind and lepers. Nor is there the slightest intimation anywhere that Jesus entertained the Christian Science view of their condition, or that he taught them that nothing was the matter with them. He recognized sin and death as actualities. Of Lazarus he said "plainly," "Lazarus is dead."—John 11:14. He did not attempt to deny the existence of death; rather he emphatically declared its existence.

The true attitude of prayer, then, is to recognize the existence, the force, the power, of the things that afflict humanity, and the existence, force, and power of a God who is able to deliver even to the uttermost.

In nearly every life there comes a time when the individual is glad to pray. Even noted infidels have weakened and sought solace in prayer. Life and death hold problems that skepticism can not face. It is as God says in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, "In the day of their trouble, of necessity they feel after me." If, then, the time will come when we will be glad to pray, answer, Is it not better to pray now?

The Straight Road

A GLIMPSE OF PROPHECY.

News.—The latest happenings.

History.—Past events.

Prophecy.—History reversed, or future events revealed before they occur; hence the newest news. The guide-posts along down the winding road of time, set by the Almighty to guide mankind aright.

The heritage of history and prophecy left to us by our fathers, in the sacred book called the Bible, is of vast importance. If it be so important to have the news of current events that one of the greatest industries of our time, which employs its thousands, and invests its millions, is the newspaper business, and in order to be up to date we read the news as published in the HERALD, and other papers, local, state, and national, how much more important is it to consider the possibility of taking a few more strides and availing ourselves of the incalculable benefits of knowing the general outline of the most important events before they occur?

Prophecy, as given in the Scriptures, and the "Spirit of prophecy" to which men are entitled now, on conditions, were intended for that very purpose; that men might know, and order their course accordingly. Fools, in all the history of the past, have ignored the guide-posts of prophecy to their own destruction.

It is not to be supposed that the Almighty revealed through prophecy what temperature the thermometer would register on a given date, how many footprints John Jones would make in Jasper County, or whether the Santa Fe' or Canadian Valley Railroad would build into town first; but it is a demonstrated fact that the great and really important events of the world have been foretold and written, hundred of years before their accomplishment. As for example, Isaiah 53, Zechariah 9:9, and Psalm 22:18, all accurately predicted and literally fulfilled by Christ! Those prophecies were not understood by the self-conceited Jews. They flattered themselves that they were the people of God, and ignored these and many other forecasts, to their own overthrow as a nation. They were scattered in all nations as a fulfillment of the prediction of Christ: "Behold, your house is left unto you desolate; and verily I say unto you, Ye shall not see me, until the time come when ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."—Luke 13:35. They might have averted the calamity which befell their nation, had they but known and understood the prophecies concerning the Messiah.

Other predictions in that same old book are of as great importance to us at the present time. Marvelous events are being, and are to be enacted, which mark our time as the closing epoch in the history of the world. The prophecies predict that the world will be taken by surprise in these things.

The church must not be taken by surprise. But who are the church? They are one of the two classes mentioned by Christ when he said: "Ye can not serve God and mammon." Types, shadows, and symbols have been used in the Scriptures to convey the real meaning. A study of some of these will assist us to accurately determine just where we are; serving God, or mammon, or "a straddle of the fence."

Brands, tags, or marks are given in the Scriptures, by which our position or fellowship may be determined; and that tried measure will be a better line to measure with than our own flattering inclinations to count ourselves out of the mammon crowd, simply because our name is on some church book, and we have never murdered any one, stolen a horse, or robbed a bank.

Those who are in the class who serve God acceptably, in the fullest sense of the word, are members of Christ's church. The church is an organization among men governed by laws of divine appointment, for the perfecting of man and for his salvation in the highest or celestial glory. Christ organized that church. Trace it through prophecy and history and see what became of it; for there are many churches of men, and if we are not on the alert we may be unwillingly serving mammon. Has that church, as organized in form and power, been kept intact until now?

Hear Paul predict, in 2 Thessalonians 2:3, 4: "Let no man deceive you by any means: for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshiped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God."

That departure from the faith was as literally fulfilled as the prophecies concerning Christ were. And the nations are still, to-day, drinking of the "wine of the wrath of" that "fornication." (Revelation 14: 8.)

Revelation 12 not only shows that the "woman"—church—was to go into darkness, but tells how long she was to remain there: "A thousand two hundred and threescore days."—Verse 6. A day in Hebrew prophecy stands for a year, as proved by Old Testament scripture. Hence the fallen condition of the church was to cover a period of twelve hundred and sixty years. Verse 14 proves that same thing again in different terms. The period of darkness is there spoken of as a "time, and times, and half a time." Going again to Hebrew prophecy we learn that a "time" means a year. Then "time," one year (twelve months), "times" plural, two years (twenty-four months), and half a time, six months, total forty-two months. Counting an average through the year of thirty days per month makes twelve hundred and sixty prophetic days, or literal years—same as sixth verse made it.

Again the fifth verse of the very next chapter proves the same thing in different terms. Read it. Again: Daniel prophesied the same thing over six hundred years before (see Daniel 7: 25), thus proving it by another witness, with the mighty wall of six hundred years between them.

Brother, these witnesses can not be impeached, and their testimony means something to you and me, as well as to others. That scripture was not written just to fill up space. At the end of that twelve hundred and sixty years, during which the power of the "beast" was to rule, the pure church, according to the primitive pattern, was to appear. John sees the "woman," (church) in the seventeenth chapter, after she has been defiled, lost her purity, and gone into darkness. Read it. She is called "Mystery, Babylon the great, mother of harlots and abominations of the earth."

Literally, who was she? Verse 9 tells the story. She sat upon "seven mountains;" and every school-boy knows that Rome is built upon seven hills. The dominant ecclesiastical power in Rome then is the "mother, mystery."

Will somebody now please rise and stand where the whole congregation can see, and tell us where her daughters are, if every church which sprang out of the Reformation is to claim parentage elsewhere?

"Oh, but—I—ah,—er, we,—ah,—think that is too—ah—radical," says Protestantism.

Ah, but it is written there, and facts are stubborn things,—the history is made. We are not responsible for either.

There is no reference in this prophecy to individual chastity; for in the mother church, as well as in every other, there are as chaste and virtuous people as were ever born; but reference is made here to legal authority with God, and legitimate parentage as organizations or churches.

We need not all speak at once in answer, but where are those daughters? and who is drinking of the wine of the wrath of the sins of the "mother"? The Bible says "all nations." Then those illegitimate daughters must be sitting on other hills, afar from Rome.

The thirteenth chapter says the time would come when all who would not worship this great power should be killed, and that rich and poor, bond and free, were not to dare to buy or sell without the "mark of the beast in their hand or in their forehead," secret, or open allegiance to the great anti-Christian power which was masquerading in sheep's clothing.

To see the fulfillment of that prophecy, see Gibbon's History, volume 3, page 265, and read: "In the creed of Justinian, the guilt of murder could not be applied to the killing of unbelievers, and he piously labored to establish with fire and the sword, the unity of the Christian faith." So those who were not "marked" with secret or open allegiance to the faith, dared not buy or sell at the peril of their lives. The time when the two lamb-like horns of the beast which spake as a dragon (see verse 11, chapter 13), were to arise, is shown by the "six hundred and sixty-six" referred to in verse 18. It says there, to count the number of the beast. We do not know of a better place to begin to count than the point where the church had gone so far into the wilderness that the creed of Justinian was thoroughly established, the year 569. And then, six hundred and sixty-six years from that date brings it to the very year when history tells that the awful, bloody Inquisition was established, 1235 A. D., under Pope Gregory IX; also the two orders of monks, Franciscans and Dominicans, i. e., the two horns of verse 11.

The twelve hundred and sixty years of complete apostasy began between the years 569 and 570, and closed between 1829 and 1830, when by divine appointment the church emerged from the "wilderness" independent of the "mother" organization, and every other creature of men.

THE TEMPORAL PLAN.

I wish to present a few ideas humbly, and in a proper spirit. In this, "the hastening time," the reason why the Lord's temporal plan is not working a marvelous wonder and blessing to his people, I believe, is because we have not consecrated our surplus and put it into the hands of the Bishop.

Some years ago an article from the hands of the Bishopric was published in the SAINTS' HERALD, for January 1, 1902 (it was also published in the Ensign about that time), under the title of "Duties, responsibilities, and faith of the Saints," from which I quote, page 8:

In laying the foundation of Zion, lands have to be purchased, and storehouses established, and all kinds of industries set in operation as fast as possible, that there may be places for the Saints to live, something for them to do, and their necessities supplied; but this will take time. In order to have means to operate with, it will be necessary for all that can to turn over their surplus, or now make a first consecration, according to their circumstances and ability, that there may be means to establish storehouses, buy lands, and make the necessary preparation for the complete consecration of the residue as stated in paragraph 10, section 42. . . . This seems to be the Lord's way to establish Zion, and all should gladly labor with him to accomplish the work intrusted to the church. The apostle says: "For we are laborers together with God; ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building."—1 Corinthians 3: 9. Then we must work according to his direction and pattern, else we toil in vain. With the law demanding the surplus let us comply, and all everywhere make a first consecration as a beginning at least; and when there is sufficient in the treasury, those in charge will move forward with their part of the work, as fast as deemed wise, or as the Lord shall direct. We do not want the cries of the worthy poor to ascend to God in vain, and we must do the Lord's work in his way.

The following April a wonderful confirmation of the position taken by the Bishopric was given, in the instruction in Doctrine and Covenants 126: 10, wherein it is stated that "the application of the law as stated by the bishopric should be acceded to."

The Bishopric has also instructed us to the effect that it is no longer time to extend one's business by increasing the investment, but if any one had means to spare the Lord had use for it. (See article by Bishopric referred to above.)

It is evidently not the Lord's intent to cripple any existing profitable industry in the hands of the Saints, but it is his will to say through the proper officers—the Bishopric—whether the surplus means in the hands of any of the Saints shall go into a zinc mine, a clay bank, or a box factory, or go to relieve the destitution and want of the family of some poor traveling elder, or elsewhere. As was quoted, in substance, in a recent editorial in the SAINTS' HERALD, Verily men can of their own selves bring to pass much righteousness. But the Lord knows the most urgent needs, so if any of us have means to spare, let us take care to allow the Lord to direct the use thereof in his authorized way.

PRESIDENTS IN THE CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST.

President.—One who is appointed to preside over and control the proceedings of a number of others.

Presiding.—Or holding the first rank among others.

Preside.—One who presides over the meetings or deliberations of a society; a president of a meeting.—To be set over others, to have the place of ruler, moderator or controller, or director, as chairman or president.—American Dictionary and Cyclopedia, vol. 7, p. 3230.

"Of ruling," (presiding, Greek).—Fassett's Bible Cyclopedia, p. 96.

In the New Testament we read of overseers, rulers, deacons, teachers, presbyters, elders, bishops, evangelists, pastors, prophets, and apostles, but we do not read of presidents. We also read of churches at Jerusalem, Antioch, Corinth, and Ephesus; but we do not read, "president of the branch at Antioch," or, "president of the branch at Corinth." No detailed church government is given by Jesus in the New Testament, and but little is said about the inner workings of local congregations, or of defining the rank and jurisdiction and duties of the ruling officers of the church. And when we step on down to the next Christian writers after the New Testament era, we learn but little more; none of the early writers gave an explanation of the duties and jurisdiction of all the ministers named. And no minister in the New Testament is called the president of a branch, or the president of the church.

Once in awhile a voice is heard in church history, and the New Testament, about ruling officers; but it is a torchlight at a distance,—it flickers and is gone. In history, ruling officers may be referred to at the death of some martyr, or with the agonies of some suffering minister, or in the controversies of some heretic; or it may be merely mentioned in connection with the edict of some heathen magistrate, whose sentence against Christians was carried into effect with a barbarous zeal, to protect the dignity of his gods. (The heathen gods had a legal standing in the Roman senate and courts; but the Christian's God had not, and the Christian's worship could only be made legal by the consent of the senate.) And after all that is said about jurisdiction of officers, there is room for a difference of opinion about their rank and duties.

"The Saints have their presidents and vice-presidents, something unheard of in the Bible." Such a flourish is often heard in controversy, and it is made to appear that because they have a president over the church, and presidents over the Seventy, and presidents over local churches, that they are out of harmony with the New Testament, and can not be approved of by Christ, because he had no presidents, they say, in his church.

And when they had ordained them elders in every church.—Acts 14: 23.

For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldest set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city, as I had appointed thee.—Titus 1: 5.

And from Meletus he sent to Ephesus, and called the elders of the church.—Acts 20: 17.

Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honor, especially they who labor in word and doctrine.—1 Timothy 5: 17.

Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over which the Holy Ghost hath made you [elders] overseers, to feed the church of God.—Acts 20: 28.

[The elders] feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof.—1 Peter 5: 1, 2.

So the elders in the local congregations "rule," and have the "oversight" in religious work and worship; but, if there should be a number of elders in the same local congregation, one likely would outrank the others, who would announce the order of the worship, invite speakers, or readers, and have charge of the service.

In New Testament times elders (Jewish) were chosen members of the Jewish Sanhedrin (see Luke 22: 66.)

And some of the Rabbis say that the Sanhedrin of the New Testament times was but the successor of the Seventy chosen by Moses as his assistants in the government of the Israelites in the wilderness.—Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, p. 1048.

And behold there cometh one of the rulers of the synagogue. . . . And he cometh to the house of the ruler of the synagogue. . . . There came from the ruler of the synagogue's house certain.—Mark 5: 22, 35, 38. Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue.—Acts 18: 8.

Synagogue means literally a convention or assembly.—Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, p. 1101.

We see that the Jewish synagogue worship, like the Christian worship in church-houses, was under the jurisdiction of the local elders; but some one would have charge, otherwise there might be confusion. "Let all things be done decently and in order."—1 Corinthians 14: 40.

Rulers of the synagogue who presided over the assembly, and invited readers and speakers, unless some person who were acceptable voluntarily offered themselves.—Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, p. 1101.

The elders of the synagogue. They appear to have been the counselors of the head or ruler of the synagogue.—Ibid, p. 1101.

In the synagogue a college of elders was presided over by a chief or ruler of the synagogue. The elders were called parnasim, "pastors" or "shepherds."—Fassett's Bible Cyclopedia, p. 668.

Every Jewish synagogue had its council of elders (Luke 7: 13) presided over by one of themselves, the chief ruler of the synagogue.—Fassett's Bible Cyclopedia, p. 96.

So that Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue at Corinth, of Acts 18: 8, before his baptism by Paul (see 1 Corinthians 1: 14.), was the presiding elder of the Jewish worshippers at that place.

The Jewish council [Sanhedrin] was composed of elders and presbyters (Luke 22: 66; Acts 22: 5), and a presiding Rabbi; so the Christian church had its elders and a president (Acts 15: 19-23).—Fassett's Bible Cyclopedia, p. 96.

Among the Jews in New Testament times the word rulers was sometimes used vaguely, like authorities with us (John 8: 48). Sometimes it more specifically refers to members of the Sanhedrin (Luke 23: 13.) In Matthew 9: 18, the ruler is the ruler of the synagogue, and Mark 5: 20, at other times the president of a feast (John 2: 9).—American Dictionary and Cyclopedia, vol. 8, p. 3513.

Organization of the first seventy, or Sanhedrin:

And the Lord said unto Moses, Gather unto me seventy men of the elders of Israel, whom thou knowest to be the elders of the people, and officers over them; and bring them unto the tabernacle of the congregation, that they may stand there with thee.—Numbers 11: 16.

Seventy elders, and "officers over them"! What could these officers "over them" be, but what we now call presidents?

The president [of the Sanhedrin] was called nasi: generally the high priest (Matthew 26: 62). The vice-president is called in the Talmud, Father of the house of Judgment. One scribe registers the votes for acquittal, and another those for condemnation. . . . they sat in the form of a half circle: the vice-president, or the oldest, at the president's right hand, the rest before these two, according to dignity.—Fassett's Bible Cyclopedia, p. 140.

Sanhedrin.—The word is derived from the Greek Sunhedrion, a council, assembly, or company of people sitting together: from sun, together, and hedra, a seat. . . . the president of the assembly was called nasi or prince; his deputy was called abath-dm, father of the house of judgment, and the sub-deputy was called chacan, the wise: the rest were denominated tzekanim, elders or senators.—Fassett's Bible Cyclopedia, p. 140.

Here we see that the "officers" over the seventy, or senate, council, or as the Greeks called it, sanhedrin, were a president, and two deputies, or vice-presidents. So the Greek word preside, but replaces the Jewish word overseer, or chief ruler.

Rabbi Johanan, who lived forty years before the temple's destruction, and presided over the great synagogue after its removal to Jabna or Jamnid.—Ibid., p. 387.

Rabbi Judah on this occasion, being rector of the school at Tiberias and president of the sanhedrin in that place.—Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, p. 821.

Before the death of our Savior, two very famous rabbis had been presidents of the sanhedrin; namely, Hillel and Schammai, who entertained very different opinions on several subjects, particularly that of divorce.—Ibid., p. 1048.

Elders, or seniors, in ancient Jewish polity, were persons the most considerable for age, experience, and wisdom. Of this sort were the seventy men whom Moses associated with himself in the government: such likewise afterwards were those the first in the synagogue as presidents. Elders in church history were, originally, those who held the first place in the assemblies of primitive Christians.—Ibid., p. 494.

Sanhedrin.—The rabbis maintain that it consisted of seventy counselors, six out of each tribe, and Moses as president; and thus the number was seventy-one; but six senators out of each tribe make the number seventy-two, which, with the president, constitute a council of seventy-three persons.—Ibid., p. 1048.

From the above we learn that even Moses was a president, the president of the first Bible seventy! And that the "chief ruler" of the synagogue was a president, because the chief ruler in an assembly is what we now call president.

Mr. Alexander Campbell says:

During the personal absence of the king [Jesus] he has committed the management of the kingdom to stewards. These were first apostles, next to them prophets, next teachers; then assistants or helpers; then directors or presidents.—Christian System, p. 183 (second edition).

Hence in every city, town, and country where the apostles gathered a community by their own labors, or by their assistants, in setting them in order, for their edification, and for their usefulness and influence in this world, they uniformly appointed elders, or overseers, to labor in the word and teaching, and to preside over the whole affairs of the community.—Ibid., p. 185.

Bishops whose office it is to preside over, to instruct, and to edify the community—to feed the church of the Lord with knowledge and understanding—and to watch for their souls as those that must give account to the Lord at his appearing and his kingdom, compose the first class.—Ibid., p. 84.

The Christian system demands for its perpetuity and for its prosperity at home and abroad, bishops, deacons, and evangelists, its bishops teach, preside, and execute the laws of Christ in all its convocations.—Ibid., p. 90.

If then, any brother fall into any public offense, those privy to it notify the elders of the church, or those for a time presiding over it.—Ibid., p. 95.

And Mr. Campbell, in an article in the Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, says:

Every congregation chooses its own overseers and deacons, who preside over and administer the affairs of the congregation: and every church, either from itself or in cooperation with others, sends out as opportunity offers, one or more evangelists, or proclaimers of the word, to preach the word and immerse those who believe, to gather congregations, each congregation being subject to its own choice of presidents, or elders whom they have appointed.—Page 464.

So we see that Mr. Campbell uniformly calls the elders, or elders and deacons, the presidents of local Christian congregations, when chosen overseers.

And in the civil affairs of the Jewish people, especially under the Roman and foreign jurisdiction, we find its rulers in Palestine and Syria, are in modern literature often called presidents.

Some reported Simeon, the son of Cleophas, as a descendant of David and a Christian, and thus he suffered as a martyr when he was an hundred and twenty years old, in the reign of the Emperor Trajan, and the presidency of the Consullar Atticus.—Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History, book 3, chapter 32.

We see that Consullar Atticus in his jurisdiction exercised a presidency.

That is, when Atticus was deputy of Syria, the Syrians used to show their years by the name of their presidents.—Ibid., book 3, chapter 32, note 1.

After he was tormented many days, he died a martyr, with such firmness, that all were amazed, even the president himself.—Ibid., book 3, chapter 32.

He [that is Cyrus the Persian] also commanded that the vessels which Nebuchadnezzar had pillaged [out of the temple] and had carried to Babylon, should be restored to the people of Jerusalem, and that the care of these things should belong to Sanabassan the governor and president of Syria and Phoenicia.—Josephus' Antiquities, book 11, chapter 4.

Now the following day the king [Herod] assembled a court of his kinsmen and friends and called in Antipater's friends also. Herod himself, with Varus, were the presidents. . . . So Varus the president of Syria.—Josephus, Book of Wars, book 1, chapters 32, 33.

These vestments King Herod kept in the palace, and after his death they were under the power of the Romans, until the time of Tiberius Cæsar: under whose reign Vitellius the president of Syria.—Antiquities, book 15, chapter 11.

Sextus Cæsar, president of Syria.—Antiquities, book 15, chapter 3.

[Caius] sent Petronius to the president of Syria.—Antiquities, book 18, chapter 3.

Saturninus and Volumius, presidents of Syria.—Antiquities, book 16, chapter 10.

Artabanus, president of Syria.—Antiquities, book 18, chapter 2.

Petus, president of Syria.—Antiquities, book 7, chapter 3.

Mucianus, who was president of Syria.—Antiquities, book 12, chapter 3.

And also Gallus, Flaccus, Petronius, Varro, etc., were in turn presidents of Syria. So that under the Cæsars and Persians, the rulers of provinces are called presidents.

In Valesius' Life of Eusebius, as translated by Parker, we also read.

A numerous assembly of bishops was convened in the city of Antioch, in which Eusebius of Nicomedia, the chief and ringleader of the whole faction presided.—Page 19.

From the words of Epiphanius it seems to be inferred that Eusebius of Cæsarea, presided at this synod.—Ibid., p. 21.

Having in his [that is Eusebius] chronological canons accurately stated the time of the advent and passions of Jesus Christ, the names of the several bishops that had presided in the four principal churches.—Ibid., p. 23.

So we see that Valesius, in his life of Eusebius, concedes that the "rulers" in the four principal primitive churches were presidents, because he says they presided. And in the introduction to his Ecclesiastical History, book 1, chapter 1, Eusebius says:

As it is my purpose to record the successions of the holy apostles, together with the times since our Savior, down to the present, to recount how many and important transactions are said to have occurred in ecclesiastical history, what individuals in the most noted places eminently governed and presided over the church.

So he goes and gives us lists of bishops who had presided over some "noted churches" down to his own time [324 A. D.] In the church at Jerusalem he recounts thirty-nine bishops, or presidents; Antioch, nineteen; Rome, twenty-nine; Alexandria, eighteen; Laodicea, seven; Cæsarea, six; altogether, one hundred and eighteen bishops who had "governed and presided" over those "noted churches." (See his tabular view of dioceses mentioned.)

And incidentally he names other churches and the names of those who presided over them:

In the meantime Dionysius died, in the twelfth year of the reign of Gallenus, having presided over the church of Alexandria seventeen years.—Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History, book 7, chapter 28.

This Dionysius is the thirteenth in Eusebius' list of presidents of that church.

For when he [Paulinuss] had thus completed the temple he also adorned it with lofty thrones [seats] in honor of those who preside.—Ibid., book 10, chapter 4.

This refers to the Christian church-house at Tyre, in which were lofty seats for the presiding officers.

Caladion, who had presided over the church fourteen years.—Ibid., book 4, chapter 19.

This man Caladion is the eighth bishop of Alexandria.

As Cornelius who succeeded Heron, had been the fourth of those that had presided there.—Ibid., book 4, chapter 19.

This refers to the church at Antioch.

At this time also, Peter, who presided over the churches of Alexandria with good reputation.—Ibid., book 9, chapter 6.

In Asia, synods had been held at Synnada and Iconium, and some other places, in which it has been determined that heretical baptism was invalid. In Africa, Agrippinus [a bishop of the church at Carthage early in the third century] had presided in a council, at which the same determination was adopted.—Life and Times of Cyprian, p. 230.

The great controversy concerning rebaptism of heretics, which is certainly the most remarkable event that has engaged our attention, both in its conduct and its consequences, had already excited internal commotion in the church, and was now [about 251 A. D.] to embroil the province over which Cyprian presided, in the general discord.—Ibid., p. 228.

This Cyprian was bishop of Carthage, North Africa, (see Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History, book 7, chapter 3); but later in life he exercised a presidency over the churches in the provinces of Numidia and Mauritania. (See Life of Cyprian, pp. 121, 214.)

At this time Clement flourished at Alexandria of the same name with him who anciently presided over the church of Rome, who was a disciple of the apostles.—Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History, book 5, chapter 11.

This Clement, of Rome, is the third in Eusebius' list of those who had "governed and presided" over the Christian church there. But Tertullian says that this Clement was the first bishop at Rome, Irenæus says that Linus was the first; so does Eusebius; so there is evidently an error here with reference to Clement's presidency over the Christians there, which may be accounted for on the theory that there were sundry churches in Rome at that time. This Clement was the companion of Paul. (See Philipians 4: 3.) And this man Linus appears in 2 Timothy 4: 21.

Since this time [the destruction of Jerusalem by Adrian] we have shown that the church there [Jerusalem] consisted of Gentiles after those of the circumcision, and that Marcus was the first bishop of the Gentiles who presided there.—Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History, book 5, chapter 12.

This man Marcus is the sixteenth in succession of presidents over the Christian church at Jerusalem. The first fifteen were Jews; but now a Jew could not live at Jerusalem. No, they were not even permitted to see the Holy City. The name of the city was now changed by this Adrian to Ælia, in honor of the emperor's wife.

At Cæsarea, in Palestine, Theophilus presided.—Ibid., book 5, chapter 22.

That is, this man was president of the branch of the church at Cæsarea, because that church was only a very small part of the whole church, hence a "branch" of the "the" church.

An epistle, also of the bishops of Pontus, among whom Palmas, as the most ancient presided; also of the churches of Gaul over whom Irenæus presided.—Ibid., book 5, chapter 23.

Irenæus, we see, presided over the churches of Gaul. This was about 180 A. D. (See Ibid., book 5, chapter 6, note 2.)

Among these was Irenæus, who, in the name of those brethren [in Gaul] over whom he presided.—Ibid., book 5, chapter 24.

And those presbyters who governed the church before Sorter, and over which you now preside.—Ibid., book 5, chapter 24.

This refers to Victor, the thirteenth bishop who presided over the Christian worshipers at Rome. This man Sorter was the eleventh. Here we are told that the bishops who had presided at Rome down to this time (about 161 A. D.) were presbyters. Although our author calls them bishops. Papists call the same men popes. Jerome says:

A presbyter is the same as bishop, and originally the churches were governed by the joint council of the presbyters . . . the bishops know that they are greater than presbyters, rather by custom than by real appointment of the Lord.

Tertullian says: "Elders preside in the government of the church"; and Firmilian says, "In elders is vested the power of baptizing, imposition of hands, and ordination."—Encyclopedia or Religious Knowledge, p. 245.

Those now called bishops were originally apostles, but those who ruled the church after the apostles' death had not the testimony of miracles, and were in many respects inferior, therefore they thought it unbecoming to assume the name of apostles; but dividing the names, they left to presbyters that name, and themselves were called bishops.—Bingham's Ecclesiastical Antiquities, 2: 11.

The office of a bishop is in administering temporal things.—Doctrine and Covenants 104: 30.

Bishop,—Greek, episcopos. Applied to the inspectors sent out by Athens to her subject states, to inquire into their state, to rule, and defend them. The Greek speaking Jews or Hellenists applied it in the LXX to officers who had the overseeing of the Tabernacle. (Numbers 4: 16; 31: 14) "the officers overseeing the host"; (Psalm 109: 8) "his charge of overseeing let another take"; quoted in Acts 1: 2, "his bishópric."—Fassett's Cyclopedic, p. 96.

Thus we see that the episcopos sent out by Athens, from whence our word bishop comes to us, was an overseer in "temporal things," as with the church of Jesus Christ. But the elders and presbyters who "ruled" were also overseers, hence they were all for that reason later called bishops. The New Testament bishop, however, was not to be an old bachelor, like many bishops that the posing as such on high perches now; neither was he to be a polygamist, but the husband of ONE WIFE. (See 1 Timothy 3: 1-7.)

These overseeing bishops (now called by that name,) were inferior to apostles, but greater than presbyters, "so they were called bishops"; "not by the appointment of the Lord," but by "custom." Thus the name bishop for that of elders and presbyters became a new name for elders or presbyters, because of the absence of apostles!

Domnus, the son of Demetrianus, of blessed memory, and who before this presided with much honor over the same church.

This was the sixteenth bishop of Antioch. (See Eusebius, book 7, chapter 30.)

About this time also, the beloved disciple of Jesus, John the apostle and evangelist, still surviving, governed the churches in Asia, after his return from exile on the island, and the death of Domitian.—Ibid., book 3, chapter 23.

It was then also, that the apostle, John, returned from his banishment in Patmos, and took up his abode at Ephesus, according to an ancient tradition of the church.—Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History, book 3, chapter 20.

Such, then, was the state of the Jews at this time. But the holy apostles and disciples of our Savior, being scattered over the whole world, Thomas received Parthia as his allotted region; Andrew received Scythia, and John, Asia.—Ibid., book 3, chapter 1.

Thus in the allotment of their missionary work, the field was divided, and the apostles were given jurisdiction over the fields. So John governed or presided over the churches in Asia (the province), and this may account for John writing to the "seven churches in Asia." (Revelation 1:4.)

There were yet living of the family of our Lord, the grandchildren of Judas, called the brother of our Lord, according to the flesh. These were reported as being of the family of David, and were brought to Domitian [the Roman emperor] by the Evocatus. For this emperor was as much alarmed at the appearance of Christ as Herod. He put the question, whether they were of David's race, and they confessed that they were. He then asked them what property they had, or how much money they owned. And both of them answered, that they had between them only nine thousand denarii, [a denarii is about fifteen cents; see foot-note number 2,] and this they had not in silver, but in the value of a piece of land, containing only thirty-nine acres; from which they raised their taxes [the taxes on land was paid in grain, etc.,] and supported themselves by their own labor. Then they also began to show their hands, exhibiting the hardness of their bodies, and the callosity formed by incessant labor on their hands, as evidence of their own labor. When asked, also, respecting Christ and his kingdom, what was its nature, and when and where it would appear, they replied, that it was not a temporal nor an earthly kingdom, but celestial and angelic; that it would appear at the end of the world, when coming in glory he would judge the quick and dead, and give every one according to his works. Upon which Domitian despising them made no reply; but treating them with contempt, as simpletons, commanded them to be dismissed, and by decree ordered the persecution to cease. Thus delivered, they ruled the churches, both as witnesses and relatives of our Lord. When peace was established, they continued living even to the times of Trajan.—Ibid., book 3, chapter 20.

"They ruled the churches." What churches? Why, the churches scattered in Domitian's empire, which he now was afraid of losing (like Herod before him). During this persecution thousands suffered, John was banished to Patmos:

But after Domitian had reigned fifteen years, and Nerva succeeded to the government, the Roman senate decreed, that the honors of Domitian should be revoked, and that those who had been unjustly expelled should return to their homes, and have their goods restored.—Ibid., book 3, chapter 20.

Thus these relatives of our Lord presided over the churches, and continued to do so until the reign of Trajan. Others presided over churches in provinces, as John in Asia, and we see him exercising that jurisdiction in Revelation 1:4. Irenæus presided over the churches in Gaul. Cyprian presided over the churches near Carthage. Other ministers presided over local congregations. Thus the New Testament "rulers" or "overseers" were presidents.

That unassuming man, Moses; that meekest man in "the whole earth," was the president of the first Sanhedrin. The "chief ruler" of the synagogue was a president; and Fassett says the Christian church had a president, and cites Acts 15: 19-23.

Maximnus, in a decree against Christians says, "Wherefore that supreme and mighty Jove [god], he who presided over your city."—Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History, book 9, chapter 7.

And in Christian literature this idea of a supreme president seems to be approved. Alexander Campbell says: "What an efficient institution is that over which Christ presides."—Christian System, p. 90 (second edition).

Scott says: "God himself, in his own person, immediately presided over them."—Scott's Christian Life, part 2, chapter 11.

So that presidents are not confined to Latter Day Saints, nor to this lower world of clay and sin. But all will face a president, in that judge who will separate the sheep from the goats.

LATTER DAY SAINT LIBRARY COMMISSION.

HISTORY.

At the Fifty-fourth General Conference of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, which convened at Lamoni, on Friday, April 6, 1907, upon recommendation of the First Presidency, a Library Committee was appointed to meet with similar committees appointed by the General Sunday-school Association and Zion's Religio-Literary Society.

The object of this movement is for the betterment of this department by the consolidation and unification of all our library interests, thus doing away with unnecessary duplications, either in the selection of books, or in the election of officers, and the bringing of the local libraries into closer touch with the general library of the church.

The commission was directed to issue suitable statement of work done and purpose of this department. Accordingly, there appeared early in June, in all the church papers, report of the Library Commission, and according to the same resolution this

THE LIBRARY COMMISSION.

The purpose of these committees was to formulate ways and means by which the Library Departments of the three separate organizations could be brought together under one general head, thereby avoiding the duplicating of effort in the establishing of libraries in the branches, districts, stakes, and in general organizations.

This joint committee chose three general officers, one from the church, one from the Sunday-school, and one from the Religio, and appointed them a Library Commission, with full power to put into operation, as soon as practicable, the plans for the consolidation of the library interests of the church.

It has been the experience of those engaged in library work in the different departments of the church, that the library departments of the branch, Sunday-school, and Religio have in many places worked at cross purposes and to great disadvantage, by reason of having three separate libraries.

leaflet is now presented, explaining the work more minutely.

THE GENERAL COMMISSION.

The Latter Day Saint Library Commission consists of three members, one each appointed by the General Conference of the Church and the General Conventions of the General Sunday-school Association, and Zion's Religio-Literary Society. The Commission shall have general supervision of all the library interests of the church and its auxiliaries, and in particular charge of the General Church Library. It shall have full power to do all things needful to unify and simplify the library interests of the church, to encourage the establishment and development of libraries wherever possible, prepare rules and list of suitable books. The commission shall select the General Church Librarian, take charge of funds, select and purchase books, and do all things needful for the General Library, not otherwise provided for.

The Commission shall choose its own officers and define their duties.

The chairman shall perform the usual functions of that office.

The secretary shall keep account of meetings and work done; receive reports from General Church Librarian and from the library boards of stakes, districts, and branches not in districts, and summarize for the use of the Commission and for report to the General Conference and Conventions.

The treasurer (shall be the Bishopric member of the Commission and) shall have control of funds, expending same on order of the Commission.

The General Church Librarian shall have the actual custody of all books in the Church Library and shall index, label, and care for the same, and keep account of those in circulation. He shall have power to choose his assistants, subject to approval of the Commission, and shall suggest from time to time to the Commission supplies needed, and books desirable to have in the Library. He shall report for the current calendar year to the Secretary of the Commission, the number and list of books and papers received during the year, and the total then in Library. THE GENERAL LIBRARY SHALL HAVE THE PREFERENCE OF ALL RARE BOOKS, ESPECIALLY SUCH AS DEAL WITH CHURCH HISTORY AND AMERICAN ARCHÆOLOGY.

THE DISTRICT OR STAKE LIBRARY.

The District or Stake Library Board shall consist of three members, one being selected by each of the three organizations,—the District or Stake Conference, the District Zion's Religio-Literary Society and Sunday-school conventions (where there exists only one or two of these district organizations, the local organization of the other or others shall meet as soon as possible and nominate a member. The vacancy may be temporarily filled by appointee of the existing member or members of the District Board).

The District Library Board shall raise the necessary funds for the circulating library, appoint the district librarian or custodian and make necessary rules for the district library, using this suggestion form as a basis, buy books and have general charge of the district or stake library work. They shall do everything possible to build up the local libraries in their district or stake as well as the circulating library.

They shall hold office for one year, or until their successors are selected; such election, after the first, to be held at the last business session before General Conference, when other officers of the same organization are elected.

Expenses of the district library shall be paid out of the district library fund.

The district or stake librarian shall have immediate charge of books in the circulating library; shall label and number all books in the circulating library, and shall schedule in a book kept for the purpose the number, title, author, date of purchase and cost.

The district librarian shall also report promptly to the Secretary of the Latter Day Saint Library Commission, for the calendar year, as soon as possible after December 31. He shall at stated intervals move the books of the circulating library from one branch to another, keeping account of such movements. He shall have the power to appoint one or more assistants subject to the approval of the district or stake board.

In the distribution of books the librarian shall be governed by the number and grade of persons who will use said books in the local library. The initials of the local library shall be marked in the cover, to prevent its being sent twice to the same place, except as desired.

He shall make a triplicate list of books at each allotment. Only the number of the book need be given. One of these lists is retained by the district librarian to check books when returned. The other two are sent with the books—one to be retained by the local librarian, and one to be returned forthwith, after checking books received. All books returned shall be carefully examined by the district or stake librarian, and fines assessed for books lost or damaged; said fines to be paid by the local library board; all fines to be paid over, once in six months, to the district library treasurer.

The Librarian shall hold office for one year, or until his successor is appointed.

LOCAL LIBRARY BOARD.

The local library board shall consist of three members, one being selected by each of the three organizations, the branch, the Sunday-school, and the local Zion's Religio-Literary Society, and shall have general charge in the branch or local library, raise funds, buy books for local or reference library after consultation with district board, appoint custodian or librarian, consult with district board as to which books shall be in circulating library and which in local, and shall have full power and authority to do such work as will further the library interests in the local branch. They are to study the actual needs and conditions and do the best possible for that locality rather than try to force everything to one iron-clad plan. (A branch in a large city may be able to secure a branch of the public library.) They shall encourage reading of all good books, and endeavor to place church publications in public libraries and reading-rooms.

All books, whether formerly belonging to the branch, Sunday-school, or Religio, will be placed in the local library; books of reference, church publications, books used in services, and other suitable books, will be credited to the local library; books suitable for the circulating library—that is, books which it is not necessary to keep in the local library, but which can do more good by being moved to other libraries from time to time, shall be placed to the credit of the district or stake circulating library. Each branch shall have its own local library. All moneys for the benefit of the local library board shall be paid to the treasurer of the library board.

LIBRARIAN.

Shall have custody of books and bookcases; shall receive all books, shall label and number all books in the local or reference library, and shall schedule, in a book kept for the purpose, the number, title, author, date of purchase, and cost of each book in the local library; also have charge of the distribution and collection of books; shall assess and collect fines, which shall be paid over monthly to the treasurer of the local library board; shall keep account of all books outstanding, and have active charge under the general direction of the local library board. He may choose one or more assistants, subject to the approval of the local library board; he shall keep posted in conspicuous places list of all books in the local library for the examination of prospective users.

List A.—Shall include all books of reference which are not to be removed from the library room except with the consent of the library board.

Books on List B.—Are local library books and may be taken out and used in the vicinity.

Books on List C.—May also be taken out as they belong to the circulating library of the district.

Said classification to be made with the approval of the local library board.

The librarian shall keep account of each book taken out with date and name of person receiving.

Any book on Lists B and C may be taken out for two weeks by any member of the branch, Sunday-school, or Zion's Religio-Literary Society. If not returned promptly there shall be a fine of five cents for every week or fraction thereof of overtime. No one shall dog-ear any book. The person taking out a book shall be responsible for all fines for delay or damage to the book.

The librarian shall be judge as to the amount of damage.

In case of dispute, it shall be referred to the local library board for settlement.

For any book lost or irreparably damaged, the full value or cost shall be paid.

The library shall be open at regular services, and for a reasonable length of time before and after each service.

Access to the library for reference purposes may be had at other times, with the consent of the librarian, but no books shall be removed from the room except with his knowledge and consent.

Upon receiving list of books from the district or circulating library the local librarian shall compare said books with the list, marking errors (if any). If none occur, the list should be marked "O. K." In either event, one list should be returned to the district librarian, as this acts as receipt for the books. The other list is used to check books before returning, at expiration of the period.

The local librarian shall make a monthly report to the library board of the number of books taken out during the month and the number of times the library is used for reference, together with any other information desired by the board. He should keep the district librarian advised of all matters affecting the circulating library and shall report to the district librarian, quarterly; or, if not in district, report to secretary of commission.

All expenses of the library shall be paid out of the library fund.

LIBRARY RULES.

(To be posted in each volume.)

1. No member of the school shall keep a book longer than two weeks.

2. Books may be renewed for two successive Sundays, not longer, without paying a fine of ten cents per week.

3. Any one keeping a book longer than two weeks (subject to Rule 2) will be fined ten cents per week for so doing.

4. All persons damaging or losing books belonging to this library, will be required to pay the value of same to the librarian.

We have also prepared form for report blanks of the use both of the local and district library boards, and expect soon to have them ready for use.

WHITTIER, THE PREACHER.

The pew is pining for the poet in pulpit. The poet preachers have kept the faith world bright. Christ was a poet. Some one has said, "Doctor Watts gave greater views of heaven than Saint John." This is hardly true, for John the Evangel was a real poet of God.

John Greenleaf Whittier's lyre was tuned to the harps of God. His soul soared, sincerely, serenely, and safely to the mountain peaks of God, and there, before the altar fires of the Eternal, pondered, prayed, practiced, and penned spirit thoughts of God, man, freedom, and immortality.

Among all the poets of American literature there is not one to be found with a clearer vision of the truth, or one who sounds a safer call to arouse the slumbering from their shallow shrines to the seats of security and simplicity than Whittier. In pulpit, or pew, at home or abroad, the soul of a poet preacher is seen with fine intent, keen insight, and refinement of feeling. He said of Mr. Moody, "I like his intent but not his doctrine." If one's intent was to better man's condition, save the lost to his family, and country, Mr. Whittier would give him the right of way.

To stay the tide of materialism, to untie the chains of oppression, to turn men from malice, the worst thing in the world, to love, the greatest thing, was ever the motive of his big soul. As a constructive master builder he sought the best means to remedy the ills of man, to civilize, and spiritualize—to bring the New Jerusalem here and now—was in himself being a poet-preacher of the Bible. No poet of ancient or modern time knew his Bible better than Whittier.

All his poems have the Bible spirit, and many, very many of them, have direct quotations from the sacred Scriptures. He is never found preaching about the letter of the Book; he knew the letter killeth, but the heart and spirit of the Word, as having the values for the wants and woes of a sin-seared soul. After searching many volumes he is compelled to say:

We cull the good, the pure, the beautiful,
From graven stone and written scroll,
From all old flower-fields of the soul;
And weary seekers of the best,
We come back laden from our quest
To find that all the sages said
Is in the Book our mothers read.

The pilgrim is described as reading the Bible by the inner light—

He walked by faith and not the letters' sight
And read his Bible by the inward light.

In speaking of John Underhill, he said:

He cheered his heart as he rode along,
With screed of Scripture and holy song.

The suffering daughter in "The Witch of Wenham," is placed beside her blind mother reading the Book of Life:

She tends her mother, sick and blind,
And every want supplies
To her above the blessed Book
She lends her soft blue eyes.

The Bible God of Infinite Love was ever uppermost in his life. It was to him the presence of the Eternal Goodness, pervading the world—the God of all mercies; that while man was often cruel, hateful, unjust, God to all his poetry was love; and it must be shown in love to man:

Earth frowns below, heaven weeps above,
And man is hate, but God is love.

This love spirit was not only in his poems, but his life preached love, his eyes looked love, his heart breathed love. His last words were: "Love—Love—Love—to all the world." The thought of serving and loving God by being kind to man is seen in his poem:

Forget, as the best at times have done,
That the love of the Lord and man are one.
That heaven's sweet peace on earth began
And God was loved through love of man.

His was an unfettered soul, and was unable to see and hear the many groans of oppression without raising his poet power pointing toward justice. He would not only untie the shackles of slavery, of the body, but he would for ever cast aside the chains which held the soul in mental and ethical darkness. To him, "Whom the Lord had made free, were free indeed." He sings in Saint John:

Alas for the lady!
No service from thee
Is needed by her
Whom the Lord hath set free.

He was willing to undergo almost any suffering, that his soul might be free from malice, injustice, and hate, bringing in—

One royal brotherhood, one Church made free
By love, which is the law of liberty.

To know the truth and be free through the truth was his desire:

The day when fettered limb and mind
Shall know the truth which maketh free,
And he alone who loves his kind
Shall childlike learn the love of Thee.

Trust in the living God with a childlike spirit, as his father, friend, and helper, went with him as an angel. He never lost faith in the eternal good, but preached:

To soften all hearts, and dull the edge of hate,
Hushed strife, and taught impatient zeal to wait;
The slow assurance of the better state.

This hope and reliance in God was so beautifully portrayed in the life of his mother, that it became an inspiration to him. When trouble came and death severed the precious ones, he was ready to leave his dead with God:

They dared not plant the grave with flowers,
Nor dress the funeral sod,
When with a love as deep as ours,
They left their dead with God.

In his poem: "Trust," when things are too wonderful for mortals, he sings:

I have no answer for myself or thee
Save that I learned beside my mother's knee;
"All is of God that is, and is to be,
And God is good." Let this suffice us still,
Resting in childlike trust upon His will
Who moves to his great ends unthwarted by the ill.

His trust in God is serene, as seen in the poem, "Eternal Goodness":

To one fixed trust my spirit clings,
I know that God is just.

Then in "Our Master," that same gospel of confidence in God is seen—

For love will dream and faith will trust,
Since He who knows our needs is just,
That somehow, somewhere, meet we must.

Whittier was ever preaching the value of the Book of Life—the impartation of Christ's power, and peace—the forgiveness of sin; the song of sins forgiven was ever on his lips. The City of God was his constant desire. The thought of God with us here and now fired his soul. Yet it was given to him to proclaim the possibilities of souls in other worlds.

When Mr. Edwin P. Whipple dedicated his book on American literature to Whittier, he placed it thus: "To John Greenleaf Whittier, the people's poet, whose inner light has brightened many lives, and his faith in the Eternal assured many hearts of immortality."

Whittier entered the cloud, climbed the heights, listened to the choir invisible, and came back to us, with a clear-cut hope, a steady faith in the things that are invisible and eternal, and going down the river path he is reminded of the light from the heavenly shore as he sings:

We paused, as if from that bright shore
Beckoned our dear ones gone before.

He speaks of being baptized in immortality, and how sweetly he says, "I have friends in spirit land." To one who had departed this life he prays:

Fold her, Father, in thine arms,
And let her henceforth be A messenger of love between
Our human hearts and thee.

This life to Whittier was not long enough to work out the great problems and possibilities of the soul, so he saw a place not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

He says, that as God lives, we must live also. "The good die not." To read "Andrew Rykman's Prayer" is like opening a door into the eternal world. How he describes those he loved and lost resting in God, with a hope that his soul be satisfied when he was allied with those who have gone before!

He was ever preaching, "Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, the things which are in store for the faithful soul." What a beautiful gleam of immortality is seen in his description of his sister, in that classic of American literature, "Snow-Bound," where he says:

I can not feel that thou are far,
Since near at need the angels are:
And when the sunset gates unbar,
Shall I not see the waiting stand,
And white against the evening star,
The welcome of thy beckoning hand?

Mothers' Home Column

EDITED BY FRANCES.

Advisory Board Daughters of Zion.

Mrs. B. C. Smith, president, 214 South Spring Street, Independence, Missouri; Mrs. H. A. Stebbins, vice-president, Lamoni, Iowa; Mrs. T. A. Hougas, secretary, Macedonia, Pottawattamie County, Iowa; Mrs. M. E. Hulmes, Treasurer, 909 Maple Avenue, Independence, Missouri; Mrs. F. M. Smith, 630 South Chrysler Avenue, Independence, Missouri; Mrs. S. R. Burgess, 5920 Etzel Avenue, St. Louis, Missouri.

Dear Sister Frances: Some times when I turn to the Home Column, and find only a selection, instead of the many spicy letters that used to cover a page or two, years ago, I grow sad. For it speaks to me of the aged, tired hands and brain that have so long worked for and presided over that column. And I wonder if the sisters have grown weary of holding up those hands that have toiled for them so long and faithfully.

The young mothers of those early days, so bewildered and puzzled over the unfamiliar duties of motherhood, have grown into experienced matrons, aided week by week through all these years by the Home Column, under the watchcare and labor of Sister Frances.

And the children over which those same mothers watched and worried, are now the young parents of a new generation. And still the Home Column work goes on. The work of its editor, like the brook, "goes on for ever, and for ever."

Yes, for ever, for its influence must reach within the veil. Many duties have hindered those whom you used to call your helpers from coming to your help now as formerly, except as we remember you in our prayers. And some have gone to the paradise of rest; and, dear Sr. Burton in her far-off mission, still laboring on, with you, for the same great end—the world's redemption.

What a host of young people have been educated through the influence sent out from the Home Column and Hope.

and Autumn Leaves, to care for the literature of the church. You and I, dear sister, can remember when the church had no literature to speak of, aside from the HERALD. What a wonderful revolution has taken place in those respects since we used to discuss through the Column the needs of the young.

And now, thank God, we can see the hosts of talented ones prepared to take up the work that the trembling old hands must soon relinquish.

May the dear Father raise up one as faithful to the work as you have been, made wise through these long years of training, that those before us did not have.

While on the subject of the "has beens," I will add a little clipping about the "Now." Here it is:

"BUT NOW.

"O happy mothers, sitting thus
Amid your babes in morning sun,
Do ever then you think of us
Who once have had, but now have none?"

"O active mothers, midst the fray
Of loving duties never done,
Do once you think, through all the day
Of us who had, but now have none?"

"O faithful mothers, in the night,
When calm you soothe some frightened one,
Bethink you how we wait the light,
We who had once, but now have none?"

"O blessed mothers, dreaming o'er
What shining ways those feet may run,
We sit and think, but plan no more,
We who had once, but now have none."

—Marion Hicks Harmon in Ladies' World.

The Daughters of Zion have discussed many good things. But they have not used the Column either in the HERALD or Ensign with the vim and earnestness they might have done, considering the number who have profited by them, or who are supposed to have done so. But it probably remains true that what is everybody's business is nobody's business. It seems to me that there ought to be a committee, the members of which should take turns of furnishing a paper—say each week—for a specified time, when they would be succeeded by a new committee. As it now is, the president and secretary have to do all the writing.

Once a month does not seem enough to keep up interest.

But I have had too little to do with it to know much of its workings.

Lovingly,
SR. ELEANOR.

Only Waiting.

You ask what makes the dear old grandfather sit in wistful silence so much of his time? He is living over the old days, and listening to the voices we do not hear, and seeing the faces we can not see.

"How life-like through the mist of years,
Each well remembered form appears."

Father, mother, brothers, sisters, and companion! Most of them have passed on into the great beyond. Sometimes I see him smile, and I imagine he is thinking of his youth. Yes, youth is beautiful; but so is old age, if one has lived the life of a Saint; and the backward look of an aged one is beautiful to them. They forget the trials and privations of the past, for none ever come to a triumphant old age without passing over many rough places.

Did you ever climb to the summit of a mountain? On going up you meet much that makes your ascent difficult, in the way of rough roads and rugged foothills; but when you have reached the top, and look back, you will see the aspect of the scene has changed. Your eyes will discover smooth landscapes, in which are fields and forests, farm-houses and quiet villages, mingled in one harmonious picture. You can not see the roughness from the summit. Just so with the man, when he has reached an advanced age. He looks back and sees only the good old times. Into his day-dreams, sometimes there comes a picture of a sweet young girl, full of young, warm life. She is as dear to him as ever, and there is a soft shyness and a glad look in her eyes. Then in fancy he seems to clasp her in his arms and call her wife. At other times he sees the children at play, and feels the soft warm clasp of their hands as they run to meet him after his day's work is over,—all so glad to see father.

See him now! He is looking far away beyond the clouds. He is thinking of the row of mounds over on the hillside, where his loved ones are laid. And, just now, the evening sun falls aslant, and touches the trees and the mounds with glory, and he thinks of that other—the celestial glory, which is as the sun.

The dear old days have long since gone into the dim distance of the past; but to him it seems but yesterday when he was a merry, romping lad, with raven locks and rosy cheeks and sparkling eyes. But yesterday since he pillowed his head on the bosom of his mother and was soothed to sleep by her soft lullaby.

On December 13 we closed a nine nights' three-cornered debate, a synopsis of which might be of interest to the readers of the HERALD. Last summer Elder David Smith and the writer held a short series of meetings in an unoccupied church about two miles southwest from a small railroad station by the name of Hanson, and about fourteen miles south of Pana, Illinois.

Our services were quite well attended, and quite an interest was awakened, and when we closed quite a number said, "Come again." Just before Thanksgiving, while I was at Pana, Bro. Smith went to the place named above and, after some effort, secured the use of a schoolhouse and began preaching to a large and interested audience. He had been there, however, but a short time when he received word that a very learned preacher of the Campbellite faith was coming to challenge him for a discussion; and soon after this challenger made his appearance, and just as Bro. Smith closed his discourse he arose and asked the privilege to ask some questions; and, being told that he could, he asked Bro. Smith if he would affirm that "Old Joe Smith was a prophet of God, or that the Book of Mormon was of divine origin," etc., etc.; at the same time he made some insulting remarks to a gentleman who was leaving the house, saying, "What are you running for?" and "The wicked flee when no man pursueth." Bro. Smith told him that it was his meeting, and that it was no place for such remarks; Smith then dismissed the meeting and then informed the man that he was not seeking controversy, nor was he out to challenge other people or to attack their individual beliefs, but he believed he represented God's eternal truth, and was prepared to defend it, and if the gentleman wished to discuss church propositions he was ready to do so.

The result was the following propositions were signed: "Resolved, That the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, of which I am a member, is in harmony with the Bible in organization, faith, teaching, and practice. D. Smith affirms; J. E. Prophater denies. Resolved, That the Church of Christ, of which I am a member, is in harmony with the Bible in organization, faith, teaching, and practice. J. E. Prophater affirms; D. Smith denies."

The debate began on Wednesday evening, December 4, with a crowded house, many being unable to obtain seats. Bro. Smith led off in fine shape, affirming for the Reorganized Church; but when his opponent took the floor he did just what we had anticipated he would do, attacked the Book of Mormon, evidently thinking Bro. Smith would follow his lead along that line; but we had resolved to pay no attention to anything he might say along that line, nor to call him to order, preferring to let him waste his time along that line if he wanted to do so; and when he saw that Bro. Smith would not chase any of his turkeys, he came back to the question and tried to negate the subject under consideration, but at the same time lamenting the fact that he could not discuss the Book of Mormon, saying, "We dare not put it up; I dare them to do it; oh, let me just get at that little book and I will whip it to a frazzle; I will make it look like a straw-stack in a Kansas cyclone." And this he continued to do in each speech during the six nights of discussion, also saying, "I meet all comers and they go down"; "I will divide time with any man that walks the earth." I met one of their men in Colorado (Curtis by name), and I finished him in proper shape." "I will debate with them a week or a month in any place or at any time they may name"; and much more such buncombe.

His efforts to deny Bro. Smith's arguments were feeble, indeed, and his entire stock in trade consisted in a denial of any church or gospel before Pentecost, and the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Said there were but twelve apostles, but finally admitted thirteen; this he was forced to do because he took the position that to be an apostle one must have seen Christ, and Paul had seen him; finally admitted more than we asked him to by admitting that Timothy and Titus were apostles, but later denied that he said so, but still later admitted it again.

When it came his turn to affirm, then he did just what Bro. Smith had predicted he would do, i. e., only affirm the church as it is described in the New Testament with dead apostles, dead prophets, and dead everything but pastors and teachers. A church without a head, without officers, without any visible organization, and without any authority, only that which was assumed from a commission given nearly two thousand years ago to the first officers chosen, and his whole superstructure built on a big "IF" we have the right to preach, we have a right to administer the right of baptism and such other ordinances as we think proper to administer.

His denial of any visible organization put him completely in Bro. Smith's hands, and he made it so clear that only those who were so blinded by prejudice that they would not admit it, could clearly see that the man was down and out.

In his closing speech Elder Prophater read several challenges which he asked us to sign, the principal import of each was that Joseph Smith was a prophet and that the Book of Mormon is of divine origin. When he had read these and taken his seat, I took the floor, and after referring to the fact that the elder had made considerable noise, quoted some of the things he had said relative to meeting all comers, that he would divide time with any man that walked the earth, and would debate us a month if we wanted to, at any place or time we would name, said, I have the following to present: "Resolved, That the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, of whom I am a member, is in complete harmony with the Bible in organization, faith, teaching, and practice. _____ affirms, _____ denies. Resolved, That the Church of Christ, of which I am a member, is in complete harmony with the Bible in organization, faith, teaching, and practice. _____ affirms; _____ denies." The discussion of the above propositions to be held sometime during the month of January, 1908. Will you sign these? Prophater said: "Why don't you sign some of these challenges I have read? Why don't you put up your Book of Mormon? That is what I want to get at." Burr says: "Oh, that is the trouble with you, is it? Well, we have had that little wagon loaded up for several days; here it is:

"Resolved, That the Book of Mormon is of divine origin and is worthy the belief and respect of intelligent people. Chas. H. Burr affirms; _____ denies. Will you sign them now?" Prophater said, "I had rather debate the Book of Mormon in Pana than here." "Well, sir, we will give you a chance in Pana if you want it; but you have challenged us here to put up this book and said we dare not do it, and now I have accepted your challenge, and I want you to do as you have said, and so I again ask you to sign these propositions."

Prophater: "Well, I want to look them over a little more." "All right, look them over; they are typewritten and easy to read, and I will read them to you again." I did so.

Prophater still manifested a disposition to evade the issue, when I said, "In every speech you have made before this audience you have challenged us to debate the Book of Mormon, and said we dare not do it; and now we have accepted your challenge, and you owe it to this people to meet it here, and I demand that you do so." He inquired, "When do you want to begin?" I answered, "To-morrow night, for a three-night discussion, as that is all the time I can devote to it this time." Prophater then said he had no bank account, and did not know if he had friends that would care for him if he went to Pana. I said, "There is a large Christian Church there and they are holding a revival service there now." But he said he had but little to do with them, and it was evident that he was not affiliating with the orthodox Christian Church, sometimes called Campbellites; in short it was apparent that he had at some time had a row with his mother and left home.

We told him that expenses while at Pana need not trouble him, as we were authorized by the Saints there to tell him they would care for him, and he would be put to no expense while there. It was apparent that all this was having a marked impression on the audience, and he saw that the only thing for him to do was to meet his challenge and sign up, which he did.

The following night we began on the Book of Mormon proposition and met with just the kind of argument that we had anticipated: "Joseph Smith, if of the seed of that Joseph of Egypt, must come down through the lineage of Nephi, hence of Indian descent." "The brother of Jared saw the Lord." "Barges the length of a tree." "Hole in the bottom, hole at the top." "Tight like a dish." "Jesus Christ born at Jerusalem, and baptism before John the Baptist." He attempted to meet but very few of the arguments presented, and even these were far from being successful; and when it came to the archaeological, ethnological, and lingual evidences he was in over his head, and never attempted an answer. So far as Bible was concerned, in his first speech he said he did not believe in the Book of Mormon because it was too much like the Bible; agreed too well with the Bible. In reply, we said that was just why we did believe it, for if it was different from, or did not agree with the Bible, we would neither believe it nor ask others to do so. Then, in his second speech he said that the reason why he did not believe in the Book of Mormon, was because it was so different from the Bible." This is only a fair sample of how he would tie himself up, and when asked to explain he would either deny or keep silent.

It is unnecessary to prolong this further, except to say that results are that in the country where the discussion was held, prior to that time it was a hard matter to secure a house to hold preaching-services in; now five school-houses are open for us, and people are clamoring for us to come and preach for them, and we know that we now have many friends in that country, and also have made friends for the gospel. I look for still further developments in additions to the church at no distant day. Circumstances made it necessary for me to return home for a few days, as I had been absent for nearly three months, and I wished to attend our district conference, which is now near at hand. I expect to return to Pana immediately after the district conference in Chicago, January 18 and 19, and will expect the discussion for which Prophater has signed articles of agreement will begin just as soon as arrangements can be perfected; and if it does not fill the Saints' church in that city to its utmost capacity I shall be sadly disappointed. I also look for an awakening in the city that will result in an increased membership.

Yours for the truth,
PLANO, Illinois, December 26, 1907. C. H. BURR.

WIRT, Indiana, January 20, 1908.

Dear Herald: During these winter months I have not been as active as I would like on account of my great lameness. For about thirty years I have been affected with hip-joint disease. For the last two years it has been getting worse, so that now, at times, I suffer great pain and weakness. So I have to be very careful of myself, as far as physical efforts are concerned. Am not able to walk far at a time. One great object in writing this letter is that the Saints might know of my true condition and make my case a subject of prayer, so that if it be God's will, I may be healed, or relieved sufficiently to endure the fatigue I have to pass through as a missionary in this church. I want to assure everybody that I am trying to live worthily before God and this church, that I may be worthy to receive any good thing the Lord may be pleased to bestow upon me. I keep just as busy in the work as I possibly can, under these circumstances.

I baptized two worthy persons recently, near Byrneville, Indiana; one a man who was in the last stages of consumption, very weak and wasted in flesh. We made a large box, and filled it with sufficient warm water to immerse him, in his home, which proved to be a success. Much of the Holy Spirit was had in his baptism and confirmation. Later he received the sacrament, and was administered to. This brought him great peace, and a contented, reconciled mind. But it was not God's will to fully heal him, and he passed peacefully away on the morning of January 5, 1908, the writer preaching the sermon to a large audience of relatives and friends, in the church at Byrneville, assisted by Bro. Metcalf, of Louisville, Kentucky.

I am now here, preaching in the Saints' church near Wirt, using my charts to illustrate the gospel story. Am so far the organist, as well as doing all the preaching. Nice, large, attentive audiences are in attendance. A few Saints here, under the leadership of our worthy brother, J. J. Boswell, are striving to keep the work alive under adverse circumstances. This is where William Marshall, Richard Scott, J. D. Porter, and L. F. Daniels were once prominent ministers and missionaries, but left the church. Bro. Marshall now preaches for the Baptist Church, and Richard Scott for the Christian Church in neighborhoods adjacent to this branch. But we are grateful that we find the few still determined to remain in this work, and some outside appear to be not far from the kingdom.

Our district conference will be held in Bryneville, the 15th and 16th of February, 1908. Bro. J. W. Wight, minister in charge, has promised to be with us. We hope for a good attendance of Saints from branches and isolated places, throughout the district. We feel sure the Lord has and does abundantly bless us in our labors, for which we are grateful indeed.

In gospel bonds,

F. L. SAWLEY.

KNOX, Indiana, January 21, 1908.

Editors Herald: I came to this point the 11th, and have been continuously engaged in the public, as well as the private administration of the word. Have occupied eleven times up to date. Audiences have increased, and interest aroused. The people have done well in coming to our services, in the face of a sensational revival conducted by the Free Methodists, and the imperative warning for the people not to attend our meetings. Says their evangelist, of Illinois: "I warn you in the name of Jesus Christ, to stay away from that hellish doctrine." Fearful warning! He had the liberty to so warn, as one of the "heaped teachers," of whom Paul prophesied, as being engaged in "turning the ears of the people away from the truth, and turning them to fables"; but to commit Jesus Christ and his authority to this edict of religious slavery, this stab at religious liberty, this anti-Christian sentiment, is monstrous, in the face of the fact that Jesus taught: "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them," and, "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear"; while his chief apostle taught: "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." Well, some did not heed the warning sounded by the self-righteous, self-called evangelist, but came to the Saints' services.

The work here, is on a better footing than for some time. The Religio is doing a fine work under the lead of Sr. Bertha Lohse. She seems to be the right one for the place. She is a sister of sterling qualities, and pushes ahead with commendable determination. A nice crowd of young people, who are not members of the church, are enlisted in the Religio work. The program committee seems to have the work well in hand, and the literary part is executed with skill. Recitations, essays, music, vocal and instrumental, form the features of the program. The program last Sunday evening was away above the average, the lesson subject was the third principle of the doctrine of Christ—baptism. And it did my soul good to see the prompt response from the class, and the intelligence manifested therein. This is the second Religio local in this district. Is it not possible for others to engage in this great work, and organize a district association? Wake up, wake up, "ye little Boy Blue," and seize the opportunity offered you. Remember, the golden moments, so freighted with splendid offerings, may never return! The Saints have electric light in the chapel now, and oh, how nice! There are seven large bulbs of thirty-two candle power each, and when the preacher is blessed with inspired utterances, the light increases. Well, the gospel seed is sown, and, I believe, with liberality. So many young men and women seem intense in their interest, and good behavior, and the gentle Spirit seems to point out the seed going to the soil of their hearts, that we feel impressed that with the right "nursing," these nestlings will fledge the right way. *

Bro. and Sr. Prettyman, the staunch, pioneer Saints of Knox, are just the same as of yore. Sr. Prettyman, although seventy years of age, has attended every service, wading through slush, over ice, and most all conditions of roads, streets, walks, and was usually one of the "first on the spot." What think ye, ye other grandmas of the district?

There are five church buildings in this town, and eleven denominations are here represented. The town has a population of about two thousand five hundred, and about one third of this number make no profession. So you will note that some have said, in the past: "Lo here; lo there."

We are hopeful of good being developed here, and the cause more firmly established, as the multiplicity of religious ideas gives us good opportunity to present the "one body" of Christ to better effect.

Hopefully yours,

Dear Herald: The name Etna is strange to most of your readers, I presume, and because of this I feel like adding my mite to your pages, believing that it will cause all to feel good to know that there may be a possible opening for missionary work here, a place practically unknown, where the gospel trumpet has not as yet been sounded. Etna is merely a post-office, situated on the slope eastward from the north fork of the beautiful Lewis River. The regions round about are dotted with comfortable homes and ranches, but the principal industry conducted in this locality is lumbering. There is a wealth of timber, mostly yellow fir, for miles in every direction, though it is being cut off very rapidly, and what now forms a great part of the pride of this beautiful America, is fast giving way to the on-slaughts of the saw and ax, and we will have only the blackened stumps to remind us of American enterprise. The great question, Does it pay? which the Government is now trying to solve, will then be answered quite easily. Of course, all this means logging and saw-mill camps, where these workers can live, and it is in one of these camps that the writer is situated, where we hope the angel's message will some day be understood and embraced.

Formerly of Detroit, Michigan, but more recently of Vancouver, Washington, we came up here last July 6, to look after one of the company's general stores; and, Saints, let me say that to one who has always had the privilege of attending the various meetings of the church, it is quite a trial to get along without the association of those of like faith. The church can get along without us; but we make a great mistake when we suppose we can get along rightly without it. We are almost sure to make shipwreck of our own little bark on life's great sea, without the influence of God's Saints, and the companionship and instruction of his servants. I have been made to realize how the Saints who are isolated from church privileges should appreciate the work that is being performed by those in charge of the various church publications. The general make-up of the papers bear silent, yet potent testimony of the zeal and energy expended for our development and good. At present we take the HERALD, Autumn Leaves, and the Sunday School Exponent, and we can not estimate their value to us. The grand articles and sermons, the inspiring letters and news from other parts, all tend to strengthen the ties which bind us as one to our God, brethren; and fellow men. Truly they have been a great help to us in our present condition. May we all help out what we can by being subscribers during 1908. I think that every branch of any importance should appoint a press agent to report items of interest to the church papers, and to give a proper directory of their place of worship and the residence of the pastor, so that officials and missionaries, also visiting Saints, could locate the place of meeting, etc. Often times branches have to secure larger church buildings, and the ministers have to move from one part to another, and such changes should be reported, or else misunderstanding will result. For example, I noticed not long since that the pastor of the Detroit Branch, as per directory in Ensign, is given as Elder George M. Shippy, 153 Townsend Avenue, Detroit, Michigan, whereas Elder Shippy has not been pastor of said branch for over two years, and has been living in Port Huron, Michigan, for some time. Detroit Saints should take notice of this, and inform Ensign correctly.

Though debarred from mingling with the Saints, as before stated, yet we are thankful that since November 3, 1907, we have had the privilege of attending each Sunday at half past two in the afternoon, the New Hope Union Sunday-school, which has been organized here in camp, with a membership of twenty-five, a goodly number being children, and all manifesting good interest. The writer as superintendent, a Methodist lady assistant superintendent. My wife is secretary, and we have all other officers necessary to a Sabbath-school. They are all exceptionally bright and intelligent for camps of this nature, mostly Americans. Our studies and teachings are supposed to be undenominational, using the International Quarterly, as published by David C. Cook Company; but to my mind, in order to teach, and not cater to any creed or sect, we will have to teach the pure gospel as is found in that book of books, as it was delivered to us by holy hands in these latter days, our creed being "All Truth." So may we live the gospel each day, and thus pave the way for a more able instructor than the writer.

We understand that our brethren, Elders Thorburn and Davis, felt impressed to come up here last summer to try to effect an opening, and we wish to say to them that we hope we may some day have the privilege of welcoming them to our midst in their good work. Being members of the Vancouver Branch, we also are interested in its development. The work there, under the direction of Elder N. T. Chapman, is making progress. Our brother is a good pilot, and if his hands are help up by his colaborers, and the flock, the branch is bound to accomplish its work. Most of the members have had years of experience in the church, and consequently are thoroughly rooted, and understand what great good can be accomplished by a faithful, honest life. The branch was organized December 4, 1906, with eight members, Bro. Harry Jones being president, and in a trifle over one year has grown to a membership of twenty-six, two being added by baptism last fall and winter. Most of the members have been added by letter from other parts. Gradually the Saints are building up a stronghold, and each is awakening to a deeper sense of his duty, and to the fact that his sphere of usefulness may be increased in many ways. The sisters deserve credit for their energy in organizing their society, the Willing Helpers, who are already making practical use of their talent with needle and sewing-machine, we hope to the good of the needy poor, as per their constitution. The young people should be encouraged in their recent effort to get a Religio local on a working basis. Truly the study of the Book of Mormon is a grand study, and the lessons therein contained can not help but be beneficial. The musical and literary phase of the local should be carried out, as it tends to lift us one round higher, on the great ladder of true development. Thus our prayers are with our Vancouver Saints, and we miss their pleasant associations very much.

An incident comes to our mind which we think will be of help to some, especially to Bro. Sim P. Carpender, if he happens to read our letter. We have not met Bro. Carpender, but a Mr. Stanley Raynor, who until recently was mill foreman here in camp, was well acquainted with the brother, and it encouraged us to hear him tell of the little things Bro. Carpender did, his little acts of kindness, which have won for him the esteem of many of the Wisconsin community. It sounds good to hear an outsider say, "If ever there was a good man to work for it was one of those Latter Day Saints." After a few pleasant talks with Mr. Raynor, I knew that Bro. Carpender was one of our faith, and it made us glad in the gospel, for our brother, and also for the church. Mr. Raynor and I became quite intimate, and I am sure he would like to hear from his friend Carpender. His address is Etna, Washington. Saints, we are being watched, so let us try to do right, and then no man can say aught against us. Hoping we may all have courage to endure faithfully.

Yours in bonds,

L. B. SHIPPY.

RAILROAD RATES TO GENERAL CONFERENCE.

The railroad rates hitherto agreed upon, of one and one third fare, to General Conferences and Conventions, certificate plan, will not be offered by the various passenger associations for the reason "that the fares to Independence from a large number of States are now on the basis of two cents per mile, which will afford practically the same reduction as would be accorded by fare and one third on the basis of the old rates." The Chairman of the Western Association states: "These fares will no doubt satisfactorily take care of persons desiring to attend your meeting, and, on behalf of the individual lines interested, would say that it is deemed impracticable, under existing conditions, to announce any further reduction."

Will advise if anything of advantage occurs affecting rates from Pacific Coast or other points.

R. S. SALYARDS, Church Secretary.

Died.

BUMP.—Catharine Anna Bump was born in Delaware County, Ohio, October 11, 1823, and in 1842 was married to John Robertson. Of this union four children were born, of whom only one daughter survives. She was married to David H. Bump in 1852, and of them were born seven children, two of whom are still living. She joined the Latter Day Saint Church in the year 1842, and renewed her covenant with the Reorganized Church by baptism in 1862, under the ministry of George Morey. The gospel has been her foremost thought, and she has made every effort to keep the camp-fire burning. She has been an obedient Saint, a faithful wife, and a blessed mother. Those who knew her longest loved her best. She departed this life January 22, at eleven o'clock at night, at Lamoni, Iowa. We do not mourn for her as one dead; but as one who has fought a good fight and is prepared to wear a crown with the righteous. Funeral service at the house, which was well filled with Saints and friends. Prayer by F. M. Weld; sermon by E. E. Long. Interment in Rose Hill Cemetery.

CORTHELL.—Jonathan CortHELL was born in Camden, Maine, February 24, 1827. Was united in marriage with Sarah Jane Lunt, September 3, 1864. Was baptized in 1841. He, with his family, moved to California, where he heard the preaching of the Reorganized Church by its elders, confessed to his wife that he had belonged to the true church for over forty years; and with them was baptized into the Reorganized Church. Died at Independence, January 14. Funeral from the Saints' church, January 16; Reverend Devol, of the Christian Church, offering prayer; sermon by President Joseph Smith; W. H. Garrett in charge.

BAILEY.—Olive Curtis was born May 29, 1839, at Quincy, Branch County, Michigan. Was baptized at Galien, Michigan, June 3, 1865, by John Shippy. Was married to Oliver J. Bailey, April 16, 1866. Of this union were born five children. One died while young; four, Albert, Martha, Roma, and Oliver remain to mourn her departure from earth-life, which took place near Akron, Harrison County, Missouri, January 17, 1908. Funeral-services at the home, in charge of R. M. Elvin; sermon by A. S. Cochran. Buried in Rose Hill Cemetery, Lamoni, Iowa.

ANDERSON.—Kerston Marie Anderson, was born in 1824, in Denmark. Married to Christ Anderson, in 1876. United with the Reorganized Church in 1878. Died December 21, 1907. Her husband and one daughter preceded her, leaving one daughter, nine grandchildren, and seven great grandchildren to mourn their loss. She was loved by all who knew her. She had told some that she would die before Christmas, and did not seem to fear the change. Funeral services at her home in Fremont, Nebraska, M. M. Bilyne, priest, officiating. Interred in Fremont Cemetery.

ADAM.—Hugo Victor, born September 19, 1886; died at Los Angeles, California, December 14, 1907. Baptized by J. F. Burton, July 20, 1895. Two weeks after his return from the St. Louis Fair, he was taken down with rheumatic fever, which permanently impaired the action of the heart. He suffered indescribable pain and distress more or less for three years; but through it all was the personification of patience, submission, and Christian fortitude. He arranged everything to the least detail as to his funeral, which was most impressive. Sermon by T. W. Williams. He leaves mother, brother, and two sisters.

AUSTIN.—Catharine Ure Cairns was born in Canada, March 5, 1830, and resided there until she was twenty years of age, when she removed with her parents to Mendota, Illinois. While living in Canada she was baptized by Elder Zenos Gurley, Sr. On September 7, 1873, she was married to Elijah Austin and removed to Sublette, Illinois, where they enjoyed a happy home together until March 24, 1888, when he died. In 1895, she removed to California, where she spent her last years surrounded by her children, who are left to mourn. Died December 14, 1907. May her rest be sweet!

MILLER.—Sr. Mary E. Miller, December 29, 1907, at her home near Theodore, Alabama. Passed peacefully away after a lingering illness of about six months. She was the wife of Bro. P. M. Miller. She leaves husband and seven children to mourn, but not as those who have no hope. The funeral was from the Baptist church. Sermon by Alma Booker.

SMITH.—Near Macedonia, Iowa, December 29, 1907, Stephen Smith. Born January 28, 1836, New Castle, Indiana. While yet a small boy he moved with his parents to Nauvoo, Illinois; and with a body of Saints moved to Garden Grove, Iowa; and later, in 1847, to Macedonia, Iowa, where he has since remained. He joined the church in early manhood and remained a member through life. He lived to a good, ripe age, and leaves many friends to mourn with the family, the loss of a friend and neighbor. The funeral was at the old home; sermon by Daniel Hougas.

BOWEN.—At Vales Mills, Ohio, January 3, 1908, Martha Sharp Bowen. Born October 23, 1857, near Albany, Athens County, Ohio. Baptized December 23, 1886, by Elder T. J. Beatty. She leaves husband, one daughter, and three sons to mourn their loss, two daughters having preceded her in death. Funeral-sermon by H. E. Moler, to a large concourse of relatives and friends.

FLORY.—Mary Alice Flory was born March 10, 1875, in Holt County, Missouri. After an illness of twelve weeks, she passed peacefully to her rest, December 29, 1907. She united with the church in 1887. Besides father, mother, brother, and three sisters, she leaves a host of loving friends to mourn her departure. Funeral-sermon by J. B. Carmichael.

SCOTT.—At his home, near New Albany, Indiana, Elder James G. Scott, January 5, 1908, leaving to mourn an aged companion, Barbara, one daughter, Lousie A., seven grandchildren, and thirteen great grandchildren. He was born at Scottsville, Indiana, August 6, 1822. Baptized in 1870, and ordained elder at the same time. Died with the full assurance of coming forth on the morn of the first resurrection. He exhorted the family to live faithfully and be prepared for the coming of the Lord. He was shown in vision, glories which no tongue could tell, which reconciled him to the change.

HARRIS.—At Anaconda, Montana, December 18, 1907, Mary Harris, wife of the late Isaac Harris. She was born at Merthyr Tydfil, Wales, April 13, 1833. United with the church at Deer Lodge, Montana. Services were held in the Presbyterian church, at Anaconda, by Gomer Reese, the Presbyterian choir rendering the song-service. She was laid to rest in the cemetery at Butte, by the side of her husband, where a delegation of Welsh singers, from the Welsh congregation at Butte, rendered the song-service, in their mother tongue. She leaves two sons and three daughters to mourn their loss.

TARRANT.—J. D. Tarrant died at his home in Newberg, Sunday, November 10, at the age of seventy-six years, lacking eighteen days. The deceased was born November 29, 1831, at Marlborough, England. Came to the United States in March, 1854. Was married to Mrs. Emma Smith February 1, 1850, and to them were born one son, E. C. Tarrant, who lives in Viewfield, South Dakota, and three daughters, Mrs. Emma Crawford who died at Goldendale, Washington, in 1889, Mrs. Nellie McCulley, of Newberg, and one dying in infancy. In 1874 he associated himself with the Masonic order at Hamburg, Iowa, and on April 15, 1877, he joined the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, remaining a true Christian to the time of his death. From Rochester, New York, Mr. Tarrant removed with his family to Nebraska in 1859, and to Oregon in 1884, locating at Newberg. He was an honorable, upright citizen, a friend to everybody, and was held in high esteem by all who knew him. Funeral-services conducted at the Friends' church on Tuesday morning by Mrs. Edwards. Services at the cemetery were conducted by the order to which he belonged.

Life, America's unique satirical and humorous journal, is just now celebrating its twenty-fifth birthday. The event takes the form of an anniversary number whose cover is ornamented with reductions of many of Life's most famous cartoons and sketches. The center cartoon of this issue represents Life receiving the congratulations of the President of the United States, the crowned heads of Europe, the Arts and Sciences, the numerous Presidential candidates, Anthony Comstock, the W. C. T. U., and others too numerous to mention. There are other pictures symbolical of the event and touching on Life's many fights for the better, when it was not the stronger, cause. The text is largely made up of reminiscent articles by John A. Mitchell, E. S. Martin, James S. Metcalfe, and Thomas L. Masson. Among its other attractive features is an impressive full-page drawing by Charles Dana Gibson, whose newer work has not been seen in America since his departure for Europe to study in foreign studios.

Life has many friends in America, and they will all rejoice in this evidence of its vigorous existence and continued prosperity.

Can You Afford Clean Food?

"The Cat in the Crackers and the grocer who owns the cat are in themselves harmless, but the unsanitary grocery store indicated by the one and conducted by the other is a public nuisance."

The Woman's Home Companion is now conducting a campaign for the clean grocery, and is using the above sentence, together with a picture of a black cat seated on a lot of crackers as a slogan of the campaign.

The editors of the Woman's Home Companion have been able to show not only that there is a vast difference in the way the clean grocer and the unclean grocer keep their goods and their shops, but furthermore that the careless grocer sells inferior goods and charges more for them in the long run than does the clean grocer for high-grade products.

Here is the result of one test made by one of the editors. The accuracy of the result is backed up by numerous other examples:

IN BEHALF OF THE MANAGEMENT OF THE JACKSON COUNTY BANK

I take the liberty of soliciting your patronage as we are in a position to do BANKING BUSINESS BY MAIL very satisfactorily. Open accounts can be placed with us for safety at your convenience and command. We have opened a savings department, paying interest on accounts of $1 or more and each member of the family should become interested in having a bank account building for future needs. We also pay interest on time deposit certificates. A number of the brethren are living here, others are looking forward to this location as a future home, and late revelation and admonition foreshadow coming events, adding materially to our spiritual holdings necessary to signs of the times, and in this connection our Board of Directors propose to safeguard the financial interests of the Saints by offering to them a depository proof against graft, greed, or calamity, governed by a kindred feeling born of the interest we have in common. It is not popular men, large capital, heavy deposits, National or State laws, that offer absolute security to depositors, but directors and officers progressive and conservative, possessed of the virtue of true manhood, shorn of all political ambition, with no taste for frenzied finance or mining speculation, with no inclination to furnish funds for others in that line. I point with considerable just pride (I assume) to our Board of Directors as named below. Feel at liberty to write us on matters that concern you in Jackson County, Missouri.

OFFICERS: Ellis Short, President; M. H. Bond, Second Vice-president; William Crick, First Vice-president; J. D. Briggs, Cashier.

SOME CONTRASTS.

Colorado is a land of contrasts. Yes, here is where the setting sun maintains his vigor to the last moment, then plunges abruptly below the horizon; and night, without any false modesty or preliminary courtship, embraces the earth.

It was our privilege recently to climb one vertebra of the backbone of the continent, via the Cripple Creek Stage road. Surely, scenery more rugged than that traversed by this old stage line can hardly be conceived. Down yonder in the valley, people sip at the soda-fountain, or breakfast daintily at ten o'clock, and are manicured by a professional; up here, at Wade's ranch, we met an old mountaineer who lives on bacon and flapjacks and bottled goods, who would regard a manicure set as the last resort of the decadent. At least he can claim that he stands on a higher pinnacle than the others.

By way of contrast, the next day (Sunday) found us far out of sight of the mountains, on the level and limitless plains of Eastern Colorado. Yesterday 'twas the indescribable tumult and upheaval frozen into solid granite; to-day 'tis the passionless dead-level of the plains.

These plains,—no wonder that the jackrabbits and coyotes have developed speed; they have to be speedy to get anywhere in a day. Also such vast tracts of unoccupied territory to be traversed, and the beckoning of the distant horizon, must inflame their ambition to the limit; and so they vanish in one heroic burst of speed and spurt of dust. Even dull man feels a desire to get somewhere where he can look over the edge of something. In the mountains the impulse is to get up; on these plains the impulse (shall we say it?) is to get away. Perhaps that is the reason that is back of the statement made to us by one land agent, that only one fifth of the people who come here to homestead remain and make permanent homes. The majority of them come, serve their time, get the claim clear, and sell out. Probably those who come later will build better houses, plant fruit- and shade-trees, and in time will have pleasant and happy homes.

At present, the prospect, in some particulars, is not inviting. As we speed along on our train, we notice a type: a little dry-goods-box of a house, surely not more than eight by ten or ten by twelve feet in size,—one room. Another little box, large enough to shelter two horses, stands near. There is not a tree or a bush in sight, and the great heavens above and the limitless stretch of the plains on every hand make it all seem indescribably little and mean and home-sick. Other men in distant cities are living in palaces so grand and so large that many of the rooms are seldom opened. They have immense green lawns, clothing to the point of suffocation, food and drink to induce Bright's disease. They are brothers to this man in the shack; but they have gotten so far apart that no one remembers the family connection. They recognize no mutual obligations. Only the gospel can ever break down their indifference and make them take an interest in each other; and break down their selfishness and make them willing to help each other.

The cause of our little journey was the death of Sr. Catherine Winegar, wife of Mosiah Winegar, formerly of Gallands Grove Branch, Iowa, whose funeral-services we were called upon to conduct at her home town, Burlington, Colorado. She died on the forty-fifth anniversary of her marriage. The then, of youth, hope, and love, and the now, of old age and death, furnish a contrast that is hardly lessened by the brief forty-five years that intervene.

The services were held in the Methodist church, and the building was crowded with people, many of whom, the pastor told us, were never before seen at church. This is the only church building in the county-seat of Kit Carson County, and the pastor has a following of only eighty-five members, out of seven or eight hundred town residents, and a vast stretch of surrounding country that is not exactly a forest of church steeples. That does not speak very highly for the religious fervor of the community, yet wait! This little flock of members maintains a commodious church building, a neat and roomy parsonage, and supports a minister and his family.

How many branches of eighty-five members in the Latter Day Saints' Church do better, financially? How many small branches consider the burden of keeping up branch expenses very heavy, even when the local elder donates all his time and supports himself and family?

The pastor, Reverend Inskeep, assisted in the services, and was very courteous and kind. Surely a contrast when compared with the treatment that some ministers accord our elders. The Methodist choir furnished music, using our hymn-books. The sermon was taken down and the editor of the local paper asked the privilege of publishing it.

Elders F. A. Russell and E. F. Shupe labored at this place for a time during the past summer. They held street-services, and in the intervals between ministerial duties constructed a dwelling-house for Bro. F. B. Shumate, who lives on a ranch near the town. The dwelling still stands. It was here where Bro. Shupe tried the bareheaded cure for baldness, and not having reckoned with the fervor and intensity of the Colorado sun, was surprised and pained at the results.

From the train that bore us back to Colorado Springs we were permitted to see the sunrise on the plains. The suddenness with which he appeared and the alacrity with which he began to attend to his duties of enlightening the world were astonishing. Yet in the brief interval between darkness and daylight there was a period when the desert, if we may call it such, no land agents being present, was flooded with bright colors,—blue, azure, emerald, gold. The landscape was one vast, colored postcard,—forgive the unpoetical comparison.

Speaking of contrasts: We are reminded that some people still send the editors money orders to apply on subscriptions; while others send original articles to the business manager.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

AN APPRECIATION.

Sister Robert Smith, whose untimely death we deplore in this issue, was well known to many of the Saints who are in America as well as in England. Her father, Henry Greenwood, has long enjoyed the confidence and esteem of the church, in conjunction with other veteran brethren, whose unceasing and ungrudging activity laid the foundation of the Reorganized Church in this part of the vineyard and consequently brought the family into association with a wide circle of friends. Sister Lizzie (as she was familiarly called) being an especial favorite, owing to her brightness and affability of disposition.

In all church work and Sunday-school enterprise as scholar and teacher, she was to the fore as a worker. She will be very much missed in all of those offices of loving service which at conferences, school entertainments, and branch gatherings are the especial duties of the sisters.

How we shall miss her happy presence, her merry jest and ringing laugh! Always to the fore in pleasure as in toil.

It is now nearly twenty years since we first made the acquaintance of our sister, and amid all the changes which are inevitable in life, she remained always the same bright, active, and sympathetic nature.

Her marriage with Bro. Robert Willett Smith proved to be a very happy union, and their home became a very pleasant resort for the visiting Saints, and many a pleasant memory of the kindly hospitality will linger in the minds of many. The consequent departure from the home of her girlhood was a wrench especially felt by her mother, whose health for many years has been very indifferent; but the trial of the separation was palliated by the proximity of the parent home and the one to which she had now removed. And, during all the ten years of married happiness, the affectionate intimacy between mother and daughter was continued in the spirit of mutual companionship.

Now, no more will she gladden the old home, nor be granted to soothe in times of illness or of sorrow; that ministry has been transferred to other realms, but surely has not ceased.

It was not granted that the marriage should grace the union with the blossom of childhood. Indeed, it was the occasion of intense bitterness that the crowning bliss of matrimonial responsibility was in evidence and the promised blessing eagerly anticipated; the black cloud of disappointment spread itself until all hope was banished and then the blight fell upon our sister in one short week of anguish, and the end came with remorseless swiftness.

The home of serene contentment was now a house of mourning, and the bright "jewel" was encoffined and lay there bereft of the grace of life; and the "setting" was impoverished of her enriching presence. The news of her death came upon her friends as a sudden calamity, and sorrow filled their hearts. Those who had been near, and in loving tenderness and sympathy had done all that could be done, were stricken with grief, and in spite of all she had eluded their attempts to retain her.

"She's gone, her work on earth is done."

The day of the funeral was very suggestive, the summer glory was stricken with the autumnal tints of death, and the near approach of the winter's blast was heralded by the moaning wind, the rustle of dead leaves, the pale yellow of the rapidly westering sun, and a chilling dampness pervaded everything; we laid her casket to rest and sought to comfort ourselves with the sublime words of hope the Christian philosophy has given, corroborated with the history of its power over death and the grave.

The large crowd of sympathizers bore eloquent testimony to her recognized worth, and the magnificent floral tributes were mute and fragrant witnesses to her excellency of character. Truly it could be said of her, "She being dead yet speaketh." The Manchester District conference convened on the first Saturday and Sunday in October, and it was an opportune time to have the memorial service, which was in charge of Brn. Dewsnup and James Baty, Bro. J. W. Rushton being the preacher. Bro. S. F. Mather and daughter Evelyn sang very sweetly and effectively the beautiful funeral hymn written by Mark H. Forscutt to the tune "Electa."

The following resolution of sympathy and condolence was passed by the conference, and a copy ordered to be presented to the bereaved husband and the parents.

"Inasmuch as it has pleased our heavenly Father to take to himself our sister, Elizabeth Smith, we, the undersigned, on behalf of the Manchester District of the Church of Jesus Christ, by instruction of the conference, present to our Bro. Robert Smith, and Bro. and Sr. Henry Greenwood and family, this letter of condolence, hereby expressing the deepest sympathy in love that we all feel with them in this great loss of one, who, as wife, daughter, and sister, has been their companion and associate for so many years.

"We can not penetrate the 'valley of the shadows' and unravel the mystery of this dispensation of Providence, which has severed these holy ties of affection, and left us mourning the removal from our midst, one whose grace of character and brightness of disposition had won the love and esteem of so many besides kith and kin. Yet, we most confidently believe that our heavenly Father will overrule every circumstance for the best and abiding good of his children. Therefore, while the gloomy shadow of the immediate sorrow hangs heavily upon us, we still look for the coming of that time, when, disrobed of the fleshly 'veiling,' the soul resplendent in the beauty of 'the house from heaven,' with which it has been 'clothed upon,' shall see the glory of God undimmed by sin, sorrow, or death, and therein read the meaning of these mysteries, which so often have ruined our hopes, blighted our ambitions, and covered our brightest visions with the frosts of death.

"We earnestly pray that God will speak comfort to each soul; and, in his way and time, will consecrate 'the gospel of sorrow' under which we mourn to-day, for our refining, and so prepare us for the coming reunion in our Father's home, when once again, under happier and brighter conditions, the happy memories and loving ties shall be resumed and blend in the music of the spheres, to the praise and glory of him, who, in life, in death, is ever the hope and refuge of his people.

"In loving sympathy, on behalf of the conference,

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

Most visitors to Salt Lake City have heard of the acoustic properties of the tabernacle. A writer in the Macomb Daily Journal, quoted in the Nauvoo Rustler, January 21, has this to say regarding that wonderful story: "On these grounds an object of interest to the visitor is the tabernacle, which is one hundred and fifty feet by two hundred feet, eighty feet high, and has a comfortable seating capacity of eight thousand. This building was erected without nails, thongs or wooden pins being used in their place. The acoustic properties of the building are wonderful. You have heard before that a pin when dropped can be heard the length of the building. At a banquet I told a story I had heard about the pin incident, that ran something like this: 'The sound of the pin when dropped reverberates from end to end of the building, growing louder and louder until it sounds like thunder, and soon rain begins to fall.'"

We deny the doctrine of the ancient Epicureans, that pleasure is the supreme good; of Hobbes, that moral rules are only the work of men's natural fear; of Paley, that what is expedient is right, and that there is no difference among pleasures except their intensity and duration; and of Bentham, that the rules of human action are to be obtained by counting up the pleasures which actions produce.—And we maintain with Plato, that reason has a natural and rightful authority over desire and affection; with Butler, that there is a difference of kind in our principles of action; and with the general voice of mankind, that we must do what is right at whatever cost of pain and loss.—What we ought to do, that we should do, and that we must do, though it bring pain and loss.—And why? Because it is right.—W. Whewell.

Elders' Note-Book

ENLARGEMENT OF MISSIONARY WORK IN THE LOCAL BRANCH.

[A paper read before the priesthood meeting of the Los Angeles Branch, January 7, 1908, by the presiding priest of the branch.]

To the Local Priesthood Assembled; Greeting: The subject thought for to-night, "The enlargement of missionary work in the local branch," may be classed under two heads, viz.: Missionary work among the outside world, and missionary work among our own people, that is, those of the "household of faith."

To reach the outside world and present the gospel, several ways might be suggested, such as street-preaching, using the gospel tent, tracting, renting halls in different parts of the city, etc.

Knowing the cosmopolitan character of the people of this city, and the feelings that a majority have against the Latter Day Saints, it is my opinion that none of the aforementioned ways will bring many converts to the religion of Jesus Christ, although of course some good would be done.

I believe that in the future most of the converts made will be those whom we meet, man to man, and day by day, who are earnestly seeking the truth, and who can see by our lives that we are living as the Master would have us live, in fact, that we practice what we preach; and priesthood and laity should let no opportunity go by of warning our neighbors and inviting them to come to our church-house and hear the word of God, the old Jerusalem gospel.

To my mind the most important missionary work at this time is among our own people, and in our own homes.

As to missionary work in our homes, we will all concede that to all of God's work there is a head, a leader so to speak; and in the home the husband and father should be the head, and lead out and direct along spiritual as well as temporal lines.

Each head of a family in our church, and especially is this true of the priesthood, should set his own house in order, in that he should establish, first, the family altar; for therein will himself and loved ones receive spiritual strength, and his children (if there be any) will be taught how to pray, to honor God, and to believe in the efficacy of prayer.

He should also see to it that the Word of Wisdom, as outlined in Doctrine and Covenants, is strictly adhered to, and otherwise live clean and right, both physically and morally, so that the Spirit will gladly come and dwell with him and his household, they receiving spiritual food as well as bodily vigor.

Further, he and his family should attend all meetings possible, especially the sacrament-meetings; for there we renew our covenant with the Father and receive spiritual strength. This is also a command, that we meet often and partake of the emblems.

There may be extenuating circumstances at times preventing the family attending all meetings; but we can all of us improve along this line, and by patience, forbearance, and the labor of love, working together in harmony (never by coercion), the whole family be made to realize that to come to the house of the Lord is a privilege and a blessing, as well as a duty.

So having established his own household, the elder, priest, teacher, or deacon can go about his ministerial work and accomplish things by the help of God, that will build up the spiritual condition of the church, and God will be glorified through him.

How unseemly and inconsistent for one of the priesthood in visiting the Saints, to advise and exhort them to have family prayers, to come to the meetings, and to partake of the sacrament, when in his own home there are no family prayers, and his own family do not attend meetings.

The idea of leadership applies also to the priesthood, and the presiding elder or president of the branch should lead out and direct all official work connected with the branch, and his associates, the presiding priest, teacher, and deacon, should seek his advice and counsel in all matters appertaining to their work in the branch, so that everything may be done according to law and order.

The presiding elder is the spiritual head of the branch, as well as of the priesthood.

As to missionary work among the Saints, it is a fact that a great many people have been baptized into this church being grossly ignorant of the law of God, some when they were so young as not fully to understand, and not having been taught as they advanced in years. Again there are others who joined the church after reaching maturity, who have a general idea of the first principles of the gospel, but who for various reasons are densely ignorant on some of the vital points of the law.

All these may be fairly good attendants at the Sunday preaching-service, hear many good sermons, and yet never be taught along the line that they are deficient in; the pastor in his sermon at best covering any special subject only in a broad sense.

I believe that the priests, teachers, and deacons, as auxiliaries to the pastor, and under his direction, could take up special subjects, be they faith, love, charity, tithing, consecration, or whatever might seem best, and instruct and educate the Saints on these subjects so that all would grow in knowledge of what is required of a people who are coworkers with Christ in the salvation of mankind.

The point might be raised as to when and where to teach the Saints. One night a week could be set apart and the Saints invited to come to the church-house; or where several of the church live in a neighborhood, one of the number might offer his home and invite all in that locality to come; and again the brethren could visit individual families and teach and educate on any subject which may suggest itself.

The idea has obtained among some of the ministry that the teachers are not visiting officers; but I find nothing in the Doctrine and Covenants prohibiting them from visiting and teaching the Saints.

Just a little kindly criticism here of local teachers, past and present, and I hope this will be taken in the spirit in which it is given.

If I have observed correctly, I have noticed that our teachers' interpretation of their duty has been one of police duty, "To see that there is no iniquity in the church," "neither backbiting," etc., whereas, in section 17, Doctrine and Covenants, this police duty is only one, and to my mind not the most important of many duties mentioned. The word teacher means, one to impart knowledge or to cause to know. Hence, I believe the teachers can do a great work in teaching the Saints, thereby strengthening them and educating them in the law of God, making them more consistent followers of Jesus Christ.

To conclude: As we of the priesthood are the administrative power in the gospel, let us be enthusiasts in our work. We must have harmonious activity. In the future may the administration of God's law be our first thought. May we, in the integrity of our hearts, so order our lives as to come very close to the pattern given us by the lowly Nazarene. And, if we do this, our people will advance to a higher spiritual plane, the power of God will be felt among us, our sick will be healed, and the world will recognize that we are indeed a "peculiar people," whose God is the same, yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

Yours in gospel bonds,

FRED ADAM.

For my part, though I like the investigation of particular questions, I give up what is called, "the science of political economy."—There is no such science.—There are no rules on these subjects, so fixed and invariable, that their aggregate constitutes a science.—I have recently run over twenty volumes from Adam Smith to Professor Dew, and from the whole if I were to pick out with one hand all the mere truisms, and with the other all the doubtful propositions, little would be left.—Daniel Webster.

WHAT IS CO-OPERATION.

It is the principle by which God works. It is a fundamental truth; a law by which all things are brought to a state of perfection; or a combination of perfect laws working together to bring order out of disorder. Anarchy is the opposite to coöperation; for its tendency is to scatter and destroy, while the other labors to unite and build up.

Let me illustrate how God works by coöperation. We will take the vegetable kingdom for example. He has made the earth for our use. The farmer prepares the land to receive the seed, and plants it; the rains descend to water it, the sun shines to warm it; the life germ then begins to swell; roots are sent forth into the ground, shoots are sent upward; the one receives from the earth and the other from the air that which they have to contribute for the bringing it to a state of perfection. So by this example we can see and learn a lesson, how all things are brought to a state of perfection by the principle of coöperation. On the other hand, should any one of those laws fail to do its part, death and destruction would follow. Now, if we ever expect to see Zion redeemed, we must have that same perfect coöperation with God in all things; for it is written that we are, or should be coworkers with him. If this be true, how can we ever expect to bring to pass the redemption of Zion, if we do not work along the lines he has laid down for us to work by? This we promised to do when we entered the waters of baptism, for this was a part of the conditions of that covenant which we entered into, that we would be obedient unto him in all things. How many of us are earnestly striving to keep that covenant by seeking to understand the laws he has given pertaining to the redemption of Zion? How many of us are striving earnestly to bring about that condition whereby all will be made equal in earthly things? How much progress have we made in that direction since the Reorganization came into existence? And how long do we think it will take us to reach that condition under the present system of working? How long would it take a man to reach any desired point in the North, if he continued to travel east?

It has been said by some that we can not practice the system of equality until Zion is redeemed. Why, do we not know that equality is one of the laws by which Zion is to be redeemed? So then we see, to redeem Zion, her subjects must put her laws in force.

I think I hear some one say, Can this be done outside of Zion? We can commence to make the preparation, as instructed; for the Lord has told us to have all things prepared before us. So then we see there is a preparatory work to do, and there is no other way only coöperating with each other; and to do this we will have to organize ourselves in every district of the church for the purpose of conducting and transacting business through and among each other. By this means our efforts will be made more effectual. The stream that is now flowing out will be turned and made to flow into Zion; and by doing this, every law that God has given concerning the gathering can be brought into action. I believe that this is one of the means by which God is going to sift his people. I have been told by some that this preparatory work spoken of is the purifying of their hearts before him. Well, I will agree with them, and this plan outlined in the above will be the test, to tell whose hearts are pure; for the pure in heart will be willing to adopt that plan which will bring about a condition of equality among them; but those whose hearts are not pure will refuse to join an organization of that kind. And, I want to tell you right here, that there is but one thing that will beat, or cause coöperation to fail, and that is, not to coöperate.

Now, fellow Saints, let us stop our foolishness and get down to business and no longer waste our time and energies in trying to do things in our own way, instead of working in God's way; but put ourselves in shape to do something; and by doing this we will be in a condition for the Lord to handle us. And I am one who is just foolish enough to believe that he will give us all the instruction necessary for our guidance in our business affairs, as well as our spiritual. But we must show our willingness to coöperate with him before we can expect much assistance from him.

I was told by one of the Twelve that this redemption of Zion was or is an individual work. Very true, but it will take as many individuals to do it as will be in Zion the moment it is redeemed; and those individuals will have to coöperate with God to redeem it. So, then, it will be a number of individuals working together collectively. It will be a collective work. To illustrate: I at one time worked in a shipyard where there was a very large stick of timber to be carried to a certain place; and it took fifty-two men to do it, and there was but one way to do it, and that was to lift and carry it. Now, no one of us, nor one half of us, could have lifted it alone; but it took all of us. So we all got around it, got ourselves in shape to do something, and when the foreman gave the word, up came the stick on to our shoulders, by all lifting together. So I say, again, Let us put ourselves in shape to do something.

Yours for the redemption of Zion,

J. A. ANTHONY.

RISING TO HIGHER PLANES.

For some years past the writer has been led to believe that we, as a church and as a people, have failed to appreciate our own standing before the world; that we have fallen short in making good our own claims; that we have failed to apprehend the true relationship between ourselves and the world; that we have permitted the world to arise to our own level, and that we have neglected to adjust our own position in such a way as to still keep in the lead.

It also appears to the writer that some have been injudicious to a degree, in the presentation of the gospel, not discriminating between the wants of the Saints and the wants of the world.

The Saints are past the point of being converted to the first principles. They need the presentation of the gospel from a higher standpoint.

It is to be understood that the attitude and position that the church assumed in its inception must always remain unquestioned; for the reason that the condition of the world at that time was receptive to no other plane of thought.

Now it must be assumed that the religious world at the time of the restoration, was in absolute spiritual darkness; nothing of good or of truth remaining in it; that the object of the restoration was to elevate the world, by degrees, from absolute darkness into perfect light. That this progression as a rule is not possible with the first generation, is well understood by those who have undertaken to civilize barbarians; but with succeeding generations, each new generation placing itself upon a new sphere of thought, it is possible. As the church descended from the Garden of Eden, or celestial state, to the purely temporal in the beginning of God's work, so it must ascend from the purely temporal to the spiritual or celestial state, which is the last of his work.

I think we all understand the principle of applying knowledge by degrees. How could we expect any one to solve mathematical problems who had not yet learned the rules of arithmetic, or to read that had not learned to sound the alphabet? When the teacher has taught the pupil the alphabet and the first rules of arithmetic, he then begins to read and to cipher, and as the pupil advances, the lessons become more and more difficult every day.

To the mind of the writer we have been holding up the alphabet to the world, when we should have been giving them lessons out of the higher readers.

To illustrate my point, permit me to quote Emerson, essay 7:

There are all degrees of proficiency in knowledge of the world. It is sufficient to our present purpose to indicate three. One class lives to the utility of the symbol; esteeming health and wealth as final good.

This corresponds to the alphabet and the first rules of arithmetic.

Another class lives above this mark to the beauty of the symbol; as the poet, and artist, and the naturalist, and the man of science. A third class live above the beauty of the symbol to the beauty of the thing signified; these are wise men. The first have common sense; the second taste; and the third, spiritual perception.

In Latter Day Saint phraseology, Emerson's delineation of degrees corresponds to the three glories spoken of in the Doctrine and Covenants, section 76, the utility of the symbol and the telestial as first; the beauty of the symbol and the terrestrial as second; and the thing signified and the celestial as third.

To illustrate the present position of the church more fully, according to the conceptions of the writer, the principle of water baptism will be taken up as an example, which will be identified with Emerson's utility of the symbol, or the gospel in its temporalities and representative forms, such as a literal gathering, the building of temples, and the purification of the literal earth at Christ's second coming, which we have held up to the world as one of the essentials of salvation from a purely biblical standpoint; that is, we have produced scriptural evidences only, ignoring the logical and scientific side of the question; while it is a well known fact that it is the tendency of the world at the present time to accept scientific and logical rather than biblical proofs; while every one knows that there is no virtue in the symbol, only so far as it corresponds to the regeneration of the inner man. Then why not develop and unfold the mental and moral qualities to be obtained, instead of placing an emphasis on the form? Why not dwell upon the beauty of the symbol from a philosophical and scientific standpoint? What is better still, view the question from its own standpoint. If the beginning of God's work in this age is temporal, and there are other planes to be obtained, and which must be obtained if the order of progression given in Doctrine and Covenants 28:8 is a proper one, should we not leave the temporal where it belongs as the symbol, through, and by which, the higher planes are expressed?

It may be well to assert at this time, that the philosophical and scientific side of the gospel is the proper identifying and arranging of doctrinal and spiritual truths, and all such truths must bear a relation to the moral in life or they are not doctrinal and spiritual truths, but only speculations.

The next important point that we may consider is: what is our position in the world, and what is our relation to it? If the symbol has become a means and not an end, how are we to apply this means in such a way as to still retain our position as the light of the world? If we have been giving them starlight by emphasizing the symbol, and the world has assimilated this light, how are we to make the transition from starlight to moonlight in such a way as to maintain our position as the salt of the earth, or the leaven that a woman hid in three measures of meal, or the city that is set on a hill and can not be hid, or the light that is placed in a candlestick and not under a bushel? How are we to keep in advance of the world, and in what way? Are we to withdraw from an active participation in the world's affairs, or shall we stand in and among the world as its example? How can the leaven do its work in the meal except it be diffused throughout the whole lump, and how shall the salt be able to preserve anything unless it come in contact with that which is to be preserved?

I do not think that we can do better than to follow Emerson's outline. We are now to take a step upward from the utility, to the beauty of the symbol; we are now to become poets, artists, naturalists, and men of science; we are no longer to take things for granted and accept them as truths because some one has declared them so to be; they must be analyzed, compared, and classified, not only from a scriptural but from a scientific standpoint as well. The gospel passes from a command to an art. All true arts are forms of heaven; untrue arts are but shadows of that form.

The object of our research is to set up a standard, and to draw a line between the proper and the improper.

True art is like the light that reveals to us the true state or certainty of things; untrue art is like seeing apparitions in the dark that impress us with the uncertainty of things. True art is like standing on an eminence, viewing the country about you; untrue art is like taking an aspect of the surrounding landscape by standing in a deep pit.

The object in entering the new sphere is, that since there always has been, and always will be abuses of every kind in the world that demand correction, and especially in this age, when the world is moving so rapidly, and so many new discoveries are being made, both in the worlds of mind and of matter; when century-old customs and regulations need renovating and readjusting to meet the demands of the times, when science has revolutionized every branch of human effort; that the church as individuals should strive to enter into all the various professions, such as politics, statesmanship, diplomacy, the arts and sciences, and in fact every profession that possesses any merit, or adds to the public good, for the especial purpose of upholding the moral principle in the new channels of activity and of holding abuse in the background.

The writer is of the opinion that the Book of Mormon and the Doctrine and Covenants are vast fields yet unexplored; that the church, in respect to them is yet in its a b c or symbol state (see Doctrine and Covenants 28:9; 67:3), and that the world has caught up with us on this point, or that the presentation of this state to the world is no longer applicable and does not represent the needs of humanity at large.

To illustrate the point more fully, the reader is referred to Doctrine and Covenants 107, wherein the Lord gave commandment to certain parties to build a boarding-house, together with the plans and specifications for the same, which the church understood and accepted literally, and in the performance of this work they utterly failed, and the church has labored under the effects of that failure unto the present day.

For convenience' sake we will identify this command to build a literal boarding-house with the symbol or a b c's, and instead of building a structure of wood and stone, let us proceed to build a moral structure out of such material as spiritual truths can supply; but in order that those spiritual truths might be known distinctly and individually, such classification of terms as gold, silver, precious stones, iron, copper, brass, and all precious trees of the earth are made use of. (See Ephesians 2:19-22; 1 Corinthians 3:10-17; Isaiah 28:16, 17.)

The mode by which all of these precious things are obtained, and of the purpose of them, is suggested to us in Doctrine and Covenants 85:21, 36; 87:5; 90:12.

These are extraordinary times, and the active ministry should be so situated financially, morally, and mentally that they can apply themselves unreservedly to the sailing of the mental seas, for the purpose of penetrating every knowable realm of thought, and of marshalling all logical and scientific, as well as scriptural, truths for the purpose of constructing the greatest of all spiritual edifices of which the restoration should be the chief cornerstone.

The purpose of the restoration, if the writer understands it, is to build up the waste places of Zion, nevermore to be thrown down. To understand what the waste places of Zion really are, please read Revelation 17 and 18. I do not think there can be any difference of opinion as to who is referred to in these chapters. The events referred to here must be the consummation of the church, preceding the restoration.

The articles of commerce spoken of here seem to have been delusions fabricated by this apparent queen and wife that had played the harlot with other lovers; and by her sorceries were all nations deceived. The calamity that overtook this harlot was because of the true light of the restoration that had been turned on this wonderful personage, that revealed nothing but lies and delusions. The land that is laid waste by the burning of this harlot, is the land that is to be restored and rebuilt; referred to in the Doctrine and Covenants as the waste places of Zion.

For further illustration and comparison, let me refer you to the parable of the twelve olive-trees, Doctrine and Covenants 98: 6-8; 100: 4-6; 102: 5-9.

Upon investigation, I think that you will all agree with me, the first laborers in the vineyard were those of the Christian dispensation, and the second laborers are those of the restoration. If the waste places of Zion are to be restored, spiritual commerce must also be restored, and the priesthood launch out into unknown seas, as Columbus did, and discover new worlds.

The writer has had sufficient experience in sailing the mental seas to understand that every waking moment, every passing event, must be taken into account. There are shoals to avoid. There are fogs to lead you astray. There are storms to weather. And there is midnight darkness to meet, that brings despair to the stoutest heart. But there are also, at times, bright sunshine, beautiful islands, and at last a distant shore, where the merchant sailor ladens his vessel with gold and silver, and precious, pearls, dyewoods, perfumes, and spices, that he might return to his own people, that they might become enriched with the good things of earth.

The day is past to expect any one to accept or do a thing because it is held up to them that they ought to. The first question that we may expect to meet with is, What is there in it for me? Will the returns balance the outlay?

These questions are not unreasonable ones, and mental and spiritual matters should be husbanded with as much economy as material ones, with this difference only: that in spiritual matters we labor to benefit the world, and in temporal matters ourselves. The party that does not give heed to these questions of economy will lose in the race.

It is necessary to deal with things as they are, and not as we would have them.

This is a day of specialism, when men give themselves, body and soul, to their chosen work.

It is well nigh impossible to excel in any of the fields of research and achievement, without giving themselves a living sacrifice to their chosen profession; and the indications are that the race will be more acute in the future than it is at present.

Some may say, Why take notice of the achievements of the world? Why not confine ourselves to the simple gospel plan? But the idea is this, that the gospel must arise to the level of all attainment, in order that it might leaven all.

We can not afford to refrain from understanding all, and still retain our position as the salt of the earth.

THE SANITARIUM.

The work of building of this much-needed institution is now well on the way toward completion and is being pushed rapidly, those in charge feeling assured that the Lord will be pleased with the efforts of the Saints and helping friends if the close of the second year, after the direction to build, shall find that the building and grounds are ready for dedication to its proper uses.

An excellent site, consisting of five acres of land, recorded as lot number one, Kensington Addition to Independence, Missouri, has been secured for the institution. The building is now inclosed and the work of installing heating plant, the proper plumbing and fixtures, necessary elevators, steel lathing, electric lighting system, is already near completion.

One thing is needful, however, to successfully continue the work—that is more means. This is an essential element just now. No debt must be upon this building when finished. There is none now; the work thus far has all been of the best, and has cost much less than the price any of our architects or builders had figured. No means has been squandered in the building, and we feel certain that none will be. The Lord has thus far blessed the work of building and we feel assured will approve of an extra united effort on the part of the Saints to finish the work.

It is from this standpoint that we again call the attention of the Saints to the necessity for help. Some wrote upon sending their first offerings that they would "double the amount if necessary." It is; let us hear from you. Those who have not yet helped

Let us hear from you at once, and thus continue to completion the good work, and the Lord bless the cheerful helper. Address, CONVERSATION OF UNCLE SAM AND THE LATTER DAY SAINTS.

Uncle Sam.—I need no introduction to the Saints of God. They recognize me at once. I am told you wanted to see me here to-day.

Saints.—Yes, we do, Uncle Sam. We want to ask you some questions, and the first one is, How many places have you in the United States where intoxicating liquors are sold?

Uncle Sam.—I am sorry to say that we have a great many. The last report that came to me showed 254,498 wholesale and retail liquor dealers. It has been estimated that we have one saloon for every three hundred persons.

Saints.—Do you know how much money is invested in the liquor business in our country?

Uncle Sam.—In the year 1906 there were $415,000,000 invested, including money from foreign capitalists.

Saints.—There must be a great amount of liquor used to warrant such a large investment, and so many saloons.

Uncle Sam.—Yes, nearly 1,700,000,000 gallons of liquors were consumed in the year 1905. That meant the generous supply of over twenty gallons for each individual in the United States.

Saints.—Your annual drink bill must be very large. Can you tell us what it is,

Uncle Sam?

Uncle Sam.—Our drink bill is about $1,500,000,000 annually.

Saints.—Why is your drink bill so much larger than your bill for clothing, food, and all Christian and educational work?

Uncle Sam.—I suppose it is because the man who drinks intoxicating liquors is never satisfied. The more he drinks, the more he wants, and of course the drink bill is heavy.

Saints.—Will you please tell us what comes from your liquor business?

Uncle Sam.—Well, I confess that I see no good. The product of the saloon is the drunkard, and my boys and girls are demanded to supply this drink with customers.

Saints.—Some people say that you need the reve-in this work and who can, send us at once. It will be the last opportunity. Let our lists, which will be completed by April 1, contain the evidence of an earnest effort from every household.

The progress of the work of the sanitarium, as well as style of building, may be seen from photographs taken by Bro. Davis, of Independence.

The first shows a front view and the progress of the work the middle of December. The second, from the rear of the building, in January. Since this last, the windows have all been secured and are being properly placed. There is before us the plastering, doors, stairways, and inside finishing and the inside painting. Some of this work will be contributed by brethren who reside near and who are ready to help; but we must have the money to pay for the greater part of the work.

nue from the liquor traffic to run the Government. Is that true?

Uncle Sam.—It is not true. More money is paid out each year to take care of the criminals and paupers that are made by strong drink than the revenue received from the traffic. I am trying to teach my people this fact, and they are beginning to learn it.

Saints.—We count the saloon as Satan's trap to ensnare the youth; its history is one of sorrow, suffering, and death. Can you not close the saloons and forbid the sale of drink?

Uncle Sam.—That is what I am trying to do. As soon as my people discover how much happier and better off we will be without the saloon, they will prohibit it. We already have six prohibition States: Maine, Kansas, North Dakota, Georgia, Oklahoma, and Alabama; and large portions of other States are under prohibitory law. Soon I hope to ring the temperance chimes from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, and proclaim my country free from the curse of rum.

Of General Interest

OUR DUTY IS TO THE LIVING.

I want my flowers now. Rather than a high eulogy uttered when I am in the great hereafter, I would prefer the warm pressure of a hand while I am in the great now. Rather than a pile of costly wreaths laid upon a tomb containing naught but dust, I would choose a single pansy, "purple with love's wound," or a clover blossom plucked by gentle hands and given with loving smile and grateful heart to living man.

My observation has been that as a rule men are much better than their credit marks among their generation show. There is no hero who deserves all the praises of his partial friend, there is no villain who is entitled to all the censure of his bitter foe. We are wont to boast of our love of justice; yet if we could know the injustice we often do our neighbor we would hang our heads in shame—and we would know if we demanded of him no more in the way of excellence than we ourselves are able to show.

We get out of the world just about what we put into it; and we find in men just about what we look for.

If we carry into the world the seeds of hatred and of greed we will reap as we have sown. If in our intercourse with our fellows we carry a load of suspicion and are sour and surly, we find men suspicious, sour, and surly.

But if we plant sunbeams in our world we will reap a harvest of light in our lives. If we go to meet our fellows with love and truth in our hearts, we will find truth and love coming to meet us more than half way.

Those of us who are not too dignified to be human may find inspiration, and upon this very point, in the literature of the children.

There is an allegory written for the little ones but serviceable to the grown folks:

"Once upon a time a Cave lived under ground, as caves have the habit of doing. It had spent its lifetime in darkness. It heard a voice calling to it: 'Come up into the light; come and see the Sun shine.'

"The Cave retorted: 'I don't know what you mean; there isn't anything but darkness.'

"Finally the Cave ventured forth and was surprised to see light everywhere.

"Looking up to the Sun the Cave said: 'Come with me and see the darkness.'

"The Sun asked: 'What is darkness?'

"The Cave replied: 'Come and see.'

"One day the Sun accepted the invitation. As it entered the Cave it said: 'Now show me your darkness!'

"But there was no darkness."—Richard L. Metcalf.

TOLSTOI TELLS CZAR HOW TO RULE.

(By Countess M. Tolstoi.)

ST. PETERSBURG, January 23.—Since Count Leo Tolstoi was excommunicated by the holy synod of the Russian Greek Church several attempts have been made to secure from the czar the imperial good offices to bring about a reconciliation between the author and the offended church. The czar has had several talks with the metropolitan, Antonio, who has suggested to the czar to write a personal letter to the count.

The czar has asked his nephew, the Grand Duke Constantine, a noted poet of the czar's family and president of various scientific organizations, to write the letter to Count Tolstoi making such a proposal of reconciliation.

Count Tolstoi has replied to this letter of the grand duke, inclosing a special letter to the czar, the text of this reading as follows:

"Your Majesty: A few more days, weeks or years and I am gone. Some days or decades more and your majesty will follow my example. That is the eternal law of nature. But before that occurs I desire to direct these lines to you as the ruler of the Russian people.

"I wish you could follow and realize the words and example of Christ:

"'Whoso will be master shall be a servant of the others.'

"To rule a people or empire does not mean to govern them by force and violence, but to serve them with wisdom and love, and execute the highest ideals for the benefit of the ruled.

"Neither parliament nor constitutional government makes a nation happy, great, or advanced, but the ideals for which they strive and the freedom necessary to obtain those ideals. If you will be a ruler as described and realized by Christ, your first duty is to build your sovereignty upon the love of peace, liberty, and brotherhood. Build your empire upon the religion of humanity and peace and there will not be necessary either prisons or enormous military expenses. Give freedom to every man to think, worship, or speak as he likes, and they will learn to rule themselves with love and wisdom.

"Therefore, I beg to suggest to your majesty these rules for ruling:

1. "To follow the example of Christ and become a servant of the nation.
2. "Abolish the army of violence and establish an army of peace and love.
3. "Give the largest freedom to all the individuals of our country to act as they think right and proper.
4. "Renounce all the wealth and luxury, abolish all titles and particular privileges, and proclaim the religion of Christ and humanity as the fundamental constitution of our empire.

"Having done this you will become one of the greatest rulers of the present time, and your name will be blessed and worshiped by millions.

"Very respectfully submitted,
 "LEO TOLSTOI."

PROVES EGYPT WAS LAND OF BONDAGE.

TOLEDO, Ohio, December 21.—A marriage contract more than two thousand years old, discovered in a tomb near Cairo, Egypt, and now in the collection of the Museum of Art here, has, it is announced to-day, been deciphered by the Egyptologists at the University of Strassburg, Germany, and has been found to be from a historic standpoint one of the most important documents brought to light in recent years.

George W. Stevens, director of the Toledo Museum says:

"The papyrus determines two matters of great importance. It establishes the period of an Egyptian Pharaoh whose time of reign has been hitherto unknown, and it also gives us documentary evidence of the exalted financial position accorded to married women in Egypt three centuries before Christ—a position almost undreamed of and un hoped for by the most enthusiastic New Woman of these modern days.

"The lost Pharaoh whose period of reign is established was Khabbasha, whose period was 341 B. C.

"From the translation it is established in case the wife repudiated the husband she allowed him to take back half his dower. This is the reverse of modern customs, especially in European countries, where the wife is expected to contribute the dot or dower. The Egyptian husband, however, not only received nothing from the bride, but had to put up a bonus to make himself a matrimonial possibility.

"The document likewise shows that in case of a separation the husband was allowed by the wife to take but one third of the moneys which they might have acquired together during the time they were married."—The World.

A Choice.

If all love's gifts of grace or power
 Lay spread before my choice this hour,
 What would I claim as life's best dower?

Dear Lord, how should I know?

Unfailing love from sun to sun?
 Unfailing wealth in honor won?
 Unfailing health—all gifts in one?

Nay; all of these may go.

For love that comes our lives to bless
 Must evermore be counted less,
 In grace and might and tenderness,
 Than gifts that from us flow.

And health, the tender soul may drain
 Of grace to share the sufferer's pain;
 And strength is weakness; power is vain,
 That soothes no human woe.

And wealth of treasure, land, or gold
 Is only sweet to have and hold
 When streams of mercy, manifold
 In ceaseless gifts o'erflow.

So, from the dazzling, tempting three,
 How can I choose? Choose Thou for me;
 Give or withhold; but let me be Content God's will to know.

Give love until I love outpour,
 Give pain till those whose hearts are sore
 May feel for them I suffer more
 Than for my own small woe.

Take wealth, and love of selfish greed,
 Give love for the world's pain and need—
 Give Thou Thyself; then rich indeed,
 All else may come or go.

The Perfected Web.

There are days in our lives when our hearts seem filled
 With utter confusion and pain.
 And into the darknes of heavy hearts
 Comes naught but the fall of rain;
 And the web of our lives stretches onward
 In a tangled mass of threads;
 And our God has forgotten and stoops not toward
 The sad and bowed-down heads
 Of his children helplessly calling, calling.
 Hush! did I say forgotten?
 Does the Father ever forget?
 The web of our lives shall stretch onward
 In perfect beauty, while yet
 Sweet faith keeps her foot on the treadle,
 And Hope lifts her beautiful eyes;
 For God's finger smooths out the tangles,
 And lo! aloft in the skies
 Is the sun still cheerily shining, shining.

—Thornburg.

There is a beautiful simile given of the Christian's vision. "Midway down the Simplon Pass the traveler pauses to read upon a stone the single word Italia. At this point he passes a boundary line, and every step makes plainer how great has been the change from Switzerland to Italy. The air becomes warm and fragrant, and vines line the wayside, and below, embosomed in verdure, Lake Maggiore expands before him. As that traveler rests at evening-time, he recognizes that the entrance into a new world was marked by the word Italia upon the stone on the pass.

"Humanity has crossed a boundary line; up to Bethlehem, bleak and cold, down from Bethlehem, another and a happier time. This new transforming power was, to the disciples, Jesus himself. He made all things new to them."

"The web of our life shall stretch onward
 In perfect beauty."—

It is beautiful to feel that a Master hand gathers our threads of endeavor, weaving them into a wondrous pattern of eternal beauty. That through the dark hours of life, when our noblest efforts become tangled in the maze of earth, with a deft touch he smooths out the tangles, showing alone the silken skein.

A young woman walks a mile through the clayey mire and weeds of a country bypath to teach a class of boys in a Sunday-school. She is weary when she reaches the place, and there is a little catch in her voice, a hoarseness from the cold, damp air, deepened by the feeling of utter failure. "How can she help others, when her own life is dark and weary?" There are but two boys in the seat. One is the fifteen-year-old son of the wealthy farmer of the neighborhood.

There is a question in the boy's mind that the teacher can not read, as she sits down a moment in the silence, before the first stir of song. Again and again the question appeals to the boy, as he studies the long row of empty benches, the motto of red and gold over the old pulpit,— "That was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Between the blended shades the boy seemed to read the question, "Shall I accept George Moore's offer and take the position in the cigar-store in the city—or shall I enter the Presbyterian academy in September, and begin a thorough course in literature and philosophy? Shall I throw aside my Bible—banish the thoughts from Browning or Lowell that have just touched my life, for the smoky atmosphere of the cigar-shop?"

Slowly the opening strains of "I am Thine, oh, Lord! I have heard Thy voice," rang out. Then the reading of the lesson and the prayer. The young teacher rose as in a daze; she spoke, she scarcely knew how; a higher power seemed to give the thought, give the words as they quivered in the tremulous accents of her voice.

The subject was "The rich young ruler." "What shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?" She spoke of life; of the vision of the highest as a gift from God—life in its grandeur and beauty.

The boy did not speak or answer one question; but that night alone in his room he knelt down, one, two, three hours, until through the darkness came the light of God, the first touch of the unfolding glory.

Thirty years later we watch a company gather in that chapel again. A memorial service to a woman who had lived a life of beauty, of lowly sacrifice in their midst. A silence hovers over every heart, as the old minister tells of the scattered threads of endeavor; the ministry one winter for that poor girl whom the world had cast out; the flower-thoughts that she had given to a paralyzed man in the county-asylum.

Then the speaker paused and, stepping back, led to the front a tall man dressed in black. The people look up into the face, then a low whisper passes through the room. It is Douglas Blair, the poet, the man who has reached the far ways of beauty in his grand expressions.

An uplifted hand sweeps out over the people in a gesture of authority, which only a master of human thought can give—one word, which in its depth and intensity, seems not spoken, but breathed to the heart of the people: "She stood at the threshold of life to me, and under God spoke the word that opened the gates of vision."—Selected.

LAMONI, Iowa, January 28, 1908.

Editors Herald: Allow me to state to the missionaries of the Rocky Mountain Mission, also the Saints and friends, that I started for home, and Lamoni, Iowa, the 24th inst., consequent upon a telegram received that date requesting me to come, owing to sickness in my family. My wife was quite ill for a time, but through the mercy of our heavenly Father is in a fair way to recovery at this time.

I had intended to visit other points additional to those where I have labored in the mission, and to call on my sister residing in Ness County, Kansas, whom I have not seen for more than twenty years, and to reach Independence March 15, for committee and conference work. My sister, Mrs. America Thompson, lost her husband by death November 15, 1907. He was an elder in the church,—a good, faithful man. I learn also, that an uncle who lived in Southern Indiana, Elder James G. Scott, has recently passed on to his reward. He did a good work years ago, in the church, baptized quite a number. Thus passed a very conscientious, humble man. Thus one by one we pass on, beyond the mystic veil, always humble and upright, always ready to sacrifice for the work.

I enjoyed the labors of the mission of mountain and vast plains. It has its difficulties, and also favorable features. Saints there are generally ready to do for the cause. Many not of the church remind one of Saints, as in earlier days of the church, when individualism was not so marked in our world as now. Time brings its changes, we all can see; and they are not always for the best for all. Noah, Isaiah, Paul, and some Nephite worthies noted like changes in their day. "Watch," says the Master, "and what I say unto one, I say unto all, Watch." And it is not to Babylon, or the world that Jesus referred, when he said: "Because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold," and especially the later, the "many."

"For the day of my visitation cometh speedily, in an hour when ye think not." When is this hour? "And where shall be the safety of my people, and refuge for those who shall be left of them?" Who now can tell "where" is the "refuge" and "safety" of this remnant "of my people"? Surely in this day, when all things are in commotion, the Lord's people should be on their watchtower, and looking forth for the signs of our Savior's coming in glory to "reign over all his Saints."

I enjoyed much liberty of the Spirit at times during my labors in Colorado. Saints at Denver are arranging as rapidly as possible to build a church for the divine service in the city; a general, good interest on the part of the Saints in the matter. We hope they may succeed. A regular, good working pastor,—one whose time in full can be devoted to the work, is needed there. Bro. C. E. Everett, their present pastor, is beloved by all Saints there, is doing all he can for the cause in Denver; but his time is so fully occupied otherwise. About two thirds of the population of the state of Colorado are at Denver, and yet diligent and continuous work is necessary to reach those who can be reached. Eastern Colorado is an open door to the missionary now, and should be diligently occupied, and not neglected. Many honest hearts there are, soil that would germinate the gospel seed. Open doors await occupancy at and near Loveland, Sterling, on the north, at Wray and vicinities in central east, at Fox on further southeast, at Burlington on southward, and at Arapahoe on the Union Pacific Railroad. Invitations were extended to us which we were unable to respond to. Am grateful for material aid rendered me by Saints while in the mission.

Nearly all the Government land in Eastern Colorado is taken by homesteaders. Society is new, and is more readily cultivated than in old, settled, and prejudiced society. The value of land there is rapidly increasing, and the homesteader is alert to his interests. Of other parts of the Rocky Mountain Mission, others can speak more certainly than I. Memories of my labors in Colorado, and associations with Saints there, will always be pleasant. Among pioneer Saints and laborers of Eastern Colorado, to be remembered, are Elder E. D. Bullard, and brother (the latter now dead), and their families, Elder McConley, A. E. Tabor, and J. B. Roush, who, though gone to his rest, is honorably remembered by those without, as well as within the household of faith. The faithful labors of our venerable brother, Elder O. B. Thomas, are "ever fresh and green" in the memories of those among whom he labored in days now gone. Bro. James Kemp also is beloved as a faithful laborer in Eastern Colorado. Also Bro. Payne.

May our Father bless his Saints in all the earth, and may they be alive to the signs of these times, the building up of Zion, and their eternal interests in Christ's soon coming in glory.

Your brother,

C. SCOTT.

BURNSIDE, Michigan, January 21, 1908.

Editors Herald: We have been looking for an elder through here for some time, but as yet none have appeared. It has been nearly a year since we have had the pleasure of having an elder in this part. We do not have the privilege of meeting together very often, but we have some noble Saints here, and we are living in hope that God will in time see fit to raise up a branch here; and our prayers are that the time is not far distant. A few of us drove out to meet with Marlette Saints last Sunday; and, although the roads were very bad, we felt well paid for our journey, as we had a time of rejoicing together; and I am sure all felt that it was good to be a Saint in latter days. My daily prayer is that I may always live worthy of the name I bear, and that I may let my light shine, that others may see the light. Sometimes I get discouraged with the cares of this life; but the cloud is lifted again, and I try to press on; for we read that only those who continue faithful to the end shall be saved. I have been promised great blessings if I continue faithful, and I hope to be always found doing the will of God. I rejoice in this work, for I know it is the church of Christ; and, if we all live as we should, we will be among the redeemed when Christ comes to set up his kingdom here upon the earth.

Ever praying for the welfare of God's people,

Dear Herald: "All is not gold that glitters," in the missionary field. We have hard work at times to get the gospel before the people. The times of the Gentiles are fast closing up. Latter Day Saints should be earnestly considering the gathering, and making the necessary preparations; which, to my mind, does not necessarily mean a superabundance of the "worldly mammon," but to have a good supply of "heavenly treasures." Of course the temporalities must be consecrated, and tithing observed, where we have been favored with such things. This system of graft, greed, and gain in the political and social (?) world, is enough to arouse the Saints to action, and cause us to remove ourselves from these selfish environments—of panics and speculations—to the Zion of God, where the UNJUST PROFIT SYSTEM must be banished into the eternal night of oblivion; if the revelations are true. Zion can not be redeemed except it be by the law of the celestial kingdom. It is an evident fact, from the trend of public sentiment, that even in the financial world reforms must be worked, and instead of the "people's money" being loaned to the banks for distributing, it will eventually be loaned direct to the wealth-producing class upon proper security. The "banking system" is a FAKE. Latter-day Israel must not make the same mistake that ancient Israel did. They took advantage of the religious rites of the Mosaic law, and turned the temple-services into trafficking and merchandising.

Friends, I have confidence in this latter-day work. I see the beacon lights ahead. The spiritual gifts are reviving, and I feel the thrill of inspiration more vividly as I stand to declare the gospel. Do not think we missionaries have no interest in this great work of redeeming Zion. Our judgment may be considered faulty by some; but the law by which this is to be accomplished is fixed and eternal. I believe the Reorganization has been laying the foundation wisely. There are a few things yet that must be eradicated: pride, selfishness, banks, usury, etc. Renting houses at present rates comes under the head of usury. Now I have no disposition to impune the motives of any one. But, brethren, the alarm needs to be sounded. Praying that God's favors may be with us until the great struggle is over,

A. M. BAKER.

DAVIDSON, Oklahoma, January 22, 1908.

Editors Herald: Our debate here between Bro. Aylor and A. W. Young, of Sunset, Texas, just closed, with the sentiment decidedly in our favor. Mr. Young was a fine scholar, and a regular machine to talk. He sounded very much like a phonograph. He represented the Christian (Campbellite) Church. Young was much more courteous and genteel than any of their men I have yet heard. He was, however, very sarcastic, and witty. He made only a dash at the polygamy question, and Bro. Aylor silenced him with Bancroft, Chambers' Encyclopedia, court decision, and a few historic statements.

His effort at Joseph Smith and Book of Mormon was weak, as it fell under one volley of hot argument, in which Bro. Aylor showed he misrepresented every statement from said book, and showed that Joseph Smith was not only free from evil, as accused, but was one of the greatest men of his time. Bible argument occupied most of the debate, and now the common talk all over town is that Aylor won a victory; and now we are preaching in the schoolhouse to large crowds, and some are talking of being baptized. Our victory is even greater than we knew at close of debate, as now nearly every one we meet says we won the victory.

The editor, who was formerly a preacher in Mr. Young's church, now says he can take the same proposition Bro. Aylor affirmed and defeat Young. Elder Young is considered the ablest debater they have in Texas, and they warned us before debate that they were going to clean the Mormons out of the country here this time. But we are here yet, and have a fine branch of the church here, presided over by Bro. Ed Stafford, who is a good man in the right place. Also Bro. B. F. Renfro, of the mission force, lives here, on a good farm of his own, and all the Saints here are alive in the work. So you see we had some prestige here to help us in the battle.

My debate at Morrison, with C. C. Parker, begins February 19. I learn he is a very rough man in debate, though he has written me very pleasant letters.

Oklahoma is a rich field for mission work, and we need about four times as many men as we have now to fill the numerous calls for preaching. I trust the Saints will be patient, and we will get to your locality and preach as soon as possible. Bro. Aylor goes from here to Enid and I go to Kingfisher until our conference at Piedmont, February 14, 15, and 16.

Fraternally, your brother,
HUBERT CASE.

PENSACOLA, Florida, January 25, 1908.

Editors Herald: I arrived here a few days ago. I have been over the Florida District in rather a flying visit. I attended the conference with the Calhoun Saints, then passed through Berrydale, only stopping a day or two. I preached one sermon at Bro. W. M. Hawkins', then I went to Coldwater and spent nearly a week, but only got to preach once; then I went to Milton and visited a few of the Saints, and took the steamer, City of Tampa, and came here. I have held some nice meetings here at Sr. Rodger's. There is a fair little band of Saints here, and they are contemplating renting a hall and having regular meetings. Bro. E. Powell can be with them some and keep the work moving. Bro. James Cooper lives eight miles out in the country. He can help them. I think a branch might be organized after awhile. I go from here to Vancleave, Mississippi, to hold a debate with Elder B. M. Bogard, of the Missionary Baptist Church. I attended the debate the first of the year at McKenzie, Alabama, between Bro. T. C. Kelley and Elder S. Pain of the Primitive Baptist Church. Bro. Kelley did well.

This city tries to share the honors of St. Augustine in being the oldest city in the United States. If it had not been for a storm that nearly swept the town out of existence when it was located on Santa Rosa Island, and compelled the citizens to move to the mainland, it would have been entitled to the claim, so it is said.

I have viewed the ruins of the old Spanish prison, where it is said they used to behead their criminals. They claim about four hundred years as the age of the building. I am now writing in, and have been preaching in one of the old Spanish houses. It is a good substantial house yet, for one built of lumber. Bro. Ned Powell showed me where the bay washed the shores when he was a boy. Now it is more than two blocks from the shore. The land has been filled in to bring it out to the edge of deep water.

I was down to the navy yard and saw them building boats. One was a steel structure, and it was interesting to see with what exactness the parts were prepared and put together. I saw them repairing the Luzon, one of the gunboats that Dewey sank at Manilla Bay. She was raised and brought here for repairs and to receive a new complement of guns. I saw them installing a "six pounder." They are small guns but no doubt effective. She will soon be ready for commission and sent to New Orleans for coast defense. I also saw them repairing the Vixon, that Helen Gould gave the Government during the war with Spain.

There has been much more chilly weather here this winter than there was last winter. Yesterday morning the thermometer registered twenty-eight. That is counted pretty cold here. A good deal of the time it has been cloudy and rainy. That has caused considerable la grippe—the most I ever saw. Wherever I go a good many are sick or complaining. Flower gardens look green and nice, but the frost has nipped the blossoms. I have not seen a rose for some time, while last winter there were roses and peach-blossoms all winter.

There are a few palm-trees here. Across the street there are a couple of fine ones. One is about two and a half feet in diameter at the bottom, and about twelve feet high, with a large tuft of palm leaves at the top. They have another palm-like tree here, called the cabbage palmetto. It grows taller than the palm and is more slender. I saw some about a foot through, and perhaps sixteen feet high, with a tuft of palm-like leaves on top. They say they have a growth on top much like a cabbage that is used for greens. They are native of Southern Florida.

There is another plant here that is quite common that grows much the same way, but the stalks are small, two to six inches, and the leaves dagger-shaped, and are stiff, with sharp points. They are called Spanish bayonets.

I was at a negro meeting, the other night, that was surely amusing. One elder got up and preached about the prodigal son returning, and "remained" many things about what he did and said. He got up to a pretty high key, and you would have thought he was going to choke, the way he gurgled, choked, and spit, all in a sing-song way. After him another elder followed in about the same way, only he was a little better at it, and gave us the regular "back-step" dance. Some of the women kept up a hymn all the time, and the men would "chip in" with an "amen," "that's right," etc.

After the preaching was over the deacon took charge, and got down on his "sindicated" knees and prayed a song or sang a prayer, I hardly know which way to put it. He would say, "O Lord" very often, with the "O" beginning very high and "Lord" said rather low, the two words slurred together in a rather musical way. After the prayer he cleared off the table and told the people they knew what that meant. "This institution can not be run without the three g's: grit, grace, and greenbacks." Bro. F. L. West threw a quarter on the table and told the deacon to sing some of those nice songs. Then the singing began. The deacon was a good singer, and they sang some nice hymns, but the singing they had in the regular meeting, "Old Hundred" would not be in it. It would take two hundred or more to compare with it,—it was lined and so long drawn out.

The darkies did not respond very well with the money. The deacon called on them often to come forward with it, but it was too close to Christmas. But the deacon told them that they must come up with the money or sing. They must do something. After a few songs and prayers we left.

The negro question is quite important in the South. Around towns and public works they do pretty well; but in most places where I have been they do not seem to like the country, and are hard to hire on the farms. If they did everywhere as they do in a few places I have been, they will solve the problem themselves. They will live together as man and wife without marriage and have very few children.

Yours,
J. M. STUBBART.

Editors Herald: We are holding forth about two and one half miles from this place, in the Clingam Schoolhouse. It is a new opening, and we are having good, attentive crowds, the house being packed, almost to overflowing. Elder William Dowker, my father, is with me here, and the good Master has given us his Holy Spirit, and we have been made to rejoice in presenting the gospel of the Son of God.

This is a town of about twelve hundred inhabitants, and we have about sixteen Saints here; but they are not organized into a branch. Before leaving we expect to organize a Sunday-school. We have some noble Saints here. Brn. William Conklin, Howard Conklin, Samuel Provost, and Wilbur Provost have taken their teams and conveyed large loads of people from town to the schoolhouse, which has helped a great deal. The sleighing has been good, but there is a blizzard on to-day, and it is so bad that we can see only about one half block. We can not secure any place in town in which to hold meetings. The work in the district is in fair condition, so far as we can see. The Sunday-schools seem to be doing good. I organized two schools since the first of the year, at the Lebanon Branch and Black River Branch. The Saints have supported us nobly.

While at Deckerville I baptized Bro. William Burgett and wife. There are more calls for preaching than we can fill. The branches need a great deal of work. The district covers nine counties, and there are about fifteen hundred members, with only four missionaries besides the Bishop's agent. The harvest is great, and laborers are few. Ever praying for the redemption of Zion.

Editors Herald: No doubt you will be thinking I did not intend to pay you for the Autumn Leaves. I did not forget it, but I always had other things to pay, and I kept thinking that the next pay-day I would send it; but the next pay-day I would have no more to spare than I had the one before, so I just made up my mind, I will pay it any way. I also have intended for a long time to pay tithing; but I never have any to spare; but I believe it is just as much a law of God as is faith and repentance. I have been talking to Bro. Henderson, the president of our branch, and now I am going to start and pay some every pay-day till I have paid one tenth of the value of all we have. And I also want to send for some of the books as fast as I can. I love this work above all other things, but I feel my weakness very much. I know I have been wayward and unworthy, but my desire is to do God's will regardless of cost, so I ask you to remember me in prayer, for without the prayers of God's children I never shall be able to stand. I love to be an instrument for good. I am paid on the first and fifteenth of each month. I am working at motoring on the street-cars in Winnipeg. I moved here last spring. I would love to move down there, but am not able yet; but hope to as soon as I can. Pray for me.

I am as ever, your brother in the one faith,

CLAY CENTER, Kansas, January 25, 1908.

Editors Herald: I have often felt the promptings of the Spirit, when reading your columns, to write and tell you how much courage and strength we have gained from the reading of the HERALD; and we pray that God may abundantly bless you in your efforts to send out to the thousands of Saints such encouragement as the pages of the HERALD are freighted with; for it is indeed food to the hungry soul of the child of God, who is isolated from the meetings of the Saints as we are. I feel as though, if I could live among the Saints, I would never miss a meeting, or give an excuse for staying away from the house of God. Those who are blessed in that way, never know the soul-longings of those who can not have that blessing; but I suppose the Saints have to be scattered throughout the land, so that the gospel may be placed before the people of the world, that thus the word of the Lord may be fulfilled, that all may be brought to see what the truth is like when placed by the side of error.

This fall there were twelve of those Utah elders through here, and my husband exposed them at every opportunity he had. They (the Utah elders) were intending to stay all winter in town, and preach through the country, and canvass the town. They did not explain the difference between them and us, and they would stay wherever they went that they "were missionaries representing the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints," and most people would think they were the same as we; but when they found out the difference they would not stay to hear any of their preaching, and thus they soon left.

If our elders would go two and two through the land, and preach to expose those Utah elders, and explain the difference between the two churches, it seems to me that it would not be long until the people would all know the difference and would not point the finger of scorn at the Reorganized Church.

When we came here, the people were very much against us, and called the children "Mormons." We have given the people tracts to read, and explained the difference, but they seem prejudiced yet. We hope some day they may be brought to see the truth.

I feel so thankful that, in spite of all the opposition, my three oldest children are baptized into the fold of Christ, and more than that, they are happy there, and do not regret the step they have taken, because God has blessed them, and answered their prayers of faith.

Pray for us, dear Saints, that we may continue faithful to the end. If Sr. Mae Duncan sees this, will she please write to me.

MYRTLE AULD.

MOUNTAINVILLE, Maine, January 22, 1908.

Editors Herald: It has been some time since I have written anything for your valuable columns, from which I receive so much help and encouragement each week. For this neglect, due to daily cares and work of life, I ask pardon, and hope to be more prompt to duty hereafter.

We are having a most unusual and delightful winter, if such can be said of winter months minus ice, snow, and cold, with spring sunshine and balmy winds. We hope this will continue to remain with us. Quite a number are sick with colds, etc., brought about by the changeable weather conditions, among them being some of our own membership, for whom we pray for recovery. As a branch we are moving about as usual, with poor prospects of making much better showing in the future, unless the things causing past failures are discarded. It seems indeed slow of solution, to say the least, why so-called live members, who are also officers and teachers in the Sunday-school, can be so dead to their own interest, as well as the interest of others, as to allow jealousy, and other Satanic attributes to control them so as to cause them to shun those who might be instrumental in helping in the Lord's work, and discarding the recognized tried and tested methods which the best institutions are using for the benefit of all. Oh, when will the people of the Lord come to that unity, when with one heart and mind they will be willing to spend and be spent in the work of the Lord? Oh, when will all feeling of jealousy be banished, and in its place dwell a desire for love and charity for each brother and sister? When will each and every officer and worker in the church and Sunday-school be willing to accept and use those methods which will tend to cause all things to be done neatly and in order according to the designs and pleasures of the Lord? And although it is hard to make such ones believe, it is entirely useless to try to make a success of any work with old, time-worn, and wearisome methods, which the most uncultured and unlearned can not truly enjoy. To come up higher, to the mind of the writer, means to bring up to a higher plane and standard everything calculated in any way to advance us and fit us for better living, that we may help others as well as ourselves. Why will we be so blind, if we are honest? Personally I am trying, as best I can, to do whatever duty lies before me, with the Master's help. And amid the darkness and discouragements of life I am trying to hold to the rod of iron and so live that a crown of life may be mine at last because of a race well run.

Ever praying for the final victory of God's people and the redemption of Zion, I remain, WALLACE A. SMALL.

HAMBURG, Iowa, January 21, 1908.

Dear Herald: After leaving home and loved ones I came to this place, being met at the depot by our genial brother, A. Badham, district president, who preached for us on Saturday night, the first evening of the series of meetings we are holding in the neat church owned by our people, which was built only last year. It is a credit to the few, faithful, sacrificing Saints who are trying to hold aloft King Immanuel's banner. We have held four services so far, with good interest and increasing audiences. Last night there were no less than twenty-five outsiders present, some coming forward and expressing themselves highly pleased with what they had heard. What the results will be, time alone can tell. Our duty is to preach the word. And oh, how grateful we have felt when the Spirit has borne witness to the truth that we were presenting, that others have seen and felt its power. How many times the comforting promise has been confirmed that was made to me when I took my first mission to the land of Scotland, when it said, "Verily, thus saith the Lord unto you, no weapon formed against you shall prosper." Why should we not have more faith in God and his great promises?

I expect to change a number of places and make some new openings before General Conference. Our district conference convenes at Tabor, February 15 and 16, and it is the desire of those in charge to have a good representation from each branch, and if not, "Why not?" Come, and bring the good Spirit of the Master with you, and let us have a grand, spiritual feast, that it may strengthen us for the duties and trials that await the children of God. My heart was made glad when I read in the HERALD for January 8, the forward step the superintendency of the Lamoni Sunday-school had taken in that they believed that partaking of strong drink, the use of tobacco, or the frequenting of the card-table, the skating-rink, or the dance-hall was detrimental to the best moral and spiritual development of the young. I am pleased to think that our own school in Independence is not a whit behind, in that they passed similar resolutions in their business-meeting three years ago next April. I fully believe that we ought to be the light of the world. The voice of the Spirit has been continually inviting to come out of Babylon, and as late as May, 1906, the Lord spoke to us, saying, "But they have sought out other shrines and made covenant in secret places in which I have no delight. Behold, and consider: If my weapons are not sufficient for your faith, shall these things give them increase, or shall ye add that which is carnal to make effective the work for which my Spirit hath been given?"

May we all live, therefore, and labor in love, that we may be able with consistency to pray all the time, Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as it is done in heaven. With bright anticipations and hope in the final triumph, and love to all the Israel of God.

JOSEPH ARBER.

GREENWOOD, Missouri, February 1, 1908.

Dear Herald: I have read your pages for twenty-eight years, and I expect to continue. I wish to say a few words to our Scandinavian brothers and sisters of this country. Can we let our brethren that have been sent to the old country ask for our help here and not help? I will send one dollar to Bishop Kelley. Would send more if I had it. Who will send the next dollar? Read Bro. P. Muceus' letter in HERALD of January 29. Does it not appeal to the Saints of the Scandinavian blood? Let us work while it is day, that we may all receive a blessing.

C. J. CARLSON.

BELLAIR, Illinois, January 29, 1908.

Saints' Herald: Bro. F. M. Slover and Bro. Henry Sparling just closed a grand meeting here. There were large crowds every night, and good attention. I think some are investigating the work, and I know it will stand investigation. We hope and pray they will continue to read their Bibles and pray for assistance, for the word of God says, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him."

Dear Saints, let us live faithful and true to the covenant that we have made, knowing that the time will come when this old earth will be restored to its former state, as it was when it came from the hands of its Creator, and shall be a perpetual habitation of the pure and the good, those who have kept all the commandments of God, and have lived upright and just lives before him.

I am so thankful to my heavenly Father that he sent the gospel to me, and that I have obeyed it, and I ask the prayers of all the Saints that I may live faithfully to the end, and that I may have a right to the tree of life and enter in through the gate into the city.

Your brother,

ED PARSONS.

SPERRY, Iowa, January 25, 1908.

Dear Editor: I left home January 17 for Sperry, Iowa, stopping off at New London, meeting with the Saints there, holding meetings until the 23d with fair liberty. Also met Bro. McDonald there, as he had been sent for to administer to some that were sick; we also blessed one baby. I left there the 24th for Sperry, expecting to hold meeting, but the Baptists had taken a vote not to let any one have their house, as their preacher was with them the week before. Also a couple of the elders from Idaho had been here. Their names were F. O. Green and Charles Christensen, both from Idaho. They have left a little book with the people, going from house to house. It is called Cowley's Talks on Doctrine, published at Chicago, Illinois. I shall visit with the people, and talk with them, and let them read the Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants, and History of Joseph Smith by Lucy Smith.

Yours in gospel bonds,
NEPHI LOVELL.

STEELETON, Ontario, January 21, 1908.

Editors Herald: I am pleased to report that the Lord's work is moving in this place. I have secured a hall and expect to hold out for one month with three meetings on Sunday and each night through the week, except Saturday. I had to fix up the hall with stove, wood, and light. Went to the bush with Bro. T. McNurdo, and we sawed and split and hauled wood to the hall ourselves, and put out five hundred bills, and thus far things are looking bright. After putting up my bills, or some of them, on the poles, a number were torn down, but it did not keep the people away. We had a splendid turnout Sunday, the 19th, at the three meetings, and Monday, the 20th, the hall was full, with the best of attention given. The few Saints here are trying to keep the faith, and turn out well, and though the hall is up one flight of stairs, yet the sisters with their babies turn out, with many strangers. There is thus far a good interest shown by those not yet of the faith, and some have invited me to visit them for a gospel talk. This I am doing, and the indication is that some will obey the truth before I leave this place. Some have asked for baptism at Halford, so we look for good results from those two places in the near future.

We are loaning some Books of Mormon, and have given out much other church reading for the good of the work and people. Bro. J. R. Tomlinson is the presiding officer here, and is a zealous man. In my last writing I informed your readers of my purpose to try and organize a Sunday-school at Halford, and am pleased to report this has been done, with Bro. Ernest Adick superintendent, and Sr. Budge secretary, and twenty-nine members. The Devil is at work; but we are not discouraged. This is God's work, and we are trying to be collaborators with him in his work, and are being blessed by his Spirit. Sr. Vina Campbell had her baby girl blessed Sunday, the 12th; name, Oris Rita. The sweet Spirit rested upon the writer, who was called to bless, bringing many a tear, to the joy of the parents and those present.

Your brother in gospel work,
R. B. HOWLETT.

LIVINGSTON, Wisconsin, February 3, 1908.

Editors Herald: I feel to thank my heavenly Father that I can be engaged in his glorious gospel, which is the power of God unto salvation.

During the past year, as a small branch located in this part, our experiences have been quite peculiar on account of the outspreading of the gospel by God's servants. The Evil One tried in all his power to overthrow God's work, but God has so ruled and overruled by his Spirit that we, as his children, have been upheld and kept from those snares which were seen and unseen. The Lord has said: "Every branch in me that beareth fruit, he purgeth it that it might bring forth more fruit." So we feel that he has purged our branch, causing it to bring forth more fruit in bringing many to a saving knowledge of the gospel, causing more laborers to be brought into his vineyard; for he hath said, that the field is white already to harvest, and the laborers are few.

So we all, as Saints of God, ought to try and "thrust in" our "sickle and reap," that God's work may move on rapidly, that the Lord may soon come to redeem his people Israel. I hope that we may live such lives as will be as a bright light which shineth into the world, which can not be hid. Though we may often have trials, temptations, and discouragements, which may seem heavy to bear, it often inspires my mind with the song:

"Never be discouraged, if along our way
Disappointments meet us, tempting us to stray;
Closely cling to Jesus; ask him for his grace;
In his words of comfort find a resting-place."

The Saints here have built a house of worship, which caused much labor and sacrifice on our part; but we all feel rewarded for what we have done, and hope it may be the means of bringing more hungry souls unto Christ.

Hoping we may become as instruments in God's hands in doing much good, and ever praying for the welfare of Zion and her children, I am,

Your sister in Christ,
JESSIE GRATZ.

TENT FOR MISSIONARY WORK.

To the Saints of Eastern South Dakota; Greeting: The missionaries to South Dakota, having learned by experience some of the difficulties to be encountered in trying to reach the public with the gospel message, have concluded that a tent would be a valuable auxiliary in the prosecution of our work, and after consultation with my collaborer, L. G. Wood, and the approval of those in authority over us, we have concluded to present the matter to you, and ask for your cooperation in the work. Faith in the cause we profess to love, and a firm reliance on God, and a willingness to do our part, to the best of our ability, will accomplish what is needful. We need a tent large enough to accommodate two hundred people or more. We need a tent for the missionaries to live in. We need money, provisions, and bedding to care for them. Write to us on or before March 20, and tell how much you can give on or about May 1, and on or about September 15.

When we know what aid to expect, the matter will be presented to the general authorities of the church at General Conference in April, and their cooperation asked for.

The tent will be the property of the church, because there is no district conference in the mission.

No money will be expected until you are duly notified by letter, or in the church papers.

The meeting tent will cost about $95.00. The living tent about $10.00.

Your servant, and also that of the church,
EDWARD RANNIE, Bishop's Agent.
OMAHA, Nebraska, 3318 Taylor Street.

To the Saints of the Northwestern Kansas District: We are entering upon the duties of a new year; duties both temporal and spiritual. Let us try to do as well in both lines this year as we can. Do not wait for the Lord to bless you with full purses before you think to pay him his part. We can do little that will be of worth to us without sacrifice. Let us do what we do with a willing mind. Let us see to it that we gain the consent of our minds to do what God's law calls for. His law calls for our tithes and offerings. Some of the Saints of our district have done nobly, and are still doing. I trust, at the end of this year, so much may be said of us all. Send your tithes and offerings to the below address. Your brother in Christ,

JOHN A. TEETERS, Bishop's Agent.

Quorum of Twelve.

To the Members of the Quorum of Twelve: This is to remind you that at your last session you adjourned to meet again on the tenth day of March, 1908, at Independence, Missouri. The time fixed is nearing. It is expected that a full quorum will be present at the next convening. This meeting is the customary one held before the convening of the General Conference, in order to consider matters relating to it.

As no men are sufficient for these things of their own wisdom, it is eminently proper and important that we seek divine wisdom to guide in the work before us. With a view of doing what we may in the way of preparation upon our part for such aid, it is suggested that Sunday, the eighth day of March next, be kept by us as a day of fasting and prayer, petitioning the Almighty for light and wisdom to guide us in the work before us, and that the spirit of love and unity may inspire and prevail in all our sessions, together with those of the conference, that our efforts may be crowned with success.

The resident members of the council, at Independence (I. N. White and Joseph Luff), will please arrange a permanent place of meeting. All communications intended for the quorum should be sent to the chairman, W. H. Kelley; or the secretaries, F. A. Smith and J. W. Rushton, all in care of I. N. White or Joseph Luff.

March 10, at 10 a. m., meet at the residence of Bishop E. L. Kelley.

Hopefully,

WM. H. KELLEY, President of Quorum.

LAMONI, Iowa, February 5, 1908.

First Quorum of Elders.

Will each member who has changed his address since March 1, 1907, please notify the secretary immediately of the fact, so that he can send each a report blank. If for any cause a blank does not reach you, do not fail to send the items of your labors for year made as accurately as you can without a blank, soon after March 1, so that our Quorum report can be ready at the convening of the General Conference. Do not hold your report until you come to the conference, nor send by some friend; but send it to the secretary by mail, and you will be sure to be included in the annual report. Also let all who have not a quorum license, and do not receive one mailed with their report blank, and wish one, send request for one to me with their report. Laboring for the advancement of our order, I am, Yours to command, LAMONI, Iowa. C. J. PETERS, Secretary.

Corrections.

In HERALD for January 22, in letter, "Have miracles ceased?" on page 91, in Sr. Rasmussen's testimony, first line of second paragraph of her letter to Bro. Sorensen, the date should read 1899, instead of 1889. Sr. Rasmussen calls our attention to the error, saying she does not know who is responsible. The date, as published, was furnished by Bro. Sorensen.

In a letter from Bro. F. R. Tubb, in HERALD for January 22, page 92, the name of Miss Sarah Riggs is used. Bro. Tubb wishes to state that her name in full is Sarah Middlebrook Riggs.

The Central California Sunday-school convention will meet at Tulare during time for conference, which is March 6 to 8, instead of last of February and first of March, as stated in HERALD for December 22 in the convention notice.

SMITH.—Elizabeth, the beloved wife of Robert W. Smith, and the second daughter of Bro. and Sr. Henry Greenwood, all of Manchester, England. Sr. Smith was born December 17, 1871, at Stafford, and sometime afterwards, with her parents, came to Manchester, where she was baptized by Elder Joseph Dewsnup, March 5, 1886, subsequently being confirmed under the hands of Elders J. McCue, J. Dewsnup, and J. Baty. On the 27th of March, 1897, she was married to Bro. Robert Smith, at Manchester, with whom ten happy years were spent in life's joys and sorrows. Under all the varied experiences of life's fluctuations, her amiability and brightness never changed; but with consistency of purpose she ever found her pleasure in the association of the Saints, and her lovable disposition was always seen to advantage in making welcome any who needed hospitality. September 20, 1907, after a brief illness, which cruelly blighted the hopes of husband and wife, and inflicted great pain and distress, she was released from the "burden of the flesh," and she left us for the "house not made with hands; eternal in the heavens." The funeral was conducted by John W. Rushton, September 25, and the body laid to rest in the Phillip's Park Cemetery. A large number of relatives, Saints, and friends followed the cortege, and the profusion of flowers and wreaths bore witness to the love and esteem which her life had cultivated. Husband, mother, father, brother, and four sisters, besides a host of friends, mourn her premature death and still feel the loss of one whose grace of character was an enrichment to their lives; and will ever hold memory a fragrant inspiration.

CRAVEN.—January 21, 1908, at Knife River, Minnesota, Sr. Sarah E. Craven. She was born February 1, 1874. Baptized in 1894. Was married to William J. Craven, October 11, 1899. Of this union five children were born. Four still live to mourn, one having died in infancy. She was all that a wife and mother could be. Funeral from her residence in Knife River, January 23, 1908. Her body was placed in the cemetery at Two Harbors, Minnesota. Funeral in charge of, and sermon by H. O. Smith. She was beloved by all who knew her. Hers was the death of the righteous.

Said sister united with the Reorganized Church, January 7, 1861. Funeral-sermon by F. E. Cohrt. A very large following to her last resting-place. She died as she lived, strong in the faith. She has gone to rest in the paradise of God, to await the higher summons, "Inherit the kingdom prepared for you."

She leaves father, mother, two sisters, and one brother to mourn their loss, all of whom were present at her death. She died with a bright hope before her. She gave, as her last words to those that remain, good advice, and wished that they were ready to go with her. Funeral service held in the Methodist church, by Elder G. F. Walling.

DIEM.—Near Clarksdale, Missouri, January 25, 1908, Sr. Alma Diem, wife of Bro. F. H. Diem. The deceased was born November 6, 1880, in Crawford County, Iowa; married to F. H. Diem, March 5, 1902, at Denison, Iowa. Baptized into the church in January, 1904. She leaves father, mother, husband, three brothers, and one sister. Interred in the Pleasant Grove Cemetery.

Powell, after which the remains were laid to rest by the side of his dear wife, in the German cemetery. She preceded him nine months. Three sons and a large number of grandchildren and great grandchildren are left to mourn, though not without hope.

BOSTROM.—At Chicago, Illinois, December 23, 1907, Sr. Martha Bostrom. Born April 14, 1859, in Nebraska. Baptized May 26, 1872, by her father, Elder R. C. loving husband, son, and daughter, and two brothers, Robert M. and John Elvin, the last of eight children, are the immediate relatives left to mourn. Funeral the 26th, from the Lutheran church; sermon by Reverend John German. Interment in Graceland cemetery.

HUTCHINS.—Alma Morse Hutchins was born May 16, 1847, in Colchester Township, Essex County, Ontario, Canada, and became a member of the Reorganized Church, November 19, 1862, in Midland County, Michigan. Died at Omaha, Nebraska, January 20, 1908. Funeral at the house of his son, George Hutchins, January 23, 1908. Sermon by Elder James Huff. The body was taken to Meadow Grove, Nebraska for interment.

TARZWELL.—January 15, 1908, at Cedar Valley, Ontario, George Tarzwell, aged 71 years, 8 months, and 22 days. He was born in Erin, Wellington County, Ontario, and was married to Mary Ann Wheeler, February 11, 1856, who, with three sons and one daughter, are left to mourn their loss. He was the first one to receive the missionaries and give them a home. He was baptized January 19, 1891, by Elder John Shields. He died firm in the faith, and awaits the first resurrection. Funeral-sermon by James Pycok, assisted by King Cooper.

Tests of Hickory by Forest Service.

Carriage makers and manufacturers of farm implements, as well as the men of a number of other industries which are concerned in the use of hickory will follow with interest a series of tests of this valuable wood about to begin at the Forest Service timber-testing laboratory at Purdue University, at Lafayette, Indiana.

The importance of the tests lies in the fact that they will furnish accurate data on the relative strength on the different kinds of hickory, which is a wood for which no satisfactory substitute has been found. The timber of no other tree possesses the peculiar properties which make hickory necessary in the manufacture of parts of vehicle and farm implements.

The hardwood forests of the northern section of the country are being rapidly denuded and it is therefore important that accurate information regarding like species in other sections of the country be obtained. The hickory of the Northern States has always been considered of better quality than that of the South and has been quite generally given the preference by manufacturers and users of this species of wood. Prejudices once established are not readily removed and because of this fact the Forest Service is preparing to prove conclusively the relative merits not only of hickory of the same species obtained in different sections of the country, but also different species of hickory grown in the same section. It is intended later to extend the scope of this work to other species of wood in the order of their importance to the manufacturing interest of the country.

A shipment of southern hickory has just been received at the Purdue timber-testing laboratory. This material was collected by a representative of the Forest Service and accurate data regarding species, growth, and locality were taken for each tree from which the material was obtained. Other material of the same species, to be selected, will be treated in a like manner and all will be tested for the purpose of determining its strength, stiffness, and suitability for the purposes for which it is used. The strength, stiffness, and other data obtained by these tests will make possible a direct comparison of the merits of the wood as regards its species and locality of growth.

A pinch in the hickory supply has been felt for several years and it is already seen that the growing of hickory must be encouraged either by natural growth or artificial planting, if the permanence of a number of industries is to be insured. The importance in this first series of tests by the United States Forest Service lies in the fact that they will determine just what species of hickory are strongest, and will give much valuable information to owners of farm woodlots and others who plant trees for profit. Not until it is accurately determined just what species produce the strongest timber will it be possible to know just what trees to plant. When the report on tests is completed, information on the work will be gladly given to all who write to the Forest Service at Washington.

IN BEHALF OF THE MANAGEMENT OF THE

JACKSON COUNTY BANK

I take the liberty of soliciting your patronage as we are in a position to do BANKING BUSINESS BY MAIL very satisfactorily. Open accounts can be placed with us for safety at your convenience and command. We have opened a savings department, paying interest on accounts of $1 or more and each member of the family should become interested in having a bank account building for future needs. We also pay interest on time deposit certificates. A number of the brethren are living here, others are looking forward to this location as a future home, and late revelation and admonition foreshadow coming events, adding materially to our spiritual holdings necessary to signs of the times, and in this connection our Board of Directors propose to safeguard the financial interests of the Saints by offering to them a depository proof against graft, greed, or calamity, governed by a kindred feeling born of the interest we have in common. It is not popular men, large capital, heavy deposits, National or State laws, that offer absolute security to depositors, but directors and officers progressive and conservative, possessed of the virtue of true manhood, shorn of all political ambition, with no taste for frenzied finance or mining speculation, with no inclination to furnish funds for others in that line. I point with considerable just pride (I assume) to our Board of Directors as named below. Feel at liberty to write us on matters that concern you in Jackson County, Missouri.

OFFICERS: Ellis Short, President; M. H. Bond, Second Vice-president; William Crick, First Vice-president; J. D. Briggs, Cashier.

DIRECTORS: Ellis Short, William Crick, M. H. Bond, J. D. Briggs, G. H. Hilliard, Doctor Joseph Mather, Doctor O. H. Riggs, Horace Sheley, A. L. Yingling.

Editorial

A TESTIMONY FROM THE OUTSIDE.

The following letter from Bro. D. F. Miles, Pittsburg, Kansas, while deficient in some parts, is a late corroboration of some of the things which were done in Daviess and Caldwell Counties during the troubles of the Saints in those counties. It is quite possible that Mrs. Huckshorne was a witness to the tragedy at Haun's Mill, but she certainly is mistaken with reference to the hanging of Lyman Wight and Sidney Rigdon, for neither of these men was hung at the time mentioned by her, nor indeed at any other time, the former dying in Texas and the latter in Pennsylvania, many years after. The name "Liman White" should evidently be Lyman Wight. Of course, neither we nor Bro. Miles will vouch for the correctness of the story, but we send it, as some parts of it are corroborative of the testimony of others who have written in regard to the massacre at Haun's Mill. It was undoubtedly one of the most cruel and vicious exhibitions of sectional hatred that ever transpired in a civilized country. It was justly deprecated by those who wrote the history of Livingston and Caldwell Counties. The history of the trouble will be recalled to those who have become acquainted with it, by these statements made in this clipping:

LANTHA, Missouri, January 20, 1908.

MR. JOSEPH SMITH, Independence, Mo.

Dear Brother: I herewith inclose a slip taken from the Pittsburg, Kansas, Headlight, of 9th inst. Use it as you think best. I will tell you who I am, then you will know my motive in sending the inclosed. My grandfather on my father's side was D. S. Miles, one of the seven presidents of seventy at Nauvoo. My grandfather on my mother's side was Israel Doty. Both went through the trying scenes told of by the inclosed. I could write more; but this will suffice for the present. Your brother,

B. F. MILES.

Mrs. America Huckshorne, who makes her home with her daughter, Mrs. Joseph Hurt, at 815 East Twentieth Street, claims that she is a daughter of a man who might have been emperor of Germany, and is a niece of Frederick William III, former emperor of the German Empire.

According to the story told by Mrs. Huckshorne, her father, who was an own brother, she claims, of Frederick William, was compelled to leave Germany and was forfeited of his rights to the heirship of the throne and royal estates.

He came to America, adopted the name "Benjamin Fox" and the Pittsburg woman is one of his daughters.

She claims that the royal blood of the German nobility flows in her veins.

Mrs. Huckshorne, who is now eighty-seven years of age and a widow, makes her home with her children, and is content to let others wear the crown, and bear the fame of nobility.

According to the story of Mrs. Huckshorne, her father was forced to flee from Germany by court intrigues, although he was an own brother of the emperor. He came to America and bought a plantation in Kentucky.

The Pittsburg representative of the German nobility was born March 6, 1820, on her father's plantation near Louisville, Kentucky, and resided there until she reached the age of sixteen years, when she removed to Daviess County, Missouri, with her father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Fox, and here she witnessed some of the thrilling scenes of her life. She had eleven sisters and three brothers, some of whom came to Missouri with the family.

This was the time the Mormons were entering Missouri and settling the land there. Her father entered land in Daviess County, and it was here that she witnessed the Mormon war. She tells of seeing the actual battle at Haun's Mill, when the other citizens there refused the Mormons the right to vote.

On one occasion during the time of the Mormon war, she witnessed a scene where women and children were killed and thrown in a well.

She says she saw the legs and arms of the women and babies protruding from the top of the well and in some cases, women who had seen their babies beheaded, appealed to her for help, and in one instance she tells of seeing a woman with her throat cut, struggling, trying to get to her baby, the life of which had been blotted out shortly before, its head being severed.

After making several efforts to reach her babe, which was but a few feet away, she turned over and died. Her body and that of the child were then taken and placed in the well with the rest of those who had suffered in a like manner.

The people suffering this cruel outrage were Mormons, the perpetrators being ruffians of Daviess County.

At Gallatin, Missouri, she says she witnessed in the front yard of her home five men hung to a tree, she being alone at the time, and they were left there until morning. She tells of a fourteen-year-old boy coming to her home and after they had become attached to him a gang came to the house and in the presence of the entire family hung him to a tree across the street.

At the beginning of the Civil War she resided in Sheridan County, Missouri, and her husband was a Union man, although he owned slaves. She tells of the rebels coming to their home and occupying all the beds, she and the rest of the occupants of the house being compelled to leave the house until they left the following morning.

She saw the Missouri State militia, sent there by order of Governor Boggs, capture the city of Far West, and witnessed the exodus from that place of the people, marching before the bayonets of the State troops, and none of the number knew where they would receive the next meal.

She told how the people were shot down who refused to recognize the State troops as being victorious, and she saw the sixty-five men, the best of the city lined up to be shot. They were not killed, however, but placed in prison and kept until the war was over.

She saw the two influential Mormon leaders, Liman White and Sidney Rigdon hung, and it was through the instrumentality of herself and her relatives that Joseph Smith, another who was decreed to meet the same fate, escaped, and she saw him when he made the desperate struggle for liberty.

Mrs. Huckshorne's husband died before the Civil War, and she has reared fifteen children, left fatherless, to man and womanhood, she being also left penniless at that time.

For sixty years she has been a member of the Presbyterian Church. All her children are members of the same faith.

She says she is one of thirty heirs to an estate in Northern England, near what used to be the border between Scotland and England, valued at $4,000,000, but she has no hope that it will ever be settled before she dies. She says that during those trying times of the Mormon war, her husband buried a barrel of silver in Daviess County, and when he died they were never able to find it.

She, according to her statement, has been shot at fifteen times and has never been struck by a bullet. She tells of bullets that passed through her hair and through the sleeves of her waist, but that is as close as they ever came to hitting her.

She is at present residing east of the Kansas City Southern shops with her son and a daughter, Mrs. Joseph Hurt, at 815 East Twentieth Street.

A NEW EXPONENT OF THE CHARACTER OF UTAH POLYGAMY.

It appears that we are not alone in bearing the title of apostate. A new aspirant to that honor has risen in Utah. Don Carlos W. Musser, son of A. Milton Musser, Church Historian, has come out in denunciation of polygamy, and proposes to show by a series of articles to be published in the Salt Lake Tribune, given in a sort of history, the peculiarities of the modern development of polygamy in Utah.

This Don Carlos Musser was born in Utah, is a product of polygamy, and undoubtedly has a right to write of the peculiar institution from his actual experiences. As may be expected, he has in his first chapter, published in the Tribune in its issue for Friday, January 10, given Joseph and Hyrum Smith as the authors and first exponents of the dogma. We propose to quote some extracts from this first chapter, with comments thereupon, in order to show the peculiar ignorance of the books of the church and its history, that seems to attach to the young men of Utah, born in polygamy and associated with it.

I said that I have always been a Mormon. I want to qualify that statement by saying that I have always been a member of the Mormon church. I have never been charged with unchristian conduct, nor have I been disfellowshipped from the church.

We were baptized into membership of the church under the regime of Joseph and Hyrum Smith, by Joseph Smith himself, and confirmed by an elder in good standing in the church; and by this act of baptism gave credence and allegiance to the church and its doctrines as these existed at the time of such baptism. No charge of unchristian conduct has ever been alleged against us, nor have we ever been cited to appear before any ecclesiastical court, nor been disfellowshipped for immoral conduct, change of opinion, or apostasy. We can therefore sympathize with Don Carlos Musser, who is declared an apostate because he, too, has taken up offensive cudgels against what was in 1857 called the "chain cable of the church."

Don Carlos Musser, after stating that he still believes in the Mormon people, and that the story of their wanderings and persecutions still appeals to him, and that he is happy that he cherishes no malice or hatred in his heart in writing what is to follow the opening portion of his work, writes thus:

I feel to demand that the leaders of my people—so-called prophets, seers and revelators—turn from their ungodly dominance in politics and commerce, and render obedience to the spirit of the Constitution of our glorious republic. I feel that the time has come when Mormonism must be either reformed or suppressed; when the priesthood must render unto Cæsar that which is Cæsar's and unto God that which is God's; when the men who claim to be the leading oracles of Almighty, and who exercise, on account of this claim, absolute dominance over hundreds of thousands of faithful followers, must turn from their law-breaking and set such examples as common decency would suggest. Polygamy must be for ever abolished. There must be a complete and lasting separation of church and state. The church must withdraw from and for ever remain out of commerce, and the vast funds received through tithing of the people of ten per cent of their incomes, must be used for religious purposes only. There must be no more violation of solemn pledges made with the Nation, and if the leaders of the church find it necessary to live contrary to the laws of God and man, they must move to some other country, under the protection of some other flag.

In this statement of demands of what he deems to be necessary for the people in the Mormon church in Utah to do, there is but a practical and terse repetition of what we of the Reorganization have been presenting to the people for, lo, these many years. Mr. Musser proposes to present his argument in a story of persons who have entered into and lived in polygamy, and introduces the woman who is to figure in the story as a girl by the name of Rita. He represents her as a woman living at a spot in the city of Salt Lake, upon one of the leading streets which was in the early days of Zion, a show place, evidently meaning a house of note pointed out as one of the evidences of thrift and industry which characterized the settlement of the place. At the time of the opening of the story, Rita was a woman of queenly bearing, thirty-two years of age, and the mother of seven children. He writes:

About the time of which I write, Rita's husband had again demonstrated his great piety and faithfulness to the sacred institutions of his church, by taking unto himself a new wife. For sixteen years, or from the time of her marriage until the advent of the fourth wife, Rita had been the favorite, and all had gone well with her. But now a great change had come into Rita's life, bringing, as is always the case in polygamous families, when the husband and father assumes new marital obligations, grave doubts to her mind concerning the sincerity and spirituality of such a move on the part of her husband. When a woman marries in polygamy, she is generally sure that her husband is moved to the act by spiritual motives, and her own faith in Mormonism is then at its height. She is never more sure of the wisdom and righteousness of the doctrine of plural marriage than at the time she enters that relationship. And so long as she remains the favorite, it is not a difficult matter to retain her confidence in her husband. But if the spirit of his divine calling moves him to take to his heart another wife, why then, the most faithful of the daughters of Zion are apt to question the godliness behind such a move.

In this paragraph it is shown that the question as to the motive of the husband who takes a second or subsequent wife in polygamy, is apparently ignored or supposed to be in accordance with spiritual intuition, and the woman who is chosen as such polygamous wife appears to acquiesce in the supposed spirituality of the institution, while she possesses the position of favorite wife, and she apparently does this whether she knows that her husband took her as a wife with the consent of those going before her in the marriage relation, or not. She either is unacquainted with the specious teaching in regard to the requirements of the rule of polygamy, or does not know that the purported revelation absolutely requires that before a husband can take a second wife or others, the first must give her consent. Subsequently in the story it turns out that Rita had no previous knowledge of her husband's intention. The story goes thus:

And then came the change. Without consulting her, without even intimating his intention, her husband married again, and the new wife became the favorite. Doubts began to creep into Rita's mind. Was her husband acting from religious motives in taking to his heart this younger and fresher and, perhaps, more beautiful wife? Did the gospel of Jesus require that he marry again? Was it necessary for him to practically desert those whom he had previously married, and who had given to him the best of their lives, in order to serve the Lord? Was it not possible that the inspiration that moved him to his new alliance came from some other source than the throne of grace?

This was but the natural result growing out of the unnatural characteristics of the institution. For while Rita may not have had any doubts upon the subject while living in the glamour surrounding the position of the favorite wife, she having entered into this relationship while a girl seventeen years old, and having been surrounded by the evidences of her husband's regard continuously, notwithstanding the fact that she had displaced others in her husband's affection, just as the new wife had supplanted her in his regard. It was an inevitable consequence. Doubtless Rita had loved the third part of her husband as much as a woman married in her youth to a man already approximating middle life and living in connection with him while maturing into the atmosphere and condition of wife and mother, it seems to be an inevitable conclusion that at periods of her life she must have thought upon the possibility that the situation would naturally give rise to, and these were that sooner or later her husband would take another or others to wife for the same or similar reasons that he had taken her. And he who is foolish enough to presume that a man would select a second, third, or any other number of wives, one after the other, while his first wife was living, to whom he had been married in his youth, would select such companions under the influence of such love as men usually have who marry the woman of their choice under the hallowed influence of the institution of marriage, makes a mistake, a grievous mistake. The man who thus marries in polygamy will utterly disregard the provisions of the so-called revelation itself, and will put out from his heart the love which he bore his first wife, if he ever had any of the right kind for her, and marry another not only without the consent of the first, but will do as the husband of Rita did, not even intimate to her that he had any such intention of taking another wife, to say nothing of his asking her for her consent. Upon the hypothesis that Don Carlos Musser proposes to do as he said he is doing, presenting the actual conditions under which polygamy is practiced, we shall be pleased to read the story of the evil and the wrongs that have been perpetrated under the disregard of the laws of God and man, and the prostitution of the highest and holiest sentiments of the human heart under divine institution.

And now, in the anguish of her heart, she could not but ask herself if she had not sinned in marrying as she did, in polygamy, and if it were not possible that the Prophet Joseph's revelation on the subject of plural marriage might not after all be a terrible mistake.

And at such times Rita would take down the "Doctrine and Covenants," that sacred book which is the solace of so many saints, and turning to the revelation, she would read verse after verse, eagerly looking for the comfort it had formerly contained.

It would appear from the quotation just made from Mr. Musser's relation that this trouble of his heroine, Rita, occurred after the year 1876, for, if she had had a book of Doctrine and Covenants printed prior to that year, she would not have found that so-called revelation in it. This paragraph also shows that the writer, Don Carlos Musser, must himself have been ignorant of the contents of the Book of Covenants printed first in 1835 and republished in 1844, 1845, 1852, 1854, 1856, and 1869, and all other editions up to the fall of 1876, none of which contain the so-called revelation on plural marriage.

But Rita secured no comfort from the reading of the revelation, nor would any of the reasonings with which she sought to stifle her sorrow and dull the aching of her heart because of the doubts which had entered into her mind, accomplish the silencing of the intuitions of her woman's nature. Apparently driven to seek other sources for comfort, she took the Book of Mormon to read, believing, as perhaps she had been taught, that there was no contradiction between the sacred books of the church. But to her too apparent dismay, she found, on searching the Scriptures for a justification of her conduct and that of her husband, that the Book of Mormon was at direct variance with the teachings of the so-called revelation, and its teaching entirely contradictory to the Book of Covenants which she had in her possession. She was more than ever staggered by this discovery. How could it be? Had she known that the Book of Covenants which she had was the one into which President Brigham Young had introduced the so-called revelation on plural marriage without authority or sanction of the church, and had taken from the sacred book as it had been left to the church by Joseph and Hyrum Smith, the declaration upon which the institution of marriage had been based by divine revelation and sanction, she would have found that there was no contradiction between the Book of Mormon and the Book of Covenants. And if Don Carlos Musser himself will but take the pains to hunt up the editions of the Book of Covenants published prior to 1876, he will discover that not only is there no contradiction between the revelation known as "The Book of Mormon, the New Covenant," and the sacred book of the church, the Book of Covenants, but also that these agree with the absolute teaching of the Bible, Old and New Testament Scriptures. The quotation from the Book of Mormon which startled Rita is given at the opening of chapter 1 of the story which he is telling, and is as follows:

Behold, David and Solomon truly had many wives and concubines, which thing was abominable before me, saith the Lord, . . .

Wherefore, I, the Lord God, will not suffer that this people shall do like unto them of old.

Wherefore, my brethren, hear me, and hearken to the word of the Lord: for there shall not any man among you have save it be one wife; and concubines he shall have none.

The story goes that it was one night in the fall when Rita found these passages and read them for the first time in her life. Had she been familiar with the teachings of the Book of Mormon, had her parents, who claimed such sacredness for the word of the Lord contained in the Book of Mormon, taught her to read and digest the sacred things of the Book, she would have been forearmed against the possible imposition that was forced upon the people through President Brigham Young, who taught his devotees to discard and disregard the teaching of the book as having been intended for the church in its infancy, but were now to be set aside, and they were to live in accordance with the dictates of the priesthood, the living oracles, himself being the leading oracle, dictator of both their temporal and religious lives. We do not wonder that the soul of Don Carlos

Musser is "harrowed up" by pain, distress of mind, disgust, indignation, and holy resistance against the ungodly teaching by which such poor, unfortunate, innocent creatures as he pictures his heroine Rita to have been, were led into evil and wrong-doing. That night, with her soul atremble with the horrible thoughts which the contemplation of these passages in the Book of Mormon had engendered, she sought the presence of her sleeping children, four daughters and three sons, one of whom suggested to her that she should seek the Lord in prayer for comfort and direction. The language of the wakeful child, "Mamma, dear, why don't you ask God not to worry you?" The childish suggestion wrought upon her and the story goes on:

Rita returned to her own room and read again the words of the ancient prophet in the Book of Mormon. "You have broken the hearts of your tender wives, and lost the confidence of your children, because of your bad examples before them; and the sobbings of their hearts ascend to God against you."

It was not possible, she told herself, for a changeless, even merciful God, to say that in ancient times, and then, in this day of refinement and enlightenment, thunderingly command Emma Smith to receive the polygamous wives of the Prophet, her husband, to her heart or be damned.

Exactly, Mr. Don Carlos Musser. This is what the sons of the Prophet have been insisting upon for, lo, these many years; that such a condition of things was not possible; that God did never contradict himself in such fashion. When he made the declaration by revelation to Joseph Smith in 1831, in regard to the domestic relation, which is to be found in the Book of Covenants, first published, and, likewise to the everlasting shame and condemnation of modern polygamists that, "Whoso forbiddeth to marry, is not ordained of God, for marriage is ordained of God unto man; wherefore it is lawful that he should have one wife, and they twain shall be one flesh, and all this that the earth might answer the end of its creation; and that it might be filled with the measure of man, according to his creation before the world was made," God set to his seal as to the establishment of marriage among men in the church which he had established, by the sending of the angel, by the discovery and revelation of the Book of Mormon, and this in complete accord with his word as found in the Bible, from Genesis to Revelation.

If it had not been that the minds of Rita and others of the women of Utah, old and young, had been stultified by the false teachings of the leaders of the church after Joseph and Hyrum Smith fell in death, no such condition of things as Mr. Musser depicts in his story could have been possible. And if those leaders and their followers have branded Joseph Smith's sons with being apostate, these same men will condemn Don Carlos W. Musser as apostate for bringing to light the blight and the curse which have fallen upon Utah. And it is fortunate for the sons of the Prophet Joseph Smith, that they have neither brothers nor sisters born under the curse, but like those mentioned by the apostle in his writing, they are children of the free woman.

The Straight Road

THE WAY TO LIFE.

The works, and the designs, and the purposes of God, can not be frustrated, neither can they come to nought, for God doth not walk in crooked paths; neither doth he turn to the right hand nor to the left; . . . therefore his paths are straight and his course is one eternal round.—Doctrine and Covenants 2: 1.

We learn from the above, that God does not walk in crooked paths. Therefore he commands all:

Enter ye in at the strait gate: for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat: because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.—Matthew 7: 13, 14.

"I am the way, the truth, and the life, and no man cometh unto the Father but by me."

So we learn from this statement that no one can go to the Father except by him. And if we wish to go to the Father we must follow the Christ, and enter in at the gate, and continue to walk in the straight road, as long as this mortal life shall last. For, Jesus said, He that endureth to the end shall be saved. And again, we read in John 3: 16, 17:

For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him, should not perish, but have everlasting life. For God sent not his Son unto the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved.

From this we learn that salvation comes by him, and him alone. In the days of Paul there were some that cried, saying, "These men are the servants of the most high God, which show unto us the way of salvation."—Acts 16: 17. Now, what did these men teach? Paul taught the people to believe in Christ and Peter taught the people to repent and be baptized "for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." So we see plainly that the first step to be taken is, faith. The second, repentance; and, third, baptism, and this baptism is the gate or door into the sheepfold of God. And if any man will seek to climb up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber. So this is the straight gate that leadeth to life everlasting. Do you, dear reader, wish to receive this precious gift? If so, come and follow the Good Shepherd, for he entered in by the door; and John the Baptist was the porter to open the door of baptism to the Christ. For we read in Matthew 3: 13-17:

Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him. But John forbade him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me? And Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer it to be so now: for thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness. Then he suffered him. And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water: and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him: and lo, a voice from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

LEAVES FROM LIFE.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF PATRIARCH HENRY KEMP.

I was born September 27, 1830, at Steeple Ashton, England. Was baptized into the old church in 1849, by Alfred Berrett. Was ordained to the office of priest in London, in the Camden Town Branch, in 1850. I was ordained to the office of elder by Eli Kelsey, and sent out as a minister of the gospel by the London conference. In that capacity I labored for almost five years, enduring all the hardships incident to the life of a traveling elder in that country, going from place to place without purse or scrip. There I baptized many honest souls into the church, and some of them later joined the Reorganization, and have passed over to receive their reward, with all the other faithful ones who had gone on before them.

I presided over several districts in that land, and had great joy in preaching the pure gospel of Jesus Christ. The horrible doctrine of polygamy had not been preached at that time. We were no apostates: we had all the gifts of the gospel. The sick were healed, the blind made to see, and the lame were made to walk, and leap for joy in the Lord.

When that hellish doctrine of polygamy from beneath was introduced and preached by Orson Pratt in the Free Mason Hall in London, before about fifteen thousand Latter Day Saints, at the April conference, about one half of them were sickened and sad, and were ready to give up, and leave the church. That day was a day I shall never forget.

We did the best we could from that time on until the spring of 1856, when we had to bid farewell to the land of our birth and to our home and loved ones; and then we started for that land God through Jacob had promised to Joseph, even a land choice above all other lands.

We had several hard storms on the sea, but finally landed in Boston. God was with us; his Spirit comforted our hearts, and cheered our drooping spirits. From Boston we went by the railroad to Iowa City, Iowa. Several of our number died as we traveled along from day to day.

At Iowa City, we had another experience. We prepared to cross the state of Iowa to Omaha, a distance of about three hundred miles, with hand-carts. On this trip still more of our number died, and we laid them away to rest until the resurrection day, and from further sorrow and trial in this life. We crossed the plains and then the great desert of America with our hand-carts. As I was a young man, and single at that, you might ask why I started on this long and tiresome trip. It was this. I promised to help a brother missionary through. His name was Henry Squires. He had a wife and several children, and I felt under obligation to help him, so on we went, doing the best we could under all the conditions in which we were placed, which were bad indeed.

Many of us had paid our fare through to Utah before we left England; nevertheless, we all shared alike, which was all right. We had a little money, or at least most of us; we were able to buy some provisions as we traveled through the state of Iowa. This helped us along. But after getting away from civilization, we were put on one half rations, and then had only one half pound of flour per day, and were drawing our carts all the day, and the women and children had to walk. All began to grow weak, and through fatigue and want of food many died and were laid away to rest as best we could in the cold grave, hid from the sight of loved ones for ever, in this life. The rest of us plodded our way in the snow, and through the cold streams of water; for at Laramie the snow first fell on us; but on we traveled until we reached the Devil's Gate. Some of the teams from Salt Lake City met us prior to our reaching that place, and gave us timely assistance. Before they met us, we were losing from two to six of our number every night. The sight was horrible to look upon.

We stayed at this place about one week, and then started on, and by working hard all the day long, until nearly sundown, we made about three miles a day through the snow. Oh, it was so cold; but as cold as it was, we had to wade the Sweet Water, which was frozen over on both sides. In the middle the current was so swift that the water did not freeze, so we had a lively time to get our carts over this stream, and had to carry the women and children across on our backs. We went about a half mile up to the mountain, where we were sheltered from the storm and winds; but that night we had the worst wind-storm we had witnessed on the trip. It blew almost every tent down, and the screams of the sisters, and crying of the children, that night, were horrible. It is impossible for the pen or the tongue of mortals to describe the sufferings of the people that night. At this place, from four to six of our number died every night. These we buried in the best manner we could; and when we could not get the dirt we often used large rocks. At this place we camped about three weeks and all of us thought this would likely be our last camping-ground in this life; but more help came from the valley, and they took the rest of us through with their teams. The wind carried our hand-carts into the air and broke them to pieces, and so we were forced to abandon them here.

Sr. Squires gave birth to a sweet little girl baby in Echo Canyon. It was named Echo. We built an Indian wigwam and thatched it over with long grass. The camp stopped a few days for Sr. Squires, and then on we went. The mother and babe both lived and did well, and in after-years they returned to England.

In Utah, we lived for nine years, and were prospered temporally. We never entered into any of their secret doings in any way, and received none of their endowments; but moved along, doing the best we could, looking and waiting patiently until we heard the tidings of great joy that came to us through the missionaries of the Reorganized Church, through Brn. Briggs, McCord, Harrington, and McIntosh.

I accepted the gospel and was ordained an elder, and then preached the pure gospel all the winter of 1864 and spring of 1865. We came back in the spring of 1865, and landed in Nebraska City, and from there moved to Council Bluffs. We lived there one year, and I presided over that branch, and had many good times, doing the best we knew; from there, the next summer, we moved to Nebraska City.

At Nebraska City, I labored as president of the branch, and as priest, teacher, and deacon, and with the rest of our brethren there we did the best we could under all circumstances, having all sorts and kinds of times, but am thankful to say the good prevailed.

The men with whom I labored at this place were true and faithful men. I preached with Bro. Waldsmith, and with others as our circumstances would permit, in and around Nebraska City for years. I also labored in Iowa, and about two years in Colorado, caring for my family with the help of my beloved companion and children, spending much of my time laboring locally; and there I was greatly blessed, and baptized many into the church, such as I believe will be eternally saved.

For the last twenty-five years of my life I have devoted my entire time in the interest of this work. Most of this time, the Fremont District was my objective point. Part of this time I was associated with the Pottawattamie District, and also with the Nodaway District.

I labored as an elder, also as one of the First Quorum of Seventy, and as a high priest, and baptized hundreds during my ministry; and in this line of work was indeed blessed of the Lord, and was well cared for in these districts by the dear ones among whom I labored so long. I feel grateful to them, and very thankful to my heavenly Father.

In 1901, September 1, I was set apart to the evangelical and patriarchal order. In this work, as a minister, and in preaching and administering in the sacred ordinances of the church, I have indeed been blessed, far beyond my expectations, and have as a humble servant of God conferred hundreds of spiritual blessings upon those who have sought a blessing from the Lord through me.

In my work in the stake, and while attending the different reunions, God has indeed been with me and has helped me in my work, to the joy and satisfaction of many souls, and has given to me, his weak servant, great comfort and assurance of the divinity of this work.

My testimony is that God lives, that Jesus is the Christ, and that this work, in which we are engaged, is true.

Dear Saints, let us be true to our God, and to ourselves and the work, and God will enable us to endure to the end, and be saved in his kingdom.

Your brother and colaborer in Christ,

HENRY KEMP.

THE TWO BIRTHS.

SERMON DELIVERED AT WEBB CITY, MISSOURI, SEPTEMBER 29, 1907, BY PRESIDENT R. C. EVANS.

(Reported by Belle Robinson James.)

Courtesy Canadian Courier.

ELDER R. C. EVANS.

Permit me to draw your attention to the third chapter of the gospel as recorded by Saint John, where you will read these words:

There was a man of the Pharisees, named Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews: the same came to Jesus by night, and said unto him, Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him. Jesus answered and said unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he can not see the kingdom of God. Nicodemus saith unto him, How can a man be born again when he is old? Can he enter the second time into his mother's womb, and be born? Jesus answered, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he can not enter into the kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again.

There is an imperative command, and the most important question ever propounded by the mind of man contained in this short reading. I am going to try to emphasize this afternoon the importance of the question and the wonderful command that fell from the lips of the greatest Teacher that ever graced the earth with his presence. First, "Ye must be born again." Second, "How can a man be born when he is old."

Standing in what may be termed a Christian pulpit this afternoon, addressing those who believe, to a degree at least, in the divine mission of the Son of Mary, I am happy in the thought that if the words of the Master are properly presented to you, stripped from tradition, priestcraft, superstition, churchianity, and idolatry, that you will be willing to receive with meekness the ingrafted word, which is able to make you wise unto salvation.

You will discover here that there are two births referred to: the natural birth and the spiritual birth. One might just as well say that he can have a natural existence in this world without the first birth, as he could say that he could have a spiritual existence in the kingdom of God without the second birth. The first birth is a miracle. We say it is miraculous, with the thousand other things we call miraculous, because we do not comprehend all the forces and the ramifications of that great law that results in the first birth; for there is not a man present but what will admit that the mystery of life is as profound as the mysteries attending death. We know very little about the laws of life. We know that certain causes produce certain effects, just as we do of electricity. Edison, the great wizard of electricity, is a baby in knowledge when he comes to measure the wonderful potentiality that is resident within the electrical force. And humanity, in its wonderful groping and blindness, calls most everything a miracle that it does not comprehend.

We can not see the things of this natural life by our natural eyes until we are born naturally into this world or kingdom, and he would be considered insane who would make the claim that one can see and comprehend and understand the things of this world anterior to his natural birth. To your speaker, it is just as clearly announced in the record, that it is impossible for us to see and comprehend and know, to sense, to enjoy, and to participate in the things of the kingdom of God before we are spiritually born.

Now with this thought before us, I launch out with this statement, that both these births, the first and second, are governed by laws known to God, devised by divine omniscience. They are both as unalterable, as unchangeable as the God that inaugurated them. As there is no change in the method of conception, life, birth, of the first birth, neither can there be any change in the modus operandi of the second birth. Both are regulated and operated by defined laws. Should some person suddenly rush into this audience with a well developed new-born babe in her arms, and essay to tell you that that child was the result of a miracle, that it came into this world by some sudden impulse as the result of prayer, how many of you would believe it? You would say in pity, "The poor thing's mind is shattered by her trouble and disgrace." Everybody would know that this child is the product of a well-known law. Now I have to sometimes pray for more patience and less language when I hear people get up and tell us that they are born again in a moment; that conception, birth, eternal life, has been developed in a moment. Perhaps they come into the revival meeting half intoxicated, with a deck of cards in one pocket and half a bottle of whisky in the other, and have heard about fire and brimstone and hell and the seething flames and the scorching tortures, and the great frown of God, as they heard him pictured as the perpetual jailer, as the eternal turnkey, and the power that is proscribed as the method of punishment, fire, and brimstone in its literal and scorching forces; and under that feeling a sudden change came over them; and, as Moody said upon one occasion, they are born again in less time than it took Zaccheus to jump down from the tree when Jesus called him. To me that is religious nonsense.

My Bible tells me very plainly that conception must precede birth, both the natural and the spiritual. Now I may not go too far in the depths of this deep subject, but I trust that to the matured mind, a word to the wise will be sufficient. They tell us that no one yet has explained the power of the second birth and that no one can explain all about the first birth; but let us see! What did the ancients understand by this first and second birth? I apprehend that they understood about as little, perhaps, of the first birth as we do. The general laws were understood and operative and the results found. Jesus said, "Ye must be born again." This is imperative. We can not escape that commandment. I want you to feel it this afternoon. This being true, the next question, "How can a man be born again when he is old?" Here is where the Latter Day Saints come to the parting of the ways with their religious brethren of other denominations. We acknowledge that we differ from them. There is no use denying this fact; and the difference indicates that some one is wrong. Now they tell us that it is charity to believe that two men, diametrically opposed to each other, are both right. I do not call that charity. I call that nonsense. It is charity to believe that the two men who differ may peradventure both be honest, both be sincere, but to say that they are both right is downright nonsense. To illustrate: we have our Presbyterian friends, and I am going to call a spade a spade. If I preach a sermon on Presbyterianism to-day, somebody that loves Presbyterianism ought to think a good deal of me for that. If I preach a sermon on Discipleship, or Catholicism, you who are Christians or Catholics ought to think a good deal of me, since I have such an intelligent audience to tell what you believe to. I wish every preacher would clearly and properly represent what we believe to their congregations all the time. If they did, everybody would soon become Latter Day Saints.

We take up the doctrine of foreordination, as taught in the confession of faith in the Presbyterian Church, and we find there that God has foreordained, predestined, to save a certain number, and he has foreordained to damn all the rest; and that predestination was all settled before you and I were born, before the foundation of the world. That our faith and good work have absolutely nothing to do with our salvation. God decided whom he would save and whom he would damn before the world was made. There is not a Presbyterian here that would deny that. They would say, I do not believe it; but that would only prove that you were not a Presbyterian in good standing, when measured according to the creed.

You take the Methodist doctrine of free grace, the doctrine of whosoever will may come, and I submit that there is no greater difference between right and wrong, between light and darkness, between good and bad, between truth and error, between God and the Devil, than there is between these two faiths, disciplines, or churches. And they tell me I am uncharitable because I do not believe they are both right. There is not a man that has a thimbleful of brains that will say that this is true, but what will come to the same conclusion we have. They can not be right. They are just as far apart as the north from the south. Suppose a school-teacher tells us that twice two are four, and another teacher tells us that two and two are forty-seven. Let the school inspector come along and tell us, Brethren, you are both honest and sincere. If you believe twice two are four, it is four. And if you believe that two plus two are forty-seven, it is forty-seven. Would you believe that? Would you say it is charity? No, you would say that the fellow had rooms to let up there. Why can we not use our reason on this like we do on mathematics? We can afford to be mistaken on mathematics, but if we must be born again, we can not afford to be mistaken on this matter of life. We may suffer all our lives as the result of a mistake in some financial concern because of our lack of knowledge in mathematics; but the grave ends all so far as that is concerned. But in this question, we have just nicely begun when we reach the grave; for the grave, death, is not a wall, but it is a door through which we enter into grander possibilities than are known here. Death is but the breaking of the fetters, the throwing off of the shackles, the unbinding of the soul, the stepping from the winter into the summer, from the night into the day, whose sun shall never know a setting, so we can not afford to be wrong in this matter.

Now then, I am going to show you some things about this new birth. We have learned that we must be born again and the important question is propounded, How can we be born again? We have a church in this town that believes in the new birth. Oh, now, I suppose they all believe in the new birth. I think that without exaggeration. I may safely state that you have no church, I am sure you have no church that has any phase of Christianity represented in it, but what will agree that the doctrine of the new birth is imperative, is the understanding of the Christian doctrine. But we differ as to the methods. "How shall a man be born again?" We have one of them teaching it this way, that the new birth is to be born of water, that is to be baptized by immersion for the remission of your sins. They tell us that is all there is in connection with the new birth. I refer to our Disciples, our Christian brethren, commonly known as the Campbellites. They tell us that is the new birth; that is conversion; that is all there is to it; to be born of water is to be born again. I have Mr. Alexander Campbell's statement here and he certainly is the forerunner of that institution or association; and all give him the credit of being; and I guess he was. If they are questioned, I have them on tap here and can turn to the page whenever you want it. He tells us that all there is in connection with the new birth is the water baptism, that that is essential to salvation. That is conversion indeed. He says that water baptism and conversion are synonymous; one and the same thing.

Now we have another denomination here and I am going to tell you the name of it, too, and if you belong to it you will know that I am telling you the truth. I refer to our Methodist brethren. I want to name these two in perfect love and friendship, to show you there is no use shooting unless you hit something. They believe in the doctrine of the new birth, but how? You must be born of the Spirit, and they tell you wonderful and numerous and beautiful truths relative to the birth of the Spirit. Now we say to our Disciple brethren, What about being born of the Spirit? Oh, born of the Spirit! That is an hallucination of the brain. Why, Mr. Braden tells us, and he is supported by a great many of his colleagues, that this birth of the Spirit leads to all kinds of fanaticism, debauchery, and criminality; that this spiritual birth referred to by the sectarians ends in lewdness and all that is bad. I am not wicked enough to give you all his words verbatim. They do not believe in the operation of the Holy Spirit, in spirit baptism to-day. That is derided, ridiculed, denounced. Water baptism is the second birth and all there is to it. I could cite you evidence from the books before I leave this platform, by the dozens, if I am challenged to do it.

Well, when our Methodist friends come to this new birth, they put all the stress upon the spirit baptism. The very thing ridiculed by our Disciple friends is the very thing extolled and exalted and idolized by our Methodist friends. They tell us that the spirit baptism is the new birth. That is all there is to the new birth. The water does not mean water, or the water baptism does not enter into this question of the new birth at all.

Now our friends want us to have charity, and they tell us they want us to believe that both these denominations are sent of God to preach the way they preach. We do not believe it. I would like to ask: When the Disciple preacher tells you you must be born again and water baptism is all there is to this doctrine of the new birth, I would like to propound this question: Wilt thou tell us by what authority thou preachest thus, and who gave thee this authority? And when our Methodist friends tell you that water baptism has nothing to do with this new birth, that spirit baptism has all to do with it, I would like to propound the same question to him, Tell us by what authority thou changest these words? Who gave thee this authority? For both of them are diametrically opposed to Jesus Christ, who taught and brought to light eighteen hundred years ago this doctrine of the new birth.

Now what does Jesus say about it? He ought to know. He says, Except a man is born again he can not see the kingdom of God. Now if he is born of water only, I do not know of anybody who ever got baptized in water who could see any better. It performs an important part; it is part of the new birth, not all of it. I do not want to belittle or minimize or dim the glory that shines in its resplendent brilliancy around water baptism. It is part of the great work that is called the power of God unto salvation, and my stammering tongue will never be able to describe its beauty, its strength, its potentiality and the force that divinity has worked through it; but it is not all. The Spirit baptism is just as essential, just as necessary, just as important, and if we have got some Disciples here this afternoon and some Methodists here this afternoon, I want them to come together and be Latter Day Saints; for to be a Latter Day Saint you will have to be just like the former day saint, only not living in the same age of the world. That is the only difference. The former day saints were just like Latter Day Saints. The Latter Day Saints teach just like the former day saints. It is only the difference in the time. Let me bring Jesus to bear right here. "How can a man be born again when he is old?" Listen! The answer:

Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he can not see the kingdom of God. . . . How can a man be born when he is old? Can he enter the second time into his mother's womb, and be born? Jesus answered, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he can not enter into the kingdom of God.

Do you not think now it is kind of cheeky, a piece of downright impudence, for any man in the first place to say he loves Jesus, and then to claim he is following him, and then he reads that and says, "Oh well, Lord, you are good, but I don't believe you. You have never learned letters, just as the folks said over there, and you are muddled a little bit about this matter. Now we have been to college and we know you can enter in without being born of the water," says our Methodist friend. "Now we know you can—you are mistaken about this."

Who is he talking to? Jesus. You are not arguing this question with me. I am just telling you what the Lord says. I would not have known a thing about it if Jesus Christ had not taught it. He says you can not enter in unless you are born of the water. Do you not think it is a little impudent for you to say you can? Think about it a minute. Suppose you had never read another book in the world, only the New Testament. Suppose you had refused to believe every man under the shining blue that contradicts Jesus Christ. Would you read it like that? Would you believe it like that? If you would not you would fulfill the statement made by Jesus when he said, By the tradition of your elders you make the commandments of God of none effect.

Here a person tells you you can be saved without water baptism, and you believe it. Now let me illustrate this by a little story. I was preaching this doctrine one time a long time ago, and a lady became very much interested. I said, "Is not that plain?" "Yes." "This is in your mother's Bible?" "Yes." "Do you believe it?" "Oh, yes, I believe it." "Now,"

I said, "why not go and be baptized if you believe it?" "Well, I will tell you, we have got one of the smartest parsons in our own church, one of the brightest minds. He is a perfect gentleman, and I know he is a good man. I would not like to make the move without consulting our minister." Yes, that is to say, she thought a good deal of Jesus Christ, too. She would not like to lose him, but it was what her parson thought first, Christ after. If she had any strong backing, she would not mind loving Christ a little. She acknowledged that Jesus said that. She rather believed it was true; but she would like to see the parson about it. I could have uttered her a little prophecy then. I told the folks after she went out, "She will not be baptized." I met her shortly after and said, "Well, sister, did you see the parson?" "Yes." "Well," I said, "when are you going to be baptized?" "Well," she says, "Bro. Evans, I have just put that right out of my mind. The clergyman that we have is good enough for me, and he says we don't have to be born of water, and I believe him."

"Now, do not laugh at that poor woman. Where are you standing? Where are you standing, you folks that I am talking to to-day? Some folks tell me I ought not to mention the names of the churches, and one thing and another. One man gave me a calling down for mentioning them, and he thought I ought not to have mentioned the names, and that night I heard him preach a sermon, and he told us what the Turks, Hindoos, and Brahmans did, and about all the works of the Vesta, and the Koran, and he gave it to those eastern people terribly. I got after him, and told him that the only difference between us was that I talked to people who could talk back, and he talked about people who could not talk back.

We do not care so much about what the folks believed away off yonder. I am going to try to get at the things you believe that you ought not to believe, and I am going to try to remove the weeds out of your garden, and plant the good seed, that there may come of the planting an abundant harvest of good fruit. That is what I am here for.

Away down in this very State, a gentleman met me in 1889. I was talking something along this line, and he came up to me and says, "Brother, I am very pleased with this discourse to-night, and yet you have hurt me." I said, "Grandpa, I don't want to hurt you, I'd sooner be a rainbow than a cloud. What is the matter?" "You proved to-night that water baptism was by immersion and for the remission of sins." I said, "I was trying to do that." He said, "I have been a preacher before you were born, and I know that I have got a remission of my sins. I am on my way to heaven. I am born again, and I have never been baptized." Well, that was a pretty strong testimony. I had a couple of questions to ask him, and I will tell you what they were. "You tell me you have got a remission of sins, born again, on your road to heaven, and you have never been baptized? You say you know that. How do you know it? Please tell me how you know it." "Yes," putting his hand upon his heart, he says, "thank God, I know it by the Spirit."

Says one, "Wasn't that a kind of a clincher?" Yes, it was; but I had one more question to ask. "Now, Grandpa, you say you have got a remission of sins, born again, on your road to heaven, you never was baptized, and you know this by the Spirit; will you please tell me by what spirit you know this?" "Why," he says, "By what spirit? why there is but one spirit." "Oh, no, the Bible says, 'Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits; for there are many false prophets gone out into the world.'" He says, "That doesn't mean me, that means you. We do not believe in prophets, and you do." I said, "Let us see, you knew it by the Spirit. The Spirit has prophesied to you salvation and an abundant entrance into the kingdom of God without baptism by immersion for the remission of your sins. That is what that spirit prophesied to you. Now," I said, "we have got to try that spirit and see whether it is a false prophet or not. How will we try it?" He did not know just exactly. "Don't you think the word of God pretty good measure to measure that with? Now," I said, "the Bible says, 'There was a man sent from God whose name was John.' The Bible says further, 'Of all they who are born of women there hath not arisen a greater than John the Baptist.' Still further, John, speaking, says, 'He that sent me to baptize with water'—and further, 'John came preaching in the wilderness of Judea, the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins'; and further, Jesus indorsed that baptism by submitting to it himself, and declaring in his first sermon, 'The Pharisees and the lawyers rejected the counsel of God against themselves, not being baptized with the baptism of John.' Still further, 'he taught his disciples, saying, Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved.' The antithesis to that is, that he that believeth not and is not baptized shall not be saved. Still further, he says, 'Teaching all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost.' And he that taketh the name of God in vain, God will not hold him blameless. And if baptism is a non-essential, we have men taking the name of God in vain every time they baptize. We have God sending the greatest preacher or prophet ever born of a woman to do something that was a non-essential. We have Jesus taking a prominent part in the gospel of righteousness, which is a non-essential. We have him telling the people that they will be saved if they believe and be baptized, and they will be damned if they do not; but yet it is a non-essential. We have showed you upon that matter that he was afraid that the disciples would really forget the importance of it, and so he says, 'You tarry in the city of Jerusalem until you are endued with power from on high; and when the Holy Ghost is come it will teach you all things and bring all things to your remembrance what I have said unto you.' And they tarried in the city of Jerusalem until that power came that was to bring to their remembrance the grand principles that he taught them. And do you remember when the power came? You will find it recorded in the second chapter of Acts, that they spoke in the language of the Parthians and Medes and Elamites and the dwellers in Mesopotamia and in Judea and in Cappadocia, in Pontus and in Asia, Phrygia, and Pamphylia, in Egypt and in the parts of Libya about Cyrene, and strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes, Cretes, and Arabians, 'We do hear them speak in our tongues the wonderful works of God.' They were all there upon this wonderful occasion, and being convinced that Jesus was the Christ, they cried out, 'Men and brethren, what shall we do.' The Spirit had come with the sound of a rushing, mighty wind, and filled the room where they were sitting, and what was the result? The Holy Ghost, coming to them, brought to their remembrance the things that Jesus taught them, and what was it? What was it now that the Holy Ghost brought to their remembrance that Jesus had taught them? Just this, 'Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of your sins.' Now," I said, "Grandpa, here is the Bible. Thirteen texts proving that baptism is essential to salvation, the way of the Lord, and for the remission of sins; and you have received the spirit that tells you you can get a remission of your sins without it. Testing your spirit, Grandpa, by the word, we find it one of the false spirits that has gone out into the world. Second, you are born again, but you have never been baptized in water. Test that by the word. Jesus says. 'Except a man is born of the water and of the Spirit he can not enter into the kingdom.' It is not his Spirit that told you you could enter in without being born of the water. We find it to be a false spirit."

I told this story at Grandpa's expense, but I am persuaded that it is going to settle down on some of you people, and I want you to remember that, as the servant of God this afternoon, I am teaching you something that you will never be the same after to-day. Did you ever sense the importance of hearing a priest of God speak, when commanded of God Almighty to represent Jesus Christ? If you recognize the seriousness of this position, you will never be the same men and women again after you go out of this door as you were before. This will stay with you, and you will meet it when the books are opened. If you love the applause of men, if you love to be in the swim, if you love to be with the popular throng, if you refuse to submit to the commandments of Jesus Christ, remember the beautiful story told you this morning, the beautiful picture painted before the vision of your understanding, that when the books are opened and you are judged according to the things written in the books, what will be the consequence? If you have rendered obedience to them, Christ will be there as your Redeemer, as your Savior. You have met Christ under his own law, you have met him in the channel of obedience. He becomes your Savior. He becomes your Redeemer; and when the books are opened, the blood of Jesus Christ is drawn across your sins. They have gone before you to judgment. He is your advocate. But if you want to be saved according to the popular way of the world and reject all the commandments of God, being ashamed to associate with the people of God and have your name cast out as evil, as the Saints of God have, then when you stand before that great white throne, he will say, He was ashamed of me and of my words before men. Now I am ashamed of him. I am not his Redeemer. I am not his advocate. Let him stand according to that which is written against him. He has no lawyer to plead his case. Let him stand upon his own merits. Let him be weighed in the balance. He will be found wanting.

I would sooner risk it, friends, to stand by Jesus, what Jesus has said, than by what the preachers have written, and I will stand that way until the crack of doom shall sound. I do not believe Jesus Christ will forsake me if I stand there and say, Master, I heard thy voice. I followed in the unpopular way as thou didst lay it down, among the briers and thorns of vituperation and scandal. I followed thee through the darkness and gloom in the old appointed way, hearing the voice of the Good Shepherd, I refused to follow the stranger. Now, I ask you, in the name of Jesus Christ, can you forsake me when I trusted in the redemption as prescribed in that law? When I have accepted the salvation as recorded in your word, can you forsake me now? Say, friends, he will not do it. He would cease to be God before he would do it.

Now here we find that water baptism is for the remission of sins and so considered a part of the new birth. Now to support this position, at the risk of being a little tedious, I am going to read you what the folks in other centuries thought about this doctrine of the new birth. What they thought it constituted to be born again.

We bring them to some place where there is water and they are regenerated by the same way in which we are regenerated, if they are washed with water, that is baptized in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost; for Christ says, Except you be regenerated, you can not enter into the kingdom of Heaven; and that we shall obtain forgiveness of the sins in which we have lived by being baptized in water, and this washing or baptism is called the enlightening or new birth or regeneration. [This is a statement made by Justin Martin in his first Apology, and he wrote and lived just one hundred and forty years after Christ was born. We can not get much better authority than that outside of the Bible, but we pass on.]

When Christ gave unto his apostles the mission of regeneration unto God, he said unto them, "Go teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost."—Irenæus, who lived one hundred and sixty-seven years after Christ.

We, after the example of Jesus Christ, being born in water. . . . the act of baptism itself is carnal, in that we are plunged in water, but the effect is spiritual, in that we are freed from sin.—Mosheim, chapter 1, p. 7.

The expression, being "born again" was not first used by our Lord, in his conversation with Nicodemus. It was well known before that time, and was in common use among the Jews; when our Savior appeared among them. When an adult heathen was convinced that the Jewish religion was of God and desired to join therein, it was the custom to baptize him first, before he was admitted to circumcision; and when he was baptized, he was said to "BE BORN AGAIN" by which they meant that he was before a child of the Devil, was adopted into the family of God. This will satisfy every reasonable man who desires only the salvation of his soul.

The writer of this statement says, "This will satisfy every reasonable mind who desires only the salvation of his soul." Do you know who said that? John Wesley's sermon on John 3: 5-7, vol. 4, p. 30.

And the very text I have taken this afternoon, John Wesley, preaching from it, declares the same thing. You see there are Methodists and Methodists, and there are Wesleyans and there are Wesleyans. If John Wesley came to-day he would be considered a Latter Day Saint, if he preached like he did when upon the earth, as far as this question is concerned, at least. I could read to you for an hour, but I pass from this thought of water baptism as a part of the new birth that is before us. I want you to notice this other carefully, you people of mature years. Test and measure this second birth with the first birth. I shall make no further allusions to the first birth, but you can draw your own conclusions. No man can come unto the Father but by me. Here we discover we must get into a certain condition. Hence the word of God is the good seed. When we heard the word of God that is the seed. When we are in a proper condition we accept the good seed, the word of God. Now, how do we know that conception has really taken place toward the second birth? It moves us to repentance, and then we are born again. How is the type of our death to sin shown? We are taken from the element of air and placed in the element of water. Now then we are dead, buried the Bible calls it; and we are buried with Christ in baptism, that like as Christ is risen from the dead, so also will we rise to a new birth or life. Coming from the element of water into the element of air, represents a birth. Sprinkling never represented a birth. I will leave it to any mother present, pouring never represented a birth. Here we come from the element of water into the element of air. I ask in the name of science and truth and experience, is not that the second birth, the only way you can get a second birth? There is not a married woman here will doubt my statement, and the deeper you go the more beautiful you can see the resemblance between the first and the second birth.

We pass on. Here is the birth of the water. Now then we are born of the water. We have not yet received the birth of the Spirit. Is the spiritual birth given by immersion? It would not be a birth unless it was immersion. As we deny sprinkling and pouring in the first birth, so we do in the second birth. I do not mean, if God pours out the Holy Spirit until you are immersed in it it will be an immersion, it is going to bother you to prove that. It is not going to bother me a bit if you believe the Bible. If you believe the Bible I have got it pretty nearly proved now. You remember Jesus taught the doctrine of the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost. It is part of the doctrine of Christ. The 6th of Hebrews says that the laying on of hands is one of the principles of the doctrine of Christ. The best musician in this world can not get away from the first principles of the lines and spaces and dots and notes—not even a Mozart or a Beethoven. Very well, the school-teacher can not get away from first principles. He has got to recognize in mathematics, addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division. Twice two are four. He can not change that, no matter what education he has got. And so with the first principles of the Christian religion. You must recognize them, and in the sixth chapter of Hebrews the laying on of hands is called one of the six fundamental or cardinal principles of the doctrine of Christ. Now then we find the laying on of hands, and promise of the Holy Ghost to the apostles. We find that they tarried for that promise. I referred to it a moment ago. They were in the city of Jerusalem, in an upper room. Let me see if I can prove immersion by that. It says they were praying there, and suddenly there came a sound as of a rushing, mighty wind, and it filled the room where they were sitting. Supposing we are seated here to-day; something comes down through the room, whether it is sprinkled or poured, I do not care how it comes. Suppose it comes until it fills the room, would we not all be immersed in it? Yes, that is where we get the word endued, from the Greek word enduno. It means to plunge, to overwhelm. Here they were born of the Spirit. They were immersed in the Spirit. The testimony of hundreds of people who have received the Spirit is given in this way, that they have felt as though there was a funnel or a cloud come down, or some mighty power encircled them, enveloped them, overshadowed them, and they were born again from an old existence into a new life.

Now, in water baptism, a man takes the individual, as a priest of God, and he offers a living sacrifice for sin, the candidate. The man does not forgive the sin, God pardons the sin; so the man lays his hand upon him, that the candidate may receive the Holy Ghost. The man does not give the Holy Ghost; that is the gift of God. Man does not give the Holy Ghost any more than man gives the pardon from sin. He officiates in the ordinances; Paul plants, Apollos waters, God gives the increase, so that both the pardon from sin and the gift of the Spirit are gifts from God.

Now in this sense we find the apostles confirming the people by the laying on of hands. You remember in the eighth chapter of the Acts, it says that after the terrible persecution at Jerusalem, Philip went down to Samaria, and preached Christ unto them there; and "when they believed Philip preaching, . . . they were baptized, both men and women. . . . Now when the apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John: who, when they were come down, prayed for them, that they might receive the Holy Ghost: (for as yet he was fallen upon none of them: only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus)."

Now let me stop right there. These folks were baptized by proper authority; had received, no doubt, a remission of their sins according to the promise: but they had not yet received the Holy Ghost. They had great joy, the inner consciousness of having served God to the best light that they had; but it was not the Holy Ghost, and so when the apostles "heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent Peter and John: who, when they were come down, prayed for them, that they might receive the Holy Ghost: (for as yet he was fallen upon none of them: only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.) Then laid they their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost."

You will read again in the nineteenth chapter of Acts, "Paul having passed through the upper coasts came to Ephesus: and finding certain disciples,"—Yes, they called themselves disciples—"he said unto them, Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed?" And like a great many disciples of which we have heard, they had not paid much attention to this Holy Ghost. Again, the record says, they had not "heard whether there be any Holy Ghost. And he said unto them, Unto what then were ye baptized? And they said, Unto John's baptism."

Now right here let me touch a point. I am told by certain denominations that John did not preach the gospel at all. Let me see whether he did or not. Paul says, John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying you should believe on him who should come after, which is Christ. Is not that the gospel? "When they heard this, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus." They say at once that they had been baptized by a man who had not been sent of God. He called himself a disciple. He thought if John had been authorized, he would try to believe that he had been authorized, and so he went at it; but he was not commanded of God. He had not received authority to represent God, and so his baptism was not valid. And Paul baptized them over again. And he laid his hands upon them and they received the Holy Ghost, and spake in tongues and prophesied.

Here is the new birth; to be born of water, and of the Spirit. I beg of you, as a stranger, come to tell you the message of life and peace, remember the statement: "What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder." You say this refers to marriage! I have been over in your country for several months now, and I have been fortunate enough to read your papers almost every day, and when I read the evidences of the divorce courts in the state of Missouri, I think God has had as little to do with the marriages of this country as most anything else in this world. It is almost next door now to trading horses. If they do not suit, you can trade them off. It is a disgrace to our civilization, a standing disgrace to the country; it is offering a premium on crime; it is destroying the morality of the country—but that is not just what I am after, just now.

Friends, anything that God has joined together, you must not put asunder. Jesus was God manifest in the flesh, and he put this water baptism and this Spirit baptism in the very same verse. Now I beg of you, if you believe on water baptism, study out the facts as to the authority to baptize; and when you are properly, authoritatively baptized in water, the man that is baptizing you in water will tell you the Bible story about the baptism of the Spirit. Any man that baptizes you with water and ridicules the baptism of the Spirit,—that is the sure sign that will follow the unbeliever.

Then again, when they tell you to come up and be born of the Spirit, and never mind water baptism, that is a sure sign they have not been called of God. He who is called of God "will speak the words of God." "Nothing can be added to it, nothing can be taken from it, God requireth that which is past." And so we must be baptized by immersion for the remission of our sins. That is being born of water. We must be confirmed by the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost; and God will send the Holy Spirit so that you may be baptized or born of the Spirit; then you are born again from the old existence into the new life. Then you will see the kingdom of God in all its beauty and glory; and thus, you, having been born again, as a babe in the kingdom, you will partake of the milk of the word, the Bible says; and by and by, as you are developed, you will be able, as Paul says, to take the strong meat, and you will grow in the grace of God until, putting off childish things, you will become a full grown man. You will not think as a child, speak as a child, understand as a child, then; but by and by you will have developed into the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ, a fullgrown, developed Christian, that will think like Christ, act like him, talk like him, and if you preach, you will preach like him.

God help us to recognize the fact as to how we can be born again, and to realize the great truth of the imperative commandment, "Ye must be born again."

March Reading for Daughters of Zion Locals.

Patience is one of the earliest lessons a child needs to be taught, as it is one of the most important lessons of maturity. He must often wait; teach him to wait patiently, that is, not to make a fuss about it. To keep perfectly still even for a minute, is one of the hardest things for a child to do; indeed, it is sometimes quite impossible for him to do it "to order," but he can be trained to it unconsciously in play.

Let him hold out his open hand and double down his fingers one by one, counting them or calling off on them names of father and mother, brother and sister, till all five are down. Then, while the little one stands perfectly still, let the mother sing:

"Now I put them all to bed,
Pillowed is each sleepy head,
Let them rest in peaceful slumbers."

He could not keep still unless he felt there was a reason for it; but here is a game of which he understands the meaning, and he will remain perfectly motionless for minutes, with an expression of greatest importance, lest he waken the sleepers; thus he is exercising self-control and learning patience by the exercise.

A baby can be taught patience in many ways. One is by not giving it what it cries for, while it is crying. We do not mean by this that the child should be left to exhaust itself with crying, but calm it tenderly, and then promptly give what it desires if right that it should have it. If it can not be quieted but persists in screaming, do not give the thing cried for. The instances are rare in which true mother-love and mother-tact can not devise some way of quieting the child; when quiet, give it what it wants in such a way that it shall feel that you wish to gratify it when it is patient and good. Feelings and sympathies are rudimentary forms of thought. Baby can not reason abstractly, but he can feel your approbation, and he soon learns to do those things which call it out.

On the same principle you can teach your little one gentleness, even in the manifestations of grief or pain. Children often cry loudly and make a great fuss over little hurts on purpose to excite pity. Often a little child who has received a tumble or a scratch will not appear to mind it in the least if mamma is not in the room, but the moment she appears he will begin to bellow lustily. Show him that you pity him when hurt, not in ratio to the noise he makes, but in proportion to the gentleness he shows in suffering.

"Softly, softly," say to him in gentle tones, "then I shall feel sorry for you"; and as he quiets down, "Ah! what a good child to be so patient!" Thus he comes to feel an honest pride in patience and endurance.

"In babyhood are the beginnings of all things." From their babyhood we should train our children to be loving, brave, and true. Or rather, and here is where danger lies, we can avoid teaching them to be hateful, vindictive, cowardly, and untruthful. Have you ever seen a baby taught to do hateful, vindictive things, because his impotent wrath looked "so cute"? To pound with his puny fists the unconscious chair or table against which he stumbles, to rattle in rage the spoon from which he has spilled his supper, even to stamp his baby foot in anger at papa or mamma when they have crossed his will? I have seen all these things done; and I have seen the unavailing efforts of after-years to efface the lessons taught in infancy.

—Mary Allen West, in American Motherhood.

Telling is not training. The one is but thin air, the other is substance.

It is easy for us to remember this in a material way, but not hard to forget it when it comes to training the child spiritually.

A mother would not expect to train her daughter to sew by merely telling her to get a needle and "do it right." She knows very well she must sit down beside the little girl, take her hands and guide them time after time, until she can thread the needle. Then she shows her how to hold the cloth, how to take a stitch, and the way the seam should go.

This she does many times, encouraging, correcting; but sympathizing and comforting when the tears of failure come.

That is training.

No mother would expect her son to become a carpenter by being merely told to "do it right."

His hand must be taught to guide the saw until it will follow the line. Week after week, here a correction, there an encouragement from his teacher must pass before he can even join two boards as they should be joined. Then months of practice under the guidance of the one who knows before he is a skilled workman.

That is training.

Could you make a great musician by merely telling the child to go and "do it right"? Certainly not. Months and months and even years it takes of patient showing, explaining, guiding, encouraging, sympathizing.

Even to give knowledge is not training. We know a long time before we can do.

Not a sense, not a muscle, not a faculty can be trained by merely telling what to do and what not to do. It must be surrounded and upheld, guided and led, corrected and encouraged, strengthened and fortified.

The moral training of a child is no exception. It is not only the most important, but the most difficult part of the child's training.

To tell the child what is right and wrong is only a beginning,—a small beginning of his training.

A child is inclined by nature to do everything it can, either right or wrong. The object of moral training is to teach it which is right and which is wrong; lead it to prefer the right, then strengthen and develop its powers until it can do the right in spite of temptation.

The qualities above all others required for this training are justice and sympathy all the way, even more when the child is wrong than when it is right.

The justice keeps the mother from shielding the child from the punishment which its wrong acts bring. It causes the mother to make it plain to the child that "being found out" is not the punishment for wrong-doing, but that the very act itself will bring punishment.

The sympathy keeps her in vital touch with the child. The most dangerous thing of all is to associate the child in your mind or allow it to associate itself in its mind with the wrong it has done.

That is, no child should be made to feel that because of a bad act it has become an exile, that it is a "bad little boy" or an "ugly little girl."

That is the start which leads to deception in an effort to cover up its wrong acts, and causes the child to ally itself after a while with its wrong deeds, and making that its policy, fight for and justify its evil ways.

The child must feel that the evil itself is its enemy. It should know that the wrong will bring punishment that hurts, but that the mother will help bear it, and show how to keep from doing it again.

Many a tragic battle goes on in a little soul when the spirit and flesh are at war. It is both unwise and cruel to make it feel when the tears of defeat tell that the flesh is the victor, that it is bad like its act and is cut off from love and sympathy.

Then of all times it should be mother's child, and while it should be allowed to pay the full penalty of its misconduct, in the fullness of her sympathy she should show it the way to avoid or overcome next time the enemy—the common enemy of mother and child—evil.—William H. Hamby, in American Motherhood.

Questions on March Reading.

Why should patience be taught a child in early life? Is there ever a time when we find no need to wait? Why is it difficult for a child to keep still? How may his natural activity be controlled? Why would the play suggested be helpful? Can a child be trained to cry or not to cry for what it wants? What shows that a baby is pleased to have its mother's approbation? Should a child be give training in patience and endurance at the time he is suffering grief or pain? Need this involve any sacrifice of sympathy and gentleness on the mother's part? What is training? (Training is causing to do.—Trumbull.) What is the object of moral training? Will telling a child to do a thing right make him able to do it? What is necessary before we can do? What makes the muscles strong for a certain work?

What will make one strong in right-doing? What qualities are needed in the one who is to give this training? Why is justice necessary? Why is sympathy necessary? Does it ever do any good to call a child "bad"? What harm may it do? What evil may result by causing a child to feel cut off from the love of his parents or from the love of God? What is to be gained by causing him to realize what is his real enemy? What is most needed by a child in his struggles against evil, even when he has yielded to the wrong?

Program for March Meetings.

Hymn No. 62, Saints' Hymnal; prayer; reading from "Home Column" with discussion; paper, "Hate the sin, but love the sinner"; paper, "Wrong brings its own punishment, how show this to the child"; roll-call; business; hymn No. 81; closing prayer.

Letter Department

VERNON, Texas, January 25, 1908.

Editors Herald: In view of all that has been said of the great Northwest by the "Jots Man," it might be well to inform the public of a State called Texas, that forms no small dot on the map of these United States of America. I wish not to be ranked egotistical when I hazard the remark, Texas is the "biggest" State in the Union. Did you know Texas has a few peculiarities exclusively her own? In making these remarks it can not be rated the writer has become a convert to all the distinct features the State has. To sum it all up in a nutshell, Texas has the best and the poorest of everything in existence. It can rain the longest and then get the driest; be the muddiest, and then get the dustiest; get the hottest, and when the "norther" comes be the coldest; and produce more capital, and have less. Among the people of the State are the most refined and others, the very reverse. It possesses the most peaceful citizenship, yet when the cherished principles and institutions are assailed, the most unrelenting and warlike. Here have been men who have died for principle and would do it again, and "you all" who differ from these well-thumbed facts have only to come to Texas to be converted. It may be my opinion has become lop-sided. Some one should essay the task of diverting the tide of opinion from floating down one single current. If such an effort were not made, some might forget there was such a State as Texas. In the higher walks, Texas has come to mean more than the first significance the hearing of the word might suggest to the mind of the ordinary Yankee—a range of wild, long-horned cattle, with rattlesnakes, wolves, horned toads, centipedes, tarantulas, and every pest known to human kind in abundance; but distinctly a THOMAS

State with a fair average for culture and refinement; and unsurpassed for sociability and hospitality. While it is true such pests in the animal kingdom lurk in abundance in the jungles (?) of the State, yet the hardy resident has learned not to be baffled by such trifles.

The State's history has been one of combat against adversity and trial. From the day the battle of Thermopylae was fought in the behalf of Texas liberty at the Alamo, when Santa Anna's army killed to a single man the last soul, including the illustrious Travis and Crockett, it has been one continued interesting chapter in the annals of American history that stands unique and thrillingly interesting—teaching the lesson of sacrifice, and what humanity can do against great odds.

We believe the interests of the church in Texas have made some advancement the last year. At least the representative men have made commendable efforts to advance its interests. The year's work has gone into history, and now the only alternative for us looking retrospectively over it, is to make wise mathematical deductions and see what difference exists between the debits and credits.

Blessings and the things of the very greatest benefit to us are not always discerned, and much we would look upon in the present as trials are really blessings in disguise. Upon this hypothesis we believe the blessings far exceed the adversities of life, and we are prepared to enter upon the duties of another year with a reasonable amount of confidence and assurance of the loving hand of an allwise Father over us for good. Surely we can rely on his same goodness and protection, judging the future by the glints of sunshine of the past. Some things according to our finality of comprehension, may seem hard and difficult; but, under the favor of divine providence, I feel confident in expecting all things for the very best.

In dispensing the word, I say, unhesitatingly, the Lord has indeed been with me. The divine Spirit has quickened the mind, which has also enabled the preached word to have weighty consideration by the hearers. What satisfaction, what joy fills the heart of him who knows his message is divine, and that our heavenly Father is leading and directing him in the work!

I have found in the South a great need of revival work among the branches and members. Some of my time I have thus devoted, because of the stringent necessity. Can we say as we have walked out from the old into the threshold of the new year, as we pause to consider,—the chilling winds and cold frosts which caused devastation through forest and glen, robbing it of its rich and luxuriant foliage,—has also taken from us the beauties of Christian character and all that pertain to nobility of true manhood? Time's transient footsteps constantly remind us of the fleeting hour—"the footprints on the sands of time." Time yields to us the golden gift of opportunity. Have we used it to the best advantage? Think! Have you been swerved by the vain and transparent philosophy of the world from the holy enthusiasm of righteousness you once had, to a life of wantonness and carnality? Has the perpetual struggle for sustenance amid this present, highstrung tension of unrest, lured you from the holy purpose contemplated in the gospel of Jesus Christ? If so, we should look keenly and deeply, reflect, then turn and retrace our steps. Success of life not only depends on the sanity of our views, religiously speaking, or the estimate of worth at par value we place on some one else's character (which view has generally percolated through a strainer of prejudice); but the manner of our life, the work, the humility, the fervor and true devotion. We do not consider the sometimes strenuous experiences and honest endeavors to do gospel work, apparently baffled at the time, void of their beneficial effects, and emerging from all present hardship we come with a clearer understanding and a closer knowledge of our responsibilities as servants of God in the great vineyard.

It is hard to make poetry out of the prose of actual experience in much of the walks and talks of "ye missionary" life. The monetary reward for our labor is meager in comparison to the way such labor is rewarded by the world. This, however, is of secondary consideration, in view of the fact that Christ says of a certain class, "Verily, they have their reward"; and we find consolation in the fact while that our compensation is scant in this life it will be abundant in the world to come. The lack of cash, no doubt, will dull the enthusiasm and would put a damper on endeavor of high society religion; for the very scheme of its creation being obliterated, the profession would lose all its charms and become a humdrum profession, adapted to weaklings instead of men.

The financial fiddle-strings of the recent money panic, to a limited extent, have affected the missionary here in the South, as no doubt elsewhere. To us missionaries the "supply of gold" indeed has been limited, hardly enabling us to do the necessary traveling incident to our work. Yet, after summing the entire list of receipts for the year into one round figure, it is about as big a thing as we have run across during the season.

In the best of times the ministers who have families dependent, are far below the average percentage of the cost of living, figuring on a worldly estimate in the cities. There is too much demand and not enough supply. Were it possible to have a supply of that dimension from which the families of the ministry could draw, according to our just necessities, and with certain monthly regularity, that our minds need not be overly burdened in worry over the food, clothing, and too many times home propositions, it would indeed be a soothing balm to the minds of the ministry of the Church. The Bishop can not supply it, if he does not have it on hand. If it were paid into his hands, no doubt, with a willing heart it would go to those in need. The member who is not as enthusiastic on the question of finance, as other questions of moment, is really unconverted—at least to that part of the law. When it comes to the practical part of the bread and butter proposition, of course there are many phases of it to be considered; but, indeed, to be practical, it is hard to have the proper sympathy and enthusiasm in missionary labor when you know such necessities are really in demand at your home, and your wife and children have not respectable wearing apparel to don in order to go to church on Sunday morning. The grand, beneficent policies contemplated in the gospel plan, will admit of no poor. At least with me there should be a more reasonable amount of certainty for the caretaking of the families of missionaries, that our desires to do the bidding of God's will as sevens may not be handicapped by woeful forebodings, thinking there may be a time arise when for some reason, say disability, our active services may cease, would there be remorse with us and our children, that they have not been given as fair a chance by the sustenance of the church as could reasonably be expected of the average man? When we take under careful advisement the fact that nothing is more sacred than the home, are we to be harshly criticised because a cherished feeling of love and desire exists to see as good results on the line of culture and education with our children as with the children of others in the church? Could we be justly criticised should we fail to always willingly throw our families on the church for their destiny in temporal matters, when we see so many apparently indifferent to our demands? If the perfect law were executed in the paying in of tithes, there would be no fears or anxieties for the welfare and happiness of our ministry.

This, it may be said, is the seamy side of the fabric; yet we must not forget to have a proper estimate of the value of the article. We must not only look at the best side, but give a critical diagnosis of what it really is, through and through, from both inside and out. In offering these few thoughts I hope not to degenerate into a pessimistic croaker. There is nothing so sacred in the law and the church that it can not be discussed with profit, and if wrong policies exist, which threaten injury to the whole, restrict them and maintain the equality of rights as well as opportunities of the great brotherhood. I fear the repeated call for finance in honor to that God has said, has not been considered with due earnestness by many, and thus God and his cause are not respected to the degree they should be. Our policy should not be "insane opposition, but sane coöperation" in matters of great consequence to us. The law demands us to be not only Saints in theory but in practice. I know all whom I have met do not place the stress upon this particular part of the law as much as some others; and some have ignored the rights and just claims of the ministry altogether, and absolutely did nothing to pay their necessary part, imposed not unjustly by man, but justly by our heavenly Father. To get a disinterested member interested, is many times a task of no small dimension. Such a policy of not contributing anything to the welfare of the whole, would not only restrict the powers of the ministry, but frustrate Zion's redemption. Not only the Bishop, but also all the ministry should take the initiative in urging the letter of the law, and urge matters to that degree that those who possess holdings that are tithable will see the demands of the law, and will willingly give over the part that belongs to the Lord. One important matter, we must agitate these questions, and that long and loud. Give it the full stress the weightiness of the law will allow.

Some opposition has been met at various places in the State. But generally speaking our men have been kindly received. Two debates were held at Avery, Texas, and Pearsall, Texas. One with the missionary Baptists, and the other with the Church of Christ (Non-progressive). Another debate is registered for June next, at San Antonio, with the Church of Christ. Elder Early Arceneaux is their representative. Propositions: "Resolved, the Book of Mormon is a fraud, and its teachings and claims not entitled to the respect and belief of a Christian people." "Resolved, the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints as restored by Joseph Smith and his coworkers is the Church of Christ in fact; and is scriptural in origin, organization, doctrine, and practice." "Resolved, the Church of Christ as restored by A. Campbell and his coworkers is the Church of Christ in fact; and is scriptural in origin, organization, doctrine, and practice."

The Church of Christ people of San Antonio have builded them a meeting-house about fifty or sixty yards from ours, on South Flories Street, and seem determined to oppose us in every way. In so doing they not only have depreciated the value of our property, but also their own. I think, however, we can stand it if they can. Elder Harding (Weeping Joe" as he has been dubbed by the boys) is at the head of the building work there.

Two branches have been organized during the year, the Second San Antonio Branch, and the Prairie View Branch, near Maypearl and Grandview, Texas. We left the charge of these two branches in the hands of Elder Ed N. McRae and Elder D. B. Higginbotham.

It was regretted Bro. I. N. White could not remain longer with us in the State and had to leave because of bad health.

The missionaries of the State so far, in the year's report, have baptized forty-nine, and besides this some have been reported by the local brethren.

I had the privilege of attending the debate at Davidson, between Elder George Young, of the Church of Christ, and Bro. W. M. Aylor. It was conceded by all Elder Young was a smart man. Was a brilliant orator and up to date debater, and possibly made as capable a defense of their work as any man in their ranks. But in this conflict we saw our cause assume a more solid foothold, while theirs depreciated in the minds of the public. The facts were what told in this debate. The people could see his sharp, cutting witticisms and sarcastic expressions were not sound argument and proof. We feel assured lasting good was done. The opposition only advertised our cause, and now it is before the minds of the people as never before, and their cause weaker and their pocketbooks less fat.

I am now at Bro. C. D. Constance's, north of Vernon, Texas, trying to hold forth. As yet the people have not given us a fair hearing. We are in hopes, however, better success will come to us here. I have been about laid up with the most severe cold I ever had. So far the winter has been very mild here in the South. Scarcely anv snow.

In gospel bonds,

S. S. SMITH.

MCKENZIE, Alabama, January 21, 1908.

Editors Herald: On December 21, Bro. T. C. Kelley began a debate with a Mr. Pain of the Primitive Baptist Church on the following propositions: "The Scriptures teach that spiritual or eternal life in the kingdom of God is conditional"; Bro. Kelley affirmed, Mr. Pain denying. Bro. Kelley showed from the Scriptures that obedience to the gospel was necessary to secure to man his eternal salvation. Mr. Pain utterly failed in his negative to overthrow Bro. Kelley's position with his many strained and misapplied interpretations of the Scriptures. His affirmative was a rehash of his negative, that the alien sinner was void of any particle of life, totally depraved, hence could not do anything that would bring him into favor with God or secure his eternal salvation. This, notwithstanding the boasted invincibility of his theory, would not stand the test when compared with the teaching of Him who said, "My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me," whose mission was to seek and to save that which was lost, that man might have life more abundantly. Bro. Kelley answered his argument with scripture, logic, and reason. Mr. Pain evidently saw in the countenances of his brethren the weakness of his position, hence in his last two affirmative speeches he left the subject and sought to prejudice their minds by referring to Joseph Smith and his work in an unchristian manner, and tried to buoy them up by preaching what he called Christ in the good old primitive way. But I do not think from the expression of his face he was satisfied with his effort, when Bro. Kelley showed how completely such a course showed his inability to sustain his proposition. A good spirit was principally maintained throughout the debate, and I think it will result in good. The Saints do not feel badly at all over it, and are willing to indorse Bro. Kelley again, if occasion demands. May the good Lord bless and prosper his work in all the world is my prayer.

Your brother in Christ,

J. R. HARPER.

HITEMAN, Iowa, January 30, 1908.

Dear Herald: We look forward eagerly each week to your visits. Many are the moments we have enjoyed in perusing your excellent pages, and many, very many, good thoughts and much excellent advice have we received. We have enjoyed, too, reading the letters of our missionaries relating to missionary work, of their successes, and sorrowed with them in their trials. While I have not been called to leave home and loved ones (my lines seem to have fallen into branch work), yet I can assure you that branch work when properly done has its joys and its trials, and severe trials at times.

We have seen in your pages, from time to time, communications from missionaries visiting branches, deploring the condition of certain branches and making statements similar to this: "We see the need of capable presiding officers over branches." The writer has had some experience in branch work, having been in charge of different branches of the church for about eleven years, and branch priest before that time; and while I am writing I am fully aware that branch officers have in some respects come short of fulfilling the law of the church, still I feel like presenting some of my experiences, and what circumstances and difficulties confront many of us.

Almost all our branch officers throughout the church are wage-workers or farmers. We wage-workers have to labor hard all day through the year, as farmers do through seed-time and harvest, so worn out with labor that it is a task to go out at all in the evening. Then we have several evening meetings to attend during the week. Then comes along some elder exhorting us that it is our duty to attend the Religio to help it along. Then comes another saying the same thing about the Sunday-school; as I heard one of our missionaries say one time, that he did not consider it our duty to send the children to Sunday-school, but to go with them. Then with priesthood, prayer, business, and Religio meetings, and our time occupied with from three to four meetings on Sunday, we have from two to three evenings during the week to do visiting in, with no evening to rest or be with our family, or read the church papers, or daily paper, or other papers one may take; neither having time to inform one's self on the church books. Then some elder tells us we should study the church books, and all good books, quoting Paul to Timothy: "Study to make thyself a workman approved of God," and also quoting the words of the Savior as recorded in Saint John 14:26 the Holy Ghost would bring "to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you," telling us that we must inform ourselves, for the Holy Ghost can not bring to our remembrance that which we have not read or learned. And again some one else comes to the branch to hold a series of evening meetings through the week, expecting all the Saints to turn out to every meeting, and not being pleased if it were not so, which I believe we should as far as we can. Again in a few days another brother quotes from Doctrine and Covenants, section 119, paragraph 9, to retire early and rise early that vigor of mind and body may be retained. I have queried then if they meant branch officers with others, and my mind has reverted to the seventeenth section of Doctrine and Covenants regarding the duties of officers.

The Lord tells us to be wise in all things, and that wisdom is much to be desired, and should be sought for. I believe this advice is good for both minister and member.

In times past I have been out and away from home every evening weeks at a time, so much so that my wife has said to me only when I was retiring, or in the morning getting ready for the day's work, or eating my supper, that she would not be much more alone if I were out in missionary work. I replied that between administering to the sick, visiting the sick and afflicted, and visiting the Saints officially, and attending the branch meetings, that I considered I had a mission, to say nothing of Sunday-school and Religio work, which I used to attend and was then a constant attendant.

Brethren, this is not said by way of complaint, but that we might know of some of the experiences of branch officers. I have noticed, too, with regret, which adds in some cases to the burden of branch officers, that some of our brethren have come into branches and have baptized some into the church which should not have been done at the time; and that, too, without consulting the branch officers in regard to them; and after being baptized they have been a source of trouble and care to those whose duty it was to look after them, some of them never making good members. I have now in mind one particular one who desired baptism at our hands in a certain branch. After talking to him, we soon found that he was not in a proper frame of mind, and was wanting baptism because another did. We advised him to seriously consider the matter a few days. Afterward he, too, thought it wise. You may say we did wrong in thus advising. Wait; let us see. Sometime shortly after he removed to another place where there was a branch of the church. An elder came along, preaching; the brother desired baptism, and was, I learn, baptized without consulting the proper officers. That was some years ago, and to this day said brother has not done anything with the church, though he has been labored with and has been a burden and care upon the branch. You may say that that is a long time to let a brother in that condition remain in the church. So it is, but conditions are not always the same in every case. Our mission is to save if possible. Of course there is a limit.

Another case I remember of a man who stood up in one of our prayer-meetings requesting admission to the church, and when we questioned him he said he believed in faith and repentance as essential, but not baptism, but was willing to comply with it to get into the church. Of course he was not baptized.

I also remember in my boyhood days of a man requesting baptism into the church in one of our branches at the hands of its officers. Without inquiring further they took him next day to the river and baptized him. It being some days till the next meeting they thought it advisable to confirm him upon the river bank. When the brethren stepped up to lay hands upon him, he said he wanted none of that. He did not believe in it. He further said he was a Methodist, but had been convinced through their preaching that baptism was for the remission of sins and that was all he wanted. Now, brethren, when officials, who have a chance to be acquainted with such men, make these mistakes, what shall we say of those who do not know them? Would it not be better to confer with those in branch authority before baptizing any one in the vicinity of a branch? We shall have enough to contend with when doing the best we can.

Brethren, we have not written this in the spirit of contention. Far from it. But we thought we should like to present our side as we view it, at least some of the things that come into our lives. We might mention other things in our experience that add to the burden and care of branch officers, but we desist.

We are glad to note the progress the church is making, and that we are to have a Journal of History published by the church, and of the strides toward building a sanitarium and orphan's home by the church. May God bless us in our efforts for good, and that we may be united in pushing forward this great work of the latter days.

Your brother in bonds,

W. E. WILLIAMS.

NAPA, California, February 4, 1908.

Editors Herald: It is with pleasure I essay to write a few lines for the perusal of your readers, believing there are some who will be pleased with what I may have to say.

For a number of years prior to the fall of 1907, I was more or less under the power of the adversary. At times it seemed as though I would be fairly rended by the evil power striving to gain the complete mastery and encompass my spiritual destruction, until finally I was on the verge of utter despair as to my condition before God, and had almost decided to withdraw from the church rather than bear the name Saint unworthily. Not that I had become criminally weak or devoid of all sense of honor, but I could not seem to be what I desired to be as a Latter Day Saint, and being endowed with honesty to a large degree (as man to man), I was dissatisfied, very much discouraged, and wanted to give up. I had come face to face with a condition that I could no longer ignore, i. e., the question as to whether I would continue my careless disregard of Christian duties imposed upon me by the covenant made with God years ago to serve him, or whether I should face the emergency manfully and trust the Father to help me.

It was certainly a case of "man's extremity," and it was "God's opportunity" also. I faced the issue squarely; and in deep humility I sought forgiveness at the throne of mercy; and thanks be to Him who is able not only to forgive, but also to give the witness of his Holy Spirit as an earnest of his forgiveness, my prayer was answered, and I bear you witness, dear readers, that I was then and there regenerated in the Spirit, and have been richly blessed since then, at times, by a renewal of that same witness.

I now believe my past weakness was due largely to trusting too much to my own strength and neglecting the plain teaching of the Scriptures. If an individual undertakes to place his own construction upon the word of God, and expects the Lord to come to his terms, he will most assuredly be disappointed. There is but one way in which we can secure the fulfillment of God's promises to us, and that is by a full and cheerful compliance with the conditions attached to those promises.

I am more than grateful to God for at last bringing me to a full realization of this truth, and am now trying in every way to redeem the past by giving heed to God's law and fulfilling the requirements thereof to the best of my ability. The gospel is the power of God unto salvation to all who will accept and obey it.

Peace and the love of God be the blessings of God's people.
In the faith, your brother,

L. M. PRUDEN.

KEYTESVILLE, Missouri, February 11, 1908.

Dear Herald: I will send you the interpretation of the vision that was given me some time ago, and published in the HERALD for January 1, 1908. The interpretation was given through a sister in Michigan. She requested me not to give her name, as she did not want any of the praise; but God only.

A brother,

OAKLEY R. MILLER.

"I was impressed by the Spirit one morning to fast and pray, and did so, not knowing for what purpose; but later I read the vision and was given the following interpretation: The light in the north side of the room was the light that will soon come from the people of the north country. They will come bringing gospel light with them. The highway is soon to be cast up, and light will flow in with their coming. The closed book in this light is the Book of Mormon, and the square gold plate is the rest of the Book of Mormon. It belongs to the Book of Mormon gospel. The open book is the Bible, which follows the closed book to confirm its truthfulness. The angel is the witness to the vision. They are moving on eastward to the Jews. It represents the gospel in three witnesses, in word, in power, and in much assurance, one bearing witness to the other.

"This seems a lovely vision to me; and I hope it will look as plain to others.

Yours in love of the gospel,

"A MEMBER."

VAN CLEAVE, Mississippi, February 8, 1908.

Editors Herald: As the Bogard-Stubbart debate is a thing of the past, will drop a line. The debate was agreed upon between Bro. Stubbart and Elder Entekin of the Missionary Baptist persuasion, probably some six weeks ago, and Elder Entekin, after coming to his right mind, decided he was not the right man in the right place, so made arrangements to get their champion debater, who is in the form of Reverend Ben M. Bogard, D. D., of Little Rock, Arkansas. The discussion was only on church propositions; but Joseph Smith and the Book of Mormon were more thoroughly discussed. Bogard is the most unreasonable and unfair debater I ever heard, though all his arguments were easy to meet. He signed rules to govern them in the debate; but was not willing to be governed by them, which of course called for an explanation from the moderators, or I should say one of the moderators. It was plain to those of the best judgment, that he had hardly touched his church proposition at all. He boasted of himself as a Doctor of Divinity until Bro. Stubbart suggested (before the audience, too,) that he hire a ten-cent boy to toot his horn for him. Bro. Stubbart clearly set forth our claims in the time he was not answering questions not bearing on the subject. Such ought to have been ruled out, but we thought best not to.

The work is moving along slowly in the South; but we hope for the better.

The debate accomplished one thing, if nothing more; it caused the Saints to see the necessity of living more faithfully, and of reading and studying to show themselves approved of God. The Saints in the South are good and kind to ye missionary. They do not want them to lack for anything; but so many will not live their religion as they should, thus depriving themselves of many blessings they might obtain.

Ever in gospel bonds,

ALMA BOOKER.

COALVILLE, Iowa, February 3, 1908.

Dear Editors: Permit me to occupy space in your valuable columns for once, at least, for I have thought that some would like to hear from this part. I have been a member of this latter-day work for eight years and I have learned to love it some. I appreciate the splendid articles in the HERALD, and may God bless the good it is doing. We have a branch of sixty-eight members. Four of these were baptized last November by Charles J. Hunt, three little folks and one woman of a family. We are pleased to have them unite with the church.

We have some good members who are quite active in church-work, and are attaining unto perfection, while others are of the "don't care" order, and place worldly amusements before duty to God. And some seem to allow every wind of doctrine to disturb their minds and destroy their faith in the church. One feels compassion for them, and especially those that are young, because there is so much to draw their attention from this work, while those of more mature years should know better and be more concerned about their future state.

I am quite sure, however, that some of the cause for so much spiritual death is the negligence of the officials in not performing their duty, and I am fearful lest we will be brought to a sense of duty when it is too late. I see no place for idlers in this work. But there is abundance of room for busy workers. God has endowed all of us with talents or gifts of some kind, and if we do not develop them it will be to our condemnation. But is it not pleasant to sing, when we are actually trying to do our part?

"May we, who know the joyful sound,
Still practice what we know;
Not hearers of the word alone,
But doers of it too.

"By acts of mercy let us show
We have not heard in vain,
But kindly feel another's woe,
And long to ease his pain."

If this gospel is as a pearl of great price, let us use it as such, and do our part in pointing people to the truth. We have a nice Sunday-school, with some good laborers in it, and I believe we are making progress along that line. We are also members of the circulating library, and are striving to keep the folks supplied with good reading matter; and so far the books have been kept in use by some one. I hope to keep in the great procession that is marching on to victory, and be useful in doing good. May God speed the right.

JOHN JORDISON.

ONAWA, Iowa, February 7, 1908.

Dear Saints: It was found necessary recently to take Sr. Electa I. Emerson to the insane asylum, at Cherokee, Iowa, for treatment, and this letter is to request you to make intercession with the Lord that she may be healed in mind and in body, and restored to her husband and darling baby, and to us, her parents.

NATHAN LINDSEY.

WIRT, Indiana, February 5, 1908.

Editors Herald: As I read the many good and interesting letters, which appear in the HERALD, Ensign, and Glad Tidings, the thought comes to me that perhaps a few lines from Union Branch of Southern Indiana, might be of interest to some, more especially so to those who are acquainted with the work here, and some conditions which have prevailed, and do prevail here at this place. The gospel trumpet was sounded here, as much as thirty years ago. Brn. Heman C. Smith, Columbus Scott, and others, commenced their ministry (as I understand) in this part of the Lord's vineyard, while the work was introduced by yet older ones. One in particular, whose name is held in reverence, known by all as Uncle Jimmie Scott, of New Albany, Indiana, who lately passed on to the shores of eternity, to reap the reward of a well-earned rest, at the hands of a loving Father. It was my good fortune to meet this aged brother a few years ago, in a district conference, held at Byrneville, Indiana, and there hear him bear a faithful testimony of the divinity of this great latter-day work. His last breath was a testimony. As loved ones stood by, as death approached, he seemed to pass away, except the warmth of his body. He lay apparently in this death state for a time, when his spirit came to his body again, and he told his loved ones that where he had been everything was lovely and grand. That he did not know for what purpose he had returned, unless it was to tell them that this great latter-day work was true, and to warn them to live faithfully. He then closed his eyes and passed peacefully away. Oh, dear Saints, how inspiring such a testimony as this should be to those of us remaining. We can all have an individual knowledge of this work, if we so desire. And if we fail to have this knowledge, we are certainly living beneath our privileges. We can not expect all smooth sailing, or a continuous path of flowers. The Master did not find this. Why should we?

Bro. F. L. Sawley (our worthy district president) has just closed a three-week series of both interesting and instructive sermons. Bro. Sawley is one of our thorough, clear-cut, and forceful reasoners. But while this is true, it was quite evident that the evil one was present, too, catching away the seeds, lest they should fall where good should come from the sowing.

I feel that we, as a branch, are passing through a dark cloud, though, hopefully, I am trying to catch a glimpse of the silver lining. During the last three years, four of our most prominent members have apostatized, two of whom were of the missionaries, and seventies. It was those two men who brought the gospel to me, then a poor, ignorant, prejudiced boy. But, thanks be to God, through a careful and prayerful consideration of the gospel, as they so ably and clearly presented it, I was convinced and obeyed; and, best of all, the Lord gave me a knowledge of its truthfulness, which has always proved a blessing; and in hours of deep sorrow I have realized the truthfulness of his promise, "I will not leave you comfortless." Ever praying for the redemption of Zion,

J. J. BOSWELL.

Herald Editors: I write this to request the prayers of the Saints in behalf of a sister who recently became insane and is now at an asylum, that she may be protected while there, and be healed if it be God's will.

Yours in gospel bonds,

A SISTER.

News From Branches

FIRST BRANCH, CHICAGO.

The past conference was a spiritual feast for the branch, reviving the work, and filling every one with a greater desire to engage in the gospel work with every effort. Many moves are on foot to help along the Master's work. Everybody is thinking of the "building fund," and the prospects of a new church.

Bro. C. W. Camp and others are "getting up" a box social, on the good old-fashioned style, to be given at the home of Bro. Bone, night of the 14th inst., and Sr. Dottie Logan is to be credited for suggesting to the Sunday-school a Saint Patrick entertainment March 17, nature and program to be left to a committee of which she is chairman. Proceeds of both are to go to the building fund.

Sunday-school voted to-day to take up a special collection next Sunday for the benefit of the sanitarium. Understand the South Side Branch are to give an entertainment for the benefit of the sanitarium, February 10. Even though Chicago Saints have many little interests, pressed by home affairs, yet we are heartily in sympathy with the noble Saints of Independence, who are sacrificing so much in the Master's work, as well as those of other branches.

Bro. Erickson, and Sr. Erickson, nee Warnky, paid us a short visit to-day, which we understand is a partial wedding tour, flavored with a little of the spice of life—business—and may remain with us for a short time. They are from one of the Kansas City branches.

Railroad Company Buys Ties from Hawaii and Japan.

A striking instance of the scarcity of timber suitable for railroad ties in the United States is seen in the recent purchase of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company of 2,800,000 ties of ohia wood from a lumber company operating in the Hawaiian Islands. It has been difficult for some time for the railroads of this country to obtain wooden ties satisfactory both in quantity and quality, and many of them have been looking about for an opportunity to purchase tie timber in other countries.

During a recent trip of this kind by a representative of the Atkinson, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company, arrangements were made for the purchase of ties, not only in the Hawaiian Islands but also in Japan. It is stated that ties from Japan will be made from a certain species of oak which compares in lasting qualities very favorably with the white oak of this country which has been considered the most satisfactory wood for tie purposes. About a year ago, before the representative of the railroad had started on his trip, the United States Forest Service made a few tests on the ohia wood. The results indicated that, in point of strength, ohia wood will rank with the oaks. It was thought from these tests that the wood was worthy of further investigation, and the large order placed by the railroad indicates that their agent is confident that Hawaiian wood will prove to be a satisfactory material for railroad ties under the conditions existing in this country.

We are apt to overlook the hand and heart of God in our afflictions, and to consider them as mere accidents, and unavoidable evils. This view makes them absolute and positive evils which admit of no remedy or relief. If we view our troubles and trials aside from the divine design and agency in them, we can not be comforted.—Emmons.

I take the liberty of soliciting your patronage as we are in a position to do BANKING BUSINESS BY MAIL very satisfactorily. Open accounts can be placed with us for safety at your convenience and command. We have opened a savings department, paying interest on accounts of $1 or more and each member of the family should become interested in having a bank account building for future needs. We also pay interest on time deposit certificates. A number of the brethren are living here, others are looking forward to this location as a future home, and late revelation and admonition foreshadow coming events, adding materially to our spiritual holdings necessary to signs of the times, and in this connection our Board of Directors propose to safeguard the financial interests of the Saints by offering to them a depository proof against graft, greed, or calamity, governed by a kindred feeling born of the interest we have in common. It is not popular men, large capital, heavy deposits, National or State laws, that offer absolute security to depositors, but directors and officers progressive and conservative, possessed of the virtue of true manhood, shorn of all political ambition, with no taste for frenzied finance or mining speculation, with no inclination to furnish funds for others in that line. I point with considerable just pride (I assume) to our Board of Directors as named below. Feel at liberty to write us on matters that concern you in Jackson County, Missouri.

DOUBTFUL TACTICS.

Some time last summer Sr. Roy Newkirk, living at Independence, Missouri, came to us considerably wrought up over statements made to her by two women canvassers of the Utah church, who apparently were making a house to house canvass of the city, leaving tracts for propagandizing purposes. Sr. Newkirk is the granddaughter of Elder Hugh Lytle, one of the early elders in the Reorganized Church, and her husband is a grandson of Reuben Newkirk, who was a member and an elder in the church under the régime of Presidents Joseph and Hyrum Smith. She told us that these canvassers stated to her that the President of the Reorganized Church, the son of the Prophet Joseph, was not honest when he made the statement that he did not know that his father was a polygamist and taught the doctrine. And told her further, that he had admitted in the trial of the case known as the Temple Lot Suit, that his father had been a polygamist. She resented the statement of implied dishonesty, told them who she was, and was quite indignant at their statements. We took the pains to deny in exact terms the statements made by these women canvassers, and furnished her with a copy of the testimony in the Temple Lot Suit; further stating to her that the probabilities were that these women would return to visit her and that they would positively deny having made any such statements when she would call their attention to them again. She succeeded in meeting them, called their attention to their statements, and offered the refutation to them in black and white, and they did as we told her they would do: denied making the statements as alleged. We heard that they made similar statements elsewhere, but that is not now material.

We present to the readers of the HERALD the following correspondence, which will explain itself:

WILLOUGHBY, Ohio, R. F. D. 2, Box 35, July 30, 1907.

PRESIDENT JOSEPH SMITH, Independence, Missouri.

Dear Brother: I feel it my duty to inform you that you have been accused of knowing that your father, the Prophet Joseph, had more than one wife, and that some time ago when you were out in Utah, you made the statement in public that your father was not a polygamist, that a woman arose in your congregation and pointed out to you in your audience your half brother born in polygamy according to your knowledge. The statement was made in the Kirtland

Bro. C. Malcor, who keeps a restaurant at Albia, Iowa, would be very glad to have passing elders call on him. Inquire for the Oxford Café.

Hotel, July 30, 1907, in the presence of five others, by Elder George A. Spangenburg, Box 417, Chattanooga, Tennessee.

Yours for the triumph of truth,

ELDER A. E. STONE.

P. S.—The expression was You know, etc.

INDEPENDENCE, Missouri, August 5, 1907.

ELDER A. E. STONE, Willoughby, R. F. D. 2, Ohio.

Dear Brother Stone: Yours of the 30th, July, received this morning. In reply thereto, it is my duty to inform you, and as many as you may choose to show this letter to, that there is not a particle of truth in the statement which you inform me was made by Elder George A. Spangenburg, Box 417, Chattanooga, Tennessee, to the effect that, "Some time ago, when" I "was out in Utah," I "made the statement in public that" my "father was not a polygamist; that a woman arose in" my "congregation and pointed out to" me "in" my "audience," my "half brother born in polygamy according to" my "knowledge."

No such occurrence ever occurred, either in Utah, or anywhere else. I publicly made the statement everywhere I went and spoke in Utah, that no children were born to Joseph Smith, my father, in polygamy, and challenged the proof. It is absolutely false that any woman rose in any audience that I ever stood before in Utah, or anywhere else, and stated that she was a wife of Joseph Smith, my father, or that I had a half brother, or any other sort of brother born to my father except by my mother, Emma Hale, whom my father married January 18, 1827. This challenge was never met at any time.

There is no truth in the statement made by this same Spangenburg, that I had or ever had knowledge that my father had more than one wife. I have not now and never had any knowledge to that effect. All the knowledge that I have in regard to his domestic family relations is contrary to what this man asserts. To my knowledge my father had no other wife than my mother. I was not knowing to his ever having any other; and when Spangenburg, or any other elder from Utah, or anywhere else makes such a statement, he states what is absolutely false. Further, I have never admitted, publicly or privately, at any time, or in any place, Utah or elsewhere, that I knew that my father had more than one wife. I have no knowledge that he had.

This story of this man Spangenburg, is a brand new one on me. I wish that you had obtained from him the name of the place where this occurrence took place, the woman's name, and the names of some who he said were present; I would like to bring such a liar to book; for if he made the statement as being of his own knowledge he lied most miserably; if he stated it as being told to him he was grossly misinformed, by a liar, or one who was himself misinformed. So, whichever horn of the dilemma the man takes, the statement is absolutely false; not a word of truth in either one of them.

I shall probably write to this man Spangenburg, at the address you have given me, and I venture to predict that he will totally deny having made the statements you have written me he did make. What would you think of that?

Please accept my thanks for the information you gave me. But I would like to have the items I have mentioned. Similar statements have been made here by some of their missionary women, and when faced with them they denied having made the statements reported that they did make.

I remain your brother in bonds,

JOSEPH SMITH.

WILLOUGHBY, Ohio, R. F. D. 2, Box 35, August 7, 1907.

PRESIDENT JOSEPH SMITH,

Dear Bro. Smith: Your reply of August 5 to my letter of July 30 at hand, and must say in answer to your question to me as to what I should think if Spangenburg should deny having made the statement as charged, I should think that it will be a further demonstration of the truthfulness of the statement made by their first leader, "B. Young," that they can simply beat the world at lying. I am sorry I did not obtain from him the matter you spoke of as to who the woman was, and the place of the occurrence. But as to making the statement here in the hotel at Kirtland, July 30, 1907, I have four witnesses who have never been found guilty of lying: Sr. Mary Squire Mottashed, Sr. Mabel I. Stone, Sr. Martha Yates, and myself. So, if he denies it, it will only be one of their old tricks, and of course they have to be as faithful as possible to their "Father," and he was a liar from the beginning. So hereafter I will be a little more careful, and when such statements are made I will try and glean all from them possible, bearing upon the subject.

I am still in the conflict of life,

Your brother in gospel bonds,

ELDER ALBERT E. STONE.

INDEPENDENCE, Missouri, August 11, 1907.

ELDER ALBERT E. STONE, Willoughby, R. F. D. 2, Box 35, Ohio.

Dear Bro. Stone: Yours of the 7th, arrived. I write to ask that you make such statement as will cover the ground of what this Elder Spangenburg said; what he said, who were present, when it was said; where it was said, and the date of its being said. I am wanting to make a statement for publication, and to make such refutation as will set before our elders the facts of the position I have taken in so plain terms that they can make a suitable answer to such false and pernicious assertions of these fabricators of lies. This statement of Spangenburg is only one of a number which have gained currency from the vindicators of polygamy, who are so angry when we take issue with them when they essay to stop our mouths with "The Prophet Joseph did it." As if that should stop all controversy. We have not so learned Christ. His commands can not be set aside by the doings of any prophet, or the sayings of the "no prophet, nor the son of a prophet," Brigham Young.

Make the statement so that it will show what the elder said; and have those who were present and heard it sign it with you and send to me, if you will.

In bonds, your brother and coworker,

JOSEPH SMITH.

WILLOUGHBY, Ohio, R. F. D. 2, Box 35.

PRESIDENT JOSEPH SMITH, Independence, Missouri.

Dear Bro. Joseph: The statement made by George L. Spangenburg, verbatim, July 30, 1907, and referred to in my letter to you, is as follows: He, George L. Spangenburg, said to me: "You know and that President Joseph Smith of the Reorganized Church knows his father was a polygamist." (Here I interrupted the gentleman and made him retract his statement referring to my knowledge, etc.) Then he continued, that "When your President Joseph Smith of the Reorganized Church was in Utah preaching, he stated that his father was not a polygamist, when a lady arose in his audience and pointed out to him his half brother born to the Prophet by one of his polygamous wives."

We hereby subscribe ourselves as witnesses to the above statement.

MARTHA YATES.

MABEL I. STONE.

MRS. J. CHAS. MOTTASHED.

ELDER ALBERT E. STONE.

(This statement was made in the office of the Kirtland Hotel.)

WILLOUGHBY, Ohio, August 13, 1907.

PRESIDENT JOSEPH SMITH, Independence, Missouri.

Dear Bro. Joseph: Since writing you relative to the statement made concerning you by one George L. Spangenburg, I have written him, but received no reply from my letter. But to-day, August 13, 1907, he came here in company with five others of his cult and I questioned him relative to the particulars regarding his statement. He made the following reply to my questions. "I do not know the date or time of the meeting referred to. Believe it was in Salt Lake City. Do not know the name of the lady arising in the audience. Do not know the name of the man spoken of or pointed out as the half brother. Do not know any one who was present at the meeting, but" he "was told by some parties in Ogden City, Utah. Don't remember who it was that told" him. This is all the evidence I want to stamp the whole thing a glaring falsehood, of which they as elders are capable of concocting against those who oppose them in their nefarious work. I would to God it were possible to close their prattling and lying about those who are their superiors in every particular.

Yours for the triumph of truth,

ELDER A. E. STONE.

INDEPENDENCE, Missouri, September 26, 1907.

MR. A. E. STONE, Kirtland, Ohio.

Dear Sir and Brother: I thank you for the statement of what Elder Spangenburg said; it will come in handy, if I have occasion to use it. The story is a good one and a new one on me. If you hear any more of them, just spot them, for me; persons, time, place, etc., and oblige.

With the best of gospel regards; yours in bonds,

JOSEPH SMITH.

Dear Brethren in Christ; Greeting: Here is a letter showing how the Brighamites speak and write about the True Latter Day Church of Jesus Christ. This man heard of the Latter Day Saints and of the Book of Mormon (or the Stick of Joseph in the hand of Ephraim) but did not know that there was more than one. He sent to Utah and had them send him one. After he had read it his relations made so much fuss about it that he gave it away; but after he left home and was among strangers he thought so much of it he sent for another, and was so satisfied that the latter-day work was the only true way that the first elder that came along he had him baptize him in the Hudson River, before he'd ever heard a sermon, and then began working his way toward Utah; and when he reached Rocky Ford he first learned of there being others of the name and stopped and went to work so as to investigate; but paid tithings up to the first of this year to the old flock that departed from the truth and were driven to the salt land not inhabited. But now declares as soon as the job is done he is coming to Independence.

Your brother in Christ,

E. W. FERDON.

SWINK, Colorado.

NEW YORK, New York, December 2, 1907.

MR. R. C. CONOLY, Rocky Ford, Colorado.

Dear Brother and Friend: We were indeed surprised to receive a letter from the "Far West" signed by yourself. You are making good headway toward the goal of your ambitions. You are evidently being led by the proper spirit and the Lord is opening up the way before you. I trust you will not allow yourself to be side-tracked by any of the alluring roads which seem to diverge but little from the one you are following.

You have had such a short time to become thoroughly grounded in the faith which you so courageously espoused, that I am a little sorry that you are so soon called upon to discern between the "true vine" and one of its cut off branches.

I think I told you something in relation to the people usually designated as "Josephites." At the time the Prophet Joseph Smith was killed there were a number of people who thought they should lead the church. They did not seem to know that the authority devolved upon the next quorum in the church, which is the Twelve Apostles. The great majority of the people who resided at Nauvoo, however, were loyal to the true leaders of the church. And at a general conference of the church held there they voted to sustain the Twelve in their places, and they repudiated the claims made by others. The expulsion from that section soon followed, and the body of the church moved west. There were a number of the dissenters who stayed behind and they found some followers among the scattered members of the church. These broken off branches for the most part soon began to wither. About fourteen years later, two of them uniting together in order to have a leader and some semblance of authority, invited Joseph Smith, Jr., to come and take charge of the church.

The leaders of these movements were dissenters and sore-heads. They were men who were fighting against the leaders of the church and were always seeking some occasion against them. That same spirit has characterized the advocates of this branch ever since. Their whole stock in trade seems to be the faults and mistakes of what they call the Utah church. They have watched for every incident in our history that they could represent in a bad light. They culled little extracts from sermons preached perhaps under the stress of the most trying difficulties. And by separating these from their context make it appear that we are teaching doctrine revolting to any right-thinking person.

There are no doubt many good, honest people among their members. I haven't the least feeling against either the members or the officers. I only know that their methods are neither fair nor just, and knowing as I do that the gospel is true, that we have the authority to preach and officiate in its ordinances, and also that the purposes of the Lord are being accomplished, I pay no attention to their quibbles, and I never try to enter into any arguments with them. I am perfectly willing that they should think and act as they please, but I do not purpose to wrangle over these little differences instead of declaring our message to the world.

Of course they accept Joseph Smith as a prophet. That is, they take such of his revelations as they have culled out. Those which suit their purpose. They also believe in the Book of Mormon, and they teach the first principles of the gospel about the same as we do. So it would be a little hard for one just at your stage of development to see the difference between the two. But as you get more acquainted with the genius and purpose of the work you will be able to see a vast difference.

I would like very much to have you meet President McRae, who has charge of the mission in which you are now living. You will find him to be an honest, honorable, and humble man. He carries with him a good spirit and I feel sure that you would at once have confidence in all that he would say.

If you would like to investigate any charges made by the Josephites against our people; or rather, if you would like to hear the answers we make to their charges, I will send you some literature. Or you can get some by writing to President McRae, 622 West Sixth Avenue, Denver, Colorado.

While we do not fear the closest investigation, and we think that every member of the church should be free to study as best suits him, I believe a man will grow faster in the church to study it from a positive rather than a negative point. That is, keep his mind in a position to see its beauty rather than try to ferret out the dark spots. If we look for dark spots we are likely to see them, or at least imagine that we do. But if we are seeking the light it will shine in upon our minds.

In studying the history of modern Israel one will find as in the history of ancient Israel that the people make many mistakes and that individually we have many weaknesses. But if he will separate the truth which God has revealed from the instruments through which they have been taught he will find all the principles to be true. And if we incorporate such principles into our lives we will grow stronger and better every day.

In relation to your tithing you may remember that you still have a credit on our books of $4.70. You could have that turned on your tithing account. If you still consider that you owe more, which you probably will by the end of the year, you can send it when you get your pay. After paying your first tithing you got a job for just two dollars more than you had been getting before. This would have been just sufficient to pay your tithing and still have as much as you had been receiving before. Now that you have made another change your wages are double what they were when you joined the church, even after paying your board. I know that the Lord will bless you if you remember to keep his commandments.

I wrote a letter to your father the other day. If I get an answer to it I will write again. I think he will feel all right toward you. I told him that you had a true love for your parents and also a strong desire to serve the Lord. That now you were a man they might expect that you would have to serve the Lord in your own way.

We send brotherly love and best wishes,

JOHN G. MCQUARRE.

P. S.—You had better keep your name in this conference until the first of the year and then if you do not intend to go to Utah soon you had better get your recommend and have your name transferred to the Western States Mission. Just after the 1st of January, 1908, we will have to make out our reports and send them in to Salt Lake City. We send in the names of all the tithe-payers, with the amounts they have paid. This is made a part of the general church records. If you desire to pay any more for this year try to get it here as near January 1 as you can. If you have to wait a few days for pay-day just write and let us know the amount to credit you with on your tithing account and we can do it and wait a few days for the remittance. But just do as you feel about this matter.

Your brother in the Master's cause,

J. G. McQ.

Referring to the matter set forth in Bro. Ferdon's letter and the one accompanying it, we suggest that Elder McQuarre makes a grave mistake when in his letter to his friend R. C. Conoly he styles the Reorganized Church as a "cut off branch" of the true vine. It has been distinctly affirmed in the courts of the United States that the Reorganized Church is in direct succession to the church organized April 6, 1830, and is entitled to recognition as such. Besides this, it can not be shown that those constituting the initial or charter members of the Reorganization were ever dealt with for their membership before a legal ecclesiastical court, and for cause divested of their right of membership in the original church. Neither has the Reorganized Church as a body ever been notified to appear before a properly constituted church tribunal to answer for heresy or apostasy, and cut off from the vine as unworthy to remain in connection with it.

Elder McQuarre states that those aspirants to the leadership of the church, to whom he refers as thinking they should lead the church, "did not seem to know" that the authority should rest upon the Twelve. In this statement he makes an error, perhaps unintentionally, nevertheless it is an error; for some of the parties to whom he refers did know that the authority temporarily devolved upon the leading quorum of the church. And some of these parties presumably were present and voted at the conference at which he states that the church "voted to sustain the Twelve in their places."

Had the Twelve remained in their places and taught the law of righteousness according to the standard books of the church, the Bible, the Book of Mormon, and the Doctrine and Covenants, as these books were left intact by the Martyrs at their death, it is a fair presumption that the repudiation to which he refers would not have occurred. But when these Twelve became subject to the lead of President Brigham Young and assumed control of the church without regard to the rights of its membership, near and remote, injected false and corrupt doctrine into the faith which these men whom he charges with having repudiated the claims made by others, he should have stated that this repudiation was more directly made against the assumption of authority made by Brigham Young and the claims made by him, not sanctioned in the law, than against the quorum and the men composing it in their places. Three years and a half after this vote was taken to sustain the Twelve "in their places," Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball, and Willard Richards vacated their places in the quorum and were elevated at the direction of Brigham Young to the Presidency. This the dissenters objected to, together with the teaching of polygamy privately taught and practiced by these men, by which private teaching and practice they virtually vitiated their calling and ended their right to authority.

Elder McQuarre is right when he states that the leaders of the movement to reorganize were "dissenters and soreheads." The fact is that these men whom he thus denominates not only dissented and were sore of brain, but they were also sore of heart, outraged, and indignant, and they did fight against President Brigham Young and those with him, under the banner of reorganization, in a just cause in defense of their rights as members of the church, advocates of the faith into which they had been baptized, and against doctrines and practices clearly subversive of right principle, correct doctrine, and honorable conduct, as representatives of that Christ who years ago said, "I am the true vine."

Elder McQuarre is not correct, however, when he states that those dissenters "were always seeking some occasion against" those whom he says they were fighting against. It was not necessary that they should seek occasion, for the conduct of those leaders against whose rule they protested, was constantly affording the occasion, and they have not ceased affording such occasion up to the present time.

It is true, however, that the same spirit of protest with which these dissenters began has continued with the advocates of the Reorganization; and it is quite likely that it will so continue until the occasions are removed. It is not the fault of the Reorganization that these occasions existed at the time this dissenting took place; nor will it be their fault if they continue.

Elder McQuarre errs again when he attempts to make it appear that the Josephites "by separating" certain extracts of sermons from their context shows that he and his colleague "are teaching doctrine revolting to any right-thinking person." The quotations referred to by him and which he admits by implication are "from sermons preached perhaps under the stress of the most trying difficulties," are clear-cut statements made by their leading men, not under trying difficulties but in the heyday of their leadership, and after the period when President Young and his immediate associates had infused into the people by direct teaching that the books of the church were no longer needed, but that they were living, existing, and moving under the direct direction of the "Living Oracles"; these living oracles, under the complete tutelage and domination of President Brigham Young, chief oracle.

We are pleased to note that Elder McQuarre admits to his friend Conoly that there are good honest people among the members of the Reorganized Church. This is absolutely true, and is admitted everywhere where congregations of the Reorganized Church exist. And it is only right and just that he should admit it as he does. We must, however, dissent from Elder McQuarre's statement that he knows that our methods are not fair nor just. We believe them to be both. We have reason to know that neither Elder McQuarre, nor any of his compeers have been willing in the past to meet the eldership of the Reorganized Church in a fair and honest discussion of the doctrines and practices held by them respectively, as contradistinguished one against the other. Elder McQuarre shows his unwillingness to such a measure when he writes to his friend Conoly* as he does, "I pay no attention to their quibbles, and I never try to enter into any arguments with them."

Elder McQuarre states correctly that the Josephites accept Joseph Smith as a prophet. He errs however, when he states that we take such revelations delivered through him as we have culled out. In this statement he is either uninformed or he wilfully misstates. The Reorganization has taken the Book of Covenants as left by the Seer and his brother at their death, as published in 1835 before their death and subsequently published immediately after their martyrdom and continued to be published until the fall of 1876. It is true, as he states, that we have taken those which suit our purpose; for the reason that they were given to suit the purposes of God. The fact is clear, as we have consistently and persistently shown, that the whole code of revelation received by the church through Joseph Smith the Seer, and acknowledged up to the date of his death, clearly authenticated, do most excellently suit our purpose. And time and its events have shown, also clearly, that these same revelations have suited and do now suit the purposes of God in building up his church in these latter days.

Elder McQuarre also states that we believe in the Book of Mormon and teach the first principles of the gospel, which we clearly do. We believe with him that when men, situated as his friend Conoly is, who will take the pains to investigate, will be able to see the "vast difference" which he refers to, and that this difference will be found to the advantage and establishing of the truths of the Reorganization in the mind of the investigator.

Elder McQuarre gives his case away very neatly when he states to his friend Conoly that if he wishes to investigate the charges made by the Josephites against himself and others as a church, that he will send him "the answers which we make to their charges," and that he will send him literature to that effect. Why does he not frankly state to his friend that he is at liberty to investigate the matters presented by the Reorganized Church upon the statements made by that body of people upon their own behalf. No right conclusion can be reached by any man if he is bound to but one side of the question which may be under discussion. If he is a free man and at liberty to exercise his own faculties, why not trust him to do that? Why put him in leading strings? Why attempt to dominate him or show any degree of unwillingness to permit him to examine adverse claims at his will? Caution and doubt are the parents of safety, and if there are dark spots in the philosophy of either the Utah church or the Reorganized Church, they should be investigated and eliminated for the benefit of the honest in heart. We do not know what the outcome of the inquiry of friend Conoly will be, though judging from the past in cases of a similar nature, it is fairly safe to predict what has so often occurred, that he who makes such honest inquiry will sooner or later either abandon the Utah philosophy and unite with the Reorganized Church, or become unbelieving, practically, in any religion.

With reference to the correspondence with Bro. A. E. Stone of Kirtland, Ohio, we have only this to add, that we were lately told by Sr. Braidwood, of Independence, Missouri, that when in Chicago some years ago she was met by a presiding elder of the Utah Mission in Chicago, who claimed to have received a letter written to a comrade minister by the name of Christianson and written by Joseph Smith, Jr., of Lamoni, Iowa, in which the writer admitted that his father did receive a revelation on plural marriage or polygamy. She was shown this letter, and it was signed Joseph Smith, Jr., but to her knowledge, was not in the handwriting of Joseph Smith of Lamoni. She was not permitted to take the letter to test its genuineness, but it was kept by this presiding elder. Subsequently, Elder John M. Terry, of the Reorganization, visited the business quarters of this Utah missionary and requested permission to see the letter referred to. He was shown it, and knowing well the handwriting of Joseph Smith, of Lamoni, he pronounced it a forgery. It is only necessary to state in this connection that Joseph Smith of Lamoni never wrote such letter, did not make such an admission, has never done so publicly or privately, and does not now make any such admission. Besides this, Joseph Smith, of Lamoni, has not been Joseph Smith, Jr., in signature since his father died. Before that he was Joseph Smith III. Since that death, he has been Joseph Smith.

TONGUES THAT FAIL WHEN PUT TO A PRACTICAL TEST.

An interesting article appeared in the Spokane Spokesman-Review for December 31. It may be a little out of date, but it has just come to our notice, and we reproduce it here for the perusal of the thoughtful:

Through the Baptist Ministers' Association of this city a letter from their missionary in Tokio, Japan, regarding the progress in that city of the apostolic missionaries from Spokane, has been made public. The letter, written by the Reverend L. W. Hamblen, bears out the admission of local apostolic adherents that the missionaries of that faith are unable to speak the native tongues, and further says that they are not in the most prosperous condition financially.

Shortly after the leaving of M. L. Ryan and his coworkers for missionary work in China and Japan the Baptist ministers at a meeting of their association, discussed the claim of the apostolic religious enthusiasts that they had been endowed with the biblical "gift of tongues" and instructed their secretary, the Reverend Willis E. Pettibone, pastor of the Central Baptist Church, to write to Tokio for definite information concerning the methods of the apostolic workers and the results they were accomplishing.

The reply from Mr. Hamblen, dated at Tokio, December

9, was received by Mr. Pettibone yesterday morning and by him turned over to the association. It reads:

"Reverend Willis E. Pettibone, Spokane, Washington.—Dear Brother: Your October 31st note of inquiry sent to the 'Baptist Missionary Headquarters, Tokio, Japan,' has fallen into my hands. I have been to the Salvation Army Headquarters here in Tokio and find that the claim of the clipping you sent with your note has no basis in fact. This is the story told me by the Salvation Army officer whom I met, a Japanese of high rank in the Salvation Army.

"On the boat on which the apostolic group came was a Japanese returning to Japan after a series of years in study in the United States. He got acquainted with the apostolic group and from them learned of their hopes and plans. The circumstances under which they were to land in Japan caused him anxiety and so, while not a Christian himself, he was kind enough to give them a note of introduction to the officer who told me what I am now telling you, as they were old friends. There was no greeting by the Salvation Army as such.

"When the note of introduction was presented at the Salvation Army headquarters the one to whom it was addressed was absent. In their meeting room there were two women, one a New Zealander and one a Japanese, both Salvation Army officers, and they were conducting or about to conduct one of their regular evangelistic meetings. The members of the apostolic group who presented the note of introduction remained at that meeting. They did not, however, conduct the meeting. As is their custom, the Salvation Army officers called for testimonies, and the apostolic friends responded, together with others present. In speaking and in praying they used unintelligible words, unintelligible alike to the New Zealander and the Japanese. When they asked the Japanese officer if it was not Japanese that they used she told them it was not. So, as the officer who gave me this information said, 'the claim that they spoke the native language is wholly a mistake.'

"The little group located here in Tsukiji at first, but they have scattered to some extent. The Ryans have gone to the suburbs where rents are cheap, and I have heard that they are already in straits financially.

"A foreign friend of mine has happened by their Tsukiji home once or twice and found them struggling hard to do business through an interpreter. I have heard, too, through a third party, that some of them made a claim of being able to speak the Japanese language to one of the well-known Japanese evangelists here in Tokio. The evangelist asked for a sample and heard nothing but unintelligible words. My information thus far gathered shows that their claims to speak the Japanese language are not borne out by facts.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

NEW YORK, February 17.—The Reverend Doctor Elwood Worcester, and the Reverend Doctor Samuel Macomb, two Boston clergymen, will come to New York to tell a new method of curing by Christian psychology. A trial is to be made at the Christ Episcopal Church, Broadway and Seventy-second Street, on March 23, to continue for one week.

It was said at Christ Church that this Episcopal parish had not committed itself to the new idea. It simply means that the rector of the church has enough faith in the new method to permit the Boston clergymen to use the church for a week to tell their story. The visiting clergymen will treat functional nervous disorders and alcoholism in both women and men.—Colorado Springs, Evening Telegraph, February 17, 1908.

BERLIN, January 25.—David Wolffsohn, the president of the International Jewish Organization, states that the Sultan Abdul Hamid has adopted a more friendly attitude toward the Zionist movement.

The president was recently in Constantinople, and received assurances from the Turkish government which led him to the belief that the Turkish authorities would offer no more opposition to the colonization of Palestine by the Jews.

He says: "We ourselves shall see in our lifetime the realization of our Zionist ideal.—Sunday-News, Buffalo, New York.

Elders' Note-Book

DOES IT PAY TO ADVERTISE?

When a missionary comes to your town or city you have a chance to do something. Get together, hire the most prominent place to be had, and simply paint the town.

The subject of advertising preaching services is a very important one. I am of the opinion we do not do enough of it. We do not aim high enough. We are inclined to imagine ourselves despised, and unable to take the lead in religious movements. This should not be. We know we have the truth; and every phase of our work will stand the closest scrutiny. Having the true gospel, and being responsible for having it brought within the hearing of our fellow citizens, we should plan how we can force our announcements before the people, so that the responsibility will be theirs.

The Toronto Saints feel they have discharged their duty towards their fellow citizens in bringing to their notice our preaching services. Ten years ago this was a small branch and quite weak financially. Elders visited and preached splendid sermons in our small places of worship. I suppose we did the best we could under the circumstances. Elder Evans visited us on different occasions, and preached sermons probably equal to his Majestic lectures; but we were in small halls where large crowds could not be obtained. Finally there came a time when the idea of branching out came with irresistible force to some. President Evans had arrived in the city to labor with us. We knew we had the gospel, and also knew that in Elder Evans we had a speaker, who, if given a chance, could win and hold his audience. We were determined to support him. We no longer figured on giving ten cents, twenty-five cents, or one dollar to help him. Some were ready to put up their last dollar. Some, who had their payments ready to pay on their property, drawn same from the bank and put it up, so determined were they that Bro. Evans should go to the front and win or lose.

How often people will take chances in business, speculate on the markets, and spend all kinds of money advertising their wares. Why not the Saints be ready to take the same chances in church work? Do not manipulate your money for personal gain only. Use it in church work. That is the safest investment a Saint can make. It will draw as interest God's approval and his protection. No stocks, bonds, or bank account can equal that. If we have the assurance of God's protection, we are the richest of men. Look over the financial situation of the past six months, and see if stocks, bonds, and bank deposits are a guarantee of safety. Picture the "runs" on failing banks. Money makes men miserable under some circumstances. No "runs" on the bank of heaven, no mismanagement, no grafting officials there.

What little experience I have had in church financing has taught me that every dollar given to the church brings good returns. When figuring up for tithing, I have found my best years were those in which we were busy in paying off church debts or helping in some way. My experience is the experience of dozens of the Toronto Saints. Convince the Toronto Saints that the object is a worthy one, and the battle is half over; they will not let up until they have attained their end. Personal needs are forgotten.

When a missionary comes to your town or city you have a chance to do something. Get together, hire the most prominent place to be had; and simply paint the town. It will require some capital to start; but your audiences will make it up in collections. We have spent over four thousand dollars in the Majestic work in Toronto, but the outsiders have paid it in collections. It has practically cost the Saints nothing. Of course the Saints put up the money to start with, and took the chances of meeting success.

President Evans is now in the midst of his fourth season. Last Sunday was his sixty-second lecture in the Majestic Theater. The house was packed. Hundreds have turned away every night. There is no let up in interest. Opposition from all sides has been brought to bear against him; but it only seemed to pack the Majestic fuller. Meetings have been carried on Sunday evenings in the other theaters and Massey Hall in an attempt to draw off the crowds from the Majestic. Some evenings "theater row" seemed like a midway. Electric lights and signs glaring, and the Salvation Army men on the sidewalk in front of the "Grand" roaring, "This way to the big salvation meeting." But our twenty or more ushers were kept busy crowding our people into every conceivable space, many people being seated in the wings of the stage.

It is acknowledged in Toronto that Elder Evans' work surpasses any religious movement ever carried on in this city. No other minister has succeeded in carrying on such meetings for sixty-two weeks without any dropping off in interest. Some have created considerable interest for three or four weeks; but none have conducted five months' series for four years, as Elder Evans has done, and the end is not yet. President Evans has been offered the largest roller rink in Toronto to continue his work here during the summer. The proprietor will run his electric fans and light the place free of any charge. The rink will seat four thousand, and will be the coolest spot in Toronto to hold services during the summer. This is a splendid offer, coming from an outsider; but the people are after Bro. Evans and insist on him continuing to preach to them.

A summary of the work in the Majestic will show the value of advertising. Four years ago we numbered about one hundred and twenty-five; now we number about four hundred. We owned a small brick church on a back street; now we have a fine new church in the center of the city, worth $15,000 (only $4,500 owing on it). The gospel has been preached to an audience averaging over two thousand for four years. Many thousands have heard the gospel. Our church has been put in the proper light before the citizens, until we now are respected and the reproach of polygamy cleared away. We feel we have done our duty in warning our neighbor, and it is not left for the stones to cry out because of our silence. When we stand before the judgment-bar we will not be accused, "Why did ye not warn us?" The Latter Day Saint gospel is talked by the fireside of homes on every street in our city. Thousands know us, that we know not. Our church is the most talked of of any in the city. We have been very much strengthened financially. We have made a net increase in the value of church property of $13,000. Since the new church was opened one year ago, we have paid $2,183.35 on church debt, decorated church, put down asphalt walks, stored twenty tons of coal in furnace-room, paid all current expenses, and have a nice balance in the treasury yet.

We were not satisfied with working in a small way. We set a high mark, and were enabled to reach it by advertising. Every person made an effort to advance the work, and God came to our assistance and prospered us far beyond the most sanguine expectation. We can extend the work by advertising and reaching out in every conceivable way. We must create the interest. Outsiders will not do it for us; but if we make a good "try," outsiders will come to our assistance. Do not hide your light on some back street. Put it on the highest and most prominent place, and then let the people know you are out, by advertising as loudly as possible.

THE GREAT COMMISSION. (MATTHEW 28.)

ELDER S. W. L. SCOTT.

Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.—King James' Version.

Go therefore, make disciples of all nations, immersing them—the disciples—into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.—Anderson's translation.

Go convert all the nations, [etc.]—Campbell's translation.

In this general or universal commission to use authority, Christ commanded three items to be performed, indicated by three very distinct and intelligible terms, viz.: matheteusate, baptizontes, and didascontes.

Fortunately, one of these words has for centuries, lain on the theological forge, under the blows of the heaviest tilt-hammers manufactured by the schools of the ages.

While all agree that the proper rendition of the first term, matheteusate, is "make disciples," and didascontes, "teaching them," the second term baptizontes, not being translated but transferred into the English, simply Englishized, gives room for divers opinions.

The meaning of any word, Greek, Hebrew, or Latin, is an elementary question, and being an elementary question, is to be ascertained by a sufficient number of competent witnesses, or a sufficient induction of particular occurrences of the word—the usus loquendi. All words are the signs of ideas, and by the simple analytical process of defining words, we gain the idea couched therein. The idea is in the word; the word is the shell, the idea the kernel; the word the vehicle, the idea the passenger; the word the glass, the idea the wine.

Words are of four kinds: 1. Simple. 2. Compound. 3. Primitive. 4. Derivative.

According to the usage of all language—ancient or modern—the derivative words legally inherit the specific meaning of their primitives. The original idea contained in the primitive word is transmitted uniformly throughout the whole family of derivatives.

Baptizo is the word pre-ordained by the Christ to indicate his will in the performance of this sacred ordinance.

Baptizo is the Greek representative of the action—baptism. Baptizo is a derivative from bapto the primitive, and legally inherits its specific meaning. It therefore inherits its specific idea, indicating specific action.

Did the world's atoning Savior, to express and define one action, select a word signifying three or seven distinct actions? If so, then in one discourse (seven ideas to a word) he repeated himself seven times—preached seven distinct discourses! If there are three or seven ideas representing three or seven distinct actions, in the word baptizo, then three, or seven actions are commanded to be done!

Any person, therefore, having been "sprinkled" is only one third, or one seventh baptized! If such premise is true, the logic is legitimate and inevitable, the whole world is unbaptized—is unchristianized!

1. If Christ and the apostles had commanded the action of sprinkling, they would have used the word expressive of that action, which is raino, rantizo, ranei.

2. If Christ and the apostles had commanded the action of pouring, they would have used the word expressive of that action, which is cheo or ekkeo.

3. If Christ and the apostles had commanded the action of "bathing," or "washing," they would have used the word expressive of that action, which is lono.

4. If Christ and the apostles had commanded the different distinct actions of "dye," "color," "stain," "tinge," they would have used the representative words expressive of those actions.

5. If the terms expressive of all these distinct actions were never used by Christ, and the apostles to express the action of baptism, then all those actions therefore, were never commanded to be done as the performance of the sacred ordinance of baptism.

6. As Christ and the apostles commanded the action of baptizontes, they used the representative word expressive of that action, which from bapto, and baptizo is translated "to dip,"—by the learned Greeks themselves—and as they used the word expressive of immersion, therefore, immersion is the action commanded by Christ in the great commission.

"Know ye not that so many of US as were baptized (baptisthamen: dipped—immersed into Jesus Christ, were baptized, baptisthamen immersed) into his death? Therefore, we are buried with him by immersion into (thanatos) death."—Romans 6: 3, 4. The personal pronouns personate the entire person, "us," and "we."—The individual man entire was "buried" and "raised." Verse 5: "For if we have been planted in the likeness of his death, we shall be in the likeness of his resurrection," i. e., "raised to walk in newness of life."

1. That which was "planted" in the downward movement of the act, is put out of sight,—"We" have been planted. "We," the entire personality.

2. That which is raised in the upward movement of the act, is brought into sight, "we," the entire personality,—not the head, and face only.

The translators of the English Version have translated the Greek primitives—the root,—"bap," "dip," "dipped," "dippeth" in the following:

And he cried and said, Father Abrahâm, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus that he may dip (bapas) the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue, [etc.]—Luke 16: 24.

And he answered and said, He that dippeth his hand with mé in the dish, the same shall betray me.—Matthew 26: 23.

Jesus answered, He it is, to whom I shall give a sop, when I have dipped it. "And when he had dipped the sop, he gave it to Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon.—John 13: 26.

And he was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood: and his name is called The Word of God.—Revelation 19: 13.

And he answered and said unto them, It is one of the twelve, that dippeth with me in the dish.—Mark 14: 20.

Then went he down and dipped himself seven times in Jordan, according to the saying of the man of God: and his flesh came again like unto the flesh of a little child, and he was clean.—2 Kings 5: 14.

Here is evidence that the primitive word bapas is translated "dip," "dipped," "dippeth," and as the primitive word,—idea and action uniformly passes over, and is transmitted throughout the whole lineage of derivatives; it is, therefore, incontrovertibly evident that "dipping" or immersion, is the true mode or action of baptizontes, or of all the derivatives.

Sometimes an advocate of sprinkling or pouring thinks Paul's allusion to the passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea favors his position,—"All baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea."—1 Corinthians 10: 2.

McKnight says in his note on this text:

Because the Israelites, by being hid from the Egyptians under the cloud, and by passing through the Red Sea, were made to declare their belief in the Lord, and in his servant Moses, (Exodus 14: 31,) the apostle very properly represents them as baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea.

But in what sense the term baptized as used by Paul, could be appropriately applied in the "hiding of Israel from the Egyptians by the cloud," we fail to see. The noble Column which was a cloud of fire by night, and of a shade by day, rode triumphantly in the heavens for other and higher purposes than that of affording hope to the advocates of sprinkling. With all their gigantic efforts, they have utterly failed to draw rain from this cloud! And as to the midway path of the host of Israel through the Red Sea, when the wind blew the waves into congealed walls, we see not Paul's application to the ordinance, baptism—for, says the Bible, "the children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground" (Exodus 14: 22), and the Lord informed Moses in verse 16, that "Israel shall go on dry ground through the midst of the sea." But, we can see that when "the gospel was preached unto them, as well as unto us" (Hebrews 4: 2), they were admitted to the privilege of partaking of that "spiritual meat," and "drink," which the same apostle calls "Christ." (1 Corinthians 10: 4.) And had it not been a gospel ordinance with "immersion" as the action, Paul would not have used the term baptized, as it would have instituted a contradiction between his epistle to the "saints at Rome," and the one written "to the saints at Corinth," and to "everywhere."

There is a metaphorical import to the word, but it will be remembered that the metaphorical use of a physical term, may illustrate, but can not define the meaning of the word. In the Greek classics some metaphorical terms are used. The ancients used the term baptizo, when they desired to express "a city plunged in sleep." Virgil speaks of a city "buried in sleep and wine." Josephus speaks of one who was "sunk into insensibility by excessive drinking." Diodorus Siculus says: "They do not sink their subjects with taxes." To be plunged in debt, or to be immersed in pleasure are phrases too well known to endanger any one mistaking the figure. While these metaphorical terms express similitude without the signs of comparison, it is difficult to evade the force of the primitive meaning of baptizantes—to immerse.

The Savior uses a term which gives us a deeper idea,—one of "new creation," "new man,"—a term introducing us to a new, a higher realm; one into which we are "born of water, and the Spirit" (John 3: 5). The word born has the significance of baptism. History informs us that "for the first fifteen hundred years of the Christian Era, no one doubted the application of John 3: 5 to baptism. Zuinglius was the first who interpreted otherwise." The word born seems to express the completed act of baptism. Baptism expresses the manner in which the new birth is performed,—buried or plunged into one element, and emerging therefrom, as the action of being "born of water." But as man is a compound being—composed of a physical organism, built up of earthly elements, not "clay," but dust—the "dust" man—and a spiritual organism which God took from the heavens, and blended with the physical, and sent it on an eternal mission to this world, the new birth is not complete until the spiritual organism is born of the element spirit. "That which is born of the Spirit is spirit."—John 3: 6. Thus, the physical body, which in weight is between three fourths and four fifths water, and this latter in a liquid state is compound matter, resolvable into elements—oxygen and hydrogen—is overwhelmed in water by the ordinance of God,—"born again" and the spirit of man—fallen degenerate—alienated from the life of God,—is born of the Spirit of God—passes from a negative to a positive state of existence, and the whole man is born again,—is a "new creature in Christ Jesus," under the ordinance of God—"the laying on of hands." Hence, Paul could affirm, "By one spirit are we all baptized into one body."—1 Corinthians 12: 13.

But inasmuch as all acts done without commission and authority are, in themselves, null and void, however great or able the person who performs them, so the act of "baptizantes," or "baptizing" the converted of all nations, will amount simply to a ceremony without the authority from God back of all administration. As by one legal act a child is inducted into a family, and sustains the relation of son, daughter, brother, sister, so we, by one act—"baptism"—legally administered, enter into the divine relationship with Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. But Campbell's, Anderson's, and the Revised Version have rendered the Greek preposition in such a manner as to eliminate the authority expressed by the terms of the great commission. "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost" signifies by, or upon the authority of this triune head. But, as rendered by the above named translations, "into the "name," expresses relationship only, without a hint of the authority by which the act of relationship is performed. The "keys of the kingdom," by which the acts performed "on earth," should be ratified "in heaven," are dropped, or perhaps left suspended to the girdle of the Roman prelate.

In Acts of the Apostles 2: 38, each translation renders the preposition in the dative case as follows: "Peter said unto them, repent and (baptisthato) be baptized, every one of you, (epi to onomati Iason Christon: upon, or by, or) in the (authority) name of Jesus Christ." "Into the name," as they render the commission, simply invests those converted with the name, and differs from the idea they express in Acts 2:38. In a few quotations, see if eis—into sounds well: En arche,—"Into the beginning God created the heavens and the earth."—Genesis 1:1.

"And God said, Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit-tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is (eis) into itself."—Genesis 1:11. "And God said, Let there be lights (eis) into the firmament."—Genesis 1:14. "And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it: because that (en) into it he had rested."—Genesis 2:3.

"And the seventy returned again with joy, saying, Lord, even the devils are subjects unto us, (en) into thy name."—Luke 10:17. "Many will say to me (en) into that day, Lord, God, have we not prophesied (en) into thy name? And (en) into thy name cast out devils? And (en) into thy name done many wonderful works?—Matthew 7:22.

It sounds funny to cast out devils into the name of Christ. Parkhurst says en has sixteen meanings and eis has eighteen; but Horne Tooke, volume 1, page 282, resolves them all into one definition. The commission given to the apostles does not authorize any man to act in their stead, for the term commission signifies something committed from a superior to an inferior. In this case the great head of the church—Jesus Christ—commits spiritual power and authority to his ministers, to "teach" and "baptize" the nations. "But ye shall receive power when the Holy Ghost is come upon you."—Acts 1:8. This was said by the head of the church to the original apostles, directly, nineteen hundred years ago. Such commission does not apply to modern ministers without direct revelation from the same source. "And no man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that is called of God as was Aaron."—Hebrews 5:4. By divine revelation from God, a minister receives divine authority to induct penitent candidates, by baptism and "laying on of hands," into the divine relationship of the Father, and Son. Such divinely authorized baptism "remits sin," gives us a moral standing before God. The baptism of the Spirit gives us a spiritual standing,—puts us in possession of "the light of life," away from, and out of, the realms of "darkness" (John 8:12). God's system is one of order. He has a time when, a place where, and means by which, he blesses and saves. The time when, is:

After that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation, in whom also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise.—Ephesians 1:13. And because ye are sons (not before,) God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father.—Galatians 4:6.

The place where, is in Christ:

Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ.—Ephesians 1:3. For in him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily.—Colossians 2:9. And ye are complete in him, which is the head of all principality and power.—Verse 10. Abide in me, and I in you. . . . If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you.—John 15:4-7.

The means by which, is the gospel of God's dear Son: Faith, repentance, and "as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ."—Galatians 3:27.

And when they heard this, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them; and they spake with tongues, and prophesied.—Acts 19:5, 6. He therefore that ministereth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles among you, doeth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith? Even as Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness.—Galatians 3:5, 6.

Thus, it is "in Christ" after faith, repentance, and baptism, with "laying on of hands" that we are blessed with the "seal of adoption,"—the Holy Spirit—and this seal denotes possession,—that he who seals, owns those whom he seals: "What! know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own? For ye are bought with a price?"—1 Corinthians 6:19, 20. A seal denotes also a signet, inscription, impression. God puts his "impression" upon us by virtue of our being cast into the mold of doctrine he has ordained; and, like the metal, we receive the "impression" of the mold. "Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, the Lord knoweth them that are his."—2 Timothy 2:19.

S. W. L. SCOTT.

MODERN HISTORY AND THE BOOK OF MORMON.

The History of Iowa, published in 1903, by Benjamin F. Gue, has some statements interesting to those who believe in the Book of Mormon. In the opening statement of chapter 2, volume 1, the author says:

During the period of melting glaciers the surface of the earth was again occupied by plants and animals. Soon after these appeared we find the first evidences of man's advent upon this portion of the earth. Professor Aughey's discovery of arrow points in undisturbed beds of loess at various places in Iowa and Nebraska, indicates with certainty the presence of man soon after the melting of the glaciers. Horses appeared about this time and were used for food, as is clearly shown by the finding of skulls crushed in a manner that could only come from the blows of an implement similar to the stone ax. These axes are found in the same deposit with the skulls, both in this country and Europe, showing that man appeared on both continents during the same geological period.

In the above statement is the fact that horses appeared upon this land in a very early period. Moroni, in the Book of Mormon, Ether 4:14, tells us that the Jaredites had "horses and asses" upon this land in the early part of their existence as a nation, which national life with that people began about 2,100 B. C. Nephi also tells us, 1 Nephi 5: 130, that when his colony arrived upon this land they found all kinds of beasts "and the ass and the horse." In the quotation above the author has the idea that horses were used for food. The Book of Mormon only speaks of them as animals being useful for man; though the crushed skulls may have been animals used for food during famines.

What sort of people were the first inhabitants of Iowa, is a question that must ever be of interest. It is generally believed by archæologists that remains of two distinct prehistoric races have been found in the valley of the Mississippi.

The Book of Mormon well tells us that two races have occupied this land of Iowa. One was certainly prehistoric. The Jaredites, beginning their civilization in North America previous to 2,000 B. C., extended their civilization over the Mississippi Valley at two different times during their occupation of the land prior to 600 B. C. The author mentions that skulls found in different parts of Iowa were similar to skulls found in different countries in Europe.

The first inhabitants of Iowa and the Mississippi Valley of which we have any evidence are called the "Mound-builders." Stone and copper implements found indicate that they had made progress in the scale of intelligence. Whether they cultivated the soil, erected comfortable dwellings, and built towns is not known, but that they made cloth is proven by samples found in mounds, strangely preserved through the innumerable ages which have elapsed. The numbers, color, habits, customs, and forms of governments of these people, as well as the manner in which their mounds were constructed, the purpose for which these enduring earthworks of various forms were used, and a thousand interesting details of the history of these inhabitants of Iowa must for ever remain unknown. Whence they came, how long they possessed the land, from what cause they were exterminated, are problems that will never cease to have an absorbing interest to succeeding races and generations. We can only call them the "Mound-builders," in absence of almost all knowledge of their history.

This author speaks of the "Mound-builders." We call them the Jaredites, who came to this continent from the Tower of Babel, 2,250 B. C., and lived here as a people for a period of sixteen centuries. That they had "copper implements," is shown by Moroni telling us that the Jaredites, Ether 4, "did work in all manner of ore, and they did make gold, and silver, and iron, and brass, and all manner of metals; and they did dig it out of the earth; wherefore, they did cast up mighty heaps of earth to get ore, of gold, and of silver, and of iron, and of copper." Samples of cloth have been found in these mounds in Iowa, strangely preserved. Moroni further tells us that those people "did have silks, and fine twined linen; and they did work all manner of cloth, that they might clothe themselves from their nakedness."

The form of government of these people was monarchical, and the thousand details of their history is well known to the Book of Mormon students, and these "problems that will never cease to have an absorbing interest to succeeding races and generations," are no longer difficult problems to us.

Evidences of the work of these people are found in many of the Eastern States and as far south as Tennessee in great abundance. The mounds are numerous along the Mississippi Valley in Iowa, extending from Dubuque at intervals through Jackson, Clinton, Scott, Muscatine, Louisa, and other counties. Many of these when opened are found to contain skeletons partially preserved, with various implements, vessels, pipes, and ornaments. One opened near Dubuque disclosed a vault divided into three cells. In the central cell was found eight skeletons sitting in a circle, while in the center of the group was a drinking vessel made of a sea shell. The whole chamber was covered with logs preserved in cement.

Helaman tells us in the second chapter of his book that during the century preceding the birth of Christ "the people who went forth became exceeding expert in the working of cement; therefore they did build houses of cement, in the which they did dwell. . . . And the people who were in the land northward, did dwell in tents and in houses of cement. . . . And it came to pass as timber was exceeding scarce in the land northward, they did send forth much by the way of shipping; . . . that they might build many cities, both of wood and of cement."

Some very interesting mounds were found on the Cook farm, near Davenport, which were opened by Reverend Mr. Gass in 1874. There were ten mounds in the group, about two hundred and fifty feet back from the river. Several of them were opened and found to contain sea shells, copper axes, hemispheres of copper, stone knives, pieces of galena, mica, pottery, and copper spools. Many of the axes were wrapped with coarse cloth, which had been preserved by the copper. The pipes were of the Mound-builders' pattern, some of which were carved with effigies of birds and animals. One bird had eyes of copper, another had eyes of pearl, showing much delicacy of manipulation and skill in carving. Twenty copper pipes and eleven copper awls were taken from these mounds.

All of the mounds contained skeletons and ashes; two contained altars of stone. In one, tablets were found on which were hieroglyphics representing letters and figures of people, trees, and animals.

In the mound represented in the accompanying illustration, [See History of Iowa] not far below the surface, two skeletons were found. Below these were layers of river shells and ashes several feet in thickness. Beneath this three mature skeletons were lying in a horizontal position, and between them was the skeleton of a child. Near them were five copper axes wrapped in cloth, stones forming a star, carved pipes, several bear's teeth, and a broken lump of ochre.

In a mound opened by Reverend Mr. Cass west of Muscatine slough, in 1880, there was found a carved stone pipe, a carved bird, a small copper ax, and a pipe carved in the shape of an elephant. Another pipe was found in that vicinity shaped to represent a mastodon.

Moroni, in the fourth chapter of Ether, mentions that "there were elephants, and cureloms, and cumoms; all of which were useful unto man."

Similar evidences of the ingenious and skillful work of that prehistoric race have been found over a wide range of country, showing conclusively that these first inhabitants of Iowa, of which anything is known, must have made considerable progress in some of the arts of civilized people.

Their mounds extend as far west as the Little Sioux River, and the Des Moines Valley is especially rich in these evidences of occupation by the "Mound-builders." At one point a few miles above the city of Des Moines, on a bold bluff of the river, are many acres covered with their mounds. At other points are found well-preserved earthworks laid out on high bluffs, evidently for defense. There is near Lehigh, in Webster County, an elaborate system of these earthworks commanding a view of great extent.

The lines of these works can be easily traced and in many places huge trees have grown up in them. There are evidences that these people cleared forests, graded roads, wove cloth, made stone and copper implements, exhibiting great skill in these works which have survived them. If they were of the same race with the inhabitants of Central America, who erected the massive structures found in ruins in that portion of the continent, their civilization must have become well advanced. It is not improbable that as these antiquities are further explored, additional light will be thrown upon this race of people who preceded the Indians of America. That they existed in great numbers, and through a period of many thousand years, can not be doubted. That they were assailed by warlike invaders coming upon them from the north and west is generally believed. That the earthworks found along the rivers were erected as protection against enemies there can be little doubt.

How long they resisted the invaders can never be known. The terrible conflicts may have lasted through several generations, as they were gradually dislodged from their strongholds and forced southward. They may have slowly perished before the resistless onslaught of the invaders until the remnants of the once numerous race became the hunted "Cliff-dwellers," who sought a last refuge in the sides of the deep gorges where some of the cliff houses have been preserved. It is generally believed that the remote ancestors of the North American Indians were the conquerors of the "Mound-builders."

It is evident from the above quotations that the historian of to-day, without any positive knowledge concerning these prehistoric races, forms conclusions that are strikingly similar to the positive facts as they are recorded in the Book of Mormon.

A DEFENSE.

I find on pages from 86 to 88 of HERALD, volume 55, what is offered as a criticism upon an article written by me, and published in a former HERALD.

The brother says, "the gist of the matter was brought out when a motion was made to properly recognize the missionary in charge, in this same meeting, by the common consent rule. The district president did his utmost to defeat its passage, and in his letter characterizes the missionary in charge as 'butting in,' 'interfering.'"

As to the above we deny that "the district president did his utmost to defeat its passage," and as to characterizing the missionary with "butting in," we simply copied his own statement on that point.

Again he says, "The common consent rule had been evaded." This we deny. The district had one year before, by "common consent" elected its president to preside for one year, and until the end of the closing session of the term, and thus all things were in order. Is there any other organization on earth that requires more than one election to qualify one to fill out his term of office?

"Permanent organization.—The temporary organization having been completed . . . the assembly should proceed to make choice of one of their number to act as president of the district. . . . The officers elected should at once assume the authority and enter upon the discharge of their duties."—Book of Rules, page 6.

By reading the whole section we see that one of the duties of a district president is to preside. "In the absence of the presiding elder of the branch the priest or priests chosen by the branch or either of them shall have the right to preside, whatever other elders or priests may be present."—Book of Rules, page 101.

What the writer should like to know is, is a branch in its organization superior to a district in its organization? And if not, why make district organization the butt of contention over and above a branch, Religio, or Sunday-school convention. "All authority was assumed by the district president." This we deny. The district president had been placed in his position as shown above.

"Preceding missionaries in charge seem to have winked at these conditions rather than to take responsibility of putting them right; easier perhaps to court favor and let it pass." This is a high compliment upon previous missionaries, I must say. Yes, there had been many of the leading authorities of the church in the district for nearly forty-six years, and had so far "winked at these conditions." But the time seems come at last when in the interest of the work that the brother had to "butt in" "abruptly" "with a high hand and in a disorderly manner." Well, it seems that he might have waited another four years, so that the district would have been an even fifty years old.

In the first organization there were special conferences held in different parts, and the same may be done now under a rule laid down in Book of Rules page 4, section 9, and as provided for in Book of Rules page 2, section 3. "Where there is no organization (branch or district), it will be well to observe the rule, 'The highest in authority shall preside.'" The above, if it means anything, sets forth in plain terms that the ones elected to preside over "branch or district" are the highest in authority of any and all others who may be present, so far as the meetings then in hand may be concerned.

"Presumably it was by the advice of one or more of these that the district referred to was misled into the adoption of the resolution suspending the operation of the 'common consent' rule." The writer of this article, so far as he is concerned, denies the above insinuation, for he has had nothing to do with the resolution only in seeking to carry out its provision as he understood it at that time, and he again asserts that "common consent" had been exercised as the brethren of the district wished it to be done until the "butting in" took place.

"Did you find any law which said he should preside if certain others were there?" Yes, the law above referred to, together with that found in Doctrine and Covenants, section 122, paragraph 8, "And when those officers are ordained and set in their order, in the church, they should be left to administer in the things unto which they were ordained, having charge of the affairs over which they were called and set apart to preside." This last was cited before, and seems to the writer to cover the whole ground of controversy.

Of General Interest

REAL BLUE BLOOD.

[The Kansas City Journal for January 24, in an editorial, contains the information which we give below in reference to the patronymic Smith. It is quite ingenious and we give it to the readers of the HERALD for two reasons; one is that it is ingenious and contains some information that might be useful some time in conversation when the name of Smith is considered; the other is to show that the steadfast persistence on the part of the Reorganized Church in reference to what has been called "The Twin Relic" has been taken notice of and has not been forgotten by those who are shaping the public opinion, the writers for the press. We often find similar pieces of information given in the popular press, which is more or less valuable to the Saints, and it affords us pleasure to record them in our own journal.—EDITOR.]

An esteemed weekly pictorial contemporary of New York performs in its current issue a signal service by noting some of the most useful and illustrious deeds which have added glamour to the scintillating name of Smith. This prolific family has made surprising contributions to the sum of human achievement in many fields of activity, and to preserve some of the most notable, which are typical rather than comprehensive, is to widen still farther the horizon of the fame of the Smiths.

Our contemporary, however, is in error in ascribing the origin of the Smiths to a period about three centuries before the arrival of Captain John in America. The Scriptures authenticate the ancestry of the Smiths by proving that they are descended from Cain. Everybody who has dabbled in philology knows that "Smith" is simply a "smiter" and the first official mention of a "smiter" in the Bible is contained in the statement that "Cain smote Abel." Nor let the Smiths become disgruntled thereat, for the best of us will run into a pirate or a peasant if we go back far enough. Next to the Adamses, the Smiths are therefore the oldest family on the globe.

But more seriously speaking, it is really interesting to note the puissant part which the Smiths have played in the development of the world. In "Who's Who" in England there are 144 Smiths, and in the American "Who's Who" there are 135. There are 400 Smiths registered in "Club Men of New York." From the standpoint of title the most illustrious members of the Smith family are Lord Strathcona, Canada's "Grand Old Man," who was plain Donald Smith when he landed in Canada a poor young man. In England George Smith's official title is the Right Reverend the Bishop of Argyll and the Isles. But the untitled members of the family are of even greater account, though Lord Strathcona is every inch a man. Still, in Canada probably the most illustrious man known by his right name is Professor Goldwin Smith.

Here at home the Smiths have flourished, waxed, and grown fat. There have been two Smiths in presidential cabinets, and we note with pardonable pride that both are editors—Charles Emory Smith of Philadelphia and Hoke Smith of Georgia. And speaking of Hoke Smith recalls that other distinguished Georgia Smith, Bill Arp, nee Smith, augmented by Charles Henry later in life. Bill Arp, coincidentally, lived in the Carterville made famous by the brilliant litterateur, F. Hopkinson Smith, the creator of "Colonel Carter." In the creative line also another Smith shines preëminent, for the author of the book of the best comic operas and musical comedies of the day is Harry B. Smith, the versatile partner of Reggie De Koven.

It pains us to turn with our esteemed contemporary from this record of monogamous achievement to the fact that the world's most married man is a Smith, the president of the Mormon church. But the credit of the family is maintained by another Joseph Smith, who is also a Mormon, so-called, but is head of the branch which is opposed to polygamy and which does not like to be called Mormons. Former Senator James Smith of New Jersey is the largest manufacturer of patent leather in the country, and a distinguished New Hampshire Smith makes socks to go with the shoes. The borax with which we kill cockroaches, if it came from Nevada, was discovered by a Smith. These are only instances, which might be indefinitely multiplied.

It was a Smith who gave to the country its national anthem. The Smiths were on both sides of the "irrepressible conflict," for a General Smith commanded a Union division at Vicksburg and another General Smith was in command at Richmond in 1862. Gerrit Smith signed, with Horace Greeley, the bond of Jefferson Davis.

It seems to be "up to" the Browns and the Joneses.

PREHISTORIC HOUSES IN OREGON.

TACOMA, Washington, January 1.—A. N. Sayre, living in South Tacoma and ex-Representative from the thirty-ninth District in the lower house during the last session of the Legislature, will shortly leave for Southern Oregon on a peculiar mission, the locating of two houses built in prehistoric times. Mr. Sayre is a pioneer mining man on the Pacific coast and is known from California to the British line.

Three years ago he was traveling through Southern Oregon and learned of the existence of ancient buildings and saw the material of which the buildings are composed. Only two or three people knew the location. Mr. Sayre says their value as ancient anthropological finds is not realized. The houses, he says, are not of the same order as are the cliff dwellings, and he is confident they belong to an entirely different age, and that they were constructed by people radically different from the primitive folk that perched dwellings on remote cliffs and the high battlements of the Rocky Mountains.

"At the time I learned of these two houses," said Mr. Sayre, "I was not in a position to stop and make a personal investigation of the locality. Nevertheless, I went to within less than half a mile of the remains of the two structures and could see where they were.

"The houses were built without question in a remote age. The walls have been almost covered with the debris of many centuries. Underbrush and vines are growing around and over them, making it hard to find the spot. Only the walls now remain.

"The work of hewing out the stones into octagon form and giving them a saucer shape has required incredible pains on the part of this ancient people, which must have had only crude implements to work with. Everything indicates that the structures were intended for defense, built in spots where with vegetation eliminated there would be a splendid outlook to all points of the compass."—The Evening Bulletin, Walla Walla, Washington, January 1, 1908.

Original Poetry

CONFLICT OF A DAY.

A morning dawned in eternity,
Of the day run now so near to eve,
A day not measured as man counts time,
For months and years its hours weave.
Deep in the bosom of eternity,
The throng of throngs together trod,
Joyfully gracing the beautiful streets
Of the capital city of God.

Hark! the lusty shouts ascending,
Bursting from that mighty host,
Angels' songs in music blending,
As joy wells to its uttermost,
Sons of God! stars of the morning!
But why this burst of plaudit grand?
'Tis the news of earth's creation,
Yet to be, by God's own hand.

Earth, for home and habitation!
Trumpets, notes of praise employ,
Morning stars then sing together,
And the sons of God shout for joy.
But hark again! This time a clamor;
Must mutiny mar the happy scene?
Whence this thrust, this breach of trust
Which mingles discord joy between?

From out his place of trust and honor
Rebellious Lucifer so bold
Usurps a place beyond his merit,
Seeking to grasp, to seize, and hold.
The prestige of his own great station,
And power acquired at duty's post,
With all his dashing, bold assumption,
Captures full one third the host.
War's proclaimed, and captains chosen,
Volunteers join each their choice;
Clamor then supplants the music
And battle din the joyful voice.

Still rages that conflict, unabated;
Old earth, long since, the battlefield,
Though victory's song be long belated,
The one third clan now soon must yield.

Selected Poetry

THE UNSUCCESSFUL MAN.

He failed, but why?
Did you or I
Do aught to help him on his feet,—
Or treat him coldly on the street?
Did we give him a helping hand
Or even scatter any sand
Upon the slipp'ry track he trod,
Or did we push him with a prod?

He lost, but say—
The other day
His wife told me how hard he tried
And how she bravely stood beside
The losing man to give him grit—
But "friends" closed in and said, "Remit,"

And like the coyote-hunted steer
This man went down—and now they jeer!

A man backslid,—
The snares were hid
Among the most religious folk
Who thought the Golden Rule a joke—
All right to preach about at times
But not to use when selling mines.
"I'll do as they do when I sell,"
And thinking thus the good man fell.

The good man fell—
But you know well
What might have been his Christian life
Had he not seen in business life
The deeds of men whose daily walk
Would not O. K. with Sunday talk.
'Twas natural that he went astray
When led in such a crooked way.

It strikes me now
I can't see how
That any man can e'er succeed,
Or follow any moral creed
While "bears" are camping on his trail
To pull him down and make him fail,
And "wolves" with lamb's wool for a cloak
Are living as religious folk.

Mothers' Home Column

An Old Legend.

In the freezing cold and the blinding snow
Of a wintry eve in the long ago,
Folding his cloak o'er clanking mail,
A soldier fighting the angry gale
Inch by inch in the campfire's light,
Star of his longing this wintry night.

All in a moment his path is barred,
He draws his sword as he stands on guard;
But who is this with a white, wan face,
And piteous hands upheld for grace?
Tenderly bending, the soldier bold
Raised a beggar, faint and cold.

Famished he seemed, and almost spent,
The rags that cover him worn and rent,
Crust nor coin can the soldier find;
Never his wallet with gold is lined;
But his soul is sad at the sight of pain;
The sufferer's pleading is not in vain.

His mantle of fur is broad and warm,
Armor of proof against the storm!
He snatches it off without a word;
One downward pass of the gleaming sword,
And cleft in twain at his feet it lies,
And the stormwind howls 'neath the frowning skies.

"Half for thee"—and with tender art
He gathers the cloak round the beggar's heart—
"And half for me," and with jocund song
In the teeth of the tempest he strides along,
Daring the worst of the sleet and snow—
That brave young spirit so long ago.

Lo! as he slept at midnight's prime,
His tent had the glory of summer-time;
Shining out of a wondrous light,
The Lord Jesus beamed on his dazzled sight.
"I was the Beggar," the Lord Jesus said,
As he stood by the soldier's lowly bed;
"Half of thy garment thou gavest to Me."

HOLDEN, Missouri.

Dear Sister Frances: This evening while reading the dear old HERALD I turned to the Mothers' Home Column to see what I could find there, as the many good thoughts we have received from time to time have been a great comfort to me; and, as Sister Eleanor says, when we turn to this Column and find only a selection, I feel there is something missing. Perhaps a great many sisters are like myself, waiting for others to write, thinking we will get something better, just as we often do in our prayer-meeting, one wait for the other; and then we miss the spiritual blessing. The many grand and glorious thoughts and experiences that I have received through reading this Column, and meeting with the Daughters of Zion, have helped me to build my home and make it what it is. I realize a home in the true sense does not just consist of a fine house and nice furniture. While it is the duty of all, as Saints of the Most High, to beautify our homes, and make them comfortable and nice, yet that Spirit that rules within is what makes the home,—peace, love, joy, godliness, banishing from our very presence that which is evil. I feel there is a great responsibility resting on us as mothers and daughters in Israel. Many are like myself, not blessed with those that should complete the home, bringing comfort and joy with their merry laughter; yet long since have I tried in my weakness to be resigned to God's will, "although hard," and turn my mind and attention to other work, always trying to find something to do that I might feel that my life was not altogether spent in vain. Eighteen years ago when our only child, a bright blue-eyed boy, came to gladden our home, we felt we had everything to live for; and for seventeen months our hopes were bright. When, suddenly, God called him home, leaving us lonely, and hopes blighted, we almost felt there was nothing to live for, which caused us many days of bitterness, and not until we found it was better to be resigned to God's will did we find comfort. Then, as I said, I began to look for something to do that my life would not be spent in vain. While I have not been able to accomplish much, because of poor health so much of the time, yet I can look back with some degree of pleasure, feeling I have tried to do some good, and have not spent my time in vain. The beautiful words we read some years ago in Autumn Leaves come to my mind: "A voice in silence. As I lay one night, thinking my past life o'er, a voice said to me, What would you do if Christ should knock at your door? Then I closed my eyes in deepest thought; would I be ready to go with him to the home of the pure and good?"

O yes, dear sister, would we be ready to go? Are we living the gospel law, that we could hail with delight the very appearance of our blessed Redeemer? If we are living as we should we could rejoice at his appearance. Have you tried to comfort the weary ones? Oh yes, such a mission work, to try to comfort those who are troubled, and have burdens to bear. Just a kindly word to show sympathy in the time of trouble, and a look of love often impressed the one in sorrow, bringing comfort and cheer to her already troubled heart, causing peace and joy to thrill her bosom. We know not how much good just a kind word will do. Yes, there are our dear aged ones, whose hair is white; if only we realized how they loved to be remembered, we never would hastily pass them by, but would find time to give them a comforting word, and let them know we loved them still. There are many little things that we often thoughtlessly pass by, looking forward to something greater, not thinking it is these little things that count. Oh, may we ever be on the watchtower of Zion, watching and ready to do whatever our hands find to do, that we may be God's children in deed and truth.

MRS. R. O. SELF.

Letter Department

STELTON, Ontario, February 4, 1908.

Editors Herald: I could write a lengthy letter of the good work being done at this place. Am pleased to say many are interested in the pure gospel, and some fine people, and I expect to baptize some before I leave this place. I am holding nine services each week, and much visiting with those as yet outside of the church. Speaking to one aged person the other day she said, "Elder, I never in my life heard the truths of the Bible brought forth as you bring them forth." She also said, in visiting some of her friends, taking some of our literature to them, and inviting them out to hear the preaching, they told her if she went to hear that man any more they would never speak to her again. She told them she was going where she could hear the truth.

Our effort here has created a stir. The preachers have started house to house prayer-meetings to keep the people from coming, and are trying to poison the minds of the people against me and the work.

The few Saints here have bought a plat of land, paid for it, ($300), and intend to build in the spring. R. B. HOWLETT.

FAYETTE CITY, Pennsylvania, February 6, 1908.

Dear Herald: In reading the letters from week to week in the church papers and HERALD, and learning of the advancement of the work, and the many blessings being received among God's people, I feel like telling of his work in this part of his vineyard. The Saints here are advancing step by step spiritually. God is blessing us. He has spoken to us, and if we are humble, and faithful to his commands, more abundantly shall we receive his favors. May the Lord help us to be faithful, and may all God's people live together in love and unity.

Brn. Baldwin and McConnaughy have been with us holding meetings. Quite a number came to hear. Some appeared interested; and many heard the gospel. Come again, brethren. One was baptized. May God's work go on, and souls be added to the church, such as shall be saved in his kingdom. Ever praying for the welfare of Zion. EMMA PERRIE.

VAN CLEAVE, Mississippi, February 6, 1908.

Editors Herald: I desire to say that I still "live and move and have a being," notwithstanding the encounter with the great Ben M. Bogard, D. D., of Little Rock, Arkansas, of the Missionary Baptist Church, is over.

The debate began February 1, at seven o'clock in the evening, and four sessions of two hours each were given to each proposition. The church questions were discussed. While much boasting and bragging and misrepresentation were indulged in, by the doctor of divinity, all the Saints that I have heard express themselves were greatly strengthened, and friends were made to the cause.

Yours, as ever,

J. M. STUBBART.

PERSIA, Iowa, February 13, 1908.

Dear Herald: The quarterly conference of the Little Sioux District convened at Moorhead, Iowa, February 8 and 9. A very spiritual time was enjoyed by all present. There was a good attendance, and reports from the branches showed good spiritual conditions. The conference organized by selecting the district presidency to preside. The morning hour, both Saturday and Sunday, was devoted to prayer and testimony. George H. Shearer, Sidney Pitt, W. A. Smith, and W. W. Baker were the speakers. Adjourned to meet with the Woodbine Branch the last Saturday and Sunday in May. We think the Little Sioux District is in good condition, to say the least.

BERLIN, Germany, January 6, 1908.

Editors Herald: A few words from this place might interest you and the readers of the HERALD, so I write. I spent the Christmas holidays with relatives on the island of Møen, Denmark, where I was raised, something I had not done for nearly thirty years. One of my uncles, for whom I commenced to work when I was ten years of age, is still living, being past ninety-one years of age. I have numerous relatives and friends still living there, all being very friendly, and inviting me to visit them. I did my best in that direction, and embraced every opportunity to talk gospel to them. They are all religious, in their way, but they have a kind of religion that does not interfere with their every-day life. Holidays with them mean more especially a time for eating, drinking, dancing, etc.

On the 4th I left for Berlin, reaching here the next morning. Bro. Joehnk met me at the station. The next day being Sunday, arrangements had been made for us to meet at Bro. Kippe's house, at Lichterfelde W., one of the suburbs of Berlin. We confirmed Sr. Kippe's father, who had been baptized by Bro. Joehnk on Friday, partook of the sacrament, ordained Bro. Kippe an elder, and administered to him and Sr. Kippe. We had a very good meeting, the Spirit of the Lord being present and confirming the work done. Sr. Kippe's mother was present and spoke in the meeting. We hope that she will ere long unite with us. A brother Smolny, from Alt Döbern, a village in the south of Brandenburg, where Bro. Joehnk has been laboring some, came up in the afternoon. He is a bright young man, and will no doubt make a useful man in time, if faithful. He also speaks the Polish language. We thus have three openings in Germany: Berlin, Hamburg, and Alt Döbern. In each place several are investigating, and interested in our work, and we are hopeful of several additions to our numbers.

I guess your readers all know that it is "uphill business" to do missionary work in this field, especially with the few men and means at hand. We have many obstacles and much prejudice to meet. As a rule we can not afford to rent halls in which to preach, but must content ourselves with visiting, tract distribution, and private conversation. It is my opinion that more of that kind of work should be done everywhere, and that our report blanks should contain spaces for gospel conversations, tracts distributed, etc.

And while I am at it, I might as well say that it is my conviction that in applying for missions every minister should give the Twelve and the Bishop an exact statement of his financial status, and inform us as to the amount needed for his family, not what they would like to have, so that the law of equality might be carried out,—every man receiving “according to his wants and his needs, inasmuch as his wants are just.”—Doctrine and Covenants 81:4. This is the Lord’s rule in the matter of allowances, and it should be carried out by the ministry first, then we could talk equality to the Saints, and it might have the desired effect. If a man has a sufficient income to support his family comfortably, he should not ask anything of the church, just because he is sent on a mission. If not, let him ask for what he really needs. If this rule obtained and our man-made rules were laid aside, our foreign missions need not be crippled as they now are. We can not get the financial help that we so much need, and one reason is that a considerable amount of our funds goes into the homes of the ministry where it is not really needed. Hoping to see the law of the Lord carried out, that Zion may be redeemed, I am,

Yours in bonds,

BELLAIR, ILLINOIS, January 28, 1908.

Editors Herald: Our hope is that we may live our religion to the glory of God, that we may keep his Spirit until we are gathered home to the land of Zion. We have no branch organization here. Pray for us that we may be faithful, keeping all the commandments. I see nothing to discourage, but everything to encourage us in the line of duty, seeking wisdom and knowledge and patience, and everything that goes to make a true Latter Day Saint. We can exert an influence that will never die. May the Lord strengthen and direct the dear children of the Saints here, and bring them safely to Zion; for it takes wisdom, strength, and courage to hold young people in the faith, when their environments outside of the family are all pulling the other way. Let us do good to all men while we have opportunity.

We have had splendid meetings here, and glorious promises, if we prove faithful. Our traveling ministers came recently and preached to us. January 12 to 26, we had a series of meetings, with Bro. F. M. Slover and Bro. Henry Sparling, Springfield, Missouri. The result of the two weeks’ preaching was one baptized at this place. We had good attendance and good attention. Some are seeking after the truth. Should any elder be passing this way he will be welcomed, and cared for while he remains.

In a letter written by Elder C. J. Spurlock, January 8, 1908, he said he had much pleasure in reading the book entitled, A Dream of Heaven. Who wrote the book, and where can we get it?

My faith in the restored gospel has never wavered. Let us move forward “in the light of God.”

In the one faith,
MARY A. FERGUSON.

BLISSFIELD, Michigan, December 30, 1907.

Editors Herald: If you will allow me space I will relate a dream I had on the night of December 3.

I stood as it were upon the banks of a small stream of muddy water, and saw an eagle wading in the stream a short distance above where I was standing. My husband said, He is hunting for fish. But, to my surprise, when he raised up out of the water he had two very uncommon hairy snakes in his claws. I would think they measured at least one and one half feet through the largest part, and were at least sixty feet long. As I watched, they tried to fight the eagle and get away; but he carried them some distance down the stream, and they finally dropped down; but the eagle went down after them again, and this time he pierced them through and my husband said, Now they will die. But the eagle picked them up again, and this time he threw them out over quite a high board fence, just a short distance from where I was, and I looked around and one had raised up its head and was looking at me, and I said to myself, I will not stay here; I shall go farther away from the fence. But previous to the eagle going into the water it seemed he had killed a smaller snake, on the ground, and my husband picked it up and threw it to the old ones, saying, Let them eat it up.

I write this to the HERALD because it has bothered me, and if any in the church can tell what it means, I should be glad to hear from them. I live here alone in Blissfield, but have hope that the work will be opened up here in the near future.

I have been looking for Bro. Scott for some time; but have not seen him. Bro. Davis promised to come, when I saw him at conference last month, at Coldwater; but he has failed to put in an appearance. It may be the Lord’s will, and I shall not find fault with my brethren, as I know by reading that they both have been doing something for the good of the cause.

I am trying to do what I can by living the best I know how, and getting others to read some of my books. One man read Bro. Joseph Luff’s book, The Old Jerusalem Gospel, and when he returned it he said it was fine and had lots of good reading in it; but of course he could not agree with all that was in it. I told him to come down and we would see if I could help him. He said he would, but has never come. If any have reading-matter to give any outsiders, I would be glad to have them send some to me, as I would like to do something for the upbuilding of this good cause.

Your sister in gospel bonds,
MRS. C. B. TONG.

BEACH GROVE, Arkansas, January 29, 1908.

Dear Herald: I am sitting on a moss-covered rock, one among the thousands carelessly hanging on the south side of the notorious Boston Mountains. The beautiful little Mulbury, at my feet is laughingly dancing over the shoal. The buzz of a few flies chimes in with the charming chorus. A hornet fans my cheek with his long wings, gnats are flitting close to the end of my nose, and a single tick, reminding me of the lone missionary, crawls peacefully along. Gentle zephyrs murmur through the leafless trees, and great bunches of mistletoe lovingly caress the smooth white limbs of the swaying sycamore, and a thousand other lovely things conspire with my silent muse to help me see the bright side of recent experiences.

One week ago I told Bro. Buchanan, “I have during the past two weeks given out twelve appointments, the weather has been lovely, but only twice has any one come out to hear me. I am convinced that no good can be done in the mountains by public speaking until summer. To-morrow I will go down to Redding and copy those ancient characters from the rocks, and will be back in time to go to Danning with you next week.”

Saturday evening I climbed a winding footpath to the top of Brush Mountain, and, leaning against the front gate I shouted, “Hello!” (Arkansas etiquette.) A lady came to the door. “Please tell me the way to the schoolhouse.” After directions she continued: “Oh! are we going to have meeting to-night or to-morrow?” “My business is preaching; but it is too late to get out announcement.” “Oh, no, it is not. Mr. F. has a phone, and you will sure have a good crowd out.” “All right, then, meeting at eleven to-morrow. Mr. D. lives near the schoolhouse, and I have been referred to him for lodging to-night.”

The sun was only a few minutes above the horizon, so I hastened on. The mountains are thinly settled, and I was surprised to meet fifty at eleven o’clock. No one knew who I was. I introduced myself, gave them a brief history of the boy prophet, and of the infamous usurpation of Brigham Young, showed what kind of a church Christ built, and how that after Constantine, the heathen portion of the church massacred the Christian portion, and substituted apostles and prophets with popes and pontiffs, and plunged the world into awful darkness.

God gave me great liberty, and helped me convince them of the need of a restoration. Continued the subject at seven o'clock in the evening, and left warm friends and urgent invitations to return.

Monday I walked down Barn Fork, where the scenery was intensely interesting. The spring torrents have washed all the earth from the broad, flat rocks, forming a long series of steps. Here still stand proud cedars, whose flattened roots are clutching into the cracks and crevices, with a faith that never falters. Their boughs are adorned with a rich drapery of long, gray moss, giving them a weird and lonely appearance. Something like a mile below the mouth of this creek I waded across Mulbury. My! the water did bite. I was soon gazing at a multiplicity of queer shaped characters, chiseled into the face of the mighty sand bluff, all the way from the ground up to a height of twenty-one feet. Seven years ago, when the signs were discovered, only a few of the uppermost were visible. A great bank of earth was closely concealing the remainder. A company who verily believe it to be the lost Louisiana mines, have spent several thousand dollars digging away this bank and tunneling into the mountain. Among a labyrinth of dots and dashes, pictures of men, serpents, turtles, and birds, are to be found the Masonic square and compass, keystone, anchor, and seven stars; bull's head, boats, triangular diamond, and half kidney; true diamond, heart, apple quarter, horseshoe, crosses, trowel points, the all-seeing eye, etc., etc.

They claim to have found all these and many more figures duplicated on stones, carefully laid marked side down, forming the checkered pavement in the embankment they have moved, also a car load or more of black sand that has been washed of its gold. Ashes, buck horn, and human bones were found in the dump.

Two old Mexicans have told the following story, both having worked in this mine:

Some of this black sand bore twenty-two dollars of gold to the pan. Several mines close by were operated by this Louisiana company. They were besieged by Indians; could not transport their treasures, so they were stored in subterranean vaults, valued at one hundred and twenty-one million dollars, all entrances sealed and concealed; and then in an effort to get away were nearly all killed by the Indians. I saw pictures of bow and arrow, and Indian's head, in war dress, on the rock. Fragments of crucibles, and stones bearing dates of 1711 and 1811, were found in the bank.

Years ago one John Farnal from St. Joseph, Missouri, came here with a chart got from one of these old Mexicans in California. He (Farna) thought this was the place pointed out; but could not be sure.

Dr. F. Hill, J. R. Morehead, W. P. Hammonds, and George Hill, of Redding, Arkansas, are the members of this company. I was prevented from making a copy of the markings of the bluff, as only part of the company were present.

It is said that Mexicans have been in this vicinity prospecting for lost mines or hunting hidden treasures nearly every season for years past.

Monday night I addressed a few at Redding, and Tuesday night a fair sized crowd at Beach Grove.

From Danning I expect to go to Hartford. I seldom miss a chance to preach a sermon by the fire-place, even when I get no congregation at church. The churches all through this country have gone to seed, and the seed is blasted, and the thinking people are disgusted. Some of their preachers went on a drunk Christmas. And so goes the world.

D. R. BALDWIN.

PANA, Illinois, January 30, 1908.

Editors Herald: The eight nights' debate held at this place between Elder David Smith of the Reorganization and J. E. Prophater of the Non-progressive wing of the Campbellites, commonly known as the Church of Christ, has just closed with another victory for the Latter Day Saints. Nearly the whole congregation are satisfied that Elder David Smith completely overthrew all the arguments of his opponent. The Saints here are all rejoicing, and know that we have something that will stand the test, no matter how sharply it may be criticised. Although Mr. Prophater lays great claims to scholarship, as he played between his revised version and his Greek testament, yet his arguments were swept away as the snow before the sun. I was chosen as Bro. Smith's moderator. The debate closed on Friday night, and on Sunday five were baptized, three grown male persons, two young people about twelve years old. Mr. Mose, one of the first to offer himself for baptism, was a member of the Free Methodist Church, and a Sabbath-school superintendent. He went to his church on Sunday at eleven o'clock and told the pastor to announce from the stand that he (Mr. Mose) was going to leave them and be baptized into the Latter Day Saints' Church at two o'clock. The pastor took him to task, and told him that he was deceived, and was taking the wrong step; told him to wait two weeks longer. But Bro. Mose told him that he had been waiting for a year already, and that it was truth he wanted to obey, and that the Saints were the only people that had all the truth. So he went home, got his clothes for baptism, and when he started to leave the house to be baptized his wife and all his children commenced crying and wringing their hands. His wife said, If you go you shall go alone. He came and was baptized along with four others, and the next day the whole Free Methodist church was in an uproar, and claiming that they would get him back again before six months. His wife said that she would not permit Bro. Sharrock or Bro. Smith to come on the place. Just what the outcome will be, is a matter of conjecture.

While the Saints are rejoicing, the Devil is raging, and our meetings are still going on. Brn. C. H. Burr and David Smith are holding up the banner of truth, with good interest, and others near the kingdom. May the good work go on, is our heart's desire.

In bonds,

F. M. SHARROCK.

ELMIRA, Michigan, February 2, 1908.

Editors Herald: It is with great pleasure I address you to renew my subscription, and send a little more to help the glorious work of the Lord along. I realize the beauty of the gospel more at this time than ever before. The HERALD is a welcome visitor at my home. This is the first year I have taken it; but it has been a good instructor to me. When we look around and see the conditions of our fellow men, oh, my heart aches, and I long to see the day when the gospel shall be preached to the ends of the earth and Zion be redeemed.

I wish to do what I can for this beautiful gospel, although I feel as one of the weak ones, but hope to come up higher in the plan of righteousness and truth, that I may be of some little use, that others may enjoy the blessings of Zion.

Your brother in the gospel,

J. J. RUSNELL.

SPRINGFIELD, Nebraska, February, 1908.

Dear Herald: Your weekly visits are welcome. We have only an occasional visit from an elder, so the church papers are very dear to us. I have been a reader of your columns for several years. I became a member of the church of Jesus Christ about twenty years ago. Was but a child, and since that time there were several years that I did not have the privilege of reading the church papers; but now for the last three years have become a regular subscriber and reader of them, and find the instructions and testimonies a great comfort. There are several Saints here, but we are scattered, and it is hard for us to meet. We have been having a Sunday-school for about two years, and feel that some good has been accomplished. The Quarterlies are so good, I feel that if we had had a Sunday-school for the past twenty years our advancement, spiritually, would have been greater, and some who have seemingly lost interest would have been strengthened. This is a good work, and we hope that all the honest in heart may yet be gathered into the true fold, and do the work that is required.

Bro. W. M. Self was with us last Sunday and spoke words of encouragement and instruction to us. I love to read the letters, and often find names that are familiar, some I have seen when a child, and some that I have become acquainted with by reading the papers. With love for the latter-day work,

MRS. JOHN PITTENGER.

LJUNGS-GARD, pr. Billesholms Gruva, Sweden, Jan., 1908.

Editors Herald: I thought it might be of interest to the HERALD readers to know that we, a few Saints here in Sweden, are trying hard to get the truth before the people. I was made acquainted with this work in Pierre, South Dakota, in 1890, through Elder Peter Moore, and have been made to rejoice many times, and am thankful to my heavenly Father for this blessed gospel which is "the power of God unto salvation" as it was in ancient times. Some four years after I was baptized I moved to Burlington, Iowa, where I made my home for over six years, learned all I could about the work, and tried to be faithful to the covenant I had made with the Lord. While there it was twice told me through prophecy that the time would come when I should preach the gospel in my native land. I never paid much attention to it at the time, as I had settled in my mind never to return. Was, however, ordained deacon and served the branch in that office while there. But the time rolled by, and in the year 1898 things were shaped in such a way that I went back, after I had attended General Conference, both in Lamoni and Independence. After I came here I greatly longed that the time would soon come when the blessed gospel would be preached to this people. I tried to do some work by the way of preaching and conversation between times, following up my occupation, and about four years went by. By this time it seemed impossible to be without the HERALD any longer, so I sent for it, and I need not tell you that I enjoyed reading its contents. In the first number I saw that Bro. Peter Anderson was in Norway on a mission. I immediately sent him a letter, asking him to come this way if possible, to which he replied that it would be impossible, as he had bought his ticket and would, in a few days, be on his way home; but said that Bro. J. H. Hansen was appointed to labor in Sweden as missionary, and that he would try to have him come this way. After a little while he came and we arranged for some meetings to be held in my house. I believe he preached for about two weeks, and a good many came out, at times, to hear. My wife was then fully convinced that we had the truth, and was baptized. My girl nearly two years old, was blessed, and I was ordained priest. Bro. Hansen had baptized several in Gotenborg before he came down here; and baptized some more before leaving for the States. This was the beginning of the work in Sweden. After Bro. Hansen had finished his two years' mission here, Bro. Swen Swensen was appointed to labor here, and he has also done a good work. After he had labored here a little while one was baptized. He went from here to Gotenborg, and some time afterwards, or this spring, I had the pleasure of baptizing two more, one being the fruits of Bro. Swen Swensen's labor.

Our missionary in charge, Peter Anderson, has visited us several times, and through his wise counsel and instructive sermons we have been strengthened, and friends have been gained for the cause. Bro. Swensen and I have labored together a good deal of the time this summer and winter, and the Lord has blessed us in our labors. We have opened up several new places, but none have been baptized as a result of our efforts, but the gospel seed must be planted before we can expect to reap. Some are, however, investigating, and we hope soon will accept the glad message.

This year there are five missionaries laboring in this country in different parts. There are about thirty members living in five different places, and the opportunity is better now than it has been for missionary work, and I am almost sure that it will be a success if the proper efforts are put forth. Would be very glad to hear from any of the Swedish Saints. Should we not rejoice together that this blessed gospel we love with all our hearts has now begun in our own land, and should we not help to support it?

With love to all, I remain your brother in gospel bonds,

C. A. SWENSON.

WEYBURN, Saskatchewan, January 24, 1908.

Editors Herald: Seeing my subscription for HERALD and Autumn Leaves has almost expired, I renew, as I wish them to continue.

We are having a very mild winter, so far, for this country. Stock has grazed their living, as there has not been snow enough to have good sleighing. There has been but very little cold weather. Twenty degrees below zero has been the coldest weather up to this writing.

The gospel work is moving along slowly, as there have been quite a few of the Saints on the sick list, which has hindered us with our Sunday-school. We are waiting for the Quarterlies, so we can commence again.

Our teacher went with a few of the Saints last Sunday to attend a prayer-meeting in a Danish settlement. We received a very cordial reception, took part with them, and the Lord verified his promise to his children, by the presence of his Holy Spirit, for the people present seemed to be satisfied with the truth we gave them, and invited us to come again, which we intend to do. And now there are two openings for our elders to preach the gospel out here; but at present no elder to occupy. The harvest truly is plentiful, but the laborers are few.

We are looking for several more of our people to home-stead out here in the spring. Bro. Charles Watson is going to locate some of them. The railroad will be built fifty miles out this way this summer; we will then have it more convenient for the settlers.

CAROLINE SANDIDGE.

A Request:

Dear Saints: On the fifth day of February, 1908, Sr. Electa J. Emerson was declared to be insane, and was committed to the asylum at Cherokee, Iowa. I am an old member of the church, and believe that prayer is effective. Believing this, I earnestly request the Saints, when they meet for prayer-service on the third Wednesday of March, 1908, to beseech Almighty God to heal her in body and in mind. I believe a united petition will be a success.

In gospel bonds,
NATHAN LINDSEY.

Request for Prayer.

Editors Herald: My husband, Elder G. H. Graves, is a very sick man. He came home sick, and, taking his bed February 1, 1908, is now under the doctor's care. He asks the prayers of all the Saints, and of the Prayer Union, if it be the will of God, that he may be restored to his health again.

He also asks the hospitality and care and help of all the Saints in his behalf.

In gospel bonds,
SR. S. J. GRAVES.

CREDENTIALS TO GENERAL CONFERENCE.

District officers and officers of branches not in districts who have not reported their delegates are urged to forward their General Conference credentials as soon as possible. Do not delay; it is essential to the work of the conference that credentials be in hand as soon as practicable. Where conferences have appointed, please forward at once; otherwise as soon as appointments are made.

ENROLLMENTS IN QUORUMS.

If you wish to be enrolled in a quorum of elders, priests, teachers, or deacons, do not delay your application until the General Conference opens or is half way through its work, as many do. It is necessary that the lists be made up before the general authorities to whom the work of reorganization of such quorums was committed meet to take up that work. Please be prompt. Application blanks forwarded on request.

Any matters that should come before the council should be in the hands of the secretary by the 25th of March.

Respectfully,
J. F. MINTUN, Secretary of the Council.

First Quorum of Seventy.

Blanks for reporting to the quorum have been sent to each of the members, and any who do not receive theirs by the time of the appearance of this notice will please to inform me by card or letter. The reports should be in my hands by the 30th of March. The time for the payment of quorum dues is past, and yet but few have been heard from. Any who are coming to the Conference will bring theirs with them.

Matters for the consideration of the quorum should be in the hands of the secretary by the 25th of March.

It is decided that the first session of the quorum will be held the first day of April, at 7.30 p. m. On account of some very important matters to be decided, it is expected that a large majority of the quorum will be present, and that the spirit of solemnity may control the minds of the brethren, that indeed the meetings of the quorum may be recognized as a solemn assembly. The brethren should not forget the rule governing the members of the quorum in regard to their attendance at the quorum meetings.

Respectfully in Christ,

THE LAMONI STAKE.

We call attention to the article on the Lamoni Stake, by Elder John Smith, president of the stake, in this issue. We have received so many letters of inquiry regarding the stakes of the church and matters connected therewith, their numerical and spiritual strength, etc., that we have solicited several articles from people competent to answer the questions presented.

The founding of Lamoni and the early stages of its growth have been told by Elder Asa S. Cochran in recent numbers of the HERALD; the present situation is pretty well set forth in this issue; and Elder John Garver has in preparation an article on the work of the auxiliary societies in the stake. As soon as possible we expect to arrange for a series of articles dealing with the growth and present condition of the Independence Stake.

Bro. C. I. Carpenter has arranged some statistics setting forth the numerical strength of the Lamoni Stake and its various branches as follows:

The present membership of the Lamoni Stake, as shown by the church records, is 2,633, divided among 12 branches and 4 fragments in Iowa and 4 branches and 1 fragment in Missouri, or in all 16 branches, and 5 fragments or remnants of branches that have existed in the past but are now disorganized. The Lamoni Branch, of course, has the largest enrollment, 1,493; followed by Lucas, 176; Hiteman, 117; Evergreen, 113; Davis City, 106; the rest having less than 100 each.

The reports for 1901, when the stake was organized, showed a total membership for the stake of 2,284, showing a gain of 349 since that time. There has also been a gain in organized branches during that time of one in Iowa (Graceland), and 2 in Missouri (Pawnee and Oland).

Of the present membership of 2,633, at least 800 are reported as absent from their respective branches, many of whose whereabouts are unknown. In Lamoni, which has nearly 1,500 members enrolled, nearly 500 are absent, leaving only about 1,000 resident members.

In the stake there are 230 holding the various orders of the priesthood, among whom as standing ministers to the church in the branches are 53 elders, 57 priests, 36 teachers, and 34 deacons, the rest being high priests, seventies, and apostles.

While the foregoing are but dry figures, they have a story to tell, but I have neither the time nor inclination to sermonize, so leave each one to draw his own conclusions from the information furnished.

C. I. CARPENTER, Stake Recorder.

LAMONI, Iowa, January 27, 1908.

So use prosperity that adversity may not abuse thee: if in the one, security admits no fears, in the other, despair will afford no hopes; he that in prosperity can foretell a danger can in adversity foresee deliverance.—Quarles.

The foregoing statistics duplicate to an extent those presented by Bro. Smith in his article, yet there are some additional items brought out that may be of interest to our readers. It is natural that many should be looking toward the stakes of Zion, because they see in them prospective places of safety. In them must be worked out those principles that shall distinguish the church from the world.

Some may have been disappointed in the progress that the stakes have made; and some may be in a position, because of personal righteousness and good works, to criticise present conditions without fear of the criticism coming back on their own heads like a boomerang. Yet the average man must remember that the stakes are peopled by average individuals, like himself subject to the same temptations and failings that still hold him lower than the standard required of Zion builders. E. A. S.

TWO HANDICAPS.

An exchange has the excellent editorial on envy and despondency, quoted below. If it be true that the business man who envies and hates the man above him is working his own ruin, it is equally true of the man in the church who envies and hates a brother; we say it is equally true, and it stands out ten times more clearly than in the first instance.

If it be true that a man of the world ought not to become despondent and commit actual or figurative suicide because of past mistakes, it is equally true of the man in the church; he of all men ought to learn what can be learned from past errors and then set his face forward and go on.

We have often talked about "what makes success." Let us talk to-day about things that make failure.

Failure, like everything else, has many ingredients. It is a hash, containing all human weaknesses. In a man's failure there is, to begin with, heredity—faults of his ancestors against which he fails to fight.

There is procrastination—a vast amount of it. Putting things off has kept many a nose on the grindstone.

There is vanity. The man busy deceiving himself has little time for more useful effort.

There's suspicion—he who can't trust others will not have others trust him.

Intemperance, laziness, and a thousand other big and little defects are loaded up on the back of failure.

We have selected to-day for especial discussion jealousy, the father of millions of failures, and looking backward, which means wasting time and regret on that which is irrevocable.

Success, of course, means energy well applied. And anything that causes misapplication of energy, that makes men use their forces in a wrong direction, means failure, or diminished success at least.

"Jealousy is as cruel as the grave; the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame."—Song of Songs 8: 6.

Only the human being who has felt jealousy knows how well Solomon described it. It is a cruel fire, cruelly burning the jealous man or woman, cruel and relentless with the objects of its hatred.

We are not interested to-day in the jealousy based on affection. It would be useless to talk about that. To tell a man or a woman not to be jealous in matters of affection would be as foolish as asking Niagara to run the other way.

The jealousy that spells failure is the envious kind of jealousy. It is the jealousy that pulls men down hill . . .

Like every other passion in the brain, jealousy uses up force. The power a man expends in envying the man more successful than himself is power that could be used to bring him the success that he envies.

Jealousy is wasted power, and it is worse—it is a mental poison. No jealous man can see straight or think accurately. The world is distorted to him. He is mentally blind.

The hatred in a jealous eye is the hatred of foolishness, and, inevitably, failure goes with it.

It is spread everywhere among men, and it is as harmful as that "sleeping sickness" in Africa so much talked about.

Envy is not a thing that can not be overcome.

The important thing is for a man to realize that he has it in him, to realize how it benumbs his mind, how it absorbs the thinking power.

A man in a violent state of jealousy, which means hatred of the object envied, is actually changed from the top of his head to his feet. His heart works differently, his nerves and his blood are poisoned, his brain is cramped.

The smallest dose of this envious "sleeping sickness" can kill off the success of the ablest man.

How can we get rid of it? By realizing our own defects, by cultivating the habit of admiring instead of envying what others do. Jealousy and envy are weeds; they can be pulled up to make room for emulation and for the honest admiration of others, which is the basis of success in ourselves.

Wagner, the humble boy, conscious of great powers within himself from the very beginning, was almost hysterical in his admiration of the greater Beethoven. He made a pilgrimage on foot—a long and dreary road to Vienna—to look on Beethoven's face only once and express humbly his admiration of that great genius. That was the feeling of which the wonderful Wagner music was born. And Beethoven himself, sickly, the son of a brutal, drunken father—did he waste power envying others? No. The admiration that Wagner felt for Beethoven, Beethoven felt for Bach and other great men. He was an admirer of genius all his life. Envy was foreign to him. His energy went straight along the line of achievement and made of him the greatest musician the world has known.

In thousands of cases, big and little, you will find the same thing. Honest admiration of success builds men up. Jealousy pulls them down. . . .

The envious man exaggerates his own merit, thinks he isn't getting what he ought to have. The man sitting on the stone looking backward goes to the other extreme. As the jealous man wastes time envying others and blaming them, so this man looking backward wastes time blaming himself and regretting what can't be helped.

Power that should be devoted to the problem, "What shall I do to-morrow?" is wasted on the thought, "Why did I make that foolish mistake yesterday?"

How foolish a bird would look scratching, sorrowing on the edge of last year's battered nest! Birds are not so foolish. They go ahead and make a new nest and forget last year's nest.

But one big class of human failures is always in last year's nest. They think of a mistake made yesterday, and the week and the month and the year before. And the biggest mistake of all is worrying about past mistakes.

Every human being has behind him foolishness, failure, missed opportunities, mistakes almost as numerous as his days.

He also has ahead of him a clean slate, years that are still his.

One kind of man says, "Never mind about what has happened; that's over; what can I do to-morrow?" That's the kind of man who goes on.

The other man counts over the list of his various foolishnesses, like a string of precious beads. With each one there comes a depressing thought, deadening and discouraging. Power that would wipe out the mistakes is wasted in moaning over them.

"If only I hadn't done this! If I hadn't made that mistake! If I'd only known enough then—how lucky I should be to-day!" and so on, and so on, he growls and murmurs.

A good beating makes a man or it knocks all the courage out of him. Mistakes and failures make men or ruin them.

You can use your mistakes as stepping stones to success, or you can anchor yourself to them and gloat over them and stick with them for ever.

Fathers talking to their sons and mothers to their daughters can use these pictures and build good sermons on them. The end of the sermon is this:

Don't envy others; don't waste force or thought on success greater than your own. Cultivate admiration for achievement. That will develop achievement in you.

Don't fret about the past. The greatest of men have made failures, and dozens of them worse than any failure in your string. But at least they cut away from them, forgot them, refused to live with them, and they went to the top. You can do the same.

CLAIMS FOR THE SUPREMACY OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

At the investiture of the Pallium upon Archbishop William H. O'Connell, by Cardinal James Gibbons, at the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, in Boston, on January 29, a report of the proceedings is given in the Boston Herald for January 30, sent us by Bro. W. A. Sinclair, of Somerville, Massachusetts, the Very Reverend L. F. Kearney, O. P., preached a sermon from which we take the following excerpts. We present them for the purpose of showing the claim which the Catholic Church assumes to make. And viewing it as one of the many man-made churches, we are not surprised at the sweeping character of the claim which they make.

In treatises on ecclesiastical persons and ecclesiastical things we find this definition of the pallium: "It is the chief ornament of patriarchs and archbishops, and the symbol of the plenitude of the pastoral jurisdiction conferred upon them by the Holy See."

The pallium, then, is a sign, a symbol. It is symbolical of authority, power. In itself, materially considered, it is of no consequence. By reason of being a symbol it is elevated to the rank of holy things. The dignity or the sanctity of a sign is commensurate with the dignity and sanctity of that which it signifies. Therefore, in order to comprehend the significance of the ceremony of to-day, when a distinguished son of Holy Mother Church is invested with the pallium, it is necessary only to reflect upon the source of the power which it symbolizes, and exalted office of him to whom that power is given.

This emblem of power has been borne here, to the most modern of civilized countries, from the representative of the oldest and most august dynasty that the world has known.

Nineteen hundred years ago our Divine Savior, Jesus Christ, established a visible kingdom upon earth. He established a kingdom which was to exist for ever among all the nations, divided as they were to be, by territorial lines, political interests, national prejudice, and national pride. It was a supernatural kingdom designed to secure to men the spiritual blessing which he wished them to enjoy, and to guide them to the supernatural end to which they have been predestined.

He gave to that kingdom a constitution. He outlined for it a form of government. Reserving to himself the right of molding its policy and directing its destinies from the right hand of the Father, he appointed a visible head over it here below. He willed that his teachings should be understood and believed, and his precepts obeyed by all men of good will. And as he was not to remain on earth in visible presence to decide and define those teachings, it was necessary that he should appoint another to exercise that high and holy prerogative; it was necessary that he should place over his earthly kingdom a head, a visible sovereign vested with supreme authority—authority not only to pronounce in doctrinal matters, but to govern and to rule, to administer and control the world, embracing society and all its parts and all its members.

His kingdom was to be one. Unity was to be a distinguishing feature of it, an essential characteristic—unity of doctrine, unity of government, unity of sacramental institutions. It was, indeed, to be divided into territorial parts, as are the empires of men, but in the respects mentioned it was to know no such thing as division or separation of parts. The Divine Master revealed but one religious truth, or one body or system of religious truths, to the world, and he could authorize the teaching of no other without contradicting and stultifying himself.

Now the maintenance of such unity was impossible without a supreme head, without a center of unity. Had he not appointed such a head over his empire, and had not this head, by acknowledged rights and obligations, been enabled to exert an influence over each of its parts, those parts abandoned to themselves, would soon have taken a course of development contrary to each other, a course which would have led to the dissolution of the whole body. In a visible kingdom a visible head is necessary. If the appointment of rulers in particular districts in the universal body, represented by such head, exerted no decisive influence, then views inimical to the interests of the body would infallibly raise to the dignity of princes men who would destroy the common faith or permit its destruction.

These truths, so obvious to mere human minds, were infinitely more clear to the man God when he designed the foundation of his kingdom. Therefore he constituted a supreme head in that kingdom. He said to Peter: "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against her." He committed to him the custody of the entire flock of the faithful—the sheep as well as the lambs, the princes as well as the common people. He assured him of confirmation in the faith and charged him to confirm his brethren.

In the natural order of things—without a continued miracle—immediate and personal supervision over a realm so vast as that contemplated by the Redeemer, was impossible for one man. Therefore, in the divine plan that realm was, as has been intimated, to be divided into sections; and over each section or district a ruler was to be placed; a ruler deriving authority from the same divine source from which that of the Supreme Head was to emanate. To Peter was given pre-eminence, not of rank of dignity only, but of authority, over the other eleven. They were constituted his subjects. But even as divine jurisdiction over them and over the entire realm was given to Peter, so was direct, immediate authority conferred upon them with regard to all those who should by disposition of a special supernatural providence fall beneath their sway. The inhabited globe, or that part of it into which the Spirit of God led them was the territory or district of the apostles; the first rulers in the new kingdom. The organization of that kingdom once completed, their successors were to exercise divinely given jurisdiction over the limited districts assigned to them by Christ's supreme vicar, the successor of Peter.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF ELDER R. C. EVANS.

The editors are in receipt of a copy of the Autobiography of Elder R. C. Evans. This is a book newly issued by the Advertiser Printing Company, London, Ontario. It is a book of 358 pages, with a preface from the pen of President Joseph Smith. The author tells the story of his life from his birth until November 5, 1907, where the story ends with the opening of the winter's work in Toronto. The book sells for one dollar, cloth binding, and must be ordered directly from Bro. Evans, whose address is 474 Adelaide Street, London, Ontario.

GENERAL CHURCH ITEMS.

Apostle Cornelius A. Butterworth, lately arrived from Australia, writes as follows from Sioux City, Iowa: "Just a line to say that I had a most pleasant and peaceful voyage across the ocean, and came safely out of a wrecked train and smash up of engine and mail car on the Canadian line, and am now spending a few days with Saints and relatives in this city. I called and inspected our new church at Honolulu, which is a great credit to the few Saints there. Had a very interesting talk with Bro. Waller, whom I had never met before. The work there is progressing favorably under his wise counsel, with the faithful assistance of others. If nothing unforeseen occurs, I will be at Independence in time to look on and see how my quorum does its work."

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

Father Leo Heinrichs, a Franciscan monk, of the St. Elizabeth's Church, Denver, Colorado, was shot and killed during the six o'clock mass, Sunday morning, February 23. He had just administered the sacrament to his assassin, Giuseppe Alio, an Italian. The murderer claimed that he committed the deed because of persecutions that he suffered at the hands of the clergy, in Italy, after he had abandoned Catholicism and united with a Protestant church. When the person of the priest was prepared for burial, evidences that the days of self torture are not passed came to light, thus described by the Denver News, February 25:

"Evidence of the strictest adherence to the tenets of his faith, even to the following of the most ancient customs of the fathers of the Franciscan order, was found upon the person of Father Leo, slain at the altar of St. Elizabeth's Church Sunday morning by Giuseppe Alio, in the shape of penance chains, consisting of a steel discipline girdle and similar armlets. These ringed bands are provided with sharp hoops to pierce the flesh, and their like has never before been seen in Denver. None of Father Leo's associates ever had seen these instruments of self-torture, for they are not customarily worn by members of religious orders in the United States of the present day. Several of the priests to whom they were shown exclaimed in wonder that a man could be so thoroughgoing in the pursuit of the tenets of the faith as to submit himself to the physical torture of such an instrument of penance. Many remarked that they supposed such customs and girdles had passed away in the Middle Ages. But they gazed upon the chains with reverence and admiration for the man who thus submitted to the mortification of the flesh for the purification of the soul. Father Leo's associates hold the chains as still further proof of the extreme sanctity of the servant of the church who so tragically met his end while performing his religious duties. At the intersection of the rings in both the armlets and the girdles are sharp hooks, so facing as to press into the flesh upon each movement of the wearer. The girdle for the full distance that it traversed the abdomen of the wearer is dull red with the stains of blood, and gives evidence that it must have been in use for years. Whether Father Leo wore the penance chains upon all occasions or only when upon the altar never will be known.

The Versailles Republican (Indiana) of recent date had the following notice of the work of Bro. John Zahnd, who is an ardent temperance worker: "A temperance meeting will be held at the Baptist church Thursday evening, the leading feature of which will be an address by John Zahnd, traveling salesman for a well-known implement firm of Louisville, Kentucky. Mr. Zahnd is well known in Milan. Come out and hear the great temperance question discussed from a 'drummer's' point of view. Everybody welcome. No admission will be charged."

The Emporia Gazette (Kansas) has this to say of a proposed State wide revival campaign:

"A good deal of valuable advertising is being obtained, without money and without price, by the diligent gentlemen who are organizing a year-long campaign against wickedness in Kansas. There reformers propose to organize an army of evangelists and start a sort of holy war, with the assistance of the regular pastors in the various communities.

Every nook and corner of the State will be subjected to the cleansing process, and it is hoped to break all records in the matter of saving souls, to the greater glory of the professional evangelists. The regularly established ministers who labor in the vineyard all the year round, doing their best to help people along paths elysian, are almost as easily worked as editors, and few of them will have nerve enough to decline to go cahoots with the visiting evangelists in this great work of renovating the morals of Kansas. The local preacher, when one of these spiritual campaigns is on, is expected to take a back seat in his own church, and look as though he enjoyed it when the fluent visitor rants at the congregation and scares people into repentance. The visitor gets all the credit for everything that is accomplished; the home preacher is permitted to sweep out the church after the meetings. It is a question whether the spectacular revival, engineered by outsiders, does any permanent good to anybody but the outsiders; it certainly does no good to the home preacher, who usually suffers by contrast with the frenzied orators, and who usually finds a slump in his congregation when the fury and the tumult have died away. Most towns have all the preachers and churches they really need, and these preachers are almost invariably good, earnest men, who do their work sanely and without tinkling cymbals and sounding brass. They teach both by precept and example; they are neighbors with everybody, and prosper or suffer with the community. It should be their privilege to gather in the stray sheep, and they'll do it eventually, even if they don't use a bass drum for the purpose."

The Straight Road

NEW REVELATION; IS IT NECESSARY?

Does God reveal himself to-day? If not, why?

Objector.—Because he has given us the Bible, which contains enough, and he said no more was to be added.

Answer.—He never said that no more was to be added. He said in Revelation 22, "If any man shall add unto these things." The Deity thus leaves himself free to do as he pleases. "These things," has reference to the book of Revelation which John was just concluding on Patmos; the Bible not having been compiled till about 397, A. D. Why would God reveal himself to his people whenever he had a people from Adam down to John, covering a period of over four thousand years, and then all at once become so different and decide to speak to man no more?

If we go back to the antediluvian world we find that God revealed himself to the different men, as Adam, Cain, Enoch, and finally Noah. By Noah there was an important work to be done. How did he find out his duty? By a persual of the revelations that had been made to Adam or to some of his predecessors only? No. How then? Why, by immediate and direct revelation from God. We come to Abraham: how did he learn that the Lord wanted him to leave his native home and journey to a strange land? Did he learn it by recourse to the revelations God had made to Noah and his other predecessors? Undoubtedly he had access to them, for we have access to them at a much later period of time; and Jude in his day (see Jude) makes a quotation from Enoch relative to the second coming of Christ. Of course Abraham was familiar with the revelations God had made to those prior to his day; but did he by an appeal to the same learn what the Lord required of him? No. How then? Most decidedly, by new and direct revelation from heaven.

We come to Moses: how did he learn his duty? He departed from Egypt and escaped into Midian and was there till he was eighty years of age ere he found out that God wanted him to return and deliver Israel. But how did he find it out? Was it through the revelations that God had made to Abraham, to Noah, to Adam? No; only by direct communication from the Almighty.

Soon afterward Israel is brought to Sinai and receives the law, the ten commandments and the ceremonial code, which is placed in the ark of the covenant. It is said that when the New Testament church was established and the gospel system revealed there was no more need for revelation. Likewise we would expect that when the Old Testament church was established and the old covenant revealed, that revelation would cease also, in at least while that code remained in force. But did it? was such the case? O, no! On the other hand God revealed himself to them and had prophets among them, not only during the period of their wanderings after they left Sinai, but for the four hundred years of the judgeship, also during the hundreds of years of the kingship.

We come down to the time of Christ and find that revelations were given both before and after his ascension, to his disciples. While he was with them he personally ministered to their necessities. After his departure he still kept in communication with them "through the Holy Ghost." (Acts 1:2.) We observe that these things were not restricted to the apostles, but we see by reading the epistles and Acts that all the members were entitled to and enjoyed the revelations of the Holy Spirit inasmuch as they lived worthily. (See 1 Corinthians 12 and 14.)

The nature of these revelations may be said to be: 1. Individual. 2. Congregational. 3. Universal. That is, some of them applied to only one individual; others to a congregation of individuals; others still to all mankind, hence universal. "Repent and be baptized" (Acts 2), is universal. "Thou hast lost thy first love" (Revelation 2), is congregational, for it had in view only the church at Ephesus. "Take the young child and his mother and flee into Egypt" (Matthew 2), is individual, because it applies only to one man, Joseph.

If, then, we be asked why we believe in present day revelation, we answer: Because the same want, the same demand, that it supplied in Bible times still occurs. Many revelations were circumstantial in their nature in that they called men to the ministry; pointed out their duties; comforted, reproved, and taught the church; and unfolded to the church the future. And so long as the church is ignorant of the future, in need of comfort, reproof, and teaching, so long as men need to be called to the ministry and their special duties assigned, just so long will the church be unable to subsist without revelation. It is extremely absurd to think that God would be in continual communication with his people for four thousand years and then suddenly cease. We admit he ceased, but, as John Wesley observes, "Because the Christians turned heathens again and had only a dead form left." No revelation, no Holy Spirit, for the very office-work of the Holy Spirit was to "bring things to remembrance," to "show things to come" (John 14 and 16). No one can know "that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost" (1 Corinthians 12: 3), and it "is life eternal that they might know" (John 17: 3). Again, Jesus said if they did his will they would know. (See John 7: 17.) Prophets and revelation are inseparable, and 1 Corinthians 12: 28 says that God set prophets in the church; and Ephesians 4: 8-13 says that they were for the perfecting of the saints, and to continue "till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ." It was by revelation that the church sought to select Matthias (Acts 1); that they knew of the coming famine (Acts 11: 27, 28); that Cornelius was directed to send for Peter (Acts 10: 5), and that Peter was directed to go to him (Acts 10: 19); that they were told to repeal circumcision (Acts 15: 28); that Paul and associates were forbidden to go into Asia or Bithynia and told to go into Macedonia. These manifestations were peculiarly circumstantial in their nature, and who is there but what can see that the same or similar circumstances may arise to-day; that to-day there might be some place where God would prefer for the time being that his servants should not go, and some other place where he would prefer that they should go? Original Articles

CONCERNING THE LAMONI STAKE.

ELDER JOHN SMITH.
President of the Lamoni Stake.

Editors Herald: In response to your request for an article on the Lamoni Stake, in which you desire an answer to eight questions, I hereby make an effort to do so, by taking them in the order in which you have made them.

1. "The present condition of the Lamoni Stake."

This will be better understood at the close of this article than it will be at the beginning.

2. "What is its spiritual condition?"

Taking a broad view of the situation, it would not be proper to say that it is at its best, because, in mortal conditions, that is, during this earth life, there will always be room for additional improvement. No matter how near we get to our heavenly Father, there will be the opportunity to get "Closer, still closer to thee"; "it requires a constant labor his precepts to obey"; for there is no place where we can stop and be safe.

The writer believes that the close observer among the Saints can see a gradual and steady gain in spiritual development, to those higher conditions to which the Lord by his Spirit is constantly seeking to lead his people to occupy, so that they may be as "a city set upon a hill."

3. "How many branches?"

There are sixteen branches,—names and locations as follows:

a. Lamoni, Decatur County, Iowa, membership.....	1,493
b. Pleasanton, Decatur County, Iowa, membership. . .	99
c. Davis City, Decatur County, Iowa, membership.....	106
d. Greenville, Decatur County, Iowa, membership.....	52
e. Leon, Decatur County, Iowa, membership.....	39
f. Evergreen, Decatur County, Iowa, membership.....	113
g. Lucas, Lucas County, Iowa, membership.....	176
h. Cleveland, Lucas County, Iowa, membership.....	79
i. Centerville, Appanoose County, Iowa, membership...	52
j. Hiteman, Monroe County, Iowa, membership.....	117
k. Wirt, Ringgold County, Iowa, membership.....	36
l. Graceland, Lucas County, Iowa, membership.....	22
m. Allendale, Worth County, Missouri, membership....	86
n. Lone Rock, Harrison County, Missouri, membership.	82
o. Pawnee, Harrison County, Missouri, membership....	33
p. Oland, Harrison County, Missouri, membership....	30
Fragments of former branches before the stake was organized.....	18
Total	2,633

When the stake was organized in 1901, the membership was 2,284; the gain to 1908 is 349.

The stake consists of eight counties in Iowa, and three in Missouri, as follows: Decatur, Ringgold, Wayne, Appanoose, Lucas, Monroe, Union, Clark, in the state of Iowa; Harrison, Mercer, Worth, in the state of Missouri.

4. "Their condition?"

Lamoni Branch being the center of the stake, it should be the leading one to which the church could look with a good degree of satisfaction. Its advantages are the best in the stake because of its present surroundings. The college being located here, it brings a large class of young people, principally members of the church, from other places. This winter the enrollment is the largest of its history; and the most of these being in touch with the church, and attendants at Sunday-school, Religio, young people's prayer-meeting and the musical society,—these conditions are all helpful in the spiritual growth of the young.

Residence in Lamoni offers the following opportunities for church life: Sunday morning, Sabbath-school; eleven o'clock, preaching; afternoon, prayer and testimony-meeting, with sacrament the first Sunday of each month; Monday evening, Sunday-school teachers' meeting for the study of the lesson; Tuesday evening, young people's prayer-meeting, in charge of young men who are devoted and deeply interested in the welfare of the young; also on the same evening, a cottage prayer-meeting on the east side of the town; Wednesday evening, prayer-meeting; Thursday evening, prayer-meeting in each of the Saints' Homes; also choir practice in the church; Friday evening, Religio; Sunday evenings there is preaching in each of the Saints' Homes, and on one evening of the week in each of these Homes, there is a class for the study of the Book of Mormon, in charge of competent teachers. If these privileges are improved, it has a tendency to hinder Satan from "finding some mischief still for idle hands to do."

In addition to these, there are the Daughters of Zion, the Mite Society, and one or more select literary societies, all under the direction of good sisters. There is always room for willing and devoted workers in Lamoni.

Pleasanton Branch is located about fifteen miles from Lamoni; a small railroad town, with a church building owned by our people, and presided over by Elder Duncan Campbell. They have regular meetings, with Sunday-school and Religio. The business of this place is chiefly farming.

Davis City Branch is a small railroad town about seven miles from Lamoni, James McDiffit, presiding elder. Our people here own a church building, have regular meetings, and a Sunday-school, and an effort is being made to have a Religio; business, farming.

Greenville Branch is about five miles from Lamoni; Bro. Nephi Lovell, president. Our people own a church building here. They have regular meetings, Sunday-school and Religio. They also have preaching-services some time during each month at the Jack Wood's Schoolhouse, and in a schoolhouse at New Buda; business, farming.

Leon Branch is in the county-seat of Decatur County, a railroad junction. Our people own a church building here, and the branch is in charge of Elder Duncan Campbell. Some years since there was a flourishing branch at this place, but removals from there have left the branch without sufficient persons to properly serve the branch. This place is about eighteen miles from Lamoni; business, farming.

Evergreen Branch is about six miles from Lamoni. They own the church building here; David D. Young, presiding elder. Have regular services, Sunday-school and Religio; also a young people's prayer-meeting; business, farming; nearest railroad point, Lamoni.

Lucas Branch is on the main line of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad, between Chicago and the West. This branch owns a church building; Parley Batten, presiding elder over regular services, Sunday-school and Religio. The chief business of the past was coal-mining; but the prospects of the present and future for its continuance are very poor, the mine being closed.

Cleveland Branch is in a mining town three miles from Lucas, on the same railway line. Our people own a church building here; Edward J. Giles, president. They hold regular services, with Sunday-school and Religio. Prospects here for a continuance of work are poor; reports are that the mine will close.

Centerville Branch is located in a prosperous mining town, population several thousand, with a number of coal mines in the immediate vicinity; three railroads through the town. Our people own the church building; Elder George T. Angell, president. A number of the brethren are miners. Regular services are held; also Sunday-school and Religio.

Hiteman Branch is in a coal-mining town three miles from the main line of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad. The church building of the Saints here was enlarged this winter to meet the demands of increased interest and attendance; Elder William Williams, president. They hold regular services, Sunday-school and Religio.

Wirt Branch is located in Ellston, a railroad town in Ringgold County, Iowa, the name of the town having been changed since the branch was organized. There is a need of more branch officers; their meetings are held in a schoolhouse; a preacher being sent to them every two weeks, weather conditions permitting; business, farming.

Graceland Branch is located several miles from railroads, and ten miles north from Lucas. Saints own a church building; Elder John R. Evans, president. They have regular services here, with Sunday-school and Religio; business, farming.

Allendale Branch is in an inland town, about seven miles from the railroad. Our people have a church building here; but they do not have sufficient help to carry on regular meetings; business, farming.

Lone Rock Branch is in an inland town, several miles from the railroad. The Saints own a church building; Elder Price McPeck, president. They hold regular services, with Sunday-school and Religio; business, farming.

Pawnee Branch. This is an inland town, several miles from the railroad; Bro. Frank P. Hitchcock, president. They have regular meetings in a hall; also hold Sunday-school and Religio; business, farming.

Oland Branch was organized October, 1907; Elder Richard S. Salyards, president. A church building is owned here by our people where they have regular services and Sunday-school; business, farming. Several miles from the railroad.

5. "What is being done in missionary work?"

Not all that could be desired, for lack of material; but we believe we are doing very well under the circumstances, with room for constant improvement. There are some counties in the stake where the work has not secured a permanent hold. There are five points within a radius of ten miles from Lamoni, where regular services are held, being supplied with local ministers from Lamoni, and their efforts and work in this direction are very commendable.

6. "How is the stake organized, etc.?" See Book of Rules, page 104, chapter 15, article, "Stakes":

The organizations of stakes are formed under the direct command of the Lord. (Doctrine and Covenants 117:11; 125:10.) They are for the purpose of bringing the Saints nearer together in their work and the more complete systematizing and honoring of the law of Christ in spiritual and temporal duties, than is found provided for in branch and district organizations. They are defined in the law to be "for the curtains, or the strength of Zion."

The organization of a stake consists of a stake presidency composed of three high priests, one of whom shall be known as president, the others as counselors, ordained and set apart for this purpose; a high council known as the stake high council, composed of twelve high priests duly ordained to act as members of the council, presided over by the stake presidency; a stake bishopric consisting of a bishop and two counselors duly ordained to their respective positions; and a secretary and recorder.

The duties of the stake presidency are to preside over the branch in "the city of the stake" or seat of organization; have immediate charge and oversight of the general spiritual work in the stake, subject to the advice and direction of the general church officers who have general control of the work everywhere by virtue of their office, or special appointment; and look after the welfare and discipline of the members within the confines of the stake.

The high council of a stake is the highest judicial body of the stake, and in addition to its work as an advisory board, in both spiritual and temporal matters of the work within the stake, it also has jurisdiction as an appellate court within the stake, to which appeals may be taken from the findings of the stake bishop's court, where matters have not been settled by that court "to the satisfaction of the parties."

The stake bishop is the chief financial officer within the stake, having immediate charge and oversight of the stake finances, subject to the advice and direction of the Presiding Bishop and trustee of the church, as per Doctrine and Covenants 122:6; he is also a judicial officer, the stake bishop's court having original and appellate jurisdiction of cases of a local character within the stake. Appeals from the action or decision of a stake bishop's court are made to the high council of the stake, and in case of failure of settlement or dissatisfaction by either party with the decision of said council, appeal may be had to the High Council of the church.

The duties of the recorder and secretary of a stake are common to those of like officers in branch and district organizations.

An organized stake may contain within its territory a number of branches organized according to the rules governing the establishment and organization of branches of the church in organized territory; and the duties of branch officers within organized stakes are parallel with those of like officers in other branches and districts of the church.

Change of officers in a stake.—If from any cause a vacancy should occur in the offices of president or bishop of stake, the general officers of the church, whose duty it is to organize and set in order stakes, shall direct in the selection and ordination of the officer to fill such vacancy.

Rules.—The scriptures and the church articles and covenants, with the rules adopted by the church for the conduct of business and guidance of officers and assemblies, shall be the order and guide in the transaction of business within a stake.

"The general officers of the church, whose duty it is to organize and set in order stakes," as mentioned in paragraph 175, are the First Presidency and Twelve. (See General Conference Minutes, 1901, page 414, by "substitute unanimously adopted"), and changes made in the president and bishop of stakes should come through this channel, and then be submitted to a representative body of the stake for approval or otherwise. This is the present rule.

7. "What are its needs?"

One of its important and pressing needs is that all the members of the stake presidency and stake bishopric should devote as much of their time as possible to stake work, providing the proper authorities can furnish the needed support for their families, and if there are hindering causes that prevent them giving their whole time, arrangements should be made whereby some of their time could be devoted to this purpose.

This would give us six men available for work; and surely both the spiritual and temporal interests of the work would receive constant care; and under this condition, if all could not give their entire time, some one belonging to each branch of the service would be constantly moving among the people, and thus better efforts to feed the flock would be assured.

Under present church conditions, if the above plan was given a trial, the missionaries that are now put in stakes could labor elsewhere, because the best results of labor should follow from those who are in close touch with stake authorities. Whatever methods are adopted, we shall continue to do the best we can, leaving the results with him for whom we labor, and to whom we must render an account of our work.

8. "Is it a good place to locate?"

We answer, Yes, for farmers and coal-miners. It will be seen by what we have written that the stake is located within a profitable and productive farming section of the country, in close touch with railroad lines, with easy access to ready markets, where produce can be disposed of for either cash or trade. Public schools for the education of children are within easy reach, and this all parents should wisely consider so that their children may have the best opportunities for education available, and that they may be well fitted for the battle and struggle of life.

It will be seen by the location of the branches within the stake, that church privileges are excellent for both parents and children, and this combination of the spiritual and temporal conditions for those who love God and desire to keep his commandments, can not fail to produce those results which all good people love to enjoy.

The best places for coal-miners in the stake are Centerville and Hiteman.

There are a number of mines in the vicinity of Centerville, and the coal of that section is in great demand for domestic use, with three railroads entering the town, that make it easy for distribution to market. The public schools are excellent, as is also a modern high school, from which scholars can graduate to become teachers. (There is at the present time a scarcity of teachers for the public schools in the state of Iowa.) They have a public library, also paved streets, and sewers, electric street lights, and electric cars that pass the Saints' church; homes may be rented or bought at reasonable prices, or land may be bought and persons build their own homes. Several of the brethren who are miners own their residences. Free delivery of letters. Centerville is the county-seat of Appanoose County, which had a population in 1903 of 25,927, and the population of Centerville at the same date was 5,256. The population has since increased both in county and town. (See Cram's Atlas of the World, 1903.)

Hiteman is situated in Monroe County and joins the main line of the Burlington railroad by a spur track that connects at Tower 307. This is four miles from Albia, the county-seat of Monroe County, and three miles from the Tower.

During the past year a good many additional miners have found work at Hiteman; and in the vicinity of Albia there are many coal-mines. The population of this county in 1903 was 17,985, and that of the county-seat, Albia, was 2,289. Both have received additions since then. (See Cram's Atlas of the World, 1903.)

Within the stake there are no large workshops where men, women, and children are constantly employed. There are a few small ones, but their number is limited. This is the reason that farming and mining are the two chief kinds of occupation within the stake, and both of these have been profitable to the Saints when properly conducted.

So far as the writer knows, the United States free rural routes pass through all the towns mentioned where the railroads do not touch, also telephone lines, so that residents can be in close connection with business centers every day.

The following taken from Cram's Atlas of the World, 1903, gives the population in the county, and the population at the county-seat. These have increased since then.

COUNTY.	POPULATION.	COUNTY-SEAT.	POPULATION.
Union	19,928	Creston	7,752
Ringgold	15,325	Mount Ayr	1,500
Decatur	18,115	Leon	1,905
Lucas	16,126	Chariton	3,987
Wayne	17,491	Corydon	1,477
Monroe	17,985	Albia	2,889
Appanoose	25,927	Centerville	5,256
Clark	12,440	Osceola	2,505
Worth	9,832	Grant City	1,406
Harrison	24,398	Bethany	1,500
Mercer	14,706	Princeton	1,575

Any further information will be willingly furnished on application to either the presidency or bishopric of the stake.

JOHN SMITH.

LAMONI, Iowa, February 8, 1908.

MAN'S DUTY.

SERMON BY ELDER HEMAN C. SMITH, LAMONI, IOWA,
JUNE 16, 1907.

(Reported by L. A. Gould.)

Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth: but I say unto you, That ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also. And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain. Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away. Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy: but I say unto you, Love your enemies, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth the rain on the just and on the unjust. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so? Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.—Matthew 5: 38-48.

There is a thought in this that I want to present if I can. I have hesitated this morning to present it, because of the magnitude of the subject, and the realization of the fact that I can not reach its height, I can not delve to its depth, can not even think, doubtless, of its scope; and yet for reasons which I need not explain, I have decided to present it, or so much of it as I may be able to present. The thought is the principle involved that we should have love for and an interest in all mankind. I shall not try to say how far that interest shall extend, or how deep that love shall be; for I know no limitation. So far as I have been able to comprehend and think out the subject there seems to be no limitation; but we are expected to use our utmost endeavor, all that in us is, all that in us shall be after our development from time to time, for the good of mankind.

Selfishness is to be lost sight of. We are to consider ourselves simply as a part of the grand whole; not as a separate part, but as a component part. So far as our interests agree with the interests of mankind, they should be considered; so far as our interests are separate from others they are not to be considered. In fact, they are not our interests. We may think that our interests are separate from others; but it is not true. We are mistaken if we have thought such a thing as that. Therefore we must not think of ourselves alone, only as a part of the grand whole, and the development of ourselves, that it should be along lines that will benefit others. That seems to me to be the spirit of our lesson, and the spirit of the Christ as manifested in all his teachings. It was the spirit of the Master when, in Gethsemane, he prayed as he did, not only for those who had been with him, and been his companions in his ministry, he not only asked that they might be sanctified through his truth, (his word was truth,) but giving his mind a broader scope he remembered every one else beside them. He remembered you and me, all future generations, and prayed, saying as recorded here: "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word; that they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that thou hast sent me."

This seems to indicate to me that there can be no real separation. And I have thought, sometimes, that the world will never be happy, or any portion of it will never be fully happy, while there is a soul that is lost. I have no sympathy with a religion that separates us in eternity, no more than I have with a religion that separates our interests here. I believe we shall be fully and completely happy when the whole human race shall be redeemed. I think I need not pursue that any farther, or I may not be called orthodox; but it occurs to me right here that that being the principle upon which our gospel is builded, that being the mission of the Master to save, before the world is fully happy and enjoying to the fullest extent its privileges, we must be saved, and our interests being connected with the interests of others, they also must be saved. I may sometime change my mind in regard to that; but I have seen no reason for doing so yet. Whether we carry it into eternity or not, it is our duty to make it applicable here so far as it is possible for us to do so. Not only in religious matters, but in all other matters that pertain to duty in this life.

I have heard people try to separate their duties. I once heard an individual say that he believed his first, second, and third duty. That duty is one, indistinct—no, I got that wrong. His first duty, he said, was to God, and his second duty to his family, and the third to society, and so on. I don't know how many duties he had; but it set me thinking in regard to it, and I concluded, the more I thought about it, that it was wrong; that there was no such thing as first, second, and third duty. That duty is one, indistinct, and when completed comprehends everything that a man ought to do. I can not do my duty toward my God and neglect my duty to my family. I can not neglect my duty to society, and do my duty toward my family, for my family is a part of society. And if I do that which is for the good of one, I must do that which is for the good of the other. If I serve God I must enlist under the influence and the spirit in which he enlists; I must be willing, so far as lies in my power, to carry out the idea expressed in the language: "He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth the rain on the just and on the unjust." So far as God shall give me power, I say, so far as my influence extends, this should be my effort, if I am in the spirit of the gospel of Jesus Christ—do good to all men.

And if this principle were carried out in all our dealings with men, there would be many of the difficulties that confront us, and the questions that are to be solved by the community, by the government, solved by individual effort. An individual, for instance, in business, should not enter into it for his own good. If I contemplate going into business in this community, or any other, while remuneration is necessary under present condition, and while I should consider whether the remuneration will be sufficient to supply my wants or not, I have no right to consider that alone. I must consider, if I am honest and a Christian, whether my services to the community will be sufficient to recompense them for the remuneration they give me. If I conclude that though I may get good remuneration out of it, I am doing no good to the community; as a Christian, as an honest man, I should not enter into it, though it might enrich me. No man ought to be willing to take more than he will give. He should be all the time thinking about whether he can do something to recompense those who are doing for him, or not.

Take that principle into business, and it would do away with the liquor traffic, and there would not be the temperance question to be settled. It would do away with all the houses of bad repute. Everything that does the community harm would be done away by individual effort, by the application of this Christian principle that we do what we can to cause the sun to shine upon the evil and the good, and the rain to fall upon the just and upon the unjust. The employee would not be willing to take more wages than he could earn. The employer would not be willing that an individual should work for less than he earns. And all these questions of an economical nature would be settled by individual effort, and they would need no law. And I am of the opinion that they will never be settled by legislative enactment, neither will they be settled by revolution. We shall not settle them by resorting to arms. We shall not settle them by saying, Thou shalt, and Thou shalt not. But we shall settle them, if they are settled, by preaching the pure principles of truth, the principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ, and making them applicable to men, and applying them ourselves, so far as it lies within our power to do.

This disposition fostered and encouraged among men, and applied to all the different departments of human experience, will bring about that happy result when men shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning-hooks, and men shall not learn war any more. Only by the application of this Christ principle can this be brought about.

I admire, and have admired ever since I heard it, the answer made by an historic individual of the past generation—almost the present generation,—though a rebel to the Government in one sense of the word, according to our interpretation of it, though taking up arms against the government of the United States, which we believe to be the best government among men. I admire the principle that he advocated when, after the war was over and he was approached by some of the corporations of the East, large insurance companies that we have heard so much about lately, where men have taken princely salaries—more than they could earn. He was approached and was offered an immense amount of money if he would serve them in the capacity of an officer of their company. He said, "Gentlemen, I can not earn it. I am not competent to earn that salary." They said, "Never mind that, whether you earn it or not, your influence in the South is worth that to us." He said, "What little influence I have in the South is not for sale." That is the right principle. That individual was Robert E. Lee. I think if that principle had been carried out in business since, if men who had been approached upon such subjects as this had frankly said, "I can not earn it," and if it were urged upon them, had said, "What influence I have is not for sale," we would have a better condition of things now than we have.

We may not all have the opportunity that he had—may not be offered to us on so large a scale as it was to him. He was beloved by the South, and they wanted his influence with the people that loved him. Our influence is demanded oftentimes, whether it is as extensive as was Lee's or not, and we are approached in one way or another to sell our influence. It may sometimes seem legitimate to us. The individual who is employing us says that it is worth that to him; but if we can not earn it, why take it? It is ill-gotten gain. Let this principle be once established among men, or let business be done upon that principle, as well as everything else, and we will have a better state of affairs than we have, and that which has seemed so strange to us will then seem natural, which it is.

When we read here the statements of the Master in regard to how we are to conduct ourselves, we think it strange. Men are ready to say it is contrary to nature. I have said, and I repeat it here, that when a man says that these statements, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor," and not only that, "Thou shalt love thine enemy," are not natural, I have said, and I say it again, It is he that is not natural. This is natural. It is the highest development of the nature of man. It is our perverted natures that rebel. In the beginning it was not so, and love ran through all creation, it seems to me. And a great deal of confidence was exercised in those days, I am sure. For whatever was told our foreparents they had confidence in. They believed it though it was told by the serpent—they seemed to take it in all right. But that was an uneducated confidence, of course. This experience enabled them afterwards to judge between the evil and the good better than they could at first; and that education was necessary to their highest development. We ought to exercise the same simple love that they had for all, to the extent that we try to do good to those who are in error. And if you love a person who is in error you will try to do him good. You will not hate them because they do wrong. Your interest will be awakened in them more than in those that do right.

It has been thought that the way to bliss and happiness, the way to success, and the way to a share in that glad millennium when all shall be peace and happiness, is for men to agree, absolutely and entirely agree. And in order that they may be Christian it has been honestly thought that force must be brought to bear to make men accept the right. I trust that time is past, now, for ever. Men have been put to torture; they have been burned at the stake, in order that they might be forced to recant their errors and accept the truth. I think people who did that were honest perhaps, and thought that was the way to do it. They thought that this difference of opinion in the world was bringing about a bad result. Better punish a few men right now and get them in rein, than to let it spread and hurt so many people. That was the idea. They were mistaken. The man that agrees with you does not do you very much good. Not unless you are discouraged. If you feel like fainting, or something of that kind, the man who puts his arm beneath you and holds you up and encourages you, and tells you that you are right, does you a great deal of good. We often need that. I would not discourage agreement when agreement really exists; but when it does not exist, what then? There is no use of trying to make it appear that it does exist. That does no good. It is the man who comes out against your theory, the man who comes against your position hard that makes you think. He does you good. He stirs you up, and you investigate. And if you find that you are right and he is wrong, you are all the better for it. You are better established after that investigation than you were before. If he had said, That is all right, I agree with you, you would not have investigated any further. You would have felt flattered a little; may be you would have been encouraged a little, too. It is all right, if you agree with him to tell him so, encourage him in the thought if you believe as he does. If you do not believe as he does you may do him good after all to tell him that. If he is right you will do him good, because he will examine his position more carefully after he heard your position than he had before, and he will be established; and it will do you good. You will go to work to prove and show where his error was, and you will fail, and it will do you good along that line.

There is about as much accomplished, anyhow, in this world by failure as there is by success. I do not mean success in the true sense of the word; for success in the true sense of the word is succeeding in the right. But I mean there is about as much gained by failing in doing what we want to do as there is in succeeding in attaining what we want to attain. Because when we fail to do what we want to do, sometimes we learn that it would not have been the best if we had done it; we made a mistake. And to make a mistake and strive to do something that is not the best thing to do, and fail, is a good thing for us, if we will only learn by it.

But our interests, as I said before, should be, and if we are really and truly followers of the meek and lowly One will be, to educate all mankind. Our life is small. Our influence is limited, very limited; but it exists. There is no individual without influence. And I would say that if we are the followers of Jesus Christ, we will let that light shine upon the just and upon the unjust, we will let the refreshing shower of that influence fall upon the good and upon the evil. That is our mission in this world.

Somehow I have an idea—I can not tell you where I got it; but I am going to express it—that there is enough of everything that man needs in this world to supply every demand; that there has been, in the economy of God, provision made for every want, and the very existence of the want provides the way for the supply. The trouble is, sometimes where want continues to exist in one department or another, conditions are not normal, environment is not what it ought to be, conditions and regulations have been tampered with by men, and some are absorbing more than they need, and others go without. There is enough for all. Our heavenly Father supplied enough for all. It is all here. And under the Christian system, though it is sometimes hard to work out the details, this provision will be made. God in nature, so far as we are able to discover, has provided a supply for every demand. He would not have created the eye, had he not created light to illumine it. He would not have created the ear, had he not created means for the transmission of sound. A supply is created for every demand that there is, every legitimate demand at least, among men; and the illegitimate demands are simply perverted legitimate ones. The things we call lust, desires for wrong, are perverted tastes that if they had been directed aright would have been legitimate. They have been perverted, and this perversion must be overcome. If our tastes and inclinations are in the right direction, then will the Spirit of the Master prevail with us, recognizing the fact that we are but a part of humanity, not a separate and distinct part which must have special favors; but we will work out the problem of human redemption, and we will settle the problem of political economy, and every other question that comes to man for solution. No question in my mind in regard to that.

The gospel of Jesus Christ has to some extent remedied the evils that have crept into the world through perversion and through wrong-doing. I say, to some extent. When I use these qualifying words, "to some extent," I do not mean to limit the influence of the gospel; but I mean to say that the application has been limited or all evil would have been eradicated. The principle is there. It is the business of the church to apply that principle more particularly than anybody else, because they have been enabled to see it. God has organized his church for that purpose. He has called it into existence for the purpose of applying the principles of human redemption, the principles of human relief among men.

Sickness came into the world. Death has come. The gospel is here particularly to overcome them. When evil was operating in the world, and the Lord Jesus sent his representatives to go out and preach the word of God, he not only told them to preach the ordinances of the gospel, but he said, I give unto you power over unclean spirits to cast them out. Still this influence of evil is in the world. To heal all manner of sicknesses and diseases, so that the evil that comes upon man physically was overcome, was partly realized through the gospel. And I say partly, because the application has been only in part. The principle itself, if applied fully, would relieve it entirely. We expect that to come. We have been looking forward to the time when the gospel fully applied should bring about a condition of things when there would be no sickness, no death, no sorrow, no mourning, where all would be peace; when, in the language of the prophet, "the knowledge of the Lord" should "cover the earth as the waters cover the sea." We are looking forward to that time. Are we preparing for it?

That principle of mercy and love, or affection for all mankind, and interest in humanity, must be applied; and until the application is made we will remain subject to evil influences. But if we expect to enjoy that peaceful reign of bliss in the time to come, where no evil shall come, where every man shall sit under his vine and fig-tree, with none to molest or make afraid, we will have to apply it. You need not think you can leave off this application of the Christian spirit, the Christian duty in your intercourse with men, in business capacity or any other way, and still in some mysterious way you will be transformed by and by into a full-fledged Christian.

Christians do not grow like mushrooms. Things that grow quickly die soon. Things that are of slow growth possess the greatest longevity. You can look at nature and determine that. It is the annuals, the plants that grow up and die in a season, that grow quickly. That that lives through the winter and continues to live and grow and develop for years, grows more slowly and lives longer. That principle will have to be remembered in our growth. But do not take that as an excuse that we ought not to be making an effort to grow, notwithstanding our nature may be that of great longevity. Things that are naturally long-lived die when the principles of their life are violated, and so will we.

It seems to me that we are yet a long way from the mark of the high calling that is in Christ Jesus. I have heard that expression all my life: The mark of the high calling which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. I do not know of anybody that has approached it yet. That is one reason why I hesitated this morning to present these thoughts; I knew I was not there, and that there was much room for development and the education for development along that line before I could reach it. But I concluded a long time ago, several years ago at least, that if the preacher only preached his own attainments he had better quit and go home. Not fit to preach if he can not do better than that. I have heard preachers criticised because of it. I have heard men who preached criticised in this way; They say, "Oh, that is all right; but he doesn't do it; he doesn't practice it. He ought to live up to it himself before he preaches it." I do not believe that. I think there is no more commendable thing for the preacher to do than to hold the standard higher than himself, to say to the people, there is something better than I; something grander than I have ever attained to yet. There is the pattern. There is the exemplar. The mark of the high calling which is in Christ Jesus our Lord! I do not want to hear a man preach that does not hold the standard higher than his own attainments. I like to have a man subject to the criticism that he is not as good as he asks others to be. I think he ought to make the effort with everybody else to get there, to get as near there as possible; but do not wait until he gets there before he preaches the highest attainments that are taught in the gospel of Jesus Christ.

It is not the man so far above us that does us good any way. Why, if you see a man scaling the mountain yonder, way above you,—with agility he leaps from rock to rock, over the rough places—you admire him. Oh, you wish perhaps, that you could do that, could climb as high, do so with the agility and strength that he does. It does not do you any good to stand there and admire him. The man that will do you good is not the man that is so far up the mountain yonder, but the one who is near enough to reach down the hand and take you by the hand and help. That is the man that does you good. So when you are climbing a hill, and a man stoops down to help you, and points upward, and says, There is the goal of our ambition, do not say, "Don't preach to me until you get there." That is foolishness. Do not make that criticism any more on preachers. Let the spirit of the gospel as contained in the teachings of the Son of God be your law to govern you in your actions towards all mankind. Do what the Master has said—and you do not know what he said, yet, fully. You do not comprehend it. Nobody does. But as you approach it, and see there is more in it than you have before seen, do that. And those very words will unfold themselves in magnitude and beauty and grandeur until they help lead you to heights yet unknown. That has been the chief delight that I have had in contemplating the mission of Jesus Christ. It was not my first conception of Christ and his teaching that has carried me through thus far. My first conceptions of him were very crude. They are yet, no doubt, compared with the fullness of what is to be taught.

When I have seen that with struggling humanity, with the brightest minds that the world has known, making development from time to time, and still the Christ principle is seen in advance, high above them; look where they will, let their mind soar as high, as broadly as they may, Christ has been there before them; that is what causes me to admire the Christ character. It is not the conception of his character that is generally believed; it is the true character.

I think of the words of the apostle when he said, Beloved, it does not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when he appears we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. That is the reason we will be like him. We will not see him as he is believed to be, but see him as he is, comprehend him, understand him, know him. Then we shall be like him.

And the sincere, earnest man that is trying to do right, and I can say everybody else in a sense, are being like him just to the extent that they can see; because when a man does not do what he does see he becomes blinded, and his ability to see is just in proportion to what his efforts are. So to the extent that a man sees Christ he becomes like him. And when we shall see him as he is—oh! what a grand thought that is! What possibilities appear before us! See him as he is! When we shall see him as he is, then we shall be like him. Then will come that reign of peace; then will come the glad fruition of our hopes. Then there will be no enmity between man and man, or between man and the beast of the field, and the fowls of the air. Then peace will reign, plenty will abound, and all the creatures of God will rejoice together in the redemption made through the atonement of Jesus Christ our Lord.

May God in his infinite love help us, so far as the little life that we live is concerned, so far as the little influence we possess is concerned, that it may, like the evil and the good, shine upon all men, that the world may be better because of the fact that we shall have lived in it, is my prayer.

Fret Not.

Fret not thyself because of those Who doeth evil in their way
Nor envy not the workers of Iniquity; for soon will they
Be cut down, as the grass is cut,
And wither as the herb in time.
Trust thou in God; do what is right;
And thus thy righteousness shall shine.
We saw the wicked in great power,
And spreading like a green bay-tree;
But, lo, he passed, and was no more;
The Lord did laugh his day to see.
Delight thyself in Christ, the Lord;
Thy heart's desire he will thee give;
The wicked one will pass away,
But thou, by righteousness, shall live.
Then fret not, God is ever kind;
Array thyself in purity.
Let no ill thought distress thy mind;
Seek patience and sweet charity,
In mansions high, by Christ prepared,
A crown of life waits there for thee;
Hand over hand the "iron rod"
Will lead thee up to life's green tree.

Reception of Beauty.

"Open the door and let in the air;
The winds are sweet and the flowers are fair.
Joy is abroad in the world to-day;
If our door is wide it may come this way.
Open the door!
"Open the door, let in the sun;
He hath a smile for every one.
He hath made of the raindrops gold and gems.
He may change our tears to diadems.
Open the door!
"Open the door of the soul! let in Strong, pure thoughts which shall banish sin.
They will grow and bloom with a grace divine,

And their fruit shall be sweeter than that of the vine.

Open the door!

"Open the door of the heart; let in Sympathy sweet for stranger and kin.
It will make the halls of the heart so fair
That angels may enter unaware.
Open the door!"

In the stir of active work we forget the charm and virtue of the simple reception of beauty and goodness. The quiet hour among the hills or by the riverside when we look afar toward the ever-deepening vision of the Highest.

It may be a railroad journey through the heart of some great section of our own land, when the heart-life will reach one of the truest receptive moments—a moment when the past and present is transfigured by the glow of beauty that unfolds in revelations of light. We were speeding through Minnesota one May day—before us stretched the soft, interminable thickets of low, clinging trees, the far, green-clad hills in the background, while through the tangled undergrowth trailed the ribbon of a stream that widened as we journeyed, until in the soft evening glow, the beauty of Minnesota burst upon us. It seemed all one moment of reception—one thought of light and delicate, blended color wrought out in our soul-life—a glorious reception of beauty to ever leave its spiritual impress upon life.

June 9 is Flower-Mission Day the world over—a thought of service caught from the shut-in life of Jennie Casseday, a little invalid, who in one great receptive moment reached the higher meaning of flower-life and for years lived to give that vision out to the world. Thoughts of service laden with the aroma of heavenly joy have been wafted afar from that life.

"Do you remember me, ma'am?" The question was asked Flower-Mission Day by a convict in the state prison. He was one in a line of over a thousand men that filed by our committee, each receiving a gilded Scripture text-card and a potted flower. His face bore the lines of sorrow and suffering, and yet withal there was a light of peace.

The sister replied that she could not remember each individual face, and she added a word of cheer.

The convict then said: "Well, dear lady, I well remember you, for last year you gave me a flower and a Bible. I returned to my cell and determined to read the book and to pray. I found peace to my soul. I had not written mother a line for years, but I began a correspondence with her which has continued and been of much comfort to each of us.

"Both mother and I now look to a blessed home-coming when the dark days of prison life within these grim walls shall have not only ended, but when 'mother's boy' will have been freed from the great prison-house of sin. I can never cease to thank you good women for my deliverance."—Mary P. Denny, in Christian Home.

Dear Home Column: I request that on the 8th of March, sometime during your prayer- and testimony-meeting, you may remember my daughter, Jennie Redden, at the throne of grace. She is badly afflicted, and medicine does no good.

CENTRAL CITY, Illinois, January 27, 1908.

Dear Herald: As I have just returned from Pana, Illinois, where Bro. David Smith is holding debate with Reverend J. E. Prophater, of the Christian Church, I can say the discussion is going off very nicely. I left before the discussion was over to return home. I found wife and the two little ones, and mother, well and happy. We have no branch at this place. I enjoy reading the good sermons and letters. They are food for the hungry and thirsty souls. A word to the Saints in Pana. I thank them for their kindness to me when I was with them. I never met so much kindness in the world before. May the Lord be with Bro. Smith in the gospel work. I desire the prayers of all the Saints that I may do a good work, acceptable to the Lord. If we accept the truth and obey the gospel of the Lord, our hearts will be penetrated with the love of God, and not by fear. Bro. Smith preached Sunday morning at ten, afternoon services at half past two, and preaching in the evening at seven, with a splendid crowd at all the services. I was glad to meet so many Saints. I shall try to get some one to come here and sound the trumpet again before the lost sheep of Israel. I need the prayers of the sisters and brothers in my behalf. Let all of the Saints everywhere be found "laborers together" with the Lord. Oh, may I prove faithful to the end!

Your brother in the faith,

LAFAYETTE L. GOTT.

DES MOINES, Iowa, February 21, 1908.

Dear Herald: Next Sunday night will conclude a series of services of a missionary and revival character that has continued nearly four weeks, during which time the conventions and conference of this district have been held here.

The general expression is that there has never been a series of meetings that has resulted in greater good to the work than have these. The help of Brn. Charles E. Butterworth and Wardell Christy is much appreciated. While none have as yet been baptized, there have been several at the services who have never heard before, and those who have heard have been drawn nearer to the kingdom, and the Saints have truly been revived in their spirits. Brn. N. V. Sheldon and M. H. Cook have rendered valuable help this week. Bro. Christy returned home on account of his wife's health, and Bro. Butterworth felt that circumstances of a very trying nature called him to return to his home. I certainly feel much blessed in the efforts made for the good of the work at this time, and I never have engaged in missionary efforts that have been more satisfactory, had it not been for the bad weather, and considerable sickness in the city.

Some remarkable cases of healing have occurred in the city since my last communication, one of which I will briefly mention. During the district conference Sr. Lela Cushatt, of Baxter, was in attendance; and while her eyes were not strong when she left home, they became very much worse, and while at the conventions and conference she was administered to several times with only temporary help, but returned home and was taken much worse, so that she could not endure the light, and had to be led wherever she went. It was decided by her parents to bring her to the city with the thought of having her examined and, if it was thought help could be given her, treated by a specialist. She requested to counsel with the elders of the church before being examined, and in compliance with her request Brn. M. H. Cook, N. V. Sheldon, and myself met at my place and counseled her to seek the Lord, fasting from the evening meal, and we would unite with her in fasting. This was done, and after the evening service the sister was led to the chair for administration, not being able to find her way without help, and she arose from the administration with her eyes made strong, and the bright light of the room not troubling her at all. She slept soundly that night, and arose the next morning, her eyes as strong as they had been for years, so that no specialist was consulted save the Lord Jesus Christ. We all rejoice because of the mercy of God and his wonderful works to the children of men.

Next week Brn. M. H. Cook and N. V. Sheldon will hold a series of services at Runnells. Bro. N. V. Sheldon is in much better health than for months, through the power of God manifest during the conference.

Much private work is to be done in the city in following up the interest growing out of the meetings, and we are trying to occupy as God may lead and assist.

The work of the conventions and conference was of a very high order, and much good has been done. Perfect peace resulted from all the business done so far as discerned, and the Saints returned to their local work much encouraged to engage in the conflict. One thing caused some sad thoughts, and that was the report of the death of one who had been severed from the branch here, and had not prepared himself to reënter ere death overtook him. May this not be the sad lot of any other, but may those who have fallen subject to temptation prepare themselves to reënter, doing their first works over again.

My love for the work grows daily, and while I can not now be as active as I once was, yet my zeal has not abated. Would to God that I may do all that God requires of me, and I shall be satisfied, and yet I regret very much that I can not do many times more than I do. As those in the city work, and those who have been in city work know, there are many complications not met with in the smaller places and in the country, yet patient work brings about a continued uplift and growth.

I request the prayers of the readers of the HERALD for the work in the city of Des Moines.

In bright hopes of the triumph of the gospel, 1205 Filmore Street. J. F. MINTUN.

MINONG, Wisconsin, January, 1908.

Saints' Herald: I should be greatly pleased if you will publish the following explanation and apology to the church, for having violated its laws. And my experience may be the means of helping some hesitating friend or brother.

Will the use of tobacco lead a man to the use of stronger stimulants? My personal experience convinces me that it will. Especially so, if a man has a very nervous temperament. Tobacco is a mild intoxicant, and its constant use will keep a man in a mild state of intoxication, which slowly but surely develops a desire for a stronger stimulant. This desire the victim tries to satisfy with stronger tobacco, and goes to excess, but without avail. The stimulating qualities of the weed are not strong enough to appease. The victim, all unconsciously to himself, is adding fuel to the fire within, which can only be quenched for a season by the use of a stronger intoxicant.

During this season of tobacco intoxication, the victim has been undermining his health, sapping his manhood's strength, weakening his memory and will power to such an extent that when he arrives at the point where tobacco ceases to have the power to satisfy his craving for a stronger stimulant, he falls an easy victim to the use of strong liquor, and is more apt to become a slave to its use than is the man whose will power has not been weakened by the use of the poisonous nicotine.

I have a very nervous temperament, and when a young boy became a slave to the use of tobacco. But realizing then that inhaling the smoke from a cigarette would soon down me, I cast it aside and took to chewing tobacco and inhaling the smoke from the pipe under the erroneous impression, gained from my elders, that tobacco used in these ways would not injure a man. This inhaled tobacco smoke always had a very exhilarating effect upon me, pleasant and soothing while it lasted, but leaving me in a depressed state of mind. The desire to enjoy the first effects grew upon me until a chew and the pipe were never out of my mouth while awake.

It was about this time that I noticed that my memory was growing poor, and that my will power to resist the temptation to drink more than I ought to was growing weaker. It was also about this time that I met my love and married. The responsibility assumed, and the love and respect I had for my wife and family, for some years kept me safe; but I still indulged in the excessive use of tobacco, and felt the desire for strong drink grow more urgent. I tried to fight it off by using stronger tobacco, but without avail. My wife stormed against drinking. It would have been better if she had fought the evil with love. Then I would have had her strength and my own to support me. Every time I indulged in strong drink I felt ashamed of myself, and began to think God had cursed me with a devilish desire for liquor.

About this time my wife and I came in contact with the Latter Day Saint doctrine, and were both converted. My wife joined the church, but I held back. I was ashamed to acknowledge God before my fellows—man's fear of ridicule. I believe God punished me by taking one of our babies. I prayed to God in secret, but was afraid to come out in the open. I prayed to God for light and forgiveness. The command to acknowledge him came to me. I went home and was baptized in Lake Clitherall, by Elder Whiteaker. I was happy to enter the waters of baptism; but I felt a vague uneasiness; for the desire for drink had not been taken away. My wife gave me her tender care, and prayed with me; but the craving stayed with me. We moved to North Dakota, and for six months I fought this terrible craving with a constantly decreasing will power. I would look at my wife and children, and baby who is life of my life, and feel strong in their presence. Away from them I was sick at heart through fear of myself. I sedulously avoided persons and places when I knew liquor was in evidence.

Last Thanksgiving Day, I stepped into one of our boarder's rooms. He handed me a bottle. I had taken a drink before I realized my danger; then it was too late. When I awoke from my stupor, I found I had lost wife, home, and friends, was a man with a family but without a home. For three weeks I wandered about looking for work, almost crazed with grief, remorse, and shame. At times I felt bitter against God and my wife. Then I would feel ashamed of this, and pray for strength and forgiveness. I believe God helped me at these times, or I would have utterly fallen by the wayside into the slough of despond that leads—well, you know where.

Finally, one Saturday night found me in the depot at Duluth, weary and without money. I felt that God had finally forsaken me, and that there was nothing left now but the saloon. There were light and heat and drink—drink that would make me forget my trouble. While still hesitating, I stopped to talk to a working man about work. I told him my circumstances, what I was up against. "Well," he said, "you look all right to me. Come home with me and stay over Sunday, and by Monday you will feel all right again." God had not forsaken me. At the last moment he had raised up a stranger to save me from the saloon. The revulsion of feeling was staggering. Then I pleaded with God in prayer. I humbled myself before him. I opened my heart to him, and he revealed himself to me. He made me see that my previous worship of him had been too cold, of the mind and not of the heart; that he had chastised and disciplined me for not coming into true obedience to him and humbling myself before him. For denying obedience, while convinced of its necessity, and defiling my body and intellect with intoxicants, he had taken from me the comforts of home and family, and would have demanded of me my very soul if I had not yielded. Even now, after this brief season in which I have enjoyed the knowledge that God has forgiven me, I feel that while the sacrifice was great, it was not too great, if I have gained the salvation of my soul. Peace and happiness may still be mine, if I am faithful; and I earnestly ask all Saints to pray with me and for me that the broken threads of my life may be mended, that I may not have to wander through the balance of my days an outcast from home, and that I may abide to the end, enjoying God's love, that the light of a peaceful life may shine for me.

THE STAR OF BETHLEHEM.

Oh, that we had a guiding star,
Like th' glorious star of Bethl'hem,
As it lighted the wise men from afar,
To the Christ in his humble home,
To guide us, to guide us, out of the night,
Into the blessed and peaceful light
Of a Christian life.

We sinners need a guiding light,
Ever to lead us, day by day,
Away from a life of sin and strife,
Into a happy, peaceful way—
To guide us, guide us, out of the night,
Into the blessed and holy light
Of a Christian life.

All mankind have a guiding Star—
Christ is the Star of Bethlehem.
He'll guide us,—as th' wise men from afar—
To God, in his heavenly home.
He'll guide us, guide us, out of the night,
Into the blessed encircling light,
Of a Christian life.

P. T. LANGDON.

NEW ALBANY, Indiana, January 13, 1908.

Dear Herald: I humbly ask a little space in your dear pages to write a few things that impress my sad and lonely heart in this hour of mourning for our loved and blessed darling father, who has gone and left us. He died the morning of January 5. He was bedfast for six months and thirteen days. He had a desire to tarry till Jesus revealed himself in the clouds of heaven, and so at times prayed to that effect; but after he was taken sick he often expressed a desire to go and be with the loved ones gone before. Then I asked him one day, "Why do you say you want to leave mother and I, when you desired to tarry when you were well?" He answered, emphatically, "I so desired, but got no promise." He bore his sickness with great patience, though at times his suffering was seemingly very great.

A few weeks before his demise he broke the bread of life,—ate and drank of the broken body and spilled blood of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Awhile before he left, he went into a deep sleep. We thought he was gone. After one hour he awoke and said, "What did I come back for?" He continued, "I came back to tell all of you to prepare; for the Lord is soon coming to reign on the earth a thousand years." Then he began to tell the glories he had seen.

"Tongue can not tell," said he, "the grandeur of the place which is prepared for the faithful, the pure, the tried, and true Saints of God." Then he glorified God, and said, "I am soon going back, I came to stay with you a little while." And the night before he left he was giving comfort to us, and said he was writing; told me not to speak to him only as he asked me something. I then asked him to read the writing. He said one would not do for me to know,—he could not tell; but one he would read to me. It was with regard to our family. It was named Confidence. He exhorted us to trust in God; and gave us many comforting words before he left; sung and prayed so beautifully. When he had done this he asked God to take him; for he was ready. Asked me to turn him over, laid himself out, closed his eyes, and went to sleep without a move of hand or foot; not a groan or sigh, but with a sweet smile and a loving good-bye.

Dear Saints, we feel as though it is hard to part with our loving father; but God gave me to know five years ago that my father would pass beyond soon. I dreamed my brother, Monroe, and I were together, talking of the last days, and what would be, and he said in five minutes more my father's work would be done here, and then he could come where he would be more useful; and he came after him, riding a horse, and leading one for my father. He appeared to be an officer in the army, with epaulets on his shoulders, and the large black horses champed their bits, and were equipped with saddles, bridles, and trappings similar to those of war horses. I turned to my father and said, "No, don't go." He looked down sadly. Brother Monroe still urged him to go, and he began to get ready. He went into the house for a short time, and came back ready. Both walked to the gate, Brother Monroe helped him mount the big high horse. Brother said, "Hurry up, father; hurry up," with his horse going off at a fast trot. Then father's horse started, and they were soon out of sight. I turned to mother and said, "Father is gone." Then I awoke and wept.

Dear Saints, the blessed Father does nothing to grieve or distress his children, without making known to them before time, that they may be enabled to bear up. My dear brother has been gone five years last November. The February following he came to me telling me our dear father had only five minutes more to work here, then he would be taken where he could do greater good.

Pray for us, dear Saints. My aged mother, who is eighty-four, is sad and lonely, and needs your prayers. My desire still is to try to hold fast to the rod of iron.

I will ask all who can to help us a little, if it is only twenty-five cents, to cancel the debts and the doctor bill. We want to pay all as soon as we can. I am reminded that when dear Bro. Joseph Smith was in debt my dear father said, "Come, let us all help do what we can." He was always ready to lend a helping hand in time of need.

MANITOWANING, January 14, 1908.

Editors Herald: I take all the church papers and find they are a great blessing and a help in traveling the road to Zion, or the city of our God.

We have a small branch organized here on the Manitoulin Island, with a comfortable little church twenty-one feet by thirty-six feet, and dedicated by Elder R. C. Evans at a district conference held here in June, 1905. We had then about fifty members. Since then many have left and gone to other parts of the country. Some few got letters of removal; some have gone the way of all flesh, and a few more have come in; so now we have fifty-one names on our record, and only fourteen that are within attending distance of the church. About twenty-two left last fall for North Shore, Sault Ste. Marie, Little Current, and other places. However, the few that are left, though feeling lonely, still continue to keep up all the meetings; five each week: Religio, Sunday-school, two prayer-meetings, and preaching Sunday evenings.

Yours in bonds,
W. R. SMITH.

PENSACOLA, Florida, January 8, 1908.

Editors Herald: We live in a new place, near Pensacola. My husband and I are the only Saints here, beside Bro. Chestnut and his wife. Our good old Bro. Edward Powell has visited us twice. He just left yesterday morning for Pensacola; but he is to be back the 30th of this month on his way to Baldwin County, where he expects to stay a month and preach. He preached last Sunday about a mile from here, in the Bellview schoolhouse. Not very many hearers, but all seemed to be interested. I think good could be done here. We would be glad to have any of the elders visit us. We are poor, but we love to see the elders come; they are ever welcome to our home. I ask the prayers of all the Saints that I may be healed, for I have been sick four months, most of the time in the bed; but thank God I am better now.

Your sister in Christ,
ROXEY COOPER.

WELLSBURG, West Virginia, February 24, 1908.

Editors Herald: The church papers are a comfort during this winter weather. I bless the Lord God for ever showing me the way into the church of the Firstborn and for the Spirit which guides, and for the health that I have, though I am old in years. I love this work of the Lord's. Brethren, this is the church of the Firstborn continued up to this time by the same God that made the worlds and inhabited them and keeps them in place by his great power; but the heavens, yea, the firmament will be folded up as a garment and this old earth will pass out and there will be no place for it; but the new earth, in which shall be righteousness, shall inhabit that heavenly place, and righteousness and holiness are all that will inhabit that new earth. So brethren, it behooves us to watch and pray lest we enter into temptation.

Our conference meets with branch, March 7 and 8, in this the Wheeling and Pittsburg District.

Yours in the conflict,
J. H. HUFFMAN.

DES MOINES, Iowa, February 17, 1908.

Dear Herald: The district conference season is an important one to all of the Saints of our district, and the conference just closed in the city was very largely attended. The church on Sunday was filled to its seating capacity, and it will not be long until a larger building will be needed here in the city. Des Moines Saints enjoy having the conference meet with them, and we believe that they extended a hearty welcome to all present.

The Sunday-school and Religio conventions met on Friday and good interest was manifested in these departments of work. Each organization selected delegates to the General Convention, and elected district officers. Representatives on the district library board were chosen. Thursday evening previous to the convening of the conventions was taken up with Religio work, and Friday evening service was in charge of the Sunday-school.

The district conference session on Saturday was full of interest, the reports being quite complete and showing the work of the district to be in fair condition. All of the branches reported showing a total membership of nine hundred and seventeen, but the Sunday-school showed the greatest gain, making our total enrollment four hundred and thirty-nine.

Elder C. E. Butterworth has been in the city three weeks, during the series of meetings which were held previous to the convening of conference, and about one hundred received their patriarchal blessings under his hands. He thus endeared himself to all our people, and his visit to the city will be long remembered.

Services were continued at the church during the week after conference, and that closed the special missionary effort. The conference was as pleasant and profitable as any held in the district and all look forward to a prosperous year in the district. The branch at Runnells, and also the one at Boone, asked for the next conference, a majority favoring Runnells; and the first Saturday and Sunday in June was the time set.

It is expected that a good many will attend the General Conference at Independence.

Very kindly,
A. A. REAMS.

LLANSAMLET, South Wales, February 11, 1908.

Editors Herald: Herewith I inclose you small cutting from South Wales Daily Post newspaper, giving a brief account of our recent conference at Llanelly. This is a very favorable comment, and this with other evidences we have had clearly indicate to me the people and press are being moved upon by the spirit of inquiry and search for truth, and God will vindicate his cause in this land. Our conference passed without any sentiment of illfeeling or selfishness, the spirit of peace and unity being manifested by all. Bro. Rushton was present in charge and preached us a wonderful sermon on Sunday night in memory of our aged Sr. Treharne whose death occurred January 30, most of the bereaved family and friends being present. Brn. G. T. Griffiths, J. W. Rushton, William Lewis, and E. B. Morgan were chosen to represent the district at General Conference. A committee was chosen to arrange and provide for a joint conference of the eastern district of Wales at Whitsuntide, if possible. A few visitors were present from Nantyglo, of old time acquaintances. Much sickness has prevailed of late among our people, and Bro. Edward Williams of Pontyates has recently broken his leg in a colliery accident. Conditions are more hopeful in Wales than I have seen before for our people to get the truth before the honest in heart, and God is again marshaling his army here.

With kind regards to all old friends, and the Saints,
Your colaborer,

HENRY ELLIS.

SALINA, Kansas, February 4, 1908.

Editors Herald: I am right in the battle here at present, and feel my weakness, but I put my trust in One who is able to help me, and gives me his Spirit. I believe that good is being done here; but our elders who have been here have all been discouraged, and one told me to let them alone. He thought all had been done that could be done, but we have only had two weeks' preaching at one time and ten days' at another in the seven years we have lived here. I do not wonder they were discouraged at that time, as they did not seem to care for religion. I have quite a few investigating, and some are quite anxious to have our elders come here to preach. We have been having a three-week meeting by the United Brethren. They organized a class of nine members, and they worked hard to get some to go forward. I did not try to interfere in any way by giving out our literature until the last night I went to one man they had been working so hard to get. I had wondered why he resisted so many, as two of his brothers had gone forward and joined the church. I told him now the rest were through with him I wanted to give him some reading. I wanted him to read carefully and then come and talk it over. He said, "I will." I had not talked to him or thought of him knowing our faith. He said he had had three talks with my husband on religion and felt satisfied there was but one true church, so I found out why their preaching did not affect him more. He tried to make me promise I would try to get one of our elders to come here to preach. He said we needed the gospel preached here. If we could have an elder not easily discouraged and strong in the faith I believe lots of good could be done. We have a fine large schoolhouse, new and heated by furnace, that is open to us whenever we can get any one to preach. We organized Sunday-school there last Sunday. I have five children at home and one married, living near us, that I would like to have hear the true gospel preached. They are left without a father's care. It will be three months the tenth of this month since he was taken from us, but I try to say, God's will be done. There are no Saints here at all, and it is so lonesome to have no one of our faith, but we have good neighbors, and I long to see the time when there will be some of our faith here. It is my daily prayer that if there are any honest-hearted here, they will accept the gospel in its fullness.

Your sister in the faith,

Route 1.

MRS. ANNIE HARRIS.

MONTE VISTA, Colorado, February 18, 1908.

Dear Herald: We came here December 31, and received a warm welcome from the few Saints. We held three Sunday afternoon and evening services in the opera-house, beginning January 12, and some cottage-meetings during the week. There being no other public place available, we thought to leave for some other point. We had made application twice to the mayor for the use of the town hall, but had been refused; but it seems the Lord was working, and that it was not time for us to leave this town. On January 30, the mayor phoned to some of the friends not of the church, telling them to have us call at his office in the First National Bank, that he had concluded to let us have the hall. Of course we were more than pleased. The agreement was that we pay for fuel and lights, and have the use of the hall free. We held forth three Sunday afternoons and evenings; and yesterday, when we called upon his honor, the mayor, to settle our bill, he informed Bro. Russell there were no charges to pay, and that at any time in the future the hall was open to us. You may be assured we felt real good. Our congregations have ranged in number from thirty-five to one hundred and fifty, with the best of attention, and no disturbance whatever. Some of our religious friends have given us some trouble by tearing down and destroying our advertising matter; but we have advertised in a way that every house in town has known of our meetings. We have posted our faces all over town, beside putting them into the houses. Bro. Russell preached twice on the Book of Mormon, and we sold eight books. Frank is a whirlwind on the Book of Mormon. We have made many friends, and we think the name Latter Day Saint has raised quite a good deal in the town of Monte Vista. Have organized a Sunday-school, and there is prospect of further advancement. A number of young ladies, friends of the Sunday-school secretary, who are members of other churches, have promised to attend the Sunday-school. They think our methods are superior to those employed by others.

Two young ladies attending the high school have invited us to their home, near Center, when we return, to hold services in their schoolhouse. And so we feel that the heaven is working, and the seed sown will bear fruit in the near future. Bro. Russell left for home last night, and the writer goes to Antonito to-morrow. We expect to labor in this vicinity until district conference in Denver, March 7.

Your brother,

E. F. SHUPE.

NEVADA, Missouri, February 19, 1908.

Editors Herald: I am at home helping take care of our sick daughter, Iva, who is very low at this writing; but in last twenty-four hours she seems to be resting easier. She has been bedfast six weeks. My wife had typhoid fever six weeks in November and December. Twelve weeks of sickness we have had this winter so far. While in Nodaway District, I was warned that a severe trial awaited me. We have had some experiences in these afflictions which we will always remember.

One day, while our daughter was suffering very much, God sent his messengers into the room, every power not of God was driven out, the room filled with the Spirit of God. We all wept under its power; and not an ache or pain remained upon our daughter.

Bro. W. E. Haden, through his influence, and the dear Saints in Nodaway District, have raised the money to buy me a new suit of clothes. Many thanks to one and all who have assisted in this as well as looked after my temporal wants while among you; also in southern part of Far West District, and at Perrin, Saints did well financially. May God bless all who have been so kind.

Dear Saints, please remember us in your supplications.

I have lost more time from my field this year than since we had smallpox in our family. I hope my hands will soon be loosed, and I back in the field preaching.

In gospel bonds,

F. C. KECK.

CHRIGHTON, Alabama, February 19, 1908.

Dear Herald: My husband and I are still living in the faith of our God. I know this work is true, and I feel that God has blessed us, and am grateful that he led us in this way of truth and glory. I know that God does love his people and will save them at last, if they will trust him. We have had some great troubles in our early life, but that makes me stronger in the faith, for I know that my Redeemer liveth and will bring things right with us another day; then we shall see it was all for the best. I can see it now, for it has brought me nearer to God. I loved our baby much and will never forget her. When one has to come down to some things and experience them it is hard to undergo, but if we will trust our God who gave the dear little ones to us we shall meet them again in that beautiful home with our Savior who died for us all. He died to bring us nearer to his Father, and it is sometimes that way with us, the Lord takes from us in order to bring us nearer to him; but I shall never cease to serve him, for the interest that we have in heaven is great. I ask the prayers of all the Saints, and am praying that we shall all meet in a better world some day.

Your sister,

F. PETERSON.

NUCLA, Colorado, February 17, 1908.

Editors Herald: It has been so long since I wrote to your valuable pages, and I feel so lonesome spiritually in this place that I do not know what I should do if it were not for the help of the blessed HERALD. I came here to make me a home in the Rocky Mountains and I find it a big proposition. We are isolated; forty-five miles from railroads, and there are no doctors, lawyers, ministers of any faith, and no ministers of law and order here. There are no religious meetings, and there are about three hundred in this part, godless, and striving to gain a foothold on earth without hope of heaven. I find it a trying time to keep the spark alive. I do not think I shall stay here long. I have been isolated for nearly eight years, during which time I have not heard a sermon on our faith. I am planning a trip to the HERALD Office town this summer for a vacation and spiritual benefit, and to spend a few days in worshiping with the Saints. I became involved too deep in politics for my spiritual benefit, and by the help of God and the prayers of the brothers and sisters, I am going to make a better fight for salvation and victory. Any communications from Saints gladly received.

Your brother,

JAMES D. FARNER.

COMSTOCK, Nebraska, February 18, 1908.

Editors Herald: Thinking some would like to hear from one of the new missionaries, I take this means to inform the anxious minds I am progressing very slowly; but am making a sure footing, I hope, upon which more rapid growth will be made in the future.

It seems to be my good fortune to be associated with an "old-timer" at the business, an able tutor, Elder J. R. Sutton, and under his care a great number of kinks are being straightened out. I assure you Bro. Sutton has a job on his hands, too.

We can not complain as to our work, for we expected no great advancement to be made the first year; but if the good Lord will continue his blessing in the way of giving light and wisdom we will be satisfied with the results, whatsoever they may be, and to God be all the praise.

The main object I have in bothering your columns is to call the attention of general missionary force to one of our little branches, and that is Columbus, Nebraska. Bro. George Murie has charge of the work there, and he is badly in need of assistance. Please make it a point if you can, in going to and from General Conference, to stop over there and give them a lift. Brother Murie lives only seven blocks north of the Union Pacific depot. Write him when you are coming, and he will meet you, make all arrangements for meetings, etc. Columbus, Nebraska, is on the main line of the Union Pacific, from Omaha, Nebraska, to the western points.

Please bear this in mind, and I assure you the Lord will bless everybody concerned.

Ever in the conflict,

HALE W. SMITH.

VANCOUVER, Washington, February 17, 1908.

Dear Herald: Never having seen any communication in your columns from the Vancouver Branch, I will send you a few items. We were organized a year ago last December, with eight members, by our district president, William Johnson. We have now grown to a membership of twenty-four, besides having several Saints with us who are not members of the branch. At present Elder N. T. Chapman is our branch president, but being handicapped by having to labor for the support of his family, he can not accomplish what he would otherwise. Several of the missionaries have visited us, but at the time we had no place of meeting where they could hold forth except on Sunday, but now, I am happy to say, we have rented another hall and have full control of it, and will be glad to have any of the missionaries come this way at any time, as we are anxious to have the gospel presented to the people in this place. Surely there are some honest-hearted souls to be found here. We have a nice little Sunday-school of about forty members, also Religio, and the sisters organized a willing helpers society last October, and are trying to add their mite towards advancing the work here and are being blessed both temporally and spiritually. Our young brothers, George Stover and Harry Davis, who recently went east, will be greatly missed by us. May the Lord of heaven bless and prosper them, and always give them such a portion of his Spirit that they may always do what is required of them in the gospel work.

General Conference will soon convene. Oh, how I should like to attend! But can only hope and pray that it will be governed by God's Holy Spirit and all will be well. As this is my first letter to the HERALD I shall not weary you.

Your sister in the gospel,

MARY H. HARVEY.

LOUISVILLE, Kentucky, February 22, 1908.

Dear Herald: I love to read your precious pages for the good news from all the Saints all over the world. Bro. Metcalf and the writer have been holding some very good cottage-meetings in the suburbs of Louisville, Kentucky. Our branch of the Saints here is moving upward to the higher calling in Christ Jesus, and we are having some very good meetings on Sunday nights in New Albany, Indiana, with the Saints over there. Bro. Metcalf is in charge of the work here and in New Albany, Indiana. I feel that the work will make progress in this wicked city with the priesthood we have now; for there have been two fine brothers, a teacher and a deacon, added to our list of warriors for the truth. We hope the work will go forward this year, and may there be many added to the church, and the servants of God be prepared for the work; for I feel that they will have to work hard to present the gospel to the people. But our heavenly Father has promised to the ministry, if humble and faithful, that the day is not far distant when he will pour out his Spirit in power that will enable them to stand before the world and break the bread of life as they have never been able to do before. So let us go forward, brothers, in this great cause.

Yours in gospel bonds,

1897 Seventh Street.

WM. N. HANNER.

Request for Prayer.

Editors Herald: I write to request prayer for my two grandchildren, Florence and Inez Gowers, who are sick with a fever, that God will heal them.

I am still in the faith. Bro. Biggs comes and preaches for us every other Sunday, and Bro. Shinn once in a while. Bro. Craig preached nine sermons. We hold services in the Christian church.

News From Branches

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

At our last sacrament service the Saints fasted and earnestly prayed for the benefit of Sr. Billinsky, who has been so seriously afflicted for so long. Manifestations of the blessed Spirit pertaining to her condition were given through Elder Archibald and Sr. Brown. Sr. Billinsky was greatly strengthened in Spirit and, though still very weak in body, she felt marked improvement from the prayers and administration which took place after the service when several of the elders went to her home and attended to that rite.

We have been strengthened and edified from the instruction received, as God's servants have occupied during the past month, also from the blessed hours of prayer and social services.

The Sunday-school and Religio are doing excellent work among the young. Their annual district conventions convened here February 22 and 23. Officers were elected for the ensuing term, and delegates were appointed for the General Convention. Very entertaining programs were rendered Sunday morning and afternoon.

The mite society gave a bazaar, supper, and entertainment, February 25, and, judging from the large attendance, good results in a financial way were realized.

Bro. J. E. Betts, Sr., of Bellville, Illinois, has been very ill for some time. On the afternoon of February 9, a special prayer service was held and he was administered to. He has been improving quite nicely ever since. How merciful is the Master when we trust in him!

We enjoyed the short visit of Bro. R. B. Trowbridge recently.

Your sister in Christ,

Miscellaneous Department

Conference Minutes.

SOUTHERN INDIANA.—Ninety-sixth conference convened with Byrnmville Branch, February 15, 1908. Called to order by F. L. Sawley. J. W. Wight, missionary in charge, chosen to preside. JOSEPH SMITH'S MOTHER IS "PESTERED" BY AN EVIL SPIRIT.

A great many writers make it their business to poison public opinion against the latter-day work. Some of them overdo the dose and their product becomes a literary emetic. The Pittsburg Sun, January 16, 1908, contained an article entitled, "Mother of Joseph Smith," from the pen of Reverend Thomas B. Gregory. We quote it in full:

Should any reader of this newspaper wonder why it is that Joe Smith is put down among the "great men," let such reader bear in mind the fact that there must be something extraordinary in the makeup of the man who is able to found a religion that shall attract a world-wide attention, command the absolute and unquestioned devotion of millions of men and women, and endure, possibly, for hundreds of years.

If the man who is able to achieve such a thing is not entitled to be called "great" it will certainly be admitted on all hands that he is entitled to be called remarkable.

Joseph Smith, the founder of Mormonism, was indeed one of the most remarkable men that this country, or the world, has ever produced, and looking into his life-history, we find the same old story of the influence of the mother.

Lucy Mack, daughter of an old Revolutionary soldier, and the mother of Joseph Smith, was just the woman to mold such character as was manifested in the case of the founder of Mormonism.

To begin with, she was an epileptic. The very brain stuff through the mediumship of which she did her thinking was diseased.

She was given to fits and convulsions, during which she would claw the earth and foam at the mouth like a mad-man.

The diseased brain tissue made diseased thought. Without being downright crazy, she was in a state of perpetual hallucination.

She heard voices, saw visions, dreamed dreams; and the voices, visions, and dreams she mistook for solid realities.

Quite unable to distinguish between subjective realities and objective facts, between the things that actually existed and the things that existed only in her distempered fancy, she was ever the dupe of a remorseless credulity.

She believed anything, everything; and the more extraordinary the thing happened to be, the more ready she was to accept it as a part of her creed.

She had never heard of logic. She had not the remotest knowledge of reason or reasoning. Of small mentality and meagre education, her small world was full of ghosts and goblins, of spirits and voices, and by these creations of her fancy she was dominated all her life long.

In addition to all this, she was the victim of melancholia.

When not racked by the terrible epileptic fits or pestered

"Some one quoting the hackneyed sarcasm, that 'between Protestantism and Romanism there is but a paper wall,' the reply was, 'True, but the whole Bible is printed on it.'" by the innumerable "spirits" she was moping with the "blues," despondent to the verge of self-destruction.

And it was under the guidance of such a mother that Joseph Smith grew up.

Knowing this, it is as easy to account for the founder of Mormonism as it is to account for the frost on the window pane.

Growing up in an atmosphere of superstition and credulity, drinking in, along with his mother's milk, the story of dreams, visions, and voices, the boy took to religion-making as naturally as the duck takes to water.

The son had all of his mother's superstition and credulity, all of her capacity for seeing and hearing of supernatural, plus the executive ability, in which she was deficient; and it was as good as settled that he was to become famous, or infamous, as the founder of the Mormon cult—a cult which after more than three quarters of a century of life is as virile and militant as ever, and which may continue to survive for a good long time to come.

Lucy Smith certainly has been "pestered" by "innumerable" evil "spirits," the latest of which is the Reverend Thomas B. Gregory.

We have carefully read the above quoted article and (perhaps because of having inherited the small mentality referred to) we are unable to discover therein any evidences that Gregory rightfully bears the title of "Reverend."

Looking at his conduct with the most powerful microscope, about how large does it appear? Observe: it is generally conceded among men, that some reverence is due women, as women, and that the lowest insult is to traduce a man's mother; it is generally conceded among men that one should be somewhat forbearing when speaking of the dead. Gregory and individuals of his kind show no respect for womanhood, for motherhood, or for the dead. They tempt one to believe the charge made by certain irreverent ones that the modern clergy are a little below the average standard of manhood; we would not urge such a charge against the clergy as a whole, but evidently some individuals are preachers because they could not quite arrive to the stature of manhood.

The work of Joseph Smith precipitated a great controversy that still rages. Intellectual giants came out and pitted themselves against him in argument. Rough frontiersmen came out to do physical combat with him. The latter shot him to death, the advantages all being on their side. Yet in a way they were men, compared with others who have offered battle. Presently comes Gregory, and others of the kind, and project themselves into the conflict. They do not take up matters of logic, or look for able-bodied, strong-minded men to wrestle with; they single out a woman, one that they think is of "small mentality" and withal dead and unable to defend herself,—that is about their size. A dog may defile the grave of a saint.

The question of logic is raised by the statement that Lucy Smith "never heard of logic." Let us give a passing glance at the logic displayed in the article referred to. In the ninth paragraph, "subjective realities" and things that "exist only in a distempered fancy" are spoken of as being synonymous; that does not indicate that Mr. Gregory is a good judge of logic. Moreover, he argues that a remarkable religious cult, that is "virile" and "militant" after three quarters of a century, and apparently destined to hold its own with cults founded by Wesley, Campbell, Luther, and Calvin, had its real origin in the "diseased brain stuff" of an ignorant woman of small mentality who was hardly "virile" and "militant" enough to maintain her own existence. We are reminded of Senator Carmack's charge against Senator Tillman, "His premises are on one side of the earth, his conclusions on the other, and no bridge between."

Joseph Smith was a church-builder; and Mr. Gregory admits that he was quite remarkable in his field of operations. He was one of many church-builders. For the sake of argument, we will omit all reference to inspiration. We will say that in common with other church-builders he looked around and was not satisfied with what he saw in the religious world.

Like others he set to work to found a church that should be more nearly like the New Testament church than any that then existed. It occurred to him to organize his church with apostles, prophets, evangelists, seventies, elders, pastors, bishops, teachers, and deacons,—in fact all the officers undeniably found in the New Testament church. 'Tis ridiculously simple; but such an idea had not occurred to the others. It occurred to him to take his doctrines bodily from the Bible, notably as found in the sixth chapter of Hebrews. It can not be denied that others had overlooked some of those doctrines. It occurred to him that his church might well enjoy certain spiritual manifestations that certainly were given to the New Testament church, mentioned in the twelfth chapter of 1 Corinthians and the sixteenth chapter of Mark, and elsewhere, as being perpetual benefits. Others had overlooked these things.

Now the conclusion is obvious. Something was wrong with a religious reformer who could use such simple ideas instead of going ballooning off into the clouds of mysticism in search of the North Pole. Something was wrong, and we may as well "blame it onto his mother." Obviously she was a woman of small mentality and never heard of logic. The symptoms induced in Mr. Gregory by a consideration of these facts reminded him of epileptic fits.

But if Joseph Smith who saw, seized, and used the ideas above referred to, was illogical, what shall be said of the illustrious reformers who overlooked them? What of their maternal origin?

Now we feel no hesitancy in pronouncing Mr. Gregory's article a tissue of falsehoods, and withal unutterably mean. Lucy Smith was an average American mother. She was the mother of a large family of children, and none of them were deficient, either mentally or physically. If it were possible, it would be interesting for Mr. Gregory to engage one of her sons in argument and permit an intelligent jury to decide whose mother was a stranger to logic.

He has raised the question of heredity, and in view of some of the things that he has written we are tempted to say that his own paternal origin is stated in John 8: 44; but we will not be so uncharitable, though to be candid we feel that by his vile attack upon a woman he has forfeited any claim to decent treatment. Nor will we trace his maternal origin, because it is not likely that his mother, if she could see his conduct in its true light, would crave publicity. We prefer to think of her as being unfortunate. Certainly she would not be proud to think that her son, as a minister, entered into a theological controversy, and made his first attack upon the character of an opponent's mother.

Reference to this article was delayed while one of the brethren wrote to Mr. Gregory asking for documentary evidence in support of his statements. No reply has been forthcoming.

Perhaps the article in itself is not worthy of notice. Yet it is one of a class, and we could not forego the pleasure of stating our opinion of the class.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

Elders J. R. Sutton and Hale W. Smith have succeeded in getting before the people of Comstock, Nebraska, via the Temperance League, as will be seen by the following from the Comstock News:

"The Comstock Temperance League met last Monday night, as announced in these columns, and the program as published, with a few omissions and additions, was carried out. . . . The solo by Reverend [Elder] H. W. Smith, also by T. H. Bryant, as well as the duet by Messrs. Allen and Butler were applauded heartily. The lecture by Reverend [Elder] J. R. Sutton was listened to attentively and was full of food for thought and reflection. The meeting was pronounced my many the best one of the season."

Elders' Note-Book

PREACHING FROM NOTES.

Preaching from notes is a custom very extensively practiced in the religious world. Some have their entire sermons written or in a printed form, which have been carefully prepared and revised from time to time.

Almost invariably the minister, before presenting his sermon to the audience, asks the Lord to give him of his Spirit that he may present such thoughts as will be food for the assembly.

In my judgment there is no consistency in asking the Lord to bring to his (the minister's) mind that which shall be food for the congregation, when he has before him all that he intends to present. It brings to my mind the following:

Little Johnnie heard his mother teaching his sister, younger than he, the prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread," when he said, "Mamma, I don't see why we should pray like that every day." "Why, dear?" "Because you baked eight large loaves of bread yesterday. They will last us one week, and father brought six sacks of flour from the mill, today; besides I heard him tell Uncle John that he has fifty bushels of wheat yet, in the granary, and if he didn't harvest any this year he had enough for bread for one year."

The prayer referred to was taught by the Savior to his disciples as he sent them out into the world without purse or scrip. Hence, it was very appropriate for the disciples and all who did not have their daily bread, or the means by which to purchase it. And to be consistent, the minister should first exhaust the stock in hand, before asking for more.

"Well," says one, "I do not believe in presenting stereotyped sermons. To me it is not interesting. It may be advisable to have notes or head-lines to bring to the mind certain lines of thought that have a bearing on the subject to be presented." Another says, "If it is advisable to have the skeleton of the sermon, why not have the entire thing, and give the audience a finished product? It is much better for the minister to prepare his sermon before delivering it to the audience, and by so doing he can revise and see that the grammar is perfect and no conflict in what is said. By this method the sermon is free from errors and sound in doctrine, and has much better effect with the thinking class than the sermon delivered extemporaneously." So, on this, as well as other matters, people differ.

The late Dean Howell, of South Wales, said, "There never was so much preaching, but what about the effect? The preaching is able, masterly, has marks of scholarship, but with little unction accompanying." It is true that the preaching in the religious world has the marks of scholarship, but lacks in spirituality, and is not sound in doctrine, but it may be free from errors as far as grammar is concerned. The divided, conflicting creeds of the day are strong evidence that with all the masterly sermons, which have the marks of scholarship, the clergy are preaching for doctrine the commandments of men, and that by the wisdom of man, and as Dean Howell says, "with little unction."

How is it with us, who are called to preach the gospel, not in word only, but by the power of the Spirit? Shall we follow in the footsteps of those who depend upon their notes and manuscript? or shall we conform to the instructions of the great teacher, Jesus Christ? "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."—Matthew 28:19, 20. Upon condition that they teach all that he commanded, he promised to be with them unto the end of the world; and in order that they might be able to do so, it was necessary for them to become acquainted with his commandments, informing themselves of his mission—study the writings of the prophets, so that from a Bible standpoint they could preach Christ, as we find Peter does on the day of Pentecost. (See Acts 2:14; also 7:1-53.) Stephen here covers much scripture in trying to convince the people of the mission of the Savior. By these chapters, we can see that Peter and Stephen were well informed. Jesus promised to be with his ministers, not in person, but by the Holy Spirit. "I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another comforter, that he may abide with you for ever; even the Spirit of truth."—John 14:16, 17. And in the twenty-sixth verse we learn what this Holy Spirit shall do. "He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you." When shall the Spirit do this? Is it when we read what the prophets had said? No, for when we inform our minds of his truths by reading, there is no necessity for the Spirit to bring it to the mind. It will give us light and confirm the truthfulness of what we read.

The promise is that when his ministry are teaching whatsoever he commanded, that he by his Spirit will be with them, and bring to their minds such as will be proper food for the occasion. Not only in the preaching of the word, but when they are arrested and brought before the courts for the truth's sake, he has promised, then, to be with them, as we note in Mark 13:11: "When they shall lead you, and deliver you up, take no thought beforehand what ye shall speak, neither do ye premeditate, but whatsoever shall be given you in that hour, that speak ye: for it is not ye that speak, but the Holy Ghost." Similar language is used in Matthew 10:18-20.

One writer says, "This appears to be a special provision for extraordinary occasions, but, of course, can have no reference to the ordinary preaching of the gospel. In fact, if this were to be the general rule, there would be no necessity for giving this specific instruction to apply upon the occasions referred to." How can it be for a special occasion when it is in harmony with the promise of John 14:16? "I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you, (not only on this special occasion) for ever." What shall it do? Verse 26: "He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you." Not only when brought before the courts of the land for the gospel's sake, but in the presentation of the word of God, and officiating in the ordinances of his church.

In my judgment, the reason why the Savior promised so minutely as to what they could depend upon, was because of their surroundings when their lives were at stake. He knew that they would need strength and counsel, and it was indeed consoling to them: not only in the teaching and preaching of the word, would the Holy Spirit bring to their minds such as was necessary, but while they may be bound, hand and foot, by their enemies. Yes, the Master knew that they would be persecuted, and brought before tribunals, and sentenced to die, and he gave them to understand that the Holy Spirit would be present then, as it had been upon other occasions when presenting the truth. I consider the promise timely, but can not indorse the statement that it was for a special occasion, and not for the ordinary preaching of the gospel.

As further evidence that the Spirit is promised to the ministry of Christ, in all their ministerial work, as well as upon the special occasion referred to, we read section 42, paragraph 5, Doctrine and Covenants: "And again, the elders, priests, and teachers of this church shall teach the principles of my gospel, which are in the Bible and the Book of Mormon, in the which is the fullness of the gospel; and they shall observe the covenants and church articles to do them, and these shall be their teachings, as they shall be directed by the Spirit, and the Spirit shall be given unto you by the prayer of faith, and if ye receive not the Spirit, ye shall not teach."

From this we learn that the elders are to teach the principles of the gospel, as contained in the books; they are to be directed by the Holy Spirit. The Spirit is promised when sought for by the prayer of faith; and if they have not the Spirit, they shall not teach. From this we infer that there may be times when the Spirit will be withheld. Yes, we know by humiliating and valuable experience that such has been the case, for good reasons, some of which may be that the audience was not in a proper frame of mind to receive the word, or, the speaker was not worthy. The speaker may have indulged in light speeches, fault-finding, evil-surmising, jealousy; or he may have had much success in his labors and the favorable comments by his hearers caused pride to enter his heart and he became exalted. All of the above are displeasing to the Lord, and are just and good reasons why the Spirit is withheld.

Paul says, By the spirit of man, we understand the things of man; the things of God, by the Spirit of God. Hence, we see the wisdom and safety in the command, "If ye receive not the Spirit, ye shall not teach."

"And any man that shall go and preach this gospel of the kingdom, and fail not to continue faithful in all things, shall not be weary in mind, . . . Therefore, take no thought for the morrow, . . . neither take ye thought beforehand what ye shall say, but treasure up in your minds continually the words of life, and it shall be given you in the very hour that portion that shall be meted unto every man."—Doctrine and Covenants 83:13, 14. This is given as a general rule, not alone as a provision for extraordinary occasions, "when they shall lead you, and deliver you up," or when making a defense before magistrates. It has direct reference to the preaching of the gospel by any and all of the faithful who are called to the ministry, as stated in verses 13 and 15. "Well," says one, "it is very humiliating to enter the stand and speak ten minutes, have the mind become blank, and have to sit down, when if I had notes of what I wished to present I could continue and present thoughts that would be new to some." Upon the other hand it is very tiresome and not edifying to the audience to listen to the minister from forty-five to sixty minutes, preach from notes in the absence of the Spirit. As the late Dean Howell has said, the sermon may have the marks of scholarship, but what about the unction? Have both, and the audience as well as the speaker is edified.

Paul says, "For our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance."—1 Thessalonians 1:5. In section 68, paragraph 1, the ministry are promised the Holy Spirit. He is to be their instructor. Second, they shall speak as they are moved upon by the Holy Ghost. Third, whatsoever they shall speak when moved upon by the Spirit shall be Scripture, will, mind, voice, word, and power of God unto salvation. Fourth, this promise is unto all the faithful elders of his church. If we are of the faithful we ought to trust him and not depend upon our notes. Often we have heard brethren say, that were called on short notice to preach, "I had excellent liberty. My mind was enlightened, and I could see grand thoughts. Yes, they came as fast as I could deliver them, and the audience was interested and edified, and it was a feast to all concerned." Why? Because the Spirit was present, bringing to the mind of the speaker that which was necessary for the congregation. This same brother may be appointed to speak one week later, and he reads and stores the mind with useful knowledge, and not having had light as to what subject he shall speak upon, and for fear that he may not have the liberty that he had on the former occasion, he writes some headlines of that which, in his judgment, would be the proper matter to present. His subject is, "Baptism," and he divides it up under the following heads: First, baptism, a command of God; second, its object; third, who are proper subjects; fourth, the mode; fifth, who may officiate. He has a plain, simple subject, and lest he forget to bring out all the above points, he makes notes, and in order that he may not take up too much time, he concludes to speak fifteen minutes on the first, ten on the second, five on the third, fifteen on the fourth, and fifteen on the fifth. He looks on his paper and is pleased with the arrangements. The inquirer asks, "What more could be done? Is there anything wrong in the above arrangement?" I answer, "The brother so far, in my judgment, is in harmony with 2 Timothy 2:15, Study to show thyself approved unto God. A workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."

The speaker enters the stand, and announces his subject, confines himself strictly to the arrangements made on the paper. When through he is not satisfied. He has noticed that part of his remarks were not interesting to the audience, and that the attention was not given as he expected it would be. On part of the subject he had excellent liberty, and could have spent more of the time in presenting valuable information, while he labored at great disadvantage along other lines. What was the cause of this? The notes to blame? No, not any more than if he had marked certain passages of Scripture and was determined to present them all, or if he were speaking from a chart. The speaker made the mistake in following out his notes; he should have followed the leadings of the Spirit. He was blessed with liberty along certain lines, and the audience was interested. He should have continued, if he never said one word about either of the other four headlines to his subject. Not only that, the elder when he enters the stand should be free, not bound to any particular subject. If he has chosen one and he finds in his opening remarks that his mind is led in another direction, speak on. Paul says, "The spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets." He may prophesy and he can quench the Spirit, so it is with the minister; he may preach as he is led by the Spirit, or he may speak from notes that which the Spirit does not give him the liberty to speak of.

The results are, that when man of himself speaks, however eloquent he may be, if he confines himself strictly to his notes in the absence of the Spirit, his sermon will not be edifying along gospel lines; while he that speaks under the influence of the Spirit, though his language may be imperfect, that which he says will be life and encouragement to all that hear, if honest in heart.

We must not persuade ourselves that because we have charts or notes upon certain subjects, that we may use them at our will to an advantage. The promise is that the Spirit will direct us. Neither must we conclude because we had excellent liberty in one place, that we will have the same experience upon the same subject at another place; for what may be beneficial to one congregation may not be essential to another. Hence, the wisdom and safety of following the leadings of the Spirit and not our notes. The command is, "If ye receive not the Spirit, ye shall not teach" (notes or no notes, Bible or no Bible).

In section 50, paragraph 5, "Verily I say unto you, he that is ordained of me and sent forth to preach the word of truth by the Comforter, in the Spirit of truth, doth he preach it by the Spirit of truth, or some other way? and if it be by some other way, it be not of God."

LEAVES FROM LIFE.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF J. H. N. JONES, OF AUSTRALIA.

ELDER J. H. N. JONES.

"I trust that this sketch may catch the eye of some stubborn one who is resisting the power of God, and cause him to yield to the pleadings of that 'still, small voice.'"

I was born the ninth day of December, 1866, in a little township (Frankston) on the shores of Port Philip Bay, within thirty miles of that great city of the southern hemisphere, Melbourne, in the state (then colony) of Victoria.

My father, the late Evan G. Jones, Sr., was a native of Key West, Florida, U. S. A., and my mother, Mary Barry, of County Cavan, Ireland.

I was the third child of a family of eight, composed of four of each sex, and when still a child my parents removed to a little fishing village called Hastings, which is situated on the shores of Western Port Bay, about fourteen miles from my birthplace, and forty from Melbourne.

My father at first engaged in the fishing industry, but afterwards had built a large boat, or small cutter, and engaged in a cargo and passenger trade across Western Port.

At the time of Glaud Rodger and C. W. Wandell's sending to Australia as the first heralds of the Reorganization, my father was plying between Hastings and the little seaport town of Queensferry, which lies on the southeastern shores of the bay. His boat many times carried the elders and Saints, to and fro, free of charge, between the above-mentioned places. Queensferry was the first place in Victoria that received the message, Glaud Rodger baptizing there Bro. and Sr. McIntosh, who still live and are faithful.

My first recollection of the latter-day work dates back to the time when Glaud Rodger, on his return from Queensferry, preached in the Hastings Mechanics Institute.

I did not attend those meetings (except to take a peep through the open door), but my father did, and I have since heard that he remarked after the service, "Mormons or not, that's the first time in my life I've heard the fullness of the gospel," or words to that effect.

Father had previously been a Methodist local preacher, and subsequently a baptized believer in the so-called Church of Christ.

Bro. Woolley (then Mr. Woolley) who is now an elder of the church at Hastings, tells of how he saw an old man on the Hastings wharf, where the fishermen dry and mend their nets, and upon hearing that he was a Mormon went up to him and said: "I hear, sir, that you are a Mormon." Glaud Rodger replied, "We are so called." "Well," said Bro. Woolley, pointing to my father's house, "go you there and you'll find a man who will talk Bible to you." Bro. Woolley at the same time chuckling to himself in anticipation of the gruelling the "Mormon" would get at the hands of my father; but subsequent events proved that both my father and Bro. Woolley received their quietus—their theological Waterloo—at the hands of the latter-day elders. I was brought up in Methodism, and any religious sympathies I had were for that people; but owing to my father having severed his connection with that body, we as a family also were somewhat alienated and thrown out of touch with that people. I sometimes attended their meetings, but I must confess more out of idle curiosity and to meet the young people than with any desire for religion or worship.

When about fourteen years of age, I well remember a striving of the Spirit with me which caused me to seek God upon my knees in my private chamber; but having no one (earthly) to direct me, I found not the straight way.

Subsequently, at a revival meeting held at the local Methodist church, I, in company with others, was induced to "go to the penitent form"; but I am sorry to say my going out was more through the power of a magnetic young lady, who came and put her arm 'round my neck, and cried with me, than the power of God. Needless to say such a conversion did not last, nor did the magnetic young lady's religion prove very deep, for in turn she flirted with all the young men converts, fascinating them, and in turn jilting them. I was one of the innocents. It was about this period of my life that I first learned the use of profane language, and was not delivered from the habit until I came into the church.

About this time my father united with the Latter Day Saints, and being, at that time, the only one in the village, was, of course, singled out for the usual persecution and social ostracism. I often wondered why father would persist in following a religion which brought such odium upon the family.

His erstwhile coreligionists were perhaps the most bitter, and even their children at school would brand the younger members of our family as "Mormons," and vomit forth the spleen which they imbibed at home.

These were not pleasant days for our family, and I am sorry to now say that I was not at all in sympathy with my father's religion, though I would always defend it as best I could when attacked and no Saints were present.

I passed the state school standard at the age of thirteen and shortly afterwards entered the great army of the world's workers, following the occupation of a fisherman, being in company with my late brother, E. G. Jones, rather successful in a financial way. We were boat and gear owners before I was nineteen years old. I might here mention that my late eldest brother joined the church shortly after my father; but he was always religiously inclined, and when he came from Methodism to the Latter Day Saints, would persist in going to the Wesleyan meetings to tell them of the blessings of the restored gospel, with the result that they would "sing him down." He soon tired of that and separated himself entirely from them.

A branch was formed in Hastings through the efforts of Glaud Rodger, J. W. Gillen, Joseph F. Burton and wife, T. W. Smith and wife, and my father was installed as president of it, which position he occupied at the time of his death. I became more or less acquainted with the brethren named, also with those who followed them, viz.: Brn. Wight and Butterworth; but I always studiously avoided any conversation with them, lest it should drift onto theology, which I did not desire. I had no time for it. When "afloat" my whole energies were concentrated upon my work, and when "ashore" upon cricket, football, etc. I always took an active part in public affairs, and in later life was often chosen as representative speaker of the class to which I belonged. I thus developed early the talent for public speaking, which I inherited from my father.

When about twenty-two years of age, I first met my wife Hypatia, her father, Doctor Rohner, being a local medical practitioner. There is a romance of real life in connection with our coming together that I can not relate here. We married when I was twenty-four and she twenty-one years old, and settled in Hastings. My father was very fond of my wife and when I would be away would visit her and teach her the beautiful principles of the gospel. So worldly was I, and so thick was the crust that by this time I had developed, that he could not speak of the gospel in my presence, and I am pleased to say he always had sufficient respect for my feelings to refrain from doing so. I, during single life, in my father's home, always avoided the Saints; and, although I respected some, I must confess that I had a strong dislike to others. When my mother knew the Saints were coming she would always give me meals beforehand, fearing lest I should treat them with contempt or incivility. Yet beneath the surface of my indifference and stubbornness, or whatever you may please to term it, there was a knowledge of weakness, and the real reason of my attitude lay in the fact that if I let them penetrate my armor I would have to come to a decision, for I realized beneath it all that their work was of God.

No one could get even the thin end of the wedge of truth through my armor. I had determined to shut out all light and was therefore like a man in a cave. But the great wheel of human life and fortune keeps turning, and each turn brings changing conditions to all, and so it proved in my life.

My father took ill, and in a short time passed into the unseen, and it was then that the first impressions of future work in the church seized my mind.

Dying in a comatose state, he could not give us any "last message," but the Spirit of God which followed him and his people came to me at his bedside, and breaking through the barrier of pride, worldliness, and sin, said to me, in a "still, small voice"—"If your father could have spoken and expressed his dying wish it would have been that you take up his work where he through death has laid it down." I do not remember telling these impressions, to any person, for I still desired to pursue my old life. I attended father's obsequies, which were conducted by Elder C. A. Butterworth, and yet did not make up my mind to step forward as prompted.

I shall never forget one Sunday afternoon, about a week after my father's decease, when attending a Sunday afternoon sacrament-meeting of the Saints I heard a Bro. Thomas Baxter prophecy to a sister recently baptized. I immediately recognized the Spirit of prophecy, and was thereupon fully convinced that the Saints' contention, "These signs shall follow them that believe," was true. There was a Spirit here that was not of man, and it was something totally different from anything I had ever seen in the Methodist, or any other church.

At this time quite a revival was being experienced among the Saints, and under the direction and preaching of Elder Butterworth over twenty persons were added to the church in a very short time.

There was also considerable persecution from the Church of England, Methodist, and Catholic peoples, who would repair to the place of baptism on the banks of a little creek called Warrungite (a native name) and jeer, scoff, and ridicule the Saints. It was upon the banks of that creek that I first showed to the public where or upon what side I intended in future to stand. It was there that I made (to me) the great concession of standing with the Saints, instead of with the scorners, whilst the service was in process. That was the turning-point with me. I had identified myself with that despised and hated sect. But why? Because the Spirit told me they were being persecuted for righteousness' sake; that they were being persecuted for believing in and practicing ordinances instituted by the Lord himself, whom these deriding Christians were professing to follow but by their works denying.

How could I hold aloof longer? And yet I did not give my name in for baptism. I well remember the entire breaking down of my pride. I had not prayed for years, but I felt the time had come when I must bend the knee, so I said to Hypatia, my wife, "Come, let us kneel together and seek the Lord's guidance, for I am filled with the thought that I must take my father's place among the Saints." We accordingly knelt and I prayed, vocally, my prayers being, no doubt, "few and short," but I rejoice to say effective in obtaining the needed guidance; so upon one Friday evening after preaching service I asked Bro. Butterworth to baptize me. Even then my pride almost caused me to leave the meeting without asking him, for I had to resist a strong impulse to leave the church. But something said to me, "It's not manly to do so. Rise from your seat and go straight up the aisle to the brother." I obeyed, and Bro. Butterworth accompanied me home to make arrangements.

It was conference week and the Spirit had told me, "If you will obey mine ordinances, there is a spiritual message awaiting you which will be delivered at this conference, and through it the whole course of your life will be altered." Bro. Butterworth, in conversation with me, said, "We understand by the Spirit that at this conference some one will be called to the office of elder, to fill the place of your deceased father, and I think it will be Bro. Mackie. But the Spirit said to me, "Thou art the man." Bro. Butterworth is right relative to an elder being called, but he is wrong in the person, for I am to take my father's place.

When Sunday came, the day appointed for my baptism, the wife having informed me that she would not obey though she had long believed, and would not obey without me. Now she felt the Spirit did not lead her; but upon the last moment she decided to accompany me, much to my delight. Though I told no one, I still had a strong aversion to being baptized. Oh, the humiliation of it! To go out and be publicly dipped and joined to a hated sect. I must confess I would have preferred secrecy rather than publicity, but I must do it, so went forward.

Wife was in a delicate state of health, and rumors went round the town that she died in being baptized; but though eleven years have passed she still lives and loves the work of God. But for it, I verily believe she would long since have passed from mortal life.

We repaired from the waters to the church, and among others, who had been baptized previously, were confirmed by the laying on of hands.

I had scarcely taken my seat when I heard a sister's (Sr. McIntosh from Queensferry) voice speaking to me in prophecy, and telling me that I should be called to preach the gospel in the islands of the sea and upon the top of the mountains.

Immediately, as the sister resumed her seat, Bro. Thomas Baxter, before referred to, arose and said, "Yea, verily, I say unto you, my servant, you are called to follow in the footsteps of your father. This brought with it truly a baptism of fire, which I shall never forget, for a warm power seemed to encircle and fill me, and I was almost literally forced to my feet and caused to testify that I knew the work was of God. And I did know absolutely and positively; not of man, but, as Peter of old, by the Father's revelation.

The same Spirit that had spoken to me inaudibly at my father's bedside here spoke in audible voice declaring exactly the same thing, though I knew they, the human instruments used in conveyance, knew nothing of the Spirit's previous communication to me. Even if they had known, under what obligation, humanly speaking, were they to believe my impressions correct and predict my future work to be in harmony with my own intuitions?

No one but those who have passed through a like experience can know with what convincing power and effect the Spirit burned that message into my heart and soul; yea, into every tissue and fiber of my whole being; and many times since when the clouds of spiritual darkness have hovered over and shadowed my spiritual horizon, that experience, or rather the ever green memory of it, has been as a "sheet anchor" to my soul.

Queensferry conference soon came around and the Hastings Branch sent in a recommendation thereto that Bro. J. H. N. Jones be ordained; but they did not specify to what office.

When the matter came before the conference some debating as to the wisdom of ordaining me to a lower office than my father had occupied obtained; but I knew they could not do it, and so it proved.

Bro. Woolley stood up in the conference and said,

"I understand by the Spirit that the brother is to be ordained to the eldership," and Bro. William Craig, whose acquaintance I had only a few days previously made, stood and said, "The prophecy said the Bro. is to follow in the footsteps of his father, and I second Bro. Woolley's proposition that he be ordained an elder." Not another word of discussion passed, but the whole assemblage voted for my ordination to that office, which ordination was accomplished on the following day, Sunday, January 5, 1896, under the hands of Brn. C. A. Butterworth, W. McIntosh, J. A. Read, and, I think, A. Woolley.

Upon my return to Hastings a few days later, and at the first regular meeting of the Hastings Branch after my ordination, I was chosen president in lieu of my late elder brother, E. G. Jones, who had occupied as presiding priest since father's death, and I was thus installed in the place vacated by my father. Only three months after joining the church I had the responsibility and care of a branch numbering seventy souls placed upon my shoulders.

I was ably assisted by Brn. Baxter, Woolley, and others, being continually directed and strengthened through prophecy and dream. It was a hard task for one so young in the faith to stand up and preach, teach, and exhort those who were "old hands," as it were. What success or failure attached to those efforts, I leave those ministered to, and God, to judge. I did my best, and for six long years continued directing (under God) the fortunes of the branch.

Many were the difficulties experienced, and no doubt my inexperience created some of them; but God had called me to exactly that position, and though, upon one occasion, I tried to throw off the responsibility by sending in my resignation, a prophecy, delivered to the branch through Sr. Baxter, whipped me back into line, and I have not since endeavored to shirk duty, however unpleasant. From that branch sprang many Saints, old and young, who have carried the message to the cities of this commonwealth.

During 1902, Bro. A. H. Smith, presiding Patriarch of the church, and Leon A. Gould, his stenographer, came to Victoria and gave blessings. When blessing me the same Spirit that had been present at my calling to the ministry caused him to say: "Because of the sterling integrity of the heart of thine ancestor, and thine own, thou shalt be recognized as one of the servants of God who is upbuilding the kingdom of God, and giving his substance of life and strength to it. . . . And if thou art faithful thy calling shall be increased, and the responsibility of higher position shall be placed upon thee, and thou shalt be made an instrument in God's hands of winning many souls for the fold of Christ. Enter in and occupy every opportunity that presents."

During that same year I was appointed managing director of the Victorian Fishermen's Association, the duties of which position led to my traveling considerably, thus gradually drawing me away from local work. Bro. Butterworth requested me to go to Adelaide upon a short mission of one month.

I did not at first care much for the mission, but when my wife pointed out that clause in my patriarchal blessing, "Enter in and occupy every opportunity," I could not refuse, so consented; came here and baptized three sisters, Cole, Lane, and Hahn, all ex-Brighamites.

It was while upon this month's mission that the Lord made known to me my future work, and consequently upon my return I offered myself for mission appointment and was accepted.

A remarkable happening occurred at the Victorian conference preceding my second departure for Adelaide mission. Bro. McIntosh, the district president, resigned; and, despite my protest, the Saints chose me to fill the vacancy. In vain did I protest, "I'm going to Adelaide, over five hundred miles, on a permanent mission, and how can I fill it?" I was sorely perplexed, thinking "some one had blundered," and upon returning to our lodgings, I asked the wife what she thought of the day's work. She replied, "It's all right!" "How?" I asked. She said, "Didn't the Lord say you were to follow in your father's footsteps, and you were about to leave Victoria without filling the position of district president, which he had for a time filled." "Oh," I said, "I see it all now." Those people were unconsciously led to fulfill the word of the Lord; for I am sure they had no thought of my calling, and they never again appointed me.

I had truly followed in all the offices held by my parent, and now I was to go into a larger field.

Wife and self left Melbourne upon our first mission in February of 1903, supposing that Elder Mackie, who preceded us thither by one month, was to be our companion in labor in opening up this new field.

But I can not describe the feelings of misgiving that overwhelmed me when Bro. Mackie told me that he had orders to return to Melbourne.

I was thus left in a city of one hundred and seventy thousand inhabitants on my first mission, and only about five persons to support me. They were all sisters, but they were noble ones. I shall mention them. Firstly, one aged Sr. Lane, who a short time ago passed to her long rest; then Sr. Cole; Sr. Eliza Lane (who came from a Brighamite family, some of whom are in Utah) and Sr. Vernon; Bro. and Sr. Hughes coming later.

We returned to Melbourne in 1905, and it was while there that intimations of higher office were given. One night, while preaching upon the streets of Richmond, Bro. E. Davis said to me, "The Spirit indicated to me to-night when I heard and felt the power of your preaching, that you will soon be called higher." I said, "Possibly; some day." He said and insisted, "When you return to Adelaide, in some way you will be raised to higher position."

I came to Adelaide a month later, in May, and when conference news came to hand my name was among those chosen for seventy. Thus the "responsibility of higher position" has been placed upon me; and what rejoices me more, I have been instrumental in God's hands in "winning many souls for the fold of Christ."

It was some time during the month of March, 1905, that Bro. Davis, upon the streets of Richmond, declared I should soon be called to higher office, and in May or June of the same year HERALDS reached me showing my name among those called to seventy.

This emphasizes powerfully the thought expressed by the Apostle Paul in the 4th of Ephesians: "There is one body and one Spirit." Surely, this is the "one Spirit," when the calling of a man is made known in Australia and America simultaneously. Thus when the word came I had no hesitation in accepting it, and was therefore at a later period ordained by Elder C. A. Butterworth.

I must here, in closing this brief sketch of my spiritual life, pay a tribute to my wife, Hypatia, who has sacrificed everything in life for the gospel. Her patient demeanor and fervent zeal for the cause of God has, even when physically unfit through a dreadful chronic complaint, caused her to brave all opposition to aid me in my work. God has blessed us in our labors in this city of churches, raising around us many noble souls to aid in the prosecution of the gospel work.

This ends my short ministerial experience; and truly this work has been to me "a marvelous work and a wonder"; and I pray God will give strength and light sufficient to enable me to continue therein until the end of mortal life. I trust that this short sketch may catch the eye of some stubborn one who is resisting the power of God as manifest in this great latter-day work, and cause him to yield to the pleadings of that "still, small voice," which would lead him into complete rapport with God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

In gospel bonds, faithfully yours,

J. H. N. JONES.

WHO PRESIDES?

Bro. G.—Mr. Chairman, I rise to move that the district president be recognized as the president of the conferences, without a vote calling him to that position at every session.

Chair.—The above is moved, and is now before you.

Bro. G.—Mr. Chairman, it is customary in most districts, at the convening of each conference, to call the district president by vote to preside, which right I believe he holds by virtue of his election to the district presidency, which I will try to prove, and if I fail or am mistaken, I hope to be set right. Custom does not always make right, so it will not do to argue that it is customary. In the Rules of Order, page 6, (new edition,) I read relative to district organization: "The officers elected should at once assume the authority and enter upon the discharge of their duties, and the temporary officers retire to the body of the assembly room."

Here it is stated that notwithstanding there had already been an election, calling a man to preside temporarily, as soon as a district president is elected the president of that meeting is requested to retire.

Again, page 3: "The rules governing the general assembly of the church in its deliberations, should also govern branch meetings." Now turn to page 100: "The branch officers are to be the officers who shall preside over, and have charge of these meetings; and none others shall preside, except," etc. These are business-meetings. And on page 101 a further explanation occurs. This ought to settle the matter of who presides so far as the Rules of Order is concerned; and it, having been adopted by the church, is law.

Now, let us go to Doctrine and Covenants and see if there is harmony between the two books.

"There should be no conflict or jealousy of authority between the quorums of the church." And there will not be when the law is understood. If it is the duty or right of the Twelve to preside in district conferences when present, then it is the right of the seventy also, a claim which I never have heard made. Listen: "The seventy when traveling by the voice of the church, or sent by the twelve to minister the word where the twelve can not go, are in the powers of their ministration apostles—those sent—and in meetings where no organization exists should preside, if no member of the twelve or presidency be present."—Doctrine and Covenants 120: 3. Here it is stated when and under what conditions it is the right and duty of an apostle to preside and that is, where no organization exists. "In both branches and districts the presiding officers should be considered and respected in their offices."—Paragraph 4. Where is their office? Rules of Order says the branch officers shall preside and none other.

This ought to locate presiding officer. But says some, Are not the Twelve the regulating authority? So they are, and so are the seventy; but where is it stated that they shall preside at a district conference? I have failed to find it; but I do find it stated that they (the Twelve and Seventy) "being the regulating and advising authorities," "should when present in branch or district be regarded and considered as the leading representatives of the church, and be respected as such." I have stated that this included the Seventy. Now for the proof:

"The traveling presiding councils [in the plural] of the church being made by the law, their calling and the voice of the church the directing, regulating and advising authorities of the church."—Doctrine and Covenants 120: 4. I understand that, if the Seventy were not included in the word councils, the word counselors would have been used. A quorum as a body is called a council, and two quorums would be councils (see section 104, paragraph 12 to 16). I understand that the regulating power is resident in the body. Doctrine and Covenants 17: 11: "The teacher shall see that all the members do their duty." Doctrine and Covenants 41: 1 and 2: "Ye shall see that my law is kept." "In matters of personal importance and conduct arising in branches or districts, the authorities of these branches and districts should be authorized and permitted to settle them; the traveling councils [not counselors,] taking cognizance of those only in which the law and usages of the church are involved, and the general interests of the church are concerned. Where cases of difficulty are of long standing, the council [not counselor, the one in charge representing his quorum], may require local authorities to adjust them; and in case of failure to do so, may regulate them as required by their office and duty." Doctrine and Covenants 120: 7.

The above citations, it seems to me, are sufficient to establish the fact that branches and districts have the power to regulate themselves, and that the traveling councils have no right to interfere in personal affairs arising in branches or districts, except local authorities neglect, or refuse to adjust them. How are the Twelve a presiding, regulating, and directing council? Read Doctrine and Covenants 120: 1; 104: 17.

Bro. P.—Mr. Chairman, I rise to move that this matter be tabled.

Chairman.—All favoring the motion say, aye.

Motion is carried.

Adjourned.

DIVORCE AND REMARRIAGE.

"Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path."—Psalm 119: 105.

Because of the fact that the marriage bond is so easily broken and dissolved by court decrees, and that remarriage is becoming so common in our land, it has become a subject of deep thought and concern in the minds of thinking and observing persons, both within and without the church.

The spirit of adultery seems to be rife in the world, and is being encouraged and increased by the ease with which it is seemingly made legal and honorable by divorce decrees and remarriage for other than scriptural causes. That it must be met and barred from the church upon scriptural grounds, by a strict enforcement of the law of God as revealed unto us in his word, seems to be the only remedy for saving the church from its evil results.

When man was created and placed in Eden God said it was not "good that man should be alone; wherefore, I will make an help meet for him," which, when he had done so, and the woman had been received by Adam, the declaration was made, "Therefore shall a man leave his father and mother and shall cleave unto his wife, and they shall be one flesh." There is nothing on record to justify the thought that God ever intended man and wife to be separated.

Under the Mosiac law a very liberal law of divorcement was allowed. When Christ came to establish the gospel—the celestial law of God—and the Pharisees came and temptingly asked the question whether it was "lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause," he said unto them, "Moses, because of the hardness of your hearts, suffered you to put away your wives; but from the beginning it was not so. And I say unto you, whosoever shall put away his wife, except for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery, and whoso marrieth her that is put away, doth commit adultery."—Matthew 19: 3-9, Inspired Translation.

Matthew 5: 36, Inspired Translation, records Christ as saying, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, that whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery; and whosoever shall marry her that is divorced, committeth adultery."

Mark records it thus: "Whosoever shall put away his wife, and marry another, committeth adultery against her. And if a woman shall put away her husband, and be married to another, she committeth adultery."—Mark 10: 2-10, Inspired Translation. Luke 16: 23, Inspired Translation, says: "Whosoever putteth away his wife, and marrieth another, committeth adultery; and whosoever marrieth her who is put away from her husband, committeth adultery." Mark and Luke both omit mentioning any justifying cause whatever for divorce and remarriage; but as Matthew does mention one, and only one, and that is fornication, we conclude that it is only an omission on the part of the other, and taken altogether Christ did teach that fornication was a justifying cause for divorce and remarriage. But it is also just as clear that unless the crime of fornication was committed that the putting away of a companion in wedlock and marrying another was committing adultery.

Further comment on what is recorded in the New Testament as the teachings of Christ seems to us unnecessary.

The Book of Mormon, page 447, paragraph 10, says that Christ taught "that whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery; and whoso shall marry her who is divorced, committeth adultery."

We see no reason from what is recorded in the Book of Mormon to conclude that Christ taught that any other cause save fornication would justify divorce and remarriage.

A writer in HERALD of April 10, 1907, page 307, in writing on marriage and divorce, and pleading for leniency in administering the law, says: "The aggregate of Bible testimony and of things reported as authoritative and binding to-day that were written for the condemnation of pious adulterers and frauds in Moses' time need thought and adjustment before hasty and unjust conclusions are settled upon. We are barely saved from the injustice of Romish decretal by what Matthew happened to say on this matter and that which the manuscript collectors have gotten into the canon. But of all that Christ did say and that may not be reported upon this question but may be reserved until the other ninety-nine parts of those things which 'Jesus truly said and did among his disciples' or—better still—may state to his church, is had, we may do well and please God as well if we make haste to go slowly in judgment. . . . What would Christ say if he were to speak to-day? That is the question for us to earnestly desire to know. What of affirmation or explanation of what men have reported of HIM?"

Latter Day Saints claim that God has spoken "to-day"—in this generation and dispensation—and we find it in perfect harmony with what ancient writers have "reported of him" having taught in their day.

Behold, verily I [Christ] say unto you, that whatever persons among you having put away their companions for the cause of fornication, or in other words, if they shall testify before you in all lowliness of heart that this is the case, ye shall not cast them out from among you; but if ye shall find that any persons have left their companions for the sake of adultery, and they themselves are the offenders, and their companions are living, they shall be cast out from among you. And again I say unto you, that ye shall be watchful, with all inquiry, that ye receive none such among you if they are married, and if they are not married, they shall repent of all their sins, or ye shall not receive them.—Doctrine and Covenants 42: 20.

Here we find that if the crime of fornication has been committed, that the innocent party is justified in again marrying, but no proof that any other cause is justifiable.

Thou shalt take the things which thou hast received, which have been given unto thee in my scriptures for a law, to be my law, to govern my church; and he that doeth according to these things, shall be saved, and he that doeth them not shall be damned, if he continues.—Doctrine and Covenants 42: 16.

The scriptures above alluded to evidently mean the Bible and what Christ taught as recorded therein, and we think is an "affirmation" of the same.

I am come a light into the world, and whosoever believeth on me shall not abide in darkness. And if any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not; for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world. He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him; the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day. For I have not spoken of myself; but the Father which sent me, he gave me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak. And I know that his commandment is life everlasting; whatsoever I speak therefore, even as the Father said unto me, so I speak.—John 12: 46-50, Inspired Translation.

In Compilation of General Conference Resolutions, No. 66, adopted April 10, 1866, we find it to be strictly in harmony with the records as we have quoted them. Resolution 272, adopted April 9, 1884, is also in harmony with the written word, and recognizes only one cause for justifiable divorce with a view to remarriage—that of fornication.

Resolution No. 412, General Conference Resolutions, which covers some five pages of printed matter on the subject of marriage, divorce, etc., etc., we never could understand, nor have we found any one who could explain the same, therefore we can not pass an intelligent opinion about it.

In a recent editorial in the HERALD we find the following language used in reference to marriage and divorce: "We have no other suggestion to offer other than that it must be apparent to every thinker that Jesus did not intend that the innocent should suffer unnecessarily for the crimes of the guilty."—HERALD for May 1, 1907, page 371.

Also one in Ensign for May 23, 1907, which is arguing for leniency on the law relative to the matter under consideration. The feeling of sympathy and pity for the unfortunate in wedlock may appeal to us strongly that we should not cause them suffering by requiring them to submit to the strict letter of the law which forbids remarriage for any other cause than fornication. We question the propriety of modifying God's law simply upon the ground that it is severe upon those that may be affected thereby.

We agree with a writer in HERALD for June 19, 1907, page 546, who says:

It is as possible, aye, probable, that the Reorganization may fail of its purposes as the organizations of the past have done. Our safety lies in hewing to the line and executing all of God's plans. We are not called upon to become apologists for the Almighty. It is not pleasing to him for us to seek to do his will after the ways of the world. The duty of the hour is to apply here and now the law of God relating to the present time, leaving the things appertaining to the life to come to the disposal of the Almighty.

We have been counseled just recently through the gifts of the gospel that we should keep the law of God to the "very letter." (See Ensign for April 4, 1907, page 3.)

The history of God's dealings with mankind in the past does not justify us in expecting that he will not execute his law because of those having to suffer who are not guilty. The flood in Noah's time and the fire at Sodom destroyed all—the innocent with the guilty—excepting a very few. When King Saul was commanded of God to destroy the Amalekites, not excepting the innocent, and his men failed to do it, evidently with his knowledge, he was severely rebuked by the prophet Samuel, who declared:

Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt offerings and sacrifices, as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams. For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft, and stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry. Because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, he has also rejected thee from being king.—1 Samuel 15; also read Numbers, chapter 15, from verse 32 to end of chapter, in connection with chapter 16, verses 1 to 35.

In this case the pleading for not too great strictness is keeping the law did not avail with the Lord, and the innocent also suffered because of the guilty. When David got displeased because God smote Uzza when he unthinkingly violated his law, we have no record that God ever apologized to David. (See 1 Chronicles 13: 10, 11, in connection with Chronicles 15: 11-15 and Numbers 4: 15.)

When because of the transgressions of latter-day Israel they were driven out of Zion, the innocent suffered equal with the guilty. God hath declared that "my word . . . shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and prosper in the thing whereto I sent it."—Isaiah 55: 11.

Ye shall see that my law is kept. He that receiveth my law and doeth it the same is my disciple; and he that saith he receiveth it and doeth it not, the same is not my disciple, and shall be cast out from among you.—Doctrine and Covenants 41: 2.

Search these commandments, for they are true and faithful, and the prophecies and promises which are in them shall all be fulfilled. What I the Lord have spoken I have spoken, and I excuse not myself; and though the heavens and the earth pass away, my word shall not pass away, but shall all be fulfilled, whether by my own voice, or the voice of my servants, it is the same; for behold, and lo, the Lord is God, and the Spirit beareth record, and the record is true, and truth abideth for ever. Amen.—Doctrine and Covenants 1: 7, 8.

The works, and the designs, and the purposes of God, can not be frustrated, neither can they come to naught, for God doth not walk in crooked paths; neither doth he turn to the right hand nor to the left; neither doth he vary from that which he hath said; therefore his paths are straight, and his course is one eternal round. Remember, remember, that it is not the work of God that is frustrated, but the work of men; for although a man may have many revelations, and have power to do many mighty works, yet if he boasts in his own strength, and sets at naught the counsels of God, and follows after the dictates of his own will, and carnal desires, he must fall and incur the vengeance of a just God upon him.—Doctrine and Covenants 2: 1, 2.

God hath declared (as we verily believe) through Bro. Joseph Luff that "men within and without my church shall yet learn that but one pattern hath been given by which ye shall build, if I shall accept your labor; and but one line hath been given by which to measure; and whosoever shall not gauge himself thereby and crucify himself to the world, shall yet be gauged thereby and shall lose his all—for, 'whosoever shall fall upon this stone shall be broken, but upon whomsoever it shall fall it shall grind him to powder.'"

"I have spoken! few have heeded!
What remains for me to do?
Warnings old wait vindication!
Man must learn that God is true."

Yours for the truth,
JOSEPH FLORY.

Original Poetry

Speak No Evil.

Speak no evil of thy neighbor,
Though his sins seem black as night;
If thine own are under cover,
Why bring other's to the light?

Advertise not once thy brother,
When his faults thou mayest see!
Seek his good, and with him labor,
Labor for eternity.

If thou would expose all evil,
Brand thine own sins first of all;
Slipp'ry is the road of gossip,
Take care, brother, lest thou fall.

When thy soul is bathed in sorrow,
Wounded by thy friends of clay;
Pray the Lord that ere the morrow
They may walk the nobler way.

Revenge? Never! Thy goal, heaven,
There the conq'ring throng will be:
Each good deed to this world given
Shall be multiplied to thee.

Where the wicked cease to trouble
And the weary are at rest;
God will gather all his humble,
In the land for ever blest.

Work for God Can Never Die.

Ho! ye who spend your strength for naught,
And slight the blessings Christ has brought,
Toilers for earth, and time, and sense,
O, what shall be your recompense?
Of all that's done beneath the sky,
Little hath immortality;
What's done for earth fails by and by,
What's done for God can never die.

Ho! ye who join the eager strife,
For gold, or fame, or pride of life,
Indulge the lusts of flesh and eye,
And for the world with worldlings vie;
Death shall undo your toils so vain,
And leave you no abiding gain;
What's done for time ends by and by,
What's done for God can never die.

Scepters and crowns will mock our trust,
Monarchs may crumble back to dust;
By moth, or rust, or thief, or fire,
Treasures will flee, and hopes expire;
Desire shall fail, and strength decay,
The world itself shall pass away;
What's done for sense fails by and by,
What's done for God can never die.

When comes the King in royal might,
To crush the wrong and crown the right;
When all the saints in glory meet,
No more to die, no more to weep;
When thrones are set and crowns are given,
With all the rich rewards of heaven,—
O, in that glorious by and by,
What's done for God can never die.

—Edward Upton Marvin.

The Opening Gates.

The human heart asks love; but now I know
That my heart hath from Thee
All real, and full, and marvelous affection,
So near, so human! yet Divine perfection
Thrills gloriously the mighty glow;
Thy love is enough for me!

There were strange soul-depths, restless, vast and broad,
Unfathomed as the sea;

An infinite craving for some infinite stilling;
 But now Thy perfect love is perfect filling!
 Lord Jesus Christ, my Lord, my God,
 Thou, Thou art enough for me.
 —Frances Ridley Havergal, in Christian Home.

"There were strange soul-depths, restless, vast, and broad." Oh, the longings of life as they beat restlessly against the shores of time toward the eternities. There is a silence that surrounds the immortal faculties; an invisible line that severs the spiritual essence of the soul from the material world.

A soul out in the silence, alone in the dark, struggling with yearning, with desires that can have but an infinite fulfillment.

"An infinite craving for some infinite stilling." Oh, the cry out through the empty voids of earth for an answer which only Heaven can give.

The answer when the infinite touches the soul, when the light and glory of the Highest answers the immortal longings of life.

Frances Ridley Havergal unfolding the vision of her verses breathes out the beauty of his indwelling: "It is when the King has really come in peace to His own home in the 'contrite and humble spirit,' (not before) when He has entered in to make his abode there (not before) that the soul is satisfied with him alone, and is ready to let any Ziba take all else, because all else really seems nothing at all in comparison to the conscious possession of the treasure of treasures.

"Sometimes this is reached at once, in the first flush of wondering joy at finding the King really 'come in peace' to the empty soul which wanted to be 'his own house.' Sometimes very gradually, as year after year we realize his indwelling more and more, and find again and again that he is quite enough to satisfy us in all circumstances; that the empty corners of the 'house' are filled one after another; that the old longings have somehow gone away, and the old ambitions vanished; and that the old tastes and interests in the things of the world are superseded by stronger tastes and interests in the things of Christ; that he is day by day more really filling our lives, till he leads us on to the rapturous joy of the 'Yea, doubtless,' and 'all things!'"

"Now, have we got as far as saying 'some things,' without being quite sure about 'all things?' Do you see that it all hinges upon Jesus coming into the heart as 'his own house'—altogether 'his own?' For if there are some rooms of which we do not give up the key, some little sitting-room which we would like to keep as a little mental retreat, with a view from the window, which we do not quite want to give up; some lodger whom we would rather not send away just yet; some little dark closet which we have not resolution to open and set to rights, of course the King has not full possession; it is not all and really 'his own'; and the very misgiving about it proves that he has therefore not yet 'come again in peace.' It is no use expecting 'perfect peace,' while he has a secret controversy with us about any withholding of what is 'his own' by purchase. Only throw open the doors, 'and the King of Glory shall come in,' and then there will be no craving for other guests. He will 'fill this house with glory,' and there will be no place left for gloom.

"Is it not so? Bear witness, tell it out, you with whom the King dwells in peace! Life is filled with bright interests, time is filled with happy work or peaceful waiting, the mind is filled with his beautiful words and thoughts, the heart is filled with his presence, and you 'abide satisfied' with him. Yes, 'tell it out!'"

Elizabeth Barrett Browning once translated the soul-longing answered in the simple words "Our Father!"

"Two words, indeed, of praying we remember,
 And at midnight's hour of harm,
 'Our Father,' looking upward in the chamber,
 We say softly for a charm,
 We know no other words except 'our Father';
 And we think that in some pause of angel's song,
 God may pluck them with the silence sweet to gather,
 And hold them both within his right hand, which is strong."—Mary P. Denny, in Christian Home.

How They Began.

Recently, when two hundred or more men who acknowledged themselves drinking men—many of them habitual drunkards—were gathered in a meeting by the Breakfast Association, a speaker asked that all who had begun to drink after the age of twenty-one would raise their hands. Six responded.

He then asked that all who had begun to drink before twenty-one would raise their hands; a sea of hands were raised. By saving the boys from the saloons, we can go far toward saving the next generation. It is not the drunkards who sustain the saloons. The real drunkard earns nothing, and has nothing to spend. The saloon is sustained by the moderate drinker, the man who works one day that he may drink the next; who works six days, that between Saturday night and Monday he may pour his earnings into the gorged till of the saloon. It is sustained by the young man, just beginning to drink, who, in his newly-found enjoyment is eager to treat all his friends.

Letter Department

SCRANTON, Pennsylvania, February 29, 1908.

Dear Brothers and Sisters: I did not expect when I sent my letter to the HERALD, last December, that I would receive kind and sympathetic letters from so many of you. Some have inclosed money, and did not send their addresses, so I have not been able to answer their letters. I thank them very much for their kindness in the hour of need. My heart is full of gratitude to the Lord for his kindness to me.

Truly has the promise been fulfilled that my dear husband made to me in that vision, mentioned in my letter of December 25, 1907.

Our branch here is in very good condition. Nine were baptized last month, and they are of the good soil. There is some talk of trying to build a house of worship in the near future. The hall in which we hold our meetings we can only have on Sundays and Thursday evenings, and the second and fourth Tuesdays, for which we have to pay ten dollars per month. There are several good people interested, and if the unity and peace that now prevails continues, we look for them and others to unite with us.

Sunday, February 16, is a day long to be remembered by many of us here. The Lord truly blessed us with healings, prophecies, and visions. The presence of the Holy Spirit was enjoyed in a marked degree.

Three of our young brethren, viz.: Walter Lewis, William Davis, and William Evans, were appointed delegates to the conference, which convened at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, February 22, 1908. They returned home highly pleased with what they saw and heard. By request of this branch, the next conference will be held here.

February 26, 1908, our aged brother, J. J. Morgan, was laid to rest. He was in his seventy-seventh year. Oh, how I wish that my dear husband could have been spared to see that ripe old age. It seems to me I would be one of the happiest persons on earth; but the Lord willed it otherwise, so I must take courage, and if we can have health, in a few years some of my little ones will be able to help to support the others.

In answer to several inquiries I will say that I have three daughters, ages thirteen, twelve, and eight years; four boys, ten, four, two years, and baby George, eight months old.

February has been a cold, stormy month, with much snow. It has been hard on poor people that had limited means to purchase fuel. I have been very fortunate. The D. L. & W. Coal Co., in whose mines, my dear husband lost his life, has furnished me fuel free, since his death, for which I am very thankful. Now, dear Saints, I again thank you for your kindness, and pray that you may always have an abundance of the necessaries of life, and especially the communion of the Holy Spirit.

Your sister,
ELLEN MORRIS.

PLYMOUTH, Massachusetts, February 16, 1908.

Editors Herald: I am somewhat interested in your pages, as they come weekly to my home, gathering from the great fountain head rich stores of knowledge, knowing the gospel reveals the righteousness of God; and when I learn from the experience of others in the gospel work, I am convinced that we are taught by the selfsame Spirit. This work comes to us as a marvel, and when I consider my weakness before him, in my finite condition, I tremble to think that such a wonder-working God as he is should select me to represent him. If I could only strip myself of every selfish act, how gladly I should do it! I love his name; I love his word. Oh, how I want to be Zion indeed! The thought was expressed, "It is hard to keep sweet sometimes under environments"; it is true. But the Lord has said we should be cheerful in our warfare, that we may be joyous in our triumph. Over what? Over all things. The Apostle Paul says we can do all things through Christ that strengthens us. I hope and pray that at the General Conference proper steps will be taken to adjust some things that have been agitated, not because it disturbs my peace, but that every one should be respected in his office. We all believe the gathering time is upon us, and we should try to have all things prepared before us. I hope that I shall have the Zion spirit, for we are informed that Zion is the "pure in heart." I know that there will be no excuse for me if I do not become pure through this message. I feel sad, at times, when I compare myself with the standard, that I have made such little advancement. I hope that I shall be more useful to his work in the future than I have been in the past. I was in hopes that I could attend the General Conference next April, but I can not. I shall wait the due time of the Lord. I want to be associated with those from whom I can learn the rules and order of the church; for if there is anything that I am proud of in this life it is the angel message. I hope that I may be able to conduct myself in the future so that I shall not bring any spot or blemish on the work. I want to be willing to pass through anything that the divine mind would have me pass through. The words of Job were, "He knows the way that I take. When he has tried me I shall come forth as gold." May the Lord direct, make things better in the coming conference, and may his choice blessings be upon all the Israel of God, is my prayer.

SHIP ISLAND, Mississippi, February 23, 1908.

Editors Herald: I am at work at Ship Island, and it is very lonesome out here. This island is located in the Gulf of Mexico. My home is in Biloxi, Mississippi, about twelve miles from here. My father, mother, two brothers, and four sisters all belong to the church, except one. I have been in the church about six years. I like to read the letters in the HERALD. We have no church building at Biloxi, and only a few Saints; but we meet every Sunday at the house of a brother and have church and Sunday-school. We also have prayer-meeting every Wednesday night, and God blesses us in what we try to do. I miss church and Sunday-school while away from home, but try to get home once every two weeks.

Your brother,

CHARLIE ENTREKIN.

FAYETTE CITY, Pennsylvania, March 1, 1908.

Editors Herald: Have some outsiders investigating our claims. I was privileged to preach for them nine nights; then their preacher had me shut out of the church, after Sunday night, but I left the people mostly in favor of us. Took a vote at the close of our meeting Sunday night. All voted in favor of continuing our meeting, except four, the number being between thirty and forty. These parties were in favor of the other preacher, and one of them held the key, and so locked us out. The people seemed quite indignant over the matter, and said they would see the lady that owned the building and get it for me if they possibly could, if I would promise to come back. I promised them I would. The building belongs to a rich widow lady whose husband built it for any denomination to preach in, except the Catholics, and was never dedicated to any denomination. The only terms required were good order and the consent of the majority of the people. It was admitted that we had the best order that was ever had there, and preached more Bible than they ever heard before; and we certainly had the majority with us, as the vote showed. The old preacher talked debate, so I left propositions for him to consider. This place is located on the Monongahela River about six miles from New Salem, Pennsylvania.

Bro. Baldwin has been holding a series of meetings here at Fayette City. Three have been baptized, the result of a series of meetings held just prior to and after holidays. Others are near the kingdom. Think they will be with us soon. Among those that were baptized was a Mr. Davis and wife, he being a Disciple or Campbellite preacher in high standing among the people here. But, oh, what a change! He is a Mormon now, and deluded. Poor fellow! The papers are giving us lots of free advertising at present. So the good work goes on. To God be all the praise. The weather is somewhat changeable here at present; plenty of mud as a rule. Hope to be able to attend General Conference this year, and take a view o'er the land of Zion, the hope of the Saints. May God bless his work everywhere, is our prayer,

JAS. C. MCCONNAUGHY.

FALCON, Colorado, February 19, 1908.

Editors Herald: I was appointed to labor in the Colorado mission this year, but on account of conditions at home I have not been able to do much in the way of traveling. However, I have been making good use of my time in a local way. In May I began preaching in the schoolhouse at Falcon, which is seven miles away, and I was having a good attendance and a splendid interest when I was notified by those in charge that I was preaching too much doctrine, and unless I would quit preaching doctrine I would have to hunt new quarters. This did not suit my congregation, as they were getting interested and wanted to hear more. So I secured the use of a schoolhouse three miles south of Falcon, and invited all to come. As a result I am having from forty to sixty outsiders out to every meeting.

I am also holding services the second and fourth Sundays of each month eleven miles east of here in another schoolhouse. At this place I am having a good interest also.

I see in the account of the "Burr-Prophater debate," as published in the HERALD, that Prophater makes the statement that he "met Curtis in Colorado and finished him in proper shape."

I met Mr. Prophater at Vernon, Colorado, which is about fourteen miles southwest of Wray. Bro. S. D. Payne, of Nebraska, debated with him two nights on the Book of Mormon, and then we got him to sign church propositions, and I debated with him six nights, commencing March 15, 1907, and ending March 20. I affirmed our church the first three nights, and then when it came his turn to affirm his church he wanted to quit and not debate any more; but he had signed the propositions, so we held him to it. His efforts in affirming his church were a failure, as he would not affirm anything. So we had to set up his church for him and then show the weakness of their position. As a result of the debate the Saints of Wray, who attended, were strengthened, and many outsiders expressed themselves as being favorable to our side. The last night of the debate (which was held in their church), I challenged him to meet us in the Saints' church in Wray on the same propositions. He flatly refused to do so, stating that he "was satisfied." And I guess he was (to quit).

The last night of the discussion before going to sleep, I had the following vision: I saw an old shack of a building that was almost ready to go to pieces. There was only one nail in each end of each board and they were loose and almost ready to fall out. The building had no foundation at all, but was sitting on a bed of loose sand. The wind was blowing and the sides of the building were swaying back and forth two or three feet on each side. Just then Prophater appeared on the scene in his shirt-sleeves, and he had three men with him, and they were trying to keep the building from tumbling down by putting props against it; but no sooner would they leave their props and start to get another, when the sides of the building would heave and out would go their props. They could not get a single prop to stand. Finally the building collapsed. Before the vision was taken from me an audible voice said, "This building represents the church Prophater is trying to uphold."

If this is the way he finished us in proper shape, then we are willing to be finished again at any time.

I rejoice in the work of the Master, and have been wonderfully blessed by his Spirit while preaching. My desire is to live so that I may be accounted worthy to assist in the redemption of Zion. Ever praying for the advancement of God's work,

Sincerely,
J. D. CURTIS.

MARLETTE, Michigan, February 24, 1908.

Dear Herald: Though we are but few in this town, enjoying the blessings of this latter-day work, we feel as though we are God's children. We have no branch here; but we have a nice little Sunday-school of about thirty. We have only ten Saints here. We have Sunday-school every Sunday at half past ten, and prayer-meeting at half past eleven, and every Wednesday evening. We are enjoying the blessings of our dear Master. We are praying that the time may not be far distant when we shall have a branch raised up here, so we may have more help in this work.

Bro. Grimes was here with us before Christmas for a few days, and was back again last week, so we feel quite encouraged and built up, and rejoice in this good work, and feel to go on serving the Master. We can truly say that we are thankful for the restored gospel.

Bro. George M. Shippy and Bro. David Dowker were the first to open up the work in Marlette, a year ago last September. They had the tent here. We were baptized, and two others. They each have been here once since they took the tent away. We have not had any preaching since, only as an elder would come through occasionally and stay a few days. Still we feel as though we are not as bad off as some others. We have a building here now where we hold our Sunday-school and prayer-meeting; and if an elder can come and give us a call we would be pleased to have him come, as we will only have the building until the first of April unless we can make further arrangements. Ever praying for the welfare of God's people, and the advancement of the cause,

Your sisters in gospel bonds,
AVIS WESTOVER.
ROSA MESSACAR.

SOUTH ADDISON, Maine, February 24, 1908.

Editors Herald: Since I joined this church last August, I have not seen a letter in the church papers from this place. I enjoy reading the letters from other brethren and sisters. They are generally the first I read when the Ensign and HERALD come. They are such good food for the hungry in Spirit. We should not live by bread alone; but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. I also take the Autumn Leaves, Religio Quarterly, and Sunday-school Quarterly. Could not get along without them. They banish the desire for worldly reading. We do not have much preaching here, only once since last September, by Uriah M. Kelley. I wish some of the elders would come here. They will always be welcome. Some are interested. I enjoy the Mothers' Home Column, and the Daughters of Zion. They do help mothers who get discouraged. I feel to thank God every day that he has shown me the right way; and I pray I may show it to others. If they will believe and do his will, they shall know of the doctrine. Hoping and praying I may always be found faithful, and not wrap up my talent in a napkin,

Your sister in the one faith,
BLANCHE REYNOLDS.

CALGARY, Alberta, February 20, 1908.

Dear Herald: I wrote through your columns last month, and have received so many inquiries I find it impossible to answer them all separately. If you will kindly publish this along with the homestead law of the province, I am sure it will be of great help to the poor of the church.

I am sorry for poor people, and this country offers a home to every energetic person. Some of the inquirers asked me to send them literature printed for distribution. I do not care to send it to any one, for it is misleading, and I do not want to have any one come to Alberta thinking every one here is going to work for the benefit of new settlers. The board of trade sent to the old country telling the people they could have their choice of a coal mine or a gold mine on their homestead. You can imagine their disappointment when they were applying for a homestead. Of course they preferred a gold mine. Who would not? And as I have read the literature that is now ready to send broadcast, I do not think it is justice to the people who are depending on it as true.

In the eight years we have lived here, there has not been a total failure of crops. Last year, all through, was the worst, both for grain and cattle. The winter started November 1, and was very cold all through the winter months. There was about a foot of snow, and as no one had ever needed to feed their cattle before they had not put up enough hay to feed all winter, and the snow covered the range, so the cattle starved. The mercury registered the lowest, forty-two degrees [below zero, we presume] on February 22, 1907. None of the literature gives this kind of items. Every other winter has been very nice. This year has been exceptionally mild. There is no snow, no cold weather, and sunshine every day. There are many homesteads, not near the railroad, but it will be but a short time till the railroads will be finished to every district. Then, of course, homesteads will be at a premium. There is a lot of land just opened up for homesteading; five hundred in number, and is east of the town of Carstairs. That town is thirty-nine miles north of Calgary. Land all through that district sells for twelve and fourteen dollars per acre. I would not advise any who have written to me to buy improved land or to rent. No one rents in this country. It is no way to do. A man is just working for some one else by renting. I do not advise old people to come, especially when they have only a few hundred dollars.

This section is settled for miles all around the railroad, both north and south. Take a map of Alberta and locate the railroad now built, and the ones just being constructed, then you can see how thickly it is settled. We have, as a rule, good, honest, industrious citizens, a great many Americans, and Englishmen right from the old country, and settlers from the older provinces. One hundred and thirty miles to the south is Raymond, where the Salt Lake people are settled. They are all law-abiding people. We never hear of their making any trouble. You timid ones need not be afraid of the people here. We are all civilized.

The wage scale is fairly good. Farm hands get $40 a month and board; women $20 to $30, according to work required. Servant girls in the city, $15 to $25; restaurant and hotel waitresses, $25 to $30. Schoolteachers $50 a month in the country schools, and $750 to $900 a year in the cities. But remember you Yankee teachers would all have to go to normal to qualify here, before you could get a school at all. Living is rather high this year, as produce is very high; but on other years it has been cheap enough. Some of the market prices are: Beef, 5 to 7 cents; pork, 10 to 12 cents; chickens, 20 to 22 cents; butter, 30 to 35 cents; eggs 35 to 40 cents per dozen. They have never been lower than 20 cents, and they have been as high as 75 cents a dozen. Potatoes 75 to 90 cents a bushel. They are high this year. Usually they are 40 to 60 cents. Carrots, 75 cents; parsnips, 75 cents; beets 60 to 80 cents, according to quality. Cabbage 3 cents a pound. All garden stuff grows well here. I grow everything, in fact, but corn and fruit. Strawberries and raspberries grow wild; and I think could be cultivated with care.

South of here are great coal mines, and timber on the rivers and creeks. North, there is lots of timber and wood and coal. Water is reached at different depths in different locations. One could not answer for the whole province, as it is about four hundred miles wide by six hundred miles long; but in places of which I have knowledge, water is found at from thirty to sixty feet. The country is a rolling land, with rivers, creeks, and small lakes, making it an ideal cattle country. There are vast, level plains, or bottom lands, that yield the finest hard winter wheat. Wheat will yield 35 to 50 bushels per acre; barley, 30 to 40; oats, 50 to 90.

Horses and cattle will be high this spring. Some years horses are very cheap. They will be about $225, and up, for a team. Every one expects cattle to be very high this spring, although there are lots to be had for $20 to $30 each. Harness, single, $25 to $30; double, heavy, $40 to $60; wagons, $60 to $80; plows, $16 to 20, etc. These prices apply to new implements; but there are many opportunities to pick up second hand things. Settlers are allowed to bring in one or two cars of settlers' effects. Your home emigrant agent will give you a list of the things you are allowed to bring across the line.

Lumber is very high, as it is in all prairie countries, as the timber here is too small to make into lumber. It is used for fencing and wood. You can build a six-room house for about one thousand dollars; that is the very outside figure, and will be well finished. The majority build a four-room or log house at about three to four hundred dollars.

Wild game is plentiful; but it is protected and can only be killed in the fall. There is an abundant supply of fish in the rivers and creeks.

As to the coal shortage,—so many have asked about—there is no shortage. We have coal, both hard and soft, and enough to supply the world for hundreds of years. The shortage was due to the cars all being used to carry the immense wheat crops away and as the Canadian Pacific Railway has everything its own way they bring coal from the mines just when they please. But other roads are being built. Coal, at the mines, is $3.00 a ton; here in Calgary, $6.50. Groceries are very reasonable; so is clothing, and have the very best goods money can buy. Very few here want cheap, shoddy goods. Everything a person can want is here to supply the demand. I believe I have covered most all the questions, except one from Colorado, who wants to know if we have to use snow shoes or stilts to get around in the snow. You have more snow there in Colorado than we do here. It is not over eighteen hundred miles to the home of any one who has inquired, and your ticket will not be over $35 or $40. Trusting this letter will satisfy each one, I am,

Yours in gospel bonds,

MRS. NELLIE WILSON.

SYNOPSIS OF CANADIAN NORTHWEST HOMESTEAD REGULATIONS.

Any even numbered section of Dominion Lands in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, excepting 8 and 26, not reserved, may be homesteaded by any person who is the sole head of a family, or any male over 18 years of age, to the extent of one-quarter section of 160 acres, more or less.

Application for entry must be made in person by the applicant at a Dominion Lands Agency or Sub-Agency for the district in which the land is situate. Entry by proxy may, however, be made at an Agency on certain conditions by the father, mother, son, daughter, brother or sister of an intending homesteader.

The homesteader is required to perform the homestead duties under one of the following plans:

(1) At least six months' residence upon and cultivation of the land in each year for three years.

A homesteader may, if he so desires, perform the required residence duties by living on farming land owned solely by him, not less than eighty (80) acres in extent, in the vicinity of his homestead. Joint ownership in land will not meet this requirement.

(3) If the father (or mother, if the father is deceased) of a homesteader has permanent residence on farming land owned solely by him, not less than eighty (80) acres in extent, in the vicinity of the homestead, or upon a homestead entered for by him in the vicinity, such homesteader may perform his own residence duties by living with the father (or mother).

(4) The term "vicinity" in the two preceding paragraphs is defined as meaning not more than nine miles in a direct line, exclusive of road allowances crossed in the measurement.

(5) A homesteader intending to perform his residence duties in accordance with the above while living with parents or on farming land owned by himself, must notify the Agent for the district of such intention.

Six months' notice in writing must be given to the Commissioner of Dominion Lands at Ottawa, of intention to apply for patent.

Deputy of the Minister of the Interior.

PURYEAR, Tennessee, March 2, 1908.

Dear Herald: We have been blessed with many good sermons this winter by Brn. Wight, Kelley, and Tucker. Their many words of cheer and encouragement have been truly appreciated. I had the pleasure of attending the debate between Bro. J. W. Wight, and Mr. Tant, of the Christian Church. At first Mr. Tant thought he had an easy task to tear down the faith of the Saints; but he soon learned the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ had a firm foundation, unmovable as the Rock of Ages. He asserted their church was founded on the day of Pentecost; but Bro. Wight showed them their work started at the root of a tree by Mr. Thomas Campbell, in the year 1811. Mr. Tant would not stay on the church proposition, but rambled off, trying to cry down Joseph Smith and the Book of Mormon. Bro. Wight had no trouble in meeting every assertion against the truth, and made many friends to the latter-day work. Even Mr. Tant grew ashamed to say J-o-e S-m-i-t-h, but would call him Joseph Smith. He said it was in the Book of Mormon that John the Revelator was alive; but when asked to show the proof, he did not. Finally he had to go to Braden and Bays to occupy his time, reading their Mother Goose stories, which have been refuted twenty years ago. Bro. Wight was prepared on every point. We watched with much interest, and the words came forcibly: "How are the mighty fallen," when we witnessed Mr. Tant and his moderator look sick and forsaken when their last little prop went down. He tried hard to prove the name had been changed from saint to Christian, even went so far as to read the name saint in the Corinthian letter. But when Bro. Wight read part of the letter to them, they found many things therein new to them which they did not believe or practice. It was proved that Paul addressed the people of the church as saints always. Mr. Tant simply let the fourth chapter of Ephesians alone. "So it is there yet." Many of the Christians said, "That fourth chapter of Ephesians will be a hard one for him to get over, but if he don't mention it we will know he can't." So at the close they acknowledged to some of the Saints that he did not touch it. Mr. Tant publicly acknowledged that the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ does not teach, preach, or practice polygamy, and is a separate and distinct church from the one set up by Brigham Young in Utah.

Much good was done. Some said, "We think more of you Latter Day Saints now than we did before." Many came to Bro. Wight and cordially invited him to come and make their houses his home while in this part of the country. I am satisfied many of the Christians learned much more than they are willing to acknowledge.

Bro. T. C. Kelley met a Missionary Baptist in discussion at Austin Springs the 25th ult., Bro. Tucker acting as moderator. I have not learned the particulars, but feel sure the more our opponents try to rub the truth the brighter it will shine.

Our work is improving some. Sunday-school is doing fairly well, considering the weather. This is the place for plenty of rain and sticky mud. I sometimes wish I was in Alabama, especially when I loose my rubbers in the mud.

A sister in the faith,

MRS. D. E. TUCKER.

Extracts from Letters.

Mrs. M. Houck, Janesville, Wisconsin: "If it should be convenient for an elder in Kansas City to go to Greely, Kansas, on the Missouri Pacific Railroad, I should be pleased to have one go and preach there, as I have a daughter and a son-in-law living there, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Moore. There is also a family there by the name of Johnson, who are acquainted with the word. I gave them the Ensign to read, and they always like to hear me talk on the gospel."

Notices.

To the Saints of Arizona, New Mexico, and Adjoining Territory: We take this method of informing the isolated Saints in the above-named region of country, that our people in Bisbee, Arizona, have recently purchased a lot and building, and expect soon to have a church of their own in which to worship. We are also authorized to solicit your aid in this needful enterprise. This we do more cheerfully because we are not unacquainted with the enterprising and generous spirit characteristic of Western people, and because we know you will not consider the building of a church in Bisbee as of local importance only. While it is of local importance, we know you will at once recognize that it is of more than local importance, and that a church in Bisbee will give our work prestige and permanency, in all this section of country, as nothing else can. Bisbee is already the chief city in Arizona, and is destined to become the great mining center of the Southwest, if not of the United States. We were fortunate in securing this property so cheaply. Our entire indebtedness, when the building is seated and ready for occupancy, will be about $750. We hope to pay this by June 1. This is your opportunity. You will not neglect it, of course. Do not hesitate to help us because you live outside of the territory described above. If you have any interest in us and the work we are striving to do, "show us." You know where we are "from." If any one wishes to assist us, and has not the money at present, please write us how much you desire to give and when you can send it. Do this at once so we can better estimate when payment can be made. Send all communications and contributions to the undersigned, and he will receipt you for the same. Use box number in addressing envelope. Will S. Pender. Bisbee, Arizona, Box 1796.

Marriages.

FORDHAM—PANKEY.—At the home of the bride, Santa Ana, California, February 18, 1908, Bro. M. S. Fordham and Sr. Margaret L. Pankey, Elder A. Carmichael officiating. Both parties are well known church workers, and their large circle of friends will be pleased to hear of their marriage. Bro. Fordham hails from Spokane, Washington, and went quite a ways from home to find his mate. We congratulate him on his choice. Sr. Margaret has for years been one of Southern California's faithful and efficient workers. Spokane, you are in luck. Jots, shake. May the blessings of the Master attend them.

Died.

WINSHIP.—Alta Mary, infant daughter of Bro. Jesse and Sr. Dena Winship. Five months and eleven days old. Services conducted by Elder C. Edward Miller, at Wheeling, West Virginia.

PANKEY.—Sr. Nancy E. Pankey, at her home, February 4, 1908. Our sister was born October 24, 1853, in Kaufman County, Texas. Was married to Bro. Henry S. Pankey, January 18, 1872. Baptized in the church by Elder J. C. Clapp, July 24, 1876, and has since been a faithful and consistent member. Not only her branch, but the whole district will keenly feel the loss. Many times she has ministered to the wants of the traveling missionary force, her home always being a place of rest and cheer for God's tired servants. Funeral services conducted by Brn. T. W. Williams, F. M. Sheehy, and A. Carmichael, Bro. T. W. Williams preaching the sermon. The very large crowd present testified to the esteem in which Sr. Pankey was held. May the peace of the Master assuage the grief of the loved ones left behind.

HANSON.—Sr. Eliza Hanson, wife of Christian Hanson, died at her home in Standish, Michigan, at 3:30 a. m., February 7, 1908. Funeral at the Congregational church February 10, in charge of J. A. Grant, who also preached the sermon. Sr. Eliza Hanson was born at Kingston, Ontario, March 23, 1858. Was baptized in February, 1875. She has been a great sufferer for years; but bore it all with patience until death came to her relief. She leaves husband, three daughters, and two brothers.

BROWN.—John J. Brown, after three years of illness, died at Centralia, Washington, February 15. Deceased was born October 27, 1856, in Morgan County, Missouri; baptized November 30, 1907, at Castle Rock, Washington. He leaves to mourn his removal from this earth, wife, two boys, and four girls. Sermon by George W. Thorburn, assisted by S. P. Cox.

DEWALD.—Bro. Milton Dewald was born at Moreland, Pennsylvania, January 20, 1848. Was married to Miss Lucinda Adams, February 10, 1873. Of them were born five sons and five daughters. He was baptized November 26, 1890, by J. S. Roth. Died February 24, 1908. Was buried at Fairbanks, the 26th; sermon by J. S. Roth, in the Methodist Episcopal church, before six to seven hundred people. Reverend Hann opened with prayer. His choir sang for us, using the Hymnals. Bro. Dewald was a noble Saint. He never missed an opportunity to present the gospel to his neighbor by word and deed.

MORGAN.—John J. Morgan was born in Merthyr Tydfil, South Wales, September 15, 1831. He united with the church in boyhood. Like thousands of others in that land, his love waxed cold because of the iniquities of Brighamism. In 1856, he married Miss Catherine Jenkins. Of this union there were four sons and five daughters. In 1862 he came to Scranton, Pennsylvania, and shortly afterwards united with the Reorganized Church. He had unshaken faith in the angel's message, and was a man of friendly disposition. On the evening of February 23, 1908, the summons came. Service in charge of William Lewis.

PRATT.—S. V. Pratt was born in Chattanooga County, Georgia, April 10, 1852; died September 22, 1907 at Hays, Kansas. Deceased came from Georgia in 1869 to Omaha; and to Pottawattamie County, Iowa, the same year. Was baptized June 20, 1880, by R. M. Elvin, at Crescent. Was ordained elder November 25, 1893, by C. Derry, T. W. Williams, and Joshua Carlile, at Hazel Dell. Removed to Kansas, 1898, March 6. Was married to Maggie T. Currie, 1878, of whom were born fifteen children, of whom nine boys and five girls are living. He leaves four sisters and three brothers to mourn their loss. He was laid to rest in the Mount Allen Cemetery. Services at the Lutheran church, conducted by Reverends Weist and Brown.

In Memoriam.

Assembled again in our annual Religio convention we are called upon to note the absence of Bro. David Morgan, who, at the time he was first stricken down, was in active Sunday-school service, an esteemed officer of the Lamoni school, and who, at the time of his death, was a stake officer of the Religio association.

The memory of his pleasant presence still lingers with us, and his gentleness and patience should be an inspiration to us. As a convention we express our respect and love for our brother, who has gone into his Father's home of light and love, and we sympathize with those to whom he was especially dear, who are left to walk a little while longer in the pathways of the earth life.

May we all so live that we shall have part in the great final gathering of the Saints of God.

Respectfully submitted,

ANNA SALYARDS,

LAMONI, Iowa, February 14, 1908.

The Star of Bethlehem Sunday-school has been again invaded by death, and our Bro. David L. Morgan has passed on to that glorious rest. He was a worthy brother in Christ, beloved by all, and his labors as a member and officer were acceptably and willingly offered.

Now we, the Star of Bethlehem Sunday-school, hereby give expression to our appreciation of his noble, self-sacrificing labors in our midst. And, as evidence of our sorrow at his departure from us, we dedicate these lines to his dear memory, and extend our heart-felt sympathy to his relatives, and his wife and child who are left to mourn the loss of a loving husband, a kind and upright father, a Saintly companion, a servant of the Master, a child of God. We sorrow not at his departure, to move on in higher and more glorious spheres, as those without hope, but humbly submit to the Divine, who hath received him into glory.

And while our loss is his gain, we cherish his memory, and seek to emulate his example of humility, and Christ-like nobility of character, and willing service to the Master.

IN OTHER FIELDS.

Dedicated to the memory of David L. Morgan.

In other fields he walks to-day,
Where one who loved him led the way,
His steps are bounding plains of peace,
Where strength and gladness never cease.

Chorus,

In other fields, in other fields,
The sunny, restful, promised fields,
All tireless, love's sweet labor now,
Where those eternal summers glow.

In other fields his voice rings clear,
With accents tender as when here
He tells the story old and true,
'Neathskies for ever soft and blue.

Chorus.

In other fields his kindly eyes
Behold the hills of promise rise.
For him eternal mornings beam
Fair as his fondest earthly dream.

CONFIDENCE IN PUBLIC MEN.

We are impressed with the idea that men who have been before the public as public servants for any great length of time, and who have during the time of their service so conducted themselves in private life and the discharge of their public duties as to become established in public confidence, ought not to be subjected to suspicion, unless by some act or public expression they should have given just cause for complaint. It is humiliating to the mind of an honorable man to feel that after he has been engaged in long and arduous service of the public that he is the victim of suspicion, either from the pettiness and ignorance of those by whom he is surrounded and with whom he may be associated, or as the result of a spirit of malicious envy, or jealousy. It ought to be an absolute certainty that a man should have given evidence of unworthiness of trust either in his private life or in his public service, before he should be subjected to the shadowing of suspicion or malicious prosecution. A man who in his private life conducts himself as a son, with filial regard to his parents; as a brother, if he has brothers and sisters; as a husband, if he has a wife; as a father, if he has children; and as a citizen, in accordance with the principles of honesty and uprightness, would be entitled to a continuance of confidence in him in these various positions; and if such a man is a public servant, and he has in public life given evidence of honesty of intention, earnestness of character, freedom from cupidity or undue ambition, and has conserved the interests of the public intrusted to him, faithfully, and according to the best of his ability, he should also be entitled to the continuance of public trust, whether his usefulness for the cause or causes which he has served has come to an end, or may be further continued or not.

It is said that republics are ungrateful. It is possible that this axiom is the result of the conviction which is usually held by most men that republics are made up of humanity of all classes, and that there is such a spirit of speculation in pecuniary affairs, and of overreaching ambition in economic and political affairs, that men become more or less poisoned with the miasma of greed for place or

There are many that say: "Give us the morality of the New Testament; never mind about the theology." Aye, but you can not get the morality without the theology, unless you like to have rootless flowers and lamps without oil. And if you want to live as Paul enjoins, you will have to believe as Paul preaches. The divorcement of morals and piety is characteristic of all pagan religions.—D. J. Burrell.

Who hath not known ill-fortune, never knew himself, or his own virtue.—Mallet.

power, that they lose that portion of innate honesty with which they may have set out in their public career; and the idea that all men have their price is far too prevalent among men. And while it may be that it is too true in the affairs of this world, the same axiom ought not to be made to apply to men who are serving public interests in which there is neither time, place, nor opportunity for what is popularly called now, "graft," or the emoluments of office in the form of empty honors, or the dispensing of patronage.

There are now in the public councils of the church a number of men who have served the interests of the cause from early manhood unto gray hairs and declining years; they have given the best years of life unto the public service; they have asked for no reward; they have sought for no position for the love of place or of power; they have sacrificed the ambitions that usually characterize men, and have earnestly endeavored to serve the interests of the cause which they held dear with honesty of purpose and without fear, favor, or affection. These men have in private life shown to their neighbors and their associates in office the elements of probity and uprightness of conduct, economy in the use of the things of this life, and deference to the principles of humanitarianism in the affairs which have been intrusted to them. Many of them have held themselves aloof from the service of the public in offices of political trust, have neglected or refused to enter into the pursuit of business affairs, where speculation was possible, or where speculation was rife. They have shown a desire for good to men, and have endeavored earnestly that private life should bear testimony to their public speech. If any one of them has failed in the discharge of duty toward his children, it has been through the influence of his earnest intention to serve the cause to which he was devoting his life, through which possible neglect may have resulted at the time that fatherly influence and care were needed by the growing members of the family. This should not be held against them as if they were blameworthy, for the conditions under which they have labored have frequently been adverse to their wishes, and over which they have had no control. These men in public life have attracted to themselves the attention of men within and without the church, and have been subjected to the closest scrutiny by many who would have been too willing to have found them unworthy of trust because of conflicting difference between their precept and their example. It is a fact worthy of consideration that these men have proved themselves during all the years of their service as being worthy of the trust that has been imposed in them. It may be that some have met the spirit of detraction manifested in others because of difference of opinions which may have been strenuously offered and maintained; but such strenuousness is in itself a principle worthy of commendation. For as all must answer to one source whence come preferences as laborers and authority to labor, there is no possible reason to suppose that any one is entitled to more consideration for honesty of purpose and integrity of intention than another. It should be a bond of common unity that each man serving in a cause is as much entitled to the credit of earnestness of purpose and honesty of intention as any and every other coworker; and it is almost an absoluteness of assurance that if such principle should prevail that there would be a more general appreciation of each other's labor and a more equal popularity for each and all.

Why should the virus of suspicion, the malice of envy, or the evil-mindedness of jealousy be permitted to mar the peace, contentment, and happiness of any colaborer, or harass and torment the mind of any one honestly intent on doing the Master's will, and accomplishing the most good within his power? Why is it that men, laboring together in a cause, should suffer themselves to forget, not only the admonition of the apostle where he declares "Charity thinketh no evil," "is not puffed up," but seeketh another's good, but also to be neglectful of the prime foundation of all human thought and conduct, couched in the Savior's direct commandment: Do ye unto others as ye would that others should do unto you?

No man will consent to himself that he is willing that his efforts should be hindered, his prospects clouded, or his good intentions overpowered, by the shadowing suspicion of envy or jealousy on the part of a coworker. No man is willing to believe himself justly to be condemned while he is not conscious of anything within himself justifying the exercise of these evil propensities against himself. Why then should he allow himself to burden his own life, and disparage the life of another, by giving way to those things to which he objects as applied to himself? We have often wondered at this, and we confess that we can not see why any man in any position should, either in public or in private, give voice to the spirit of detraction as to the worthiness of the labors of others. It is contrary to the religion which we profess. It is contrary to the teaching of the law. It is contrary to the best instincts within us, and he who gives way to it is opening the doors of his soul for the incoming of a spirit that will sooner or later subject him to infinite loss, bring in a spirit of discontent, that will, soon or late, altogether poison his life and render him a source of annoyance and vexation to all with whom he comes in contact.

A man who for years has carried himself in private and in public life above suspicion should be free from the spirit of detraction, and should be sufficiently at peace with himself and at peace with his coworkers to give every man the due meed of credit to which he is entitled; and further than this, whatever his position may be, however great his influence may be, he should never, under any circumstances, allow himself to exercise his official character or position to the disparagement of another, or to overawe by threat of compulsion any one, whatever position he may hold inferior to his own.

Jealousy is said to be as cruel as the grave, and we believe there is no jealousy so mysterious, so fraught with evil results to the public usefulness of a coworker, as that which we denominate as official jealousy. Such jealousy should find no place among officers of the church. These above all other men, should seek to give due honor to their coworkers. These of all others should give expression in their official life to the words of the apostle, "In honor preferring one another."

It may be thought derogatory to the dignity and official position of a man to have others say wrong things about him, or to offer criticism which he may pass without resentment; but it is too often the case that disparaging remarks made of a coworker are made mischievous by being repeated to the person of whom they have been made, who upon the influence of a sense of injustice or irritation, gives place to the spirit of resentment, when there are two parties in contention at once. As "evil communications corrupt good manners," so does this spirit of resentment create friction where the application of the proverb, "A soft answer turneth away wrath," would result in a better understanding, and strife be avoided. Great men should be above small things, and there can scarcely be anything smaller in great men, than the disposition to belittle others, or to resent the envious criticisms and remarks of others smaller than themselves. The man who stands upon the height overlooking the inequalities around him, should avoid stumbling over them; so should men in high places, holding positions of honor or of trust, looking over the field of his usefulness and occupation, avoid injuring others and hurting himself by stumbling over the evidences of smallness that he sees developing in others. Better to hear and pass in silence, than to hear, resent, and make trouble for himself and others.

THE MAN TO WATCH.

Rudyard Kipling is reported to have voiced the following sentiments in an address before the students of McGill University, Montreal:

When, to use a detestable phrase, you go out into the battle of life you will be confronted by an organized conspiracy which will try to make you believe that the world is governed by the idea of wealth for Wealth's sake, and that all means which lead to the acquisition of wealth are, if not laudable, at least expedient. . . . You will live and eat and move and have your being in a world dominated by that thought. Some of you will probably succumb to the poison of it.

Now I do not ask you not to be carried away by the first rush of the great game of life. That is expecting you to be more than human. But I do ask you, after the first heat of the game, that you draw breath and watch your fellows for a while.

Sooner or later you will see some man to whom the idea of wealth as mere wealth does not appeal, whom the methods of amassing that wealth do not interest, and who will not accept money if you offer it to him at a certain price. At first you will be inclined to laugh at this man, and to think that he is not smart in his ideas. I suggest that you watch him closely, for he will presently demonstrate to you that money dominates everybody except the man who does not care for money.

You may meet this man on your farm, in your village, or in your legislature. Be sure that, whenever or wherever you meet him, as soon as it comes to a direct issue between you, his little finger will be thicker than your loins. You will go in fear of him; he will not go in fear of you. You will do what he wants; he will not do what you want. You will find that you have no weapon in your armory with which to attack him; no argument with which you can appeal to him. Whatever you gain he will gain more.

I would like you to study that man. I would like you better to be that man, because from the lower point of view it doesn't pay to be obsessed by the desire of wealth for wealth's sake.

If more wealth is necessary to you, for purposes not your own, use your left hand to acquire it, but keep your right for your own proper place in life. If you employ both arms in that game you will be in danger of stooping; in danger also of losing your own soul.

It is to be presumed that Mr. Kipling gave the students of McGill University the very best that he had in store; and indeed we find no fault with that part of his address here quoted, believing that it is sound, logical, and true.

But there is one peculiar coincident: Some years ago Mr. Kipling wrote an article in which he went to great lengths in ridiculing the Book of Mormon. Yet in one place in that book, namely, in the Book of Jacob 2: 4, 5, we find sentiments regarding the acquisition of wealth almost identical with the best that came from the lips of the noted novelist before the student body of McGill University. A writer in the New York Times book review, October 26, 1907, noted that Mr. Kipling had borrowed the title to one of his novels, "Kim," from the Book of Mormon, without giving credit. How quickly would Joseph Smith be charged with plagiarism if conditions were reversed.

Mr. Kipling, coming to this New World, finds the people obsessed with a love of wealth for its own sake and not for the good that can be done with it. He gives them some most excellent advice, as quoted above. Many hundreds of years ago, Jacob, the brother of Nephi, found a similar condition obtaining among his brethren in the New World. He made an address, not before the students of a university, but in the temple, to the assembled people. He declared to them that they had come to a rich land and that they had begun to accumulate gold and silver and costly apparel, to be proud, and to persecute the poor.

Jacob was a man who did not love wealth for its own sake, and his "little finger was thicker than the loins" of the money grubbers when it came to a direct issue. Yet Jacob did not despise wealth; he valued it when it was sought for and used for right purposes. He argued, like Kipling, that a man should reserve himself for noble purposes, and if he sought wealth he should seek it for purposes not his own. Two sentences from Jacob's address read like this:

But before ye seek for riches, seek ye the kingdom of God. And after ye have obtained a hope in Christ, ye shall obtain riches, if ye seek them; and ye will seek them, for the intent to do good; to clothe the naked, and to feed the hungry, and to liberate the captive, and administer relief to the sick, and the afflicted.

Mr. Kipling is an author of world-wide fame; he has traveled all over this old world, from Greenland's icy mountain to India's coral strand; he has seen the very depths of poverty and degradation, and the extremes of idle luxury and bloated wealth; and he can not improve on the sermon that Jacob preached. In fact he might well have taken the text for his Montreal address from the Book of Mormon.

Be that as it may, there are ideas in this second chapter of Jacob, and in Mr. Kipling's address as well, that are worthy of our careful study, as touching our efforts in building Zion. We recognize truth in both of these addresses; and a truth is a truth "wherever found, on heathen or on Christian ground,"—referring to the Book of Mormon under the latter head, and making no application of the former.

VEILED SARCASM OR BLASPHEMY, WHICH?

At the close of chapter 9 of Don Carlos Musser's story in exposition of the Utah philosophy of plural marriage he has the two following paragraphs, which, to the outside barbarian, or the not too interested looker on, assume the form of either veiled sarcasm or too apparent blasphemy. These paragraphs are as follows:

And I want to say unto you, dearly beloved, that though there may seem to be considerable truth in the assertions of our enemies, that we have broken our sacred pledges, there is really nothing to the charge. We made no sacred pledges. We only appeared to do so in order to fight the Devil with his own weapons. We do not make sacred pledges to people who do not know what sacred things are; and if we have made statements under oath it was an oath without weight—sworn before a false god, and no Latter-day Saint can be bound by it. Sacred pledges, indeed! Are our persecutors such profound idiots as to suppose that the Lord's appointed servants would make sacred pledges to disobey his commandments? Surely, if they are, they deserve to be hoodwinked, and I thank God that our leaders have enough of the divine Spirit to be able to hoodwink them.

Does not the Spirit burn within you, dearly beloved, when you contemplate our venerable prophet preaching the new and everlasting covenant right in the very halls of Congress? And are you not more than ever proud of your religion when you think of your leader and prophet standing in the presence of senators and defying their man-made laws? And does it not fill your hearts with gratitude to the All-father to know that it is through his kindness and mercy that you have a testimony that Brother Joseph F. Smith is the anointed and divinely commissioned vicegerent of the Christ? Does it not fill your soul with love and veneration to know that your leader, your prophet, priest and king, is above the law and can break it with impunity, as he has done for lo! these many years?

It is said that comparisons are odious. It may be that comparisons are odious, as stated; but it sometimes happens that it is only by comparison that truth and right are made apparent, and we venture a comparison by inference.

The language of Don Carlos Musser, as employed by him in these two closing paragraphs of his chapter 9, presents one of the most vivid pictures in contrast that we have seen in public print for a good while. Under the veil of a solemn appeal to a class of beings whom he calls, "dearly beloved," he presents the picture of a reverend, titled, and revered leader, in company with others, his associates, who have made pledges to the nation under the laws thereof, sealed by an oath or affirmation, which pledges were taken as having been made in good faith: and yet in this fervid appeal and exhortation, ostensibly made by some one to his dearly beloved brethren, the statement is made that these pledges, sacred as they might have appeared to have been when made, were made deliberately for the purpose of hoodwinking and blinding those to whom they were made. So cunningly is this done, that one is led almost to admire the shrewdness and the craftiness of the writer; but what shall be said of the appeal made to these same "dearly beloved" that their souls should be filled with love and veneration by the knowledge that their reverend leader can break the law with impunity? And of course this impunity means to do so without being called to answer before the courts for such breaking of the law.

For the purpose that the reader may see what may be covertly meant by what we have quoted from Don Carlos Musser, we offer a supposition. It is known that there is in the field of religious controversy a body of people known as the Reorganized Church, but nicknamed by the church of Utah through its eldership, as Josephites. Let the readers of the HERALD paraphrase this fervid appeal of the one impersonated by Don Carlos Musser by inserting in their imagination the leader of this Josephite division, even calling him by name. What would be thought of such a presentation? Would not the great mass of the men and the women of the Reorganized Church, thus appealed to, be filled with feelings of disgust, and protest against such an exhibition of departure from the grounds of moral uprightness, and the common virtue of fealty to pledges made to one's associates and fellow men? Under what cloak of sanctity could such a leader hide and be safe? Would it be possible for him to so seclude himself from public observation that his sin would not find him out, and he be punished at the public request of the men and the women whom he had so grossly betrayed.

If the Editor of the HERALD, the President of the Reorganized Church, or any recognized leading man in that body of people, were known to be guilty of a breach of faith in regard to pledges made to the people of the State or the Nation, or to be a malefactor justly condemnable under the laws of the State where they are living, and where they have their citizenship, would he be allowed to retain his moral standing with the people whom he would, by such acts, morally betray? Is it not a moral certainty that such a man would lose his moral and spiritual standing in the church which he would be misrepresenting, and would he not be compelled, by significant movements in the body to either desist from such acts, or be deposed from his position? Further than this, is it not also equally morally certain that he would be made to answer at the hands of the courts, and receive merited punishment? The conclusion is inevitable.

COMMUNISM AND PRIVATE OWNERSHIP.

As the readers of the HERALD well know, we have ever been on the lookout for anything which will lead to an understanding of the philosophy of communism, whether of an economic form or of a semi-socialist political character. The following taken from the current press dispatches of the day will lay before the readers of the HERALD the opinion of one who has been experimenting under apparently fair conditions. We make no comment, but simply give it as a matter of news, and the expression of opinion by one interested in the sociological developments of the period.

PRIVATE OWNERSHIP BETTER.

NEW YORK, March 8.—Presenting his views on practical communism as a remedy for existing sociological conditions, before the Civic Forum at Carnegie Hall to-night, Frederik Van Eeden, the sociologist, poet, and founder of the communistic colony in Walden, Holland, declared that common possession of the soil was utterly worthless unless the community to which the soil belonged was well organized. Mr. Van Eeden said:

“Private ownership in the hands of a good landlord is eminently preferable to common ownership in the hands of a badly trained and poorly organized community.

“Organization, strict, powerful, functioning organization, that is the all-commanding condition of communism, and of land-communism in the first place. In an absolutely perfect organization to which the human race will perhaps adapt itself in a thousand years, the idea of private property or possession will have lost its meaning altogether.”

JOURNAL OF HISTORY.

The first number of the new magazine has been mailed, and already we are receiving letters expressing satisfaction and appreciation. This publication should be in the hands of all who desire to be well posted on church history. It is not only educational, but good, interesting reading as well. We are satisfied that a large number will yet desire to begin their subscriptions with the first number, and, to accommodate such, we have printed quite a number of extra copies, and for some time at least subscriptions will be started with the first number of the magazine. However, after our present supply is exhausted, the first number can not be furnished. The subscription price is forty cents for a single copy, or one dollar and fifty cents for one year.

The pleasure and delight of knowledge far surpasseth all other in nature. We see in all other pleasures there is satiety; and after they be used, their verdure departeth, which showeth well that they be but deceits of pleasure, and not pleasures; and that it was the novelty which pleased, not the quality; and therefore we see that voluptuous men turn friars, and ambitious princes turn melancholy. But of knowledge there is no satiety, but satisfaction and appetite are perpetually interchangeable.—Bacon.

LEAVES FROM LIFE.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF ELDER VINTON M. GOODRICH.

ELDER V. M. GOODRICH.

I have been made to partake of the power and goodness of God; also I have been made to drink of the bitter cup of Satan, and tremble under his power, . . . but with Christ I have power over him and can overcome him and the world.

I was born April 18, 1859, at Byer, Jackson County, Ohio. Obtained a common school education of the time; became interested in religion early in life; I united with the Christian or Disciple Church, in my fifteenth year, after which I can of a truth say that my conscience answered me clear, and I rejoiced, believing that I had done the will of God; viz.: baptized for the remission of sins. I ran well for a season, and did the best that I knew, but the time came when I was known by the brethren as a "backslider," inactive and caring but little, if anything, for religion.

In my twenty-second year I was married to Marianne Arnold, at Tuscola, Illinois, soon after which I again felt out after God and tried to live a consistent life so far as I understood it, remaining in the same church until the year 1890, when my companion was taken in death, which proved altogether too much for my faith. I became skeptical, and doubted even the existence of a God. From this time on I had no further use for a religion of faith and faith only, with nothing of a supernatural power to confirm my faith. I concluded that if there was a God that I did not know him, for I could not understand why he should thus deal with me, together with his ill-defined purposes and his painful reticency. In this time of great sorrow as well as hitherto, I felt that something was wrong. I remained in this condition for several years, notwithstanding my brother J. L., (who is an elder,) at various times attempted to talk and reason with me; also urged me to read the church literature, but all to no avail, or at least as pertaining to final results.

One day I found on the counter in my place of business, a tract, the title of which read, "Sincerity seeking his way to heaven." Who put it there I did not know, neither do I now remember who wrote it, nor have I seen a tract like it since; but think it a good one: albeit, it was the means of attracting my attention, and marked the turning point in my life in a sense; the sense at least of unstopping the deaf ear and softening the cold and indifferent heart. About this time, as near as I remember, I had a dream unlike any which I had before experienced; a feeling of peace and hallowed influence associated with it and the subject matter so vividly brought to mind the next day. At intervals this dream was repeated, more than it was increased in magnitude and grandeur; feeding as it were a hungry soul.

After reading the little tract referred to, I became convinced that the Saints had the gospel in word if not in power; but of the latter I was very doubtful indeed. 1. I thought it too good to be true. 2. I thought it impossible for a people to have such a fearful reputation in the world and yet be the people of God.

The first sermon I heard was in the summer of 1889, by Elder T. W. Williams, then a priest, in a schoolhouse the use of which I was instrumental in obtaining. At the beginning of the discourse I had an experience which is vivid to my mind at present. It was this: There came, as if from above, a communication to this effect: This is the first time you have heard a true servant of Christ. I told my experience to my companion after I returned home, who showed much displeasure at what I said and the impression it had made on me. She told me that if I joined the "Mormons" she would leave me. This came to me as a thunder-clap from a clear sky, it was so unlike her and our former happy, congenial life. I was nonplused for a moment, but recovered presently, and with a full determination to resist the monster who had so audaciously raised to bind the liberty of my soul, then and there made a vow, calling on God to bear me witness, that if God would indeed make me know that this was his church, and this people his people, and his power working with them as they claimed, I would unite with the church, although it may cost me my wife, my whole family, every cent which I have, and my own life also.

Some four years passed away, and my companion also. At this time two of the brethren came to our little city, desiring to hold some gospel tent-services, and asked me if I could furnish a lot for the purpose. This I did and furnished a home for the elders also. It was during these meetings that I witnessed the power of God working with the elders. My wife (for I had married the second) had been sick for several months, and was bedfast and low in strength. She had been doctoring with Doctor McClellen, a specialist of Columbus, Ohio, who pronounced her case tuberculosis, and told me that I might prepare for the worst, as there was no hope for her.

Through the prayers of the elders (Brn. H. R. Harder and my brother, J. L.,) and the anointing with oil, my companion was completely restored to health, and not one drop of medicine was taken by her after the first prayer was offered. Doubt had now for ever fled. I believed with all my heart; but, oh my sins! I felt the weight of them and my unworthiness to that extent that I feared that I had sinned my day of grace away. About this time I again had the beautiful dream vision presented, before mentioned; and, oh the peace,—such blessed influence and power resting upon me the next day,—words and language fails me to describe. It must be felt to be realized. At noontime the next day, while I was alone at my desk, pondering over what I had experienced, and the beautiful words which were given to me in the dream, their meaning, the purpose for which they were given, and the sweet hallowed influence which was all around me at the present time, I exclaimed in my soul, Why should I have this beautiful experience and influence; what does it all mean? Why should such beautiful words, and the purpose for which they were given (for I understood the purpose) come to me, and why should I have this glorious and happy feeling and power upon me now, for I know that I am a sinner? The answer came so clearly, so distinctly, that I shall never forget: "God loves you," and I said, "Lord, is that so?" (For I was astonished to learn that God loved sinners and men while they were in sin.) "Why, I am ashamed, for I have not loved you, but will try to love you from now on." While I made this covenant and formed a resolution to reform, still I scarcely knew what to do, or what my privileges were, if any. Before the healing of my wife and the last experience named, I felt myself a little above the Saints, and was ashamed of them, or to be seen in their company very much. But now there was a complete change. I felt entirely unworthy to be named among them; felt that I would be a disgrace to the work, and an injury to the church of God. Truly, I felt that I ought to go to hell, that justice demanded it, and I did not wish to rob justice, and really I felt willing to go; but had not changed my mind in the least as to trying to love God. If hell was my doom, I had made up my mind to go there like a gentleman, and to be a gentleman after I got there; for I believed that God would not send me there unless it was right to do so; and if it was right he could not do otherwise.

I said to the Lord, If it is possible, I would like to be saved; and if you will make it known to me that you will accept me, I will be very thankful. I set in operation to the best of my understanding a life of reform, fully determined to carry it to the very gates of hades, if there was nothing better for me. And while I would have been satisfied, and really expected an answer to come through some of the brethren, God in his wisdom had provided a better way, one which I shall never forget. Some weeks passed, and I had been tried, and overcome those besetting sins, and had kept my promise with God. One night, about two o'clock, while I was upon my bed in deep slumber, there was a person who appeared to be just over and above me, although I did not see any one, but I was aware of a presence, who said to me, "Go forth in obedience, and if they persist to hinder you from my work, I will remove them from the face of the earth if necessary." At the conclusion of this message I was fully awake, with all my faculties aglow, aroused as it were by the touch of an unseen hand. The necessity for this wonderful message and revelation to me may be seen, for the reasons: 1. That I had asked if God would accept me, and if so to make it known. 2. There were some persons under whose influence and power I was, to quite an extent, whom I believed would make it impossible for me to serve God if I united with the church, hence I was under great fear of them, which the Lord well knew. With this assurance I went to H. R. Harder, who had returned to our neighborhood, and demanded baptism at his hands, and who, I am glad to say, waited upon me in performing this rite, which occurred on the fourteenth day of October, 1894, at Bierlytown, Ohio. Oh, that day! A day above all other days of my life. After I arose from the watery grave, and was confirmed, peace filled my soul, and a new song was indeed in my heart. I loved much, for I knew and realized that I had been forgiven much. I now knew that Christ lived, and that he had dealt wondrously with me to bring me to the knowledge of him and his great work of these last days. I knew that his Holy Spirit filled my soul, for indeed my soul was filled to overflowing. I knew that Christ was my friend, yea, my best friend, my true friend, and I knew that I was "free indeed," evidence of the gift of the Holy Ghost.

After retiring for the night, after returning from the baptism, so great was my joy that I felt sleep had for ever fled. I was in continual and incessant prayer and rejoicing. Far in the night, perhaps two o'clock, I said, "Lord, give more of this great joy." I was answered, "You now have all you are able to bear." To which I replied, "Lord, then let thy servant sleep in peace." So far as I then knew the last request was answered at once, for the next thing that I have any recollection of was that I awoke, and the sun was well up in the heavens.

At noon of the next day after baptism, I was reading the second chapter of Acts, and my attention was particularly called to the quotation made by the Apostle Peter, of the prophecy of the Prophet Joel. It appeared to me that the apostle was making the claim of the entire fulfillment of this prophecy upon this occasion, which conclusion the King James translation seems to warrant. In the quotation the sun is to be darkened, the moon to be turned to blood, etc., which phenomena did not occur on the occasion, according to the record. Realizing that the apostle was speaking by the power of the Holy Ghost, and that the prophecy was given by the Holy Ghost, and there seemed to be a conflict in the two, I was in a quandary and strait of mind, for it never occurred to me that there could be anything wrong with the Bible or any omissions in it. I said, "Lord, is it possible that the Apostle Peter made a mistake?" This was given to me, by the Spirit: "In part." This made it clear to me; and the reading would be as corrected: "But this is in part that which was spoken by the Prophet Joel." I again offered a prayer of thankfulness; and why should I not? I realized the fulfillment of the promise of the Scriptures, viz.: "And ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." And again, "Even the Spirit of truth, whom the world can not receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him: but ye know him; for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you."—John 14:17.

I have been taught since, many times, by the direct voice of the Spirit, have had many spiritual dreams and visions, to warn me of danger, to encourage, to show me my duty, and how to adjust and deal with things much complicated in the pre-siding line.

Having been blessed with so much evidence and divine guidance, and favors, it may be in place to say a few words along another line.

I, too, have been tried, being made to feel forcibly the evil power. So pungent have been my sorrows and trials, that I despaired of life, and my spirit even shed tears. I at one time asked God to remove me from the earth, and its wicked men, not because of physical disabilities, but because of the wrath of Satan and his influence over wicked men, and false brethren, all of which I do not love to dwell upon or think about; hence I will forbear, by saying, that I have been made to partake of the power and goodness of God; also I have been made to drink of the bitter cup of Satan, and tremble under his power. I can, therefore, because of these experiences, discern between the two powers. I fear Satan, I know his power is greater than that of my own, when left alone, but with Christ I have power over him, and can overcome him and the world.

On the twenty-ninth day of October, 1894, two weeks and one day after I was baptized, I was ordained to the office of priest, at Vales Mills, Ohio, under the hands of Apostle G. T. Griffiths. The same brother, at Limerick, Ohio, on the 20th of September, 1896, ordained me an elder. At the General Conference of 1899, I was set apart for a high priest, and was ordained to that office June 21, 1900, by Apostle W. H. Kelley, at Davisville, Ohio. Received my first missionary appointment at the conference in the year last named. All, save five months only, since my first appointment, I have labored in the missionary field, and for this time I asked to be released for secular purposes. I hope to serve with profit my God, my church, and my brethren, until God in his goodness says, It is enough.

LIFE ETERNAL.

Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch can not bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me.—John 15:4.

In consideration of life eternal, we of necessity are forced to resort to the teachings of Christ, who said: "This is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." In the language of Job, "Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?" We believe that all the teachings of Christ were only such that they appealed to the intelligence of every man. Therefore through obedience to certain divine principles, we believe in the gospel, which is the power of God unto salvation. And through its ordinances God will supply the necessities relative to our spiritual development.

But before we can receive the necessities for our spiritual growth, it will be necessary for us to consider the conditions relative to this growth. We notice, first, the statement of Christ to Nicodemus, "Except a man be born again, he can not see the kingdom of God. . . . That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." Passing over the natural birth, we note the spiritual, "being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever." (1 Peter 1: 23.) "Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth."—James 1: 18.

It is revealed in Doctrine and Covenants 85: 9:

All kingdoms have a law given: and there are many kingdoms; for there is no space in the which there is no kingdom, and there is no kingdom in which there is no space, either a greater or lesser kingdom. And unto every kingdom is given a law; and unto every law there are certain bounds also, and conditions.

Consequently, there is in the spiritual organism a principle of life, but it is not self-existent. There are certain bounds and conditions: it requires a second factor, a something in which to live and move and have its being. In other words, an environment. Thus it is not a strange thing for the soul to find its life in God.

The soul, then, is a living organism; that which produces life. "Abide in me, and I in you," is the word of Christ. The soul then is furnished its living substance as Christ stands between the Father and man, in a Mesozoic condition, that is, holding the middle forms of life. And in him was the life of men and the light of men. (See Doctrine and Covenants 90: 1-5.)

Things are natural or supernatural simply according to where one stands. To illustrate: We hear the expression: That was a miracle. But in reality, it was not a miracle; we are only living in an unnatural condition. When the heart of man is again seized upon by the quickening Spirit of God, no further violence is done to natural law. It is another case of the inorganic, so to speak, passing into the organic. The plant is made of materials which have once been inorganic. Thus an organizing principle, not belonging to their kingdom, lays hold of them, and elaborates them until they have correspondences with the kingdom to which the organized principle belonged.

Therefore, it takes the divine to know the divine. But in no more mysterious sense than it takes the human to understand the human. The analogy, indeed, for the whole field here has been finely expressed by the Apostle Paul: "For what man knoweth the things of man, save the spirit of man which is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God."—1 Corinthians 2: 11. An eternal life demands an eternal environment. This is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."—John 17: 3.

Life eternal, then, is to know God. To know God is to correspond with God. To correspond with God, is to correspond with a perfect environment. And the organism which attains to this, must live for ever. Here, then, is eternal existence, and eternal knowledge. But grant a spiritual organism in perfect correspondence with a perfect spiritual environment, and the conditions necessary to eternal life are satisfied.

There lies a something at the back of the correspondences of the spiritual organism, just as there lies a something at the back of the natural correspondences. The ear as an organ of hearing demands something to hear. God has supplied the demand. The same with the eye as an organ of seeing. And again, the inherent desire for eternal life; God shall supply that demand. If not, why not? "As the hart panteth after the waterbrooks so panteth my soul after thee, O God."—Psalms.

In this world only the cornless ear is seen; sometimes only the small, yet prophetic blade. The sneer at the Godly man or woman for his or her imperfections is ill-judged. A blade is a small thing, at first. It grows very near the ground. It is often soiled and crushed and downtrodden, yet it is a living thing. But this small blade, it does not yet appear what it shall be. All beings who abide not in those conditions, are not justified:

For intelligence cleaveth unto intelligence; wisdom receiveth wisdom; truth embraceth truth; virtue loveth virtue; light cleaveth unto light; mercy hath compassion on mercy, and claimeth her own; justice continueth its course, and claimeth its own; judgment goeth before the face of him who sitteth upon the throne, and governeth and executeth all things: he comprehendeth all things, and all things are before him, and all things are around about him; and he is above all things, and in all things, and through all things, and is round about all things: and all things are by him, and of him; even God, for ever and ever. (Doctrine and Covenants 85: 10.)

This, then, is indeed the very environment of the soul; and from the things stated herein, is it correspondence. "Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch can not bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine." We believe that the apostle expressed the thought on this wise: "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."—1 Thessalonians 5: 23.

The body, then, should be under the control of the Spirit. And of the whole, we understand, that redemption and salvation are accomplished through obedience to law. Consequently, God will furnish that which, if properly received, brings us back into a state of purity and peace and eternal bliss.

And the light which now shineth, which giveth you light, is through him who enlighteneth your eyes, which is the same light that quickeneth your understandings; which light proceedeth forth from the presence of God, to fill the immensity of space. The light which is in all things; which giveth life to all things; which is the law by which all things are governed; even the power of God who sitteth upon his throne, who is in the bosom of eternity, who is in the midst of all things. Now, verily I say unto you, that through the redemption which is made for you, is brought to pass the resurrection from the dead. And the Spirit and the body is the soul of man. And the resurrection from the dead is the redemption of the soul; and the redemption of the soul is through him who quickeneth all things.—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 3, 4.

And this redemption and salvation must be brought about through the power of the gospel. "But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you."—Romans 8: 11.

CHARITY.

Charity is a principle incorporated in all exercises, social, religious, or political. It is not only incorporated in, but it is one of the fundamental principles of all established institutions, whether of God or man; and it is the cement of society, without which all institutions would dissolve and utterly fail of the accomplishment of their purpose. Charity is one of the abiding principles that clusters around God's throne, by which all of heaven's retinue are bound together in the accomplishment of the grand purpose for which they were created. Charity is the principle that moved heaven's infinite wisdom, when we were in a helpless condition, for God to give up his dear Son for us in order that we might be redeemed. It is the cement and basis of all civilized governments, that inspires confidence to trust one another in all the positions of honor; and binds, as with a golden cord, to one common interest. From the lack of charity, distrust, discontentment, and finally, disorder and dissolution will occur. From the lack of it, we may justly attribute the present condition of the Christian world. Charity will enable us to have a proper regard one for the other in the science of literature, and assist one another in the accomplishment of the highest attainments possible, for the accomplishment of the greatest amount of good to all, being destitute of hate or envy. Charity is a principle of infinite importance, more to be desired than gold or rubies. It has within it the power of assimilation, and if cultivated will develop and grow to a marvelous extent. It enables us to master our own dispositions, and to have a proper influence over our friends. Charity is an abiding principle, as we are informed by holy writ: When all else fails, it continues and abides for ever.

Charity is a detective, and enables us to discern if any one is acting from an improper motive. It enables us to judge the acts of all by the motive that prompts the actions. It also enables us never to act from an improper motive. It has immortalized the names of those in the past who have been governed by it.

As a principle it is external, and by abiding in the bonds of it, we will accomplish the greatest good here, and attain the highest condition hereafter.

If it were possible to speak with the dialect of angels, while destitute of charity, it would profit us nothing. Should we attain the highest position in the science of literature; and, like the philanthropist of the ages past, bestow of our goods for the benefit of the poor, if charity be absent, we would be found like tinkling brass, an empty sound.

If we are in the possession of charity, its attributes will predominate in our moral characters. As we are informed in divine writ, "Charity suffereth long and is kind; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own; is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth." It was present at the dedication of the heavens and earth, when the foundations thereof were laid, when the morning stars sang together; and all the sons of God shouted for joy.

Let us cultivate and develop under its influence, and success is ours; we will be beneficial to society, and the world will have been bettered for us having lived in it.

MISSIONARIES IN CHARGE.

THEIR DUTIES AND RESPONSIBILITIES UNDER THE LAW, AND THEIR RIGHTS IN THE PREMISES.

The law of the Lord is perfect.—Psalm 19: 7.

There is no conflict in the law.—Doctrine and Covenants 120: 6.

All Latter Day Saints will admit that the law of the Lord is perfect, and consequently, as stated in the Doctrine and Covenants, there is no conflict nor can there be any conflict in the law; and, as a further consequence, there should be no conflict between the officers of the law in their duties and responsibilities under that perfect law, which nowhere conflicts with itself. Hence the propriety of the counsel given that "there should be no conflict or jealousy of authority between the quorums of the church; all are necessary and equally honorable, each in its place." (Doctrine and Covenants 120: 3.) This being true, there should also be no conflict in authority between any of the officers of the church, when the perfect law under which they are working is properly understood, and each one is working in his proper sphere.

Wherefore, now let every man learn his duty, and to act in the office in which he is appointed, in all diligence.—104: 44.

That there is a conflict between a missionary in charge and district officials is manifestly the case, judging from an article in HERALD for October 2, 1907.

We will say that the writer has never come in conflict with any missionary in charge in respect to the question under consideration in this writing, therefore he is not writing in self-vindication, but will simply give his views on the matter as it appears to him from his standpoint of view as an elder in the church.

The twelve are a traveling, presiding high council, to officiate in the name of the Lord, under the direction of the presidency of the church, agreeably to the institution of heaven, to build up the church and regulate all the affairs of the same, in all nations; first unto the Gentiles, and secondly unto the Jews.—Doctrine and Covenants 104:12.

This means something. Just how much and how little we shall attempt to show from the parts of the law.

Evidently the writer of the article in the HERALD above mentioned, takes the position that the missionary in charge, inasmuch as he is a member of the "traveling, presiding high council," has the right to preside whenever and wherever he is present at a district conference. Upon the other hand, it is possible that district and branch presidents—officers of local organizations—when they read that branches and their officers, districts and their officers, are to be considered as provided for in the law to carry on the work of the ministry in caring for the membership of the church, and to relieve the Twelve and Seventy from the vexation and anxiety of looking after local organizations when effected, would conclude that the missionary in charge has no right whatever to preside in local organizations, or their assemblies, under any conditions of affairs that might exist in those local districts or branches. Were that which we have quoted all that is written, it would be difficult to show that there is no conflict in the law; but we find that the respective duties of both sets of officers are more fully defined in the law; and, as thus defined, we conclude that the rights of both the missionary in charge, and of local—district and branch—officers are limited just so as to allow of no conflict in authority between the two classes of officers. And that when both work along the lines designated, there will be no conflict in the respective duties of their offices. We read:

In both branches and districts the presiding officers should be considered and respected in their offices; nevertheless, the traveling presiding councils of the church being made by the law, their calling and the voice of the church the directing, regulating and advising authorities of the church, and representing it abroad, should when present in either district or branch be regarded and considered as the leading representative authorities of the church, and be respected as such, their counsel and advice be sought and respected when given; and in cases of conflict, or extremity, their decision should be listened to and regarded, subject to the appeal and adjudication provided for in the law. . . . In matters of personal importance and conduct arising in branches or districts, the authorities of those branches and districts should be authorized and permitted to settle them; the traveling councils taking cognizance of those only in which the law and usages of the church were involved, and the general interests of the church are concerned. Where cases of difficulty are of long standing, the council may require local authorities to adjust them; and in case of failure to do so, may regulate them as required by their office and duty; and this that the work and church may not be put to shame and the preaching of the word be hindered.—Doctrine and Covenants 120: 4, 7.

In those two paragraphs we have very clearly defined just where the authority of local officers ends, and those of the missionary in charge begins in districts and branches. "In matters of personal importance," the local authorities are to be "respected in their offices," and be "authorized and permitted to settle them." The missionary in charge, if he should be present, at a meeting of either branch or district which had met to adjust or settle "matters of personal importance and conduct," would have no official business or right to step in and claim the right to preside; but he should, as the law directs, "authorize" that the branches and districts be "permitted to settle them," without any interference on his part. Should, however, questions of law, or the usages of the church be involved in the district or branch, and the general interests of the church be concerned, then the missionary in charge should be allowed to exercise his official rights and duties under the law, and be allowed to preside without let or hindrance on the part of local officers, by respecting the higher officer in his place and in his calling and duties.

Section 120, paragraph 7, further authorizes the missionary in charge to act "in cases of difficulty of long standing," other than those in which the law and usages of the church are involved, when the local officers do not act of their own accord, or when by him "required" to do so for reasons given in paragraph 7.

In paragraph 4 of section 120, where it says, "The traveling presiding councils of the church being made by the law, their calling and the voice of the church the directing, regulating and advising authorities of the church, and representing it abroad, should when present in either district or branch be regarded and considered as the leading representative authorities of the church, and be respected as such, their counsel and advice be sought and respected," etc., etc., must, we believe, be understood in the light of their duties, rights, and powers as explained in paragraph 7 of the same section. And unless there is something to regulate—something out of order in which the law and usages of the church are involved, and which needs regulating—they have no official business there, and have no right to preside because of their official standing in the church.

Webster says regulate means "to adjust by rule, method, or established mode. To put in order." If there is no disorder in a branch or district to be regulated, what need have we of a regulator—an officer whose business it is to regulate—what need of such an officer to preside, when there is nothing in his line of business to be done? To us it seems useless, and not only useless, but it would create disturbance and disorder for any one to claim that he has a legal right to preside; and, unless through courtesy he was thus invited to preside at a district conference or branch business-meeting, he would not in the least be humiliated before the law if he took a seat in the congregation with the rest of the Saints.

If my watch keeps good time, it needs no regulating. If my body and mind are all in good order they do not need a regulator. But if either becomes disordered, then it will need some one to apply the means necessary to regulate it, and set it in order. Just so with a branch or district of the church. So long as it is in line with its duties, and in harmony with the law, it needs no one in the church whose business it is to regulate disorder to interfere with its authorized officers, whose duty it is to preside, and deprive them, even temporarily, of their position as presiding officers of their branch or district. But in case disorder does exist, then they are empowered by the law, their office and calling, to go in and act in that capacity, and regulate whatever may need regulating. Taking this view of the matter, it seems to us that all parties would be properly respected in their office and calling, and none would be humiliated before the law; but would in all things be honoring the law, and thus bring honor on themselves and the work. Taking this view of the matter, we think it is in perfect harmony with the following:

The work now lying before the missionary quorums of the church is of such increased magnitude and importance—the field so white unto the harvest, and the need for laborers so great—that the twelve and the seventy under their direction, together with such high priests and elders as can travel and preach as missionaries, shall be free to wait upon their ministry in gospel work, leaving the branches and districts where organization is effected to the care and administration of the standing ministers, high priests, elders, priests, teachers, and deacons, so far as possible; thus freeing these spiritual authorities and leaving them at liberty to push the preaching of the word into the new fields now widening before them; in which work, if they will but now take counsel, saith the Spirit, they shall feel a peace and vigor of mind surpassing what they have enjoyed in the past. That part of the law which says: "It is the duty of the twelve, also, to ordain and set in order all the other officers of the church," is to be understood by the revelation which went before and in accordance with which it was written; and which follows after it in the book; and when those officers are ordained and set in their order, in the church, they should be left to administer in the things unto which they were ordained, having charge of the affairs over which they are called and set apart to preside [over branches and districts, as the context in this and preceding paragraph clearly teaches—J. F.]; the twelve and seventy administering as those prosecuting the work of preaching with the warning voice [to the unconverted world—J. F.], baptizing, organizing and setting in order [new branches and districts—J. F.], then pushing their ministry into other fields until the world is warned. It is the will of God that they do this; yea, verily, thus saith the Spirit, If they will now enter upon this work, leaving the burden of care in organized districts, or conferences to the standing ministry, under the presidency of the church; observing the law already given to ordain and set high priests or elders to preside in large branches and in districts, and also evangelical ministers, then will those officers set in the church be useful and he who gave the law be honored; the differences between the quorums be healed, confidence be restored and good will and peace come to the people as a cherishing fountain.—Doctrine and Covenants 122: 7, 8.

From the foregoing two paragraphs in the Doctrine and Covenants, it is certainly taught with clearness that the Twelve and Seventy and such others of the high priests and elders that constitute the missionary force of the church are to "push" their work into "new fields," open up the work there, "baptizing, organizing and setting in order" new branches and districts, and "then pushing their ministry into other fields until the world is warned." Were these two paragraphs taken separately from what is written elsewhere, we might conclude that the missionary in charge had no right to preside in either branch or district, after they were once organized. But when we take paragraphs 4 and 7 of section 120 into consideration, we must conclude that in case of disorder in either branch or district, then, and then only, will he have such right.

In this connection, and in perfect harmony with the law, as we understand it, we quote, with but little further comment, from Doctrine and Covenants 122: 9, 10, as follows:

The quorums in respect to authority are designed to take precedence in office as follows: The presidency, the twelve, the seventy in all meetings and gatherings of the membership, where no previous organization has been effected. Where organization has been arranged and the officers have been ordained and set in order; the standing ministry in their order; high priests, elders, priests, teachers, and deacons order; high priests, elders, priests, teachers, and deacons. . . . Should the church fall into disorder or any portion of any of them to take measures to correct such disorder; through the advice and direction of the presidency, the twelve, the seventy, or a council of high priests, in cases of emergency.

In section 122, paragraph 7, which we have already quoted, we note again the statement that the "missionary quorums" of the church should leave the branches and districts where organization is effected to the care and administration of the standing ministers, high priests, elders, priests, teachers, and deacons so far as possible. Now, is it not possible to leave them alone just so long as they do not become disordered? We certainly think so. Then the traveling, presiding quorums have no official business whatever in branches or districts until they do become disordered, and then unquestionably they do have authority and the legal right to go in, take charge, and set the same in order.

One or two thoughts more, and we are done. Is it not more reasonable that a branch or district president would have a much better understanding of local affairs pertaining to their particular locality than one whose mission and business is in the field, to preach to the world? And consequently they would be better qualified to do the local business under ordinary or normal conditions, than the higher officers in the church would. Hence, we see the beauty and perfection of the law that respects every man in his own office and calling, and allows no one to encroach on his rights.

Joseph the Martyr has said: "We have learned, by sad experience, that it is the nature and disposition of almost all men, as soon as they get a little authority, as they suppose, they will immediately begin to exercise unrighteous dominion."—Doctrine and Covenants 121:39, Salt Lake edition, 1886. This statement is perhaps just as applicable to those high in authority—the missionary force of the church—as to the standing ministry of the church, district and branch officials; the one, Diotrophes like, who "loved to have the preëminence among them"—loved to exercise the authority of those above him; and the others who, though not named, were disposed to disrespect those who were in less authority, and deprive them of their rights, or, in other words, were inclined to be "lords over God's heritage." (1 Peter 5:3.)

Hoping and praying that the time say soon come when Zion's watchmen may see eye to eye.

A Dream.

In my dream, a few nights ago, I thought I was in one of the houses here in Taronia, as they used to be; and hanging against the wall was a beautiful new silk dress of a light brown shade. I was showing it to some of the sisters as having been my wedding dress; though in fact my wedding dress was white; and this one had the appearance of never having been worn. Along with the dress was the long white veil, and wreath of orange blossoms, the same that I had worn; they also looked crisp and new. I laid the dress on the bed, and arranged the folds of the veil to fall gracefully over it to show the sisters how it looked when they were worn. Some one then called me to go into another house, where there were two sick persons. I was attending them, when I became aware that the twilight was deepening, which caused me to leave the house hastily, saying that I could not stay another minute. I must go home, which seemed to be somewhere in America; but I had to go on foot, and alone, and it was a long way. I started walking very rapidly. At first my way lay close beside a car-track, so close that it was difficult to walk. Now I had left the car-track and was on a road that took many steps to make much distance on account of cradle-hollows—a road that was very familiar to me in childhood. After a while I came to the foot of a mountain, a long, gradual incline. Here I lost sight of the ground altogether; I entered what seemed to be a broad snow-shed, at least there was a broad, high, flattish roof from base to summit, which made the way a shade darker and more gloomy. Beneath this roofing there were several ways, like so many car-tracks, which, though being side by side there, led out to very different places; and all was so literally bestrewn with logs and timbers of all lengths and sizes that the different paths could not be seen, and I was afraid of verging onto a wrong track. I had not slackened my pace; and since this driftwood, as it seemed to be, lay lengthwise of the road, there was always foot room to walk between it, but no room to spare. When more than half way through, a man passed me on a wheel, but he did not shoot past on account of my rapid gait. He also was wheeling between logs. While passing I said, You lead off on the way that leads out at the top of the hill, and I will follow; for I could easily keep him in sight. He went straight ahead for a while, then turned off to the left. I said within myself, I will not go that way, I will keep straight for the top. Then I did not see the wheelman any more. He went suddenly down out of sight. It was only a little while till I found myself at the end of the shed, and on the top of the hill; and such a surprise opened to my view that I stood still in an ecstasy of delight. It was no longer twilight. I thought at first it was moonlight; but it was not like the pale, silvery light of the moon, neither the bright glare of the sun, but a creamy, mellow light that cast no shadows. And oh, the beauty it revealed! I can give but a poor description of it! I saw that I was standing about in the center of, and on the highest elevation of a short chain of mountainous hills; and as far as the eye could reach was scenery of great natural beauty. The sloping hillsides, the clusters of trees, while others again stood out by themselves, with broad, spreading branches; the lovely valley at the base, with pretty nooks and shady dells along the foot-hills; the tender, green grass that covered both hillside and valley was as smooth and even as a well-kept lawn; no dead branches on the trees, no dry leaves or withered grass to mar their beauty. I said within myself, I have often looked at this high, saddle-shaped peak in the mountains, but never thought I would come over it. As I said those words I could see without turning or looking back, the way I had come, from the time I left the house to the place where I then stood; there was no road visible, neither tracks, it was as though my passing along had left a mark; and, thank God, it was as straight as an iron rod. When drinking in the scenery before me, the thought flitted through my mind, this is not of earth; and yet the outline of all seemed familiar. Then in the sloping distance, I beheld my home; and lo, it was our house on Mount Olivet, in California. Yes, it was the same outline of country, but so perfected that I did not at first recognize it. I commenced to descend the smooth green in front of me, apparently too nice to step on. Presently I discovered beautiful flowers, more beautiful than I had ever beheld, growing in little clusters here and there; not on bushes or high stalks, but like artistically arranged bouquets of a variety of flowers deposited among the soft grass; the leaves were not green, but of a delicate salmon color. While descending, I flitted from one cluster to another like a delighted child, gathering some from each. When about half way to the house, and where the flowers grew in the richest clusters, I perceived two or three groups of young maidens, some sitting on the ground, and some standing. They were dressed in loose dresses such as the natives wear, and they looked like the native sisters, only their faces were not dark. They looked at me and smiled. I said, Perhaps I ought not to gather these flowers, but they are so pretty I can not help it. Here the dream ended. It seemed to have been a glimpse of the purified earth, and it left a happy feeling with me for days, notwithstanding my wedding dress was not white, the flowers were not white, neither were the maidens dressed in white; nothing that typified the righteousness of Saints. But the track made over the rough road was straight, and it terminated on the top of a high mountain.

There have been many excellent articles in our church papers of late. I do not know what our spiritual condition would be without the renewing brought about by the coming of those papers. They are indeed "helps." Bro. Isaac Smith's "Fruit of your doings" was food for thought. How I did wish the Saints here could read it! We have been having some good meetings of late, in which the gifts were manifest to the encouragement and instruction of all. Some of the erring ones have returned.

Bro. and Sr. Lake are with us again. The Lord has preserved them through all the perils that beset their going, from island to island, and brought them back in even better condition than when they started. Praise his name!

To be, or not to be: that is the question:
 Whether 'tis nobler in mind to suffer
 The slugs and arrows of outrageous fortune,—
 Or to take arms against a sea of troubles,
 And—by opposing end them? To die: to sleep:
 No more; and by sleep to say we end
 The heartache and the thousand natural shocks
 That flesh is heir to, 'tis a consummation
 Devoutly to be wish'd. To die, to sleep;
 To sleep: perchance to dream: ay, there's the rub.

Letter Department

PAPETE, Tahiti, February 17, 1908.

Editors Herald: Our mail arrived on the 14th, and, among the letters we received, was one from the Presidency, which was very comforting to all the Saints here; but the HERALDS are still unread, though they were opened and hastily looked through, as were all the church papers; but some of them are missing.

The Saints are beginning to gather for the conference, which is to meet on the 6th of March this year. It was changed to give the divers time to get to the diving islands before the diving commenced. And as the time for the diving has been changed again by the government, we may meet in conference on March 6 and then adjourn till April 6, if the Saints desire to.

When our Sunday-school convention meets, we hope to perfect arrangements for printing Sunday-school lessons for the coming year; and the young missionaries, with Emma's counsel, will give an impetus to the Sunday-school work here; and we also expect to start the Religio again in accordance with a resolution of the Religio convention of April, 1905, which discontinued the Religio until the new missionaries arrived from America, as it was accounted unwise to leave the society in operation without an American missionary to oversee and regulate them.

And we also expect to begin the work of filling up Taronā shortly after conference, and divide the land of Taronā among the districts of the mission and the few Saints of the Taronā Branch, and soon we may have a nice chapel and conference house and homes for the people of the church, who may come here from the different islands outside of Tahiti, and from this island also, where they can rest and worship the great Father according to his word.

Bro. and Sr. Lake are here now, and they and Emma are fairly well, and are enjoying the meeting of the native brethren who are beginning to come to conference from the various islands.

May God's peace and blessing rest and abide upon the Israel of God.

Your brother in Christ,

JOSEPH F. BURTON.

NEOLA, Iowa, March 10, 1908.

Editors Herald: I enjoy reading the letters in the HERALD, and have often wished I could write as others can; or, that I could arise in testimony-meeting and express my desires as others. But to do so is another thing. Perhaps it is not always as easy for others as it seems, and "Must I be borne to paradise,

 On flowery beds of ease,
 While others fight to win the prize?"

I remember attending a prayer-meeting where no one seemed to have a desire to take part, and it was a drag from the first. I thought if Bro. ——— would only arise and speak, it would change the meeting. I felt impressed to sing something, and perhaps he would arise. When I had finished the verse, I looked up to see if he had arisen; but no, he was still sitting. So I sang another verse; but he still kept his seat. Having so great a desire for him to arise, I sang one more verse. I looked up. He was standing, waiting till the singing ceased. About the first thing he said was that he had fully made up his mind to take no part in the meetnig. His talk had the desired effect, as many took part after that, and the meeting was no longer a drag.

Dear Saints, do we appreciate the blessings we receive?

I often think, How long will the Saints be permitted to live in peace as they do now? and, will we be able to stand when trials come?

Some time ago I had the following dream: It seemed that I, with others, was riding along in a carriage, going to attend a large gathering or meeting. Before we reached the meeting-house we had to go up a large hill. As we neared the foot of the hill, we saw some men come over the top, pour something on the ground, then turn and go back. On reaching the top, we found they had been pouring water on the road. As it was cold weather it soon froze, making it very icy. The carriage slued round, so it was almost impossible to go on. They they began to throw mud and ice at us; but we did not mind that, as we were slowly making headway, and soon reached the meeting-house. When we drove up, we saw that there was no one in the churchyard, the crowd being in the street, in front. We wondered why they did not go in, but as we came closer we saw that there was a large ditch to cross before we could get in the yard. There seemed to be a path made of short, narrow planks, that led to the ditch; but the planks that laid over it were so short that they would scarcely reach, making it very dangerous to cross over. As we came up (intending to walk over) a man stepped up, picked up all the planks, and, in a loud voice said, "You will have to pay five dollars for every plank you walk on." We knew then why the crowd had not gone over. As we stood there, not knowing what to do, a lady came and touched me on the arm, and said she had prepared a place of safety for Sr. ———, and as I and the lady with me were the only women there, she asked us to go, too. She took us to what seemed to be a large tent. I thought, What a queer place to call a place of safety. If those men came that way they could destroy it in a few minutes. There were only a few inside (all women). Though I felt safe, I was not satisfied, as I had left dear brother behind, and I wished so much to have him with me. So I asked the lady who had been so kind in bringing us there, if I could go and bring brother, too. She said I could. But I still did not feel satisfied, as there were others left behind, whom I would gladly have asked, but dare not.

After having this dream, I thought of what is written in my patriarchal blessing, "Difficulties will obstruct thy pathway, but let thy feet be found steadfast, and thou shalt know God is thy protector."

Dear Saints, I ask an interest in your prayers, that when these difficulties arise, I may be counted worthy to be favored of God.

Your sister,
CORR SCOTT.

VINCENNES, Indiana, February 25, 1908.

Editors Herald: I will report the Baggerly-Albright debate, which commenced January 30 and closed February 3. The debate was on church propositions, drawn up in the usual way, J. M. Baggerly affirming the Reorganized Church and J. M. Albright affirming the Christian Church. Bro. Baggerly showed their church up as it was, and then left it without either head or feet or even any body. Then he set our church up in such a manner that a little child could see that it was in perfect harmony with the apostolic church. Bro. Baggerly is an able defender of the angel's message, and Elder Albright was a perfect gentleman in every respect; only had to be called to order twice during the ten nights. He acknowledged his defeat, and is investigating our doctrine, and said that he will come in if everything proves all right.

When the Campbellites saw their defeat, they planned to take us out, or scare us away, by shooting and throwing through the window. Satan raged, heathens howled, but we made many friends, and some are ready for baptism, I will send you a clipping from the Vincennes Commercial that will show what the people at large thought of our victory. They got the name of our brother wrong. It should be James M. Baggerly instead of Jeremiah. May the Spirit of God enlighten all mankind, is my prayer,

R. F. D. 9.

JOHN A. DAVIS.

HAD HOT OLD TIME.

HAZELTON, Indiana, February 14.—A ten-day debate between the Reverend James Albright, a Christian minister, and Jeremiah Babberly, a Latter Day Saint, at Glass Ridge Church, lower Knox County, was won by the Mormon expounder. Seven arrests followed the conclusion of the ten-day argument; and five men, accused of disturbing the meetings, have been fined.

Charles Ferguson, the only man to plead not guilty, had his case continued by phone, while John T. Skinner, the alleged leader in the disturbance, has not yet been found. The defendants paying fines included James and Frederick Davis, Glenn Guess, and Burr Thompson. Otto Dixon, fined $19.60, and who failed to pay, was removed to jail at Vincennes. The trials were had before Squire Charles Glenn. The judges of the debate were John Davis, Thomas Martin, and Theodore Morris.

SHABBONA, Michigan, March 8, 1908.

Editors Herald: We, as a little body of Saints, are trying to keep the banner floating; but sometimes we feel that there is a cloud that darkens the rays of the sun. But after the darkness passeth, the light will appear more beautiful to the eye. We have been greatly benefited by the elevating and inspiring sermons delivered by Elder G. F. Grimes, realizing much good has been accomplished through his efforts here. We hope to advance, step by step, spiritually; and live in obedience to God's laws and commands, that we may more abundantly receive of his favors.

This gospel is dear to us; and, without the hope there is in the gospel, we feel all would be darkness. How well we remember when it was first brought to this vicinity by Elder William Davis. He came here a stranger; but now many a door is open to him, and friends are waiting to welcome him back.

One more was taken into the fold and kingdom in the person of Sr. Groombridge. Thus they are coming in one by one. We hope to be humble, and faithful to our covenant, that when Zion shall be redeemed we may be worthy to be gathered in.

CELIA M. LORENTZEN.

COMSTOCK, Nebraska, March 3, 1908.

Editors Herald: Bro. Prettyman lives here, and through his untiring efforts has broken down the hard feeling against our people; and when Elder J. R. Sutton and myself came here Elder Evans of the Congregational Church asked Bro. Sutton to occupy his pulpit one Sunday evening, and myself to occupy in Wescott Church some four miles from here. On Monday, the 24th, the Temperance League met at the Congregational church, and Bro. Sutton gave the address, by request of Elder Evans. Bro. Sutton gave the people of Comstock to understand that we, as a church, sent no one to represent us in the world that used liquor in any form. A good feeling existed between our people here and the other churches.

While Bro. Sutton and Bro. Rumel were laboring near Kennard, Nebraska, a Reverend Warren, of Kennard, told a story concerning our people in order to keep his people from going out to hear the brethren. The story came to the ears of our brethren, and Bro. Sutton sent a statement to Clearwater, Nebraska, which came back signed by the four principal business men of Coldwater. The statement follows this letter.

It will please both Bro. Sutton and Bro. Rumel if you will send a marked copy of the HERALD in which you publish the statement to Reverend Warren. I write by the request of Bro. Sutton concerning this matter.

HALE W. SMITH.

A STATEMENT OF FACTS.

Whereas, one, Reverend Warren, one time pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church, in Clearwater, Nebraska, but at present located as pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church, in Kennard, Nebraska, having made statements to certain parties of Kennard, Nebraska, that while he (Reverend Warren) was pastor of the church in Clearwater, Nebraska, he held a public debate with the Latter Day Saints, in which debate he vanquished the Latter Day Saints; and also that the Latter Day Saints offered one thousand dollars to any one who would find a statement supporting polygamy in any of the standard works of the Saints, and that he (Reverend Warren) having found such statement, the Saints recalled and would not meet the argument, we, therefore, as citizens of the town of Clearwater, Nebraska, being acquainted with the Reverend Warren during the time of his stay as pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church, in Clearwater, Nebraska, do affirm that no discussion occurred between Reverend Warren and the Latter Day Saints at this place, and also that the offering of money as a prize, as stated above, etc., is false.

TORONTO, Ontario, February 8, 1908.

Dear Herald: This is my first letter for you since we entered upon the duties of a missionary in October, 1907. This is certainly a strange change of work for me, having spent twenty-eight years shoeing horses, never sparing myself as to wringing from my brow the sweat, and now no physical exercise only walking around. The strain of studying, not having a trained mind, is more wearisome to me than the hardest day's shoeing; but having been called by revelation to give up the anvil, I enter upon the new life with reluctance. For many years I desired to spend my entire time in defense of this latter-day work, and would have counted it the joy of my soul to go, but God wanted me at home till conditions were ripe, and then when the time came it took the word of the Lord to chase me. That seems to be the way in this work. Paul's experience was similar when he says, "What I would, I do not; and what I would not, that I do." I find it much easier to sing, "I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord," than it is to act it out; but I must not misrepresent myself. Yes, since coming into this great work, I have and will go and do or stay and do. All we ask, is the assurance that God is behind our work. On one occasion, when at a conference, during the election of the district officers, five of us were nominated for the office, and during the discussion I wanted to pull out with the consent of my nominators, fearing I might be elected (without positively declining) and in the heat of debate over the question a high priest who sat near me wrote on a paper and sent over to me the following:

"How ready is the man to go
Whom God hath never sent;
How timid, diffident, and slow,
God's chosen instrument."

They elected me, very much against my wishes, and so it is, I presume, were I to speak for the Prophet, his counselors, the Twelve, and every man or woman that is heart and soul in this latter-day work. Could they have their choice of position they, with the writer, would say, "Lord, let me occupy in the back seat as an onlooker." "I would rather be a door-keeper (deacon) in the house of the Lord." Never have we felt so insignificant and unqualified to occupy as now.

At present we are laboring on the outskirts of Toronto, and it is wonderful the number of people that have heard the gospel through Elder Evans in the Majestic. There is a great work being done there. The crowds never tire.

BELLEVILLE, Illinois, March 9, 1908.

Herald Readers: I arrived at this place the 3d. Found the Saints as usual, except Grandpa Betts. He has had quite a hard spell of sickness. But thanks to God for divine help, he is fast recovering. There are a few noble souls at this point, who are interested in helping the work along. There are several young people who would be a great help here, if conditions were more favorable, and they received more encouragement from older members. I am sorry to see such a lack of interest toward helping our young Saints. I would like to see conditions change for the better.

My labors for the past two months have been in company with Bro. F. M. Slover, in the Southern Illinois District. I find Bro. Francis to be a noble fellow workman, well liked by all in his old field. He is ever ready to prefer his brother in the pulpit, or anywhere else, where he thinks it will do the most good. And the writer prefers his brother to do the baptizing, so we got along real fine. We held some very interesting meetings, especially at Bellair and Springerton. Some noble souls, and earnest workers at both places.

We had the pleasure of witnessing the baptism of eight precious souls into the kingdom at the latter place. We had a very large congregation, and we were well supplied with preachers, as Bro. I. M. Smith was with us, who is also one of their old missionaries. All seemed to be very well pleased to see and hear him again.

Bro. Francis and I went south to Tunnel Hill Branch. Roads very bad; yet we had a few meetings, which we hope were productive of good. I leave here for Bourbon, Crawford County, Missouri, to hold meetings. H. SPARLING.

COLLINWOOD, Ohio, March 5, 1908.

Editors Herald: This morning breaks after the blackest night in local history. One hundred and sixty-five of the school children here met death in its worst form yesterday, by panic and fire! The story is being read ere now on two continents; but will the lesson be heeded? Some persons, not yet determined, have been negligent, or unwatchful, or both; many scoffers will lay the result as an interrogation point, written in blood, against the word of God, and yet how often does the warning sound forth, "Take heed!" "Take heed to yourselves!"

When disaster and death is focused down to one central point, it causes humankind to stop in its mad rush a moment and stand appalled, forgetting the while that the death-scourge is abroad in the land; and even though an hundred babes meet death to-day in fire and frenzy, we do not heed as we should that every day they are meeting death by their thousands, often by longer sufferings!

These things should not be! The all-wise Father has 'warned and forewarned us.' He has promised immunity to the heedful, even that the destroying angel might pass us by.

Is the light of revelation a real and practical asset in our lives to-day, or are we unwatchful and negligent, and thus courting disaster?

Bro. Tapping moved from this ill-fated school district, to this side of town but recently, else this latest disaster might have touched the Cleveland Saints, his little girl formerly attending the school.

Bro. Robert Miller, our deacon, will be a busy man in this trouble, as his insurance business carries him among the greater number of the stricken families, and many of the poor little ones he personally knew. As a true Saint should, he carries a warm and sympathetic heart, and we pray he may be inspired to speak words of comfort and hope to the bereaved and soul-sickened ones.

At Kirtland, the district conference afforded the Saints in this country a pleasant reunion, peace and harmony prevailing throughout. The G. A. R. Hall, acquired by the Saints there, was dedicated on the afternoon of Sunday, March 1, Bro. Greene preaching the sermon, and branching out along a line of very practical instruction, such as we only too seldom hear from the pulpit, though the divine counsel provides a most solid and important vantage-point of this kind for our use, instruction, and protection.

Let us occupy the higher ground—God would never have called us thereto were it beyond our power of accomplishing, nor need we expect “more light!” “more light!” until we can show appreciation for that which he has given, which we are prone to wrap in a napkin and hide till the coming of our Lord!

Meanwhile, “My people perish for lack of knowledge,” while the “great treasures of wisdom” go abegging. In like manner, as we deal evasively with his divine counsel, so we meet retribution in the rejection of our work by the world; we can and must win only by the fact that we are called to be like unto a city set on a hill—the world, the sincere part at least, will turn to us for safety. Will we be able to care for them?

Looking forward to and working for that perfect day when for ever will “Hushed be the accents of sorrow and mourning

Zion, in gladness, begins her mild reign!”

I pray God's favor on his people.

SAN ANTONIO, Texas, February 25, 1908.

Editors Herald: Possibly a few words from this part of the Lord's vineyard would be interesting to some, and especially those that have labored here. I have been laboring for some weeks in the western part of the district. Among other places, I visited the place where Bro. S. S. Smith held a ten-day debate last June with the Christians, or Campbellites, and I am proud to say we have not an enemy in that neighborhood. Even the Christians are our friends. The Christians have never preached a sermon at that place since the debate. There are several very near the kingdom at that place. I also preached at Ariola, Texas, where Bro. M. G. Wallace and wife and daughter have lived for some years. Bro. Wallace was in very bad health and had been for some time, and just one week after I left his place a phone message reached me that he had passed away, and his request was that I should preach his funeral-sermon. He passed away February 17, and the remains were brought to Pearsall, Texas, and on the morning of the 18th I preached the funeral-sermon to a large crowd, and was blessed in trying to tell the people the hope of the Saints of the latter days. Indeed the promises that are vouchsafed unto us in the gospel law are a great consolation under such circumstances. A great deal of prejudice is being removed in Texas in regard to the latter-day work. Very often when visiting new places they think I am from Utah; but when I make them acquainted with the fact that I was born and raised in Southwestern Texas, they seem to be surprised. Usually, I get to tell them something about the latter-day work; if not in their church buildings, I take the advantage of the street or in their homes.

Ever praying for the success of the work and the redemption of Zion, I remain,

Your brother,

D. S. PALMER.

LYNNVILLE, Kentucky, March 5, 1908.

Dear Herald: Weather conditions for the past two months have been very unfavorable for the prosecution of mission work. Excessive rains, and consequent muddy roads, have made travel difficult, and hindered attendance at the services we have been able to hold. Then, too, there has been a great deal of sickness throughout the country. From Kentucky to the Gulf of Mexico there seems to be a general complaint among the people. They seem to have “bad colds,” or “the grippe”; and in some places it seems to be almost epidemic. I have heard of a great many fatal cases, but none among the Saints. I rejoice in this; not that others are taken, but that the Saints are spared. I believe if we would observe the Word of Wisdom more closely, we would enjoy still more of the Master's blessing; both from a temporal and spiritual standpoint.

The spirit of debate seems to be in the air throughout this mission. Nine discussions have been held during the conference year just closed; besides, the first two days of the year were the closing days of a debate that had commenced four days previously, between the writer and Doctor J. F. Love, of the self-styled “Church of Christ.” This debate was held at the Santa Rosa church, near Berrydale, Florida, February 25, to March 2, 1907. In October I met the Doctor again, at Bay Minette, Alabama, and from December 31 to January 3, I was engaged with Elder S. A. Pain of the Primitive Baptist order, and February 25 to 28, with the Reverend I. N. Penick, of the Missionary Baptist Church. During the forepart of February 1908, Bro. J. M. Stubbart held a debate at Van Cleave, Mississippi, with a Missionary Baptist, Reverend B. M. Bogard, of Little Rock, Arkansas. During the year, Bro. J. R. McClain held one debate with a Mr. Jones, and Bro. C. L. Snow held two with the same man, and one with a Mr. Hargroves, of the same faith and order. January 28 to February 1, was held, near Cottage Grove, Tennessee, a five-day discussion between Bro. J. W. Wight and Elder J. D. Tant of the so-called “Church of Christ.” The writer acted as moderator for Bro. Wight. The agreement was to debate church propositions; but Mr. Tant, from the first, abused, with more or less virulence, Joseph Smith, and the Book of Mormon, seemingly thinking that all he had to do to sustain his church, and also to down his opponent, was to show some defect in the character of Joseph Smith, or in the “Book of Mormon,” as he called it. Bro. Wight gave him choice of propositions, agreeing to affirm Joseph Smith a prophet, or the church question. Mr. Tant chose the church question, and the expectation of his people, and some others, was that the church propositions would be discussed, from a Bible standpoint. But Mr. Tant went back on the agreement; brought in Joseph Smith's prophetic claims, the Book of Mormon, and resorted to as many filthy, slanderous stories, as he could rehash, in order to prejudice, as far as he could, the minds of the people. But Bro. Wight was able to meet him on all points, and made friends of practically all who heard the debate. One or two outsiders voluntarily contributed to Bro. Wight's expenses. Others manifested their friendship and high esteem by hearty invitations to their homes. All in all, the debate will do us good in the vicinity where it was held. Bro. Wight's manner, as well as the clear, straightforward, logical arguments presented by him, were in striking contrast to the manner, and incoherent, illogical arguments, of pretended arguments, of his opponent; so much so that, as stated above, practically all who heard (except it be a few who were too prejudiced to be fair in judgment) were able to see that Bro. Wight had outdistanced his opponent on all points.

We were sorry that the unfavorable weather and muddy roads kept so many of the Saints from hearing Bro. Wight preach at the few points where we sought to hold meetings in the district. Those who heard him in the debate, or in preaching, were very favorably impressed with him as a defender of the truth.

I heard none of the other brethren in the discussions wherein they took part, so can not speak from personal knowledge of any of them. Suffice to say, that so far as I have learned from all sources, about all these ten debates, the only change in the faith of the Saints is, they have been strengthened, and quite a number of friends to the cause have been made.

The brethren in the field have done a fairly good year's work, in addition to the work of debating, and I am pleased to be able to state that there are evidences of improvement, for which I am glad to give the brethren in the mission field credit. Also to local workers, who help as their circumstances admit, here and there. Marked improvement along Sunday-school lines of work is noticeable, in some places. May it continue, is our prayer. The sweet influences of the Holy Spirit are often felt, and give us much "courage by the way." For this we feel very thankful to the good Father above. May peace abide with Zion's children everywhere.

T. C. KELLEY.

REAGAN, Texas, February 26, 1908.

Dear Herald: I thought as we are having some very interesting meetings here at the Philadelphia Branch I would contribute a few lines to your columns. It is so cheering to me to read the grand and spiritual letters that you bring to me, and the comfort that I get in reading the inspiring thoughts of others is a source of strength to me; for I see those who, with myself, have not been as diligent as we should have been, now arising to diligence, and I hope and trust that the good work will roll on till all the honest in heart are gathered. There have been two baptisms in this branch of the church since this meeting has commenced.

Your sister,

MRS. W. W. SQUIRES.

PENSACOLA, Florida, February 26, 1908.

Dear Herald: As I read the many good and interesting letters which appear in the HERALD the thought comes to me that perhaps a few lines from this part of the Lord's vineyard might be of interest to some of its readers. We have had some fine preaching by Brn. E. Powell and N. L. Booker. We have no branch here yet, but I hope we will soon. There are four families of the Saints here and all seem to be in good spirits. As for myself, my intention is good, for I know this work is true.

We live eight miles from Pensacola, and will be glad to have any of the elders visit us at any time; for I think some of the outsiders are interested in the work. I ask the prayers of all the Saints that I may come up higher.

Your sister in the one faith,

ROXEY COOPER.

CLARE, Michigan, March 6, 1908.

Editors Herald: As I have not the opportunity to meet with the Saints the thought came to me this morning to write this letter. There was a hard rain- and ice-storm here last night. It has been very cold and stormy weather this winter.

Well, dear Saints, I was baptized into the Reorganized Church at Farwell, August 29, 1877. I have never regretted that I found this beautiful gospel. I have had many things revealed unto me to show me that this is the church, and is truly the work of God. I have been healed of many severe diseases by the prayers of the Saints and the laying on of hands, and have had dreams and visions to show me the work is true. Although I feel my weakness and unworthiness, and many times step aside from the right way, yet the Lord is merciful to me; he blesses me day by day. It is the desire of my heart, and determination, to live a better, purer life in the future than I have in the past, with God's grace assisting me. Pray for me, dear Saints, that I may receive more spiritual strength and be able to overcome every besetting sin, and at last be gathered with the blest. My prayers are for all his people.

Yours in Christ,

SR. MARTHA HARPER.

Over the Mountains.

Editors Herald: My former correspondence was from the rarely beautiful city of Logan, Utah, in the first autumnal month—September. Elder Stead and I had gone thither to preach on the street. We found on arrival the baby of the resident missionary dead. Ere the arrival of the father from his far mission, we had conducted its funeral and laid it away in yonder hill beneath the whispering leaves.

About the 20th of the month the writer left Logan and the two missionaries and came to Oxford, Idaho. There I remained for a couple of weeks, preaching once in the Mormon church by permission of the bishop, the Mormon organist playing for me. I requested the church for another service, but the bishop had other use for it. Oxford is a point from which snow is visible the year around on the lofty heights westward. There are two families of Saints there, who intend to come Zionward, some of them at least, as soon as the way opens up.

One brother gave me an account of what he relied on as a spiritual dream in relation to the Brighamite church. He saw the time come, as it was pictured before him, when the Brighamites were coming in this church "in bunches," with that rapidity that there could scarcely be found, in the mission, sufficient of our elders to baptize them, to wait on them in the administration of the gospel ordinances. I am inclined to credit his dream, whatever time will elapse before it is fulfilled. I believe that a trend of astonishing events will awaken conviction in a great many; that such events will exhibit the contrast so favorably to us that the observing who are intelligent and honest of heart can not but see it. When our temple rears its spire in the heavens, when we have begun the vicarious ordinances therein, when our ministry go forth with that increased power, when our people are gathered in the holy places in great numbers, and other multitudes coming, with little inclination or movement on the part of Mormons in that direction, and when in this situation the judgments of the Lord are being poured out without measure upon the wicked outside cities in a remarkable manner, when that which happened San Francisco is seen to be but an example of that which is to follow upon other cities—then I suspect there may be such a crisis in the Mormon church as was depicted to the brother. And even then it is not likely to be a general stampede, but a small minority. Just think of one twentieth—or much less than that—of their population of three hundred and twenty-five thousand coming into the Reorganized Church. Of course they do not get their statistics the same as we do; and if we derived our statistics the same as they do it would put us way beyond the sixty thousand. If all the Mormon apostates were stricken from their lists, and if no one but baptized converts were reported, it would mean a tremendous reduction in their numerical strength. And if they enforced the laws of morality—profanity and drinking for example—it would cut them down so that I have no hesitancy in saying that they would come nowhere near paralleling us.

I baptized two at Oxford and came farther north. By way of Pocatello I visited Blackfoot and other points on the St. Anthony branch of the O. S. L. railway, including the Teton Basin. At Blackfoot, which I venture to say beats anything I have seen for fantastic Indians, I had a couple of friendly conversations with Ex-senator Dubois, who showed me much courtesy and friendship. He is a resident of the town and invited me to his home. He said he was about to start a paper in Boise, in which after it obtained headway he would publish on his own accord the difference between the two churches. The paper has since been started and he has carried out his promise. The Mormons hate him like leprosy, and think he is as crooked as Snake River, which, for the first time, I saw at Blackfoot.

It was about potato and sugar-beet time when I was up that line. It was interesting indeed to see the constant hauling of those roots for weeks and weeks to the factory, the first of which description I ever had the opportunity of going through, a Mormon institution. Potatoes, I never saw so large as they grow them along that line. It is quite a common thing to find a single potato weighing three or four pounds. One woman said they had six which made a half bushel in weight. One was captured at Rigby, same region, which weighed ten pounds and a quarter. Now, beat that in Missouri, will you?

The Teton Basin is near the corner of Yellowstone Park and near the three Teton peaks, famed far and near. Too late to enter the park, which opportunity we might have enjoyed had we landed there earlier in the season. People go through with covered wagons, taking necessaries for subsistence with them, which renders the tour inexpensive. Utah and Idaho are great for covered wagons and long drives. In Utah I met a sister who, with her husband, had taken a fourteen hundred mile drive during the summer, to some extent speculatively, and for the comfort and recreation there was in it. I do not blame them. In said basin we have two branches; one the best, I presume, in Idaho. There I met Elder John Condit and got acquainted with him, who can tell the story of Idaho in connection with our work.

Some of the Saints on that line will probably come to Zion this spring. Some, I believe, have left for the East since they saw me. Do not think from this that I am unduly urging the gathering, let alone a precipitate flight.

Mr. Dubois had said: "If you come to Boise we can both help each other." I determined to try Boise for the winter, since it was so easily within my reach to have a warmer winter than ever before. Setting out for there I came part of the way and found in the first place by a letter in the HERALD to which my attention was called by a brother, that Sr. Gill from Nebraska, with her family, had settled at Heyburn, which is about twenty miles from Minidoka, on a branch line, and that she would appreciate to be called on. I allowed myself to be sidetracked there, began preaching in the schoolhouse, and have been there most of the time from that time (November 28) to now (March 5). And it is at Heyburn, Idaho, were I indite these words, where also I expect to be till the last week of this month, thence to Independence, possibly first attending the conference at Hagerman.

I have preached about thirty sermons in the schoolhouse here, and gave a series in the school at Minidoka, where reside Bro. Benson and wife, formerly of Iowa, who has charge of the steam pump; also their son, Doctor J. L. Benson, and wife, at the present time. Doctor Benson, an accomplished, up to date dental surgeon, is thinking of the East, and will undoubtedly yet pull teeth for the Saints in Zion or her regions.

Here and at Minidoka, the teachers being temporarily laid off by illness, I taught by request for three days, one here and two there, and realized in remuneration eight dollars and seventy-five cents, which, of course, I could not shut my eyes to in a mission like this.

At my concluding service here, ere an absence for three weeks to Minidoka, a Mormon elder thought he would play a clever trick. He arose after my dismissal, and delivered a little harangue in which he pronounced us as out of line of succession; thought to convert the impression I had made to do favor to the Mormon church. I had already made an announcement for the Sunday evening three weeks hence, so after he had his say I arose and stated that as the hour was late—I having talked near two hours—my subject in the next service would be the differences between us and the Mormon church. I also stated that I had as far as possible, or in general, evaded those issues as there was only one or two Mormon families in the neighborhood, thinking that what was to be done with them might be done in conversational capacity, but that their conduct of the evening licensed me to take a different attitude toward them.

On my return a large crowd was in attendance, for it had been reported that they were going to have a representative man there to meet me. But he did not come, notwithstanding they had struggled desperately to have one; had sent to Salt Lake and different places, but all to no purpose. So the same local elder came. I invited him to the front, told the audience he was welcome to half the time and the last say, which privilege I would readily accord to Joseph F. himself if he were there. A timekeeper was appointed. We then had our tilt of half hour alternations, but only for that night, as he acknowledged that his leaders had counseled him to have nothing to do with me; and besides, he said, I had made fun of him and had not acted strictly gentlemanly. I went on then for several nights, preaching on Mormonism, and they are groaning under its paralysis in that neighborhood. One recent day I met the gentleman whose misguided temerity impelled him to put forth his frail hand to steady the ark, and he gave me the following advice: "If you ever go into a neighborhood again to make an opening, let other churches alone, and don't do like you have done here, or you will not make one d—d convert."

But now the aspect of the case has changed. We have another enemy to deal with. Soon after my arrival in November, and old Adventist preacher came into the neighborhood, they having a few members on the scene. He had one meeting between a couple of mine, but saw that he had to fight or run, so he left promising to return in the future. Recently he returned, respectfully requested me to give way to him for a few sermons to lay down his platform before the people, as he had not had anything like the opportunity there that I had, and then he would possibly engage me in debate, as it had been insisted on by a great many people when here before. I consented, believing it would be the best for me in the end, and most for the conservation of my influence. On Sunday evening, 23d ult., he attended my service. I announced that in answer to a request of Mr. Oliver the day preceding I would not announce any sermon, that I would give way to him, whence I would resume again. Thus far he has preached four or five sermons, in which he has attacked us directly and indirectly. I am attending and taking notes. I told him I would review him. He said, "I expect that." The people are anxiously awaiting my announcement, which I expect to make to-night. He must come up to half-hour alternations or back down.

Had the Mormon kept his mouth shut, the people of the neighborhood would have known a great deal less of their hideousness and corruptions than they do now. Had the Advent stood back, the people would have known a great deal less of the plagiarisms of Ellen G. White—of the "shut door," of Sunday being the mark of the beast, of their time-setting failures, of the source of their authority, of their denial of baptism for the remission of sins and the literal restoration of the house of Israel, of the false prophecies of Mrs. White, who enriched herself with her husband (Joseph F. like) with her book sales, of the fact that Adventism stands or falls with the writings of Mrs. White, than they do now. My experience has been that I never have been able to do successful labor in any place without the adversary sending a picket. This place is not an exception. His first sermon was to me the blowing up of the Maine, the first shot on Fort Sumter; and is to be treated as such; no compromise.

I have been called away from here twice for administrations, to Blackfoot and to Mountain Home; five hundred miles of riding. Sr. Gill's daughter has been teaching in the school where I have been preaching; and, to her credit, she has shown more love for the truth than for popularity by not missing one service so far, and by rendering solos from time to time in the opening of services. I feel well, strong, and courageous. May God bless our General Conference.

Order of Evangelists.

Dear Herald: There is something that I wish that you would say to my brethren of the Order of Evangelists, and I take this way to say it, using your bright pages as the medium of communication.

I wish you to say to them, Greeting in the name of our Lord and Savior. May the peace and love of God be with you, now and evermore.

The time for the assembling of the General Conference of the church is fast approaching, and the Order owes the church a recognition of its assembling.

Our labors for the past year should be reported, and the rules of reporting are such that it is better that a report from each member of the Order should be forwarded to the presiding officer of the Order, that he may be able to formulate a general report covering the necessities of the work, and report to the First Presidency of the church, and through them to the conference.

For this reason I would like to have my brethren of the Order report to me in time for me to make my general report, before the actual convening of the conference. Report to me as elaborately as you wish, and I will try to see that your report will not be cast out. I would be especially pleased if our brethren of the Order in Great Britain would favor me with a report. I have never received a report from them, and I would like to get in touch with them in our great work. I am a stranger to them; and save from the report of the authority appointing and ordaining them, I do not know them, and I would like to get closer to them in the spirit of our great work.

Please say to those who can conveniently attend the General Conference, that I wish them to attend. There are some questions of importance that ought to be canvassed by us, and the sooner that we get together, the better will we be able to leave a good record. And while the thought of a record is on my mind, I wish to say to my brethren, it is very important that correct records should be kept of all blessings given, for as time passes we can see of what importance they will be in the future.

And now for the benefit of my brethren of the Order, I will relate a very pleasing experience I had when meditating upon our calling, and wondering why there was nothing said about patriarchs or evangelists in the Book of Mormon, objections having been made to our work on account of this seeming omission.

I was sitting by my fireside thinking upon this matter, when an influence seemed to say, "Read your Book of Mormon." I roused up and looked around, but did not heed the impression, when again the influence seemed to say with some assertive feeling, "Read your Book of Mormon." I had the book on the table by my side. I put out my hand and laid it on the book, but my memory of my readings in the book seemed so clear, I thought it no use; and the third time the impression came with more vehemence than before, "Read your Book of Mormon."

I took up the book and opened it at the place where Lehi gave his son Jacob his last or dying blessing and read it: "Oh, I said to myself, that is too general for my use, as evidence," and shut the book up and laid it on the table, when distinct to my senses, as an audible voice, came the command again, "Read the Book of Mormon." I again took up the book and it opened to the place where Lehi gave his son Joseph his blessing. I read it through carefully. I read it twice. I was surprised, yet I was not satisfied, and said, "But Lehi was not a patriarch," when quick as a flash came the voice, "Lehi was both prophet and patriarch." A feeling of satisfaction and peace came over me, and I was satisfied. Let me recommend the reading of Joseph's blessing by his father, Lehi; I think it is one of the most important and prophetic blessings I ever read, not excepting Jacob's blessing of Joseph's sons, Ephraim and Manasseh.

With kindly greeting to all,
ALEXANDER H. SMITH, Presiding Patriarch.
OMAHA, Nebraska, March 3, 1908.

Church Secretary.

To Presidents and Secretaries of all Quorums of Elders, Priests, Teachers, and Deacons: Not having received annual circular letters, as requested, from the quorums above named—except from the Fifth and Eighth Quorums of Elders, I hereby request that the presidents and secretaries of such quorums will at once make up and forward to me at Independence, Missouri, alphabetical lists of the names of their members. Such lists will be needed in checking up the lists of ordained officers by those to whom has been assigned the work of reorganizing the quorums. They are also needed to check up with other records, as quorum records contain items not obtainable elsewhere.

Please see that these lists are forwarded to reach me not later than April 6; earlier if possible. Prompt attention to this matter is urged. We need the lists, and on time.

R. S. SALYARDS, Church Secretary.

LAMONI, Iowa, March 9, 1908.

Graceland College Museum.

As curator of the museum I desire to get into correspondence at once with any one having relics, curios, or specimens, who would be willing to give or to loan them to the museum. We especially desire those which may have a bearing on the history of the church, evidences of Indian civilization, the development of this and other countries, specimens of animal and plant life which may be characteristic of certain parts of the world, etc.

The museum is now nicely located on the third floor of the college, is being reclassified, labeled, and rearranged, and we are preparing a catalogue of exhibits which we hope soon to have published. Few people realize the extent of the present exhibit, and we need only a general cooperation to make this a prominent adjunct to the college, as well as a valuable property for the church.

Please let me know what you have. If convenient to bring or send your contribution to General Conference, it can be given to me, or to Bro. F. B. Blair, from whom you will receive a receipt for same, and it will be properly placed in the museum.

CHARLES B. WOODSTOCK.

Died.

HALLIDAY.—Alice Garrett was born at Bolton, England, December 24, 1822. Her mother died in 1831. Being left alone, she made her home with her brother, Robert Holt, until she was seventeen years old. November 15, 1843, she united with the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, being baptized by Elder Peter Mayew. February 14, 1847, she was joined in marriage to John Seddon. Of this union two children were born, Joseph and Rachel. In February, 1848, she, with her family, emigrated to America, coming to Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1850 they started to go to Utah, expecting to find the Zion of the Lord there. Arriving at Council Bluffs, Iowa, July 3, 1850, they concluded to stay there, and settled on a claim near there. August 12, 1850, her husband died, leaving her stranded with no visible means of support. She struggled along as best she could and kept her children together. August 19, 1855, she was united in marriage to Henry Halliday, near Council Bluffs. In the spring of 1856 they moved to Florence, Nebraska. Of her union with Henry Halliday, five children were born: Elizabeth A.; Mary Ellen; Henry S.; Rebecca M.; Catherine P. In 1857 they moved to Genoa, Nebraska, and remained there until 1863, returning then to Florence. Here the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints found them. They moved in the spring of 1864 to near where Persia now is, where she has continued to reside until her death which occurred February 14, 1908, on the sixty-first anniversary of her marriage to John Seddon. She was aged 85 years, 1 month, and 21 days. October 8, 1864, she united with the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, being baptized by President Joseph Smith. She lived a consistent Christian life, always bearing a strong testimony to the truth of the gospel and God's unending love, and died in full faith of a part in the first resurrection. She leaves to mourn her departure, one son, three daughters, thirteen grandchildren, eight great grandchildren, one step daughter, six step grandchildren, and seven great step children, with a large circle of other relatives and friends. Funeral services were held at the residence of I. J. Copeland, February 16, 1908, in charge of Elder Sidney Pitt. Sermon by Elder Charles Derry to a large assembly of relatives and friends.

PHILLIPS.—Sr. Louisa M. Phillips passed away at her home in Oakland, California, February 21, 1908, after a few days of illness with pneumonia. She came to California in 1901, from Brockton, Massachusetts. She leaves one son to mourn the loss of a good mother. She was a devoted member of the church. She had a desire to go to the Saints' Home, in Lamoni, but the Father took her to the one in Paradise. Funeral-sermon by J. M. Terry; prayer by Elder J. M. Rigby, of the Utah church, of which the son is a member.

CAMPBELL.—Jairus M. Campbell was born in Holt County, Missouri. Came to Iowa with his parents when small. Grew to manhood in their prairie home, near Council Bluffs. Was married near Moorhead, Iowa. Moved to Washington where he has since resided until his death, which occurred at Seattle, Washington, December 14, 1907. His body now rests in the Bay View Cemetery.

He rests at last, life's pain and cares all ended; A short life done,—few joys with many heartaches blended. He went from us imbued with buoyant life and hope; Too soon, with life's hopes blighted, in dark despair to grope. Was it for faults of his he suffered so?

O Hidden Page, your secrets here we may not know. He murmured not, but did the task God gave to him. When joys of life had passed, the hope of life grown dim, He returned no more to those who love him well; Too proud to come again, his blighted hopes to tell. He sleeps in a lonely grave, far from his childhood's home, Where the night winds softly sigh, as they about it roam; And the dews of heaven fall upon that silent spot As tears by loved ones shed, to say you're not forgot. O Nature, rear a flower to bloom above his grave— Too far away for loving hands to plant one there, to wave. And go, ye wildwood warblers, and chant a tender lay Above his resting-place, at the closing of each day. We leave you, loved one, to your peaceful rest. We know not, but our God knows best; For the record there, each life's work will show, And what here from us is hidden, we there shall know.

ONE POINT AT WHICH JOSEPH SMITH TOUCHED THE HISTORY OF HIS NATION IN HIS PROPHETIC CALLING.

Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets.—Amos 3: 7.

Here we find the statement made that the secrets of God are revealed unto his servants the prophets. These secrets are of a varied nature. The prophet may be made aware of some plan that God has formulated regarding his (the prophet's) nation; it is a secret, i. e., not yet known to the people, and it may or may not be the will of God that the prophet shall make it known. Sometimes there is an educational or religious principle to be promulgated, as yet unknown to men, and God commits to his servants the prophets the work of teaching and expounding it. Or perhaps an organization or further development of the church and kingdom of God is to be accomplished, and the fact is revealed to some chosen prophet.

Revelations along all of these lines have come to prophets in the past; and in an especially striking way they have been given an insight into the secrets of futurity as affecting the nation where their lot has been cast. Of course this is not true of all prophets, because their work differs according to their surroundings and the period in which they live. But glance back over the past: Joseph in Egypt was enabled to foresee the periods of prosperity and of famine that were to come upon that land, and as a result was able to do a work that justly entitled him to be called "the preserver of his people,"—primarily of his own people, secondarily of the Egyptians. To Samuel was revealed the purposes of God regarding the Israelitish kingdom. Jeremiah foresaw the fall of Jerusalem and the seventy years of captivity in Babylon, and with that knowledge was able to give good sound advice to the kings of Judah and to the people of Judah. Daniel in Babylon was shown the future of the world down to modern times; and especially was he given to understand the future of Babylon. Christ himself predicted the fall of Jerusalem and the dispersion of the Jews. The prophetic calling of these individuals is proved by the fact that they foresaw prominent events. God revealed things to them that at the time were secrets.

There is a perpetual frost in the pockets of some rich people; as soon as they put their hands into them, they are frozen so they can not draw out their purses.—Had I my way, I would hang all misers; but reversing the common mode, I would hang them up by the heels, that their money might run out of their pockets.—Rowland Hill.

Coming, now, to the matter in hand, did Joseph Smith touch the history of his nation at any point in such a way as to demonstrate his prophetic calling? Did God reveal any secrets to him regarding the future of the United States? We answer, Yes. His inspiration was demonstrated in a most striking manner along this very line. He foresaw the greatest crisis that has occurred in the history of the United States since the adoption of the Constitution. Not only did he foresee this crisis, but he warned the people and did what he could to bring about conditions that would avert it; while the crisis was inevitable if certain policies were persisted in, it might have been avoided if they had been abandoned.

As early as December of 1833 he was given a revelation which contained the following words:

It is not right that any man should be in bondage one to another. And for this purpose have I established the Constitution of this land, by the hands of wise men whom I raised up unto this very purpose, and redeemed the land by the shedding of blood.—Doctrine and Covenants 98: 10.

We notice but briefly the statement that God raised up wise men to establish the Constitution. While the wisdom of these men is conceded, the réal glory is ascribed to the Divine Being who stood back of them and directed the affairs in which they were concerned. This is quite in contrast to the attitude of religionists who argue that man has climbed to such a high plane of education and enlightenment that God no longer needs to interfere in his affairs by way of inspiration or revelation. If we admit that God inspires one individual and reveals himself to one individual in this age, we must admit that he may to another, and that it is still an age of inspiration and revelation. Sectarianism then loses a favorite argument, namely, that the work of Joseph Smith must of necessity be a fraud because the day of inspiration is past.

However this revelation may harmonize with the views of modern religionists, it harmonizes perfectly with the views of George Washington, who was one of the most prominent of the men who established the Constitution, as will be seen by the following:

It was recalled, many years afterward, how General Washington had stood in the midst of a little group of delegates, during the anxious first days at Philadelphia, while they waited for commissioners enough to justify them in effecting an organization, and had cried, "Let us raise a standard to which the wise and honest can repair. The event is in the hands of God." (A History of the American People, by Woodrow Wilson, vol. 3, p. 71.)

That was the opinion of Washington, and his importance at that particular period is shown by the following quotations:

It gave it [the convention] great dignity that Washington had presided over its councils and was heart and soul for the adoption of the measure it proposed. His name and quiet force had steadied the convention on many an anxious day when disagreement threatened hopeless breach. (A history of the people of the United States, by Woodrow Wilson, vol. 3, pp. 69, 70.)

"The opinion of General Washington was of such weight," said Count Moustier, the French minister to the United States, "that it alone contributed more than any other measure to cause the present Constitution to be adopted." (Ibid., p. 79.)

The finger of an overruling Providence, pointing at Washington, was neither mistaken nor unobserved; when, to realize the vast hopes to which our revolution had given birth, a change of political system became indispensable. . . . This arduous task developed on citizens selected by the people, from knowledge of their wisdom and confidence in their virtue. In this august assembly of sages and patriots, Washington of course was found; and as if acknowledged to be most wise where all were wise, with one voice he was declared their chief. (From funeral oration by Richard Henry Lee.)

The revelation of 1833, before referred to, declared that God had established the Constitution; it was even more specific, and declared that he had established it in the interests of liberty because it was "not right that any man should be in bondage."

The prophet at that point put his finger on the thing that the Constitution stood for, namely, human liberty. And yet at that time many of the people of the United States believed in slavery and advocated it as a heaven-ordained institution. This was the thing, (with other conditions not necessary to mention here) that precipitated the crisis of which we have spoken and brought on the great Civil War. Those who advocated the institution of slavery and those who abhorred it met in armed combat to determine the right or wrong,—or rather to determine what attitude the country should maintain, because God had long before determined the right and wrong of the matter and had revealed it to his servant the Prophet. This conflict was the greatest scourge that the nation had ever experienced, and for a long time apparently threatened its very existence.

God foretold the coming of this great war in a revelation given to Joseph Smith December 25, 1832. Therein he named the place where the struggle would begin, and foretold many of the details of the conflict. We quote:

Verily, thus saith the Lord, concerning the wars that will shortly come to pass, beginning at the rebellion of South Carolina, which will eventually terminate in the death and misery of many souls. The days will come that war will be poured out upon all nations, beginning at that place; for behold, the Southern States shall be divided against the Northern States, and the Southern States will call on other nations, even the nation of Great Britain, as it is called, and they shall also call on other nations, in order to defend themselves against other nations; and thus war shall be poured out upon all nations.

And it shall come to pass, after many days, slaves shall rise up against their masters, who shall be marshaled and disciplined for war.

And it shall come to pass also, that the remnants who are left of the land will marshal themselves, and shall become exceeding angry, and shall vex the Gentiles with a sore vexation; and thus, with the sword, and by bloodshed, the inhabitants of the earth shall mourn; and with famine, and plague, and earthquakes, and the thunder of Heaven, and the fierce and vivid lightning also, shall the inhabitants of the earth be made to feel the wrath, and indignation, and chastening hand of an Almighty God, until the consumption decreed hath made a full end of all nations; that the cry of the Saints, and of the blood of the Saints, shall cease to come up into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth, from the earth, to be avenged of their enemies.

Wherefore, stand ye in holy places, and be not moved, until the day of the Lord come; for behold it cometh quickly, saith the Lord. Amen.

The authenticity of this revelation can not be controverted. As we write we have before us a copy of the Pearl of Great Price, published in Liverpool, in 1851. It contains this revelation exactly as we have quoted it above. We also have in our library a copy of the SAINTS' HERALD in which it appeared nine months before the breaking out of the war that was thus predicted. Also it was referred to by enemies of the church, in books published prior to the war, as a revelation that had not been fulfilled and so was false,—thus do men rush in and become involuntary witnesses to the truth of the thing they are opposing.

True to his calling, the Prophet exhorted the people of the land to repent of this and other evils, and repeatedly warned them of the impending danger. He sounded his warning so far and so widely as he could, even entering the political arena as a candidate for election on the side of the right. He entered into correspondence with prominent politicians of the day, including Henry Clay, J. C. Calhoun, and Martin Van Buren, and in 1844 issued a pamphlet setting forth his views regarding the destiny and policies of his nation. Of course many questions were covered in these utterances; but we will refer only to the one now under consideration. We quote direct from his pamphlet, a copy of which is before us (also see Church History, vol. 2, pp. 714, 722):

The Declaration of Independence "holds these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness"; but at the same time, some two or three millions of people are held slaves for life, because the spirit in them is covered with a darker skin than ours. . . .

Petition also, ye goodly inhabitants of the slave States, your legislators to abolish slavery by the year 1850, or now. . . . Pray Congress to pay every man a reasonable price for his slaves out of the surplus revenue arising from the sale of public lands. . . . Break off the shackles from the poor black man, and hire them to labor like other human beings; for "an hour of virtuous liberty on earth, is worth a whole eternity of bondage."

The people did not heed his warnings and the war followed. Abraham Lincoln, the great war President, stood in the storm center of that hurricane of death, and what he saw and endured convinced him that it was a scourge sent from God.

In the Circle for February, 1908, appears an article by Colonel Alexander McClure, entitled, "Lincoln as a politician." Colonel McClure was one of Lincoln's personal advisers during the entire war and writes from personal knowledge. From his article we learn that Lincoln proposed practically the same methods of emancipation that Joseph Smith had advocated several years earlier; but it was then too late. We quote:

Lincoln had the courage to propose compensated gradual emancipation to the border States in the early stages of the war, but he was not heartily supported either by his cabinet or by his party leaders, and the Union men of the southern border States had not then advanced to the point where they could see the necessity of bowing to the inevitable. It was one of the most brilliant conceptions of statemanship exhibited at any time during the war. It would have saved Kentucky, Tennessee, the Virginias, and Missouri from the terrible sacrifice they had to accept, and would have given them the freedom of slaves that was then assured sooner or later, without financial loss to the people of those States, and it would at the same time have so weakened the Confederacy that its overthrow would have been easily accomplished. Lincoln's appeal to a large number of border State representatives to plant themselves upon the platform of compensated gradual emancipation in the border States was one of the most eloquent and earnest utterances of his life, but the movement failed, at a fearful cost to the people of the States involved. . . . He wanted the South brought back not as conquered and servile subjects, but as men of a common brotherhood with ourselves, and it was for that reason that he proposed, only a few months before the close of the war, to pay the South four hundred millions if the insurgent States would accept emancipation and resume their fellowship with the Union.

I saw that proposition in Lincoln's own handwriting at the White House in August, 1864, when he was a candidate for reelection. I was astounded, and said to him that if it were known that he would propose such a measure to the South, his defeat would be overwhelming. He admitted that the country was not prepared for it, but he gave reasons for it which none could answer. He feared that when the Confederate armies were absolutely defeated, with only desolated homes and fruitless fields where they once lived in comfort, in utter despair, would spread anarchy throughout the South. He said that we wanted these people back; we wanted them to come with some sympathy with the Government; that that could only be accomplished by extending to them substantial sympathy; we wanted them to restore prosperity to the South to help pay our national debt; and he added that the war, which was then costing nearly four millions a day, would cost us the four hundred millions, in addition to the sacrifice of life and property, in little more than a hundred days, and the war could not be ended within that time. He was absolutely right in his proposition, and one of the very few of our statesmen who possessed the higher qualities of statemanship that would enable them to grasp so grave a question in the tempest of popular passion.

In his second inaugural address Lincoln declared:

Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray, that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled by the bondsman's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said, that the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.

The justly celebrated Wendell Phillips is reported to have said in a speech shortly after the assassination of Lincoln:

These are sober days. The judgments of God have found us out. Thirty years ago none heeded the volcanic fires that slumbered below. It was nothing that a giant sin gagged our pulpits; that its mobs ruled our cities, burnt men at the stake and hunted them like wild beasts. . . . None stopped to consider; none believed. But what the world would not look at, God has set to-day in a light so ghastly that it dazzles us blind. What we would not believe, God has written all over the face of the continent with the sword's point in the blood of our best heroes. We believe in the agony of the slave's hovel when it takes its seat at our own board.

He said that thirty years before none heeded the volcanic fires that slumbered beneath; yet almost precisely thirty years before that date Joseph Smith received the revelations that we have quoted. Others might not have dreamed of impending disaster, but God revealed his secrets to his servant the Prophet.

Joseph Smith came in contact with the history of his country in such a way as to demonstrate his prophetic calling. ELBERT A. SMITH.

PRECEPT OR EXAMPLE, WHICH IS THE STRONGER?

The man that shields the wrong-doer, or that sympathizes with his wrong-doings is guilty of wrong himself. God does not look upon sin with any degree of allowance. . . . The man that condones evil, and protects him who is doing evil, is as guilty in the eyes of God as the man who commits the evil.—Joseph F. Smith at Morgan, Sunday, February 16, 1896, as reported in the Deseret News.

The church can not fellowship evil nor its perpetrators.—Deseret News editorial, November 17, 1886.

We use the foregoing for the purpose of illustrating, if we may, possible difference between precept and example. No one need to question but what the precept contained in these extracts is most excellent. But when it is known that the chief officer of the church of which the Deseret News is the organ, has publicly testified before one of the most august tribunals that ever sat in this Government or any other among men, that he was living in known contravention to the statute law of the State of which he is a citizen, and in so doing had disregarded the law of God given to the same body of people through revelation which prohibited the acts which he was doing and by which he was breaking the statute law of the State, of what value is the precept? How is it to be made forcible? If the old trite saying, "Acts speak louder than words," is true, may it not justly be expected that every officer of the church, from the reverend head who thus has testified to his wrong-doing and his intention to so continue, to the lowest officer known to the church, would take advantage of the act and expressed intention to continue the acts, and himself assume the role of law-breaker in a similar manner? Have the members of the church any guarantee whatever that there will be found any officer to whom the example of their leader may come, who will be any more observant of the law and order of the statute enactments than that leader himself is? Are not what are called the Gentiles, the outside elements, both in the secular and religious world, the citizens surrounding the church in the State and those occupying in the States surrounding the State where this law-breaking is going on, warranted in the belief that the pledges which have been made and are being made that the people of that church are law-abiding, are untrue, and that there is no intention of keeping the pledges which have been made? Are they not justified in believing that the same elements which have been disregarding the law will continue to do so, and that the statute enactments must necessarily be dead letters on the statute books? If the leading exponent of the church faith and its policies has disregarded the rule of honorable faith and practice, and is disregarding them still upon the hypothesis that their Gentile neighbors do not know of his individual transgression, and will not inform upon him before the proper courts because of their lack of actual evidence, however firmly they may be persuaded that there is strong evidence of moral guilt, and also is trusting to the overconfident trust of his followers that they will not inform upon him, though they may know of his transgressions, will not this same principle of dependence upon the forbearance of the outside element and the tacit consent of the inside element apply equally to every other officer in the church, from the leader down, that it does to that leader himself? And further, if one statute enactment making certain acts misdemeanors or crimes, may be set aside as the result of moral turpitude, will not the same rule apply with regard to every other misdemeanor or crime in the statute enactments of the State?

For instance, if the leader of the people may go unwhipped of justice, though he is absolutely living a daily life in what is known in the statute as unlawful cohabitation, is it not fair to presume that other officers of the church are living in the same condition, and escape punishment for the same reasons? And is it not a logical sequence that men who choose to disregard the law in any respect under the influence of the example of such a leader will disregard the open precepts, though they may be spoken from the housetops as well as from the pulpit, and take the example so set as the guide to their conduct in disregard of law?

The outside barbarian who is accounted as an enemy to the church by those within, can not fail to follow the thought expressed herein in the form of a question, and come to a moral conclusion that the example is stronger than the precept, and has a more pernicious influence against law and order than the precept loudly uttered can have for truth and right. And if the outside barbarian justly may draw such inference, how about the honorable men by which the church is surrounded in the State and the States of the Republic surrounding it?

We leave this as a subject of thought.

THE TWO-STORY BOOK.

The Herald Publishing House has just issued a new book entitled The Two-story Book. As the name indicates, it consists of two stories: First, "An instrument in his hands," by Mary Leland Carter; second, "The minister who was different," by Elbert A. Smith. The first named appeared in Autumn Leaves during the past year and was very popular. The second is now running in Autumn Leaves. The book is for sale at the low sum of fifty cents, cloth binding.

These are gospel stories and the Two-story Book will be valuable to the Saints, both for reading in the home and to loan to friends and neighbors. It will gain an opening where a tract or sermon would not be considered. Once made you can follow up the advantage with gospel conversations.

The Two-story Book is not published for profit, but to do good. Send in your orders, and make the best possible use of it. Address the Herald Publishing House, Lamoni, Iowa.

MORE FRUIT, LESS HOG.

The Creator in his wonderful economy always constructs with a purpose. He has distributed fruits all over the earth, and has caused them to mature at a season when the solid and carbonaceous foods are not needed by the body. The latter, when taken during the warm season, only clog and obstruct the vital machinery, resulting in disease; whereas, the juicy, stimulating properties of fruits keep the vital forces properly balanced and regulated.

Probably the most generally diffused fruit is the apple. According to chemical analysis, this fruit has eighteen per cent solid matter and eighty per cent water, while milk has only thirteen per cent solid matter, and oysters the same. Cabbage, the great stand-by of the laboring man, has only eight per cent solid matter and ninety-two per cent water. Pears have about the same amount of solid matter as apples. Peaches have twenty per cent solid matter and eighty per cent water; while pork has only twenty-four per cent solid matter. We see therefore that fruits are richer food than milk or oysters, and approximate that of pork. Yet the laboring man thinks that he must have his bacon and that he can not work without it.

The operatives of Cornwall, in England, consider apples nearly as nourishing as bread, and more so than potatoes. The laborers there assert that they can stand their work on baked apples without meat, whereas a potato diet must be supplemented by meat or fish. The French and Germans use apples extensively, and rarely sit down to a meal without them in some form, even at the best tables. The laborers and mechanics frequently dine upon sliced apples and bread.

Besides contributing sugar, mucilage, and other matters as food, apples by their acid and aromatic principles act powerfully in the capacity of tonics and antiseptics, and when freely used at the season of ripeness by rural laborers and others, they prevent debility, strengthen digestion, correct the putrefactive tendency of nitrogenous foods, avert scurvy, and strengthen the powers of productive labor. If our friends will only provide themselves with plenty of choice apples, we venture that not one man or woman in fifty will care for animal flesh to eat.

The alterative effects of fruit are wonderful. When you think you need a sugar-coated laxative pill, select some mild acid fruit, such as the apple, grape, fig, or tomato. But as each fruit does not affect all persons alike, each one must find out by careful experiment what is the most suitable to effect the desired end in his or her particular case. There are very few cases of diarrhoea in children or adults which will not, if taken in time, yield to pure black-berry juice. The fresh fruit is excellent for the same purpose. The tomato is recommended for torpid liver; the luscious watermelon for derangement of the kidneys and bladder. Very often when the tongue is coated, a bad taste in the mouth, and symptoms of biliousness, one can find relief in sucking a lemon. Here one acid seems to correct another. During the vintage season in the south of France many invalids go there to drink the pure fresh juice of the grape direct from the press. Most of these are sufferers from nervous dyspepsia. The pure fresh juice tones up the system and sets the vital machinery to running aright. How many farmers in the South have grapes for the use of their families? Fruit also supplies the body with pure uncontaminated water. The cause of the prevalent malarial diseases of the lowlands of the South is not so much the air you breathe as the water, teeming with decomposing vegetable matter which you drink. In all localities where pure water is difficult to obtain, you should use freely juicy well-ripened fruits. By proper selection a succession of such can be had, from the ripening of the strawberry to the melon and late apple.

Probably fifty per cent of the people of this State ignore the use of fruit, and none is ever seen upon their tables. With them it is bacon three times a day, and a firm faith that unless the hog is freely used no physical labor can be accomplished. Yet more western hog means more outlay for provisions, more doctor bills, and less money in the pocket. More fruit means a less quantity of western bacon, better health, cleaner intellect, and more money in the pocket.—Doctor J. P. H. Brown, before the Georgia Horticultural Society.

If all the misfortune of mankind were cast into a public stock, in order to be equally distributed among the whole species, those who now think themselves the most unhappy would prefer the share they are already possessed of before that which would fall to them by such division.—Socrates.

Elders' Note-Book

DO DEBATES PAY?

This question is susceptible of two answers, Yes, and No. It is often necessary to invite discussion between persons of different opinions in order to elucidate truth. Truth may now and then lose a battle, but it can never lose a war. God, speaking to the opposer of truth, said: "Produce your cause, saith the Lord; bring forth your strong reasons, saith the King of Jacob." Such an invitation is to invite debate. Again: "Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord." This could hardly be done without debate. Debate, in our General Conferences, or in Parliament, or in Congress, often elicits the most striking truth; truth that would have lain dormant, probably for years, if it had not been brought to light through debate. The wrong lies not in debate; but the "striving unlawfully" for "masteries." In "olden times" certain men were trying to turn the grace of God into lasciviousness, thus denying the truth to save. In order to meet such opposition, Jude, a servant of God, said: "It was needful for me to write unto you, and exhort you that ye should earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints." These instructions could hardly be carried out without either debate in private, or public, or both. Later along, in our day, when the truth commenced to materialize more perfectly through a restoration, opposers from pulpit, press, and forum, arose and put in a vigorous protest. The Lord, to be like himself in former times, said to Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon, in the month of December, 1831:

Now, behold, this is wisdom; whoso readeth let him understand and receive also; for unto him that receiveth it shall be given more abundantly, even power; wherefore, confound your enemies; call upon them to meet you, both in public and in private; and inasmuch as ye are faithful, their shame shall be made manifest. Wherefore let them bring forth their strong reasons against the Lord. Verily thus saith the Lord unto you, There is no weapon that is formed against you shall prosper, and if any man lift his voice against you, he shall be confounded in mine own due time; wherefore, keep my commandments: they are true and faithful.—Doctrine and Covenants 71: 2.

This was not given alone for Joseph and Sidney, but to others—"whoso readeth," and "unto him that receiveth it." Many of the elders in the church have been governed by these sayings, and acted in accordance, and the results have been, as I personally know, overwhelmingly in favor of wisely conducted debates. Paul warns us of "perilous times" to come in "the last days." "Men shall be lovers of their own selves, . . . boasters, . . . false accusers, . . . despisers of those that are good, . . . Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof." This places them in the ranks of religious opposers, who have to be met. We are further warned to avoid "foolish and unlearned questions." "Strive not about words to no profit, but to the subverting of the hearers." "Shun profane and vain babbling: for they will increase unto more ungodliness." This is equivalent to saying debates are admissable, but a warning of what to avoid. Such men as "Jannes and Jambres," who withstood Moses, and resisted the truth, must be met. Hence, we are commanded to "study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." Later, in our day: "Seek ye diligently and teach one another words of wisdom; yea, seek ye out of the best books words of wisdom, seek learning even by study, and also by faith." This is a "key" to what kind of text-books are most needed in a debate. The main standard of evidence should be the written word of God; all other should be correlative evidence. All persons seeking after truth will see the fairness in this. Apostle Paul, speaking of those who would oppose truth in the last days, said: "Ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth"; and while "evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving, and being deceived," we are admonished to stand steadfast in the "Holy Scriptures, which are able to make thee [us] wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus"; and, that "all scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." Debates pay, when they are demanded by the public on purpose to elicit truth, to see which of the two contending parties (if either) is on the side of the right. Public preaching will not always meet this demand. Sometimes, even through the most careful preaching, public sentiment will demand a public debate. At such time it will pay. At all times care should be taken in formulating propositions, and in selecting competent and fair-minded men, if at all possible, to do the debating. All ministers of the gospel are not debaters; neither indeed can be. I do not wish to be understood that none but experienced debaters should be chosen to carry forward a debate in order to make it a success. Inexperienced men must have a chance to get experience. Yet, there are men that are not endowed with a natural tact for debate; and, hence, never would make successful debaters, even with ever so much experience. There are others that are blessed with the "gift of debate." Here, we can "prefer our brother" to ourself to the protection of the work we love so well. Yet, this "gifted," inexperienced brother may be somewhat awkward in handling his first debates; yet, he may be like the "awkward farmer boy," that chanced to be in town, and was decoyed by a crowd of men and boys to the street to witness a champion wrestler bantering the crowd to a "tilt." This awkward boy was prevailed on to step into the ring; they clinched; but the athlete was not up to the awkward passes of the farmer boy, and before he got his "hand in," he found himself lying on his back, with the awkward boy on top, to the chagrin of the experienced wrestler, and the amusement of the crowd. The boasting Goliath, "a man of war from his youth," said, "Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves? . . . Come to me, and I will give thy flesh unto the fowls of the air, and to the beasts of the field." But the trusting young David, with his sling in hand, and without experience in war tactics, replied: "Thou comest to me with a sword, and with a spear, and with a shield: but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of Hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast defied."—1 Samuel 17:44, 45. Victory is not always to the strong and mighty, but with the meek and humble, when on the side of the right.

WHO SHALL PRESIDE?

As the question as to who shall preside at district conferences is open for discussion, I would like to present a few thoughts as they present themselves to me upon reading the law. To my mind the law as accepted by the church is supreme, and has been given to govern the church in its work; and it is only by keeping the law that success can come to us in gospel work. As to district organization I find the following in Rules of Order, page 2, paragraph 3:

In all promiscuous assemblies of the Church, where there is no organization (branch or district), it will be well to observe the rule, "The highest in authority shall preside"; and where there are several present who hold the same authority, other things being equal, preference should be given primarily, to the eldest in rank, and secondarily, to the eldest in years.

This is for temporary organization, and when one has been so chosen, they then proceed to permanent organization, and on page 6, Rules of Order, we find the following:

The temporary organization having been completed, the desire for more permanent organization should be presented by those favoring it; and if it be decided upon, the assembly should proceed to make choice of one of their number to act as president of the district, whose duty shall be to have supervisory charge of the several congregations forming the district. One or two vice-presidents may also be chosen if deemed advisable, and a secretary, and the organization will then be complete. The officers elected should at once assume authority and enter upon the discharge of their duties, and the temporary officers retire to the body of the assembly room.

To my mind this is quite plain, and speaks for itself. So if the President of the church was present, and should be chosen to preside at the temporary organization, he would, when the permanent has been effected, take his seat with the body. He would not feel humiliated in so doing; for he believes in honoring every one in his office and calling.

In Doctrine and Covenants 120:2, it is written:

Districts may be presided over by a high priest, or an elder, who shall be received and sustained in his office by the vote of the district.

So if an elder should be chosen president of a district at its organization, he would take his place and preside, although the President of the church and members of the Twelve should be present. I have attended several district and stake conferences when the President of the church has been present, but have never seen him preside over either one of them. This question as to who should preside at district conferences was presented to the Presidency of the church, and they gave their decision at the conference of 1906, and it was that the "primary right belonged to the district president; but when the general officers of the church were present, they should be respected as such." Their report was adopted by the body, and as such is a part of the law to govern the body,

But how are they to be respected? Let the law answer. Doctrine and Covenants 120:4:

In both branches and districts the presiding officers should be considered and respected in their offices; nevertheless, the traveling presiding councils of the church being made by the law, their calling and the voice of the church the directing, regulating and advising authorities of the church, and representing it abroad, should when present in either district or branch be regarded and considered as the leading representative authorities of the church, and be respected as such, their counsel and advice be sought and respected when given; and in cases of conflict, or extremity, their decision should be listened to and regarded, subject to the appeal and adjudication provided for in the law.

The statement in this that in both branches and districts the presiding officers should be considered, and respected in their offices, is just as strong as that the traveling councils should be respected in theirs. One has no right to interfere with the rights and privileges of the other; and, to my mind, no one in the church has any rights except those guaranteed in the law. Then the question as to what are the rights and privileges of a district president. "One who is appointed to preside and control the proceedings of a number of others." "The chairman or chief officer of a company, board, society, or office." "The highest officer of state in a republic." According to this definition, the district president would be the highest officer in the district organization, and the primary right to preside would belong to him. A district conference is a part of the work of a district; for it is the outgrowth of the district organization. It is written in the law as already quoted: "In both branches and districts the presiding officers should be considered and respected in their offices." This means, of course, when they are acting in harmony with their calling. But if presidents of branches and districts are out of order, then the traveling councils of the church would have the right to step in to regulate and set in order, for the law makes this their duty. It seems to me that it is not necessary for a member of the traveling council to take the platform to preside in order for him to be recognized as the highest traveling authority present. All know that he is the highest, and are willing to respect him as such. Of course it would be an act of courtesy to request him to preside, or to ask him if he would like to preside. And if so requested by the branch or district president, it would be showing just as much respect as to have the body vote for him to so act. In my work as branch or district president, I have, when those in charge have been present, always asked them to preside. I have done this as an act of courtesy to them. But on the other hand, when, as district president, I have attended branch business-meetings, and been requested to preside, I have refused, desiring rather to sit with the body, that I might the better take part in the work before the body. Also that those officers might better qualify themselves for their work by presiding. I have never felt humiliated by so doing. I have tried to "prefer my brethren," and encourage each to perform his own duty. I have held in the past, and still hold, that the deacon of a branch is entitled to just as much respect in the performance of his duties, as any other officer of the church is in the performance of his; and believe that all should act along this line. The law makes the Twelve and Seventy the leaders in the missionary work; and where no organization has been effected they have the right to preside. (See Doctrine and Covenants 120:3.) Section 122, paragraph 8, reads:

That part of the law which says: "It is the duty of the twelve, also, to ordain and set in order all the officers of the church," is to be understood by the revelation which went before and in accordance with which it was written; and which follows after it in the book; and when those officers are ordained and set in their order, in the church, they should be left to administer in the things unto which they were ordained, having charge of the affairs over which they are called and set apart to preside; the twelve and seventy administering as those prosecuting the work of preaching with the warning voice, baptizing, organizing and setting in order, then pushing their ministry into other fields until the world is warned. It is the will of God that they do this; Yea, verily thus saith the Spirit, If they will now enter upon this work, leaving the burden of care in organized districts, or conferences to the standing ministry, under the presidency of the church; observing the law already given to ordain and set high priests or elders to preside in large branches and in districts, and also evangelical ministers, then will those officers set in the church be useful and he who gave the law be honored; the differences between the quorums be healed, confidence be restored and good will and peace come to the people as a cherishing fountain.

It seems to me that this is so plain that there is no need of any misunderstanding about it. The negative reasoning of this would be, that peace and good will will not come to the people until it is complied with. The legitimate reasoning of this paragraph would be, that where organization has been effected, and high priests and elders have been set to preside over large branches and districts, they should be left to care for these under the direction of the Presidency of the church. But should anything get out of order, then it would be the duty of the Twelve to step in and aid in regulating and setting things in order. That is, when difficulty has been of long standing, and local officers have not been able to settle it. (See Doctrine and Covenants 120:7.) I believe, also, that when one of the "traveling council" is present at a district conference it would be all right to associate him with the district president, as the presidency of the conference; but it would be entirely out of order for him to take the place of the district president, as the primary right belongs to him. In conclusion I wish to say that I believe that every one should be respected in his office and calling, and that each one should strive to learn his duty, and do it in meekness and good will to all.

WHILE WE WAIT.

Therefore, in consequence of the transgression of my people, it is expedient in me that mine elders should wait for a little season for the redemption of Zion, that they themselves may be prepared, and that my people may be taught more perfectly, and have experience, and know more perfectly, concerning their duty, and the things which I require at their hands.—Doctrine and Covenants 102:3.

The Lord further states there that he will fight certain battles for the people, and in the following paragraph tells some of the means which he will employ to fight those battles and prepare, "not many days hence," the lands which have been consecrated for the gathering of the Saints.

This awful visitation of the destroyer, to lay waste the wicked by the judgments of God, with the besom of his wrath, has been foretold, not only in this prophecy, nor yet in this book alone, but in the Bible as well; and though the slowly creeping years may whisper a lull, which seems to softly say, "Not yet, but by and by, if ever"; yet the fact remains that such is the word of prophecy, and we know not how soon these things may come.

The last word the church as a body received from the Lord (April 14, 1906) directed that our activities concerning the gathering of the Saints to those consecrated lands should be in accord with a previous revelation which was received on Fishing River. We diverge to say that God at one time commanded Noah to build an ark, Moses to lead Israel, and Joshua to overthrow Jericho; but that we would be considered a little behind the times should we be found trying to build an ark, or looking for rams' horns to blow at the downfall of some imaginary Jericho, simply because God commanded these things to be done once upon a time. History of other men's achievements and failures afford us valuable lessons; but what most concerns us is God's commands to us in the now. What are some of those commands which are applicable now? Strangely enough, when we attempt to answer that question, though the machinery of our investigation may have been running smoothly all along, through the examination of the works of others in the past, when it comes to ourselves, in the present, if there is to be any friction at all, there is where we will be sure to find it. So we need not be surprised to hear a squeak in the machinery now and then, and even sometimes a screech, as bearings which need the lubricating-oil of the law of the Lord proclaim with a shrill note their friction.

It is from the last named revelation, the one given on Fishing River, which is the one above all others pointed out by the Lord as applicable now, that we quote the Lord's instruction to "wait." Ah! what a soothing balm for a slightly irritated conscience—"wait!" Simply wait. How easy. Easy for the self-satisfied and fortune-favored; but no doubt a harder task for others.

But while we wait for the cherished redemption, and, incidentally, for the less-to-be-desired preparatory judgments, it might be worth our while to casually observe why this delay—why we are waiting, and that this same revelation which says wait, says a few other things, too. One of the other things is that the Lord tells us why it is necessary to wait. Hear him: "In consequence of the transgression of my people" they should wait for a season, and so on.

Then, by this statement, and others similar, we see that transgression is the first, last, and only cause for the delay—for the waiting. Transgression in what? Stealing horses? No. The Lord has not accused his people of that (though they have been accused of stealing sheep, by some men, I believe; though no wool having been found in their teeth); but there has been a transgression somewhere. What was it? Plundering and robbing? No. Rejecting the principles of faith, repentance, and baptism? No. What then? Let the Lord answer in the revelation last named; the one we are straightly commanded to be in accord with NOW: "They have not learned to be obedient to the things which I require at their hands . . . and are not united according to the union required by the law of the celestial kingdom." Ah, there is the bridge in the right-of-way which we are required to build while we wait; and the construction company has promised under bond to clear up all of that old wreckage in the way yonder, when we get enough of this waiting and perform the task assigned to us. After the waiting shall have been endured by the Lord long enough, all of that old wreckage and obstruction will begin to move, according to decree, wrath; and under bonded contract, paragraph 4, section 102, Doctrine and Covenants; also latter clause of paragraph 3, same section, and other parts of the agreement too numerous to mention. This part of the agreement will surely be performed, whether we live up to our covenant or not; and if we are not awake and on the alert, many of us will be caught in the rubbish when the powerful machinery of God sets to work in the aforesaid clearing.

"Come let us reason together." We see what the cause of the waiting is. Seventy-eight years have passed since the Lord said transgression was the cause, and that his people should continue to be chastened, till—till, when? Till they learn obedience. If the same character of transgression is to any degree indulged to-day, we will act the part of the wise to frankly admit it, and labor to correct our error, rather than to lull ourselves to sleep with the dreamy thought that the "unity required" in temporal things, means equality according to ability to acquire; and that, therefore, we are living up to the letter and spirit of the law nicely. And, by the way, that principle (equality according to ability) has been lived up to with astonishing exactness in all the history of the world, with about three exceptions. That is, if it is truly that which pleases the Lord, it is astonishing to see it flourish so much like a green bay-tree; for it is not thus with many of the principles of righteousness among men.

There are at least three notable exceptions to the rule, however, where, if that is the Lord's plan, they failed miserably. One was in Enoch's time, where they all had and shared alike; both those who were able to acquire and those who were deficient in ability; both the weak and the strong. What a pity, indeed, that Enoch's people could not have been up to the average of the rest of the world in this matter, so as to have let every man hover this world's goods according to his capabilities to hover, holding down everything in reach, and inventing laws to keep the other fellow off of everything in sight; putting a tribute (payable to the able) on everything you can think of, and some things you can not think of! What a pity that Enoch's people did not learn all of this; for since it is said that God will finally reward the able and proficient an hundred fold, we are learning to take judgment in our own hands and to see to it that the poor, unfortunate wretch, born under the pressure of the world's financial lever, without one chance in a thousand of learning how to get hold of the long end—we (the world at large) seem to feel it a self-imposed duty to see to it that the poor, unfortunate wretch pays the penalty for not having ability, tact, shrewdness, or luck enough to worm out on top, to help squeeze down somebody else. But if the Lord was displeased with the way Enoch's people were running things, upon a basis of equality, with no poor among them, and no rich—for all were alike,—if he was displeased he never mentioned it to anybody, and he finally took them to himself. Would to God latter-day Israel could see the necessity of measuring to the same line.

Another instance where the unequal kind of equality was not in demand is briefly sighted in Acts 2:44, 45, at the time when "they continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship." The glorious time when "fear came upon every soul and many were the signs and wonders that were wrought." At the time when, as a legitimate result, the sick were healed in the streets (see chapter 5, verse 15), believers were added to the Lord in "multitudes," and prison doors and stocks of captivity refused to retain the servants of the Lord.

If this narrative is all visionary, and only a myth, well and good; but if it was literal and true, how it ought to inspire us with a hungering and thirsting for the same manner of recognition of the Lord, which, like every other cause and effect, is but the legitimate result of an unchangeable law. And the God that lived in Paul and Silas' time is just the same to-day.

Upon American soil, about the year 68 A. D., we have another instance where the usual rule of the world, of every man for himself and the Devil catch the hindermost, was broken; and they too, fell into the folly (?) of not giving their consent that every man should possess and control all that he was able to corner. But they were equal in their possessions, no poor among them, and the Lord's displeasure at their error in that matter was never made manifest; but they were blessed by the usual outpouring of wonderful spiritual power, which was a sure token of the pleasure of the Lord in their doings, rather than displeasure. See the narrative in Book of Mormon, 4 Nephi, chapter 1. "And surely there could not be a happier people among all the people who had been created by the hand of God."

With these instances before us, and with the demands of justice in right-thinking, it is clear, and ought to be if nothing ever had been written by command of the Lord, that any law or interpretation of law, which assumes to conserve the rights of any individual to acquire, and protect him in holding more than his brother, is founded upon a wrong basis, and lacks several degrees of coming to the line of union required by the law of the celestial kingdom. And Zion can be built up by no other law than the celestial law; for the Lord has said so (see Doctrine and Covenants 102:2).

So while we wait for the promised redemption, also for those attendant sorrows which as a forerunner must strike terror to the wicked, let us call black, black; and white, white. Neither confusing the colors nor slighting the work will shorten the waiting.

SOME POINTS TO BE NOTICED CONCERNING THE "WOMAN" OF REVELATION 12.

1. The woman represents the church, (Inspired Translation,) the organic form being strongly suggestive of life, purity, and fruitfulness.

2. The woman was clothed with the sun, representing the higher light, which no doubt is present revelation, or the gospel light.

3. She was crowned with a crown of twelve stars, evidently representing the authority or priesthood, as vested in the twelve apostles—but not the twelve apostles themselves, for they are to be found in the organization—"but now hath God set the members every one of them in the body." (1 Corinthians 12.)

4. The woman was a live, active institution, capable of performing the functions of her being.

5. The "man child" could not have been simply the priesthood, because she was already crowned with that, before she brought forth the "man child." If she was not, then she was simply a human institution, and if one human institution can produce the priesthood, what is to hinder others doing it? So why find fault with other churches on that score? Furthermore, the woman still remained intact, unprevailed against, after the man child was caught up to God, and was nourished twelve hundred and sixty years, and came forth, "clear as the moon, fair as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners." (Doctrine and Covenants.)

6. The man child was not to preach the word and rule or govern in the affairs of the church, but was to rule the nations with a rod of iron ("word of God."—Book of Mormon). God took that prerogative up to his throne. He may bestow it upon the church later. (See Revelation 2:26, 27.)

7. The dragon persecuted the woman, but did not prevail against her. Do not forget that. The dragon was angry at her and would have carried her away in the flood of his own production; but it did not harm her. For she had given to her, wings, etc. Besides, the earth helped the woman, and not the dragon to overwhelm her.

8. The woman "fled"—flew, got away from—the dragon. Where to? To her place. Not to the Devil's place; but to her place that God had prepared for her. Query.—Where is the place that God has prepared for his Son's "bride" until the "marriage" takes place?

9. "The dragon was wroth with the woman." Did not make love to her, or entice her away with him and his minions; but angry because she had escaped him, now goes about to make war with the remnant of her seed, i. e., that which was left. The woman had fled. He could persecute her no longer. She had gone home to her place. But the remnant of her seed was left. Who are they? When the last who hold the priesthood have passed away, then the church has gone. The hundreds of women and men who do not hold the priesthood, who remain scattered and unorganized, can well be called the "remnant of her seed."

10. The "scarlet" woman of Revelation 17, can not be the woman of Revelation 12; because she was in league with the dragon, and was drunken with the blood of the Saints. The very material that composed the former named woman—as well as the remnant of her seed, in fact drove her off the earth. Again, that woman that went into the wilderness, say in the sixth century, came out, or began to come out in 1829 (see Doctrine and Covenants 5:3), whereas, that Babylon woman remains yet much as she was, and is to be destroyed later on. They are both upon the earth to-day. And so the cry is, Come out of her (Babylon) my people (the honest in heart) and become members of the true church,—the "woman" that came out of the wilderness.

11. The woman with wings fled into the wilderness, not Babylon. And when she appeared again, she came out of the wilderness, not Babylon. Indeed God could not call his church, the Lamb's bride, out of Babylon, because he had none there. No true organization, no fullness of the gospel, no priesthood authority—hence no church of his. But he had one somewhere else.

Note.—It may be thought that the scarlet woman was in the wilderness, too, because of Revelation 17:3. But the reader will notice that it was John who was carried away in the Spirit into the wilderness, not Babylon, and he saw future developments from that standpoint. Perhaps the same as Enoch from Mount Simeon. He did not see all these things in the mount, Simeon, but he saw them in the vision of the future, while he was there.

John could not have seen those things as they actually existed, then, from any place, because they had not been transferred as yet. But he could see them in spiritual vision, from any place where the Lord might take him. Paul knew a man that was caught up to paradise, and heard things, and perhaps saw things. He speaks of that experience as "visions and revelations"—and why not John?

A PROTEST AGAINST CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.

From Captain W. P. French, U. S. A., one of our esteemed contributors, we have received the following earnest and thoughtful protest against corporal punishment of the young, which we take pleasure in publishing, as admirably expressing our own views and ideals for which the Arena has long contended.

"That apparently sane, kindly, decent, and respectable people should seriously advocate corporal punishment in the public schools of a twentieth-century democracy is incomprehensible, and it is a disagreeable and shameful reminder that some of us, at least, are still brutal and stupid barbarians badly disguised by a thin veneer of civilization.

"Are the gentlemen and ladies who propose a return to the discredited methods of the Dark Ages, Christians? Are they believers in the teachings of the gentle, loving Nazarene?

"'Spare the rod and spoil the child' is the maxim of a coward, a weakling, or a coarse-grained tyrant.

"The teacher that can not maintain discipline without the rod is unfit to teach, and should apply for a position as wielder of the knout in Siberia, slave-driver to the Sultan of Turkey, or executive officer of the Delaware whipping-post.

"No well-poised, just, self-controlled, warm-hearted man or woman needs to, wants to, or would, beat a child.

"The best children I have ever known came from families where no blows were ever struck, the worst from so-called homes where might made right, and cruel strength striped its own flesh and blood.

"I have handled boys (several hundred of them) for four years in a great school where I am the head of the military department. Their ages ranged from seven to twenty-one, they were not exactly lambs, some were very difficult to manage, and a few extremely difficult to deal with. But (one occasion excepted) neither I nor any other member of the faculty ever laid a hand in anger on one of them; and a better disciplined, franker, nicer or more loyal lot of lads it would be hard to find (they can not be found in a school where the lash is used). The excepted occasion was when an ill-balanced, weak, and irritable teacher slapped a boy at inspection for wearing dirty gloves. The boy stepped out of the ranks and knocked the teacher down. The lad was sustained by the school authorities, the man apologized to him, and, at the end of the term, the master was replaced.

"In my opinion, no human being is good enough to be trusted with the dangerous power to inflict corporal punishment upon children, especially upon another person's children.

"Kindness, firmness, self-control, and even-handed justice (with a little wise toleration of ignorance, fun, and young spirits) will make and keep good discipline in any school or any home.

"Force, fear, and punishment may suppress the symptoms, but they intensify the disease.

"Guidance, affection, and reward, justly and generously used, will remove the cause, and make the black sheep such a light gray that anybody but a child-beater would mistake him for a serviceable white.

"Do ye hear the children weeping, O my brothers,
Ere the sorrow comes with years?

They are leaning their young heads against their mothers,
And that can not stop their tears."

—The Arena.

THE PURPOSE OF OBEDIENCE.

Obedience to the parental law must be enforced always with this end in view, to bring the child to Christ.

Pure arbitrary law, without this intention, imperious, domineering control, drives from the child the true spirit of obedience. He obeys, but is not submissive; he yields, but the yoke is galling, and he casts it off as soon as the age of control is past its limit. With no roots of obedience deep in his soul, he is an easy victim for the prison and the penitentiary.

"Take my yoke upon you and learn of me," Christ said. The yoke of obedience must be a mutual token of service between Christ and his followers. The same principle must couple together in duty the child and the parent. "If ye love me, keep my commandments," Christ said to his people. The child must recognize also, above the command, the voice of his parent, "If ye love me, obey me." "Therefore love is the fulfillment of the law," or rather, the fulfilling of the law must be in love. . . .

Anticipation is half the battle in winning obedience. If you know the bridge is down, do not approach that part of the stream; seek a ford further up, where the water is at low ebb. If the boy had made up his mind to do a certain thing, and I knew it in time, it was an easy matter to divert his determination; much easier to divert it than to meet it with opposition. If the child does right, our object is gained, though we may not recognize, in the means used, the fact of his submission.

Not for his own sake did Jehovah demand obedience, but for the sake of those who were dependent upon his knowledge of results. So, in the government of our children, we should work for results, and teach them that it is theirs to choose results.

We started out in life with very common ideas of very common methods; at least, I did. What more natural, considering the popular modus operandi, than for me to connect obedience with the rod? So, it was but in the usual course of family events that a little switch lay close at hand on the kitchen mantel, ready for use in case the child wandered beyond the boundary line of the garden fence, or nibbled at the tempting globe of a green plum.

I did not intend to be an extremist in the matter, oh no! I would but clear the law, so to speak. The very sight of the rod made me wince; but there was the arm of the wise Solomon, above my maternal head, wielding the implement, without which my child would die. There was the one course for me to pursue. So, as I said, the rod, or the tiny twig from the orchard, reposed in unconscious importance on the mantel.

I thought it had its effect, too, for when temptation was at hand, I had but to glance at the rod, or at the place where it was known to abide, and the baby understood. He would rather do the thing I wished than to bear the correction. Nevertheless, I never switched ever so lightly the dimpled hand of my child, but I felt a sting, as if I had been myself beaten with the rod. In spite of Solomon, my conscience smote, and told me that I was a coward. It hinted that my child obeyed me from no better motive than did my pussy cat, or the dog, who equally understood this very literal use of the rod, and could understand little else.

In this recital, I do not burn the apple-tree switch for others. I would but lay down this caution. See to it that the respect for the rod does not undermine, or anticipate respect for the parents. . . . Blind obedience is better than disobedience. And yet, as I have said, it is not true obedience, for true obedience is of dual nature, the thing itself, and the spirit of it. . . .

But how to apply those numerous proverbs of Solomon, those proverbs over which I stumbled with the apple-tree twig in my hand. Was it not plainly written, "Chastise thy son while there is hope, and let not thy soul spare for his crying?" . . . To impute corporal punishment to the word chastise, in applying it to the government of children, is like discussing a body without spirit, a semblance of something without life. . . . "Chastise thy son," correct him, appeal to his nobler nature, the nature which, in spite of physical pain inflicted, grows and develops in secret.

"Foolishness is bound in the heart of a child." . . .

From a first glance, one would conclude that the wise man had but one remedy, a counter-irritant for all the moral ails of childhood, "The rod of correction shall drive it far from him."

Always the chastisement, the beating, the laying on of the rod. But what is it, this rod that beats the child, that corrects him, that chastises him, that gives wisdom? Is it an instrument of torture for the flesh, a stick tough and fibrous, inflicting red lines on the tender back and limbs, purple witnesses to your own superior strength and wisdom? Is it the switch from the old apple-tree, lurking behind the clock, or the swift sharp strokes from a palmer surface? Is it the stinging blow from a hand, intended to guide the child, not to strike him?

And ancient authority, discoursing upon this rod of many misunderstandings and applications, says, "Judiciously applied, there is a lesson in every twig from the tree of wisdom." The rod of my youth has changed shape, the tree that bore it has changed shape, the application of it has also changed manner. . . .

"Suffer the little children to come unto me," were the words of Christ to his followers, on whom rested the privilege and dignity of rearing the lambs. "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness." These fruits, plucked by the child from the parent tree, may be sufficient for correction and chastisement.

Every rod that pledges good discipline, every twig that holds a bud of promise, every shoot from the tree of divine wisdom, be they word, example, encouragement, or correction, may be the rod with which to drive the foolishness from the child's heart.

Sometimes the rod signifies a staff, something to lean upon and to impart strength. Happy the child who finds such a rod in his parent's hand. Again, the rod may signify a shepherd's crook, a loving faithful means to guide. Happy the parent who has this rod in his hand. In the holy of holies, the heart of the Christian parent, within the veil of anger and passion and evil-speaking, with the golden censer of prayer, and the ark of the covenant, and the cherubim of glory overshadowing the mercy-seat, is the rod that budded, the rod of parental control. By it the plagues of Egypt, the inclinations which harass the child, may be subdued, and, like Moses, by it we may lead our children out of the enemy's country. . . .

"A child should be in some sense his own disciplinarian."

In his better moments he will agree with you that such and such things are wrong. He will heartily agree with you as to the penalties which he must suffer when guilty. Self-imposed fine, or forfeiture, are healthy, successful means of applying the rod. Mutual resolve on the part of parents and children, cooperation, where possible, have proved to us the best methods of combating an evil thing.

When the first man, Adam, said of husbands and wives, "They shall be one flesh," he might also have included their offspring. The family are one in blood, one in spirit and intention, and love, and final redemption. Let no man put them asunder by fatal methods of correction. Every chastisement used should but draw them closer together, in sympathy and harmonious brotherhood. Whatever law is enacted in the house should have for its one object to bring unto Christ.—Elizabeth Grinnell in American Motherhood.

Questions on April Reading.

What is the purpose of gospel law? What is the object of obedience to parental law? To what extent does your experience lead you to believe this object is recognized? What is the true spirit of obedience? What will foster this spirit? What will have the opposite effect? Will the habit of obedience without true submission result in any good? What greater good will result from obedience prompted by love? Can the voluntary obedience of the believer to Christ be made the pattern for the child's obedience? For whose sake did the Lord demand obedience? For what should parents work in the government of their children? With what is the most common thought of discipline connected? Is it possible for the rod to undermine or come before respect for parents? How? Is blind obedience better than disobedience? Why? But what is far better? How may the fruits of the Spirit in the parent result in the correction and chastisement of the child? Will the parent who enjoys these fruits of the Spirit desire them for his children also? Can they be secured for them without good discipline? Can there be love and peace and joy in a home where children are disobedient? How can a child aid in his own discipline? In what sense are the family one? How may they be put asunder by some methods of correction? What should be the one object of law in the home?

Program.

Hymn No. 132, Saints' Hymnal; prayer; reading from Home Column with discussion; paper, "The fruits of the Spirit in good discipline"; roll call; business; hymn No. 257; closing prayer.

Editors Herald: It has been but a few years since I first heard the Latter Day Saints' doctrine explained, at Audubon, Minnesota. Latter Day Saints, up to that time, had always been associated in my mind with adultery and polygamy. Since then I have traveled considerably, and ran across many men who know of the Latter Day Saints of Lamoni, and all have been uniform in their praise of them as a people, and think their doctrine, as far as they knew, is all right. Let us all hope and continue to pray that this knowledge of the doctrine and people will soon be known to every one in every city and hamlet in our land.

I am alone in "this neck of the woods," in a lumber camp, and the lumber jacks think it odd to see one of their number read a chapter in the Testament every night; but I read just the same, and am ready to defend my faith.

Dear Herald: The bright side of my ministerial work for one year, commencing January 27, 1907, ending January 27, 1908. I was ordained an elder under the hands of J. C. Mortimer. In a few days I was called to administer to Bro. Mortimer. The first sermon I preached I had to fill Bro. Mortimer's appointment. I was somewhat surprised when I found that Bro. Mortimer was sick. I did not have a Bible with me. I talked about twenty minutes. It seemed to me that it was a failure. The first three sermons I had to fill about the same way. So then I thought I had better buy me a Bible, or borrow one, so I could get ready, for fear I might fail in my attempt to present the gospel. A few days later I was asked to bless Bro. and Sr. Hadith's little girl. She was not well and very nervous, could not sleep. In a few days I called upon them and they told me she was better, that she could go to bed and sleep all night, something she had not done for a long time. That gave me some encouragement to go on, that God had recognized me thus far; so I got a Bible and went to studying, and I can truly say my mind was enlightened on many principles of the gospel. I was the president of the Winnipeg Branch. I struggled along trying to do good, but still the old grumblers and growlers that Bro. S. K. Sorensen wrote a piece about got in, so that it was very discouraging at times. In a short time two boys were baptized; then I went to conference for the first time. I enjoyed my trip. While there I met a goodly number of the elders that have been at my house in Pipestone, Minnesota, and to my surprise I was invited to go into the Fifth Quorum of Elders, with whom I am pleased to have my name enrolled. I returned to Winnipeg, taking up my duty as president of the branch. In June we had a reunion which was a complete failure. Bro. R. C. Evans was with us. He was a success, and gave us several good sermons and baptized four. Elder Dorsett baptized two. Some of the Saints moved to Gilbert Plains, Manitoba, about two hundred miles west of here. I was called there to administer to a sick lady, and when I got there she told me she did not belong to the church, but she believed this gospel. Before I administered to her I asked her, if God should bless her and raise her up from her bed of affliction, would she obey the gospel? She promised me she would. I administered to her and she was restored to health again. I think she will be baptized in the spring. We have a very good Sunday-school. We also had a nice entertainment on Christmas. I was called back to Gilbert Plains to administer to a sister that was very sick. I left Winnipeg on Sunday night, at seven o'clock; reached Gilbert Plains at three o'clock in the morning. A team was waiting for me and had to drive sixteen miles over stumps, hills, and grubs, arriving at half past six. A house full of Saints was waiting for me. The sister was apparently dead. I administered to her. To the surprise of all in the house she asked to get up. They told her to wait until the house got warm. At half past eleven she dressed herself and ate dinner with us. There were eight witnesses; one outsider present, and I baptized him the next day. Cut a hole in the ice in order to baptize, and it was a very cold day.

I returned home and had the pleasure of baptizing thirteen. I have one more to baptize next Sunday, February 23. Shortly after that I was taken sick with la grippe, and while sick I received another telegram to come at once. I went as soon as I was able. I administered to eight people, and I can truly say God recognized them with his blessing.

It seems, at times, that I am the weakest servant that he has ever called to labor in his vineyard, but still I can truly say that I have seen the blessings of God given to more than one. This gives me strength to press on to the end. May God bless all of his children is my earnest prayer for all.

KANSAS CITY, Missouri, March 2, 1908.

Editors Herald: I see a letter in the HERALD of February 26, 1908, by Elder John G. McQuarre, of the Utah church, to a young man in Rocky Ford, Colorado. Elder McQuarre and I were close friends and brothers in the same church and at one time teachers of the fourth ward in Ogden City, Utah. He was one of the seventy, but I do not remember the number of his quorum, and I was a priest. I left Ogden and did not see him for a good many years, but eleven years ago I was at a meeting of the Utah people in Park City, Utah, and there I heard Elder McQuarre make the statement that he would be willing to sacrifice his life to bring one soul to the Master. The statement affected me very much, because I knew the man to be honest and upright in all his dealings with his fellow man, and I thought I had been directed to that hall that night to save a soul from death. In the years we had been separated I had embraced the true gospel of the Son of God in Denver, Colorado, by the sermons of T. W. Smith, of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ, so as soon as the meeting came to a close I made straight for the stand to talk with Elder McQuarre.

I said, "John, do you know me?"

"No; I do not think I do."

"Well," I said, "I never thought you would forget Will Steele."

He then took me by both hands. "William, William, I thought you were dead. Tell me, are you still in the church?"

"Yes, I am."

"Oh, how glad I am of that!"

"Yes, but John, I am in the true church now."

"Oh, you have turned a Josephite," he said.

"No, I am neither a Josephite nor any other ite, but I am a Latter Day Saint, a follower of Jesus Christ, what I never was before. Now, John, you said to-night that you would give your life to save a soul. Now come home with me to-night and bring that young man along that is with you. My wife will be glad to see you, and I have a Bible, a Book of Mormon, and a Doctrine and Covenants. You and I always believed these books, and we will stand by them, and you will have a chance to save a soul to-night, or I will convince you that there never was a more deluded people than the people who belong to the church of Brigham Young."

"William," he said, "there is no use to talk to me, because I would rather have my head taken off and my body given to the coyotes on the mountains than to leave the church, so I will have to bid you good-night."

I met him next morning, and he still refused to try to save one whom he seemed to think so much of. I write you these few lines so if this young man, R. C. Conely, reads the HERALD, he will see by this letter how much Elder McQuarre wanted to prove that he belonged to what he calls the true vine, and he evaded the opportunity of proving that I belonged to a cut-off branch. I thank God to-day that I found in what he calls the cut-off branch the true gospel as taught by the Son of God, and the gifts and blessings in it that always follow the gospel of Jesus Christ; and although I was born and raised in what he calls the true vine, I never found the gifts and blessings that are promised the church of Jesus Christ in it. No wonder they are afraid of what they call a Josephite; for I do not think there is any man who embraces this gospel can see the folly and wickedness of that people clearer than one who has been raised in what Elder McQuarre calls the true vine; and I hope and pray that God will open the eyes of this young man that he will see the difference between the church of Jesus Christ and the church of Brigham Young.

MINDEN CITY, Michigan, March 9, 1908.

Editors Herald: Once more we begin our annual letter to your columns. In looking back over the past year, we see many things for which to be thankful, and we know that the favors and blessings received have not been ours by chance, but that the Father has had a hand in bringing about the same, and this draws us nearer to him.

We are striving to live appreciative; trying to practice what we have learned of truth, and are endeavoring to learn a little more day by day; and in so doing we find plenty to do. The more we learn of this gospel the more we realize there is to learn, and of course the greater and more beautiful it appears.

My health at present is a little better than it has been in past years, yet I am far from being well, and because of physical weakness, at times, the small duties at Sunday-school and Religio, besides trying to keep up with other church literature and Sunday-school normal lessons, seems quite a task. But I have been thinking that were it not for my weak physical condition, which hinders me from entering secular work to any degree, I might not have as much time to engage in church work as I do under present conditions; so we find no fault in the least, but feel thankful for the privileges we have, realizing that there is no line of work that we enjoy so much as we do that of the gospel. We have been conscious of the fact all along during past years that God is with us, and has blessed us, so much so that the past years have been by far the happiest period of our life.

The present winter has, thus far, been one noted for its severe snow-storms and extremely deep snow, causing railway blockades for days at a time. Some of the country roads have also been impassable at times, and under these conditions we were deprived of attending Sunday-school and Religio for a time, which made the days somewhat dreary, and we longed for a change to break the monotony. And it came, even as other blessings have come, when most needed.

The latter part of January a series of meetings was held in our church by our new missionary, Elder J. F. Grimes, and Bro. M. Carr, of the Gagetown local force. During these meetings we stayed with our brothers and sister in town in order to be nearer the church so as to attend the meetings regularly, and we truly enjoyed the time, were spiritually benefited by the meetings, and also from our association with those who have the gospel uppermost in mind and heart. We enjoyed the good influence to such an extent that we were loath to part from those favorable conditions, and enter other environments. Such seasons are pleasant memories in life, not easily forgotten. We accept them as blessings from the Father, and are thankful for the same. The meetings held were attended quite well, considering the stormy weather and deep snow; but because of these unfavorable conditions continuing the meetings closed at the end of a week.

The Saints were benefited by the meetings, and the gospel was preached to a few more, as a witness, if no more. However, we hope that the seed sown to the world, as well as to the Saints, fell on good ground, and will be nourished by true faith and prayers, so that it may bring forth fruit.

In order for the word of truth to take root and grow, it must receive sufficient nourishment. In Alma's instruction on "how to test a seed of truth," he says it must be planted in the heart with desires to know its worth, and, if it begins to sprout and grow by enlightening the understanding and enlarging the soul then 'tis known to be good, for every seed bringeth forth its own kind, and that which bringeth true light is certainly good seed, even seed of truth.

Those of us who have thus experimented with the seed of truth, and have tasted to a degree of its enlightening and life-giving influence, let us profit by Alma's further instruction wherein he has said, Now as this tree begins to grow, it must continually be nourished by our faith, and with diligence and patience, so that it will take deep root, and finally it shall be a tree springing up unto eternal life, and we shall feast upon the fruit of it until we shall hunger nor thirst no more. "Blessed are all they that do hunger and thirst after righteousness for they shall be filled"—but if we nourish not the word continually, by pressing onward and upward, after entering the path, through obedience to the first principles of the gospel, we can not pluck of the fruit of the tree of life which is sweet above all that is sweet.

A superficial knowledge of the gospel is not sufficient. We need to study deeply and earnestly, and be taught by the Spirit of truth, in order to have an intelligent faith in God and in the principles of the gospel he has given for our salvation.

It should be our aim to improve upon every opportunity God gives us to advance in righteousness, in knowledge, wisdom, patience, etc.; try to learn the intended lesson from every experience we are called to pass through; for these lessons will have to be learned sometime, if we would accomplish in this life all that God has designed we should, and thus gain eternal life.

The more of Christ's nature we take into our lives, the more good we can do. There is no better way to teach the gospel to our fellow man than by living it in our daily lives, thus demonstrating to them the power of the same, proving to them that it is in reality what we claim it to be, letting them see, if they will, that it will do for us now just what it has done for others in gospel ages of the past.

Oh that more of our time and energy would be spent in those things that would benefit us eternally! In the communication received a few years ago the Lord tells us what is most needed, wherein he says, "Live ye therefore and labor in love, not so much that ye may obtain, but that ye may make effectual my law and exemplify my life. In this ye shall find riches and your peace shall not fail."

With a degree of knowledge of God's infinite intelligence, we can not make believe that he is blind to a half-hearted service, but that he requires of each of us our best intelligent service. In order to give our best service, we must learn to know God and his ways; for to know him is to love him.

We can not look back over our experiences of the past, or even view the present, without beholding most prominently God's infinite attribute of love in all his dealings with us. How gentle he has been in trying to teach us our needed lessons, and we know his loving help is extended to all.

God's ways are all ways of peace and happiness when we walk therein; but it takes many a hard struggle to learn his high and holy ways, because we are so human, and there is much dross to be cleared away.

After a mutual acquaintance with the Father, so that we know him as our nearest and dearest friend, there is a pleasure in serving him; yet, trials will continue to come in order that we may grow stronger spiritually, and the Lord knows just where to apply the test; and, under these conditions it takes constant effort on our part, humility, prayerfulness, and the exercise of our faculties to retain this close relationship with God and Christ. But, it is certainly worth our best effort, for it bringeth the peace that surpasseth understanding.

"In the path of duty walking day by day,
Life is clad in beauty of celestial ray,
Purest joys are given when thy will is done;
And our earth is heaven, with thy work begun."

That which we think, do, or say that is contrary to the mind of God brings a spiritual discord. It is rightly said "that the least variation is bound to bring loss to us in some way." It pays highly to cultivate earnestness and exactness in our spiritual efforts, as well as our earthly efforts, and not to neglect the former for the latter. May we all thus strive to serve God, so that heavenly peace may attend us, and the greater blessings in store be enjoyed by all.

General Conference time is nearing. Some of the quorums will likely be in session already. We hope and pray that divine approval may rest upon all that will be done. With love to all the Saints, I am, EMMA VOLZ.

Editors Herald: It does not seem strange to me that the elders of the Brighamite church, of Utah, resort to lies to defend their polygamy, as I am aware that those elders who have been through their secret temple ordinances are taught to lie, if they thereby can defend their church and priesthood, because that is what they taught me in the endowment house. I have heard statements made by their polygamous wives when on trial at Superior Court, at Ogden, Utah, that they did not know who the father was of their new-born children.

Dear Herald: A few of the Rossendale Saints are striving with might and main to keep the banner of King Immanuel floating in the breeze; but I fear more are sleeping. They have lost their first love for the church, and are gradually retrogressing. We have a church at Rossendale, and lately have bought another Methodist Church, which is known as the McCreary Church. It is more centrally located than the Rossendale church, being only eight miles from our home, while Rossendale is fourteen miles. Nevertheless, Bro. Wilson holds meetings in Rossendale, and also at McCreary every Sunday; at the former place at three p. m., and at the latter at seven. We have had good crowds and excellent attention at McCreary, and it may be a good work can be done there.

The residents of that vicinity were enraged at the Methodist people for selling it, and sent a delegation to wait on Bro. Wilson, asking us to buy it, and they, the people, would help us. We certainly were greatly surprised. But we know our kind heavenly Father had our welfare in his hands, and he paved the way for us to acquire another Methodist church. That is two we have bought in a little over a year. Bro. J. L. Mortimer will be with us to-day, for which we are indeed grateful. This is the first time Bro. Mortimer has been here for three years, so no doubt he will awaken some of our sleeping ones, and add new ones to the fold, if we can keep him long enough.

Ever praying for the redemption of Zion and the good of mankind.

Dear Herald: I received the following dream and request that some one who has the gift of interpretation would interpret it for me, as I have been very much puzzled about it. I dreamed several of our neighbors were visiting at our house, who are not members of the church. I was sitting near them, but was not interested in their conversation. I was meditating about conditions, and finally got up and went out, when something drew my attention heavenward, and the following scenes appeared: There, as real as life, was a large ram. It grew larger and larger, until it was as large as an ordinary cow, with large curling horns. I immediately ran to the house and called my sister Anna, and Johnny, to come and see the large ram in heaven. When we got back there were three rams of natural size, standing upon their hind feet, with their heads against the large one, apparently trying to force the large ram back. There were also two other rams of natural size standing behind, with their heads against the large one. While in this position there was an angel about three yards in the front, and another angel about the same distance behind. They were clothed in long white robes, with long flowing hair reaching over the shoulders. They both held their right hands up, and poured something out of a cup into a vessel, which appeared in all colors, about the size of a quarter of a dollar. I said to my sister, This surely is the reward of the righteous. We continued to watch the scene till it faded away, and then returned to the house, where the people were still engaged in worldly conversation. We wondered how they could be so unconcerned about the event. I then awoke, with the power of Spirit present.

INDEPENDENCE, Missouri, March 6, 1908.

Editors Herald: Our work has advanced very satisfactorily in Oklahoma the past year. Oklahoma furnishes a great field for missionary work. We have held three successful debates with the Non-progressive Campbellites this year. The last one was with C. C. Parker, one of the vice-presidents of the Anti-Mormon Association. This was held at Morrison, Oklahoma, February 19 to 27, in the Christian church. Bro. Hubert Case represented our side in this conflict, the writer acting as his moderator. Parker depended entirely on just such stuff as is contained in that "Anti-Mormon" literature, as published by R. B. Neal. They flooded the community with this stuff two weeks before the debate, also commenced their meetings eight days before, expecting in this way to get the advantage. But the R. B. Neal literature, and with one of their main "guns," did not take with that people. And if R. B. Neal & Co. get the same kind of a setback everywhere as they did at that place, they will soon go out of business. We heard at least two persons say they had intended to join the Christian Church, but now they "would not have anything to do with such an outfit." Parker announced at last session to continue the meetings; but they got such a cool reception next night, only about twelve out, he and his moderator, W. E. Morgan, packed their "Anti-Mormon" stuff and left the town. We understood they were to get two hundred dollars for their work. If so it was spent to help advance our cause, and to their sorrow. I said before the debate, if we found any good in a man that came from that county, recommended by R. B. Neal, I would be surprised. I am now more than ever convinced that they are a set of "grafters." Parker never read from one authentic historian, but depended entirely on garbled statements gotten up by the enemy. The Saints all feel fine in work at that place, and our work is onward. The Lord can have the praise.

ARLINGTON, Nebraska, February 25, 1908.

Editors Herald: We live a good ways from any branch of the church, and do not have the privilege of meeting with the Saints, and one does not know how to appreciate the privilege until they are deprived of it. We have been away from the branch for almost three years, but we had Bro. J. R. Sutton and Bro. Hale W. Smith come out here last August and hold meetings in the schoolhouse; and then the first of February Bro. W. M. Rumel was here and held meetings, also; but the people around here are all Methodists, and so prejudiced there were only a few that would come out. Some that did come seemed to get interested, and heard some things they never heard before.

We take the HERALD and Autumn Leaves, and can hardly wait for them to come; for we find much good reading in them, and enjoy them. The Lord has blessed us in many ways, and we are truly thankful for it; but we desire to live where there is a branch of Saints, so we can enjoy the blessings that are in store for God's people; and hope in the near future that we may have the privilege, for we do want to bring our children up in Sunday-school and church. My companion and myself, and one other sister, are the only Saints that live close around here; but we are trying to tell the people the difference between the churches; and let them have books and papers that they may study it out and know for themselves. We ask an interest in the prayers of all, that we may do some good for the advancement of this blessed cause.

Your sister in faith,

MRS. STELLA TAYLOR.

BANDON, Oregon, February 16, 1908.

Dear Saints: As on this the Lord's day I am unable to get out and do anything for the Master's cause (having been under the most rigid quarantine for the past two weeks) perhaps the time can not be more profitably spent than penning a few lines for your most valuable columns. It has been some time since I have written to the HERALD, not because I have not had the interest of the work at heart, or been trying to do what I could for the Master's cause, but have not had any glowing accounts to write, so have left your valuable space to be filled by those that had more to write and could do better than I. At this writing we, in this part of God's moral vineyard, have many reasons to rejoice, and at the same time the cloud of darkness and sorrow has settled over us.

I came to Coos County, August 15, to attend the district reunion at Myrtle Point, thence to Bandon for a short stay, and since that time I have been laboring in the county as I thought best, and circumstances would permit, but most of the time being put in at Bandon. The work was first opened up here by H. L. Holt and A. M. Chase, about nine years ago; and by their faithful efforts, and those of other missionaries, a branch was shortly after organized, and in the main has continued to grow and prosper, although passing through some hard struggles and strong opposition. They held their meetings from place to place, and rented halls. Last fall they were told that when their time was out in the hall then occupied, which would be January 1, they would have to pay about twenty dollars per month rent, and that was more than it was worth, so they decided to try to build a church, and by a united effort of all, and the untiring energy and zeal of some, they have succeeded and have it completed, except a few of the finishing touches and seating. The first services were held January 5, by Elder E. Keeler and the writer, with a fair attendance, and the announcement that the next Sunday there would be a series of meetings commenced, as there was more work to do on the building, as they had been hindered in some things that caused delay.

They have a nice, neat, little frame building, main part twenty-four by forty, speaker's and choir stand on the north side eight by sixteen, and belfry at entrance in southwest corner seven and one half feet square. The intention is in the future to put an annex on the south about fourteen by twenty-four. The building is on the southwest corner of the block and faces west.

The meetings commenced as stated, in charge of Elder D. E. Stitt, branch president, Elder Keeler and myself doing the preaching, and the following Sunday there were five to unite with the church, two married ladies, Mr. James and wife, and Bro. D. W. Carpenter's daughter, Eunice, aged twelve, and so we had cause to rejoice; but the good work could not go on without a hindering cause. All manner of lies had been told about us, and even the Methodist minister was sent to some of the interested parties to talk with them, but all of no avail, as they joined any way; so something else had to be done, or it seemed that way to the writer.

Among the most untiring and earnest workers on the church building were Bro. Amos Carson, wife, and daughter Frances, giving a lot for the church, quite an amount of cash, and feeding some who worked on the building all or part of the time, Bro. Carson working every day there was anything to be done from start to finish. Srs. Carson and Frances, in connection with others, did what they could, doing such work as sand-papering the inside woodwork, papering, etc., and the principal thing, suggesting and keeping them at it and things moving. As the church was nearing completion, their youngest son, Melvin, was taken sick, and was sick during all the meetings so Sr. Carson did not attend, only the services on the first Sunday. The doctor was called, and came the second time, but did not decide what the disease was. He was administered to at his request by Elder Stitt and the writer, Elder Keeler and the writer, Elders Stitt, Keeler, and the writer at various times, and by the writer alone many times, as I was staying at their place, and for a number of days was called upon morning and eve, to which I willingly complied, but all to no avail. At the close of the Sunday meetings, the day of the baptism, the Spirit was manifested in all the services. It was announced that prayer-meeting would be held Wednesday eve, and Elder Baker would preach each eve during the rest of the week and Sunday, as the interest seemed very good, that evening being the largest attendance the writer had seen at Bandon. The following Tuesday night, at half past twelve, Melvin passed away without a struggle. While he had not united with the church, his faith seemed unwavering. Besides the administrations, he had taken oil all the time, and almost at the last moment he asked to have his throat rubbed with it. So this was a shadow of gloom cast over the bright prospects, and it seemed a hard reward for such faithful service as they had rendered; but God knows best. After his death it was sent far and near that he died of diphtheria, and in fact one of the doctors, when he signed the death certificate, so stated; so we held the funeral from the house, but there were not many out. Sr. Carson came back from the cemetery worn out with the hard work and care of the boy, as he had been sick twenty-one days. We held meetings as stated, but the attendance was small on account of the scare; but on Sunday we baptized Mr. Finniger, husband of one of the ladies baptized the Sunday before, with the prospect of more to follow. There were also eight children blessed, as the ones baptized were all new to the work, so had never had that done, and the Lord was again with us by his Spirit.

Sr. Carson did not get any better, and by that time was down in bed. Monday morning they called the doctor and he pronounced it diphtheria, and placed us under quarantine of the strictest kind, and not only us, but nearly every family of Saints in town. Sr. Carson continued to grow worse in spite of all efforts that could be made, both of a medical nature and of the spiritual, and again on Tuesday night at half past twelve, just one week from the time, and almost to the minute, that the boy passed away, she passed peacefully to rest from all her labors, and surely she ought to receive a crown of glory; but it seems hard that she should be taken before the new church was entirely complete, and not to attend but one day's service when she had worked so hard, and expected to enjoy it so much. But the Lord's will, not ours, be done, and he truly has been with the bereaved ones and given them strength. We are all well at present. There is left of the family to mourn the loss, Bro. Carson, Sr. Frances, and son Ray, and she will be greatly missed by many, and in the church work, as she was a hard and willing worker, loved and respected by all that knew her. Besides the family that is shut in are Sr. Baid, who came to help care for Sr. Carson, Bro. Charles and Robert Hunt, who were boarding here at the time, and the writer. The quarantine was raised for most of the Saints yesterday, and if all goes well we will get out Thursday. Our district conference was postponed for two weeks. If all goes well we want to do a little more work here and see if there are not others to unite with the church, as there are others that ought to, and then attend the conference; and if nothing hinders and we do not feel that it is duty to stay we want to start home.

Still in the battle for truth,

A. A. BAKER.

Since writing the above, things went well, and we held the meetings as stated, and the result was four more added to the fold: the husband of the other married sister that first joined, and three children of the Saints; and there are others that are near. All are well.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI.

Editors Herald: The Saints in Great Britain may be interested to know of our whereabouts, and also of our safe arrival at our destination. We left home Saturday morning, February 29, passing through Manchester on our way, where a few Saints met us and wished us good-bye.

Arriving in Liverpool about half past eleven in the morning, we concluded arrangements for the voyage across the Atlantic, then went down to the landing stage, where we met Bro. Joseph Bennett, who resides at the Mariner's Home at Lickeard. Our brother, in spite of his eighty-three years, looks hale and robust. His confidence in the church, and anxiety for its welfare, still sustain him, and form the chief topics of interest in his life.

At Princes Landing Stage, the massive hulk of the White Star Line S. S. Cyneric was moored, and making ready for her trans-Atlantic voyage to Boston. After her departure, at half past two in the afternoon, the S. S. Lucania, of the Cunard Line, took her place at the stage, and soon the small army of passengers, with their baggage, was safely embarked, and at five o'clock we sailed down the Mersey.

We had a very stormy voyage to Queenstown, where we arrived Sunday, at nine in the morning. We shipped the mail, and the Irish passengers, and at half past ten set out on our long voyage to New York.

After leaving the coast, we experienced the full force of the northwest gale which was blowing. Both Sr. Hughes, of London, who was accompanying me to Independence, and the writer were seasick; but not for very long.

We passed Nantucket Lightship at half past nine, Friday evening, and Saturday, surrounded by a heavy fog, as we were proceeding slowly up the channel to New York, we had the misfortune to run aground, and after remaining fast for an hour we were tugged back into the proper track, and, without further mishap, passing through the various forms necessary to landing on American soil, we found ourselves once again in New York.

Originally, I had hoped to spend the Sunday in Brooklyn, but found it would take me all the time from Saturday evening to reach Independence by Monday night. We therefore took train Saturday evening at half past six, and, traveling continuously till Monday, at half past five we were deposited at the station at Independence. We received a warm welcome with Bro. and Sr. E. L. Kelley, with whom we left Sr. Hughes.

I went up to my father's place, and found all well. Our quorum services commenced March 11. Wednesday evening, I took supper with Bro. and Sr. J. E. Matthews and Bro. and Sr. Bookers, the former of Birmingham, and the latter of Leeds. I was sorry to see Bro. Matthews had been so very ill, and had decided to return to Birmingham in the spring, after the conference.

I wish to say that, during my absence, any matters needing attention may be referred to Bro. W. H. Greenwood, whom I have requested to take oversight in the meantime. My address during my stay in America will be 821 South Delaware Street, Independence, Missouri.

Sincerely,
JOHN W. RUSHTON.

Editors Herald: I have to report the death of Bro. John Leeson at his home in Pennsboro, West Virginia, on the 15th inst., at the age of seventy-two years, seven months, fifteen days. He has been rendered almost entirely helpless from rheumatism for about fourteen years, and for a part of the time totally blind. I was called upon by the widowed sister and her family to deliver the funeral-sermon in the United Brethren church, and was assisted by the Reverend Bibby of that place, who spoke in the highest terms of Bro. Leeson's Christian character, and also that of the family who survive, indorsing our faith and the power of the gospel to save the believer.

A large concourse of people witnessed the services, manifesting deep interest and sympathy for the bereaved family.

Bro. Leeson was born in the county of Tyler, at Centerville, Virginia, October 2, 1835. United with the church at Brooksville, Calhoun County, West Virginia; was baptized by Elder H. E. Moler, September 29, 1894.

Bro. Leeson left a bright testimony, and died in the full enjoyment of the faith and hope of a better resurrection. He called the family to his bedside, gave them good advice, bidding them farewell; kept his mind, realizing his condition, and passing from earth life, to the very last breath.

Editors Herald: It is some time since I wrote anything for the letter department in the HERALD, my time having been fully occupied in other matters. I am, at present, on a brief mission to Buladelph; and, for the time being, free from many other duties, so I again take up the pen to address you.

I found a nice little branch of the church here, with a neat little meeting-place of their own, quite free from debt. This reflects great credit on the few Saints and friends here and is an evidence that they are possessed of the grit so essential to success in our work.

Years ago I bestowed a good deal of labor here, but conditions were very different then. Feeling ran high against us, and persecution of the petty order was rife. For some time we were able to obtain the use, at intervals, of the one hall in the town for service, but after a time this was denied us. When assured that there was absolutely no chance of the use of the hall being granted us, the Saints decided to build a church of their own; and now we can worship beneath our own roof, without let or hindrance.

Since I was last here, much labor has been bestowed by Bro. John Jones, our worthy district president, and some little by Elders Hanson, Barmore, Butterworth, and Wells. The Saints have also been cheered by reunion sessions held here once or twice, and are looking forward to the convening of our next New South Wales reunion, during Easter.

The Seventh Day Adventists have been, and are still, busy hereabouts, and my mission here has been to deliver a series of lectures on the prophecies so much abused by them. Though the weather has not been the best, I have had fair audiences all through, and believe we have succeeded in letting a few of our friends see that the fine-spun Adventist theories are clearly out of harmony with the Scriptures. I am not fearful that they will influence any of our members or supporters to follow them. Still, our intention is to keep a missionary in the vicinity just as long as they remain here; for who knows that there may not be some honest-hearted ones not known to us now, whom they may deceive if some one is not here to call attention to the "old landmarks"? Home address is 536 Darling Street, Rozelle, New South Wales.

Fraternally yours,
WALTER J. HAWORTH.

Extracts from Letters.

G. E. Jones, Alamo, Texas: "I have often enjoyed reading your columns, and hardly know how to value the good news, for you have been a great help to wife and myself. We are the only Saints near this place. I hope to be able to join the Saints at Independence in the near future. Some of the people here would be glad to hear some of our elders preach. It would be a great blessing if we could lead them into the light of the true gospel, and not only a blessing to them, but a chance for others to hear the truth. We are handing them our church papers to read, the HERALD and Ensign. They say they like to read them, and do not know why the church should not be just like it used to be."

News From Branches

FIRST KANSAS CITY.

Since last writing, quite a change is had. Our new church, which the Bishop bought from the Methodists, which is located on Ninth Street and Lydia Avenue, is so attractive that we are about to desert our little church on Wabash and Twenty-fourth Streets altogether, and move there. The new church was opened the first Sunday in this month with a rousing effort. The big pipe-organ, under the manipulation of Bro. Paul Craig, with a well-trained choir under the direction of Bro. Arthur Mills, and about six hundred voices from the congregation, was indeed charming; and then such an excellent sermon from our beloved and esteemed brother, President Joseph Smith! It was enough to induce us to want to leave our little humble church; and so, on Monday night, at our business-meeting, we resolved to abandon all our meetings, except Wednesday evening prayer-meetings, at our little church, and all attend, or hold our meetings in our new church until after General Conference. It was carried without a dissenting voice; so we are now at home at Ninth Street and Lydia Avenue, ready to welcome all our friends at that place. Bishop E. L. Kelley preached a very instructive sermon at night, followed by a week's preaching every night by different speakers, with Bro. F. M. Smith in charge.

Our meetings and Sunday-school at Centropolis, at the home of Bro. and Sr. Drice, will continue as before; also home class Religio, at the home of Bro. Selby; also a new place just opened by the writer at 1919 Brooklyn Avenue, where we will have preaching every Tuesday evening.

Now as we look back over the twenty-eight years of our labors (when we began our efforts here in this city, at Troost Avenue and Eighteenth Street, at the house of Bro. Joseph Schmutz (deceased) and Sr. Schmutz (who now lives in Denver), our heart was made glad to see the work of the Lord making progress. Among the three hundred thousand people here, we have members scattered all over this city, with six organized branches; and our influence is felt for good among the people, and besides the fulfillment of God's promise, that he would give us grace and favor in the eyes of the people. Some weeks ago we were made glad to be invited by Reverend W. A. Johnson, of the Christian union church, to fill his pulpit at the regular eleven o'clock service; also by Reverend C. H. Clark, at the Fourteenth Street Methodist church, to preach for him at the regular evening hour, then at the close to have them shake my hand, with a "God bless you, Bro. Warnky; come and visit us again when you can."

Yesterday I preached both morning and evening for Reverend W. A. Johnson at the Christian union church. My prayer is that God will give us wisdom to present the angel's message in plainness, and not speak against other churches, nor say harsh things about them. The large majority are doing the best they can, and are willing to be instructed, if it is done in the spirit of meekness and love.

Sr. F. C. Warnky has gone to Dallas, Texas, to visit her daughter, Maud (Mrs. L. W. Chick, 787 McKinney Avenue), and while there will work in the interest of the home class Religio, and the church in general.

LONDON, ONTARIO.

On Sunday, the 8th, the infant child of Bro. and Sr. Harry Lott was blessed by Elder John Shields and Arthur Leverton, and named George Edward.

Elder George Henley, priest of our branch, occupied the stand at St. Thomas last Sunday.

President R. C. Evans arrived home from Toronto Sunday night, the 8th, and left on the 9th for General Conference. He reports the work advancing rapidly in Toronto.

Elder Arthur Leverton, of the Chatham District, one of the first elders to preach the latter-day work here, nearly thirty-five years ago, occupied the stand both morning and evening of the 8th inst. Elder Leverton is a forcible speaker, and both discourses were fully enjoyed by the large audiences which turned out to hear him.

Elder John Shields, missionary, is holding special services in the church Sundays and through the week. A fairly good interest is aroused, and many are investigating.

Beside these, an aged husband and several grandchildren are left to mourn. Grandma Glick was loved by all. She united with the Saints' church sixteen years ago, and remained a faithful member until death. Funeral-sermon by W. H. Lowe.

ADAIR.—At Shenandoah, Ralph William Adair, infant son of Bro. Robert Nelson Adair; died March 5, aged 2 years, 2 months, and three weeks. He was a beautiful child, making the loss the greater. Buried in Rose Hill Cemetery. Funeral service from the home, by Joseph Arber.

CATO.—Bro. A. J. Cato died at Miami, Oklahoma, October 22, 1907, after suffering for two or three years. Funeral services by O. P. Sutherland. Bro. Cato was born January 7, 1843, in Monroe County, Alabama; baptized August 26, 1873. Ordained an elder, September 20, 1873. Was in active missionary service several years, was an able defender of the faith, opening up many new places, and passed through severe persecutions and trials; but continued faithful to the end, and died in the faith, and entered the paradise of rest. "He that endureth to the end shall be saved."

NELSON.—Ole Christian Nelson, born April 24, 1859, in Møen, Denmark; united with the Reorganization September 13, 1883, at Council Bluffs, where he died from blood poison February 16, 1908. Funeral discourse by M. M. Turpen at the home, which was filled with sympathizing friends, of whom Bro. "Chris" (as he was wont to be called) had many. He leaves wife and three children, his aged mother who made her home with them, a brother and two sisters. His character was such that we rest in the assurance that with him all is well.

CARRINGTON.—Sr. Martha Carrington was born December 28, 1839, at Brownville, Jefferson County, New York. Died at the home of her daughter, Sr. C. C. Hoague, in the town of Portor, Rock County, Wisconsin, March 6, 1908. Early in life she united with the old organization of Latter Day Saints; and, in September, 1866, was baptized into the Reorganization, by Bro. Samuel Powers, and remained a faithful member until death. She leaves to mourn, one son, one daughter, and two grandchildren. Funeral at the home, in charge of J. O. Dutton; sermon by W. A. McDowell, to a large gathering.

LEWIS.—At Bertrand, Nebraska, Mr. Walter Lewis, aged seventy years, four months, and five days. Walter Lewis was born at Stratford, Connecticut, November 8, 1837; moved to Gosper County, Nebraska, about thirty years ago, and this continued to be his home until he was called to the great beyond, on the morning of March 13, 1908. He leaves a faithful companion, four daughters, and many relatives, friends, and neighbors, to mourn his departure. Funeral service at the home, March 15, 1908, conducted by C. H. Porter. Interment at Fairview Cemetery.

Government Land in Wyoming.

The Shoshone irrigation enterprise in the Big Horn Basin of Wyoming on which the United States Government is spending $4,000,000 is being rapidly completed.

What is known as the Corbett Tunnel, 17,000 feet long, has just been completed and through it, what is known as the Garland Government Canal will supply water this spring to 14,000 acres of public land. This land is open to homestead entry under the usual rules modified by the provisions of the Reclamation Act. Continuous residence is required and practically nothing is charged for the land, the Government merely charging the settler his pro rata share of the cost to the Government of the irrigation works.

In this particular project this amounts to $45.00 an acre, and the settler is expected to pay $4.50 an acre per year and has ten years in which to pay the full amount. These terms are very favorable especially when it is remembered that no interest is charged by the Government on the deferred payments.

The Government has prepared plats showing the location and size of each of the farm units, any one of which the settler may select.

This land is located along the Shoshone River in the heart of the Big Horn Basin, which lies between the Big Horn Mountains on the east and main range of the Rockies on the west, with connecting mountain ranges north and south. The situation is well sheltered, the climate is fine, and the soil as rich as any in America, and produces abundant crops of oats, barley, wheat, potatoes, sugar beets, alfalfa, and garden truck. Water is plentiful and pure and there is plenty of timber and coal.

Any one who is thinking of settling in a new region will do well to investigate this splendid opportunity.

Every Latter Day Saint is a Lookout Committee of one. As a believer in the latter-day work it becomes your duty to warn your neighbor.

You may do this in various ways. You may club him on his theological head with scripture quotations and defeat him in argument,—and at the same time make him mad. Or you may get around him in a diplomatic way and interest him and at the same time keep his good will.

We suggest that as a starter you buy the Two-story Book and place it in his hands; it will interest him and it will not offend him.

What is the Two-story Book? It is a book containing two stories: An Instrument in His Hands, by Mary Leland Carter; and The Minister Who was Different, by Elbert A. Smith. It will win its way where a tract would not be read and where a sermon would not be listened to.

The Two-story Book is for sale by the Herald Publishing House, at the extremely low price of fifty cents, cloth binding. Two stories high, well lighted, well furnished, rock foundation.

INDIVIDUALITY AND EQUALITY.

Where you find a man who is both selfish and clever, that man will prosper.—Ambrose Bierce.

Whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all.—Jesus Christ.

As we understand the situation, the condition of equality and unity contemplated in the gospel law, and long sought after by God's children, can never be fully obtained until men are controlled by a true and proper ambition. That ambition will not be for personal or family advancement alone, but for the advancement of all our brothers and sisters,—the whole family of God, both in heaven and on earth.

Men must learn that there is no permanent advancement for individuals when the whole rank and file of the church does not move up,—we refer now to conditions that confront us in this life in the building of Zion; nor can one gain reward in the next world who has ignored the welfare of others in this world. Napoleons may speak of the common people as "cannon meat," and the aristocracy of Russia may rise, individually, by trampling others down, but they can obtain no permanent security in this way. The very flesh on which they trample will rise and kill them.

The wave that essays the stars must have the full, strong tide back of it; and the men who assail the heights must move forward with all their brethren in a strong and united effort.

When by a further study of the law or by the aid of further revelation, the church is enabled to crystallize its opinions, and those opinions take form in action and at last we have equality, no matter what plans may be elaborated, we can never maintain that condition until we abandon the ambition that ends in self, and become possessed of an ambition that includes humanity. Christ made no mistake when he said that man must be born again before he could see the kingdom of God. He alone has the power and the means by which that regeneration can be effected. The gospel is the power of God unto salvation, in this as in all other particulars.

At present man loves personal gain, and it is the incentive that urges him to his labors. Take away that incentive and he would not work. Imbue him with a broader ambition that shall include others and he retains an incentive; he will work just as hard for the advancement of Zion as he did for his own sole advancement. If we doubt this we may well ponder the question, What incentive did Christ have? He thought so much of others that he became the servant of all.

In a limited sense such a spirit is manifest in the family. A man forgets himself and does not demand that the members of his family shall each be satisfied with what that member may be able to earn; he is willing to share with his wife or brother or sister or helpless children so that the whole family may be preserved and be provided for. Patriotism is a little broader expression of that spirit. The nation is in danger,—the man sacrifices himself and even his family, and goes out to fight and die for the nation. True Christianity is the broadest expression of that spirit, and leads a man to include all men in his ambition. It rises above individual or family ambition and becomes the highest type of patriotism. It is the only spirit that will ever wipe out individual, family, and racial differences, and bring about conditions where there are no Jews and no Gentiles, no bond and no free, and only one kingdom under the whole heaven.

Surely we have examples in nature which show us that selfish motives are not the only motives which promote industry. If a man "works like a beaver" he is simply emulating an animal that knows only community ambition. If he is as "busy as a bee" he simply follows the example of an insect which in the honey season literally wears its life out in a few short weeks, and all because of community ambition, pride, or love. If, being a sluggard, even under the stimulus of personal ambition and the keen competition of our times, man goes to the ant, as God has told him to do, he finds a very busy creature which knows nothing about competition as the "life of trade" but does know a great deal about coöperation as a life trade. Divine wisdom took note of the ant; and shall a man be greater than God?

Nor will our future condition of equality destroy individuality. Whatever may have been the plan of "all things common" which the apostles adopted after the day of Pentecost, at which time they received such an endowment of wisdom and power, it did not destroy the individuality of Peter,—hardly! He was Cephas still. Zion will not be an emulsion, but an aggregation of units. To a degree, patriotism destroys personal ambition and fosters national ambition; yet it does not destroy individuality, but rather quickens it. In times of war, when one ideal (and that not a personal one) moves the mass, individuals stand out in greatest prominence, both in the council halls and on the field of battle, as note the generals and statesmen of every great war.

Surely it will be so in the army of the Lord. The law of God will take care of the individual most jealously while he is striving for others. Individuality is one of the most valuable factors with which we have to deal, and God will use it for all it is worth. No great enterprise was ever founded, back of which there was not some strong individual. No corporation or trust or aggregation of any kind can long continue unless some one is putting his strong individuality into the work.

So it is in the work of God. We need men who will consecrate, not money alone, but might, mind, and strength. Men who will throw their individuality into the work and throw it hard. It will not suffice to consecrate our moneys or anything else to the church while our individuality is wrapped up in the world, and while we are governed by worldly ambitions.

Every minister, especially, should be a man among men, with ideas, abilities, and manners of his own; and that is generally the case, because we have not a factory-made clergy. Our ministers are hand-made; and God seldom makes two men exactly alike, either in feature or disposition.

God has placed upon other shoulders the burden of teaching and executing the law of temporalities, and, so far as we are concerned, we are content to let it remain there, while we attend to the especial business that he has given us; but it is a common duty resting upon all to do what can be done toward securing that proper spiritual condition which must underlie every successful effort to enforce the financial laws. The oversight of missionary work in all the world may rest with the Twelve and seventies; the duty of pastoral work may be with the high priests; the control of financial matters may rest with the bishops; but the duty and right to teach personal righteousness rests alone with no man or quorum of men, but with all the church, because the success of every department of church work depends upon that principle.

There may be a lack of unity as regards the law; but we are persuaded that our greatest danger right now is not in that particular. Our greatest obstacle is selfishness; and when we get rid of that we will soon come to an agreement.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

DECATUR, Illinois, March 16.—Evangelist Sunday has succeeded in breaking all his own previous revival efforts in the meetings which he closed here to-night. A total of 6,206 converts were made, nearly two thousand more than in Bloomington, which was his high-water mark heretofore. Last Sunday was the day on which the fund as a gift to Mr. Sunday was to be raised. The people of Decatur arose to the occasion by giving the handsome sum of $10,379.52—two thousand dollars more than Bloomington. Thus Sunday received exactly $2,000 a week for his efforts in the Macon County capital.

This evening over six hundred converts were made.

Sunday there were received about six hundred converts for the churches. Previous to the record-breaking campaign in Decatur, Bloomington held the palm with 4,200 converts.

In his sensational sermon on "Booze" delivered Sunday afternoon to the men, Mr. Sunday said that if the Decatur saloonkeepers got too active, he would come back for two or three days just before election day.—Burlington Hawkeye, March 17, 1908.

OSKALOOSA, Iowa, March 17.—Oskaloosa ministers have created something of a sensation in coming out in a printed declaration over their signatures as opposed to the remarrying of divorced persons, and with a single exception they have declared they will not marry couples who have been divorced.

The agreement is the result of a heated debate in the local ministerial association. Only one minister, Reverend Alexander McFarren, of the First Presbyterian church, refused to sign the agreement. This minister in discussion admitted that he held different views on the subject than those advanced by the teachings of his church.

The ministers declare that if the ministers of other denominations unite with them in a similar decree they will wield a power against the evil influences of the present divorce system of the country, which will be far reaching. The Oskaloosa ministers will use their influence to have the matter brought forward for action in the governing bodies of their denominations.—Exchange.

"The Reverend R. J. Campbell, pastor of the City Temple, London, England, has been evolving and constructing and strenuously advocating a new theology which has put him much in evidence in the public prints and in discussions at religious gatherings. It is now reported that he has published a letter addressed to all Free Church men and other sympathizers, proposing to form a new sect and organization for an active propoganda in behalf of his new theology, the central idea of which is the denial of the divine origin of Christ, whom he regards as a social reformer. The reason he gives for this step is the hostile attitude of the official element in the churches to the new movement. This," says the New York Christian Intelligencer (Ref.), "is a sensible proposition. Holding such views, the City Temple is no place for Mr. Campbell, since in the long and notable pastorate of his predecessor, Joseph Parker, the City Temple pulpit was a very Gibraltar of orthodoxy. The consistent and logical result of radical depature from the orthodox belief on which the City Temple was founded is a relinquishment of all relation to that church and the formation of a new body in which Campbell and those sympathizing with him, may, unhindered by the hostile attitude of church officials, give free vent to his new theology and find a congenial environment. Change of faith necessarily and logically leads to a change of ecclesiastical relations."—Exchange.

Doctor Lila E. Whitehead, in an address in Chicago, said:

"Why do mothers, members of the W. C. T. U., work for a law which provides for the teaching of the effects of narcotics in the public schools and then after their children have been taught the truth under it, undermine their faith in what they have learned by giving them tea and coffee at home when they have been taught that tea and coffee are just as truly narcotics as liquor or tobacco?"

"The effect of coffee and liquor on children is terrible," said Doctor Whitehead, when the question was opened. "Before I have had charge of a room six weeks I can pick out every child that uses tea or coffee. The effect of the stimulation on their sensitive, growing bodies is unbelievably bad. Tea and coffee and staying up late at night make all our bad children. I have never known a refractory child who did not use either tea or coffee or stay up late at night. One of the greatest specialists in children's diseases in the city has told me he would rather give his children beer three times a day than give them tea or coffee."

At a church entertainment in Southern Iowa the other evening the master of ceremonies announced, "Miss Bates will sing, 'Oh, that I had wings like a dove, for then I would fly away,' accompanied by the minister."—Des Moines Tribune.

A man that puts himself on the ground of moral principle, though the whole world be against him, is mightier than them all; for the orb of time becomes such a man's shield, and every step brings him nearer to the hand of omnipotence. ANNUAL STATEMENT OF BOARD OF PUBLICATION.

Below will be found the annual statement of the publishing department of the church. While, of necessity, our liabilities are heavy, to replace the Herald Office and equip it with new machinery, yet the gain made during the year, of $10,854.82, exclusive of all donations, makes us hopeful that in a few years the plant will be free from debt, and the good accomplished increased many fold. We earnestly trust that the Saints will take the church papers, and thus help pay off the debt, while at the same time much good will come to them through the printed word. The rebuilding of the new office has not all been balanced up yet, but full report will be made in a few weeks that all may have full information of the work done.

We feel thankful for the support given the department the past year. Some of the missionary force have done splendidly, and we hope to see many more "workers" helping us this year. If all of the Saints will help by subscribing for the HERALD, Leaves, and Ensign for the next four years, we will cancel the debt.

Yours in bonds,
F. B. BLAIR, Manager.

TWO OLD POEMS.

DAVID H. SMITH.

From a photograph taken at about the time of the appearance of the second poem referred to in this article.

There are two poems by David H. Smith, one entitled, "Tatty in the Buggy," and the other beginning, "Little HERALD, stop a moment," that are well remembered by the older generation of Latter Day Saints. They are not so familiar to the younger generation, because they have not been preserved in the literature of the church, perhaps because of a lack from a literary standpoint,—it was their sentiment and not their polish that appealed to the Saints at the time of their appearance. Indeed, they were the work of a boy who was just venturing into the realm of poesy; and they lacked the perfect beauty of his later compositions.

When Joseph Smith took his place, in 1860, at the head of the Reorganization, he found no more sympathetic and enthusiastic follower than his young brother David, who was then only sixteen years of age.

It was the custom of the family to make the halls of the old home ring of an evening with songs. Many of these were of David's composition. In memory of those olden, golden days he has written, in Hesperis:

"Oh, how we used to sing in the days that are no more;
As we gathered in a ring 'round the old familiar door;
When some kind friend would raise some well remembered strain,
Sacred to those happy days,—shall we ever sing again?"

So it came about that when Joseph felt the call of the Lord and went to take his place at the head of the church, the boy David expressed his exultation in verse, and the family sang the poem to the tune, "Kingdom Come, or, Year of Jubilee." To understand the song, be it known that "Tatty" was the faithful old family driving-horse. The song was taken up by others, and there are those yet who will sing it for you without any freshening of the memory by reference to the printed page. The first verses were:

"Oh, brothers! have you seen Brother Joseph,
With a smile upon his face,
Going along the road with Tatty in the buggy,
As if to leave the place?
He heard the word way up the river,
Where the Amboy Conference is:
Then he took by the hand his dear old mother,
And he's gone to take his place.

"O then, to see the people coming,
To the water blue and clear:
They heard the sound of the word from heaven,
And unto them it's dear.
They know that he has sense and wisdom;
And they know that he is true;
And they know that he will lead God's people,
As a prophet ought to do."

Yet notwithstanding his earnest belief in the prophetic calling of his brother, there were those who sought to force upon the younger brother the thought that he should be the leader. Yes, among the various conflicting claims of those troubled times there were those who called themselves "Davidites," using his name, though, without permission. His winning traits of character, his religious fervor, his intense spirituality, his varied abilities and brilliant prospects, seemed to them to designate him as the ideal prophet-leader,—the "Prince David" of the latter-day dispensation.

Strange, is it not, that some will always choose some way other than the one that God has appointed? There were many in the Utah faction who were eager to hail him as the "seed of Joseph" called to lead the church; though they refused to follow the one who rightfully had the call. These individuals at different times offered the young man great inducements to fall in with their ideas; and finally he replied to them in no uncertain tones, through the SAINTS' HERALD, April, 1863, in a poem entitled, "A word of advice to those who look for me to be the prophet."

Needless to say the poem was received with delight by those who were weary of men who would sacrifice the church in the interests of their own ambitions. The impression that it created can hardly be imagined at this late day. To be understood, it must be remembered that at the time three pillars of the temple still stood at Nauvoo; and with true poetic inspiration the young poet compared the three sons of the Martyr to these three pillars. We quote the poem in full below.

A WORD OF ADVICE TO THOSE WHO LOOK FOR ME TO BE THE PROPHET.

By David H. Smith.

"Little HERALD, stop a moment
Ere you journey on your way;
I have something of importance
That I wish that you would say
Unto those who, not contented
With the leader God hath sent,
Still declare that I shall lead them,
Though I gave them no consent.

"Go and tell them I am loyal
To the counsels of the Lord;
Tell them I have no desire
To dispute his mighty word.
Joseph is the Chosen Prophet,
Well ordained in God's clear sight;
Should he lose it by transgression,
Alexander has the right.

"Joseph, Alexander, David,
Three remaining pillars still;
Like the three remaining columns
Of the Temple on the hill!
Joseph's star is full and shining,
Alexander's more than mine;
Mine is just below the mountain,
Bide its time and it will shine.

"Shame, then! work no more with Satan;
Tempt me not to leave this band;
For as long as we're united,
We in faith and strength may stand.
Go to Strang, and go to Brigham,
No false prophet make of me;
In the name of Jesus, Satan!
Get thee gone—it shall not be.

"Little HERALD, go and tell them
To cast out this devil dark,
Then come follow after Joseph,
And to truth and reason hark.
Bid them quit their evil dreaming,

From a drawing by David H. Smith.

"THREE REMAINING PILLARS STILL."

Thus to mar my joy and peace,
And destroy me and my brother;
Bid these loud ones hold their peace.

"Then, thou HERALD, come and tell me
What the poor deceived ones say;
Tell me if they are not willing To help Zion on her way,
And not strive to clog her rudder,
Cut her ropes, or strain her mast;
But aboard and help cast anchor,
That she may outride the blast."

TEMPLE-BUILDING.

It is a well known fact to all who have made the subject of temple-building a particular study, that there was never a temple built which was acceptable to God excepting that he had first commanded it to be built.

We read in Doctrine and Covenants 107:12, the following: "I commanded Moses that he should build . . . a house in the land of promise . . . my holy house, which my people are always commanded to build unto my holy name." The advocates of the Utah church blindly interpret this to mean that they are commanded always to build temples, but to the writer it is very plain, as it states that Moses was commanded and in this same paragraph continues by saying that my people are always commanded to build temples, inferring that as Moses was commanded so should his people always be commanded.

The building of Solomon's temple was by command. (See 1 Chronicles 28:6-19, 1 Kings 7:4-13.) The Far West temple was suggested by revelation, April 26, 1838. The Nauvoo and Kirtland temples were commanded to be built, as was also the one yet to be built in Independence, with all particulars given in each case.

Millennial Star, volume 16, page 89, shows that the high council decided to wait upon the Lord for revelation concerning particulars in regard to the Far West temple. The Historical Record, volume 7, page 434, states that Joseph counseled that the building of the temple be postponed until the Lord should reveal that it was time to be commenced. Brigham Young states, Journal of Discourses, volume 1, pages 277, 278, also Millennial Star, volume 15, pages 391, 392, that the temples in Utah were none of them built by divine command. Deseret News, May 17, 1884, says Logan temple was contemplated and designed by Brigham Young, neither were the temples at Manti and St. George commanded to be built.

Orson Pratt stated December 10, 1876, "There has not yet been a temple built which God has accepted since the Saints left Ohio, nor will there be till a temple shall be erected in the land of Zion where God has designated. These temples here in the valleys have not been built by divine command." The above is taken from a tract entitled "Reply of Joseph Smith to L. O. Littlefield in refutation of plural marriages," and that these statements were made by Pratt was not refuted in the reply to same. Orson Pratt also said in 1848, "The house of God (temple) never was in any past age and never can be in any future age, built without EXPRESS COMMANDMENTS or NEW REVELATIONS being given to the people who build it. The house of God could not be built without new revelation to give the pattern of its various apartments."—Millennial Star, vol. 10, p. 264.

The above is in contrast to the position of the Utah church of to-day, so it is clearly to be seen that they have changed in many other ways than simply the accepting of false doctrines, for they have reversed almost everything in order to substantiate the teachings of Brigham Young, who stated that no new revelations were needed in order to build temples. (See Millennial Star, vol. 15, p. 391.)

According to the leaders of the Utah church none of their temples were built by divine command; and, in taking such a position, it is an admission on their part that the only temple of the Lord in existence to-day, built by divine command, is in the possession of the Reorganized Church, the Kirtland Temple, while the temples of Utah are like unto those built by the Israelites in the year 760 B. C., spoken of by Hosea, 8: 14, wherein he says: "For Israel hath forgotten his Maker, and buildeth temples."

LEAVES FROM LIFE.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF ELDER N. C. ENGE.

I was born September 27, 1850, at Enge, six miles from Grimstad, Norway, and brought up on a farm at the same place, situated a few rods from the fjord (bay), which abounded with fish of divers kind. My parents taught us children to serve the Lord, as they understood it, and from my earliest recollections I revered the house of worship, and those that served in it.

I remember at about the age of seven I was deeply impressed by what I had heard concerning the day of judgment, and at some time during a certain night I beheld an old man descending from the sky: his hair was white as snow and he was seated on a chair, and though my understanding of these things was, and is yet, very limited, I suppose he was coming to judgment, and of course I thought that the Ancient of Days was "God the Father." As he was slowly descending, I wondered, would he look at me, and instantly he turned and gazed at me with his piercing eye, and immediately every drop of blood seemed to leave my body, and I awoke: but the sensation experienced continued for some time. I have since thought that when the change from mortality to immortality takes place (among those who shall be permitted to tarry till then) the sensation during that "twinkle" may be.

From this on I pondered much on the mysteries of creation and the life to come. I was very prompt in attending the common school, where of course the religion according to Luther was taught. I advanced rapidly and was able to recite most of the catechism when six years old. Parents and teacher were proud of me. However, my associates, while playing and fishing, etc., were not the best class,—the higher class being the most immoral, the wealth of the parents covering their sins, the dollar being the minister's beacon-light. We were taught at school to read the New Testament, in which I took a great delight, also a so-called Bible History. I passed through my studies easily, passed in the preparatory for confirmation (?) and was confirmed (?). When filling my fourteenth year, renewing the covenant my sponsors had made for me at the font, while an infant, I solemnly promised (while pressing the minister's hand) that I would forsake the Devil and all his works. I assure you the service was very impressive and I was sincere in my promises and began to fulfill them immediately, in that I soon began to drift away from certain parts of the catechism and read only the New Testament. It was only a short time until something very important dawned on my vision.

I saw that I must go out in the world and support myself. My parents were poor. The majority of the young men went to sea, and there was no alternative but to be brave and be a la mode: though parting with father, mother, and sisters was next to impossible; mother weeping bitterly while arranging my scanty wardrobe, including a pair of seaboots and a suit of oilskins. I shipped as cabin-boy, a very desirable position with top pay, namely, four dollars per month and board. Letters from home were received in every port admonishing the tiny sailor boy not to go on shore, nor drink beer or whisky, but of course "one drink would not hurt any one," so the boy must not only drink a glass to show that he was a man, but he must treat in return and hear the applause of the sailors, when relating to those on board how courageous he was in that he could call for the drinks.

However, by the intervention of the invisible powers my desire was not for drinks, and though I was twice (as the sailors term it) three sheets in the wind, once on whisky, once on sweet wine, I never became a lover of either; though I drank wine now and then for a number of years, because I read that the Lord made wine out of water. But to continue: The sailor could not be on the lookout at night, or pace the deck the long and dreary night watches, especially in rough weather, unless he must have something to cheer him up, so of course he must have a smoke. When he is steering the ship the officer will not allow him to smoke, but he may bite a big chunk off the plug—the minute he takes hold of the wheel, so that the mate or captain now can trust the ship in the hands of the great salt who now chews and turns the quid in his mouth, watching the compass and the ship's head (bow).

Now, brethren, I suppose you do not like to mention your bad habits in an autobiography to be read by all men. Ah, you say, I did not indulge. And so you had plain sailing all your life, did you? Well, then, you did not have much to overcome along that line; but I wonder if you did not whirl around with some damsel at some party; if you did not attend public dances.

Can you put a rattlesnake in your bosom without danger? Maybe some Latter Day Saint elder can. I was not one at that time, and was bitten several times. I continued in this sort of a so-called decent way, not in open violation of law, not a libertine, not a night Rambler. Oh, no! but just a decent Christian hypocrite. During this time I made three trips to India in sailing vessels, around the Cape of Good Hope. The last trip I made as second officer, having passed the board as navigator, and during stormy weather I often knelt by the rail of the ship implored the Lord to let the threatening squall pass by. There was no hypocrisy then, I assure you, and the Lord granted my request several times. Also made two trips in a steamship through the Suez Canal and the Red Sea, passing Mount Sinai a few miles distant. When looking at that mountain so near by, the Sandy Desert, the caravans of camels crossing the same, the Bible story of these surroundings was brought vividly to my memory, and I began to reflect on my past career, and resolutions of repentance were repeatedly made.

I made several voyages up the Mediterranean. I walked round the Island of Malta. I noted the only sandy bay on the island where a vessel could possibly drift in without being broken in a thousand pieces on the craggy rocks lining the whole coast,—the little bay where Bro. Paul landed. I also steamed up the Archipelago to Smyrna. There was but one street left of the old town; the rest of the city having been destroyed by earthquake and fire. We brought two hundred and fifty sheep from that place to Constantinople. There were two shepherds accompanying the sheep; age, dress, and herding peculiarities precisely like those referred to in the Holy Scripture; all this produced a great longing in me to be a different man. Returning from the Black Sea, we passed the walls of Troy and out through the Grecian Isles into the Mediterranean Sea.

On a certain Easter Sunday, while wondering why I could not accumulate any of this world's goods, a voice seemed to say, "Seek first the kingdom of God and its righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto thee." From that time I began in earnest, as we say, to seek the Lord. My present wife was then a girl, and was in service in Granville Park, Lewisham, the suburb of London, England. We had been acquainted then about six years, so upon agreement set sail for Norway, where we were later married in the Lutheran church. I shipped again as chief mate, and made a trip to Scotland, where I heard an evangelist (Murry) from Glasgow. He represented the assembly of believers. I believed, and was immersed at Bonnes in a bathtub, but the minister stood on the outside. I always thought when I returned to Norway that something was wrong with that baptism; however, I felt that I was pleasing in the sight of God.

A good deal was said at that time among the people in Norway about being born again. It was a byword, Are you crazy? Are you born again? It now became my duty to separate from the state church, so accordingly I went to the minister and after some palavering had my name erased from the books. This was in my thirty-fourth year. The next spring wife and I shipped for America; our baby boy, Axel, then being six months old. We dedicated him to the service of the Lord. When arriving in Wisconsin, I united with the Mission Baptists. My wife later in the summer was baptized in the Angally River. I studied the Bible and soon found out that the Baptists did not practice the laying on of hands, so at a business-meeting in 1889 I made the motion to have that ordinance added to our creed. A heated discussion followed, but it was finally resolved that hands should be laid on those baptized; but it was never practiced while I was there.

In the spring of 1900, we came West to Tacoma. By this time I had about made up my mind that I need not belong to any church to be saved; but reading in Revelation 1:20 that churches were candlesticks, I thought that if I was a light I must be on a candlestick, so I joined the Baptist Church again; but when I found, after reasoning with the minister, that he would not practice the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost, I began to secede. A Christian Alliance minister was then recruiting missionaries for Japan. A young woman appointed, said she would like to have me baptize her. I consented and incurred by this act the displeasure of the minister, because I had not been ordained by him. A meeting was called and an attempt was made to disfranchise me, but my question in regard to authority puzzled them. Shortly afterward, I baptized a Roman Catholic, a French lady, who was our neighbor. This caused another extra business-meeting. Nothing wrong could be proved, however; but I withdrew from that body and began preaching on my own responsibility, taking for my foundation Hebrews 6:1, 2. I know now that I was then led by the Spirit of the Master to that passage of scripture, though I was ignorant in regard to the authority of the priesthood. I knew that a change had taken place in my heart; but when I read about being born of the water and of the Spirit, I was not satisfied; and right here, I shall attempt to show where the mistake is often made by many honest-hearted souls in that they imagine that the change of heart is the new birth, when in fact it is but a conception of the truth, which is the Word, as in the case of the immaculate conception. The word, spoken by the angel to Mary, in conjunction with the power of the Holy Ghost caused the conception to take place, so in like manner when the gospel, the glad tidings about the Word (Christ) is spoken to now, accompanied by the overshadowing power of the Holy Spirit and man, like Mary, submissively, gladly receiving the message, a conception takes place of the new creature that shall be born of water and the Spirit. How wonderful! The Word made flesh. Christ in us the hope of Glory. However, Apollos like, I was partly instructed in the way of the Lord, and with the light I had, made many trips to Eatonville and Muck Creek, walking many miles, calling sinners to repentance. Many came to hear, and there are people living there to-day who can testify that I preached the true principles of the gospel in order as they are recorded. Bro. Duncan stated that I was preaching the Latter Day Saint doctrine, though I knew of no such church, or any one who preached the fundamental principles in rotation. As aforesaid, I believed I had a right to preach, but told the people I did not think I had authority to lay hands on the sick or on those baptized.

During this time, I had met Bro. James Puckett, then of Lake Park. I heard him lecture, and his plain, forcible arguments along certain lines convinced me in a measure that my position was wrong. I read the Book of Mormon and believed every word of it. I brought Bro. Puckett out with me to Eatonville and introduced him as a man who knew more about the laying on of hands than I did, and that I was going to quit preaching until I had investigated this, to me, new light. Shortly after I was baptized by Bro. Puckett and when he led me into the water and said, "Now, Bro. Enge, you will be baptized by one having authority," he looked like an angel from heaven. Peace came to my soul, and I waited some time for an elder to confirm me. In due time Bro. John Davis arrived at Brookdale, where we lived; and, though a stranger, it seemed that I had known him before. I was confirmed shortly afterwards at Lake Park. My wife was baptized by him, and Lilly and Noble, our youngest children, were blessed. I was ordained a priest the same day. I began to utter monosyllables and gradually developed so I could present the work in part. I had wonderful assistance of the Spirit of God. There was no assembly of the Saints in the neighborhood, so we had no manifestation of the gifts; at least if we had, we did not understand them, though a new light in the understanding was surely evident.

Next year, I was ordained an elder by Brn. J. C. Clapp and John Davis. I labored and preached in the state of Washington as circumstances would permit, opening up new places, etc. Orting should be mentioned here, where several were brought into the church by Brn. Davis and Enge. While living in this town my wife, children, and I were insulted every time any of us walked the streets. A man entered the Christian church one evening with a rope intending to hang Davis and Enge. I gave him a tract while he was sitting in the church, and some so-called ruffians told him when he came out that if he attempted to harm us he would swing to a certain tree. We stayed in the town until the spring, when we moved east of the mountains to Liberty, Kittitas County, Washington. While here I became despondent because, though I, by the advice of the missionaries, applied through them for a mission, I was not appointed, hence began to doubt my call to the priesthood, and while engaged in prayer in the woods one day a voice seemed to speak to me these words, "Write to the Prophet and ask him to intercede for you." Accordingly I wrote these words, "Please ask the Lord to reveal to you if I am worthy to be his messenger." In due time this was received and mailed to me, "The Spirit saith, thy work is accepted in righteousness, and thou art worthy to preach the gospel, and to warn men to flee from the wrath to come; be faithful; of a pure mind; thy heart set to do righteously and thy work is accepted of me."

At this I took new courage. Attended General Conference at Lamoni, in 1900, where, for the first time, heard the gift of prophecy in the person of Sr. Brewster, of West Virginia, and I was completely enveloped in the Spirit. A couple of days later, in prayer-meeting, the spirit of prayer was with me, though in few words, and as I ceased praying this same sister prophesied again, and she told me afterwards that as soon as I had prayed, the Spirit told her to deliver the message.

I was appointed that year on a mission to Scandinavia; but as I have forwarded notes some time ago to the Historian on the Scandinavian Mission, I shall omit that part, but will say that when I was ordained to the eldership, it was said that I should be ordained again and again. One ordination has taken place, and I am trying to fill that office as best I can.

Now to the young men and maidens in the church, of my mistakes and follies take warning. Shun evil in all its appearances; put on the whole armor of God. Yield not to temptation; be sober, be pure. To the brethren of the ministry, you older ones: we are going down hill; the conflict is getting more difficult; the battle fiercer, but the laurels are in sight. Let us stand shoulder to shoulder, that we may conquer the enemy without and enter the city.

In bonds,

N. C. ENGE.

THE POWER OF THE GOSPEL.

The article of a brother which we find on page 149 of the HERALD of recent date contains that which we believe it would be well for all of us to consider.

We read in the Scriptures: "His divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue."

Some of these "things" we not only hear in words of instruction and wholesome admonition by the ministry in the sacred desk, but also read them in tracts and official writings, and in the many articles, treatises, and discussions sent broadcast by the brethren and sisters throughout the church; and all these are a power for good.

As we read in Romans 13: 1: "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power in the church but of God; the powers that be are ordained of God," we should ponder well the thoughts expressed.

Long experience and close observation have no doubt revealed to many of us the various manifestations of these higher powers, and we have at some period of our spiritual career not only felt great peace and comfort of mind and heart, but at times also have had to suffer because of the word of reproof, when we have been slothful and disobedient in regard to keeping the divine command.

We are not surprised at the stress which our brother places upon the work of the priests and teachers, and especially the sacred responsibilities of those who have been called to preside over the assemblies of the Saints.

Just for a moment consider, for instance, in connection with other evils existing, how alert and bent on strife and division is the adversary to prompt to tearing asunder the sacred ties that have for years perhaps bound the members of families together,—husbands to leave their firesides that have been a refuge and stay amid the vicissitudes of life, and wives long cherished to sue for divorce from the fathers of their children: and all this unrest and trouble the wicked one brings about, that he may thwart the purposes for which the divine powers have been ordained and placed in the church.

Alma, in chapter 9, paragraph 9, says that they that will harden their hearts, to them is given the lesser portion of the word until they know nothing concerning his mysteries, and then they are taken captive by the Devil, and led by his will down to destruction.

But man is not left to himself without guidance in his wanderings from God; for, throughout the sacred records, the ministers of the word have pointed out the sins and pitfalls into which his unwary feet are liable to be decoyed. And this is the reason why, while those endowed with power from above labor and intercede for the church, we are commanded to sustain them by our faith and prayers, that through them we may be advanced and the work prospered and perfected.

The faithful apostle prayed to the Father that he would grant the church to be strengthened with might by his spirit in the inner man,—“that Christ may dwell in your hearts,” “that ye . . . may be able to comprehend . . . what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height,” “and to know the love of Christ, . . . that ye might be filled with all the fullness of God.” What a wonderful prayer was that!

Could that blessing be confirmed in us, the Saints might indeed know for themselves what are the mysteries of the kingdom, and be prepared, through faith and good works, for the redemption of Zion.

For all the evils and weaknesses of man, such as desires for glittering and vain pleasures, gaudy plumage, rich and costly apparel, and for the sins of greediness, covetousness, complainings, malice, envyings, divisions, contentions, backbiting, and all the rest, including separations and divorce, an excellent word of counsel, familiar to all of us, is given, and may be as profitable to us as it was to the Saints at Colosse; “Put on the new man which is renewed in knowledge;” “if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual restore such a one in the spirit of meekness;” “bear ye one another’s burdens.” And again one which applies not only in our intercourse with each other as Saints, and as associates in business, but also as members of families and in our homes: “Put on bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering, forbearing one another; put on charity,” “let the peace of God rule in your hearts, and be ye thankful.”

For the good of all, President, priest, teacher, and lay-member, might be reiterated the words, “Warn them that are unruly, comfort the feeble-minded, support the weak, be patient toward all men, doing nothing by partiality.”

Such words of admonition as these appeal to us as being inspired by the spirit of love, and thus by the strengthening of our minds through the study of the Scripture, with intent to comprehend, in our lives may be displayed, to the edification of all, the power of God.

These precious “things,” written for our profit, call forth the deepest gratitude of our hearts, and speak to us from the unforgotten past of a loving Providence, acting in every age and clime in behalf of his children.

Much is revealed to each one of us by which we can make an application of every true principle; and unless we who have received of the gospel fullness consecrate our time and talent to the establishing of righteousness, we need not think to accomplish much in the way of advancing the work of the latter days, or of helping to convert those who are in darkness, or who are honestly seeking for light.

We believe that our very best efforts must be put forth, if we would be clothed with power from on high; and, by heeding the promptings of the Spirit, our minds will be drawn toward God in prayer, and to do good will be the aim of life.

May our minds so broaden that we shall comprehend more fully His love toward all mankind, in sending His only begotten Son to redeem the world by His mighty power, to raise the fallen, set at liberty the captives, and bring again peace and happiness to earth renewed.

And let us do our part well, and so be colaborers with Him in spreading the good news, in disseminating the light of the fullness of the gospel, that all the honest in heart may be saved in His kingdom.

A FEW IMPORTANT THOUGHTS TO REMEMBER ABOUT THE GOSPEL OF JESUS CHRIST.

AN APPEAL TO THOSE WHO ARE LOSING THEIR FIRST LOVE.

First, it is the power of God, as manifest in the human life, to bring it back to himself from a condition of sin, selfishness, and sorrow, to that of purity, friendship, and communion; and the promise has been made, that to as many as would receive Christ, to them gave he power to become the sons of God. This message is so divine, and so assuring, that its results are made manifest by the use of words found in 2 Corinthians 5:17: "Therefore, if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new."

Let us stop long enough to look at these words, and to think about them just a little at least; because I am reminded of what I heard several years ago about American people: "They read too much and think too little."

And just at this point I want to use a statement made by another, which has so much meaning for most of us living in America, whether we were born here or not. For we, likewise, have become Americanized, so that, too often we find ourselves so anxious to get through our reading matter, that it would be to our disadvantage should we be questioned as to the contents of our reading; for we could not be able to repeat a very great portion. I desire a quotation I shall use to be of service, because it has given me some concern, and aroused my faculties to be more careful, and less hasty along this line:

"Get into the habit of looking intently at words, and assuring yourself of their meaning, syllable by syllable, nay, letter by letter. You might read all the books in the British Museum, if you could live long enough, and remain an utterly illiterate, uneducated person, but if you will read ten pages of a good book, letter by letter, that is to say with real accuracy, you are for evermore in some measure an educated person."

We know of no better book than the Bible to make the first application upon, because in this book there are to be found letters from the great God to his many children, some of whom have become so distantly related they could not receive him into their presence. So he has still been mindful of them and sent them word by his servants. And if any of us have become so unmindful of the contents of these letters, that we do not find the nourishing qualities in them, as when we were in our first love, we had better remember the first principles of our Father's messages, and apply them to the spiritual side of our life, and look intently at his words to us, until we begin to realize their import.

How is it, brother or sister? Can you claim the fulfillment of the statement: "Old things are passed away, and all things are become new." Do we feel that we are new creatures in the same sense that we have at any time in the service of Christ? If not, look intently at the words found in the margin of 2 Corinthians 5:17: "And let him be a new creature," and you will find the influences returning that you so much enjoyed when you were in your first love. And should the dust have collected on that copy of the Inspired Version of the Scriptures, that you at one time read with so much pleasure, take it down from that shelf, or from its place, you have almost forgotten where you placed it last, turn to 2 Corinthians 5:16, just the verse preceding the statement about the new creature, and you will find these words that you have been neglecting, perhaps. Look intently at them, until you know of their meaning; apply the same rule to your life that brought so much into your soul, that you felt that the angels of God were ministering spirits unto you (see Hebrews 1:7-14), and you will realize again they are making their visits to your home; that you have not allowed them to do so for some time. And if you have the name of Latter Day Saint, earnestly contend for the faith that was delivered unto them (see Jude 3; Revelation 14:6, 7), then mark that passage in your Bible (Inspired Translation); but lest you forget, let us read it over now: "Wherefore, henceforth live we no more after the flesh; yea, though we once lived after the flesh, yet since we have known Christ, now henceforth live we no more after the flesh."—2 Corinthians 5:16, Inspired Translation.

And, after reading this with that attention referred to, turn to another of our Father's letters, Romans 8:1, 2, and read these words: "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death." Do not you remember the words of our Savior, recorded in John 10:10, that he came that we might have that more abundant life? Do not you remember, when you were enjoying the blessings of Jesus and his gospel, it was because you were worshiping our Father in spirit and in truth? Why, you just used to ask him for his Spirit to help you govern your tongue, so that you might realize what it is to experience the development of the soul into greater perfection, because you had read in one of these heavenly letters, "If any man [or if any woman] offend not in word, the same is . . . perfect . . . and able also to bridle the whole body."—James 3:2. Yes, this is a good letter of instruction. We need to spend some time practicing on this part, as this ingredient will help us much to have control of all our faculties. We will then be able to sing again (because of feeling what we sing) that number 258, that has not been used while walking through the valley, or in the wilderness; but with a little practice we will soon learn the tune again:

"The Spirit of God like a fire is burning;
The latter-day glory begins to come forth;
The visions and blessings of old are returning,
The angels are coming to visit the earth."

The angels will hear you, and join in the chorus:

"We'll sing and we'll shout with the armies of heaven:
Hosanna, hosanna to God and the Lamb!
Let glory to them in the highest be given,
Henceforth and for ever: Amen and amen."

After realizing how nicely the heavenly blessings blend your soul with heavenly things, you will want to prepare the different ingredients of the gospel of power that the elders will realize that you have been paying some attention to the lessons and messages of love they imparted the last time they were among you, and will be much encouraged by the marked progress you have made.

But before laying the "good book" aside, containing directions to heaven, and how to commence to lay up a store of knowledge of what it will "be over there," and of sending the proper materials to our Savior for the mansion you are working for now, let us read again by going to the fourteenth and fifteenth verses of 2 Corinthians, chapter 5, and you will not read that Jesus did it all, your part and his both; but you will read of what assistance you will receive when performing the part he outlined for you to do: "For the love of Christ constraineth us"—to properly judge of his death for us all, that we might learn to live from now on, not a selfish, unfeeling, carnal life that leaves him out of our considerations, but from "henceforth" we may learn to live more constantly and consistently the life we promised to live, when we made the covenant with God to serve him according to the example of his well beloved Son, and not overlook the direction he has given, because we might experience some of the passage to be a little dark, and have to have sufficient oil to replenish our lamps. And we do not want to be compelled to join the wrong company, because we run short of light. And that which furnishes the light—yes, you have not altogether forgotten the forepart of Matthew 25:1-13. You may have just time enough left, now, if you get right after that oil; for you certainly will not be able to find the way without it. And you, perhaps, do not realize, at present, and for some time passed, that others have been more concerned about your spiritual welfare than you have been yourself. And they have been praying for you night and day, very earnestly, that they might see your face over there, and are desiring that you would realize what is lacking in your faith, and receive the heavenly power, and become more perfect than you now are. (See 1 Thessalonians 3:10. Yes, better read verses 11-13, also, if you do not forget.) But lest you forget some things, let me remind you, that "the gospel" is a whole, made up of parts; and sometimes, because we have not looked upon some of those parts with that intensity and earnestness that we should, our memory was not so deeply impressed as to keep it in mind very long. We all know by heart (I should say head) the first principles of the gospel; but we do not even lay them to heart; perhaps they did not pass the head, because they were arrested and discharged before they reached the heart. This occurs with some people, sorry to say. If they were sorry enough, themselves, after a godly sort, they would repent and believe the gospel. Then there is another class who believe, or have at one time believed the first principles of the gospel, and after obeying the part for them to perform they considered their work all done, and were going to take it easy. Well, you know what becomes of these easy Saints. They become like easy Methodists or some other easy people. They cling to the form of godliness, and often manifest the power of Satan. And they do not notice any difference. And, to be sure, nobody else notices any difference in their life since they came inside the fold. They do not know what it means to have old things pass away, and have new things take their place. They have never given any time for new things; they just held so tightly to the old that the power of Satan never loosed his hold upon them.

Yes, we have another type of Saints (by name), the kind who allow the gospel to reach their hearts, do something and get something in return. They realize the gospel is a divine system; that God is in that system, because he established and ordained this gospel of his to accomplish just that which it was ordained to do, "bring his wayward children back to him from that thief who entered Eden, who lied, stole, killed, and destroyed (see John 10:10), and who also made a disruption in heaven, and led a number with him before coming here,—the real sheep, who hear the shepherd's voice. They can realize the gospel is a whole, made up of parts; and, though they learned some of the parts before entering the door, they have kept right on going to the same school which taught them the first principles of the gospel, and they pass from one grade to another. As they develop in learning and practice, which makes character, they never find any place or any time to stop the school of learning and the helps furnished for developing. They keep right on learning to add to their faith, and for each addition they make, according to this heavenly schooling, the head of this school multiplies to them of the things from heaven's store, and they are never heard complaining about all they have to give up. They have learned that what they have given up they could not take into the next world with them, so they let them go for other things of greater importance; and thus, as they advance, they realize, more and more (see 1 Thessalonians 4: 4) this sealing power (see Ephesians 1: 13, 14), and also the powers and blessings of the world to come (see Hebrews 6: 4, 5). Starting on the right foundation (see 1 Corinthians 3: 11-13; Matthew 7: 24-27), they are not easily moved (see Ephesians 4: 13, 14), but are constantly adding to their faith, in order to fill out the work allotted to the Saints of God; their part made known and learned from time to time (see John 14: 26; 15: 26; 16: 8, 13), so that from the time their confirmation was performed until the resurrection, they have been pressing upward, leaving what parts of the gospel remained for them to fill out between confirmation and eternal judgment, and their spiritual building, which is being erected upon this firm foundation, becomes more and more developed and beautified; and, as fast as they learn in one grade, they pass to the higher, always filling out that which is lacking (see 1 Thessalonians 3: 10); and when they see some who have only made profession, and not manifested the power, they realize the truth of the Savior's words, that some seed fell on stony ground, or among thorns. (See Matthew 13: 5-7, 20-22.)

So the promise made to those who receive Christ and his gospel becomes real to them, because they receive the power. (See John 1: 11.) They change the course of their lives, because God is working in them, and they are working out Philippians 2: 12, 13.

Encroachments upon the rights of free speech and free assemblage which we have looked upon with indifference because they were for opinions which to us seemed false or hateful, we have suddenly found applied to ourselves. Here is repeated again for us the warning of which all the histories of liberty are but the record. The outposts of our rights are to be found in the maintenance of the rights of the least of our brethren. The more odious they, the more we need to keep our lamp of vigilance trimmed and burning for their defense. It is through the weak gate of their uncared for liberty that the despot will steal upon us.—Henry D. Lloyd.

The Golden Rule.

Comrade, when despair enwrapped you
Did a lance-thrust from some tongue
Wound afresh your soul, and leave you
Weaker where it stung?

Just a word—but by its power
Measure what your words may do—
Spare your fellow man in sorrow
Arrows barbed by you.

Comrade when despair enwrapped you
Did a swift and friendly hand
Warmly clasp your own and bring you
Courage at command?

Just a touch—but by its power
Took you not fresh wish to live?
Measure, then, by that sweet pressure
What your hand may give.

Pictures as Educators.

Dear Sister Frances: I have been reading in the papers of a crusade being made in some of the towns and cities against moving-picture shows, where children patronize them. At first, because of the danger from fire in the small theaters, in which such exhibitions take place. But on investigation it was declared that the danger to morals was far worse than the loss of life from fire. Since then the agitation has been going on. We have one here in our town, but I can not speak of it from personal knowledge, not having attended it in the year that it has been located here. A sister told me that she received a complimentary ticket and went. The principal picture was of a little girl and a pig dancing together, and she did not feel edified. I suppose in this careless age, that would not be regarded as immoral. When we think of the lasting nature of early impressions, it is wonderful how indifferent parents are to the dangers besetting their children in the pictures that they see. Not in the show alone; but in the Sunday papers and some of the illustrated magazines.

I have seen children artistically inclined trying to draw bacchanalian pictures from the Sunday papers, and have wondered that their artistic taste was not better directed, and what the result to the moral nature of the youthful artist. Why not exclude these unseemly things from the home, and provide the children with proper models, such as will cultivate love for the beautiful, and give them elevated ideals?

Do we appreciate the power that there is in pictures as educators? They speak to the eye and to the understanding far more quickly than a printed page. I saw a little four-year-old boy much interested in an illustrated catalogue of machinery. He could tell the uses of the various parts, how the wheels, the cylinders, and the pistons worked.

I have seen others equally interested in seed catalogues, the names and nature of the various fruits and vegetables therein described; and I have thought, oh, if all the illustrations which the children see were such as would give them lessons of useful information!

There are books of ornithology, which is an instructive and fascinating study. There are books on forestry; than which I do not know of anything in nature more useful or entertaining. With the world so full of all that is beautiful and instructive in literature and art, easily obtainable, costing no more than the expense of a daily paper, why should the children be left to the low and degrading?

I was passing a news-stand one day and saw two small boys examining the pictures in some cheap looking literary papers which are also half full of advertising of things that such children are far too young to know about; which ought not to be allowed even for older ones. Medical advertisements, cigarettes, and other unnameable things. Stories of encounters with brigands, profusely illustrated with pistols and knives; and here I know that children spend many a penny. I was told that the moving picture show gave an illustration of the Thaw trial, and was crowded with women and children.

I do hope things are not so bad with the Saints as we know is the case with the world; but are even Saints as guarded and careful in these matters as should be expected of those who are placed as a light to the world? and who will have to answer for the children in their care.

A mother said to me: "We do not take the Sunday paper, but our next neighbor does, and our children see them there; we can not help the evil in our neighbor's house, nor prevent our children from seeing and hearing of them. That is very true. But by providing your children with the instructive and elevating, and refusing to countenance the others, you will not only be an influence towards the uplifting in your own family, but that better influence will go out to your neighbor; and who can say that your neighbor's children will not likewise be benefited? By educating the children's tastes and discernment, we fortify them against the low and degrading.

I remember, when the writer was about five years old. Walking with my mother along the public road, we came upon a deck of playing-cards. Not knowing what they were, I was about to pick them up, when mother exclaimed, "Don't touch them! They are awful wicked things; don't you ever touch them!" It was long before I understood how they were wicked; but I grew up with a horror of them that sticks yet. We seldom realize the force of early impressions.

ELEANOR.

Little Things in Religious Life.

Little words, not eloquent speeches or sermons; little deeds, not miracles nor battles, nor one great act or mighty martyrdom, make up the true Christian life. The little constant sunbeam, not the lightning; the waters of Siloam, "that go softly" in their meek mission of refreshment, not "the waters of the river great and mighty," rushing down in torrent noise and force, are the true symbols of a holy life. The avoidance of little evils, little sins, little inconsistencies, little weaknesses, little follies, little indiscretions and imprudencies, little foibles, little indulgencies of self and of the flesh, little acts of indolence or indecision, or slovenliness or cowardice, little equivocations or aberrations from high integrity, little bits of worldliness and gayety, little indifferences to the feelings or wishes of others, little outbreaks of temper and crossness, or selfishness or vanity; the avoidance of such little things as these goes far to make up at least the negative beauty of a holy life. And then attention to the little duties of the day and hour, in public transactions, or private dealings or family arrangements; to the little words and tunes; little benevolences or forbearances, or tenderness; little self-denials, self-restraints and self-thoughtfulness; little plans of quiet kindness and thoughtful consideration for others; punctuality and method and true aim, in the ordering of each day;—these are the active developments of holy life, the rich and divine mosaics of which it is composed. What makes yon green hill so beautiful? Not the outstanding peak or stately elm, but the bright sward which clothes its slopes, composed of innumerable blades of grass. It is of small things that a great life is made up; and he who will acknowledge no life as great save that which is built up of great things, will find little in Bible characters to admire or copy.—Selected.

Letter Department

DAYTON, Nevada, March 17, 1908.

Editors Herald: As the missionaries pass to go to the General Conference, will one of them kindly call on me in Dayton. I have been sick for eight years, and am here alone. The SAINTS' HERALD is a great comfort to me, as we have no meeting here of our church; have not for several years. I think some good could be done if one of them would stop over.

A sister in Christ,

MRS. ANNIE ROBERTS.

By MRS. L. D. COOPER.

BEMIDJI, Minnesota, March 16, 1908.

Editors Herald: Please say to our inquiring friends that our address is Bemidji, Minnesota, R. F. D. 1.

We are living in a two-story log house, in a heavy thicket of jack-pine trees, that seem to vie with each other in climbing heavenward. We are staying with our granddaughter and her husband, Lela and Guy Buell, and are watching their progress in blocking out a farm; doing what little we can, and adding suggestions along the line of clearing up a timbered farm.

Guy and Lela have a little sprig of intelligence committed to their trust that is a great comfort to us all.

We are holding preaching-services quite regularly, and improving every opportunity to spread the good news contained in the restored gospel; and, if jack-pine timber could talk, you might hear of a Religio being held at our house every Friday eve, also a prayer-service quite often on Sundays at half past two in the afternoon.

The coldest weather of the season, as indicated, is fifty-two degrees below zero; yet we do not feel it as we used to zero weather at Lamoni, Iowa.

We are living on the grand divide; the waters north of us flow into Hudson Bay, south of us into the Gulf of Mexico, via Mississippi River.

Would be pleased to hear from our friends that know not our address.

HENRY C. SMITH.

BERRYDALE, Florida, March 20, 1908.

Editors Herald: My wife and self left Memphis, Tennessee, the last of June, 1907, coming down the Mississippi River by boat as far as Vicksburg. From there by train via Jackson and Gulfport, Mississippi, to the Mobile reunion. We had decided to enjoy the sensations of "ye missionary" life for a month or two, by this means to recuperate from nervousness brought on by long service in the telegraph office.

From the reunion we went to Mobile, Bay Minette, and Pollard, Alabama, and from there into the Florida District. Here we proposed to labor until the McKenzie reunion, and from there go back to work. But the seed of love for these Florida Saints got tangled up in our anatomy somehow, and drew us back among them. When we did decide to leave, the money panic was at its worst, so we have spent the entire conference year in the field here, self-supporting. We expect to go back to the key directly after General Conference; but even then we hope to spend some time during the coming year in this field.

During the time spent here, I have baptized seven. Though doing all the preaching I could, I have spent more time in the Sunday-school work. Have organized three local schools: Pleasant View, Calhoun, and, very recently, one near Pensacola to be known as the Escambia Sunday-school. This is the first school ever organized in Escambia County, Florida, so far as I know. Have also organized one district association, with Bro. E. N. McCall, president; J. S. McCall, secretary. Bro. E. N. McCall is a bright, energetic young man, and we believe the Sunday-school work will prosper under his care. I have also urged the study of the normal lesson course. Quite a number have taken it up. Besides this, I have organized one Religio.

There are a goodly number of young people in the district, who only need training to make effective workers.

The district has petitioned conference to send a presiding elder to preside over them. I hope this can be done, and believe it will pay in time.

In all my labors, my wife, who can play and sing, has been a great help to me.

The weather here, during March, has been beautiful. The farmer is busy plowing and planting. Peach-trees are about done blooming, and peaches are forming. The dogwood-tree is in blossom, grass and trees green, flowers in bloom, and the thermometer registering from seventy to eighty above. In Pensacola, recently, we saw men in light midsummer suits and straw hats. It gives us the shivers sometimes to think of starting north this season of the year, and are only induced to do it by reading such items as, "The weather was as warm as summer."

Yours in bonds,

C. J. CLARK.

DEER ISLE, Maine, March 14, 1908.

Editors Herald: As the time for General Conference draws nigh, our minds turn in that direction. Owing to the great distance and consequent outlay of heavy expense, I have concluded to deny myself the privilege of attending this year. It has been my privilege to attend seven General Conferences, and I have greatly enjoyed the association of my collaborators and friends there.

Some have regarded the General Conference as a great means of spiritual education, and to that I cheerfully agree; however, as I have listened to the discussion of several so-called great questions, I have regretted to note the questionable attitude on the part of some of the men in high authority in the church, to whom we younger men of the ministry have the right to look for a model in deportment and righteousness of example. I surely have witnessed several exhibitions wherein "my servants have been harsh one with another." And while some have said that such conduct was educating, I never have regarded it in that light; I am not of that disposition that I can fight one moment and be ready to pray the next. I consider that a man is guided by some spirit other than the Spirit of God when he weaves into his argument, personal reflections, bitter resentment, wounding sarcasm, and display of temper. I have observed that some of our most competent men—profound thinkers and excellent preachers are they—choose the quiet, peaceful, modest attitude; their voices are not heard on these ponderous questions. They listen and observe. "Speech is silver but silence is gold." Of course there is a time to speak. Proper, intelligent discussion is delightful; and some who feel it their duty to display their wisdom on every question should be "slow to speak," that an opportunity for others may be had. That opportunity should not be taken as an occasion for vindictive assault; but rather that the assembly may be enlightened by what is said.

From a periodical which comes regularly to my desk I note some pointed remarks on the question of ministers' salaries. I herewith insert a few extracts.

"The beauties of sacrifice appear to best advantage when properly distributed—to the clergy and laity 'share and share alike.'

"No honest minister wants to live better than his people. The true servant-spirited man will be very ready to live in a shack—in the midst of a settlement of shacks. But living in a shack and preaching for a people who live in mansions is a different proposition, and it is no wonder that ministers revolt at it. There is no other hardship equal to the hardship of constant unfavorable comparison with your neighbors, and since it is an utterly needless hardship, and a useless one to boot, the church which imposes it on its preacher convicts itself of stone-heartedness and no imagination."

"It isn't safe to assume that if everything wasn't going well at the manse, you'd have heard of it. If your preacher is the right kind, you won't hear of it. If his wife is the right kind also, there's double chance against your hearing of it. They're not going to whine. The only way you'll find out is to go down to the manse with your very best tact worn next your heart, and insist on knowing.

"And you ought to go. If the salary isn't sufficient to make the minister and his family as comfortable as the average comfort of your community, then there's clearly something to be done about it. Not one tenth of one per cent of the Protestant congregations of the United States are actually paying their pastors all that they could pay; this is a guess but it's a safe one. Your congregation can raise the salary, and it will, rather than let the pastor's family feel privation.

"Only you as the 'leading elder' or the 'principal trustee' or the 'best-known deacon' will have to find out the facts and let the congregation know—and put down the first increase."

"Set down what it costs you to keep your family a year—if you are a farmer, be sure you add the grocery price of what you eat of your own raising. Count in what you give away—and double it, for the preacher has more requests, and it's likely he's more generous than you.

"Put down a little extra for clothing, because you know you couldn't bear to see him wear in the pulpit a coat as scuffed as serves for you in a pinch. Allow him $50 for new books; the reason he was so dull last Sunday was probably because he hasn't been able to afford a fresh book to read for six months. Add as much more for expenses to a convention or two; you wonder why he doesn't keep up with the times, but he hardly ever gets away anywhere where he can catch step with the times. Finally, grant an allowance for insurance and the rainy day."

In this connection I also wish to call attention to the table of "Religious Statistics for 1907," compiled by Doctor H. K. Carroll, and published in Literary Digest for February 8, 1908. In this table we note how the various churches are divided and sub-divided into numerous distinct organizations. For instance we note that there are six kinds of Adventists, fourteen kinds of Baptists, nine kinds of Catholics, twenty-three kinds of Lutherans, seventeen kinds of Methodists, twelve kinds of Presbyterians, and two kinds of Latter Day Saints.

The gospel leaven in this section of the country is moving along in about the usual manner, so far as I am able to discern. If the soldiers of the cross would only line up at duty's call, it does seem to me the enemy would have less advantage. It is rather difficult to represent the exact spiritual condition of a branch or district; for, like the weather report, it is constantly changing. It should be changing for the better; but oftentimes it is to the reverse. Some of our members may be in the front ranks at this writing; and, ere this appears in print, may be mad, offended, or choose to be negligent of duty, and hence the change in spiritual condition. Jesus was "ever the same"—unchangeable in his purpose to do the will of God, and why can not we imitate him? He surely does not approve of the conduct of those who set their light on the candlestick for a time, and then for any foolish reason hide it under the bushel for a time. This unsteadiness in the attitude of many of the Saints weakens our influence with people of the world. If we can not agree with each other, or if our feelings are wounded, we should try to manifest the example of the Master, forbearing and forgiving our brethren; and not for any reason should we hesitate in our loyalty to God and his service. My time has been occupied this winter in holding regular services at Stonington, Mountainville, and Little Deer Isle, with an occasional service at North Deer Isle. I have felt that my services were appreciated, and profitable to some; and with others I notice the attitude of indifference. The movement at Little Deer Isle, to erect a new church building, is still under way. We are anxious to see this movement prove successful, as a more suitable meeting place is so badly needed there. It will surely result in a better representation of our church work in this vicinity.

TULSA, Oklahoma, March 25, 1908.

Editors Herald: As it is nearing conference time, and the elders will be passing to and from Independence, I would like to call their attention to this place. I shall never feel satisfied until this town has had a thorough trial of hearing the gospel in its fullness. Besides, I want to warn my neighbors. Bro. J. D. Erwin was here two days and preached twice in my house. Some of the neighbors seemed interested, and some of my boarders were very anxious to have him stay longer. If some of the elders will come here and open up the work, I will furnish them something to eat, if it takes all summer. This is quite a large place, and I believe there are honest people here; and I have never failed to let them know my belief, and many of my boarders have read our papers and books. My door is open to any of our people. I live on the corner of North Denver and Fourth Streets, number 404; phone number, 363.

Yours in gospel bonds,

MRS. HELEN SHERWIN.

WALTHILL, Nebraska, March 22, 1908.

Dear Saints: We no longer live at Blair, Nebraska; but on the Omaha Indian Reserve, in Thurston County. I feel that we have made a good move. Our farm is in a wild state of nature, yet nature can be beautiful. We have not the good graded roads, telephone lines, mail routes, large houses and barns that keep the rent up to five dollars an acre, and cause envy to enter unbidden the hearts of thousands of poor, and, what is even worse, to work hard all the year, only to learn that at the end of the year they can just pay the rent, with nothing left. We have the very best of land, the best of water, and warm, sunny nooks, surrounded with natural timber, in which to build barns with straw-thatched roofs, corrals of any size, modest little dwellings that hold just enough furniture to make you comfortable, and pay only fifty cents per acre for prairie the first year; land that has been broken, one dollar, and well worked land two dollars per acre. One half of the rent we pay in March, the other half in December. Corn is just as good a price here as any place in the State, the year around. Poor Saints can come here, even if they have not a dollar to go on.

But one thing is sadly missing. Religion! There is a dearth of worshiping God. I pray the Lord for help. I wish I had some helpful literature from the church; almost anything would do.

In the one faith,

MARY A. CARTER.

NEBO, Illinois, February 8, 1908.

Editors Herald: On the 8th and 9th of February last I visited and preached near the county-seat. Notwithstanding threats of closing the schoolhouse against me, I was met by a fair crowd the first night, and a house full the next. Homes were opened, some visiting done, and undoubtedly the Spirit is upholding the work there, judging from the extraordinary liberty enjoyed while preaching.

Here at Nebo there is a small branch. Some have grown cold; but others can not "give up the ship." Next Tuesday night a ten-night discussion, involving both churches, will begin here. May the Lord bless it to the good of his cause. The prospective discussion came about on this wise: Our work was attacked by H. D. Leech, of the Non-progressive Church of Christ. I attended, took notes, and challenged them for discussion. It was to the officers that I went with my challenge. They informed me that they were not in favor of Elder Leech meeting me, assigning as their reason that we were both somewhat local, and it might engender a strife that men not located here might not do; and, further, that they were in favor of each party getting the best man procurable, and letting them go to the bottom of the matter. Of course I assented, and turned the matter over to Bro. H. Sparling. He selected F. M. Slover. After some discussion over church propositions, an agreement was reached, Roberts being selected to represent the Church of Christ. There are prospects for a wide hearing.

Confident of the triumph of this great work,

W. A. GUTHRIE.

Editors Herald: Our Church History, volume 3, in giving a brief sketch of the various factions that were led off from the church, loses sight of several of them. Among them the Brewsterites and the Hinkleites. And as it so happens that I fell in with these two factions early in my ministry, I thought it might be interesting to say that the Brewsterites, or the followers of J. C. Brewster, came to California (called in the Olive Branch, the land of Bashan), and settled in El Monte. I also settled in that place when I first went to Southern California, and became acquainted with Hazen Aldredge, Ira Thompson, James Clemenson and family, and Adam Lightner and others, and by them I was able to get the Olive Branch, and I read it quite thoroughly. All of the persons named were rank spiritualists.

On my first mission to Oregon I fell in with the little church of G. M. Hinkle, called the "Bride, the Lamb's wife." They were presided over by J. F. Adams, who was a brother-in-law of Hinkle's. They were quite shy of me at first; but in the course of two or three years I baptized several of them. But it was not until Bro. Gillen made a trip with me to Oregon, that old Bro. and Sr. Adams yielded. We ordained Bro. Adams an elder, and put him to preside over the branch that we organized out of the remnants of his little flock. This John F. Adams was a brother to Jesse L. Adams, of Iowa.

J. C. CLAPP.

COOKES POINT, Texas, February 17, 1908.

Editors Herald: I come to tell you that one Samuel Sherrill, who was once a member of the Reorganized Church, became a convert to the claims of J. J. Strang, who introduced the claims to one of our elders by the name of T. L. Veale, who became a convert to said claims. Said parties wrote for a Mr. Wake of New Mexico to come and baptize them, and he came, baptized, and ordained them both elders. Said Wake called upon us at Cookes Point. I let him present his claims to us. While he was doing it Bro. John Harp, who was present, could not refrain from speaking while he (Wake) was talking. After he (Wake) closed his remarks, I made a brief reply to the satisfaction of those present. Wake made one more effort. In this he referred to the book they call the Law of the Lord. As it happened I had the book. It seemed that he did not expect that I had seen the book. After I had read some of it to him before the people, he wilted very much, and did not wish to continue any longer to present his (their) claims here. He found us awake, too, at this place. He left us soon. I do not think he intends to come back to this section of Texas any more.

I have read quite a number of frauds, and of them all, this is the clumsiest one I ever read. I am sorry for them. What few teachers they have, employ all their time, it seems, in trying to show that somebody else is wrong, but will not try to show that they are right. I called upon W. Watson, their champion, some time ago to tell me where they were, and he answered me that the "echo answered, Where are we?" So their claims to be the true church amounts to about this: Once upon a time I heard of a man who said he had a barrel, but when the matter was investigated he had only a bung hole of the barrel. So when we investigate Strang's claims to be the true church, that's the way it pans out.

We are still in and contending for the faith once delivered to the Saints. It will triumph over all opposition. We are still on guard, watching for somebody else to come along with some other claim to air. I am,

Yours for the truth,

E. W. NUNLEY.

INDEPENDENCE, Colorado, March 23, 1908.

Dear Herald: I am still working in and about the mines of this district, which no doubt is the greatest gold camp of the world. A few years ago people thought the mines were about worked out, but new ore bodies are being found; and, according to reports, the camp produces as much gold as ever. Still a good many mines are being worked out. People here do not feel the panic as they do in other places, as wages are from three dollars to four dollars and a half a day in the mines. But many men come here looking for work, and can not get work. Some times sixty men can be seen at once trying to get work at some of the big mines where they work four or five hundred men. How nice it would be if all the big companies would pay their employees living wages, as they do in Cripple Creek. There would be no need of strikes and contentions as there is the world over. I am trying to get fixed so I do not have to work in the mines, as there are many bad places, and a great deal of danger working in the mine. I thank the Lord that I was not killed while working in a very wet shaft last December. My partner and I were on the graveyard shift from 12 p. m. to 8 a. m. We were sinking in a shaft seven hundred and fifty feet deep, and very wet, like working in the rain. The four o'clock shift had fired a round of shots with one report short. Neither we nor they could tell just where the missed shot was, as the shaft was not entirely cleaned out. Anyway, we cleaned off one end of the shaft, and set up the machine (air-drill), and I started drilling. When my partner got the shaft nearly clean, found the missed shot with four or five big sticks of powder in it, and I had drilled right through it. It was a lucky thing it did not explode; for it would have blown us to atoms. I tell you I had something to thank our heavenly Father for.

Thousands of miners have been blown up by doing that very thing—drilling into powder. I tell you the Lord is a buckler to them that put their trust in him. I can look back and see where my life has been spared many times. How thankful we ought to be to our heavenly Father, to keep us from danger, although it may be near. As little as any one can do, is to obey the gospel. How can we convince the people? They go and say it is all imagination, and are soon cut off, without complying with the requirements of the gospel. Yours brother in the one faith of the gospel,

A. L. HARTLEY.

RAYMOND, Idaho, March 6, 1908.

Editors Herald: After attending the Spokane District conference, in December, I went to the Hoodoo Valley, in Bonner County, Idaho, and preached ten sermons in H. P. Jenkins' hall to small but interested audiences; and I believe that good will result therefrom. This was a new opening, and ought to be looked after. From there I went to Sagle, Idaho, and held a few meetings. There is a branch of the church at Sagle, and the Saints are trying to keep the faith. I then returned to Spokane City for ten days, assisting in such labors as were necessary, and also made an opening at Hillyard, and preached three times. This is another place that ought to be looked after. On the 3d of February, I started for Page, Franklin County, Washington, and on the 5th began a series of meetings in the Page schoolhouse, and preached ten sermons, baptized two, and blessed two children. This is a new opening. Bro. and Sr. James Storey live there, and they are live Saints, and do not hesitate to do all they can to care for and encourage the missionary. Their daughters, Mary and Clara, were the ones that I baptized, and I believe they will yet become zealous workers for Christ. From there I went to Eureka, Wallawalla County, Washington, where I preached seven discourses, two in Brother G. R. Herman's home, and five in Mr. H. C. Carver's hall, he furnishing the hall and lights free. This was very much appreciated by ye scribe, for there is a Congregational church building and organization in Eureka, and the pastor (a woman) would not announce a meeting for me, neither would she permit me to announce a meeting to her congregation, and she seemingly did everything she could to hinder me from reaching the people, even to changing her time of meeting. But the Lord stood by me, and gave me such liberty that the people, (some of them) came to hear me, and on the last night I had my largest congregation in Eureka. I am satisfied that friends were made to the cause of Christ; and if my efforts can be followed up, in the near future, I believe some will unite with the church. Before I came away, Mr. Carver said to me, "If you will come back again, and will let me know a few weeks before you come, I will see that you have a house to preach in as long as you want it." This is the place where Bro. John Davis preached several years ago. He is still remembered by the few Saints there. I made my home with Bro. and Sr. George R. Herman while there, and was made to feel that I was among true friends. May God bless them and their children for their kindness to me.

From there I came to Hagerman, Idaho, and met with the dear Saints of the Hagerman Branch, and preached twice in the Niles Schoolhouse, and twice in Bro. J. E. Condit's home.

Came home on the last day of February, where I am at present, trying to get caught up with my writing. I expect to visit the Saints of Soda Springs and Eightmile, next week, and after doing some preaching in Bear Lake County, and perhaps in Bannock County, I expect to start for Independence, Missouri, to attend General Conference.

In regard to the work in the Spokane District: To me the outlook is bright. I have made nine new openings during my labors in the district, and I hope the work begun in those new places will be continued. And if I am returned to the Spokane District, I want to, if possible, do some work among the Nez Perces Indians. They are the most intelligent tribe of Indians I have ever met, and many of them are very religiously inclined. Hoping the good work will prosper everywhere, I am,

Your brother,

A. J. LAYLAND.

Extracts from Letters.

James M. Wynn, Corydon, Indiana: "We are striving to serve our Master. We have no branch as yet, but hope to have before long. There are sixteen Saints in this neighborhood. We have not had any preaching since before Christmas. Elder C. E. Harpe was here also last fall and held four weeks' meeting, which we all enjoyed."

J. J. Phare, Cleveland, Ohio: "I forward under separate cover copies of some of the literature being issued by the Reverend John D. Nutting, secretary of the 'Utah Gospel Mission' of the Congregational Church, whose headquarters are in this city at 1854 East Eighty-first Street. I have called on this man three times to show him that in his lectures (stereopticon views of Utah) he is unfair to the Reorganized Church, in that he classes us directly with the Utah Mormons, stating that ours is only 'a case of arrested development,' and that, given the same conditions, we should blossom out the same as they. I have attended two of his lectures. His fight is against the whole Joseph Smith movement. He ignores the presence of our elders and missionaries in the Utah field, and yesterday at the close of a call upon him with Bro. Rudolph Etzenhouser, he denied having met our missionaries there, though he claims to have been in the work about fifteen years, and pastor of a Congregational church in Salt Lake City for six years. He dodged the challenge for debate with Bro. Etzenhouser yesterday. Thinks he can 'use his time for better things.' He is doubtless doing a good work throughout the Utah field and should not be opposed in a rational and fair prosecution of it, but something should be done by our church to counteract his insidious lectures to eastern church people in whom a greater and needless hatred of all Latter Day Saints' work is engendered. I shall be glad to cooperate with our people in any movement they may conclude to make against some parts of this man's work."

Mrs. Rebecca Atkinson, ——— "We are taking the Ensign, Autumn Leaves, and Zion's Hope, and we hand them to those that will read them, and we have some tracts that we loan to those that will read them. I try to let my light shine so it will be a help to those around me. It will be a year the 28th of April since I was baptized by Bro. G. W. Anderson, and I feel thankful that I have obeyed the Lord's will. I first heard the gospel in its fullness in 1900, at the Pleasant Grove church, by Walter W. Smith. My husband was at first opposed to the doctrine, and would not let me obey; but I thank God he has seen the light and we have both obeyed the Lord's will, and my husband has been ordained a priest. We belong to the Grove Spring Branch, but it is fourteen miles from our place. Bro. W. A. Brooner was here and preached some good sermons. He is an able speaker. Last August there was a crippled girl at our place. She had been a cripple for some time and had to go on crutches. She was administered to by G. W. Anderson and

A. M. Baker and is now well, and has since been baptized. Her name is Sarah Brown, my husband's granddaughter."

Elder A. A. Baker, Bandon, Oregon: "The work here is still in good shape. Saints all fairly well at present and feeling good in the work. Expect to leave at noon for Coos Bay, then by steamer to Portland, then on east, making a few short stops on the way, and expecting to reach Independence for Conventions and Conference. Am feeling well in the work, and hope to continue."

Aaron W. Kelley, Indian River, Maine: "I am an old man now, seventy-three years old, and have been a cripple forty-four years. Have been in the church over thirty-five years, and I never have seen the time I wanted to leave it. There is nothing under the sun that will compare with it. It will carry me safely through this life, if I keep the faith, and land me safely on the other shore."

James A. Ferguson, Miltown, Indiana: "I am located for the present at this place. Am interested in getting the doctrine introduced here. Have been sending tracts out for thirty years; am at work, now, and giving out literature. Several are interested and the Christians are trying to smother me out. I want some of the elders to make arrangements to come here and help me out."

Mrs. J. F. Owens, Wiggins, Mississippi: "We live where we have no church to go to. Two of our elders were here to see us in September, Brn. Alma and Lafayette Booker. We rejoiced in seeing them, as the people had never heard a Latter Day Saint preach before, and some were quite interested, and ask when they are coming back. My husband was baptized while they were here. Pray for us both, that we may walk in obedience to God's commands."

Mrs. Nancy Thorp, Wellsford, Kansas: "Have been a subscriber to the Ensign for a number of years. I dearly love to read and to learn of the advancement of the work, and to do what I can to move the work along, for it means more to me than all else; for we have obtained a knowledge that it is of God, and there is nothing can compare with it. Our sincere prayer is for the advancement of this work, and for the brethren and sisters; and I ask an interest in your prayers for myself and family."

Sarah E. Rush, Lexington, Tennessee: "I wish to do all I can in helping every one to know the truth. It is my whole heart's desire to do good for others, as well as self. I was taken with a severe pain in my side and back and thought my time had come. I was reconciled to go, but for one thing. I wanted to live until I could see some way provided for my two girls. They are grown now, but I felt they needed a mother's care. I just breathed a silent prayer to God, and I was healed that moment. Now, dear Saints, be humble and trust God, and he will hear and answer your prayers. I love this work. I know it is true. The longer I live the stronger I am in the faith once delivered to the Saints."

R. M. King, Biloxi, Mississippi: "This work comes to us as a marvelous work, and when I consider my weakness before Him, and my finite condition, I tremble to think that such a glorious work is not being published in its purity in this part of God's vineyard. We have a beautiful church room rented, well seated, a good organ and plenty of lights. We have church every Sunday. I am doing all that I can to keep the few Saints together, and preach for them in my weak way. It looks like all my work is outside of a branch. We have recommended our little band to be organized into a branch, but it seems like we are overlooked. There is an opening for a good work to be done here in this beautiful little city. I have belonged to the church twenty-seven years. Was ordained a priest the same week I joined, and still hold the same office; and I find nothing to complain of when I do my duty. I feel sad at times, when I compare myself with the standard, that I have made such little advancement. I hope I shall be more useful to this work in the future than I have been in the past. I want to be willing to pass through anything that the divine mind would have me pass through. The words of Job were, 'He knows the way that I take; when he has tried me, I shall come forth as gold.'

Walter Jones, Johnnie, Nevada: "We have just come to this part from Eastern Michigan. Thought by writing I might learn if there were any more brothers and sisters in this part of the vineyard. We like the place very much and find the climate fine; but our mind often drifts back to our associates in Eastern Michigan, and we hope to live so that if we do not meet here again, we will be an unbroken circle in the kingdom of God. Would love to hear from old friends, especially from Michigan."

John R. Nelson, Guilford, Missouri: "I have belonged to the church for twenty-five years. I have had many trials and temptations to contend with, the same as you have; but the Lord has blessed me many times. The Lord has never turned me away when I have come before him in a humble way. I have seen the time when I was so darkened with trouble it seemed as though I could not stand it, and I have gone to God in the humblest way I knew how, and he has cheered me and made everything bright for me, and he will bless any one that will serve him. I do not know what would have become of me sometimes if it had not been for the helping hand of God, the eternal Father. I have read letters in the HERALD that have done me more good than one hour's discourse by an able minister. Sometimes when I have been discouraged and down-hearted I have picked up the HERALD and read some noble letter that has caused me to humble myself and thank God that it was not too late yet to try to serve him. My earnest desire is to overcome all, and be saved with the righteous ones."

Emily A. Tidland, Blakes, Virginia: "According to promise, I will write a few lines to let you know that I arrived in Virginia all right, and like it as well as one can under the circumstances. There are no Saints here or in Roanoke. I could not live in Roanoke. I had a terrible cough all the time I was there, so came to Blakes on Bro. Larch's farm and will stay awhile here and see if I get rid of rheumatism. I miss the Saints very much. I often think of the good meetings we used to have at the home of Bro. and Sr. Hawkes. Bro. Lundeen and Bro. Hawkes used to meet us with teams and take us out to the farm and have some good meetings. Bro. Hawkes has done a great work to get the gospel before the people. I hope they will gather many into the kingdom. Love to all the Saints in Minneapolis."

Mrs. Annie Brooks, Calabasas, California: "My husband and I are all the Latter Day Saints here that I know of, and I feel sometimes that we are hardly worthy of the name, although I do want to be, and try in my weak way to be one; but I am afraid I fall short of my duty many times. We live about thirty-five miles north of Los Angeles, and have not heard a sermon of any kind for about four years, only the funeral-sermon of our son Willie, which Bro. A. Carmichael preached in Santa Ana; so you see we do not have much spiritual food. There might be a branch built up here if some elder would come and preach. If Bro. Williams, of Los Angeles, sees this, we would be glad to have him call on us. I was in hopes that my uncle, J. C. Clapp, would come down this way, but I hear he is going east. I ask the prayers of all the brothers and sisters, that we may strive harder to live our religion, and teach our children in the right way."

NINE MONTHS TOURIST FARES IN EFFECT DAILY FROM CALIFORNIA AND NORTH PACIFIC COAST POINTS TO THE EAST.

The following, just received from the Trans-Continental Association, is inserted for the benefit of any who may profit by it:

"Regular nine months tourist fares, approximating two cents per mile in each direction, or about one fare and one third for the round trip, are in effect daily from California and North Pacific Coast Common Points to Kansas City and other Missouri River points. The rate to such Missouri River points and return is $90.00. Rates to other points further east may be had on application.

"The nine months fares do not apply to intermediate or interior points, but only to what are known as the eastern gateways of the Association. Should it happen that delegates apply at a station on Pacific Coast from which the nine months fare is not in effect, which may be the case at very small unimportant stations, the agent will ascertain and advise them the nearest point to his station from which such fare does apply.

"Please note that these nine months tourist tickets are sold only from the states of California, Nevada, Oregon, Washington, and west of and including Mission Junction, British Columbia; also from what are known as Kootenay common points, namely, Nelson, Rossland, Sandon, Kaslo, and Grand Forks, British Columbia."

Forest Ranger's Examination in Seventeen States.

The United States Civil Service Commission has just announced that examinations will be held for the position of ranger at the Supervisors' headquarters at every National Forest on April 23 and 24. It is estimated that three hundred more rangers will be required during the present fiscal year than were on duty last year, and eligibles to fill these vacancies will be furnished the Forest Service by the coming examination. The examinations will be held in seventeen States and Territories at the following places:

Alaska: Ketchikan.

Arkansas: Fort Smith.

Arizona: Benson, Douglas, Flagstaff, Nogales, Roosevelt, Safford, Show Low, Springerville.

California: Alturas, Bishop, Elk Creek, Hemet, Hot Springs (Tulare County), Los Angeles, Nevada City, North Fork, Quincy, Salinas, San Luis Obispo, Santa Barbara, Sisson, Sonora, Weaverville, Yreka.

Colorado: Cillbran, Delta, Denver, Durango, Estes Park, Glenwood Springs, Gunnison, La Veta, Leadville, Meeker, Monte Vista, Saguache, Steamboat Springs, Westcliffe.

Idaho: Boise, Hailey, Idaho Falls, Kooskia, Mackay, Meadows, Oakley, Pocatello, St. Anthony, Salmon City, Wallace, Weiser.

Minnesota: Cass Lake.

Montana: Anaconda, Ashland, Bozeman, Dillon, Great Falls, Helena, Highwood, Kalispell, Libby, Livingston, Missoula, Sheridan, Thompsons Falls, Townsend.

Nebraska: Halsey.

Nevada: Austin, Elko, Las Vegas.

New Mexico: Alamogordo, Albuquerque, Captain, Magdalena, Santa Fe, Silver City.

Oklahoma: Cache.

Oregon: Eugene, Grants Pass, Heppner, John Day, Lakeview, Medford, Portland, Prineville, Roseburg, Sumpter, Wallawa.

South Dakota: Camp Crook, Deadwood.

Utah: Beaver, Ephraim, Escalante, Grantville, Kanab,

Logan, Moab, Panguitch, Payson, Provo, St. George, Salina, Salt Lake City.

Washington: Chelan, Hoodspout, Newport, Orting, Republic, Sumas, Wenatchee.

Wyoming: Big Horn, Cody, Jackson, Pinedale, Saratoga, Sundance.

Applicants can secure information on the examination from the United States Civil Service Commission, Washington, District of Columbia, or from the Forest Supervisor at any of the places mentioned in the seventeen States. Those who wish to take the examination should ask for application form 1093, a copy of the "Use Book," and a copy of "Information Regarding Employment on the National Forests." The papers in the examination will all be forwarded to the Civil Service Commission and the results announced in due time.

Experience, a thorough knowledge of forest conditions, and a sound body, rather than book education, are the qualities sought in examining applicants who desire to become forest rangers. The man must have the ability, however, to make simple maps and write intelligent reports upon forest business connected with the position. A ranger must be able to take care of himself and his horses in regions remote from settlement and supplies. Necessary qualifications of applicants include the knowledge of trail building, construction of cabins, and the ability to ride, pack, and deal tactfully with all classes of people. They must also know something of the land laws, surveying, estimating and scaling timber, logging, mining, and the live stock business.

The applicant should be thoroughly familiar with the region of the country in which he seeks employment. In Arizona and New Mexico, the ranger must know enough Spanish to conduct forest business with the Mexican users of the nation's forests. Personal equipment and horses for use in connection with duty of a ranger are furnished by the rangers themselves, and not by the Forest Service.

Working under the direction of the Forest Supervisors, the ranger patrols the forests to prevent fire and trespass, estimates, surveys, and marks timber, supervises and performs other duties which a man thoroughly familiar with forested regions and possessing a fair education is able to fulfill.

Only those men who are at least twenty-one years of age, and not more than forty, of good character, temperate, and in good physical condition, are eligible to take the examination. The salary paid to beginners is seventy-five dollars per month. Compensation runs as high as one thousand four hundred dollars per year for rangers who have had some experience and demonstrate their capability. Still better places are open to these men, for it is the policy of the Forest Service to fill vacancies in higher positions by the promotion of rangers who have proved their capacity.

The Unemployed.

In the plight of the unemployed there are several considerations besides the mere fact of idleness. There is, for instance, a sharp distinction between the unemployed and the unemployable; some men will not work. There is always comparative lack of work in mid-winter, due to bad weather and the slack season in certain industries, and there are many workmen caught in the cogs of new machinery and new methods of production whose hard-bought trades are a drug in a market no longer bidding for handicraft where machine-craft is quicker and cheaper,—men who must suffer as they adjust themselves to a new order. These things are not peculiar to this winter, but they add to its total of unemployment.

The number now out of work is variously estimated. It has not been counted nor can it be compared exactly with the number in other years, for America has no substitute for the police registration of European cities. A committee in charge of the relief situation of Chicago gives 75,000 as a conservative guess for that city of many seasonal occupations. In New York estimates made by Frank Julian Warne from a few authoritative figures on typical trades indicate 90,000 idle members of trades unions in addition to non-union workers, and a minimum of 35,000 homeless men besides. The number of homeless men is based on the total number of beds in free and cheap lodging-houses, and as all of these are crowded, it is probably near right. The Commissioner of Public Charities has stated that there are normally 30,000 homeless men in New York at this time of year. Of other figures one may take his choice. Numbers count for little, for as has recently been pointed out, it is not the number who are idle, but the ability of the idle to meet the situation, that counts. One hundred thousand men temporarily idle but able to care for themselves and their families make a problem slight in comparison with a possible situation involving one tenth as many both idle and dependent.
