Schlatter, the great faith healer, has been in Des Moines, and we improved the opportunity to talk with him, see him as he is, and meet him at close range. He registers as Chas. McLean, of Boston, Massachusetts, and the name, "Schlatter," which he uses generally, is the German term for "sleeper," a name applied to him because of his claims. In outward appearance he is a striking character among men. His long beard is pinned together to keep it from waving, his hair is uncut, and his facial expression is rare. He is sixty-six years of age, and began his work as a faith healer when he was twenty years old. He stated to us that before he was born the Lord told his mother that she should have a son who would be a great man, on whose head no razor should come, and that in all things he should be like Christ. All this prophecy given to his mother has been fulfilled in him. He publishes no statement of himself, or his work, but takes delight in collecting newspaper accounts of himself.

He says that he is a thousand years ahead of the world to-day in thought, precept, and example. That he cures the blind, the lame, and the deaf, and heals the sick through faith in God; that he has raised seven persons from death to life; and that he, himself, was dead and buried for forty days, while in Denver, in 1894. He expressed his belief in both a soul and body, and that while his body was the forty days in the grave, his spirit was with God.

While in the city of Des Moines for the ten days beginning June 17, on Sunday afternoon and evening, he spoke at one of the public places of amusement, and at other times in some of the public halls. In his public talks he occupies about thirty minutes. On these occasions he opened his service with prayer, and read from the Bible the several accounts of where the sick had been healed and the dead raised. He talks little in the way of a sermon, saying that people are more interested in seeing him in his healing administrations than in hearing him. He urged people to come to the stand to receive the laying on of hands. But few in Des Moines would accept his offered service and he was scathing in his rebuke for their unbelief and sneers, and no great manifestations of healing were claimed here. He had no use for the city, said he would never come here again, and openly consigned all to a very low place of punishment. He eulogizes the Catholic priest for his vow of celibacy; Schlatter, himself, never having married; but in everything else he is bitter against all forms of Christian belief; preachers are infidels, and churches are all wrong.

June 26.

A. A. REAMS.

SPRINGFIELD, Missouri, June 24, 1909.

Dear Editors and Saints: I can say this afternoon that I still appreciate the blessings the gospel affords us as Latter Day Saints, and although my life at times has been overshadowed with clouds, and the darkness and sadness in my life have seemed hard to bear, yet I have always felt the assurance of one friend at least, who has never forsaken me and I will find myself casting every care on Him who careth for his faithful followers. So the sunlight of God's love has shone in through the clouds and my mind has been enlightened and my faith strengthened.

There are many mysteries in life which can never be fathomed. It seems as though we so often misunderstand each other, but God understands each heart and knoweth the secret thoughts. I do not see why we should not be as ready and willing to forgive each other when a person will acknowledge wrongs and ask forgiveness, as our heavenly Father is to forgive us.

In the HERALD of May 26 there is a letter from a "lonely, down-hearted Saint." I am quite sure that I know who that letter is from. No name or address was given, but I might possibly be mistaken. Certainly there must be condemnation resting upon that soul and sadness in the life. Why not make or let yourself be known; ask forgiveness of those who have been wronged and try to make things right, and then you won't think the world all against you, but will find your friends. I often wonder how Saints can be so negligent in their duties before God. May the Lord help us all to be faithful to the covenant we have made with him, hence showing a greater interest in this work, until we are called to try the realities of eternity.

I had a lovely dream where Christ had come and was choosing out those who were faithful to go and dwell with him and I was quite consoled to know that I was one of the chosen ones. It was all so real.

Your sister in gospel bonds,

MRS. EMILY IRWIN.

FULTON, Iowa, June 8, 1909.

Editors Herald: We have been holding meetings here in a hall owned by Bro. John Simmons, but of late a resolution was made and a committee appointed to either buy the German Baptist church, or see about building one. The committee made haste in their charge, and yesterday the deed was made out that put us in possession of the German Baptist church. We have nearly all the money raised, and paid in. Will not need any outside help. We have a nice little church three miles west of Fulton, but we seldom use it. We may use it later on again. We feel encouraged and hopeful for the future, and believe that good is being done.

As Bishop's agent, I have no money at all for May and none for June. Can some one help out soon, so that the families of the elders need not go without their allowance, which is indeed small enough at the best? We say we love this work; let us show by our works that we do.

Your brother,

JOHN HEIDE.

BY T. W. CHATBURN.

Again we are amid the icy browed sentinels of the Rocky Mountains, the wonderful enchanted grounds of the "lasting hills." Our trip over the plains was uneventful save the fact, "The star of empire wends its way," and the once boundless prairies are now the habitation of the yeoman who is rapidly turning the buffalo sod with its scant forage into fields of abundant harvests of corn and wheat. As we look from the car window across the billowy expanse and see herds of cattle and sheep, the plain, dotted with farms and bunches of trees almost everywhere, gives impressions of the ever restless spirit of man, his unyielding ambition, and his brave, adventurous character.

Our chariot goes rushing onward with its meditative freight. Some one cries out, "The mountains are in sight," and sure enough, over against the western sky, is the snowy range, mountain fields of everlasting snow, and from now on, all eyes are watching the slowly rising, enchanting hills, the snowy peaks that seemingly are leaning against a cloudless sky. Veering off at Limon, leaving Denver off to the right, we are whirling on in a southwesterly course directly toward Pike's Peak, the great landmark of the Indian trapper and explorer. In later days it was the beacon by which the gold hunters steered their prairie schooners into the wonderful and mysterious West; now it is the goal of those in search of the beautiful in nature, the enjoyment of an attractive summer resort, or the restoration of impaired health. The mountain is 14,444 feet above the sea-level, and can be seen for 175 miles from the east. At the foot of this ever snow-crowned monarch, is nestled the beautiful residence city and health resort, Colorado Springs. Its elevation is almost 6,000 feet, population about 25,000. The city is replete with parks and fountains with the "Garden of the Gods" close by.

Here we change cars, taking the Midland Route, scenic and rugged indeed, describing a semi-circle around Pike's Peak, through Ute Pass, over Haden Divide, via Granite Canyon to Buena Vista on the Arkansas River. From this beautiful mountain city we follow a water grade to the head of the river some fifty miles to Leadville, the wonderful "cloud city," the highest in the United States; elevation 10,200 feet, almost up to "timber line," within four miles of the backbone of the Rockies. The rivulets from the mountain sides where the eternal snow cautiously melts, form the headwaters of the Arkansas and Platte rivers, that go surging through mountain passes, roaring over jagged rocks, through dismal canyons for two hundred miles before reaching the verdant fields of a civilized world; then on to the Father of Waters, via New Orleans into the Gulf of Mexico to the Atlantic Ocean.

In 1850 the site of Leadville was known as California Gulch. Millions of gold was washed from its rocky depths. It was then nearly abandoned until 1870, when the great beds of carbonate silver were discovered; since then it has wonderfully grown in wealth and population, being now the fourth city of Colorado and the greatest carbonate mining-camp in the world.

Rushing onward towards the tunnel but a few miles off, which will conduct us through the great national divide to the "sun-down" side of the continent,—darting into the tunnel, we are on the highest point of the route, 10,424 feet above sea-level. Those with weak lungs or affected hearts are panting for the oxygen that gives life. There! a lady has succumbed just across the aisle, and her husband is fairly frantic with serious apprehensions.

EVANSVILLE, Wisconsin, June 23, 1909.

Editors Herald: The year in Wisconsin has been a busy one and we have been made to realize that the truth of the words uttered by President Joseph Smith, that this would be a year of activity and opposition for the church. We have already seen an increased amount of the workings of the Evil One, both in and out of the church. Sometimes his evil power, being exercised in the body, makes one fear and tremble. However, we have the evidence that this is God's work, and if our people will only do their duty, he will bring us safely through.

When I recall the many warnings given in the recent past through the power of the Holy Ghost I can not but say the Lord has done well his part.

We hope and trust that the Saints of the Southern Wisconsin District are not forgetting the words of instruction given in the past at the reunions and we hope and trust that all are doing as we were told, viz, "Come out of the world; cease, cease from its pleasures and its follies that you be not carried away therewith, seek unto me more diligently and I will bless you with my Spirit and qualify you for the work before you."

Our Madison reunion begins August 27 and closes September 5. Let us all be working to the end that we may attend. God will bless us in such sacrifice.

Hopefully, your servant,

JASPER O. DUTTON.

HITEMAN, Iowa, June 28, 1909.

Editors Herald: I have often enjoyed very much the letters of the HERALD. Many of them are a source of strength and comfort to me. It has recently occurred to me that some one else might be blessed by my testimony, hence I make bold, for the first time, to offer a little for your columns.

The latter-day work is my greatest interest in life. Many testimonies of its divinity have come to me. In my occupation, mining, there have been many times when I have escaped calamity, even death, by the care and protection of my heavenly Father.

We have a good, live, and growing branch at Hiteman; and laboring as a deacon here, I have been blessed, and many times convinced of the divinity of the work.

Of late, I have felt that my work in the mines was nearing an end. I have received injuries that disqualify me for the mines, but which would not prevent my working at the carpenter trade, which I learned under my father. I have felt to leave the mines and follow carpentering. After prayer and fasting I write this, trusting that God may direct in my final decision. If any brother who is a contractor and engages help, or who desires a partner in a moderate carpenter business, reads this and feels interested, he may write me. I desire to be led of God in temporal as well as in spiritual matters, and I most sincerely ask the prayers of the Saints to this end.

Your brother in Christ,

ROBERT ZIMMERMAN.

The conversion and apostleship of Paul alone, duly considered, is of itself a demonstration sufficient to prove Christianity a divine revelation.—Lord Lyttleton.

ELKTON, Oregon, June 23, 1909.

Dear Herald: It has been a long time since I have written anything for your pages and perhaps this will bring up in the waste basket, but I feel that I must pen a few lines.

My home has always been in Michigan until last April, when, having lost my companion, and all my family being here in Oregon, I came out here and received the heartiest welcome from my children and grandchildren; but I sorely miss the companionship of those of the precious faith and also I do not get my HERALD regularly.

The people here have never heard the gospel preached by any of our faith, and I have been assured that we could have any of their schoolhouses free, and as I would like to be doing something for the Master, I would do all I could to help one of our elders or priests get here, if one will correspond with me, assuring him in advance of a home with my people as long as he can stay. The Methodist and Christian churches have got a foothold here, but some of their members have assured me that they would like to hear one of our elders preach, and I feel quite sure a good work could be done here.

I am located with my children about six miles from Elkton. A letter addressed to me, in care of John Fairfield, will reach me, and will be answered immediately. I held the office of deacon in the West Branch, of Ogemaw County, Michigan, and tried to do my duties in the branch; even trying to preach a few times, but not being gifted that way will be only too glad to assist one that can preach.

I had ordered my HERALD sent to Salem, but as it is not mailed to me regularly, I would like to have the address changed to Elkton, hoping that one of our elders or priests will see this letter and come, or open correspondence with me in regard to coming. Would say to the West Branch and Rose City Saints that I still remember them all and would be glad to hear from them.

I am, in gospel bonds,
RICHARD BASHAW.

CHICAGO, Illinois, June 28, 1909.

Editors Herald: I inclose you a clipping, I thought it may be of interest to Book of Mormon students, as our opponents try to make a point against the Book of Mormon because of the statements regarding the rapid increase in numbers of the early settlers of this country.

Please state through your columns if any know of Saints in the city that are not attending our church or have relatives or friends living in the city whom they would like me to visit, that I shall be glad to do so if they will write me.

Mission address 6549 Marshfield Avenue, Chicago, Illinois.

Very truly,
ARTHUR ALLEN.

"BERLIN, June 22.—One of the largest family reunions ever held in Waterloo County, and probably in Canada, was held at Doon, Ontario, to-day, on the George Till farm.

"Fully twenty-five hundred took part, and they were the descendants of Christian, Jacob, and Joseph Schneider, who came from Pennsylvania in 1806. Christian settled on the farm where the reunion is being held; Joseph was one of the founders of Berlin, and Jacob settled on the Oxbrow farm at Bloomingdale.

"Two special trains from Elmira, St. Jacobs, and Berlin, besides the regular trains took the people there."—The London, (Ontario,) Free Press, June 23, 1909.

TORONTO, Ontario, June 26, 1909.

Editors Herald: Your generous and gentlemanly apology is seen and, of course, freely and cordially accepted. I knew that the omission of my name from the article upon "The coming comet," was merely an accidental oversight.

May I be permitted to add that the powers and magnitudes and velocities of the celestial bodies are so vast, and so utterly stupendous that the human mind simply can not grasp figures and facts in which millions and thousands, or even hundreds of millions of miles are involved, unless brought into sharp and sudden contrast with something finite, or of human invention, such as the human mind can grasp.

Thus, to inform your thousands of readers that, as my essay has already told them, the length of the tail of Halley's Comet is one hundred and eleven millions of miles, and the length of that of the comet of 1882 is two hundred millions of miles, seems but vague at the best; but to tell them that a railway train at ninety miles an hour day and night would take one hundred and forty years, nine months, and twenty-one days to traverse the length of this resplendent object, brings it home to all minds; while, could we take one of the magnificent, newly invented, electrical engines, with the still higher velocity of one hundred miles an hour, traveling day and night incessantly, it would occupy the vast span of two hundred and twenty-three years, five months, eighteen days, and sixteen hours. Thus, to traverse the comet of 1882, were our earth absolutely at rest, and the comet rushing by at one hundred miles an hour, it would be close upon two hundred and twenty-three and one half years before the last mile of this mighty comet's train had traveled past.

I remain, your brother in bonds,

PHILADELPHIA, Pennsylvania, June 25, 1909.

Saints' Herald: You are receiving daily New York papers; many interesting matters are being read upon the house-tops; church quarrels, one of the most numerous, and we know this will continue until they shall go down and out and end in new fads, merging into the most hideous, strange delusions that the living God has said will take place in latter times.

The Book of Mormon, through a choice prophet of God, foretold this condition and the full outcome of discordant creeds and opinions are of men deceiving and being deceived; accusing and excusing one another. Their abuse of the church of Jesus Christ from the time of the restoration of the fullness of the gospel, down to the present time, has brought the wrath of God upon such conduct, and they are reaping the seed sown against God's righteous cause.

My opportunities of watching this whole question enable me to delve into this and fathom the real meaning of rapid fulfillments of all the prophets since the world began, to pick out of the Chinese methods of Christianizing by forms of godliness and their failure; these not alone, but its wonderful failures most marked upon every hand. The telling blow that creeds have felt from the gospel being preached as a witness in all the world, from its very restoration,—from the authorized angel from the presence of God, to the choice seer, Joseph, has turned inquiring minds towards the fullness of the gospel. I hear favorable comments whichever way I turn among men, who learn of the claims we make, the unharnessing of creeds, has cut loose a freedom of those that hear the voice of the Shepherd, and will follow. Many noble men with vast wealth, who are of the true seed of Ephraim, shall hear his voice and will come with all their wealth and influence and lay at the feet of Ephraim their wealth,—yea, better than all this, yield obedience and shall be heralded to the nations of the earth. The Almighty God of this marvelous work and a wonder, knows these noble men of the earth by name, and as creeds crumble and the very hearts of these men will hunger and thirst for righteousness, will be satisfied in the obedience of the truth. We are finding favor upon every hand. Truth crushed to the earth shall rise again. The battle has been fought with angelic hosts in the spirit of meekness and has moved the hearts of men outside of the church, and is well earned by God's people. A continuance of good works will surely make us living epistles known and read of men, and bring to pass the crowning glory to every Saint of God; a steady, continual hard pull only a little while longer, will bring the greatest relief to the treasury from kings and princes of the earth, and ere long the harvest will end, and our King shall reign with those that have borne the burdens and heat of the day. The awful calamities that have already come and are to come even in greater destruction will destroy the wicked and cleanse the earth for the mild reign of Christ.

May all that we have learned by what we have suffered in the past, turn us to greater diligence, to escape the awful wrath of God coming upon the earth. Happily we may escape and meet him when he comes. Worry not over the building of the temple, for our God knows those that will ere long come to the rescue; when the time is ready for him to make known his will in this most notable event, for the Saints will be happily surprised at the source from which money will flow freely into the hands of the head bishop in Zion.

Fraternally yours,
A. N. HOXIE.

STRATTON, Ontario.

Dear Herald: I have been a reader of your pages for about twenty-five years, and I can safely say I have gained a vast amount of useful information and instruction as regards this present life and its duties and requirements to fit us for the better life to come, and if I fail to come up to the standard set forth (which is Christ) I shall have to suffer the loss. During that time there has appeared on your pages things that have not been profitable to me, possibly because I did not understand them. I have thought in the past and think so still that some of the controversies that have appeared on your pages would have been better left out or considerably cut down, but as the editor has deemed otherwise, we submit.

I would advise if there are any Saints who want to know anything about tithing let them conscientiously practice it for a few years and a controversy will not be needed to convince them. It is an all round benefit and approved of God. In reading over a pastoral letter I came across one item that to me appeared somewhat strange and looked almost like a vote of want of confidence. I here insert the paragraph: "We also admonish the brethren not to arrange for or to enter into public discussion without first consulting with those in general charge." O verily, those men sent out in this or any other mission to preach the gospel and build up the kingdom of God on earth, are they not (under God) able to defend it when opposed? If not, the sooner the school of the prophets is organized that they may be qualified to defend the work the better, as it may save them a possible humiliation, if some party should dare to oppose them when out in their field of labor presenting the gospel. For by our own experience there are times when the servant of God is called upon to act quickly in defense of what he is presenting to the people; but if he has to get in communication with those in general charge before making a stand in defense, it certainly is a sorry position to be in, and if I were a missionary I would rather be excused, from what we have seen. We believe as a rule, public discussion is profitable to us. There are occasional exceptions to the rule, but we always feel confident that if the defendant is faithful, humbly prayerful, does the best he can, all will be well.

I find in Doctrine and Covenants, section 71:2: "Now, behold, this is wisdom; whoso readeth let him understand and receive also; for unto him that receiveth it shall be given more abundantly, even power; wherefore, confound your enemies; call upon them to meet you, both in public and in private; and inasmuch as ye are faithful, their shame shall be made manifest." In reading the whole section through it is evident the Master did not intend that his servants were to everlastingly carry a chip on their shoulders, but there are times when it would be wisdom just to place one on, if only as a bait. The central thought in that revelation to my mind is, "inasmuch as ye are faithful, their shame shall be made manifest;" and if not faithful, but rely on their own strength and wisdom, they will learn and learn fast too. We know whereof we speak, and I sometimes think it the best kind of schooling we can get. It is written, "He learned obedience by the things he suffered." It is a well known fact that some are more adapted for discussion than are others, but how many are there of our faithful brethren and sisters that bear testimony that God has stood by them in power when defending this glorious gospel; and if so, will he not give to his faithful servant a mouth and wisdom that can not be gainsaid? "Yes, verily," in the words of one of the old standard-bearers," the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong"; the work is the Lord's, and he will take care of it.

I notice another pastoral that reads to my mind, decidedly better, and I think more encouraging to the man laboring under that jurisdiction: "In case the necessity for debate should arise, consult the minister in charge, unless the emergency demands immediate action; under such conditions humbly and prayerfully do the best you can, reporting to me the conditions at your earliest convenience." If we have not confidence enough in the men who are intrusted to present this gospel to defend it when opposed, better call them in. As a rule, our missionaries are a humble, prayerful, self-sacrificing lot of men and it seems hardly fair to place such humiliating restrictions upon them. Let us have more confidence in them, assured that they have the Spirit of their Master, and so having they will do what is right.

To the Saints in Southwestern Ontario, I may say that Bro. Hampshire is still in the faith, although under the darkest cloud of his life. Whether I lose my way in the darkness, or the good Father will take my hand and lead me safely out, remains to be seen.

I need your prayers, brethren.

GEORGE HAMPSHIRE.

FALL RIVER, Massachusetts, June 21, 1909.

Editors Saints' Herald: The individual cup for sacramental use meets with my unqualified approval. I heartily agree with the position taken by Dr. W. A. Sinclair, of Somerville, Massachusetts, in his recent article. In fact, after his very learned dissertation and bacteriological deductions, I can only think of one argument that could, with propriety, be used in support of the passing and all drinking out of one cup, and that is to be found in the eighteenth verse of the sixteenth chapter of Mark: "And if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them."

Yours in bonds,

DR. JOHN GILBERT.

SAN ANTONIO, Texas, June 22, 1909.

Dear Brethren I just received word that Elder Johnnie Hay, of Hearne, Texas, is dead. Died on the 16th. Took a pain in his head and in one half hour was dead. Bro. Hay was one of our best missionaries of Texas; a wise man and one we could trust anywhere. His place will be hard to fill, and he was a man we could ill afford to lose. He leaves a father, mother, wife, and four small children; was a young man; belonged to the Quorum of Seventy. Elder E. W. Nunley conducted the funeral-services. I well remember Bro. Joseph said that death would make inroads on us this year.

W. M. AYLOR.

COOKES POINT, Texas, June 18, 1909.

Editors Herald: Brn. W. M. Aylor and Johnie Hay visited us and preached a few sermons last week. They left us Monday, Bro. Aylor going to San Antonio and Bro. Hay returning home. On Wednesday we received a phone message to come at once to Bro. Hay's, that he was dead. He died very suddenly, in about thirty minutes after he was taken with a severe headache. I suppose he had congestion of the brain. He leaves a wife and four children, besides a host of friends to mourn his early demise. He was a splendid young man and preacher. It was through the writer that he was called and ordained to the office of elder a few years ago. He died in the harness and service of the Master.

The writer baptized five promising young people, all quite grown but one girl of about ten years. While we move slowly, we move all the same.

We attended and conducted the funeral-services of Bro. Johnie Hay, near Hearne, Texas. The large turnout at the funeral showed the respect the people had for him. The outsiders also regretted his death very much indeed.

We have an appointment to preach next Monday at Cookes Point and on the first Saturday night and Sunday at the Texas Central Branch. I learn that Sr. Lula Vanleave, wife of Bro. Albert Vanleave, died very suddenly. They lived in Johnson County, this State. There are many sudden deaths in our parts. It bespeaks to us the importance of being always ready, and in order to be so we should live every day as we would when we come to die, or when we stand in the judgment before the Judge of the quick and the dead.

I am still a poor, unworthy servant in the faith once delivered to the Saints and in the conflict until the battle is over.

E. W. NUNLEY.

MACHIAS, Maine, June 19, 1909.

Editors Herald: I arrived at this city May 27, tired and weary of our two thousand mile ride. I found that our chapel, built forty years ago by that faithful worker, T. W. Smith, was in a bad condition; the roof needed shingling and the plastering was badly damaged on the ceiling. I called for help by donation at once, and had all I asked for. Men that did not belong to the church dropped their work in the field and with their tools came and helped me fix up the chapel. Joseph Foss, Joseph Farnsworth, George Bartow, and John Shoppy gave the shingles. Herry Mealey, John Enylee, and Tommy Foss gave the nails; George, Joseph, and William E. Johnson, Tom Quinn, Benjamin Blyther, Harel and Samuel Bryant, George Manchester, Vinal McCaleb, and Irvin Foss helped me on the house. We took up a collection and bought the lime and cement.

I have held seven meetings here to a full house, with the best of attention and fine order. Many are very much interested. I found many of the dear Saints had passed into the great beyond, and the few that remain are looking onward, in hope of reaching the better land. Bro. Emery C. Foss is still standing up for the faith that was delivered to him forty years ago. I met with two of my brothers, S. O. and Francis, and I am pleased to say that I find them sound and firm in the faith. I preach at Mason's Bay next Sunday, and then I go to Jonesport to attend conference on the 26th and 27th. I will try my best, while here, to build up and advance the interest of our noble cause.

Yours truly,

J. C. FOSS.

BISBEE, Arizona, June 21, 1909.

Dear Herald: A little band of Saints at this place have bought a little church and have been struggling hard to pay for it. The sisters have for several months been making aprons and fancy work to sell at a bazaar about the middle of July to try and pay off a part of the debt. Any one having a piece of fancy work or anything that would sell at the bazaar could help along a worthy work by sending it to the bazaar not later than the 12th of July. Sr. Anna Lamb is president of the Ladies' Aid Society, Box 1829.

I find a nice little band of Saints here who are struggling to get the latter-day work before the citizens of this town. I like my new field very well, but at present do not see much opportunity of reaching many others except our own people. But I am struggling with the problem and with the Lord's help will study it out some way. I was never in a place yet, but I became master of the situation before I left, and am confident of results here. Expect to try the suburbs first and the main town later. The main difficulty I see is the extreme indifference to religion of any kind. Several other churches are having as hard a struggle as we. There does not seem to be so very much prejudice here. We are purchasing a folding organ for street-work.

Any one having friends or relatives here would help along with the work if they would send me a letter of introduction to them. My address for the conference year is Bisbee, Arizona, Box 1922.

Very kindly,

J. W. PETERSON.

GOODERHAM, Ontario, June 18, 1909.

Dear Herald: It is sometime since I have written to your columns, though I often think of it. I love to read the many letters and home training. I always read that and "Leaves from a life." It is good to read the experiences of others; it helps along the way. We all have different experiences in life and it is a help to others.

It is over twenty years since I heard the gospel. I received it with joy though I had many things to meet. Friends were all against it, but I am thankful I ever obeyed the truth. My sister and myself, of our family, were the only ones to receive the glad news, and she has passed away. Last fall we had J. T. Thompson with us for awhile and he baptized my sister and her daughter. He was here this spring and baptized my brother and wife, brother-in-law, daughter, and two others. It made our hearts glad to see so many more added to our numbers. We were a few struggling Saints, and for years just holding our own. Now we have a nice Sunday-school. We have moved it over to the schoolhouse. A few outsiders attend and we hope there will be more. I feel to rejoice in the angel's message. We ought to be glad we have come out from under that cloud of darkness and have been planted in the glorious light of the gospel, when we see the spiritual drunkenness that Isaiah spoke of.

I hope we may all strive to do the will of the Father, that we may obtain unto that life that reaches beyond this vale of tears. Ever praying for the redemption of Zion, I remain,

Your sister in bonds,

HATTIE M. LAKE.

GOODERHAM, Ontario, June 12, 1909.

Dear Editors Herald: Our hearts have been made glad by the presence of our missionary in charge, Elder J. T. Thompson, in our midst, who has been holding a series of meetings for two weeks. He has baptized six noble souls into the kingdom of God. At the confirmation we were all made to feel that the Spirit of the Lord was in our midst to own and bless. One young brother that has been a prodigal son for three years went out and wept like a child. He said, "My mother has gone, I know to a good place, and I have not lived as I should. You don't know how bad I feel."

J. T. Thompson lost no time while here, but made a specialty of visiting Saints and outsiders, making lots of friends to the work. One noble woman and her husband that had never heard the gospel preached in its fullness before, invited him to their home and fed him and gave him money, fulfilling the word of the Lord when he said, "When they feed you and give you money, by this ye shall know they are my disciples." Surely the Lord will reward them for this righteous act. May God bless them in their investigation and that before long they will see the necessity of obeying the gospel and rejoice in the angel's message.

There are others here that will yet see the light if we are faithful. Our branch is presided over by Elder Jacob Staley, who is always trying to do his duty to the church and the Saints.

We are proud of the work accomplished by Bishop R. C. Evans in Toronto. It is a power for good in the Canadian Mission. I have met some people out here that heard him preach in the Majestic Theater and said he was a good preacher. His meetings being advertised through the papers gives the public to understand it is worthy of their consideration.

We have taken the HERALD ever since we joined the church, and do not wish to be without it. May God bless the editors and all of the noble Saints that send their words of comfort and cheer to fallen humanity. It is food for thought. Dear Saints, let us try to be faithful, considerate, and prayerful that we may not bring disgrace upon the church of Christ.

CHESTER H. LAKE.

Editors Herald: I desire an interest in the prayers of the Prayer Union and of all the Saints who may read this, that if it is God's will, I may receive health and strength. I have had the la grippe and it has left me with a cough, and I do not feel very strong.

My little boy, of whom I wrote last winter, who had catarrhal pneumonia, and whom the doctor gave up, saying it was consumption, through their prayers and God's mercy has been spared. I took him to the doctor to have his lungs examined and he was surprised to find him so well. Said he never saw a case that recovered so rapidly. He said the lungs were not quite back to their normal condition, but he could not find any broken down tissue.

How glad and thankful I was to know that God had been so merciful and kind to us and that he gave me strength to care for him while he was so sick. Kindly remember him in your prayers that he may be fully restored to health.

Your sister,
MRS. ALEX MELLON.

Editors Herald: It has been a long time since I have seen anything in the HERALD from this part of the Lord's vineyard, so I will write a few lines to let the readers of your columns know we are still struggling for an existence. Although we are few in numbers, we still keep up our prayer and sacrament-meetings the first Sunday of each month at Oran Center Schoolhouse, and the third Sunday of each month at Sr. Clark's in Oelwein. Last Sunday there was preaching by Elder Turner, district president, at Oran Center. Bro. Robert Smith, of Waterloo, Iowa, is branch president, or presiding priest. Bro. H. D. Miller is visiting priest. We have no Sunday-school; as the members are so scattered we can hardly get enough together. We have preaching occasionally, by the elders of the district, which keeps the campfire from going entirely out. I wish we could have Sunday-school, as I have a large family of children, and there are other children of the Saints that need instruction in the doctrines of the church and also in the way of life.

I see by the HERALD of June 23, that the Kewanee, Illinois, and Eastern Iowa districts will have a reunion from the 13th to 22d of August, 1909. May they have a spiritual feast, a pentecostal shower so to speak.

The writer had a little conversation with a restitutionist a short time ago. He wanted to know if we were Mormons. I told him no, but we believed in the divinity of the Book of Mormon and that we are more strongly opposed to polygamy than any other church. I then told him the difference between the Utah church and the Reorganization, and quoted a part of the second chapter of Jacob and told him the Book of Mormon condemned polygamy in stronger terms than the Bible. I promised to exchange literature with him. He gave me an old paper he had in his store. If you will please excuse the blotted condition of the papers that gentleman gave me, I will send them to you. The organization seems to believe in the restitution of this earth to its former condition as it was before the fall of Adam and Eve, somewhat as we do, and that God's people will live on this earth a thousand years.

As ever, your brother in Christ,
JOHN G. HODGES.

SIDNEY, Montana, June 17, 1909.

Editors Herald: As I scan the sacred pages of the HERALD the thought comes to me to write a few lines. Husband and I have been in the church over twelve years and we have never missed one year's subscription for your paper. I could not live contented without it. We have always derived so much good from its pages and now it brings us more joy and comfort, as we are isolated far from our branch and home and many loved ones at Columbus, Ohio. We are away out on the prairies of Montana, living with an uncle, but expect soon to locate somewhere in a home of our own, trusting the good Lord to lead us where he is best pleased. We greatly miss going to church and the association of Saints, but we are not left without his blessed Spirit to comfort and guide and bless us.

I can sweetly sing:

"Alone with Jesus I would be
When with life's care and toil oppressed,
I find in him a refuge sweet,
In which my weary soul may rest."

I feel so thankful to my heavenly Father that I have been accepted of him and have a knowledge of the restored gospel and enjoy its many blessings. I feel many times that I live far beneath its glorious privileges, but my prayer is that I may each day live closer to God and do more for his cause in the future.

Twice since being in the church I seemed near death and all earthly aid seemed to fail. I felt it was better to go than to stay, but through the prayers of faith and in the hands of God's servants, I was restored to health. Other members of my family have been healed when death seemed near and no earthly aid gave any relief. Husband's health has been very poor for some time and there has been much to hinder us, through affliction and trouble, to do much in a financial way; but we are trusting the Giver of all good that we may be able to do more for his cause and hope to live faithfully and uprightly before him. We like the opportunities of the Northwest and like this country so far. We think it better for us and expect soon to locate near some branch of the church, so our children can have the association of Saints and be instructed in the true gospel.

Have had some correspondence with one family of Saints, but have not met any. This brings us to realize more fully that we are all children of one family; and I often think, what a rejoicing time it will be for the faithful to gather at Zion and be in the presence of our dear Savior.

Ever trusting that I may live humbly at his feet and be found worthy to enter in is my prayer,

Your sister in bonds,
MRS. D. S. GREEN.

Extracts from Letters.

Elder E. W. Nunley, writing from Cookes Point, after the close of meetings held at which he had been present, states: "I baptized five nice young people last Sunday, between the ages of ten and twenty-six years. We expect them to make fine members of the church. Two of them were my grandchildren and the only grandchild I have in the church. All my children were baptized into the church when they were young and have all lived consistent members to the present time; one of them has been an elder several years. I organized a Sunday-school of twenty-five members to-day and preached to a good sized audience who gave evidence of feeling a good interest."

Mrs. Lorena Gilliland, of 416 South Bourland Street, Peoria, Illinois, writes that wages for women who go out to work by the day are very good in Peoria, and she will gladly furnish information to any who desire to move to that place. She is trying to arrange to start a boarding house about September 1, and will need some help at that time. She says that she is willing to give a widow with children a good chance if they are willing to work. Any who are interested can write her at the above number.

Elder J. T. Norton, of Brownsburg, Quebec, would like to hear from any Saints living near him. The brother has lately moved there from England.

News From Branches

SAINT LOUIS, MISSOURI.

The quarterly business-meeting of the branch was held the first Tuesday of the month, at which time the following officers were elected for the ensuing term; President, J. A. Tanner; presiding priest, A. W. Smith; teacher, Bro. Jacobs; W. R. Cowlishaw deacon, G. Trowbridge clerk, and the undersigned, correspondent.

District conference convened June 13 and 14 at Lansdowne and a most peaceful session was enjoyed. The Lansdowne Saints are to be commended for their brotherly and sisterly love, evidencing it by noble works. Brn. Paxton, of the missionary force, and Etzenhouser, of Independence, were the speakers.

The Saints of St. Louis were edified and instructed the past month through Brn. Tanner, Archibald, Burgess, and Billinsky.

A district priesthood meeting was held the evening of June 21, at the Rock Church.

The Oak Hill Branch is showing a decided effort toward new life and growth through the energetic and untiring efforts of Bro. S. A. Burgess. He with Bro. Paxton are holding nightly meetings this week and having fair interest.

Since our last report a Religio was organized at Cheltenham, with Bro. C. J. Remington as president. They have quite a nice little band which manifest a lively interest in the work.

The Sunday-school children's day program the morning of the 20th was a decided success. In harmony with the morning's theme the dear little babe of Bro. Paul Ayers and wife was blessed and the collection was taken in gilded cradles by four little girls.

The Bishopric.

APPOINTMENT OF BISHOP'S AGENT.

To the Saints and Friends of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints of the Southern California District: Please take notice, that upon the change of Bishop A. Carmichael from the Southern California District to the work of manager of the Herald Publishing House, Lamoni, Iowa, it has been necessary to appoint an agent for the said California District, and after canvassing the matter with as many of the Saints and officers of said district as I have been able to confer with and the recommendations having been uniform with reference to Bro. Frederick Adam, of Los Angeles, a worthy and proper brother for Bishop's agent, this will give due notice of the appointment of Bro. Adam, and I take pleasure in commending him to the Saints and friends of the Southern California District as Bishop's agent for the same.

Bro. Adam will at once take up the line of work of agent in and for the said district and perform all the duties which belong to the office of Bishop's agent in said church. The Bishopric regret that it is necessary for Bishop A. Carmichael of Southern California District to resign in order to perform duties in the Master's work elsewhere, and take pleasure in commending the work that he has performed during his incumbency of the office of Bishop's agent, and also that of Bishop, and feel confident that the Lord will continue to bless and prosper him in his labors in the work that lies before him.

Especially asking the coöperation and assistance of all the Saints and friends in behalf of the new agent, Bro. Adam, whose address is 1714 New England Avenue, Los Angeles, and asking that the special blessing of the Lord may be with each one in the performance of duty in the work the present year, so that all may be fully commended of the Lord for faithfulness to the trust he has committed, I am

In behalf of the Bishopric,

INDEPENDENCE, Missouri, July 1, 1909.

Quorum of High Priests.

MEETINGS.

The only opportunity afforded the high priests to meet with their quorum is during the time of the General Conference; during this time one or more sessions are held each day, or when not interfering with their other duties.

One purpose of quorum organization is for mutual improvement. By an interchange of thought the members may aid each other in learning their duties and better qualify themselves for ministerial work. At least, we so understand it, hence the character of our quorum meetings have been largely along educational lines. Papers are read, questions submitted, and suggestions offered; so that our meetings have not only been interesting but instructive as well.

It has been a question with some of our members how to make this work more effective, especially in reaching those who were not able to attend our sessions. Two years ago we tried publishing a quorum annual. This was found to be too expensive for the amount of good accomplished. This year several suggestions were offered; when it was finally decided that the officers of the quorum, together with the secretaries be authorized to select and offer for publication in HERALD and Ensign such matter as was thought to be of general interest. In this way we can reach not only our own members, but many others who might be equally interested.

With this explanation the readers of the HERALD and Ensign will understand why there is published from time to time some of the questions considered by the High Priests' Quorum.

F. G. PITT, President.

Resolutions of Condolence.

Whereas, It has pleased our heavenly Father to remove from this life our beloved brother and co-worker, Albert Giesch, and,

Resolved, That we, the First Quorum of Teachers, do hereby express to the bereaved wife and family our heartfelt sympathy and condolence. Be it further Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the family of our brother; also to the SAINTS' HERALD and Zion's Ensign.

Pastoral.

To the Saints in St. Louis and Southern Illinois Districts: As I am again placed in charge, I desire to again have the cooperation of the Saints in both districts. We have one more missionary than last year. All of them were in the field early and are doing good work, but some of them are troubled when they hear from their loved ones at home and know the church is behind with family allowances two and three months. Just think, dear Saints, how it tries the faith of both the good wife and the missionary. It takes faith in God, also in the Saints, for a missionary and his family to continue this year after year. Now, you can help ease that load by sending your tithing and offerings. Do not wait until you save up a large sum; send what you have. The address of agent for St. Louis District is R. Archibald, 5741 Garfield Avenue, St. Louis, Missouri; agent for Southern Illinois, F. M. Davis, Thomsonville, Illinois, R. F. D. 6; also remember the Southern Illinois reunion will be held at Springerton commencing July 30. Let us hear who are coming. Fine shade, water, and pasture for stock; prominent speakers; do not fail to come. My mission address is 2941 Thomas Street, St. Louis, Missouri. HENRY SPARLING.

FORBIS LAND COMPANY, or FRANK CRILEY, INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

Honorable Benjamin B. Lindsey, the famous juvenile court judge of Colorado, "hands down" an opinion on the cigarette that ought to make people think: "I have been in the juvenile court nearly ten years, and in that time I have had to deal with thousands and thousands of boys who have disgraced themselves and their parents, and who have brought sorrow and misery into their lives; and I do not know of any one habit that is more responsible for the troubles of these boys than the vile cigarette habit."—The Sunday School Times.

by asking, "What was it that ye disputed among yourselves by the way?"

There was no answer. Even Peter was silent. They suddenly saw the question in a new light and were ashamed. In the presence of the Serene Man they saw that they by their conduct had humiliated themselves as a quorum and as men. They had disputed by the way as to which one among them should be the greatest.

It was not necessary that any man should answer his question because he knew what they had been doing, and again it must have been impressed upon his mind that the spirit of the world, which is one of selfish, personal ambition would try hard to force itself into his church. The policy of the world, in politics, business, and society, is to seek to build self up first; His philosophy was different and had been admirably stated thus, "But seek ye first to build up the kingdom of God and to establish his righteousness."—Matthew 6: 33, I. T.

So he sat down and called all the Twelve about him and taught them, "If any man desire to be first, the same shall be last of all, and servant of all."—Mark 9: 35. He struck a hard blow at that base craving to be preëminent for the mere sake of being conspicuous or in a position to receive adulation. But he did not say a word against the unselfish ambition to be of service, to be at work, to be active. He made service the basis of greatness. The object is to help others; the indirect result is the development of a great character in one's self.

Christ as a man was that kind of man that could look right over thrones and titles and through gold lace and uniforms into the heart of the man himself. "What of the man?" was his disconcerting question. Concerning promotion in his own church and kingdom he made this statement: "Whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased; and he that shall humble himself shall be exalted."—Matthew 23: 12.

From the utterances already quoted we obtain the idea that a proper frame of mind consists in being willing and anxious to serve Christ and our fellow men and entirely willing to leave it to God to place us where in his wisdom we can best serve. Therein is found the only true and laudable ambition and aspiration; it may include a desire to be capable,

SOME MISTAKES.

II. PERSONAL AMBITION.

A group of men were journeying along the road toward Capernaum. They were the Twelve Apostles of the Lamb. But one might not have realized that fact by listening to their conversation. It was not that occasion when men took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus. There were disputations and strife among them. No doubt bystanders hearing them shrugged their shoulders and condemned the Master because of the conduct of his followers. It was then as it is now.

Presently they came to the end of the journey, into the house in Capernaum. Jesus was fully aware of their strife, how we do not know. Possibly he had overheard it, or their angry countenances may have betrayed them, or he may have understood intuitively, as he so often did. At least he understood, as he does to-day, and when they were come into the house he took them abruptly off their guard efficient, and powerful; but it must exclude any craving for advancement simply to gratify self, something that is base and unworthy of a disciple of Christ. The disciples of old realized that fact very plainly when they came face to face with Christ on this question of who is greatest; his followers realize it most keenly to-day when his Spirit is present in power.

It is only when we are in a degree of darkness that we begin to contend one with another about that question and to become unduly anxious regarding our rights and prerogatives as officers or members in the church. When there is love, unity, humility, and courtesy among the ministry they can labor together without a jar. When love, unity, humility, and courtesy are absent the question of authority, of preëminence, of presidency arises to disturb their serenity, and no conference resolutions can ever be drafted grading their priesthood and authority so explicitly and outlining their rights of precedence so nicely that they can work harmoniously. It is the Spirit that maketh alive. When brethren prefer one another there are no acrimonious struggles for preëminence such as occurred on the road to Capernaum and at times since that day.

Yet from time to time this question of greatness has arisen in the church, always to the injury of the work when an attempt has been made to settle it by human force and wisdom. When the Saints assembled at the memorable conference in Zarahemla, April 6, 1853, it threatened for a time the further progress of the Reorganization. Unity did not obtain until the Devil had been rebuked and the Spirit of God came flooding in as on the Day of Pentecost. The Lord then made it known to the elders that he had left them alone for a little time that they might discover their own weakness and learn to rely on his wisdom.

It is one of the deplorable features of this latter-day work that following the martyrdom of Joseph Smith so many men aspired to the office of president of the church, and that in so many instances the welfare of the church was ruthlessly sacrificed in the interest of selfish ambition. There were literally dozens of men who immediately began to lay their plans to secure that position for themselves, or some favorite friend on whose patronage they could rely, apparently unconscious that it rested with God to indicate the successor, as he had done and would again do at the proper time. That fact, with others that are a matter of record and observation, would argue that the idea of priesthood is not properly understood.

Priesthood (authority from God) is not given to gratify the pride of the individual, that he may be appointed to a place of honor, ease, or gain. It is not given that the recipient may become an overlord and exercise dominion, oppressing his fellows. It is given to convey the right as well as the power to coöperate with God in a particular way in saving those who are lost, and it may bring humiliation, poverty, suffering, and apparent degradation. Instead of conveying lordship it sometimes puts the recipient in a position where he is subject to a thousand criticisms and annoyances and must cheerfully bear for the sake of the work interferences that other men will not tolerate.

We now quote words written by Joseph Smith and his comrades while in Liberty jail:

There are many called but few are chosen, and why are they not chosen? Because their hearts are set upon the things of the world and are aspiring to the honors of men; they do not learn the lesson that the rights, of the priesthood, are inseparably connected with the powers of heaven; and that the powers of heaven can not be controlled nor handled, only upon the principles of righteousness, that they may be conferred upon us, it is true, but when we undertake to cover our sins, to gratify our pride, vain ambition, or to exercise dominion or compulsion over the souls of the children of men, in any degree of unrighteousness; behold the heavens withdraw themselves, the Spirit of the Lord is grieved, then amen to the priesthood, or to the authority of that man; behold ere he is aware, he is left to kick against the prick; to persecute the saints, and to fight against God. We have learned by sad experience, that it is the nature and disposition of almost all men, as soon as they get a little authority, as they suppose, to begin to exercise unrighteous dominion, hence many are called but few are chosen. No power or influence can, or ought to be maintained by virtue of the priesthood, only by persuasion, by long suffering, by gentleness, by meekness and by love unfeigned; without hypocrisy, and without guile: reproof with sharpness when moved upon by the Holy Ghost, and afterwards showing forth an increase of love towards him whom thou hast reproofed, lest he esteem thee to be his enemy, so that he may know, that thy faithfulness is stronger than the cords of death.—Times and Seasons, volume 1, no. 9.

Christ said, "As my father hath sent me, even so send I you." God sent Christ into the world to give it his love, service, and sacrifice. He never oppressed any one, and though he possessed authority, and used it, he never flaunted that fact in the faces of the people. Titles could not add to his greatness; their absence could not detract therefrom. That fact is true, in a sense, of his followers to-day; and in an aside we may venture the statement that the church members usually size a man up pretty well and know rather accurately what he amounts to as a man, irrespective of his title; they may be mistaken in some cases, or for a little while, but not as a rule.

It is certainly a mistake for one to become proud and lifted up because he has been called for a few short years or days to occupy in some place of trust in the church. Let us consider. The work grows in magnitude and the years roll on one after the other, in a little while the ambitious one is dead or forgotten, or both. A younger generation comes on that knew him not. No one remembers him, excepting his

God; and to him we must all look for final resurrection, reward, and exaltation. How foolish then to inflate ourselves and listen for a little passing applause, a pattering of hands that is soon hushed. How much better to be humble and live for the notice and approval of the Eternal One who will reward us when the hands that now applaud are fallen into decay. Flattery may be sweet, but remember its nature. Crabb, in English Synonyms says, "Flatter, in French flatter comes from flatus, breath, signifying to say that which is light as air."

It is a mistake for one to set his eyes on some particular office in the church and strive by devious ways, to obtain it. It matters not whether it be the office of apostle, high priest, seventy, elder, priest, teacher, or deacon. We should contentedly do our work to-day, trusting our future in the hands of our God; though we concede at this point that one may be justified in asking God to increase one's personal power for good and to open the way that one may occupy in some place, best known to him above, where he can use his abilities to the fullest extent, in the service of humanity. Such an ambition is neither personal nor base. It is in line with the permission that Christ gives us to seek true greatness by way of great service.

In closing we quote from the charge given to the Twelve Apostles shortly after the organization of that quorum at Kirtland, Ohio. (See Church History, volume 1, page 544.) We italicise certain portions that emphasize the need of humility, explain the object of priesthood, and instruct in regard to prayerfulness. The advice is excellent for the consideration of all the ministry, as it will apply quite generally. Oliver Cowdery delivered the charge, and in the course of his address was impressed to utter the following:

With regard to superiority I must make a few remarks. The ancient apostles sought to be great; but lest the seeds of discord be sown in this matter, understand particularly the voice of the Spirit on this occasion. God does not love you better or more than others. You are to contend for the faith once delivered to the saints. Jacob, you know, wrestled till he obtained. It was by fervent prayer and diligent search that you have obtained the testimony you are now able to bear. You are as one; you are equal in bearing the keys of the kingdom to all nations. You are called to preach the gospel of the Son of God to the nations of the earth; it is the will of your heavenly Father, that you proclaim his gospel to the ends of the earth, and the islands of the sea.

Be zealous to save souls. The soul of one man is as precious as the soul of another. You are to bear this message to those who consider themselves wise; and such may persecute you; they may seek your life. The adversary has always sought the life of the servants of God; you are therefore to be prepared at all times to make a sacrifice of your lives, should God require them in the advancement and building up of his cause. Murmur not at God. Be always prayerful; be always watchful. You will bear with me while I relieve the feelings of my heart. We shall not see another day like this; the time has fully come, the voice of the Spirit has come, to set these men apart.

You will see the time when you will desire to see such a day as this, and you will not see it. Every heart wishes you peace and prosperity, but the scene with you will inevitably change. Let no man take your bishopric; and beware that you lose not your crowns. It will require your whole souls, it will require courage like Enoch's.

JEWES CONCERNED IN THE DISCOVERY OF AMERICA.

According to the Book of Mormon, Lehi and family, people of Israelitish descent, at one time discovered and peopled this land of America. Nephi in a vision saw the destruction of this people and later on beheld how the Spirit moved upon another man, evidently Columbus, to cross the great waters and re-discover the land. It should not be surprising if it is discovered that some of Nephi's own countrymen were intimately concerned in that expedition. In this connection the following from an authentic Jewish source will be read with interest:

Jews were instrumental in making the voyage of Columbus possible. Negotiations between the navigator and Ferdinand and Isabella, the king and queen of Spain, had been suspended when the Jewish favorite of Ferdinand, Luis de Santangel, chancellor of the royal household of Aragon, induced them to lend favorable consideration once again to the appeal of Columbus. He himself advanced seventeen thousand ducats out of his own fortune, for which he would not accept interest, towards fitting out Columbus' first expedition. The discovery of this fact has destroyed the century-old legend that Queen Isabella pawned her jewels to secure the money for the equipment of the expedition of Columbus, and led the late Professor Herbert B. Adams, of the Johns Hopkins University, to coin the epigram, "Not jewels, but Jews, were the real financial basis of the first expedition of Columbus." It was undoubtedly because of the assistance given him by Santangel that Columbus wrote him the first detailed account of his voyage. This was in the form of a letter written by Columbus on February 15, 1493, from the Azores, where the navigator stopped on his homeward voyage.

A kinsman of Santangel, Gabriel Sanches, is also mentioned in connection with this matter of furnishing financial aid for the expedition. It was, without doubt, in recognition of his obligation to Sanches also that Columbus addressed to him from Lisbon a similar letter describing his discoveries. Sanches published this letter in Barcelona.

The first European who set foot on American soil was a Jew by birth, Luis de Torres, the interpreter of the expedition of Columbus. He settled in Cuba and lived there the remainder of his life. He was the first European to discover the use of tobacco.

Doctor M. Kayserling, who pointed out these facts in his book, "Christopher Columbus and the Participation of the Jews in the Spanish and Portuguese Discoveries," mentions a number of other persons of Jewish descent among those who sailed with Columbus on his epoch-making voyage, viz: Alonso de la Calle, Rodrigo Sanches, and Maestre Bernal, the ship's surgeon.

There is also an indirect connection between the Jews and the second expedition of Columbus. One of the most infamous acts in history was the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492; the property of these unfortunates was confiscated by the government, and from the sale thereof the funds for the equipment of the second expedition were secured.

A further connection between the Jews and the discovery of America lies in the striking fact that the expulsion of the Jews from Spain, the most disastrous event in Jewish experience since the destruction of Jerusalem, and the discovery of the land which was destined to prove their refuge from the persecutions of the Old World, both took place in the same year; aye, still stranger, on August second, the expelled Jews sailed from Barcelona, exiles from home, going they knew not to what fate, and on the very next day, August third, the ships of Columbus set sail from that same port, to discover a new home for the homeless exiles; the departing Jews saw without doubt the crews of Columbus' ships preparing for their departure.

The coincidence of these events impressed Columbus himself, for he wrote in his diary (it will be noted that by a slip he wrote January for August): "After the Spanish monarchs had expelled all the Jews from all their kingdoms and lands in January, in that same month they commissioned me to undertake the voyage to India with a properly equipped fleet."—From Tract No. 2, issued by Central Conference of American Rabbis, Cincinnati, Ohio, entitled, The Jew in America, by Rabbi David Philipson.

It will be noticed that each one of these articles deals with a subject that in itself is of striking interest. Each subject is handled by a competent writer. The articles are illustrated with suitable half-tones and etchings.

In addition to the mere statement of historical fact the reader gets the benefit of a philosophical discussion of its meaning by a student of personality and mature thought.

The entire series covers the history of the church quite comprehensively up to the death of Joseph and Hyrum Smith. A second series of articles to appear at a later date will take up the history of the Reorganization, and events between the years 1844 and 1851.

The editors feel that they are prepared to offer the Saints something of unusual interest in this series and ask your coöperation in the way of securing new subscribers so that we may reach a larger audience with these facts regarding the latter-day work.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

Among the recent valuable additions to Grace-land's Library in an indefinite loan of fifty-four handsomely bound volumes, including the following sets: Historians' History of the World, twenty-five volumes, three quarter morocco; Library of Oratory, fifteen volumes; Half-hours with Great Authors, by Knight, six volumes; Great Travelers, eight volumes. These were loaned by a brother who wishes to aid the college in a material way, but who modestly requests that if his loan be published his name be withheld. The example thus set in strengthening the college library would seem commendable. Professor Fitzpatrick, the librarian, states that he often has rare opportunities to purchase complete sets of valuable works. Those not having books to give might well place a few dollars at his disposal and aid in a most definite manner.

LAMONI ITEMS.

Lamoni Saints are pleased to welcome Bro. Gomer Wells and family who have just arrived from Australia. Bro. Wells returns from that far-off land after fifteen years of missionary work. He expects to live in Lamoni and will labor in the Nodaway District, Missouri.

The stake bishopric was in charge Sunday morning, Bishop Anderson occupying. In the evening Elder Gomer Wells addressed the Saints on the condition of the work and people in Australia.

Last week's rains played havoc with our railroad service, there being several serious washouts on both sides of Lamoni. Consequently we have received very little mail for a few days.

"For the word of God is living and active and sharper than any two-edged sword."

"Make every occasion a great occasion, for you can not tell who may be taking your measure for a larger place."

When a certain Roman once said, "Father, my sword is too short," the parent replied: "My son, add a step to it."

The Straight Road

THE MARK OF THE HIGH CALLING IN CHRIST JESUS.

Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect: but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus. Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before. I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.—Philippians 3: 12-14.

What constitutes the mark of the high calling of God, and how can it be reached? is a question that perhaps troubles some and might well be asked. And we suggest that to reach an end there must first be a beginning. To end right means to begin right, and then continue right all the way.

To the mind of the writer the mark of the high calling of God is the attaining to a "perfect man to the measure of the fullness of the stature of Christ," and to attain to his fullness requires a constant development; it is not reached without a remarkable growth.

To reach Christ in the finality we must discover first the way in which to develop, find if possible how he developed, and mark his example and precept in the matter.

Jesus said, "Ye must be born again," and a birth signifies the ushering in of a new life; but before there can be a birth there must first be a begetting, as there could be no birth without it, and so we read: "Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth."—James 1: 18. That is, God by his word begins to quicken within us the new birth.

We hear the "word of God which by the gospel is preached unto us," and it begins to quicken the spiritual man. By proper care the germ that is implanted begins to grow and is nurtured and in due time the birth will take place and we are "born again of water and of the Spirit," i. e., we have now repented of our sins through hearing the preached word, and with faith in God we enter the waters of baptism as have been shown us by our Lord (Matthew 3: 15, 16), being baptized by one sent of God. (See John 1: 6.) We then receive the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, by the laying on of hands (Acts 8: 17). Thus we become a new creature, a babe in Christ, for we have just been born; hence, we are not yet a perfect man, but a perfect babe in Christ.

As it becomes necessary for new born babes to have tender care until they are able to care for themselves, so also is it necessary for us to be nurtured in the word of truth, until we are able to walk about and defend ourselves against the ills that may be brought to bear against us.

A babe may be a perfect child and yet it is weak and very helpless, but as it is nurtured it grows and soon begins to play and prattle, and in the course of time is able to sit up; finally it begins to creep about and in course of time can stand by a chair, and after having been on its feet long enough, begins to try to walk, by first reaching from one chair to another, and finally begins to walk alone. It has a good many falls, but it gets right up and tries again until it has developed into a perfect man physically, after years of growth and experience.

Now will anything short of the same kind of growth and development spiritually bring us to the stature of Christ spiritually? Let us remember then, that when we enter the church we are not yet perfect men and women, but merely babes in Christ, susceptible to spiritual growth and development, just as the natural child is to the natural growth. If we fall when we begin to walk, let us not become discouraged, but get right up and try again; exercise and develop our spiritual man until we have reached the mark of the high calling of God. That is evidently what the Apostle Paul had in mind when he said, "not as though I had already attained neither were already perfect." No, far from it. We might be a perfect child, but manhood is not yet reached, and so when he (Paul) said, "forgetting those things that are behind and reaching forward," he evidently intended that we should forget our childish things; pass beyond the little things of infancy, and as we become schooled in the Spirit of Christ, let us leave off the childish things until we have put them all away and reach forward and strive for that which is before us, which the apostle calls the "prize of the high calling of God."

It can be reached by growing in grace and strength and a knowledge of God; and we must therefore feed upon those things that will give us the proper vigor and life until we have reached the object of our creation, a full grown man, fully developed, and rounded out; having attained to a perfect character in every sense, attaining to the prize, "having apprehended that for which we are also apprehended of Christ Jesus," a perfect man having reached the stature of the fullness of Christ, not physically, but morally and spiritually.

Christ died that we might live and that we might have a more abundant life.

Do we want that life abundant?

It is ours if we choose to have it, and so far as we fail in reaching that mark of the high calling of God, so far has Jesus died in vain for us. He will not compel us to have more than we are willing to receive.

NEPHITE APOSTLES. OBJECTIONS CONSIDERED.

If any of the HERALD readers are still in doubt on this question, they are kindly requested to re-read "Nephite Apostles," as found in the HERALD for December 30, 1908, pages 1257, 1258, 1259. Also HERALD for February 3, 1909, pages 103, 104. These two brethren wrote independently of each other, neither one having any knowledge that the other had written, was writing, or would write on the question of Nephite apostles, yet the two articles are perfectly harmonious. This is not strange.

After reading these articles, please compare carefully with articles written on the other side of the question and published recently in the SAINTS' HERALD. This will help you to form correct conclusions, which is always important. One thing should not be overlooked, namely, that there is no proposition which is susceptible of demonstration by evidence, but what a negative argument can be formed against it. I presume this very thought occupied the mind of one of the writers referred to, when he made the following statement:

"So at times some of us form conclusions or assume positions that can only be supported by argument; but, individually, I must have proof as well."

When one of our most able opponents, an intelligent minister, by the way, was about to deliver nine lectures on infidelity, at Woodbine, Iowa, in May, 1891, he realized that he was about to meet a mass of negative argument against Christianity, hence gave expression to the following truths:

"It takes no intelligence to tear down a system, or to abuse people. A child can ask more questions in a few moments than a philosopher can answer in a lifetime." So the only proper way is to give to objections a fair consideration, so that, if possible, we may determine what degree of merit, if any, they possess.

We believe that God did choose, ordain, commission, and establish in the Nephite church, on this continent, through Jesus Christ, twelve apostles, in like manner as he did on the Eastern Continent. To this position certain objections are urged, though much of the evidence adduced in support of it is left untouched.

1. As a fundamental objection, and one which is sufficient of itself (if valid) to overthrow every claim made in favor of Nephite apostles, we are told that some offices in the church of Christ are limited, others unlimited. "The first presidency, the apostolic office, that of the seventy, and the presiding bishop belong to the first class; while that of the high priest, the elder, priest, teacher and deacon, belong to the latter class." Then we are told that the first presidency is limited to three, the apostolic office to twelve, that of the seventy to four hundred and ninety, "that of the leading bishopric to three." The argument based on this statement is, therefore, that there could be no first presidency, apostles, seventy, or presiding bishopric in the Nephite church; while there could be any number of high priests, elders, priests, teachers, and deacons, "as necessity or the magnitude of the work demands."

We are also told (and the statement is consistent with the position assumed) that these limited offices are the very ones which "are so conspicuous by their absence in the organization of the church here in America." If the position is a correct one, and has been correctly stated by the brother, we frankly admit the argument to be conclusive. But let us see. It will be noticed that the position is simply assumed, no evidence being presented or cited. What an easy way this is to overthrow (?) an important claim, and that, too, when the very premise of the argument is being presented.

Where is the evidence that the apostolic office is limited to twelve? Notice, the argument is made on the office, not the quorum, except incidentally. But let it be office or quorum, or both, we want the proof. It is true that Christ placed twelve apostles in the New Testament church, but did he say there can be no more? With no such prohibition, and with the New Testament history favoring the belief that there were more than twelve apostles at the same time, the argument is seen to be far from conclusive.

Paul and Barnabas were apostles. (See Acts 14:14.) Andronicus and Junia were probably apostles. (Romans 16:7.) James, the Lord's brother, was an apostle, though not one of the first twelve. (Galatians 1:19.) Silvanus and Timothy were also apostles, as shown by 1 Thessalonians 1:1; 2:6. That some of these apostles were coexistent with the twelve, is evident from Paul's statement found in 1 Corinthians 15:5-7. Paul says in this statement, that Christ "was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve," after that by more than five hundred. Still later, he was seen of James, (evidently the Lord's brother) "then of all the apostles." We have more than twelve apostles in the church at the present time.

In the revelation of April, 1906, Joseph Luff of the twelve is designated as "a medical director and physician to the church," etc., with this closing statement concerning his ministerial office: "And this my servant Joseph Luff may do and retain and exercise his apostleship."—Doctrine and Covenants 127:2. Three years later Bro. Luff was released from the quorum of twelve, but not from his apostleship. "My servant Joseph Luff can not fulfill the duties of a member of the quorum of twelve in actively looking after and caring for the missionary work in the field and discharge the duties of his calling as a physician ministering to the many seeking his advice and aid with safety to himself and others. It is wise therefore that the church release him from the responsibilities of the active apostleship as a member of the quorum, that he may act unreservedly in his calling. Another may be chosen to the office in the quorum. He has been faithful, and his record and reward are in my hand."—Doctrine and Covenants 129: 2.

I have emphasized certain words with the purpose of making plain the fact that there is no contradiction between the wording of the two revelations, as quoted; but if in the last one he was released from the apostleship, the contradiction exists. Bro. Luff was therefore released from the active duties of apostleship, in the quorum, but he was not released from the authority and responsibility of the apostolic office. Heman C. Smith was released in like manner, and still holds the office of apostle. We might name a number of others, but these are sufficient. Under existing conditions, honorable release from active duty in that office has been granted to them and others, while at the same time, other and new responsibilities are added, under which, of course, they are required to be faithful. It is a change in the duties of their calling, but the apostleship remains.

It may be said that though the apostolic office is not limited, yet the quorum is. There can only be one quorum of twelve apostles in the church of God at the same time. We readily admit that one quorum of twelve apostles in the church of Christ, is the true order of organization, but we deny that God can not or will not organize his church whenever and wherever it is impossible for them to get the full benefits resulting from the divine order, without such organization. Who will try to defend the position that God, the Infinite One, has so arranged his work that the church in Palestine, nineteen hundred years ago, and the church in America, in our day, could have the full benefits of the divine order, but the Nephite church in America could not? Can such a view be made to harmonize with the justice and impartiality of God?

Our position has been plainly stated. Wherever the church is organized by the authority of Jesus Christ, and according to the divine order, governing herself by the word of God and the Holy Spirit, there is the church of God, whether located in Palestine, America, the "North Country," Mars or Jupiter. This is the "one body." Fact is greater than mere inference, and especially when the inference is not legitimate. It is a fact that Jesus Christ chose twelve men from among the Nephites, ordained them, made them his leading witnesses and ministers, gave them the same kind of commission that he gave to the original twelve, sent them out to do the same kind of work. And as has been shown, this was kept intact for at least a hundred years. How shall we treat these facts?

If the negative argument referred to is a good one, then there were not only high priests and elders in the Nephite church, but also priests, teachers, and deacons, as we have them to-day. Has it been proved that these were in the church? True, we read of priests and teachers in the Book of Mormon, but do the terms necessarily imply the specific offices of priest and teacher, or are they simply used in a general sense? In this general sense, all Christ's ministers are priests and teachers. We do not deny that there were priests and teachers in the Nephite church, but it has not been proved, nor is the evidence contained in the Book of Mormon conclusive. But what about deacons? So far as I know they are never once mentioned in the Book of Mormon. Who will furnish us a scrap of evidence from the Book of Mormon, which proves that there were deacons in the Nephite church? The presiding bishop and his two counselors are placed with the limited offices. But is it not a fact that the office of bishop is no more limited in any sense, than that of high priest? There is no more provision for duplicating the presidency of the high priests' quorum, than there is for duplicating the presiding bishopric. And so far as the number of bishops is concerned, it is governed by the demand, the same as high priests, elders, priests, teachers, and deacons. And yet, fatal as it is to this supposedly strong premise, the Book of Mormon makes no mention of bishops in the Nephite church.

Now the matter seems to stand like this: The proof for priests and teachers in the Nephite church, except in the general sense of ministers of Christ, is inconclusive. No bishops, no deacons, so far as shown by the Book of Mormon, though all these are found among the unlimited offices. And we are urged to believe that the twelve disciples whom Jesus chose, ordained and commissioned to preach in all the world, were not apostles, while at the same time, we must believe that there were priests, teachers, and deacons in the church; and, putting this logic with the fact that the office of bishop is unlimited, we are required to believe that there were also bishops in the church.

It will be understood that though the argument and logic may be ever so good, if they rest upon an unsound premise, the whole position is bad and dangerous. It is like putting good material and workmanship into a building which rests on an unsound foundation. The structure is liable to fall at any time. If the material and workmanship are also poor, it is so much the worse in one sense, but, on the other hand, the building is not nearly so liable to deceive the people.

2. We quote: "That the apostolic office could not be duplicated is evident from the fact that the quorums of seventy were placed in the church as assistants or substitutes for the twelve apostles. If the twelve apostles could have been increased in number, it would have been done, and there would have been no need for the seventy." We have already shown that the Jerusalem church and the restored church of the last days, did have more than twelve apostles at the same time. But applying this reason to the quorum, and not to individual apostles outside of the quorum, we notice that the rule laid down by the brother, can only be operative where there are available apostles and seventy. It could not apply to the Nephite church and the twelve and seventy at Jerusalem, for the reason that these twelve and seventy at Jerusalem were not in any sense available ministers in the Nephite church. Furthermore, if there could be no quorum of twelve in the Nephite church, there should have been seventy to act as substitutes in the accomplishment of the apostolic work.

It will hardly be claimed, much less attempted to be proved, that when Jesus visited the Nephites there were seven complete quorums of seventy in the church at Jerusalem. Why then did not Jesus ordain some of those legal assistants and substitutes for the apostles? Would not the next and most consistent thing for us to do (after rejecting the claim for Nephite apostles), be to accept the twelve Nephite disciples as twelve seventy, authorized to act as a substitute for the twelve apostles.

3. "The twelve apostles are to labor under the direction of the first presidency. . . . There was no such office in the church here as first presidency, and consequently if these disciples were apostles they were out of harmony with the church organization; and would have no check or restraining power upon them in their work." There is a simple principle in logic which tells us that "that which proves too much, proves nothing." That is, if I undertake to overthrow an opponent's position, or sustain my own, and the evidence adduced overthrows an important part of my own position, then it fails to prove anything for me. If, therefore, the stated reason is against the existence of apostles in the Nephite church, it also forbids the existence of high priests. High priests labor under the direction of the first presidency and twelve, and so far as we know, they need a "check or restraining power upon them in their work," as much as the twelve apostles. Why not? But, we are told, there were no apostles or first presidency in the Nephite church, hence no proper authority to direct or restrain them in their work; consequently, if there were any high priests in the Book of Mormon church, "they were out of harmony with the church organization," and, of course, the claim that there were high priests in that church should be promptly rejected. For proof that high priests labor under the direction of the first presidency and twelve, see Doctrine and Covenants 104: 5; 122: 9; 123: 16.

4. "These Nephite disciples were inferior or subordinate to the twelve apostles at Jerusalem, and were to be judged by them. (See 1 Nephi 3: 26; Mormon 1: 9.) Query: Can a man or party of men sit in judgment upon others without the party judging having superior power or authority over the one judged? We think not." No. 4 is carefully worded, but in my opinion the claim made would have been stronger had this reason never been stated. But as it is, it will materially help us to reach what we believe to be the correct conclusion. First, it should be noted that the question is not whether the twelve at Jerusalem possessed some sort of precedence or superiority over the Nephite twelve, but if they did, does it prove that the Nephite twelve were not apostles? Evidently, because of the age in which they lived and the peculiarities of part of their work, they have precedence over the Nephite twelve and the latter-day twelve as well. Peter, James, and John hold precedence over the first presidency of the latter days, but they held no higher office. Joseph the Seer, though holding the same office as his successor, necessarily holds precedence in several respects. Adam was a high priest, patriarch, and prophet. In Doctrine and Covenants 104: 28, we have the following:

"And the Lord appeared unto them, and they rose up and blessed Adam, and called him Michael, the Prince, the Archangel. And the Lord administered comfort unto Adam, and said unto him, I have set thee to be at the head: a multitude of nations shall come of thee; and thou art a prince over them for ever."

From this passage and many others which might be cited, it is easily seen that Adam holds a wonderful precedence over all who should succeed him; and yet there have been many men since Adam's day, who held the same office and authority that he held. Is it not a strange and new rule in jurisprudence, that men can not be judged by their peers? It is not strange that the first twelve should judge the Nephite twelve, for Jesus had promised them they should "sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." (Matthew 19: 28.) The Nephite twelve were a part of the twelve tribes of Israel. The proof texts cited by the brother, show this to be the reason,—not because they were not apostles, but because they were a part of the twelve tribes.

"Behold they are they who shall judge the twelve tribes of Israel: wherefore, [for which reason.—Webster] the twelve ministers of thy seed shall be judged of them: for ye are the house of Israel: and these twelve ministers whom thou beholdest, shall judge thy seed.”—1 Nephi 3:26.

“Yea, behold, I write unto all the ends of the earth; yea, unto you, twelve tribes of Israel, who shall be judged according to your works, by the twelve whom Jesus chose to be his disciples in the land of Jerusalem. And I write also unto the remnant of this people, who shall also be judged by the twelve whom Jesus chose in this land; and they shall be judged by the other twelve whom Jesus chose in the land of Jerusalem.”—Mormon 1:9.

These texts contain much stronger implications in favor of the belief that the Nephite twelve were apostles, than they do in favor of an opposite belief. They also show why the Nephite twelve will be judged by the Jerusalem twelve. Further, they show that the Nephite twelve will judge the remnant of the Nephites, just as the Jerusalem twelve will judge the twelve tribes of Israel. We also see from the brother's own texts, that the Jerusalem twelve are referred to by the angel as “twelve ministers,” as well as twelve apostles, which is precisely the same language he uses in referring to the Nephite twelve. Mormon refers to each quorum as “the twelve,” and when speaking of one in contradistinction to the other, he simply says “the other twelve,” which he evidently understood to mean just the same as if he had said the other apostles. He also says, when referring to the Jerusalem twelve, “whom Jesus chose to be his disciples,” which certainly favors the belief that the Nephites understood the word disciples, when applied to the quorum of twelve, to mean the same as apostles.

5. This number is on the title of apostle. The writer says that “in the Book of Mormon there are at least a dozen references to the twelve at Jerusalem, and almost invariably they are called apostles.” Is not this statement rather overdrawn? Not intentionally, of course, but, possibly, because of the brother's intense anxiety to overthrow the claim for apostles in the Nephite church. But, even allowing the statement to be correct, it would fall far short of overcoming the amount and character of the evidence which supports a belief in Nephite apostles. It would be putting a mere inference, drawn from the use of an official title, against the evidence which so strongly tends to prove, and we believe does prove, that the office itself was actually held by the Nephite twelve. We are not so particular about what they were called as we are about what they actually were.

Then we are told that “Christ when he chose them called them apostles.” Yes, Luke says he named them apostles, (those sent forth) but it was not necessary then, nor is it necessary now, that they should be called apostles to prove that they hold the apostolic office. Jesus never referred to nor addressed the twelve as apostles, but he did refer to them as disciples, and addressed them as the twelve. (Luke 22:10; John 6:70.)

In the New Testament, the twelve are referred to about sixty times as apostles, fifty-two times as disciples, and twenty times as the twelve. Or about sixty times as apostles, and about seventy-two times as either disciples or the twelve. By the way, the angel of God that heralded the good news of Christ's resurrection, called them twelve disciples, and not apostles. (Matthew 28:7.) The angel who called the Jerusalem twelve apostles, also called them twelve ministers, at the same time that he referred to the Nephite disciples as twelve ministers. (See 1 Nephi 3:26.) Mormon says that Jesus chose the original twelve “to be his disciples,” thus showing that, with the Nephites, the word disciple was used to designate official standing as well as in its ordinary use. He also refers to the two quorums as “the twelve whom Jesus chose in this land,” and “the other twelve whom Jesus chose in the land of Jerusalem.”

The Book of Mormon record of titles applied to the two quorums, respectively, is about as follows: The Jerusalem twelve are called disciples, 1; twelve ministers, 1; twelve, or the twelve, 5; apostles, 14. Thus we see that about one third of the time they were known by other official designations than that of apostle or apostles. The Nephite twelve were known as twelve ministers, 1; the twelve 10; the twelve disciples, or disciples, 22.

This argument on official designation, to be conclusive, must show, that first the Jerusalem twelve were invariably known and referred to as apostles. And, second, that the Nephite twelve were not and could not be known as twelve apostles, when called and referred to as “the twelve disciples” and “the twelve.” Who can show this?

In this connection we call special attention to what was incidentally mentioned before. According to the testimony of the New Testament and the Doctrine and Covenants, no other quorum or council in the church has ever been known or designated as “the twelve” or “the twelve disciples,” except the quorum of twelve apostles. With this evidence before us, and not so much as a hint in the Book of Mormon that the Nephites used these official designations in any other way, what should be our conclusion? Peter, James, and John are nowhere referred to in the New Testament, or in church history, as the first presidency, and yet it is probable that a very large majority of the Saints believe that they were made a first presidency in the primitive church. Peter was just as much of an apostle when he called himself an elder as he was when he called himself an apostle. (1 Peter 5:1.) John was just as much an apostle as Paul, though he always referred to himself as "the elder" or that "other disciple." (2 John 1:1; 3 John 1:1; John 20:2-4).

How do we know that successors to the original twelve were chosen for four hundred years "and they were never called disciples"? As to what the church called them after she had gone far into apostasy, it will hardly count as valid precedent. It is stated that the apostles referred to in Mormon 4:7, "were undoubtedly those at Jerusalem." This statement, couched in less positive terms, is not objectionable. They may have been the apostles at Jerusalem. We fail to see the proof in paragraphs three and four of the same chapter; and as to the statement that "Mormon was writing to the Gentiles," it is only a part of the truth and hence is misleading.

Mormon tells us "that a knowledge of these things must come unto a remnant of this people, and also unto the Gentiles, which the Lord hath said should scatter this people, and this people should be counted as naught among them, therefore I write a small abridgment, daring not to give a full account of the things which I have seen," etc. (Mormon 2:5.) And the next paragraph begins with these words: "And now behold, this I speak unto their seed, and also to the Gentiles," etc.

In chapter 1:9 we are told that he wrote to "the remnant of this people, who shall also be judged by the twelve whom Jesus chose in this land; and they shall be judged by the other twelve whom Jesus chose in the land of Jerusalem." Also to the whole house of Israel, and "unto all the ends of the earth." Thus the arguments made on the improbability of Mormon writing to the Gentiles about the miracles wrought by the Nephite twelve, fails. Whether the statement, that "there were many mighty miracles wrought by the hands of the apostles," applies to the first twelve or the second, (and we do not contend that it applies to the second) one thing is plain, namely, that Mormon could have applied it to the Nephite twelve without involving him in any inconsistency whatever. In the same paragraph, and in close connection with the statement in issue, he does refer to the Nephite twelve, and to the commission which Jesus gave them, in the following language:

"For behold, thus saith Jesus Christ, the Son of God, unto his disciples who should tarry; yea, and also to all his disciples, (the twelve) in the hearing of the multitude, Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature; and he that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved, but he that believeth not, shall be damned. And these signs shall follow them that believe, in my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover; and whosoever shall believe in my name, doubting nothing, unto him will I confirm all my words, even unto the end of the earth." Thus we see that those who claim the statement applies to the Nephite apostles, have, apparently, good grounds for their belief.

6. In this number an argument is made by attempting to carry out and apply Paul's illustration of the necessity and importance of every part of the body occupying in its own place and performing its own work. If we try to make these figures do more than they were intended to do, by those who introduced them and used them, we get into difficulty. For instance, if the first presidency is the head, the apostles the mouth, the prophets the eyes, the seventy the ears, etc., then wherever the first presidency is, there are, necessarily, the apostles, prophets, and seventy, for all these are component parts of the head. What could the head do without mouth, eyes, and ears?

Carrying out this illustration a little farther, we have the Nephite church so located that, because of environment and the decrees of God, she must get along without head, and, of course, without eyes, ears, and mouth. That is, she can neither think, eat, talk, hear, nor see. Let it be remembered that the Nephite church could receive no more benefit from the Jerusalem church than we can in our day, to say the least. Their necessities were just as great, because of environment, as ours were because of apostasy. And yet we are not only asked to believe that she did not have these leading ministers that God placed in the primitive church, but that she could not have them. We do not believe that God has so arranged for the perpetuity and upbuilding of his work, that he can not supply every necessary demand, and that too, in harmony with his word.

Moreover, the members of the human body represent the orders of ministry and membership in the church of God. If apostles are represented by the mouth, it is not confined to the original twelve, but applies to all true apostles, in every clime and every age. And it is clear to us that when Jesus Christ calls men, ordains them, makes them his leading ministers and witnesses, and sends them into all the world to preach the gospel, they are his apostles; and if the number be twelve, they are his twelve apostles. It is not putting another mouth in the body, hence this huge monstrosity is only a creature of imagination.

7. In this number an attempt is made to show that the Nephites did not need apostles—that the provisions made were ample to meet their emergencies, and needs. If so, they were and are sufficient for us, without apostles, prophets, etc. They had no advantage over us in getting along without them. All that was needed was that these lower and unlimited officers should be placed in the church, and then we could have gotten along just as well as if we had the others also. In fact this position leads us to adopt the orthodox (?) view, which we have been combatting ever since 1830. That is, "apostles and prophets are done away, because no longer needed."

Let us try to be consistent. If the head is represented by the first presidency, the mouth by apostles, etc., where shall we find a substitute for these members of the human body? It may be said, as correctly claimed by the brother, (but erroneously, we believe, given as a reason why there could not have been apostles in the Nephite church,) that the seventies can act as assistants, or substitutes for the apostles. True, but it is not because the ear can fill the place of the mouth, but because the seventy, acting as a substitute for the twelve, are themselves apostles. So if a substitute was needed for apostles in the Nephite church, which has been conceded, the seventy constitute the legal, and only legal provision for that substitute. (Doctrine and Covenants 120: 3.)

The claim made that these Nephite twelve were simply and only a quorum of twelve elders, chosen and ordained to act as a substitute for the twelve apostles, shows very forcibly the unenviable place into which one is driven by taking the position that the Nephite twelve were not apostles. In the first place, there is no provision in the law as contained in the sacred books of the church, for a quorum of twelve elders, or any other quorum of twelve, to act as a substitute for the twelve apostles. The position is wholly assumed, having no divine warrant in the word! And all this to get rid of the claim of Nephite apostles!

Why should we say that the title of elder as used in Moroni 3: 1; 4: 1, did not include the high priests and twelve apostles, any more than we should say that John was not an apostle, for he always called himself the elder, or a disciple? Or that the elders referred to in Doctrine and Covenants 17: 22, and 42: 5, proves that it was not intended that there should be any first presidency, apostles, high priests, or seventy in the restored church, for the elders and priests were to administer the sacrament, and the elders, priests, and teachers were to teach the principles of the gospel. If nothing else would convince us that the Nephite twelve were apostles, this monstrous assumption would. Now, as this assumed position of twelve elders to do the work of apostles, all falls to pieces when we begin to handle it, our former position on Moroni 2: 1, remains intact. The words "for thus do mine apostles," plainly implies that the twelve whom Christ was addressing, were apostles. They can mean nothing else.

And now, Bro. Chairman, while we are on our feet, and with your permission, we move that hereafter Christ be permitted to organize his church whenever and wherever he pleases, placing therein such officers as he may deem to be necessary, (provided he does all according to the pattern) and that he be not subject to the charge of polygamy.

DEFENSE OF THE REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS AND REPLY TO JOSEPH F. SMITH, JR.—PART III.

PROMISED REVELATIONS NOT RECEIVED.

The promises of the Lord are generally conditional. When they are not fulfilled we perceive therein an evidence that the conditions have not been complied with. There are certain promises the Lord has made to those who would obey the gospel: that they would receive the Holy Spirit and the gifts thereof; that they would know of the doctrine; that the signs would follow them. If somebody, a reasonable length of time after they have obeyed, were to make the announcement that they had not received the Holy Spirit or any of its attending effects, fruits, gifts or blessings, we would all at once unite to question their repentance, their preparation, their compliance. We would believe that the conditions had not been complied with or fulfilled; and this with the greatest of propriety if we know that the officer from whom they received the ordinances was one who held authority to thus administer. Whether the failures or deficiencies on the part of the candidate are visible or not, we have every reason to believe in their existence inasmuch as not to believe in them reflects discredit and partiality on the Lord.

The same thing which is true in relation to an individual is true in relation to a congregation, the church, or a nation: whether that congregation be located at Nauvoo, whether that church be the original church of Latter Day Saints with its headquarters at Nauvoo, or whether that nation be ancient Israel.

To ancient Israel God made certain promises upon their entrance into Canaan. He promised them his help to make a complete extermination of the Canaanites. But they were not all exterminated. The Philistines and others remained, as a thorn in the flesh of Israel. In other words, the promise was not fulfilled. Why? Because the conditions were not complied with. Because Israel made a league with the Gibeonites. Because they were not dutiful in other respects. In this case there is before us the cause of the nonfulfillment of the promises. But even though the causes were not visible, even though there were no history in the sacred volume respecting the violations by that people of their part of the contract; even though the Bible were silent about their league with the Gibeonites, their intermarriages with heathens, etc., we would, in the very nonfulfillment of the promises, have the best, the surest foundation for our suspicion—yea, our belief that due causes existed, that somewhere there was some default, some shortcoming.

To latter-day Israel God revealed himself and planted them in Jackson County, Missouri. He promised that if they would do right they would "eat the good and fatness of the land of Zion." The profound and philosophic writer, Orson Pratt, allows, in his pamphlet, "The New Jerusalem," that they would have lived in peace with their neighbors had they been obedient; they could have remained. But they did not remain, they were driven away. Why? Section 98 (101 in Utah edition) says, "I the Lord, have suffered these afflictions to come upon them, in consequence of their transgressions." Of what did the transgressions consist? Same section: "There were jarrings, and contentions, and envyings, and strifes, and lustful and covetous desires among them." Herein the cause is again visible. But were it not, the very fact of what came upon them would be sufficient testimony that it existed.

Later we find them on the banks of the Father of Waters, at Nauvoo. They were commanded to erect a temple, a dwelling, an abode for the Lord. A great promise is made if they would execute this task. He promised that he would dwell in that temple, that he would abide there; and as an evidence of his abode, his dwelling, he would reveal himself, would reveal certain things. "For there is not a place found," says he, "on the earth that he may come and restore again that which was lost unto you." Furthermore: "Let this house be built unto my name, that I may reveal mine ordinances therein, unto my people; for I deign to reveal unto my church, things which have been kept hid from before the foundation of the world, things that pertain to the dispensation of the fullness of times."

As literally as smoke and warmth issue from fire, these revelations were to issue from the dwelling and abiding of the Lord in that temple. The reception of those revelations was to be an evidence of his acceptance of the temple. The non-reception of the revelations was to be an evidence that the temple was not accepted. He would not reveal himself in or on account of a temple that had not been built; and even if it had been built, he says, "if you build a house unto me and do not the things that I say, I will not fulfill the promises which ye expect at my hands." We have, therefore, a reason to expect that upon the completion of that edifice God would "restore again that which was lost"; that he would reveal his "ordinances" therein, that he would reveal things never thereunto revealed, things that were hid "from before the foundation of the world," and that were to pertain to the "dispensation of the fullness of times." We are therein informed of the seal of approval that God was to put upon that house and the nature of that seal. We are not only told that he was to reveal himself, but we are informed beforehand of the import of the revelations.

Now, let us ask Mr. Smith: Have any such revelations been received? Name them. Where are they and what are they? Our Doctrine and Covenants contains only two sections that were given between that time and the time the Saints left Nauvoo, and they are not revelations, but letters of Joseph Smith containing items of revelation pertaining to baptism for the dead. The Utah Doctrine and Covenants contains nothing that could be accepted as a response, an answer, to the promise in full. Section 125 is said to be a revelation directing the Iowa Saints to gather at or near Nauvoo. Section 126, not published in the Martyr's lifetime, is purportedly to Brigham Young, telling him that he could stay home thereafter and take care of his family. Nothing in either of these purported revelations revealing lost ordinances, the fullness of the priesthood, or anything that specially pertains to the dispensation of the fullness of times.

Sections 127 and 128 are the two letters referred to, addressed by Joseph Smith to the Saints in Nauvoo in 1842. They can not be said to fulfill the measure of revelation the Lord designed, for several reasons. In the first place, baptism for the dead was known and practiced in the primitive Christian church in the days of Paul; and in order to have proceeded, the contents of these revelations must have been then known; hence they do not contain something that had been hid from before the foundation of the world. Then, instead of professing to be a fulfillment of the promise that had been made, they both shrink from and despise that very supposition in looking forward to something yet to come. The former says: "I am about to restore many things to the earth, pertaining to the priesthood." The concluding paragraph of the latter is still promissory. Section 129, said to be revealed in 1843, contains a few independent paragraphs about spirits, angels, etc., but nothing that pertains any more to the dispensation of the fullness of times than any other dispensation; nothing, I venture to say, that the staunchest Mormon would affirm has been hidden since the foundation of the world.

Section 130, not published in the lifetime of the Martyr, can by no fair means be explained as filling the vacancy depicted. It has something with regard to the natures of God, angels, their habitation, the future earth. It has an item about the war, and another about the time of the coming of Christ; but with reference to the great gap that was to be filled, intimated in the revelation of January, 1841, it is quite irrelevant. It has not one spark of light but what we have reason to believe the ancients had, save the reference to South Carolina and the promise to Joseph about the coming of Christ, which things, as matters of war and private promise, can not be said to have any special pertinency to the great latter-day dispensation.

Take section 131. What is it? It is one which refuses an honest bachelor the right to go to heaven, to celestial glory. No matter how faithful, how dutiful, he must be shut out, according to this section which, again, was not published in the lifetime of the Prophet Joseph. He can enter an inferior glory, but can not procreate. Because he has committed the awful sin of being a bachelor in this life, he is destined to remain one in the life to come. If he has been guilty of the crime of having ill-health, whether that ill-health was hereditary or self-contracted, and thereby rendered unmarriageable, he must nevertheless be shut out. I am glad that section was not published in the Martyr's lifetime. I am glad that we have the best of reasons for doubting its genuineness and its truth. I am glad that the Martyr is not stained with its known authorship. Whoever wrote it, wrote the word liar on his very forehead. What we have said is sufficient to exclude from the mind of any inquirer the thought of its being of that peculiar nature that we have pointed out is inherent in many preceding sections, whether it is of God or not. It exhibits not one feature, whether it be right or wrong, that we have any foundation for believing was withheld from those intervening the present dispensation and the foundation of the world. But, as a matter of fact, the last three sections do not of necessity enter into this consideration. They might with all propriety have been passed by, as they do not purport to be revelations, but merely some instruction given by Joseph Smith, speaking not by a "Thus saith the Spirit," not ex cathedra.

Following this section 131, this prelude of polygamy, comes the notorious section 132 ordaining polygamy. Permit me to digress to say that paragraph 26 declares that when a man has been married according to this special order, he may commit any sin of the new and everlasting covenant, and he may also go so far as to commit "all manner of blasphemies," yet so long as he is not guilty of murder, he will "come forth in the first resurrection and enter into his exaltation," by being "destroyed in the flesh," which Mr. Penrose defines ("Blood atonement," pages 24, 28) as being blood-atoned or having their blood spilled. Hence while section 131 shuts bachelors out, section 132 shuts polygamists in. While section 131 will not allow bachelors to do enough good to get into celestial glory, section 132 will not allow polygamists to do enough sin to get out—save murder. If the paragraph referred to does not mean polygamists in particular, Mormons will admit that it includes polygamists.

But what about the nature of this revelation, which purports to have been received in 1843, as responding to the promise. True or false, genuine or spurious, does it fill the bill? What does it contain that according to the document itself had been hidden from before the foundation of the world? The very opposite: it claims to be a reproduction of an order which obtained in the time of the patriarchs. It only claims to be new in the sense of restoration. It teaches that the same course that it justifies was known and observed in the times of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, of David and Solomon. Inasmuch as it therefore does not claim to bring to light anything but what was before had and practiced, we may dismiss it at once and extend our inquiry still further. The revelation that the revelation of January, 1841, looks forward to, is not one of restoration, but one that has never in this world been made known.

Section 133 is a revelation given while the Saints were at Kirtland. Section 134 is not a revelation. Section 135 is not a revelation. Section 136 purports to be a revelation given through Brigham Young in 1847. What is its nature? It does not matter very much, for they had already forsaken the temple, finished or unfinished, and were at Winter Quarters on their way across the plains. All the document purports to be is a little instruction as to how they were to organize and proceed in their migration to the far West. No ordinance, nothing that had been lost, nothing that had been kept in reserve since creation.

What next? Nothing, for that is the last section. Now where are those revelations? Wherein has the Lord ratified his promise? Echo answers, Where? Where are we to look for this mark of his acceptance to the temple? Where?

We were really not subject to the necessity of examining the sections or revelations given before the period he fixes for the completion of the temple (granting for the time being, if he likes, that the temple was completed); for the revelations were to be given after its completion, when the Lord took up his residence therein. He would not accept it until completed, nor would he reveal himself in indication of his acceptance of it till he had accepted it. The deficiency of these revelations, therefore, is an evidence that the building, built or not built, completed or not completed, was never accepted.

SUCCESSION AND LINEAGE.

Mr. Smith now turns his attention to the Doctrine and Covenants, and proceeds to discuss some of the portions thereof relating to the matter of succession and the law of lineage. He quotes successively from section 28, 35, and 43, of the Utah edition (27, 34 and 43 in our book), the passages we frequently appeal to along with others as incontrovertably supporting our position relative to the manner of filling the vacancy occasioned by the death of Joseph Smith.

LORD TO APPOINT ANOTHER.

Joseph F. Smith, Jr.—“And if thou art led at any time by the Comforter, to speak or teach, or at all times by the way of commandment unto the church, thou mayest do it. But thou shalt not write by way of commandment, but by wisdom; and thou shalt not command him who is at thy head, and at the head of the church, for I have given him the keys of the mysteries, and the revelations which are sealed, until I shall appoint unto them another in his stead.” You see the Lord was to appoint another. The passage in section 35 is as follows: “And I have sent forth the fullness of my gospel by the hand of my servant Joseph; and in weakness have I blessed him, and I have given unto him the keys of the mystery of those things that have been sealed, even things which were from the foundation of the world, and the things which shall come from this time until the time of my coming, if he abide in me, and if not, another will I plant in his stead. Wherefore, watch over him that his faith fail not, and it shall be given by the Comforter, the Holy Ghost, that knoweth all things.” The third passage is as follows, beginning with the first verse:

“O harken, ye elders of my church, and give an ear to the word which I shall speak unto you; for behold, verily, verily, I say unto you, that ye have received a commandment for a law unto my church, through him whom I have appointed unto you, to receive commandments and revelations from my hand. And this ye shall know assuredly that there is none other appointed unto you to receive commandments and revelations until he be taken, if he abide in me. But verily, verily, I say unto you, that none else shall be appointed unto this gift except it be through him, for if it be taken from him, he shall not have power except to appoint another in his stead; and this shall be a law unto you, that ye receive not the teachings of any that shall come before you as revelations or commandments; and this I give unto you that you may not be deceived, that you may know they are not of me.”

Response.—Yes, indeed, it is unmistakably plain that it was the Lord who was “to appoint another.”

Joseph F. Smith, Jr.—These revelations, extracts from which I have read, were all given between September, 1830, and the first of March, 1831.

Response.—This statement is an error. Instead of being given “between September, 1830, and the first of March, 1831,” section 28, the first of the three quoted from, was given in September; this according to both the Utah Doctrine and Covenants and ours.

SECTIONS 27, 34, AND 43, NOT DONE AWAY.

Joseph F. Smith, Jr.—At that time the church was less than one year old, and was not fully organized with its various officers as we have it to-day.

Response.—Less than one year dating from April, 1830; but what of it?

Joseph F. Smith, Jr.—When they [these revelations] were given the Prophet Joseph was young and inexperienced and this law was laid down for the government of the church as it existed at that time, as these revelations clearly indicate. You will notice from these passages that the Lord was to choose another in the prophet's stead in case of his removal through transgression or for any other cause during that incipient stage of the history of the church. [Italics mine. —A. K.]

Response.—We admit, again, that the law enunciated in said revelations was one applicable to the church as it existed at that time and during that incipient stage of the history of the church; but on the statement that its applicability was to be regulated to that period and that it has no application to the condition of things to-day, to the more advanced stages of the church, or to its post-martyr period—there we part company with Mr. Smith at once. It is our keen familiarity with his meaning which we gather from his comment following the affirmation we have quoted from him, also from their history—touching the accession of Brigham Young—that has inspired us to italicise his words.

But what is there in the quotations Mr. Smith produces from those three revelations to indicate that the law which they enforced was only of a temporary nature? What is there in them to indicate that the provisions the Lord makes for the maintenance of the function of the revelator in the church were not to be permanent? Not a word, not an iota. Of course he must succeed in this position or Brigham Young (who was neither appointed through Joseph Smith or ordained especially to that office) must go down. To admit that the law provided for in the three sections under consideration is still of binding force and that every future and successive individual who should stand at the head of the church and occupy the place that Joseph occupied at that time must arise to that station, according to the rule therein prescribed, is to admit that Brigham Young was not Joseph Smith's successor and that the Utah church is not the true church of God. For, if Mr. Young's accession was in accordance with the provisions of those revelations, let us not think for a moment that our friend would insist upon their inapplicability to his case. And as the whole three sections, which teach that the successor of Joseph Smith was to be appointed by God and through Joseph Smith, all come under Mr. Smith's repeal. He leaves himself fairly open to the conclusion that Brigham Young was neither appointed by God or through Joseph Smith.

My House—or My Boy—Which?

So many times I fret and grow
Discouraged, for it seems each day
That now I've got the house so clean,
It surely clean will stay
Until the morrow. But alas!
The morrow comes and with it brings
For me to do, in endless round,
The same old, common, homely things.

I look around each morning; there
Upon the tables and the chairs,
I find cut paper, strings and nails;
Oh! me, the same old, humdrum cares!
While whittlings litter up the floors,
And here's a cap, and there's some shoes
To put away. Does it seem strange
That I, sometimes, my temper lose?

I think how nice the house would look,
And how much easier work would be,
If I had nothing out of place,
And everything from dirt was free;
No strings or toys to be picked up,
No misplaced cap, no muddy shoes;
Then life would be a happy dream,
And I would never have the blues.

But when the shades of night are drawn,
My day's work done, I sit me down
To read or write, 'tis then I'm tried;
'Tis then I try to think, and frown
Because of Grandpa and the boy,
Who laugh and chatter, blithe and gay.
Dear me! I wonder who could think?
They drive my every thought away.

But when I think of how I'd feel,
If nevermore should come my boy;
If he should go, far, far from me,
Would not my pleasure, all my joy
In life go too? And then I know
That I had rather keep my boy,
With all his litter in the house,
Than all my happiness destroy.

For oh! how desolate the house
Would seem with him afar away.
How quiet always would I be;
How could I think by night and day.
No, no, I would not have it so;
A life like that would be no joy
To me; I'll take the strings and nails,
The misplaced things, and keep my boy.

Mrs. Dawson's Awakening.

BY MON TANA.

(Concluded from last week.)

"Come inside and I'll show you my Indian suit," the boy said, and Johnny stepped in and sat down on the covered box. He felt like he was in fairy-land, it seemed so unreal. He knew his mother would disapprove, but he just couldn't pull himself away now he had come, and he did want to play Indian.

"My name's Clark," his new friend said, as he tumbled things out of the trunk onto the floor, "and I'm eight years old. How old are you?"

"I'm six, going on seven," Johnny said proudly. "I'm most as big as you are."

"Yes, but I ain't got curls," the other replied with a grin. "Say, if you say anything about my hair again I am going right straight home. I think you are not very polite to company," and Johnny got to his feet but made no move to go out the door.

"Well, we'll play Indian and then you will want to stay, all right. I will put on my suit now and you can have this cowboy suit to dress up in. I've got feathers and everything. Don't I look fine?" Clark asked as he strutted around with the feather head-piece set very much to one side.

Johnny was half afraid of such a fierce looking playmate, for he had never seen the like before, but he wanted to get into the game as quick as possible, for it promised to be interesting. He donned the cowboy suit and Clark tied a red handkerchief around his neck and tucked the hateful curls under a wide-brimmed soft hat. A belt with a big pistol made out of wood was strapped around his waist and then they were ready for the game.

"Now you go down by that tree and hide and I'll come and whoop at you, and then you must run and I'll chase you and you must let me catch you, then I'll scalp you. You musn't say a word, for if you do, the game won't be real. Oh, here comes Roy Bruce! He's a dandy fellow to play Indian with. He's got a suit here in my trunk, too, and we'll have a fine game now. Come on, Roy, we're just beginning. This is the boy next door. His name is Johnny. Hurry up and get your duds on."

The newcomer came up to the others but he did not seem to like the looks of Clark's new playmate.

"Say, Clark, is he a girl?" he asked with scorn, pointing at a stray give-away curl hanging down Johnny's back.

Johnny's hand flew to his head and he hastily tucked the naughty curl out of sight, but his face got very red and he felt like he wanted to fight.

"Oh, he's all right," Clark very graciously said. "He can't help the curls, and he doesn't want them so we are going to scalp him," he added with a chuckle. "He can't help what Indians do to him. Come on, let's get started."

The game was soon in full swing and the afternoon sped quickly by, and it was almost dusk when the boys finally threw themselves down on the grass panting and tired and hot. Johnny had won great favor with the two other boys, and they were all happy and tired but hungry as little cubs. Johnny bethought himself of the glass of milk and crackers his mother had told him to have Nora give him so he said good-bye to the boys and made his way home. When he reached the house he felt a little frightened for everything was quiet and not one of the servants was to be found. He ran through the hall out onto the front porch, expecting to find his mother out there, but no one was sitting in the big chair, so he ran on down to the gate.

He looked up and down the street but not a soul was in sight. His heart began to thump awfully hard and he had to press his hand against his side for fear it would jump right out through his ribs. He went out and down the walk a piece and 'way down at the other corner he saw several women coming towards him, so he felt safer and ran down to meet them. As he got closer he heard one of them say:

"Oh, there he is, Mrs. Dawson! Don't worry any more. He's all right," and he then saw his mother who was leaning on another lady's arm. Her face was so white it frightened him and he ran towards her holding out his arms. Hers opened to catch him, and she sank on her knees clasping him to her heart and covering him with kisses.

"Oh, Johnny, dear, where have you been? I was later than I expected to be and down in front of Mrs. Loving's we met a boy who said you had gone down town and I feared you would be killed by the cars. Where have you been, dear? We couldn't find you at home so we hurried down the street thinking perhaps we'd find you. Have you been away?"

"Just next door, mamma, and I forgot the time. I'm so sorry," and he patted his mother's cheek; something he had never done before, and it felt so soft and velvety he patted it again.

Mrs. Dawson kept hold of his hand all the way to the house and when they reached the porch she sat down in the big chair and drew him onto her lap. She looked into his frank blue eyes and wiped his red little face with her own lacey handkerchief, and then for the first time she noticed his hair, and she gave a little gasp of astonishment and sat up very straight, nearly spilling him off her knees.

"Johnny, why—why what is the matter with your hair?" she asked as she rubbed her hand over his shorn head.

Johnny flushed and began to squirm, but she held him tightly, and so at last the whole story was out. He forgot everything but the exciting game he had played that afternoon, and his mother listened in silence as he pictured the fierce Indians and the jolly good time they had catching him to scalp him.

"It didn't hurt a bit," he told her, "and we had the bestest time. I do wish you would let me play over there all the time. Clark said his mother liked boys and he said she always let him play on the grass, and he's got a billy-goat and his papa plays ball with him. He said it was lots of fun to go bare-footed, and he's got the dandiest wagon with red wheels, and oh, so many things I can't tell you all of them. I guess you do love me, don't you, mamma?" he asked as he looked up into her eyes. "Clark said his mamma said you didn't know how to love children. I wish you'd love me just a mite," and he did not try to keep the tears back this time.

Mrs. Dawson held him closer. What was he telling her? That she did not love him? She had never heard him talk this way before, and she was so taken by surprise she did not know what to say. She held him a long time, thinking, thinking all the time, and then that night after he had gone to his little white room she came and sat by his bed and held his hand and coaxed him to talk. He needed little coaxing and he was soon pouring out his lonely little heart to her, and as she clasped his hard brown fist in her hands she saw herself in an altogether different light, and she began to question herself: had she done her duty by the one little child God had given her? Was it right to leave him so much alone, and did the lectures she attended and the papers she wrote amount to as much as the companionship of her boy? She had devoted so much of her time to the Mothers' Meetings and had so often told Johnny not to bother her when she was writing a special article on the bringing up of children. She had loved the praise and the compliments her efforts had gained for her, but now she asked herself where had been her gain?

Johnny fell asleep at last with the happiest heart he had ever known, and when he awoke in the morning he at first thought it had all been a dream, the Indian game and then the tender caresses his mother had bestowed upon him. He lay there thinking it all over and then jumping out of bed he ran to his mother's door and knocked timidly. And the dearest voice in the world told him to come in, and with a bound he was on her bed and clasped in her arms.

"Mamma, mamma," he whispered, "you do love me, don't you, mamma?"

"Yes, Johnny, man, I do love you, and mamma is going to be with her little boy more after this. We'll have great times together, Johnny boy, and mamma is glad she had such a nice talk with you last night," and Mrs. Dawson nestled him close, and when he asked if she did not like his hair better like this, she bravely said, "Yes, indeed."

She was happier all day, and she thanked her heavenly Father he had let her eyes be opened in time. She realized how her little boy had been denied nearly everything a boy craves in a mother, and she made up her mind her duty should be to her child first before she spent afternoons telling other mothers how to make a close companion of their children. In her letter to her husband that night she poured out her heart as Johnny had poured out his to her and she felt he would understand.

Johnny was so happy in the days that followed and so obedient; he came to his mamma for advice, and he never was turned away by "I'm too busy now, run away." She watched him at his play and he did not play alone either. The boy next door, and even his dog, Muggs, came over every day, and there were other children who found his yard a delightful place to romp, and he had the nicest mamma, they thought, and so did he.

A little cold water applied to the lady's face, and a few assuring words from the conductor, calmed the fears of the frightened husband; in the meantime the train is slipping down the mountain side into denser atmosphere; the lady revives, the good husband smiles at her weakness and all is well.

Crossing the nation's watershed, we are now on the Pacific Slope. The rivulet on our left is the head waters of Eagle River, which joins with Grand River, running into the Colorado River that flows into the Gulf of California and into the Pacific Ocean.

The sun is sinking behind the whitened peaks that lay like saw notches against the western sky, and as far as the eye can see, a panoramic view, grand, wonderful, beautiful, and inspiring mountains, gorges, canyons, valleys with sparkling loveliness, dashing streams and somber forests, infinite variety, indescribable—and here on the crest of the Continent, in the twilight of a setting sun, we catch a glimpse of the "Holy Cross," on a noble peak which seems to pierce the sky, half hidden with mystic clouds and plumed with gleaming snow. This sacred symbol is of such a character that dwarfs all human carving; sitting on the crest and pinnacle of our nation, is a sign of Christian possession for ever.

In the unnumbered ages of the misty past, or perhaps when He was nailed to the accursed tree, or in the roaring rumblings of eternal commotions amidst the darkest of darkness, the cross was planted here by a divine hand, as a living prophecy to unborn generations, a sign of glorious fulfillment, a reminder from always to eternity, a seal upon our proudest eminence, as to what our fealty should be. Here, in the sight of all men is inscribed by a divine hand the marvelous testimony of a crucified Christ; far above the strifes of all human marts, planted so grandly above the turbulence of all earthly clouds, it seems to say in no measured tones, "Humble thyself, O man, uncover thy head and acknowledge thy weakness, and never forget that as high above the gilded spires, gleams the splendor of this ever living cross, 'So my ways are above thy ways and my thoughts above thy thoughts.'"

Darkness has thrown its mantle over the scene; the lights are gleaming in the car and we would it were morning. We shall miss many scenic views, as we go thundering through Eagle River canyons, the mountain gorges, the little picturesque towns and mining camps, and as we speed downward, the hills are rising on either side and we can see their jagged tops in the gloaming, against the sky. No doubt we will be well down the Grand River Canyon by the dawning of the morning, but our eyes are heavy and we must rest. A short repast from our scanty basket, a drink of cold water, and we curl up in our seat and soon, amid the rumblings of the wheels, the grinding of the brakes, the shriek of the iron monster, and as the dreamy echoes die away, we are lost in fitful slumber.

Herald Editors: As I am receiving considerable inquiry regarding the individual communion service, as to where obtainable, prices, etc., I am sending you a catalogue of the wares, and I wish you would print sufficient notice in the HERALD to cover the wants of the people. This firm is the best firm that I know about, and they can furnish anything that may be wanted in the communion service line. I do not believe nor does the church in the manner of serving set forth in the catalogue, but their opinions regarding the manner of serving in no sense change the utility of the service. I trust this catalogue will prove of interest to you, as well as to the rest of the Saints.

Editors Herald: As the sun was well down, this afternoon, I buried beneath the water Bro. George Stowe of this little town. And as I raised my voice and said, "George, having been commissioned by the Lord Jesus Christ, I baptize you in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; amen," my whole body shook, for the Spirit of God was upon me. It is the sixty-fifth anniversary of the death of our beloved President Joseph Smith. He was killed about five o'clock in the evening and so it was nearly that time that I buried Bro. George in the water. We confirmed him in the evening, later, and so we are all here rejoicing. I am glad that I have had the privilege, upon this noted day, to lead one soul into the kingdom of God. By my faith and work, have done my part to bring to pass Joseph the Martyr's prophecy: "I or my posterity will plead the cause of injured innocence."

Bro. William Sparling is here helping us and we are sorry that he will leave to-night for his home. We have been with him at Fairview where he led six precious souls into the water, and later on I will lead two more into the watery grave, one being a former Salvation Army worker.

I leave in a few days for the west and as we go on our journey we are thankful that we are in the work. May we all work for the steady growth of the work in which we are all interested.

During the two weeks spent in that neighborhood we have had several sharp encounters with the Brighamites who are rapidly growing in strength there, and contend as zealously as ever for the holy (?) principle of polygamy.

I am en route now to Bliss, then Western Idaho and Oregon points. Weiser, Idaho, care of W. T. Ferguson, will be my address for awhile. Will stop off at points en route to Seattle if practicable and notified, as we hope to attend August reunion.

Dear Herald: Having read the many letters and articles in the HERALD, I decided to be a correspondent also with the Saints who can only get good news this way. During the last few months, we have had Sunday-school and some preaching services by Brn. W. M. Self, Hayer, Hansen, and Bardsley?

I am sending you some verses which if you think desirable to publish, I would like to have done.

I walked through the woods and meadows,
In the silence of the eve;
And the stillness and beauty moved me
To thoughts which would not leave.
I thought of the words of our Savior,
Spoken in love to his sheep,
When wandering away from the sheepfold,
He hastened and paused once to weep.

Of those to the soldiers by him;
In his agony on the cross;
When he cried out, "O, Father, forgive them";
They understood not the loss.
O, that we could be more like him,
Patient in suffering and in pain;
Forgiving those who sin against us,
And not think all our efforts in vain.

SAN BERNARDINO, CALIFORNIA.

Thinking that it would be of interest to your readers to hear from this part of the field, will say the work is progressing nicely. Although we regretted very much that Bro. Pitt left us, yet we feel that our loss is another's gain. Now we are anxiously awaiting the arrival of Bro. Charles Crumley, of San Francisco, who has been appointed to labor with us.

Elder Williams, of Los Angeles, a short time after his return from the General Conference, paid us a visit and lectured to us five evenings. These lectures were well attended by appreciative audiences.

Shortly after this, he became engaged in debate with an ex-Unitarian minister, Mr. Edward Adams Cantrell, of Chicago. For months, Mr. Cantrell has defied the ministers of Southern California with a standing challenge to meet him in a joint debate. The question was: "Following Jesus; Is it possible? Is it desirable? Is any one doing it?" The local ministers seemed somewhat chary; but Bro. Williams proved to be the "minister who was different." He accepted. As a result, they held a two-hour discussion before an audience of about four hundred people, on the evening of June 15, in the Woman's Club House in this city.

Mr. Cantrell is a gentleman and a scholar; he is a polished, refined, brilliant; and eloquent speaker; and the general verdict is he fought the best fight against Christ and Christianity ever heard in these parts. I can not tell you all the good things we heard, but suffice to say, Mr. Cantrell's air of complacency faded into a dismal hue before the affair was ended. In brief, it was as follows: Mr. Cantrell termed Jesus as one whose teachings were impossible to follow; he arraigned Jesus as the apostle of imitation and substitution, both of which were a menace to progress. He said:

"If you can trust the vulgar, wayside flower because of its own virtue, of its own inherent qualities, in its own way, and after its own volition, why not trust the highest expression of life known to us in the universe to do likewise? The rose of to-day does not say to another rose, 'Go to, let us unfold as a rose of nineteen hundred years ago unfolded.' Yet Jesus' name is being harped upon all the street-corners and alleys. I loved a little woman once. I loved like a house on fire, or like two houses on fire, as the saying goes. Did I go about yelling her name on all the street-corners? No. Her name was too sacred. Yet one often hears such expressions as, 'Oh, I'm going to run a store like Jesus,' until, as Emerson said, 'I'm tired of this whole Jesus business.' I am opposed to your whole philosophy of imitation and substitution. It reminds me of a boy whom I will call Tommy Blank. My father took such a liking to this boy, that he was continually urging me to act like him. It was 'Tommy Blank' this, and 'Tommy Blank' that, until I grew so tired of hearing the name, I rose in all the positiveness of my boy nature, and exclaimed: 'Damn your Tommy Blank, anyhow!'

"It was not that I disliked the boy, but I objected to being always urged to imitate Tommy Blank. Froebel, the great educational teacher, rejected the old imitation philosophy. He did not believe in molding human life. He believed in unfoldment, in progress, through self-activity. Read Gibbons, Hallum, Draper, Buckle, and all the great historians, and you will learn that Christianity has destroyed three civilizations, and will destroy every other one it dominates. The church has been the relentless foe of every advance movement. There has not been a discovery in science, art, or literature, but the church has fought. Whatever truth there was in the utterances of Jesus was equally true before he uttered them as they have been since. They are true regardless of who uttered them. Euclid stated truths in mathematics. We do not hark back to the personality of Euclid. The man who fulfills the highest promptings of his inner consciousness is good regardless of any other man. I am opposed to the gospels and the recorded historical Jesus, for he demands the impossible. If a God or an angel would come to the earth and demand the impossible and visit dire consequences on those who failed to execute the impossible, he would be entitled to our scorn. Listen. Jesus told men to 'Resist not evil.' Suppose a burly negro brute comes into your home at night, and tries to assault your wife, then should you try to carry out this statement of Jesus, 'Resist not evil'? The whole history of Christ, the early church was one of non-resistance, a policy which had enslaved the world and allowed the cruel and vicious to ride rough shod over those who submit.

"If a man strike you on one cheek, turn the other also. If a man compel you to go a mile, go with him twain. Take no thought for to-morrow.' What a foolish utterance! How could men live? Our entire civilization is due to a violation of this command. The thing which distinguishes us from the brute is this. 'If a man sue thee at law and take away thy coat give him thy cloak also.' 'Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth.' 'I came not to bring peace but a sword.' Every intelligent man knows it is impossible to keep these things. It is impracticable. Again, and a little more to the point, there is no one doing this. Are your preachers doing these things? How many of you are not resisting evil? How many of you would turn the other cheek? How many of you take no thought for the morrow? You are not doing it, and your failure to do is an unanswerable argument as to the fallacy of the command.

"Jesus renounced property; he put an embargo on thrift; he repudiated marriage; he taught the sinfulness of sex. In his modelizing the child, and his comment as to eunuchs, he said, 'You must become sexless as a child.' His teachings was the base for all the asceticism and recluse lives of his followers. Jesus said, 'Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth.' He had better said, 'Woe to the meek, for they shall be slaves.'"

Bro. Williams took up the life of Jesus in its historical settings. He went back into Judea and showed the conditions existing at that time. He tore into shreds the statements of Cantrell as to imitation and in both the vegetable and animal worlds showed that imitation was one of the chief factors in progress,—not an echo, not a parrot, not a shadow, but intelligent, voluntary imitation. And as to the doctrine of substitution, he explained that the term was not understood, and in glowing terms pictured the principle of the atonement, which was not substitution but rather coöperation and kindly aid. He took up the various statements of Jesus and defined them. He showed that Jesus was living the positive life, and where he said, 'Resist not evil,' he meant, 'Do not waste your time negating the evil.' Set up your standard of right; get it to working; allow it to bear fruit, and you will the more readily overthrow evil. Don't resist, fight, attack evil. There is a better way. Employ yourselves in the better way. Two wrongs never make a right. To strike a man because he strikes you is folly. It is better to suffer wrong than to do wrong yourself. He traced the history of Christianity, and affirmed positively that Christianity even in its perverted aspect had been a help rather than a hindrance to the extent that it followed the teachings of Jesus, and the reason that evil came as a result of the rule of the church was because they did not accord to the teachings of Jesus.

The verdict of those who listened to the debate is that Bro. Williams made a master effort in his defense of Jesus and his message. The debate has caused the Saints to feel stronger in the work. One sister who has been a member for ten years, but of late has taken little part in church work, rose in prayer-meeting and said that this debate had done more to awaken her to a true appreciation of the restored gospel than anything that could have happened, for she could see the strength of truth as contrasted to the weakness of error. The students of the high school who attended gave Bro. Williams credit as being the ablest debater they had ever heard, and for several days they made the debate a subject of much comment. We believe much good will result. Elder Williams goes from here to deliver a course of lectures at San Diego, a place that has received very little attention from our elders of late years. On returning, he is to enter a ten-night debate with a minister of the Christian Church, one who met Bro. Etzenhouser in debate a few years ago, and is considered an able debater. We believe this kind of opposition will do us good, and will bring us more prominently before the public. The trouble is there has been indifference to Christianity in any form, on the part of the public generally; it is difficult to get an audience that our message might be heard.

Yours for the spread of truth,

936 Eleventh Street.

The place of encampment is a beautiful maple grove, called "Kenwood," on the north side of Lake Cadillac and overlooking that beautiful body of water. Tents will be for rent upon the camp grounds at a reasonable price and no charge will be made for the use of the ground when tents are rented there, but those furnishing their own tents will be charged the small sum of a dollar for the use of the ground. Steamboats and auto busses run between camp grounds and city every few minutes, thus making it easy and pleasant for those that might wish to go back and forth. Grounds lighted by electricity; phone at headquarters; speakers of national repute; good music and a spiritual and profitable time. Branches that have not remitted their portion to the reunion secretary, Bro. Thomas Hartnell, 319 Bremer Street, Cadillac, Michigan, please do so at once, so we will be able to complete arrangements and meet all obligations. Saints, lay aside the cares, trials, and difficulties of life for a week or ten days, get to the reunion early, enjoy the preaching-services, prayer-meetings, Sunday-school, Religio, and normal sessions, college talks, music (vocal and orchestra), fresh air, and balmy lake breezes, and the camp life; then when you return home you will feel like taking hold of life anew and will anxiously await the time of the 1910 reunion. The Committee, per H. A. Doty, secretary.

The Ohio, Kirtland, and Pittsburg districts will hold a reunion at New Philadelphia, Ohio, commencing July 30, and continuing over two Sundays. Prominent ministers will be in attendance and an enjoyable outing is anticipated. Tents should be ordered immediately from J. A. Becker, Willoughby, Ohio, Route No. 2. Tent and single cot $2.50, additional cots 50 cents each. No bedding whatever will be furnished. Meals will be six for $1.00. Address J. A. Becker and the undersigned, after July 22, New Philadelphia, Ohio, reunion grounds. C. Ed. Miller, 72 Miller Street, Pittsburg, Pennsylvania.

it failed. The poor of Paris, and his former employees who had helped to create his vast fortune, received scant remembrance in his will. Consequently with characteristic French vehemence the aforementioned poor, with some eight thousand of the former employees, and the general public, all of whom had in one way or another paid toll to M. Chauchard and felt they had helped to purchase the aforementioned casket and pearl buttons, lined the streets and hooted, howled, and hissed their hatred as the procession passed by. Motor horns, sirens, and whistles of all kinds swelled the uproar with derisive blasts.

If the design was to impress God, it will fail, also, because for once this man will find himself on an equal footing with others. His spirit will go naked and unadorned into the presence of the Great Judge. The amaranth coffin will fall into pieces and the one hundred thousand dollar pearl buttons be lost in a handful of millionaire dust long before the resurrection of the unjust.

The incident serves to illustrate the futility of wealth. Money can not buy the love of man nor of God. It can not stay the processes of nature that lead to death and decay. Yet men forget that fact and lavish their thought and labor on money and the material things that money will buy; they literally serve Mammon with heart and soul, might, mind, and strength, and it is their god.

In section one of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants we read this language: "They seek not the Lord to establish his righteousness, but every man walketh in his own way, and after the image of his own God, whose image is in the likeness of the world, and whose substance is that of an idol, which waxeth old and shall perish in Babylon, even Babylon the great, which shall fall."

The excessive valuation set upon riches by those who have them and the sullen envy of those who have them not are daily illustrated by events happening in the world. Wealth becomes the sum of all human desires, and men even think to bribe Deity and buy their way into paradise with magnificent alms and princely donations to colleges, churches and hospitals. With a plomb they face the judgment day in amaranth caskets and with hundred thousand dollar buttons on their waistcoats.

MONEY MANIA.

Some days ago one M. Chauchard, a millionaire owner of department stores, of Paris, died and was buried. It was his privilege to die, and it was necessary to bury him. The nature of his funeral, however, was of such a character as to attract a great deal of attention in Paris, and has since been made a matter of comment in leading journals in France and America.

He was buried in a casket of Brazilian "amaranth" wood, ornamented with sculptured bronze, costing one hundred thousand dollars. The Literary Digest says, "The pearl buttons on the waistcoat in which he awaits the day of judgment are valued at one hundred thousand dollars, and he was wrapped in a shroud of cloth of gold." Hired opera singers performed at the service, and the whole affair was on a royal scale, calculated to do great honor to M. Chauchard. But further than to advertise the fact that M. Chauchard had passed from this world and was about to enter another where different ideals prevailed, the ostentation of the funeral was wholly wasted.

If the display was intended to impress humanity,

During the recent Gould divorce case Mrs. Howard Gould testified that it costs thirty-five or forty thousand dollars per year to dress a woman of her social standing. She discards a six hundred dollar gown after wearing it once. The folly and crime of such wicked waste in high places while many worthy people are in poverty can not be too severely condemned. The plea that such persons by their extravagances put money into circulation and thus do good will not stand in their favor. The facts are that their riches demoralize them and tend to demoralize all who come in contact with them. Those who deal with them and cater to them realize the "size of their pile," as the saying goes, and soon learn to overcharge and in a variety of dishonorable ways go after all there is in it. Their immediate servants are vitiated by a system of gifts, tips, and spoils of various kinds. A large section of the populace is kept from all useful and productive avocations to spend their time promoting idle amusements, or in manufacturing, handling, selling, and caring for mere baubles of ornamentation or dress that do not feed, nourish, warm, educate, or minister to any legitimate need of any human being.

But be that as it may, millionaires of the Chauchard type and society women of the Gould type set the pace for a multitude of people. All the way down the scale each in his sphere is proud of the outward show that he can make and is struggling for more money with which to make more show. These are facts; though we are not blind to the further fact that not all people are affected with this money madness.

There are thousands of honest toilers whose delight is in their simple homes and the love and association there afforded. There are many men and women working in educational and religious institutions and engaged in the various professions who live simply, love their work, and are thinking about the good they can do and not about money and vulgar display. Such individuals may be classed among the "honorable men of the earth." In them is the hope of the nations and they are valuable prospective members of the true church of Christ. But they are not the ones of whom we write at this time. We are concerned with these people who believe in and uphold a false standard of life. Their influence is far-reaching and does great damage.

This money madness in its more extravagant paroxysms is easily recognized. All abhor and decry the conduct of M. Chauchard and many deplore the conduct of the Gould woman. But when it runs its even tenor, bargaining, scheming, grasping, hoarding, or spending in barbaric lavishness, and all behind the shrewd and smiling face of business, it ordinarily passes for legitimate success. There is danger that a false standard will be set up even in the church. If there are not or have not been those in the church who love their wealth and cling to it at the expense of eternal salvation, section 101 of Doctrine and Covenants should never have been given.

Being keenly sensible of the danger that worldly ambition for riches, and the pride of material things, might overcome some in the church, Joseph Smith and his comrades in bonds and affliction wrote from Liberty Jail: "If there are any among you, who aspire after their own aggrandizement and opulence while their brethren are groaning in poverty, and laboring under sore trials and temptations, they can not be benefited by the intercessions of the Holy Spirit: we ought at all times to be very careful that such high mindedness never have place in our hearts, but condescend to men of low estate, and with long-suffering, bear the infirmities of the weak."—Times and Seasons, vol. 1, p. 131.

Wealth, be it much or little, is a sacred trust. Latter Day Saints have professed to consecrate all that they have and all that they are, with their powers of mind and body, to the service of God. Under the spirit of that covenant they may use of their wealth all that is necessary to supply the needs and the just wants of themselves and their families. The rest is a residue or surplus belonging to God, not to be squandered in worldly ways, but to be used in the interests of the common brotherhood, as he shall direct, in caring for the poor, preaching the gospel to the lost, and building up the New Jerusalem.

Without any desire to dictate to anyone we here submit this thought for what it is worth. Saints should carefully scrutinize their expenses for luxuries. The church is not doing all the work that under more favorable circumstances and with more zeal might be done toward the redemption of Zion.

We have not yet paid for that which has been done.

The church is in debt.

At the late General Conference our venerable president told us most emphatically that an effort should be made this year to pay that debt. What are we doing about it? Are we putting any of the money needed for that work into luxuries? Think about it. Let our items of expenditure be approved by a good conscience, not by worldly sentiments regarding needs and wants. Some make the plea that they fear that their surplus will not be wisely expended if intrusted to the church. Are you sure that it will be wisely spent if you withhold it? The rule is that after just needs are supplied men waste their money,—their folly mounts as their surplus increases, until we have M. Chauchard.

To work for money as an end in itself, something to be hoarded and cherished, is a great mistake.

To work for money as a means to an end, and that an unworthy end, is a mistake almost as great. To work, and work hard, for money as a means to a worthy end is entirely justifiable, because then not Mammon but God is the Master,—the ambition is to do good.

In chapter two of the book of Jacob we find this language:

But before ye seek for riches, seek ye for the kingdom of God. And after ye have obtained a hope in Christ, ye shall obtain riches, if ye seek them; and ye will seek them, for the intent to do good; to clothe the naked, and to feed the hungry, and to liberate the captive, and administer relief to the sick, and the afflicted.

This is as sound and wholesome a philosophy of money making and money spending as we have ever read or heard expounded. First, the kingdom of God is to be sought before all other things. Second, after the kingdom of God is found, one is permitted to seek the riches of this earth. Third, he will obtain those riches, if he seeks diligently, a refutation, if this language has any application now, of the idea sometimes expressed that men can not succeed financially and use honest methods. In the Book of Mormon times God always blessed his people financially when they were righteous and dealt honestly. Fourth, the motive back of all such effort is to secure riches with which to do good. This is applied Christianity;—individual and collective effort along temporal as well as spiritual lines for the upbuilding of Zion and the sustenance and succor of the needy.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

THE SANITARIUM.

Quite a bit of inquiry is being made in reference to the Sanitarium. And some uneasiness is being expressed at its not having yet been opened for occupation.

Not seeking to answer these inquiries, we deem it advisable to present a few thoughts in reference to it for consideration. Last year the expenditures upon the part of the Bishopric for the Herald Office and Sanitarium were very heavy. There was not a sufficient amount in the treasury for the full completion of the work, over and above the finishing of the building, leaving the furnishing in the way of lighting and fitting up of the rooms as an after consideration. This included the putting in of the electrical lamps for the purpose of lighting the building. It must be remembered that there is to be quite a large number of rooms to be fitted up, and superintendent, caretakers, engineers, housekeepers and their helpers, nurses, and other assistants to be secured and maintained. There is also a provisional department, including dining room furnishing, kitchen furnishings, and all the accessories of an establishment of the kind to fit and prepare it for work which it is designed to accomplish. These require a greater or less amount of means.

The Bishop has been under the necessity of going slow. How long this necessity will continue it is difficult to state.

A number of the Saints at Independence and Kansas City have expressed a desire to furnish some of the rooms. There may be quite a number abroad who are also willing to assist in such a work as that. Those who may be contemplating offering supplies in this regard, should remember that the principles of hygiene and sanitation require that these furnishings shall be as absolutely clean as newness of texture and making up will enable them to be so that they may be as free from germ-carrying qualities as is possible. It would be advisable to consult with the Bishop by corresponding with him on the part of those who may contemplate furnishing one or more of the rooms. The Sisters' Aid Society would do well to look the matter up among themselves and see what they can do in regard to it. We do not know when the Sanitarium may be ready to receive occupants.

It will be well enough for everybody to remember that the Sanitarium is not intended as a home, like the Saints' Home and Liberty Home at Lamoni. It is to be what its name implies, an institution where those suffering from human ills and spiritual depression from the wear and tear of sickness may be received and, so far as the church may do, be helped.

We are not in condition to secure competent service in the different departments from volunteer labor on the part of those within the pale of the church. Undoubtedly there will be some who would be willing to spend some portion of their time as helpers and nurses, and these will undoubtedly find opportunity; but there will be more or less of expenditure for the carrying on of the institution that must be met, hence the great body of Saints must help in this particular.

We have no great moneyed men, nor millionaires, like there are many in the world who of their great abundance have sufficient surplus, to endow our college, our Saints' Home, or the Sanitarium with a fund securing the institutions against constantly recurring depletion in the treasury. We all wish that there were, but knowing that there are not, it would be necessary to look after the pittances and generous donations that may come from those who have but comparatively little. We are pleased to know that there are many such and that they seem remarkably willing to help in the good work. Don't be impatient.

The conditions of those who are needing are no worse now than they were when the Sanitarium was directed to be erected, and it is the part of wisdom not to unnecessarily strike at those who may have the work in hand who apparently are not doing what we think they ought to do. The Bishopric is carrying a heavy load this year, and is wisely seeking to diminish the indebtedness of the church. We should assist in this work, if in no other way, by not clamoring for a carrying on of those things which would involve greater expenditures beyond our opportunities for so doing.

The Emmanuel Movement among the churches is incidental to the great wave of the incoming healing forces under the influence of the great Physician. Let us be patient and though it has been said that the children of this world are wiser in their generation, let us emulate the wisdom of the world so far as that wisdom is applicable to the work we have in hand, both as individuals and as a body.

A LETTER TO BISHOP KELLEY.

We have before us a letter written to Bishop E. L. Kelley by Elder W. S. Pender, of Phoenix, Arizona, under date of April 3. We print it below because we believe it will interest the Saints and possibly may cheer and encourage them regarding the work immediately confronting the church. It will be remembered that at the date when the letter was written Brother Pender of course had no earthly way of knowing the important actions that would be taken at the General Conference then about to convene, or the nature of the revelations about to be received:

PHOENIX, Arizona, April 3, 1909.

ELDER E. L. KELLEY,

Dear Brother: I awoke this a. m. impressed, as I believe, by the Spirit of the Lord to write you. Of the source and propriety of what is written, no doubt you can best judge.

Amidst the multitude of duties which I know now envelop you, you need not take the time to answer.

The Lord is your God and has taken cognizance of you and knows the integrity of your heart and has taken cognizance of your efforts to teach his people the law pertaining to temporalities and to establish equality among the people.

He has also taken cognizance of the opposition waged, some of which was not needed and ought not to have been. Nevertheless, it shall redound to my glory and the salvation of mine elect.

Thou art a chosen vessel to execute my will in these matters, saith the Spirit. Therefore, let not thy heart faint, neither be disheartened, O my servant, saith the Lord. In due time the effort of thy labor shall appear; verily thus saith the Lord; Zion shall be redeemed in mine own time and the people shall dwell in peace and safety.

Therefore, let your heart be comforted concerning Zion and her redemption. Continue in the future as thou hast in the past to teach my law and to urge upon the people the necessity of its faithful execution.

I have many laborers yet whom I will raise up to assist in this laudable work; men whose hearts are true and whose courage is strong and they will contend for the establishment of my will concerning Zion, yea, even the establishment of the Order of Enoch, which order shall be established and flourish among my people; and then, and not until then, shall my will be fully honored by my people.

Therefore, seek to establish Zion; seek to establish this Order among my people; yea, seek diligently, and hindrances shall be removed and success shall crown your efforts.

In making this effort, I will come to your own personal aid substantially; I will direct your steps; I will sustain you fully at all times; no influence and no power shall prevail against you. My peace shall fill your mind and soul continually. Nothing shall mar your peace or disturb your mind in making an effort to establish the Order of Enoch among the people and your success will be phenomenal. Therefore, do not hesitate. The time is at hand, the time is at hand.

Now, dear brother, I have written what is in my heart to write, and I know God will give you great success. And I pray that his Spirit may rest upon you and upon all the assembled quorums and people of the General Conference.

My health continues poor, but I am hopeful of better things to come.

WILL S. PENDER.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

Elder C. C. Joehnk, missionary to Germany, writes that he arrived in Hamburg safely after a pleasant voyage. His address will be in care of Alexander Kippe, 25 Roon Street, Grosslichterfelde.

The Arapaho Bee, Custer County, Oklahoma, July 9, has the following interesting and rather amusing account of the recent debate there between Rev. J. S. Warlick and our J. F. Curtis. The item is headed. "Not what we wanted but what we got." It seems to be a good natured confession that they wanted a victory on the part of Warlick, but got the reverse:

So far as the Apostle J. F. Curtis and Elder Joe S. Warlick are concerned, the great religious debate has ended. But on the street it still goes on. There was no judges to decide and the all important question in the minds of the people is, "Who won the debate?"

Joe Warlick was a great man, a great debater and Bible student. He had one of the best minds we ever came in contact.

But somehow he failed on the great purpose for which he debated and did a hard week's work; to strengthen his own church and add new recruits to his way of thinking.

While his brethren stayed with him nobly he did not get what in politics would be called the floater.

Apostle J. F. Curtis was an unassuming man who took his text and never wandered far from it.

Systematically he planned his work and never changed his base. Now it may have been the debaters and it may have been the audience. But they cheered the diplomacy of the Apostle Curtis.

While we are not able to speak otherwise, so far as the audience was concerned it seemed to favor J. F. Curtis.

But all Christian problems are not to be decided upon what these two debaters say. The old staid churches who have labored in Arapaho for the upbuilding of humanity are entitled to some consideration. But a Christian must learn to lose and look pleasant.

Your church is composed of people. It is either people or bats and owls in a church.

Don't lose your head or temper over a religious debate.

The two debaters here were both able, educated men. They had spent years of study on this subject, and each debate sparkled with new things that will cause a prudent man to pause and read and investigate for some time before coming to a definite conclusion.

LAMONI ITEMS.

Bro. and Sr. John Smith left last week for a month's visit among relatives and friends in the East, and they expect to attend the Highland Lake reunion. The young people of the church choir gave them a farewell serenade on Wednesday, which came as a surprise to the brother and his wife; but Brother John is eminently resourceful and surprised the choir by hustling them down town where he entertained them with refreshments. Brother and Sister Smith made short speeches of appreciation.

Lamoni Saints are preparing for their reunion and expect to make it a big success.

Elders' Note-Book

FROM THE QUORUM OF HIGH PRIESTS.

Bro. Pitt, president of the Quorum of High Priests, sends to the HERALD certain papers and suggestions that came before the quorum during its sessions at the late conference. Other quorums may well follow this example in the future, as such papers are often of considerable merit and of general interest.

SUGGESTIONS FOR MINISTERIAL WORKERS.

In preaching, a much better effect is obtained if the speaker will employ a conversational, rather than that which is sometimes known as a preachy, tone.

In Doctrine and Covenants 59:2, the Lord has associated oblations and sacraments, and commands his people to offer them upon the Lord's day. In some of the branches the oblation is omitted. We wonder why?

Some of our elders have fallen into the habit of opening meetings with the words, "The Saints will please come to order."

We have never heard this in any other church. Should we not do all in our power to do away with this unseemly habit of disorder? The Saints should be taught to be in order when services are about to begin, and all conversation should cease when the minister enters the pulpit.

At sacrament meetings, where the congregation is large, all the members may not be known to those who pass the emblems; therefore it is best to explain that while it would be a pleasure to offer the sacrament to each one present were we permitted to do so, we are restricted in this by command of the Lord to offer it only to those who are members of the church. Some such explanation should be made in a kindly manner to avoid giving offense.

DOES THE LAW PROVIDE FOR PRESIDING PRIESTS, PRESIDING TEACHERS, AND PRESIDING DEACONS IN BRANCHES?

In answer to this question we cite Rules of Order, chapter 1, section 6. "Complete Branch Organization":

A branch is said to be fully organized when it has a presiding elder, a priest, a teacher, and a deacon. If necessity requires, two or more priests and teachers and deacons, or two or more of either of the officers of these three grades may be chosen.

According to this it will be seen that provision is made for but one presiding officer in a branch when fully organized, namely "a presiding elder."

Again in Rules of Order, page 100, section 160, under the heading "Rules for the government of branch business meetings."

Who shall preside.—The branch officers are the officers who shall preside over and have charge of these meetings; and none others shall preside, except by vote of those present at any meeting, or by the courtesy of the officer present whose right it may be to preside at the time. Who preside, by right.—The officers of the church recognized by these meetings as having a right to preside, are: A presiding elder who has been regularly chosen by vote of the branch; a priest, or priests, also regularly chosen by vote of the branch; a teacher, or teachers, also regularly chosen by vote of the branch; a deacon, or deacons, also regularly chosen by vote of the branch; a secretary or clerk of the branch, also regularly chosen by vote of the branch. In the absence of the presiding elder of the branch the priest or priests chosen by the branch or either of them shall have the right to preside, whatever other elders or priests may be present in such meeting; in the absence of the presiding elder and the priest or priests, the teacher or teachers, or either of them shall have the right to preside; in the absence of the presiding elder, the priest or priests, and the teacher or teachers, the deacon or deacons, or either of them, shall have the right to preside; the priority of right of associate priests, teachers, and deacons to be determined by seniority of office in the branch should question arise in regard to presidency; the right to act for the branch as its officers having been previously determined by the vote of the branch.

Here again the only reference to a presiding officer in a branch is the "presiding elder," excepting when the presiding elder is absent, and then provision is made for the presidency of a meeting, the right falling first upon the priests, then upon the teachers, and then upon the deacons, in the order named. It will be noted, too, that these lesser officers are called "associate" priests, teachers, and deacons.

In Doctrine and Covenants 120:2 it is stated: "A branch may be presided over by a high priest, an elder, priest, teacher, or deacon, chosen and sustained by the vote of the branch." Of necessity, therefore, when a priest is chosen to preside over a branch instead of a high priest or an elder, he may properly be called a presiding priest. And the same may be said regarding a teacher or a deacon when presiding deacon with assistant deacons. The law names them "associates" which seems to make them all equal, excepting in the absence of the presiding elder, when the priests chosen by the branch have the right to preside over the meeting. The priority of right of these officers to preside to be determined either of these are called to preside over a branch, but we know of no specific law providing for more than one presiding officer in a branch at the same time.

Nor do we find any law for the method adopted by some branches of electing in connection with a presiding elder, a presiding priest and assistant priests; a presiding teacher with assistant teachers; and a by seniority of office in the branch. That is, the first elected shall be first to preside.

DEFENSE OF THE REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS AND REPLY TO JOSEPH F. SMITH, JR.—PART IV.

Sections 28 and 35 (in Utah edition) declare that God would appoint the successor of Joseph Smith. Section 43 declares that the successor would be appointed through Joseph Smith. Section 28, containing the first intimation respecting the possibility of Joseph Smith having a successor, has no limitation with respect to time; neither with respect to cause of vacancy. It leaves room for the conclusion that God would appoint the successor if the office became vacant, no matter what might be the event leading to its vacancy. And there is nothing in the revelation from beginning to end to show that its reception was based on the youthfulness of the prophet, as Mr. Smith suggests. Instead of the revelation being given at the instance of the prophet's youthfulness, history informs us that it was evoked by an altogether different circumstance. What was the circumstance? Hiram Page and other brethren were deceived by the revelations being received from a certain stone. Joseph inquired and received this section, which, from its wording and the nature of the circumstance, makes it clear that its primary object was to allay the condition of deception that had obtained, and at the same time, while making known to them that the Page revelations were false, lay down a rule to fortify the church against any such a contingency in all time to come. The Lord not only informs the church that Joseph Smith was the only one to receive revelations as a law to the church at that time, but that function was to subsist in him "until I shall appoint unto them another in his stead," to receive revelations for the church.

If any of the membership of the Utah church place themselves in a similar relation to that church or to their president that Hiram Page placed himself in to the original church and the original president by his arrogance, there is no question but what Mormon authorities would all with one accord appeal, in their repudiation, to the provisions of this section. And rightfully enough, for it is not declaratory of a restrictive command, but of a principle which was to be in force from that time on to protect His people from the intrusion of spurious revelations to which they were to be as liable in the future as at that time.

In a great measure that which has been said in respect to section 28 might apply equally to sections 35 and 43. The latter section, especially, was given under conditions strikingly similar to those we have observed as having obtained at the giving of section 28. Preceding the reception of this section 43 in February, 1831, a woman came pretending to give revelations and commandments to the church. She, too, found sympathizers, whereupon Joseph inquired and received this revelation, which is, substantially, but repetitional of the law contained in section 28, which law in section 28 is undoubtedly had in allusion when he says, "Ye have received a commandment" from me covering this matter. And here the Lord extends the provisions as to the mode of succession, stating that the successor was to be ordained, etc.

But, Mr. Smith says that the church was not fully organized with its "apostles and seventies" as it is to-day. Shall we say, therefore, since it is more fully organized and these quorums are created that these quorums or others besides the head of the church may receive revelations for a law to the same? If not we would have him tell us how the section is to be explained as applying to us now wherein it defines the rights and powers of the president and not applying to us now wherein it is provisional of a means for the perpetuity of that office-work.

The Lord says: "Until I shall appoint unto them [the church] another [revelator] in his stead." It is very evident that the Lord looked forward to the time of his removal by any cause, by transgression or by natural death, in 1834 or in 1844, up to which time he would retain the "keys of the mysteries and revelations," which are definable as the sole right to receive revelations as a law to the church; which power, of necessity, must be transmitted to a successor, unless the church cease with him. This, because it would still be necessary after his departure for the church to receive revelations, and hence, still necessary that they be safeguarded against impositions.

Joseph F. Smith, Jr.—"Verily, I say unto you, the keys of this kingdom shall NEVER be taken from you, while thou art in the world, neither in the world to come; nevertheless, through you shall the oracles be given to another, yea, even unto the church." I take it as a natural sequence that this law which was given in March, 1833, superceded the provision made in 1830 and winter of 1831, wherein a law was given as protection to the church in case of the taking away of the keys from Joseph the Prophet—a contingency that did not arise.

Response.—The quotation used is found in section 90, Utah edition (87:2, our book). His argument is that after March, 1833, it was no longer needful that the president of the church be appointed by God or through Joseph Smith. Suppose then, Joseph Smith had died between March, 1833, and the year 1835, the year the Twelve and Seventy were organized, by what process would his office have been filled? How would the next occupant of the presidential chair have been appointed? For, between March, 1833, and 1835 there was no president of the Twelve to succeed him, and since the law of 1830 and 1831 was no longer in force, according to Mr. Smith, he would have no right to appoint his successor. "Supercede" means, "To take the place of; replace; supplant." Hence the law of 1830 and 1831 could never be operative after 1833, according to our opponent's proposition, either in the event of Joseph Smith's death or of his transgression. But, he says that the prophet had "proved himself and evinced before God through his faithfulness that he was worthy of the trust placed in him," therefore, "the Lord declared that the keys of the kingdom should never be taken from him in the following words"—of the revelation of March, 1833. That is to say, that God found out by March, 1833, that which he did not know in 1830 and 1831, that Joseph Smith would remain faithful. But, as it happens, the operation of the law of 1830 and 1831 was not to be contingent on transgression, but "for any other cause," as Mr. Smith allows on page 39 of his work, though he denies it on page 40.

Mr. Smith's idea now seems to be that after 1833 neither Joseph Smith, nor God through Joseph Smith, would ever have occasion to confer the keys which he held upon a successor, as they were never to be taken from him in this world or the world to come. A very singular position to be sure. The Doctrine and Covenants speaks of many keys. The revelations of 1830 and 1831 do not say "keys of the kingdom"; but "keys of the mysteries and the revelations," and "the keys of the mystery"—if there be any difference. Turkey may be said to hold the keys to the Black Sea. Great Britain may be said to hold the keys to the Mediterranean. That is, through the channels of these powers, which are controlled or which may be controlled by these powers, it is that access to, or admission to, or intercourse with, the Black Sea or the Mediterranean is to be had. Likewise revelations coming to the church had to come through the channel or avenue of Joseph Smith. Through him they were to receive this law; through him they were to be thus blessed, "all kindreds of the earth." There can be no question but what these keys were to descend to Joseph Smith's successor, as we have already seen, whoever or wherever. Those keys the Martyr could not have retained in heaven, after this life, inasmuch as we all know that the revelations to be received to-day (on the hypothesis of either the Utah church or ours being successor) do not and are not to come through him. As certainly as the church looked for the revelations to come through him in the years 1830 to 1844, so Mormons look for them to come through Joseph F. Smith, and we look for them and receive them through our president, the Martyr's son. That these "keys of the mysteries of the kingdom" were to be relinquished by Joseph Smith to his successor is made very plain in section 64, where it is stated that they were not to be taken from him "while he liveth, inasmuch as he obeyeth mine ordinances." Seeing that it is the exclusive right to receive revelations for a law to the church that is meant by the keys of sections 28, 35, and 43, and that that right must necessarily inhere in every future incumbent of the prophetic office, it remains as much for our opponent as for us to describe the nature of the keys that Joseph Smith was to retain in the next world. We do not by any means concede darkness on the subject, but prefer in an investigation like this to avoid all logomachy and all that is not strictly pertinent to the points at issue. The fact is, his quotation from the revelation of March, 1833, has no relevancy to the situation and supercedes nothing.

QUORUM EQUALITY MISAPPLIED.

J. F. Smith, Jr.—Later in the year 1835, when the Twelve Apostles were chosen and their duties defined, the Lord declared that they were equal with the Presidency as a quorum.

Response.—The Lord said: "They form a quorum equal in authority and power to the three presidents previously mentioned." Yes, but this equality is not to be understood as being absolute, for the reason that we see some prerogative, some right, in either quorum that does not belong to the other, and which the other can neither assume to do nor take from it. So long as the Presidency has the right to receive revelations to be binding on the church and the Twelve has not that right, so long are they not perfectly equal. That fact alone would destroy the absoluteness of equality. In the same revelation and in the same connection it is said that the Seventy "form a quorum equal in authority to that of the Twelve." Two things, each of which are equal to the same thing, are equal to one another. If the Twelve are equal to the Presidency and the Seventy are equal to the Twelve, then the Seventy are also equal to the Presidency, necessarily. No way around this. We know that the equality between the Twelve and the Seventy is not absolute. The former has the power of sending and directing the latter, but the latter has no such power in relation to the former. We have noted an inequality between the Presidency and the Twelve; we perceive inequalities between the Twelve and the Seventy; we recognize the most positive inequalities between the Presidency and the Seventy. If then these three quorums are not equal, if no two of them are equal, then when the Lord declared their equality he must have had reference to particularity rather than generality—that there was some particular respect in which they were equal. It becomes a matter of determining, then, the respect in which that equality exists. Perhaps Mr. Smith can tell us.

J. F. Smith, Jr.—That is, in case of the dissolution or destruction of the First Presidency of the church, the Twelve should succeed to the Presidency, and would thus act until such time and place as the Lord revealed that the First Presidency should be again organized.

Response.—O, that is it! But where does the gentleman find anything in the revelation to indicate that the equality of the Twelve with the Presidency spoken of has reference to the power of the former to take the place of the latter upon the latter's dissolution? Nowhere. Mr. Smith allows on the following page (41) that if "both these quorums (Presidency and the Twelve) should be destroyed, then it would devolve on the Seventies," etc. In other words, the Twelve is not equal to the Presidency unless the Presidency is dead or has ceased to be; and the Seventy is not equal to the Twelve until both the Presidency and Twelve are wiped out. According to our opponent equality can only take effect upon death or dissolution. To make the issue plain let me quote him on page 41: "I think it must be conceded that the apostles could not be equal in authority with the Presidency when the First Presidency is fully and properly organized." According to Mr. Smith, then, the equality of one quorum to another spoken of in the revelation (section 104; Utah edition 107) cannot obtain during the life or existence of both quorums.

Now let the reader turn to said revelation and read its language following that which pertains to the matter of quorum equality and there he has the solution of the whole business:

And every decision made by either of these quorums [Presidency, Twelve, or Seventy] must be by the unanimous voice of the same; that is, every member in each quorum must be agreed to its decisions, in order to make their decisions of the same power or validity one with the other.

This is the revelation's own definition of what the equality was to consist. Simply that the decisions of the quorums would be equal with each other, when unanimously rendered on matters of business or of church government commanding or calling for adjudication. Beyond this we cheerfully submit the text to the scrutiny of the judicious reader who, whether he believes in the divinity of its contents or not, will not fail to be surprised at the most specious sophistry in its treatment by Joseph F. Smith, Jr., of Utah.

Mr. Smith quotes from our Church History 2: 11, 12, and Times and Seasons 2: 521, where Joseph the Martyr in 1836 and 1841 spoke of the Twelve as standing "next to the First Presidency." Very true; no objection to that. The Twelve, standing next to the Presidency, when the Presidency was dissolved would clearly be left in the lead as the highest quorum. But they should have led as the Twelve and not as the Presidency. When they got into the shoes of the Presidency they got out of their place.

THE LOCOMOTIVE.

We admit that when a locomotive tumbles off the track it leaves the tender in the lead; but that does not make a locomotive of the tender. We admit that when the tender tumbles off the track it leaves the baggage coach in the lead; but that neither makes a tender nor a locomotive of the baggage coach. The trouble with the Mormons was, when the locomotive tumbled off, the tender acted as both tender and locomotive for a time, and later contrived a locomotive for itself and pushed it ahead, contrary to the plan of the General Superintendent who was separately preparing one to take the place of the original.

ADMITS LINEAL PRIESTHOOD IN GENERAL.

Joseph F. Smith, Jr.—From section 86, they quote as follows: "Therefore, thus saith the Lord unto you, with whom the priesthood hath continued through the lineage of your fathers, for ye are lawful heirs, according to the flesh, and have been hid from the world with Christ in God; therefore your life and the priesthood hath remained and must need remain through you and your lineage, until the restoration of all things spoken by the mouths of all the holy prophets since the world began." But they fail to quote the eleventh and succeeding verse: "Therefore, blessed are ye if ye continue in my goodness, a light unto the Gentiles, and through the priesthood a savior unto my people Israel. The Lord hath spoken it. Amen." But to whom was this revelation given?

Response.—It opens by saying, "Thus saith the Lord unto you my servants."

Joseph F. Smith, Jr.—Was it to the Prophet Joseph Smith alone?

Response.—No, and no one has so claimed.

Joseph F. Smith, Jr.—This revelation was given December 6, 1832, to the elders of the church. Therefore when members of the "Reorganization" declare that Joseph Smith was one of these elders and must be included with his posterity in the promise, we meet their argument with the counter statement, that this promise was also to Hyrum Smith, to Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball, George A. Smith, Parley P. Pratt, Orson Pratt, and a large number of other elders who never have been identified with the "Reorganization," nor have their children, and to them this promise is as sure as to the seed of any others.

Response.—Granted. We admit that those men named were as much included as Joseph Smith. We have never contended that Joseph Smith was the only one to whom the law of lineal priesthood was applicable. All we use this text for (section 84, Lamoni edition,) is to prove the doctrine of lineal priesthood, and it proves it. Mr. Smith admits here that Joseph Smith was included when he says that the "promise was also to Hyrum Smith" and others.

Joseph F. Smith, Jr.—The inference in this eleventh verse is, that if they are not faithful then they will not receive the fulfillment of the promise.

Response.—The inference fairly drawn from this statement of Mr. Smith is, that if they are faithful they will receive the priesthood or the fulfillment of the promise. The reader will do well to note that Mr. Smith makes the implied concession that the only interruption to the lineal descent of the priesthood is unfaithfulness; that inasmuch as the sons of a priest are faithful, they are heirs by law to the priesthood.

HEIRSHIP IN THE NAUVOO HOUSE.

On page 46 of Mr. Smith's book he quotes from Doctrine and Covenants, section 107 (124, Utah edition,) where the Nauvoo House was commanded to be built, in which Joseph Smith and house were to have place from generation to generation; "for," says the revelation, "this anointing have I put upon his head, that his blessing shall also be put upon the head of his posterity after him."

Joseph F. Smith, Jr.—That is the anointing the term "this" refers to. It is the place in that boarding house, and has nothing to do with the Presidency of the church.

Response.—But by virtue of what was it that Joseph Smith was allotted the place in that boarding house? Why did not the Lord choose some lay member, some member of the deaconship, or of the priests, or, to come higher, of the Twelve, to occupy there? Why not, if the Presidency of the church had nothing to do with that position? Why not place Young, Pratt, or Carter there? Among the lay membership he could have found plenty who, so far as cookery and the temporal administration of the establishment were concerned, could have run things, and from that standpoint could have entertained the "stranger" and the "weary traveler" as capably as Joseph Smith. It is too evident to justify expatiation that it was the Presidentship of Joseph Smith that placed him there or entitled him to that position. If then it was by virtue of his presidentship that he was to hold or have place in that house, with the utmost propriety we ask, Could his seed have place in that house by virtue of anything else? The conclusion is not far-fetched by any means that if Joseph Smith, by virtue of his presidential incumbency was to have place therein, then the head of his posterity was to have place therein for the same reason. The tenor of the revelation goes to show that the Nauvoo House was to the President of the church what the White House is to the President of the United States.

Mr. Smith next has considerable to say respecting the blessings of the Smith family, but as his quotations are largely from private Mormon documents which are not accessible to us we for the most part pass them by.

CONFINES LINEAL PRIESTHOOD TO TWO OFFICES.

Joseph F. Smith, Jr.—We learn from the Doctrine and Covenants that there are two offices in the church that descend from father to son. One is that of the bishopric, for upon Aaron and his sons the Lord conferred this priesthood (section 68:16-18). The other is that of the evangelist. This we learn in section 107, but our friends misconstrue this section and try to make it appear that it is the Melchisedec priesthood that is meant. I will read it and you may judge for yourselves: "It is the duty of the Twelve, in all large branches of the church to ordain evangelical ministers, as they shall be designated unto them by revelation. The order of this priesthood was confirmed to be handed down from father to son, and rightly belongs to the literal descendants of the chosen seed, to whom the promises were made. This order was instituted in the days of Adam, and came down by lineage in the following manner," etc.

Response.—Our friend's idea is that "the order of this priesthood" (section 104) refers to the office of evangelist in particular rather than to the Melchisedec priesthood in general, although the latter is under consideration not only on the page from which the quotation is taken, but also on the following page and on the two pages preceding. In paragraph 11 the Lord speaks of the Presidency, the Twelve, and the Seventy; in paragraph 12 of the Twelve; in 13 of the Seventy; in 14 of the standing high councils; in 15 of the High Council in Zion; in 16 of the Traveling High Council, and then because in the 17th paragraph the ordination of evangelical ministers is referred to he assumes that "evangelical ministers" must be antecedent to "the order of this priesthood" in paragraph 18.

If it said "this office of the priesthood," there might be some shadow of reason in his contention, but it does not. Suppose nothing had been said in the preceding sentence about evangelical ministers, would he have concluded that because the Twelve are designated therein "the order of this priesthood" had reference to them? As a matter of fact, since the Twelve are mentioned in connection with the evangelical ministers and since they are given such prominence in the sentence preceding, is there not more room for believing that "the order of this priesthood" points to them than to the evangelical ministers, if we falter to apply said verbiage as looking to the Melchisedec order generically? Among the several sections which teach the lineality of the Melchisedec priesthood is section 83 (84 Utah edition) which says that Melchisedec received it "through the lineage of his fathers, even till Noah; and from Noah till Enoch, through the lineage of their fathers; . . . which priesthood continueth in the church of God in all generations."

PETER AS PRESIDENT.

Joseph F. Smith, Jr.—If the keys of the kingdom belongeth always to the presidency of the high priesthood, then Peter was president of the high priesthood for the Lord conferred upon him the keys of the kingdom.

Response.—Herein Mr. Smith affirms that Peter was really president of the high priesthood, his if being predicated on the declaration of section 80 (81 Utah edition) that the keys of the kingdom "belongeth always unto the presidency of the high priesthood." Possibly he was. If such is the corollary of the declaration of the revelation and the circumstance of Peter's receipt of the keys (Matthew 16), we have no objection.

MOSES AND JOSHUA.

Joseph F. Smith, Jr.—Even when we go back in ancient Israel we find Moses of the tribe of Levi ordaining Joshua the son of Nun as his successor, and not his own son.

Response.—There is not a scrap of evidence that Moses confirmed upon Joshua a particle of priesthood—merely the civil leadership.

RECKLESS MISSTATEMENTS.

Joseph F. Smith, Jr., (page 53).—The president of their church declares that he was blessed in Liberty Jail, twice afterward before the fall of 1843, and again publicly in the grove at Nauvoo. (True Succession, page 40.)

Response.—Another instance of the recklessness of our critic in the representation of documents right before him. What he refers to as a fourth blessing is described on page 40 of True Succession, quoting from the President of the Reorganized Church, as but a "public attestation of the same blessing," the former one.

Joseph F. Smith, Jr.—It is also quite evident that this expression was an afterthought on the part of Lyman Wight from the fact that on that memorable 8th of August, 1844, he voted to sustain the Twelve Apostles as the presiding quorum and Presidency of the Church, (History of the Church, for August 8, 1844).

Response.—The minutes of the conference as contained in the Times and Seasons published at that time show no vote in reference to the Twelve save for the "supporting the Twelve in their calling."

[EDITOR'S NOTE.—At this point we insert a statement from the pen of the church historian: "Our information is to the effect that Lyman Wight was not present at the meeting 'on that memorable 8th of August, 1844.' My mother, Lyman Wight's eldest daughter, then eighteen years old, states that her father refused to attend said meeting; that Heber C. Kimball and George Miller came to his house, in her presence, with a summons from Brigham Young to appear, which he declined to do, declaring that the Twelve were usurping authority. This resulted in a personal encounter during which Miller was forcibly evicted from the room by Wight and Kimball followed without awaiting the enforcement of the order.—Heman C. Smith."]

Joseph F. Smith, Jr.—It is hardly reasonable to suppose that the Prophet "appointed," "blessed," and "ordained" his son to this office every few days.

Response.—Three times in twelve years is not every few days, nor is it exceptionally frequent.

[NOTE.—Our Utah friends need not feel captious about this matter of repeated blessing. It is claimed that Joseph F. Smith's father, Hyrum Smith, received at least two separate patriarchal blessings. The second, published in Lucy Smith's history of the Prophet, contains no mention of Hyrum's posterity. To offset that fact our Utah friends triumphantly point to a "former" blessing, now reposing in the famed "archives" in Salt Lake City, in which wonderful predictions were made concerning Hyrum's seed.

"It is hardly reasonable to suppose" that the Patriarch blessed his son "every few days."—Associate Editor.]

A FRIEND IN NEED.

The following clipping was handed us by one of our missionaries who said that he had been in need of a friend and a friend appeared and spoke boldly for him. The minister, however, does not live in Lamoni and hence Mr. Bradley did not know him, as stated, but he did know Lamoni and our people and this made him a friend in need. The clipping follows:

Knows Saints' Missionary.—Louis Bradley, of the Hygiene Bathrooms, Diamond Street, informs the Courier that he knows the Latter Day Saints' missionary, now in Titusville, who hails from Lamoni, Iowa, a town from which Mr. Bradley recently came to Titusville. The latter gentleman says that the place has about sixteen hundred inhabitants and that four-fifths of them are of the denomination named. Mr. Bradley speaks in the highest terms of the Saints, who are opposed to polygamy, and says that the town is the cleanest and most moral of any in the country of its size. While not a member of the faith, and though an outsider, the local man is profuse in his compliments of the people who belong to the church, classing them as model citizens, from every viewpoint. He further states that the Governor of the State or any other person of prominence will give the same recommendation.—Titusville, Pennsylvania, Courier.

Of General Interest

A March Across Iowa in 1835.

INTERESTING JOURNAL OF A UNITED STATES DRAGOON RECENTLY DISCOVERED.

In the July number of The Iowa Journal of History and Politics there is published a journal kept by a member of the First United States Dragoons while on a number of military expeditions in 1834 and 1835. For many years this journal has been in the possession of Mrs. Kate Zimbleman, of Boone, Iowa, its real value unappreciated until it came to the attention of Mr. C. L. Lucas, president of the Madrid Historical Society. It was through Mr. Lucas that the State Historical Society of Iowa gained permission to edit and publish this interesting diary of an unknown writer. All efforts thus far have failed to reveal the name of the dragoon who kept the journal.

The military expeditions described in this journal extend over an area of five of the States of the Mississippi Valley. Of the four marches three were in the country south of the present State of Iowa. The first march extended from Jefferson Barracks to Fort Gibson; the second was a journey from Fort Gibson to the Pawnee Pict country on the head-waters of the Red River; and the third march was from Fort Gibson to Fort Des Moines, in what is Lee County, Iowa. Mr. Louis Pelzer, who edited the journal for publication, describes the fourth march in the following words:

"The fourth and last part of the journal holds by far the greatest interest and value to students of Iowa history, for it records the story of the march of eleven hundred miles by companies B, H, and I, under Lieutenant Colonel Kearney. On June 7, 1835, this detachment left Fort Des Moines and marched between the Des Moines and Skunk rivers to near the mouth of the Boone River. Then taking a northeasterly course they arrived at Wabashaw's village on the Mississippi River in Minnesota. After remaining here about a week the companies marched westwardly. Then taking a southerly course they reëntered Iowa in Kossuth County and reached the Des Moines. After crossing this stream, they descended it on the lower side and reached Fort Des Moines on August 19, 1835, without sickness or the loss of a single horse or man."

Not only did the writer of the journal record the movements of the dragoons, but he described the country through which they passed, and the character and customs of the Indians whom they met. For instance the record for July 1, 1835, reads: "Marched only twelve miles. Country hilly. Plenty of wood and water. Good encampment. This country is romantic and abounds with many picturesque appearances, such as high hills and deep vallies with here and there a fine cascade caused by the water of the prairie tumbling into the creeks below—." At times the spelling is poor and punctuation lacking, but the whole account is very readable and interesting. It will give the reader some idea how the country looked seventy-five years ago.

BY EMORY HENRY, PH. D.

Men don't believe in the Devil now as their fathers used to do,
They have forced the doors of the broadest creeds to let his Majesty through;
There's not a print of his cloven foot, or dart from his fiery bow,
On earth, in air, or anywhere,—for the world has voted so!

But who is blinding the souls of men and making them willing slaves,
To wreck their lives on the rocks of sin and fill up bloody graves?
Who blights the bloom of the land to-day with the fiery breath of Hell?
If the Devil isn't—and never was, won't somebody rise and tell?

Who dogs the steps of the toiling saint? Who digs the pit for his feet?
Who sows the tares in the fields of time wherever God sows His wheat?
The Devil was fairly voted out, and, of course, the thing is true—
But who is doing this kind of work, that a Devil alone should do?

We are told that he does not go about as a roaring lion now,
But whom shall we hold responsible for the everlasting row
To be heard in home, and church, and state, to Earth's remotest bound,
If the Devil by a unanimous vote, is nowhere to be found?

Won't somebody step to the front forthwith, and make his bow and show
How the frauds and crimes of the day spring up—for surely we want to know!
The Devil was safely voted out, and, of course, the Devil is gone, But honest men would like to know who's carrying his business on?

—Anonymous Rhymester.

Whoever wrote the above saw the prevailing situation of humanity from the right angle. The "frauds and crimes"—the evil diseases of human minds and human hearts—demand an explanation that will amount to a conviction. The prophets of new theologies go far afield in search of the origin of evil so soon as they leave the Mosaic trail.

The account of the temptation of Eve and the following "Fall of Man" through the wile of the Devil may be denounced as a myth, a folk-lore tale, the theological invention of a dark and primitive age of superstition, but it fits in perfectly with the facts of human experience, and explains logically and convincingly the evil data of human history.

The plain story is that God, for his own service, created a species of immortal spirits who are neither gods nor men. They are "the servants of his household," and are his "flaming messengers and ministering spirits." They are endowed with intelligence and powers to understand and obey the will of God. Having these qualities it was possible for them to obey or to exercise self-will. "Lucifer," called "the light-bearer," or "Son of the Morning," was the chief of these angels. Because of his high position, his command of the grand army of God, he became affected by that supreme spiritual dementia that we call ambition—the desire to act independently, and do godlike things without let or sufferance. Hence, the seemliness of Shakespeare's putting into the mouth of Cardinal Woolsley the advice to Cromwell to "put away ambition for by that sin fell the holy angels!"

"Lucifer," having done that sin, was expelled from the presence of God with all the other and lesser angels who had followed him in "that great transgression." Christ said he saw him "fall like lightning." God, having made him immortal, could not annihilate him, and so "Hell was prepared for the Devil and his angels," who had sinned and fallen with him. Hell was not fixed for human beings, such as you and I, unless we voluntarily determine to do as "Lucifer" did, and go with him into a place of eternal punishment for inexpiable transgressions.

Hell is a place of selection and not of election. Every man makes his own choice as to whether he will go to hell or not. This is a matter which God does not assume to determine for man; having made man a creature of choice, so that he can choose himself whether he will pursue righteousness and attain its ends, or pursue evil and descend to its ultimate degradation.

The objection to the Devil is to his personality. Some people assume to believe that evil is a form of moral disease which can attack an individual by direct descent or voluntary exposure. In other words, it is claimed that evil, like yellow fever, cholera, tuberculosis, and other communicable diseases, may be acquired by contagion, or by germ infection, or by accident. In fact, there are those who believe that the microbe theory explains sin in the same fashion that it is assumed to explain physical disease, but, if that were true, it would not be six months before some ingenious Yankee would invent a "sin-microbe killer" that would relieve us promptly of all danger from that source. Our drug-stores would soon be laden with those sin-microbe killers, so that all that would be necessary in order to convert a sinner to righteousness would be to discover what brand of devilment he was afflicted with, go down to the drug-store, buy the right sort of microbe killer, and cure him within the space denominated on the bottle.

As a matter of fact, sin is a spiritual derangement, and not amenable to mere physical or material resistances. The Devil is a spiritual being, having powers that exceed our normal mortal apprehensions. In order to resist him we need spiritual enlightenment, so that we may be able, as Paul says, "to resist all the wiles of the Devil." For that reason, he, in his day, thoroughly informed as he was of all the philosophies then extant, adjured his hearers to "be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might." Marie Corelli, in "The Sorrows of Satan," has drawn what is perhaps the most excellent and informing picture of the personality and methods of the Devil that has ever found its way into the literature of the world. Her "Prince Lucio" is the physical and spiritual exemplar of him whom we encounter in daily life as the instigator of evil, because the evil that they do is chargeable to him, and that serves to prolong his banishment from the presence and forgiveness of God. At the same time his disposition is such that he can not avoid the inducement of weak human nature to do what he himself has done, and hence the continuation of sin.

Henry Arlis in his stage representation of "The Devil" seeks to impress upon those who witness his impersonation that the Devil is not a fiend, but a subtle, indefinite, determinative influence upon weaker human spirits. This is right. The Devil can not influence the man who is strong in his purposes of righteousness. He can only have power over those who are willing to yield to the call of the flesh and abandon the counsel of the Spirit. The Arlis representation is artistic, realistic, and magnificent, but it is not the whole, nor the real, thing. A visit any day to the Tombs in New York City, or the Harrison Street Station in Chicago, will afford to the honest investigator more real examples of what the Devil can do with humanity than any actor on the stage has ever yet been able to conceive. Facts of human life are too often beyond the imitation of the mimic boards.

Those of us who have ever suffered from sin, or half-way sounded the depth of human woes, know that it is not the suggestions of man that send us down, but some spirit within that suggests things we had not dreamed of and endeavors we had never designed. The Devil is not the lean, long, lank, red-hot individual represented by Mephistopheles in Faust, nor is he the black imp in the corner at whom Luther threw his inkstand, nor yet the comique figure that Coleridge described when he said that,

"His jacket was red
And his breeches were blue,
With a little round hole
came thru."

If Scripture is believable at all, the Devil is yet able, though a fallen spiritual creature, to imitate what he once was, and "transform himself into an angel of light so as to deceive almost the elect of God." Therefore we must beware how we permit the approach to ourselves of even the fairest friend or the most promising benefactor.

Psychology is good as a spiritual instructor, but unless psychology shall follow the lines of intuition or revelation—whichever you may call it—it is bound to arrive at false conclusions. Psychology is not a science of God, but a science of the soul of man in sentient existence. Therefore, psychology, being impotent to reveal good, is equally impotent to reveal the Devil.

So that, in spite of all the antidemonistic philosophy of the world, we must settle down upon the revelation of Moses, or upon that of men who evidently know less than he did, and are unable to solve the problem which he left behind him. If we believe Moses, we must believe that there is a God and that there is a Devil.—The Golden West Magazine, May, 1909.

EARTH IS SLOWLY BUT SURELY BECOMING BETTER.

The only perfectly comfortable people in the world are those who have no ideals, and they are the only perfectly worthless people. In a letter received a few days ago the writer complained that there were a great many unloving and greedy people in the world, and argued from that fact that Christianity is a failure, which is almost as rational as it would be to claim that ten or a hundred million years ago this earth of ours was a failure because it was taking so long for it to become fit for human habitation.

Once let nervousness and petulance creep into a reasoner's argumentation, and his conclusions are futile. There is no great hurry about anything.

The world is far from perfect, but one needs to know but a little of what was the condition of things one hundred, five hundred, one or two thousand years ago, to be perfectly well aware that this world is becoming a better world, a more comfortable place to live in, more full of service to others and love for them, less killing and stealing among men, less fighting among nations, the conditions of life not so hard nor so brutal.

One may not be able to see the hour hand move on the clock dial, but if he compares the place where it stands now with the place where it was an hour ago he will discern that it is getting toward noon.—C. H. Parkhurst in American-Journal Examiner.

THE BASIS OF PEACE.

I have given this brief paper the title, "The basis of peace," and I shall begin it with the quotation, "Blessed are the peace-makers; for they shall be called the children of God."

We commonly apply these very familiar words to those who pour oil upon troubled waters after a commotion has been raised, who have brought about reconciliation between those who have been estranged, who have hushed angry disputing or quieted the violence of strife.

In this paper I wish to give the term a broader application. I wish to place peace-makers in contrast with peace-breakers. I wish to include among peace-makers not only those who quiet strife and reconcile enemies, but also those who preserve the peace by observing those conditions that are the basis of peace. All people who do the things that result in peace are peace-makers, and, in contrast to them, are those people who break the peace by doing things that violate the rights of others.

The peace-makers shall be called the children of God and shall constitute his kingdom. It is therefore highly necessary that we shall learn here and now to be peace-makers, preservers of the peace, doers of the things written in the law of God which must be the basis of our peace.

Here I wish to digress slightly to speak of a little book called Life and Her Children, which presents in a very pleasing manner much information concerning the lower orders of animal life. It tells us of marvelous little beings which live and move and multiply in ways quite incomprehensible to us. From the lowest grades of microscopic forms it traces the development of life up to man, "himself, the crowning work of all he sees."

In the simplest forms, life seems to be little more than passive existence, but soon there develop powers of attack and defense, and from this point upward animal life is a fight in the battle for existence. Each one fights remorselessly for himself, or, if his interests go beyond himself, they are confined to his little ones, or as in the cases of some of the ants, to his community.

It is when we reach man that we find the higher devotion of parents to children, of children to parents, of friend to friend.

After we have read this little book and have thought of life and her children, noting the gradual development in ability to do and to enjoy, we may open another book which tells us of the next grade above man's present condition, that of angels; for man was created a little lower than the angels.

And, after we have observed the development of life in the lower orders, we may recall the proclamation of Jesus to his people, "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly."

Progress and development are before us. A life, more full of ability to do and to enjoy, is on the plane above us. Shall we rise to it and live more fully?

The author of Life and Her Children has pointed out to us that selfishness characterizes the struggle for existence in the animal kingdom. We can not deny that the great family of man is dominated by this principle, and that the natural man is selfish, but as soon as we begin to set ourselves to the task of rising to the plane of that more abundant life of which Jesus spoke, that plane upon which angels dwell, we learn that we must submit ourselves to a higher law, the leading principle of which is love; not that limited, exclusive love exhibited in the mother hen that defends her little brood, or that somewhat broader interest which the ant may have in a member of his own community, but the love that is godlike, that extends to all, that seeks to preserve all, to cherish all.

The natural man is selfish; the spiritual man must not be. He must be humble and full of love. So says the law of God. There is no progress, no rising to the higher plane except by this way. There is no other way given under heaven among men but that way which the Son of God came from heaven to teach in his words and to exemplify in his life. It is the way of love, the way of kindness and good will, of truth and justice, and right dealing one with another. He who would climb up in any other way is a thief and a robber and shall not gain entrance into the kingdom of perfection and peace.

A short time ago, I read the introduction of a work on the rights and duties of American citizenship. Commenting upon the natural tendency of men to gather into families, groups, and communities, the author says: "It is found that the more civilized men are, the greater sociability they exhibit, and consequently, the closer they draw together in their common relations. The closer they draw together, the more interests they have in common, and the more necessary it becomes that the selfish desires of individuals should give way when they conflict with the general interests of the community at large.

"While there is in human nature the social instinct which causes men to derive pleasure from fellowship with one another, there are also elements equally natural, though not equally praiseworthy, which tend to counteract and render impossible the realization of this sentiment. These are the selfish instincts, which, if unrestrained, urge men to seek their own ends without reference to the welfare of others, and cause them to commit acts of violence against those who interfere in any way with their own desires.

"Thus it is that the higher social feelings, which involve the elements of friendliness, sympathy, mutual aid, and self-restraint, are ever warring against the lower and selfish desires, which involve cruelty, hate, violence, and common misery.

"The perfect social condition is one in which the proper desires—such as are beneficial to the individual and do not conflict with the common welfare—are permitted and protected, while all others are restrained and suppressed. . . .

"Gradually, as men grow accustomed to living with one another, and as their ideas of right and wrong become more developed not only are their sympathetic feelings intensified, each of them being made to feel more and more kindly disposed towards others, but each sees that it is to his individual advantage that peace should be maintained.

"It is but a fair return to society that each individual should make the common welfare an object always to be considered in his conduct. This he can do by obeying its laws, by faithfully performing his contracts, and by refraining from violating those rights in others which he thinks others should respect in him."

I have introduced these extracts into this paper, because the principles advocated in them as necessary to good citizenship in our republic are these same principles that must be observed by us in qualifying ourselves for citizenship in the kingdom of God, or, as we may term it, in the great democracy in which the fundamental principles are love, equality, common consent.

Coming directly to the consideration of the family, we find that the same principles that will produce peace in society, those righteous principles that finally will prevail in the kingdom of God, are the principles that now will produce peace in the family life. In our families must be the first administration of those principles of love, equality, and common consent which we expect to be administered in the future upon a much broader scale.

We are told that the very word family denotes in its ancient significance, a group assembled around an altar for religious service, the services being conducted by the father or husband. Were it the case in every family, the altar of God was set up, and were the principles for which it stands observed by every member of the family who gathers around it, there could be no estrangements in that home. There could be no discord there; injustice and selfishness could have no lodgment within its walls.

Peace would be there, for the altar of God with the principles for which it stands are the basis of peace whether it be in the home, in the community, in the nation, or in the great kingdom of God.

Families cling together under adversities of all kinds, under poverty, sickness, danger, and even disgrace, so long as the bonds of love are sufficiently strong to hold them. It is when love fails that families are disrupted. Love fails as a result of wrong conditions.

Too often in the familiarity of family life, the rights of members are invaded. Too often promises made in the home are not kept. Too often duties are left undone. Too often there is inequality in the home in the distribution of its work, in the handling of the money, and in other respects.

It should be our object to correct these things. We have the same need in our homes to stand each in his own place and do his own duty that there is for this to be done in the more extensive work of the church. It is as necessary in the home as in the church that the principle of common consent be cultivated and encouraged. In most cases, arbitrary authority exercised by either the husband or the wife, results in greatly disturbing, if not in destroying, the peace of the home.

In this brief paper, our thoughts have ranged from consideration of the tiny creature whose life is but for a moment to that of angels whose life is forever. The object of this has been to direct our attention to the opportunity before us of going higher, of developing and fitting ourselves for life upon the higher plane.

We have called attention to the fact that, in the animal kingdom, self-preservation is the ruling principle; in other words, that selfishness reigns there; and we have endeavored to show that, upon the higher plane, in that more abundant life to which Jesus has called us, love reigns and is the law, and that out of this principle of love, grow equality of rights and opportunities and the enjoyment of happiness.

Let us go upward.

In our study of the ancient history of Israel, two pictures have impressed themselves upon my mental vision because of their suggestiveness.

One is the picture of that body of people who went out from Egypt and followed the leading of the pillar of cloud to Sinai. Up from the valley of tropical beauty, where the dark cloud of oppression had obscured all the brightness for them, upward and still upward, over a way toilsome and hard, but ever higher and higher, that horde of freed people made their way to Sinai, up we might say, to the presence of God.

The other picture is like it, that of the pilgrims who, in later times, went to Jerusalem to the annual feasts of the nation. The journey to Jerusalem from Galilee was continually upward, to higher and still higher ground until the Holy City was reached in which stood the temple with its Most Holy Place, typical of the presence of God.

The suggestiveness of these pictures to me is in this, that we are called to leave the lowlands where we now inhabit, and rise to higher and still higher ground. We are invited into the more abundant life, that life that is nobler than our present, fuller and more complete in its labors and its enjoyments.

We need not wait until death comes to enter upon this life. If we wait until then, the probability is that our opportunities will not be so great then as now. The more abundant life is to be entered into here and now, a life that leaves behind in the lowlands the darkness, the ignorance, the selfishness, the discord and contention that belong there, and that disappear as we rise into the brighter light and clearer air of the higher atmosphere.

The Lord is ever ready to lead us, to send his light upon us that we may walk safely and without fear. Perhaps there are few times in the whole course of human life when one needs more the guidance of the divine wisdom than in that time when a new home is established. There is something beautiful in the significance of the word family which has already been presented to you, in the thought that each new home as it is established becomes a place for the erection of an altar to Jehovah, and that the little ones as they come into that home shall be trained up from their infancy to love not only the name of God but the principles of his truth.

But how shall this be, if they who found the home, do not both of them love those principles and bow before Him who commends them to us? How can it be accomplished, if the two who found the home be not united in their faith and loyalty? Who can insure peace in that home, if it be not founded on the rock?

Storms will come, no matter how serene the skies may be when the marriage vows are spoken, storms that will try the foundation of the home with boisterous blasts. Many a home has fallen when the fierce winds have blown, because its foundations were not sound, but more of them have stood through sunshine and storm, and the number of wrecked homes will grow fewer and fewer as we learn to be guided by the Lord's wisdom, first in the establishment of the home, and afterwards in observing those principles which are the basis of peace, in every sphere in which men and women shall have a part.

Questions on August Reading.

What two applications may be given to the term peace-makers? Which is better, to be a preserver of the peace or a restorer of peace? What contrast do we find between the natural interests of man and those of the lower orders of life? What is the natural disposition of man? To what law must we submit in rising to the higher plane? What is the only way of progress? How should the selfish interests of individuals be regarded as compared with the interests of the community? What is the perfect social condition? How should the common welfare be always considered by the individual? How is he affected by the maintaining of peace? What are the fundamental principles of the great democracy of God's people? Do they differ from those required for good citizenship in our republic? Where should these principles be first applied? Why? What does the word family in its ancient significance denote? What must accompany the setting up of the altar of God to insure right conditions in the home? What prevailing evils would thus be averted? What form the basis of peace? Is there any variation from this rule? By what power are families held together? What wrong conditions should be corrected in order that love may continue in the home? As a rule, what is the effect of arbitrary authority wherever exercised? What effect has it upon the peace of the home? When may we enter into the more abundant life? What does it leave behind? In what way is divine guidance needed when a new home is to be established? What should be the purpose of the home? What is necessary in the two who found the home?

Jots by the Wayside.

BY T. W. CHATBURN.

At the first streaks of the gray dawning, we are aroused by the brakeman crying, "All passengers for Salt Lake, Spokane, Portland, and Seattle, remain in this car." The magic word Spokane quickened us, and in our dreamy arousing, we see men like trees walking. A. J. Smith, Ferguson, Fordham, Bell, and others, loom up in our vision with the "big depot," gilded spires, and somber hills. A moment later another cry, "Grand Junction, twenty minutes for breakfast," quieted our nerves. Rubbing our eyes open, we gather our tin cup and follow the crowd across the way to a lunch room. We are after a cup of exhilaration; however, we never drink it "hot." We hasten back and devour the remaining crusts of our once splendid lunch, a series of bumpings in the switching and we're whirling on through fields of living green and the best fruit section of Colorado.

Fruita is the next station west, and is the heart of this magnificent fruit-growing region. Its altitude is four thousand five hundred and ten feet. Whirling out upon the Utah Desert we travel one hundred and sixty miles over a weary waste with scarcely sufficient on it to keep a jack rabbit, yet, we opine. The ever restlessness of the pale face will in time divert the rushing waters of Grand and Green rivers far out on this thirsty land; and the Utah Desert will linger only in memory.

Green River is reached, an oasis in the desert; handsome lawns greet the eye, ornamented with shrubs and beautiful flowers. From Green River to Soldier Summit, we are climbing the "Wasatch Range" of mountains for a distance of ninety-nine miles. It is a constant ascent, the scenery growing wilder and more varied as the advance is made.

Helper is reached where a helper engine is placed on the rear to help us over. Four miles west of Helper we enter the famous portals at the entrance of Price River Canyon; the two huge pillars at either side rise to the height of five hundred feet; through the narrow gate the river and railway both run, the stream leaping over rocky beds and its banks are lined with tangled wildwood. It was through this gate that the renowned Albert Sidney Johnston marched his army. On Soldier Summit, over which he passed, was buried one of his soldiers upon the highest railroad point on the Wasatch Range, and for which the pass was named.

We rush on down the mountain side into and through a succession of vales and valleys. Emerging therefrom, the engine screams its greeting to Springville. This is a typical Mormon town, and is really the first settlement we enter.

A very large hot spring comes out of the mountain side, from which the town derives its name. Population thirty-five hundred. Provo, the county-seat of Utah County, is soon reached; population sixty-five hundred. This is a very pretty city; cold mountain water flows down on each side of the streets in abundance; shade trees galore; rich and green gardens filled with fruits and flowers; cool, shady walks on every side, is in striking contrast to the hundreds of miles we have passed on the sear and burnt deserts, over the barren and rocky hills. To the west lies the Utah Lake, a beautiful body of fresh water, thirty-five miles long and a mean of seven miles wide; these waters flow through the Jordan River into Great Salt Lake and, like its namesake that connects Galilee and the Dead Sea, so it connects Utah Lake with Salt Lake.

Ensign Peak, the mount of prophecy, is looming up in the distance; the beautiful city of Saints (?) nestled so cosily in an elbow of the mountains is in plain view. The "Big U" on the mountain side high above Fort Douglas is the welcoming beacon to the wonderful city. The snow-capped range on the east and north almost encircling the city are beautiful indeed, contrasting with the forest of green trees throughout all the city.

Salt Lake City is reached and we disembark and hie away to No. 343 South Sixth East Street, which will be our home for a time, the home of our genial brother, Jefferson Davis Wilson.

Saints' Herald: The inclosed clipping on the opinions of Doctor Parkhurst of this city, is a bad misfit, he having been at the head of a movement to suppress crime, and was made utterly powerless to cope with it. He was actually made to get out, so overwhelming were the awful criminal conditions, and since then for years the crimes of this city have increased so rapidly that the city authorities can not head them off. I actually believe that with the four hundred bombs used within the borders of this city to destroy property and people, the hideous criminal incendiarism, in the poor tenement district, for insurance and spite, and the best part of nights are given over to wanton pleasure and awful crimes, murder and burglaries; and the streets are traversed by loud, lascivious, and abandoned characters; suicide, wanton waste of money, people out of employment, parks full of tramps who sleep on benches and on the ground; poor old men and women whose faces are pinched with hunger; homeless outcasts. Thousands are sent to the island homes for good riddance, to ask for bread; they hustle them off in shame to the workhouse; burglars get by every alarm set. People, under the old story, look out for Mormonism. They warn the people from pulpits and press and in secret that our craft is in danger. Believe them not until they have educated the public all along the line, until they have prepared themselves for a hideous, near-by destruction, that is surely coming upon this city, to its utter ruin and its people.

I well remember the history of the choice seer, killed for the testimony of Jesus, who walked the streets of this city looking over the wonderful buildings, then lifted up his heart and voice and asked God if it were possible that this beautiful city would be destroyed. This answer came, "Yes, I will sink it out of sight with its inhabitants," as near as I can call to remembrance. A city of the worst Christianity, priest-ridden priestcraft, of most hideous, strong delusions, sent upon them that they may believe a lie and be damned; are past redemption, quarreling among themselves. That is simply fulfilling the prophecy in the Book of Mormon that they shall quarrel among themselves to their own downfall and destruction. The article sent you on the predictions of the destruction did not come to pass, but God, instead of man, will fulfill his word when the day comes. Surely he will do nothing save he first revealeth his secrets unto his prophets.

In the one faith,

Fraternally,

A. N. HOXIE.

STIDHAM, Oklahoma, June 21, 1909.

Dear Herald: I enjoy reading your columns as you are the only preacher that I ever get to hear. I am isolated and the nearest Saint is twelve miles, Sr. Martin, of Eufaula.

As Bro. F. R. Tubb wants to know the difference between 1,500 miles square and 1,500 square miles, I will try to demonstrate. The square measure rule is to multiply any number by itself, therefore $1,500 \times 1,500$ equals 2,250,000 square miles.

Well, dear Saints throughout the world, I ask your prayers in behalf of my little boy, twenty months old, who has been afflicted from his birth.

I expect some one would like to know something about this country. It is a good place for the gospel to be preached, as it is thickly settled and the people are church-going people, although they are very wicked; that is, a majority of them are. This is a good farming country. Any kind of grain can be successfully raised although cotton and corn are the principal crops. The soil is rich and deep and good water is easily secured. Land is cheap; from ten to twenty-five dollars per acre, rarely above fifteen dollars per acre. Rent is cheap, wood is plentiful, and there is the best prospect for a crop that I ever saw.

If there should be any of the elders passing by Eufala, please stop off and come to Stidham. They can come on the evening mail hack, and I'll settle with the hackman, as he is one of my customers. They can find me at my shop. I am glad that Elder J. W. Jackson was sent to Oklahoma. There can be a lot of good done here, as some of the prejudice is dying away. There is one Brighamite here and the people are finding out the difference.

Hoping and praying that I may have a colony of Saints to live with, I am,

Your servant,

C. C. CHRISMAN.

CLAY CITY, Indiana, July 2, 1909.

Herald Editors: On Sunday night, June 20, having been called upon to occupy the pulpit at the United Brethren church, I presented the angel's message to the people. Felt bound down to this message only. Five days later I received a letter from Bro. Gomer T. Griffiths, saying, "You will be called upon to defend the truth under very trying circumstances, but if you leave yourself in the hands of God, he will enlighten your mind and inspire your heart, and under the inspiration of God you will declare the gospel in mighty power and will convince many people who to-day are wandering in darkness," etc.

The same day this letter reached me, Utah elders appeared on our streets. They presented themselves as the only gospel messengers. I arose in defense of truth and purity and the fight is on. We will continue the discussion indefinitely. Surely the Lord is greatly blessing me. Their weakness is very apparently seen. The sympathies of the people are with me. Wife and I are the only members here. I am not in communication with any of the Southern Indiana brethren, having come here last December from Pennsylvania. Would like to see some missionaries here. I have a tent in Pennsylvania which I will probably send for.

The people are much interested. I have no church history but Tullidge's; no Inspired Translation. Am working in the mill, not much time to study. Hope you can arrange to send one or more brethren here at the earliest date possible, if you think it wisdom. There are sixteen Utahites here now, but I do not think they will stay long. Let me hear from you. You will probably remember me from past correspondence. The written discussion with a Mr. Watterworth that I wrote you about, Bro. Elbert, terminated with my first article. He was the challenger and aggressor, but grumbled and complained at my first article and quit.

Remember me in your prayers.

In gospel bonds,

CHARLES F. DAVIS.

Editors Herald: As we are members of the Reorganized Church and have never written to the HERALD, thought we would make an effort and let our dear brothers and sisters know that we are still in the faith, although we have not heard a sermon preached by a Latter Day Saint preacher for six years, and will have to admit that during a part of that time we did not live as God wanted us to live. For over two years we have been trying to serve God as we should. We prayed God to grant us the privilege of once more hearing the true gospel preached by a Latter Day Saint, and will say we are thankful to know that he has heard and answered our prayers.

We did not know there was a Latter Day Saint in this whole country, until one Bro. Randall came in on the train Sunday, June 13, and preached in the schoolhouse that night and announced meeting for Monday night and that Bro. James T. Davis would preach. We were denied the right to use the schoolhouse because we were Latter Day Saints, or Mormons as they call us, so I went to the trustees of the Oddfellows and got their hall for Monday night; then we rented a store building and Bro. Davis preached six sermons there. The school board saw they were going to get into trouble, if they did not let us have the schoolhouse, so they gave us permission to use it and Bro. Davis preached ten sermons there, with fairly good interest. Those that attended the meetings liked Bro. Davis' sermons fine and we think there are several that are ready to accept the gospel and be baptized, four at least.

Bro. Davis took orders for five Books of Mormon, but there are some that are very much prejudiced against us, as Latter Day Saints, or Mormons. They say the Latter Day Saints and the Utah people are one and the same and they went so far as to say that Bro. Davis ought to be run out of town and one man said that he ought to be taken out and hung. The mayor of our town said he would be willing to bet five dollars that Bro. Davis was a tramp and was just traveling and preaching to get out of work. I had been working for this same man, the mayor and townsite man, and he refused to let me work any more because I was a Latter Day Saint; but, thank God, all the people in our town and surrounding country are not like him. Bro. Davis left here Monday, June 28, for a small place about eighteen miles from here called Peal, where there are some Brighamite preachers working among the people. He will stay there for a time and on the 12th or 15th of July he will start debating with the Campbellites at Ryatt, Arkansas, just seven miles south of us.

I am a member of the Lamoni Branch and my wife is a member of the Crescent Branch. We ask an interest in the prayers of the Saints that we may stand the storm and be faithful, no matter what the opposition may be, and remember Bro. Davis, for this country is a hard row to hoe. May God give strength to all his Saints and courage give them too, is our prayer,

BRO. AND SR. W. E. CURRIE.

SIKESTON, Missouri, July 2, 1909.

Dear Herald: As I have been looking over the HERALD and reading the precious letters that the brothers and sisters have written, I feel it my duty to put in a few words from this part of the world. We are the only Latter Day Saints I know of around here, and I feel very lonely and sad in heart. I think if I could hear a good gospel sermon it would be food to my soul. I can hardly wait until Fridays to get the Ensign and HERALD, as it is all the gospel we can hear.

I think we are living in the last days when destruction shall come upon the earth. We can look around us every day and see things coming to pass as the prophet said it would be in the last days. We Saints ought to be more humble and faithful to our blessed Master.

Saints, pray for me that I may be healed if it is God's will. I have been afflicted seven years with several kinds of diseases. Pray for me that I may come forth as a rose refreshed by dew. I know if I will live as Jesus wants me to live, that I will come forth with a shining face in the next world, where there will be no more sickness, sorrow, death, or pain. I think I would faint by the wayside if it were not for the hope I have in my Redeemer. I know that Jesus is merciful to his people and I know that he has blessed me wonderfully insomuch that there was not room to receive it. I just fell down on my bed and thought I was dying, but Jesus lifted me up and I shouted his blessed name, as I never did before.

It makes me feel lonely to think I can not attend the reunion. I would give half my life to be in another Latter Day Saint meeting and hear the gospel in its fullness and hear the prayers. I know I would feel better if I could be with the Saints. Pray for me that I may sow gospel seeds out here. The people here are so wicked they can not hardly bear preaching. They have just got through with a lawsuit with the minister and they are going to have another one soon.

I am a Sunday-school teacher at the Methodist Church and try in my weak way to tell things of Jesus, and what they must do before Jesus will accept them. I wish some elder would come out here, and preach some for us, so if there are any earnest in heart they may find the glorious gospel that would be food to their soul. Saints, remember me in the reunion and pray for my brothers.

Ever praying for the upbuilding of Zion and that Jesus will keep me under the shadow of his wing and use me as he sees best, so that when he comes he can say, "Come up higher, my good and faithful servant."

Goodbye to all till we meet to part no more,

MISS EULA GRIGSBY.

BAY MINETTE, Alabama, June 30, 1909.

Dear Herald: I do not feel that my little mite would be any help to any one, but we do not know how many we may comfort and cheer along life's rugged road. I am under the hand of affliction and I feel that it is the chastening hand of God, yet I have felt the blessings of God all through the five weeks' suffering that I have passed through. I feel it is for my good and, like Job of old, I can say, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust him."

I could not get an elder until a few days ago, but I received a blessing as I suffered very little afterward; but the doctor had to perform a work, and to-day I am able to be about, for which I thank the Lord. I never felt greater love for my family, for the church and for all mankind than I do now. My heart's greatest desire is that I may be able to do more in the work of God in bringing souls to a knowledge of the true and everlasting gospel, for I know that this work is true. I have felt discouraged and almost ready to give up, but in due time the Lord would show me the silver lining to the dark cloud that hung over me, then I would take courage and press on. Dear brothers and sisters, let us press on and up, that our light may shine; that others may see the love of God that is in us. Let us love one another, for if we speak evil of one another and hate one another we show the dark side and not the light. If we are in this condition we will not enjoy the Holy Spirit, neither will both be saved in the kingdom, for God is not the author of confusion, but he has called us to peace. Oh, Saints, let us humble ourselves and come in the strength of our God, for the struggle will not be long before we will be called to occupy higher ground, and if our lamps are trimmed and ready, we will enter in; if not, we will be cast out.

Dear Saints, pray for me that I may be able to live so that I will be worthy of such gifts and blessings as the Lord may bestow upon me and that I may be better able to work in the vineyard of the Lord. My prayers are for the blessings of God to rest on the whole church from the greatest unto the least.

Your brother in Christ,

G. W. BANKESTER.

PHILADELPHIA, Pennsylvania, July 5, 1909.

Editors Herald: You will see by this address that I am among the folks on the coast, arrived here just in time to catch the concluding words of what was reported to be an edifying discourse by Bro. M. C. Fisher, at Somerville, Massachusetts. Those present seemed to be in a happy mood, as Boston Saints can be. After greetings of, "Glad to see you? How are you? Going to stay until after our reunion?" I was soon on the way home with Brother Fisher and Sr. Ada Sanford, to meet with good care. A hot wave was pressing down, in striking contrast to conditions prevailing a few weeks previous.

My associate, Bro. F. M. Sheehy, had tired of waiting and gone to New York. After visiting a few families of Saints and attending the Wednesday evening prayer meeting in which there was an active participation, and the meeting a good one, I quit Boston, arriving in New York on Friday morning on the steamer Harvard. Found Brother Sheehy at 965 Saint Marks Avenue in good condition, and under care of Bro. and Sr. George Potts and family. Saturday following we attended the annual Sunday school picnic held by the Saints in Prospect Park, a delightful place, and ample preparations had been made to have an enjoyable outing, especially for the young folks. Old and young joined with glee in social chat, frolic and fun in the open air, not forgetting to test the merits of the well-prepared luncheon. It was a pleasure to meet with the Brooklyn Saints again, and note so many familiar faces. Among the new ones present was the senior Brother Potts, from England, in his eighty-third year, soon to return to his native land.

Sunday Brother Sheehy and I were the speakers at the church, he in the evening and I in the morning, Brn. George Baty, E. Squires, and William Hobson, in charge. Bro. Sheehy gave his hearers some strong meat in his discourse. A good interest was manifest in the Sunday school service, and the Saints were active in the prayer and testimony meeting; so going ahead.

I observed that Independence was represented in the choir by Bro. Paul Craig. A heavy downpour of rain, most refreshing, fell during the day. So matters appear to be going well this way.

Yesterday we spent the glorious Fourth of July in Philadelphia, attending the Sunday school and sacrament services in the morning, and preaching in the evening. A good many of the Saints were absent, attending the Sunday school convention at Elk Mills, Maryland, Bro. Walter W. Smith, the pastor, one of them. The Saints here entered with earnestness into the services of the day with manifest zeal and growth. While here we are under the care of our excellent young sisters, Clara Zimmermann and Eunice Smith, Bro. and Sr. Zimmermann, Sr. Anna and the older boys having gone to Seattle to view the wild and woolly West.

Occasionally an exceptional opportunity comes to every one. To-day was ours. At 10 a. m., we stood by Independence Hall and joined in the celebration of our birth of freedom. Listened to the eulogies and recounting of the names of some of the illustrious men and great events in our nation's history. The star of the occasion was Baron Kogoro Takahira, Japanese ambassador to the United States. He was introduced by Mayor Reyburn and spoke in English, the great audience generously applauding. He is smaller in stature than the average American and shows to be intelligent. Referring to his own country he said in part: "We have a constitution guaranteeing the freedom of religious belief, liberty of speech, writing, publication, public meetings, and associations. Freedom of conscience and progress of the truth are of the most vital importance to man." So Japan is in the line of progress.

Editors Herald: It is now some time since I wrote to your pages. We are always glad to get the dear old HERALD week by week, as we find in its pages that which seems to cheer one's drooping spirit. After reading the various letters and articles written by the brethren, we feel a kind of inspiration come over us, which seems to give us fresh courage by the way. It is now some twenty-seven years since I embraced the truth, but I still feel to rejoice, and praise God for the knowledge he has bestowed upon me; I still have a desire to do what little I can to make it known to others, but I can assure you, dear reader, it is an uphill course for the truth to be presented out here. We can seldom get a stranger out at our meeting. The few that make up the branch many times get discouraged, because of the stigma put upon them by the outsiders. We feel much concerned over our children, as we want to keep them with us in the church. How long, O Lord, how long shall we have to wait for the time when we can gather to Zion. We long to see some preparation for that time to come. We will still hope, trust, and pray for a brighter future.

Your brother in gospel bonds,

Extracts from Letters.

E. E. Long, Crabtree, Ohio: "I am preaching in the Christian Order church here to large crowds with fine interest. I have another church at my disposal when I wish to go. This is a new place and the country is stirred up for miles around. There is not the prejudice here usually found in new places. Address me Rosden, Ohio, care J. A. Criswell."

Bro. I. M. Smith, Race Track, Montana: "I baptized nine here last Tuesday."

E. B. Hull, 1431 Academy Street, Scranton, Pennsylvania: "I am in Scranton, Pennsylvania, working in a tent with Elder A. E. Stone; have been here one month; interest increasing. I receive my HERALD every week, for which I thank the publishing department."

News From Branches

DELISLE, SASKATCHEWAN, CANADA.

It has been suggested that perhaps a few lines from this far away northern country might be of interest to the readers of the HERALD. The Saints in these parts are very much alive to the building up of Christ's church and kingdom.

Six new members were added to our branch by baptism, making a total of thirty-six for the Minnesota Branch. Three of the new members were my husband and two boys. How our hearts have rejoiced! We have a large (for these parts) flourishing Sunday school, over which Mrs. C. O. Ferrie very ably presides. There are sixty enrolled. Five families are represented there who are not church members.

Bro. Davidson reached us three weeks ago and has done much to encourage us spiritually and help us to prepare for the conference, and Sunday school and Religio conventions to be held at Saskatoon, July 14 to 18. Our Religio has been revived under his supervision and there seems a good prospect for efficient work in that line. Bro. Davidson has been a wonderful help; has held preaching services as often as possible to much interested audiences, and giving us much needed instruction in our various lines of work.

May God continue to bless us and give us of his divine wisdom that we may be able to win souls to Christ and prepare for his coming.

The prayer of your sister

GRACE NUNN.

NEW ALBANY, INDIANA.

The month of June was one of more than usual advance in our little branch. All meetings were well attended and the spiritual blessings were manifested to many.

Our Sunday school business meeting was held June 26, with all old officers reelected.

Bro. James Ewitt was chosen as Religio president for the next six months, with Alma Brown as his assistant.

Three more precious souls were baptized into our fold by the writer the past week; my wife obeying the angel message, as one; the other two were men in the prime of life, one being a Roman Catholic. He came into the work against strong opposition on part of his family and relatives. He's a fine man and certainly a fine addition to the work. We now have twenty-five in our branch and by all indications a grand work will be done in New Albany, as several prominent people are getting favorable to us.

May God prosper his work everywhere, and may we all be on the watch.

JOHN ZAHND.

CENTRAL CHICAGO ITEMS.

Sunday, July 4, was such a cold day, jackets were needed instead of electrical fans. Sacrament service was quite well attended in the morning, and we feel all were blessed. If we would live up to our privileges how much greater would be our blessings! How many of us are doing the best we can under the circumstances; consider the Lord's work first in all things? Sermon in evening was quite instructive, by Elder E. K. Evans, of Grand Rapids, Michigan. Bro. Evans and wife were the guests of Sr. Elizabeth Evison.

Monday, the day we intended to celebrate. What a cold, rainy time and how many disappointed because we could not attend the picnic we had planned at Washington Park. Some people in the city started their furnaces, and the heat was very acceptable.

Sr. George Waldrick has returned with her mother from their western trip, and we are glad to welcome them home.

By request of Sister Sherman, the regular Wednesday evening prayer meeting was voted Sunday to be held at the home of Sister Sherman instead of at the church. Seventeen in attendance and a very good meeting. How it rejoices our hearts to meet with those who have been deprived of the public worship for so long.

We are sorry to report that Elder Arthur Allen is again suffering with one of Job's boils (or tormentors) and request that the Saints will remember him at the throne of grace, that he may be relieved of this affliction. It is now over a month since the first carbuncle made its appearance on his neck. "The prayers of the righteous availeth much."

Sr. T. Vanderhoof and her husband have recently moved in our locality, on Paullina near Sixty-sixth, which has made our hearts glad, as we feel that we have one good worker that much nearer.

We neglected to mention that a little daughter made her appearance at the home of Brother and Sister Cotton a few weeks ago. We trust that all these little buds of promise will be influenced to such a degree that they will delight to be engaged in the work of the Lord, as they grow to maturity. As we have mentioned before, if all of our young people were enlisted in the work, what an army we would have. Let us each one do our best to assist them in every way possible to become interested in the gospel, and show by our good and happy lives that it is really worth while to devote our time and energies to the Lord's work. "Let us be cheerful in our warfare that we may be joyous in our triumph."

Died.

KNUDSON.—Bro. Christian Knudson was born in Denmark, May 3, 1830; emigrated to America in 1878. In the spring of 1881 he settled on a farm near Guilford, Missouri, where he died June 14, 1909, after a sickness lasting about four months. Bro. Knudson united with the church May 30, 1879. He was a loving husband, a kind father, and the gospel was dear to him. He leaves to mourn, one son and three daughters, besides a host of friends. Funeral from Long Branch church; sermon by A. E. McCord. Thus another has passed over the river of death to his reward.

HAWLEY.—Miss Sylvia Johnson was born May 27, 1832, in Wayne County, Michigan, and was married to Elder John Hawley October 22, 1849, at Fredericksburg, Texas. To this union twelve children were born, four dying in infancy; eight are left to mourn the loss of a kind mother. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church October 22, 1871, by her husband, at Gallands Grove, Iowa. Seven weeks previous to her death her husband died. Death came as a happy release.

"Rest, mother, rest,
We wish not your return;
For you it is the best,
While we God's will must learn."

BISHOP.—At New London, Iowa, June 8, Sr. Isabella Bishop. She was born in New Jersey, September 16, 1829. In 1849 she was married to Walter Bishop in Ohio, and in 1856 moved to New London in which community she resided until her death. Her husband passed away in 1878. She united with the church some years ago and held to the faith unto the last, passing away in hope of a resurrection with the faithful when the Lord shall come. Four sons and one daughter remain, five children having passed on before. Funeral services conducted by Charles Fry.

SUMMERFIELD.—Bro. William D. Summerfield passed from this life June 17, 1909, at his home in Weston, Missouri. He was born March 16, 1858, at Provo, Utah, and was baptized January 13, 1864, by J. W. Gillen. He leaves to mourn a wife and four children, an aged mother, five brothers, and one sister, Mrs. E. A. Powell, of Stewartsville, Missouri. Funeral at the Baptist Church at Weston, June 18, 1909.

HAY.—Elder Johnie Hay was born September 4, 1879, age twenty-nine years, nine months, and twelve days. Was baptized by Elder E. W. Nunley, August 18, 1895, near Hearne, Robertson County, Texas. Was married to Maude L. Hill on January 4, 1899; to them were born four children, two girls and two boys. He was ordained a priest by Elder Amos J. Moore. Was ordained an elder July 27, 1903, and a seventy at General Conference in April, 1908. He was put in the mission field in Texas in April, 1907, and was continued in said mission until his death, which occurred June 16, 1909. Bro. Johnie was born and raised near Hearne, Texas, was always an obedient son and a consistent member of the church from the day he was baptized until he died. He was a kind, affectionate husband and father; and was an energetic, persevering young man in business and church work. He loved God and the church and died in the gospel harness. His death was a surprise to us all. He seemed as well as usual until within a half hour of his death. The cause is unknown, but the writer believes congestion of the brain was the cause. His funeral took place on the 17th at Suggs' Cemetery. A large concourse of people attended the services, which were conducted by E. W. Nunley. He leaves father, mother, wife, four children, sister, and a brother-in-law, besides a host of friends to mourn his early and sudden demise. We wonder why he was taken now, because of his usefulness, but we humbly bow in submission to the dispensation of God's providence, knowing that he knoweth best

Ideal Vacation Trips

The Ideal Vacation involves a complete change of scene and living conditions, both of which will be obtained by making a trip to any of the following places:

COLORADO—the greatest summer resort state in the country, offers the greatest variety of out-door activity and recreation in a dry, invigorating climate, amid inspiring mountain scenery. The Burlington Route is the shortest line, and with its splendid trains, several of them electric-lighted one-night-on-the-road trains, offers the best service thereto.

YELLOWSTONE PARK—the National Playground, containing the greatest collection of Nature's wonders, and where game animals are constantly seen in their native wild state is unique. Through train service to Gardiner, the Official or Northern entrance to the Park, from principal Burlington points.

ALASKA-YUKON-PACIFIC EXPOSITION—unique among expositions and the most beautiful and interesting ever held, where meet the Occident and the Orient, the South Seas and Alaska. A trip to the Exposition offers great educational advantages and enables one to see at first hand the marvelous recent development of the great Northwest with its unlimited opportunities for investment in orchard, ranch or city. The Burlington is the only line which runs through trains to Seattle the Exposition City.

I would like to tell you about the unusually low cost of any of these trips and give you Burlington Route folders on Colorado, the Yellowstone or the Exposition.

Adultery is next to it. Why? Because, of all the carnal offenses, it comes nearest to being irreparable, save only murder. Who can estimate the lasting and far-reaching evil effects of sexual sin? The consequences may be direct or indirect; but it is with great difficulty that they can be wiped out, if indeed they ever can be. No wonder God placed adultery next to murder in the Ten Commandments, is it? Theft and covetousness may be repaired, the consequences of unchastity follow the guilty ones to the grave and perhaps, almost to an eternity beyond.—Liahona The Elders' Journal.

The foregoing article is taken from the editorial columns of the Liahona, published by the Utah Mormon church as their vehicle for missionary work, at Independence, Missouri, for July 10, 1909. It is an astonishing document, coming from the source it does. From the evidences which have been placed before the world, in the inquiry made by the senatorial committee in what is known as the Smoot case, it is astonishing that intelligent men sustaining the condition of things in the Utah church, and the men who testified to such conditions would, in an intelligent community, put such a statement in print for circulation. Believing that we are warranted in so doing, we present the document, and call the attention of the Liahona to what the Book of Mormon states in regard to the sexual conditions existing in Utah which were so notoriously shown up in the senatorial inquiry referred to.

In the second chapter of Jacob, the prophet and minister unto the people made inquiry of the Lord respecting the people over whom he was presiding and to whom he was ministering. The result of this inquiry was as follows: "Thus came the word unto me, saying, Jacob, get thou up into the temple on the morrow, and declare the word which I shall give thee, unto this people."

After receiving this word he went up to the temple and reproved the people of their transgressions, their carelessness in keeping the commandments, their pride, and other things which were reprehensible. He continued specifically thus:

And were it not that I must speak unto you concerning a grosser crime, my heart would rejoice exceedingly, because of you. But the word of God burthens me because of your grosser crimes. For behold, thus saith the Lord, This people begin to wax in iniquity; they understand not the scriptures: for they seek to excuse themselves in committing whoredoms, because of the things which are written concerning David, and Solomon his son. Behold, David and Solomon truly had

THE GRAVEST SINS.

The Book of Mormon (page 350) points out the grievousness of the iniquity of harlotry and adultery, placing them second only to murder and the unpardonable sin, denying the Holy Ghost. That is the place the sexual sin has always occupied in the category of crime, according to the "Mormon" view. That is what the young people of the Latter Day Saints are explicitly taught. And the result is, as a whole, they are the cleanest people sexually upon the earth.

The gravity of sexual vice can hardly be overestimated. No efforts should be spared to impress this fact, in a judicious way, upon the minds of the young. God has made it an offense second only to the shedding of innocent blood.

There is one sin that seems to be absolutely unpardonable; namely, the sin against the Holy Ghost. This is a spiritual sin, which few, perhaps, have the power to commit, because to do so, you must have at least knowledge enough to "know that ye deny it," as Alma explains (39: 6). But there is a physical crime that ranks with it in magnitude; namely, murder, and every person has it in his power to commit it. Murder is the gravest crime because it is the hardest to repair. In fact it is wholly irreparable. Any of us may strike out a human life, but none of us can bring it back. Only God can bring a life into the earth. Hence for that life to be snuffed out by mortal, is a thing that amounts to sin against God as well as being irreparable.

many wives and concubines, which thing was abominable before me, saith the Lord, wherefore, thus saith the Lord, I have led this people forth out of the land of Jerusalem, by the power of mine arm, that I might raise up unto me a righteous branch from the fruit of the loins of Joseph. Wherefore, I, the Lord God, will not suffer that this people shall do like unto them of old. Wherefore, my brethren, hear me, and hearken to the word of the Lord: For there shall not any man among you have save it be one wife; and concubines he shall have none: For I, the Lord God, delighteth in the chastity of women. And whoredoms are an abomination before me; thus saith the Lord of hosts. Wherefore, this people shall keep my commandments, saith the Lord of hosts, or cursed be the land for their sakes.

The Elders' Journal has cited the condemnation of the Book of Mormon against sexual immorality, and likened it in grossness second only to murder. Now, how will the Elders' Journal shift the burden which they have thus laid upon themselves to accept the Book of Mormon as an authoritative standard of decision as to what is criminality and what is not criminality in this regard. They have quoted from the Book of Mormon and given their citation.

We call their attention to the facts set forth in the citations from the Book of Jacob, Book of Mormon, second chapter.

1. Jacob states distinctly that if it were not for their grosser crimes, his heart would rejoice because of them; and also that he was burdened by the word of the Lord because of their grosser crimes; the word crimes is plural.

2. He states distinctly that the people to whom he was addressing himself had begun to wax in iniquity; understanding not the scriptures.

3. That they were excusing themselves in committing whoredoms, because of what was written concerning David and Solomon.

4. That David and Solomon having many wives and concubines was a thing which was abominable before God.

5. That the Lord had brought that people out of the land of Jerusalem that he might raise up to himself a righteous branch from the fruit of the loins of Joseph.

6. That the Lord would not suffer that they should do as did the people of old.

7. Commanding them directly that no man among them should have more than one wife; and concubines should he have none.

8. That the reason given by the Lord for this was, that he delighted in the chastity of women.

9. That whoredoms were an abomination before God.

On the last page of the Liahona, of the same issue from which we have quoted, occurs the following quotation from the Doctrine and Covenants: "From eternity to eternity he is the same, and his years never fail." Those who are reading this will remember that it is written by revelation of the same God who instructed Jacob to go up into the temple and reprove the people for their iniquity. We challenge the Elders' Journal to quote this citation from the Book of Mormon, Book of Jacob, which we have given, following the article which we have written, and disprove the application which common sense, logic, and processes of right thinking will make to the conditions shown to exist in the Mormon church in Utah and among the people in whose interest that journal is published.

TRUE SUCCESSION.

Quite a number of years ago, while yet the HERALD was being published at Plano, Illinois, Charles W. Penrose, now one of the Twelve in the Utah church, was publishing at Ogden, Utah, a little journal called the Ogden Junction. In one of the leading articles of this journal at one time was a statement to the effect that "the son of the Prophet" was afraid of what might be discovered of the history of the past, referring to the history of the church before the death of Joseph and Hyrum Smith. This statement was called out by a reference made in the HERALD to an effort being made by certain parties to find reliable information to the effect that there was collusion between Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon in connection with the origin of the work. Our reply to this statement regarding the fear of "the son of the Prophet" of what discoveries might be made in the past history, was, emphatically, that "the son of the Prophet" had no fear in respect to what the past might reveal or investigation or inquiry discover. We are now, as we were then, absolutely without fear of the discoveries that might be the result of inquiry, or of what fictitious circumstances, sometimes called fate, might present with regard to the history of the church, or the acts of men connected with it. Up to this period of time every discovery of honest investigators has justified us for this absence of fear. Every discovery that has been made, having a just application to the church or its work up to the death of Joseph and Hyrum Smith, has been decidedly favorable to the contentions we have been making. A discovery made by the diligent search of Elder Walter W. Smith, now laboring in Philadelphia, is a case in point.

On the 10th of January, 1848, a special conference of a goodly number of members of the church during the lifetime of Joseph and Hyrum Smith, was convened at the house of an elder by the name of Thomas Tourtillott. Over this conference Elder Tourtillott presided.

One action of this conference is discovered in the following:

Resolved, That whereas, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, has suffered much from the imposition of men professing to be prophets and leaders of the church, and have led their followers into sin and iniquities of the grossest kind, and have thereby brought the principles of our holy religion into disrepute before the world. Therefore,

Resolved, That we deem it expedient that some measures be adopted for the speedy relief and redemption of the Saints, and that a statement be made of the principal causes that have led to this evil in the church, and brought so much suffering upon the innocent, whereby many are now scattered to and fro in the earth, like sheep having no shepherd. And whereas, we believe that the Lord has not deprived this people of a prophet—therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of six men be appointed to write a proclamation to all the Saints, setting forth the true order of the church, according to the law of God.

Whereupon, Thomas Tourtillott, Aaron Hook, Alva Smith, John Landers, William Smith, and Nathaniel Berry, were unanimously chosen said committee.

This committee, after due deliberation, published a communication entitled, "To the scattered Saints." In this communication, after setting forth what they believed to be the causes which led to the evil conditions which they deplored, they set forth the following as an agreement of principle of organization.

First, a Presidency of three, section 3, paragraph 11.

Secondly, the traveling High Council, to act under the direction of the First Presidency, par. 12, and in addition to this is the council of twelve high priests who form a standing council for the church in Zion, including the seventies, elders, bishops, priests, teachers, and deacons, all acting in their several capacities as defined in the Book of Covenants.

Third, we hold the Book of Covenants as a law unto the church, until the coming of Christ, immutable and unchangeable, therefore we have no right, neither an angel from heaven to violate this law. Provisions are also made in this law for the filling up of vacancies that may occur, without the administration of an angel for that purpose, sec. 13, par. 4, sec. 5, pars. 5 and 6.

The gate into the church is baptism, and the right to the Presidency of the church comes by ordination of those holding the authority in the church, and by the appointment of the church. The President may also be appointed by revelation and acknowledged by the church in his administration, and such is the power and authority invested in this our brother, William Smith, and we now call upon you, as servants of the living God, to rise up and lay hold.

Under this declaration, which was signed by the committee, an organization apparently was effected, in which William Smith, Aaron Hook, and Alva Smith were chosen to preside, and a pamphlet was published sometime in November, 1848, including the minutes of the conference, the appeal to the scattered Saints, and a revelation said to have been given to William Smith in 1847. From this revelation we quote as follows:

Therefore, my servant William, gird up thy loins and put on thy whole armor for the work whereunto I have appointed thee, for though thy spirit has not been altogether pure, yet because thou hast humbled thyself before me, and because of the integrity of thy heart in the proclamation of the truth, and because thou hast nobly and manfully defended the cause of thy father's house, the cause of the innocent and my servant Joseph who was the Prophet and head of the church in these last days, a church of my own right hand's planting, not to be destroyed or thrown down; yea, because of these things I have forgiven thee, and accepted thy offering. I said unto my servant Joseph that his blessing should remain upon the head of his posterity, and be handed down through the lineage of his father's house according to the flesh; therefore the true church continueth with this priesthood—that same high priesthood with which thou art invested and to which thou hast been ordained by my servant Joseph, thy brother, and which thou dost inherit by lineage from thy father Joseph Smith, sr., who was a descendant of Joseph the son of Jacob who was sold into Egypt; and no power on earth can deprive thee of thy authority and priesthood. Moreover I have appointed thee, my servant William Smith, to take the place of my servant Hiram Smith, thy brother, as Patriarch unto the whole church, and to preside over my people, saith the Lord your God, and no power shall remove thee therefrom; and thou shalt be the prophet, seer, revelator, and translator unto my church during the minority of him whom I have appointed from the loins of Joseph thy brother; go on, therefore, and organize and set in order all the branches, for I have given thee full power and authority.

This pamphlet was issued and circulated under the authority of William Smith and those with him, which authority had been bestowed by the church under the administration of Joseph Smith, acting as president of the church organized April 6, 1830. The men composing this organization so effected in Philadelphia in January, 1848, made an effort to build up the church, preach the gospel, and regather the membership which had been scattered by means of the evil doctrines and practices which had been introduced into the church. There can be no question but what these men held legitimate authority; and had they but pursued the proper courses after such organization, having the right of church expansion, they would have formed a strong defense against the encroaching evil and would have accomplished much good. We make these extracts from this pamphlet discovered by Bro. Walter W. Smith, who has been very persistent in searching for historical facts connected with the history of the church in the old city of "brotherly love."

It will be seen that while William Smith was chosen to act as president, such choice was made upon the hypothesis that he had been ordained to succeed his brother Hyrum as patriarch of the church, and also as having been ordained a prophet, seer, and revelator.

It will be seen, furthermore, that this appointment to preside was understood by them to be in force only until the one who had been chosen of God to succeed in the Presidency should remain in his minority. That if, during this minority, this one who had come in at the gate should retain the honor and integrity consistent in an upright life, he should be placed in the sphere into which he had been called.

It does not detract from the value of this testimony that the statement is made in a revelation stated to have been given to William Smith in 1847. If the revelation was genuine, it is in harmony with the revelations in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, affirming the principle that "in thee and thy seed, shall the nations of the earth be blessed," a promise made to Joseph Smith, jr., the first president of the church organized in 1830. If the revelation is not genuine, it still shows that the principle referred to was understood not only by William Smith, the brother of Joseph, but by his associates, the men named in the committee, two of whom, Aaron Hook and Alva Smith, were chosen to form a part of the Presidency.

We give this to the readers of the HERALD as an additional evidence that the principle of true succession, as to the presidency of the church, was not only understood but was openly advocated before the choosing of Brigham Young at Winter Quarters in December, 1847; and the consequent reorganization of his followers as a whole, under the ministration of the regime instituted by Brigham Young.

It may be well to add here a fragment of history of the past, a blessing pronounced upon the head of Joseph Smith, the son of Joseph Smith, jr., by his grandfather, Joseph Smith, sr.

BLESSING OF JOSEPH SMITH, 3D.

I lay my hands upon your head to bless you: your name is Joseph, and it is after the name of your father; you are Joseph the third; and you shall live, and after you are grown up, you shall have wisdom, knowledge, and understanding. And you shall search into the mysteries of the kingdom of God. Your heart shall be tender toward all, and your hand shall be opened to relieve the poor. You shall be admired by every one who beholds you, and you shall be an honor to your father and mother, and a comfort to your mother, and a help to your brothers. You shall have power to carry out all that your father left undone when you become of age. And you shall have power given you to wield the sword of Laban.

We have not been able to see in the events transpiring since the death of Joseph and Hyrum Smith, any necessity for the wielding of the sword of Laban. One thing, however, we have seen clearly, and that is, that it was not only the province of those who had received the priesthood in the days of Joseph and Hyrum Smith, but it was their duty to take up the measures instituted by Joseph Smith, for the preaching of the gospel, and the building up of the church, in the intent, purpose, and integrity of the word left on record by Joseph Smith, prophet, seer, and revelator. This has been done so far as it has been possible under existing conditions. Let the event speak for the work done.

THE BIRTH OF JOSEPH SMITH.

The next issue of the HERALD will contain the first number of the SAINTS' HERALD Historical Series. This number will be by Sr. Vida E. Smith, and will be entitled "Parentage and birth of Joseph Smith."

The readers of the HERALD are well acquainted with the writings of Sr. Vida E. Smith, and those who have read Autumn Leaves will remember with pleasure her series of articles entitled "The historic trio."

In this article she prepares the way for others to follow, telling of the notable events in the life of Joseph Smith and in the history of the church.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

"Nothing is, perhaps, more dramatically illustrative of the change that has come over the government and political life in Turkey than the really startling things that have already been done in Jerusalem under the constitutional regime of the new governor. This official, who came to power upon the triumph of the Young Turks last summer, in his 'letter to the citizens' declared:

"I have formed a commission composed of competent persons, whose duty it will be to investigate the agricultural needs of the province and to submit to me a report of the result of their investigations. I convened a committee of merchants, with the object of creating a Chamber of Commerce which can serve as a consulting body. . . . Being assured of the extreme need of water from the town, I have confided to an energetic man the consideration of a project to bring into Jerusalem the waters of the spring Arroub, and also the formation of a company which is to procure the capital necessary for the work. I have placed myself in communication with the Jaffa-Jerusalem Railway Company, and have asked them to consider the question of a junction of their railroad with the Haifa-Damascus line, and am endeavoring to promote by the construction of other railway lines, the easy and free access to all parts of the country of travelers arriving at Jaffa and Jerusalem. In conclusion, I have charged the municipality with the earnest consideration of the speedy sanitary canalization of the town.'

"A new economic impulse has begun to stir Palestine. Its agricultural and mining possibilities are being developed and even manufacturing has taken a foothold. The modern city of Jerusalem, which numbers now more than eighty thousand inhabitants, is growing rapidly, we are told, the most rapid growth taking place outside the old walls into a new city in which the oldest residence is less than twenty-five years of age."—The American Review of Reviews, July, 1909.

WHY WILL MEN ROB GOD?

That is one of the questions that has puzzled me. Why will they do it? If we rob God how can we expect his blessing? "Thou shalt not steal," but "thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself."—Luke 10: 27. "On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets."—Matthew 22: 40.

Now, Saints, you who do not pay your tithes and offerings, (for it is in neglecting to do so that you rob God,) I want you to carefully think over the above. Think just as carefully as you did when you were weighing the evidence for and against the angel's message before you entered the church. "Let no man deceive himself."

For my part I would just as much expect to quit eating and live, as to "rob God" and expect to continue a member in good standing and have my prayers answered. You may think I have used strong language, but why should I not? My only object is to awaken you to a sense of duty to your Father, who gave you all you have. Do you think that God will be more lenient with you than he was to those spoken of in Malachi 3: 8 from which we quote, "I the Lord change NOT."

As a people we expect to find acceptance with God only so far as we are willing to do his will and keep his commandments. Please do not forget that. "If ye love me, keep my commandments."—John 14: 15. "For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments, and his commandments are not grievous."—1 John 5: 3. We are not only bound to obey, but we are assured that we can do so; they are not "grievous," not burdensome, not something we can not do. God is not unreasonable, but our compassionate Father who "so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John 3: 16.

Need I tell you that "faith without works is dead"? and that "by works was faith made perfect"? (James 2: 22.) What would you think of foreigners who came to our country and were naturalized citizens, but failed to pay taxes? You would say they were poor citizens. Well, what about those who enter the church of Jesus Christ, whose first duty is to "seek to build up the kingdom of God"?

Why, yes, we are all to be "laborers with God," but we must labor with him or we labor alone. Let us look closely at our text. Malachi 3: 10: "Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it."

Can anything be plainer? Prove me herewith. With what? Why, the very thing spoken of, tithes and offerings. (Verse 8.) Do you think God will break his word and give you the blessing anyway? "I, the Lord, am bound when ye do what I say, but when ye do not what I say, ye have no promise."—Doctrine and Covenants 81: 3. Do you believe that? If so, your duty is plain.

Would a person's sins be remitted if he were not baptized? Why, no. Neither can we expect the blessings unless we comply with the terms upon which they are promised. We are not owners of what we have, but stewards. We have a trust, that is, we have been trusted with what we have. It belongs to the Lord, for he says. "The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein."—Psalm 24: 1. "For every beast of the forest is mine, and the wild beasts of the field are mine."—Psalm 50: 10. "We brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out."—1 Timothy 6: 7.

The Lord wants us to conduct ourselves so that when we "fail he can receive us into everlasting habitations." I used the word can advisedly. If we do not do the best we can to obey God's laws, we break or neglect the very means he has provided for them to reach us.

Yes, ye are stewards: "A commandment I give unto you concerning your stewardship which I have appointed unto you; behold, all these properties are mine, or else your faith is vain, . . . then ye are stewards, otherwise ye are no stewards. But verily I say unto you, I have appointed unto you to be stewards over mine house, even stewards indeed."—Section 101: 10. Again, "It is wisdom in me" (same section, paragraph two). That ought to be enough. Who will pit his wisdom against the Christ's? "It is expedient that I, the Lord, should make every man accountable, as stewards over earthly blessings, which I have made and prepared for my creatures."—Section 101:2. So you see it is a solemn trust.

Drawn by Ernest Webbe.

Shall we prove that we are worthy of being trusted? This is a celestial law. Those "who are not sanctified through the law which I have given unto you, even the law of Christ, must inherit another kingdom, even that of a terrestrial kingdom, or that of a telestial kingdom. For he who is not able to abide the law of a celestial kingdom, can not abide a celestial glory."—Doctrine and Covenants 85:5. "For it is required of the Lord, at the hand of every steward, to render an account of his stewardship, both in time and in eternity. For he who is faithful and wise in time [that is, now] is accounted worthy to inherit the mansions prepared for them of my Father."—Doctrine and Covenants 72:1.

This work or performance of duty must be done willingly: "Behold, the Lord requireth the heart and a willing mind."—Doctrine and Covenants 64:7. "Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or of necessity; for God loveth a cheerful giver."—2 Corinthians 9:7. So that to obtain the benefit of any law, we must comply with its terms. We must not fail to perform our duty because it requires sacrifice to do so. We are being tested to demonstrate our faith in God and his methods. In keeping this, as well as other commandments, we prove our worthiness. Jesus, referring to this law of duty in temporal things, says: "He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much: and he that is unjust in the least is unjust also in much. If therefore ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches?"—Luke 16:10, 11. Can anything be plainer?

We are to go on to perfection; what does that consist of? "Seek ye first to build up the kingdom of God, and to establish his righteousness."—Matthew 6:33, Inspired Translation. Christ gave up all for us; we should be willing to do all we can to extend the gospel which he came to affirm to man. We are to affirm the Christ character to our fellow-men. He gave all for us; we should be willing to do all we can to extend his kingdom. "He shall call to the heavens from above, and to the earth, that he may judge his people. Gather my saints together unto me; those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice."—Psalm 50:4, 5. Do not forget that. If you expect to be one of those who are gathered with the redeemed of God; if you expect to be a part of Zion; if you expect to be in the city of God, you must not waver because you are called upon in the discharge of duty to Christ, to sacrifice. To deny yourself some things which people out of Christ indulge in.

The word tithe means a tenth; and the rendition of a tithe referred to in the Bible, is the turning into the hands of the bishop, appointed to receive the same, the tenth part of what a man has, over and above his indebtedness, or a tenth of his increase. "Honor the Lord with thy substance, and with the first fruits of all thine increase."—Proverbs 3:9. It should be borne in mind that the tithe is a part of what a person has been blessed with; God first bestows upon us, and then asks a return according to our several abilities. The widow with her mite may do this and receive reward therefor. The rich can not be rewarded if they withhold, "For there is no respect of persons with God."—Romans 2:11. There are other means of giving for those who have plenty after the tithe has been paid, such as "surplus, freewill offerings and consecrations."—Doctrine and Covenants 129:8.

If we have increase, we should pay the tithe on it as often as it occurs. "It is the duty, and should be regarded as a privilege, of every person to consecrate everything he has and is, to the service of God, to be used for the advancement of his work as he may direct. The church being an organization ordained of God for the developing and promulgating of his purposes it follows that through its authorized representatives we can more effectually accomplish these purposes than in any other way. The Bishop, being under the law the authorized custodian of the church funds, he should be recognized and his coöperation secured in the consecration of money or property to the uses provided for in the law."

Dear Saints, the church needs your financial assistance right NOW.

"What shall separate us from the love of Christ?"

Are you going to let money do it?

Now is the time to prove the kind of a Saint you are.

Pardon me if you think I have presented my thoughts too strongly.

I realize the church's need.

LEAVES FROM LIFE.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF ELDER D. R. BALDWIN.—NO. 1.
THE RESULTS OF A BROKEN COVENANT.

Lord, help your servant to record a true, simple story of his mottled life to the good of those who read. Amen.

My parents were from the New England States. My father, David Baldwin, was a praying man; I never knew or heard of him doing a disreputable act. Mother's maiden name was Mathewson. She was a skilled and experienced nurse, noted for her loving solicitude for suffering humanity, generally, and specially for her heroism in contagious diseases. Pathetic emotions will ever be stirred in many hearts as they recall her fearless devotion during the deadly diphtheria scourge of my boyhood days.

I was born at East McDonough, Chenango County, New York, on Thursday, the 7th of October, 1847. There was but very little, if anything, pleasant connected with the formative period of my life. I would pass it by in silence were it not for the hope I entertain of imparting a much needed lesson to many young parents who are repeating the mistake that came so very near ruining my youth. As I remember it now, rigid rules, harsh threats, and severe corrections were the order of the day. This developed all the antagonism there was in me, so that I was naturally arrayed against nearly everything, and was wrong on most points. I was often under reprimand and frequently smarted keenly from punishment. At school I danced many lively jigs to tunes played on the seat of my trowsers with the long ferrule. Mother was very anxious about my education. She kept tab on my lessons and night after night I was called on to read them to her, and the benediction pronounced at the close of those services was usually a good sound drubbing. I was called many mean names by some of my tutors. All this soured my nature and blasted my youth.

It was not hard for those three times my size to overcome my body by brute force, but every time it wrung from my soul a secret oath of revenge. I found consolation in the thought, "I can be just as mean as you are big." I was seldom encouraged, and being too much of the time alone, I developed a sullen, morose, gloomy disposition. I was provoked and felt undone, so I abandoned myself to base, low influences. But, thank God, all the time there were unseen influences that in a measure restrained and rebuked me.

I was kept in the same school where five sisters qualified as teachers, but I learned little. As time passed, milder methods were adopted and when the idea of shaping my character by the means employed in forging steel was abandoned, I commenced developing a sweeter nature; gradually I lost sight of my desire to be avenged of mine enemies, and in due time found myself bubbling over with goodly, parental endowments.

In 1865 I went with my parents to Michigan; thence to Correctionville, Iowa. During the winter of 1866 and 1867 I left home and wandered into South Dakota and Nebraska. In 1868 I went with a younger sister to Mason County, Michigan, where I entered a homestead. On the memorable 15th day of May, 1870, I married my worthy companion, Miss Susan Drown.

My parents were churchgoing people; their home was a place of prayer where the scriptures were read daily. There was born in me a desire to reverence God; but I loved the story of the gospel. I could see so much in it to sweeten one's life that I desired to believe it, but alas, I nowhere heard it taught. After all the glory had been torn away the mutilated fragments held no attraction for me. After a time I concluded the Bible must be a sort of fairy tale. I could see no agreement between the hypnotic convolutions brought on in the mills of excitement and the spiritual gifts that my mother so often read about from the family Bible. The contrast was too great. A few times in my life I prayed earnestly for the light of life to be unfurled to me, or for death and annihilation; but as no immediate results were visible to me I plunged into infidelity. The outlook was desperate, indeed; but I tried to close my eyes against the future and resolved to get what little sweet I could out of the present. My associates were mostly of the floating elements of the docks and camps, so I became very reckless and extremely profane.

This was the condition of my life when I heard my first gospel sermon. God was arranging all the time to answer my prayers. It was in the fore part of December, 1871, when Elders Henry C. Smith and Asa S. Cochran came into the lumber woods of Mason County and preached the old Jerusalem gospel to us. It was the sweetest music I had ever heard. A sudden burst of great joy entered my soul. I was not only willing but anxious to obey. So on the 13th of this month old Father and Mother Gensen, my wife, and I were buried in the icy grave and raised to newness of life. A strange but sweet fascination laid hold of me, accompanied by an overwhelming desire to tell the gospel story to others. It seemed to me that I could convince the world. I did not see how they could keep from believing the glad news of the restoration. The gift of prophecy rested upon Elder Smith as he laid his hands on my head. Thus the Lord revealed to all in the house the desire he had planted in my soul, and I was confirmed and blessed unto that end. Father Drown received the gift of tongues. The Sugar Grove Branch was organized. Old Father Gensen's hearing was restored after twenty years of deafness, and his soul was filled with love and joy to overflowing. Thus were we started out on our missions of love and truth.

From my childhood I had been afflicted with dyspepsia, but I gladly adopted the Word of Wisdom, since which time I eat, relish, digest, and assimilate all I need of whatsoever kind of food placed before me. For the first time in my life I now was awake to the awful fact that I was an ignoramus. I at once commenced a diligent study of the books and church papers, my good wife doing nearly all the reading for me, for it was with much difficulty that I could read. On the 24th day of January, 1875, I was ordained to the office of priest and placed in charge of the Sugar Grove Branch.

A family of small children now commenced to claim support and I was confronted with stern poverty. A nervous shock disqualified my faithful companion for continued reading, so I had to dig for myself, and I found it slow, tedious work. I think but few are called who are as unlearned as I was, and I trust none are called upon to suffer such remorse and neglect. It may be consoling to some to know that "God hath chosen the foolish," weak, and base things of the world to confound the wise, "that no flesh should glory in his presence," and while I am thankful beyond measure that a loving father has made something out of me, still before God I am ashamed of the follies of my youth.

It was soon necessary for me to spend all my spare minutes with my books, so that when I should have been sociable with my loving wife and playing with the children, when we should have been lovers and chums, I have been so wedded to my studies that we became comparative strangers. Who can calculate the loss? Lord, help me couch these words so that my loss may be others' gain! Oh, help rising generations to escape the ordeal of having these truths burned into their souls by the cruel branding iron of neglect! Amen and amen.

We sold our homestead in August, 1875, and went to Decatur County, Iowa, via Sioux and Correctionville, where we spent the winter. It was here that I had my first face to face encounter with the Devil. He was in the person of "old Father Keester," a Methodist reverend, whom I had not met before. I had stopped to inquire the way to my appointment and was kindly received by the man of the house. An older man of large proportions, well muffled in his winter garb, got up from near the stove and gave me one of the most unmerciful tongue lashings I had ever received since a child. The Spirit showed me that every insolent thrust was as a club falling with force upon his own guilty head, so I could well afford to be patient. On our way to church the man of the house gave the following apologetical explanation: "Father Keester has recently been in debate with one of your elders down at Dow City and is still feeling sore over his trouncing."

We finished our trip from this point with an ox team in the month of April, 1876, and were taken in and treated with much kindness by S. V. Bailey and Asa S. Cochran until room could be secured elsewhere.

Here I made another serious mistake: On starting from Michigan I covenanted with my Maker that if he would protect and give us a prosperous journey, and bring our money to us when due, I would surely tithe it. (For we understood from the start that while in a scattered condition one tenth belonged to the Lord.) Now, our Father ratified in marvelous ways this contract. During the winter I secured a wagon and team, and just before we reached Fontanelle a fierce storm arose; that great black rolling cloud savagely tinged with green was a formidable sight, for on the prairie there was no shelter. Seeing our helpless condition silent prayers were offered up, and as the cruel monster was about to reek its fury upon our heads, the angel of mercy stood in the way. The ominous cloud parted and passed on either side, while our hearts melted with gratitude to our protector. We soon came to where the storm had closed in and found where great slugs of ice had made their imprints in the earth.

Reaching Fontanelle we stopped at old Bro. Briggs Alden's home with a view of resting until the next morning; but the hail had broken all the glass from the windward side of the house. Seeing that they were in no shape to entertain us we passed on. In still other ways we were favored and protected, and our little roll of money came promptly when due.

Now it happened at this time that President W. W. Blair published his views on tithing, by which I was convinced all too soon that surplus only should be tithed, and having no surplus, I excused myself on the pretext that "a bad promise was better broken than kept." The result of this was that we were very soon placed beneath the grinding wheels of poverty. Flattering prospects were repeatedly turned into blighting curses. Whether God requires the tithing of all we have or not, it was away yonder too late for me to prove recreant to my own proposition after a loving Father had so wonderfully confirmed it. Long weary years of stint and pinch and toil followed and I always came out behind.

We lived the first two years on the edge of the prairie west of where the old chapel stood. While here, our son David was instantly healed of a malignant fever, under the hands of Elder Charles Jones. As soon as the elder's hands were removed from the babe's head, he got down from my lap and went to his play.

In the spring of 1879 we located near Cameron, Missouri, and became members of the Delano Branch. After this I rented a farm north of Orsborn, where our eldest son was healed of pneumonia; he was delirious with fever and frantic with pain, but when Elder J. M. Terry laid his hands on him and prayed, he at once reached a normal condition and slept. About this time we received several hundred dollars from my father's estate, and bought and improved a small place on Grindstone, a few miles northwest of Cameron. I think it was in 1883 that we traded this place for a home in Stewartsville, Missouri, where in company with Bro. Benjamin Dice we followed the tubular well business for several years. Here the God of infinite love again listened to our prayers and gave my wife a new lease on life under the hands of Elders J. M. Terry and William Lewis.

But along the financial line I had no success. I worked early and late at a lucrative trade, and my good wife was the essence of economy and the acme of industry; still I could not keep out of debt, so in 1890 I turned over our little home to Brother Dice and moved with teams and wagons to Lincoln, Nebraska, where we followed public construction for a time, and then bought a pretty home in the suburbs of the city, of a Methodist reverend, whose head had been bleached by so many winters that I supposed he must be the essence of honesty; but he lied to me about the title and beat us out of the little we had left. A mechanic's lien of later date than the abstract turned up and dispossessed us after a whole season's hard work to clear what we supposed to be the only shadow on the title.

At this juncture, the great vulture known as "frenzied finance," in an awful downward swoop, plunged her craven frame from the gaze of the masses whom she had plucked, that she might the more stealthily sap from their shivering frames their remaining activity. All public works instantly stopped, and I found myself too ragged to be seen on the streets. One day our son David said, "Papa, I can't eat off you folks this way any longer; I am going into the country. I know I can make my way," etc. So in the morning, with a mother's prayers and a father's blessing, he left the city and commenced herding cattle for five dollars per month and soon became expert with the saddle and whip. After two months he came home on a visit with ten dollars in his pocket. He paid five for clothing and intended to invest the other five in a present for the home folks, but some one stole the boy's money. Getting cheated out of the exquisite joy of surprising us with that present was the severest trial he had ever encountered.

After this I got him into a baker's shop to learn the trade. He got his board and one dollar per week, and during that entire winter at the end of each week he brought home one dollar's worth of groceries, refusing to use one cent of his wages for himself.

About this time I learned that there were a few Saints in the city, and I formed the acquaintance of Bro. John Hollenbeck, who gave me a new suit of clothes and furnished me the work to pay for same. Then he called on me to preach to the Saints placed under his charge by Elder Porter. Next came Apostle James Caffall, who preached in the city, and by the spirit of revelation and wisdom called me to the office of elder. Not receiving the witness of the Spirit at this meeting I hesitated. My good wife reasoned with me that night and pointed out my mistake, reminded me of my confirmation, and showed that I could not fill my mission in life without that ordination. The Spirit cleared my mind the next day, so on the 14th of September, 1892, I was ordained. The Lincoln Branch was organized and the writer elected to preside.

Brother Hollenbeck, the grocer, anticipating our financial stringency, continued taking and filling orders long after I filed my protest; for I could see no way of ever being able to pay him. After a time I secured a position as general carpenter of the Western Normal College, then I secured an interest in their swine and poultry. I thought I had scored a victory, when, by a carefully laid plan, I secured sixty dollars tuition and got all my children in school.

We had a little band of faithful Saints who rented a hall in the central part of the city, where we held our regular services. Saints of the surrounding country placed their membership with us, and some were baptized, until, I believe, our number exceeded sixty. Passing missionaries began to call on us and were more than welcome at the chapel hour in the college, where President Crone introduced them to the students, soliciting a short sermon. Thus we hoped that we were laying the foundation for a great work for the future; but the miserable condition that our monetary system had been worked into by the greed of the money lords had a disappointment in store which was dealt out in no uncertain way. The Westside Improvement Company, composed of our bankers, who promoted this college scheme, after expending about three hundred thousand dollars, went to the wall; business was thrown into convulsions; many students were compelled to leave the school, and many more prevented from coming. The expenses of that great institution steadily overrun the receipts, so that in 1894 the college company suffered strangulation. Whole brigades of people were squeezed from the city. Bro. Hollenbeck had to close out his business and he went to Lamoni. The only thing I could find to do in that city of seventy thousand inhabitants was to take a five-year lease on a farm to be put into fruit in Arkansas. I asked the Lord what I should do about it, and I dreamed that one handed me a nice little roll of bills. I prayed over the matter again, and that night I dreamed I caught the biggest fish in the stream. So I resigned the presidency of the branch, preached my farewell sermon, and received as a token of esteem, a Bible from my congregation, and after long years of constant wear, the book is yet well preserved.

WILL A MAN ROB GOD?

HAVE YOU PAID YOUR TITHING?

This may seem a peculiar question and yet there is need of each individual asking himself if it applies in his case.

The human nature of man seems very much the same to-day as when the Prophet Malachi asked this startling question, and then answered it by saying that the whole nation was robbing God.

In our own nation to-day people seem to think they should have ice cream and cake or an entertainment or something of that kind for their money and then call that helping in the Lord's work.

Through his latter-day prophet, the Lord has said that his work can not prosper as it should until his people yield obedience to his will in temporal things as well as spiritual. The world around us is so full of the spirit of speculation and there are so many delusive opportunities continually presented to us that we are liable to put off giving God his portion of what he has given us.

We think that if we use it altogether for awhile longer, we will then have much more to give. But it often happens like the bank cashier that speculates with money that is intrusted to his care. He loses his own and the other too, and then can not pay it. Or, if we make great gains without having learned to pay the Lord his portion of smaller amounts, the trial may be too much for us to part with the larger amount that is due the Lord, after we have made great gains.

He has said to try him and see if he will not open the window of heaven and pour us out a blessing, and even rebuke the devourer for our sakes, but the greatest blessing that comes to us from giving the Lord that which is his is that it helps us to realize our partnership with God, so that we can continually remember to carry on all our affairs in a way that will meet his approval.

We all want to be workers together with God, but we sometimes forget that we can not expect him to conform to the way we might like to work. We must always bring ourselves into harmony with his ways.

Withholding that which is his is robbing God.

His is the oldest debt we owe.

Nothing in this world can help us to overcome the selfishness in our natures so well as rendering unto the Lord that which is his in tithes, offerings, and consecrations.

If he wished he could reveal by his Spirit where great hidden wealth lies in the earth, so that his work could be carried on; inheritances given, and Zion redeemed without any more being given by his people. But then what kind of a people would he have? How could they obtain the blessings they need?

God's work must be carried on and Zion redeemed by the sacrifices of his people, so they may have the blessing that comes from doing. It does not bless God for us to sacrifice and labor that others may be benefited; it does bless us and make us godlike.

I often wonder if there ever was an age when the condition was so prevalent of people living beyond their means, and I can call it nothing but pride that makes people try to dress better and have finer homes and more in them than their neighbors have. If the Saints partake of these conditions they never will feel that they have anything to consecrate, and will not be willing to pay their tithing and give offerings as may be needed.

My Prayer.

BY MEG.

Father, keep thy weary child
All the way home;
Never from thy teachings mild,
Let me roam.
Purify my thoughts; my heart
Teach to know Thee as Thou art;
Take the sting from every smart,
All the way home.

When temptations manifold
Would me destroy,
Help me to the iron rod hold,
Thy strength employ.
When with pain and sadness worn,
From my heart each idol torn,
Still may I say, e'en though I mourn,
"I trust in Thee."

When with fear and doubt o'ercome,
Fainting, I fall;
Oh, give me help divine from Thee, God of all.
If the darkness round me fall,
When unpleasant duties call,
Teach me how to give my all,
Lord, unto thee.

When at last, the hilltop gained,
Sweet home I see,
May I hear a tender call,
"Come unto me."
May my Savior draw me near,
Where my Father's voice I hear,
In the midst of loved ones dear,
"Child, welcome home!"

VALE, Oregon, June 7, 1909.

Dear Sisters: The HERALD has just come this morning and how I have enjoyed reading it! Bro. Kelley's article especially appealed to me, and while I would much rather send in my offering and say nothing, I thought perhaps I might persuade other sisters to make a little sacrifice also, and thus help on this great work, that is dearer than life to me. The majority of us must look to the men for all the spending money we get, and they are the ones that have the tithing to pay; but there are lots of little things we can give up and thereby collect a nice little offering.

Some time ago I read in our HERALD an account of a sister that had only one dress. She had money to buy another, but instead gave it to help establish the Herald Office. (And how very thankful I am that we have the HERALD. It always brings something good, and twice especially has it brought me just the encouragement I needed.)

Several days ago I was looking at a catalogue of waists and as I had not bought a new one this spring, I thought I would buy one. So when Mr. Propst came home I showed them to him and asked which he liked. He picked on a white Jap silk, price two dollars and fifty cents. Well, I thought I would get it and would have sent for it only I have been too busy to get the order off. Now, I am not going to send it at all. I'll send the two dollars and a half to Bro. Kelley instead. The Lord will think just as much of me in my old one, (it is not worn out at all; I was just tired of it, and wished to follow the fashion,) and the church will be that small amount ahead.

Dear sisters, won't some of you keep me company? I have no one here that will sympathize with such an idea. Just the other day one lady asked me where I got my tracts. I told her I bought them and sacrificed several little things to get the money. Her remark was, "Oh, you big goose!" But I enjoy it anyway. She said she would sure read them if I thought they were worth that.

A short time ago a sister was discouraging the post card exchanges. Of course it can be carried to extremes, but I would very much appreciate a card from the sisters that will keep me company in my last year's waist, or that have made some other sacrifice. But, then, if you will take the price of the card and put it in the Christmas Offering Fund I will do without the pleasure, for I intend to meet you all some day and the Christ, too. Oh, the joy that will be mine if I am worthy to stand! I won't care whether I have on silk or a plain white lawn. Let us put pride far from us and remember that he who would help in this cause must be "humble and full of love," also remember, "this is a day of sacrifice."

The work is advancing and it is for us to decide whether we will advance with it or let it go on and leave us behind.

With a heart full of love for all mankind, but a deep yearning for the association of the Saints, I am,

Your isolated sister,

MRS. O. W. PROPST.

Letter Department

SHINNSTOWN, West Virginia, June 24, 1909.

Editors Herald: At the close of the conference year, I had occasion to go home and set in order its affairs, so as to be in readiness for another year's labor, for the cause so dear to all Latter Day Saints. The time seemed to pass away quicker during the stay at home with loved ones than any other part of the year, so at the set time gathered the necessary equipments to take with me, and on the first of the present month, I took my leave of all that is near and dear in this life, starting for my field of labor.

Called at Bro. Thomas Miller's, of Detroit, Michigan, Bro. and Sr. Robertson, of Toledo, Ohio, and from there to Wheeling, West Virginia. I could see by the looks of the land and the crops, on my way, that too much rain had fallen for the benefit of the grain. Tarried and worshiped with the Saints over Sunday and part of the week, making my abode with Bro. and Sr. Tary. The meetings were of a pleasant character, quite cheering and full of comfort to the Saints, especially the prayer service.

On Monday I visited at the home of Bro. and Sr. Henry Carns who live on a farm about fourteen miles from Wheeling, it being over twenty years since the time of our last meeting with them at Louisville, Ontario, where Bro. Henry and Sr. Charlotte were made one by the writer. To make their union more happy they have a family of seven, most of them in the church. On Tuesday evening I held a preaching service at their house. Quite an attentive congregation was present to listen to what we had to say of the gospel.

A very favorable impression was made, and it is apparent good will be done in that part if followed up. On Wednesday I returned to Wheeling, attended the prayer service and their business meeting, which passed off pleasantly.

On Thursday afternoon a number of the Saints, in charge of Bro. Joseph Ebeling, were permitted to visit the State penitentiary, which we felt to appreciate very much. It appears there is a charge of twenty-five cents per head for the visitors, but Bro. Joseph some way or other got a pass for himself and associates. In the visit, which was of interest to the writer, we were not permitted to enter the women's apartments. There is a great deal of work performed there, such as men's clothing, also women's. One room we were in, there were three hundred and ninety persons in for from one year to a life sentence; boys in their teens, to the gray headed sire, all with their heads down to their work as fast as it were possible for them to work, each one having his part of the work to do. All the work is done by machinery, electricity being the power by which it is driven.

The machines were in rows and the men were seated as close as it was possible for them to be, also in other apartments, were whips made, also brooms; each article is made in a room by itself. The guards were seated in an elevated stand attached to the wall, far enough apart that these guards could see every man under his care. There appeared to be as many colored men as whites, all mixed up together. Each one had so much work to do and if it were in his power to overreach that amount he got pay for it.

Our next visit was to the dining-hall, a large room well lighted and ventilated. The tables were in rows about twelve feet long, not very wide, made out of planed boards, just room enough for a row of plates on each side. A bench without any back to it comprised the seat. The dishes, plates, and cups were of granite ware. They had knives and forks, but by the looks of them the bath brick had not been used very often, so far as I could see. Each one's allowance was put on his plate. By so doing one was not permitted to get more than the other. About nine hundred or more sat down at once; there are colored waiters also. They bake their own bread and it is a good quality; I tasted it and considered, so I think I am right in my statement, and some of the Saints in the company seemed to enjoy a whole slice. The oven is after the Dutch pattern, built of brick and heated with gas.

They have a school in which they give the prisoners an education, also a very neatly arranged chapel, also a large pipe organ and choir, composed of the convicts. The first service is from nine to ten in the morning; all are obliged to attend church. A minister of the city is employed to do the preaching. They had one preacher there for stealing a horse, so I was informed. Visitors are permitted to attend the services that are held. They have to get up between five and six, get their breakfast, and get to work by half past seven, and work until five or half past. The whistle blows; every man quits work and gets ready for supper at about half past five and at six is closed in his cell for the night. It seems an unpleasant part of the affair, to be barred of liberty in this life, a prisoner, and worst of all, a prisoner in the world to come. May our Father help us to do right in this world, so that when done here, we may be worthy of the rest in the world to come.

After viewing the penitentiary, or as much as they saw fit to let us see, we were escorted to the outside of the prison and allowed to go our way, feeling a relief to think we were at liberty once again. After our visit in the prison, we had previously arranged to visit our dear Bro. Gordon Dobbs, who was residing at the home of his mother. He was prostrate upon a bed of sickness, burning with lung fever, and almost wasted to a skeleton; his loved wife, with her little infant of about three months, fanning him and rendering him all the comfort that human power could give. I felt sad in my heart to see a young man of twenty-three years in the jaws of death, it being the first time I had ever met him. I felt to weep and could not refrain shedding tears. Bro. Joseph Ebeling, being teacher of the branch, stated that we had come to comfort them in their hour of trial and that if he could endure it, Bro. Brown would talk a short time, and administer to him. We sung, "O thou God who hearest prayer," etc.; then offered prayer for the Father's blessing to be upon us, and it was granted, for such words of comfort were given to our brother in his last hours. The Saints felt the comforting influence of the Spirit and all felt glad that they were Saints of the latter days. I administered to him according to the holy pattern, and it seemed to me as though I was anointing and administering to him for his death and burial. So we bade him good-bye, and left for our places of abode. This event took place on the 10th inst., and on Friday the news came to Wheeling that Bro. Dobbs had taken his departure from us at noon on Friday.

Previous arrangements had been made for me to go to Glen Easton Friday evening. Bro. Joseph Ebeling came with me to stay over Sunday and when we arrived at Glen Easton, Bro. James Craig was in wait at the depot for our arrival. I went to the home of Brother and Sister Craig, Brother Joseph going out to Brother Dobbs, accompanied by Brother Jasper. I spent the evening and part of the next day at Brother Craig's by Sister Dobbs, a daughter of Brother a veteran for years in the interest of this latter-day work, and is respected apparently by all as a man of integrity and honor. So on Saturday, about ten o'clock, I was met at Brother Craig's by Sister Dobbs, a daughter of Brother Frank (they are about all Dobbs in that part, or vicinity of the branch) of fifteen summers. She was quite a good teamster and I felt myself safe in the surrey with her as teamster. The roads were very bad, and in places where the road had slid on the mountain side, it seemed at one time as though we were doomed to stick in the mud. I suggested the propriety of my getting out, but she answered in the negative, and she was out as quick as a fly, got one horse by the rein, and after the team had rested a few minutes we started again. They pulled themselves and surrey through about two feet of mud, just about as thick as it can get.

After three or three and a half miles' ride I arrived at the home of Bro. Henry Dobbs and received a welcome to their hospitality. I sought to make myself at home, for I felt so at least. It was evident that the peace left by the servants of Christ, several years before I reached there, was still there. The next day being Sunday, the regular Sunday school was dispensed with at nine forty-five on account of the remains of the deceased brother, previously mentioned, being brought to Nauvoo Church, of the family burying ground, for interment. There was a very large concourse of neighbors and friends in attendance through respect for the deceased. Brother Craig had charge, by invitation; the writer preached the discourse from 1 Corinthians 15, "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." A degree of the Spirit was enjoyed and comfort was given to the bereaved.

I spoke Sunday evening to a good crowd, remained all week and over the following Sunday, holding several meetings. I felt comforted while I was there, especially at their Sunday school, at nine forty-five, on Sunday the twentieth. For a school in a rural district it was quite largely attended, from the smallest tot to the gray headed sire. Bro. Jasper Dobbs is superintendent and quite an energetic Sunday school worker. By invitation I taught the Bible class, and at or before its close, was called to give an address to the school, though was hardly looking for it, but I cheerfully set to work at the task. It brought to my mind an experience I had in Detroit, Michigan, a number of years ago, while in attendance at the Sunday school. At the time, the organist was playing the march for the teachers and scholars to take their places, and my attention was called to the sister who had the infant class, a number of bright little boys and girls. The Spirit's presence which came with these words, "That sister is teaching those boys and girls the gospel, who in a coming day will declare it to others and call her blessed." I felt the same impression while addressing the Fairview Branch. Nearly all present received the witness to the statement. I felt well in the address given, for it was given in the Spirit and borne home to the hearts of all present.

On Sunday evening after service I felt it was a week well spent, good being done, the Saints felt comforted and so was I; I felt if it were possible I would return at some future time. On Monday I bade adieu and left for Shinnston. Brother Dobbs and wife and Brother Craig accompanied me to Cameron; from where I took the train for Shinnston, Brother Craig going to his home at Glen Easton. My train left at eleven fifty-two, and while gliding along as fast as it were possible for Nahum's chariot, twisting around curves and dashing into and through tunnels (it seemed to me as if some of them were over a mile long), I saw an aged man in the car whom I thought I ought to know, and finally concluded to satisfy myself by inquiring, and was pleased, as well as he, to find the man I was looking for. So we journeyed on to Shinnston together. Making one stay at Sister Griffiths, we set to work to arrange for preaching; got permission to use the Christian church, got three hundred bills printed and distributed them in the town, so people would know we were here and what for, and on Tuesday commenced our meetings for the balance of the week, continuing over Sunday, having two preaching meetings on Sunday. The preaching was good, the attendance small, outside the few Saints, and they are sisters of the very best type and character, full of energy, and that's the kind of people we want in this church. On Sunday evening we thought it wise to leave for a time, Brother Thomas accompanying Brother Baker to Amos to start the work there. I go to Clarksburg.

Yours in gospel bonds,
SAMUEL BROWN.

PITTSBURG, Kansas, July 7, 1909.

Editors Herald: I have just read the letter of Bro. J. E. Wiggins in the HERALD of June 30, who is contemplating a change of location. This is not the direction in which his eyes are turned, but if he has had experience in coal mining, I invite him this way. We have in process the organization of a coal company on the coöperative plan. The proposition is to purchase a mining plant that is already equipped and developed, that will give work to about eighty-five diggers. I would like to hear from any who are interested in this kind of a move. It is the calculation to take only Latter Day Saints into this and only those who wish to work in the mine. The whole proposition will be given to any and all who are interested.

Good school and church privileges can be had. There is a good branch of the church at Pittsburg and also State normal and manual training schools. We also have a nice Sunday school with Bro. Otto Hemple as superintendent. The Religion is moving along and doing a good work, developing the talents of the young under the management of our young brothers, Davis and Wheeler.

Your brother in bonds,
E. E. GILBERT.

ARAPAHO, Oklahoma, July 8, 1909.

Saints' Herald: I have just closed a ten session debate with Evangelist Joe S. Warlick, of Dallas, Texas, of the non-progressive wing of the Christian Church, at this place. Arapaho is the county-seat of Custer County.

Bro. F. M. Sheehy had arranged the debate and intended to do the debating, but was detained in the East, so I entered the conflict.

We had a hot time in two ways. The weather was very warm and my opponent was a good hand to pump hot air. Mr. Warlick is looked upon as one of the great debaters of Texas, having held over two hundred debates.

Church propositions were discussed. He lead in the affirmative on his proposition for five sessions, and then we took the affirmative for five sessions more. Nine out of ten of the citizens are on our side and several are talking of being baptized. One lady has belonged to the Christian Church for thirty years, but says she is ready to unite with us.

There had never been any preaching by our people here before. At first we had lots of prejudice to meet, but as the debate went on, Mr. Warlick became very abusive, so much so that he disgusted the people, even the members of the Christian Church. There were about sixteen elders of the Christian Church present and three of them came to me and complimented me on my deportment and Christian spirit during the debate, and said that they did not approve of Warlick's methods.

Bro. Hubert Case acted as my moderator in the debate and was lots of help to me.

We are still continuing to preach in the big tent where the debate was held, to good crowds. We expect to baptize some Sunday. The good Master gave us strength in body and spirit for the conflict, for which we feel thankful. We have been given food, raiment, and money, and truth has found its way to many souls.

With renewed confidence we move on to the final triumph, hoping to be found worthy at last.

In bonds,
J. F. CURTIS.

NORTH DEER ISLE, Maine, July 4, 1909.

Dear Herald: Are we prepared to meet the questions which are now asked on every side, Why are we members of the Reorganized Church? We are the church, we are the ones who have the authority. We know that we are in Christ's church and kingdom. We know that we have received his Spirit. Our faith is so strong that we can not be moved or shaken, but can we prove to others why we say we are right, and know we have the right church? Here is where we may fail if we have not read and learned what we might, and I beg you to awake and fit yourself for the place in which you stand, and let us awaken to the spiritual need of those around us. Let us first see if our lives agree with the name we bear. Think of it; we call ourselves Saints; we are members of the church of Christ, heirs of the kingdom of Jesus Christ, and as heirs we may be equal with him. Are we striving to be like him? Are we each day striving to follow closer to the example of that elder Brother who gave his life to make us better? When we live as he would have us live, then we are not only fit for the church and to be in his kingdom, but we are fit to lead others. Our lives will cause others to ask what there is about us they have not. If we live right they will feel drawn to listen to what we say, and to watch what we do; then we can show them the beauty of this glorious, matchless gospel.

How grand is the plan of salvation; how far reaching it is! Only to think that when we are baptized our sins are all blotted out, and God will remember them no more. We have fathers, mothers, brothers, and daughters. Oh, if we could see them or know of them obeying the gospel, how great cause those who love them have to rejoice, that they are new creatures; that they are as pure as the child that knows no sin! Are we doing all we can for the spread of the gospel? Are we improving every chance we have to get the truth before the people, many of whom the ministry can not reach? We can plant seed or first plow the ground, and fit it for the seed, and leave it in shape that it will thrive when planted by others. Let us not stand idly by and leave all for the elders to do. In many cases men and women may be preached to and they will not understand one word they hear from the stand. While some one may explain without letting them know they are trying to teach them. There are some who will receive a knowledge of the truth by the testimony of others, and thus are ready to receive the gospel when they hear it. Jesus said, My word will judge you in the last day; Jesus our leader and commander.

Wishing to hear from any who know the truth and can prove they know it, I remain,

Your brother in the gospel,
DELMONT C. ROTTEY.

HAILEYVILLE, Oklahoma, July 6, 1909.

Dear Herald: The good Lord is blessing the Saints with his Spirit and we are having some fine sermons, by Bro. Lee Quick, who is an able man. We have a good hearing here. The work is moving slowly but surely, and the Saints are climbing the hill of Zion. I hope and pray that God will bless the faithful men that the Lord has sent forth with this message of love. We will have the district conference here July 30 and 31 and I hope we will have one as good as the one held at Wilburton in the Saints' chapel. The work of the district is on the increase and I hope will continue so till we are in a better shape and have greater spiritual light in our meetings.

A few of the outsiders are giving us good attention and say they have not heard so much gospel in their lives. We are trying in our weak way to let our light shine and are meeting with very good success, for a few weeks past. We baptized one noble soul into the fold and kingdom of our dear Savior, who will make a noble worker if he continues to go forward. I love this work because it will make better men and women of us, if we will allow it to; but if we do not let the Spirit guide us, we will go backwards, which I hope will never be my lot.

Please let all the missionaries take notice; the Haileyville Branch wishes a visit from all, so come and see us.

Yours in bonds,
JOHN S. WHITE, Branch President.

AMES, Iowa, July 8, 1909.

Dear Saints: It has been a number of years since I have written a letter to the HERALD. That time it was the means of my becoming acquainted with a dear sister in South Dakota. We lived several miles apart, but that did not hinder our visiting each other. We have been denied church privileges for a little more than a year now, and oh, I do get so hungry for a good sermon!

I had hoped that an elder would have called on us ere this, as we are in the Des Moines District. I have tried to be patient and await God's time, but my heart yearns for the companionship of Saints. If there are any in the vicinity of Ames I would be pleased to meet them. Ever praying for the welfare of the cause I love,

Your sister in the faith,
MRS. CLARA LINSE.

PORTIS, Kansas, July 11, 1909.

Dear Editors: I have been a reader of the HERALD about six months and as yet I have not seen one letter from this part of the Lord's vineyard. My wife and I came in through the door of entrance into God's kingdom by baptism in the Solomon River, by Bro. Jacob Hemison, September 6, 1908, and were confirmed by Bro. W. N. Potter. Thanks be to God for the day he called us out of gross darkness into the blessed light of the gospel of Jesus Christ, which I am not ashamed of. I know it is the power of God unto salvation.

From the time I was two years of age I was sickly; went from bad to worse until the time of my baptism I was a wreck upon the shores of humanity. The best physicians in this great land utterly failed to cure me. I knew within myself that my only hope was in God and in seeking his kingdom. I made two attempts to climb up some other way. I became connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church, but I did not find the Savior there. After hearing the gospel story from Bro. Matthew Scott, I forgot my afflictions and when baptized was instantly healed. I am well and hearty, and have no symptoms of my former afflictions.

I was married February 26, 1908, and on March 2 my wife took down with appendicitis. The physicians said she must undergo an operation or die. She continued to have these attacks oftener and the last attack typhoid fever set in. We feared greatly for her recovery, but she did recover, thank God, and before she was able, in the sight of men, she was baptized with me and was healed, with no sign of a return. I declare unto you, brothers and sisters, that the Lord Jesus Christ is the great physician.

Please do not read this letter, brethren and sisters, without sending up a petition to God in our behalf, that we may abide the day of trial and tribulation of this world forever. Our own folks are set at variance against us. We have been abused and had almost all manner of evil spoken against us falsely, on account of the gospel.

Your brother in Christ, in truth, and in deed,
F. L. REAM.

JASPER, Minnesota, July 11, 1909.

Editors Herald: It has always appeared to me that there was little of interest to the church from those in isolated places, especially where there is so much prejudice that a hearing can not be had, and for this reason I have kept silent.

We greatly enjoy the weekly visits of the HERALD, and find much food for thought in its pages. We occasionally have a call from some of the elders, but as there are very few members of the church in this part of the State, these calls are not often. The past week we were visited by Elders Adams and Brown of the Utah church. When Elder Adams introduced himself, I wondered if some of my kin had wandered into the meshes of Brighamism, but we could trace no relationship. One of my first remarks to Elder Adams was, that it was to be deplored that all believers in the divine mission of Joseph Smith could not see alike. He ventured the opinion that the time would come when we would, but I think I convinced him that there would not be any change in the attitude of the Reorganized Church, as to the damnable heresies that Brigham Young and others loaded onto the name of the church when they went into the mountains of Utah, leading a part of the church into apostasy.

We canvassed the differences of the two organizations, in which he defended polygamy and other kindred evils, and upheld Joseph F. Smith in all he is doing. He seemed ignorant of the admission of the president of his church before the Senate Committee in the Reed Smoot case, where he admitted he was a violator of the laws of his church, of the land, and of God, and said he did not believe that President Smith ever made such an admission. Elder Adams has been in the field eight months, and Elder Brown was just starting out. They did not seem to know much of the early history of their church, and to me, at least, made a very poor showing. It was a surprise to me to know that they accept the Inspired Version of the Bible as authentic. I told Elder Adams he must be mistaken, that I was sure their church authorities had never accepted the work. He said he was not; that while they did not use it in speaking before the Gentile audiences, yet in their own meetings, and among their own people they did. This was news to me.

I tried to treat these poor deluded followers of an apostate church with kindness, invited them to dine with us, which they did, and as they left shook hands with them and told them I was sorry for them, and that they were bending their energies in fostering such opinions as they held, and in laboring in such a cause.

They spoke on the streets that evening, and from our talk, I thought they were to remain, as they said they would see us again, but their meeting was but a mere handful, and I have seen nothing more of them. It is the first time any of the Utah faction have ever visited our town. They were on their way to Sioux City, and said they would meet with our people there, if they could find the Saints' church. These young men seemed like sincere laborers, but in talking with them, I could not but feel how ignorant they were of their own church teachings and history, evidently following their instructions to obey counsel of the church oracles.

I trust the time may come when those who are honest in heart and are willing to listen to the appeals of reason among the deluded followers of Young and others, may see the error of their way and return to the true fold.

In gospel bonds,
ARTHUR H. ADAMS.

ALVA, Oklahoma, July 10, 1909.

Editors Herald: We send you a copy of the Alva Pioneer in which you will find an article on Mormonism. This was written by A. M. at the request of the editor, also because he thought it advisable, from the fact that our city was recently visited by some of the Utah Mormons. On Saturday afternoon, A. M. felt impressed to go to town; this impression remained with him so strongly that he, hardly knowing why, hitched up the ponies to the buggy and went. On arriving there, he found seven Utah Mormon elders holding meetings on the street, they simply representing themselves to be "Latter Day Saints." After listening to their winning service, he asked them a few plain but pointed questions, purposely bringing out the fact to the people that "they were not of us . . . but they went out, that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us." He also announced that he would follow each of their services with a little expose, lifting the cloak of expediency that the public might see what was underneath. He being rather an experienced hand at the business, having had about five years of it in Utah, we think he rather surprised our Mormon friends. It is needless to say what was exposed in this examination, but it was so successfully done and the revelations of such a character on Sunday afternoon and evening, that on Monday they failed to meet their appointments and we were left in full possession of the street for our meetings.

At their Sunday evening service they purposely held on as long as they could; one speaking, then a song, etc., thinking there would be no time left for our side of the question, they filling most of the time with affidavits trying to prove Joseph the Seer a polygamist; but notwithstanding this tiresome harangue the people knowing what was to follow, many stayed. About this time the churches having just closed their services many others gathered, and for over an hour the crowd stood and listened to the true gospel as taught by Christ and his disciples, and restored to earth by Joseph the Seer, showing the people where polygamy came from and why they had tried, but in vain, to date it back to the Seer.

We all thought it a good thing for us that the Mormons came to town, as it afforded us an excellent chance to get our views before the people. One of our prominent citizens said, "That's the way I like to see a man do, get after them while they are here and not wait till they are out of town, then get some noted divine to come and deliver a lecture against Mormonism, thirty-five cents admission, please." This is what our Methodist people of this place did recently to help raise funds for a new church, but when the Mormons come and are on the ground the preachers are all missing. Well, the citizens seemed to enjoy the discomfiture of these men while under examination and some still seem to enjoy the continuation of our meetings.

Elder Hughes, of Harper, who has recently bought here, assisted in a week's meetings following this, on the street, and although the crowd was not so large there were many interested listeners, and we feel sure that good will come from these efforts. We are still holding services through this country, advertising our reunion which will be July 23 to August 2 inclusive, the city having granted us the use of its parks, about two blocks from the court-house square. We have a comfortable, shady place for camping and holding services.

This week's appointments are thirteen miles northwest of here beginning Saturday night, and next week thirty-six miles northwest and thirty miles west, two schoolhouses we visit once a month. Our missionary ponies no doubt think they have the hardest part of this, but they are standing it unusually well.

Inclosed please find a bill of our reunion. Come early, Mr. Editor, and thus get first choice of camping grounds.

We also inclose obituary of Bro. J. D. Davis, of Hazelton, Kansas, formerly of Castle Rock, Washington. A. M. was called there by phone and preached his funeral sermon on the 3d. They were some of the first Saints of Castle Rock. We knew them there as good faithful friends and Saints, and Brother Davis, we are told since, had developed and become quite an able defender of the truth. May the Lord grant the wife and daughters the solace and comfort of his Spirit in this their great bereavement, is our prayer.

Yours in gospel bonds,
MRS. A. M. CHASE.

CAYUGA, Oklahoma, July 6, 1909.

Editors Herald: I left home and loved ones on May 13, and landed at Fort Scott, Kansas, the same day. Bro. Lee Quick joined me on the 15th and we held forth at the Socialist Hall till the 27th. Brother Quick baptized two, one an old lady that had been investigating for quite a while; the other a little girl, daughter of Brother and Sister Hatfield. We went to Mapleton, Kansas, where Brother Quick's home is, and preached there a few nights to small crowds.

On June 1, we started for Fairland, Oklahoma, to district conference, stopping over night at Fort Scott; also at Hepler, Kansas, one night, Brother Quick preaching at the home of Bro. S. Chezem to quite an interesting crowd of neighbors, which shows how our brother and his family are respected by those in that vicinity. I think that would be a good place to pitch the tent for about two weeks, sometime during the fall, before it gets too cold.

Arriving at Fairland on the 4th in time for Sunday school work and the conference the 5th. The conference work went off smoothly and without a jar. Everybody seemed to enjoy themselves. The preaching was by Brethren Hilliard, Quick, and Curtis. On the 7th the brethren separated, going in different directions, the writer to a new opening eight miles southwest of Afton, Oklahoma. Stayed there one week; crowds small and irregular. The people were very busy with their crops, plowing and harvesting. On the 15th I went to Needmore, beginning services the same night in the schoolhouse, holding forth till the 28th to good crowds most of the time, and very attentive. There are quite a number there who believe the gospel, but whether they will ever accept it or not is yet to be decided.

I crossed Grand River and began services at a schoolhouse near Bro. J. D. Kelley, expecting to stay there about two weeks, but hearing that a Baptist minister by the name of Long was going to expose Mormonism, I thought it would be nothing out of the way to go over and hear what the reverend gentleman might have to say. So closing our meeting at Bro. Kelley's on Saturday evening, Bro. Kelley and I returned to Needmore on Sunday morning, in time to hear the exposure. Well, to be short about it, I think he was just about as black-mouthed a man as I ever heard. He spoke three hours and forty-five minutes, then his son spoke fifteen minutes. I asked for a few words which was granted, after they closed their meeting. I presented the two church propositions and asked them to meet me upon them and discuss them before the congregation, so that the people could hear both sides of the question; but that they refused to do, saying that they could get Abe Carlin or a Mr. Bogard, if we wanted to debate. Well, of course, I saw my bluff was working all right, so I told them that we would meet any of them. I then announced that I would reply to his lecture that night and invited them to come out and hear, but when evening was come the Longs were nowhere to be seen.

I spoke three evenings in reply and I tried to leave no chip unturned. I am satisfied that our cause lost nothing by the attack, though we may never be able to baptize those who heard. There is one thing sure, they have too much light to be good members in any other church. I left many friends to the cause and the few Saints greatly strengthened and rejoicing in the restored gospel.

I am now here at Cayuga and expect to stay over two Sundays, if interest demands. I have preached every night except two since the 7th of June and each Sunday except last Sunday, when I heard the expose. I am feeling well in the work and see no stopping place in the future.

As ever, in the conflict,

W. R. SMITH.

GIRDLETREE, Maryland, July 5, 1909.

Dear Herald: I left Canada on the 26th of May to take up my labor in this Eastern Mission. Those in charge of that part of the work thinking I could best serve the interests of the church in these parts, assigned me this mission. As I took the field with the purpose of going wherever sent, I asked no questions, but wended my way to Philadelphia, where I got in touch with the submissionary in charge, Bro. Walter W. Smith. He deemed it wise to hold a series of meetings there, so we advertised and had meetings, when, I suppose, the greatest uproar possible could attain, the trolly men going on a strike, just as our meetings commenced. Bro. Joehnk, our German missionary, took part in the services, preaching one sermon in German. Brother Walter informs me that seven were baptized as the result of the meetings, which we are glad to note.

The writer was sent to Brooklyn, New York, and held some services there, and as in Philadelphia, we were permitted to get acquainted with some of the Saints, with whom we enjoyed our stay. From Brooklyn we went to Norwalk, Connecticut, where we tried to cheer the Saints, a little band struggling against great odds. How well we succeeded it is for them to tell. The Saints who live in easy access of the place of meeting have no idea how hard it is for some of those who live in rural districts to get to meetings, and yet, how little interest is manifested in some places to get to meetings. I fear in some instances there is more pleasure elsewhere than in the service of the stainless One. I sometimes wonder what the end will be.

Leaving Norwalk, I went to Philadelphia, and from there I came to this place to fill a call sent to Brother Walter for an elder. We expected to remain here but a few days, then go to Elks Mills to convention and hold some meetings there, but interest and conditions were such that I thought it best to remain here.

The church at Elks Mills not being ready for occupancy we stayed and have found that it was for the best interest of the work for us to do so. Six were baptized here last week, making in all nine who are Saints in this place, and as we started to gain a foothold, Satan got to work and opened the floodgates, so to speak, and some of our folks have had to suffer as the result. Two bright young ladies and one young man have been baptized; one lady was the organist of the Baptist church. Just before she asked for baptism, in talking to her, we were impressed to tell her that she would be cast out from other society and they would not allow her to preside at their organ, and many other things, if she ever united with our faith. We were glad that we had so warned her, for immediately after her baptism all that we told her came to pass, and the poor girl was nearly overwhelmed by the forces that were brought to bear upon her; but she is now able to almost stand alone. The old cry of "Mormon" is ringing forth, and forces are at work against us, yet we are able to fill the schoolhouse in which we are preaching, and are looking for larger crowds this week.

We hope to be able to tell the story in plainness and pleasing to the Master, thus doing our part in helping to carry the gospel story to those who will listen.

For fear this finds its way to the wastebasket, I will close. Ever praying for the welfare of Zion, WILLIAM ANDERSON.

112 WEST ONTARIO STREET, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

CONWAY, Missouri, July 10, 1909.

Dear Herald: Since May 16 have been busily engaged in missionary work. Have been associated with Elder W. P. Bootman, up to June 24, when we separated at Mansfield, Missouri, so that we could cover more territory. I find him a congenial companion, and one that wins among the people.

While laboring near Cabool, Missouri, we had the pleasure of baptizing an old soldier, and an old time member of the "Campbellite" Church. Sister Davis has several daughters, who no doubt will embrace the angel's message soon. While laboring in this locality, we were domiciled at Sister Davis'. Her husband (not being a member) is a good, kind, reasonable man.

At present I am laboring among a band of Brighamites. There are about twenty members living six miles east of Conway. The elders who baptized them told them they had discarded polygamy. Several are getting their eyes open. Expect to meet Elder George Anderson and preach there to-night and over Sunday.

Now, dear Saints, remember the "Lamb's wife" needs your financial support. Let's make this district self-sustaining. If you do as well the balance of this year as in the past six months, we will be able to get through without calling on the Bishop. My mission address is Willow Springs, Missouri, R. F. D. No. 2, Box 63.

Still in the conflict,

A. M. BAKER.

"Independence Day" at Independence.

Monday, July 5, was celebrated by the citizens and Saints here as "Independence Day." A picnic was decided upon by the Sunday school a few weeks ago, and to-day as we think of it and hear of it, we regard it as the best ever held by our people here. We were told that over six hundred children were seated for dinner. A nice little paper dish was provided for each one, and supplied with ample of the good things of the earth to give satisfaction to all, having a reasonable appetite.

Many of the aged and some of the infirm ones were seated together and nicely cared for by those appointed for that purpose. Everywhere was sunshine within and without; the outer calling out the use of the handkerchief, although for a short time the sky was dimmed by a cloudy atmosphere, which made it comfortable for the boys and girls and some of the elderly ones, who engaged in running, jumping, etc.

A good many of the young men entered into a baseball contest in the afternoon when the heat made slow running preferable. However, the game was an interesting and stirring one, as you will judge; the score being 18 to 15.

The most appropriate part of the proceedings was given between the hours of ten and twelve. An opening number was given by the Sunday school orchestra, directed by Bro. Thomas Watkins, followed by a prayer by Bro. W. H. Garrett. Elder F. G. Pitt now read the principal part of the Declaration of Independence, with the earnestness of a true patriot. An anthem by the Independence choir followed, appropriate to the occasion, which was nicely rendered and much enjoyed. Then H. Hale Smith, of Lamoni, was introduced as the orator of the day. Our young brother carefully pointed to several of the important events and men of the past, whose intelligence and courage gave to us our present day liberties. He spoke of our attitude towards foreigners; what it should be and what it is among a great many Americans, emphasizing the fact that this nation is but the offspring of foreigners in combination with foreigners. Criticisms were made upon all Americans who assumed an attitude of hostility towards the foreigner, who in point of criminality, as compared with native born Americans, were shown to be better by quite a percentage. He called attention to the treatment given the foreigner by the captains of industry, who were willing to extract all the possible energy from them to build up fortunes, and at the same time hold up the American principle of liberty. Patriotic in noise and oral demonstration, but the reverse in fact by their acts to the principles of freedom.

He submitted an ideal for all Americans and believed by him to be possible of realization of universal peace, which we should aim to secure. He plead for the application of the principles that would bring the whole world into one common brotherhood, "Citizens of the world first; after that, citizens of America."

Provisions were made by the Sunday school for all the children of the intermediate and primary grades to get a dish of ice-cream and lemonade free. All others were furnished refreshments at reasonable prices, and as a result, it was stated that the school will be the gainer by a considerable amount. It is estimated that about twelve hundred were present. The grounds were but a short distance from the church, very fine, and called Forbes Park. There were many fine trees and quite a number of swings were put up for the children.

One of the most pleasing features was the marching of the little ones to places for dinner. Everything was well planned by those having charge. As a whole, the picnic can be regarded as a success.

"The Devil can sit down and rest when we have so much missionary work on hand that we can not take time to pray in secret."

JOHNNIE, Nevada, June 16, 1909.

Dear Herald: My wife Mina and I and three sons, who accepted the gospel about four years ago, and Bro. and Sr. A. J. Jones and son are all the Saints here, and the surroundings seem to be in opposition to the gospel. We feel as strong in the work as ever and miss very much the good times we have spent among the Saints of Eastern Michigan, the many warm hands we used to grasp with brotherly love at conference and two-day meetings. Our hearts often go out for the dear Saints, and the grand work, yea, and the many who are near and dear, and that all could see the gospel. It brings joy, peace, comfort and rest while here and the grand hope of a Saint beyond this vale of tears. Trials and troubles will come, but the gospel of Christ makes them light when we live that our eyes can see beyond.

I was born June 9, 1875, in Essex County, Ontario, near McGregor. It was as bad a place for drinking as I ever saw and I thank my father and mother for their watchful care over me, as I was of a wild disposition, and their care for me kept me from being worse than I was. I had many bad habits, but never got in any serious trouble; used to chew and smoke, drink some, and swear; but not around my father or mother until grown up, they being Catholic. Mother would go to church every Sunday; father would send us. I hardly remember of ever going with him. I understood he did not feel satisfied.

After going for myself at about eighteen years of age, lived with my brother Felix about one year. He having "good spells," as I used to say, we took to reading his Bible. Neither the boys nor girls taking any interest in the mother church after about eighteen years of age, except William and Frank, who married in the church. Bro. Felix and I would read nearly every night about as long as we could sit up and would stop and talk of what we had read, with much earnestness, thinking, "Well, that sounds very good, if we could have lived away back yonder," and rather believed it as true. We would often say, "But why not blessings now?" We could see a vast difference in the way they preached nowadays, so spent many an hour reading and conversing on the Scripture, and as far as we got thought that the Bible was true, the Catholic Church must be wrong, and all other churches, so far as we knew. But in the meantime I prayed to God, believing there was a supreme being, yet never had I received any evidence of such or of the work in which I had been engaged. I knew that if the gospel was true and his church was upon earth he would show me the way. I promised I would try and do his will.

Time passed and I grew to have little fear or care for anything, as near as I can explain it, though I did not go to the extent of my feelings. I had taken one trip to the Canadian Northwest at the age of sixteen, and in 1895, I went to Tuscola County, Michigan. Felix and William both moved there. I met my wife there; went on to the lumber woods in the upper peninsula; was ready to go to Africa, but was called back home, met this young lady and thought with some help I would settle down and lead a better life. We were united in wedlock April 7, 1896.

Felix, while living in Windsor, Ontario, became acquainted with the Saints and he and wife were baptized by Bro. Alvin Knisley, as also two of their children. I heard of him joining the Mormons. Did not know much about them, only what I had heard. I went to pay them a visit and found him very earnest, would not even take a drink with the boys, and was very careful in every respect. In a short time they moved to where we were living. He stayed with me most all summer, and began to tell me all about the plan of salvation. Every Saint knows how that is and what the Bible says about this, that, and things that had happened, and what was going to happen. Everything sounded very good, if it were true, and if any church was teaching and practicing and receiving such things, it was surely good. You show me where it says that in the Bible. Do you people preach and practice that? Yes, they preach the gospel just as it is. So he labored with me night after night, day after day. When he would prove it, I would yield, and he did prove all by the word of God, until myself and wife became very anxious to meet some of those people, especially an elder. We did not know of any preaching anywhere near, yet heard Elder McKenzie was living at Juniata, Michigan, about ten miles away. Bro. Felix suggested that we write to the postmaster and find out. My wife wrote and got an answer that the Saints had a church there and were having meetings every Sunday; and so the following Sunday we went. We were made to feel at home. We went to Sunday school. We were very disappointed, yet not sorry of our trip. They said they would have an elder before long and would let us know. Through the week we got a letter that Bro. William Davis would be there on Sunday.

We went and heard the Saints talking and the elder preach. Whenever I thought I had something to say I would say it, and keep my side of the question until I was shown I was wrong. We brought the elder home with us. He would preach nights and I would keep him talking day times, and that week I asked the elder what there was to prevent me from being baptized. He could not see anything, so I said I wanted to be baptized. When I told my wife she said, "So am I." We have never regretted the step, but many times have rejoiced in this grand and noble cause. May God bless those who did their part in bringing us to see this beautiful light of the gospel.

Since then my brother, A. J., who married a sister to my wife, came into the church, also their mother and nephew, Brother and Sister McTaggart and son, another of Brother Felix's daughters, our son Eddie, and we were a happy band of Saints. Many a time did we meet and have God's blessing bestowed on us, until a little over a year ago, we broke from the ranks. We had our Sunday school and many a sermon was preached there. Went to many two-day meetings and conferences together, and walked, as it were, hand in hand. Now we are somewhat scattered, but the tie still binds. We would love to be together as we used to be and if it is God's will we may; and if not while here, let us so live that we may meet in the morn of the first resurrection. We long to be among the Saints, to enjoy the privileges that a Saint loves. Sometimes we may not know the reason for things, but the "Lord knows why and that's enough."

We have the only hotel in this place. My wife is postmistress and telephone central. Brother A. J. and I have mail and stage route together. Do not know when we will break loose from here, nor where we will go, but hope and pray that we may grow day by day to be greater workers for the Master and do our part in the building of his cause and kingdom here on earth, and that we may be worthy to receive a crown of righteousness at the end of the race.

Ever praying for the afflicted, tempted, and tried, the poor and the needy, all who weep and mourn, for the officers of the church, and for all that would advance the cause that Zion may be redeemed in the name of Christ, and realizing the prayers of the righteous, I ask your prayers in our behalf,

Your brother in Christ,

WALTER C. JONES.

SCAMMON, Kansas, July 6, 1909.

Editors Herald: I have just finished a tour through Southern Kansas, or Northern Oklahoma, preaching the gospel at different points by the way. In Beaver County, Oklahoma, I preached in two places, where considerable interest was manifested. At Elmwood Schoolhouse our congregations increased from the beginning, and also at the Baggerly Schoolhouse.

There is a small branch of the church here, presided over by Bro. M. Hancock, a very good, faithful man. Several members have moved away of late, some to Lamoni and some to Holden, Missouri, leaving only enough to hold an organization. I enjoyed my stay with the Saints here in a high degree. I think others here will unite with the church at no distant day.

I likewise labored north of Pond Creek, in Grant County, but with no perceivable effect. At Winfield, Kansas, I preached once at the home of W. Vickery, late of Plano, Illinois. He lives in a beautiful country and by his upright deportment has commended himself to his neighbors, and I expect a branch of the church to be raised up at no distant day. There are two families of Saints living in Arkansas City, nine miles from Bro. Vickery's, that attended our meeting, and also two families from Winfield. Elder Boswell and mother, late of Southern Indiana also attended. I think Bro. J. J. Boswell will be a great help to the work there.

Many of the Saints in Perry County, Indiana, will be glad to hear of Bro. Samuel Harding and wife as being yet strong in the faith; as is also their daughter. Our meeting at Bro. W. Vickery's will long be remembered by all, especially by the writer.

My next stop was in Scammon, Kansas. It was so intensely hot here I only preached twice and deemed it unnecessary to try to do more, it being the time of our greatest national anniversary. So few seem to be able to appreciate the importance of this, the greatest anniversary to the American people. Its importance will never be known to but few, until the beginning of the golden age just dawning.

I have felt strengthened and blessed in this missionary effort and hope to be able to assist more in the great work.

I. P. BAGGERLY.

SCANDIA, Kansas, June 27, 1909.

Dear Herald: This is the first time I ever wrote to your columns. Truly there are false spirits and doctrines abroad in the land. I will send you some clippings from the Kansas Weekly Capitol of a new sect of snake worshipers. You may publish it if you wish. May the Lord bless his children that they may keep the whole law of Christ, for the time is truly short when he will come to his own, and may we be ready to meet him and receive that welcome, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant; enter into the joy of thy Lord."

Your humble servant and colaborer in Christ,

S. A. MADDEN.

Manitoba Reunion.

Promptly at 10 a. m., Thursday, July 8, 1909, the Saints of the Manitoba reunion assembled at McCreary Church, Treherne, and were called to order by Elder J. L. Mortimer, missionary in charge of Manitoba. Previous to the reunion a program providing for four sessions a day, had been prepared and published, and this was closely followed out. The organizing of the reunion and district Religio special for Thursday, of district Sunday school for Friday, and of Winnipeg District for Saturday, with special services on Sunday. After a few brief remarks the following reunion organization was effected: President, Apostle R. C. Russell, missionary in charge of Canada; associate, Elders J. L. Mortimer, George Buschlen, and James E. Kelley; secretary, William Hadath, who selected Elder T. J. Jordan as assistant; chorister, Nelson Wilson; organist, Sr. Lily Vennard; ushers, Brn. Ed McGregor and James Hadath; press committee, Elders J. E. Kelley, T. J. Jordan, and N. Wilson. The presidency was authorized to appoint all speakers.

With Apostle R. C. Russell presiding, the following officers were elected for the Winnipeg District of Zion's Religious-Literary Society; superintendent, Thomas Seaton, of Winnipeg; assistant superintendent, Stella Hayward, of Indianford; home class superintendent, Ethel Conlin, of Winnipeg; secretary, William Hadath, of Winnipeg; treasurer, Wellington Wilson, of Treherne; librarian, Kate Morgan, of Treherne. Motion to elect officers at the next convention prevailed. Adjourned to meet at 10 a. m. on the Thursday preceding the convening of the next district conference and at the same place.

The session for Sunday school business convened at 2 p. m., Friday, Elder J. L. Mortimer, presiding. Officers elected: Superintendent, Mrs. Nelson Wilson, of Treherne; assistant superintendent, W. S. Carter, of Spy Hill, Saskatchewan; secretary, Stella Haywood, of Indianford; treasurer, William Henry, of Treherne. By motion Martha Burr, of Winnipeg, was recommended to the district superintendent to be appointed home class superintendent. A collection of $9.20 was taken up, to be equally divided between the two societies. Adjourned to meet at 10 a. m. Friday preceding the convening of the next district conference at the same place. The Canadian Mirror was introduced by Elder R. C. Russell.

Saturday, July 10, at 2 p. m. began the organization of what will hereafter be known as the Winnipeg District, Apostle R. C. Russell presiding. A motion was carried that we petition the next General Conference to include in the Winnipeg District that portion of Saskatchewan lying between the west line of Manitoba and range five (5) west of meridian two (2) in Saskatchewan. Also motion prevailed to present this matter to the Saskatoon reunion for their consideration and action. Officers elected: President, Elder Nelson Wilson, Treherne; first counselor, Elder James Edmund Kelley, Winnipeg; second counselor, Elder Thomas Seaton, Winnipeg; secretary W. S. Carter, Spy Hill, Saskatchewan; treasurer and Bishop's agent, L. H. Carter, Spy Hill; librarian, Sr. Elsie Carter, Spy Hill, Saskatchewan. Adjourned to meet in Winnipeg on Saturday and Sunday, the date to be fixed by the district presidency. A vote of thanks was extended to the Rosendale Branch for entertainment. The speakers were Elders R. C. Russell, George Buschlen, J. L. Mortimer, and James E. Kelley. The Manitoba reunion, from beginning to end, temporally and spiritually, was a success.

WILLIAM HADATH, Secretary.

The "One Cup."

Dear Herald: One is sometimes moved to a gentle irony against his will, and I have recently wondered long and loud at the very remarkable fact that so many of our beloved and departed brethren and sisters and collaborators in the vineyard of the Lord, have, for more years than I care to mention, partaken regularly of the "one cup" and of the "one bread" and yet, in spite of it all, have lived to such a good old age as is very rarely seen in these pessimistic and degenerate days.

Were it not for a seeming discourtesy to high authorities, I was about to remark upon the even more remarkable fact that neither the "Lord of life and glory," nor his contemporary disciples, nor even your respected parent and his compeers, knew anything at all about these deadly microbes or venomous bacilli, or noxious germs, in either the cup or the bread or the wine of their Lord's sacrament; but just went blundering blindly on, eating of the one bread and drinking of the one cup until such of them as were not sawn asunder or crucified, or slain, or devoured of wild beasts, became poisoned by these new-fangled germs and microbes; but not until they had attained a very remarkable and robust old age (in most cases at least).

How very strange that none of these beloved and ancient worthies were aware of just one well-known and well-authenticated fact in the biological science, to the effect that for every single disease germ, or infection microbe, there are untold thousands—nay millions of normal, pure, and healthy microbes in the atmospheric air we breathe, and in the water we drink, which instantly prey upon and destroy all deadly bacilli before they have had time to enter the vesicles and to poison the blood corpuscles of the human body.

Some years ago, Dr. T. Stephenson, of London, England, (a dear friend of mine since deceased,) confided to me that one half of the advertisements by the medical profession were meant to scare people into diseases which they never had; and the other half to cure them. Of course, I immediately turned to see whether this was said seriously or merely in bantering; but he simply turned upon me a stolid countenance, and went on: "Fact; if people simply won't get sick, they must be made to imagine they're sick; or what is going to become of us poor 'meds'?" I thought it mere joking then, but I have had ample time to believe it in sober earnest since.

When I read such blood-curdling advertisements in the daily papers as the following, I just simply smile a grim smile and think of my medical friend's words, and of his "bread pills" and of his "rosewater tonics": "Stop that cough, or you are a dead man in two months!" or "Have you ever paused to think that that backache means kidney trouble; and kidney trouble means death?" "That headache only shows how near you are to the brink of insanity," and plenum ad nauseam. Out of the seventy-six patients who applied for admission to Charing Cross Hospital during the time my learned friend walked that venerable institution in the West End of London, England, he assured me solemnly and seriously that not more than nineteen had anything organically the matter with them at all. The remainder had been simply "scared" by the faked, "quack" advertisements, and just imagined they were at death's door, because of a headache or a backache, or a merely local lesion or irritation, temporary nerve trouble, which a few days rest in bed or change of scene or in some cases a temporary avoidance of certain foods or drinks, harmful to the system, would have entirely and almost instantly removed and cured.

The time has come when all such absurd but terrorizing advertisements should be rigorously and vigorously barred from every newspaper and from every respectable magazine in the world. There would speedily follow a rapid diminution of such cases as I have named; and people would soon realize that God in nature is not only the great prophylactic (or preventative), but also the great healer of all the diseases of mankind. (Psalm 103: 3.)

In the meantime, may I respectfully be permitted to present to your readers a new and revised rendering of 1 Corinthians 11: 25: "After supper also he took one of the cups, when he had supped saying, Drink not all of these cups, lest some among ye be poisoned with germs and some with microbes and some with bacilli; and there arose murmurings and disputations among ye saying, Whose microbe hath poisoned me? or whose diseased germ hath sent me unto my death? for I say unto you that some have many more microbes than others; therefore see ye to it. Also he brake the bread and when he had blessed it he said unto them, Take, eat, this is one of my bodies which is broken for you; but the body that my servant James eateth of is not the same body that my servant Peter eateth of; neither is it the same cup, for have ye not read that if there be many breads, there must needs be many bodies; and if there be many cups, doth it not also symbolize that it is not by the blood of the one offering that ye are saved, but that there are many bloods and many offerings?"

Now let your readers compare this new-fangled version with the uncorrupted plain word of God, in 1 Corinthians 10: 17: "For we being many are one bread, and one body; for we are all partakers of that one bread." See also Matthew 26: 26 and John 6: 31-35.

May the God of all grace enable us to flee from all merely human fads and fancies; that we may continue to be partakers of the "one bread, one cup, one Lord, one faith, and one baptism."

OLD SUBSCRIBER.

VALENTINE, Nebraska, July 22, 1909.

Editors Herald: I thought perhaps a line from one of the isolated ones would interest some one, so write. We seldom hear one of our elders here, but we have three Utah men here preaching on the street. Two of them called here yesterday. We read the second chapter of Jacob and had quite a talk with them. One of them told Mr. Shepard that Joseph was in Utah and went to Joseph F. and wanted to unite with them; that he told Joseph he could not come in any other way than to repent of his sins and be baptized by them. [Of course this story that President Smith made overtures to the authorities of the Utah faction with a view to uniting therewith is all moonshine. But it is rather amusing to think that Joseph F. Smith who confessed before the senate committee in the Smoot case that he was living in violation of the laws of both the church and the land is represented as asking the president of the Reorganization to repent, when, as everybody knows, the latter has always lived well within the laws of God and of his native land.—ASSOCIATE EDITOR.]

I will send one of their cards with article of faith. The elder's name was Black [so was his story] that made the assertion that Joseph Smith wanted to join with them. They claim that the martyred Joseph was a polygamist. I wish some of our elders could come to our town after they are gone and show up the difference.

Ever wishing success to the work we are all interested in,
I am,

In gospel bonds,

INDEPENDENCE, Missouri, July 17, 1909.

Editors Herald: Letter from Bro. James O. Coshaw, July 12, written from Hudson, New Mexico, shows interest there, and that the friends are wanting to see and hear an elder. Can not some of our elders in New Mexico, or nearby, visit Hudson and Lloyd and do some missionary work among the people? There are some ready for baptism and no authorized administrator of the ordinance. Write to or call on James O. Coshaw, Lloyd, New Mexico.

The church that feeds tracts to the starving will always play second fiddle to the Salvation Army in the matter of practical results.—Commoner.

The less meat a person tastes the better he will make use of the powers God has given him. Feed on the more natural diet with plenty of exercise, long walks, deep breathing, and frequent bathing—this means a happy and long life.—William W. Klein.

"Inquiry as to the general age of trees being put to an authority of the forestry service at Washington, it was said that the pine tree attained 700 years as a maximum length of life; 425 years were the allotted span of the silver fir; the larch lived 275 years; the red beech, 245; the aspen, 210; the birch, 200; the ash, 170; the elder, 145; the elm, 130. The heart of the oak begins to rot at about the age of 300 years. Of the holly, it is said that there is a specimen 410 years old near Aschaffenburg, Germany."

News From Branches

CHICAGO ITEMS.

Our missionary, Elder Arthur Allen, is preparing a leaflet, setting forth our distinguishing points of doctrine, places of meeting, etc., with which all members will be supplied, as a means of advertisement, hoping to increase the attendance of visitors at our services. The great drawback in our work here in the city is not in getting honest people to obey the truth, but in getting them to stop and consider it. We read in the papers of our missionaries opening up at a new place, and literally turning things up side down, but such an idea would be a joke if related in connection with any ministerial effort here where everybody has more things of interest "on tab" than they can look after, and of course religion to them is an eleventh-hour proposition.

After all, we might say that the chief object in our maintaining a church here is, since a few Saints will always be found in this, as in other cities, that they might have a place wherein they can worship, regardless of the prospects of gathering in new members. What the Saints need is education. Not so much of the letter sort, but in original thought, and self-preparation. Knowledge tells a man what to do, while wisdom tells him what not to do, and while we are drifted along at the present breakneck speed of the world, our greatest need is a little holding back. Men suffer more from overdoing than from underdoing a thing. We eat too much, work too much, and sleep too much,—after 1 a. m. What the Saints need is regulation, more system, and less hustle and bustle. No man can be happy and useful in the church when he is all fagged out from long hours in the field, in the shop, or at the desk. God has promised his people a place of rest because they need it.

God wants his people to be industrious, but he does not require that they shall overtax the body which he has designed to be an honor unto him, instead of a weary, worn, complaining wreck, as in the case of Mary and Martha, as recorded in Luke, tenth chapter. Mary loved to wait at the Master's feet, and listen to him talk, while Martha was "cumbered with overmuch serving." The Savior sided with Mary, when Martha complained about having to do all the work. Mary's faithfulness to the Savior would mean her soul-salvation, while Martha would only save—save what? Nothing.

Bro. Allen has prepared a tabulated schedule, showing a month ahead, where each of the preaching force will occupy. This includes the three branches, First, Central, and West Pullman. While there are but a very few at the latter branch, they are God's children, and are entitled to the help of the ministry. It was the writer's turn there last Sunday evening, and we preached to the five present, just the same as if to two thousand. I heard Brother Bond once say that the best sermon he ever heard was preached by Bro. Columbus Scott to but four people. That was five years ago that the statement was made, and whether Brother Bond has changed his mind we can not say. So, brethren, do not let the size of your congregation gauge your zeal. Shut your eyes and go into your subject, and you will some day have a larger crowd.

As stated, what this church needs is the solidifying of the body, making each member better and brighter; then the ingathering from the world will be simple.

CENTRAL CHICAGO.

Sunday, July 19. Delightful day. Fair attendance at Sunday school, and it was voted to hold the picnic at Manhattan Beach on the last Saturday in July.

Sermon by Elder Pement, which contained many good thoughts, one that if we are thoroughly converted to the Lord's work, we will be generous with our money, and consider the Lord's work first and paramount. Elder Allen occupied in the evening, discoursing on the teachings of the different sects or churches, and showing that the Lord requires that we obey all his commands, and live by every word that proceedeth from the mouth of God.

Dr. E. E. Schwartz and wife were visitors at the evening service.

We are pleased to report that Sr. Elizabeth Evison, her son, and three daughters have now moved to the South Side, locating at Sixty-fourth and Honore streets, within two blocks of the church. The families are coming in one by one and we trust it will not be long until the majority will be located near the church.

Apostle Frank Sheehy was in charge of the prayer meeting Wednesday evening. All were glad to see him once again, and listen to his good counsel. Fair attendance at meeting. Normal class held after prayer meeting in charge of Elder Allen, as formerly announced.

Bro. W. I. Cochran and other brethren have been spending some time very profitably in the church, and the painting, etc., give the interior an entirely different appearance. How thankful we will be when it is all finished, and ask all faithful Saints to remember us in prayer that we may be humble and heed the admonition given to us the first sacrament Sunday, that many would be gathered in, if we would do our duty. The Lord is always ready and willing to fulfill his part of the contract, but how indifferent and dilatory we are so many times!

The Value of Health.

E. H. Harriman, the famous railroad magnate and multi-millionaire, is now traveling abroad in a quest for improved health. He is trying to regain, in Europe, the health and strength which he exhausted in his struggle for the wealth with which he is now so abundantly supplied. He has spent his life working—night and day, no doubt—for the great fortune of which he is now master. He probably paid little or no attention to his health—his business was the making of money. Health was of but little importance to him. It was not until he reached that period of existence when he realized that the foundation of health and strength by which his life was sustained was gradually slipping away from him that he began to understand the value of a healthy body.

How many men who are not millionaires are making the same mistake? Year after year they are struggling and straining and striving with might and main, and for what? Nothing more in most cases than pecuniary independence, at the most. It is the duty of every one to carefully compute his available capital on frequent occasions. Few remember, however, that there are two kinds of capital. One is measured by the amount of money one may have in the bank, or the amount of one's various holdings. The other sort of capital is the amount of health, bodily vigor, mental or physical abilities. This last form of capital is by far the most important. Without health there can be no happiness, there can be nothing of moment accomplished in life. In fact, life is a mere miserable existence to one who is compelled to struggle along day after day with depleted vitality and a weakened body. One hears a great deal about cultivating the habit of saving. This is very commendable, but there is little said about conserving the physical resources, taking care of the physical capital.

The time is coming, however, when we can expect a change, when we will struggle not so much for financial independence, but for the physical and mental capital that will forever eliminate the fear that comes to those facing the possibility of being without the price of a meal. Let us lower the dollar standard, and in its place erect a higher standard of manhood and womanhood. Wealth has its uses. It is a mighty power, but its importance has been exaggerated. It is not really necessary to life or health or happiness, and those who seek it with the idea that its attainment will completely gratify all of life's desires are chasing an illusion.—Physical Culture for August.

Private Hygiene.WHAT IT MEANS TO THE INDIVIDUAL AND TO THE RACE.

Private hygiene is even more important, and means a revolution in our habits of living. It means fresh air perpetually flowing through our houses and more of our lives spent outdoors. It means common sense in diet—the avoidance of bolting food, from which dyspepsia springs, and the reëducation of normal food instincts, the avoidance of gluttony on the one side, and body starvation on the other, the avoidance of alcohol, the most potent of the predisposing causes of tuberculosis, and the avoidance of dirty, infected milk and meat. It means the "simple life," free from over-exertion on the one hand, and indolence on the other; the habit of normal sleep, and the emancipation from worry.

In giving this prescription, Doctor Trudeau once said to me: "It is as simple as bathing in the waters of Jordan, and that is why people are so slow to follow it."

But to-day people are following, and following rapidly. When they see a man, who only a few years ago was so ill of tuberculosis that he could scarcely drag himself out upon a porch, now run twenty-five miles for pure love of exercise, or when they see nine college men inside of half a year double their endurance through rational diet alone, or when they learn that ex-President Roosevelt developed from a weak and timid boy into the personification of strength and courage, and that Cornaro, about to die at thirty-seven, abjured all unhygienic habits and prolonged his life to one hundred and three, they begin to realize the practical value of personal hygiene.—From Professor Irving Fisher's "The war upon the great white plague" in the September Century.

Says Newspapers and Magazines Have Taken the Place of the Preachers.

In "The pilgrim's scrip," in the August American Magazine is a remarkable letter signed "An American Woman." The letter is quoted in part as follows:

"Like many women, I am interested in the problems of the day. Like or unlike them—I do not pretend to say which—I am not intensely interested in what the apostles thought or said or did. I am not actively interested in biblical interpretation of any kind. I say this not in the spirit of sacrilege. I am simply stating a fact of which I am not in the least ashamed. But I am very much interested indeed in the industrial problem, the sex problem, the negro problem, the problem of municipal corruption, of immigration, of the franchise, in any economic or sociological investigation. Although not a member of the socialist party, I am intensely interested in the growth of socialism. But if I wish to learn about these things, I have to go to the newspapers and magazines.

"Mr. William James said in an article printed over a year ago that the better class magazines, such as the American Magazine, McClure's, Collier's, and in its way, the World's Work, offered the college graduate a supplementary college course. One could perhaps go farther and say that these magazines have replaced the minister in the American home.

"Again if I want to see some of the problems I have mentioned presented in a more striking form, I have but to attend one of a dozen plays recently produced in New York.

"In brief, the churches are moribund in their relation to social problems. The magazines, newspapers, and theaters are vividly, virilely alive to them."

A Characterization of Doctor Holmes by Doctor Hale.

The serious purpose is hardly hidden beneath the light-hearted play of any of Holmes' stories or biographies or essays. I told him once that an oversensitive reader had taken the fancy that his description of a "possession" in Elsie Venner was so true that she who read felt in danger that she was thus controlled by a master mind, as, indeed, the hypnotists would perhaps teach us. Holmes was very grave when I said this. Often, indeed, he was the gravest of men. He said that he wrote the book merely as a psychological romance, with the eager wish to expose the folly and wickedness of the doctrine of transmitted sin. For this purpose he invented, wholly, what he called the psychological imagination of Elsie Venner's possession by another's will. He did not believe, and he had not supposed that any one would think he did, that such possession is possible. He was eager to say to me that he had no idea that one person can so control another. He was surprised that any one fancied that he thought so. But, on the other hand, his wish was to show that sin can not be inherited. Sin must come from the will of the sinner. It must be a conscious act and purpose of his own. He was eager that I should say to any one that he never supposed such a case as Elsie Venner's really possible.

All which I copy from a note I made at the time by way of showing how eager he was to enforce some essential truth in what he wrote. Wisdom or joke, fun or retrospect, there is a purpose behind it all. And, as I meet the young people to-day, and as I look round on the men and women whose writings they like to read, I see no one left whose serious purpose seems to me to affect them as did his.—From "Oliver Wendell Holmes," by Edward Everett Hale, in the American Review of Reviews for July.

A Hilarious, But Sensible Fourth.

"We Rubiconians always prided ourselves on the fact that Rubicon was the most patriotic town in the State," says a citizen in Woman's Home Companion for July. "A hardy individual from Capua once asked for proof. He was snapped up promptly by a leading citizen.

"Proof, eh?" said he. "Why, just come out here with me and I'll show you proof that would convince a man from Missouri. See that ruin down there at the corner—just a chimney sticking up into the air? That was Doctor Hawkins' fine residence. Cost ten thousand dollars. The fire started from a fire-cracker last Fourth. Notice the foundation back of that large house over there? Fine barn burned up there the same day—another fire-cracker. See the gap in that row of cottages down across the railroad? Three of them went up two years ago—fire-crackers or something. Look at the Methodist church there on the corner without a steeple. Maybe you'd think the wind blew it off, but you'd be wrong—Fourth o' July got it—and we had hard work to save the schoolhouse. I could show you lots more if I had time. And then walk about and look at our people. Why, man alive, there's fewer eyes and ears and fingers, not to mention arms and legs, in proportion to the population than in any other town you can find—all gone from fire-crackers, or toy pistols, or bursting cannons, or in some such patriotic way. Your town of Capua isn't in it, I tell you. Yon lion roaring in his den may be all right in his way, but if the old Grecian spirit isn't frozen in your veins you must see that for pure patriotism Rubicon leads the world.' The man from Capua shrunk away."

But the Rubiconians have at last evolved a sensible celebration, which includes a parade, a noise-festival for the little boys, athletic games, a luncheon, dancing, and closes with fireworks in the evening. As told about in the Woman's Home Companion it is a very attractive Fourth.

Why the Church in New York Wanes and Sickness.

Ray Stannard Baker, writing in the July American Magazine on the godlessness of New York, puts his finger on the core of the causes for the decay of the church in New York City. He says:

"The plain fact is, the church, even the institutional church, is still content with a religion that is a thing apart, that concerns only small, superficial things, that deals with children. Can any religion really live that does not apply itself frankly to every side of human life—business, industry, banking, tenement-houses, land owning, in short the whole of life? Or can the church recover from its present decadent condition until it strikes to the very roots of social conditions?"

"The rich people of the up-town churches, indeed, have the poor on their consciences as never before. To meet the conditions they have built institutional churches—a good idea, so far as it goes. They are willing to pay a large proportion of the expenses of maintenance, or even all of the expenses; they are willing that the institutional churches should be finer than their own churches; they will even go down and help with the clubs, classes, and Sunday-schools. In all these superficial things, in the singing and praying, they are willing to cooperate; but that is as far as they have got at present. There the cooperation stops short!

"When it comes to extending their religion to a cooperation in business and politics, to banking and land-owning—why, no, that can not be. For 'business is business'—and religion must be kept out of it. They have a groping idea that the church, if it is to survive, must command the lives of working men (how much we have heard of 'The church of the working men,' 'The church and the foreigner,' and so on), but they are not themselves willing to let religion command their own lives. They worship with the working man and then turn around and charge him an exorbitant rental for the home he lives in, they take fat profits on the necessities of life, they work women and little children long hours at low wages—and out of the proceeds they live luxuriously, while the workingman scrapes along miserably in his tenements. No, it is not real—this religion. It is 'Brother' only on Sunday: and the masses of grown men and women in poor neighborhoods know it. They prefer the honest openness of the saloon, the frank cheapness of the nickel theater, where they can pay for what they get, to the doubtful largess of the church.

"So the church wanes and sickness in New York. A few earnest churches and missions drag men here and there from the gutter, but the gutter itself, the gutter of unbrotherliness, of the oppression of the weak and the luxury of the strong, still engulfs its thousands and carries them down to ruin. Much of the reconstructive power and vision is outside the churches, not inside: it is found in settlements, charity and civic organizations and among socialists.

"It is only when the poor devils downtown in the McAuley Mission 'surrender,' and admit religion to the whole of their lives, that they are reconstructed: and the rich devils up-town can achieve reconstruction in no other way. Nor can the church be saved by giving a little money for missions, nor by going down to the working man on Sunday: it must be all or nothing."

"No one can be the true friend of a boy for one day in the week only. When the boy gives his friendship he gives it for every day, and if the teacher does not do the same, sad results will follow."

Ideal Vacation Trips

The Ideal Vacation involves a complete change of scene and living conditions, both of which will be obtained by making a trip to any of the following places:

COLORADO—the greatest summer resort state in the country, offers the greatest variety of out-door activity and recreation in a dry, invigorating climate, amid inspiring mountain scenery. The Burlington Route is the shortest line, and with its splendid trains, several of them electric-lighted one-night-on-the-road trains, offers the best service thereto.

YELLOWSTONE PARK—the National Playground, containing the greatest collection of Nature's wonders, and where game animals are constantly seen in their native wild state is unique. Through train service to Gardiner, the Official or Northern entrance to the Park, from principal Burlington points.

ALASKA-YUKON-PACIFIC EXPOSITION—unique among expositions and the most beautiful and interesting ever held, where meet the Occident and the Orient, the South Seas and Alaska. A trip to the Exposition offers great educational advantages and enables one to see at first hand the marvelous recent development of the great Northwest with its unlimited opportunities for investment in orchard, ranch or city. The Burlington is the only line which runs through trains to Seattle the Exposition City.

I would like to tell you about the unusually low cost of any of these trips and give you Burlington Route folders on Colorado, the Yellowstone or the Exposition.

FROM THE RIVERS TO THE ENDS OF THE EARTH.

The following note which is going the rounds of the press, this being taken from the New York World, indicates the character of the pension list of the United States. It is probable that some of those who are reported as being abroad are not actually of foreign birth, but the great majority of them undoubtedly are. When one stops to reflect a little upon the late civil war, now forty years or more in the past, and discovers that there are yet, on the latest roll of pensioners, nearly one million of those receiving pensions from the Government, one can easily imagine how many there were who engaged in the conflict, and it must be remembered that those of foreign birth and those who were native born of foreign parents would make up a very large percentage of the entire number of those who were engaged in the conflict on the Federal side of the question. As a matter of fact, there were comparatively few of those of foreign birth or of foreign parentage in the Confederate army; the great mass of foreign immigration being into the North and Northwestern States, settling north of the Mason and Dixon's line. The report as found in the clipping is suggestive:

At the petition of twenty residents of Oldham in Lancashire Joseph E. Ewell, department commander of the Grand Army of the Republic for this State, will shortly organize a post there. It will be not only the first G. A. R. post in England but in Europe. Of the six posts outside the United States at the present time four are in Canada, one in Honolulu, and one in Peru.

So far as the pension commissioner's figures go, there is room for a number of G. A. R. posts in several of the leading countries of Europe. According to the official figures for 1908, three hundred and seventy pensioners were living in England, four hundred and sixty-one in Ireland, ninety-two in Scotland and nineteen in Wales, a total of nine hundred and forty-two for the United Kingdom. Oldham, where the new post is to be instituted, represents only a small group.

In Germany there are five hundred and eighty-one pensioners on the rolls, in France fifty-nine, in Italy forty-one, in Denmark thirty-four, in Switzerland sixty, in Norway fifty-eight, in Sweden fifty-seven, and in Austria-Hungary thirty-four. Even so far away as Australia there are seventy-four. Peru, where one of the six foreign posts exists, show eight pensioners.

All told, of the nine hundred and fifty-one thousand six hundred and eighty-seven pensioners classified in the pension commissioner's report, five thousand and forty-seven, or a little over one half of one per cent, are in foreign countries. The natural inference is that while some of these may be widows, the greater part are veterans of the civil war who have returned to their native country.

It will be seen that England, Ireland, Wales, and the United Kingdom furnished a great many of those who made up the Northern army; and Germany, France, Italy, Denmark, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, Austria-Hungary, and Australia are represented on the list. Indeed, it may be said with a great deal of truth that the United States has largely recruited its population from the foreign countries, and if we take the morale of the enlistments in the army as indicative of the regard which those enlisted had for their adopted country, so far as those of foreign birth are concerned, and the latent patriotism that there would be in those born in this country, though of foreign parentage, the nation has reason to be grateful for the class of citizens which resulted from the immigration which began long prior to the war.

It is possible that if the population of the United States had not been recruited from such of the continental states as Germany, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and from Scotland and from Ireland, the nation as represented in the armies that fought under the Stars and Stripes during that terrible inter-necine war, would hardly have presented such a host of stalwarts as fought the battles to their close. The peculiar physical and moral atmosphere prevailing in the United States has such an effect upon those immigrating from foreign countries, especially those who find their homes in the agricultural portions of the country that it affects an increase in the stature physically, and to give spirit and dash to the mental organization, which marks an improved manhood. This is especially noticeable in the second generation after settlement in this country. So write the physicists and writers on political economy of the United States.

Notwithstanding that the chief early settlers were of the Anglo-Saxon race, and the further fact that it appears to have been the destiny designed of God, so far as this country was concerned, and perhaps the world, that the Anglo-Saxon should finally predominate, we have great reason to accept the thought, and to be thankful for it, that there has been an infusion into the national life of the blood of the sturdy races which are mentioned in this pension list.

We are thankful that within the last few years there has been a striking increase in the manifestation of a spirit of patriotism among the people. The fact that when our schools are in session the Stars and Stripes are floating over the buildings or the campus in like manner as they float over the houses of Congress when it is in session, and over the military stations and camps where the standing army may reside or be assembled, calls the attention of the rising generation to the fact that we have a government which is worthy of respect and admiration and love both at home and abroad.

What turmoils may occur abroad we may not know, so far as the main kingdoms of the continent are concerned, but from what we see now taking place in Turkey, Persia, and Morocco, the spirit of republicanism, using this term to represent government "of the people, by the people, and for the people," is spreading everywhere; and it is not difficult to suppose that these pensioners of the United States, over five thousand of them, not only represent the standing of the Government as just to keep its promises and pledges to those who fought with appreciative patriotism, to preserve the union of the States from disintegration, but that they will also take abroad with them an appreciative understanding of the form of government itself, and thus spread continuously a knowledge of the institutions of the country we love.

The political unrest abroad, the still apparent rivalry going on between the different kingly governments to make a show of the power of resistance, if not aggression, resident within themselves, are not conducive to the continuance of peace in the world. So interwoven now are the commercial interests of the nations that war to any extent in any part of the world would largely affect the United States, and it will require wise statesmanship to keep us clear of unnecessary entanglement in the quarrels that may occur. It may appear boastful, but it is a little difficult for an American citizen not to feel a little exultant when he sees through the general press the downfall of an oppressive dynasty such as we have reason to believe has characterized Turkey, Persia, and Morocco. And, if we believe, as we must, to be consistent, that God intended that from this favored land the principles of self-government should go abroad from the rivers to the ends of the earth, until the leaven of it should fill every nation, kindred, tongue, and people, we can not be seriously condemned for welcoming each successive downfall of tyrannical or irresponsible government. Who is there that would be willing to exchange his birthright of freedom for the care, anxiety, and constant apprehension that must attach as a part of the constituents of a kingly government, in any form? Let us be thankful then, that we are accounted worthy of a citizenship in a country destined of the Lord for the accomplishment of so great an end.

GRACELAND COLLEGE.

The Board of Trustees are doing some splendid advertising. The latest is a folder with a three-color picture of Graceland College. We now reproduce all but the picture for the benefit of those who will not get this circular. Those who wish to see this fine piece of work and advertising will be able to procure it by writing the secretary of the Board of Trustees, or F. B. Blair.

SOME LEADING QUESTIONS.

Q. What courses are to be had at Graceland?

A. The College represents five schools in one, as follows: College of Liberal Arts, Normal and Preparatory Schools, Commercial School, which includes shorthand and typewriting, School of Music, School of Oratory, and a course in Religious Pedagogy.

Q. Will Graceland's credits be accepted at the University?

A. Yes; full credit is given at the University of Iowa for work done at Graceland College. Full credit has also been given by other universities when requested and proper credentials presented.

Q. What is the tuition at Graceland?

A. In the Collegiate, Normal, and Preparatory

Departments the tuition is $30 for the year. In the Commercial School, $40 per year. For tuition in music and oratory please consult complete catalogue.

Q. Must one be a high school graduate to enter Graceland?

A. No; classes are provided for those of limited education. If you are determined to better qualify yourself for life's battles, come to Graceland and a place will be found for you.

Q. What is the object of the course in religious pedagogy?

A. The primary object is to assist students in qualifying themselves as teachers for Sunday schools and young people's societies.

Q. Is Graceland College a sectarian school?

A. No; the articles of incorporation enjoin "that the college shall never be sectarian in its work or instruction, but its advantages and privileges shall be open to all alike."

Q. Are students at Graceland surrounded by Christian influences?

A. Yes; there are two churches in Lamoni, the Latter Day Saints and the Methodist Episcopal, and regular services are held each Sunday. Sunday schools, prayer meetings, and young people's societies afford abundant opportunity for spiritual development.

Q. What is the living expense at Graceland?

A. Board at Marietta Hall and Patroness Hall, the College dormitories, may be had for $2.25 per week, and room rent 50 cents per week. Board and room can be secured in private families at $3.50 to $5.00 per week.

Q. Does Graceland afford the means of an education to those of limited or no means?

A. The Industrial Department gives the opportunity to quite a number of boys and girls who are limited in means, but willing to work, to work for all or part of their expenses. Write C. B. Woodstock, Lamoni, Iowa, the director of the department, for full particulars.

Q. What is the Industrial Department?

A. This department might well be called the self-help department, as it is designed to afford young people the opportunity of helping themselves to meet their college expenses by their own labor. It includes all kinds of farm work, work in the dining room and kitchen, janitor work, and in fact everything necessary to keep up an institution of the kind.

Q. Does Graceland pay students' car-fare to Lamoni?

A. Yes; up to ten dollars, if a year's tuition is paid in advance. When you buy your ticket to Lamoni, get a receipt from the railroad agent and turn your receipt in on your tuition.

Q. When is College Day?

A. College Day is the first Sunday in October, at which time a collection is taken in all the branches to assist in meeting the college running expenses.

Q. Where can I get a complete catalogue of Graceland?

A. Write the secretary, R. J. Lambert, Lamoni, Iowa, and he will forward one.

POSSIBILITIES OF THE RESURRECTION.

The following is from the writings of Isaac Disraeli, an English writer, who was born at Enfield, London, in 1766, and died in 1848. It is one of the curiosities of literature, under the caption of "Palingenesis":

Never was a philosophical imagination more beautiful than that exquisite Palingenesis, as it has been termed from the Greek, or a regeneration; or rather, the apparitions of animals, and plants. Shott, Kircher, Gaffarel, Borelli, Digby, and the whole of that admirable school, discovered in the ashes of plants their primitive forms, which were again raised up by the force of heat. Nothing, they say, perishes in nature; all is but a continuation, or a revival. The semina of resurrection are concealed in extinct bodies, as in the blood of man; the ashes of roses will again revive into roses, though smaller and paler than if they had been planted; unsubstantial and unodoriferous, they are not roses which grow on rose-trees, but their delicate apparitions; and like apparitions, they are seen but for a moment. The process of the Palingenesis, this picture of immortality, is described. These philosophers having burnt a flower, by calcination disengaged the salts from its ashes, and deposited them in a glass phial; a chemical mixture acted on it, till in the fermentation they assumed a bluish and spectral hue. This dust, thus excited by heat, shoots upward into its primitive forms; by sympathy the parts unite, and while each is returning to its destined place, we see distinctly the stalk, the leaves, and the flower arise; it is the pale spectre of a flower coming slowly forth from its ashes. The heat passes away, the magical scene declines, till the whole matter again precipitates itself into the chaos at the bottom. This vegetable phoenix lies thus concealed in its cold ashes, till the presence of heat produces its resurrection—in its absence it returns to its death.

This is a possibly fanciful illustration; but, taken with Hall's claim that the completed formation of all existent things is to be found in its embryo, and the words of the apostles, "But God giveth it a body, to every seed its own body," shows the wondrous possibilities of the resurrection. (See 1 Corinthians, 15th chapter.)

The literary study of the Holy Scriptures is undoubtedly profitable and inspiring; but unless the student goes farther, and discovers their profound spiritual value, his study will fall far short of its real importance.—The Examiner.

The world is full of judgment days, and in every assembly that a man enters, in every action he attempts, he is gauged and stamped. A man passes for what he is worth.—Emerson.

CONCERNING ELDER PENDER'S LETTER TO BISHOP KELLEY.

In HERALD for July 21 we published a letter from Elder W. S. Pender to Bishop Kelley, from Phoenix, Arizona, under date of April 3, foreshadowing certain important events that transpired at the General Conference. There is a peculiar incident connected with the delivery of that letter that we did not give, but perhaps should have mentioned. The letter was not delivered to Brother Kelley until June 6, at which time it came from the postal authorities with this notation, "Recovered from stolen mail pouch of April 6, 1909." Mail addressed to Elder T. N. White was recovered from the same holdup on the same date. So it is a peculiar coincident that Brother Pender wrote the letter at a time when he could not know of the events that it foreshadowed, and Bishop Kelley did not receive the letter until after the important initial steps in the undertaking had been taken at the General Conference. Bishop Kelley has the original letter slightly mutilated by the train robbers, while Brother Pender has a copy made by him when the letter was written.

LAMONI "CONFERENCE" IGNORED.

The Northern Illinois elders held a conference in Nauvoo, May 30 to June 1.

The foregoing is taken from the Liahona for June 26, and is quite unimportant in itself; our purpose in reproducing it is to call attention to the peculiar fact that our Utah brethren are very inconsistent. Some weeks ago there were seventeen Utah elders in Lamoni, holding one of their "conferences" so-called. The Saints showed them every courtesy, gave them the use of the church for their priesthood meetings and for a series of preaching services, and Elder Ellsworth in charge, was here and personally conducted the effort. And yet neither the Deseret News nor the Liahona, its echo in these matters, made any mention of their presence in Lamoni, their conference, or the services held.

We refer to the incident because it is an evidence of their policy of ignoring the Reorganization, and not because we feel slighted, for we do not. If our elders should be given the use of "Mormon" meeting houses in Salt Lake City or Logan for a like effort at enlightening their people, we are sure that our appreciation would demand the courtesy of some mention in our official papers.

No agency for conversion is so potent as a life in which Jesus Christ dwells in the fullness of his grace. No ingenious method to attract attention and awaken feeling can ever equal in evangelistic value the life of God revealing itself in the life of man.—The Standard.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

Elder J. Charles May writes from Salt Lake, Utah, en route to his field in the South Sea Islands. He is spending a week in Zion (?) and sends in a picture of the statue of Brigham Young, calling attention to the fact that Brigham is pointing toward the Utah Savings Bank while his back is turned toward the Temple.

Elder Lester Wildermuth writes from Cullom, Illinois, that he and Elder J. E. Vanderwood are doing successful open air work. Elder Vanderwood had baptized four recently.

Elder Hale W. Smith writes from Idaho that he has baptized several of late and others are to be baptized soon. Elder I. M. Smith had baptized nine at Race Track, Montana, making eighteen in Montana since the General Conference. Elder S. S. Smith had just baptized two at Lulaiette, Idaho.

Elder E. E. Long writes that he is busy in southern Ohio, having numerous openings. He has baptized several of late. His letter is misplaced, but the recollection of the editors is that he has baptized eight.

LAMONI ITEMS.

Patriarch E. C. Briggs preached Sunday morning and Elder J. F. Garver occupied in the evening at Central Park.

Elder Elbert A. Smith left on Wednesday (28th ult.) for New Philadelphia and Crabtree, Ohio, to attend reunions, and expects to return in time for the reunion at Lamoni.

Christ's confidence in the unlimited spiritual capacity of humanity was an induction and generalization from what he knew of himself. This is the only possible way of reasoning if we deal with men prophetically. It was a generous thought that all men had in them the same spiritual possibilities that he found in himself, but how otherwise could he reason or believe? Jesus stood on the rock of his own spiritual experience, on what he knew to be true of himself, and from this reached in absolute confidence to the conclusion that where he stood and what he knew were things within the reach of every human soul.—The Universalist Leader.

It will not be our criticism of each other's follies and the exposing of the foibles of our philosophies which will save either ourselves or others, but the generous, helpful spirit of our Master, which shall make this world a paradise and cause the atmosphere of heaven to be realized on earth.—Pacific Christian Advocate.

THE SAINTS' HERALD HISTORICAL SERIES.

I. THE PARENTAGE AND BIRTH OF JOSEPH SMITH, BY VIDA E. SMITH.

[EDITOR'S NOTE.—This is the first number of our historical series. The second number will deal with Joseph Smith's first vision. It is contributed by Elder T. W. Williams.]

In the life of every great man we see the culmination of a series of events forming in environment and heredity, history and tradition, some justification for his peculiar personal fitness to his mission.

Joseph Smith, the martyred leader of the church, was not unlike other great men in this respect. He was the issue of the union of two strong lines of life tide, flowing for generations to this God-appointed event. His father, Joseph Smith, came of hardy old New England stock, a man of splendid physique, with the tenderest and most constant of hearts. He was mild and pacific in temperament, patriotic, long-suffering, and patient, but in the end placidly firm and unflinching in his conceptions of right, which conceptions were weighed always and measured with regard to the rights of others. His was a family knit together for many generations with strong brotherly affection.

Like all great men, appointed to exalted missions, Joseph Smith was sprung of no ordinary type of mother. In her veins flowed the rich blood of the revolutionary period. She held liberty and freedom in the glorified light of one who appreciates the price paid. She was warmhearted, impulsive, independent in thought and action, flashing with wit, and possessing deep spiritual insight. Lucy Mack stands out as a peculiarly suitable wife for the ecclesiastical father of a people driven and persecuted, but numbering thousands, and she proved herself a matchless and worthy mother of a leader of men; that son, born amid the snowy hills of Sharon, Windsor County, Vermont, on the 23d of December, 1805. That notable decade gave to the world such poets, statesmen, and leaders as Beaconsfield, Longfellow, Whittier, Poe, Gladstone, Kossuth, Victor Hugo, Hawthorne, Lincoln, Seward, Emerson, Holmes, Greeley, Theodore Parker, Sumner, Garrison, Agassiz, and Carlyle, and still a longer list and longer as we turn the pages of history that have wreathed their names with laurel, but the living believers of Joseph Smith have tempered their warmest appreciation with a studied care and the apparent belief, voiced by one who knew him better than any man on earth, "He was but a man except when the power of God was upon him."

"Poor indeed is that prophet who can boast of but one birthplace." Then was our prophet poor, for the humble cottage in the low New England hills has never been questioned of this simple honor. After all, what matter where a man be born so much as to how he is born and to what.

If ever man had right to be well born it was this one. The weight of a great organization was to fall upon his youthful spirit. The carefree joys of youth were short lived.

Begotten in love and cradled in poverty that "band that holds men stanch," he early found need for the magnificent and enduring qualities of both parents, and interwoven with his inherited nature were the very elements of a new time that must meet a new demand. Just as the coterie of brilliant minds that had accompanied his spirit were developing their extraordinary endowments to meet these changing times, all tending to the breaking of shackle for freedom of men. With little tutoring of school, but much wholesome and godly training in his home, he learned to revere and trust the divinity that shapes our ends. The rigorous New England home training of both parents brought about a system of obedience and law in his home.

He was not a freak of docile nonentity, nor a demon of wickedness. A healthy, happy, normal boy, his pleasures were those of his brothers, his companions, his own family of brothers, sisters, and the few neighbors. Life's playtime for him was short, for he early took his place as one of the bread-winners of the family in a cheerful, earnest, honest way. He was fond of animals, and with most boys of those early times was no doubt a "good shot," and accustomed to healthy outdoor games.

His mother claims that "no very remarkable incidents attended his childhood." She tells that he, her fourth child and third son, was a remarkably quiet, well-disposed child. However, her mother heart could not treasure from us the story of that agonizing surgical operation in which the diseased portion of bone was removed from the child's leg. There was no relief then by anæsthetics, and the only thing used to help at such times was wine or brandy. This the boy refused to take, nor would he be bound upon the bed. "I will tell you what I will do—I will have my father sit on the bed and hold me in his arms, and then I will do whatever is necessary in order to have the bone taken out." Fancy the trust of that boy, then listen: "Now, mother, promise me that you will not stay—will you? The Lord will help me and I will get through with it."

So lying on his father's arms, looking up into his dear, sympathetic face, he bore that torture, as they took out those pieces of bone. Soon after he was able to go with his uncle, Jesse Smith, to Salem, and there in the strengthening sea breeze he became strong and healthy again.

There are those who love this story of a boy so true to his convictions that he would not yield even to save himself, even in any degree this bodily torture. It was curious, too, that once during that operation when his mother burst into the room, he cried: "Oh, mother, go back, go back. I do not want you to come in. I will try to tough it out if you will go away." Thinking even in such agony of her good and trying to shield her. He knew how worn she was, for she had carried him until her strength gave way.

Surrounded with an atmosphere of trust in God, and busy with the practical things of life he grew into that period of questioning, mysterious boy life, that sometimes without warning suddenly dips into the deep channels and long purposes of manhood.

Grasping with boyish hands the rudder, Joseph

Smith turned his lifeboat into the swift current and the care free season of boyhood ended when he was but yet fifteen. Henceforth he carried a burden of altruistic responsibility and occupied a position fraught with danger and temptation.

JOSEPH SMITH THE PATRIARCH.

In connection with the foregoing article by Vida E. Smith we herewith reproduce an article that was at one time published in the Journal of History, and later in the editorial department of the SAINTS' HERALD, April 8, 1908. Those who have read it may pass it by; those who have not read it may find it of interest in connection with the subject in hand.—EDITORS.

In Book of Mormon history the greatness of the Prophet Lehi is somewhat overshadowed by the greatness of his son, Nephi. In like manner the student of men and events connected with the latter-day restoration finds that Joseph the Patriarch was great, only the luster of his work is somewhat dimmed by comparison with that of his son, Joseph the Prophet. Yet he justly claims our attention. He did a considerable work in connection with the restoration of the gospel. He was an inspired man to whom God revealed certain things concerning the coming forth of the work, while his son Joseph was yet a little child. As regards his official position, he was the first patriarch of the church; as regards his personal character, his leading traits were honesty, simplicity, steadfastness, faith, and spirituality.

He possessed one characteristic in common with the early pioneers that surrounded him: the disposition to launch out into new enterprises. In the Old World a man inherited his trade or profession from his father and worked at it during life. In the New World the yoke was thrown off; opportunity knocked at the door every morning, and men decided before breakfast what new venture to embark upon. So the subject of our sketch was by turns a farmer, a merchant, and a school-teacher, and in the declining years of his life he became a preacher, the first of at least four generations of preachers, and traveled thousands of miles, converting and baptizing many people.

Evidently he entered upon his true calling late in life, as he was a very spiritual man, calculated to succeed as a minister and to fail as a financier. In 1802 he rented his farm and engaged in mercantile business. He ventured about all he had in one enterprise, in the exporting business, and the venture resulted well for others but illy for him, as he was swindled out of all that he had invested. He failed and went out of business, but not with full pockets, as some have done before and since his time. He sold his farm and drew the savings of years from the bank and settled his debts in full. This trait of honesty is further illustrated by an incident which occurred just prior to his removal to Palmyra. He had been farming in the State of Vermont and crops had failed for three years in succession, resulting in hardship that amounted almost to famine. It was decided to move to the State of New York, but before leaving, Mr. Smith called his creditors and his debtors together and made a satisfactory settlement with them all. Afterward when some of the creditors made complaint they were paid again the second time, in cash. The family kept clear of lawsuits and litigation of all kinds; never becoming involved in anything of the kind until years later when Martin Harris' wife sued their son Joseph, charging him with extorting money from Mr. Harris; on which occasion Mr. Harris testified that the charge was false, and the case was dismissed.

The subject of our sketch may be termed the first convert of the Latter Day Saint Church; at least he was the first to hear and accept the testimony of his son regarding the angel's message. His simple and childlike faith is shown in his ready acceptance of the message, and his steadfastness of character is shown by the fact that he never wavered during all the severe hardships and perils of the years of persecution that followed. His ready acceptance might subject him to the charge of credulity, were it not that he had himself received divine instructions that prepared him for the events connected with his son's ministry. This shows us something of the spiritual nature of the man. The first of these revelations (see Lucy Smith's History, p. 57,) was given during a night vision, the exact date of which is not a matter of record (probably about the year 1811). It appeared to him that he was traveling through an open, barren field, covered as far as he could see with dead, fallen timber. A death-like silence prevailed, and no vestige of life was to be observed. He was alone in that gloomy place, with the exception of an attendant spirit that kept close to his side. This spirit told him, "This field is the world, which now lieth inanimate and dumb, in regard to the true religion, or plan of salvation; but travel on, and by the wayside you will find on a certain log a box, the contents of which, if you eat thereof, will make you wise, and give unto you wisdom and understanding." In this vision he traveled on and found the box. When he ate of its contents he was made perfectly happy, but immediately there rose out of the ground all manner of beasts, horned cattle, and roaring animals that surrounded him and compelled him to fly for his life, typifying, no doubt, the intense persecution that awaited him.

Just a little later he received another vision which bears a resemblance to one that was granted to the Prophet Lehi. This is recorded in Lucy Smith's History, page 58. At first the same barren wilderness presents itself, but presently there is a change and we quote a part of his description of the scene, as follows:

"Traveling a short distance further, I came to a narrow path. This path I entered, and, when I had traveled a little way in it, I beheld a beautiful stream of water, which ran from the east to the west. Of this stream I could see neither the source nor the termination; but as far as my eyes could extend I could see a rope, running along the bank of it, about as high as a man could reach, and beyond me, was a low, but very pleasant valley, in which stood a tree, such as I had never seen before. It was exceedingly handsome, inasmuch that I looked upon it with wonder and admiration. Its beautiful branches spread themselves somewhat like an umbrella, and it bore a kind of fruit, in shape much like a chestnut bur, and as white as snow, or, if possible, whiter. I gazed upon the same with considerable interest, and as I was doing so, the burs or shells commenced opening and shedding their particles, or the fruit which they contained, which was of dazzling whiteness. I drew near, and began to eat of it, and I found it delicious beyond description. As I was eating, I said in my heart, 'I can not eat this alone, I must bring my wife and children, that they may partake with me.' Accordingly, I went and brought my family, which consisted of a wife and seven children, and we all commenced eating, and praising God for this blessing. We were exceedingly happy, inasmuch that our joy could not easily be expressed. While thus engaged, I beheld a spacious building standing opposite the valley which we were in, and it appeared to reach to the very heavens. It was full of doors and windows, and they were all filled with people, who were very finely dressed. When these people observed us in the low valley, under the tree, they pointed the finger of scorn at us, and treated us with all manner of disrespect and contempt. But their contumely we utterly disregarded."

What is termed his seventh and last vision was received in 1819, on the eve of the beginning of the restoration. It is recorded on page 74 of the history before mentioned. In this vision a man bearing a peddler's pack approached him and their conversation is recorded as follows: "'Sir, will you trade with me to-day?' I have now called upon you seven times, I have traded with you each time, and have always found you strictly honest in all your dealings. Your measures are always heaped, and your weights overbalanced; and I have now come to tell you that this is the last time I shall ever call on you, and that there is but one thing which you lack, in order to secure your salvation.' As I earnestly desired to know what it was that I still lacked, I requested him to write the same upon paper. He said he would do so. I then sprang to get some paper, but, in my excitement, I awoke."

It was reserved for his son Joseph to receive in writing the plan of salvation.

Physically, Joseph Smith, the Patriarch, was very strong. He stood six feet and two inches in height and weighed two hundred pounds. As a young man he was noted as a wrestler.

Our paper deals with his character, but a brief outline of his life may be given. He was born in Topsfield, Essex County, Massachusetts, July 12, 1771. He married Lucy Mack, January 24, 1796. Ten children were born of them. Following the organization of the church, he moved to Kirtland, Ohio, in 1831, where he was ordained patriarch, and president of the high priesthood, December 18, 1833. In 1838 he moved to Far West, Missouri. Following the extermination order of Governor Boggs, he escaped to Quincy, Illinois; and in 1839 he arrived in Commerce, afterward known as Nauvoo, Illinois. He died September 14, 1840.

Elder R. B. Thompson, who preached his funeral sermon, said, "A prince and a great man has fallen in Israel; a man endeared to us by every feeling calculated to entwine around and adhere to the human heart by almost indissoluble bonds; a man faithful to his God and to the church in every situation, and under all circumstances through which he was called to pass."

Of him another wrote:

"Zion's children loved him dearly;
 Zion was his daily care;
 That his loss is felt sincerely,
 Thousand weeping Saints declare;
 Thousands, who have shared his blessing,
 Thousands whom his service blessed,
 By his faith and prayers suppressing Evils which their lives oppress.

"Faith and works, most sweetly blended,
 Proved his steadfast heart sincere;
 And the power of God attended
 His official labors here;
 Long he stemmed the powers of darkness,
 Like an anchor in the flood:
 Like an oak amid the tempest,
 Bold and fearlessly he stood."

LEAVES FROM LIFE.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF ELDER D. R. BALDWIN.—NO.2.

THE ARKANSAW TRAVELER.

I traded some of our furniture for a good team and loaded the rest onto a car and on Sunday, December 1, 1894, we landed in Ravenden Springs, Arkansas, with thirty cents in my pocket and a debt of one hundred dollars on my shoulders. The soil was thin, the face of the country mountainous and rocky; the ways of the people different than we had ever met. A great lack of enterprise astonished us. The next Sunday I preached two sermons, and but few Sundays were allowed to pass when I was not at my post of duty.

My sons who had been raised on the fertile prairies could not see how a living could be made among the rocks, and but for their strong filial love, they would have gone to other climes. Family councils were of frequent occurrence in those days, so it was that I counseled as follows: We have been "hunting the long horned cow" for many days and in many places, and now we have struck the most God-forsaken country I ever saw; it is seventy-five years behind the times; but we are here for some purpose, and we are here to stay until some changes of importance are brought about, for we can not get away at present. We can not afford to be blue. We are not going to get discouraged; we will just roll up our sleeves, look at the bright side of things, and whistle while we work. The harder the job the greater the achievement when it is completed.* So we cleared the deadened timber from the ground and set out about three thousand fruit trees. Succeeding seasons were hot and dry. Crops at times were a total failure. I managed to get a pair of stirrups and one rainy time I made a saddle; for straps and girths I used material from a grain sack, covered it with a goatskin and the Sunday seldom passed that I did not do my best to tell the story of the restoration. Some of the time I preached sixteen miles from home.

The Martin's Creek Branch was organized in the fall of 1896 and for thirteen years, with the exception of one year, it has fallen to my lot to preside. The worst of all propositions that confronted us was our poor school system, and the first six years we were here, disease swept away about sixteen head of our stock.

It would be a gross neglect of duty not to mention at this juncture the loving devotion of our sons who rallied so vigorously to our rescue, and carried us through the dark days. David's net earnings at his trade were first tithed, then every dollar above his actual necessities was sent home. He could make no other use of his money that afforded him half so much satisfaction. This he continued for years after he was of age, amounting to hundreds of dollars. Eber worked in the timber the first winter for twenty bushels of corn per month; this fed our team. After that he brought home horses and saddles and money, and we are still the recipients of his favors in various ways. J. N., after starting in the world for himself, sent home a mule and a new wagon.

This represents only a part of the self-sacrificing devotion of these sons. It created within us a profound love and respect so richly deserved. They enabled us to liquidate our debts with interest, and when I came from under the bondage of debt that for so long had been haunting me like a nightmare, I straightened up, drew a free breath and felt twenty-five years younger.

Let me touch this note once more. The reckless manner in which I had treated the contract made with God caused him to withhold his blessings from me along the financial line. I view it as an unpardonable sin, for I do not believe that one farthing was ever acquitted, remitted, excused, absolved, forgiven, or pardoned; but I had to grind out the uttermost mill. I was ashamed to ask God for financial favors, yet I dare not do otherwise. Thank heaven, it is passed.

The second summer that we were in Arkansas, our son, J. N., got his toe poisoned by some means. I thought it was dew poison, for his shoes were badly out at the toes; but it hurt him so badly that he went to the house and took his bed. In a short time he sent for me to administer to him. I found him in great misery; his foot and leg badly swollen and spotted. While praying I poured some oil on his toe, and putting my hands on him I prayed again. He heaved a great sigh of relief, turned over and went to sleep. The swelling disappeared and in a little while he resumed his work.

MY STUDIES IN BIOLOGY.

I commenced the study of the science of life in Lincoln, Nebraska, and for ten years my spare moments were patiently and prayerfully spent trying to acquaint myself with myself. The great question was, What is Man? Finding nothing in the public library, I sent for sample copies of many magazines, selecting the best. I contributed short articles and poems, in which way I secured yearly subscriptions to nearly all that I cared to read. I also exchanged literature with many correspondents. So I found myself surrounded with stacks of papers from the choicest talent of the land, all without money. The deeper I dug, the more intense grew my interest; for every fact developed fortified my faith in the gospel, for they were integral parts of it. "All truth" was our great motto.

The original cause and to trace my way from thence to the various occult effects, was my study. I now regard those years of study as the most profitable of my life. I learned that man is a triune being, "spirit, soul, and body." I learned that the spirit of man is an intelligent entity, and that it has charge (under God) of the reflex and involuntary actions of the body. I learned that the soul, or conscious mind, or "understanding" (1 Corinthians 14:14), is that superior intelligence brought into existence by a union of spirit with the human body. I learned that by obedience to the gospel we may bring our spirits under the control of our souls, or under the power of intelligence; so that "the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets." I learned that our spirits get acquainted with spiritual things through the sense of perception, just as our souls do with physical things through the five senses. Therefore, the only way our souls acquaint themselves with spiritual things is by being in touch with their partners, our spirits. I learned, therefore, that the development of perception, or the sixth sense, is simply a cooperation between the spirit and soul of man; that if the spirit and soul are not on speaking terms that person is shut out from the presence of God. I learned that love is a copartner with life and that hatred and death are confederates. I believed some of these facts before, but my research and experience demonstrated them to my understanding. The following poem was suggested as a result of my studies:

WHY NOT THE SPIRITS OF MORTALS BE PROUD?

Why not the spirits of mortals be proud?
 Made for the glory of God.
 Made to sing anthems of God's praise aloud,
 Made for the glory of God.
 Made in the image of the God of love,
 Made not for beneath, but made for above,
 Made not to crawl, but to soar like the dove,
 Made for the glory of God.

Made firm and steadfast, courageous and bold,
 Made for the service of God.
 Made to be stirred up like Cyrus of old,
 Made for the service of God.
 When hunger and want and poverty pinch,
 Tempted with bribery, yield never an inch,
 In the presence of death never to flinch,
 Made for the service of God.

Why not be proud that we're made sound and sane?
 Made in the image of God.
 Not with haughty, arrogant, scornful disdain,
 But in the image of God.
 Not to be faltering or flinching or faint,
 But valiant and brave, as becometh a saint,
 That love of money or lust can not taint,
 Made in the image of God.

Why not the spirits of mortals be proud?
 The crowning work of God's Son.
 To be clothed with light and not with a shroud,
 The crowning work of God's Son.
 Given dominion o'er sea and o'er land,
 Made with Jehovah's bright angels to stand,
 The crowning work of God's Son.

Why not the spirits of mortals be proud?
 Made to be perfect as God.
 Made to do good with the heavenly crowd,
 Made to be perfect as God.
 Made to be equal with God's own Son,
 Made with the Father and Christ to be one,
 'nat their will on earth as in heaven be done,
 All to be perfect as God.

For a time I turned my attention with much success to the treatment of disease. My methods varied according to the circumstances. Hydropathy, electro-magnetic treatment, osteopathy, and in cases of mental hallucination, acute neuralgia, and severe burns, I resorted to hypnotic suggestion; hygiene and deep breathing were paramount as a finishing touch. I have quite an array of testimonials setting forth the facts of remarkable, speedy, and permanent cures as the result of my work.

I did not find it easy to quit this occupation; the importunities of suffering ones were hard to turn down, but for several reasons it did not suit me to continue. I knew that I was called to preach the gospel, and the change came about in the latter part of the year 1901. My son David offered to furnish my family twenty dollars per month if the Bishop would credit it as tithing and I be appointed a mission by the church. This matter was laid before President Joseph Smith, and on December 19 he wrote me that he had conferred with the Bishop on his return from Europe, also with the missionary in charge of Arkansas, and I was appointed a mission in my home State.

After about one year, our son met with reverses which so crippled him financially that he could not supply the family longer. As soon as Bishop Kelley learned of this he instructed me to stay with my work and supplied the needed family allowance.

On January 7, 1902, by the solicitation of Heman C. Smith, I accepted the appointment of local historian for Northeastern Texas and Choctaw Nation, also that part of Arkansas not included in the Spring River District. At the April conference of 1906 I was appointed Bishop's agent for all unorganized territory in Southern Missouri and Arkansas, and was ordained a counselor to the president of the Fourth Quorum of Elders, at Independence, Missouri, on April 18, 1906, by Apostles Griffiths, Greene, and Kelley.

This day I have come high up into the mountains to be a little while with the Lord. Save for the occasional lonely "hoo-hoo" of the owl and the distant notes of the hunter's horn, silence reigns. As I gaze down hundreds of feet onto the tops of the towering pines which stand in the yawning chasm beneath the jagged rocks, where I am writing, I am strongly impressed that somewhere and in some way in this wild and weird scenery is depicted the counterpart of my checkered life. Oh, that the veil could be lifted! that we could see ourselves since Eden; we could understand our conditions better; we might then know what influences in the past have wrought that some are born with natural qualifications to fill lofty and honored positions, while others sift to their natural level in out-of-the-way, semicivilized regions. Age after age, century after century, these giant rocks have stood as silent witnesses of some frightful tragedy that split this mountain; it was as a little spark by the side of all the fires of earth when compared to the awful calamity that separated man from his Maker, and made all this work necessary to again elevate him.

When the history of the work in Northeastern Arkansas, which is now in manuscript, is published, the reader may find a more detailed account of some of the stirring events that I will only briefly mention here. It was in September, 1897, that I arranged with Elder Joseph Ward to help me in a meeting at Kingsville when Rev. W. D. Ellis, a Methodist circuit rider, made his vicious attack by securing many names to a hateful protest; by closing the house without authority; by circulating false reports; and by writing a threatening letter to Elder Ward. When all these failed and we begun our meeting as per appointment, he tried to kill me with a long knife. He succeeded in breaking up the meeting, but in doing so he brought a curse upon the town that it will never outgrow; loss of property, death and separation have broken up the families of nearly all of the Protestants.

On the 1st day of October, 1898, I rode sixteen miles to Sugar Creek and administered to Sr. Hannah E. Davis, whose eyes were swollen shut. Her eyes were healed; they came open while my hands were on her head. The same night the Lord also made her whole from a long standing case of dropsy of the heart by another application of my hands and by prayer.

Elders' Note-Book

THE PROPER COURSE IN THE PREPARATION OF SERMONS.

SHALL WE DECIDE ON THE SUBJECT BEFORE ENTERING THE PULPIT? SHALL WE USE NOTES?

Paul says to Timothy, "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth"; and I know of no better text for me to use in the preparation of this paper, and I know of no better advice on the question of the "proper course in the preparation of sermons."

Many of us—I might say the majority of us—are handicapped in our work because of a lack of education. True to himself and his work in the past, "God has chosen the weak things of the world to confound the mighty, and base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen," and, as it was in olden times, "Ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called."

But in spite of the fact that we are from the lowly walks of life and have not had the advantage of a college training, it can not be said of us that we are below the average in intellect, and hence we are capable of improvement. Indeed, I do not think that we will honor our calling and make ourselves workmen that need not be ashamed if we do not improve, neither do I believe that we will be approved of God.

In the instruction of Paul to Timothy I find the word study. In instruction given to Hyrum Smith in Doctrine and Covenants 10: 10, we find these words:

Behold, this is your work, to keep my commandments; yea with all your might, mind, and strength; seek not to declare my word, but first seek to obtain my word, and then shall your tongue be loosed; then, if you desire, you shall have my Spirit, and my word; yea the power of God unto the convincing of men; but now hold your peace; study my word which hath gone forth among the children of men, and also study my word which shall come forth among the children of men, or that which is now translating.

And in the instructions given in regard to the organization of the School of the Prophets, as given in section 85: 21, I find the following:

And I give unto you a commandment, that you shall teach one another the doctrine of the kingdom; teach ye diligently and my grace shall attend you, that ye may be instructed more perfectly in theory, in principle, in doctrine, in the law of the gospel, in all things that pertain unto the kingdom of God, that is expedient for you to understand; of things both in heaven, and in earth, and under the earth; things which have been; things which are; things which must shortly come to pass; things which are at home; things which are abroad; the wars and the perplexities of the nations; and the judgments which are on the land; and a knowledge also of countries, and of kingdoms, that ye may be prepared in all things when I shall send you again, to magnify the calling whereunto I have called you, and the mission with which I have commissioned you.

The fulfilling of this command will surely give us all the scope that we wish for study, but the Lord does not stop with this, but in section 87:5 we find the following: "Study and learn, and become acquainted with all good books, and with languages, tongues, and people." We are not to study the sacred books of the church, and become acquainted with them alone, but we are enjoined here to study "all good books." This certainly should give us all the scope we want, and should satisfy the most ambitious one among us. It is also obvious to all that God is not pleased to have us remain in ignorance, but that he desires us to store our minds with knowledge so that he may use us in the accomplishment of his purposes. I am not a believer in the thought that all we have to do is to open our mouths and that God will fill them. I am a believer in the thoughts presented at one time by Henry Ward Beecher in an address to some theological students. He said:

No man can speak well, the substance of whose sermons has not been prepared beforehand. Men talk of "extemporaneous preaching," but the only part that can properly be extemporaneous is the external form. Sometimes, indeed, one may be called to preach offhand, ex tempore, and may do it with great success; but all such sermons will be the result of previous study. The matter must be the outgrowth of research, of experience, and of thought. Most preachers have intuitional moments, are, so to speak, at times inspired; but such moments are not usual, and no true inspiration is based upon ignorance.

No man can speak well except out of an abundance of well wrought material. Some sermons seem to start up suddenly, soul and body, but in fact they are the product of years of experience. Sermons may flash upon men who are called in great emergencies to utter testimony, and the word may grow in their hand, and, their hearts kindling, their imaginations taking fire, the product may be something that will create wonder and amazement among all that hear. It is only the form, like the occasion, that is extemporaneous. "No man preaches except out of the stores that have been gathered in him."

With us the inspirational moments are the rule, perhaps, instead of the exception; but inspiration must have something to work with. I am no more a believer in the thought that God does it all in this matter than I am in other things. I might just as well expect a crop of corn, or wheat, or other grains, or produce, when I had done nothing towards preparing the ground, planting the seed, and cultivating the growing crops, as to expect results from a mind that I had made no effort to improve, and store with knowledge and wisdom. I believe, however, that there are times, when emergencies arise, that God uses men by inspiring them beyond their capacity, and by presenting to them through the Holy Spirit great principles and thoughts to which they have previously been strangers, but these times are rare, and God does it that he may save his work from defeat, but these are simply the exceptions, and not the rule by which God works, and because he does this once, or twice, we need not conclude that he will always do it, and lay back on our oars and depend on him to fill our minds as well as to give us utterance; for if we do we will find that we will come under God's disapproval, and we will not only suffer humiliation ourselves, but we will bring loss to the cause we love.

It might be pertinent to ask right here, What books shall we read? and the answer would be, "Read all good books." But what does that phrase good books mean? The books that will enable you to fulfill the requirements of the revelation to "be instructed more perfectly in theory, in principle, in doctrine, in the law of the gospel, in all things that pertain unto the kingdom of God, that is expedient for you to understand," would no doubt be the sacred books of the church, the Bible, Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants; but when the remainder of the injunction, to be instructed of things both in heaven, and in earth, and under the earth; things which have been; things which are; . . . things which are at home; things which are abroad; the wars and the perplexities of nations; and the judgments which are on the land; and a knowledge also of countries, and of kingdoms, is carried out it would demand a wide range of reading in all the sciences and histories, the study of political matters, and books on social conditions, and anything that would give us a better understanding of conditions and measures with which the gospel must compete in the redemption of man from present evils, social, political, moral, or spiritual.

Does fiction come under the head of "good books"? This is a question that is frequently asked, and variously answered. I can only answer it for you as I have answered it for myself. There are a great many books that come under the title of "fiction" that are "good" in more ways than one, in my estimation, and I have benefited by reading them. In fact, I find more real inspiration in some "fiction" than I do in many of the books that are put out by the so-called religious press. I really believe that the religious thought of the age is being to some extent molded for good by some of the writers of fiction. I will not have time or space to refer you to many, but just a few: Donovan, and We Two, by Edna Lyall. One is a sequel to the other. In both the same characters appear, and in both a conversion is made from the ranks of the infidels, and the conversion is brought about by an appeal to the reasoning faculties, and the teaching of those higher thoughts of practical Christianity that can not be resisted by the thoughtful and intelligent. Even in Robert Elsmere, a book that the religious world thought would overthrow the faith of thousands, and which was the subject of many sermons from the pulpit, and comments from the press, I found inspirational thoughts. The author does all she can to show that Christ was not divine from the standpoint of immaculate conception; that he was a mere man, and she succeeds in overthrowing the faith of her hero in this doctrine; but she finds work for him in the slums of London, and in lifting up the lowly, and when he is finally brought face to face with the fact that he must have an organization in order to carry out his work of reformation of character, and in casting about for a name for that organization, he can find nothing better than to call it the "Brotherhood of Christ." This I considered an unconscious admission that Christ was the highest ideal of a perfect being that could be conceived, and that his example was the only safe example to follow, his character the only character that could be safely imitated. In this admission I saw a strong argument for the divinity of Christ that the author had spent much time in trying to prove was not true. If Christ was not divine, then why can not we find in all history his equal? If he was a mere man, how is it that he stands so far above all other men, that he is called the "Matchless Man," by friend and foe? The simple fact that the hero of the novel could find no other name to call the society, of which he was founder, than to call it the "Brotherhood of Christ," was a sufficient refutation of the arguments previously made against his divinity, as I looked at it.

In The Man from Glengary, by Ralph Connor, I find the doctrine of eternal punishment brought out in such a way that it can not help but provoke thought, and the thought, too, that it can not be true. The Sunday school lesson is being studied, and the punishment of the wicked is under discussion, and the question is asked if there will be any time when the Lord will let them out, and a tender hearted little boy spoke up and bursting into tears said, "Oh, I do hope he will let them out." Such scenes as these are bound to set one thinking, and the inevitable thought will be that God is merciful and long-suffering, and that his punishment will not be one of vengeance, but corrective in its nature, and if he is true to his nature as a loving Father, he will let them out when they have sufficiently suffered to answer his corrective purposes.

In the matter of reading fiction, however, every one should be governed by his circumstances, but to me have come some exceptionally fine thoughts through this kind of reading. It has also helped me in another way. Sometimes one meets, on the train and other places, those who do not care to talk about religion at first and it is nice to be able to talk about the latest book or novel, and by doing so with those who are especially interested in such things, one may be able finally to lead up to other things. It is well to be able to talk on many subjects, and I think that is one of the ways one acquires that knowledge of "things both in heaven, and in the earth, and under the earth."

Storing our minds with useful thoughts is the first great requisite to preaching useful sermons, but we should not neglect the matter of our manner and method of presenting the thoughts that we have acquired by study and research. In my opinion this phase of the subject has been too much neglected in the past. In one of the quotations we have made from the Doctrine and Covenants we are told that we should "become acquainted with languages, tongues, and people," and in following out this injunction I think that it would be well for us to first become acquainted with our own language. In doing this it is not necessary that we learn to use big words. The use of big words is not a mark of an educated man. Most anyone who has a dictionary can soon acquire a vocabulary of big words, and can through that means show off; but the best mark of an educated man is the ability to present a big subject in simple words that all can understand. There are various ways of acquiring a suitable vocabulary. One may acquire it by one's surroundings, that is, by mingling with people who use good language, or he may acquire it by the reading of those books which are written in the best language. One of the authors that I always have at hand makes this statement in regard to the necessity for one to use good language, and the manner of acquiring it: He thinks that our instincts are the best guide to some of the finer distinctions in the use of words, but, he says,

Unfortunately many of us have been brought up in surroundings unfavorable to purity of language. Our instincts remain undeveloped if indeed they are not grossly perverted. We have not learned what delicacy of expression is. Some method of studying words is therefore important; but we will do far better if we seek to add knowledge of the differences and shades of meaning, and variety of expression, rather than to suppress our errors. Fill the mind with richness and error will inevitably be crowded out.

The first thing for us to do is to train ourselves on those fine distinctions in the values of words which cultivated people make but common people miss; and then we may learn some of the points in which the usages of cultivated society differ from the usages of the average world, so that we may speak in such a way that cultivated society will listen to us and the influence of our words may be felt. In a speech to a cultivated audience one serious solecism or misuse of a word would entirely spoil the effect of what was said, since the audience would be so taken up with laughing at us.—Sherwin Cody's Dictionary of Errors, pp. 82, 83.

Another has given the rule for writing and I think that it is a good one for the speaker as well. It is as follows:

To choose the right word and to discard all others, this is the chief factor in good writing. To learn good poetry by heart is to acquire help toward doing this, instinctively, automatically as other habits are acquired. In the affairs of life, then, is no form of good manners, no habit of usage more valuable than the habit of good English.—D. S. Jordan.

I did not have the advantage of a good education, and I am especially deficient in grammar, but I have formed the habit of reading everything critically, and no matter how interested I may be in a narrative of any kind, if I come to a sentence that does not sound right to me I stop and go back over it, and try and find the subject, and, so far as I am able with my limited knowledge of grammar, I analyze it and see wherein the mistake occurs, if it is a mistake, and reconstruct the sentence in different ways to see if I can not get it better to my liking; but in this I have largely to depend on my "instinct," as Mr. Cody says, and this "instinct" has been cultivated solely by observation and the reading of books.

We may not be able to read all good books, but we can see to it that all the books we read are good ones. Good books are of various kinds. One book may give us great ideas, and another one may give us language without the ideas, but as a rule you will find good language and good ideas associated. However, should I find a book that taught me language alone, I should not think that my time had been entirely wasted if I read it, but I would not recommend the reading of a vicious book just for the language it might contain, or teach, for there are plenty of "good books" that contain both language and sentiment, and one does not need to read anything that is bad morally to cultivate language.

Early in my ministerial career I formed another habit that has helped me very materially. I always had a pencil and paper handy when I heard others speak, and if they used a word or constructed a sentence in a way that was different from what I thought it ought to be, I would jot it down and at the first opportunity I would consult an authority and learn whether I was right or the other fellow. In this way I was able to correct many errors, and once or twice I have been in trouble when I happened to criticise the other fellow, but one should not make himself obnoxious in this regard. I think it would be a fine thing if two, traveling together, would form the habit of criticising each other in a friendly way, and if they could do it without heat, and with a willingness to admit that it is possible that one may be wrong, which is hard for some of us to do, much good might result from it. However, there are few of us who possess the happy faculty of correcting our fellow laborers, and making them feel that we are doing it for their good, and there are fewer of us who can take a correction with grace, and hence much forbearance would be necessary if we made this a rule, but if we could it would result in much good, and it might be an excellent training in forbearance, as well.

I suppose, however, that the principal difficulty that is encountered is in the thought involved in the other question in the subject that has been assigned me, namely, "Shall we decide on the subject before we enter the pulpit?" To this I would answer, Yes, and no. That is, sometimes I should decide on the subject before entering the pulpit, and sometimes I should not do so. I would be governed entirely by the circumstances and conditions surrounding me at the time. But, it is probable that the one who propounded this question would like to know whether, in my opinion, we should ever at any time decide on the subject before entering the pulpit. To this question I can only reply as I have answered the question for myself. I think in the majority of cases we should decide on the subject beforehand, and make preparation for it as far as we can. Occasionally I have gone into the pulpit with my mind perfectly blank as to the subject that I was going to present, and under those conditions I have done some of the best work of my life, but as a rule this has been when I have been called upon to preach a sermon here and there, that is, just one sermon in a place; but what I call the very best work that I ever did, has been done when I have advertised my subjects sometimes weeks ahead. I find it almost a necessity to do this in the cities, if I expect to gain a hearing. My advertisements must appear with others in the daily papers, and the subjects announced beforehand.

In the direction given by Paul to Timothy it is said we must "rightly divide the word of truth," and some have thought that to do this we must wait until we are before the audience before we can tell what that audience needs, but this is not necessarily true. I do not see why God could not know for weeks ahead, if necessary, what the audience would need and assist us to prepare for their instruction.

There are a number of ways in which a man is influenced to decide as to what his subject will be, and which enables him to prepare accordingly. The man who mingles with the people and hears questions discussed at the fireside, on the streets, and in the places of business, is often able to select his subject with a view of rightly dividing the word of truth, and is able to prepare himself beforehand for his work, and by so doing he becomes a much more efficient laborer for God, than he will if he always depends on the inspiration of the moment. I do not believe that one should always depend on God for everything, but should try and help himself as far as he can, and should try and find out for himself the temper and desires of the people. There is a double purpose in this. First, by mingling with the people you make them feel that you are taking an interest in their welfare, and they are very much more inclined to come and hear you, and then you are better prepared to meet their individual needs than you otherwise could be. After the sermon has been preached for which they have wished, you have the chance of again coming in contact with them in their homes, and if there is still a lingering doubt in their minds you may be able to dispel it by a heart to heart talk, and happy is the man whose natural instincts lead him in this way. God wants us to do all we can and when human wisdom and ingenuity fail he will come to the rescue if we trust him, but in the ministry, as in everything else, "God helps those who help themselves."

Shall we use notes? Well, yes, but I would not use them to the extent that you would become so used to them that you could not speak without them. If your memory is poor it might be well to help it out with notes, but you should not entirely depend upon them. You might use them in the first presentation of a subject, and then gradually discard them as you become more and more familiar with it. And if you do use notes my advice is that you prepare fresh ones at each presentation of the subject, for by so doing you would not be so likely to become stereotyped in your work, and grow into the same old rut year by year in the preaching of the word. Presenting the same subjects year after year becomes rather monotonous work unless one varies the method and matter from time to time. If one is enjoying the Spirit of God as he should do, each time he speaks he will receive new light on the subject, and the next time he handles the same subject he will be able to enlarge upon it until it becomes almost limitless in its possibilities. But if he confines himself to the same old notes all the time he is likely to become more of a machine than a thinking man, and when one has heard him once they do not care to hear him again on the same subject, or at the most not more than twice. That is one reason that I never cared to speak from charts. I believe that they are a good thing to impress truths upon an audience, but as a rule they are a bad thing for the speaker. I have often wished, however, that I was a good blackboard worker, for on a blackboard one may vary the form of treating a subject, but with a chart it is not so easy, although one may do so.

Anything that will make me a more efficient worker for the Master I am sure he will approve, and I believe that the habit of writing out notes will do this, even though I might not use those notes. The writing of them makes me more systematic in my thinking, and taking up subjects in a systematic way makes their presentation more effectual for good. I seldom make notes, and seldom use them when I do, but I have often wished that I had done so for several reasons. One of those reasons is that if I had become accustomed to the use of notes it would have helped me in debating, for the reason that in debating one is obliged to use them, and if you are not accustomed to them they confuse almost as much as they help.

After we have done all we can we are then confronted with the fact that we can not get along without God, and his Spirit will be your main help in all of your efforts. You should depend on his Spirit not only while you are presenting the word, but in the preparation of the sermon as well. If, in the quiet of your room, you can have the approval of the Spirit in the building of the sermon in your mind, it will bring to you such an assurance of the truthfulness of your message that you can deliver the same with power and effect. But if you go at the preparation of the sermon, if you prepare at all, with half-heartedness and uncertainty as to its truthfulness or the soundness of your position, you fail to reach your audience, and fail to impress them with the thought that your message is true, and impress them with the thought that you are not sure yourself that you are right. I have often thought that Christ's power, when he was able to cause the people to see that "he spoke as one having authority, and not as the scribes," consisted in the assurance that he was right. "Seek learning by study and also by faith," is one of the commands of this latter day, and hence I believe that God will help us in our efforts to learn if we ask him in faith, and your success will depend entirely upon the fact of your keeping humble and faithful, but withal studious and diligent in the use of every means at your hands to help yourself, and I believe that God and the Master rejoice over the servant who tries to make himself a "workman approved unto God, that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."

If we are not humble, let us humble ourselves; if we are humble, let us humble ourselves more; if we are unlearned, let us learn; if we do not understand the language and its uses as we ought to in order to properly, and without shame, present the truth, let us study this branch of learning; then with God's Spirit to help us we will become mighty factors in the work of God and he will delight to use us as instruments in the forwarding of his cause.

I have very briefly presented to you some of the things that I have learned by experience, and I hope that you will find some suggestions in my humble effort that will assist you in making yourselves more efficient for the Master's use.

I am getting along in years, and may not be able to make use of my own suggestions as effectually as I could have done in my younger years, but many of you are yet young and if you can learn from my experience I shall be satisfied. But I have not ceased to grow, I hope, but am still learning and striving to make myself more worthy of the great calling to which we are called, and I hope I may never see the day when I shall cease to grow more and more efficient as a worker in the cause we love.

SON OF POLYGAMIST SEEKS CONVERTS HERE ON POLYGAMY DOCTRINE.

ONE OF JOSEPH F. SMITH'S MANY BOYS ARGUING BEAUTY OF MULTI-MARRIAGE WITH WOMEN AT WAIKIKI.

The Mormon doctrine of polygamy is being industriously preached and taught in Honolulu at this very time and by no less a personage than one of the twenty-one sons of Joseph F. Smith, head of the Utah Mormons. The fact that his father paid a fine a year or two ago, after the birth of his forty-third child, the sixth or seventh from his sixth wife, does not deter this chip of the old block from informing all who listen to him that it is a holy and righteous thing to have a harem.

Smith, Junior, is carrying on missionary work for his church in Waikiki, just now, and there is a considerable amount of indignation from the fact that he times his domiciliary visits just at the times of day when the men are away from home and the women are available. The son of the prophet, seer, and revelator of Salt Lake City, Utah, will receive a welcome some morning at one of these houses that will astonish him, making him wish that his muchly-married parent had had just one son less and that one himself.

This missionary of glad tidings to womankind is not content with pointing to the brilliant example set the world by his respected parent on the male side, but brings into his discussions the name of the Savior and of the Almighty to bolster up his claim to the divine origin of the blessed state of multim matrimony, while he declines to accept the statement of the fact that Adam found Eve helpmeet enough for his home in Eden.

A respectable woman of Waikiki, who does not wish her name used in connection with the matter, states that Smith of the antirace-suicide family has made more than one call at her house, decidedly more than one call too many. She is a member of the Reorganized Church, a church which has fought polygamy from the inception of the degrading system by Brigham Young. Her statement is:

"On Monday afternoon last I was visited at my home by two elders of the Utah church. One of them said that he was the son of Joseph F. Smith, president of the church. The purpose of their visit was evidently to find out what church I belonged to and to teach all about their church. Upon entering the house they asked if there were any Mormons here. On my replying no, they then asked to what church I belonged. After telling them that I was a member of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, they informed me that the Reorganized Church and the Utah church were almost alike. To this I answered that there were some differences and pointed to the doctrine of polygamy as one which their church taught and which was condemned by ours.

"They then laughed and said that God founded polygamy, having given a revelation preventing certain people, but not all, to marry more than one wife.

"They supported their belief in polygamy by referring to prophets of God, such as Abraham, Jacob, Daniel, and Solomon, who were polygamists.

"I then asked them why, if God founded polygamy, he did not set the example to the world in the beginning by giving Adam more than one wife? They replied to this that God made Adam one wife, but intended others for him amongst the other spirits. Through sin Adam lost these affinities.

"They quoted from the Bible in support of polygamy, laying especial stress on the sons of Jacob, who were born in polygamy.

"I quoted from the Book of Mormon the passage in the Book of Jacob which says that the things done by David and Solomon are abominable before God. They replied that what God had commanded certain people to do was not wrong. They also said that Jesus was a descendant of David, who was a polygamist.

"They declared my church was not a real church and that its ministers did not have authority from God.

"In speaking of polygamy he referred to his father, Joseph F. Smith, the head of the Utah church, who he said had five wives, all of them living happily with each other, and each having a house to herself. He said that when he came away on his mission to Hawaii, all these women acted as a mother to him, helping to pack up his things, as if each was his own mother.

"He was particularly anxious that I should tell the presiding elder of the Reorganized Church here, Elder Waller, of all things that they had said, especially emphasizing the statement, that Waller had no authority to preach the gospel or administer its ordinances. He also said that the Utah church received revelations continuously up to the present time, but that their elders were persecuted, some of them even being crucified."—Sunday Advertiser, Honolulu, July 4, 1909.

THE USE OF DRUGS.

[The following article on the use of drugs, from the pen of Dr. J. H. Kellogg, appeared in Good Health, July, 1909. Doctor Kellogg is a physician and surgeon of international fame. He speaks from personal observation, experience, and study. His utterances should be given a careful reading and should do something at least toward staying the widespread abuse of drugs and patent medicines. If members of the church have been imposed upon and have spent their money for noxious concoctions that have only done harm, they should heed his warning and learn to put their trust in sane methods of living and in the blessing of God.—EDITORS.]

A well known physiologist once wrote, "All drugs are poisons," and we have recently read in a work by a distinguished French physiologist the statement that "all poisons are drugs." The eminent Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes even went so far as to suggest that it would be better for mankind if all the drugs in the apothecary shop were cast into the sea—adding, sententiously, "but bad for the fishes."

There are drugs which are invaluable, a few which are almost absolutely indispensable; but it must be admitted that a vast majority of the chemical compounds, extracts, mixtures, syrups, powders, pills, potions, electuaries, and kindred products of the chemist and the pharmacist are as useless as a sixth finger or a title to a farm at the North Pole.

The popular superstition that drugs cure disease was long ago exploded. Drugs never cured any malady, unless it were a tapeworm or some other parasite, in which the capacity of the drug to kill becomes available as a means of removing the cause of the bodily inconvenience. Nature cures, not drugs.

Nor is the doctor more able than the drug or druggist to cure. Doctors are a necessary element in human society. To them the world owes a greater debt of gratitude than it will never be able to pay. There is no class whose self-sacrificing services are so little appreciated as are those of the physician. But the doctor does not cure. He sometimes stands by and helps; it may be sometimes that he hinders; but it is nature that cures; and by nature we mean that all-pervading Intelligence which rules the universe, and which heals by the same mysterious magic-working power by which it created in the beginning and still creates; for healing is recreating. The two processes, creating and healing, are one and the same in kind.

Probably the majority of men and women believe that if only the right doctor can be discovered, who is able to point out the right remedy, they will be able by swallowing a few drops or a half dozen pills to antidote all the ill effects of sinning against the body. But this popular belief is a delusion and a snare. "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." The man who sows disease reaps disease; and the only way by which we can escape reaping the whole penalty of physical transgression, which is disease and death, is by the intervention of the same power which made the laws that have been transgressed—the power which comes to the relief and succor of repentant humanity the moment it is ready to yield obedience to the laws which it has disregarded. This, of course, provided the individual has not so far exhausted his resources and damaged his physical mechanism that recuperation is impossible. The divine Intelligence which made man and which dwells in him, heals him, if he is ever healed at all. All that the doctor can ever do, all that nurses can do, all that remedies of any sort can ever do, is simply to cooperate with the healing power within. . . .

It is not going too far to assert that multitudes of people die every year because of their addiction to the patent medicine habit. Many of the nostrums which are extensively used contain chiefly virulent poisons of the most deadly character. Opium is almost universally put in nostrums which are recommended for relief of pain, cough, and other distressing symptoms. Not infrequently the opium habit has been contracted by the use of these medicines. Manufacturers know that those who use them must continue to use them in increasing quantities, and herein lies the trick of success in this meretricious business.

Stomach, liver, and kidney remedies of various sorts usually contain irritating poisons which if used for any length of time will certainly produce the very diseases which they are guaranteed to cure. The cases of chronic disease the most difficult of relief are those in which nostrums have been long employed with the expectation that a cure might be secured by a "short cut." There is only one royal road to health; only one short cut, and that is obedience to nature's laws. . . .

1. Sleep-producing Drugs.—Chloral, bromid of potash, and coal tar products are by no means the innocent remedies which they are generally supposed to be by the laity. Every physician is well acquainted with the evil consequences which result from the continued use of these genuine poisons, for such they really are. They do not produce natural sleep, but poison sleep, a condition of unconsciousness which differs very widely from the sleep which the poet rightly calls "nature's sweet restorer." The sleep resulting from hypnotic or sleep-producing drugs is usually followed by languor, nervousness and depression. The continued use of such drugs invariably results in disturbed digestion, impaired nutrition and usually an aggravation of the insomnia which their use is intended to relieve. The cases of insomnia most difficult to cure are those in which a temporary treatment with drugs of the class referred to has been previously employed.

2. Remedies for Relief of Pain.—Pain killers, soothing syrups, and other pain-relieving drugs and nostrums are always harmful. Thousands of babies have been sent to premature graves by the use of soothing syrups. They produce nervous disturbances, impaired digestion, and lay the foundation for nervous ailments which may be the cause of life-long wretchedness, if the child to whom they are administered by a depraved nurse or an ignorant mother happens to survive the injuries thus inflicted upon it. Pain killers prepared from coal tar products are all nerve poisons. Those employed for external use contain considerable amounts of such highly dangerous poisons as aconite, chloroform, and other pernicious drugs.

3. Cures for Drug Habits.—Thousands have been deceived by the alluring advertisements of the so-called alcohol and tobacco cures. Not infrequently patients have been led from an evil habit to a worse one.

4. Cathartics.—"Pleasant purgative pills," liver tonics, and other drugs intended to stimulate intestinal activity are perhaps more widely used than almost any other class of drug-store products. After-dinner pills, laxative mineral waters and effervescent salts of a laxative character, constitute a large and lucrative part of the druggist's business. All of these drugs are responsible for a vast deal of mischief. The chronic irritation to which they give rise results in gastric and intestinal catarrh and thus renders the patient's conditions worse than in the beginning.

5. Headache Remedies.—Most of these drugs are prepared from coal tar products, while some contain cocaine, caffeine, and other drugs. All are poisonous. Numerous cases of poisoning have been reported from the use of headache powders. These drugs never cure. The temporary relief which they afford is at the expense of more or less serious damage to the nervous system.

6. Rheumatism Cures.—A great variety of drugs and nostrums are recommended for rheumatism. Most rheumatism "cures" contain salicylic acid either free or in combination with various vegetable substances. Not a single one of all these vaunted nostrums is capable of influencing this disease in a curative way. Rheumatism is the result of long continued autointoxication, generally through the absorption from the intestines of poisons produced by putrefaction in the colon. No drug can antidote the effects of these poisons. Reliance upon rheumatism cures often leads to neglect to give attention to the removal of the causes of the so-called rheumatism pain, the real nature of which may be neuritis, neuralgia, or organic disease of the bones and other parts.

7. Skin Remedies.—External applications, ointments and lotions are generally comparatively harmless, consisting mainly of antiseptics, oil and germicides, but nostrums intended for internal use generally contain arsenic, the daily introduction of which into the system for a long time may give rise to chronic bright's disease of the kidneys and other incurable conditions.

8. Consumption Cures.—It seems needless to say that no medicine was ever discovered which can cure this disease. The so-called consumption cures are, without exception, pure fakes. Their use almost always results in injury instead of benefit. Most of them contain opium, a drug which soothes the sufferer into a condition in which he thinks he is better because he suffers less, but which actually hastens the fatal termination.

9. Bitters.—Stomach bitters and various other preparations containing bitter substances are much used as a means of stimulating the appetite, and in many cases doubtless as a substitute for alcohol, as most bitters contain alcohol in considerable quantities, sometimes equal to that of the strongest whisky. The use of these drugs gives rise to catarrh of the stomach and bowels, and sometimes to the alcohol habit. No good ever results from their use, and they are, without doubt, responsible for a vast deal of harm.

10. Blood Remedies.—A great variety of "blood purifiers," "blood-builders," and other nostrums guaranteed to improve the blood are sold to persons suffering from anemia and various blood diseases, but without other effect than to deplete the purchasers' pocketbooks. Most of these remedies contain iron, iodid of potash, arsenic and other more or less harmful drugs. There is no scientific foundation for the belief that the blood can be purified or restored by any such means. Blood is made from food, not from iron. The remedy is to be found in improving the patient's conditions of life, rather than in dosing with medicinal agents of any sort. An abundance of easily digested food, out-of-door life, light gymnastics, breathing exercises, cold bathing, the abominable bandage at night, massage, electricity—these are measures which are of immensely greater value than any medicinal agent administered in any form.

Dear Parents and Teachers: Below we are giving the "Foreword" of the eighth volume of our Birth Offering Series, entitled, Talks About Joseph Smith, which is now being issued from Herald Office press and will be on sale at fifty cents per volume. In it will be found a full list of the names which have been sent in with Birth Offerings since the Indian Maiden was published. Orion, the author, is too well known to our readers to demand any special introduction, but we can not refrain from saying that this volume is one upon which he has bestowed his best thought and much labor, and it is one which you can not afford to fail in placing in your Sunday school library and in the home library of your boys and girls.

FOREWORD.

"Come now, and let us reason together," is the invitation of the Lord to his children, and at a later day the injunction of one of his accredited messengers was "Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and fear."

It is not necessary that we refer here to the obligation resting upon each Latter Day Saint, who is a parent, to see to it that his children are thoroughly instructed in the gospel of Christ, and so familiar with its teachings and principles as to be prepared for baptism when eight years old. This should be familiar to each one, as well as that most weighty of reasons connected with it, namely; that God in his infinite wisdom has put it out of the power of Satan to tempt our children before they arrive at the age. The truth then planted in their young minds, the seed sown in the tender soil of their hearts must and will take root and grow, because the adversary has no power to prevent it. But this teaching must be followed up—this soil must be cultivated if parents would obey the commandment of the Lord to "bring up your children in light and truth."

It is solely with a view to help parents in this matter that this little volume, the eighth of the Birth Offering Series, has been written and is now published. Bro. H. O. Smith, who under the nom de plume of "Orion" is the author, has been at great pains in collecting and collating facts bearing upon the many important events now taking place in the world, both of a historic, social, and scientific character, which were treated of by Joseph Smith years before their occurrence, and which to-day stand as irrefutable proofs of the wisdom of the man, as much as the direct prophecies made by him which have been literally fulfilled, stand as proof of his divine inspiration and God-given message to the world.

All these have been prepared with direct reference to the need, long since felt, that our boys and girls, our youths and maidens should have access to a literature of their own, calculated to establish them in the truth, and which will enable them to give a reason for their faith in Joseph as a prophet—a man sent of God to restore many plain and precious truths of the gospel taught by Christ and his disciples, and to make plain the way—the narrow way—of light and truth. And it is to this mission we commend it and send it forth, praying God to speed it on its way.

Letter Department

The Other Side.

[EDITOR'S NOTE.—We wish to say that the letter to which Elder Lewis is replying in the following communication found its way into the HERALD by mistake. Inadvertently it was placed with letters intended for publication. The criticisms of Elder Lewis having been published we can not well do less than to permit him to answer the charges. Difficulties arising in branches, districts, or missions should be settled by the regularly appointed officers in charge or by vote of the Saints in business meeting or conference. They should not be threshed out in the HERALD. Persons dissatisfied with the conduct or labor of missionaries in their field should go to the man most concerned with their criticism, and if necessary make complaint to the minister in charge or to the appointing powers of the church. Charges should not be preferred against him in the HERALD. The public does not care to listen to a debate as to whether a certain elder had sufficient reason for returning home earlier than some thought he should. Why Saints will persist in an effort to publish such charges against each other in the HERALD passes our understanding, when it is well known that God has appointed officers and courts before whom all such cases should be brought.]

Brother Editor: I regret that I have to ask for space to explain in answer to a criticism in your columns of June 2, 1909, page 521. I have carefully read my letter of April 28 which the brother refers to, and fail to see any just ground for the extreme and unkind criticism.

First. He says, "It was inconsistent for me to say March 7, that I intended to remain in Llanelly for some time, and April 17 I was in charge of a prayer-meeting at General Conference." What is there inconsistent in my statement, when we are governed by circumstances? Forty days from the time I made the statement until I was in charge of prayer meeting; greater and more surprising events have taken place in less time. The world was flooded in forty days. Sickness at home was one reason that I returned. Bro. J. W. Rushton, missionary in charge, had consented for me to do so under the circumstances.

Second. He is interested to know if one conversant with the Welsh language is essential to preside over North and South Wales, whether such a person would be required to speak North and South Wales language, as there is nearly as much variation between the two as between the Scotch and Dutch. Why make such a misleading, extravagant statement? In the first place the brother is not a competent judge, not being versed in the Welsh language. He has, like many others, learned to say, "Good morning", or "good evening"; "bread and butter"; "bread and cheese." In answer to this wild and untruthful statement, the facts are that the same alphabet is used in North and South Wales, and the same Bible, which is not true of the Scotch and Dutch. While there is some difference between North and South Wales, still not any more than there is between the English in England. One of the late missionaries that presided over Wales, Robert Evans, was a North Welshman; still there was no difficulty in understanding his preaching, and in the early days, missionaries from South Wales went to North Wales, and vice versa.

Third. "That there are scores of dialects in every county in Wales, and if Wales was appointed as a mission that the president should know North and South Wales language, besides English, and the scores of dialects that prevail." I ask why should the president be conversant with all of the above if Wales was a mission any more than under the present condition? Still, if Wales has such a mixture of languages, I would find no fault with the idea of having a president that was conversant with all the languages and dialects referred to. Why the brother objects to one conversant with the English and Welsh presiding, and approves of the one that can only speak English is to me unreasonable.

Fourth. "That the motion referring to Wales being set apart as a mission was out of order, as it was not the vote and voice of the district, and was not mentioned to the missionary in charge, and contrary to district by-laws, and only two out of five branches were represented at said conference, October 10, in Porth, South Wales." I say, emphatically, that the conference and vote were in perfect order, and at the succeeding conference held in March, the minutes of the October conference were approved. So far as being contrary to district by-laws, I know not of any such rules, and so far as not mentioning the matter to the missionary in charge for his consideration or approval, he was not present, besides the mover of the motion had framed the resolution only twenty-four hours previous to conference. I understand that it is the prerogative of the members of branches, districts, missions or General Conference to bring such matters as in their judgment will be for the good of the work to the respective bodies. If this is correct, why say that the motion was out of order? I do not understand that all matters coming before business assemblies must have the approval of the president before they can be presented to the body for their consideration. I admit that it may be wise to consult those in charge, when it can be done, before introducing any measures that will affect the present method or custom of said mission, district, or branches, but I do not understand that in case the presiding officer does not approve of the matter it will deprive the mover from presenting it for the consideration of the body. If it does not, then it would not be out of order to present it without consulting him. The motion asking General Conference to set North and South Wales apart as a mission was presented six months before the convening of General Conference. It was a mere request. So if the missionary in charge or any others did not approve of the measure, they would have ample time to oppose it. However, I am still of the opinion that North and South Wales should be a mission, and its president conversant with Welsh and English. So far as two branches out of five being present, that was no fault of the conference. All branches knew of the time and place, and so far as I know none of the three branches absent took any official action against said conference. The brother himself reported his labors as an elder and solicitor for the Bishop's agent, to that October conference, and still he has maintained in letters to Bishop Kelley and the missionary in charge and myself that the said conference was illegal; but he has failed to sustain his claims. I certainly would not report to a body that I considered had no jurisdiction. In conversation I had with members and officers of two of the branches not represented they found no fault with said conference, but approved of what was done.

Fifth. "That the business referring to the Bishop's agent for Wales at said October conference has since been annulled, which shows clearly that whatever business was done there was not in order." Why not tell the matter in its true light? The statement that "whatever business was done there was not in order," is misleading. Notice some of the business done at said conference. The report of branches, elders, time and place of the next conference, which convened in March, and the minutes read and approved at the said March conference, the brother being present, so was the missionary and submissionary in charge. Nothing declared out of order. That which the brother said was annulled needs explanation. September 26, 1908, Bishop E. L. Kelley wrote me requesting that I name some one in Wales he could appoint as agent. Bro. Edward Williams had been appointed, but declined to act owing to circumstances. Bishop Kelley stated that it had been suggested that some Welsh brother be appointed. I received his letter about the 8th of October, and as the Western Wales conference convened the 10th, I concluded that I would make the Bishop's request known at said conference. A motion was then made that Bro. Silas Evans be recommended to the Bishop as his agent for Wales. The Bishop appointed Brother Evans. Objections were raised against the action of Western Wales upon the ground that they were legislating for Eastern Wales District, but it was not so intended, for it was only an expression of Western Wales District, and inasmuch as the Bishop had the authority to appoint his agent without the recommendation of any district and had appointed Brethren Rushton and Meredith as agents in England, and Williams in Wales, without the recommendation of any district, we took it for granted that he could appoint Brother Evans on the above recommendation. But inasmuch as Eastern Wales had not a voice in the recommendation for agent for Wales, objections were raised. Bishop Kelley then suggested that if Eastern Wales wanted an agent he would appoint one, notwithstanding his advice was one Bishop's agent for Wales. The Bishop then notified Bro. Silas Evans of the wish of the Eastern District. Brother Evans at once accepted of the suggestion of the Bishop. At the Eastern District conference held first Saturday in March, five months later, Bro. Thomas Gould was recommended as agent for said district. Two weeks later, when the Western Wales conference convened, not wishing to be selfish, they approved of the action of Eastern Wales, and recommended Bro. Silas Evans as agent for Western District, and not for all Wales. Under the circumstances the action of Western Wales in indorsing the recommendations of Brother Gould for the Eastern District was commendable.

Sixth. That my statement "was extravagant" when I said that seventy-five per cent in and out of the church are Welsh. He says had I said five per cent I would have been nearer the truth. Just think, only five Welshmen in North and South Wales to every one hundred persons. Again, "That there would be no need of Welsh speaking preachers in Cardiff, Swansea, and Aberdare, or any other of our large Welsh towns." Why say our large Welsh towns, if only such a small percentage is Welsh. The facts are that in the town of Swansea, there are twenty-four Welsh churches, and there is more of a mixture of nations in Swansea, as it is along the seacoast, than in any other, except it would be Cardiff, and of necessity they would need Welsh speaking preachers in those twenty-four churches. When I said that seventy-five per cent in and out of the church were Welsh, I had reference to Wales exclusively. Take the branches of Wales and do not include England, as the Eastern District takes in part of England, my statement is not far from being correct.

Seventh. "What right has a representative of the general church to come here and spend so little time with us, returning without bidding us even a good-bye, and then publicly proclaim contention and friction had existed." I answer that a representative has the right to come under General Conference appointment, and as to the length of time he shall stay, circumstances should govern. If the brother refers to me I say, "Not guilty." I was in the mission ten months, and when I made arrangements to return home, owing to sickness in the family, and with the consent of the missionary in charge, I said good-bye to at least six of the seven branches in Wales; so the accusation is not true so far as I am concerned, and I know of no one that is guilty. So far as proclaiming that contention and friction had existed, why not quote the statement in its true light, which is as follows, April 28, page 404. "There has been some contention and friction in the Western and Eastern Wales districts, but I am pleased to say that since the convening of said districts in conference, unity and peace prevail, and the prospects for the work are very encouraging." One reason that called forth the above statement was that this brother had denounced the October conference of Western Wales as illegal, and what business was done as being out of order. This he did by correspondence with those already mentioned and others. But he did not succeed in proving his assertion. I thought it would be a word in proper time to say that peace and unity prevailed. Is it not strange that the brother should find fault with me, referring to a matter that he himself was the main instigator in circulating far and near, and is still finding fault, as his letter shows? There has been a spirit of opposition to the missionaries from the States by a few, and this brother comes out in the following: "I must say the church would and could do better by appointing men we already had here than sending appointees from the United States." To make his appeal have weight he misapplies the statement of President Smith, who was addressing the ministry at General Conference, when he stated that some of the brethren in charge of missions were overcareful in letting those of the standing ministry take up their line of work, viz, to preside over districts, when he said, "Why not throw them into the stream, try them, and give them a chance." The Lord said, April 15, 1901, section 125, paragraph 13: "For prosecuting the work in two of these missions, this is offered and directed. Send the Bishop to England with my servant Gomer T. Griffiths to aid in arranging the affairs of the church there, organizing the ministry locally, and determining what help in the missionary field may be required from America." According to the brother's statement they do not need any help from America. He thinks the church could do better by appointing men from that land. The church has appointed men of that mission, no fault to find with them, but evidently the Lord understood that they needed help from America, and the Bishop and Elder Griffiths so recommended. The conditions in that land have not changed so far as needing help in the missionary field, and in my judgment the time has not yet come when the church could do better by not sending men from other fields there. I believe that it would be a blessing to exchange missionaries, not only to the work in various fields, but to the ministry. The old saying, "The change of pasture is good for the calf." If, in the judgment of the Presidency and the Quorum of Twelve, who have the authority to send men into the vineyard, they should say to some of the brethren in the British Isles, "Come and labor in America," I am sure that they will be made welcome, and I would dislike very much to hear any of our brethren say, after the missionary had come to his field of labor, that the church could do better by appointing men from our own land. We might say, "Come in, brother, make yourself at home, glad you have come," and occasionally put a shilling in his hand; but the fact that there had been sent broadcast the statement that it was a mistake to send men to that field would be very discouraging to the one sent to labor there. May we never be guilty of such unkindness.

The brother again refers to a Welsh service held at the recent Aberdare conference, (last March): "Not more than three could sing Welsh, (or did not try to). I do not believe one third understood or had any interest in that service, which was very far from being a success, although the speaker made a fair effort." The service referred to was preaching at 11 a. m. on Sunday in Welsh by Bro. Rees Jenkins, who made a plain, sensible talk. The reporter for the local paper (Aberdare Leader) spoke kindly of that service and the conference, and quoted at some length from the brother's sermon. Still the statement was made that the service was far from being a success. Even if in his judgment it was not, what need to publicly denounce it. The statement that not one third understood or had any interest in that service, if true, is uncalled for. "Not more than three could sing Welsh or did not try." I do not see the object in making such a statement. I can give the names of at least twenty-five that were present that did understand and could sing Welsh. True, there was one song given out that the audience were not familiar with, not having the necessary amount of Welsh hymn books. But why make the criticism that the service was far from being a success, and admit that the speaker made a fair effort? The brother takes comfort in the statement that there are a number of Welshmen in Wales who can testify no one has done more for the church work than himself. I refer him to the following: "There is not one wise man among twenty will praise himself."—Shakespeare. "A man's accusations of himself are always believed, his praises of self never."—Montaigne.

I received the following in answer to my questions from Mr. John Evans, one of the editorial staff of the oldest daily paper in Wales, also from Mr. L. Hughes, chief reporter from the South Wales Daily News:

"First. About what per cent of the population of North and South Wales are Welsh or of Welsh descent? About eighty or eighty-five per cent of the people of Wales are of Welsh descent. It is only in large cities that English people are found in any numbers.

"Second. About how many, if any, Welsh churches or congregations in your city (Swansea)? In the municipal borough of Swansea there are four Welsh churches belonging to the Church of England, and upwards of twenty Welsh nonconformist chapels, with flourishing congregations.

"Third. Are there any Welsh public schools in North and South Wales? There are no exclusively Welsh public schools, but Welsh is a statutory subject in most of them. To all the Welsh churches there are attached Welsh Sunday schools.

"Fourth. Are there any firms or corporations, or courts, or any line of business that transact their business in Welsh? There are few firms that conduct their business correspondence in Welsh, but there are thousands in which, over the counter and in the factory, Welsh is the only language used. Most of the county court judges and nearly all the stipendiary magistrates are Welsh speaking Welshmen, who frequently conduct the business of their courts in the vernacular. I am glad to say that the language is not dying out. (Na y mae yn fwy byw nac erioed?—No, it is more lively than ever.) Indeed, there never was a time when greater interest was taken in its perpetuation, or when it was more generally spoken.

"Yours respectfully,

"JOHN EVANS,

"JULY 22, 1909."

The following are the answers by Mr. L. Hughes, chief reporter of the South Wales Daily News.

"First. There are no statistics available.

"Second. Eighteen in the city of Cardiff.

"Third. There are about ninety-six secondary and intermediate schools established in Wales, and Monmouthshire, under the Welsh Intermediate Act of 1889. In addition, Welsh is taught at sixty per cent of the elementary schools of Wales.

"Fourth. Several public bodies (poor law guardians especially) transact their business entirely in Welsh and, very frequently, in public courts and county courts, cases are heard entirely in Welsh.

"Fifth. According to the last census (1901) Welsh was spoken by a larger percentage than English.

"Yours truly,

"L. HUGHES,

"Chief reporter of South Wales Daily News."

Now compare another statement of the brother's with the above answers of Messrs. Evans and Hughes: "I might also say no business transactions of any kind are done in Welsh, neither is any trial conducted in Welsh, English is taught in all our schools in Wales, no business or professional man would be of any use in Wales to-day if unable to speak or write the English language."

Yours for truth,

WM. LEWIS.

Meditations on Things Wise and Otherwise.

Editors Herald: Of all men to whom authority has ever been delegated, none have ever borne a greater burden of responsibility than the man whose duty it is to "warn the world." He has to do with the eternal weal or woe of his fellow mortals. Dereliction of duty, either aggressive or defensive, may result in irretrievable loss to those to whom he is sent to minister and he himself may have to foot the bill. It is no trifling matter to contemplate.

On the other hand, no man ever enjoyed greater prerogatives than the true servant of God. Notwithstanding all this, the man who seeks to magnify his office and calling by teaching a strict observance of the letter of the law, no matter how clean his character or how pure his motives, does so at the risk of being called a "crank"; and a persistent effort to call attention to things detrimental to the peace and safety of the body only enhances his chances of obtaining the uncoveted title. If he is so bold as to attack worldly encroachments he will be classed a "hobby-rider" and his influence will be lessened to a large degree, and finally he becomes an object of ridicule. Now listen:

"Son of man, I have made thee a watchman unto the house of Israel: therefore hear the word at my mouth, and give them warning from me. When I say unto the wicked, Thou shalt surely die; and thou givest him not warning, nor speakest to warn the wicked from his wicked way, to save his life; the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at thine hand. Yet if thou warn the wicked, and he turn not from his wickedness, nor from his wicked way, he shall die in his iniquity; but thou hast delivered thy soul. Again, When a righteous man doth turn from his righteousness, and commit iniquity, and I lay a stumbling-block before him, he shall die: because thou hast not given him warning, he shall die in his sin, and his righteousness which he hath done shall not be remembered; but his blood will I require at thine hand. Nevertheless if thou warn the righteous man, that the righteous sin not, and he doth not sin, he shall surely live, because he is warned; also thou hast delivered thy soul."—Ezekiel 3: 17-21.

I am persuaded that the principle involved holds good to-day, "For I am the Lord, I change not"; and whether or not we are willing to "line up," and no matter how strenuous we may argue and reason to evade the force of the divine edict, the cold fact remains that "every transgression and disobedience" shall receive a "just recompense of reward."—Hebrews 2: 2. The application of such epithets as "radical," "crank," and "hobby-rider," to those who complain of the existence of certain "evils," and who cry "repentance," does not disprove the existence of the "evil" complained of, nor do they relieve the responsibility to pay heed to those whose duty it is to preach with the "warning voice."

Jeremiah continually prophesied of the destruction of Jerusalem and the captivity of the Jews, and his "hobby" carried him to prison. John the Baptist had the audacity to tell a rich ruler that he was living in adultery. He was a "radical" on the divorce question and his "hobby" cost him his head. For preaching the resurrection from the dead Paul was "called in question," and branded as a "heretic," a "pertinent fellow," and a "word of sedition." His peculiar ideas ran counter to the popular understanding of things, and he was a "crank" in the estimation of popular opinion. He rode his "hobby" to prison and to death.

What might be said of Nephi, Alma, and Moroni? They were "cranks" and "radicals" par excellence. Nephi was a visionary "crank" to such an extent that his own brothers hated him. Moreover, he was "radical" on secret societies, going so far as to say the Devil was the "foundation of all these things." He had no hesitancy in voicing his sentiments, choosing to obey the command of God by lifting the warning voice rather than cater to the popular clamor to the disparagement of the right.

It may be that that which was of paramount importance anciently has become a modern fanaticism, but I fail to see how or why. My comprehensive powers may be deficient, but that is no reason why I should be called a "crank" or a "hobby-rider."

By what system of logic can it be shown that that which was under the ban of inspiration in Book of Mormon times is to be winked at to-day as a harmless institution? Do not like causes produce like effects? It may not be wise to legislate restrictive measures to govern the personal conduct of the members of the body outside of the revealed "code of good morals," but should that fact be used as a bar against the use of that which is revealed as an educational factor? I think not. Does preaching the gospel imply only an aggressive proclamation of the plan of redemption as comprehended in the "first principles"? If no attack is to be made on existing "evils," what becomes of the command to "say nothing but repentance to this generation"? To my mind the above is susceptible of a very broad application.

prehending all the elements essential to our happiness here and hereafter, can we by any possible means enhance our condition by affiliating with organizations aside from and which form no part of the gospel scheme? I think not.

If the Book of Mormon contains the "fullness of the gospel"—the "new covenant," are not the prophetic utterances concerning secret organizations that should exist in the "last days" as much a part of the message to be delivered as anything else in the book? If the above proposition is true, and I believe it is, will not a failure to deliver the message entire bring us under the anathema of God as announced to Ezekiel quoted above? Why should we shun to declare the whole counsel of God? If we remain silent while this "evil doth pollute my estate," with our eyes open to the situation, will not the blood of those who fall victims of the evil be upon our heads? I am fearful of it. If we announce to the world that the "Lord doth not work in secret combinations," are we any more a "crank" than Moroni was for teaching the same thing? If we teach men in the church that they should not be "unequally yoked together with unbelievers," are we any more "radical" than Paul was who taught likewise?

Secret oath-bound societies are a positive injury to the growth and development of the body of Christ, and Almighty God has, in both ancient and modern times, spoken his disapproval of them, and has plainly foretold their predominating influence in the "latter days." Again we repeat the question: "Shall I be content while this evil doth pollute my estate?" Shall we be a party to the "evil" by our silence? Would it not be the better part of Christian fortitude to stand boldly in defense of that which is "written for our learning"? Will I be justified in the sight of God if, when I see a brother being lost to the church by the influence of the "lodge," I refuse to warn him simply because the lodge in no way interferes with my personal liberty? Am I my brother's keeper? Because my personal liberty is not being hampered, will I be excused in the final summing up of human affairs when I have witnessed others being ruined by the "evil" and refused a helping hand? Would I be justified in voting "wet" in a crusade against the liquor traffic simply because my personal liberty is not in jeopardy? If the body is composed of many members and one member does that which results in injury to himself, am I not compelled to suffer also even though my personal liberty may not be infringed upon?

When the body legislates corrective measures, in harmony with the divine order of things, is it not the duty of every authorized servant of the body to diligently seek to carry out the will of the body? Is it right to class a man as a "hobby-rider" simply because he endeavors to carry out the expressed will of the body? Does not the application of such terms as "hobby-rider," "crank," and "radical" have a tendency to cripple the man's influence for good among those whom he may be called upon to labor? Did the Lord make "constructive criminals" of the ministry by saying they should avoid the use of tobacco and strong drinks? (Doctrine and Covenants 119: 3.)

For all that pertains to the peace and development of Zion's conditions.

Extracts from Letters.

J. C. Foss, writing from Machias, Maine, July 16, says: "We are having a warm time of it here. Find them in squads discussing the doctrine. Last Sunday I baptized two more; others to follow."

"The most heavenly pictures seen on earth are men and women doing common loving kindnesses."

News From Branches

BURLINGTON, IOWA.

Burlington is "still here," if we haven't been heard from for some time.

There has been little change in the branch since last report. One has been lost by death, and four added by baptism.

The Religio maintains a reasonably good attendance, and the Sunday school is doing well. June 27, children's day, was observed and as a whole proved a success. An attendance of seventy was reported for the regular Sunday school session, and the house was well filled for the special service and program time. We are pleased to say that in connection with this program we introduced fourteen cradle roll members, one of them being blessed during the service. Sr. Callie B. Stebbins, of Lamoni, who is visiting here, gave us a short talk about the cradle roll, and our pastor, Bro. Charles Fry, spoke to the children for a few minutes, after which the ordinance of baptism was administered, four of the children having given their names. Neat little souvenir programs were prepared for the children, giving the present corps of officers and teachers, the program, the cradle roll, and the names of those baptized. A very good feeling was manifested, and we trust is indicative of an even brighter future for the school.

Letters of removal have recently been received from Brother and Sister Morgan, of Medea, Illinois. We are glad to welcome any new workers among us.

The members of the North and South Hill Aid Societies met together recently at the home of the pastor and enjoyed a social afternoon. On account of living at a considerable distance from each other, this is rather infrequent.

A number of our Burlington people are planning to attend the reunion at Bluff Park, from July 30 to August 8.

LONDON, ONTARIO.

Sr. Lizzie Evans, of Toronto, has been spending a few days here visiting Saints and friends.

Bro. Ed Moore, who has been in the hospital several weeks, suffering from a broken leg, is able to be around again.

Bro. George Latt met with a very painful accident last week while at work. While assisting in the erection of a large warehouse, one of the heavy beams fell on his foot, crushing it badly.

The following officers were elected to have charge of the Sunday school for the next six months: Superintendent, Frank Gray; assistant superintendent, P. H. Philippin; secretary, Lily Gray; treasurer, Mamie Harrison; library representative, Bert Richardson; organist, Maud Cambridge; chorister, Ethel Gray; assistant chorister, Elder Henley; janitors, Joe Heaslip and Norman Winegarden.

A new Sunday school has been organized in West London by assistant district superintendent, O. W. Cambridge.

The local ministry, under the direction of Elder Fligg, are holding open-air services in several parts of the city. Elder Henley spoke last Sunday at Knolwood Park, an opening made by Bro. C. Insell.

The Religio local elected the following officers for the ensuing term: President, James Winegarden; first vice-president, Edith Pope; second vice-president, R. J. Farthing; secretary, Bessie Talbot; treasurer, Ruth Greer; library representative, Clara Hardey; organist, Lillian Pope; chorister, Ethel Gray; janitor, W. Willis.

134 NORTH LOCUST STREET.

OMAHA, NEBRASKA.

We are trying to keep moving while this hot weather lasts. This is the hard season of the year to keep up interest in city work. There have been a number move away lately; some to Independence, some to Alaska, some to Grand Island, and some to Hastings, Nebraska. In all about thirteen. We have gained one by baptism and three by letters.

On June 20 we observed children's day; had program morning and evening, which was very good. One baptized.

F. A. Smith, on his way to his field, stopped and gave us two sermons. After being city missionary here for six years, his visits are always enjoyed by the Saints.

Sunday, July 4, was election of officers for the Religio, and resulted in the selection of almost a new set of officers, and two new teachers. We expect new officers and teachers will bring new energy.

An ice-cream social was held at Hanscom Park for the benefit of branch expenses, July 15. Quite a nice little sum was realized. A basket social, to help the building fund, was held recently and was very encouraging.

We have a soliciting committee to raise means to either buy or build a new church, as a better building and location is badly needed. The committee is meeting encouragement, almost everywhere they have been.

Lots of rain, but no serious damage has yet been done in the city.

The general health of Saints is good. Some are looking forward to the Council Bluffs reunion, for a spiritual feast, which is August 21 to 29.

A good deal of the preaching of late has been by the branch officers, other than the president, and very acceptably, too.

Bro. James Huff, one of the old veterans of the church, and also of Uncle Sam, has just received the appointment of chaplain at the state penitentiary of Nebraska.

A number of Saints have received wonderful blessings of late through administration. Three cases of appendicitis have been almost instantly healed. May God be praised.

Sunday, July 18, the preaching morning and evening was done by two branch teachers. Good instruction was given and all will be blessed if it is put into operation.

Not many out. Hot weather we suppose is the cause. Maybe it is a justifiable excuse, but time will tell.

Sr. Florence Calhoun, of Sioux City, visited a few days very acceptably at the missionary's home.

August 5 there is to be a joint picnic of the Omaha and Council Bluffs Sunday schools to be held in Hanscom Park, Omaha.

Miscellaneous DepartmentThe Bishopric.*APPOINTMENT OF BISHOP'S AGENT.

The Saints and friends of the Eastern Maine District of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, please take notice that upon the removal of Bishop R. Bullard from the territory of Eastern Maine and assignment of field of labor in the Rocky Mountain Mission, it has been necessary to select a Bishop's agent in and for the territory of Eastern Maine District. By recommendation of the conference at Jonesport of June, present year, Elder Samuel F. Cushman, of Jonesport, Maine, is hereby duly appointed and authorized to act as Bishop's agent in and for said district in place of Bishop R. Bullard, resigned.

We commend Bro. S. F. Cushman to the Saints of the Eastern Maine District and ask for him the cooperation and special help of all the Saints and friends of the cause of Christ in and for said district. We also take pleasure in commending the excellent work of Bishop Bullard in said district the past two years, and commend him as a bishop in financial work in his new field of Rocky Mountain Mission and any field where he may be called to labor. We trust that Bro. R. Bullard may be blessed and prospered in his labors in the new field as fully as in his former.

We shall hope that all who are members of the church or who are special friends of the cause of Christ in the Eastern District of Maine, will contribute to the interest of said district during the present year.

May peace and the blessings of the Lord attend every worker and helper. In behalf of the Bishopric,

Very respectfully,

E. L. KELLEY, Presiding Bishop.

Pastoral.

To the Saints in North and South Dakota and Minnesota: Having been appointed in charge of the above-named States, I would like to hear from those who desire to have missionary work performed in their neighborhoods. A number of missionaries have been assigned to this mission and we desire to keep in touch with each other, so we can work systematically together and accomplish the greatest amount of good.

At the June conference held in Clitherall, Minnesota, I was chosen district president of the Minnesota District, and as the assistant district president has resigned, it will be necessary for me to spend most of my time in Minnesota.

I hereby notify the Saints in said district that an assistant district president will be chosen at our fall conference.

The prospects for a successful year's work are good and I hope each Saint will make a special effort to assist the cause we love so much.

My mission address is 427 Knox avenue, Minneapolis, Minnesota, care of Elder Charles Lundeen.

Resolution of Appreciation.

Whereas, after many years of untiring, faithful, and efficient service, and when having labored beyond his strength, the resignation of Elder A. Barr, as Bishop's agent, has come, be it

LARSON.—John Peter Larson was born at Malm, Sweden, May 28, 1836; baptized March 2, 1882, at Omaha, Nebraska, by Elder Jens Anderson. He was married to Miss Bengta Nelson, to which union were born seven children, five of whom with their mother survive him. The gospel was a comfort and stay to him in his suffering and sustained him in his parting hours. Funeral services in the M. E. church, at Page, Nebraska, by Elder Levi Gamet.

HAMPTON.—Homer Alma, child of Elder W. H. and Anna N. Hampton was born January 21, 1909, blessed February 21, 1909, by J. T. Riley and J. W. Jackson, and died June 29, 1909. Funeral in charge of Elder J. S. Moore. Sermon by Elder J. M. Smith.

RHODES.—Howard, the infant son of Bro. and Sr. Josiah Rhodes, on the morning of July 10, 1909. For such a little while (three months and fifteen days), as men count time, was he permitted to linger here; but counting it by "heart beats" who can measure it, or the aching void left in the hearts of those who loved him, which nothing but the love and mercy of God can ever fill. Funeral was held at the home of Elder D. W. R. Davis, grandfather of deceased, where Elder William Johnson poured the oil of consolation from the cruise that never fails. Amid showers of fragrant white blossoms, sweet emblems of the sinless soul, loving hands laid the little form away to await the resurrection.

something grafted upon original Christianity by later thinkers, particularly by Saint Paul. Veit says, "Dogma is something decidedly inferior to the gospel, and we deny that dogma has any right to claim to be the reproduction of the gospel correctly and historically understood."

In the second place, it is argued, dogma and gospel are intrinsically opposed to each other. The gospel and Christianity are life itself.

Dogma is the formulation of a proposition, of a theory, and belongs rather to the intellectual part of man, while religion is decidedly a matter of the heart. Dogma leads consistently to a dead and formal orthodoxy. It can not produce a religious life. Baars says: "Christianity is a religious doing. It is not thought, nor formula of thought. We need no dogma; we must live our Christianity independently of the particular forms and molds which Christianism may happen to have assumed."

Thirdly, dogma and science are represented as mutually exclusive. Professor Harnack, for instance, maintained that the Christianity of the primitive church was largely the outcome of Greek philosophy coupled with oriental mysticism. The researches of many modern critics have undertaken to demonstrate that generally accepted Christian views developed under the influence of dogma are incorrect, and must accordingly give way to the more reliable results of modern independent science.

These and similar arguments in favor of a creedless Christianity are discussed with great skill by Dr. M. O. Stammer, in a recent issue of the well-known apologetical journal Glauben und Wissen. It is a psychological impossibility and self-deception on the part of the champions of an undogmatical Christianity, he declares, to claim that there can be such a thing as a creedless Christianity. All religions consist of certain principles and ideals, and these are simply other terms for creeds and articles of faith. The lives of all of us are spent in efforts to realize certain things considered desirable, and these things are what we believe in and what we hope for. The Monist or the advanced religious thinker does not really try to abolish creeds; what he is attempting to do is to stamp out the old faiths and put in their place his own convictions. He has a new religion to offer the world. He wants to substitute one creed for another. He would abolish the article of faith which tells us that man was made by the creative act of God, and would substitute a statement that he came into existence by the slow process of natural development. Just as agnosticism is really a self-contradictory term, Doctor Stammer contends, so a creedless Christianity is also self-contradictory.

It is plain, the same writer continues, that the original teachings of Christ and Christianity were anything but creedless. Even after such elements as the chief contents of the Fourth Gospel or of the Pauline Epistles, now challenged by the radicals as something grafted in later years upon the primitive teachings of Christ, have been eliminated, there still remains practically nothing in this Christianity but a

Editorial

CREEDLESS CHRISTIANITY SELF-CONTRADICTORY.

It would appear that Professor Elliot, late of Harvard, has turned prophet, and in the exercise of his prophetic calling he declares that there is approaching an era in the religious life of the churches in America, if not in the world, in which there will be an aggregation of religionists without a dogma or a creed. The basis of Professor Elliot is similar to that held by others, a digest of which appears in Current Literature for August, 1909, pages 178, 179, from which we quote the following:

An analysis of the arguments made by these advocates of the "Away from dogma" crusade, shows that they base their claims on three main grounds, namely, that creeds are opposed to the spirit and original character of the gospel; that they are contrary to real Christian faith; and that they are out of harmony with the best results of scientific research.

The first claim is founded on what is regarded as the result of the critical study of the New Testament made by Harnack, Pfleiderer and others. According to this point of view, the teachings of Christ were originally a system of simple ethical principles, such as are incorporated in the Sermon on the Mount and the synoptic gospels. Dogma, it is contended, is body of teachings or doctrines. The synoptic Christ is not a creedless Christ, as is seen by what he is constantly teaching concerning the kingdom of God, the Son of Man, and other matters of equal importance. Particularly in his opposition to the thought of his age Christ is seen to be a teacher of doctrines. Over against the false teachings of his day he set up a new system, and in the very Sermon on the Mount, to which the advocates of an undogmatical and purely ethical Christianity so frequently refer, the higher religious principles, or doctrines, of the New Testament are contrasted with the inferior dogma of the Old.

Dogma, Doctor Stammer affirms, is a religious necessity. The important thing about a man is his life, and he lives what he believes in. He can not lead a Christian life unless he purposes to realize certain principles or truths that his faith as a Christian makes him think are necessary. Without dogma and doctrine, the Christian life would lack a guiding star, a directive principle; it would be like a boat without a rudder. The church, even more than a political party or a school of philosophy or sociology, must have a special creed and fixed principles as an expression of its ideas and ideals. A creedless Christianity, Doctor Stammer says in conclusion, is an impossibility.

We commend this criticism of Doctor Stammer to that class of minds that are so prone to hunt for something in the philosophy of things that will help them to get away from the absolute facts taught in the New Testament scripture by the great Teacher. We believe Doctor Stammer to be right, and we publish his refutation of what these would-be advanced thinkers are presenting with a view to substitute their dogma for the absolute teachings of Christ, as being legitimate, the fighting of fire with fire, or to confound any false philosophy by the teaching of sound reason from the ranks of the philosophers themselves.

A FAIR INFERENCE.

It is a fair presumption that when God calls men for the accomplishment of any purpose, whether it be of a national, or political, or religious character, he selects those who are by natural gifts qualified to perform the duties which attach to the position which they are called upon to fill; or, that after he has called them he, by virtue of the Spirit which he puts upon them, qualifies them to understand and perform the duties of the office to which they are appointed. This is a fair inference. Is it not an equally fair inference that all others who are not called to those positions, are not so well qualified, either by natural gifts or by the gift of the Spirit, to act in the positions as are those whom God calls?

Granted that all other things are equal, and that these persons respectively have received a degree of the Spirit commensurate to the several positions which they occupy in life or in any associate work to which they are called together by the Lord, is it not then a fair inference that those whom God has called and qualified should be considered the better judges of those things which call for their consideration, judgment and decision, and action, than those whom God has not called to such positions? Is it not a fair inference that those whom God has called for the performance of specific duties are the better judges of what their action should be within the lines of the responsibilities placed upon them and for which they are to answer unto him who called them? If those who are called are to be held responsible for that which they do within the province of their calling, which responsibility does not rest upon those who are not called, and for which those not called will not be required to answer, ought not those who are called and who are responsible be left to discharge the duties of their calling without factious opposition upon the part of those are not called?

THE LAMONI "CONFERENCE" AGAIN.

In last week's issue we called attention to the failure of the Utah church papers to mention the effort some of their elders made at Lamoni in June. So much time had intervened we concluded that they were not going to say anything about it; but after going to press, the Deseret News for Saturday, July 31, reached us, in which we find the following from W. D. Van Dyke, jr., one of the elders who visited Lamoni:

ELDERS CARRY GOSPEL TO REORGANITE HEADQUARTERS.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, July 21.—A group of sixteen elders of the Northern States mission visited and held meetings in Lamoni, the headquarters of the Reorganite church, on the 12th, 13th, 14th and 16th of June, 1909, under the direction of Elder German E. Ellsworth, president of the mission.

The Reorganized church was placed at our disposal for our services and priesthood meetings with the understanding that they should follow in defence of their claims. For this courtesy we expressed our appreciation as there was no other suitable place where we could have held forth.

There is only one other house of worship in Lamoni, the Methodist church, which was too small for our services. During the day our elders visited every home in Lamoni, distributing tracts and literature, finding many good, honest-hearted people, sincere and honest in their religious convictions, who, of course, have been misguided from the path of the great latter-day work. We found some of the old people who freely broached the question of polygamy and voluntarily expressed to us that they knew that it originated in Nauvoo, and that it was taught and practised in Nauvoo long before the exodus of the main body of the church. We did not appear in their midst for the purpose of controversy as that is contrary to our method of doing missionary work and also to the spirit of the gospel, but to deliver to them the fulness of the everlasting gospel as restored to the Prophet Joseph Smith. However, we were attacked by Mr. Heman C. Smith, their church historian, in his addresses on the evenings of June 15, 17, and 18. He made an effort to prove the apostacy of the church even as early as 1841, during the life time and presidency of the prophet. He also attacked us as usual on polygamy, blood atonement, reconfirmations and a reorganization of the church in the valleys of the mountains quoting from various authorities what he saw fit to suit his purpose and to bolster up his assertions. His remarks carried the same spirit as is characteristic of all their elders, that of abuse and attack of personal character of President Young and other early church officers.

In an editorial in the SAINTS' HERALD of June 23, in commenting upon our visit to Lamoni, that paper has the following to say: "We wish now to pass some criticisms on the men from Utah. We do not wish, however, to criticize them in any harsh, unfair, or captious spirit. First, we will say that their deportment (with possibly one exception) was such as to be creditable to them as men and to their church. So far as we observed they conducted themselves in a gentlemanly manner and in their attack upon us as a people, they were for the most part open and frank and evinced a care for our personal feelings that was commendable. Our elders may, and we trust do, profitably pursue a similar course toward all antagonists."

We do not know what the "one exception" was which they have reference to.

In behalf of the elders who visited Lamoni we desire to express our appreciation for the courteous treatment which we received at the hands of the people generally.

W. D. VAN DYKE, JR.,

President North Illinois Conference.

As usual, whenever their leaders are quoted, or well-known and authenticated facts are produced in connection with Brigham Young and others, they at once set up the claim of persecution. In a general way, Bro. Heman C. Smith brought forth much the same matter already presented in his reply to Elder B. H. Roberts; but in his answer to the extraordinary speech by Elder German E. Ellsworth, he exposed the absolute fallacy of argument in what was nothing more nor less than an attempt to justify and uphold the doctrine of polygamy.

DECADENCE OF LATIN RACES.

A good deal of interest is existent as to the decadence of what are called the Latin races, and the philosophers are seeking for the reason of it. This interest in the apparent decay in those states of the Continent which are the representatives of the Latin origin, is of a varied character. We give below a portion of an editorial appearing in the Kansas City Journal for August 3, in which we believe a very fair conclusion is reached by the editor as to the more reasonable and more apparent cause of the decadence in these Latin races:

The causes of the decline of the Latin races are open questions concerning which sociological scholars will find room for wide differences of opinion. It might be said of Spain and Italy that poverty and oppressive taxation had crushed the spirit of the people, but this does not apply in the case of France which is still one of the richest nations in the world. The Bank of France is undoubtedly the soundest, strongest financial institution in all Europe. It has repeatedly come to the assistance of the Bank of England at critical periods, probably saving the entire world of finance from disastrous shocks. The French people, too, are probably the richest, per capita, in the world; at least wealth is more equally distributed among them. The stocking of the French peasant is seldom empty, and it was from this well-filled hoard that the war indemnity of a billion was paid to Germany even before it was due, so great was the desire of the French people to remove the hated foot of the invader from their soil. In the opinion of many careful observers, the most potent factor in the decadence of the Latin nations is the growth of the irreligious spirit which is widespread and bitterly hostile to all forms of religious worship. France still numbers many thousands of devout Catholics actively loyal to the church, but as a whole the nation is pronouncedly irreligious. In Italy and Spain religion is largely confined to the highest class, while in many localities the common people manifest a ferocious hatred toward the religious orders. Atheism has become the rule in both countries, and is rapidly gaining ground in France owing to the insidious teachings of the socialist leaders. It might well be inferred that patriotism, courage and every other virtue can not long survive in a country without religion. A nation without a God is a people without a guide.

It may be that we agree with the conclusion of this lay preacher upon the same hypothesis that Elder Elijah Banta one time expressed himself in regard to the orthodoxy of one of the elders of the church whom he heard preach. His comment was this: "The brother is sound in the faith. Why do I say he is sound in the faith? Why, because he believes with me." We believe with the editor. One of the strongest reasons why we believe with the editor is that we have been assured in divine writ through revelation that we are to have no king in time on this land. And further, that the nation on this land that will not acknowledge God will not prosper, but will in time be destroyed. From this we conclude that this can never become a godless nation, using the word nation to represent the Government. Efforts may be made, as they have been to take God out of the Constitution, to prohibit the Bible from being read in the public schools, or to take the motto, "In God we trust," from the national coin, but from the fact that God has assured us through the revelations of his inspiration that wise men were inspired to draft the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution, we may safely conclude that as long as we as a people maintain our faith in God's revelations to us, and as he has left them for the government and guidance of mankind, Christ will find a people here who honestly acknowledge the existence of God. We concur with the conclusion: "A nation without a God is a people without a guide."

CAUSE FOR DIVORCE.

Cardinal Gibbons, the head of the Catholic Church in America, is credited with having made the following declaration on the subject of divorce, at Omaha, Nebraska:

I am thoroughly opposed to divorces, especially with the privilege of remarrying. Divorce in the family is what anarchy and sedition are in the State. Every good citizen is opposed to sowing the seeds of anarchy in the community, and he ought to feel the same way toward divorce which breaks up the family and thus attacks the life of the State.

When young married people know that it is easy to secure a divorce they will often rush to the courts to seek them, while if the law did not allow it they would live together and mayhap forget their differences and love each other. Look at South Carolina where there are no divorces. People live happily there, all of which shows that the laws of the country need changing.

This declaration of the prelate is characteristic of the attitude of the Catholic Church towards a disrupting of the marriage bond, and we are inclined to agree substantially with this view. It is to the credit of South Carolina if the statement of Cardinal Gibbons is correct. If similar laws existed in other States, it would be quite apt to check the mania for hasty marriages.

There can be but one just cause for disrupting the marriage form, and hence the only difference of opinion is to the point whether an actual crime must be committed, or whether there is a possibility for what may be termed constructive criminality. On this point there is considerable difference of opinion, and we have been lately criticised for having expressed a dislike to the impeachment of individuals who have apparently gone wrong, and whose acts have been construed to be acts of wrongdoing when there was extreme doubt as to any intention of committing wrong. It is clear that motive has largely to do with criminality, and in the absence of motive, clearly ascertained, there is, in our opinion, strong reason for avoiding extreme punishment. The Master has said, "Ye are commanded to forgive all men; I will forgive whom I will." The apparent intention of this is to remind us that being finite we are scarcely qualified to sit in correct judgment upon our fellow-men; that He only whose province it is to know the act and the hidden motive behind the act, is qualified for correct judgment. It is well that the thought be impressed upon us all that there is but one just cause for divorce.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

We have a letter for Mrs. H. W. Preston, Stockport, England, which we will hold until some one supplies street address.

Original contributions and articles of general interest have usually limited our letter department, but there being an unusual number of letters on hand, we have decided to make this issue a special letter number. Those writing for this department should be brief and newsy without going into details so purely local in interest that our readers will not care to read what they submit. Kindly remember this. The Saints are glad to read of the progress of the work. All are interested in it. Dwelling too much on local affairs will lessen appreciation of your communications, and, besides, may cause the editors trouble in deciding what part, if any, should be used, keeping in view, as they always try to do, the greatest possible good for everybody. We consider our letter department as a most important one, and want to please everybody, if possible. However, we have a great deal of difficulty in getting some of the letters in suitable shape for publication. We realize that letters are like testimonies: quite often the simple, humble letter bears a stronger message than more pretentious ones.

The next number of the SAINTS' HERALD Historical Series will be by Elder T. W. Williams, pastor of the church in Los Angeles, California. The Saints are well acquainted with Brother Williams, both as a speaker and a writer. They know his style to be concise, vigorous, and pleasing. We are sure that they will enjoy and appreciate the forthcoming article which will be entitled, "Joseph Smith's first vision."

In last week's issue the article, "The proper course in the preparation of sermons," failed to show the writer's name. This was a paper prepared by Bro. Hyrum O. Smith and read by him at a meeting of the Third Quorum of Seventy.

A sister writes us from Chetek, Wisconsin, that certain Methodists of that place make the statement that on a recent visit to Salt Lake City they went to see the Mormon Temple and that thereon they saw inscribed these words: "Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints." The sister has denied the truth of such statement and wants us to make it clear that there is no connection between us and the Utah church. It seems incredible that anyone making any claim to a knowledge of the situation, would not know that there never was any connection between us and Utah Mormonism, and never can be under conditions existing in Utah. If the word Reorganized is inscribed on the Mormon Temple in Salt Lake City we have never before heard of it; it is there contrary to the will of every true Latter Day Saint, and we brand the statement as false; because in the nature of things it could not be there, and such a thing would be just as distasteful to our people as it would be to anybody else. If Chetek Methodists or other citizens wish to inform themselves, let them inquire of Governor Carroll, of Iowa, or of Senators Dolliver and Cummins, of Iowa, or of Senator Burrows of Michigan. These men are prominent and know the differences between us and Utah Mormonism.

By report from Elder J. W. Wight we learn that the baptisms for the last quarter in his field number one hundred forty-eight. A pretty fair showing.

LAMONI ITEMS.

Elder A. Carmichael, business manager of the Herald Publishing House, arrived last week from California, bringing his family. He preached Sunday morning.

Full equipment has been installed and Lamoni's waterworks system is in operation. Homes are being connected as fast as possible.

The Straight Road

PURE AND SPURIOUS CHRISTIANITY.

The crying need of the world to-day is the application in and to their lives of the true principles of the religion of Christ. True Christianity is that system of moral and spiritual ethics revealed through and taught by Christ and his ordained ministers, a record of which is written in the Bible—God saw the world under the bondage of sin and so loved mankind that he sent his Son that whosoever believed in him might obtain a freedom from this bondage of sin.

Socrates said: "We must wait till some one comes from God to teach us." Plato, another heathen philosopher, said: "It is necessary that a law-giver be sent from heaven to instruct us." Nicodemus said: "We know thou art a teacher come from God." So we present in harmony with the Bible Jesus Christ as the greatest teacher, law-giver, leader, witness and commander that ever trod the earth.

Jesus emphasized the thought that strict and complete obedience is necessary to a fullness of life hereafter: "Man shall live by every word of God." Also in sending his disciples as teachers to the world, he said: "Teach them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." He said again: "If ye continue in my word ye shall know the truth and the truth shall set you free."

Jesus was an innovator in that he introduced a strange and novel doctrine. He was an exclusionist in that he did not accept the churches and creeds of this day, stating: "You make void the commandments of God by your traditions." Told them to "repent and believe the gospel." There are creeds and systems of religions to-day by the hundreds, each differing from all others in some doctrinal point. The thinking mind is bewildered as it goes out to find a church home. If Jesus was to appear in Oakland to-day at which church would he worship—under which creed would he find a welcome? The logical answer would be that church and under that creed that would most closely harmonize with the creed or doctrines he taught and in whose pulpit and pews there would be a welcome to the same divine Holy Ghost that was poured out on the ancient church. So let us take the blessed Bible as our guide book and go in search of such a church.

Jesus said, in John 14:21: "He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me." Jesus as a commander gave commands and we must obey them else we love him not. In sending out his apostles he said, Mark 16:15, 16: "Go ye preach the gospel to every creature; he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Baptism was then a command. Again we read, Acts 2:37, 38: "They said, Men and brethren, what shall we do? Peter said unto them, Repent, and be baptized, every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and you shall receive the Holy Ghost, for the promise is for all." Peter held the keys of the kingdom and he taught the way into said kingdom was by faith, repentance and baptism for the remission of sins. If Peter is to be the doorkeeper of the New Jerusalem he will either have to change his creed or exclude those who do not comply with the law as given by himself on Pentecost when under the spirit of inspiration. It may be possible to find churches that teach the above but let us look again at our guidebook, Hebrews 6:1. Paul enumerates the principles of the doctrine of Christ, as repentance, faith, baptism, and the laying on of hands. This last doctrine was taught and practiced in Christ's church for the reception of the Holy Ghost, as may be found in Acts 8:17; 19:6. Why do we not hear the clergy preach as did Peter on Pentecost? Why not practice as Peter and John and Paul did anciently? These doctrines and ordinances were essential then and are just as binding to-day.

How can we preach Christ as a divine teacher without teaching these, his doctrines? How can the clergy of our day represent Jesus as the commander and fail to tell the world about these doctrines that were revealed through him and perpetuated by his apostles? Why ostracise the name of Joseph Smith and cast aside those who believe in the message he bore to the world when we discover the church he organized, the doctrine he taught, the Spirit bestowed upon the church, are each and all an exact counterpart to the church and doctrine and spirit of the church of Christ? For what false doctrine are we condemned? For what sin was he slain? The angel of Revelation 14:6, has come, the church is once more established with all the ancient officers and doctrines and the Lord is recognizing his church as formerly. A further investigation of this doctrine is solicited.

LEAVES FROM LIFE.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF ELDER D. R. BALDWIN.—NO. 3.
EXPERIENCES IN REAL PIONEER MISSION WORK.

On September 9, 1899, I entered into my first debate with Binum Black at Ravenden Springs, on the subject of continued revelation, at which time all their arrangements to erect a house of worship at that place were abandoned after the matter was well under way. Again, on November 20, of the same year, we held a week's debate on church propositions at Martin Creek and Black had a lying report of the debate published in his paper, the Eye Opener, at Ravenden Springs, whereupon said paper died in spasms.

On August 13, 1900, Sr. Ella F. Reeves, of Martin Creek, Arkansas, was healed of a cancer by the power of God under the hands of Elder Joseph Ward and the writer.

December 23 to 28, 1901, I was in debate on church propositions with Prof. John L. Fry, a Campbellite, at Oconee, Arkansas, during which time I ate with my opponent at his own table, and slept by his side in the same bed. I was among strangers and could secure no help. I had to be governed by his moderator who acted the gentleman from start to finish, but I can not say so much for the professor. This debate marked the turning period of his life along political lines, from overwhelming successes to ignoble defeats.

In November, 1902, I was on my way to the vicinity of Center, and at four o'clock on Friday morning, the 21st, in open vision, I seemed to be covered with dirty, ill-favored, blear-eyed, little black cats. I picked them off one by one and made them turn lively somersaults as I threw them from the high porch. I understood these unsightly feline parasites presaged something unusually unpleasant, but I knew not what. On the 23d I preached at Cove schoolhouse. At the close Elder W. H. Hulett, of the Campbellite Church, asked a few questions in a kind way. I at once recognized the soft fur of the little cats against my cheek.

This night I dreamed of seeing a large man in a stooping attitude gazing steadily at the people through an opening in a large black hood which he held over his face. A voice said to me, "He is practicing the black art." I then noticed that the people were passing under his influence and seeing things through his eyes. I stepped forward, broke the spell, and exposed his wicked work. This greatly enraged him. Advancing, he fixed his glittering eyes upon me and made a threatening, vehement address. His dark complexion, bloated face, and white, projecting tusks formed an aspect long to be remembered. I waved him back and he retreated from the motion of my hand. A break now occurred in the drama. The next play was concise and vivid. I held the floor and was addressing the audience, with untold liberty, while my opponent had stretched himself at full length on a bench over near the wall.

At the close of my meeting on the 26th, Hulett got very boisterous; he raved and pitched and bawled like a wild broncho. He inferred that I was a lying hypocrite because I had called him brother, and swore that we were not forty-seventh cousins. On the 27th, he filed objections in a rapid manner for thirty minutes, during which he called me brother three times. He had mellowed down considerably. At the beginning of my meeting on Saturday night, the 29th, Elder Hulett entered with a small posse of men. He came forward to the stand, while his companions found seats back close to the door. I perceived clearly that their intent was evil; but I felt strong and secure. After the sermon (which was a stirring one) Hulett commenced to rave in a noisy, angry manner, and used but little reason. His menacing, vicious nods, wicked, glaring eyes, and impudent sarcasm reminded me vividly of my dream. I made no reply to him, only sang in full note a few verses of No. 1116, Saints' Harp.

"The pure testimony poured forth in the Spirit Cuts like a keen two-edged sword,
While hypocrites now are most sorely tormented,
Because they're condemned by the word."

I announced a lecture at eleven o'clock the next day on the Book of Mormon, and as Hulett had said mean things about the book, I asked him to occupy half of the time. He promised to be on hand. I noticed that Bro. Armand Nuckles stayed right by me and that a young man rode his horse close behind the wagon, and stayed over night with others, where I did; but not until two days later did I learn that the young man was one Mr. Edwards who overheard Bennett and Wiggs, who accompanied Hulett, threaten to do the old man up. It was all clear to me now that the presence of my alert bodyguard that I was not aware of, prevented mob violence; for they were heard to say, "Those eyes of Nuckles' give the whole thing away." On the 30th I enjoyed unusual liberty in my lecture, which lasted ninety minutes, but neither Hulett nor his cohorts were present. On my way from meeting I again thought of my dream. My opponent had retired.

Heavy rains now boomed the streams to danger point, so we opened meeting on the 1st of December at Bettis Schoolhouse on our side of Big Creek. On the 2d I was powerless to maintain order. Several times some went to the door and whispered and eyed me closely. I knew the mob spirit was rife. Soon "Joe Bob" Hulett, a brother of W. H. and also a Campbellite preacher, bobbed up and poured in a growsome mixture and broke up my meeting, giving me no chance to dismiss. I was alone and in the presence of a dangerous crowd. The night was exceedingly dark. I was inclined to slip into the brush out of their sight, but the brooks were raging and gurgling among the rocks and I was nearly five miles from my stopping place. I would have to lay in the woods or stay with the lantern until I got across the creeks. At this juncture the Lord flashed into my soul a positive but jovial attitude, so that I mingled freely with the coarse crowd and was not harmed.

The next night I was not alone. Brother Nuckles' presence carried much weight. I sternly refused to be disturbed, enjoyed good liberty, and after dismissing orderly, we all sat down and listened to Hulett's hateful thrusts for nearly thirty minutes. When he sat down I related the vision of black cats, showing with what velocity I made them change ends, and said, "Now in like manner do I propose to jerk the hides from the last one of these filthy little cat-like objections this man can urge against the work of God." Then I dispatched a few after the short order method, much to the amusement of the crowd. Hulett fairly boiled over and gave vent to the following furious poem:

"He calls me a cat.
He's a little, lousy, lop-eared, hound pup;
This an educated imported-foreign-off-preacher
Is a low down, stinking liar.
He's a mangy, sheep-killing dog," etc.

In a short, audible prayer, I asked God to forgive the man, "for he does not know what he is doing." One Mr. Hurst took me to one side and congratulated me for my "gall." He plead with me to leave a regular appointment, "for" said he, "the Campbellites have made a practice of running all other ministers away. I am so glad that at last they have run up against one that they can't budge."

On Friday and Saturday nights Hulett made savage runs at me, but on both occasions I singed his nose closer than ever before. After my sermon on Sunday, a third champion, one Elder Wiggs, appeared on the arena and did his do, but failed to strike fire. Monday night I rode Brother Lock's young mule who was baffling the young men of the neighborhood with his bucking proclivities, and the enemy laid another plan to get rid of me. They drew my rope reins into so many knots that while I was untying it all the others rode off down the hill. Of course this set my mule all on nettles. They had cut my stirrup strap almost in two in a place where I failed to see it.

When I finally got mounted and started down the hill they rushed out from the brush behind me, slapping their sides and stamping their feet, expecting to see the old man hit the ground, for they knew that the mule became unmanageable if any dashed up behind him.

Now, for some cause not known to either them or myself, I had perfect control of the animal, and rode off smoothly, knowing nothing of the condition of my stirrup strap until the next day. I could then see clearly how that a higher power than man had been present and forestalled the deep-laid plans of men and devils.

I was not bothered again until the 13th. They had tried to bluff me with a challenge for debate, and I had submitted fair propositions. They had fixed up another on the back of the original paper, leaving great loopholes out of which to slip. They now brought them forward with a great bluster, daring me to sign my own paper. I showed up their crooked work and when Hulett saw all his plans turned against him, he grew desperate so that on the 15th he waylaid me and swore that he would "spoil" my face. A higher power stayed his vengeance, so that I walked away in peace.

Thus ended a three weeks' siege and as I walked away from that part of the country I soliloquized as follows: "No less than one dozen times I have been chewed up and spit out in quick succession by three of their carnivorous beasts, and still I live. I think that in all my days I have not been called a liar so many times as within the last three weeks. That does not hurt me, for I know I am innocent. It rather helps me to feel my relationship with the Holy Nazarene. Oh, Lord, lay not these gross insults to the charge of these men, for they are blinded by the influence of him whom they serve! Deal gently with them. Thy will, and not mine, be done."

I blush when I think of refined people reading some of these coarse, vulgar expressions, but I do not know how to depict to your understanding the disgusting scenes of an Arkansas bullfight without using some of their brutish forms. I would prefer not being grizzled with such stock, but the few Saints there were lonely, being mistreated, persecuted, tormented.

The next time I did ministerial work in that country was in February, 1904. I found both of these schoolhouses in ashes; so I did my preaching in Center, known to be the hotbed of Campbellism of that country, and again W. H. Hulett was present and did very wickedly. But in two weeks' time the poor man lay a corpse. His brother, "Joe Bob," and also their sister who had opposed the work and boasted of having tried to poison Elder C. J. Spurlock, soon followed on, all in the prime of life. The Saints did all that lay in their power to administer relief and comfort to the afflicted and their bereft families.

From September 24 to October 13, 1903, I opened up the work on Cove Island, Arkansas, where the members of the Christian Church sent after their champion, Elder George Kirk Patric, whom Satan entered and caused to kill his own cause and his individual influence, so that the following was spread on their public blackboard.

SUICIDE.

We the Jurors who sat in the case of Elder George Kirk Patric, deceased, do find that he came to his death by his own hands. (Signed) Citizens of Cove Island.

The man stopped preaching, nor did the Christian Church have another sermon preached on the island for four years.

March 12 to 17, 1905, engaged in a debate with Reverend Lawrence, of the Baptist Church on Cove Island, Elder W. P. Pickering acting as my moderator, and I baptized five at the close of the debate. But as Elders Moler and Pickering had done able work there the debate should be considered as the last straw that broke the camel's back, for the best citizens on the island and the backbone of Campbellism were baptized. The Baptist people closed the schoolhouse against us at the close of the debate. Elder Pickering predicted that inside of three years the Latter Day Saints would preach to larger crowds at the schoolhouse than the Baptists would get out of their church, and that very season their pastor was deposed for being too familiar with the sisters, their congregation was thrown into a seething turmoil, and the third year they had no minister, no influence, and no congregation, while our elders preached to good crowds in the schoolhouse.

From March 5 to 11, 1906, by the help of the Lord and Elder W. P. Bootman, we withstood the slanderous torrent of misrepresentation and vanquished the enemy again at Center, in a debate with F. M. Strickland, of Batesville, Arkansas.

Passing many stirring events that occurred at Salem, Cedar Bluff, Portia, Coal Hill, Imboden, Black Rock, and various other places where I was several times threatened with personal violence, I will mention one in this connection that occurred at Dagonio, Missouri, where in company with Elder C. Quick I preached in August and September, 1908: One Lemreaux Hart, a young man of the baser sort, tried to work up a mob to "rock" us, but his career was soon brought to an end. On about the 15th of August at our meeting, a contention arose over which he got stabbed with a knife. On the night of the 23d he became a raving maniac with fever, so that it took strong men to hold him onto his bed, and the poor fellow died a most wretched death on the 4th of September.

It must not be thought that the writer takes any undue glory to himself because of the foregoing plain summary of facts, for there is another fact that belongs with them; many, many times have I been confronted in the most humiliating manner by my own weakness. I am so thoroughly imbued with a knowledge that the hand of Omnipotence is in this work that when in line of duty I have no fears. I want to express my gratitude that our loving Father has not suffered defeat to come to this wonderful work when entrusted to one so much inferior to his opponents along visible lines. I want to magnify the prophetic statement that "no weapon framed against this work shall prosper." They may seem to so far as human eyes can see, but before God they are honeycombed with their own destruction.

I will here mention a peculiar physical experience of my own: No matter how sweltering the temperature, or how uncomfortably warm I may be clad, I have never suffered inconvenience from heat when speaking in public, if I enjoy enough of the Spirit to give me liberty. I need no handkerchief when speaking, for I never perspire one drop; but when my discourse ends the pores open and I sweat freely. If, however, from any cause the Spirit be withheld and I try to preach, I can come about as near spoiling with the heat as anyone else.

I no longer chafe under the harness if things fail to come my way. I may illustrate this thought by copying a little from my notebooks.

Saturday, March 15, 1902.

"Lord, some refused to listen
And whistled while I talked;
And of your sacred message
Made faces, sneered, and mocked.
I will leave it all with thee, Lord,
I will leave it all with thee,
I will do my duty promptly,
And leave them all with thee."

Preaching at Catalpa, January, 1908.

One Mr. M. lives hard by; he is a conundrum, for he refuses to answer a civil question without trying to insult me. This makes me curious, so I seek opportunities to speak to him and study his nature. Three days later. I am growing more curious every day to discover his sunny side while he grows sour and more sour. He sees me coming and hies into the house to prevent me speaking to him, but at the door he caught up his year old baby and warmly embraced it as he disappeared. I love that man because he loves babies.

My! Isn't this mud and slush just horrid? Yes, love, just horrid enough to make our home all the more cheerful when we reach it. Let me set you across.

Hello, there, my little man, who are you going to be when you are a man? Oh, come along there. What in this world is there about that dirty, little scamp that attracts you so?

"Yes, dear, his face is grim with dirt,
He has old clothes and ragged shirt,
But see that twinkle in his eyes.
I think of when I was just his size;
Everybody turned up their nose,
And I thought the world was made of prose.
Now I read a poem in every face,
Hatred is gone and love has its place."

On meeting my old friend Professor Fry with whom I have had warm debates:

B. "Hello! I am glad to shake your hand again. What are you doing for the world these days?"

Fry. "Well, sir, I am working for Uncle Sam; getting over a hundred dollars per month and all expenses paid. Are you making that much out of your preaching?"

B. "I see you have not found the Lord's measuring line yet; he estimates manhood by what we give to our fellows, not by what we take from them. You need to study your Bible yet."

I spent a part of the winter of 1907 and 1908 in the Boston Mountains, a good day's drive from railroad, where a heavy percentage of the doors fasten with a string or possibly a wooden latch. I learned that the day of wild-cat distilleries is not a thing of the past, for one was found in operation right in the vicinity where I was preaching.

Monday morning of Christmas week I walked several miles through a fresh snow, borrowed an ax and cut and carried enough wood to do me a week and piled it in Patterson Spring Schoolhouse where meeting had been appointed. The stovepipe just reached the joists and vomited the smoke into the loft. I swept out the snow and there put in the most of my daylight hours working on my manuscript of history and preaching at eleven a. m. I had agreed to spend Christmas night with one of my hearers, and got to the place just at dark; my host had taken his bed in consequence of having imbibed too much wild-cat whisky. The house was old and low and smoky. A flickering glim from two green sticks in the shabby old fireplace was the only light. From this I saw the floor was made of broad, rough boards, minus one, forming a dangerous chasm. Part of the loft was gone, and some kind of a human was humped down on the hearth. Four grown daughters and their mother were trying to get supper in the lean-to kitchen without fuel. Now my companion turned out to be deacon of the Baptist Church whose tongue, from some cause, was loose at both ends, but I was feeling unusually grum and did not care to talk. The deacon "knowed" all about "Old Joe Smith who fixed posts and planks across Grand River and bragged how he could walk on the water, and seed him pull letters out of the top of a sycamore tree with a string and claim they come from heaven," etc., etc.

After a long time and he had run down, he wanted to know what I thought about it? So I growled out, "I don't care how many times Mr. Smith walked on the water, or how many letters he got from heaven either. What difference does that make to me?" But his tongue wagged on for an hour or so during which time he had told what a sharp smart man "Old Joe" was. Finally I awoke out of my stupor and said, "Now, sir, don't you know that all of your yarns can not be true? A boy six years old would know that others could see posts and planks as well as he. Joseph Smith was a fool or he never undertook such fool pranks as that. You say he was a sharp man. So your other stories are not true."

I never learned whether it was this bit of logic that silenced the deacon, for at this juncture the man of the house got up from his drunken swoon and they had a hilarious laugh over the effects of his grog. Supper was called and we filed out of one dark room into another. The smoking, flueless lamp sat to one side of the room; the corn pone, fat meat, molasses, and coffee were disposed of, and we were glad enough to get off to bed.

On the night of the 27th I took the following observations of the quarters where I was domiciled: A single log house, twenty-one feet square, six logs high; no upper joists and of course no loft. A partition runs east and west and reaches halfway to the roof. Floor in south room fourteen inches lower than in the front room. Door in south eight inches too short and three inches too narrow to fill the opening. Board eight inches wide, on the outer edge of the front door, swings by one nail to the upper cleat and fastens with a cloth string wound around a nail. A piece of a chair, a trunk, and an old ox yoke are the only seats. Pigs run in and out at leisure. Spring twelve feet west of the house, boxed with lumber four feet square, covered loosely with rails, each end resting on the ground, surface water drains in from three sides. The top that has been cut from a large oil can, with a wooden plug in the nozzle, serves all purposes of a wash pan. There is no door to the cook stove, and the wood for the fireplace is sixteen inches too long. I have great relish for this frugal meal of crackling bread and milk. The cow stands with her head in the front door chewing her quid with great content. Here lives a young couple comparatively happy. The husband is tanning a cat skin for a head to his homemade banjo. The spirit of the gospel is not found here, still I enjoy this night's lodging as I count forty holes through which the lunar orbs play peek-a-boo with the inmates, who so joyously share with me the little they have. They are renters living in a tenement house (?) that belongs to a rich farmer with whom I have also lodged, so

I ate of the cream
And supped of the whey,
Wealth brings peace it may seem,
But it will not stay;
For it layeth a snare
At the rich man's door,
Who refuseth to share
With the needy poor.

There is nothing flattering connected with my work in this State. I have traveled many thousand miles in numerous counties; have preached in over a hundred places; met with opposition, and by the help of God I have vanquished my enemies with the powerful weapon of love. I have allayed much prejudice, made many warm friends, and baptized a few. I was led one season to deliver lectures on the Book of Mormon in many places. After the lectures it would often seem to me that the people did not know what I had talked about, but the Lord had directed me and given much liberty and the people had listened with all attention. The sequel was the Lord's and not mine. Many of these experiences seemed more like dreams than like realities, still I gained the reputation of being intensely awake.

I have thrown my whole soul into the Master's cause in a patient, prayerful, unreserved manner; and having done my best, I am not uneasy relative to the outcome. Time has wrought important changes. A new college has brought good schools to our door. Our home is again blessed with babies. We are in love with nature and enamored of our mountain home. Four of our sons are earnest, prayerful, spiritually-minded church workers.

Hoping the world will be made better on account of our lives, I bid you a hearty God-speed. Adieu.

A Woman's Letter on Motherhood.

[Will not those who have the privilege of casting their vote either for or against the terrible scourge of our land find food for thought in the following, taken from the Cleveland Press, May 24, 1909?—EDITOR.]

To the Editor of The Press: It is becoming more and more common to hear the charge made against the American woman that she has lost or crushed out the God-given desire to become a wife and mother.

Various reasons are assigned for this, but I have seen no mention of what I believe to be the principal cause. I believe it is because our nation has refused to protect the home that the American woman refuses to become a wife and mother. She has wept, prayed, and petitioned our national and state governments to throw around the homes of the country some protection from the greatarest curse this world has ever known; but instead of granting her request, this "land of the free and home of the brave" has gone into partnership with the home destroyer; so the only reply weeping, petitioning womanhood receives is: "Go, make homes; be patient; bear children and each year we will lay only about one hundred thousand of them in drunkard's graves!"

Besides the toll of death the mother knows that other hundreds of thousands of our children will be brought by drink to almshouses, county jails, penitentiaries and asylums.

It is not that a woman loves a poodle dog more than a baby that she chooses the dog.

Does not society itself place the higher value on the dog? If the woman pays her dog tax and puts a collar on the dog, the law protects her pet from theft and slaughter; but tell me, if you can, how does the state protect her boy?

At best the state JAILS the boy and breaks his mother's heart when he falls into temptation and yields.

How can the mother protect her boy when society places the stamp of its approval upon drink and drinking places?

Don't you know that when a woman brings a child into the world she gambles a life for a life? She deliberately turns from health and goes alone down far into the valley of the shadow of death, not knowing if she shall remain there or if she shall come forth leading by the hand another tiny little life.

Do you realize that thereafter her life and her aims are submerged in the loving service and care that shall rear a new human being to carry forward the marvelous chain of human life?

Ought not the whole world love and protect her when she, counting the agony and the travail as naught, rejoices that she has brought forth a child?

Yet, and especially if it be a man child, there is from the first one haunting fear. The fear that her boy may fall to the level of the brute through liquor. The fear of that curse which of all things can make him lose his love for his fellows, his mother and his God. And yet you collect a tax from saloons and say that you are "not the guardians of our brother."

I know, Mr. Editor, I know. I know how the mother watches over the baby, the child, the youth, and the son grown to man's estate. How she watches over him sleeping and waking; warns him of the dangers of drink, but too often it availeth not. Ere the blush of youth has left his cheeks she has seen him offered as a sacrifice on the altar of a nation's greed. What wonder that a woman buys a ranch, goes into sheep raising, instead of raising boys?

Wool growers are protected, and if the wolves should abound our government would pay so much a head for their destruction; but the destroyer of our souls is protected by law—his business is legalized.

When the voters of the country make the raising of children a safe business, then will our daughters become wives and joyful mothers of children; and there will be great rejoicing throughout the land, and may that day come soon.

"Chief of sinners though I be,
Jesus shed his blood for me;
Died that I might live on high,
Died that I might never die.
As the branch is to the vine,
I am his, and he is mine;
Chief of sinners though I be,
Christ is all in all to me."

An important feature of Woman's Home Companion this summer is the reminiscences of the late venerable Edward Everett Hale. The August issue contains, in place of the regular monthly chapter of the reminiscences, the publication of which commenced before Doctor Hale's death, a beautiful tribute to the eminent writer and minister by his personal friend, W. H. McElroy.

SOUTH ADDISON, MAINE, July 12, 1909.

Editors Herald: I will try and give you a brief outline of how the Saints in Eastern Maine celebrated the Declaration of Independence and are rejoicing before their Lord and Master.

We have had the pleasure of entertaining Bishop Bullard and listening to his instructive and spiritual sermons, which are indeed food for the soul. Through his faithful service two precious souls were born into the kingdom of God on that day of liberty (my husband and oldest boy). It was indeed a day of rejoicing among the few Saints here, as well as the angels, (but not among the friends). Although the enemy was and is busy, we had the peace and recognition of the Master which passeth all understanding.

On July 5, Brother Bullard informed us that he wanted to go to Jonesport before leaving for his field in the West, July 6. "God's ways are mysterious, his wonders to perform." He was directed there to celebrate another day of liberty by leading two of the sisters' husbands into the waters of baptism, amid the noise that usually salutes the ear on that day. We realize whose hand is over the honest in heart, and may the good work roll on till all are gathered in who are willing to take upon them the meek and lowly Christ for their guide.

May we all try to serve him better each day. He is worthy of a whole-hearted service and a walk of uprightness before him. We will be abundantly rewarded here and life eternal in the world to come.

We all feel sad for not having Bishop Bullard here in this mission, but time may reveal the wisdom of the change.

Your sister in Christ,

BLANCHE REYNOLDS.

WILBURTON, OKLAHOMA, July 12, 1909.

Dear Herald: My heart has been made to rejoice, many times, that I am a Latter Day Saint. How much joy and comfort we find in this great work, if we will only live it, be faithful, and do our duty! When dark clouds hover over us, we can exercise so much more faith in our prayers; then when we have done our duty we are entitled to the blessings God has promised. His promises are binding and this is why a great many of us do not receive the blessings that we often ask for. Pray and be humble when everything is bright, and when darkness comes our prayers will be answered and the darkness will turn away. Take courage, there is nothing to discourage us if we will keep this beautiful and soul-saving gospel ever present in our minds. Do not forget you are a Latter Day Saint. Keep this in mind, that you are a child of God and that he watches and cares for you every minute and hour. You may seem lonely but you are never alone. God is always with you. In trials and troubles you have a strong arm to lean on.

All of us have trials, troubles, and disappointments along our life's road, but who expects to inherit this earth in its redeemed condition, on flowery beds of ease? God's people must be a tried people. The trials make it easier for us, though they may be hard. They keep us meek and lowly. Look at the life of Christ, the son of God. How rough was his road? Do not think that you have a hard time, and do not go around murmuring about your troubles. Take them to God in faith and prayer. He can help when nobody else can. Remember some one else may have a more rugged way than you. Study to help brighten others' pathway and you will get returns for it. It will make you rejoice. You are only one of multiplied thousands, but you can do countless good. Put your life to service. God sees every little frown that you allow to creep over your face. Make the world better by you living in it. Count your time precious. Be kind, patient, ever ready, up and doing. Put your whole life in this work. Do not sleep and drag around half dead in this great work. I do not see one moment for waste. Get up and hustle. Do not depend on the poor, sacrificing missionaries. You—every one of us has just as much to do as they. Our work is just as great as that of the missionaries. The mother's work is very wide and great, to teach and raise the little ones and live a righteous, noble life; to set a good example for the little ones to follow, especially if she is a missionary's wife. My father is a missionary, but mamma has just as much work to do as papa. Her sacrifice is just as great. We are all preachers. We can talk the principles of this glorious work. Wherever we are, teach it to our playmates and neighbors.

The work here at Wilburton is progressing. We have a good Sunday school well attended.

Last Sunday we had an outing at a nice spring near Wilburton which was enjoyed by all. Several nice speeches were made.

Our Religio society is very interesting and educational. We had a good Book of Mormon lecture last Friday evening by Bro. Willie Peacock. May God bless all his children, is my prayer,

Your sister in the one faith,

RUTH ERWIN.

NIANGUA, MISSOURI, WEBSTER COUNTY, July 26, 1909.

Dear Herald: I wish to inform you of a medical spring on our farm. It lays one mile from the Frisco depot of this place, which is thirty miles east of Springfield, and six miles from Marshfield. We would give some one a good show to open up a health resort, but had rather give the Saints a chance; so thought this the best way.

The spring lies out in the meadow about three hundred yards from the spring branch; there are several springs on the place, but this one we dug down about three feet and there seemed to be a lake of water. As we could not dip it dry we began to haul the water to use, in May of last year. We live at Niangua and my husband and myself have had better health than for years. He has had miner's consumption, catarrh, chronic bowel trouble, and other ailments. We sent the water to Columbia, Missouri, before the spring was sunk down. They only put the tests on; said "the water is so extremely pure that I would doubt it to be a natural water, if you had not said it came from a spring. It contains but 3 2-10 grains of aquite of mineral residue per gallon, and is free of organic matter. That this water should benefit you should be expected, as it will dissolve and remove from the human system detentions, substances which a harder water does not act upon." I have copied a part of the letter I received from Prof. Paul Schweetzer, Ph. D., Columbia, Missouri.

Hoping this may be a help to others as it has been to us, with best wishes to all, I am,

Your sister in the one faith,

MRS. R. M. BRADLEY.

FOSSTON, MINNESOTA, July 18, 1909.

Dear Editor: I would like to ask the Saints who take the Autumn Leaves and HERALD, if there are any Saints living at North Yakima, Washington. There is land to be opened up in 1910. If there are any Saints living there or any that are acquainted with the country, would you please write me, giving the bright and dark side of the country? They tell me it is a fine place and that it does not rain there in winter.

Thanking you for your kindness, I am,

A sister in the gospel,

MRS. ALVEE MEEHEN.

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLORADO, July 10, 1909.

Dear Herald: For many months my pen has been silent to our publications. Have resolved many times to renew my efforts along this line, but when I do make an effort, it to me seems so weak I consign it to the wastebasket before the editor gets a chance. Nevertheless, I want the dear old friends of Des Moines District to know we have not apostatized, neither have we forgotten them.

After journeying westward, we did not lay down our weapons of Christian warfare, but we have tried to make ourselves useful instruments in His hands ever since our arrival in this beautiful mountain city. The work in this part of God's vineyard is advancing, though sometimes quite slowly.

This is touring season here and the going and coming greatly interferes with the church attendance at times. Some street efforts are being made now which we trust may result in good to God's work here, or perchance elsewhere. At the street services, the speaker little knows to whom he is speaking. Some of his most attentive listeners may be here to-day, but many miles away on the morrow. God alone must water and nourish the seed sown, and surely he will, for so he has promised.

As August days draw near, we are made to keenly recall those dear old days when we were permitted to meet with his people at reunions. The incidents of those days are as jots placed upon the most precious pages of memory's tablet. The people of the West, in this country at least, surely do not know how to have reunions, and in fact I believe they are a thing of the past here. How we miss them and the good reunion spirit that must always prevail to make them a feast to the hungry souls present!

May God bless in abundance his children, wherever they may be, who are striving to attain to greater heights.

Your sister,
ELSIE RUSSELL HARRIS.

MYFORD, CALIFORNIA, July, 14, 1909.

Dear Saints: Being one of the isolated ones I enjoy every line of our dear HERALD, but if one part more than another it is certainly the letters.

So far I have seen no word of special commendation for that most excellent editorial, "Preach the word." I, personally, was well pleased to know that "those in authority" held that conception of the truth, and I most earnestly pray that it might soon be comprehended among the members. For, it was believing that such understanding moved the priesthood that I received baptism by the Latter Day Saints. The people have heard of Jesus, and of religion, and of theories, but, oh, we do need to have repentance preached to this generation—repentance and baptism, the simple saving ordinances of life eternal. We should be taught in our local services that it is not outward manifestations but the interior dispositions of the heart that our Father looks upon and into. "The fruits of the Spirit are love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance" (Galatians 5:22), exercised as toward our Father who ordains the daily circumstances of his children. That the works of our hands are for this material world only and that our labors of love are to develop character, that we may become able to abide in Zion, the city of the Saints.

Jerusalem, the city without foundations, whose builder and maker is God—the city of the Great King, the seat of the true spiritual church, the mother of us all and not the city of the Jews, but a heavenly city of the living—the now living God. (Galatians 4:26; Hebrews 12:22.)

Zion, the city of the gospel children under the Christ, the Prince of Peace. Zion that now is unseen but real. Zion is now; for Zion was taken up into heaven—that is made invisible to fleshly eyes. (Isaiah 8:18; Psalm 48:1, 2, 12; Psalm 50:2.)

Remember, I beseech you, the appearance of our Lord Jesus Christ to the disciples assembled when he took fish and honey and did eat, and said, "See and feel; a spirit hath not flesh and bones." (Luke 24:38-43). Can we not yet realize a resurrected body? And that they are often near us though unseen? Did not Paul say, "Behold, I show you a mystery"? Saints, these things are all now, but the veil of the flesh stands between us and them. So, likewise, is there an evil spiritual world.

Babylon, the Great, the city of Satan, the seat of the false spiritual church. The mother of harlots and all abominations. (Revelation 2:13.) Harlots, false organizations among men?

Sodom and Gomorrah, the twin cities of the evil children, under Beelzebub, the prince of devils and of this present evil world. (Revelation 11:8; Matthew 9:34.) These things are all in existence now. Realities, but unseen by us, and they do not refer to organizations nor to cities among men. Read your Bibles, Saints. How can we denominate any organization as being of the Devil? Are we not told the world is the field and that the tares are sown broadcast among the wheat? Again, how can we say that any church is the only church of Christ? The Saints are in all the world, both in and out of organizations. We read that the Lord has sent forth servants at various times to call the world to repentance and baptism. Organizations have grown up out of necessity for the carrying on of the work, and, in the process of time, become burdened with rules and regulations and the ordinances of men—just as we are in danger of doing and as the Lord has said would happen except that the days shall be cut short. "When the Son of Man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?"

In our papers have appeared some very severe remarks concerning the Catholic Church. I wonder if these writers have never read: "With what measure ye mete it shall be measured to you again"? and Michael . . . durst not bring against him [the Devil] railing accusation"? (Jude 9.) I wonder if they have never read the terrible curses and plagues that have been pronounced by God himself and by men of God. Let us take heed. For our God says there are no powers over us, but such as have been ordained of him. (Romans 13:1.)

Who shall say that the Catholic Church has not carried the knowledge of Jesus and the simple sacraments farther and longer than any other, and I, personally, having borne testimony of the Spirit of truth and officers of the latter-day work, desire now and here to bear testimony to the power of the Catholic priesthood, to the grace and blessing I have received at the hands of the sainted Leo XIII, and I verily believe that except for that blessing I would have been unable to receive the latter-day work, but would still be in the dense darkness of the Protestant world. I was raised a Protestant and was, for about twenty years, a member of the Christian or old fashioned Campbellite denomination, and until I received the latter-day baptism. Why? Because they held no creed and I was free to read my Bible by the Spirit's guide; and after receiving the spiritual blessing of the Catholic Church, I was advised to continue as I was until I should receive more light.

Many persons view with alarm the chances that the Catholic Church will perhaps rule this country. Has our God not said that the true Saints can live and abide under any law? What do our books teach us? Does rebellion rise up in your hearts? Put it down and out. They teach us that we must obey the powers under which we chance to live—that they are all ordained of Him—and that we can be children of light and bear the fruits of the Spirit, the peaceable fruits of righteousness, and dwell in Zion, purity of heart, in safety, under any laws. It is said of those who bear the fruits of the Spirit (Galatians 5: 22), "Against such there is no law." "But, and if ye are persecuted, happy are ye."

What is persecution? The brightest saints of all ages have been persecuted by the church itself, before and since the day of our Lord.

When will we cease to war after the flesh, and strive more faithfully to bring into subjection our selfish minds and imaginations. Our weapons are not carnal, therefore how or why should we war against carnal organizations. It depends upon each soul of us to bring our thoughts under obedience to Christ. (2 Corinthians 10: 4, 5.) Let us bring forth the fruits of righteousness, and offer the sacrifices of righteousness, even a broken heart and a contrite spirit, then all our material labors to establish a "family reunion" here in this present world, until we shall be called home, will strengthen our characters and develop our understanding and give us ability to dwell obediently in the heavenly Zion; for not the least trace of rebellion can enter there.

Let us walk in the Spirit here without fear, for, as the mountains are around about Jerusalem, so the Lord is around about his people (Psalm 125: 1), and as a wall of fire about us. "In returning and rest ye shall be saved; in quietness and confidence shall be your strength."—Isaiah 30: 15. Let us have more confidence. There is no law against the faithful Saint, for God dwelleth in Zion, and this is Zion in this visible world, even purity of heart. Read that ninety-first Psalm: No evil shall befall thee; no plague come nigh thy dwelling; nor pestilence; nor destruction. No deadly thing can harm us (Mark 16: 18), and that words shall even be put in our mouths (Matthew 10: 19), if we will keep quiet. No harm can befall us; persecution is the saint's heritage—the Father's chastisement of his own children (Hebrews 12: 5-9). Perfect love casteth out all fear. Let us have confidence.

So many beautiful, saintly lives have been lived in the Catholic Church and their record left for us—a precious heritage. Thomas a Kempis, Mme. Guyon, Brother Lawrence, and many others; let us not judge and condemn lest we be judged and condemned after the same manner. With all her faults and errors the Lord has declared that she shall be purged of all her sins and made pure and white. Notice, that the church, the New Jerusalem, is spoken of as a woman, also the false church, Babylon, as a woman, but not the same woman. The Catholic Church occupies the same position in the world to-day as that of the Jewish church at the time of Christ, and has true and faithful priests, even as the Jews still have, although the royal commission of the gospel has been taken from both and intrusted to another, because of the corruption of the official organization, and if a Catholic should so desire, they should receive baptism and confirmation and still remain with the church, even as the Jews did, even as Jesus Christ has set the example, having received the Melchisedec priesthood, being of a higher order, yet submitting to the lower, for there was found no rebellion in him. Blessed be his name.

But now has come a time when again the traditions and ordinances which organizations acquire through the fallen nature of man, permitting evil to work, must be laid aside and the simple gospel preached as a forerunner of our coming King and the rending of the veil of the flesh as typified at the crucifixion.

These apparent errors are the accumulations of time, the results of ignorance and darkness. Many of them being wise provisions against the enemy of our souls at the time and among the people given. But the enemy is wiser than the children of light, so he subtly takes our weapons and trains them on ourselves, and we, in our mistaken zeal and loyalty, fail to discern between the enactments of men and the principles of the gospel. Praise the Lord that he understands the heart, and though many works be burned, yet the faithful, believing souls shall be saved. Let us be workmen that need not to be ashamed. (1 Corinthians 3: 12-15.) Look at our own conference; see how quickly we could be overburdened with rules and enactments and statements of doctrine; that, as we see on every hand, each new set of people would desire to change to suit new conditions.

I beg of you to receive these things into your minds and to lay them up against a time of need of understanding, when the Spirit will teach the truth as applicable at the time. There is still so much prejudice and rebellious spirit among us—and I plead guilty, and pray that our Father may search and cleanse to the inmost depths.

May the Lord bless us all with the faith that is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen. (Hebrews 11: 1.)

HARRIET M. SMITH.

DES MOINES, IOWA, July 27, 1909.

Dear Herald: A report is current the past week that a discovery of the skeletons of mastodons and prehistoric horses has been made along the bluffs of the Missouri River in Harrison and Monona counties. The remains are said to be of a species never before discovered in Iowa, and indicate that this region along the Missouri River was once the home of gigantic creatures, partly resembling horses and partly elephants.

The ninth biennial report of the Historical Department of Iowa, issued by Edgar R. Harlan, assistant and acting curator of the department, appeared from the press early in the year. Speaking of the mound at Boone, which has been referred to in the HERALD, the report says: "In the spring of 1908, the department explored a mound in Boone County, Iowa. It was ninety by one hundred and ten feet in extreme dimensions, and fourteen feet high. Every precaution was taken to accurately record its original appearance and its every disclosure. Prehistoric stoneworks and other marks of the intelligence of the unknown race were of great interest. A detailed report is in course of preparation by Mr. Van Hynning who has immediate charge of the work. We wish to publish this as soon as the time can be spared from the pressing duties of installing the new museum. The Historical Department should have authority to acquire and hold in trust for the people of the State options on the right of exploring, if not the title to, all such works. Prompt survey of them should be made. Such works are being leveled rapidly and the expense of thoroughly exploring them is so great that science must certainly lose a vast opportunity. Already a number of the burial grounds and town sites of the prehistoric inhabitants of the State of Iowa, which are known to have been situated in the rich alluvial plains of our streams, have been obliterated by the processes of agriculture. Those on the hills will not much longer remain."

In this we find that science tells us that an intelligent and unknown race of people inhabited the State of Iowa. From the above mound were taken several skeletons of human beings, one skull being in an excellent state of preservation. The mound delver assured us, as we stood and looked upon the skull, that it was of a type of man above the Lamanite. But science stands mute before the remains of this intelligent and "unknown race," as to who they were, and when they were here. We patiently await the time when science will find the key which will unlock the mysteries of this unknown race to the world, and which will certainly confirm every statement of the Book of Mormon in regard to the intelligent race of people who inhabited this part of the country.

The report from which we quote in listing the printed matter in the department, and that received during the biennial period, gives the following: Autumn Leaves, Lamoni, Iowa; Journal of History, Lamoni, Iowa; SAINTS' HERALD, Lamoni, Iowa. Of books and pamphlets now in the department it gives: Autumn Leaves, vols. 2 to 5, 18 and 19 (1889-92; 1906-07). SAINTS' HERALD, 1880, 1882, 1883, 1885, 1886, 1890, 1907. Odd newspapers; "Nauvoo (Illinois) Independent, August 9, 1908, "containing an account of the Battle of Athens." Under the head of autograph letters, manuscripts, portraits from Mrs. Mary M. Gilham, Des Moines, "Mormons, newspaper clipping relating to." Among the donors and contributors is listed Zion's Religio Society, Des Moines District.

The report says, "Files of two hundred and eighty-six Iowa newspapers, and of twenty-nine from outside of the State currently received, have been regarded the most valuable feature of the department. They are regularly bound, indexed, and filed in an easily accessible manner. Not a question of importance in any part of the State escapes discussion and record here. The files are consulted daily throughout the year by students, editorial writers, and statisticians. Very frequently calls for their use are made by litigants."

The interest manifested in the Historical Building is shown by the fact that for three months during the latter part of 1908, ten thousand persons visited the department.

Yours with an interest in all that the study of history affords,
A. A. REAMS.

THEODORE, ALABAMA, July 13, 1909.

Editors Herald: It is a great pleasure to me to write or speak or to do whatever is in my power to do for the advancement of this glorious message to man. One who is fully and completely enthused with this wonderful light from heaven to men is made to feel that his or her mission upon earth is not in vain, but there is hope and an assurance that is continually growing brighter and stronger which makes one have a longing desire for the time to come when the trials and hardships we are so accustomed to meet here, will all be over; when we shall meet in the streets of gold where no death nor sorrow shall be.

The writer is still hoping and trusting, praying and working to be counted one among that number who have overcome. The battle is still on and the conflict against sin and Satan must continue until we hear him say, Well done. We feel hopeful and happy in the conflict. I have a rich and lasting experience in the work, just to that extent that I am faithful and diligent in service, and I find that the kind Father has required of me to work diligently and faithfully in order to receive blessings that have come to me in the past. By this, I have comprehended to some extent the great responsibility that has been placed upon man and I am thankful that so much is required of him to do which gives him a chance to rejoice and be happy as a result of having done good service in the Master's cause. I thank God that I have a work to do and that I feel so keenly the great responsibility of doing that work, which I began to perform when I started in obedience to the gospel message and this work of obedience is required of all.

I know by experience that the true, genuine member of the church feels that there is a great responsibility resting upon him, just as soon as he complies with the rules of initiation, by which he becomes a member of the church. After I became a member I learned that the law of tithing was a part of the gospel law and while there was strong opposition against it in that district where I was baptized, I went to work and complied with it, and have kept it up ever since, when I had anything to tithe.

Last spring when I arrived home, the last of March, after making out my annual account to the bishop of the stake, I discovered that I owed twenty-five dollars as tithing and no means with which to pay it, so I secured employment as a common laborer and went to work for one dollar and seventy-five cents per day, until I secured enough money to square the account.

I do not speak of this boastingly, but for the purpose of encouragement to those who are weak or negligent in duty along this line. I felt that I could not feel free away in the mission field as a representative of Christ if I had not kept this part of his law. Now I can speak of that law when necessary with a clear conscience, both publicly and privately, knowing that I have tried to keep in complete harmony with it. Those who are willing to comply with the law, can find a way to comply if they will make an effort.

I have been busily engaged of late in ministerial work along the Gulf Coast of the States of Alabama and Mississippi and I felt well spiritually, but a little on the background physically. I am still able though to make almost a continuous fight against gnats and mosquitoes which are very thick. I sometimes wish I had all the little, old, pesky creatures in a big cannon so that I could send them whirling into the Gulf of Mexico and make quick work of them, and not have to kill them one at a time, and not get them all killed either.

Any of the Saints or friends of the cause who may desire to correspond with me in regard to the work, can reach me by letter addressed to McKenzie, Alabama, my field address. I am in the field in the interest of the Lord's work with a desire to push the interest of the work into every nook and corner that I can, and I ask the prayers and assistance of all in this important matter. We can not be idlers in the Lord's work and retain a good conscience, so let us be faithful and diligent in our work and the Lord will give us a rich reward. I trust that I may have the consolation of knowing that I have done the best I could, when the struggle here upon earth is ended. I pray the Lord to bless his children in every place that they are working to establish the cause of Zion.

WEST SOMERVILLE, MASSACHUSETTS, July 14, 1909.

Editors Herald: Have mailed you sometime past, since I have been in New York, the daily papers, of much interest no doubt to you, of passing events, which can only be discerned by the Spirit of the Master. To us they are the fulfillments of God's servants' writing, as they were moved upon by the Holy Ghost. The eyes of our understanding have been opened; we appeal to the prophets in former and latter days. The Book of Mormon has been made plain through the new covenant made to us of God. Has given us great enlightenment and settled convictions of plain, unvarnished truths. Shall God's word prevail? It should make Saints faithful to the covenant vows.

We are surely finding favor upon every hand; willing listeners eager to read our claims. Ere long fireside preaching will be the great lever to move the work. I have mailed you for five weeks the Sunday World. My reaching people with our work is not limited by any means, as I go from city to city.

Fraternally yours,

41 LOWDEN AVENUE.

A. N. HOXIE.

"I have troubles of my own," is a slang phrase, but it fits the universal facts. No young man or woman need expect to escape trouble and trial. Somewhere on the road it will come, and the only point is to be prepared and courageous.—Forward.

TRAVERSE CITY, MICHIGAN, July 14, 1909.

Editors Herald: I want to say that I am interested in the Religio work. I can see how God is working through it in preparing his people for more efficient work in the church. Through past years I can see where I have made many mistakes and neglected many opportunities I might have taken hold of and received strength thereby. I desire to profit by the past and not let good opportunities go by unnoticed. Day by day I am brought face to face with the fact that there are many honest people who have not yet heard of the beautiful plan God has ordained to save man by, and realize there is a certain responsibility resting on every Latter Day Saint to bring the gospel to them. I desire to so live and prepare myself that when opportunities present themselves to me, I may say something to further the gospel work, that I may be able to do it in an intelligent manner, that honest people may be able to see the beauty of the gospel brought back by the angel of God.

Dear Saints, I have a testimony to bear of this work wherever I am, that it is of God and that he is working in it. This testimony I received of God and not man. O, I feel so thankful that God has seen fit to reveal himself to me as he has. I have had many spiritual dreams that have helped me much and I have seen visions several different times, when I was wide awake as I am now.

One Sunday last winter when the Saints had met for prayer meeting, God saw fit to send a goodly portion of his Spirit; I was feeling borne down almost to giving up. It seemed that I could not continue longer, but when I arose and bore testimony God saw fit to send a goodly portion of his Spirit and when I sat down, one brother and sister sung a verse of a hymn that no one else seemed to know. While they were singing, I could plainly hear at least four voices of angels singing with them, and it was the sweetest harmony that I ever heard. The verse I will give here.

"Take time to be holy,
Speak oft with thy Lord;
Abide with him always
And feed on his word.
Make friends of God's children,
Help those who are weak;
Forgetting in nothing
His blessing to seek."

Those words have given me much strength and consolation.

I am rejoicing in the gospel and wish I were able to do more to advance the gospel of the Son of God. Saints, the time is short that we have here before we will see the Son of God coming with power and great glory. So let us be up and doing while the day lasts, for the night is coming when we can not work. When it is well with you, remember me in your prayers to God, that I may be able to do what he wants me to do, and say what he wants me to say. The work is on the gain here, there having been several baptisms in the last year. The Sunday school is doing nicely, also the Religio.

Tell Elder David Smith that I would much like to hear from him and get his address; and if this finds its way to the columns of the HERALD, I may write again sometime.

Your brother in the bond of the gospel,
411 NORTH SPRUCE STREET. D. D. DUNCAN.

KNOX, INDIANA, July 20, 1909.

Saints' Herald: Elder Samuel Stroh began preaching services here on the evening of July 2, and continued to and including July 13. Services were well attended for this place, considering the busy time of the year. There seemed to be a greater interest among nonmembers than there has been for a long time.

On July 4, besides having two services at the church, there were services held at the county farm in the afternoon, about one half mile from town, by request of the lady who oversees the home there. Sr. F. J. Mock was at the time staying there until arrangements could be made to take her to some other home. Her desire was to go to the Saints' Home, and Bro. Stroh, being president of the district, was making arrangements while here to get her into the Home when she was taken sick very suddenly and died in about twenty-four hours. She was near seventy-six years of age and almost blind. We believe the Lord saw fit to take her to a better home. Funeral services were held July 8, in the county house parlor, in charge of Bro. Stroh. Sr. Mock, we believe, was well taken care of at the county home. Her husband, Henry Mock, died about a year ago.

There are a few good, faithful Saints here who are trying their best to keep the church work moving, also some not of the church who are helping us, and we hope they will see the need of uniting with the church, for in so doing they will receive greater blessings, providing they live for them.

In the faith,

MISS B. E. LOHSE.

HOWELL, MICHIGAN, July 19, 1909.

Editors Herald: As I take my pen in hand to write a few lines to your valuable columns, it is with a silent prayer in my heart that God will direct my thoughts that what I may write may be of some help and encouragement to some one, for I truly feel my weakness and inability along these lines, and the HERALD is too full of precious things to waste even the space my letter will fill.

Our hearts have not grown cold in the work; indeed we are very much interested and are striving our best to let our lights shine. Though there are only nine or ten of us in number, yet we have our Sunday school and prayer meeting every Sunday morning. They are truly peaceful meetings, and we are sure that God's smile of approval rests upon us, for "our hearts do burn within us."

Isn't it grand, dear Saints, this sweet assurance that we truly are the children of God, who has said he is the beginning and the end, the first and the last, the only Savior of men, beside whom there is no other? Surely his love for us passeth all understanding and we, as weak creatures of the dust, can not fathom the great depths thereof, for though, as it is written, his thoughts and ways are as far above our thoughts and ways as the heavens are above the earth, yet he never forgets us, who are many times ungrateful and thoughtless; never wearies of showering rich blessings upon us and has promised "with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee." We can always trustingly rely on his promises, for he has told us many times, though "the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed," yet his words shall never pass away. How beautiful and precious are the precepts and teachings of Christ!

The Bible becomes more interesting and this latter-day work more dear each day of my life. I have always read my Bible more or less, but now I can read over the same passages I read, even a year ago, but what a difference! What then seemed of passing interest now seems so grand and beautiful. I am so thankful for this, and any other change by which I may discern that I am getting nearer to my Savior. Oh, dear brothers and sisters, we, as Saints, the chosen children of God, are living far beneath our privileges; for look at the wonderful blessings God has promised us, if we do our part. His words never fail, so if we are not receiving, it is plain we are not doing our part, and therefore not deserving.

The Devil is always closely watching our every weakness, ready to strike at that point where we are the weakest; but thanks to our heavenly Father, he can only tempt us; he can not compel us, but if we give him our little finger he will take our whole hand, and if he finds the door of our hearts ajar, he needs no invitation to enter; for by so doing, we invite temptation.

It is sad to see so many, many, and especially among the young, who are of the opinion that there is nothing to our life here outside of the world and its pleasures. It brings to our mind the thought, "What shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" How many times it is recorded, "There is no peace for the wicked." If they would only remember that Jesus said, "My yoke is easy and my burden is light, for great peace shall the righteous enjoy." "O that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments! then had thy peace been as a river, and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea."

I feel my great weakness, dear Saints, and how very apt I am to stumble by the way; and I do need your prayers so much, for sometimes I am inclined to feel rebellious because my physical condition does not improve more rapidly. May our loving Savior who, "though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered," help us afflicted ones to put our whole trust in him, who doeth all things well, patiently submitting to all things which may be for our good and his glory. God has said in his record, "Behold, I have refined thee, but not with silver; I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction." May it burn the dross away and we come forth as gold.

I wish to thank Bro. J. G. Severin for the year's subscription of Autumn Leaves, which I greatly appreciate and enjoy. Mamma takes the Ensign and my sister the HERALD, and we feel we could not do without any of them. They are always welcomed with delight at our home. My heart is in this great work and my prayers are always for the advancement of it and the welfare of God's children. I often think what a responsibility rests upon the ministry of this, the church of God. I know there is much sacrifice and great trials for those who are called to proclaim the angel's message, but what a grand thing it is to be chosen by Almighty God to be his servant.

My prayer is that such may be strong and live pure lives that God may, through them, pour out his great blessings upon the children of men; and that they will use the talent God has given them, for God has said, if they (his servants) hide or bury their talent, or will not open their mouths, his anger is kindled against them, and with them he is not well pleased. What a great reward will be theirs, if they go where he wants them to go, and do what he wants them to do!

We are to have a reunion here in August (14 to 23) and we are anxiously awaiting the time, praying that much good may be done, and that some honest souls may be added to our number. Remember us in your prayers, dear Saints, that we may remain steadfast and at last be numbered among that great gathering of the faithful.

Your little crippled sister in Christ,
DESDE DALEY.

ALLENDALE, MISSOURI.

Editors Herald: For the first time I will try and write some. I enjoy reading the letters in the HERALD very much. I have learned many good things I think.

I live twenty-four miles from Lamoni. I have two farms and want to get some good elder to locate here to preach for us. Should any elder want location on farm, if they will write me I will help them to get located. Write at once.

Yours for the good of the cause,
E. M. CARR.

SASKATOON, SASKATCHEWAN, July 20, 1909.

Editors Herald: The organization of the Saskatchewan District with the auxiliary societies, Sunday school and Religio, marks an epoch in the forward movement of church work in the northwestern part of Canada, and if energy and the spirit of righteousness are any indications of what will be, the hope of a bright and successful career of the church can be safely indulged.

This is a large territory, Alberta and Saskatchewan, and traveling very expensive; yet there were quite a large number gathered to take part in the work of organizing and to participate in the meetings generally. There is no branch at Saskatoon, and only a very few Saints, only one family in a position to do anything in the way of entertaining the delegates, and that family did nobly; never the visiting members were under the burden of self-sustenance which they seemed to cheerfully bear, for the sake of the enjoyment and benefit derived from the gathering.

The preaching, prayer meeting, Sunday school, Religio, and even the business meetings, were pronounced to be good and interesting. There were some fifteen of the priesthood present, Apostle R. C. Russell, minister in charge; Elder J. L. Mortimer, missionary in charge; and Elder T. J. Jordan, president of the district; are all men of ability in their respective positions. The local ministry seem to be alive in their line. Bro. J. A. Gunsolley did a good work in behalf of the Sunday school and Religio, and has added a good number of workers to the general associations.

Tent meetings will be continued in the district until cold weather or other circumstances prevent. The missionary force will then occupy in the schoolhouses and hall to which they have been invited.

Individually I am contented and happy in this mission field, and hope that conditions, including the climate, will be as favorable during the winter as they are proving to be during the summer months.

Some reforms are being agitated by the priesthood, by which better conditions may obtain along certain lines, which will appear in another form.

My address for some little time will be as above. Glad to learn that Elder Macgregor has gone to Nova Scotia. Hope he and Brother Buschlen will be permitted to do good there. I have no particular instruction as district president to give, other than what has already been given to the other officers.

Hopefully,
H. J. DAVISON.

LOXLEY, ALABAMA, March 29, 1909.

Dear Herald: The work here is growing slowly, but we must not give up. I have felt somewhat discouraged for some time, but the Lord has blessed me so much more than I am worthy that I feel like I ought to do something for him.

My father was taken sick and I called in a doctor, but he did him no good; then I sent him off to another doctor, and every time I would hear from him he was no better. One day I studied about him all day and felt that something had to be done and that we had not done our duty. When I came in my mother told me that father was worse. I knew something had to be done and I went to the Lord in prayer and asked him if it was possible to let him come back to our home. Just three days from this he drove up and nobody knows how I felt. The first thing I thought of was that God had answered my prayer.

Dear Saints, let us press on. Pray for me that I may be worthy of the blessings God has promised.

Your brother in Christ,
ROBERT E. BANKESTER.

FANSHAWE, OKLAHOMA, July 16, 1909.

Dear Editor: We wish to present to the Saints our story of distress down here in this new country. Those of our brethren in the older States where the great angel message is better understood, do not know what we poor Saints have to undergo. Some five years ago the gospel was preached here by Elders S. W. Simmons and E. A. Irwin and others in a schoolhouse built by myself and others. All the sects used it as well as the Saints.

Time went on and the sects almost died away, and our opposers went to work to turn us out of doors. Every effort failed them until our state officers were elected. The opposers commenced lying about us to the powers that be, and on Sunday last got an order for the Mormons to stay out of the school building; hence the church and Sunday school of about fifty or sixty children have to go to the woods to worship and hold Sunday school. You can imagine the sadness of our hearts when we view the grand army of Latter Day Saint children and their parents turned away from a schoolhouse where they have loved and embraced the truth so precious to them; where we have made the school building and paid for the lot on which it stands, and are not allowed to use the labor of our own hands and our own money.

But this is not all. We are going to build a Latter Day Saint church house and we are very poor and have not a dollar to build it with, and it is going to take at least five hundred dollars to buy a lot and erect our building where we can worship God. We have a building committee appointed, five of our best members, with Bro. W. O. Brannon as chairman, to solicit money to build a church to be completed and deeded to the church and in the custody of one of the bishops.

Now, dear Saints, you who are wealthy and whom God has blessed with an abundance, please come to our aid. Every dollar sent Brother Brannon will be acknowledged and a strict account given in erecting a building to worship God in and to teach our children the great truth restored in these last days. Brethren and sisters, send us what you can, if it is only a penny, it will help us. We can raise about one hundred and fifty dollars among our members.

Praying God to move upon the hearts of every Saint to do something for us in this our time of need, we are,

Your brethren,
 W. O. BRANNON, Chairman,
 J. H. LEWIS,
 BAXTER HOOKS,
 J. F. GOSS,
 J. B. BOURLAND,
Committee.

LINEVILLE, IOWA, ROUTE 3, July 22, 1909.

Dear Herald: The little birds are singing so happily, and seem to be enjoying the beautiful world on which we dwell. It makes me feel happy to hear the sweet little things. We all ought to try and be as happy as the birds and give praises to our heavenly Father more than we do. The trouble with us I think, is, that we are not as patient as Saints should be. I know by experience, but I am getting along better than when I wrote to these pages before. Let us pray more for one another and see how much better we will all feel. I think the prayers of the Saints are much availing and a great help to those who are trying to do as the Master desires us to do. If we are faithful and earnest he will answer our requests, if we are worthy.

The letters are fine in the dear HERALD, also the sermons. I just could not get along without the HERALD. I wish it came twice a week, but since such is not the case, I only wish more could see the true light and accept it. It is a pleasure for me to go to church. I can hardly wait for Sunday to come. We haven't gone much this summer, as it is so far to drive a team after they work all week, so we have our Sunday school lessons at home and call it meeting. I think I have been helped a great deal in the past year, as my health has improved quite a bit. I ask an interest in the prayers of the Saints that I may be restored to health again.

I will close by sending a receipt for erysipelas. It has cured our boy of it when he was three years old: Take peach tree leaves and boil in sweet milk and bind on. Keep it so it will not spread any worse, and give a light dose of salts, and don't let the patient have greasy food to eat. Let them eat bread and milk all they want.

I hope this will never have to be used by any one, but if it should, I know it will cure. I hope I may be faithful and endure to the end, and that all the Saints will be more patient.

Your sister in the one faith,

MRS. LILLIE BAILEY.

News From Branches

SAINT LOUIS, MISSOURI.

On July 4 our regular sacrament service was held and many prayers and testimonies of appreciation for the freedom of our country were expressed.

The past month Brother Tanner has been holding a series of lectures on early and latter-day history, which have been very interesting and instructive. Others who spoke to our edification were Brethren Masten, C. J. Remington, and Ivor Davis.

A series of meetings were held at Oak Hill, Brethren Madden and Paxton of the missionary force having charge. Bro. S. A. Burgess, president of the Oak Hill Branch, was also at his post of duty.

Our regular priesthood meeting was held July 19. One question under consideration was divorce.

We are pleased to report the baptism of a promising young man, Fred, the son of Bro. Fred Elliott and wife. Brother Tanner performed the rite, and he with Bro. T. J. Elliott confirmed him the first Sunday of the month.

Our Sunday school and Religio election resulted in selecting officers who we believe are thoroughly competent to advance the work.

A very pleasant social was enjoyed by the St. Louis Religio and their friends recently.

The Cheltenham Branch and Religio are reported to be doing nicely. They had a nice social the evening of the 27th. Brother Archibald has been lecturing in Cheltenham the past month on Sunday evenings.

Our semiannual election resulted in electing the following to serve during the ensuing term: President, A. W. Smith; vice-president, Pauline Elliott; secretary, Sybil Burgess; treasurer, J. R. Lloyd; chorister, Rob Lloyd; librarian, G. Trowbridge; the undersigned correspondent.

Our local has purchased a printing press and is now in a position to attend to printing announcements, notices, etc.

The social committee gave a very pleasant ice cream social the evening of July 16, on the church lawn.

The Religio with the Sunday school voted to buy a scholarship in Graceland College.

On July 20 a Religio was organized in Oak Hill with S. A. Burgess president.

We have gained one new member since last report.

We are making progress nicely and gathering in some of the scattered members. At our last business meeting we received into our branch Sentilow and Alta D. Dempsey, Josephine N. Walker, C. W. Matson, Joseph W., Lora B., Viola M., James W., and Mary E. Stobaugh, Robert E., William O., Sarah E., and Robert L. Givens, May B. and John L. Isaacs, Frank P., Lucretia, and Alfred Hitchcock.

Brother and Sister Rewald are nicely located here with us. He is in the grocery business at Tenth and Forest avenue. We hope the Saints will remember him when in need of such things as he deals in. He will give you a hearty welcome.

Brother LaRue, our presiding elder, is agent for our publishing houses and through him you can get any and all the publications you may desire. His address is 811 Lydia avenue.

Mr. Smith and Sr. Ellen A. Wahlstrom, of Utah, were married, the writer officiating.

Bro. E. A. Ashbaugh, of Armourdale, died and the funeral was from our church. He was a highly esteemed, good man.

The Sunday school and Religio are holding their own this hot weather; also our preaching meetings have been well attended. Brn. W. E. LaRue, F. C. Warnky, and E. L. Kelley have been the speakers.

Sister Slocum is yet at Brooklyn, New York, and Sister Warnky at St. Louis, each of them caring for a grandson of very limited age.

My correspondents will please notice the change in my address, as I have sold out on Wabash avenue, and now live a little nearer Independence.

Thinking perhaps some one might wish to know what is doing here in church work, as this is a place long to be remembered by so many Saints that lived here when the Herald Office, with its help, and the Plano Harvester Company were here and when our church was well filled at every service. Many have gone to other parts where they might provide for the natural man, and many have gone never to return. Still we should be thankful that there is yet a nice little branch here; perhaps not as we all should be spiritually. Last week we were pleased to have Brother Hilliard call on us, who gave us a good talk along the line of duty to ourselves and to the church.

The Ladies' Aid Society served ice cream in the church yard to a nice crowd last week, with nothing left but a nice little sum and a good time long to be remembered. Many citizens of other faiths were with us and I think a gathering of this kind is a help not only financially, but also socially. This week we held our Sunday school picnic down on the banks of the Fox River, about two miles from town, where all had a good time bathing, fishing, pearl hunting, swinging, eating, and drinking, and being merry. The second load that went from the church with mostly children, numbered fifty-eight.

Our thoughts now are drawn out looking forward to the 20th of August, the time for our district reunion, where so many of the Saints are expecting to meet, perhaps more than ever before, as Brn. Joseph and Alexander Smith expect to be with us; also many others of the ministerial force.

"Only to find our duty certainly, and somewhere or somehow to do it faithfully, makes us good, strong, happy, and useful, and tunes our lives into some feeble echo of the life of God," says Philips Brooks. CENTRAL CHICAGO.

Saturday, July 31, our Sunday school picnic was held at Manhattan Beach, a lovely place for bathing, and an ideal day and evening. All seemed to enjoy themselves, but not many children in attendance.

Sunday school was not well attended, we think some of the people must have enjoyed themselves too much at the picnic. Not as good attendance as usual at the sacrament service, although a good spirit was present to cheer and comfort. A request had been presented that Sister Sherman, who had been so badly burned, and Sister McKittrick, formerly of Omaha, Nebraska, be remembered by the Saints in fasting and prayer. It often seems strange that so many of the Saints do not avail themselves of the blessing received from fasting, at least on sacrament Sunday, as surely it is pleasing unto the Father. The Savior once told some of his disciples that certain blessings could only come by fasting and prayer, and surely we all want the choicest blessings. Many intellectual and musical people eat very sparingly, and sometimes fast, in order to have their brains clear and active when engaging in some difficult tasks, and how much more do we desire to have our intellects sharpened when in our devotions we request the Lord to recognize us. Elder Pement occupied in the evening.

August 4. Weather still continues very warm, and rumors of a street-car strike next week. Wednesday evening prayer meeting in charge of Brother Burwell, of Hammond, who gave us some good instruction. Bro. Henry Keir and family spent Sunday with his brother at Matteson, Illinois. Elder Allen spent Saturday night at Hammond, Indiana, preaching Sunday morning at West Pullman.

Bro. Fred Johnson has returned from his western trip, Sister Johnson having stopped at Lamoni to visit relatives.

Sister Durfee, mother of Sr. George Warlick, has been on the sick list for some weeks, but is reported slightly improved. May we never cease our praying for the sick and afflicted, and those in distress.

Bro. Arthur and Sr. Ethel Pement were supposed to return from their vacation this week, and trust they will favor us with their presence next Sunday. They have been missed from the Sunday school at least.

Miscellaneous DepartmentConference Minutes.

BIRMINGHAM, ENGLAND.—Annual conference of the Birmingham, Eng., District, convened in Priestly Road Chapel, Birmingham, England, Saturday, April 10, 1909, with President William Ecclestone in the chair. Letter of apology from the secretary, Joseph Ecclestone, explaining his absence, was read. J. W. Taylor was elected secretary pro tem. Resolved, That Thomas Taylor, of Leeds, missionary, have voice and vote in the conference. Resolved further, That he be associated with the presidency of this conference. The following were chosen deacons: Howard Sneid, Frank Smith, and Edmund Norton. Letter convening conference was then read. Committee on credentials was appointed, consisting of J. E. Meredith and Robert Tabbiner. Statistical reports: Birmingham, Priestly Road 133, Summerfield 48, Stafford 36, Leicester 36. Spiritual reports were also received from above-named branches; the condition generally was reported to be good, though there was a lack of interest and attendance on the part of some. Elders reporting by letter: William Ecclestone, Charles Walton, W. N. Kemp, and J. W. Taylor. J. E. Meredith, president of the Seventh Quorum of Elders, asked permission to hold quorum meeting about noon. The request was granted. Business again resumed Monday, 10 a. m., with High Priest Thomas Taylor in charge. Credential committee here reported. A resolution carried adopting report and discharging committee with thanks. Further reports by letter from Elders George S. Greenwood, Joseph

Ecclestone, E. A. Webb, and J. E. Meredith. Treasurer's report: Total income £6 10s. 7½d. Total expenditure £2 13s. 7½d., balance on hand £3 17s. ¾d. Catering account for last conference £1 15s. 5½d. Auditing committee was appointed, consisting of T. Anderton and R. Tabbiner. Report of Elder J. E. Meredith as Bishop's agent was read. The brother also here read his letter of appointment by Bishop E. L. Kelley. A committee comprising C. Walton, J. W. Taylor, and E. A. Webb were chosen to audit Brother Meredith's account on behalf of this district. The following sent in licenses for indorsement as per district rule: Elders William Ecclestone, J. E. Meredith, George S. Greenwood, Charles Walton, W. N. Kemp. Elder E. A. Webb said he had lost sight of his, and Joseph Ecclestone had forgotten to bring his. Accordingly, the following was moved, That all licenses sent in be indorsed, and that Joseph Ecclestone's be indorsed by president and vice-president upon being forwarded, and that E. A. Webb have a new license issued, and that J. W. Taylor, who had only recently come into this district, also have his license indorsed. Auditing committee on treasurer's account reported books to be in a satisfactory condition. Auditing committee on J. E. Meredith's account reported auditing accounts to December, 1908, and found correct with two exceptions, viz, receipt for rubber stamp showed 3s. 1d., whereas 2s. 5d. only was shown in cash books and ledger, also a receipt for £1 paid through Brother Rushton was not entered in cash book or ledger. Resolutions accepting reports of both auditing committees were carried. Charles Walton, J. W. Taylor, and E. A. Webb were again chosen as committee to audit Bishop's agent's accounts for ensuing year. Recommendations for ordination: Summerfield Branch recommended F. Edwards, priest, for ordination to office of elder, but as the call did not come through the right channel, this was ruled out of order. Stafford Branch recommended Walter Taylor for the office of deacon. Resolution approving of the same was carried. Secretary to write Stafford Branch to that effect. New business: The court of elders appointed to sit on charge of apostasy preferred against Elder William Shepherd, of Nottingham, by his being baptized into the Utah Mormon church, and who had been duly labored with according to law of church. The court recommended that three months from date of holding court be granted for the brother to reconsider his position, after which expulsion, if unrepentant. Conference passed the following resolution: Re Elder William Shepherd, we approve the findings of the court and adopt the suggestion, with the following exception, i. e., that we grant four months from date (April 12, 1909,) for the brother to put himself in harmony with his district; at the end of this time, failing repentance, he be expelled from the church. Re expenses of above court, that £1 10s. be debited by president of mission. This was considered excessive, seeing that only one member out of five who were tried at the same time was a member of this district; therefore it was resolved to pay 3s. only, as our portion. Resolved, That Heman C. Smith, Gomer T. Griffiths, J. W. Rushton (if present), and F. G. Pitt be appointed as delegates to represent this district at General Conference of 1910. Resolved, That Charles Walton, J. W. Taylor, and E. A. Webb be appointed to draw up and send letter of condolence to Sr. C. H. Caton. The following notices were given for next conference: To amend rules 2, 5, 9, 9a, and to bring forward new rules governing district expenses, etc. Appointment of officers: William Ecclestone was reelected president, together with Charles Walton and J. W. Taylor as vice-presidents; George S. Greenwood treasurer; and Joseph Ecclestone secretary, together with Robert Tabbiner as assistant. Unanimous resolutions sustaining the general authorities, together with mission and local authorities, were passed. Votes of thanks to catering committee who had so bountifully provided for all, were carried unanimously. Motion to adjourn until next Eastertide. On Sunday, services were as follows: Morning in charge of Elder Charles Walton; William Ecclestone, and Patriarch Joseph R. Greenwood were the speakers, the former discoursing in his usual fervent manner, whilst the latter dealt with his subject in his familiar, elaborate style, both giving words of comfort and encouragement. Afternoon service in charge of J. E. Meredith and H. Smith. J. W. Taylor gave a brief but bright and thoughtful address, after which the remaining time was spent in testimonies, interspersed with favorite hymns and songs which, together with experiences of old and young, made it a most enjoyable service. Evening service in charge of Presidents William Ecclestone and J. R. Greenwood. High Priest Thomas Taylor, missionary, was the speaker and discoursed upon the characteristics of God, his attributes and relation to the universe, a discourse of a scientific character, affording abundant evidence of God as the Creator. Thus passed away a most peaceful and enjoyable conference. Joseph Ecclestone, secretary.

Great Increase in Cement Production.

The growth of the cement industry in the United States has been one of phenomenal rapidity. Ten, even five years ago, the business of making cement was confined to a number of comparatively small mills. To-day the output and consumption is upward of 50,000,000 barrels annually, valued at a little over $1 a barrel, and cement constitutes one of the ten leading mineral products of the United States. Concrete is coming into general use in great building structures and huge office buildings, aqueducts, bridges, etc., for which purposes it is reinforced with steel wires or rods, while for houses and similar structures it is used in the form of hollow blocks, several times larger than bricks. It has replaced, in hundreds of thousands of miles, flag-stones and bricks for sidewalks; it is used to line sewers, conduits, irrigation canals, for building dams, silos, for making sanitary barn and stable floors, and in a hundred other instances where stone or brick might be used were they not too expensive, or where they can not be used to advantage. Concrete replaces stone because it is cheaper and better than wood, because, although its first cost is greater, when properly proportioned, it is practically everlasting.—From "New tests for building construction," by Guy Elliott Mitchell, in the American Review of Reviews for August.

Bodily exercise is necessary at all periods of life, for without it the circulation of the blood in the interior of the body, especially through the liver, becomes feeble; the heart grows weak, and the lungs expand and work less perfectly. Diseases of the liver, lungs, and heart may be produced or favored by too sedentary habits.—Dr. E. A. Parkes.

Ideal Vacation Trips

The Ideal Vacation involves a complete change of scene and living conditions, both of which will be obtained by making a trip to any of the following places:

COLORADO—the greatest summer resort state in the country, offers the greatest variety of out-door activity and recreation in a dry, invigorating climate, amid inspiring mountain scenery. The Burlington Route is the shortest line, and with its splendid trains, several of them electric-lighted one-night-on-the-road trains, offers the best service thereto.

YELLOWSTONE PARK—the National Playground, containing the greatest collection of Nature's wonders, and where game animals are constantly seen in their native wild state is unique. Through train service to Gardiner, the Official or Northern entrance to the Park, from principal Burlington points.

ALASKA-YUKON-PACIFIC EXPOSITION—unique among expositions and the most beautiful and interesting ever held, where meet the Occident and the Orient, the South Seas and Alaska. A trip to the Exposition offers great educational advantages and enables one to see at first hand the marvelous recent development of the great Northwest with its unlimited opportunities for investment in orchard, ranch or city. The Burlington is the only line which runs through trains to Seattle the Exposition City.

I would like to tell you about the unusually low cost of any of these trips and give you Burlington Route folders on Colorado, the Yellowstone or the Exposition.

PRESIDING PATRIARCH ALEXANDER H. SMITH CALLED HOME TO REST.

The Saints used to sing, "Joseph, Alexander, David, three remaining pillars still; like the three remaining pillars of the temple on the hill." Only one of the three pillars now stands. David and Alexander have passed to the beyond.

It is our sad lot to chronicle the death of our beloved Patriarch and Father to the Church, Alexander H. Smith. He passed to his rest Thursday, August 12. Full particulars of his sickness will be found in the paper read at the funeral, published in another column. By a strange dispensation of providence he died at the old Mansion House in Nauvoo, the home of his boyhood and early married life. He had often expressed the wish that when his time came to depart he might pass away in the old city of Nauvoo.

The remains were brought to Lamoni Saturday. Services were held at the home Sunday afternoon at two o'clock, prayer being offered by Elder Richard S. Salyards, and the funeral was from the Brick Church at half past two. Patriarch Joseph Lambert presided at the services at the church, the prayer was offered by Bishop E. L. Kelley, and the sermon was by Elder Joseph Luff. We will publish the sermon in the near future. The task placed upon Brother Luff was very hard and he labored under deep feeling. He did not attempt to preach a doctrinal sermon, his talk was simply an expression of the feeling of a man who has lost a choice friend. At the cemetery prayer was offered by Bishop May.

Brother Alexander has lived a long and useful life. He lived absolutely without blame, a spotless and honorable life. Our sadness at parting with him is swallowed up in the thought of the reception that awaited him on the other side. His martyred father, his beloved mother, his uncle Hyrum, his younger brother David, and many others of the family welcomed him home and he is now with his blessed Lord and Master whose servant and friend he was.

PATRIARCH ALEXANDER H. SMITH

Rest, cold form, thy spirit cleaveth with swift speed the upper air;
Lone the hearts which here it leaveth, but how glad its welcome there.

OUR BROTHER.

The readers of the HERALD will read of the death of Patriarch Alexander Hale Smith with great regret. Having been acquainted with the brother for a great many years we are able to write of him aside from any consideration of our relationship in the flesh. Our association with him in church work began at an early time after becoming connected with the Reorganization.

No man of our acquaintance and associated in our labors for the church has been more uniformly staid, considerate, and persistent in effort than he. No man leaves a more unsullied record for honorable and consistent dealing with his fellow-man. He has gone wherever his service was demanded by the church without hesitation, and while in the field of his duty has filled the meaning of the statement made of another in the New Testament time, He hath "done what he could."

Whatever differences of opinion may have existed between us, there was never a break in our Christian regard and our affection. He was without fear and maintained his opinions earnestly, but without rancor and without leaving anything for remorse.

A fitting word of praise from us as a coworker would be that a truer man never lived.

The attitude of our brother in his first mission to Utah was one of unyielding fortitude to anything that might compromise the faith of the church or lower the standard of the morality of a Christian gentleman. The opposition he met there was such as would try the nerves of an ordinary man, but neither intimidation, threats, nor cajolery caused him to swerve from what he held to be the course of right and duty. He met President Brigham Young frankly but without fear, and maintained himself as the son of his father should do. In each position which he was called upon to occupy in the church, he occupied with the same untiring energy and devotion to principle which knew no abatement in zeal. On the Sunday before his death it is stated that he preached the closing sermon at the Bluff Park Reunion, thus virtually closing his life in the active discharge of his duty as the servant of the Master.

Of such a death his associate workers each may say, "Let me die the death of the righteous and let my last end be like his."

HIS SICKNESS AND DEATH.

(The following statement of Brother Alexander's sickness and death was read by Brother Luff during his address):

He attended the reunion at Bluff Park, and took part with pleasure in all meetings, greeting Saints and old friends with his usual good cheer and genuine delight. Sunday night he preached the closing sermon of the reunion with usual vigor and was apparently feeling well, and in excellent spirits. Monday he crossed to Nauvoo and visited old acquaintances, expecting to go Tuesday to Burlington, stopping at the mansion, still his property, but occupied by his wife's brother, John Kendall. In the afternoon he complained of feeling unwell, and his niece, Mrs. Ross, brought home remedies to his aid, but he grew worse and continued to grow worse through Tuesday and Tuesday night. Bro. and Sr. Mark Siegfried adding their attentions to those of the family, and these joined now by the help of Brother Smith's stenographer, Bro. William Dexter.

A physician was called who gave them no hope, and his family was called. His oldest daughter, Mrs. Heman C. Smith, reaching him on the morning of Wednesday, the 11th. She immediately dispatched for her mother. Accompanied by her grandson, Glauud, and daughter, Mrs. Coral Horner, Sister Lizzie reached Nauvoo Friday morning, but found another messenger had gone before, and she must meet the first bitter hours of widowhood in the home of her bridal days. Amid the wreck and ruin left of former happy and beautiful scenes, she looked upon the silent form of one who had never before failed to answer when she called him.

Brother Alexander died at five minutes to eight on the evening of August 12, 1909, after a constant and unceasing struggle with pain and sickness from Monday evening until late Thursday afternoon.

Bro. Lester Haas with his auto brought Bro. George Lambert from Rock Creek to administer on Wednesday, and again Thursday he went for Brother Lambert, but he came only in time to help prepare the body for the journey home, for a great peace had fallen upon him, and rest and coolness where had been struggle and fever and wearing pain.

At six o'clock on Friday, August 13, they placed the casket in the south yard of the mansion and the little band of Saints stood near him, and gave with broken voices a little service of song and Bro. George Lambert offered a prayer full of sympathy and tenderness. The sun was low, almost down, as the ferry boat carried the body and its attending friends over the rippling Mississippi to the Iowa side where they took train for Lamoni.

He leaves a widow, three sons, and four daughters; one son, Don A., and his daughter, Eva Grace, awaited him in the beyond. Fred A. is in his mission field in Oregon. Ina, the second daughter, lives in Australia. Vida, Emma, Joseph, Arthur, and Coral, and their children, and family of Fred A., and the widow of Don A. with six children, and Lamont, the son of Eva Grace, are all present. In addition to these he leaves a brother, our venerated president, Joseph Smith.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

We can furnish HERALD readers no clearer or more concise biography of our lamented Patriarch than by reproducing the following sketch from the pen of his daughter, Sr. Vida E. Smith, published in volume 4 of our Church History:

Alexander Hale, fourth son of Joseph Smith, the Seer, and Emma Smith, was born in the town of Far West, Caldwell County, Missouri, June 2, 1838.

The scenes following in cruel rapidity, are seen only dimly through a child's fitful recollections, until the establishment of a home in Nauvoo had been effected for some years. For him the dearest and the saddest events that come into a man's life, center in the happy old city of Nauvoo. His first memory of home; his fondest memory of mother in life and death; his only memory of father, a dimly sweet and vividly sad one, were here on the hill-slopes of Nauvoo. Though but a lad of six, he remembers with clearness the exodus from Nauvoo after the tragedy in Carthage. The scene was too full of woe to escape in many details the grasp of his sensitive, tender nature. Clinging to his mother's hand, with her he left the home on the banks of the Mississippi, his young heart excited by the firing of guns and the sad-faced, hurrying throng, pushing through the streets to the ferry. On the Uncle Toby, a north-bound steamer, they passed up the river to a village on its eastern banks, called Fulton City.

The return to Nauvoo in 1847 was almost as sorrowful and dangerous as the exodus had been. Happily for him, a brave-hearted mother held the helm, and his life was steered through the varying waters of youth until 1857. Quickened by the excitement consequent upon the discovery of gold in Pike's Peak, the spirit of adventure caused him to join a party starting for that promising field. The venture did not prove a success; and from the plains of western Kansas they returned homeward. This was a disappointment; but subsequent events bear out the thought that the hand of God overruled.

In the year when his brother Joseph took his place in the church, the home circle was much agitated. A mighty force tugged at the bonds of peace. Alexander was not religiously inclined. His experience with religion had not been of a character to induce him to give it much thought. The fundamental principles of the gospel must first awaken him to a love of God. His mind was in a tumult. His adored younger brother, David, joined himself to the church; while the mother stood stoutly by them. It was a serious outlook. Already friends were turned against them. A warning had come to his brother Joseph from the citizens, that he must neither preach nor pray in public, nor in any way attempt to promulgate his doctrine in the county in which he lived. The popularity of the Smith boys was on the wane. This threat did what nothing else had done for Alexander. He began to search such books as were at his command, and began to believe the principles therein. Their beauty and power appealed to his mind as true and desirable. Still he lingered.

In 1861 he married Miss Elizabeth Agnes Kendall, a daughter of Elder John Kendall, of England, who was killed by falling from a scaffold while endeavoring to save a fellow workman.

In April, 1862, Frederick G. W. Smith, third son of Joseph and Emma, died without baptism. This perplexed Alexander, and caused him days and nights of sorrow. That his beloved brother was lost was a horror such as has filled many hearts; but to his there came a balm, the testimony of the Spirit, the first communication direct from the Comforter, saying, "Grieve not; Frederick's condition is pleasant; and the time shall come when baptism can be secured to him," admonishing him to do his duty and all would be well. Satisfied of the necessity of baptism for the living, and comforted by the evidence of its possibility for the dead, on May the 25th, of the same year, his brother Joseph baptized him in the grand old Mississippi, confirmation following under the hands of the same, assisted by Elder Nathan Foster. In July of the same year his wife followed him, receiving baptism by Joseph Smith and confirmation by his administration the same day.

In September, 1862, his ordination to the office of teacher took place, Joseph Smith, I. L. Rogers, and John Shippy officiating. The following year at the April conference at Amboy, Illinois, he was approached by Bro. W. W. Blair with the question, "Are you willing to accept an ordination to the office of elder?" assuring him that it was his calling to minister in gospel things as an elder. The thought suggested to him was, "No man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron." Ready always to do the will of God so far as able, he resolved to keep himself in condition and wait until it was made known to him, claiming his right to receive light from God direct, and trust no man. That night God sent to him a vision; to him it was and to us it is, beautiful and significant, more so than even he to whom it came then realized. In his own words we give it:

"I saw myself standing on a cone-shaped hill. I could see for a long distance in every direction; and so far as I could see there were multitudes of people. I looked to the top of the hill and saw a speaker's stand, built strong and substantial; I even noted the material of which it was constructed, and wondered at its strength. I saw two men upon the platform. One had two books in his hand, and looked as if he had just ceased speaking to the multitude. As I gazed, wondering, I was possessed of a strong desire to get closer. I began to push through the crowd to get near and hear what the two men had to say. As I was thus engaged, they left the platform, stepping down and coming directly toward me. I noticed the people stepping aside, opening a pathway wide enough for them to walk side by side without crowding. As they came toward me, chatting and talking to those on either side, I recognized them. They were my father and Uncle Hyrum. My uncle was slightly in advance of my father. As he met me he took me by the hand and said, 'How are you, Alexander?' Then my father took my hand in his, a good strong clasp, and held it till he turned and pointed with his other hand to the speaker's stand and said, 'Alexander, you go up and take your place. We are going away; we will be gone for a season, but we will return again.' He then bade me good-bye, and the two walked on towards the east, and as they walked they gradually left the earth, and I watched them till they ascended out of sight. I turned and looked towards the stand. The people still stood as before, but there was the pathway open to the stand, not a man had moved into it. The interpretation was plain. When I came to my sense of surroundings, I was sitting upright, bathed in tears, and the Spirit did not leave me for hours; and on the next day, the 8th day of April, 1863, I was ordained an elder."

He at once began missionary work, spending the summer, fall and winter of 1863 and 1864 in western Iowa, in company with Elder W. W. Blair. His next work was along a new and in many ways trying line, as president of the branch of his home town.

Near the close of the summer of 1864, accompanied by Henry Cuerden, he was sent to the Saint Louis District. In the spring of 1865 Elder Cuerden was released, and Elder William Anderson, of Iowa, became his companion. Of this friend and brother, there are remembrances delightful to recall, God's rich and wondrous feasts spread for them by his Spirit as they journeyed together, binding them in bonds of love to the gospel, and in bonds of friendship in life. This season of blessing was followed by an appointment from the fall conference to the Pacific Slope. He was given the choice of associates, and he named William H. Kelley, and William Anderson, of Montrose, Iowa. Elder Kelley could not go.

On April 12, 1866, he was ordained a high priest by Joseph Smith and J. W. Briggs.

In company with William Anderson and James Gillen, he endured the hardships of a trip by wagon across the dreaded plains. At one time he left the wagon and lay down on the desert as he feared in his death agonies; but was raised by the Spirit to finish his work. He spent twenty-one months in his mission in California.

In 1870, with W. W. Blair, he again went west to Utah, remaining there while Brother Blair went over to California.

On April 10, 1873, he was called to the apostleship at Plano, Illinois, being ordained by J. W. Briggs, Joseph Smith, and W. W. Blair. In 1875 he was again appointed to the Pacific Slope Mission, having charge of that then distant field. He was accompanied on this mission by his brother, David H. But what had promised to be a bright and pleasant mission, terminated in the saddest and most anxious time of his life. A message that his wife was near to death at their home in Plano, brought him from his mission field with his brother sick and broken at his side. Upon his wife's recovery, he again took up his work, this time in northern Missouri and southern Iowa.

In the fall of 1877, upon his request he was released and permitted to labor as circumstances would permit, increasing family care making missionary work more arduous, he thought thus to be less of a burden. But his soul was not satisfied; the service seemed half-hearted, though it was not. In 1878 he again received conference appointment, being burdened with the charge of his former appointment, northern Missouri and southern Iowa. In 1879 the whole of Missouri was added. From October, 1880, it was simply Missouri until the following April, when he was given Illinois in addition. In 1883 he was still retained in charge of his birth-state, Missouri, and the State of Kansas.

The time came for another distant mission. Leaving his family (wife and nine children) in their home in Independence, Missouri, in 1885, he took charge of the Pacific Slope, returning in the spring of 1886. From this sunny field he was directed to minister to the Saints in a field comprising northern Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, the Dakotas, and Manitoba. His charge kept him in touch with the people of the North until 1890. Then in connection with Elder E. C. Briggs, there were added northern Indiana, Michigan, and northwestern Ohio. He returned to the Rocky Mountain Mission in 1892 with Elder Joseph Luff as associate. In 1893 he was associated with Elder William H. Kelley in the Eastern States.

In 1890, April 15, he was ordained president of the Quorum of Twelve, by Joseph Smith and W. W. Blair, which office he held until 1897, when he was called as counselor to the President of the church, and patriarch and evangelical minister unto the church. Acting in the office of such calling and ordination, and in the discharge of obligations imposed by revelation to the President of the church, April, 1901, he left his home in Lamoni, Iowa, for a mission to Australia, the Society Islands, and Hawaii. Spending some months in the islands, he proceeded to Australia, where in April, 1902, he received a cable message to ordain C. A. Butterworth to the office of apostle, the revelation authorizing such ordination, also lifting from him the responsibility of counselor to the President of the church by placing another in his place, thus leaving him free to act in his evangelical calling and his work as Patriarch to the church. This position is one to which he is well suited, being of a sympathetic and affectionate nature.

As a man he has a height of five feet ten inches; an eye large, clear, full, and blue; hair dark, almost black, soft, fine, and abundant, even now when he is growing old; a forehead square and full. A facial index of his tender heart is shown by a deeply cleft chin. As a speaker, he appeals to the heart at once. He is himself quickly moved to extremes of sorrow or merriment, and has the gift of enjoying the good and beautiful things of life to a remarkable extent.

There were born to him nine children, four sons and five daughters: Frederick, now an apostle, living in Lamoni, Iowa; Vida E., wife of Heman C. Smith, of Lamoni, Iowa; Ina I., wife of S. G. Wright, of Australia; Emma B., wife of William F. Kennedy, of Independence, Missouri; Don A., of Lamoni, Iowa; Eva G., wife of F. L. Madison, who died in San Bernardino, California; Joseph G., a priest, of Lamoni, Iowa; Arthur M., of Lamoni, Iowa; Coral C. R., still residing with her parents. All are members of the church except Don A.

From his first home in Nauvoo the subject of this sketch went out to his church work except two years residence in Plano, Illinois, from where he returned to Nauvoo, in 1870. Thence he moved to a farm in Colfax Township, Harrison County, Missouri. Here for two years he acted as post-master at a post office called Andover. In 1882 he left the farm, going by team to Stewartsville, Missouri; and in March, 1884, he went further south to Independence, Missouri; and in 1887 removed with his family to the farm in Missouri, and then in 1891 to Lamoni, where he, his wife, and two younger children still reside.

FUNERAL ITEMS.

President Joseph Smith, wife Ada, son Reginald, and daughter, Sr. Emma McCallum, came from Independence on Saturday. With him came also his daughter, Sr. Carrie Weld, and granddaughter, Sr. Rebecca Weld, who had been visiting in Independence.

Bro. Fred A. Smith was reached by wire with difficulty, he being in Washington. The great distance made impossible his attendance. His family expect him on Wednesday.

Bro. Heman C. Smith was finally located at Davenport, Iowa, and arrived a few minutes before the funeral.

Brn. Joseph and Arthur Smith, sons of Brother Alexander, formerly of this place, but now of Wray, Colorado, reached Lamoni, Saturday. With them came Lamont Madison, a grandson.

Bro. Elbert A. Smith reached Cleveland from Buffalo just in time to learn of his Uncle Alexander's death and get a train for Lamoni, arriving at noon Sunday.

Bro. Heman Hale Smith, son of Sr. Vida E. Smith, and editor of Zion's Ensign, arrived from Independence on Saturday.

Bro. Joseph Luff was communicated with late on Saturday and arrived in time to take part in the services.

Bishop E. L. Kelley arrived on Saturday, and Bishop Roderick May came on Sunday.

Bro. B. M. Anderson arrived from Omaha on Sunday noon, and left for his home in Independence on Monday.

Bro. Joseph Luff returned to Independence Monday morning.

In spite of extremely hot weather the attendance was large, the church being filled to its greatest capacity, showing the universal love and respect felt by all for "Uncle Alex," as he was called by nearly everyone.

CONCERNING CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

From a clipping taken from the New York World, sent by Bro. A. N. Hoxie, sr., it would appear that all is not well in the Christian Science camp under the leadership of Mrs. Mary Baker G. Eddy. It appears that one Henry Pennington Tolar, once a leader in the Christian Science Church and a millionaire, has either fallen into disgrace with the leading spirit of the movement, or the wonderful mystery of the philosophy taught by Mrs. Eddy has turned the man's head, as it has done with hundreds of others. He now charges that Mrs. Eddy and Mrs. Augusta A. Stetson, evidently joint leaders, have been treating him with what he calls "malicious animal magnetism," and which they have exercised against him. It appears from the clipping in our hands that this Mr. Tolar has sacrificed the greater part of his fortune, estimated at a million of dollars, in forwarding the interests of Christian Science. He was a successful business man up till 1901, when he accepted the Christian Science philosophy. He was looked upon as a rising genius, and entered heartily into projected schemes for the advancement of the church of his acceptance. It is further stated that unless his friends come to his rescue he would be sent to Ward's Island to be taken care of as a public charge for insanity.

It is fair to presume that had not this man been wealthy and of some note in business circles his loss of sanity would have been covered up and he would have been lost from observation in the confines of the hospital, without further mention or notice. While we have no desire to make any particular war upon the effort of the Christian Science Church to do good, we have lately read in that popular work, Masterpieces of the World's Literature, a chapter devoted to Mrs. Mary Baker G. Eddy and her work, which chapter includes a sermon in laudation of Christian Science and the church as being the new evangel into which would be swept all the forms of Christian philosophy; the presentation of which did not impress us favorably as it appeared to be too largely a play upon the words God, good, will, wisdom, mind, and the final conclusion that material things were not material, but immaterial, or as existing things, nothing, and hence, man being material, was nothing; hence, he was spiritual, practically a play upon the words which to anyone who accepts the firm establishment of man's hope upon the development of Christianity through Christ and his apostles, has no meaning.

In the article in the masterpieces referred to, Mrs. Eddy made the statement that up to that date out of five thousand adherents to the faith there had been but seventeen deaths, the argument being that the devotees of Christian Science Health Science, would neither be sick nor die. Either this is a rank mistake upon her part amounting to a misstatement, or she has been kept in a state of ignorance of what is happening among her devotees, as it is not hard to believe that more than that number of deaths have taken place among Christian Scientists in Kansas City, Missouri, alone, during a similar period of time.

The compilers of these Masterpieces of the World's Literature, in the introduction of the author to the reader, almost invariably give the particulars of the birth, place where born, and the time when born, at the opening of their notice, and then give the peculiar work in which the individual is engaged and for which they have been noted; but the introduction of the chapter which we read and to which we have referred, occurring in the eighth volume, page 4055, does not give the date of her birth. Tells who she was, who some of her predecessors were, but is silent as to when she was born. It states of her, however, that she was married in 1843 to Col. George W. Glover, of Charleston, South Carolina, and that after his death she was married to Dr. Asa G. Eddy, of Chelsea, Massachusetts, who also died in 1882. It would appear from this that she has lived twenty-seven years a widow.

Allowing a fair presumption that she was twenty years old when she was married to Colonel Glover, Mrs. Eddy would now be something like eighty-six years of age, if she is still living. There have been rumors in the press in reference to her feebleness in old age and some suppositions as to her having departed this life. Of these we know nothing, but, as John Alexander Dowie finally succumbed at a less age than Mrs. Eddy has attained to, it will not be strange if Mrs. Eddy will depart this world in due time. We can respect her fidelity to her opinion, and have regard for the good which she has done, but we are not prepared to yield faith in the mission of Jesus Christ and his philosophy as told by himself and his disciples for any of the mysticisms which may now be urged upon us from the old mysticism of metempsychosis to the latest development of health science under the remarkable energy of Mrs. Mary Baker G. Eddy.

'Serving God' is doing good to man; but praying is thought to be an easier 'service,' and therefore is more generally chosen.—B. Franklin.

We thirst for the invisible mystery, whose voice floats above the veils of the world, and we would drink again of the old wonder.—Fiona Macleod.

If a man lives entirely on the physical plane, he can never be permanently satisfied, because the other sides of him are inactive. Though he devour the finest dinners, the best part of him remains unfed.—Carlyle.

II. JOSEPH SMITH'S FIRST VISION, BY ELDER T. W. WILLIAMS, PASTOR OF THE CHURCH IN LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA.

[EDITOR'S NOTE.—Elder Williams' article deals in part with both the vision of 1820 and the later manifestation or manifestations of 1823, but it is directed more especially to the former. We introduce his article with Joseph Smith's own account of the occurrence. It will be remembered that Joseph was then about fifteen years of age. A very exciting religious revival had been held in his neighborhood in which various churches were united. When the revival ended unity ended and each church began a struggle to secure the major portion of the converts. Joseph had become anxious to be saved and desired to know which church he should join. Each denomination was loud in its demands for his allegiance—until he became confused and distressed. While in this condition he was reading the Bible and came upon James, chapter one, verse five: "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him." This commandment was like a ray of light and he obeyed it immediately.]

JOSEPH SMITH'S TESTIMONY.

"It was on the morning of a beautiful clear day, early in the spring of eighteen hundred and twenty. It was the first time in my life that I had made such an attempt, for amidst all my anxieties I had never as yet made the attempt to pray vocally.

"After I had retired into the place where I had previously designed to go, having looked around me and finding myself alone, I kneeled down and began to offer up the desires of my heart to God. I had scarcely done so when immediately I was seized upon by some power which entirely overcame me, and had such astonishing influence over me as to bind by tongue so that I could not speak. Thick darkness gathered around me, and it seemed to me for a time as if I were doomed to sudden destruction. But exerting all my powers to call upon God to deliver me out of the power of this enemy which had seized upon me, and at the very moment when I was ready to sink into despair and abandon myself to destruction, (not an imaginary ruin, but to the power of some actual being from the unseen world who had such a marvelous power as I had never before felt in my being,) just at this moment of great alarm, I saw a pillar of light exactly over my head, above the brightness of the sun; which descended gradually until it fell upon me. It no sooner appeared than I found myself delivered from the enemy which held me bound. When the light rested upon me I saw two personages (whose brightness and glory defy all description) standing above me in the air. One of them spake unto me, calling me by name, and said, (pointing to the other,) 'This is my beloved Son, hear him.'

"My object in going to inquire of the Lord was to know which of all the sects was right, that I might know which to join. No sooner therefore did I get possession of myself, so as to be able to speak, than I asked the personages who stood above me in the light, which of all the sects was right, (for at this time it had never entered into my heart that all were wrong,) and which I should join. I was answered that I must join none of them, for they were all wrong, and the personage who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; that those professors were all corrupt; 'they draw near to me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me; they teach for doctrine the commandments of men, having a form of godliness, but they deny the power thereof.' He again forbade me to join with any of them; and many other things did he say unto me which I can not write at this time. When I came to myself again I found myself lying on my back, looking up into heaven.

"Some few days after I had this vision I happened to be in company with one of the Methodist preachers who was very active in the before-mentioned religious excitement, and conversing with him on the subject of religion I took occasion to give him an account of the vision which I had had. I was greatly surprised at his behavior; he treated my communication not only lightly, but with great contempt, saying it was all of the Devil; that there was no such thing as visions or revelations in these days; that all such things had ceased with the apostles, and that there never would be any more of them. I soon found, however, that my telling the story had excited a great deal of prejudice against me among professors of religion, and was the cause of great persecution, which continued to increase; and though I was an obscure boy only between fourteen and fifteen years of age, and my circumstances in life such as to make a boy of no consequence in the world, yet men of high standing would take notice sufficient to excite the public mind against me, and create a hot persecution; and this was common among all the sects; all united to persecute me. It has often caused me serious reflection both then and since, how very strange it was that an obscure boy of a little over fourteen years of age, and one too who was doomed to the necessity of obtaining a scanty maintenance by his daily labor, should be thought a character of sufficient importance to attract the attention of the great ones of the most popular sects of the day, so as to create in them a spirit of the hottest persecution and reviling. But strange or not, so it was, and was often cause of great sorrow to myself. However, it was nevertheless a fact that I had had a vision. I have thought since that I felt much like Paul when he made his defense before King Agrippa and related the account of the vision he had when he 'saw a light and heard a voice,' but still there were but few who believed him; some said he was dishonest, others said he was mad; and he was ridiculed and reviled; but all this did not destroy the reality of his vision. He had seen a vision, he knew he had, and all the persecution under heaven could not make it otherwise; and though they should persecute him unto death, yet he knew and would know unto his latest breath, that he had both seen a light, and heard a voice speaking to him, and all the world could not make him think or believe otherwise. So it was with me, I had actually seen a light, and in the midst of that light I saw two personages, and they did in reality speak unto me, or one of them did; and though I was hated and persecuted for saying that I had seen a vision, yet it was true; and while they were persecuting me, reviling me, and speaking all manner of evil against me falsely for so saying, I was led to say in my heart, Why persecute for telling the truth? I have actually seen a vision, and 'Who am I that I can withstand God,' or why does the world think to make me deny what I have actually seen; for I had seen a vision; I knew it, and I knew that God knew it, and I could not deny it, neither dare I do it; at least I knew that by so doing I would offend God and come under condemnation."—Church History, vol. 1, pp. 8 to 11.

"Never did any passage of scripture come with more power to the heart of man than this [James 1: 5] did at this time to mine. It seemed to enter with great force into every feeling of my heart."

Whether Joseph Smith, the acknowledged leader of this distinctive American religious cult, did or did not see an angel, is not to be determined by mere superficial analysis or even by the rules of logic applied to the everyday affairs of life. The law of evidence relating to things purely mundane, and which permits of universal physical demonstration, is inoperative here.

If you would hale me before one of our leading jurists, and he would propound a question looking to the discovery of what I knew in relation to the claim of Joseph Smith, it is very probable my testimony would be thrown out as irrelevant. If the question was put directly to me, "Did Joseph Smith see an angel?" I would be forced to say, "I do not know." I was not there. I was not born when this event is said to have transpired. I have never seen an angel, much less the one which he claimed appeared to him. Even though I had received an angelic visitation it would not confirm beyond all doubt his assertion or authenticate his story to anyone but myself, and even then it would be hearsay evidence. I might believe the angel, but his mere affirmation would not "cause me to know." In answer to every query along this line I must simply say, "I do not know." Courtesy and fairness compel me to withhold judgment as to the information possessed by others.

So far as my own consciousness is concerned, I have been content for thirty years to believe his message, to entrust all my temporal and spiritual hopes to this frail craft, conscious at times that the atmosphere was hazy and the light largely obscured, occasionally groping absolutely in the dark, yet again buoyed up by the confirmation and spiritual intuition which, to me at the time, was absolute. I have heard thousands testify they knew Joseph Smith was a prophet of God, and far be it from me to impugn their motive, question their integrity, or reflect upon their sanity. I have been content to permit each and all to follow the even tenor of their own way, satisfied with the privilege of following my own. It takes much less to satisfy some minds than others: the mere manifestation of some occult power has been sufficient to sway the mass and to for ever banish doubt and fear in the breasts of religious devotees. This is equally true of all religionists. It is universal. It is one manifestation of that indefinable quality of the mind or soul which, in its accentuated form, is called superstition or credulity.

JOSEPH SMITH, THE PROPHET.

"Though I was hated and persecuted for saying that I had seen a vision, yet it was true. . . . I had seen a vision; I knew it, and I knew that God knew it, and I could not deny it."

Environment and heredity, the two great forces which have ever played a part in furnishing the mold in which human personality is cast, must be reckoned with in arriving at a solution of this question, the why of action.

Annie Besant, a companion worker with Charles Bradlaugh, a conspicuous and seemingly relentless foe of all things occult and divine, became a mere puppet when confronted with the phenomenon of East Indian occultism. Her espousal of theosophy is mysterious and from the simple laws of cause and effect indefensible. Unconsciously her long fight against all things spiritual, the persistent denial and challenge had wrought within her a nervous apprehension, a soul hungering for the things against which all the forces of her being had been arrayed, and it needed but the faintest glimpse of things beyond her ken to make her a willing devotee and subsequent high priestess of forces which remain ever mysterious and incapable of practical demonstration.

This is equally true of Robert G. Ingersoll, the great agnostic, the foe alike of superstition and intolerance, who did more to put out the fires of hell than any other of his time. If he, with that analytical mind which he possessed, had been permitted to obtain a clear and consistent elucidation of the philosophy of "the life to be," he would have capitulated and every force of his being would have been enlisted in its support and the blasphemer of yesterday would have become the apostle of to-day. This was the case with Saul of Tarsus. Somehow the forces were not opportune for Mr. Ingersoll. Notwithstanding his early education and environment, regardless of the grooves in which nature and the race needs had thrown his life forces, outlining a course not of choice but of destiny; still the instinctive sensing of the man within as to the eternal destiny of the soul is clearly revealed. Moved by grief, and in the loneliness which follows the withdrawal of a soul affinity to the unknown, he gave expression to that literary classic which will remain as the index to that great man's heart when his epics and syllogisms are all forgotten. With that hope which is born not of knowledge but of faith, and standing by the bier of his beloved brother, he presented the following beautiful lines.

We strive in vain to look beyond the heights; we cry aloud but the only answer is the echo of our wailing cry. He who lies here mistaking the approach of death for the return of health whispered in his latest breath, "I am better now." Let us hope in spite of doubts and dogmas, tears and fears, that these dear words are true of all the countless dead.

The sublimity of this entire tribute bridges the uncertainties, not in the briefs of logic, but with that divine potentiality which is a part of, but not the creation of man, and solves our problems for us.

I must say in passing that the claim of Joseph Smith is equally valid with that of any man living or dead. What proof have we that Moses saw God, that with his own finger he wrote on the tables of stone? Simply the traditional record which has been handed down through thirty-four hundred years of a vascillating, wandering race. We have no authenticated letter or testimony from Moses himself. Simply the garbled record of the historians of a later time; that is, unless you accept the inspired correction of the Holy Scriptures by Joseph Smith, and in doing this the major question is involved.

What proof have you that Saul saw the light and was stricken to the earth? Nothing save the unconfirmed statement in his own epistle and that found in the Acts of the Apostles, which was the accumulated traditional facts preserved for nearly a hundred years before they were recorded. Please remember I am not denying the truthfulness of either, but I do say the claim of Joseph Smith is equally valid with any recorded statement in the Scriptures. In fact it is more so. Moses said God wrote on the tables of stone. No living witness has ever vouched for the statement. Twelve witnesses confirmed the testimony of Joseph Smith. If I were to determine on the mere facts in the case I must conclude there is more to substantiate the story of Joseph Smith and the work which he introduced than any recorded instance in the Bible. It happened in our day; we have the testimony of witnesses known to hundreds of men now living. These men say they knew; they saw the angel and bore witness to his message.

What may be said of the claim of Joseph Smith may, with equal propriety, be said of that of every other religious leader. I will not even exempt Jesus. I feel morally sure no man living could satisfy any jury of twelve men that his knowledge along these lines was unimpeachable, providing they confined themselves to the simple rules of earthly logic.

All religious devotees with equal assurance affirm they "know." The Buddhists say, "We know Vishnu and Buddha live." The Mahometan says, "I know that Allah is God and Mahomet is his prophet." The Israelites know that "Jehovah is God and Jesus Christ an impostor." The Mormons in Utah know that, "Brigham Young was a prophet of God and polygamy a divine institution."

I can not paraphrase this in the language of Ingersoll when referring to some leading ministers: "They know that I know that they know that they don't know."

In Christian Science it is neither its Christianity nor its science which appeals to the mass of its converts. No; some friend or relative has been healed, and confronted with this inexplicable manifestation they gulp down all this jumble of idiotic and insane ravings of Mary Baker Eddy which no sane man can explain to the satisfaction of his own intelligence.

Seeing the sick healed is not absolute evidence of the truth of any position, for people have been healed in connection with almost every kind of doctrine and dogma. This is true of every other form of spiritual manifestation, whether it be prophecy, dreams, revelation, tongues or interpretations. The man who predicates his hope on anyone or all of these things alone, and pleads for support, finds himself submerged in a ceaseless jargon of equally substantiated claims. It will not suffice.

Most men mistake a pacific attitude for knowledge. To be satisfied is "to know." The absence of doubt to them means knowledge. Such a condition may be one of lamentable ignorance. Ignorance is generally arrogant. The less a man knows the louder his protestations of knowledge. Ignorance vaults forth in forbidden fields where knowledge modestly refrains. From time immemorial the kings and priests have wielded the scepter of destiny by that magic word, "I know." Throughout all the centuries of the past the masses have been awed by this arrogant assumption, content to bring of their abundance and lay it at the feet of their exploiters who, because of their superior wisdom, (?) were entitled thereto. They never once thought to ask them how they knew. The world is changing and the pendulum of that great eternal time is swinging to the other extreme.

The peculiar fanaticism of the overcredulous is, when they are satisfied with the manifestation along a certain line, they have no consideration for anything else which in any sense differs therefrom. In fact they become intolerant, notwithstanding the others have equal claims with their own. In other words the manifestations I have received are all right and of God while those you have received are all wrong and of the Devil. It is but fair that every man should be heard in his own defense. We are under no obligation to accept his message. We are morally committed to consider it.

A revelation to one man can, in no sense, be a revelation to another. It is but hearsay to the second party. The latter may, either from church association, friendship, or discipleship, accept the spiritual manifestations of the other. It is not a revelation to him unless the force which imparted the message to the first confirms or reiterates it to the second.

Whether Joseph Smith did or did not see an angel may always remain a mooted question, but that he had equal rights with all others no man can gainsay. I have as much reason to believe him as any other man. When he published his message to the world the warring elements of all Christendom locked hands and, with one voice, proclaimed him an impostor. They did not care to test his claim. As the Jews with Jesus, they said, "Away with him, away with him." The leaders, as in Christ's time, saw that an acceptance of this new religion meant ostracism to them. It struck at the root of their philosophy. They had been telling the people for centuries that divinity had either voluntarily or involuntarily been relegated to heavenly confinement; that while for many centuries prior to this men more or less carnal, some vulgar and uncouth, had been in daily communication with him on seemly and unseemly subjects, yet now, though the world was passing through changes necessitating the application of mental acumen entirely eclipsing the childhood of the race,—at times at an entire loss for a true solution of the vexed questions of soul and mind,—yet no more did he volunteer any information. With a great many there had arisen a lurking fear that this confinement was involuntary, for they could not understand how a loving Father, all powerful and all wise, could content himself in perpetuating monastic seclusion when the whole race, the direct result of his divine creation, were groping in ignorance and fast going to destruction as a result of lack of information which he alone could supply. Of the two horns of this dilemma they could better believe in God, if believing at all, as in this condition from necessity rather than choice. The Christian world had nothing but hearsay evidence to support their claims.

Paul, who lived two thousand years ago, testified he saw an angel. His testimony had been preserved by the Catholic Church. The Protestant world could not say too harsh things against the same church, and yet they were wholly dependent upon this church for everything they had in the way of divinity. They were dependent for their very existence on this book preserved by this same Catholic Church. What supreme logic this!

If angels have once appeared to men, where in all the bibles of all religions was there any restriction as to time and place? None, my friends, none. The cessation of divine communication to-day is an unanswerable argument against its reception in any age. The leaders of Protestantism had lost that psychic power, whether acquired or conferred, whereby they could appall or charm their people and hence, perfectly logical in their own minds, they had manufactured the statement, "God does not speak any more." "No more spiritual manifestations, no superhuman phenomenon." The people swallowed it as a pacific morsel, an opiate which quieted their overwrought nervous desire for revelation,—an anæsthetic which produced a delirium of joy in the consciousness that they were infinitely better off with nothing than if supplied with abundance!

This was the condition in which Joseph Smith found the world. I need not elaborate on his experience. This you can find in his history. It is in his own words. That he had recourse to the Bible is somewhat strange to many, for the mass gratuitously had yielded the right to the clerics only to interpret and apply scripture. The fact that he was profane enough to enter where priests only were allowed to tread, was in itself enough to provoke the scorn and contumely of the world: but when he made bold to enter the holy of holies where no priest had dared to enter for nearly two thousand years, and bring a message direct from the throne of grace, his act became blasphemous and throughout Christendom were reënacted the scenes of Palestine. This fellow was pestiferous. He must be put away, and the emissaries of the gospel of peace united to destroy him.

Whatever the value of his claim, the attitude assumed by the Christian fanatics of America in relation to Joseph Smith, the future historian will certainly be unable to classify in the line of sane and intelligent action. Remember, reader, it was not the religious scoffer; it was not the infidel, agnostic or atheist; it was not the Jew, Mahometan, or any of these heathen people who mobbed Joseph Smith for claiming he had a message from Jesus. Oh, no, but, anomalous as it may seem now, it was the class leaders and preachers who wielded the tar buckets and feathers; these men who were supposed to be humble followers of the Nazarene. Joseph Smith supplied the missing link; without it their position was untenable, and yet they rejected him. They should not be censured for refusing to accept his message on his mere ipse dixit, but reason shows us they were very short-sighted in refusing to test his claims. He made it possible of proof. This was in his favor. He said, "I have seen an angel. I have seen God. I know there is a God. It is within your province to know. Not by me telling you. Not by accepting my message. No. I have blazed the way. I have entered within the veil and I know. You can know. If you care to go in, you can know as I know to-day. I can not give you that knowledge, you must get it for yourself. Reading will not cause you to know. Hearing me tell it will not cause you to know. You must read and hear and then apply."

My arraignment of the Christian world is that they pretended to be close to God and yet gave no evidence of contact. Joseph Smith said, "The unknown country is there; and I have seen it. This is the road I traveled." Their religious fanaticism, prejudice, and intolerance made cowards of them. Joseph Smith had not blazed out any new way. He had simply found the old path grown up with the briars and thorns of centuries and mowed them down. He had only taken the book they cherished and turning its pages came to that significant passage, that specific statement wherein no man following should be lost: "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not." This certainly was all inclusive. It meant him. It meant every man. Jesus had formerly said, "If any man will do God's will he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God or whether I speak of myself."

Note: He was to know of the doctrine—not of Christ, for it was not given to all men to know him, know for himself. How? Not in any way that would satisfy another, but it would satisfy himself. After all, this is the chief end of life. The individuals who receive such knowledge from God will be so fortified they will need no forts of prejudice or breastworks of bigotry, no intolerant weapons; they will have the truth and that will be ample to meet the Goliaths of error.

The supreme evidence of divinity is not the power to awe, mystify, and bewilder the people. It is the manifestation of those qualities of heart and mind which enables men to have a greater insight, a broader scope, a more complete hold on life. If you ask me as to the claims for divinity among men, I would answer that that man who carries with him the greatest love for his fellow-man, the most astute powers of soul and mind, looking to the uplift of the race, has greater proof of divine contact than all the occult manifestations which he could produce. Thomas Paine, who did more for the American revolution with his pen than Washington did with his sword, according to Washington's own words, who wrote and published practically every essential of the Declaration of Independence ten months before it was formulated by our revolutionary patriots, and who was not in accord with the church of his time and rejected many of the assumptive terms of religion which have long since been discarded, gave evidence of greater claims for divinity than the bigots who sought his life. He shows the source of his inspiration in the following words:

Any person who has made observations on the state and progress of the human mind, by observing his own, can not but have observed that there are two distinct classes of what are called thoughts—those that we produce in ourselves by reflection and the act of thinking, and those that bolt into the mind of their own accord. I have always made it a rule to treat those voluntary visitors with civility, taking care to examine as well as I was able, if they were worth entertaining, and it is from them I have acquired almost all the knowledge that I have.

The sublime personality of Abraham Lincoln stands out in bold relief as a character with divine potentialities. He was content to live his life and act for men. He paid the forfeit in martyrdom. Joseph Smith in the religious field was similar to Lincoln in the political arena.

A jurist, when determining as to the validity of two adverse positions, is guided by the following rule of logic: Which is the most plausible? Which the most logical? Considering the claim of Joseph Smith as to divine contact and that which he has given to the world, which is the most logical conclusion? Was he so far in advance of all his fellows as to discover all the legitimate appurtenances of the gospel long since lost? Did he in himself possess the mental insight and spiritual penetration as to more than equal the combined wisdom of the world?

When Joseph Smith read this passage in James he felt impressed with its significance. It was plausible. It was highly probable. It was very essential. He resolved to put it to the supreme test. He repaired to the forest, an ideal priestless sanctuary; no ritual; no prescription; no intermediary; that is my idea of service. He approached divinity not by beating his breasts, by pitched voice or contracted body. He simply laid his case before the Almighty and requested a fulfillment of his promise. In this last particular he was strictly orthodox. Men for centuries had been doing the same thing and had been perfectly satisfied in the doing. If he had been content with this he would have been in full fellowship with the evangelical throng without sun, moon, or stars to light their way to never-ending day. He was different. He waited for a reply.

Poor, foolish man, herein lay your mistake. Had not Rome, papal Rome, thundered her pronouncement down through the ages that no answer would ever come again; that true service consisted of supplication with no response; in entreaty but no reply? Had not Protestantism said, "Aye, aye, sir" to this illogical creed? "Who is this Daniel come to judgment, who dares to pray morning, noon, and night to any but the God of our own creation?" "Throw him into the lions' den that we may devour him."

Ah, foolish boy, if you had been content to be as other men, your life would have been a flowery bed of ease; they would have loved you when living and lauded you when dead. Your great mistake was in claiming that God answered your prayer. This was the only charge the Christian world had against you. They prayed; so did you. They did not get any answer; you did. There was the rub. It mattered not whether your claim was in harmony with the Bible or not. Looking at it impassionately can you not see the inconsistency of your position?

"Your churches are all wrong." Your "creeds are an abomination in my sight." "You draw near me with your lips, but your hearts are far from me." You "teach for doctrine the commandments of men, having a form of godliness, but deny the power thereof." Thus spake the Almighty through Joseph Smith.

"It is false," said all of the churches then.

"It was true," say all of them now.

How is that? Because every one of these churches have changed their creed since then. If they were right then they are wrong now. If they are right now they were wrong then. Whichever horn of the dilemma you take Joseph Smith has the advantage. I am not here to say the Bible is infallible or all of the minor premises invulnerable, but the Christian world must appeal to it or nothing, and in said appeal they are incriminated; they are under the dire necessity of repudiating some of the specific teachings and promises in order to have any semblance of consistency, while the claims of Joseph Smith, both as to doctrines and results, coincide identically with the book itself. I am not claiming that this in itself is irrefutable evidence of divinity, but so far as the churches are concerned it is unanswerable.

Resolving this question to its final analysis individual consciousness must be the determining quality as to what is or is not divine. Certainly I will not allow any other man to settle this question for me. I should not assume to settle it for any other man.

Whether Joseph Smith did or did not see an angel must be left to the arbitrament of time. From a legal standpoint I do not know. I have been content to give my support to the philosophy which he propagated because it satisfied my inner concept of right. I have tried other things, but always the divinity in me led me back to this same old premise. In development it is not so much that the mind and soul of a man is awed with some supernatural phenomenon as it is that the divinity within finds expression. I am a Latter Day Saint because there is afforded a greater latitude to express this divinity, because it allows to divinity the most unobstructed privileges. I could easily assert that I knew that Joseph Smith was a prophet of God. Very probably I would, by some, be considered very strong in the faith. I prefer to think that the greatest witness I can bear, either to his divine call or the truthfulness of his message, is to so live, teach, and act, that others coming in touch with me will be constrained to feel and sense the divinity which comes in exemplifying the message which he gave to the world.

I believe that Joseph Smith told the truth. I have accepted his message. In seeking to make my life conform to the religion which he gave to the world I have found great peace and satisfaction. Aside from that, deponent saith not.

The so-called Christian world asserted there was a God. They furnished no means of determination. They denied present day revelation. Joseph Smith said there was a God and affirmed revelation. He was consistent; they were not. It is not of so much consequence that I know Joseph Smith saw an angel as it is that I am true to myself, true to the manifestations of God which come to me individually; for, if I am true to these, I can not oppose any other divine message which comes through any other source. If there is truth in Joseph Smith's claim it will be vindicated in time. I have not attained that point where I can look over into the promised land. It may be my fault, but I have tried to prove worthy of all necessary help. I am not walking by sight but by faith. I am content if there is enough spiritual direction to guide my feet aright. It is enough to know that I am moving in the right direction. I am afraid if I knew more I would strive less. Possession oftentimes produces stagnation. I am better off with enough of denial and uncertainty in my life to stimulate action, providing said stimulation will bring me to the point where I can utilize knowledge. It is not what one knows which is so important. It is the use we make of what we know. "To know" and not to do brings condemnation. Future retribution will be predicated not on the light and information which God has given us, but on the use we have made of what he has given. The greatest testimony one can give in favor of this latter-day work is not an offhand, "I know," but rather a consistent exemplification of the spiritual and ethical forces which must stamp it as divine. I long for the time when our people will bear this testimony, "I know this work is true because of the help it has been to me. I know it is true because it has made me more divine. I know it to be true for I am a better being."

I have known thousands who have been loud in their claims to knowledge, but I am at a loss to know what use said knowledge has been to them. If I, with my lack, do each day the duty the day brings to me, I am best serving my Master. I want to know. I am hungering for more light. I am striving to fit myself to receive it. I do not crave it as the boy does a toy or the girl a new dress to pander to pride or fancy. I do not desire it to gratify a morbid curiosity. It is inconsistent to claim we know unless we bear the fruits of knowledge. When I hear a man loudly proclaim his knowledge of things divine and I am sure his life morally, intellectually, and socially does not bear out his claim, I must reject his statement. "To know" is to do, to be all which that knowledge embraces. God's "No" to me has been my benediction.

ATHLETICS AT GRACELAND COLLEGE.

[We herewith present an interesting article on athletics from the pen of the director of athletics in Graceland. Other articles on the work in Graceland College are under preparation by J. A. Gunsolley, acting president, and C. B. Woodstock in charge of the industrial department.—EDITORS.]

In introducing this subject we wish to call the attention of the reader to our statements in the Graceland College Catalogue of 1909, and in the College Bulletin, recently published. These state briefly our ideas on the subject of athletics. We do not think it necessary to reproduce them here, as they are no doubt already in the homes of most of the members of the church. We desire, however, to quote from our article in the Lamoni Chronicle of November 26, 1908, in order to place our views and the aim of the college in this respect before the people of the church. The following explains our attitude:

"For athletics to assume their proper and correct place in the college, they must be under proper control. If not, they are a detriment to any institution, and not an advantage. We believe that the first object of the college should be to educate the mind, and that it is the province of athletics to take second place and aid in this object. However, we are convinced that this end can best be reached by developing the physical and mental in harmony with each other. There are three elements in the constitutional make-up of every individual,—the mental, the physical, and the spiritual, or moral. No one can be neglected without detriment to the others. Neither should one be abnormally developed to the exclusion of the others. It is the aim of Graceland to develop the three conjointly, and by harmonizing the whole as nearly as possible, to produce the best results.

"It is our aim not only to furnish that recreation so necessary to those under severe mental strain, who desire to secure maximum returns for the amount of vitality expended, but to provide also that such recreation be secured under the best possible moral influences, thus reducing to a minimum those objectionable features which sometimes creep into athletics, as they do in everything else in life.

"For this purpose, in order to conform as nearly as possible to our ideal of pure and unadulterated sports, the college has established a board of control, composed of three members of the faculty and two from the student body. This board has established the rule that no student not having an average grade of eighty-five per cent may participate in any college game. It has been our experience that this regulation has had the wholesome effect of compelling negligent students to keep up their studies, and in many cases it has worked wonders for boys, who, were it not for athletics, would not have entered college at all.

"We are of the opinion that it is absolutely necessary, for the attainment of the best results, to provide some channel through which the superfluous energies that naturally accumulate in the body of every healthy, active American boy, may escape, and thus, in a measure, prevent them from flowing into wrong channels. The throbbing, red blood of youth demands this, and we are unreasonable if we deny it. How often we hear fathers say, 'My boy can get enough exercise on the wood-pile.' True, absolutely true, as far as mere exercise is concerned; but how about recreation? His recreation may be baseball, yours may be your paper. Now, you try to get recreation out of a dry treatise on medicine or metaphysics! The wood-pile is to the boy as the treatise on metaphysics is to the father—is a true proportion. The boy can get enough physical exercise out of a wood-pile; so can you get enough mental exercise from the treatise; but is it the necessary recreation? We do not wish to create the impression that boys should not be taught to work; on the contrary, we believe that any father who neglects this important item in character-building has committed a sin for which he will be held responsible, in proportion as his negligence works injury to the boy. Notwithstanding this fact we also believe that, 'All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy.'

"These, briefly, with many others, if we had time and space to enumerate them, are our reasons for upholding clean athletics in the college. Graceland stands for the development of true manhood and true womanhood, and it is our aim and our earnest endeavor to develop our young people in all lines best calculated to insure their success, both in this life and the life to come; physical as well as mentally; and morally and spiritually as well as mentally and physically; for only by so doing, in our opinion, can we hope to attain the highest and best results."

Now, as to the subject, can athletics be made a factor for good in our college? We answer emphatically that they can. We are aware of the fact that there are many who, like Nathaniel of old, are prone to ask the question, "Can any good come out of Nazareth?" As in that case, it is generally the result of misunderstanding. Viewing the conditions as they are observed in most of our schools and colleges relative to the matter under consideration the criticism is doubtless just. There is too much of a tendency in our colleges and universities to place too much stress upon physical powers.

Everything depends on the aim. If it be to win at all hazards, regardless of method, professionalism and immorality generally creep in and athletics can not be made an exponent of good. But good may be accomplished if they are placed under proper control, and if the idea of truth and fairness is kept constantly in sight. We can not expect this in the world, from which most of our observations have been drawn. The accomplishment of good is what we are all aiming at. We claim to have more light than other people, hence, if we live up to our claims, we must be different than the people of the world. Our aims and ideals should be different and our college should differ from those of the world, and if athletes in our college can not be made different from those in other colleges, they can not result in good in the strictest sense. It is possible that they may increase the enrollment materially, but in the mind of the writer, the good toward which we should bend our energies is not quantity, but quality. I hope I may live to see the day when parents, even those of the world, will send their children to Graceland, not because of her reputation for numbers, but because of her character of purity. It is generally the abuse of privileges that brings about evil results. So it is with athletics. If they are not assigned their proper place, they will not result in good. Their proper function is to aid education. It is all right to hitch the horses to the wagon, but it is all wrong to let them run away with it. Under the proper control athletics will be beneficial. Let us be temperate in all things. Every pursuit of life, temporal or spiritual, should be subjected to the searchlight of the gospel of truth. When we learn to do this, we will have made a long stride toward the good at which we all are striving, the redemption of Zion. An overindulgence in anything that tends to lead our minds from the gospel of Jesus Christ is inconsistent, whether it be business, football, baseball, marbles, or playing the piano. We should keep that thought uppermost in our minds, and bend everything else to it, not it to everything else.

We believe that athletics can be conducted on such a plan; if not, like anything else, they should be abandoned. Possibly they can not be conducted successful on this plan according to the judgment of the world where success means to win at any cost, but success as Latter Day Saints view it, means something better and nobler. If athletics can be made a means of moral as well as physical education, if they can be made a medium by which to instill into the minds of the youth those principles of truth, righteousness, and integrity which should characterize the true child of God, then they will be a success in the deeper and nobler conception of the word. We believe this can be done.

"He is trying to dress a wolf in sheep's clothing; he is trying to paint a black sheep white." To such, if any there be, we would make this answer: We have within ourselves the conviction of sincerity, and there is only One whose judgment is infallible. He judges from the heart. We have no sympathy for the individual who would sacrifice everything to win. We have still less for the individual who would place the young in straight-jackets and deny them some of the simple and harmless pleasures of life, because they do not conform with his narrow view of conventional-ity.

We have been asked to state our views and we have done so frankly. There are radicals on both sides of the question and we realize that our stand may not be agreeable to either class; nevertheless, "what we have said we have said." All things that we enter upon in life should be placed under the great searchlight of the gospel of Christ and made to conform thereto. As the Prophet Isaiah writes, "To the law and to the testimony, if they speak not according to this word it is because there is no light in them." Regardless of criticism from one standpoint or the other, in all our dealings, whether it be Sunday school, Religio, business, pleasure, class recitations, athletics, or whatever it may be, we desire to conform, as nearly as we can in our weakness, to the statement of Paul where he says, "I am determined to know nothing else among you save Jesus Christ and him crucified."

If time and space would permit, we would like to enter into the technical side of this subject, but we have already trespassed too long on your time and patience. May the time soon come when love and unity shall be our watchword, and our college shall be known to the world for its emoluments of purity and truth, that all may learn therefrom both wisdom and righteousness. May Graceland be so pure as to be the mecca for all the pure in heart and be recognized as such by the world.

Stone the Woman, Let the Man go Free.

The noontide rests upon Jerusalem;
The air is golden, and an azure sky
Bends o'er the lovely land; the trees beyond
Make whispering music with soft, clashing arms,
And blend their low tones with the voice of streams,
The sigh of winds, the call of mating birds,
The distant laughter in the reaper's field,
And gentle footfalls as the camels pass.

The streets are silent; for the idle drones
Who bring no honey to the human hives,
But swarm at corners and at open doors,
Eager for anything to stimulate
The dull monotony of the hours,
Have sought the temple where the Savior sits,
To calmly criticise his mode of speech,
And hear if he, an obscure Nazarene,
Can fashion it with such strange subtleness
As thrills, men say, the coldest listening heart.

But now the dreamy silentness is o'er;
A group of scribes and Pharisees appear,
And in their midst a wretched woman moves,
A blot upon the beauty of the day:
Her head is bent in uttermost despair,
Her hands are clasped upon her beating breast,
And burning tears are falling down the cheeks,
Where conscious sin has sent the rushing blood.
Shame clothes her as a garment, while her soul
Shudders within its desecrated shrine,
Stained and unutterably dishonored,
So sad a sight, so loathsomely deformed,
That angels weep and tremble as they gaze.

Her brow is hidden; for ah! nevermore
Can she lift up her youthful woman's face,
That once was beautiful with innocence,
And raise her vision to the holy skies
With eyes reflecting their blue purity.
Oh, nevermore, through the long waste of years,
Can she walk upright in the ways of men,
And look the wide world bravely in the face,
Strong in the untouched whiteness of her life;

Nor taste again the simple joys of home,
The tender sweetness of modest ways,
A husband's love, the touch of infant lips,
The trust of friends, the happy fire-lit hearth,
The little tendrils that softly cling,
And give their perfume to a clean, sweet life.

It might have been, it nevermore shall be!
Sin's dark simoon has broken o'er her heart
And left it waste and barren. Not for her
The scented blossoms that the guileless pluck,

The lilies waiting for the true and pure.
She wronged the better instincts of her soul,
Chose the black passion flow'rs of sin and death,
And stands accused before God and man.

They hurry onward through the sun-lit streets,
With pitiless, coarse jests and mocking words,
She is not fit to walk the fruitful earth;
She must be stoned, the law must be fulfilled.
But first they'll lead her to this Nazarene,
Whose doctrines are suspicious, strangely new,
Unpalatable to a scribe,
Or honest Pharisee who loves the law.
Let Him pass judgment, and reward her doom;
They say He's mild and merciful; perchance
They'll snare Him into breaking Jewish codes,
And be revenged for all His subtleties.

They reach the temple; in a moment more
The sinner stands before the Savior's face.
How wonderful that face, the burning tongue
Of Seraphim would fail to picture it.
Divinely sweet, unfathomably calm,
Unutterably tender; in the eyes
Patience so godlike and compassionate,
A look of Mary 'round the sacred lips
That wear a sign of weariness repressed,
As though pain slept a little further back.
How young he seems, and yet he seems not young,
But grave and gentle, as if many cares
Pressed on an infinitely loving heart.

The trembling woman kneels before her judge,
And clasps her hands upon her guilty face.
Never before seemed purity so pure;
Never before was sin so horrible.
She did not plead, she knelt there clothed in shame,
An outcast and degraded—weeping knelt,
Waiting the words—"The woman must be stoned."
The crowd draws near to hear what Jesus says,
And silence steals upon the multitude;
The sunlight falls athwart the temple door;
Through an open doorway sighs the fragrant wind;
The little children patter with soft steps
In quiet corners, knowing not as yet
Life's tragedy, intense and passionate.
But Jesus speaks; the temple grows more hushed,
And watching angels thrill with endless love.
"Let him," he says, "who knows that he is pure Cast first the stone at her." The men look up
Startled a little; then they hang their heads
And blushes gather on the brows unused
To show such color. Slowly, one by one,
Without a word, they slink abashed away,
Till Jesus and the woman stand alone.
"Go, sin no more," he says, and forth she goes
To mend the ruined beauty of her life,
To wash her soul in penitential tears,
And ever after with undying love
To follow Christ lamenting.

But where is he, the sharer of her guilt?
The man whom God appointed as the head,
The shield of woman in her weakness—
Whom she should look upon as less than God,
But noble, lovable and worthy trust,
Incapable of wronging that weak heart,
That seeks its strength in meekly loving him.
Is he not, too, in deepest grief and shame,

Filled to overflowing with an agony
 That can not, like the woman's, find relief
 In tears that scorch and dry upon the cheek?
 Is he not, too, surrounded by a group
 That look on him with loathing, holding up
 His shamed manhood, his insulted God,
 The ruin brought upon another's soul,
 Heaping upon him stinging words of scorn,
 That, burning in his ears, awake the sense
 Of utter degradation.

A sumptuous feast is spread upon his board,
 And joyous guests are pledging them in wine:
 He's clothed in purple, and the flashing light
 Of diamonds sparkle on his breast and hands,
 Odorous scents are stealing from his robes,
 And watching slaves are hanging on his looks;
 The dancing girls are waiting in the halls
 With lyre and sistrum to beguile the hour
 And touch the senses into soft delight;
 And half pleased smiles are playing 'round his lips;
 And conscious laughter ripples in the air,
 As pleasant banter lightly tells the tale,
 And friendship merrily accuses him
 Of having won a woman from her lord.

Yes, stone the woman, let the man go free.
 Draw back your skirts lest they, perchance, may touch
 Her garments as she passes; but to him Put forth a willing hand to clasp with his
 That led to her destruction and disgrace.
 Shut up from her the sacred ways of toil
 That she no more may win an honest meal,
 But open to him all honorable paths,
 Where he may win distinction. Give to him
 Fair pressed-down measures of life's sweetest joys,
 Pass her, O maiden, with a pure proud face,
 If she puts out a poor polluted palm;
 But lay thy hand in his on bridal day,
 And swear to cling to him with wifely love
 And tender reverence. Trust to him who led
 A sister woman to a fearful fate.

Yes, stone the woman, let the man go free!
 Let one soul suffer for the guilt of two—
 It is the doctrine of a hurried world,
 Too out of breath for holding balances
 Where nice distinctions and injustices
 Are calmly weighed. But ah, how will it be
 On that strange day of final fire and flame
 When men shall wither with a mystic fear
 And all shall stand before the one true Judge.
 Shall sex make then a difference in the sin?
 Shall He, the searcher of the hidden heart,
 In His eternal and divine decree
 Condemn the woman and forgive the man?

Humility is a rare virtue. If one is rich he is apt to be proud of his riches; if he has distinguished ancestry, he is apt to be proud of his lineage; if he is well educated, he is apt to be proud of his learning. Some one has suggested that if one becomes humble, he soon becomes proud of his humility. Christ, however, possessed of all power, was the very personification of humility.—William J. Bryan.

The State of Utah contains eighty-five thousand square miles of territory—mountainous, arid, and desert lands. The oasis of this vast expanse is the great basin in which is centered the Great Salt Lake, the inland sea of America without an outlet. Several large rivers, besides numerous smaller streams, flow into its saline depths. All of these are fresh water, and the surprise is the lake water does not freshen, but remains twenty-two per cent salt. The lake to-day is eighty miles long by forty miles wide, three thousand and two hundred square miles, at an average depth of twenty feet. There is sufficient salt, if loaded onto cars at twenty thousand pounds per car, to stretch a train around the world with one hundred thousand cars off on a side track. No necessity of taking this without salt.

It is current here, that E. H. Harriman will expend two million dollars in converting Saltair Beach into a western rival of Coney Island; besides, an immense hotel upon Church Island, some eight or ten miles from the main shore, will also be a first class pleasure resort. A huge sanitarium is to be built where the salt water may be used for curative purposes. There are nine islands in the lake; the largest is "Church Island," eight miles wide and sixteen miles long. A large buffalo herd, belonging to one Mr. Dooley, of this city, is resident upon this island. There are fresh water springs, some timber, and plenty of the finest of grazing upon the island. Another interesting island is called Bird Island, which is located some twenty miles from the north shore and is the home of millions of sea gulls. A question would naturally arise, how can gulls live on an island in Salt Lake, in which not a living thing can exist? At the north end of the lake, Bear River enters, and the current of fresh water is seen for miles in the saline waters. In this fresh water current there are thousands of fish that come down out of Bear River. Mingling with the salt water they are soon stuped or dead and become an easy prey for the gulls.

The level of the lake varies greatly as the years come and go. There are what is called the "wet and dry cycles"; during the dry the lake recedes from the lack of snow and rain, and the operation of rapid evaporation, but the wet cycles soon return and the waters of the lake rise again. The wet cycle is now at its culmination. Five years ago we visited Saltair. There was not a drop of water around or near the pavilion,—now the water is eight feet deep—and almost reaches the shore line of 1876; yet, as a whole, there is a gradual receding of the lake. Shore levels are plain to be seen on the mountain sides; on the south end at Garfield Beach they are very distinct, indeed, the highest being almost one thousand feet above the lake's surface to-day, and still down the mountain sides are levels, where the waves have lashed for centuries. Five hundred, three hundred, two hundred, one hundred feet levels are quite visible. It is estimated that at one time it covered the vast area of twenty thousand square miles, or nearly as large as Lake Huron; in fact, the high shore levels indicate that it once had an outlet through Cache Valley in Idaho, thence through a notch in the basin rims into Snake River Valley, then on to the Columbia, and onward to the earth's greatest ocean, the mighty Pacific.

The history of its discovery is vascillating and uncertain. It is known that as far back as 1553 the Valley was entered by one LaHunton, and in 1776 by Padre Escalante. Not until 1832, then by Captain Bonneville, the lake was fully explored and was mapped and recorded as "Lake Bonneville." Again in 1843, John C. Fremont, the pathfinder, sounded its briny depths. He went across to the main island dry shod, which is now ten miles from shore, proving the "wet and dry cycle" theory as stated above. Not until 1847 did the Mormon pioneers discover the great lake, led by James Bridger, the mountaineer scout, who said the Indians gave it the name of Salt Lake.

These, however, were the first colony to push their way into these then deserted wastes, seeking homes for a much weary and worn people, and as they dropped the yokes from the sore necks of the poor oxen, no doubt they were scarcely alive to the more delicate impressions of landscape and water sheet that lay before them; and the beautiful tints of a setting sun as he drops into the briny depths.

As we sit writing this at an upper window of our room, the great orb of day is dropping into the mysterious lake, sending back scenic glories upon the icy-browed sentinels of the encircling hills beyond our pen to describe. The strong side-lights bring the sharp crests into bold relief, as the shades and shadows lengthen, revealing and rerevealing anew the sculpturing hand of a divine mind. The beautiful wooded hills of our own Zion land, when arrayed in all their autumnal glory, are not more striking than these mountain ranges when ablaze with the reflected glories of a sunset sky, and as he sinks away into the dreamy rest, leaving innumerable tints and shadows, and only the highest peaks, like an enchanted shadowy encampment of mysterious battlefields, catch the fading glory, and the cool breezes from the mountains arrayed in white, steal out o'er city and plain; the view is dispelled, the curtains of darkness are let down, the shades and shadows are lost and linger only in memory, our soul is filled with wonder, and we cry out, "O Lord, how mysterious are thy works and ways!"

We could scarcely end this chapter without one more significant thought. In conversation with the Government surveyor, speaking of Missouri in contrast, he said, "Do you know, sir, that you have a great State, one of the best? Missouri has more farmed lands than Colorado, Utah, Nevada, Montana, and Idaho combined." There was something seemed to whisper, "All hail to poor old Missouri!" the good Lord made no mistake when he planted the Zion stake in that goodly land. No doubt he knew of Utah, notwithstanding there would be those who would make it "Blossom as the rose." We shall now sit up and take notice of this mysterious mystery, the mighty problem before us.

PROVO, UTAH, July 26, 1909.

Editors Herald: A few items from the valleys of the mountains might be of interest to the readers of the HERALD, so I will attempt to inform you of how the gospel is winning its way in the Zion (?) of the West.

Leaving home on May 16, we stopped on our way for some two weeks in Colorado, and visited some brothers and other relatives living near Akron, which delayed our arriving here until June 3. Immediately on our arrival we began to inform ourselves on existing conditions and found that we need not flatter ourselves on having a "snap." While I did not come expecting I would be found sailing on flowery beds of ease, yet I will admit that I find conditions fully as discouraging as we expected. However, I will say that I did not come to become so badly discouraged that I will not put up the best fight that I can and keep battling away even under trying circumstances.

I found some good Saints here, some whom we would be glad to see show a little more zeal, and still others who have almost let the little light go out, but we still have hope.

In mingling with the Mormon people I have discovered that there is a feeling of resentment manifested whenever our differences are discussed. As long as we leave them alone in their delusions, all goes well, but should a single statement be made concerning some of the things taught by their leading men, from Brigham Young on down, which is contrary to the gospel, they are at once up in arms. I have visited some of their meetings in the tabernacle here in Provo, and listened to some of their leading men, among them Apostle John Henry Smith. I must say that he pointed out the highest standard of morals I have ever heard from any of their representatives. I met him personally and was surprised at his manner, for he treated me very kindly and did not manifest a spirit of hatred, as some do.

Bro. H. N. Hansen and the writer called upon a Mrs. Harris, daughter of Hyrum Smith the Martyr, and sister to the present president of the Utah church. She treated us kindly, but insisted on bearing her testimony. When she was informed by Brother Hansen that her testimony was a contradiction of the plain teaching of the scripture, it seemed to have a quieting effect on her and she desisted from giving us more of it. One point we called to her attention, was a statement made in the polygamous revelation which declares that Emma Smith should cleave unto Joseph and none else. This she explained was to the effect that Emma was not permitted for any reason to ever marry any other husband, and then she gave expression to language that will show the kind of feeling that they have for the "elect lady," in declaring that she married a "stinking, dirty, Gentile." I called her attention to the statement found in section 42:22 which law was binding on Joseph Smith where he as well as others are commanded to "love thy wife with all thy heart, and shall cleave unto her and none else." In the latter clause the Brighamites contend that it means as many wives as they want and love, while in the former it is limited to one and only one. Oh, consistency, thou art a jewel, but you can't be found in Utah!

At the present time this city is being agitated over the granting of a depot site. Even Joseph F. Smith is taking a part in the matter and using the name of the church to influence votes. We are waiting and wondering what will be the outcome. I am glad that our worthy President does not interfere in any way with matters of this kind. I have been led to exclaim, How long, O Lord, how long will people continue to be governed by priestly rule here in Utah? We hope for a bright day and trust that the coming generation will throw off the shackles that have bound the people here for so many long years, and stand upon their own integrity. Several have expressed themselves in such a way that we hope for a better condition in the not far distant future. They declare the church has no right to dictate to them how they shall vote or think on religious or secular matters.

I learn from our district president that our conference and reunion will be held here in this city commencing August 28. We hope to have a good attendance of Saints from all over the district. Come and bring the good Spirit with you and let us have a splendid reunion.

I had the happy privilege of baptizing a Sister Mangum, who was a member of the dominant church here in the valley of the mountains. We believe the Lord will amply repay her for the sacrifice made.

My address will be as follows for the present year: 210 West Fourth street South, Provo, Utah.

With a firm hope of the final triumph of the Lord's work, I am,

In gospel bonds,

GWYNFA LONLAO, LLANSAMLET, SOUTH WALES, July 22, 1909.

Editors Herald: I have much pleasure in sending a few words to the HERALD once more. I am delighted to read the contents of the different articles every week in your valuable paper. I can not say that I can swallow everything that is coming out, but we must allow a little for the change of views. We are going on steadily here in this part of the vineyard. We are meeting regularly in the week and on Sunday, and we are enjoying the fruits of the Spirit to a great extent.

We are holding meetings at Pontrhydyfen once a month, a Sabbath walk of eight miles each way, and we have to walk the most part of it; but we enjoy it on the whole, because we have a good attendance there. Many outsiders are interested in the angel's message.

The Llansamlet Branch has gone through some hard ordeals during the last twelve years, for the reason that the most of the members have emigrated to America, in consequence of which the branch had to suffer immensely.

We had the conference of the Western District of Wales held at Neath last Whitsun; the Saints from the different branches attended well. Sorry to mention that Bro. William Lewis left us so suddenly and unexpectedly, although he was liked very much by the Saints and others in Wales.

I was very glad to understand that Bro. Thomas Jones, of Nantyglo, has been ordained to the office of high priest, although this boon has not come direct to one of the elders of Wales, because Bro. Jones is living in England. Considering the privileges of the different nations in the church at present, I am under the impression that Wales is behind the times. Who will remedy this? There are some competent young men in the church here at present. Kindly do not account this any kind of a boast when I say that I am the oldest active elder in Wales at the present time.

When writing this letter I have not intended to hurt the feelings of any one, but I intended that its contents should be for the welfare of all concerned. May peace prevail among all the Saints of the Most High.

Yours for truth,
DAVID LEWIS.

BROWNSBURG, P. Q., CANADA.

Dear Editors: I have been engaged in this great latter-day work now for nearly twenty years; a work I am proud to acknowledge, being drawn out from a world of creeds. Since becoming connected with the latter-day gospel, I have not as yet found it a bed of feathers to rest my body, or a swan's-down pillow to lay my head. Should there be any individuals who enter this work with such aspirations, let me say to such an one that rough and thorny is the road leading us to Zion's land. The nearer we live to Christ, the greater the trials; fiercer is the enemy of all righteousness.

But in this work I have experienced that noble injunction of the Apostle Paul: I can do all things or shall I say overcome all things through Christ who strengthens me. The greater part of my spiritual labors have been in Leicester Branch and district. Many a battle have I fought there with my esteemed Brother Ecclestone, in the interest of the truth.

Through a severe slackness in trade, and my family being large, I was compelled to leave those I love in the faith (but my heart is often with them) and seek work elsewhere. I removed to North Wales with Sr. Norton and all the little Nortons. Was there for two years, isolated from any branch, and my family is still there. My work became very bad there and the result is I came out to Brownsburg, P. Q., Canada. My work is very flourishing out here, my trade being granite paving and block cutting.

I shall ever remember the smart the morning I bade farewell to Sr. Norton and my loving little children. I presume my brethren in the mission field will understand me best, when leaving all home comforts to fight the good fight of King Immanuel. I sailed from Liverpool, England, March 9, on the boat Lake Manitoba. We were twelve days at the mercy of the great deep, and I was the only Latter Day Saint on the boat. I felt like as in days of old, surely if five righteous can be found we would be spared.

He carried us safely to land for my sake. I think more sin and vice I never witnessed on land than was seen on that boat. The morning we landed at Saint John's port my heart went up to God in thankfulness and praise. What a merciful and loving Father! After we were landed, of course custom house rule was the next outline of business with which to comply. Here the writer met with some difficulty. I passed my first and second degrees all right, but my third degree I had a stiff battle to fight, passing the emigration agent. They were all put in a place, something like sheep pens, passing out one by one, and questions being put to every individual. All answered favorably up to me, a Latter Day Saint. These are the questions as near as I can call to memory:

"Have you been here before?"

"No."

"What trade are you?"

"A stonecutter and granite paving block cutter."

"Are you going to follow the same trade here?"

"Yes."

"How much money have you?"

(Certainly I had not the amount required, but I may say right here, my fare was paid from Liverpool through to Montreal.) I said, "Three dollars."

"To what church do you belong?"

"The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints."

"What church did you say?"

I emphasized the words so that he could clearly understand.

"Go and sit down there," was his stern reply.

Here, brethren and sisters, I fought the battle. I asked myself a few questions: In what have I failed in this examination? Or is it the church I represent? Myself and Christ were in correspondence in the twinkling of an eye. Now, O righteous Father, I beseech thee through thy Son Jesus Christ, assist thou thy servant. This answer came to me like the sound of a trumpet:

"Fear not, I am with thee; O be not dismayed;

For I am thy God, and will still give thee aid;

I'll strengthen thee, help thee, and cause thee to stand,

Upheld by my righteous, omnipotent hand."

The agents were two stern looking men. All passengers had passed through, taking an earnest look at me, as they passed along, as though I were a prisoner. I tell you, dear Saints, I felt like one; doors being safely closed, and they approached me as their prisoner. With firm voice and piercing look, this was the question put to me.

"Young man, are you aware we do not allow Mormons to land in this country?"

I at once discerned their ideas and promptly answered with a firm and calm reply that I belonged to the true Mormons.

"But you are a Latter Day Saint?"

"Yes, and proud of it, too. But I belong to the true Latter Day Saints." I at once set to work, as I was well supplied with all necessary ammunition, to cut through their armor of bigotry, and they soon hoisted the white flag. They gave me a gentle pat on my shoulder with these words, "You may go now, my good man."

"You are well satisfied, then?"

"Yes."

"Will you accept a tract?"

"Oh, no, no, you have made it perfectly clear."

Now, brethren and sisters, this battle I fought because of that cursed principle of polygamy. Yes, brethren in Leicester, England, the Utah Mormons no doubt are rejoicing over Elder J. T. Norton's departure from that city. While I am permitted to use my vocal powers through Christ, I am determined that the right shoulders shall bear the blame.

Since I have been here in Brownsburg, Quebec, and through my request in SAINTS' HERALD, July 7, I have made the acquaintance of Bro. Charles Mottashed, of Montreal, fifty miles from this place. I paid him a visit Sunday, July 18, and stayed with him until Monday, the 19th. Our meeting together was a very profitable one, strangers to each other, but we were soon the closest friends. We had that sure testimony. Did not our hearts burn within us as we talked together of the mysterious workings of almighty God?

While there, it was my happy privilege, through the quiet workings of Brother Mottashed, to visit on Sunday evening (18th inst.) some colored Methodists in that priest-ridden city. I was at once invited to the stand. I believe the feeble effort that was made was profitable to all present. The writer had good liberty and was invited to visit them again. All credit is due to Brother Mottashed for the wisdom he pursues among these people. I feel sure a good work may be done there. I am sorry the distance is so great, else Bro. J. T. Norton would be there by his side helping him to push the work there.

I have also received a communication from Sister Morrison, Holstein, Ontario, in reference to becoming a member of the home class, which I gladly accepted. Will be pleased to hear from any brethren or sisters who may know I am out this way. No Latter Day Saints here but myself. A good work may be done by tracts. Presbyterians and Wesleyan Methodists are very strong here. Brother Macgregor on Presbyterianism would be very good here, and also Brother Sorensen's tract of seventy-one questions. While here I hope to be able to do something to open up the work.

My whole desire is for work, and my earnest prayer is that God will use me in his hands, blessing me with wisdom to win souls for his kingdom.

Your brother in Zion's cause,
J. T. NORTON.

SCRANTON, KANSAS, August 2, 1909.

Dear Brothers and Sisters: Were it not for the many encouraging and spiritual letters that we see in your worthy pages, sometimes we might get weary in trying to do well. But when we read of others of like faith progressing and finding favor with God, it makes us rejoice to think that we are counted worthy to stand in defense of this latter-day work. Although there are many discouragements and, as Paul said, perils on land and sea, and also among the false brethren, yet every dark cloud has its silver lining. So it is our duty to wait with patience when the clouds are rolling by that we might enjoy looking at the silvery lining on the other side. Then we can look with gladness and call it pretty good.

There was much joy in my soul when I read Brother Pender's letter to Brother Kelley. Brother Pender and I labored together years ago in Topeka, Kansas, and I found him to be a man of God. God does reveal his will to men that are serving him with heart, might, and strength. Not much time for anything else to the man of God, and when this brother is in the Spirit he asks Brother Kelley to seek to establish Zion; seek to establish this order among my people. Let us wisely consider this Order of Enoch, because the Spirit says this order shall be established and flourish among my people. Thank God for the glorious news revealed to us by his servants! This is inspiring to the soul of man that wants to be instructed of the Lord, and he will instruct his Saints as long as we are worthy to be instructed. This is God's method of doing business. How much different from the ways of men, or the so-called socialism of the world; so many of them denying our Father and our God. For this cause they can not learn to know of his power, although I have heard that some would rather be called socialists than to be called Latter Day Saints. God have mercy on such, is my prayer.

Brother Paul was one of the apostles that said the gospel is the power of God, and though we, apostles, or angels from heaven should preach anything else, let them be accursed. Is the power of God made known outside of his kingdom, and if so, where? Let me prepare, remaining inside and looking for instruction from the Lord of glory in my Father's kingdom.

There is no room for ideas of men in the gospel plan of salvation, for "as the heaven is above the earth, so are my ways above your ways, and my thoughts above your thoughts"; so if we want this body of ours to come forth in the first resurrection, let us live according to the whole law, as one jot or tittle can not pass from it, because it is perfect in every detail. The gospel is still the power of God. He reveals his will to those that seemeth good or worthy in his sight. Let us watch lest we enter into temptation. May God give us patience to wait until the Spirit leads us and not run before it, or we may make a mistake.

At present we are having our Bro. H. E. Moler with us, trying to revive the work which has been at low ebb for some time. But we are hopeful that we can see a silvery lining looking through the cloud that has been here for years.

May God speed the day that every branch and every member may have this knowledge that the gospel is the power of God unto salvation to everyone that believeth, is the burden of all my prayers to our God?

JAMES BAILLIE.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, July 24, 1909.

Dear Herald: To my friends, brothers and sisters in the gospel. I thought perhaps you would like to hear from me and to hear where I am. I left my home in Plymouth one year ago last March and went to Charleston, West Virginia, to stay with my people as I thought. But the Master had willed it otherwise. I had no rest there. I came to Independence one year next month, August, and am staying with Bro. and Sr. Hiram Robinson, who have been friends indeed to me. I can truly say the Lord has led me all the way, for which I hope to thank him every day of my life.

Now you will want to know how I like Independence. I like it very much. I like the people, and it is a pleasure to me to attend the services. The Sunday school is a pleasure I never expected to have in this world, for I was wedded to my home town. It was very hard for me at first and I wondered why I was brought here, but now I can say, where once I was blind, I now see. I can also say that this is the true church of God and this is his people for which I thank my Father in heaven.

I have heard my dear father talk often and with great reverence of the gathering place, and he longed to see the time when the Saints would come to Zion; so, dear brothers and sisters, I am still in the faith and it is my great desire to do all I can for the building up of His kingdom while it is day, for the night cometh when no man can work. Brothers and sisters in the Scranton Branch, remember me in your prayers.

Yours in the faith,

MARY A. ISAACS.

BURLINGTON, COLORADO, July 23, 1909.

Editors Herald: It seems that each one of us has his trials and sorrows to pass through in this life; perhaps it is to teach us obedience by what we suffer. Within a year and a half we were called upon to part with our dear father and mother. It was indeed a sad trial, but God knew best and they have left this life of suffering to dwell in the paradise of God, resting from their labors. Our desire is to so live that we may all meet again when Christ shall come, when there will be no more sorrow or sickness or parting. What a glorious promise!

On Tuesday last we were made to rejoice when dear old Bro. J. S. Roth, of Grinnell, Iowa, came to see us. He is a faithful old soldier, always busy at the Master's work. I was baptized by him over fifteen years ago. He is laboring in Colorado this summer because of ill health, but has been greatly benefited by the fine climate and pure water. He will preach for us next Sunday in the Masonic Hall. We enjoy his sermons, because of their plainness and simplicity. We would like very much to have a series of meetings while Brother Roth is with us, but the farmers are too busy at present with their corn, and small grain harvest. Crops are good in this part of the country, notwithstanding a hailstorm which passed through here in the early part of the season.

Ever praying for the welfare of God's people, I remain,

Your sister in Christ,

EFFIE SHUMATE.

SNICARTE, ILLINOIS, August 3, 1909.

Dear Herald: I thought I would write a few lines to the HERALD, as I would like to know if a certain sister is still living. This sister was baptized at my house and confirmed by Bro. M. T. Short. Her name when baptized was Mary Pridechet, but was married again since she left our neighborhood. If she is living I should like to hear from her. If she should see this I hope she will write; or if any of her friends see this and know where she is, please let me know.

Your sister in the one faith,

ELIZABETH AVERY.

SEILING, OKLAHOMA, July 26, 1909.

Dear Herald: We of this region have reason to rejoice this good day. A protracted drought had threatened this part of the State, and yesterday the drooping fields languished under a burning sun; but to-day our prayers for the material weal of the locality are answered; the thirsty ground has drunk its fill from the gracious clouds and prospects for a good crop seem sure.

We closed a series of meetings here and nearby yesterday, with an outdoor service near the river, which was the largest gathering of its kind ever held at the river grove meeting point by the Saints, and there have been several such meetings during the last ten years. Two were baptized and a score know they should be, and some are even now ill at ease in mind because they were not. May God preserve them to obey the gospel.

The reason for the fine interest taken in this meeting is because of the sweet and loving spirit of union which prevails at present among the Saints here. Stalwart, faithful, local laborers deserve credit for the healthy condition of the work. Among the persons alive to the spirit of the work, and who are pushers at the gospel wheel, I mention a few (space forbids the mention of all who are faithfully doing their part): Jephtha Scott, branch president. E. L. Ballinger, presiding teacher, whose business is to serve the Lord, but he drives Uncle Sam's rural delivery to pay expenses. G. M. Steele, branch priest, master photographer of the town and recently appointed to the dignity of police judge, first occupant of that office in the newly incorporated town. Jesse M. Volgamore serves the branch as deacon. Elder H. F. Durfey, a man whose ability as an expounder of the Latter Day Saint faith from the pulpit is recognized by Saint and sinner and admired by all. His local preaching while caring for his other business has done much to put our work in its doctrinal strength before the people. R. M. Maloney's steady years of standing by the standard with his unquestionable integrity, spiced with now and then a dash of Emerald Isle wit, has contributed not a little to the present dignity of the work here. May Texas give him room and send him back soon. Frank Wright and Morris Moldrup are also in the ranks of the Aaronic ministry, as also Bro. Grant Moore, living near Richmond, and who should occupy as an elder. These men are all at the head of Latter Day Saint families, as also our worthy brethren, J. W. Squire, the mechanic; R. B. Brown, a qualified educator; Ed. Hancock, a genial and respected builder; T. J. Cook, prominent for his thrift and industry, his lack of guile, and if we say he is blessed with the same kind of a crowd that was to overcome Gad, see Genesis 49: 19, nevertheless his said "troop" command the respect of all who know them. T. J. and his good wife are recent recruits to the army of the Lord, though by no means "tenderfeet" and said "troop" are prospective soldiers as yet. Jacob Hershey, also of the ministry, and a man as closely attached to faithfulness as a shadow to its object.

"These, and more we kept recounting,

But the list it kept a mounting,

So here we haste.

To swell the list we will not ask it,

In hope to thus escape the basket

Of the waste."

But with such a corps of workers, Seiling and vicinity has much to hope for, notwithstanding the character of our opposition, if the workers continue to stand together.

CHATHAM, ONTARIO, July 26, 1909.

Dear Brethren: As I have been frequently written to regarding the Book of Mormon coming into Canada duty free, they having trouble with their home customs office, for general information I herewith inclose you a certified copy of letter sent to the Chatham City Canadian Customs office.

If you will, kindly insert same [see below] in the HERALD so Canadian Saints can preserve said copy of HERALD and govern themselves accordingly.

Your brother,

J. H. TYRRELL.

"D. R. FAYERHANON, Esq.,

"Collector of Customs,

"Chatham, Ontario.

"Sir: On the 5th of August last, you wrote me respecting the admission free of duty of the religious publications of the 'Latter Day Saints' and stated that the only publication regarding which there had been any difference of opinion at your port was the 'Book of Mormon' which on more than one occasion you had declined to classify under the head of 'Bibles.'

"The book referred to, copy of which was sent me with your letter of the 5th of August, has been decided by the department to be entitled to free entry and you will be good enough to govern yourself accordingly.

"This ruling has been approved by the commissioner and the sample book is returned herewith.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

(Signed) "R. R. FARROW,

"Assistant Commissioner of Customs."

"No man overcomes sin until he hates its power more than he fears its punishment."

OTTAWA, KENTUCKY, July 14, 1909.

Editors Herald: Dear brothers and sisters, we all ought to live more humbly and always be praying to our heavenly Father to keep our feet in that straight and narrow way.

I had a strange dream, or at least it seemed strange to me. I dreamed a dog came up the path to the house and bit me. I did not give my dream any thought, and dreamed again that a mad dog came up the path and bit me on the right arm. I reached out my arm to God and asked him to heal it and it was healed at once. I became very worried over this and told it to my husband and said there was something in it, it was so real, and I prayed for the interpretation and got none. Went over to Sunday school and my husband said, "Tell Henry about your dream." I told him and he said that was some person, that it was not a dog.

The tobacco crops are nearly all pinched and we are not expecting anything out of it. We should always have the words of prayer on our lips.

Dear Saints, I want you to pray for me. I would like to write more, but perhaps this will find place in the waste basket.

Yours in the one faith,

MRS. JAMES OLIVER.

Extracts from Letters.

Bro. C. C. Joehnk writes from Mangschutz, province Silesia, Germany, under date of July 23, 1909: "A week ago I baptized seven. Prospects are quite good."

Bro. J. C. Clapp writes from Myrtle Point, Oregon, under date of August 3, 1909: "Our reunion closed last night. We had a good attendance; good interest and an all around good time. Six baptisms and more to follow."

Request for Prayer.

Sr. Eliza J. Fuller, Saints' Home, Lamoni, Iowa, requests that August 25 be observed by those so desiring as a day of fasting and prayer that she may be healed from an affliction of her eyes, brought on by being overheated.

Conference Minutes.

EASTERN OKLAHOMA.—District conference met with the Haileyville Branch on July 30 and 31, and August 1. Branches reported as follows: Wilburton, last report 198, present number 182; Haileyville, last report 46, present number 45; Jacksonville, last report 62, present number 72. Seventy reported as follows: Lee Quick, E. A. Erwin; Elders H. R. Harder, W. Hampton, J. S. White, J. P. Brannon; Priests W. O. Brannon, Bro. Graham, Everet Reeser; Deacon J. H. Sills. C. C. Crisman's request that a statement that his license had been returned and satisfactory arrangements had been made in regard to his ordination be published in HERALD and Ensign, was granted. V. L. Lum was ordained to the office of elder by E. A. Erwin and J. T. Riley, July 3, 1909, at Haileyville, Oklahoma. A very spiritual priesthood meeting was held Saturday at 6.30 p. m. John S. White was elected president of the district for the coming year; D. O. Harder secretary and treasurer; and Mark Gooch as library commissioner. The next district conference will be held with the Wilburton Branch, time to be appointed by the district authorities. Lee Quick, E. A. Erwin, J. T. Riley, and C. E. Goss were the speakers of the conference. A vote of thanks was granted the small band of Saints at Haileyville for the royal manner in which they provided for the visiting Saints. A very spiritual and harmonious conference was held, and many expressed themselves as being greatly blessed by attending it. D. O. Harder, secretary.

The seventeenth semiannual conference of the Sheffield District convened in room with Saints at 175A Uppertorpe, Sheffield, on July 10, 1909. Presided over by J. W. Rushton, mission president, and John Austin, district president. Called to order 7.30. Notice convening conference and minutes of last conference were read and passed. In place of deacon, Brother Burnett was appointed janitor; organist and chorister, J. Hoole. Resolved, That all members visiting and in good standing have voice and vote in this conference. There were some remarks by the chairman. Quite a number have of late been baptized at Manchester and in Wales; very encouraging results also at Leeds. A revival was worked in spiritual advancement. Brother Joseph's prophecy stood very favorably to be fulfilled in this part. As the result of solidarity of workers the whole mission was in an upward trend. Reports received and read from following ministers of district and local, one failing to report: J. Austin, J. Holmes, T. Taylor, C. Cousin, R. Rallings, E. Wrapp, S. Holmes, sr., S. Holmes, jr., and G. Gaydon. All correspondence was read and resulted in the suggestion that the ordination of J. Naylor to the office of elder was referred to district officers for their prayerful consideration. A suggestion that a council meeting be held every three months to consider the work of the district and its officers and arrange for same, was generally agreed upon. Resolution sustaining church authorities carried. Vote of thanks to Sheffield Branch for the entertaining of this conference and the hospitality to the visitors carried. At 9.30 a. m. priesthood meeting, President Meredith, Birmingham, Seventh Quorum of Elders, explained the formation and profession of this quorum down to the present, and its mission, viz, that the priesthood meet and discuss any point of doctrine or other matters affecting labor, so that there be a universal oneness or unity of thought and practice of the laws of God that we be able to push forward the gospel in future with knowledge and wisdom and the Spirit of God, and not undoing each others' work. Most of the priesthood were called upon to speak. Brother Rushton stated he was pleased the quorum had called the elders to discuss work. T. Taylor spoke as to the world and its thoughts. Preaching 10.30 a. m., by Elder T. Taylor. At 2.30 fellowship, when the brethren and sisters took part in the form of one prayer and nine testimonies. Preaching at 6.30, by Elder J. W. Rushton. George Gaydon, secretary, No. 9 Saint Albans Road, Bulwell, Notts, England.

Llanely Chapel, Wales.

AN APPEAL TO THE SAINTS FOR HELP.

We are making an attempt to secure sufficient money to put the Saints' chapel in Llanely, South Wales, into a proper state of repair, not only to provide a fit place for meeting but also to preserve it from ruin, which fate threatens it at present.

We have had the new deeds drawn out and new trustees have been appointed at considerable expense. The building has been examined by building experts and they have detailed what repairs are necessary to make it tenantable and the estimated cost of the necessary work to be done is not less than seventy-five (75) pounds.

The Saints here in Wales are too poor to meet this expense unaided and there are not many from whom we can secure subscriptions, so we are taking the liberty of making this appeal to all the church, and especially to those of our brethren and sisters whose first knowledge of the gospel message was received in Wales, that they may help the few who are left here to meet this burden.

Many of the HERALD readers will know of this building; it is a landmark in the history of the church in this country, having been built in the early days of the latter-day movement. It is the incarnation of the pure love that the people who were early converted to the restored gospel had for the Master.

After the blight of infidelity to the truth had devastated the vineyard and once again the waste places were being revived by the sound of the "angel's message," around this landmark a conflict was waged, and finally the building was acknowledged to be the rightful property of the Reorganized Church as the lawful representative of that original church. We are anxious, therefore, to preserve this trophy of fidelity and hand it down to the coming generation as the symbol of right and truth.

The "Island Place Chapel" is redolent in happy memories of memorable services and within its walls the songs of Zion have surged and the fire of the Spirit has glowed with passion; and, to-day, we can hear of the days long since past when its walls were crowded with faithful, earnest people whose worship was a joy and whose hope was an inspiration. To-day we can not hold services any longer therein for the ravages of time have wrought dilapidation and we are anxious that once again in Llanely the work we love shall have the attention that it deserves.

We hope to commence open-air work there, and judging from the very good interest that was shown there quite recently in this work, there is every indication that such a hope is within the probability of realization.

Will you please help us by forwarding subscriptions, either large or small, for this purpose to Elder Silas Evans, 362 Cardiff, Road, Aberaman, Glamorganshire, South Wales. Brother Evans is the Bishop's agent for this district.

Send post-office orders made payable to Silas Evans, of Aberaman.

Any details or information will be supplied on application to Rees Jenkins, Spider's Castle, Trebanog Porth, South Wales.

JOHN W. RUSHTON.
REES JENKINS.

I commend the effort of the Saints in Wales to repair church in Llanelly. It is in fine location, time-honored landmark, and should be put in good condition. Bro. Silas Evans is the Bishop's agent for the Western District of Wales and the means will be applied as advised. Any in America who can pay to this office more conveniently may do so, and the offering will be forwarded. A list of the contributors and the amount of each will be published.

E. L. KELLEY, Presiding Bishop.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, BOX 125, August 7, 1909.

Bishop's Agents' Notices.

To the Saints of the Northeastern Kansas District; Greeting: We are truly appreciative of the support the Saints in this district have rendered in times past and gone and are assured that God will amply reward for the same; but at the present time this department of the work is in need of help, while the burden we have to bear this conference year is not great, as there are only two families of the ministry that we have to supply. Yet we have to be able to supply them without delay. The burden of the missionaries is sufficient without having to worry about the support of their families, so, dear Saints, whatever you have in the way of tithes and offerings, please send to the undersigned as soon as possible. Do not wait till you get a large amount before sending in, but send in your mites at once, and if all will do this we shall be able to meet the obligations we are under. Let us not be forgetful of our duties, but remember the needs of the Lord's work. Send all remittances to the undersigned, at Scranton, Kansas.

JOHN CAIRNS, Bishop's Agent.

INCOMPETENT EVIDENCE.

Editors Herald: On the 6th of the present month my attention was called to a pamphlet which has been published by the Ensign Office at Independence, Missouri, and issued as a tract, entitled "Latter-day polygamy, its origin." The matter of this article was a sermon delivered about October, 1904, by Elder R. C. Evans at Saint Louis, Missouri, and was transferred from the Ensign to the pages of the tract, and has been variously circulated since. On pages 16 and 17 of this tract appear the following extracts from a letter written to G. R. Wells by T. F. Stafford, August 24, 1891:

Permit me to read some extracts from a letter written to G. R. Wells by T. F. Stafford, August 24, 1891:

"But I am fully convinced, as I was then, that Brigham [Young] was in adultery in Manchester, England, in the fall, winter and spring of 1840 and 1841. Elizabeth Mayer is the person with whom Brigham was then committing adultery. My reasons are these: We lived next door to her under the same roof. . . . This Elizabeth Mayer had a father and brother who were gardeners; they took their dinners, as they worked a long piece from home. After they had left for work Brigham would step into the house, she would then lock the door, and pull down the blinds or curtains, which to me was strange. He never came to see our folks, although not five steps apart: and when he left he was always in a hurry and she never came to the door with him when he was leaving.

"This same thing occurred in Nauvoo with a woman and Brigham; her name was Greenough; her son was about my age, was always driven out when Brigham came, the door was shut and the curtains lowered. I was puzzled to know why he acted so, if he had a good heart and was engaged in the business of teaching the truth, why drive the boy out? Why not come also and see my mother, only a few steps apart.

"I am now, and was then, satisfied that he was in adultery in Manchester, England. The seeds of polygamy were sown and Brigham was the sower. . . . I was present at a meeting in a grove, about three weeks before Joseph and Hyrum were murdered, when Joseph made a public statement in the presence of three thousand people, that polygamy was being practiced secretly by some; that it had crept into the church secretly and must be put down speedily or the church would be driven from Nauvoo.

"I am satisfied that Joseph was not in favor of it [polygamy] at all. Would swear to all I have stated. . . . In conclusion, I make the fearless statement that Brigham was a whoremonger and a villain of the darkest dye."

On pages 19 and 20 occurs the following, said to have been a statement of Major Thomas Wanless, made to R. C. Evans, his nephew, in the presence of Mrs. Wanless and her daughter, in Saint Louis, Missouri, September 7, 1904:

Well, no one need blame Joseph any more, Brigham is the self-confessed channel through which polygamy was given to his people.

I here submit the testimony of Brigham Young's legal wife; who left him after he was untrue to her. Testimony of Major Thomas Wanless, given to R. C. Evans, his nephew, in the presence of Mrs. Wanless and her daughter, in Saint Louis, Missouri, September 7, 1904:

"I met Brigham Young's first and legal wife and her daughter in the winter of 1860 and 1861, at Central City, Colorado, she told me that Joseph Smith had nothing to do with polygamy; that he did not teach, practice, or in any way indorse the doctrine of polygamy, that he had nothing to do with the so-called revelation on celestial marriage; that he had but one wife. My husband, Brigham Young, Orson Pratt (she gave the name of another man whose name I have forgotten) made up the revelation on celestial marriage.

"Before they left Illinois, some of them practiced polygamy. Brigham Young went to Utah to reorganize the church, and publicly introduce polygamy or to reorganize the church on a polygamous basis."

She left Brigham Young, finally obtained a divorce from him, and was then living with her daughter. Brigham sent the daughter money according to an agreement. She told me they ought to have shot Brigham Young in place of Joseph Smith.

The statement of Major Wanless that she was Brigham's first wife is a mistake. Brigham married Miriam Works, October 8, 1824; she died September 8, 1832. In February, 1834, he married Mary Ann Angel; she was his legal wife, and perhaps is the one referred to by the Major. It is quite pardonable in Major Wanless in getting Brigham's wives mixed up. We opine poor Brigham was at his wit's end to keep the family record correct himself.

We call attention to these extracts from the tract for the following reasons:

First. The tract was not submitted to the Presidency for examination before it was published either in the Ensign or in the tract itself. At the time the sermon was delivered I called the attention of Elder Evans to the statements made, and their untenable character, having no idea of any intention to publish the sermon as a tract for distribution. The sermon was sent to the Ensign Office and was published in tract form, including the extracts as they are presented here.

Second. The Presidency was not consulted in reference to putting the matter in tract form, and it was not until the 6th of August, 1909, that I saw the tract. Bro. Joseph A. Ferris, of Independence, Missouri, has been appointed at the head of a tract distributing agency, and he presented the tract to me, asking for a decision as to its fitness for circulation. I took the matter into examination, and found to my surprise that the quotations herein given and to which I had objected at the time the sermon was delivered, were included.

Third. The statement of T. F. Stafford in this letter to G. R. Wells is a statement of what occurred in England while Stafford was a boy, and is not corroborated by testimony of a similar character, and is at best, only an assertion as to the opinion of the writer as to the meaning of what he saw. The expression of such opinion and its subsequent use as testimony under the circumstances, is of doubtful propriety, and is objected to for this reason.

Fourth. The statement purported to have been made by Major Wanless is extremely faulty for the reason that President Young's first wife, whose name was Miriam Works, died in 1832, and President Young was married to Mary Ann Angel in 1834, hence Major Wanless could not have met his first wife, as she had been dead long before 1860. Major Wanless could not have met his second wife, Mary Ann Angel, as the divorced wife of President Young, for the reason that she was not divorced from President Young, and continued to be his legal wife until 1877, when he died; and she is named in his will as a legatee with other heirs. Major Wanless could not have met Ann Eliza who claimed to have been divorced from President Young, as it was not until long after 1860 when her estrangement from President Young took place. For these reasons the statement in reference to Major Wanless having had an interview with the divorced wife of President Brigham Young is entirely misleading and incorrect.

Neither the statement of Thomas F. Stafford nor that of Major Wanless is competent evidence and can not receive the sanction of the Presidency to be used in a tract of the character of this tract in which these extracts appear. Had the matter been submitted to the Presidency before the sermon was published we should have asked that it be left out, as we have not the slightest intention of giving sanction or color to evidence that is incompetent or statements that we know to be incorrect or unproved.

We have called the attention of the Ensign Office to these extracts objected to, and have also called the attention of Brother Evans and are authorized by him to have the matter objected to expunged from the tract, should it be republished.

JOSEPH SMITH, President.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, August 12, 1909.

THE REUNION AT NEW PHILADELPHIA.

The associate editor was privileged to attend the entire session of the reunion of the Pittsburg, Kirtland, and Ohio districts, held at New Philadelphia, Ohio.

The reunion was well attended, enjoyable, and entirely successful. The prayer services were very spiritual and the gifts were repeatedly manifested. At one service the aged Patriarch John H. Lake sang a beautiful hymn in an unknown tongue and Sr. Gomer T. Griffiths sang the interpretation.

The preaching services were well attended by non-members; in fact the town people gave us unusually courteous treatment. A large vehicle was secured for use in the evenings and singers and preachers were conveyed to the city square where services were held on the streets. Large crowds attended these street meetings and listened attentively. Thus not only was the reunion advertised, but the gospel was preached to many who could not or would not visit the camp ground. The local press was favorable and placed its columns at the disposal of the reunion press committee.

A feature of the camp life was that afternoons were set aside for healthful recreations under the oversight of the director of athletics, Bro. J. A. Jaques, formerly of Saint Louis. Swimming, croquet, tennis, quoits, and baseball furnished amusement for old and young. One ball game was held between the Lamanites and the Nephites. Elder F. J. Ebeling was chief of the Lamanites while Elder Eben Miller headed the Nephites. True to their history the Lamanites massacred the Nephites, score twenty-three to sixteen.

The camp ground was pleasantly situated directly between the Tuscaurauwas River and the canal. This canal is the one over which the Saints passed in early days en route to Missouri. On their first journey to Zion Joseph Smith and his party passed over it. It has a further historic interest from the fact that President Garfield used to walk its tow-path as a boy. Its days of usefulness are ended.

The three districts represented have as fine a body of Saints as can be found. They also have a fine-spirited ministry who toiled zealously in the interests of the work in hand.

This account of the meeting should have appeared sooner, but the unexpected death of Alexander H. Smith caused other things to be temporarily forgotten. We close with a poem written by Bro. J. T. Curry and read at an entertainment given during the reunion:

By this historic stream, where oft a martyr wrought,
And where, in former times, as foemen redmen fought Against the paleface hosts, e'er pressing to the west,—
Until, from shore to shore, was Joseph's land possessed,—

To-day we meet, but not as they, to spoil the weak.
 Enjoyment from "reunion" here is what we seek;
 To foster friendship new, and to cement the ties
 We formed when first we met those whom we love and prize.

Though pleasure comes from sport, remember the delight
 That lives within the heart is kindled by the light
 In words inspired of God, whose servants here attend;
 Their helpful themes we'll hear,—pleasure and profit blend.

STATEMENT IN CORRECTION.

Bro. Heman C. Smith hands us the following statement and we publish it here because the matter to which it refers was also placed in our editorial columns:

LAMONI, IOWA, August 17, 1909.

Editors Herald: Will you please say to your readers that the statement of Elder W. D. Van Dyke, jr., regarding my recent effort in Lamoni, quoted in your issue of August 11, viz: "He made an effort to prove the apostasy of the church even as early as 1841, during the lifetime and presidency of the prophet," is absolutely without foundation in truth.

HEMAN C. SMITH.

THE POPE AND DOCTOR ELIOT.

Dr. Charles W. Eliot and his "Religion of the future" have received attention on all sides. We thought the incident closed and the religious world on tiptoe for fresh inspiration. Now comes the report that Pope Pius X will soon pay his respects to the doctor's address. The Evening Mail, New York, says:

Pope Pius X has signified his intention of making a formal reply to Dr. Charles W. Eliot's recent address on "The religion of the future."

As the world goes, this is a great honor to Doctor Eliot, and a sign of a change at the vatican. In an earlier day, the only answer made to such a document would have been the entrance of its title in the list of the Index Expurgatorius, with the word prohibited stamped upon it.

Everybody will await the pope's response with keen interest. Yet, in advance, wonder may be expressed that the pope should find any ground in Doctor Eliot's paper upon which to rest anything like a discussion.

The church's point of view, and the Harvard emeritus president's, are as wide apart as the fighting ground of the eagle and of leviathan. How can the teeth of one be made to touch the talons of the other?

For this is what the church says:

"There can be no religion without authority."

"There can be no religion without the sacraments."

And this is what Doctor Eliot says:

"The new religion will not be based upon authority, either spiritual or temporal."

"The new religion will admit no sacraments."

Can the protagonists of such opinions do aught but meet, and stand erect in their diverse strength, and pass, and go their ways?

We shall know, when the pope speaks. In the meantime, the mere juxtaposition of their opposite declarations is deeply suggestive. It reduces an ancient controversy to its simplest terms.

With all who profess and feel religion, a mighty advantage rests with the side of the pope. Religion is an expression of a wish to turn from that which is human and sorrowful and fallible to that which is divine, and consequently authoritative. It is the expression of the ultimate awe in the presence of the ultimate mystery; and that awe is itself sacramental. Religion is not thought so much as it is feeling; and in the realm of feeling, what are rational refinements?

Religion is divine perfection, omniscience and omnipotence ranged against human imperfection, ignorance and impotence. Even if the divine be but a dream, it is still the essence of religion.

So, in such a controversy as is proposed, the victory, by very necessity, must rest in advance with the pope.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

A member of the missionary force writes that a correction should be made in the minutes of the General Conference wherein Glasgow, Scotland, is credited with a branch of thirty-three members. He claims that this branch was disorganized some years ago, and the property of the branch turned over to the Saints of Manchester, England.

The August number of the Gospel Guide, published by Joseph S. Warlick, Dallas, Texas, contains a brief account of the recent debate at Arapaho between Mr. Warlick and Elder Curtis. Mr. Warlick in his account says it was a real "play job" for him to debate with Elder Curtis except for one reason, namely, that Elder Curtis was so extremely inefficient that people rather sympathized with him when he got the worst of it. This hardly harmonizes with the account published in the leading paper of Arapaho, a nonpartisan paper, so far as religion is concerned, wherein it was plainly set forth that Elder Curtis had decidedly the best of the struggle all the way through the debate.

The next number of the SAINTS' HERALD Historical Series will be entitled "The visions of September, 1823, and the first view of the plates from which the Book of Mormon was translated." This article will be from the pen of Sr. M. Walker, for many years editor of the Autumn Leaves. It is of such a nature that it can not fail to strengthen the faith and increase the knowledge of those who read it.

In this issue of the HERALD will be found a notice for the sale of bonds. The Herald Publishing House has been growing steadily since the fire. To-day it is equipped with the best of modern machinery, enabling it to take its place among the foremost publishing houses. This has taken not only time and labor on the part of those in charge, but also money. The managers of the Herald Publishing House now see the necessity of bonding this indebtedness. They are offering to the Saints a chance not only to safely invest their savings, but also to help along a business which belongs to every one of them.

President Joseph Smith and wife returned to Independence on Monday morning.

Elder Elbert A. Smith preached Sunday morning in the Chautauqua tent, the meeting being transferred from the Brick Church.

Elder Fred A. Smith arrived on Wednesday from Seattle, being called home on account of his father's death.

Stake President John Smith and wife returned Wednesday from a month's visit in Massachusetts.

Mr. Hans P. Freece, lecturer, made his appearance before the people of Lamoni during the Chautauqua assembly held here last week. His subject was, "The Mormon peril," and he set forth some of the features of the Mormon belief and history of the church in Utah. Mr. Freece was fair enough in speaking of the Reorganization. Certainly, little fault could be found with his talk other than that he seems to take an extreme view of some things. Whether he gave us his regular lecture or not we do not know, but his effort was somewhat rambling and disconnected.

An item of special interest to the Saints of Lamoni and the Lamoni Stake is the movement just started to build a church at Andover, Missouri. At a meeting held there Saturday a building committee was appointed, consisting of Gus Bergman, Samuel Bierlein, Arthur Heide, John Smith, and William Anderson. The following constitute a soliciting committee: Isaac Copp, O. E. Lane, R. S. Salyards, Mark Stanley, and Miss Bertha Snively. The church as planned will be of cement and will be twenty-six by thirty feet in size. We wish the movement unqualified success.

It is a curious state of mind which leads the ignorant to trust the confident amateur rather than the professional, to pin greater faith to quack remedies or grandmother's simples than to the prescription of the physician. We should regret indeed to lose the powerful therapeutic force that resides in religion, but it does not follow from this that we are ready to welcome the priest as a fellow practitioner of medicine, or even to acknowledge that he can exercise that function in the public and wholesale way of the Emmanuel rectors without the danger of doing far more harm than good.—Medical Record.

Thankfulness.

[Folliot Sanford Pierpont, well known as a minor English poet, wrote this hymn in 1864. It has suffered much at the hands of those with whose views it clashed; but its original beauty is being recognized, and it is being sung with greater frequency as a dignified and Catholic hymn of gratitude.]

For the beauty of the earth,
For the beauty of the skies,
For the love which from our birth
Over and around us lies—
Christ, our God, to thee we raise
This our hymn of grateful praise.

For the beauty of each hour
Of the day and of the night,
Hill and vale, and tree and flower,
Sun and moon, and stars and light—
Christ, our God, to thee we raise
This our hymn of grateful praise.

For the joy of ear and eye;
For the heart and mind's delight;
For the mystic harmony
Linking sense to sound and sight—
Christ, our God, to thee we raise
This our hymn of grateful praise.

For the joy of human love,
Brother, sister, parent, child,
Friends on earth, and friends above;
For all gentle thoughts and mild—
Christ, our God, to thee we raise
This our hymn of grateful praise.

For thy church, that evermore
Lifteth holy hands above,
Offering up on every shore
Its pure sacrifice of love—
Christ, our God, to thee we raise
This our hymn of grateful praise.

For thyself, best gift divine!
To our race so freely given,
For that great, great love of thine,
Peace on earth and joy in heaven—
Christ, our God, to thee we raise
This our hymn of grateful praise.

When materialism looks at a man, it thinks of the low forms of animal life from which he climbed; when Christ looked at the prodigal, he thought of the angels of God to whose level the youth might ascend. When science stands behind a man it looks down at a mollusk, and talks about its beginning; when Christ beholds a man he looks up, and talks about his consummation and his end. Science says man began with a cell; and carries seventy summers in his heart. Christ says man began in the mind and purpose of God, and he carries eternity in his heart. Science talks the ruby down to the red clay from which it was made; Christ talks red clay up to the ruby, and carries the ruby up to a gem, and beholds the gem set sparkling in the crown of God.—N. D. Hillis.

The very arguments that men use against a life of holiness, are in themselves the very best reasons why they should embrace such a life and strive to live its requirements.—B. V. Bander.

WILL WE ROB GOD AND GO WITH THE WICKED? OR GIVE THE LORD HIS OWN AND BE WITH THE GOOD?

In order to treat this subject intelligently, we should understand our relationship to God.

First, he is our Creator. He has given us life both physically and spiritually. He giveth to all life and breath and all things. (Acts 17: 25.) For we are also his offspring. (Acts 17: 28.) We are all his by creation. He has created this earth and placed us on it. It all belongs to him. The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein. (Psalm 24: 1.) This makes it plain that we and all we have belong to God. He has given us wills of our own, and put good and evil before us, that we may choose what we prefer to do. He has given his Son to die for us, that we might have a fullness of life through obedience to the gospel, the law of life. We accept the gospel, and in so doing we covenant with God to serve and obey him as long as we live; and for our service he is to give us eternal life. Then Paul says, "Ye are not your own. You are bought with a price, and that price is the precious blood of Christ." We are now to be "laborers together with God" (1 Corinthians 3: 9), and the Lord has emphasized this in this dispensation:

All are called according to the gifts of God unto them; and to the intent that all may labor together, let him that laboreth in the ministry and him that toileth in the affairs of the men of business and of work, labor together with God for the accomplishment of the work intrusted to all.

In this we see that all are required to work with God to establish his kingdom. Jesus said, "Seek first to build up his kingdom."—Matthew 6: 38, I. T.

We see that all are required to work alike to accomplish this one thing; establish God's kingdom on the earth. It matters not what our occupation may be. We are all to give our life service to God. We are stewards under him, and as such must be faithful in our stewardship or come under condemnation.

The first revelation of the Reorganized Church was to execute the law of tithing. The gospel must be preached and the kingdom built up, and all must help to do it. The Lord requires our means as well as the preacher's time.

Honor the Lord with thy substance, and with the first fruits of all thine increase.—Proverbs 3: 9.

Behold, now it is called to-day (until the coming of the Son of Man), and verily it is a day of sacrifice, and a day for the tithing of my people; for he that is tithed shall not be burned (at his coming); for after to-day cometh the burning: . . . Wherefore, if ye believe me, ye will labor while it is called to-day.—Doctrine and Covenants 64: 5.

The proof of our faith is in making the sacrifice, paying our tithing, one tenth of what we are worth when we come into the church, and one tenth of our increase thereafter. And now, as the gathering has begun, and Zion is to be built up, the Lord requires all our surplus property to be put into the hands of the bishop. (Doctrine and Covenants 106: 1.) Section 42: 8:

If thou lovest me, thou shalt serve me and keep all my commandments. And, behold, thou wilt remember the poor, and consecrate of thy properties for their support, . . . and inasmuch as ye impart of your substance unto the poor, ye will do it unto me, and they shall be laid before the bishop of my church and his counselors, two of the elders, or high priests, such as he shall or has appointed and set apart for that purpose.

When ancient Israel failed to give the Lord his part, he said they robbed him. Listen:

Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed me. But ye say, Wherein have we robbed thee? In tithes and offerings. Ye are cursed with a curse; for ye have robbed me, even this whole nation.

They knew God required them to bring their tithes and offerings and consecrate them unto him, to help the poor and carry on his work. They were stewards, all belonged to the Lord; and by withholding his part he declares they robbed him. Now we are the Israel of God, and stewards over earthly possessions, and he has told us what he requires; and will we withhold as they did, and rob God and bring his curse upon us, or will we comply with his law as set forth in the standard books of the church, taught by the Bishopric, and sanctioned by the quorums and the General Conference and receive the divine approval and blessing? The Lord is complaining of us in his last utterance at the General Conference in April last. He had before said to the old church in section 101: 2, after telling them that all things were his, and he was going to provide for his Saints in his own way, "that the poor shall be exalted and the rich made low."

Therefore, if any man shall take of the abundance which I have made, and impart not his portion, according to the law of my gospel, unto the poor, and the needy, he shall, with the wicked, lift up his eyes in hell, being in torment.

Did the Lord tell the truth? Shall we suffer the same fate as others who imparted not their portion according to the gospel law? If God is unchangeable and no respecter of persons, those who do not give their part now must, with all others like them, go to the same place.

Notice what the Lord said to us in the last revelation:

The word which has been given at a late period should not have been so soon forgotten and disregarded by the church or any of its members. "I am God; I change not;" has been known to the church and the eldership since the coming of the angel with the message of restoration. . . . The church has been directed to accede to the rendition of the bishopric with respect to the temporal law; and until such heed is paid to the word which has been given, and which is in accordance with other revelations given to the church, which had been before given, the church can not receive and enjoy the blessings which have been looked for when Zion should be fully redeemed. Therefore, hearken once again unto the voice of inspiration, in warning and instruction, and conform to that which is given and receive what is awaiting the upright and the pure in heart.—Doctrine and Covenants 129: 8.

Will we now give heed to this instruction and warning; and help with our substance as the law requires and enter into rest with the pure and good; or will we keep the Lord's part, and rob God, and go with the wicked to that place of torment? Let us heed the warning, give the Lord his own, and enter into rest. So may it be, is my prayer.

Discussion by Lay Members.

(Bro. John Grainger, of St. Louis, to whom we are indebted for so many clippings, fillups, and contributions, sends us the following discussion which appeared in the St. Louis Times. "C. W. B." writes very much like a Latter Day Saint, but we do not know who he is.—EDITORS.)

OPPOSES COMMON SENSE.

To the Editor:

ST. LOUIS, July 9.—In your esteemed paper, at different times, I have seen articles written by self-styled "Truth-seekers," seeking after truth in things religious, when in all probability they would not be able to identify truth if they were to find it; and in last night's Times I saw an article from one "Common Sense" which does not appear to me in that light, and I desire to say a word or two for the other side.

"Common Sense" asks this question: "Do Christians believe the earth was created out of nothing in six days, as stated in the first chapters of Genesis?" Let me tell Mr. "Common Sense" it positively does not state in the book of Genesis or elsewhere in the Bible that the earth was created out of nothing in six days or a million years. It says, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." It does not say "out of nothing," "Common Sense" also seems to object to Jesus saying that some of his apostles would live to see the end of the world! Can "Common Sense" point out the time, place and manner of the death of John, the beloved disciple?

In regard to the number who practice his teaching, let "Common Sense" speak for himself alone, for, while this may be as he quotes, the "most worldly, corrupt, sensual, hypocritical age this world has ever seen, not even excepting pagan Rome," yet there are some who practice the teachings of the Christ, and with his assistance do not find them beyond human powers. In Saint Matthew 7: 13, 14, he says: "Enter ye in at the strait gate: for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be that go in thereat: Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." Does that look to Mr. "Common Sense" as if the Savior expected the greater per cent of the people to practice his teachings?

And again: Mr. "Common Sense" says, "No truthful person can deny that Christianity has had a fair trial and has been found wanting." That statement is an absolute falsehood, as there are in this country to-day some tens of thousands of persons who can positively assert that "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." If any truth-seeker would come down off his perch for a time and look into the matter a little, he would discover that the gospel is being preached to-day in all its fullness, and with all the power of the apostolic age, and with all the gospel gifts enumerated in the twelfth chapter of 1 Corinthians. God reveals himself to-day to mankind just as he always did in any age of the past when any would obey his will. God is, indeed, unchangeable and impartial and bestows his blessings now as in the dim, distant past. We will admit that during several centuries the glory of God was not with mankind, nor his authority, but he has raised up righteous men to proclaim his truths and doctrine, and to-day there are some seventy thousand persons waging the warfare against the adversary. With those there is no blind faith, but absolute knowledge, and the glory and authority of God and Jesus Christ, whom he sent, are resident with them. C. W. B.

ARGUING BY QUOTATION.

To the Editor:

ST. LOUIS, July 16.—Answering C. W. B., John 1: 3 says: "All things were made by him; and without him was made nothing that was made." Matter comes under the head of "all things," and to my simple mind the only deduction possible is that God, being omnipotent, is able, and did create all things out of nothing.

Your question as to John's death is mere quibbling. I have never yet heard it claimed he was still alive. If you have knowledge of his present whereabouts in this life, will you, for "truth's sake," prevail upon him to settle the disputed points, as to "when and by whom the gospel attributed to him was written"? "When and by whom verses 9 to 20 were added to Mark 16"? "Who was the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews"? and the various other controversies. Ask him also to explain the inconsistencies and contradictions of the New Testament, for, as you know, John 20: 31, the things therein are written, "That you may know that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, etc." For myself I would prefer not to quote other authorities, but am willing to accept the record as presented. If you insist I can name you the generally accepted time and place of John's death.

I do not see that you would gain anything by proving him to be still alive, for he says, John 18: "Little children, it is the last hour, etc.; we know it is the last hour" (though some translators render hour as time, which does not make sense), and in Revelation 22 he is told: "Seal not the book, for the time is at hand." In 1 Thessalonians 4: 13-17, Paul tells them he and they will be taken up alive.

In regard to the few who are to be saved, Jesus also said, John 12: 32, if he "be lifted up, he would save all men to him."

I challenge you for the proof of your statement that the gospel is preached to-day with all the gifts and powers of 1 Corinthians 12: 9, 10 (healing and working of miracles), nor do you know seventy thousand Christians, nor seven, nor one judged by chapter 5, 6, 7, 19, and 22, Matthew.

As you consider it only a "probability that I would not be able to identify the truth," why not, in Christian charity, try to pierce the density of my ignorance with the effulgency of that light of truth with which you are so abundantly illuminated, and "give reasons for the faith that is in you"?

With some appreciation of the rarity of the quality, I again sign myself, COMMON SENSE.

C. W. B. REPLIES TO CRITICISM.

ST. LOUIS, July 21.—In your esteemed paper of the 19th inst. I note a communication from "Common Sense" answering a former one of mine, and I have a few thoughts which may be of value to him, and perhaps to some others.

If "Common Sense" will refer to his former article he will find that he raised the question as to whether Christ was lying or not when he said some of them would not taste death till he comes again. Here is what Jesus said to Peter about John: "Jesus saith unto him, if I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? follow thou me. Then went this saying abroad among the brethren, that that disciple should not die . . ." (John 21: 22, 23). In the words of "Common Sense," "I would prefer not to quote other authorities, but am willing to accept the record as presented." I do not care to know "the generally accepted time and place of John's death."

If "Common Sense" will more closely examine my former communication he will observe that I made no reference to the few who would be "saved," but to the few who would accept and practice his teachings. Christ died for all mankind, not just for the few who have had an opportunity to receive his teachings. All shall be judged according to their works and their opportunities.

As to the gospel being preached with all the gifts and powers of First Corinthians I reiterate: The gospel gifts always accompany the gospel. If you find a gospel without the gifts and without the authority and direct revelation from God, and without all the officers enumerated in the New Testament, it is not the gospel of Jesus Christ. But such a gospel is being preached now, and if space would permit I could refer you to hundreds of persons who have been miraculously and instantaneously healed of all manner of disease, such as blindness, deafness, consumption (last stages), internal tumors (removed root and branch), cerebro spinal meningitis, crushed bones, etc., etc., but will refer you only to one who will try to answer all the questions you may desire to ask. "The proof of the pudding is in the eating."

And if "Common Sense" or any other desires a portion of the "light of truth" to which he refers, let him follow the advice of James 1: 5, 6: "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him. But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering . . ." All those minor difficulties to which he refers may be settled in that manner.

Hoping that "Common Sense" will avail himself of the opportunity of learning something about the hitherto unknown, I am,

Doctor Eliot's Religion Declared Unsound.

PASTOR LA RUE SAYS IT LACKS TRUE BASIS.

The new religion predicted by Dr. Charles Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard University, was the subject of a sermon by the Rev. William E. La Rue, pastor of the Central Church, Latter Day Saints, at Ninth street and Lydia avenue Sunday morning.

Mr. La Rue quoted from the text: "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the way of the ungodly," and in the course of his remarks took Doctor Eliot severely to task for his absolute denial of the existence of God, as Christians define him, and for his weak understanding of the Bible.

In the whole catalogue of religious sects there probably are none more widely at variance than the Latter Day Saints and the Unitarians. The new religion coming from Doctor Eliot, nominally a Unitarian, met with a rebuke from Mr. La Rue, who said in part:

"The basis of true religion, whether new or old, is contained in the law of God. That law, as revealed in Jesus Christ and his gospel, was designed by the infinite wisdom of God, to apply to all people in all ages of the world, for all time.

"Any new religion that eliminates Christ as the Son of God or excludes any principle of his gospel can not but be a false religion.

"Doctor Eliot says that God will be so imminent that no intermediary will be needed, that there will be no recognized deification of remarkable human beings. That is to say in other words that Christ will not be recognized as a mediator between God and man, and that he will be denied as the Son of God and simply be esteemed as a good man.

"The new religion, recognizing not anything except the laws of nature, will deny the resurrection of Christ and his miracles and thus make the Bible a book of fables, and Christ the greatest impostor of human history.

"If Christ was not born of the Virgin Mary, if he is not the Son of God, in fact, he is for ever unworthy of further recognition, and only to be condemned. As the new religion is not to be found by doctrine or dogma, it will then eliminate the foundation of the gospel.

"As the new religion will admit no sacraments except natural hallowed customs, it will surely not be the religion of the New Testament.

"This reputed twentieth century religion will hardly recommend itself to the people who believe in an unchangeable God and an unchangeable gospel. That is what we believe as a people.

"Because a man of great learning in this work states a matter according to his opinion, it does not follow as a fact.

"Prof. George B. Foster, of the University of Chicago, in his book, The Function of Religion in Man's Struggle for Existence, denies that man has a soul in these words:

"There is no such thing as a self-dependent soul freely active or interactive within an organism which we call the body."

Denying the existence of God, he says:

"There is no self-dependent deity active or interactive in that larger body which we call the cosmos."

"He further says there is 'not a single Bible believer to-day; that the world is God; that the concept of a personal God has symbolic validity only.'

"The trouble with these men is that they have forgotten that the Bible says 'the world by the wisdom of the world can not know God.'

"No religion not founded on the unmovable truth of God's word can long survive."—Kansas City Journal.

How to Improve the Complexion.

Frequent bathing is, of course, of great value for blood purifying purposes. The pores of the skin must be kept active, and if they are not cleansed at frequent intervals, at least once or twice a week, the impurities that they might otherwise eliminate are often thrown back into the circulation and may result in serious eruptions. I should say that one should take a soap and hot water bath for the entire body at least once or twice weekly. A cold bath, or at least a cold sponge each day, can also be taken with advantage, though this is not absolutely necessary by any means.

A dry friction bath should, however, be taken at frequent intervals, as it is really of more value than the cold bath for increasing the activity of the pores of the skin. This dry friction bath can be taken with two soft bristle brushes. One of these brushes should be taken in each hand, to use them effectively, and every part of the body should be brushed back and forth until the skin is pink from the friction. After you have taken this friction bath for awhile you will be amazed at the change that has taken place in the texture of the skin. Although previous to this it may have been harsh and dry, in a short time it will be as soft and pleasing to the touch as satin, all through the influence of dry friction.—Physical Culture for September.

The Bible as "Good Reading."

"I wish I had something to read," said He.

"Well, what's the matter with the magazines?" promptly replied the Other One.

"I have read them all," He immediately objected.

"Why, I thought you didn't want to read anything. I thought you said this was to be a vacation in the woods, with no reading or thought or anything else," said the Other One.

"Well, of course," said He; "but a fellow has got to have something to read, after all."

"Well," said the Other One, "let me read you something out of the Bible."

"The Bible," said He. "Oh, no! I want some 'good reading,' that's what I want."

They were in camp in the deep woods, many days' canoe trip from a human being. They were two tired-out men—wholly tired out when they started, with non-productive brains, and with sore, ragged nerves, from their year's hard work. They were none the less "worn out" that it had been a year of successful work—even of triumphant work.

So they said when they started: "Let's get a rest. Let's don't even take any reading material. Let's obey Emerson. Emerson's advice to the rest-seeker in his Wood Notes, where he says to leave everything behind: 'Enough to thee the primal mind.'"

And so they did. They arranged for their guides carefully (and you who go to the woods look carefully to that). They were scrupulous to the last degree about their cook (and you who go to the woods be very careful about that). They were particular about their tents, almost technical about food and sleeping and creature comforts. But reading matter—none of it for them. At the last minute, obeying the impulse of the civilized, they bought all the magazines in sight; and one of them who always carried a Bible had it with him on this occasion.

So, up the streams and over the lakes they went, and at last, far out from the path of even canoe voyagers, on the shores of a lake whose name is Beauty, and in the depths of a forest whose name is Noble, by a mossy spring whose name is Delight, they swung their axes and built their camp. Already Nature had begun her work. They slept like pieces of iron, with this difference—there was the delicious consciousness of going to sleep and ecstasy on awakening. They ate with the appetite of the primal man, but with the restraint of the civilized one when out in the wilderness. They were careful to get up from their meal always a little hungry. They joyed in the woods. The flight of birds was a thing to be looked at and to get pleasure from. The forest had strange, attractive sounds. The occasional sentences of the guides were full of wisdom.

THE HOLIDAY OF THE BRAIN.

Almost instantly Nature began her work on the brain cells. They had planned not to think at all. They were astonished to find that they thought more than ever and more sanely, more calmly, and yet with a good deal more vigor. Every suggestion of tree, and flower, and cloud, and shadow and shine was fecund with thought. The rain induced more than sleep; it induced a curious yet a delightful mental life. There was none of your neurotic thoughts which come of overworked nerves and all that sort of thing.

Of course, you can't keep that kind of men down to not thinking at all. Their bodies, which so long have been unused and maltreated, demand exercise—long rambles among the trees and over mountains; canoe trips where every stroke generates more energy than it expends; target practice with pistols until the snuffing of a candle at nighttime, twenty yards, three times out of five, was no extraordinary feat. Well, then, it was plain to see how the minds of these men demanded exercise just as the body did; for the minds had been more maltreated and neglected than the bodies.

"So I want something to read," said He.

"Well, what's the matter with the Bible?" said the Other One.

"Oh," said He, "I don't want anything dull. I don't want to be preached to. I feel in a religious mood, all right, but not in the mood for a sermon."

"Why, man," said the Other One, "the Bible has more 'good reading' in it than anything I know of. What will you have?—poetry, adventure, politics, maxims, oratory! For they are all here." And he produced the Bible.

Thus occurred the first Bible reading in the woods. After it was over—"Why, I never knew that was in the Bible," said He. "Let's have some more of that to-morrow."

And to-morrow they did have more of it. By chance, one of the guides was near and he sat down and listened. The next day all the guides were there. The day after, the reading was delayed and "Indian Charley" modestly suggested: "Isn't it about time to have some more of that there Bible?" And more of it they had.

And this continued day in and day out through the long but all too brief vacation in the woods—the real woods, the deep woods—the limitless woods—none of your parks with trees in them.

A BOOK FULL OF REAL MEN AND WOMEN.

The comments of the guides were curious, keen, full of human interest. It was no trouble for them to understand Isaiah. They had the same spirit that inspired David when he went up against Goliath. They knew, with their deep, elemental natures, the kind of woman Ruth was and Rebekah was. Moses slaying the Egyptian and leading the children of Israel out of Egypt, laying down the law in good, strict, man-fashion, was entirely intelligible to them. One wonders what the "higher critics" and "scholarly interpreters" of the Holy Scriptures would have thought had they seen these plain men, learned in the wisdom of the woods, understanding quite clearly the twelfth chapter of Romans, or the voluptuous Song of Solomon, or the war song of Moses, or, most of all, the Sermon on the Mount.

"Why, I never knew those things were in the Bible. How did you ever get on to them?" said He one day, when a perfectly charming story had been read.

"Why, this way," said the Other One. "Many years ago in a logging camp there happened to be nothing to read, and I just had to read. I had read everything—that is to say, I had read everything but the Bible. And I did not want to read that. I had heard it read over and over again in the church and in my own home, and always with that monotonous non-intelligence, that utter lack of human understanding that makes all of the men and women of the Bible, as ordinarily interpreted to us, putty-like characters without any human attributes.

"But there was nothing else to read. So I was forced to read the Bible, and I instantly became fascinated with it. I discovered what every year since then has confirmed—that there is more 'good reading' in the Bible than in all the volumes of fiction, poetry, and philosophy put together. So when I get tired of everything else and want something really 'good to read,' something that it charged full of energy and human emotion, of cunning thought and everything that arrests the attention and thrills or soothes or uplifts you, according to your mood, I find it in the Bible."

WITH PLOT AND COUNTERPLOT.

It is natural enough, is it not? Surely this book has not held its sway over the human mind for two thousand years without having engaging qualities—something that appeals to our "human interest." Surely the Old Testament, which is the story of the most masterful and persistent people who ever lived, a people who have seen nations rise and fall, dynasties grow and perish like mushrooms—I mean the Jews—surely such a history can not help being charged with thought, and emotions, and love, and hate, and plot, and plan, with frailty and ideals, with cowardice and courage, with anarchy and law, with waywardness and obedience, with the flowing of milk and honey on the one hand, and battle "till the sun stood still" on the other hand. No, surely, such a chronicle could not help overflowing with everything human.

And surely, too, the New Testament, which is the account of the Man who dominates all Christendom to-day, the Man who is the most powerful influence in civilization two thousand years after He has passed from earth; surely such an account could not be without a fascination, compared with which our most thrilling novels and most passionate poems are vapid and tame. And, of course, the New Testament, with its vivid account of the life-work and deeds, with the crucifixion, resurrection, and ascension of our Lord, is not without these elements. And, when you add to these merely human elements of the Old and New Testaments the divine quality glorifying it all, you have by far the best literature in the world; and not the best literature only, but by far the most interesting literature.

You have not only the development of the only divine religion known to man, but you have easily the best reading to be found in all the libraries. It is of the Bible from this last point of view to which this paper is addressed. I am talking now to those who are asking each night about their firesides for "something good to read"; and I am telling them to read the standard novels and more than the standard novels—the standard histories and biographies; and more than the standard histories and biographies—the standard poets; and more than both of these—the current magazines and all of them, for they are the living expression of the world's thought to-day; but I am telling them that, more than all of these put together, they will find "good reading," considered from the viewpoint of "good reading" and nothing else, between the covers of that volume which every home would be ashamed to be without, but which, curiously enough, is the last thing to be read.

Or is it curiously enough? Is not the neglect of the Bible as mere literature due to the intellectual indigestion acquired early in youth as to this particular book by the unintelligent way in which it is read at the fireside and from the pulpit? I say unintelligent merely, because, to our young men and young women, when they are boys and girls, nothing but texts and precepts and maxims are read, and these are declaimed with an offensive solemnity that defeats its very purpose.

But take the Bible up as an account of mighty men and extraordinary women and the most wonderful of peoples; take it up as a purely "human document" (you will get the religion in it as you go through) and note how fascinating it is. I wish the time permitted an article upon the Bible as good reading under each of the following titles:

"The Bible and adventure," "The Bible and art," "The Bible and politics," "The Bible and statesmanship," "The Bible and poetry," "The Bible and oratory," etc.

Having got all these you would not fail to get what all of them combined tell—The Bible and Religion.

But let us take up some illustrations of each of these.

First of all, the Bible is by far the most admirable compendium of the best short stories to be found in the literature of the world. Forgetting this, the consensus of modern literary criticism is that the French are the best tellers of short stories. And yet the French short stories—perfect as they are when compared with other fiction—are crude and prolix compared with the short stories of the Bible, which, after all, are not stories, but the plain telling of actual human occurrences. They are of every kind, too. Suppose, for example, you want to read a story of adventure—one that will make your blood jump and yet uplift you.

A GREAT SHORT STORY.

Very well; turn to the seventeenth chapter of first Samuel, and read how the golden-haired, ruddy-cheeked, blue-eyed young Hebrew called David came from the shepherding of his father's flocks, bringing food for his brothers, who were soldiers in the Israelitish army encamped on the side of a mountain. On the opposite side of the valley was the army of the Philistines.

Those were tremendous days for fighting. Men slew men with primitive ferocity. It was the time of that rude chivalry where a single combatant from one camp would demand the other camp to produce an antagonist, and settle the whole affray in a single fight. We read of the same custom in early Roman history. It reappeared in mediæval times. Indeed, in one form or another, it has always been here and always will be here.

The Philistines had a fighter who had never found his match, and the terror of his fame was upon all the land. He was a tremendously big man physically, and unlike most physical giants his nerve was as fine and as tense as his body was great (for, to digress, most physically big men are inferior nervously). And this Philistine man of might was as brave as he was tall. Also he was as hard as nails.

There wasn't anybody in all Israel who dared "go up against him." And that was saying a good deal; for the ancient Hebrews were perhaps the best fighting men the world has yet produced. They were as daring as courage itself. They were schooled in combat. They always believed that they were fighting under the command of the Most High, and the strict obedience required of them to the amazing and minute laws of health laid down by Moses made them altogether in muscle, nerve, and brain unsurpassed as warriors by any men of any time, unless we may except the Japanese Samurai.

And yet, when the Philistine champion came out before the army of Israel, and cried, "I defy the armies of Israel this day; give me a man, that we may fight together," Saul and all Israel "were dismayed, and greatly afraid." And day after day, while the opposing armies rested, this defiance was renewed.

Pretty soon, of course, this had its effect. The Hebrews began to lose heart. They began to "lose their nerve," as the saying is. Worse than this, they were humiliated.

They began to be ashamed. And when you have at once humiliated a man, and also scared him to death, he is about the most pitiable of spectacles. Take it altogether, it was a heartrending situation when the blond (David had yellow hair and blue eyes and a "peaches and cream" complexion, you know) young musician arrived in the camp with some bread for his brothers. For you must remember that David played on the harp and sang well; so far as that is concerned, he did nearly everything well. I have often thought that Emerson must have had him in mind in his wonderful lines on Character when he says:

"His tongue was framed to music,
His hand was armed with skill,
His face was the mold of beauty,
And his heart was the throne of will."

When David arrived and saw the fearlessness of Goliath; his blood turned to fire, and he shouted out, "Who is this uncircumsized Philistine that he should defy the armies of the living God?" And the soldiers told him all about it; and then the blue-eyed shepherd boy went to Saul and told him that he would be the Hebrew champion.

Of course, Saul said, "Thou art not able to go against this Philistine to fight with him: for thou art but a youth, and he is a man of war from his youth."

Then David made the argument that heroes have made in different words from the foundation of the world. There was a courage in his heart all his own, and faith in his soul from on high. He was another of the type of Joan of Arc or of Nelson or of our own Lawrence.

They put the armor upon him, but he could not move in it. He wasn't used to it, so he put it off of him; he took instead his staff in his hand and chose five smooth stones out of the brook, and put them in his shepherd's bag, and his sling was in his hand and he drew near to the Philistine. When Goliath saw David, he was furious with insult, and roared out the denunciation which you might expect, telling David what he would do to him and what, by all the rules of the game, it was apparently certain he would do to him. David's answer was as noble as his charge:

"Then said David to the Philistine, Thou comest to me with a sword, and with a spear, and with a shield: but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast defied.

"This day will the Lord deliver thee into mine hand; and I will smite thee, and take thine head from thee; and I will give the carcasses of the host of the Philistines this day unto the fowls of the air, and to the wild beasts of the earth: that all the earth may know that there is a God in Israel.

"And all this assembly shall know that the Lord saveth not with sword and spear: for the battle is the Lord's, and he will give you into our hands."

There spoke the voice of the soul of the Hebrew people. There was a defiance that answered Goliath's own and overwhelmed it. Also, it dazed the mighty Philistine warrior. What! a mere boy say this to him. It was astounding—more! it was absurd! And still more! it was insulting! And then the fight took place. The world has not yet forgotten this immortal combat. And for "good reading" in the realm of adventure, nothing has been produced that comes anywhere near it.

"To the saints that are, and the faithful in Christ Jesus." These are those who have an "inheritance" in Christ. By the saint, we are not to think of any superexcellency of moral qualities, but merely one "consecrated or dedicated to the service and use of God." We are thus all called to be saints. —Christian Standard, May 1, 1909.

Letter Department

DENVER, COLORADO, July 30, 1909.

Dear Herald: Death has again invaded our ranks, taking two of our members. He is coming often of late. These make eight since March 1.

Others of the Saints are well, with one or two exceptions. Our worthy president's family are out of quarantine for scarlet fever, after six weeks of detention. The new church building is not yet above ground, but we hope to have the dirt flying very soon. It looks more favorable than at any time in the past. Come forward, Saints, with your donations of money and labor, and we will have a place of our own to worship God in before the snow flies. May we not hear from our scattered members with good healthy subscriptions?

Elder C. Scott arrived from Wray a few days ago, and is still in the city. We see by Ensign that Bishop Bullard has departed for Los Angeles. We were expecting him to locate in Denver, or hopeful that he would.

The writer is still holding services at Boulder and Louisville on alternate Sundays, and while the attendance is not large, we think there are some who are interested. To say the least, we are having a very interesting discussion with the minister of the nonprogressive branch of the Christian Church, through the columns of their paper published at Boulder, called The Word of Truth. We have had three articles in their paper so far (and another in preparation) and the editor's reply. What will result from this discussion we are not able to foretell, but of one thing we are sure: it is giving us a good opportunity to get the gospel before that body of people, as well as some others. We think to stay with this reverend gentleman as long as he will give us space in his paper, unless we have to quit because of being whipped, which we are not uneasy about as yet.

I am feeling well in this work. We are thinking very strongly of beginning street work in Boulder and other northern Colorado towns. We would have done so ere this, but have been waiting for assistance.

NEW GLASGOW, NOVA SCOTIA, July 25, 1909.

Dear Herald: I write you with a longing in my heart for the ordinances of the true worship of God's house; a longing which a contact with the world only intensifies, as the latter is so hollow and unsatisfying. This is a city of churches and church-going people; where Sunday is a sabbath and no unseemly noises ever disturb the quiet stillness of the sacred hour. It is a stronghold of Presbyterianism, with four large churches of that denomination, where the wealth and fashion of the city congregate to worship and with reverent, bowed heads, they sit in solemn stillness. Even a whisper would be a desecration of the sacred place, a silent rebuke to many of our people who do not appreciate the solemnity that should pervade the house of God. The house of God is looked on by many of the people of God with no more respect than a five-cent theater. The place where God dwells is too holy for frivolities; laughing and talking are altogether out of place. There should be a solemn hush over the congregation that meets to worship God. The children are not taught reverence; they are allowed to rush noisily from place to place, and to disturb the meeting by coming in after the services have begun, thus grieving away the Spirit of God; their part being to show themselves at some part of the service and that being done, they have no other responsibility. We have not far to look for the cause of dull meetings; one fruitful cause for their dullness is the lack of holy reverence for God. We need development along these lines and we can not come up to the standard if we do not show proper respect for the ordinances of God's house.

MRS. A. MCKENZIE.

CULLOM, ILLINOIS, July 20, 1909.

Editors Herald: On June 5 and 6 the Northeastern Illinois district conference was held at Mission, Illinois. Elders F. M. Cooper, C. H. Burr, J. E. Vanderwood, and Arthur Allen ably broke the bread of life to the Saints assembled from different parts of the district. The prayer services were uplifting and cheering to the people of God, as well as the sermons delivered during the sessions. A peaceful spirit prevailed in the business as well as other sessions.

The program given by the Mission Sunday School Friday evening was worthy of note, both young and old rendering their several parts well. The Saints of Mission are surely to be commended for their hospitality and kindness in caring for visiting Saints and friends.

By advice and counsel with our worthy and congenial minister in charge, Brn. F. M. Cooper, J. E. Vanderwood, and the writer came to Kempton, Illinois, via Big Four and Illinois Central Railroad, about eighty-five miles southwest of Chicago. We were cordially welcomed by Bro. and Sr. Goren Olsen who are Saints indeed. We are told in Doctrine and Covenants 83:16: "Whoso receiveth you receiveth me, and the same will feed you, and clothe you, and give you money. . . shall in no wise lose his reward. . . by this you may know my disciples." Bro. and Sr. Olsen are well respected and known by their good works in the village.

The next day we called on the Reverend Dunberry, of the Methodist Church, he being the only local minister in town at present. In answer to the inquiry regarding the use of the church to hold services in, he said he would see; also claimed to know "who was who" and that the Reorganized Church is a distinct and separate body from the dominant church of the West.

The same evening we commenced services in the open air and continued to preach each evening with the exception of once or twice on account of the rain, about twenty days. We also visited and left tracts at every house in town. Some places we were invited in and conversed for over an hour; other places, though not stepping inside, we talked at the door, inviting people out to hear, and explaining our position. We had some very interesting conversations. As a result of our work, two Books of Mormon were ordered; one for a deacon of the Methodist Church, another for a gentleman who had invited us to his home, where we stayed one afternoon explaining and expounding the restored gospel to him and his wife. We held services on Sunday afternoon at the home of Brother and Sister Olsen.

Our next stop was Cabery, four miles east of Kempton, where we held forth one week with fair endeavors. While there we were cared for by Mr. and Sister Miller, who were very kind to us, and also by Sr. Cora Olson and her estimable daughters, who did not forget the missionary's needs when we parted. God bless the faithful isolated Saints, as we know he will. While at Cabery we built a portable stand for open air work with stand and pole for attachment of gasoline torch, which we have since purchased. This is a very attractive way of calling the people together, and especially when Bro. J. E. Vanderwood mounts the stand and his clarion-like voice rings out, with his forceful, logical way of speaking, which indeed has no uncertain sound. Bro. John is indeed a wonder when it comes to clear-cut, straightforward reasoning. The Cabery Enquirer, the local paper, printed two articles by Bro. Vanderwood, explanatory of our work. The editor was very courteous and kind.

We are now holding forth in Cullom, first station south of Kempton, with very good interest and large turnouts, from three to five hundred sometimes listening to us. We have served this place the same as others, going to every home, leaving literature and inviting them out to hear. We are trying to follow the instruction of the Master in Inspired Version, Matthew 6:25, 26: "And will turn you out of their synagogues. Nevertheless, ye shall go from house to house, teaching the people; and I will go before you. And your heavenly Father will provide"; and to reach the people in a systematic way and search diligently as commanded in Doctrine and Covenants 83. This is the only successful way of reaching all the people according to the Master's instructions. We are holding meetings here every week-day evening in open air, but on Sunday we go to the Sunday school held by the Saints near Piper City, six miles south of here, and preach morning and evening for them.

On Sunday, the 10th, Brother Vanderwood buried beneath the liquid wave four precious souls, who were raised to walk in newness of life in Christ Jesus. Two were adults, Bro. Homer Lundquist and Sister Ida, two noble young workers for the Master's cause, who, if faithful will become shining lights in his kingdom. The two others were children of Saints; one a son of Brother and Sister Quick and the other a grandson of Bro. Silas Rogers, of Piper City.

May God bless the little lads for their desires to serve him. The Spirit of the Master was present at the confirmation service. We were glad indeed to meet and grasp the hand of the Saints; Sr. Melvina Heavener, sister of Bro. I. L. Rogers who has passed on to the paradise of God; Bro. Silas Rogers and wife, Bro. Silas Heavener and family, as well as others young and old.

We are domiciled at present with Bro. and Sr. John Haas, two miles from Cullom. They are whole-souled, whole-hearted Saints, full of zeal and love for the work and willing to do all they can for the same. Cullom is a new opening and the interest is seemingly increasing. One man expressed a desire to purchase a Book of Mormon, and others ask for more literature.

Ever hoping, praying, and desiring to be ever laboring actively for Zion's redemption, I am,

LESTER WILDERMUTH.

Southern Nebraska Reunion.

Last night closed the fifth reunion of the Southern Nebraska District. The reunion was a success in every way, despite the fact that we had considerable rain during the week; the tents kept dry inside and all had a good time. We had with us some of the leading men of the church: Patriarch Ammon White, Apostle J. W. Wight, G. H. Hilliard, of the Bishopric, Elder J. R. Sutton, Southern Nebraska district missionary, Elder Lytle, of Blair, Nebraska, and Elder W. M. Self, of the Pottawattamie District. These brethren were assisted by the local ministry. The Saints were strengthened, and the outsiders who gathered in the evenings to listen to the preaching, we think must have received a better understanding of the gospel of the Lord Jesus than they had ever known before. There were seven precious souls led down into the waters of baptism, Elder W. M. Self officiating.

The Sunday school and Religio work was in charge of Sr. Blanche Andrews, of Lincoln, Nebraska, who performed the work in a very able manner. A business meeting was held on Saturday afternoon, when arrangements were made for holding another reunion in this district in 1910. A committee of six brethren was elected to have charge of said reunion, and were given authority by vote of the assembly to secure, by lease or purchase, permanent grounds whereby we may have privilege to beautify and improve for reunion purposes. Committee elected to have charge of reunion next year are Brethren Jones, of Plattsmouth, Burgess, of DeWitt, Grubb, of Central Nebraska, Ed Briggs, W. M. Self, and H. A. Higgins, of Nebraska City. Thus closed one of the most successful and happy reunions ever held by the Saints of the Southern Nebraska District. MRS. C. S. DUNLAVY.

NEBRASKA CITY, NEBRASKA, August 2, 1909.

MARSTON, MISSOURI, July 27, 1909.

Editors Herald: It has been almost two years since I have heard a Latter Day Saint preach. There are no Saints around here that I know of. I wish there were some in this part of Missouri. I think an elder could do some good here, and I wish one would come. I could meet him at the train if he would let me know the time. He would have a place to preach and stay. There has never been any preaching here by an elder, and the people as a rule do not care for anything but worldly things.

Saints, pray for me that I may hold out faithful unto the end and that I may be an honor to God and his cause.

Your brother in Christ,
W. C. COOK.

VALE, OREGON, July 17, 1909.

Editors Herald: I would like to say a few words concerning the individual communion cups. Of course, the incidents related by the M. D. are enough to sicken anyone, but I think such cases are the exception instead of the rule, and could easily be remedied in the branches where such occur. They could have their own cup or the branch could use the individual service; there is no law against it that I know of. But there is, to me, a far more important subject that it seems our doctors could give us much information on, and that is the Word of Wisdom. We are promised health and strength if we observe the Word of Wisdom and keep the commandments, and I know of no command to use individual cups so we may have health, or use the communion cup. Evidently God considered our diet more important, because he spoke along that line and gave us a promise of a great blessing if we observed his instructions.

I enjoyed Brother Webbe's article on the Word of Wisdom, and if Graceland's Receipt Book teaches along that line, I want one right away. I only wish Brother Webbe had given more receipts.

Bro. S. D. Condit has recently paid us a short visit, which we appreciate very much. If it wasn't for him, we would feel entirely forsaken by our brethren, as we have not heard from either district or branch officers since we moved here, three years ago. I am not finding fault with our officers, but I think it is a great mistake to let the isolated ones drift from their attention. Many a weak or discouraged Saint would take new life and courage if they would receive a short letter of encouragement that showed them they were not forgotten. But to the isolated Saints or the lonely ones, I wish to call your attention to the fact that "by our works we stand or fall." Our brothers or sisters can't carry us to Zion or Paradise, no matter how willing they may be; although it seems you stand alone, remember Christ in the garden prayed alone and his friends (disciples) slept. They hadn't interest enough in his sorrows to keep awake, and we are no better than he, so let us be diligent and remember that he that is warned should warn his neighbor.

With love to all the household of faith, I am,
Your sister,
MRS. O. W. PROPST.

BELLAIR, ILLINOIS, July 19, 1909.

Dear Herald: We have not reported the condition of our branch for some time. We are still alive and hold meetings as usual. Our district president, Elder Henry Sparling, is with us, encouraging and helping us over the rough places, which we greatly appreciate. He preached for us last night; his text was Proverbs 22:18, to interested listeners. We met with some opposition, though we found some friendly to our work.

A good many difficulties that occur in our branch are the direct result of misunderstanding. The Lord said that the elders and men of the church should be of cheerful heart; must be without blame in word or deed. Those responsibilities are of such a character that they must be met in the fear of God or they shall surely suffer loss. I believe that most all of the Saints here are doing the best they can. The Saints at Bellair fasted and prayed and I have seen the Spirit of God manifested a good many times. O brothers and sisters, we ought to be thankful to think that the God of love would look down from above and help us in time of trial. Our place of worship, also our hearts, are open to welcome all those who desire to come up higher.

Sunday, July 4, was sacrament meeting. There were very few present. We need the sacrament of the Lord. Let us study well in our hearts and minds the beauty of this ordinance. Missing it may cause us to slumber.

We have a membership of fifteen. Our attendance has been very good for this busy season of the year. Brother Sparling will be with us three weeks. He is a faithful and energetic worker and our prayers are that God will bless him in his labors as he goes forth in his mission work. Prepare yourselves, for the Lord your God will require a work at your hands. Live in accordance with this blessed gospel.

Bro. Ed Parsons is quite sick at this writing.

Your sister in the church,
MARY A. FERGUSON.

WHORTON, ARKANSAS, July 19, 1909.

Editors Herald: The HERALD is the only preacher we have. We have not heard a sermon preached by one of our own faith for over a year. We live forty miles southeast of Springdale, Arkansas, our nearest railroad station. Would be glad to have an elder call and preach awhile, as the people have never heard the gospel preached in this part of the country. The Utah elders have been here and held meetings over the country, but have had no converts that I know of.

Pray for me that I may be found faithful and at my post of duty.
MRS. J. H. BOREN.

RARDEN, OHIO, July 19, 1909.

Editors Herald: It has been a long time (?) since I have written a letter to the HERALD, and since a number of Saints have asked me, "Why don't you write?" I will try and respond.

I left home rather late this year, being detained on account of church matters. I bade loved ones adieu June 3 and came direct to Scioto County and began operations in the vicinity of Crabtree and Dutch Run, baptizing seven. I also visited the Saints on Buck Fork and preached twice for them in the schoolhouse.

At present I am about thirteen miles from Crabtree, and about six miles from Rarden. I came here the 4th and begun preaching in the Christian Order church with a fine interest from the start. I closed last night with a full house and a pressing invitation to "come again." I go to another place, about five miles distant, to begin meetings in the Christian church to-night, with indications that some from this vicinity will follow. This is a new field among a class of people who for the most part believe the Bible. There are some of the "Holiness" crowd here and they have browbeaten the Christians until they were getting tired of it. I preached in a union church two evenings where they hold forth, treating on baptism, water and Spirit; and to say that we stirred them up is putting it mildly. Their minister was present and when I had concluded my effort the first evening he took the stand and the way he stamped and yelled and beat the air was simply a "caution." He said I was a false teacher worshipping a "little water God," with many such choice epithets, being supported all the while by the "sanctified" with loud "amens," a dozen at a time. He then took a slap at the sacrament. They call it "sour dough and bug juice."

The next evening the house was full and I took up the Spirit part of the subject. They squirmed and groaned, and as soon as I was through a young woman jumped up and such yelling as she put up for about fifteen minutes! She was followed by two or three others who went through the same orgies, one young woman shaking her fist in my face, commanding me to "repent." It was evident that they intended to assume control of the meeting, so I thought it wise to call a halt. Rev. J. R. Lawill, of the Christian Order Church, was in the stand with me and he had a few things to say that were right to the point. When he concluded they again endeavored to continue their "testimonies," but I told them it was my meeting and I proposed to close in order. One big fellow arose and said it was a "free house" and was about to get under way when I told him to sit down and sit still; that I was going to close, and if they wanted to have a "jamboree" after I had dismissed my meeting, I had nothing to say.

I told them I had no doubt whatever but what they had had an "experience," when they all yelled, "Amen," "Praise God," etc.; but I told them I did not want any of it. Then they groaned. The congregation arose and we dismissed in good order. I made my way out into the open air, but Reverend Lawill was less fortunate. They surrounded him and seemed bent on tearing him to pieces. He escaped, however, without injury.

One man said to me, "If you will stay here and preach, I will feed you a month." Another said, "There is another big church down the road open to you whenever you can come." Others said, "It is the first time the gospel was ever preached in that house," etc. I now have three large churches open and perhaps others. I will remain here until I must go to Crabtree to prepare for the reunion, beginning August 21.

All who contemplate coming to the reunion and expect to tent on the ground should write to Elder J. A. Becker, Willoughby, Ohio, R. F. D. No. 2, as he will have charge of small tents. All who come via Columbus, get off at Lucasville. Those coming from other points, either east or west of Portsmouth, get off at McDermott. Teams will meet trains. The Saints and friends around Crabtree are preparing to entertain all visitors free. Come and bring the good Spirit with you. Be sure and let me know what day you will be here.

In gospel bonds,

E. E. LONG.

Kenwood Reunion.

The Central, Western, and Northern districts are represented in the first reunion in Michigan. The camp is beautifully situated beside Lake Cadillac. The equipment ample and a credit to our cause. A spacious assembly tent, comfortable chairs, electric lights, excellent water, abundant shade. Small and rapid boats ply between city and grounds at a round-trip rate of ten cents. The beauty, comfort, and pleasantness of natural surroundings, with the favor of God, enlarge happiness. The attendance is not large, but ample for an excellent time which has been well begun. It is now safe to say reunion work will be established in Michigan. One of the most pleasant, as well as very helpful features, is an orchestra composed of ten pieces, directed at Traverse City and South Boardman by Brn. H. A. and Byron Doty, united in service here. Not only are the services well supplied in addition to congregational singing, but during odd interval hours the sweet and gentle cadence of music from voice, reed, and string floats out upon the breeze, enlivening and also quieting the camp. The three district presidents are here: James Davis, G. W. Burt, and J. H. Blackmore, their purpose one. Brn. J. J. Bailey and W. A. McDowell are here; Brn. Wight, Gunsolley, and Cornish expected.

Miss Gaines, of Graceland's faculty, is here. Her excellent talent in oratorical work adds admirably to instruction and entertainment.

Bro. Thomas Hartnell and fellow committeeman are industriously engaged to supply comfort for all. Brn. William Davis, W. A. McDowell, and J. W. Wight are the presidents.

A good quota of local brethren of the several offices are present.

Suitable rules were formulated and read early and not yet repeated of necessity. The relics of the past had at the General Conference and others unearthed since, add a quota of interest; but are not placed specially or prominently to view for prudential reasons. Since my return to Michigan, nineteen pieces have been found, covering a distance of two hundred miles, some of them in the presence of a noted scientist. The evidence as to genuineness is now ample, but will yet be added to by more finds still bearing similar marks to all so far unearthed. The scientific O. K. is now abundantly justified and if justice shall not miscarry will be had. For it, we can, as we must, wait a season, and in the interim wait in quiet, we trust. As soon as prudence warrants the full account will be given out to all alike. I had prepared a statement that Bro. Hilliard had signed with me having been present a part of the time. I lost it and furnish this instead. The prospects ahead are for excellent results for our cause. So far all notice in the press has been avoided and it is necessary that this continue.

Let us wait patiently, wait quietly, and wait in faith.

Earnestly interested to advance the cause,

R. ETZENHOUSER.

57 SELDEN AVENUE, DETROIT, MICHIGAN.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, July 28, 1909.

Editor Ensign: My last letter from Cleveland had reference to the excellent work in cottage meetings, conducted by Bro. (now Apostle) R. C. Russell. That work was at the season when park open-air services were out of the question. We are now in the height of the park season, and Elder Richard Baldwin, from Sharon, Pennsylvania, is striking sledge-hammer blows for the gospel every Sabbath afternoon, with telling effect.

We still have our "inning" in the beginning of the afternoon, taking good advantage of the increasing assembly for the union services of the other churches immediately following ours. In order to secure seats for the latter service, many people place themselves where they must hear the true, unadulterated word of God expounded, and can not escape the "witness" which its preaching becomes to them. It is thus they are exhorted to "hold fast till I come, that which ye have already," and are taught the news—to them—of the first principles of Christ's everlasting gospel, and the urgent necessity of obedience to its demands.

Our branch has had its ups and downs for lack of outside preaching talent until about two weeks ago, when Bro. Baldwin came among us, and his forcefulness is being used to reach the people who are otherwise hard to get at.

One of Bro. Baldwin's first works among us was to preach the funeral sermon of our dear little patient, long-suffering sister, Florence Gertrude Lutz, who died July 10, 1909, after an illness of more than a year. She was born at Cleveland, Ohio, October 2, 1887; was baptized at the age of twelve, by Bro. E. H. Garrett.

Her life was one of useful activity in the Master's work, and the winning sweetness of her disposition brought sunshine wherever her glad smile was seen. Called upon to spend the last year of her life away from all the privileges she so much enjoyed, and at the same time to suffer the ravaging disease that wasted her young body, her case often came before the Saints for special prayers in her behalf, and her dying testimony, clearly given in her last conscious moments, was that she had been greatly helped thereby and blessed in her daily sufferings by the knowledge that her fellow Saints were holding her up before the throne.

Thus the Father's will has been done and his wisdom shown to one pure young Saint, whose example sheds sweet perfume and will be held dear in our remembrance.

Her mother preceded her to another life about three years, also firm in the faith. Her father and two brothers remain to consider the beauty of a true Latter Day Saint's life as they knew it, day by day.

We are just on the eve of the district reunion, which opens at New Philadelphia, Friday next. Those of us who can not go are hopefully waiting for some of the crumbs that may fall when our representatives return.

Our young Brother Garrett, who assisted in the organization of the Cleveland Branch about ten years ago, dropped in among us, July 18, with his family, from Independence, Missouri, and passed on to Kirtland.

Bro. William Miller, father of our hustling brethren, Eben and Robert, passed away some months ago, firm in a faith which had been shaken by all the tests that come to a Saint who has crossed the plains with a hand-cart, and escaped the victimizing influences of Brighamism.

We are hopeful that the summer's work will speak well for the Saints of Cleveland Branch. The chances for a harvest are truly great; the field is wide and inviting, but there is so much else to distract the attention, and so few efficient ones to present the truth, that thousands are wandering on, unmindful of the beautiful pearls of precious worth they glance at and leave beneath their feet.

May God and the Saints hasten the day when reapers may be found to garner in the waiting sheaves.

JOHN J. PHARE.

Southern California News.

In spite of obstacles within and without the church, regardless of the general apathy prevailing among the membership, the work advances, the tide grows higher.

During the past month the presence of Bro. Fred M. and Sr. Ruth Smith has been an inspiration to the Saints of the Southwest. There was not much preaching done except on Sunday. There was no flourish of trumpets. No. They got close to the people and we learned to love them. Light-hearted Ruth captured the people. Fred M. has been denominated the sphinx out here. I looked the term up in the dictionary. I could not see the application until one of the brethren told me it meant "close-mouthed." I understood. This characteristic gives him an element of strength with the people.

Los Angeles Saints vied with each other in making their stay pleasant, and should they decide to locate in Los Angeles we will settle with Independence. They could do worse. Considering that they live in Independence they could not make a better move. Los Angeles has an ambition to be a stake of Zion.

Bishop Bullard and wife arrived in Los Angeles on Sunday. Brother Bullard came direct from the train to the church. It was sacrament service and it was one of the best spiritual feasts we have enjoyed in years.

Brn. Savage and May were in Los Angeles for a few days, island bound. The Saints had come together fasting. All through the services the room was filled with the divine presence. The young brethren spoke feelingly of their contemplated trip and work among the natives, whereupon hymn No. 209 was sung, and the president offered a prayer in their behalf. The entire congregation was moved and subdued under the divine illumination which filled the room. We had four prophecies and one tongue. The brethren were admonished of trials which awaited them, together with discouragements and temptations, but promises of care and blessings and assurances of return to their native land were comforting. Commendation, counsel, and instruction were given the body. In all this meeting was a milepost in spiritual progress.

Bro. Joseph F. Burton has been very near death's door and at this writing is very low. His children have been called to his bedside. We hope and pray his life may be spared.

Bro. Albert Carmichael and family left last week for Lamoni, Iowa. Brother Carmichael has been closely connected with the Southern California work for nearly two decades. The Saints were loath to see them go, but are not selfish enough to try to deter him from greater work for the church. Success go with them.

Bro. C. E. Crumley has been installed as branch president at San Bernardino. Good reports of his work already. The Saints have created a fund to raise money to move his family from San Francisco.

Bro. A. E. Jones looks after the work at Cucumonga and has kept the Saints together there against great odds.

Hiram L. Holt and one of the missionaries held a series of tent meetings at Cucumonga with fair results. They are expecting to open up at Ontario, a new point, in a few days.

All arrangements have been made for the reunion, September 4 to 13, at Huntington Beach, California.

The Saints at Santa Ana now have a church of their own. They will be some in debt, but have made arrangements whereby it will not burden them.

Individual Communion Cups.

After reading the article under the above caption in HERALD of June 9, I thought, Truly, there is danger even in the communion cup, in these last days, of pestilence and disease! I laid the paper aside, and returned to my work with mind still occupied on the same line of thought, when suddenly a light seemed to be about me, and the word faith came to me almost as if it were spoken. Sure enough, thought I, we are to partake in faith. Not only in faith that the sacred emblems are to be received as the "body" and "blood" of Christ, but that the prayer given for blessing the emblems will be heard and answered to all who partake worthily. And if blessed and sanctified to the good of all who partake, would they be in danger of taking diseases from the cup? Nevertheless, intelligent beings should be reasonable, while each should exercise faith in God and in his word, to feel safe from the unseen dangers. Those that are visible should be avoided, and yet the good Saint should not be barred from the sacrament.

While in the islands, there was a sister who had leprosy, but she was a good Saint, and came to the sacrament meetings and there partook of the sacrament two years or more after her leprosy was visible; but she never touched the communion dishes. She would hold her hand, and the priest would drop a piece of bread in it; and again she would hold her hand and he would pour a sup of the wine in her hand and she would sup it from her hand. It would seem wise to treat open sores on the lips in much the same way. One may not like to sup from the hand in a more highly civilized congregation, but it would be an easy matter for either brother or sister to carry a small glass in coat pocket, or hand satchel, into which the officiating priest could pour the wine; then the afflicted one would always have his, or her own cup. While, in the other case, all the cups would likely be washed in the same water, and wiped on the same cloth, and upon the next occasion, the well person would be likely to drink from the glass that the diseased one did the Sunday before, with the unseen germ, if such there is, adhering to it, unless all were scalded. [Individual cups should be immersed in water that is hot enough to kill all germs.—EDITORS.]

This is not written in opposition to the position taken by the brother; but that the readers may be benefited, even as I was, by the awakening, or renewing of their faith; that unseen power that is sufficient to "quench the fiery darts of the adversary." Therefore, when such a power is delegated to all who will claim and exercise it, let us not be fearful, but steadfast. And be assured that neither God nor Christ is at all surprised at the diseased condition of even the Saints in these last days, if indeed it is any worse than in the days when he instituted the Lord's supper, the days when all manner of sickness and disease were brought to him daily. All those things were known and foreseen, yet we find no other antidote or shield is given except faith.

COLTON, CALIFORNIA.

E. B. BURTON.

HITEMAN, IOWA.

Editors Herald: I have been a reader of the HERALD for the last fifteen years. I love the HERALD and rejoice in the restored gospel. There are quite a few Saints, not saying anything about the host of angels in heaven, that will rejoice when I tell you my aged mother, seventy years old, was baptized the 29th of July into the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ. I feel like it is a great joy. Her home is Plainview, Texas, and any elder passing that way will be welcome. Brother Harp, I have mentioned you to her, she will be at home sometime about the 1st of October. Her address is, Rose Ann Adams, Plainview, Texas. Please call on her or write to her. That will make a home for you while you make a new opening, or for any other elder that can go there.

I also have a brother by the name of Clarence Adams, Lebanon, Red Willow County, Nebraska. He is interested in the work and any elder of our church would be welcome there. He is a harness maker, so you can easily find him. He takes the Ensign and is well pleased with it. I believe he will join our church if he gets a good understanding of our work. Elders that are close to him, please go and see him.

To the remaining Saints of the Cainsville, Missouri, Branch, or rather those that once belonged to it, I still love you all and would love to see you all again. The Lord said we would be scattered. How well his word has been fulfilled. Not one is left there now. I am in a good branch again of about one hundred and sixty members, the Hiteman, Iowa, Branch, and I have learned to love them just as well as the other branches I have left behind.

Only the Father knows how many times I thank him that my mother is a true Saint now. I shall be glad when Zion has been redeemed and Jesus our king on earth.

The Saints are all as well as common, so far as I know, here. I love the Mothers' Home Column, and I am thankful to the dear ones that contribute to its pages. I am the mother of seven strong, healthy children, with plenty of temper and self will. I set as good an example before them as I can, and pray for the Father to help us raise them right, and we leave the harvest in the Lord's care.

Hoping the good cause may continue to prosper here and elsewhere, I am,

Your sister in Christ,
MRS. R. L. ROWLEY.

JOHNSTOWN, OHIO, July 28, 1909.

Dear Herald: I am in a country of wonder. There has come out a history of this Licking County, Ohio, annexed to it the French and English settlement of North America, with a clear account of the Indians and an uncertain account of a people who many years before had possessed these lands; whose inhabitants, if not intelligent and ingenious, were by no means considered ignorant. Who, they claim in this history, have left many marks of being an advanced people, such as octagon inclosures and circular inclosures from one hundred and fifty yards in diameter to three eighths of a mile, several of which are at Newark.

I have examined them. The levees around them are from seven to twenty feet high, covered with grass, also large trees. It seems this late history has stirred up a sleeping people over it, and many are now astounded at the immensity of such a work. I find I can work in the Book of Mormon to good advantage on some of them, and I believe the time near when a great work might be done here. My greatest setback is the polygamous set that are roaming the country here. The most successful way for me is to have you send me some more Senators Burrows' and DuBois' congressional speeches on Smoot case. Those that I got settled them, but I want more.

Southeastern Illinois Reunion.

The reunion held at Springerton, July 30 to August 8, 1909, was conceded by all to be one of the best held in the district. The preaching was of a very high order, the prayer meetings were spiritual, and many cheering testimonies were borne.

The afternoon hour was devoted to Sunday school and Religio normal work in charge of Brn. J. A. Tanner and A. White.

Those of the priesthood present and assisting were High Priest J. A. Tanner, Patriarch Ammon White, Seventies H. Sparling, F. L. Sawley; Elders I. A. Morris, F. M. Davis, P. G. McMahan, William Kelley, P. T. Plumb; Priests Lloyd C. Moore, E. W. Sutton, Lewis Brown, A. H. Burroughs. There were twenty tents on the ground with from ninety to one hundred and two campers occupying them, babies and all.

The Saints on the ground did their part very kindly and generously in taking care of the ministry and others, while those living near brought in vegetables, etc., and divided with those on the ground. The expenses of the reunion were nicely met by donations from the Saints and others and by three collections during the reunion.

The patriarch was kept busy the latter part of the reunion bestowing blessings, his stenographer, Sister Richards, from Taylorville, Illinois, was assisted by Brother Sawley and Sister Lassater. Taking it as a whole, the reunion was a success every way and those attending were built up and strengthened and the church has gained prestige in that locality.

The Methodists held a camp meeting three fourths of a mile away from us during our meetings. They attracted large crowds, but our congregations increased from the start, and we had all we could well take care of. We had remarkably fine order, and the character of our meetings was favorably commented upon by those who had attended both meetings. It was unanimously voted to hold another reunion next year. Parrish was the place selected. Brethren Sparling, Davis, and A. H. Burroughs were chosen as a committee. They were authorized to receive subscriptions and purchase a new tent for the district. So we hope the Saints will remember us and make it possible for us to do so.

A. H. BURROUGHS, Secretary and Treasurer.

BRIDGEWATER, IOWA, July 27, 1909.

Dear Saints: While reading the letters from my dear brothers and sisters in the HERALD, I am impressed by the Spirit many times to write a few lines in my weakness, trusting it may help some poor soul to embrace the fullness of the gospel.

I read the Book of Mormon when only nineteen years of age, was fully convinced of the truthfulness of the angel's message, but did not have the courage to obey, my people were so bitterly opposed to the work. I joined the Christian Church, but never felt satisfied; then after my marriage I tried to keep Saturday, but still there was darkness. I decided to pray more earnestly to God to send a man after his own heart, to preach for us, for we had only the Methodists, and they preach the doctrines and commandments of men. Brother Sorensen came and preached a few sermons in our schoolhouse, then was called somewhere else in his mission field. One night I had a vision: I saw a great arch of light and a voice said, "Brother Sorensen will lead you in the light." The very next day we received a number of Ensigns containing the apostasy and restoration of the church. I began reading and was ready for baptism the first opportunity. Mother Hodges and I were baptized by Brother Sorensen, on June 30, 1908. I can say with many others that I know this work is of God. I have seen Sister Whiteaker, of whom Sister Howery spoke in her letter, and heard her bear testimony, saying that in two days after her baptism her cancer dropped out, and if she should be burned at the stake she would never give up this gospel. Now, dear sisters, let us adorn ourselves in modest apparel and be a peculiar people, zealous of good works.

We belong to the home class department and find it a great comfort to the isolated Saints. I do sympathize with Sr. Amelia Stone in her affliction, but we must all have our troubles to bear. We saw our little Leonard, eight years old, die with diphtheria. It was the saddest time of our lives. We had no children left, but the Lord has blessed us with two, Leslie is eight years of age, and Lucile is four. It has been ten years this October since he was taken, but his place is vacant still. I realize God knew best. These afflictions work unto us a more eternal weight of glory.

Now, dear sisters, cheer up and trust him who doeth all things well. He will give you comfort in all your trials. Do not think it a sin on your part. Jesus was without sin, yet his visage was marred more than any man.

We haven't any preaching at our schoolhouse. Haven't heard a sermon since Brother Hayer was here last September. We believe if any of the elders could come and preach for us this winter, the people might turn out. If any can come they will find a welcome at our house. Mr. Hodges does not belong, but is interested, and likes to hear the Saints preach.

Your sister in Christ,

NANCY R. HODGES.

TACOMA, WASHINGTON, July 22, 1909.

Editors Herald: I am only a babe in Christ yet, having only been in the church nine months; but since my baptism I have often thought I would write to the HERALD and tell of how the Lord has led me. Even before I knew anything of the church my parents left me, while yet a child, with strangers who did not look after my spiritual welfare; hence I became like the world, worldly. But the Lord in his mercy showed me my condition. I was sick and tired of the world; my soul was longing for the peace I did not possess. I prayed the Lord to help me. I fasted for nearly three weeks and prayed the Lord to show me his people, and if there were any apostles on earth now, what I should do. I wanted to be baptized, as I saw this was right according to what I had read in the Bible. I saw him in a vision. He stood before me, and when I asked him to show me one of his apostles, he left me, while angels kept guard, and presently in about five minutes he returned and brought a man with him, saying, "This is the man thou hast asked to see; be thou baptized by him." I then asked him where I would find this man and where I would find his church, so he brought me to a river, showing me several landmarks, so I could easily find the place. He led me through the river and into the town, and to the Latter Day Saint church in Castle Rock. There was no one in the church at the time, but he taught me scripture I had never read.

My husband and I moved to Centralia where I became acquainted with Bickertonites, who made me believe that their minister was the man. The Lord had showed me, I was persuaded, and was baptized; but I was not satisfied, and the Lord and Sister Crum led me to the river again. I understood there was something wrong with my baptism, so when the right man arrived (Bro. J. D. Stead) I was baptized again, and the Lord did not go with me to the river any more. I felt wholly cleansed as I stepped from the water, and I waited for the Lord to tell me what to do next. Since then the Lord has visited me often and told me what to do, and warned me of danger. The Lord also showed me in rotation the following brethren: Fred A. Smith, two Rood brothers from Seattle, and N. C. Enge. Hale Smith was in the stand; he stepped back, and the Lord stepped in his place and began to teach.

We are here isolated. The Saints who lived here have all gone, but the Lord has been gracious to me. I often have visions of angels during prayer. One evening, while Brother Enge was speaking to us, an angel stood over him bending forward with folded hands, and at another time while he was singing hymns, an angel stood over him, and above there was a band of angels and a bright light shone down on him from these heavenly messengers. Yesterday evening during prayer, Brother Enge, being in doubt whether he should stay here or go east of the mountains, a messenger appeared above his head, laying one hand on his head and pointing with the other toward Seattle. He seemed to be in a hurry; he also put his hand on my husband and blessed him, and on me lastly, then left us. Next day Brother Enge went to Seattle and he received a letter from the missionary in charge, giving the desired direction, confirming the vision to him, as he stated upon his return. We are sorry to have Brother Enge leave us, as he has been giving us good instructions while here. Come again, brother.

I pray God's blessings upon the reader. May this help some poor soul to Jesus.

GOODERHAM, ONTARIO, July 29, 1909.

Dear Herald: My heart has been made to rejoice in this latter-day work. We ought to live more like the Master of men, and be prepared to meet him when the pearly gates shall roll ajar, and the clouds shall reveal him to man.

We have a nice Sunday school here, which is growing. Elder J. T. Thompson has baptized eight precious souls since last fall. He is in our midst to present the truth to others, that they may see the sunny way and rejoice in the angel's message. May God's Spirit ever be his to enjoy along life's rugged pathway. My prayer is for the Saints of God that they may be found faithful and true to that to which they belong, and may have part in the first resurrection.

Ever praying for the welfare of Zion, I am,

Your sister in the faith,

NELLIE WHITE.

CLITHERALL, MINNESOTA, July 29, 1909.

Dear Herald: The "Willing Workers" here held their annual business meeting Friday, July 23. Sr. Eleanor Whiting was elected president; Mrs. Lydia Whiting vice-president; Sr. Irene Rotzien secretary, and Sr. Fannie Houghton treasurer. The report read as follows: Twenty dollars to the Sanitarium, twelve dollars to the Children's Home, seven dollars and fifty cents to the Union Church; four quilts finished for the Home, and eight partly finished, and two ready for sale.

It was with pleasure we read of the consecration of land by the sister of Lamoni for the Children's Home. We shall be glad when the Bishop and those connected with him shall think it wise to begin the building. We surely ought to do all we can to aid those whom the burden of this work rests upon. It has been written that as the children of Israel were led at the first so shall the redemption of Zion be. Our aged Prophet certainly needs the confidence, faith, prayers, and aid of all those who call themselves the children of the kingdom. The women of Israel did their part, so I am made to feel that the Daughters of Zion are doing a great work towards the great gathering. When Moses held up his hands Israel prevailed, and when the burden was too great, the brethren came to his aid, and then his hands were steady until the going down of the sun. Let us stand by him whom God has called to lead Israel in these last days.

Our reunion which closed here in June is not soon to go out of our memories. Four were baptized and one more on the following week. The instruction given, the encouragement, and reproof ought to be a help to be more prepared for the Master's work; and when Bro. J. W. Wight spoke in the beautiful gift of tongues it was like the refreshing dew of heaven upon that little band of Saints, making us feel that we were still his children. It was as follows:

"Verily, thus saith the Spirit unto you my people, now assembled: With your gathering together and the humility and faithfulness you have manifested from time to time, I am well pleased. Continue in faithfulness and humility and I will continue to bless you. Nevertheless it needs be that you purge out the iniquity from among you, and live in harmony with my law if you would be blessed of me. Cease to murmur and complain, and be not overconcerned with the mistakes of others. Even though those standing high in authority shall do that which is wrong, it is no excuse to others; for though all in the church shall fall, remember the gospel is true and that by obedience thereto and a faithful life, you will be saved in my kingdom. Be earnest, then, in my service and I will bless you. Thus saith the Spirit unto you, my people. Amen."

Your sister in the one faith,

ELEANOR WHITING.

NICHOLSON, MISSISSIPPI, July 31, 1909.

Editors Herald: I and family are the only Saints living in this part of Mississippi, but we do not feel so isolated as one would think. It has been God's will to send the gospel to us, and as we feel that we have the faith, it is almost a stronghold in the day of trouble; a comfort in distress, a joy in sorrow and a light in darkness. It is as the shadow of a rock in a weary land.

I have been afflicted with catarrh of the nose so I could not work for some time; but, thank God, I am getting some better. Will all the Saints send up a word of prayer for me and mine?

I will state here just how I came to be in the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. The Booker brothers came to the neighborhood where I lived, and were, as I thought, just a set of Mormon elders; but I saw that they preached the gospel. So when I held a private conversation with them, they gave me some light on the matter to understand that the Utah Mormons were not the church that Jesus Christ set in order by Joseph Smith. For years past I had seen that the churches set up by the reformers did not even resemble the church of Christ, as it was in early days; and when I understood that the church that was set up through Joseph Smith had apostles, prophets, elders, teachers, and bishops and all the gifts that belong to the church, I knew that it was not directed by man. Yet I was hesitating between two opinions, and as I slept one night I saw in a vision a man of square build with dark hair and beard, with dark eyes. He had no coat on, and was fine looking. I think I will see him again some day. He came to my bedside and handed me a bundle of papers. I said, "What are these?" He said, "These are Latter Day Saint papers. This is what you and your family need," and as he handed me the papers the vision passed. I raised my hand to see the papers, for I surely thought they were there. I explained the vision to my wife and I said to her that the church is right and I wish all the world of people could think so.

We are a band of Saints and strangers
Traveling onward to a land;
Soon we'll cross the rise of Jordan,
And with all the ransomed stand.
We are seeking for a city,
With its walls of jasper bright;
Soon we'll reach that heavenly mansion
Where Saints are clad in white.

We have left the gloom of sorrow,
With our banners all unfurled,
Soon we'll reach the heavenly city,
With its gates all set with pearls,
Where our Savior bids us welcome,
As we meet the heavenly guest;
With the sanctified we'll worship;
In eternity we'll rest.

J. C. TOLBERT.

AUGUST 1, 1909.

Dear Herald: I have often thought I would write and tell you how much good you have done us. We have taken the Ensign and Glad Tidings about eight years and also Autumn Leaves. My daughter had often heard me say I would like the HERALD; so on Christmas she sent it to me for a present, and it is a present every week. We do not have the pleasure of attending the services, so we enjoy our papers. I have read a great many helpful letters in the papers, and wished I could express my thoughts as well as others, but we are not gifted alike.

Last winter the main topic was the law of tithing and consecration and their origin. I read them quite carefully, and in the controversy over them failed to see where they made any definite points, and thought I could discern a feeling that was not altogether brotherly. It seemed queer, that our good old prophet had not discovered the flaw long ere this. I hope I shall never doubt the laws governing the church, if I do the members. I do not think any of us will be guilty of paying too much tithing, if we give all we possess.

The other topic is the one cup or individual system. There was a piece in the HERALD that suited my idea on that subject. People nowadays are getting (as the saying is) more neat than wise. I believe in being neat in person and dress, but in our effort to be clean, we can offend some of the weak ones, and I believe if the Lord would condescend to drink with poor, fallen humanity and forgive our sins, we can drink with our brother. Paul said, "If it maketh my brother to offend, I will eat no meat while the world stand." I believe in teaching and practicing neatness, but when, by our actions, we say in plain words, "You are not fit to eat and drink with me," that is going too far. Did not the Savior go among the lowest and poorest and minister unto them? And he no doubt partook of the cup with them and did not hesitate on account of person or microbes.

I have been wondering how they would manage at General Conference. Perhaps the clean ones would come first and the others next; but who would be the judge. That would require a physical examination and would make work for the M. D.'s, and where would it all end? I am willing to drink with the rest and leave the result with the Lord that knows who has microbes and who has not.

Another is socialism. That seems to be the subject on now. There have been good points on both sides trying to blend the two subjects, gospel and socialism together. The scripture says there is a time (and I believe a place) for everything. I think it means good, useful, helpful things. The gospel economy is perfect and will stand for ever. Socialism is a temporal law and will not endure. The Lord said, "When that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away." The gospel economy is in the Lord's hands and he is trying to use his people to bring it to perfection. Why should his children use their valuable time to bring about an imperfect law or government, only to pass away, only hindering in the establishing of the "perfect"? The children of God ought not to engage in discussion of worldly matters in the church papers. Why not join all forces in bringing about that which is perfect and will stand? The church believes that all thrones and kingdoms must go down; even our own beloved government. Then what is the use of wasting valuable time in building up something that must pass away? These are only a few thoughts that have passed through my mind, but I hope no one will take offense.

With love for the gospel, I remain, as ever, your sister in the love for the truth,

R. M. E.

DEER ISLE, MAINE, August 7.

Editors Herald: As I pause for a few moments in the mad rush and hurry of business life and look backward upon the year now past, and reflect upon the failures and successes, the sorrows and joys, the storms and calms, I am once more made aware, in an undeniable manner, of the great love of the Father toward his children, and the value of one's being in true connection with that true vine, that one source of life from which comes our protection, strength, and guidance amid these ever changing scenes of life. Through all the clouds and sunshine, the sorrow and pain, I can now see the Almighty Hand that fulfills the promise that all things work together for good to those that love the Lord. My little life, I feel, is but a repetition of the life and experience of others along this line. This being the case does it not bring before us once again the object lesson that if we are God's children, if we truly love him, which means to keep his laws and commands, should we not be content and patient whatever may come or fail to come, seeing that these things are necessary to our education and fitting qualities for something higher and better and grander than the present? Oh, that we could come to that height in our spiritual lives where we could desist from fault-finding with the work and plans of the dear Father and look upon his work, not as a single disconnected part, but as a full plan and in its entirety and a whole.

I wish to state that personally I am still striving to so live as to prepare myself to inherit a part in the great kingdom to come. I love the communion of Saints here. I shall love the association of the Saints in the hereafter and the one great object, the prize, the aim of my life, is to so live in thought, word, and deed, that when the roll is called in Zion I may be able to answer with assurance, "Here am I."

Asking an interest in your prayers and looking and praying for the redemption of Zion, I remain,

Your brother,

W. A. SMALL.

GLADSTONE, ILLINOIS, August 1, 1909.

Saints' Herald: I have been reading Bro. Henry Stebbins' series of letters in Autumn Leaves, concerning the Jaredite lands and possessions, which is very interesting indeed; also a great many other subjects in the HERALD and Ensign.

I am isolated and afflicted in a manner that I can scarcely go away from home, and wife is afflicted with stomach trouble; yet in all our afflictions we still have hope of the final triumph of the gospel in all the world for a witness to all nations. As yet, we have not been situated to help financially, to speed the gospel along throughout the world, as we would like to see it go. The history of the past and panorama of the nations of the earth since the flood, are revolting; and the panorama when vividly drawn before our vision is enough to make one cry out with the Psalmist David, "Lord, wilt thou draw out thine anger to all generations?" In Psalms 85: 8 the Psalmist says, "I will hear what God the Lord will speak: for he will speak peace unto his people, and to his saints: but let them not turn again to folly." We see here the Psalmist speaks of the Lord's people and also of his Saints.

Brethren, remember me in your prayers that I may prove worthy of that glorious inheritance.

Your brother in the hope and final triumph of the gospel,

J. L. RUST.

MINERAL RIDGE, IOWA, August 2, 1909.

Dear Brethren: We have baptized twelve; four more yesterday. Closed a six-week effort with a crowded tent at every meeting and many earnest and insistent requests to return. More are convinced of the truth of the work, and will later come into the work. Some of my friends gained in the work here, took me to Boone last Monday, and bought me a new outfit, suit, hat, shoes, and suit case. Go to reunion from here.

Yours very hastily,

W. CHRISTY.

TOPEKA, KANSAS, August 9, 1909.

Editor Saints' Herald: I have just returned from Scranton, where we held meetings over two Sundays past. The Methodists were holding a protracted tent meeting near by, so we did not have many outsiders at our meetings; but the Saints seem encouraged and this was our endeavor.

On Sunday, the 9th inst., Bro. James Baillie baptized four children, three girls and one boy, belonging to Brother and Sister Liter, of Carbondale.

While we sojourn again in Topeka, for a short time, we expect to be found on the streets at night, doing what we can to tell the people about the gospel. As the busy season passes by, we hope the Saints throughout both the Northeastern and Northwestern Kansas districts will do all they can to help us extend the preaching of the word, assisting in making new openings. Let us not be satisfied with keeping up the meetings in branches only, although this is commendable and a duty, but strive also to get new openings in the vicinity of and adjacent to the branches.

Our field force is limited, so let us do all we can to keep them busy, and thus utilize our force to the best advantage. Also let all remember their duty towards the Bishop's agents (Brn. John Cairns, Scranton, Kansas, and John W. Teeters, Alexander, Kansas,) by promptly sending the tithes and offerings that are justly due to the Lord's storehouse.

Any openings that may be available, or any demand for ministerial help, kindly report to the undersigned at Holden, Missouri, and response will be made by some of the force just as soon as possible.

H. E. MOLER.

TOPEKA, KANSAS, August 13, 1909.

Editors Herald: After closing meetings at Scranton I came to this place on the 9th inst., and took up street preaching once more. But on the 10th Bro. James Baillie came after me to return to Scranton to officiate at a double funeral, Sr. Mary R. Evans and her son Frederick both having died that morning; the son about three hours later than the mother. So early on the morning of the 11th we went back to Scranton. These deaths were very sudden, and a shock to the whole community.

The week before, Sister Evans seemed to be in good health, and was a regular attendant at the meetings conducted by the writer. Thus we see how uncertain is life. The funeral was postponed until the 12th to give the relatives time to arrive. This occasioned the breaking of our street appointment in Topeka for one night. We came back last evening and took up the work again, and expect to continue over Sunday.

Bro. W. H. Murphy and family are away visiting relatives at Rexford, Kansas.

The work in Topeka has had a great many discouragements and hindering causes to contend with, but the outgrowth at present seems to be for the better, although there are some things yet that indicate there is plenty of opportunity for improvement.

H. E. MOLER.

HOLDENVILLE, OKLAHOMA, August 11, 1909.

Dear Herald: The Saints of Holdenville are rejoicing over the work done in this town. Bro. Lee Quick has just closed a week's meetings. He preached on the street at 3 p. m., and at 8.30 p. m. in the church, to good crowds, and the crowds grew larger every night. The meeting was a grand success, as people are now reading and asking questions. There are some near the kingdom. The good Master has been listening to the prayers of the Saints of this place and his Spirit was poured out on them here during the meeting.

Oh, Saints, let us live in harmony with what we teach and want others to be. We should be a light to the world. If we have oil in our vessels and ourselves clean and pure, the light will shine to those all around and they will glorify God; but just let a Saint begin to use dirty words, deal dishonestly with his fellow-man, smoke, chew tobacco, tell vulgar stories, etc., when all these begin to surround the lamp or person, the light begins to get dim and the first thing you know it is so dark you can not see how to walk and you are liable to run off the track into the ditch.

We have a nice little branch here and a good farming country. Also the Saints have a nice church worth about twelve or fourteen hundred dollars, but we have not got it paid for yet. We owe four hundred and forty dollars. If any of the Saints wish to help us it will be appreciated.

May God bless the advancement of this great work is my prayer,

C. T. SHEPPARD.

POTTER VALLEY, CALIFORNIA, August 10, 1909.

Editors Herald: I believe it might be of interest to you to know of the efforts of Bro. J. W. Wiles in presenting the gospel to the Indians for the first time in this place, as we now live near an Indian village. Bro. Wiles was anxious to preach to them; so together with Sister Landrum, who brought him here from Willits, where he had been preaching, we called at each house and invited them personally to come out and listen, which nearly all did, and for two evenings he told them with good liberty of the Beautiful Record hid in Cumorah. Since he has gone many are the inquiries as to when he is coming back, and requests that he preach soon.

These Indians have a school and are being taught. Their religious teaching has always been Methodism. We have talked the gospel to some of them on different lines, and have attended some of their meetings in the past, always feeling a portion of the Spirit present and having a portion when trying to exhort them to better lives.

As Brother Wiles was telling them, he hoped some of them would accept the gospel and be called. A young Indian whom I did not know very well was brought forcibly to my mind, and afterwards he went directly to Brother Wiles and talked to him after the sermon. We think other manifestations of God's approval were given us. We have ordered a couple Book of Mormons to give them to read. We feel Brother Wiles' visit was a benefit to us also, as we are among the isolated.

We ask an interest in the prayers of God's people that we may be useful members in God's kingdom.

Sincerely and in gospel bonds,

ROSA L. SIDES.

LOGAN, IOWA, August 15, 1909.

Dear Herald: I am young in the church work; have been associated with it only a little over two years, but I can truly say that I have enjoyed my life and my associates better in that length of time, than the number of years I have spent in worldly pleasures. I find there is much to this gospel of Christ; the more you seek the more you find, and by living closer to my maker, greater are his blessings. Trials and temptations are sometimes hard to bear, but they are purifiers. In the past year my trials have seemed hard to bear, but when they are heavy I do not forget to pray. Christ is my Comforter.

One of my trials is that my dear companion in life is failing in health, and we have had to give up our home and live with our dear parents, who are near and dear to us. She has had this affliction nearly a year. She joined the church the same time I did, for which I am thankful to my heavenly Father. We have tried to live as God wants us to, but we have realized the weakness of the flesh, and possibly have erred, but have sought forgiveness in our daily prayers.

I desire an interest in the prayers of the Saints in behalf of my companion that she may be healed from this affliction, if it is God's will. "The prayers of the Saints will heal the sick." Soon after I joined the work, I was called to the priesthood as teacher, and have tried to do my duty the best I can. God knows our desires better than we can tell and we do humbly pray that all the Saints and those seeking after light may keep faithful and bear the cross faithfully to the end. Are we valiant soldiers of the cross? May God bless and strengthen all afflicted ones, is our prayer in Christ's name.

Your brother in Christ,

R. E. ADAMS.

BURLINGTON, IOWA, August 14, 1909.

Editors Herald: The Saints have been thrown into mourning by the sad news of the death of our beloved patriarch, Bro. Alexander H. Smith. So many of us had left him but last Monday, upon breaking camp at Bluff Park, in good spirits and seemingly in good health. He had been with us during the reunion and seemed unusually well and cheerful; preached five times, the last of which was the closing sermon on Sunday night, and gave a number of patriarchal blessings.

It had been planned that he should come to Burlington on the 10th to remain until the 13th, when he would go to the reunion at Moline, but of this visit we were deprived. Having occasion to go to Nauvoo on Monday, the 9th, he was there taken suddenly ill that afternoon with stomach trouble from which it was impossible for him to find relief either through administration or medical aid. He passed away Thursday evening, the 12th inst., after severe suffering. His daughter, Sr. Vida E. Smith, came from Lamoni and was with him the last day, but Sister Smith and daughter Coral and grandson Glaud did not arrive till the next morning. Brn. M. H. Siegfried and W. R. Dexter were with him through his sickness and did all in their power in caring for him. The funeral party passed through Burlington last night, having to stop over between trains about two and a half hours. With several of the Saints we met them at the depot and did what we could for their comfort and cheer. The whole church will mourn his death, for we have lost a tower of spiritual strength. May his rest be sweet and his reward glorious.

Our reunion at Bluff Park was a success in every way. Eleven years had passed since the district held its last reunion, and times have changed since then; hence the effort this year was largely experimental. The attendance was not large at first, but increased to the close. An excellent spirit prevailed throughout, the prayer meetings being spiritual and uplifting and the preaching of excellent character, with liberty attending the speakers. The committee were able to meet all financial obligations. At the business meeting a resolution favoring the holding of another reunion next year was passed unanimously.

Hopeful for the cause,

CHARLES FRY.

MCKENZIE, ALABAMA, August 11, 1909.

Editors Herald: Beginning the 25th inst., I expect to hold eight sessions of debate at this place with Rev. J. S. Newman, Baptist, of Glen Rose, Texas, on church propositions. I write this to ask the earnest prayers of all that I may have strength physical and spiritual in the conflict in order that truth only may be fully maintained and be the victor in the hearts and minds of the people. Rev. C. H. Cayce, of Martin, Tennessee, editor of Primitive Baptist, was to have engaged in the debate, but he writes me that he could not do so by reason of a nervous breakdown and that they had secured another man. I guess they have got one of their best to meet us.

Reunion here is now on and T. C. Kelley and John Harp of the missionary force are with us. The Saints all seem to feel well and happy in the work.

Hopefully in the conflict,

F. M. SLOVER.

MACHIAS, MAINE, August 5, 1909.

Editors Herald: The good work is moving steadily onward. Some opposition, but that keeps the fire fanned and helps stir up the minds of the investigating class. We are having fair congregations. Sunday night I spoke on the promised land of Abraham, and Tuesday night I spoke on the promised land of Joseph, the greater and richer blessings bestowed upon him and his seed, the promised blessing reached across the sea into the land of America. We sung for opening, "This world will be blest by and by," and closed by singing, "My country 'tis of thee, sweet land of liberty." All returned to their homes feeling that they had been amply paid for walking from one to six miles that evening.

Thursday night I speak on the coming forth of the Book of Mormon. I have stood by our noble cause for over two months, since I came here in Little Kennebec, and have preached twenty-six sermons, baptized four, and several to be baptized next Sunday. I feel to rejoice to see our cause once more looking up so well in Kennebec, for it has been at a very low ebb for many years. About a year ago, Bro. Abner Lloyd, of Eldorado Springs, Missouri, spoke to me in tongues, and the interpretation was that my way should be opened up, that I should go among my people, and that I should lead many of them into his church and kingdom. I see the word of our blessed Master fulfilled, for which I do thank God.

Later (9th), yesterday I baptized three more, making seven at this place. The work is onward.

Yours truly,

J. C. FOSS.

MOUNTAIN CREEK, ALABAMA, August 12, 1909.

Saints' Herald: I am a brother far away from any church. Have not seen a Latter Day Saint in a long time, but am still in the faith. May the Lord bless our church and send some elder here to preach the truth. I believe some good could be done here. I will do all I can. I was baptized by J. D. Irwin at Flat Rock. I mean to do my best for the cause here.

F. J. WATSWORTH.

News From Branches

SCRANTON, PENNSYLVANIA.

August 8. A pleasant day. Good attendance at Sunday school. Friday, July 30, the Sunday school held its picnic at Nay Aug Park with a large attendance of Sunday school scholars and friends. An enjoyable time was spent by all.

On Thursday, July 29, Bro. O. T. Christy, of Philadelphia, the superintendent of the Sunday school association of the New York and Philadelphia District, paid us a visit and stayed over Sunday with the intention of organizing another Sunday school in this city. The school was organized Sunday, August 1, at the home of Bro. Ervin Williams, at Greenridge, with Bro. Charles Simpson as superintendent, and Bro. Ervin Williams as assistant superintendent, Boyd Armstrong secretary, and Pearl Williams organist, with about twenty other members. The organizing of this school is the result of home department work, the writer acting as home department superintendent for the Scranton Sunday school. Many were in attendance, including the branch choir, which did the singing. Instructive talks were heard from Brn. O. T. Christy, A. E. Stone, and E. B. Hull, of Philadelphia. The branch is making some progress of late.

July 28, five were baptized at Lake Lincoln and were confirmed the following Sunday, Bro. Stone, pastor, officiating. More baptisms are expected soon. There has been considerable preaching done recently, both in and around the city. The gospel tent has been in operation by Brethren Hull and Stone while the local officers have been doing street preaching. The tent has now been removed to the Archibald Mine, where interest is being manifest. The Religio is still moving along in this place with fair attendance. With the newly-elected officers we expect to see it advance. The officers elected are as follows: Elder T. T. Jones president, A. E. Mayers vice-president, W. J. Lewis secretary, Alice Morris treasurer, George Morris chorister, Margaret Lewis organist, and Albert Davies janitor.

Children's Day was observed last June and programs were rendered in the morning and evening.

The Sunday school recently elected its officers to take charge until next March. The officers elected were: Superintendent, Elder Lot Bishop; assistant superintendent, A. J. Hawkins; secretary, E. Walter Lewis; treasurer, David James; organist, Margaret S. Lewis.

EVANS.—Mary R. Thomas was born October 10, 1842, at Blackhood, Monmouthshire, South Wales. Came to America when eleven years of age, locating at Belleville, Illinois. At Cheltenham, Missouri, was married to Thomas R. Evans, in 1859. They came to Scranton, Kansas, in 1874, where she lived till the day of her death. Baptized April 27, by Elder James B. Jarvis. Her husband preceded her in death some thirteen years. She died August 10, 1909. Also EVANS.—Frederick, was born February 28, 1881, at Scranton, Kansas. Died August 10, 1909, at the same place and just three hours and five minutes after his mother expired. He was the youngest son of Sister Evans, and the only child at home. They leave to mourn their loss, one son (and brother), and five daughters (sisters), numerous other relatives and a host of friends. Both died very suddenly after an illness of less than forty-eight hours' duration, the mother of acute indigestion, and the son of congestion of the lungs. Both diseases were complicated with inflammation of the bowels. Funeral services at the Saints' church in charge of James Baillie, sermon by H. E. Moler. Both interred in one grave in the Scranton cemetery.

THOMPSON.—Sarah Thompson was born February 8, 1837, in Chautauqua County, State of New York. United with the Reorganized Church May 26, 1861, at Belvidere, Monona County, Iowa, and had resided in Monona County ever since. She loved the Lord's work and brought up her children in the faith. She departed this life June 6, 1909. She leaves five sons, three daughters, three brothers, and one sister to mourn the loss. Funeral at Saints' church in Moorhead, Iowa, in charge of Elder R. A. Ballantyne. Sermon by Elder Joseph Lane.

Muddy Vision in Practical Christianity.

When a bill that required safety devices in factories was recently pending before a State legislature, an officer of a great association of manufacturers sent to the members a circular that called attention to the bill, and inquired: "How will this affect your business?" When the first Christian missionaries began preaching in Ephesus, some nineteen centuries ago, a well-to-do silversmith named Demetrius, who found that Christianity was reducing the sales of the silver shrines and images of the goddess Diana, opposed the new movement vigorously by calling together his fellow business men and declaring: "Sirs, ye know that by this business we have our wealth." He added as an afterthought that their city's religion was also being endangered.

Prof. George A. Coe, the well-known writer and lecturer of Northwestern University, has just written a severe arraignment of the muddy vision of many otherwise good Christian men of to-day in matters wherein genuine Christianity would diminish financial profits, in a searching discussion of "Demetrius: the pious business man," which appears in the Sunday School Times. He even dares to suggest that there is an adroit silversmith in each of us whose prejudice confuses our moral vision. The article will set a good many people to thinking.

The Rapid Growth of Religious Movements Independent of the Churches.

"Men are seeking first, new definitions of their relationship toward God," writes Ray Stannard Baker in the September American Magazine. Amplifying this statement, Mr. Baker says:

"Modernism among the Roman Catholics, the Reform Movement among the Jews, the 'higher criticism' in all the churches, have been tearing down old structures of belief and tentatively offering new. Strange experiments are everywhere being tried—experiments such as Christian Science, Emmanuelism, Theosophy, the 'Holy Ghosters,' the Milleniumites. Various oriental and exotic cults, transplanted upon our hardy soil, find many to water and care for them. It is a time of troubled and restless inquiry. Escaping from the churches, how the religious principle, as Carlyle once said, 'either lies unseen in the hearts of good men, looking and longing and silently working toward some new revelation, or else wanders homeless over the world, like a disembodied soul seeking its terrestrial organization.

"Not only is the religious principle seeking new definitions of belief, but it also appears working unnamed, almost undefined, in a thousand activities of our common life. It is characteristic of a practical, vital, nervous age like ours that men should occupy the time while they are waiting for the New Theology in expressing their growing idealism in a bewildering and apparently unconnected series of experiments in the Brotherhood of Men. For we can not have the New Theology until we begin to practice the New Brotherhood of Men.

"One group of activities like the Christian Endeavor Society, the Epworth League, the Brotherhood movement and the Y. M. C. A. are still actively religious and adhere more or less closely to the churches; but it is significant that the organizations which are now growing fastest and seem most prosperous, like the Y. M. C. A., have departed furthest from church influence and place the chief emphasis not on distinctly religious work, but on social and educational activities and physical training. Even the Salvation Army, beginning as emotional religious revival, has become a great agency for providing employment, lodgings and food for poor people. Its Christmas dinners and its lodging houses are perhaps more noteworthy now than its religious activities.

"But the greater group of practical activities to which I have referred has wholly departed from church influence and is not even outspokenly religious. Among the chief of these unchurched activities I should class the social settlement movement, hospital extension, municipal and political reform, and many of the newer forms of charity and education. All these movements represent the faith, however groping, however unconscious, of the unchurched or of those who though still nominally connected with the churches, find the most satisfactory avenues for the expression of their religious idealism in organizations outside of the churches."

THE POLISHED SHAFT.

"He hath made me a polished shaft."—Isaiah.

The polished shaft is here used as an emblem of efficiency. The figure of speech was suggested to Isaiah at a time when weapons and instruments were hand forged and were intimately associated with the owner and user. Their polish was not the result of varnish or paint or factory finish. It came as the result of service. It stood for a combination of good metal and hard service. The poor blade and the idle blade took no polish.

So in those days the man who had by his side a polished shaft felt more secure. It was the defender of his life. He would tolerate no defective weapon.

Isaiah felt that he was an instrument in God's hand, something with which to fight his battles and defend his cause. Native good qualities and the experience and wisdom resulting from long and faithful service had made him a polished and successful weapon with which the Lord smote dishonesty, infidelity, immorality, superstition, and wickedness in high places.

The desire to be a polished shaft in God's service is a laudable ambition. Paul wrote to Timothy, "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."

The preacher can and should give careful study and prayer to the problem of making his work effective. The word should be presented in a clear-cut, convincing, powerful manner. The pulpit calls for enthusiasm, fire, purpose, conviction, eloquence. But though the full tide of inspiration may come in the pulpit, the sermon is only an incident; it is about one hour long, and usually there are twenty-three hours, at least, sometimes a week, elapsing between sermons. These hours must be used to the best advantage, and after full allowance for rest and recreation, there comes the study of books and the intercourse with God and man that will fit one to be a preacher. Then there are the ministrations to individuals or families that sometimes form the most important part of the minister's work. In all of this there should be an ardent desire to work in a systematic and successful manner. No haphazard work will do. The situation demands zeal, unselfishness, sympathy, good judgment, and inspiration.

The life and vitality of the work in some localities depends upon the church representative there stationed. The forces of opposition are closing in on the church. Can God depend on him? Is he a polished and reliable weapon?

These thoughts will be heartily approved by the church membership in general, unless we have formed wrong conclusions from things that we have observed. Scattered Saints write to the minister in charge, "We have an opening here. Send us some good elder." Branches petition the appointing authorities, "Send us some good, live elder for the conference year; one who is competent to do pastoral work." The Saints frequently inquire about a visiting elder who is appointed to preach, "Is he an able speaker?"

All this may cause some heartburnings under certain conceivable circumstances. Yet it is human nature to wish to see a thing done well if it is done at all. An audience that has assembled to hear a sermon naturally wishes to hear a good sermon. They do not wish to listen to a half-hearted effort, or to rambling remarks, or to a dissertation that can not possibly be understood.

It is no injustice to the pulpit for the pew to demand a good sermon. Injustice is done at times when the pew errs in its judgment as to what constitutes a good sermon. The most eloquent and flowery effort is not always the best. The best sermon is a rare combination of eloquence, fervor, spiritual power, and common sense. And a good sermon, the one that is needed, may make the pew very uncomfortable.

As we have said, the membership demands a capable ministry. But we intend to carry the thought further. All members should be in their respective fields of work polished instruments in God's hand.

Listen: "All are called according to the gifts of God unto them; and to the intent that all may labor together, let him that laboreth in the ministry and him that toileth in the affairs of the men of business and of work labor together with God for the accomplishment of the work intrusted to all."—Doctrine and Covenants 119: 8.

The gospel holds out the highest conceivable incentive to effort to all classes of men and women. There are no privileged classes and none are forgotten. The world makes personal gain the incentive to labor and argues that if that incentive is removed men will not labor. The gospel offers a higher and broader incentive and sets men and women at work for the spiritual and temporal advancement of all, themselves included. It is inclusive; including all that the world has to offer in the way of self-interest and a great deal more.

Latter Day Saints should be deeply interested in making themselves masters of their own avocations. Brn. A, B, and C are farmers. They work hard and plan carefully. There are the three families to feed, clothe, and educate; and these families being producers, and withal of the salt of the earth, deserve a good living and a good education. But their ambition does not end there. Because of the fact that they are capable laborers these three men, A, B, and C, are able to pay tithes and offerings into the hands of the Bishop sufficient to keep one elder in the field during the entire year. In addition they, by their sober, temperate, and honorable lives, help to put a solid, reinforced-concrete foundation under every sermon that the elder preaches.

Now, who will select one from among the four men, Brn. A, B, C, and the elder, and say, This man is a polished shaft in the hands of God and the others are not.

Bro. D is a teacher, principal of a high school. He is a thoroughly equipped, up-to-date instructor and commands a good salary. This enables him to support him and his family as they should be supported. But his ambition is not self-centered, and because of the fact that he has a good income and is interested in educational matters he is able to help one or two young men through Graceland College, besides performing other works required under the law. These examples may be multiplied many times without doing violence to that which is being done right now in the church.

Because of having a well-defined idea of service A, B, C, D, and others in many other avocations, find an added zest and happiness in life. Their work is not a grind. They are not contemplating suicide. Almost any work that is not in itself repulsive may become pleasant if we go at it with sufficient interest and a determination to do it in the best possible manner. And the man who is doing his work in that kind of a way will be called to a higher class of work, sooner or later, because it is certain that he will carry with him the same conscientious and zealous habits.

For these reasons we join in the petition, Send us a good elder; and we go further and say, Send us good carpenters, teachers, merchants, farmers, lawyers, physicians. Wherever a Latter Day Saint is working let him do his work well. His religious convictions ought to constrain him to do good work, that he may give the world full value received. He is also interested in drawing a good salary or commanding a good income that he may help the work of God onward to its culmination.

The progress of the work, so far as man is concerned, depends on the surplus of energy and ability resident in the church membership. The earning capacity of our members is an important question. The laborers in the church must support themselves and their families. The amounts that they can give toward prosecuting the missionary work in all the world, as well as caring for the poor, educating the young, etc., will depend entirely upon their ability to produce a surplus. It is as clear as crystal.

God wants many polished instruments. He gives a new dignity to labor by enlisting it in the great gospel cause. He needs men and women of sterling worth who are well educated, skillful workers, and can honestly win their own living and something more to be used as he shall direct.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

THE ART OF PAYING ATTENTION.

The following from the Christian Endeavor World is recommended to HERALD readers for a careful reading and consideration:

Next to being a good speaker I crave the grace of being a good listener. In fact, I am not sure but that, if I had to choose between the two, and could be but one, I should ask the good fairies to make me an attentive and appreciative listener. Certainly good listeners are much more needed in the world than good speakers and good talkers, for there must always be at least one listener to every talker, and often a good many more than one, so that there is certainly a greater need of listeners.

This, too, is a grace that can be cultivated. It is an art worth studying—this art of paying attention. I have a friend whom I esteem most highly, to whom it is always a tribulation for me to go with any suggestion or with a story of any sort, for I never feel that he is paying the least attention to what I say. I may be wrong in that feeling, but he certainly gives me that impression. He seems to know the end from the beginning. He does not wait for me to express my thought before I see that his mind is wandering off to something else. He says, "Yes, yes, yes, I see!" when I am very sure that he does not see, or at least more than half see, what I am driving at; and I often go away with an unsatisfied feeling that I have made no impression worth speaking about upon his mind.

I have another friend who settles down in his chair, when I have anything to say to him, looks me straight in the eye, says nothing at all until I have told him the whole story, and perhaps not very much then; but I see from his attentive gaze, from the lighting up of his face, from his few words of appreciative understanding on the subject, that he has taken it in; and I leave his presence feeling that something has been accomplished.

The public speaker always divides his audiences into two classes, those who have learned the art of paying attention and those who have not. In an audience of a thousand people he can pick out before his half hour's address is over certain people who have preëminently learned the art. They fasten their eyes upon him; their mobile faces show the play of their emotions; he knows that their thought responds to his thought, and his heart goes out to them in gratitude for being good listeners. A good speech depends quite as much upon the listeners as upon the speaker. Before some audiences it would be impossible for Chrysostom himself to make a good speech.

I saw a crowd not long ago from which Daniel Webster would have retired baffled and discouraged if he had attempted to talk to them. On the other hand, I have seen audiences, and addressed them, where I felt that even I, with my faltering tongue, had made an impression, but largely so because there were one or more good listeners in that audience, who responded with heart and soul, with face and feature, to what I was trying to say.

All honor to the good listener; May their tribe increase! If I were a rich man, I would endow a chair in every grammar and high school in the country, and one of the duties of the professor who occupied it would be to teach the art of paying attention.—Pilgrim.

SR. F. G. PITT DEAD.

We are pained to announce the death on Monday morning of Sister Pitt, wife of High Priest F. G. Pitt, of Independence, Missouri. Brother and Sister Pitt came to Lamoni last week to attend the reunion and visit at the home of Sister Pitt's niece, Sr. Mattie Rabidou. She had been unwell for some time and a slight accident, the getting of a cinder in her eye on her journey, as we are informed, brought on complications which resulted in her passing away. The HERALD extends sympathy and condolence to Brother Pitt and family in their affliction.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

"Persual of the official report of the last April conference held by the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints brings to light an act in such significant contrast with the methods pursued by the money-grabbing Utah prophets-by-self-appointment, that the temptation to acquaint the public with its brief details may not be reasonably withstood.

"It appears that some time ago there died at Lamoni, Iowa, a member of the 'Josephite' church, as Utah Mormons name it, Mrs. Martha Wood. The deceased left a will, in which she designated Mr. Heman C. Smith, a fellow church member, as executor. After making provision for the payment of all debts, and designating certain legacies to the amount of a little over five hundred dollars, the will directed the executor to utilize the residue in prosecuting the missionary work of the Reorganized Church in Europe. During her latter days the executor, Mr. Smith, and other friends of the deceased, had heard the lady express a desire to so rearrange her affairs and so change her will that she could bequeath to certain needy relatives in Scotland the sum of four hundred dollars, but she had died before having convenient opportunity to make this contemplated change.

"Now came Mr. Smith, the executor, and presented the matter to the conference last April. He stated his position in the case concisely in the following terms, as copied from the official conference report:

"'Now according to the express terms of the will the executor has no power to carry out her expressed wish, unless the church which is the chief beneficiary shall authorize him so to do, and provide that he shall receive a receipt for the same from the church. This matter is therefore presented for the action of the body.'

"The report then goes on to say that 'it was moved that the executor be authorized to pay to those mentioned in the document just read the sum of four hundred dollars in case the will is not contested. The motion prevailed.'

"The church was the chief beneficiary, as stated, and in its act at the conference merely relinquished a portion of its own temporal right in a splendid exhibition of human feeling. The organization teaches the cultivation of broad charity, and the evidence in this case is that in its organized self it practices what it preaches."—Salt Lake Tribune, August 9, 1909.

The Lamoni Stake reunion is in full swing, having started Friday, 27th ult. A large number of tents are already up and more are coming daily. Quite a number of the ministry having homes in Lamoni are present, as also some from a distance.

Bishop E. L. Kelley is here on business in connection with improvements at the lake which supplies our waterworks system.

Lamoni's oldest inhabitant passed away on Monday at the Saints' Home. He was Bro. William D. Cutler, aged seventy-five, who has been an inmate for a number of years. Up till recently the brother was quite a familiar figure at church and on the streets. He was a retired blacksmith and a violinist of considerable ability.

Elder Fred. M. Smith, wife, and daughter Lois arrived on Saturday from their western trip and will spend a few days here before resuming their homeward journey.

Bro. William Bradbury, of Providence, Rhode Island, is in attendance at the reunion. He is on his way home from Salt Lake City where he attended the G. A. R. encampment. He reports a good time among the Mormons.

We note from Omaha Record-Herald that Bro. A. M. Fyrando has served continuously for fifteen years as secretary of the Old Settlers Association of Harrison County, Iowa.

It Is Well.

(To Brother and Sister Rhodes, in memory of their little son, these lines are lovingly submitted.)

"Run now, I pray thee, to meet her, and say to her, Is it well with thee? is it well with thy husband? is it well with the child? And she answered, It is well."—2 Kings 4: 26.

"Is it well with the child?" I asked of the breeze
As it softly sighed through the whispering trees.
And as I listened, I caught the refrain
Of thousands of voices from hill and plain;
Each blade of grass, each flower and tree,
Bearing this message of hope to me:
"The works of God are not wrought in vain;
And though we die, we shall live again;
It is well with the child,
It is well."

Is it well with the child? Oh, listen and hear
The voice of the Master, sweet and clear,
As he walked by the beautiful Galilee;
Suffer the children to come unto me
For of such the kingdom of heaven shall be.
It is well with the child,
It is well.

It is well with the child. Oh, stricken heart,
There is One who can heal the sting and smart;
He who spared not his only begotten Son
To redeem from the grave thy little one.

When the stormy voyage of life is o'er,
And thy sails are furled on the heavenly shore,
Will freely give thee thine own once more.
It is well with the child,
It is well.

Opportunity.

(An answer to Ingall's poem on "Opportunity," by Walter Malone.)

They do me wrong who say I come no more
When once I knock and fail to find you in;
For every day I stand outside your door,
And bid you awake, and ride to fight and win.

Wail not for precious chances passed away,
Weep not for golden ages on the wane!
Each night I burn the records of the day;
At sunrise every soul is born again.

Laugh like a boy at the splendors that have sped,
To vanished joys be blind and deaf and dumb;
My judgments seal the past dead with its dead,
But never bind a moment yet to come.

Though deep in mire, wring not your hands and weep;
I lend my arm to all who say, "I can."
No shamefaced outcast ever sank so deep
But yet might rise and be again a man.

Under the Magnolia Tree.

Sing on, sing on, thou merry bird,
In yon Magnolia tree;
Sing on, sing to your little ones,
As mother sang to me;
We used to stroll through field and wood,
And to our fav'rite nook,
The old magnolia so loved by you,
Down by the little brook.

There she used to read to me of Him
Who died—long years ago—
Upon the cross, for our wrong deeds,
Because he loved us so.
She told me of the angels, too,
And the Golden City above,
I nestled closer to her side,
As she sang of His great love.

Alas! where is that mother now
That held me to her breast?
I hear a still, small voice whisper,
"Sweet is her eternal rest."
Sing on, sing on, thou happy bird
Thy tender song cheers me;
My loving mother is asleep,
By yon Magnolia tree.

"Briefly stated, success is that for which all men labor, the end all mankind seek to attain, the crowning point of the struggle of nations. Success, therefore, means something. It stands as a monument to energy, labor, strife, progressiveness, ingenuity and coöperation. It is that for which 'hope springs eternal in the human breast.' Success is seldom gained single-handed, but is due in a great majority of instances to the coöperation with others."

FUNERAL SERMON OF ALEXANDER H. SMITH, AUGUST 15, 1909, AT LAMONI, IOWA, BY JOSEPH LUEF.

Who is there among us that feels within himself equal to the situation that confronts me to-day? When the message reached me on yesterday evening notifying me that I had been selected as the one to occupy, and that the funeral services would be held here this afternoon, I was more surprised than I was when the word reached me of our brother's death. I was at a loss to know what to do, but finally sent the answer as I did, and came, without a single thought in mind, though trying all the way along the journey on the cars to center my mind upon something upon which I could make a beginning, and through the consideration of which I might be supplied with thoughts that would enable me, at least, to formally occupy the hour.

I can not believe that it was intended that the occasion to-day shall call for anything like a memorial service in the broad sense of the word. I believe that that might be reserved for a time to be set by the church itself, and I only answer to the request of the family to-day to connect myself with the exercises that have to do with the formality of laying our brother's body away.

Just before coming up the steps in the building there were handed me for the first time a few items, from which it was understood I might make selection, and present them to the listeners in the way of general information, I have not the time to make selection of the salient points, and therefore I will read the items just as I find them here, in the article prepared in the history of the church, written by the daughter of our departed brother, Sr. Vida E. Smith.

Alexander Hale, fourth son of Joseph Smith, the Seer, and Emma Smith, was born in the town of Far West, Caldwell County, Missouri, June 2, 1838.

The scenes following in cruel rapidity, are seen only dimly through a child's fitful recollections, until the establishment of a home in Nauvoo had been effected for some years. For him the dearest and the saddest events that come into a man's life, center in the happy old city of Nauvoo. His first memory of home; his fondest memory of mother in life and death; his only memory of father, a dimly sweet and vividly sad one, were here on the hill-slopes of Nauvoo. Though but a lad of six, he remembers with clearness the exodus from Nauvoo after the tragedy in Carthage. The scene was too full of woe to escape in many details the grasp of his sensitive, tender nature. Clinging to his mother's hand, with her he left the home on the banks of the Mississippi, his young heart excited by the firing of guns and the sad-faced, hurrying throng, pushing through the streets to the ferry. On the Uncle Toby, a north-bound steamer, they passed up the river to a village on its eastern banks, called Fulton City.

The return to Nauvoo in 1847 was almost as sorrowful and dangerous as the exodus had been. Happily for him, a brave-hearted mother held the helm, and his life was steered through the varying waters of youth until 1857. Quickened by the excitement consequent upon the discovery of gold in Pike's Peak, the spirit of adventure caused him to join a party starting for that promising field. The venture did not prove a success; and from the plains of western Kansas they returned homeward. This was a disappointment; but subsequent events bear out the thought that the hand of God overruled. In the year when his brother Joseph took his place in the church, the home circle was much agitated. A mighty force tugged at the bonds of peace. Alexander was not religiously inclined. His experience with religion had not been of a character to induce him to give it much thought. The fundamental principles of the gospel must first awaken him to a love of God. His mind was in a tumult. His adored younger brother, David, joined himself to the church; while the mother stood stoutly by them. It was a serious outlook. Already friends were turned against them. A warning had come to his brother Joseph from the citizens, that he must neither preach nor pray in public, nor in any way attempt to promulgate his doctrine in the county in which he lived. The popularity of the Smith boys was on the wane. This threat did what nothing else had done for Alexander. He began to search such books as were at his command, and began to believe the principles therein. Their beauty and power appealed to his mind as true and desirable. Still he lingered.

In 1861 he married Miss Elizabeth Agnes Kendall, a daughter of Elder John Kendall, of England, who was killed by falling from a scaffold while endeavoring to save a fellow workman.

In April, 1862, Frederick G. W. Smith, third son of Joseph and Emma, died without baptism. This perplexed Alexander,

PATRIARCH ALEXANDER H. SMITH.

"Sometimes I have been carried away so in thought upon the enjoyment that will be in the heart at the coming of my Lord and Savior that I have almost heard the tramp, tramp, tramp of the coming host, when the sound of the tramp shall be."—A. H. S.

and caused him days and nights of sorrow. That his beloved brother was lost was a horror such as has filled many hearts; but to his there came a balm, the testimony of the Spirit, the first communication direct from the Comforter, saying, "Grieve not; Frederick's condition is pleasant; and the time shall come when baptism can be secured to him," admonishing him to do his duty and all would be well. Satisfied of the necessity of baptism for the living, and comforted by the evidence of its possibility for the dead, on May the 25th, of the same year, his brother Joseph baptized him in the grand old Mississippi, confirmation following under the hands of the same, assisted by Elder Nathan Foster. In July of the same year his wife followed him, receiving baptism by Joseph Smith and confirmation by his administration the same day.

In September, 1862, his ordination to the office of teacher took place, Joseph Smith, I. L. Rogers, and John Shippy officiating. The following year at the April conference at Amboy, Illinois, he was approached by Bro. W. W. Blair with the question, "Are you willing to accept an ordination to the office of elder?" assuring him that it was his calling to minister in gospel things as an elder. The thought suggested to him was, "No man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron." Ready always to do the will of God so far as able, he resolved to keep himself in condition and wait until it was made known to him, claiming his right to receive light from God direct, and trust no man. That night God sent to him a vision; to him it was and to us it is, beautiful and significant, more so than even he to whom it came then realized. In his own words we give it:

Then follows the vision which most of you may read for your own benefit. [Published in its entirety in last week's issue.—EDITORS.]

He at once began missionary work, spending the summer, fall and winter of 1863 and 1864 in western Iowa, in company with Elder W. W. Blair. His next work was along a new and in many ways trying line, as president of the branch of his home town.

Near the close of the summer of 1864, accompanied by Henry Cuerden, he was sent to the Saint Louis District. In the spring of 1865 Elder Cuerden was released, and Elder William Anderson, of Iowa, became his companion. Of this friend and brother, there are remembrances delightful to recall, God's rich and wondrous feasts spread for them by his Spirit as they journeyed together, binding them in bonds of love to the gospel, and in bonds of friendship in life. This season of blessing was followed by an appointment from the fall conference to the Pacific Slope. He was given the choice of associates, and he named William H. Kelley, and William Anderson, of Montrose, Iowa. Elder Kelley could not go.

On April 12, 1866, he was ordained a high priest by Joseph Smith and J. W. Briggs.

In company with William Anderson and James Gillen, he endured the hardships of a trip by wagon across the dreaded plains. At one time he left the wagon and lay down on the desert as he feared in his death agonies; but was raised by the Spirit to finish his work. He spent twenty-one months in his mission in California.

In 1870, with W. W. Blair, he again went west to Utah, remaining there while Brother Blair went over to California.

On April 10, 1873, he was called to the apostleship at Plano, Illinois, being ordained by J. W. Briggs, Joseph Smith, and W. W. Blair. In 1875 he was again appointed to the Pacific Slope Mission, having charge of that then distant field. He was accompanied on this mission by his brother, David H. But what had promised to be a bright and pleasant mission, terminated in the saddest and most anxious time of his life. A message that his wife was near to death at their home in Plano, brought him from his mission field with his brother sick and broken at his side. Upon his wife's recovery, he again took up his work, this time in northern Missouri and southern Iowa.

In the fall of 1877, upon his request he was released and permitted to labor as circumstances would permit, increasing family care making missionary work more arduous, he thought thus to be less of a burden. But his soul was not satisfied; the service seemed half-hearted, though it was not. In 1878 he again received conference appointment, being burdened with the charge of his former appointment, northern Missouri and southern Iowa. In 1879 the whole of Missouri was added. From October, 1880, it was simply Missouri until the following April, when he was given Illinois in addition. In 1883 he was still retained in charge of his birth-state, Missouri, and the State of Kansas.

The time came for another distant mission. Leaving his family (wife and nine children) in their home in Independence, Missouri, in 1885, he took charge of the Pacific Slope, returning in the spring of 1886. From this sunny field he was directed to minister to the Saints in a field comprising northern Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, the Dakotas, and Manitoba. His charge kept him in touch with the people of the North until 1890. Then in connection with Elder E. C. Briggs, there were added northern Indiana, Michigan, and northwestern Ohio. He returned to the Rocky Mountain Mission in 1892 with Elder Joseph Luff as associate. In 1893 he was associated with Elder William H. Kelley in the Eastern States.

In 1890, April 15, he was ordained president of the Quorum of Twelve, by Joseph Smith and W. W. Blair, which office he held until 1897, when he was called as counselor to the President of the church, and patriarch and evangelical minister unto the church. Acting in the office of such calling and ordination, and in the discharge of obligations imposed by revelation to the President of the church, April, 1901, he left his home in Lamoni, Iowa, for a mission to Australia, the Society Islands, and Hawaii. Spending some months in the islands, he proceeded to Australia, where in April, 1902, he received a cable message to ordain C. A. Butterworth to the office of apostle, the revelation authorizing such ordination, also lifting from him the responsibility of counselor to the President of the church by placing another in his place, thus leaving him free to act in his evangelical calling and his work as patriarch to the church. This position is one to which he is well suited, being of a sympathetic and affectionate nature.

As a man he has a height of five feet ten inches; an eye large, clear, full, and blue; hair dark, almost black, soft, fine, and abundant, even now when he is growing old; a forehead square and full. A facial index of his tender heart is shown by a deeply cleft chin. As a speaker, he appeals to the heart at once. He is himself quickly moved to extremes of sorrow or merriment, and has the gift of enjoying the good and beautiful things of life to a remarkable extent.

There were born to him nine children, four sons and five daughters: Frederick, now an apostle, living in Lamoni, Iowa; Vida E., wife of Heman C. Smith, of Lamoni, Iowa; Ina I., wife of S. G. Wright, of Australia; Emma B., wife of William F. Kennedy, of Independence, Missouri; Don A., of Lamoni, Iowa; Eva G., wife of F. L. Madison, who died in San Bernardino, California; Joseph G., a priest, of Lamoni, Iowa; Arthur M., of Lamoni, Iowa; Coral C. R., still residing with her parents. All are members of the church except Don A.

From his first home in Nauvoo the subject of this sketch went out to his church work except two years residence in Plano, Illinois, from where he returned to Nauvoo, in 1870. Thence he moved to a farm in Colfax Township, Harrison County, Missouri. Here for two years he acted as post-master at a post office called Andover. In 1882 he left the farm, going by team to Stewartville, Missouri; and in March, 1884, he went further south to Independence, Missouri; and in 1887 removed with his family to the farm in Missouri, and then in 1891 to Lamoni, where he, his wife, and two younger children still reside.

These items were written some time ago, and of course if they had been written to-day, or since our brother's death, would have been revised to some extent.

In regard to his illness I have this information placed in my hands:

He attended the reunion at Bluff Park, and took part with pleasure in all meetings, greeting Saints and old friends with his usual good cheer and genuine delight. Sunday night he preached the closing sermon of the reunion with usual vigor and was apparently feeling well, and in excellent spirits. Monday he crossed to Nauvoo and visited old acquaintances, expecting to go Tuesday to Burlington, stopping at the mansion, still his property, but occupied by his wife's brother, John Kendall. In the afternoon he complained of feeling unwell, and his niece, Mrs. Ross, brought home remedies to his aid, but he grew worse and continued to grow worse through Tuesday and Tuesday night. Bro. and Sr. Mark Siegfried adding their attentions to those of the family, and these joined now by the help of Brother Smith's stenographer, Bro. William Dexter.

A physician was called who gave them no hope, and his family was called. His oldest daughter, Mrs. Heman C. Smith, reaching him on the morning of Wednesday, the 11th. She immediately dispatched for her mother. Accompanied by her grandson, Glauud, and daughter, Mrs. Coral Horner, Sister Lizzie reached Nauvoo Friday morning, but found another messenger had gone before, and she must meet the first bitter hours of widowhood in the home of her bridal days. Amid the wreck and ruin left of former happy and beautiful scenes, she looked upon the silent form of one who had never before failed to answer when she called him.

Brother Alexander died at five minutes to eight on the evening of August 12, 1909, after a constant and unceasing struggle with pain and sickness from Monday evening until late Thursday afternoon.

Bro. Lester Haas with his auto brought Bro. George Lambert from Rock Creek to administer on Wednesday, and again Thursday he went for Brother Lambert, but he came only in time to help prepare the body for the journey home, for a great peace had fallen upon him, and rest and coolness where had been struggle and fever and wearing pain.

At six o'clock on Friday, August 13, they placed the casket in the south yard of the mansion and the little band of Saints stood near him, and gave with broken voices a little service of song and Bro. George Lambert offered a prayer full of sympathy and tenderness. The sun was low, almost down, as the ferry boat carried the body and its attending friends over the rippling Mississippi to the Iowa side where they took train for Lamoni.

He leaves a widow, three sons, and four daughters; one son, Don A., and his daughter, Eva Grace, awaited him in the beyond. Fred A. is in his mission field in Oregon. Ina, the second daughter, lives in Australia. Vida, Emma, Joseph, Arthur, and Coral, and their children, and family of Fred A., and the widow of Don A. with six children, and Lamont, the son of Eva Grace, are all present. In addition to these he leaves a brother, our venerated president, Joseph Smith.

I also have an excerpt from a sermon preached by our brother on the 5th day of July, 1908, which it has been thought fitting to present here under these conditions. In the course of his sermon Brother Alexander said:

I have been made to believe that the coming of the Lord Jesus is of that character that it matters not to me whether I sleep or whether I am awake and in this life when he comes. If I live righteously before him, and keep his commandments, I have his promise that he will bring me forth, and that I will be among those who shall meet him at his coming and reign with him. . . .

What matters it to you and to me whether we sleep in the tomb, if, when the trump shall sound, and the graves shall be opened, we are among those that shall come forth at the sound of the trump, to meet the Lord at his coming? Why, sometimes I have been carried away so in thought upon the possibilities of the enjoyment that will be in the heart at the coming of my Lord and Savior, that I have almost heard the tramp, tramp, tramp of the coming host, when the sound of the trump shall be. I have seen, in my thoughts, the flashing of light from the east, as it showed the presence of the coming of the Lord, as it passed o'er hill and vale, and through the world. I have seen in thought the people arising and going forth to meet the Savior when he shall come to reign as King of kings and Lord of lords.

To me as a result of the few lessons I have learned, and from which I have tried to profit in this life, there comes to-day, after thinking over the event of the last few hours, the assurance that tears do not belong to this occasion, if we consider the departed one alone. But when our thoughts for a single moment penetrate the home, where he was almost everything, and when we think of the church and the relations he bore thereto, the ministrations on his part that have occurred faithfully from year to year through his life, and which are to be enjoyed no more, it is impossible to repress the tears. To the church, to the family, our tears are due. To him the smiles of congratulation are due.

There is not a living soul to-day who has been permitted the privilege of an intimate acquaintance with our departed brother that would cherish a thought within his mind at this moment other than that all is well with him, that he has earned what the Father in heaven made it possible for his covenant children of earth to earn. There has opened to my vision while thinking of him to-day, and last night while on my knees with my family, pleading in the behalf of those in the bereavement that his departure occasioned, a condition strikingly similar to that which is described in the language just read. I saw him figuring with another host, and I was made to remember instinctively a statement found in Mark 4: 29 to the effect that the Master, when he seeth the fruit ripe, puts in the sickle. Sometimes it is an injury to the grain to leave it longer on the stalk than nature properly calls for. So with fruit. And where it becomes essential for the highest good of the individuals concerned, and in the service of that wonderfully divine purpose that we see something of the beginnings or primary developments here and which carry their significance into the broad beyond, that the sickle be introduced, it is done; the ripened products transferred to more befitting environment, to unfold their excellence and glory in a sphere where they never think of anything coming to an end. I see him entering into that condition, and I sense the answering response to my mental vision that comes back to me, and the restfulness of spirit, and the contentedness of soul that is possessed by him. I shall not attempt to describe it, but, O! for me may the change and welcome be as blissful!

The transfer in this instance from one sphere to another was just as essential as it has been in other cases, where the hand of God has directed. The little vestibule in which we still remain is narrow, and is comparatively obscure as to its meaning and relation to that into which it opens hereafter. We overestimate this and underestimate that, and are not able to comprehend, naturally and intelligently, how loving is the ministration of the hand that leaves us in tears in the vestibule for a while, while the audience in the vast auditorium rejoices over the new addition to its ranks.

I think it will not be very long until so many of the great and good and noble ones who have served among us will have passed over that we shall more anxiously long for that condition than to remain, that we may be with those whose association here has made life not only tolerable but enjoyable to us. We shall long for those who go more than to remain.

Not a word need be said by me with reference to our brother and the character of his ministration. My personal relations with him were of the dearest character, and he was one of those men who knew how to esteem and to appreciate the regard and affection of another for himself. I am afraid that there are very few (though all estimate him highly) who ever did really appreciate the richness of the character of the man. Those who have only seen him in the pulpit, and heard his ministrations there, have enjoyed it richly, but to my mind, (and you will pardon this freedom of expression on my part I know,) he did not shine out there to the extent of his real worth.

Neither the pen nor the tongue of Alexander Smith, to my mind, ever served him as brilliantly as the ideals of his spirit and the poetry of his soul deserved. I mean by that that his pen and tongue were more prosaic than his spirit. And why I say it is this: In my personal relations with him at different times, and I have been with him day after day through weeks and weeks of personal ministrations twenty-five years ago in Missouri, I have been with him in the western slopes, and along the coasts of both the Pacific and the Atlantic, I have been with him in his home, and he has made a temporary residence in mine, and I have had occasion to call forth from him there through social intercourse, things that made him stand out, as I thought, brighter than he ever stood out to me in his average pulpit work. I do not know how it has been with others, but such has been my experience. I have, however, listened to him preach at times, and have prayed for the Spirit's grace to help him and make him what I wish all of our ministers to be when they occupy the stand—living illustrations of God's idea of the subjects on which they are discoursing, when it has been most blessed to be a listener to him.

I have thought sometimes he, though seeming to enjoy a great abundance of liberty, seldom, or comparatively so, did full justice to that which his mind seemed to be holding in contemplation. I have seen him when the heavy portion of the effort in framing and delivering a sermon seemed to be at an end, and his spirit was liberated from the constructive work of selecting subject matter, and throwing its parts together into a compact body, he has soared out and began the work of garnishing that discourse in its peroration with garland after garland of what I call epigrammatic effusions which were simply gems in themselves, and which added to that discourse a luster, and a soul relish that made of it a beautiful and delicious thing—more beautiful than the beginning or main body of his discourse seemed to suggest. And then when I have had occasion to converse with him at times alone and have made reference to something here or something there, it seemed in the freedom of social intercourse, that he would be able in that epigrammatical form to express ideas more richly, and I have wondered at times why, in his pulpit work, that beauty and those spiritual poems have not been made to stand out with the same luster as actual living and undying charms to those who looked at and listened to him. I have wondered if others thought of him and measured his work in that way.

On one occasion, in 1879, I was appointed a missionary, with five others, to go on my first mission to Utah, from the fall conference near Council Bluffs. After my name had been mentioned and the question of confirming the appointment was hung up for a later period in the exercises, one after another of prominent men, judging from experience and observation, and feeling a great deal of alarm for me, a babe in the church—only about two years and a half old—came to me and sounded note after note of warning in my ears, till I began feeling a little timid myself about going out into that field. Brother Alexander came to me, after hearing of the conversation, and took me aside. What he told me gave me assurance and courage. It was afterwards confirmed by the President of the church, and in a single sentence which he used, he greatly impressed me. It was an expression of confidence that gave birth within me to an enthusiasm and determination that I had not realized, at least to the same extent before; I went out into the grove alone, and I said to the God of heaven: "Let me die any form of death in this world before I betray the confidence thus expressed in me!" I am not situated here to tell what he said, and what was in that conversation at that time.

I found in him one who, though you might disagree with him just as widely as you could, and emphasize and speak in disagreement on church matters as vehemently as you please, so long as you did it as a man ought to do it, and was gentlemanly in your course and attitude, you would never disturb his brotherly affection toward you. He was your brother still; he was your counselor still; he was your friend still. And in times when our controversy along certain lines in our social intercourse would reach a stage where it would seem impossible for us to agree on matters under discussion, the manner in which these would end up was always such as to make us feel (I think he did as well as I did) strengthened or confirmed in the confidence that had formerly existed in us toward each other. I learned from him, early in my church life, this lesson, that my truest and best friend may be my strongest opponent in the advocacy, or defense, of certain views. I learned that it was possible for me to so carry myself in my course in life, that whatever my public relations, whatever my ministerial work and service might be in an official capacity in the church, I could occupy in such a way, under the suggestions and biddings of my own conscience, as to appear stubborn and independent at times, and yet in my heart carry, as I thought he carried, that feeling of kindness that would enable me to place my arm around my brother's neck and kiss his lips with an expression of as deep an affection as I ever felt prior to the time that controversy was started. I learned or partially learned this from what I saw of him in connection with the work where we have been together. I have tried to be as observing as I could, and have been made satisfied of this fact, that I could always count on him as a friend; whatever conditions in life might occur to disturb my comfort and peace, I could go to him for counsel and help.

I believe in my heart to-day that there are necessities existing elsewhere for such service as he has been made capable of performing as a result of the training that he has had here, and which were more necessary for him to enter upon at the time of his being removed from us here than for him to have continued with us to minister as he has done, important and deep as we may consider these necessities to be. I am satisfied of that within my own mind, and am resigned. Nothing is called for on my part in the way of a sermon doctrinally, or otherwise. I do not believe in personally eulogizing the dead, as is sometimes done; but an expression of love's appreciation is just and proper in the estimation of intelligent men. I believe I can say with all that we have lost as true a friend as the church has ever known. I make the exception of Christ. I am speaking of earthly friends that we have had among us and who have been taken from us. In the language of the President of the church, in the prophecy delivered at last conference, death's harvest has taken one whom the church will think that it can ill afford to spare. Who the next will be that will impress us with the strength and significance of that prediction, who shall be removed from us, I am not at liberty to say now. Perhaps some of you are. I stand to-day with this feeling within my heart, that should the authorized proclamation come that my Master would be here to take up his abode to-morrow, no joy could equal the thought or that which that thought would bring me. I begin to long within my soul for the associations that exist somewhere else, and as I see one by one borne hence from the mixed conditions of this life into the realm toward which the spirit seemed to signify to me in what I have read heretofore, as being the embodiment of rest, and peace, and bliss, the hungering in my spirit becomes more intense; I have a hope—a strong desire, that what remains to me of time and strength shall be so employed that when my summons shall come I shall have left as good evidence in support of the thought that all is well with me as my brother—your brother—has done—the Patriarch and Father of the church.

I took no text in rising to-day, but thought of a significant and suitable passage of scripture that might be used in closing. It is the language of the Apostle Paul. I use the words as though from the lips of our departed Patriarch, as appropriately as they were employed by the former apostle: "I have fought a good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith. Henceforth, there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also who love his appearing."

What shall be the outcome, or the result, of this change that has occurred, in the congregations of the people, the future must develop for us; but I sincerely hope that the spirit that he sought to inculcate within us, the testimonies that he bore, the sermons that he preached, the fatherly consideration that he exhibited as one who was yearning for the well-being of those over whom he had been given this spiritual oversight, may have so impressed us that, though he has departed from us, we shall try to consecrate ourselves more fully to God, and pledge ourselves to imitate and emulate those excellencies, and stand in the power and strength of that grace which has been assured to us on the condition that such counsel as he gave to us shall be faithfully observed. Thus by the fruits of his life's influence he will still be with us.

A patriarch, indeed, a father has gone—one who ever felt joy in his heart, when the privilege was his to address the people in our public assemblies and make use of the words, "Your father, the father of the church." And it seems to me that no man could have been picked from the vast body who was within himself the embodiment of those peculiar characteristics that so represented that thought, or that idea; and never has there stood one, within the range of my knowledge, within the church, whose general attitude was such as to make me feel safe in counting upon his sympathy, and the outstretching of his hand with a view to my uplifting immediately upon the discovery within me of the necessity for it. I hope the grace of God may be as clearly revealed, in the near or remote future, as may be wise to Him in the selecting of one to occupy in the place that has been made vacant by his going from us, and one who shall be equally as worthy of that title and name, and who, when his time shall come to go, shall leave as sure a guarantee behind of the blessedness of the act that gave him to the body in evidence, too, of the wisdom of his appointment unto the office or place that he occupied. May God in his infinite kindness give us grace in all our relations in the church and elsewhere, to occupy as he sought to occupy, that all who love righteousness and are disposed to give credit and praise to God for the good that is revealed in the human, and that characterizes us from day to day, shall be able to do so, and say truthfully of each of us: "He served his day well; he served his generation well." Whatever is the post of duty assigned, occupy it under the conviction that it was appointed of God. I am glad that Sister Vida put that item in with reference to her father which I read, that when the President, or one of the Presidency of the church came to him, and notified him of the Spirit's intimation that he had been chosen to occupy as an elder, his soul was willing and he stood ready to put forth his hand and minister. But the conviction was upon him that the man whose services are so demanded should receive indisputable assurance of the call. When that evidence came his hand went forth, asking God to sanctify it. I am glad it is so on record.

I pray that we may never be aspirants for place or position, or aught of that kind, in this life, but always wait for the assurance to us of what God requires at our hands; then putting our hands to the plow, never think of turning back, though even the hand or the power of death shall smite us. Whatever may be the character of the torture or trouble that may come to us, if God wants us there let us stay there. Love for God is the shrine or the altar where our convictions should lead us to consecrate ourselves and live and die for the promotion of the interests of what is involved therein. To me that is manhood, that is faith. I do not believe in that kind of faith that believes everything that you hear. I do believe in that kind of faith which, having received an assurance of what the will of God is, goes to work with the intention of executing all that is implied within it, let the conditions or consequences be what they may. May God help us to occupy in this sense wherever his Spirit may indicate or his will shall determine.

I am not capable to-day, if the weather permitted, of preaching. It is past me. I feel what we have lost as keenly as any one of you, outside of the family. I feel the agony of it in my soul, and the task of trying to speak is at least equal to the honor imposed upon me to-day.

May God greatly bless the widow and the family. May he so minister that whenever they shall note the vacancy death has created they shall as clearly see the Spirit's occupancy, and be thereby led to patiently and resignedly wait for the time when all shall be made plain and the explanations will be satisfactory—when we shall see that all the tendencies of God's providences were in the best direction, and we shall be inspired to praise him even for every interruption of our plans and calculations. The fruitage of it all will there proclaim his praise and the conditions of contentment will for ever abide.

I shall show you a life that is worth living. A young man says: "I am here. I am not responsible for my ancestry; others decided that. I am not responsible for my temperament; God gave me that. But here I am, and I must take an account of stock. Here I have a body which is a divinely constructed engine. I must put it to the very best uses, and I must allow nothing to damage this rarest of machinery. Two feet, and they mean locomotion. Two eyes, and they mean capacity to pick out my own way. Two ears, and they are telephones of communication with all the outside world, and they mean capacity to catch the sweetest music and the voices of friendship—the very best music. A tongue, with almost infinity of articulation. Yes, hands with which to welcome, or resist, or lift, or smite, or wave, or bless—hands to help myself and help others."—Doctor Talmage.

GRACELAND COLLEGE.

[This is the second number in our series on the work of Graceland College. It is written by Acting President J. A. Gunsolley, who has been with the institution practically since it was established. He is prepared to state the case exactly as it is. Our next number will be written by Professor Woodstock, who is in charge of the Industrial Department.—EDITORS.]

As the time nears for the opening of another year's work of our college, it is but fitting that the Saints at large should have their attention drawn in that direction.

MUTUAL INTEREST.

A church institution means an institution belonging to the church, in which each member of the church is part owner, and hence interested in its success. This interest is not measured by dividend checks cashable at par, but by the better preparation of the young of the church, their increased capacity to do, and the consequent uplift to the whole church.

Every Saint, whether he has children of his own to educate or not, is interested, because the education of every young Saint means so far the betterment of the church, and hence the betterment of every individual member of the church, because the interest of each member is identical with the interest of the body, the church.

PATRONESS HALL AS SEEN FROM THE WEST SIDE OF THE MAIN COLLEGE BUILDING.

NOT A LOCAL SCHOOL.

There were enrolled last year students from some sixteen States, four provinces of Canada, and one foreign land. From this fact it is plainly apparent that Graceland is not a local institution, as has been charged.

NOT A UNIVERSITY.

The school offers the following courses and maintains the following departments: College of Liberal Arts, consisting of two courses leading to the degrees of Bachelor of Arts, and Bachelor of Science;

MAIN COLLEGE BUILDING, AND THE TWO DORMITORIES.

a Normal School, providing a three-year General Preparatory Course, a County Certificate Course, High School Diploma Course, and regular State Diploma Course; Commercial School, offering a Business Course, a Shorthand and Typewriting Course, and a Preliminary English Course; School of Music, having courses in voice, piano, harmony, and history of music, and the addition of a department of band and orchestra music, is under contemplation; School of Oratory, offering two years of work in Elocution and Oratory; Manual Training School, offering two years of work in industrial and mechanical drawing and wood work. In addition to these, courses in art, basket weaving, and other useful and ornamental work are available to students. Hence, though not a university, quite a varied curriculum of work is offered, and all work offered is of a high standard of excellence.

EQUALITY OF OPPORTUNITY.

Those who have means—money or property—can enjoy the advantage of college and university training in the church, secular and state schools; but those not favored with such temporal advantages must be deprived of the opportunity of such an education, or receive it as a gift at the hands of some who are willing to assist them by the bestowment of a portion of their means for the benefit of others. The children of the rich and well to do deserve no special credit for their fortunate parentage; nor are the children of poor parents worthy of blame; both conditions are beyond the control of privilege. Can the church look upon these two classes of children, saying to the one, Enjoy all these privileges and advantages, and to the other, Suffer the disadvantages of the lack of the same, and say it is just? Verily, no.

Hence it is that the church is endeavoring, through the instrumentality of its educational institution to extend this equality of opportunity, and thus contribute to the hastening of Zion's redemption.

THE INDUSTRIAL FEATURE.

Many individuals who recognize the need of this equal opportunity are contributing of their means to this end. Some are buying scholarships, some are the children. This being true, and yet the children of the rich and the children of the poor being compelled to enter into competition side by side in the struggles of life, is it not manifestly unfair that there should be such a difference in the conditions under which they enter upon the stern realities of life, the one having all the advantages of an education affording the best mental training and discipline, and the other deprived of such blessing?

The church of God owes the advantage of equal opportunity to its young people. It is not right that the missionary's child shall be compelled to suffer from a lack of educational privileges, and the banker's child, or the merchant's child, or the child of the prosperous farmer, be blessed with such a paying for room rent in advance, and some in other ways. The Board of Trustees, believing that much might be accomplished by some means whereby students might help themselves by personal effort in the way of manual labor, has adopted the self help plan, and last year, 1908-9, about sixty young people enjoyed this privilege and worked for all or part of their expenses while in attendance at college. These students perform such labor as farm work on the college farm of upwards of forty acres, chores in caring for farm live stock—cows, pigs, chickens, horses, etc.; janitor work; firing; and general repair work; for the boys. The girls work in the kitchen and dining room, laundry, and work of that nature. Then there are a number of Lamoni homes that take girls to do housework, or boys to do chores, for their board. There are also some business houses that employ additional clerks on Saturdays and special days. Besides these, there is gardening, house cleaning, wood sawing, etc., which afford work for a number. But in a town like Lamoni, with all these sources of help to the deserving young person, the number who can be assisted is necessarily limited.

THE AMBITION OF THE MANAGEMENT.

It is the fond hope of the Board of Trustees, and surely it is shared by every earnest member of the church, that such assistance may be placed at their disposal that they be in position to say to every young person who is worthy but unable financially, who desires an education, "Come to Graceland and we will give you an education," believing that every dollar thus expended will yield many returns, not only in a spiritual uplift, but purely as a financial proposition. The training received will increase the earning power to the extent that the individual becomes a contributor to the help of the work of the church instead of being simply self-supporting or possibly a dependent.

HOW CAN YOU ASSIST?

You can talk to young people and interest them in Graceland. You can solicit contributions for furnishing dormitory rooms. You can buy a scholarship or pay room rent for some worthy young person. You can encourage contributions to the library. You can talk up College Day, the first Sunday in October.

COLLEGE DAY.

The General Conference set apart the first Sunday in October as College Day, upon which the branches and members of the church are requested to make a special contribution to aid in the running expenses of the school. It is very desirable indeed that there should be a universal response on that day, as the expense account was overdrawn last year. A large number of branches did not respond at all, and others did but little, while many did nobly. We shall need very much more than was received last year; and if every branch and all the scattered members would respond, there would be ample.

Surely no one who desires a reward is willing for others to do all the work; therefore, each should do something. The officers of every branch should talk the matter up with the branch beforehand and a preparation should be made for a liberal donation. No one will be impoverished and the effort will prove a blessing to the college and the hundreds of young people under her care, as well as the one making the gift.

May the Lord's blessing and peace be upon all, is the prayer of

J. A. GUNSOLLEY, Acting President.

A PLÉA FOR THE TEMPORAL LAW.

In preparing an article on this subject for the readers of the HERALD I hope to set forth the necessity of complying with the spiritual law pertaining to temporal things, for it is one of the greatest needs of to-day.

Every member should be encouraged by the sure words in Holy Writ: "I am the Lord, I change not;" and, "Believe in the Lord your God, so shall ye be established; believe his prophets, so shall ye prosper." (Malachi 3: 6; 2 Chronicles 20: 20.) The gospel has been restored and God's church reestablished on earth, and by obeying the ordinances of that gospel we are established in it and are not easily "tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine," knowing as we do that we "have not followed cunningly devised fables," but have believed the truth. Now, having been established we can prosper as a church by heeding the words of the prophets.

If you require an inspiring historical account to increase your faith as to your present duty, please read the seventh chapter of Genesis, Inspired Translation, wherein is contained the cheering record of the perfect faith of Enoch and his people in the Lord. They were not only established in the Lord but were prospered beyond the power and wisdom of man. So faithfully did they keep the whole law that is it written that "it came to pass, that Zion was not, for God received it up into his own bosom."

In making themselves ready for such divine favors they obeyed the temporal law, which was one of the necessary means in their preparation and everlasting blessing, and their triumph over a sinful world ought to inspire us to greater diligence. Surely they did not rob God by withholding their tithes and offerings, but fulfilled the law in all things, seeking "first to build up the kingdom of God, and to establish his righteousness" (Matthew 6: 38, I. T.), for their salvation was secured by doing the will of God in the church at that time, and our salvation is to be realized by doing his will in the church now reestablished.

We should obey him now, for he will not and has not given us a single law, spiritual or temporal, that we can not keep, or one which will not be for our best good.

"Abraham gave a tenth of all," so should we. Jacob promised: "And of all that thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth unto thee." So should we make a like promise and fulfill it.

Paul wrote: "Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves." So should we. Again, "whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?"—1 John 3: 17.

Does the love of God dwell in us as it should? If not, why not?

It was from a continued neglect of keeping the temporal law that direction was given Malachi to write these words to ancient Israel: "Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed me. But ye say, Wherein have we robbed thee? In tithes and offerings." This command followed: "Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in my house, and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts."—Malachi 3: 8, 10.

Let every Saint take warning and pay his tithing.

Noah was a preacher, prophet, and an ark builder. What assurance have we, that had we lived in his day, heard the warning, received his instruction to give of our herds, flocks, and other properties for publishing the gospel, building, and furnishing the ark, we would have obeyed! Would we have kept "putting off till a more convenient season" or till death claimed us? Did many in that day "rob God" by not doing their duty till the destructive rain clouds gathered, then beg Noah to receive their offerings when it was too late?

Take warning, dear readers, for the cleansing of the earth by fire is nearing, and Jesus has said: "As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of Man."—Luke 17: 26. In the days of Noah they had wickedness, righteousness, and a prophet of God; we have the same now, and will have when the second cleansing of the earth takes place.

Listen: "Behold, now it is called to-day (until the coming of the Son of Man), and verily it is a day . . . for the tithing of my people; for he that is tithed shall not be burned (at his coming)."—Doctrine and Covenants 64: 5.

To the Reorganization the Lord said in 1861: "In order to place the church in a position to carry on the promulgation of the gospel, and as a means of fulfilling the law, the twelve will take measures in connection with the bishop to execute the law of tithing."—Section 114: 1.

Not only has the Master repeatedly asked us to pay our tithes, but our surplus, freewill offerings, and consecrations as well, for they belong to him: so let us do our whole duty. We should bear in mind that by a constant refusal to obey the temporal law we entertain a spirit of disinterestedness in the church, in all its interests, until infidelity is the result.

Please take warning and do not give, deed, or will property to your children, or to others until you have fully complied with the law of tithes and consecrations, for by complying with the law you teach your children one of the most sacred and blessed gospel lessons in your power to teach them.

Children should be very watchful, also, to have their parents do their whole duty in giving the Lord his share of the property; then the church will prosper as it has never done since the coming of the blessed angel message. Parents should teach their children the great need of complying with the tithing law, teaching them by precept as well as example, and to put from them all doubts, fears, jealousy, and greediness, and instead thereof cherish the inspiring words given through the prophet at the last General Conference: "Be ye encouraged and press on to the consummation designed of God for his people—unity, honor, sanctification, and glory."

Will we press on and receive the glorious blessing? If so, we must obey the temporal law and not rob God.

THE PERSUASIVE POWER OF IDEALS.

Problem: Thumb sucking.

Result sought for: Self-control.

Think the word reversed—control self. So many parents work under the notion that self-control consists in for ever keeping the child working from their will. [Under the parents' will.] The volitional life receives no nourishment when the motive power for control comes continually from the mother.

Primitive Control: Obeying father and mother.

Developed Control: Obeying oneself.

Begin as early as two years to detach the child from thinking that he works from your will. Force upon him the reality that he is self-directing; he will experience a pleasurable sensation. Why? Because he is feeding a legitimate hunger—hunger for power.

Do you remember when your babies gained control over the functions used in walking, that you, realizing their pleasurable emotions, said: "See how proud he is!" This observation should have led you to a consideration of training methods, which would again and again cause this pleasurable emotion in the child, increasing his desire to make all his functions obey him. What him do I mean? The self you are constantly forming by your appeals to his imitative instinct—by the ideals you give him to copy. His control will always bear a definite relation to the ideals furnished. The size of the control will be equivalent to the size of the ideal. For instance, if he has not had held above him the ideal (a desire for developing joy-habits) he will make no attempt to control grief; he will always "hold on to it." No ideal for love awakens no effort to control hate, etc.

As early as possible, call attention to the child's hands and feet and say: "Is it not a lovely thing to have hands and feet all your own?"

Some day when the hands have touched what they ought not, say: "Hullo! Didn't your hands obey you?" Go close to the child, take the hands in yours and say: "Speak to them, dear, tell them, 'No, no.'" Wait until this has been done and then send him back to the forbidden article just to see if this time they will obey him. He will return with an exultant strut and the same pleasurable emotion that made you say—"See, how proud he is!" Teach him to commend his hands, tell him to speak to them and tell them how good they have been. If occasionally they persist in wrongdoing, say: "Well, mother will tie them up for you until they tell you they will mind you." Soon loosen them and watch the result. Make him master his feet in the same way. Begin in very simple ways and then, when he is old enough to go out alone, designate his distance, and then ask him if, when he reaches that point, his feet will turn quickly and obey him. Constantly commend his mastery over hands, feet, and tongue. Tell him how proud you are of them, too. Furnish him with plenty of experiences, as he grows older, for the control of his functions.

Do not put goodies out of his reach or sight. Taste bears a resemblance to the lower passions. The will is molded by experiences. Voyage him safely by making him steer himself through these plastic years, and the experiences of adult life will take care of themselves. After the age of nine, and occasionally between six and seven, experience him in making choices. For instance, the question comes—"Mother, may I do this?" "Yes, if you think it is right." You will nearly always, when a child has had this method used, hear him say—"Well, but I would rather you would tell me I can." "No, you must decide for yourself. I have taught you the way, but now only you can make the decisions. I have to make mine—you must make yours." Give them as many experiences as possible in exercising judgment. They will often fail, but the failure will be only an incentive to deeper thought next time, and consequently better judgment. We grow by action.

My treatment for the thumb sucking is a set of stories, concealed in which are the two processes:

Comparing—reflecting.

Emotional—appeal.

They all contain the principles just outlined in my method for establishing control.

MOTHER NATURE.

Do you remember, Helen, of ever seeing a picture of Mother Goose? Didn't she look comical riding the Goose Bird, wearing a funny hat, and carrying a broom?

I am going to introduce you to another old lady, very much older than Mother Goose but very much nicer, even though she is older. Unlike Mother Goose, no one ever caught her at her housework in time to make a picture of her. No one ever saw her broom, her hat, her cloak, or her steed. Her housekeeping is beautifully done nevertheless. Where is her house, did you say? The whole of this beautiful old world. What is her work? Telling everything what to do and how to do it. When you see the fleecy clouds come closer and closer together, meet, and grow very dark, 'tis the work of this very old lady. When these clouds burst and send their drops down to the thirsty earth, 'tis the work of this same old lady. Want me to tell you her name? Well, wait just a minute. I want to show you first how you and I are a part of her housekeeping.

When you came in the other day from coasting and could hardly eat your supper you were so sleepy, that was the very old lady telling you that your body needed rest. When you are very hungry, there she is again telling you to give your stomach some food. Why, we could never get on without her; she tells the whole world of things that they ought to do—the flowers, the trees, the birds, the bees, the squirrels, the mothers, the fathers, the little girls and boys. Once in awhile the children do not hear her speak; then, the mothers and fathers have to help her out a little—they speak her rules just a bit louder—just a bit clearer.

I guess you are beginning to think this a very wonderful old lady. Well, so she is, for she is everybody's mother. Once, a long time ago, these everybodies had a meeting to talk about this old lady with the rules and all these everybodies named her "Mother Nature."

Now, I am going to tell you a story to-morrow about the way a caterpillar obeyed Mother Nature's voice and what happened because he obeyed.

HOW THE CATERPILLAR WENT TO SLEEP.

First there is a little egg—not like the egg you eat for breakfast, but a queer, tiny thing. After awhile it bursts open and out crawls Mr. Fuzzy-wuzzy Caterpillar. Mr. Fuzzy-wuzzy has sixteen short legs and twelve little eyes.

What will you think when I tell you that Mr. Caterpillar isn't satisfied with his first little warm, hairy coat he has on when he comes out of the egg. No, indeed—he is a fussy little fellow, as well as a Fuzzy-wuzzy. How many coats do you suppose he puts on before he grows to be a big, fat caterpillar? Four! Just think of that! Why, you are quite a big girl and you have hardly had four coats. But, you see he makes them himself and he does not have to sew them.

One day, he hears—whom do you suppose? Mother Nature, of course, saying: "Time to go to sleep. Stop making new coats and make your bed." Out from Mr. Fuzzy-wuzzy comes a thread; it is the beginning of his bed. He winds it round and round himself until he is all covered; then he closes his twelve eyes, cuddles down, and goes to sleep. He sleeps and sleeps in his little home-made bed—not just one night as you do, but ever so many nights. Sleep helps you to grow—sleep helps the caterpillar to grow. When you wake each morning, you are the same, sweet little Helen, only a bit stronger for your sleep. When Mr. Fuzzy-wuzzy wakes, he is not the same queer, fuzzy fellow; his sleep has made him grow and change. Let me tell you how he wakens.

One bright morning he pops his head out of his home-made bedclothes, wriggles a little, and out comes a—butterfly. His wings are wet as if he had just come from a bath. He stretches and dries them, and then he flies away to hunt for the honey in the flowers. Could the caterpillar have ever grown so beautiful if he had not obeyed Mother Nature's voice, made his bed, and gone to sleep?

When the caterpillar heard Mother Nature's voice, did you notice that he had something to do? What was it? Why, he had to do what is a most difficult thing for most people—he had to make himself mind himself; he had to see to it that the thread he made was used, the twelve little eyes closed, and the sixteen little legs were quiet. He did it. All caterpillars can make themselves mind themselves, and that is the reason we have beautiful butterflies. Mother Nature's voice is only a part—the caterpillar must do the rest.

To-morrow I will tell you a story about what Mother Nature said to a sleeping flower.

JULIA AND THE MORNING-GLORIES.

There was once a little girl named Julia. She lived in a pretty, white house in the country. Back of the house was a barn and in the barn were ever so many things that Julia loved,—hens and cows, a pretty white pony that was Julia's very own, and a dear little black kitten. The kitten's name was Fluffy, because she was soft and pretty. Julia just needed Fluffy, too. Why, Helen, if it hadn't been for Fluffy, Julia wouldn't have had anyone to play with. There were no children in Julia's house; only just Father, Mother, and Grandpa, and not a child in any of the houses near. But Fluffy was a fine playmate. I suppose you will think it funny when I tell you she could play ball. Julia would stand at the barn door and throw the ball, and Fluffy would run so fast that she looked like a ball herself; she would almost tumble over.

Now, Julia's pony couldn't play ball, but he could take Julia to ride on his back. Every day Grandpa and Julia went riding, Grandpa on his black horse and Julia on her white pony. They rode very slowly, for Grandpa was old and Julia was a wee, little girl, not much bigger than you are. One day when they were riding along, Julia called—"Whoa!" White pony stopped and Julia said, "Grandpa, please may I get down and look at that flower sticking through the fence?"

Grandpa got off and helped the little girl down. Then he wiped his spectacles so that he could see the flowers, too.

"Oh, Grandpa," called Julia, "something is the matter with it. See—it is all shut up; it must be sick."

Grandpa stooped down over the little girl, looked at the flower, and then began to laugh. The child looked up surprised, and said: "Oh, Grandpa, I shouldn't think you'd laugh at a poor, sick flower!"

"Why, Julia," Grandpa said, "don't you know the difference between a sick flower and a sleeping one? That flower is called a morning-glory. When the sun begins to climb high and stand over our heads, these flowers whisper, each to each—'Good-night—sleep till the light and we'll waken.' Morning-glories. See, child, they are all asleep!"

Grandpa spoke softly as if he might waken them. Julia whispered back: "Grandpa, would they waken if I should pick them open?"

"No, dear, for Mother Nature told them to go to sleep. They always obey her, else they could not waken beautiful in the morning."

The little girl smiled as if she understood, and then she said: "Would they waken if I kissed their closed eyes and patted them just gently?"

"No, Julia."

The little girl bent close and put a kiss upon the pretty petals; gently she patted them; then, looking up to Grandpa, she whispered: "Will you bring me early to-morrow, so I can see them waken morning-glories?"

JULIA MAKES A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.

One day Grandpa and Julia were sitting in the big easy chair on the piazza. Grandpa was almost asleep and Julia's curly head rested on his shoulder. Grandpa's eyes came open—pop!—when Julia wriggled a little and said: "Oh, dear, suz me!" Whenever Julia said—"Dear, suz me," it meant that tears were almost ready to fall, and Grandpa loved his little girl so much that her tears made him very sad.

"Heigho! My sweetheart, what is the trouble?"

"Oh, Grandpa, I wish I had something to mind me. Mother Nature makes the caterpillars, the morning-glories, and everything else obey. Mother makes me mind her, and I haven't anything."

Julia sighed a big sigh, and crept close to Grandpa. Grandpa held her close for a moment, and then he said: "What will you think when I tell you that you have ten babies to mind you, and more—yes, many more, but I'm only going to tell you ten now."

"Oh, goody, goody! Come and show them to me. Are they up in the nursery?" And Julia slid down off Grandpa's lap and tried to pull him up, but Grandpa never moved. He smiled, and drawing Miss Julia back into his lap, he told her to hold up her hands. Up came the ten little fingers, and very slowly Grandpa said: "Tommy Thumb, Peter Pointer, Toby Tall, Reuben Ring, and Tiny Wee Baby."

Julia couldn't remember the names all at once, so they were named over and over. Julia felt so proud and happy. Now she was quite grown up like Mother Nature, Mother, and Grandpa. She sat quite still for awhile, counting them over and over, and then she said to Grandpa: "Will they surely mind me?"

"If you teach them, Julia."

To-morrow I will tell you how Julia began to teach her babies to mind her.

JULIA AND HER BABIES.

Julia had a pretty garden full of lovely bright flowers. One day there was a storm. The wind blew and the rain fell and fell and fell. By and by, the sun came through the clouds. Julia put on her rubbers, and knocking at Grandpa's door, said: "Please take a wee bit of a walk with me."

Grandpa opened the door, put on his hat and spectacles, and together they walked up and down the paths in the garden. Suddenly Julia let go of Grandpa's hand and ran to the little patch of ground where her flowers grew. When Grandpa reached her, she was crying just a little.

"See, Grandpa, the rain has knocked down all the flowers we brought from the woods yesterday!"

"Never mind, little girl. Why, Julia, here is a chance to teach your babies to mind you! Tell Tommy Thumb, Peter Pointer, Toby Tall, Reuben Ring, and Tiny Wee One to get some string and tie the flowers to some little sticks, then they will come up straight and bright again."

Julia stood still, looked at her babies and then at Grandpa. In a moment, she said: "Tommy Thumb says he is tired. Don't you suppose your babies would do it if you asked them?"

"Yes, little girl, they would; for they have minded me a great many years. Do you think, though, that my babies ought to do your babies' work? Julia's garden is work for her babies, isn't it, Julia?"

Julia nodded, and then she said: "Grandpa, I'll take my babies over under that tree and teach them to mind me. You wait here and see what they do."

Grandpa walked away a bit, and Julia took her ten babies under the tree. Grandpa could hear her telling each one that they were not good babies unless they went quickly to mind their mother Julia and fix the garden. Soon the flowers were straight again because Tommy Thumb got the string and Peter Pointer and Toby Tall helped him tie the knots. That was the way Julia began to teach her babies to mind her.

Say to the child immediately—"I have the babies, too, haven't I, Helen? And they mind me every time. When I say to them: 'Helen needs a new dress—be busy,' Tommy Thumb and the others fly until the dress is finished. When I say—'Helen needs some dinner,' away they go, scampering as fast as ever they can. I can understand just how happy Julia felt that day in the garden when she found she also had the power to make herself mind herself.

"Helen, your babies do their work very well, but one of them, Tommy Thumb, is always tumbling into the wrong place, and no one but you can teach him to behave,—no one but you can make him mind. He is not as obedient a baby to you as the caterpillar was to Mother Nature, or as you are to me. When Mother Nature told the caterpillar to go to sleep, to sleep he went. When she spoke to the morning-glories, away they went, even though the other flowers were awake. Could not you make your finger baby mind you? Could not you make him stay in his place with the other fingers when he begins to try to creep up to your mouth? Certainly you can. I know you can for two reasons.—First, because it is never right, even for a little girl, to have any part of her that will not mind her, even so small a part as one of her finger babies. Second, because you love me, and whatever I ask, your love will make you do.—Florence Evans in American Motherhood.

Questions on September Reading.

Where must the motive power come from in self-control? What assistance toward self-control should be given a child at a very early age? What pleasure will thus be conferred upon him? Why is the child proud when he has learned to walk? How may this element in his nature be made to serve the purpose of bringing other functions of his body under his control? How should we appeal to the imitative instinct of the child? What will measure the child's control of himself? What will lessen the habit of grieving over unpleasant things? How will a feeling of responsibility for his hands and feet aid a child in self-control? Toward what should the mother's help be directed? How should his mastery over his members be emphasized? How is the will molded? How can we help a child to steer clear of temptation? With what little things may we commence? What practice in the exercise of his judgment should be given the child? What is the object in the telling of the "Mother Nature" story? What help do you find in the caterpillar story? What purpose is shown in the story of "Julia and the morning-glories?" What principle, stated in the beginning of this article, is exemplified in the story of Julia's discovery? What would be the influence of the last story upon a child? Should a child's love for mother be appealed to as the first reason for making his fingers obey him? What reason should stand first?

The Unseen Cord.

There is an unseen cord which binds
The whole wide world together;
Through every human life it winds—
This one mysterious tether.
It links all races and all lands
Throughout their span allotted;
And death alone unties the strands
Which God himself has knotted.
However humble be your lot,
Howe'er your hands are fettered,
You can not think a noble thought
But all the world is bettered.
With every impulse, deed or word
Wherein love blends with duty,
A message speeds along the cord
That gives the earth more beauty.
Your unkind thought, your selfish deed,
Is felt in farthest places;
There are no solitudes where greed
And wrong can hide their faces.
There are no separate lives; the chain,
Too subtle for our seeing,
Unites us all upon the plane
Of universal being. —Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

True repentance is concerned far more about what we have done to God than what God may do to us.—Western Methodist.

PORTSMOUTH, IOWA, August 4, 1909.

Dear Herald: I feel I am one of the weak ones, yet God has not forgotten me. He has blessed me many times. I have been a member of the church nine years and can truthfully say I do not regret the step I have taken, but feel to thank God that I was led to hear and believe the angelic message.

My husband is not a member of the church and I wish to ask the Saints to remember us that he might be led to believe the truths of the gospel, so that we might be more worthy of the Lord's blessings and raise our three little ones in the service of the blessed Master.

Hoping this may escape the wastebasket, I close, giving room for others whose letters are more interesting. Pray for us.

Your sister,

PATIENCE L. WALKER.

MANGSCHUTZ, PROVINCE SILESIA, GERMANY,

August 4, 1909.

Editors Herald: Since my arrival from America I have spent a few days in Hamburg, Berlin, and Gross-Raschen with Saints and friends. I arrived here July 9, and on the following Sunday held two preaching services, confirmed four, who were previously baptized by Bro. John Smolny, who holds the office of priest. July 15, I baptized a young man with whom I got acquainted about three years ago. He heard me preach when we held meetings at Gross-Raschen, province Bradenburg, where Bro. John Smolny resides. Brother Smolny has been very active in the Master's work. He was the first to spread the truth here in this place. July 17, I baptized two, man and wife, and Sunday, July 18, baptized four, confirmed these four and the other three who were baptized during the week. We had one preaching service; Bro. John Smolny was the speaker, and we had sacrament service. Brother Maluch, from Gross-Raschen, was present also. There were fifteen members present including the writer. The Holy Spirit was felt in our services, especially in the confirmation service, the Spirit indicating that some of the brethren would be called to the priesthood.

Mangschutz is a little village, belonging to the province of Silesia, which borders on Russia. We are about twenty-five miles from the Russian borders. The people speak both German and Polish. The majority of the people here are very poor; nearly all the land belongs to the nobility. Some of the poorer classes rent land; some own from five to twenty acres. They raise mostly rye and potatoes; a little oats and barley. Those who have land keep two or three cows, some have a few goats. They do the work with the cows, and the primitive method is still in use here. Wages are very low, the lowest I know in Germany. A man gets fifty cents per day and has to board himself; women about twenty-five cents, and in winter they get about half that much. The diet consists mostly of rye bread, butter or lard, coffee, potatoes, salt and pickled herring; once in awhile on Sundays they have meat. Meat is quite expensive; a pound of ordinary soup meat costs about twenty-five cents.

When I see how most of the people here have to live and how hard they have to work, and see their condition, I wish that I were able to help them to come over to Joseph's land, where there is an abundance of all good things. The people seem to be honest and industrious. We hope and pray that many will see the light of the gospel and obey, and that we may reach them with the gospel.

We need tracts for distribution. That is about the only way and means we have to reach the people here, and as our tracts are nearly all gone and the Saints here can not raise sufficient money to get more printed, I appeal to the generous American Saints for help, and especially to the German Saints, and those who are interested in the German mission to aid and help us with their means if they can, and to help us in building up the kingdom of our Lord. Every little aid will be thankfully received. Post money orders are absolutely safe, and is the best way of sending money. Address, care of A. Kippe, Roon Lt. 25, Gross-Lichterfelde, West by Berlin, Germany.

PIPECREEK, TEXAS, August 5, 1909.

Editors Herald: Thought I would write a few lines, thinking some might be glad to hear something from the Bandera Branch. This branch has been established many years, and has struggled hard for an existence. It has looked at times like it would go down, never to rise any more, and now it is at a very low ebb; but the few that are left of the branch are hopeful that it will take a turn for the better and take on new life. Much of the time of late years we have been without presiding officers; had no one to take the lead, so have hardly done anything for the good of the branch. Members of the branch are badly scattered. Some have moved to other branches, hence we are but few in number now, and that few are not as lively as they should be.

W. M. Aylor came among us July 9, and preached for us a few times to large and eager crowds. Three were baptized and there are others near the door. Three Books of Mormon were sold, much prejudice removed, and a good interest and large crowds throughout the meeting.

From there Brother Aylor wended his way up the Medina River to Luff to do some preaching. Brother Palmer joined him at that place where they met with the Medina Branch in district conference. Five were baptized at that place. From there they came back to Pipecreek and did some more preaching to increasing crowds. Much interest was manifested in these meetings, which resulted in three others being baptized. There are others that are very friendly toward the work, and think if we can keep the camp fire blazing they will soon be among our number.

We pray that the Lord will soon raise up such material in this branch, as it is badly needed to rebuild and carry on the work here.

Your brother and wellwisher,

F. HODGES.

COCKBURN ISLAND, ONTARIO, August 6, 1909.

Editors Herald: Under the advisement of those in charge of the Canada Mission and by urgent request of the Port Elgin Branch I returned there, after the General Conference, to complete my labors in that branch; four were baptized and one ordained. I felt sad to leave this noble band of God's children, but the General Conference had ordered otherwise, appointing me to the Manitoulin and North Shore mission. Accordingly, after attending the district conference at Saint Thomas, I left home for Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, June 19, arriving Sunday morning, June 20, and remained until July 5, doing what I could to strengthen the Saints in the work. They are ably presided over by J. R. Tomlinson, my baby brother, and are struggling under a heavy church debt, and the church not yet finished.

Leaving July 5, I sailed direct for Manitoulin Island. I was met at the wharf at Manitowanning by W. R. Smith, president of the Manitowanning Branch. He informed me that I was billed to preach a funeral sermon the next day of a young man who had been suddenly killed that day in the mill. The young man was not of our faith, but it was the request of those in charge that I should conduct the service.

It was a very large funeral, the church being filled and a number outside, some of the leading men of the town being present. The best attention was given as I spoke on the justice of an all wise Creator, the calm and gentle Spirit was present giving light, and those who bitterly opposed us in the past were heard to say, "That was one of the best sermons I ever heard in my life." The undertaker came to me and said, "I must congratulate you on your service; I never heard your equal as a speaker on this island."

There have been a great many changes on the Manitoulin since I left four years ago. Our ranks at Manitowanning are almost depleted, and Elder W. R. Smith is quite discouraged, and the writer is at a loss to know what to do to revive the work. These conditions can not be understood unless you are here on the ground, and for that reason I do hope the president of the mission will see his way clear to go over the field in the near future. There is one thing that is quite apparent to the writer, and that is, the missionary in charge should have the right to ordain and regulate all matters in connection with the work. The necessity for this is demonstrated on all sides.

By urgent request of the Walford Saints, which is a small village on the north shore, I left Manitowanning on July 20, arriving that night at Walford. A prayer meeting was held that evening at Bro. Ernest Alicks', a young man of promise, a priest of the church. Special services were arranged for during the remainder of the week and on Sunday I preached the funeral sermon of Sr. Alfred Raveill in the Union Church at Walford. Bro. E. Alicks holds regular services there. In the evening I preached in a schoolhouse about seven miles away in the mountains, to a very small audience, remaining Monday and Tuesday evenings. The interest did not increase, however, so I went back to Walford for the remainder of the week, preaching at the schoolhouse the next Sunday evening. This place is known as the "Smith settlement," and Elder Howlett and his earnest efforts are highly spoken of. We have three members there now. I arrived in this place last night at midnight. I expected Brother McFee to meet me, as I had written him; but the mail miscarried and there was no one to meet me. I was a stranger in a strange land. I asked a man at the wharf if he knew Mr. McFee. He said he did, and that he lived two miles and a half in the country. I wandered around the town and finally met an Indian. I said, "Do you know a Mr. McFee?" He said he did and that he lived straight out on that road. I said, "Is there a Saints' church here?" He said, "It is in the country." I then asked him if there were any members of that church in the town. He said yes, one Tom Campbell, and showed me the house. I soon had Brother Thomas up and my troubles were at an end.

I have administered the ordinance of baptism to six since coming to the mission and I have far more calls for preaching than I can fill. My health is good, with the exception of the affliction that has troubled me for years, catarrh of the head and throat, but I am trying to be cheerful and good, and all who know me know that is quite an undertaking for me.

In bonds,

G. C. TOMLINSON.

District has just closed one of the grandest reunions and spiritual feasts in the history of the district, Notwithstanding the heat of the August sun, all services were well attended, the Lord speaking to us through revelation, and the gift of tongues several times, giving us admonition and encouragement, sufficiently so all can truly say he is a rewarder of those that diligently seek him. Sixteen were baptized and confirmed.

PLEASANT GROVE, UTAH, August 7.

Editors Herald: Our laborers in this field are doing what they can in the interest of truth, and in behalf of the work unto which we have been appointed. The "Jots Man" is in Salt Lake City, Bro. John Davis at Ogden or vicinity, and Bro. L. G. Holloway has been laboring at Provo and in the regions round about.

I learn that the time for our reunion and conference at Provo is set for August 28, at which time we hope to meet as many of the Saints of this mission as may find it practicable to attend.

I came to this place a few days ago, having previously labored in Provo, Sandy, West Jordan, Salt Lake City, and Ogden. I find only a few Saints left in this place, as a number have moved away, chiefly to Independence, Missouri. We miss their associations, but trust they are prospered and blessed in their homes in the center stake of Zion.

I am interested in the grand and good work intrusted to us, and hope for final victory.

Yours in the conflict,

H. N. HANSEN.

Why I am a Member of the Reorganized Church.

With your consent, I would like to answer, through your columns, the question asked by Bro. Delmont C. Rottey, in HERALD, July 28, 1909.

First. I am a member of this Reorganized Church because I know by the power of the Holy Ghost (which is the Spirit of truth) that it is the true church of Christ and that we have the gospel in its fullness, the only plan whereby man can be saved, and the only plan that will be given. If I did not know this to be true, I would not belong to this church.

Second. I can not prove to the Saints or to the world that I have this knowledge given me by the power of God, unless by his Spirit he bears witness that I speak the truth to them, but Jesus said, "If ye love me you will keep my commandments." I am trying to keep them the best I can. Jesus said, "Ye know the tree by the fruit it bears." I am trying to bear the right kind of fruit, gentleness, goodness, long-suffering, patience, charity, meekness, and love. Jesus said, "By their works shall ye know them." I am trying to do my part of the work, in short I am trying to live the gospel, trying to overcome the flesh; trying to bring self under subjection to God's will and law; trying to be a living epistle known and read among men; trying to live true to my convictions, true to self and God; trying to prove to the world that that which I claim to be true is the living truth.

I know that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and love him for what he has done for me, and I am trying to prove to him and the world that I love and believe in him, by keeping his commandments, that he and others will not think I am a liar and the truth not in me.

Since obeying the gospel in its fullness, my life will bear me witness that I have tried to live acceptably before God, the best I could, but I have no other power of proving the truth to the brother, only as stated. "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven," are words of the Master.

If you have any other proof please submit it. I am willing to learn all I can. Intelligence is the glory of God; the more I know the better I can serve him.

I talked with some Utah elders last summer and they certainly try to make the people believe they are the reorganized people. One of the elders said to me, "You people are always anxious to tell we teach polygamy and that there are two sets of people." I replied, "Sure we are anxious for the people to know the difference, and if you had the truth, you would be anxious to tell the difference also." I hope some of our elders will come to this place this summer and preach; two would be kept busy I am sure. Street preaching here is very popular during the summer season and it is worth a trial.

Yours in the faith,

MRS. HELEN SHERWIN.

PHILIPSBURG, MONTANA, August 15, 1909.

Editors Herald: There are a number of errors in my autobiography. Two or three of them are of a nature that I will ask you to make a note of them. In thirteenth line from top of page 745, first column, read Cave instead of Cove Island. In the fifteenth line you have added the personal pronoun I. This gives the writer the honor that belongs to Elder Pickering. Beginning eleven lines from bottom of same column it should read: "On about the 15th of August at our meeting, a contention arose, over which he got stabbed with a knife on the night of the 23d. He became," etc. The way you have it punctuated he was stabbed on the 15th at our meeting, whereas the facts are he was stabbed on the night of the 23d while I was away.

Very respectfully,

THEODORE, ALABAMA, August 16, 1909.

Dear Herald: I certainly do enjoy reading the HERALD and especially the letters and Mothers' Home Column. I realize that we Latter Day Saints are becoming more and more of one heart and mind. I am thankful in my heart that we have the gospel light along our pathway and can know to our own satisfaction that we are engaged in the true work of God. The happiest moments of my life are spent in the gospel. Joy, peace, and happiness come to me when I am humble and obedient to the requirements of the gospel; that is worth more to me than anything this world can afford.

There is much responsibility resting on us who have found the glorious gospel as was taught in former days. I can realize with the other Saints that there is no time for idleness in the gospel. I also know that I am one of the weakest of his children and can not live as I should unless strengthened and upheld by the Holy Spirit. Clouds of darkness overshadow our pathway at times and we feel that we are unable to meet the battles of life and can not bear our cross in a Christianlike manner; but we have sought God in prayer and asked him to banish these clouds or rather give us strength to overcome all evil, and he has always been near us in such times of need. I find that trials, and even troubles are good for us, for they cause us to see the great need of being humble and prayerful at all times, and ever submitting ourselves to the Father's will.

Brn. Slover, Chute, G. W. Sherman, and N. L. Booker have preached some noble sermons for us of late, which I believe will be of lasting benefit to us. I know that we are the happiest people in the world, when we live as we should, for we have a love within our souls for all people that we can not have only in the gospel of Christ. My prayers are that we will ever be faithful to the covenant we have made and prove that we love Christ by keeping his commandments.

Pray for us, dear Saints, that we may be all that we should be, and also be able to raise our dear little babes under the gentle influence of the gospel that in the years to come they may be workers for the good Master. The Sunday school and Religio are still on the move in the Theodore Branch.

My letter is getting too long, so I'll close for fear it finds its way to the wastebasket. Much love to all the Saints.

Your sister in the one faith,

MRS. OSCAR TILLMAN.

EAST INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, August 16, 1909.

Editors Herald: I feel like I ought to bear my testimony to your readers. I have suffered with my head since 1884. At times I have hardly known what I was doing, as my head and back gave me so much pain I could not sleep nor rest. About three years ago I said I would not doctor any more, and if it was the Lord's will I would patiently bear the pain. Since then these troubles have been gradually leaving me, and though I am very deaf, as a result, I can stand that, for I believe it is God's will, and he will give me my hearing when it is best that I shall receive it.

When I read of those who can not go to church, I sometimes wonder if they are not better off than one who goes every Sunday and can not hear.

To those who are afflicted let me say, Put your trust in God, and if you do not get the blessing you ask, it may be best for you, as I know is the case with me.

My greatest desire now is to do what will be the best for God's work. I hold no ill feeling for anyone, and if any have wronged me I feel I would rather it would be so than for me to have wronged them. I want to make all my wrongs right.

I want all the Saints to pray that I may have my hearing if it is God's will.

F. T. DOBIE.

BICKNELL, INDIANA, August 19, 1909.

Editors Herald: I have lived here two and a half years. There are three more Saints here who came from Nelsonville, Ohio: Brother Rogers and two sisters. After the 25th of the present month there will be three more. To the elders in charge of the work in the Southern Indiana District, we would like you to come, as there are some very near the kingdom here, and if the proper effort is made I believe there can be a branch started. We can get a small tent to hold services in and I will help in the meetings, as I am a priest. I have been scattering tracts and instructing the people as the opportunity presented itself, and so has Brother Rogers. The prospects are good for an ingathering. Hoping to see some of the elders soon,

Your brother in gospel bonds,
ROBERT GRIEVE.

ELKHORN, WISCONSIN, August 22, 1909.

Editors Herald: I have just finished reading the article by Bro. T. W. Williams, in HERALD for August 18: "Joseph Smith's first vision." It is grand. I like the tenor of the brother's argument. And like myself, while he can not say by an actual knowledge that Joseph Smith saw an angel, the greatest witness he could bear either to his divine call or the truthfulness of his message, was to so live, teach, and act that others coming in touch with him would be constrained to feel and sense the divinity which comes in exemplifying the message which he gave to the world.

Having been in this church seventeen years and fifteen of those years spent as a teacher; and having repeatedly heard members affirm that they knew Joseph Smith to be a prophet, etc., and then seeing those members up and down in the work continually, has brought sorrow and disgust. I have never prayed for the Lord to show me if Joseph Smith was a prophet or if he saw an angelic messenger. Neither shall I. I have heeded the admonition of the Savior wherein he says, "If any man will do his will he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself," and I can truthfully say this has been verified in my behalf.

Ever praying for the onward move of God's work, and that we may be found doers of the word and not hearers only,

Your brother in the gospel,
F. M. BALL.

News From Branches

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

All goes nicely with us here. We are moving ahead slowly but surely, and losing no ground. We very much enjoy meeting in our own church building, where all is clean and pure; a great relief after meeting so long in hired halls, used for all kinds of services. We are enjoying a good Spirit in all our assemblies. The preaching is good, encouraging, and elevating, and we are earnestly engaged in spreading the truth and helping the cause.

With Sunday school and Religio, etc., we hold four services every Sunday and two or three during the week. Our cottage meeting is held Tuesday evening, where we get a chance to tell the gospel story to some who might not come to the church. Our branch officers are active and earnest, setting a good example to the members who are willing to be equally vigilant.

We have just had the pleasure of a visit by President F. M. Smith and wife. This city and Oakland had the opportunity of hearing him preach, and also were favored with his illustrated lecture on the life of Christ. They have now left us, continuing their journey northward, up the coast.

Our missionaries are all busy in the field. J. M. Terry, district president, is well again, and proclaiming the "good news" in different parts of the district, cheering the Saints and instructing and warning those not of the faith. The health of the Saints here is generally good, their faith strong, and their efforts commendable.

GEORGE S. LINCOLN.

CENTRAL CHICAGO.

Sunday, August 15. Not as large attendance as usual at Sunday school; better at services. Memorial sermon by Elder Arthur Allen in honor of Patriarch Alexander H. Smith. Many interesting events narrated, and many good thoughts suggested. One that we should live day by day prepared for the summons to depart, and that our good deeds may live on and on after our earthly pilgrimage has ended. Exceedingly oppressive day, until about 6.30, when a cool breeze visited the south part of the city, and we understand there was quite a shower on the north side.

Elder Pement occupied the pulpit in the evening.

Monday evening was the occasion of quite a pleasant gathering at our church, the object being the presentation of a purse to Elder Arthur Allen from the Chicago and West Pullman Saints. The West Side and West Pullman members were expected to attend, but through some misunderstanding of the presidents of the branches, we did not have the pleasure of enjoying a social time with our neighbors. Light refreshments were served after the presentation speech by Brother Burwell, of Hammond, and fittingly responded to by Elder Allen.

Wednesday evening prayer meeting small in attendance but a good spirit, and we can surely testify that God fulfills his promise, that where only a few are gathered in his name, there will he be and that to bless. Delegates elected to the Plano conference were Elder Pement, Brother Wainwright, Srs. Ethel Pement, Cora Keir, and Florence Wainwright, conference convening on Saturday, August 28.

The reunion at Plano, Illinois, will convene on Friday, August 13, continuing over one week. We hope and pray for a good attendance and that many will be benefited.

Bro. Alexander Keir, brother of Henry Keir, with his family, has located on the South Side at 6434 Lincoln Avenue, which we hope will swell our attendance. The son and daughter are quite musical, and they will be a valuable addition to our Sunday school ranks.

We just desire to quote one verse, which may be of benefit to some one:

"Just for to-day what more can heart demand,
From one who will each longing understand
Thy love withholds no treasure, so I pray
'Choose what may come, but give me strength to-day.'"

ALICE CARY SCHWARTZ.

6549 MARSHFIELD AVENUE.

SAINT LOUIS, MISSOURI.

Our sacrament service was enjoyed because of the calm, sweet Spirit's presence. Brethren Archibald, Cooke, Beaird, and Rhodes presided over the services.

We were all pleased to see Srs. R. DeJong and J. J. Bilinsky present, they have been ill so long.

Words of encouragement and instruction were received through Brethren Masten, Elliott, Archibald, and Tanner the past month.

The regular branch priesthood meeting was held the evening of August 16.

Our pastor and wife and daughter attended the Springerton, Illinois, reunion and report excellent interest and attendance. Brother Tanner has been attending to work in Voshall and Linn branches the past week.

We have been having some sickness because of the extreme recent heat.

We regret very much the sudden demise of our beloved Bro. Alexander Smith. His worthy life will long live in the memories of the Saints. May God's blessing comfort and strengthen his loved ones in their hour of trial, is our sincere prayer.

Our Sunday school and Religio are moving along fairly well, considering the hot weather and many being away from time to time on vacations.

Your sister in Christ,
E. M. PATTERSON.

Died.

GUYATT.—Edward Guyatt was born at Fort Madison, Iowa, January 15, 1885, being at the time of his death, 23 years, 6 months, and 1 day old. He was a member of the Reorganized Church, being baptized by Elder F. M. Weld, March 5, 1897, in which faith he continued to the end. At about the age of twelve years, he left school to help sustain his widowed mother and sisters, which he did with all diligence of a loving son and brother. Since that time he has sought honest employment at different places in the locality in which he lived. His last employment began in March last, for the Burlington Railroad, where he served faithfully and diligently until Friday, July 16, when he was accidentally run over by the cars, causing death about four hours later. He is survived by his mother, Mrs. Mary Guyatt, and two sisters, Ruby Guyatt, and Mrs. Edith Cooper, and a host of friends. Funeral services were held at the family home, Monday, July 19, Elder George P. Lambert officiating.

Race Suicide a Blessing.

Once more Dr. Woods Hutchinson has come to the rescue of our much-abused civilization. In September Woman's Home Companion, he points out that not only are all wrong about the race-suicide problem, but there isn't any.

According to Doctor Hutchinson, the whole question is befogged by misconceptions. He says the question is not a new one, but is very old. An increasing population is a sign of civilization. As for our immediate forefathers, they can claim no credit for large families, for they either gave no thought to the question at all, or else welcomed children as future bread-winners.

"To sum up," he says, "I believe that the evidence is conclusive that race suicide, so far as it has yet gone, has proved an almost unmixing blessing instead of a curse; that the race can never again return to the method of blind and wholesale reproduction without thought of the future. No class or group in the community which believes itself worthy to exist can of course view with equanimity any proposal to limit the offspring of marriage to less than three, or such number as may be necessary to secure the survival of that quota to adult age, so that the second generation may be at least a trifle more numerous than the first.

"On the other hand, biologic morality, while depreciating the production of children, who are likely to be born unfit, or become so from lack of proper support and training, glorifies and exalts as both the highest racial duty and the most precious individual privilege the bearing of children by those who are personally fit to bear and financially competent to rear such as shall be of value to the state. There is no achievement better worth living for, no more valuable legacy that can be left to the future, no more enduring claim to honorable remembrance, than a family of well-born, well-reared children.

"At the same time there is a growing tendency to encourage and promote in every possible way the marriage at a reasonably early age of young people, who are particularly desirable as future ancestors, to use a Hibernicism. Some day possibly we may become sufficiently intelligent to endow this sort of matrimony with state funds. At all events, an intelligent direction of race fertility, by selection of parents and rational limitation of the number of children, will be the path of future progress."

"Coöperation is one of the greatest forces of life, by, with, and through which deeds amounting to miracles are performed, and the lack of which writes ruin in capital letters on the minute books of roganizations, associations or corporations large or small, and measured by the degree that coöperation exists, can success be determined. We might say that coöperation is the result of inspiration, and inspiration comes as a result of concentration of thought and energy, but however this may be, coöperation is essential to success in organization."

"We should always take it for granted that God is present in the meeting, whether any of the leading members are there or not."

We have a correspondent in New York who underscores at least half his words. He thinks it strengthens them and gives them force. He is entirely mistaken. He does so much of it that nearly everything being emphasized the marks cease to be distinctive, the unitalicized becoming, if anything, the most noticeable to the eye and mind. When emphasis is so common that it ceases to be distinctive, it is no longer emphasis. Some writers seem to have discovered the fact that the day of italicizing words in letters and articles has entirely passed. So much is it out of vogue that in many of the printing shops containing new outfit one can not find such letters for use.—Southern Presbyterian.

Watch against any fallacies in your ideas which may arise, not from disingenuousness, but from allowing yourself in moments of feeling to think vaguely, and not to attach precise meaning to your words. Without any cold caution of expression, it is a duty we owe to God's truth, and to our own happiness, and the happiness of those around us, to think and speak as correctly as we can. Almost all heresy, schism and misunderstandings, between either churches or individuals who ought to be one, have arisen from this fault of an involved and vague style of thought.—The Reformed Church Messenger.

"A Michigan university professor announces that 'true religion can not be found in the church' or in the Bible. 'We must apply to our religious consciousness, even if in the process we lose Christianity.' The man who gets off such nonsense ordinarily has no Christianity to lose. His worship of the inner consciousness is simply the gospel of self-conceit."

God wants work of us. He is working. He offers his power to us if we will work with him. Greater deeds than have ever been done do not wait upon his willingness, but upon our obedience.—R. E. Speer.

"Winning converts to Christ calls for working for their growth and development in the Christian life. Babes left without proper care perish. Robust Christians can not be had without some concern and care on the part of the people of God."

We rather dislike the phrase "the new gospel" just as we rather dislike the phrase "the old gospel." The better phrase is "the gospel." The good news proclaimed by Christ's disciples is still good news. It is the old, and it is always the new gospel.—Standard.

A man may seem to be winning souls to Christ, and it may be really only to himself, or a theory, or a party.—A. N. Gilbert.

THE OPEN DOOR.

SERMON BY ELBERT A. SMITH, AT INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, MAY 1, 1909; REPORTED BY MARIE MORGAN.

The subject that I have selected for the morning's discourse is "The open door," suggested by Revelation 3: 8 where the statement is made: "Behold, I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it." In connection with that text I want to use the closing words of the revelation given to the church at our recent conference: "So be ye encouraged and press on to the consummation designed of God for his people—unity, honor, sanctification, and glory."

The text I have cited your attention to, as you are aware, was addressed to the church at Philadelphia, and the language is, "Behold, I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it." But I believe it has a special application to us, as well, at this juncture of our history. Those who are familiar with the conditions that surround the church now, and that which was given us at our recent conference, will agree with me that God has set before us an open door; and I don't believe that any man can close it.

Thursday night when I returned to the place where I am stopping, they told me that Brother Harrington wanted me to call him up on the phone; that he wanted me to speak here Sunday morning. I thought the matter over. I wondered what there was that I could present here in this center of religious culture and instruction that would be of interest to the people; and this text I have read to you came into my mind like a ray of light (a text that I have never preached on before, and have given little thought to) and I thought, If God wants me to give that message to this people, I will give it to them. So the next morning, when I called Brother Harrington up, he said, "Will you preach Sunday morning?" and I replied, "Yes," and I heard him chuckle when he hung the receiver up because I had said yes so promptly, but I had been thinking it over during the night.

"Behold, I have set before thee an open door; and no man can shut it." I don't care to give you any oratory, or paint any pictures, but if I can make you see that open door this morning, I shall be satisfied. Did you ever stop to think of the difference there may be between an open door and a closed door? At one time I went through the penitentiary at Fort Madison, Iowa, and saw what I could of the conditions existing there. I saw the inmates at their labor. I was especially impressed in the workshop, where they were manufacturing pitchforks, where there were a number of desperate-looking colored criminals working, in the glare of the furnaces, and the scene was almost diabolical. But the thing most impressive was the sleeping quarters of these men. There were long corridors with rows of doors like pigeon holes. These doors were barred with iron, and on looking into these rooms we found there was just room for a little cot and washstand, and I tried to imagine what it would be like to be shut in there; to spend days and weeks there and never to escape,—stone walls pressing in on every side and above and below. When the doors of the great outer stone wall surrounding the prison again opened I realized what an open door might mean: we could go out. There were men in there for life and they couldn't go out. The man who let us out couldn't go out himself; he was a trusty.

Not long ago I was present at one of the higher courts of the church, and a young man appeared before that tribunal to plead his cause. He wanted permission to be baptized into the church again. He had been cut off, and for eight years he had been pleading for the chance to come in again. The plea presented was very touching. He said, "Brethren, I have had no rest by night or by day, neither of body nor of mind." There was a man who faced a closed door, and when it was opened, his heart was filled with joy: That was an individual case.

Travelers who have been to Jerusalem tell us that there is an immense stone wall there, a part of the old temple built by Solomon. Every Friday for centuries past the Jewish people have congregated there, and it is called the Place of Wailing, or Lamentation. Their mourning is not formal, because their hearts are really sad. They read passages of scripture; their eyes are overflowed with tears, and, according to Mr. Stoddard, the traveler, and lecturer, the words of the prayer that they utter are like this: "We are become a scorn and derision to our neighbors. O, Lord, behold, we are thy people. We are brought very low, but remember not our iniquities for ever. In thy tender mercies redeem us, O, Lord."

There was a nation that had the greatest privilege ever given to any people, many centuries ago. Christ came to them, and he was of their own flesh and blood. There was Jewish blood in his veins. One of their own women was his mother. He came to them, and gave to them the greatest opportunity ever given to men, and they turned away, wherefore he said unto them, "Thy house is left unto thee desolate." For nineteen hundred years they have faced a closed door, and their prayers and lamentations have gone up. It will not last for ever; the gospel will go to them again, and it is possible there are young men in this congregation who will take it, but I trust, realizing now that we have also the opportunity that was given to them, in a gospel sense, there will be no place of lamentation awaiting us in our future history.

I believe that the thing we need to do now is to move forward in harmony with the words of the revelation I have just quoted to you: "Be encouraged and press on." The eyes of the Saints everywhere are resting upon the people, especially at this place, and the thing to do is for us to get down on a business basis with this church proposition and get to work and cease dreaming and singing so much about the glories of Zion, but get to work and seek to realize some of them. Those who come here want to be self-reliant, and reliant on God,—energetic and busy.

Now, pardon me if I go off on a tangent. At our house we have a flock of hens. There are twenty of them, and my wife has kept account of the expense of keeping that flock of hens. She has kept account of all the eggs used and sold, stock on hand, increase, and all that sort of thing. She did that for nine months, and we discovered that in nine months we had cleared thirteen cents. Now, you see, there is an opening for anyone with a million hens to make a good living, and keep busy too. But we also have two or three little bantams that belong to my little boy. He makes money with those chickens. I'll tell you how: I bought the hens for him. I buy the feed for them. I pay him for the eggs. He eats the eggs.

When I was making the chicken house for them, after I had worked on it for several hours, he inspected the work and said, "What, haven't you got that done yet? Why, I could make that in half the time."

The point is here: There are some people wanting an inheritance in Zion who are willing and anxious to accept of it, but they expect the Bishop to buy the hens, furnish the feed, pay for the eggs, and let them eat the eggs, while they stand around and nurse some project of their own, and say, "Haven't you got Zion redeemed yet? Why, I could do it in half the time." Now, you think of it and see if it isn't true about some of our people.

I remember at one of our reunions, between meetings we were having a long discussion on the side, as we have sometimes, and one of our discontented brothers who has a hobby to ride, began to complain about the leaders of this church. He says, "Why don't they go ahead and do something; get something started; get Zion redeemed and get something ready for the people? Why, I sent on an article to the HERALD years ago explaining it all, but it never was published." One of our blunt missionaries turned to him and said, "If Zion were redeemed now are you fit to go there?" The brother said, "No," and it was true, too. He was a married man, having a good time with the girls, and making the life of his wife a burden. I think his wife would appreciate the sentiment of the other woman who on her marriage day gave her husband a book entitled, The Perfect Gentleman; and two years later she gave him one entitled, Wild Animals I have Known. He was that kind of a man in the home. He was complaining because Zion wasn't redeemed when he wasn't fit to go there at all.

What we need is workers. We need consecration. We need people who don't want to come here and expect to have everything done for them. The only man who can claim an absolute living without effort is the man who is absolutely disabled.

Every man who comes should be ready to add to the strength of Zion; if he is not so ready let him not find fault with others. Now I shall seek, if I can, to impress you with a comprehension of the scope and extent of the work that lies before us, suggested by this thought of the open door that now confronts us. What is the work of this church? At the recent conference our aged President said that we had two things to do: first, to carry the gospel to all the world; and second, to prepare in Zion a people for the coming of our Lord. Now, do you realize what a wonderful thing that is,—to preach the gospel to all the world and to prepare a people for the coming of our Lord? Do you realize what a wonderful thing it is; what an open door there is before us, to be message bearers in the name of Christ, and to prepare a people for the coming of our Lord? I tell you candidly, I would rather be a member of this church and one of the people than to occupy any other position in the world. I would rather be that than to be John D. Rockefeller. He will die some day and go where they can't handle oil, but I trust that there awaits us a better proposition than to be that. To be a member in the church of Christ is the highest honor ever given to any man in the history of the world,—absolutely the highest.

The next day after our conference closed at Lamoni, a good sister came into my room in the Herald Office and said, "I want to shake hands with President Smith," and it had a peculiar effect on me. I suppose it should have made me feel big and important, but instead it made me feel small and foolish, and I said, "Sister, please leave off the titles." She said, "All right; I want to shake hands with Brother Elbert." That sounded better, because "Brother" is the best title in all the catalogue of titles. That covers it all.

Bro. John Smith, the president of our Lamoni Stake, uttered a truism when he said that the highest position in this church is to be a member in good standing. That in one sense is not absolutely true, because some positions are perhaps higher than others, in one sense; but in another sense, and a better one, it is absolutely true, because our moral condition determines our altitude, and to be a member in good standing is better than to be an officer in poor standing. You will agree with me on that, and that shows us that it is the work the man is doing and his spiritual condition that determines whether or not he is high or low.

I don't mean one against whom there are no charges preferred; one whose name is on the church books, but a member in good standing; one who can look his Christ in the face, if need be, and say, "I am doing the best I can," and it is given to each one of us, to be a member in good standing, and help preach this gospel to all the world.

Now, someone may say, "I am not a preacher; I am a merchant, or a farmer, or a mechanic; and so I can not preach the gospel"; but there is where you make your mistake. We have been commanded that we shall preach this gospel or prosecute the work of preaching it as far and widely as we can, and we are told that we are all laborers together in that work. How? Why, let me tell you. Not long ago one brother in Lamoni was advising and counseling another brother. He said, "You must be contented and satisfied to live on the allowance you are receiving, because we must make a sacrifice in this work. You are laboring in the interest of the church, and you must sacrifice, and your reward will be sure." That advice was good, but the trouble with it in that case was simply this: The man who gave the advice has money put by for future use and draws a salary of one hundred and twenty-five dollars a month, and the man whom he was advising is living on forty dollars a month and has to rent his house and feed and clothe his family out of that allowance. The advice didn't go down worth a cent. If that man actually believed in sacrifice he could have placed himself on a level with that missionary, by contributing of his surplus, over and above that of the other for the good of the cause, and I wish some of our well-to-do men in Lamoni and elsewhere would place themselves somewhere near that basis. If they would, we could raise the allowance of the missionaries' families a little bit because they don't get enough and can't get out of debt to save their souls.

When it comes to talking about sacrifice some of us don't know what sacrifice means. We won't sacrifice unless we are paid for it. It is the elders' families who know what sacrifice is. The man who leaves his home, whose little children grow up and hardly know him; the wife who stays at home and sacrifices the care of her husband, his protection, advice, counsel, support;—they are the ones who know what sacrifice means.

Now, brethren, you are no better than these missionaries are. Your wife is no better than theirs. If you are as good, you are pretty well along in spiritual development. You will pardon me for being earnest in this matter. No, you needn't pardon me, either. I will never ask any man's pardon for being in earnest in this work, for we are commanded to be earnestly engaged, and I think the compliment I prize above all others was given me by an old German brother in Burlington, who had listened and sat in silent judgment on me for nearly four years and finally, when I was leaving, he said, "Brother Smith, I hates to see you leave. What we likes about you is that you mean every word you say." I prize that because I do mean what I say, and believe this is the greatest work and the greatest prize ever offered to any people or class of individuals.

The statement is made in the text I have read that the door is open and that no man can close it. It is in harmony with a statement made, I think, in the eighth chapter of Romans, where Paul says that neither life nor death, powers nor principalities, nor any other creature, can separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus. I want to cite you to the history of this church in the days of exile when they confronted a closed door, and the door was closed for many years, and why? We are told in section 98 that it was because of their transgressions, and the statement is made that there were among them contentions and envyings and strife and lustful and covetous desires by which they polluted their inheritance, and for that, the door was closed. Instead of succor, their enemies came against them and hindered them. Their enemies would have been powerless if they had been fully confirmed in their service to God. The door was closed, but to-day, we stand in the age when the promise made them is being fulfilled, that Zion should not be moved out of

SOME ILLITERATE CRITICS OF JOSEPH SMITH.

The Boston Traveler, August 30, and the New York Times, August 28, contain leading editorials on the vexed subject of Joseph Smith.

Both writers say that he was brutally illiterate. The similarity of the language suggests that the paper of the later date, The Traveler, borrowed its ideas from the New York Times, something as they charge Joseph Smith with borrowing the Book of Mormon from Spalding.

The editorials are full of blunders. For instance, The Traveler says he organized the Mormon church in 1833, in Ohio. It is a fact well known to most writers that he organized his church April 6, 1830, in New York State. The statement is also made that he started a bank in Kirtland, Ohio, and flooded the country with worthless bank notes for which he was tarred and feathered in 1832. The truth is that the bank was not started until January, 1837, nearly five years after the time when he and Sidney Rigdon were tarred and feathered. To cap the climax this ignorant beaneater says that Joseph Smith was killed at Carthage, Missouri.

There are so many blunders in the editorial that the fact is clearly shown that the writer knew nothing of the subject on which he wrote. Yet he calls Joseph Smith ignorant. We do not know what "brutal" illiteracy is, but it must include such mutilation of facts as we have noted.

The editorial in the New York Times is along similar lines, and contains the startling information that Smith was killed at Carthage, Ohio, by a "furiously moral mob." A "furiously moral" mob! It is the New Yorker's idea that a mob may become furiously moral.

Now any common school history, the very commonest kind would have informed these writers that Joseph Smith was killed at Carthage, Illinois. All confidence in such articles is destroyed by the conviction that absolutely no effort was made to ascertain facts. Such editorial writers who draw a salary and profess to enlighten the public are liable to prosecution for obtaining money under false pretences.

COLLEGE OPENING.

The fifteenth annual opening of Graceland College was Tuesday, September 7. An appropriate program of exercises was rendered in which various members of the faculty and others participated, and to which the public was invited. There was the annual opening address, by Elder Heman C. Smith, which was reported and will be published in the HERALD.

The indications are for a large enrollment, and we shall not be surprised if the number should exceed any fall term in its history.

The Board of Trustees have secured the services of Ernest B. Blett, Farwell, Michigan, as superintendent of the college farm, who will remove his family to Lamoni this fall. He also brings with him his poultry journal, Poultry Pointers, to be published under his auspices from the college farm. The subscription price to this very neat and valuable little monthly magazine is twenty-five cents per year. Every farmer and every lover of poultry should send in his subscription to Poultry Pointers. Until further notice send to R. J. Lambert, Secretary of Board of Trustees.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

We learn by telegram that Sr. F. M. Sheehy passed away at Brunswick, Maine, Sunday, August 29. Brother Sheehy was with her. The news reached us too late for publication last week. The year is not far spent and yet the death roll in church circles grows alarmingly.

The last two weeks were marked by several important events. On August 27, at Reims, France, Henry Farnum broke all records for long distance flying in an aeroplane, and on the next day Glenn H. Curtiss, at the same place established a new record for twelve miles with his biplane. On August 30, the Norwhal, United States submarine boat, broke all speed records for submarine boats. September 1 brought announcement that Dr. Frederick A. Cook, of Brooklyn, New York, had reached the North Pole on April 21, 1908. On September 2, the Cunard liner, Lusitania, broke the trans-Atlantic record, reaching port four days, eleven hours, and forty-two minutes out from Queenstown.

The report of Doctor Cook's discovery of the North Pole seems to be true. The doctor is nearing Copenhagen, where he will be given an enthusiastic reception. We will give HERALD readers an extended account of this discovery when reports are fully authenticated.

Doctor Cook has put a quietus on any idea that the Ten Tribes are at the North Pole.

The Lamoni Stake reunion closed Sunday night, and has been a success in every particular. A complete report will be given next week.

"And though your work may be small, make it as great as you can! 'The real worker,' declared Joseph Parker, 'never says, 'How little can I do?' but always 'How much can I do?'" In the church there are, even yet, sadly few ambitious souls. It is better to speak convincingly the praises of Jesus than to win cases before a jury or carry a bill through a senate. It is better to discover new ways of reaching souls with God's truth than to discover the North Pole. It is better to win one victory over evil than to conjure the most brilliant army ever brought into the field."

THE OPEN DOOR.

her place and that her children should return with songs of everlasting joy, to build up the waste places in Zion. The door is open for us again, and no man can close it. If it is closed we will close it ourselves.

It was the same in Nauvoo. The Lord gave them an opportunity, but warned them and told them that if they did not execute the work in the time it should be accomplished, they would be rejected; and in the same revelation he says, "By your own works you bring curses instead of blessings."

Well, you know what the result was, of their hardships and of the evil temptations to which they yielded. It culminated in the great apostasy, and the door was closed for many years, but later it began to swing open, and I believe that to-day, as a church, we stand on a higher place, and our prospects are brighter than they ever have been since that date. It remains for us, then, as a people, standing where we do, to heed the mistakes we have made in the past and avoid them in the future. Are there contentions and jarrings and strifes among us to-day? Are there lustful and covetous desires? If there are, then I say it is time for us to repent as individuals. I know that during the recent conference we heard it is said that we should not preach repentance to the church because it wasn't needed. I believe sometimes it is needed. Our busy church courts show the need of it; our brethren who constantly labor with those in transgression can testify of its necessity, and we need to cry repentance still, and urge the people that they should press on in the accomplishment of the work in their care.

The second text, taken from the revelation given at our conference at Lamoni during the past month, contains words like this: "So be ye encouraged." I am glad the Lord told us to be encouraged. Not long before the conference convened, I was talking with one of our brethren who said to me, "I know that God revealed to me that this church is in darkness." I thought then that when one man sets himself up against the church and says he is in the light and everybody else is in darkness, that man is in danger; but when the Lord spoke he said, "Be encouraged." Don't be so pessimistic, doubtful, and fearful, but press on in the consummation of all that God designed for his people, unity, honor, sanctification, and glory.

The Lord knows all about this work. He knows the present condition of the church. He knows the Bishopric, the Presidency, the Twelve. He knows our financial condition. He knows more about the work in a minute than you do in a year; and he says to be encouraged and press on.

I believe we should become more united as a people. The Lord says in this revelation that we have made some progress in the past year towards unity, and I trust we have, and I hope in our discussions of differences that we will have a unity of spirit if not of opinion.

You notice here he says, we shall press on toward the consummation, unity, honor, and glory. Unity, then, in the absolute sense, is to be a consummation. We can not expect it right now. We must approach it by degrees. That is, absolute unity, of opinion. We have men of so many different characteristics and surroundings, and new members coming in constantly, that it is inevitable that we will see things differently for some time to come, but we can have, if we will, unity of spirit and desire,—the desire that truth shall prevail and nothing else.

We don't have charity enough for each other in our consideration of differences. During the late conference one of our brethren who is sometimes considered as something of an extremist, came to me and said, "Brother Elbert, I have reached the conclusion that I am a conservative." I said to him, "My brother, that is the most radical conclusion you ever reached."

A little later he heard me preach and said, "I have reached the conclusion you are a radical."

I replied, "I presume you are conservative in that conclusion."

How reconcile these statements? In this way: In the presentation of our pet theories we are all radical, but in listening to the theories of our neighbors we are all extremely conservative.

I was struck, recently, in reading one of the lectures of John L. Stoddard, the traveler and lecturer, with his statement that the people usually conceive the Devil to be quite different from them. We are white, so we think the Devil is black. But a European traveler in Africa was once surrounded by black natives who came rushing out and declared, "He is as white as the Devil." They thought the Devil was white because they were black. We think he is black because we are white. We do ourselves the honor of thinking that the Devil is as different as possible from what we are. It is not always true. He don't necessarily black his face when he goes among white people, or wash his face when he goes among blacks, and it doesn't follow that everything we have conceived as being truth is absolutely free from that which is evil: or that everything our neighbor does that we don't agree with has the Devil in it. We must canvass our differences in the spirit of charity and in that way, with the help of God, we can, we trust, approach the consummation which shall be absolute unity in spirit and in opinion as well.

Most of our differences in the past have been the result of misunderstanding, or a disagreement regarding methods, or a result of individual peculiarities that have made it hard for certain men to work together. We have agreed regarding fundamental doctrines.

In other words, we are divided on trivial and transitory matters, but we are united on that which is fundamental and eternal.

So far as this question of who is radical and who is conservative is concerned, Christ is the standard by which we are measured. He who refuses to go as far as Christ went on any question is conservative; he who goes further than Christ went is radical. He who stays close by his Lord and Master is safe, sane, and wise.

Before I close I want to call your attention for a few minutes to the history of our church. I am going to quote some words from the first General Epistle issued by our President, written a little over a year after the Amboy conference, when, as a young man he raised the standard of the Reorganization, and called the people everywhere to rally around truth and virtue and the gospel of Christ. If there ever was prophetic utterance which burned with the Spirit, that was one, and he sent that utterance out to the world:

In the name of the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, I now call upon all of the scattered Saints, upon all the broad earth, to arise and shake off the sleep that hath bound them these many years, take on the armor of the just, calling on the name of the Lord for help, and unite once more for the emancipation of the honest in heart from the power of false doctrines and the shackles of sin.

In the name of bleeding Zion, I call upon all those who have been wandering in by and forbidden paths, and have been led astray by wicked and designing men, to turn from their scenes of wickedness and sins of convenience, to turn from their servitude to Satan, in all his seductive devices; from vice in every phase, and from the labor of sin, the wages whereof are ever death, unto their true and delightful allegiance to the principles of the gospel of peace.

And in the name of the Lord of hosts, I call upon all the inhabitants of the earth to repent, believe, and be baptized, for the time cometh when the judgments of God are to be poured out upon all nations, and the besom of God's wrath shall smoke through the land; when men shall know that there is a God in Israel, and he is mighty to punish or to save; that the prayers of those under the altar have been heard, and a swift retribution is to come, when the despoiler will be despoiled; when those who denied justice shall be judged, and the measure meted unto others shall be meted unto them; when the prisoner shall go free, the oppressed be redeemed, and all Israel shall cry, "Glory to God in the highest be given, for he that is long-suffering and slow to anger, has arisen, and shall bring again Zion." Amen and Amen.

That message was given a great many years ago, almost fifty years ago, and our brother has sounded it from that day to this. It is not wholly fulfilled yet, and there ought to be a thousand young men take up that cry as it falls from his faltering lips and carry it to the farthest corners of the earth.

We must sound it right here in Zion. "Arouse ye that have slumbered so long. Leave your sins of convenience and service of Satan in all his seductive wiles." Arise and help us to redeem Zion.

While I believe some of us ought to repent, I have a great deal of faith in my brethren. I have a great deal of confidence in them. They are the best people in the world, but I know that, like myself, they are subject to their weaknesses.

I want to close early this morning to give the Bishop time to carry out his work as announced, but in closing, let me present this thought. We must not only have faith in God and in our brethren, but we have got to work. It is said that a woman will pay to get into heaven, but she will work to get into society; and a man will pray to get into heaven, but work to earn the almighty dollar.

Heaven doesn't command our attention so long as there are earthly problems to be solved. Heaven isn't ready for us and we are not ready for heaven. We are not good enough for heaven, but we are too good to fritter away our time on the follies of this world. So far as the dollar is concerned, it is all right as a means to an end, but as an end it is all wrong.

So let us concentrate on this one proposition, that we will not only pray but work for the redemption of Zion here and now. I trust that God will help us to that end.

It is one of the most despicable things in life to see people of sense and education decrying and injuring the character of others who it may be for some slight misdemeanor, laid themselves open to public talk and scandal. No good, but only evil can come from such a course, and people of sense and discretion should be ashamed to be ever found guilty of retailing and doling out bits of scandal, however small and insignificant they may appear.—Lutheran World.

To a large number of the human race nothing is so delightful as to hear bad or spicy news regarding the conduct of others. A genuine scandal monger finds a piquant bit of gossip concerning a neighbor more to his relish than a savory meal. He delights in it as the years roll on with ever increasing gusto. His appetite grows by what it feeds on. Why is it that men are so prone to publish abroad a neighbor's shame and to pass lightly by his virtuous actions? Charity can spread a wide mantle over many of the infirmities of poor humanity, rather than publish them broadcast over the land.—Lutheran World.

"A selfish minister, greedy for money, hungry for applause, scheming for place, careless of his word, eager for pleasure, envious of superior gifts and bitter in temper and speech, is a spectacle to make 'angels weep,' and true Christians hang their heads in shame."

III. THE VISION OF SEPTEMBER, 1823, AND FIRST VIEW OF THE PLATES, BY SR. M. WALKER.

"He was clothed with humility,
For no need of seeming had he.
No trappings were on the sheath,
The sword of his soul to reveal,
All saw the make of the steel Underneath.

"He was sweet in his soul and mild,
With the innocent trust of a child,
As he prayed to an immanent Lord;
But, stirred by the wrath of the fight,
He seemed as an angel of light
With a sword."

"The world is God's seed-bed. He has planted deep and multitudinously, and many things there are which have not yet come up."—Henry Ward Beecher.

NEW WINE IN NEW BOTTLES.

More than three years had now elapsed since Joseph Smith had had his first vision, and during this time we are not informed by either history, or tradition, so far as is known to the writer, that anything of importance bearing upon his future lifework disturbed the quiet tenor of his way. He indeed tells us that during this period of waiting he yielded to many foolish temptations, and was led into errors, displaying not only the follies of youth, but the corruption of human nature. But in regard to the many thoughts and reflections which must have occupied his mind during this time, bearing upon the wonderful manifestation which had already been given him, as well as their effect upon his future life, he is silent. I have often thought of and wondered in regard to this. I have thought that it would have been most gratifying to many who in after years yielded their allegiance to the gospel of Christ as taught by him, to have known the inner workings of his mind during this period of waiting. But if ever "new wine was put into new bottles," if ever all previous precedents were set aside, totally ignored as it were, it was in the history of the coming forth of this latter-day work.

THE SILENCE BROKEN.

But at last the silence is broken, and the time of waiting is ended. Convinced of wrongdoing the tender conscience of the boy finds peace only in repentant confession to God of his follies and sins and pleading with his heavenly Father that he might know of his standing before him. In pleading with God this second time for a manifestation of his Spirit, the only thought which seems to have at all influenced his mind was a personal one. His conscience convicted him of sin, led him to repent of it and to plead with God that he would manifest to him whether or not his repentance was accepted. Up to this period of time it would seem that no thought of anything beyond his own personal concern had entered the mind of the boy in connection with any experience he had had. This, strange as it may seem, will perhaps account, at least in a measure, for those three and a half care-free years in which, when not engaged in labor, the sports and follies of young companions appealed to him and he yielded to the influence of his environment to such an extent as finally alarmed him in regard to his acceptance with God. Could a greater contrast than this between the first and second forerunner of Christ be imagined?

Well may it be called a marvelous work and a wonder, unlike in many respects every other work of God which had preceded it. But now all this was to be changed, and though the years of waiting were not yet ended the boy was no longer to be left in ignorance, that so far from this being exclusively a personal matter it was to embrace in its interest the utmost bounds of the habitable globe, and that he, the careless, uneducated country boy was to be an instrument in God's hands of helping to usher in the dispensation of the fullness of times and establishing upon the earth the kingdom of God, never again to be thrown down or given to another people. I do not say that all of this was made clear to him then. It is doubtful if at that time he had ever heard of a previous dispensation, or could at all have understood the meaning of that dispensation in which God would "gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on the earth, even in him." But he was told that God had a work for him to do and that his name should be had for good and evil among all nations, kindred, and tongues. Strange statement this, and one utterly impossible of fulfillment without the aid of divine interposition.

JOSEPH'S ACCOUNT OF THE VISION.

But in order to a correct understanding of that which I may say in regard to this vision it seems best to insert it here, for while it is very familiar to many of my readers, its repetition will do no harm, and there are possibly others who can not lay a like claim to familiarity.

While I was thus in the act of calling upon God I discovered a light appearing in the room, which continued to increase until the room was lighter than at noonday, when immediately a personage appeared at my bedside standing in the air, for his feet did not touch the floor. He had on a loose robe of most exquisite whiteness. It was a whiteness beyond anything earthly I had ever seen; nor do I believe that any earthly thing could be made to appear so exceedingly white and brilliant; his hands were naked, and his arms also a little above the wrist. So also were his feet naked, as were his legs a little above the ankles. His head and neck were also bare. I could discover that he had no other clothing on but his robe, as it was open so that I could see into his bosom. Not only was his robe exceedingly white, but his whole person was glorious beyond description, and his countenance truly like lightning. The room was exceedingly light, but not so very bright as immediately around his person. When I first looked upon him I was afraid, but the fear soon left me. He called me by name, and said unto me that he was a messenger sent from the presence of God to me, and that his name was Nephi. [NOTE.—This name is given "Moroni" in Doctrine and Covenants 26: 2 and 110: 20.] That God had a work for me to do, and that my name should be had for good and evil, among all nations, kindreds, and tongues; or that it should be both good and evil spoken of among all people. He said there was a book deposited written upon gold plates, giving an account of the former inhabitants of this continent, and the source from whence they sprang. He also said that the fullness of the everlasting gospel was contained in it, as delivered by the Savior to the ancient inhabitants. Also that there were two stones in silver bows, and these stones fastened to a breastplate constituted what is called the Urim and Thummin, deposited with the plates, and the possession and use of these stones was what constituted seers in ancient or former times, and that God had prepared them for the purpose of translating the book. After telling me these things he commenced quoting the prophecies of the Old Testament. He first quoted part of the third chapter of Malachi; and he quoted also the fourth or last chapter of the same prophecy, though with a little variation from the way it reads in our Bibles. Instead of quoting the first verse as it reads in our books, he quoted thus: "For behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, all that do wickedly shall burn as stubble, for they that cometh shall burn them saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." And again he quoted the fifth verse thus: "Behold, I will reveal unto you the priesthood by the hand of Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord." He also quoted the next verse differently: "And he shall plant in the hearts of the children the promises made to the fathers, and the hearts of the children shall turn to their fathers; if it were not so the whole earth would be utterly wasted at his coming." In addition to these he quoted the eleventh chapter of Isaiah, saying that it was about to be fulfilled. He quoted also the third chapter of Acts, twenty-second and twenty-third verses, precisely as they stand in our New Testament. He said that that prophet was Christ, but the day had not yet come when "they who would not hear his voice should be cut off from among the people," but soon would come.

He also quoted the second chapter of Joel from the twenty-eighth to the last verse. He also said that this was not yet fulfilled, but was soon to be. And he further stated the fullness of the Gentiles was soon to come in. He quoted many other passages of scripture and offered many explanations which can not be mentioned here. Again he told me that when I got those plates of which he had spoken (for the time that they should be obtained was not yet fulfilled) I should not show them to any person, neither the breastplate with the Urim and Thummin, only to those to whom I should be commanded to show them, if I did I should be destroyed. While he was conversing with me about the plates the vision was opened to my mind that I could see the place where the plates were deposited, and that so clearly and distinctly that I knew the place again when I visited it.

After this communication I saw the light in the room begin to gather immediately around the person of him who had been speaking to me, and it continued to do so until the room was again left dark except just around him, when instantly I saw as it were a conduit open right up into heaven, and he ascended up until he entirely disappeared and the room was left as it had been before this heavenly light had made its appearance.

After a short interval the heavenly messenger came again and repeated all which he had said at his first visit, also adding that "great judgments were coming upon the earth, with great desolations by famine, sword and pestilence, and that these grievous judgments would come upon the earth in this generation."

Again the messenger departed, but in a short time came back and repeated the same things he had said before and beside warned his listener that because of his family being poor Satan would tempt him to make use for obtaining money, but he forbade this saying that: "I must have no object in view in getting the plates but to glorify God, and must not be influenced by any other motive but that of building his kingdom, otherwise I could not get them."

THE FIRST VISIT TO CUMORAH.

Three separate times the heavenly visitant appears and each time repeats the instructions previously given. Again the next day he appears, and after again repeating the same instructions he tells the boy to inform his father of all he has seen and heard. This he did, and obeying the advice of his father he went to the place which had been shown him in the vision as being the one where the plates were concealed. Of this visit he writes:

I knew the place the instant that I arrived there. Convenient to the village of Manchester, Ontario County, New York, stands a hill of considerable size, and the most elevated of any in the neighborhood. On the west side of this hill, not far from the top, under a stone of considerable size, lay the plates deposited in a stone box. This stone was thick and rounding in the middle on the upper side, and thinner towards the edges, so that the middle part of it was visible above the ground, but the edge all round was covered with earth. Having removed the earth and obtained a lever which I got fixed under the edge of the stone and with a little exertion raised it up, I looked in and there indeed did I behold the plates, the Urim and Thummim, and the breast-plate, as stated by the messenger. The box in which they lay was formed by laying stones together in some kind of cement; in the bottom of the box were laid two stones cross-ways of the box, and on these stones lay the plates and the other things with them.

I made an attempt to take them out, but was forbidden by the messenger and was again informed that the time for bringing them forth had not yet arrived, neither would until four years from that time, but he told me that I should come to that place precisely in one year from that time, and that he would there meet with me, and that I should continue to do so until the time should come for obtaining the plates. Accordingly as I had been commanded I went at the end of each year, and at each time I found the same messenger there, and received instruction and intelligence from him at each of our interviews respecting what the Lord was going to do and how and in what manner his kingdom was to be conducted in the last days.

this movement appealed, and who were stirred up in wrath not only at the beginning of this "shaking up," but which has extended even to the present time. "Orthodoxy, my Lord," said Bishop Warburton in a whisper, "orthodoxy is my doxy,—heterodoxy is another man's doxy," and never perhaps in the history of the world was there ever introduced a religious belief for which the accepted orthodoxy of Christian churches was less willing to stand as sponsor. It was not the "doxy" of any one of them. So far from it that all of their creeds were declared to be an abomination in the sight of the Lord.

Against the creed makers of that and later days Henry Ward Beecher brings this accusation: "Creed makers have treated the Bible as men do their sheep—shearing the wool to make thread, dyeing the thread

THE HILL CUMORAH.

An entire volume might well and profitably be filled with an analysis of and comments upon this vision—this strange and wonderful display of the condescension and love of God! But while it is not our purpose at this time to do this, it is yet our earnest hope that other and able writers will yet give it their attention and furnish a proper setting for the wonderful picture. Gladstone has said: "It is doubtless needful that popular theology, which like everything else tends to settle down into mere formulas should be shaken up from time to time and measured and adjusted by its eternal standards."

NO MAN'S "DOXY."

The careful reader who sets himself to bestow upon the history of this time and movement even a casual observation will experience no difficulty in seeing and deciding upon the class of people to whom for the shuttle, and working the shuttle in the loom to create every fabric that invention can conceive, all the while declaring that those fabrics and patterns grew on the sheep's back." This being true it is not at all to be wondered at that the original gospel of Christ was not recognized, but especially by those men who professed to be teachers of the gospel and followers of the meek and lowly Nazarene was it most bitterly opposed and its adherents persecuted with a blind zeal and perseverance worthy of a better cause.

OUR EVIDENCES.

I have thus far confined myself almost exclusively to the statements made by the chief actor in the events narrated by the boy, or young man, to whom the angel appeared, allowing him to tell his own story in his own way. To the minds of many the vital question has doubtless already presented itself: How is this story to be substantiated? How are we to know that it is not all a delusion—a mere fabrication of the brain, or worse yet, a cunningly concocted story gotten up by the boy and his friends for the purpose of deceiving—that he might gain followers, popularity, wealth, perhaps, and become great in the eyes of men? What have you to offer as proof that it is genuine?

Thus called upon for evidence I find that before attempting to give any it becomes necessary to understand somewhat in relation to the character of the evidence which will apply to the case and also by what standard that evidence when produced is to be judged. As in a previous article bearing upon the life and work of Joseph Smith I made the statement that it was not aiming to write for or attempting to convince the unbeliever in God and his divine revelations; so here I repeat that this article relating to the inauguration of the work which had its beginning in the visitation of angels to Joseph Smith is written with the same limitations and is addressed only to those who believe in God and his Christ and accept the Bible as the standard of evidence and the word of God as an end to all controversy.

Please understand that this position is not taken because it now does or in the past ever has entered my mind for a moment to believe that the existence of God, the promise and assurance of life hereafter, the incarnation of Christ, his life, suffering, death, and resurrection is not just as susceptible of proof of being established by as high (if not a higher) class of evidence, as any fact in the natural world. Let that fact have relation to history or science; to the physical formation of the earth or the wonderful phenomena of any facts bearing upon either physical or mental science, I care not what it be, or how solid its foundation, I yet claim that equally solid is the evidence God has not only pledged himself to give but stands ready to give to every one who places himself in a proper position to receive it. And in this matter—this testimony of the truth of God and the gospel plan of salvation, the infinite Father with wisdom possessed only by an infinite being has safeguarded and removed it entirely beyond the realm and reach of occult science—beyond the reach of any power but his own. Well has John said of this: "If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater."

Let me here repeat a quotation from Dr. Lyman Abbott which I used in a previous article. In a recent work, entitled The Rights of Man, by this able and well-known author, he says:

The accessibility of God to every soul, the possibility of every soul coming to God—this is the teaching of the Bible from its opening statement that God made man in his own image, to its closing statement that whosoever will may take the water of life freely. The whole record of the Bible is a record of the personal relation between the individual soul and God. The writers of the biblical books talk to God, God answers them; they walk with him, they have fellowship with him, they report that fellowship. He is their friend, their companion, their inspirer, their counselor, their helper, their king, their Father. . . . It is only the church that has condemned the man who has gone out into the infinite and brought back a new vision of God. I have sometimes thought I should like to write a history of the church for the purpose of showing that Christianity must be supernatural to have lived despite so many blunders of its friends.

Words of our own would fail entirely to place this matter before the reader in so clear a light. Joseph Smith had had a vision. He had seen and talked with God and "it was not" to use the words of another, the religious scoffer; it was not the infidel agnostic or atheist; it was not the Jew, Mahometan, or any of these heathen people who mobbed Joseph Smith for claiming he had a message from Jesus. Oh no, but anomalous as it may seem now, it was the class-leaders and preachers who wielded the tar buckets and feathers.

Joseph Smith had a peculiar, a special work to do for the people, not only of his own time, but one bearing upon all future time, all coming generations until the return of Christ to the earth. For this work he needed and must have a special preparation, hence it came to him in many and lengthy interviews with those of his fellow-servants who had passed from the world's stage of action before his time as well as from the confirming testimony of both the Father and the Son. Every special work calls for a special preparation, and he who has a witness to bear unto others must of necessity himself be well established in the truth.

But you and I, dear reader, are intrusted with a work of just as grave importance—just as far-reaching consequences to us as individuals as that of any man or woman who has an immortal soul to save. It may not indeed be of so much consequence to the world at large as was the message of John the Baptist, or that of Joseph Smith, but to us it certainly is, for "what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul, or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" This being true, it certainly should interest us to know in regard to this vision: Is it true or is it false?

The messenger told him many, very many important things—things which were shortly to come upon the earth—things which were contained in the book which was then hidden in the earth, etc., etc. But most important among all these he bore witness to Christ and stated that the hidden book contained the fullness of the everlasting gospel.

It is a well-established fact that the claim of Joseph Smith not only at the beginning of his career, but all through life, and to the hour of his death was, that he introduced no new gospel, no new system of religion, but taught the gospel as it had been taught by Christ and his apostles; that he had been commissioned to teach the gospel of Christ, not only in word, but in power and the demonstration of the Spirit. Hence it follows that whatever may have been his teachings, whatever he claims to have learned by direct communication from angels, by visions or in what way soever he may have been taught, becomes subject to the same class of evidence and must be tried by the same standard, namely, the Bible, and must not in any way conflict with the teachings of Christ or those whom Christ commissioned to represent him.

PROPHECIES, MIRACLES, INTERNAL EVIDENCES.

Most individuals who have undertaken to prove the divine origin of Christianity, either from the rostrum or by use of the pen, have relied mainly upon three sources for the arguments advanced, namely: the prophecies recorded in the Old and New Testaments, the miracles, especially of the New Testament, and the internal evidence found in the purity and excellence of the entire system, plainly marking it as having its origin in and being watched over by a power far higher than that possessed by any human being or any combination of such.

It is not the object of this brief article to present here the arguments which have been made at various times by the wisest and best men of every age and generation since the days of Christ. We ought all to be familiar to them, for among the first commandments given to the church organized by Joseph Smith was one that from all good books, we as a people were to seek for knowledge. Let it ever be borne in mind that while God, through Joseph Smith, denounced the creeds which men had made, he did not denounce all men, neither ignore the good which was in God's world. Good books there were, and they must first have been written by good men, and there must have been good men and women, too, who read them else it had been a thankless task to make them.

"Many," says Max Muller, "are the advantages to be derived from a careful study of other religions, but the greatest of all is that it teaches us to appreciate more truly what we possess in our own. When do we feel the blessings of our own country more warmly and truly than when we return from abroad? It is the same with regard to religion." Doubtless this may have been one of the reasons why God enjoined upon us to obtain information. Another is that we may be in a position to give to every one who asks us a reason for the hope that is within us and while we do this with meekness and fear it is none the less to be done in the full assurance that we "speak that we do know and testify that we have seen."

Napoleon once said that "all the scholastic scaffolding falls as a ruined edifice before one single word,—faith." But faith itself, if it be a saving faith, demands and must have a foundation upon which to build.

Atheism charges upon the believer in Christianity that he accepts upon mere faith many things which reason rejects. Addison retorts in this wise:

"Supposing all the great points of atheism were formed into a kind of creed, I would fain ask whether it would not require an infinitely greater measure of faith than any set of articles which they so violently oppose."

Joseph Cook says: "There is no modern form of skepticism which may not be exploded by a fair use of its own concessions." I believe this is true, but I know there is no skepticism to which God will not deal the death blow if the individual will but place himself in that position before God which will enable him to know for himself.

IF ANY MAN WILL DO.

When Jesus Christ was sent by the Father to declare to men the will of God and to teach them the gospel plan of salvation, the Father did not leave him alone, neither did he send him to declare to men that they must receive his unsupported testimony that what he taught was the eternal, unchangeable truth of that God who created the heavens and the earth. Far from it! This is the message—this the rock upon which the church of Christ is built as that also upon which my faith—the faith of every true Christian must be founded: "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself."—John 7: 17.

When Jesus questioned Peter as to his knowledge of him, asking, "But whom say ye that I am?" and Peter answered: "Thou art the Christ the Son of the living God," Jesus said: "Blessed art thou, Simon Barjonah; for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee but my Father which is in heaven."

Here then we find the foundation of our faith—the rock upon which the church of Christ is built, and the impregnable rock of holy scriptures, namely, the witness of God which is greater than the witness of man—the Holy Spirit which is the mind and will of the Father and the Son bearing witness to the truth of what the Son came to teach. Salvation is strictly an individual matter. Faith is the first principle of revealed religion, but we are enjoined to be able to give a reason for that faith. Jesus said the doer of God's will should know, and however strong the faith may be it is certainly a grand thing to be able to say like one of old, "I knqw that my Redeemer liveth."

ONE WHO KNEW.

When Joseph Smith began his life work (the preaching of the gospel of Christ to the men and women of this country) he said in substance:

I know there is a God for I have both seen him and spoken to him. He has talked with me and I know that Jesus Christ is his Son, for I have seen him too, and God has borne witness of him. I have talked with angels and they have taught me many things which pertain to the building up of God's kingdom in these latter days. They have also told me of many events which are shortly to take place and have given me authority to preach the gospel. I do not come to you declaring any new gospel—any new plan of salvation, but the same gospel taught by Christ and his ministers. I have indeed taken from the earth where they had long been buried a set of golden plates in which the history of the early inhabitants of America was written. I do not understand the language engraved upon these plates, but translated them by the use of certain stones set in silver bows which were buried with the plates and which the angel taught me to use. But so far from this book containing any new doctrine, anything which conflicts with the gospel of Christ, it is a very strong witness to the truth of the record contained in the Bible which all Christians profess to believe, and so plain in its teaching of the gospel of Christ that it is not possible to mistake the way.

Now I do not expect you to accept my unsupported testimony in regard to this for that is not God's plan. Jesus Christ did not ask it and neither do I, but just as he offered to men and women the testimony of his Father, so God has commissioned me to offer the same and in the words of Jesus to say, "If any man will do his will he shall know of the doctrine."

A PERSONAL TESTIMONY.

To the writer long years ago this message came, and after many a struggle, many an unavailing prayer that a testimony might be given before obedience was yielded to that which faith accepted as the gospel plan of salvation, her resolution was at last taken to obey and then demand of God a fulfillment of the promise. And when she here testifies that the promise was fulfilled—fulfilled even as Jesus promised it should be, would it seem to be assuming too much to say that I knew Joseph Smith was called of God and that when he published to the world an account of what the angel Moroni revealed to him, he published a true statement of facts? I think not, for it is done in meekness and the fear of God. His glorious plan of salvation embraces this future—infinitely precious, if that may be, above every other distinguishing feature: that God has reserved to himself the giving of that witness to the truth of his gospel which is greater than the witness of men, and no one is cut off from or deprived of this who is willing to put it to the test by doing the will of God.

ANOTHER CLASS OF EVIDENCES.

But while thousands upon thousands have borne a faithful testimony to the truth of this latter-day work which had its beginning in the vision or visions which we have been considering, and which in themselves embrace the direct evidence of more than one prophecy literally fulfilled, and while other thousands have attested to many miraculous events, falling little short of those recorded in the Bible, there yet remains another class of evidence to which the honest seeker after truth must give due weight, and which even the bitterest foes of the work will certainly find it hard to set aside with a wave of the hand or the enumerating of those talismanic words—delusion! imposter!

Brother Williams, in his article in the previous number of this magazine, as our readers will remember, said:

What proof have you that Saul saw the light and was stricken to the earth? None, save the unconfirmed statement in his own epistle and that found in the Acts of the Apostles which was the accumulated traditional facts preserved for nearly a hundred years before they were recorded. Please remember I am not denying the truthfulness of either, but I do say the claim of Joseph Smith is equally valid with any recorded statement in the scriptures. In fact, it is more so. Moses said God wrote on the tablet of stone. No living witness has ever vouched for the statement. Twelve witnesses confirmed the testimony of Joseph Smith. If I was to determine on the facts in the case I must conclude there is more to substantiate the story of Joseph Smith and the work which he introduced than any recorded instance in the Bible. It happened in our day; we have the testimony of witnesses known to hundreds of men now living. These men say they knew they saw the angel and bore witness to his message.

In the year 1876, following the announcement of the death of Sidney Rigdon, the following (editorial, I think) appeared in the Chicago Times:

Mr. Rigdon was a man of good general ability, enlarged general culture, and well versed in natural science. He devoted the latter years of his life to the study of geology, on which science he was an able lecturer. No person had a more intimate acquaintance with Joseph Smith, or had better opportunity to judge the truth, or falsity of the thing he proclaimed to be true. As a Baptist, as a Campbellite, as a scientist, he was regarded as an honest, straightforward man. Only a bigot will accuse him of dishonesty in espousing the doctrines held by Joseph Smith. Mr. Rigdon was not the only person of good repute who gave testimony in favor of Joseph Smith till the end came. The original testifiers of his having the golden plates, whereon was inscribed the Book of Mormonism, never indulged in crooked talk in relation to the affair. As recently as last year, two of them were living—venerable men, whose word no person was likely to question in other matters. The widow of Joseph Smith still lives at Nauvoo, respected in the community as a woman of more than ordinary mind, culture and character. Two of his sons are citizens of this State, esteemed by all who know them as gentlemen of the highest integrity.

No one who knows them will deny that the anti-polygamy Mormons, or Josephites who are scattered throughout the West, are the peers of other people in honesty, integrity, and truthfulness. It is all very well to sneer at Mormonism, to say that the father of Joseph Smith was an idle vagabond, who stole sheep, and that he himself was a knave or a fool, or both combined, but the question naturally arises, What is to be done with the testimony of this cloud of witnesses, the word of whom in all ordinary matters is taken as readily as the word of any man, and whose oath would send any man to the prison or gallows? Another age will probably ask, Why was not this testimony refuted when those who gave it were living? The truth is, the testimony of these persons must be shown to be false within the next twenty years, or the fact that it was not disproved or even shaken will be a powerful argument in favor of its truthfulness in all coming ages. If there is good and sufficient evidence to substantiate any phenomena ordinarily classed as supernatural, it exists in relation to acts performed by Joseph Smith. Not one of the miracles imputed to the author of the Christian or Mohammedan religions was vouched for by so many witnesses.

The above is the conclusion reached by a totally disinterested party. One who so far as my knowledge extends never had the slightest affiliation with our people, and yet while the quotation shows him to have been a man of broad and liberal mind, we are naturally led to inquire how under all the circumstances, and with a knowledge of facts as they really exist, could a just man arrive at any other conclusion.

IN CONCLUSION.

In conclusion I would say by using the words of another:

"My abiding belief is that just as the workmen in the tunnel of Saint Gothard, working from either end, met at last to shake hands in the very central root of the mountains, so students of nature and students of Christianity will yet join in the unity of reason and faith in the heart of their deepest mysteries," and when that time shall come those who have read deepest from the open book of nature will most marvel at their own interpretations of her handwriting by which they were led into doubts and unbelief, while those who took heed to "the more sure word of prophecy" will enter into the joy of their Lord. All truth is one. But to discover this truth at the end of the race is far from meaning to the individual discoverer who all his life has opposed it that which it means to him who has spent his life in contending most earnestly for it. Men yield allegiance to and demand a class of evidence which has condemned untold thousands of innocent men and women to imprisonment and death, while they reject that which God offers them as being unworthy of reason. The way of truth can not be mistaken by him who relies upon both the law and the testimony. But either one without the other is an insufficient guide. There is not a soul whom God has created, but at times feels an intense longing for that which only God has to give and which nothing of an earthly nature can satisfy.

It was doubtless in this frame of mind, with this soul hunger gnawing at her very vitals, as it were, that Annie Besant first encountered Theosophy. Atheism held no God. In materialism she could find no answer to the problems of life and mind, and using her own words,

I had all along been deeply troubled as to the "beyond" of all my efforts at social and political reform. My own socialism was that of love and leveling up; there was much socialism that was of hatred; and I often wondered if out of hatred any true improvement could spring? I saw that many of the poor were as selfish and as greedy of enjoyment as many of the rich, and sometimes a cold wind of despair swept over me lest the "brute in man" should destroy the realization of the noblest theories. Here Theosophy with its proof of the higher nature in man came as a ray of light and its teachings of the training of that nature gave solid ground for hope. May I add that its call to limitless self-sacrifice for human good—a call addressed to all who can answer it came to me as offering satisfaction to what has always been the deepest craving of my nature—the longing to serve as ransom for the race. At once I recognized that here was the path to that which I had been seeking all my life.

The last Christian belief to which Annie Besant clung was her faith in the deity of Christ, and because it was her last and dearest all the more closely she clung to it. In a measure, at least, this was restored to her in Theosophy, for the philosophy taught is essentially Christian in ethics. She was driven to infidelity by those creeds of men which the Lord told Joseph Smith were an abomination in his sight, and for one, I have never read of her trials, struggles, and failures, without lifting a silent prayer to God that finally she might be brought to know the truth.

But to become "as a little child" is a hard matter for those who pride themselves upon their own wisdom, their riches, their talent, or the honors bestowed by men. God has given man his agency, and his power to choose will be God's vindication in the day of judgment.

The true way is to speak as well as we may of all with whom we come in contact, being always open and frank with every one and ever free from tricks and frivolities of speech whereby a character or reputation may suffer. Scandalous words, even though spoken without bad intent, often drive men to despair and a suicidal death.—Lutheran World.

It is of the utmost importance that a nation have a correct standard by which to weigh the character of its rulers. But above all, if we be just men we shall go forward in the name of truth and right, bearing this in mind—that when a case is proved and the hour come, justice delayed is justice denied.—W. E. Gladstone.

"Whatever theories may be preached about the best way to reach the 'masses,' the fact is still patent that all men are converted as individuals. Sinners are never saved in 'crowds,' though crowds may be saved at the same time.

"A thing is not necessarily wrong because it is new, nor right because it is old. Sin is as old as Adam, but is as wrong as when it entered the Garden of Eden. Neither is a thing right because it is popular."

We are not alone in thinking that the theaters of our day are no better than those of pagans of old time in their demoralization.—Christian Instructor.

THE FINANCIAL LAW.

LEST WE FORGET.

[Not long ago a faithful and able elder was heard to say, "I have spent fifteen years of the cream of my life in a foreign mission field. I have a large family growing up and we have no home. We need one, but how shall we get it? I might go to work, but I have lost out in industrial lines. What could I take up that would pay? And anyway my calling is to preach. But we need a home. My wife would be overjoyed if we had a little cottage of our own."—EDITORS.]

When I essay the task of telling men and women what their duty is, or that they ought to do their duty, I at once assume an arduous task. I step upon ground often trodden by exponents of law, whether it pertain to the law of the land or the law of the Lord. In the latter case it is more difficult because it is more far-reaching in its results.

In considering the subject of finances, men are likely to think that everything in the article that "hits them" is a personal attack upon their standing in the church. To me the whole gospel is of personal application. If I am not in harmony with it, it is an argument against me. I can see no possible way to escape making every law of the divine economy of personal application, because we are, individually, particles of the whole. But this attack if it be pleasant to any to call it such (defense seems to me to be better), should be made with the intention of engendering strife or antagonism in no one; but for the purpose of getting men to awaken to their duty, thereby enabling them to "obtain a more excellent name" (reward) for themselves, by reason of which, as instruments in the hands of God, they are the means of bringing about the salvation of others, in which alone lies honor and glory for men. It is only fair that we make every law of personal application, since it is the intention of the law to make the body pure by making the individuals free before the law.

"Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he can not enter the kingdom of God." "If thou lovest me, thou shalt serve me and keep all my commandments. And, behold, thou wilt remember the poor, and consecrate of thy properties for their support, that which thou hast to impart unto them, with a covenant and a deed which can not be broken," etc. Now, where is the man or the woman who can say that one of these is binding and the other is not? That is, if he has anything to consecrate or give? And where is the man or the woman who has nothing to consecrate? Many have no surplus, it it true. If he has no money to consecrate, he can consecrate his life. "Silver and gold have I none; but such as I have give I thee"; "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Suppose your neighbor is especially endowed with talents of mental power, and he dwarfs them by allowing them to be unused, or corrupts them by devoting them to improper uses. Is he any worse than the man who has received a legacy through his father, or who has amassed a fortune ere he entered the church, or after, for that matter, and who devotes the use of that fortune to his own selfish interests? I see no difference. Both are serving the world and themselves, instead of the Lord through the church and its members who need this help. It seems to me there is a lack of consecration on the part of both. But in the light of the promises of God to his children, and I believe he will fulfill them, there is no excuse for either. Because some in the missionary force are not consecrated as they should be, from the viewpoint of others, often causes those who have means they might otherwise be willing to give, to withhold it. Isn't it true that when some of our wealthy men see that there are some among the ministry getting perhaps ninety-eight dollars per month for doing no more than others are doing for perhaps thirty-five dollars, a mere allowance for the support of their families, they consider it cause to withhold? But are they justified in reaching that conclusion? Decidedly not. I am persuaded that the shortest and best way to "Zion" is the route of the gospel. Others may take another route, but remember what Christ said about climbing some other way. They are excusable no more than a man is justified in not obeying the law of baptism because some one who has, has failed to live his religion after coming into the church.

It appeals to me thus: If the bishop has made mistakes, not so much in his interpretation as in his application of the law, as is charged by many, the best, quickest, and only safe, legal way to set him right is to get right ourselves. Then we will have a right to believe the Lord will intercede for us. Another man's virtues will not take us to heaven, neither will his vices keep us out.

Then again: The dream of many a missionary! A home! And how true and nobly instinctive it is to want a home, over whose hearth should be written, "O-t-h-e-r-s" in letters of gold. It makes the boundary between selfishness and altruism,—equality. It has to be learned before we can rise out of ourselves and realize that we are only particles of the whole, the family of God. We must learn to spell that word before we spell "S-e-l-f" if ever we come to a full realization of the meaning of "thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself"; "whosoever will do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother." Practicing it, will purge from us the grossness of our desires, and make us more receptive to light and truth,—the needs of the race.

The missionary takes his life in his hand, and, going out into the world, leaves his family on the church for support, education, etc. He goes because he feels that God has called him to assist in saving the world. He goes because he loves his mistaken neighbor, of whatsoever nationality, as himself. He is not content with being in the church and the prospects of saving himself alone; but he wants every one to be brought to a knowledge of the celestial law, that they may be saved if they so desire, realizing, too, that his salvation depends upon the faithfulness with which he prosecutes his work.

Now is there nothing for those who labor in the affairs of men to do? Have they not equal opportunities with the former? Does the Lord require of the one to labor for simply his expenses, and his family an allowance, while the other can enjoy the luxuries of this world, lifelong, with the full guarantee that when he dies his family will be provided for? Where is the equality in that? The missionary goes out in faith: he believes the church will be able to provide for himself and family.

How can the church do it?

And, behold, thou wilt remember the poor and consecrate of thy properties for their support, that which thou hast to impart unto them with a covenant and a deed which can not be broken; and inasmuch as ye impart of your substance unto the poor, ye do it unto me.—Doctrine and Covenants 42: 8.

Behold, now it is called to-day (until the coming of the Son of Man), and verily it is a day of sacrifice, and a day for the tithing of my people; for he that is tithed shall not be burned (at his coming); . . . Wherefore, if ye believe me ye will labor while it is called to-day.—Doctrine and Covenants 64: 5.

Verily, thus saith the Lord, I require all their surplus property to be put into the hands of the bishop of my church of Zion.

Read also section 101, paragraph 2. Also in section 77, paragraph 1 it is stated, for if ye are not equal in earthly things, ye can not be equal in obtaining heavenly things; for if you will that I give unto you a place in the celestial world, you must prepare yourselves by doing the things which I have commanded you and required of you.

Now, if the Lord requires the missionary to sacrifice everything but the home for his family, in order that he may have eternal life, how much less will he require of the men who labor in the affairs of the world, business, to obtain the same reward, eternal life? How much less? God is no respecter of persons.

Now, brethren, if we have that to give, let us see that we do give. If it is a day for sacrifice, as well as a day of consecration, a day to pay surplus, a "day for the tithing of my people," let us see to it that we pay our tithes, that we pay our surplus, that we consecrate, and that we sacrifice. One may pay his surplus (having paid his tithing), according to our present definition, and still conduct a four million dollar business, provided he needs it all in his business. He may go farther than that: he may make a special consecration of five hundred thousand or so, and still have all he needs for himself and family. But if he gets to the point where he goes without the things he actually needs to make himself comfortable, in order to the spread of the gospel, for the redemption of Zion, then is he beginning to put on the garments of Christ,—to sacrifice what he needs.

LOWER LAKE, CALIFORNIA, August 20, 1909.

Dear Herald: This morning I feel impressed to send you a few lines, giving a brief account of the visit of our dear brothers, L. Daguer and J. F. Wiles. They came to us on June 25, and received a very cordial welcome. The little district schoolhouse was occupied a few times and a very few outsiders came to hear the sermons. Then we endeavored to procure a place in town (Lower Lake) where there are churches, Catholic, Presbyterian, Campbellite, and Methodist. It was amusing to hear the paltry, weak excuses for closing their doors against us. Later we applied to a saloon keeper who is one of the trustees of the schoolhouse. He and another of the board gave a very cordial permission to occupy the large hall free of charge. Only two or three attended. Our postmaster, a Methodist, gave us permission to occupy one of his buildings. The justice of the peace offered his courtroom. There were services held in the private rooms of Sisters Grammech and Knobb, which were better attended. On one occasion Brother Wiles preached a sermon on the Book of Mormon, which was considered very grand. He had the Spirit in great power. All were thrilled by the force, and clear, conclusive evidence given of the divine authenticity of the book. His memory is remarkable. He can quote scripture for every question, promptly and clearly.

Much good could be done if the elders would remain longer in a place. This fitting from place to place is not wise, according to my idea. Nevertheless, the Saints were much strengthened and comforted by the prayer and testimony meetings, during which the Holy Spirit was often manifest, sometimes with much power.

I wish to say to the Saints of Fanshawe, Oklahoma, who have been driven from their "church home," that they should not submit to such treatment, but assert their rights, produce their "deeds" to the property, and appeal to the governor for justice. We would like to contribute our mite to help them rebuild if they can not reclaim what is legally theirs. They should make a protest and the effort will be blessed.

And now I desire to say to all of the Saints who do not possess the Church Histories, that they do not know how much good they are missing. We have procured a set, and in addition to the instruction contained in them, they are very entertaining and comforting. We look through the index, take a subject that strikes us, and find food for reflection in reading that way. Then when winter comes we will read them from beginning to end. For the young in the faith, as is the writer, I meet with wonderful manifestations of the Spirit, angelic visits, visions, etc., that almost thrill one to read since we know they are true, not the fancies of overpious brains.

Then I think those dear brothers whose skill has produced such fine work of the printer's art, should have their meed of praise.

Your sister in Christ,

MRS. MARIE J. T. ADAMSON.

Alabama Reunion.

At 8 o'clock p. m. Saturday, August 7, the Saints of the Alabama District assembled at Pleasant Hill church for the purpose of organizing the reunion, called to order by Bro. J. R. Harper. The following organization was effected: President, T. C. Kelley; secretary, J. A. Vickrey; chorister, O. M. Sellers; organist, Sr. Pearl Odom; ushers, L. G. Sellers and J. A. Vickrey. The presidency was authorized to appoint the speakers, regular librarian to have charge of books, and appoint any necessary assistance. Promptly at 10 a. m. Sunday, August 8, the regular Sunday school service was held; at eleven, preaching, after which lunch was served on the ground. At 3 p. m. the congregation reassembled for another preaching service, after which the Sunday school normal class met, and followed by that was the regular Religio service. At 8 p. m. we again had the pleasure of listening to the gospel propounded from the stand.

During the following week the Saints met regularly at 9.30 a. m. for prayer service, the good Spirit was enjoyed in many of these services, preaching service regularly at 11 a. m. and 7.30 p. m. The reunion closed with the afternoon service of Sunday, August 15.

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, August 22, 1909.

Dear Herald: Papa's work closed down five years ago, so we moved south, to New Decatur, Alabama. There was no Latter Day Saint church there, so my brother and I attended the Baptist Sunday school for nearly four years. We won a gold pin for regular attendance for one year. We became somewhat indifferent, being isolated so long from the church, but I am glad I am permitted to again be among the Saints. I had just been baptized a short time when we moved south. Bro. M. M. Turpen visited us for a few days while we were there.

The branch gave an ice cream supper in the church yard at Highland Park, on August 21. There was a good attendance. A gold ring was to be given as a reward to the one who sold the most tickets. Jennie Metcalf, daughter of Elder J. W. Metcalf, received the prize. Brother Zahnd, of New Albany, Indiana, presented her the ring.

The work is progressing nicely, and I hope it will not be long till we will have a large branch. If we all do our part the Lord will do the rest.

Yours in gospel bonds,
RUTH RIGGLE.

Parents too often trust to outside influences and depend too much upon a misunderstood environment to bring out the fine instincts and best traits of their boys when in reality what a boy attains in life is due principally to home influence and example.—American Boy.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLAHOMA, August 22, 1909.

Editors Herald: My heart is still in this work, ever ready to scatter good seed wherever I can. I have been isolated for three years; have had no church privileges at all. It is hard to be raised up in the church and then have all these church privileges taken from you. I went to the district conference at Haileyville. We all enjoyed the Spirit of the Lord abundantly.

Dear Saints, let us put our whole heart in this glorious work and our shoulder to the wheel and keep it moving rapidly along. If I had to give up life or this work that leads up to life everlasting, I would die still clinging to the faith once delivered to the Saints. I know there is nothing in worldly pleasure to live for. We are here only to prepare ourselves for the coming of the Son of Man. If we expect to receive a full reward we have no time to lose. I have never regretted the step that I took at the water's edge. I do not feel as though I have made much progress, but I am still striving. I have seen my brother raised from his deathbed. The Lord spoke to him through the ones that were administering to him and told him that if he did not return to the fold and repent of his evil deeds he would return to the dust from whence he came. And he was restored to health. But the last time he gave no heed to the Lord's words and so he passed away February 28, 1908.

Saints, we should always be ready to obey the Lord's command and be up and doing, ever ready to lend a helping hand and let no time be lost.

I would like to know the address of my uncle, James McClain, last heard of in Texas.

Your sister in the true faith,

MAE MCCLAIN.

KNOBNOSTER, MISSOURI.

Editors Herald: I love this latter-day work and am glad to know that I have had the opportunity of hearing and accepting the true gospel. It does my soul good when at home and alone to get to thinking and studying about the goodness of God to man. How kind he was to provide a way for us as in days of old; but again, how careless we get sometimes in doing our duty! I have been healed and have seen my children healed. I often notice how careless we parents are with our little ones, that have been intrusted to our care. What excuse can we make when we are called up before the Judge of all for neglect of duty? We should stop and read how we are commanded to raise our little ones. Training should begin at the cradle. I have read in the HERALD where a sister said that we should make our children do what we tell them to do even if the biscuits in the stove burn, and I think she is right.

When we take our children to meeting I think we should make them behave. I remember being at a meeting once where the little girls ten and twelve years of age were allowed to sit out in buggies during services and little boys from eight to ten stayed out on the hitch rack or in buggies, or on the coal house or any place they wished, while prayer meeting was going on. I think we parents will have to answer for that, for if we let them do so at that age, what better can we expect when they are grown? What excuse can we make? Can we say, O, wife would get mad, or it will cause trouble to correct the children? Do you think that kind of an excuse will clear us? It is the little things that will look the biggest to us on that great day when we come to be judged.

I think sometimes that I make slow progress, but I can see I have made some advancement. Hoping to meet in that bright, happy morn with Christ,

Your sister,

BETTIE JOHNSON.

GLADSTONE, ILLINOIS, August 22, 1909.

Editors Herald: I am trying to stand in defense of the truth and in my weak way keep the testimonies of the Lord.

Law without evidence is of no force, evidence being the first point in law, whether civil or divine. David, the patriarch, in his great contest needed but one stone in his sling, though he had others; the one he used was sufficiently effective. So also is the stone of the foreknowledge of the scriptures sufficiently effective to stand the test of its divinity. The spirit of prophecy and foreknowledge could not exist without the divine mind back of it. Jesus says in Revelation 2: 17. "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written." Can mortal man imagine any whiter stone than the testimony of the Lord, the sure foundation, the gold tried in the fire, the infallible evidence that can not be rejected by any tribunal in heaven or on earth? Who but the Lord knoweth the unborn and that which is to testify of his divinity? Men may think themselves wise, but not actually be wise; but man may know for himself that God is and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him.

The testimony of Jesus is all that revives the little spark of hope I have left and makes me know there is a divine mind. Although in this life we often meet with sad experiences and the departure of those near and dear to us, in Him who loves us we are more than conquerors. Come, trials, afflictions, persecution, and death, the Lord hath conquered all.

Your brother in the gospel bond,

REPUBLIC, WASHINGTON, August 17, 1909.

Editors Herald: Bro. S. S. Smith came here on the 16th of July and held meetings for ten nights. The congregation was small, owing to the busy time of the year. The interest was good throughout the meeting, people being well pleased both with the preacher and with the message he gave them. Several have said if they ever join any church it will be the Latter Day Saints. Brother Smith is an able speaker and he gave us the pure gospel from first principles to the restoration, so plain that anyone could understand it.

The people are very anxious for him to come back in the winter and hold meeting again. This is the place where those evangelists boasted so loud last winter. They challenged the world; said no minister dared to stand before them. One of them was present two or three nights at our meetings, but had nothing to say. Think he sized up the preacher and found him too large in stature and intellect, so had business in other parts, and we have not heard of him since.

I think that the good seed sown here will bear some fruit in the future. That is my sincere hope and prayer.

R. WORTHINGTON.

MINT, MISSOURI, August 22, 1909.

Editors Herald: I have been a member of the Grove Spring Branch since the 28th day of April, 1907. I am sorry to say that I have not seen a letter of encouragement from any of our members except one from our elder, Bro. George Anderson, in which he reported a debate held at Winnipeg, Missouri. But we still live in hopes that the Grove Spring Branch will revive in the future. We live twelve miles from the branch and we want to get closer to church. Perhaps we will move to Douglass County, as my husband is going down to conference, and while there he will look for a location. We would be glad to hear from any of the Pomona Saints, as we would like to have a recommendation of the branch there. Our good Bro. W. A. Brouner gave them a good recommendation when he was here, but that has been some time ago.

Our cause for moving is to get where we can go to church, and have our children in Sunday school, where they will learn more about the good work of the Lord. We have a daughter fifteen years old and two boys thirteen and eleven years old. They are all members of the church. I thank God for helping me lead my dear ones into the light of the true gospel. I have been a strong believer in the Latter Day Saint doctrine ever since November, 1900, but my husband would not let me obey until 1907, when he was truly convinced that it was the church.

Hoping to hear from any of the Saints soon,

MRS. REBECCA ATKINSON.

Eastern Iowa.

About the 9th of July the Eastern Iowa district tent was set up on Fifth avenue, one block south of Charles street (the place the tent was last year), in Oelwein, Iowa. Bro. J. B. Wildermuth delivered a series of fine sermons or lectures on the gospel of Jesus Christ. Outsiders say the preaching was "good," "all right," "fine," etc. Brother Wildermuth had to do all the preaching as there was no other elder with him. The meetings lasted until Sunday, the 8th. Most of the time there was a fair attendance and at the last night the tent would not hold all who came. I feel to rejoice because of the eight precious souls who were buried with Christ by baptism, and I hope they will walk in newness of life. Two of them are Brother and Sister Spear from the Christian Church, who did nobly in helping with the singing last year as well as this season. Two others were children of Brother and Sister McQueen, and four were children of the writer. My prayer is that they all may be faithful until the Lord comes, and that they may have part in the first resurrection. There were two added last year. They were Sister Loveland and Brother Neblock.

The Oran Center Branch met in the tent August 1, on business, President Robert Smith in the chair. Notice had been given that a meeting of the branch would be held at Oran Center Schoolhouse for the purpose of deciding whether we should change the place of business of the Oran Center Branch to Oelwein, also of changing the name from Oran Center Branch to that of Oelwein Branch; but there were not enough members present to form a quorum, so nothing was done in regard to the change. So the questions were brought up at the business meeting in the tent August 1, and decided in favor of the change, and now we await the Eastern Iowa district conference to ratify our decision.

We also decided to build a little church of our own in Oelwein and send out a committee to solicit subscriptions to build. On August 8 the committee reported about two hundred dollars subscribed, so a building committee was appointed, with the privilege of choosing two others to assist in selecting a location and formulating plans for a building.

We also organized a Sunday school to meet at Sister Clark's residence, Bro. C. Shippy superintendent; Bro. Ed Spears assistant. Much good has been done and a great deal of prejudice removed. Hoping this branch will yet become a bright and shining light in this part of the Lord's vineyard,

Your brother in Christ,

JOHN G. HODGES.

The happiness of the republic depends on the virtue of its citizens. Political health is as important as physical health. Religion is the guiding star of nations as well as of individuals. It alone can safeguard liberty.—The Rev. T. J. Conaty, Worcester, Massachusetts.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA, August 23, 1909.

Editors Herald: Since our last letter we have been favored with a visit from Pres. F. M. Smith, wife, and baby. Brother Fred preached for us twice, and a like number of times at the church in Oakland.

His sermon on Sunday evening, August 1, on "The virgin birth of Jesus Christ," was intensely interesting and was the cause of much favorable comment. On the following evening Brother Smith gave his illustrated lecture on the life of Christ. Brother and Sister Smith were with us for nine days, which was a treat to all the Saints in the "Bay Cities." They abode while here at the home of Bro. and Sr. J. A. Anthony. They sailed Tuesday, the 3d, on the steamer City of Pueblo for Seattle to attend the reunion at that place and see some of the sights of the fair before returning home. Brethren May and Savage, the young missionaries en route to the South Sea Islands, worshiped with us on Wednesday evening, the 4th, at our prayer meeting. They left the following Friday on the steamer Mariposa, for their mission field.

Brother Ingham, of Honolulu, preached for us last Sunday morning, the 15th. His discourse was interesting and well received. Brother Ingham expects to locate on the coast, as business interests will keep him here indefinitely. His family are in Honolulu, but will join him later.

Sr. C. E. Crumley, our efficient chorister, will leave this week, with her children, to join Brother Crumley in his mission field at San Bernardino. Sister Crumley will be greatly missed, especially from the choir, as the musical services under her able leadership have been of a very high order. Our loss will be others' gain.

Our reunion at Irvington will be held from September 3 to 12 inclusive. We are all looking forward to a time of spiritual strengthening.

The work in San Francisco is on a solid footing and with all the officers and members living and working in unison, we have reason to look for further improvement in the near future.

Bro. J. A. Saxe was the speaker at the morning hour yesterday, and Bro. J. M. Terry preached for us on the evening of the 15th, his sermon being highly spoken of. Our Sunday school and Religio are both in a prosperous condition under the able direction of Brn. H. D. Simpson and Kenneth Richmond.

In gospel bonds,

JOHN A. LAWN.

EROS, LOUISIANA, August 15, 1909.

Editors Herald: The Saints here are enjoying some of the blessings of the Lord. We have Sunday school and preaching once a week and also hold prayer meeting. We thank the Lord that we have the opportunity of hearing the angel's message and of being in Sunday school, for it is a noble way to enlighten our minds.

Dear Saints, let us all be faithful and obedient to the law of God and receive that grand reward that awaits the faithful ones after the toils on earth are over.

The Saints here are waiting patiently for the return of Bro. James M. Smith, and also Bro. J. N. Simmons. We will be glad to see them come; they have a happy welcome in many homes here. There are a great many people here who want to hear them preach. I think there is much good to be done in this vicinity. Two precious souls were baptized here a few days ago, and others may follow soon.

I feel my weakness and desire the prayers of the Saints that I may devote my time to the work of our heavenly Father and come forth in the first resurrection and meet the Lord at his coming.

Your brother in Christ,

JOHN A. FULLER.

FOSTER STREET, PARKSIDE, SOUTH AUSTRALIA, July 15, 1909.

Dear Herald: It is a great pleasure to me to read the letters from time to time in the HERALD, and in this far off land of ours we can through its columns glean a little of what some of our brothers and sisters are experiencing and the good work they are doing in America, and elsewhere. Although we are thousands of miles apart, we can feel that unity of spirit which comes to all who obey the gospel in its entirety.

My husband joined the church four years ago and at that time I was very much opposed to it, believing that they were "Mormons," a people I had heard spoken against when quite young. But when I understood the difference I could see that they were right, though it was a long time before I was baptized. Unlike some, I did not feel any different after I had been confirmed for the gift of the Holy Spirit. Months passed in this way and I sometimes wondered if, after all, it was what I heard other brothers and sisters testifying to, and wondered why I did not feel something of the kind myself. One good sister (whom I have good cause to love) often said, "Why don't you stand up and say a few words in the meetings?" I would reply that I should never be a speaker, being of a reserved and rather nervous temperament, I could not do it, besides I had nothing to say, but if I felt I had I should try.

The winter came on, and we had some severe frosts, but let me say first of all that the winter is my worst time as a rule, and I have been unable for days together to get about my work properly. But I got through these severe frosts better than I had done before for years, and felt very thankful to God for his goodness to me. Something whispered to me, "You must stand up in the meeting on Sunday and give thanks to God in the presence of his people," and when Sunday came I had made up my mind, though it seemed the hardest thing that the Lord could ask of me. After the meeting started Satan began too, and this is practically what he said, "I would not stand up here if I were you. Wait till Wednesday night at the cottage meeting. There will not be so many there then." But I am thankful to say that the Lord reminded me just then that if I did not do it I should be a coward and afraid to own him, so I arose to my feet and with trembling voice stammered out a few words of thankfulness to him for the strength he had given me.

Towards the end of that meeting our missionary in charge, Bro. J. H. N. Jones, spoke in prophecy to me and said that the Lord was well pleased with me and if I was faithful I should be the means of bringing some of my own relatives into the church, and while he was speaking I had a glorious witness of the Spirit. It came to me in the words of Job, "I know that my Redeemer lives." I felt like shouting it out for all to hear, and with it came that peace that passeth all understanding. I was lifted right out of myself and surroundings and it was a calm, holy peace that is impossible to describe. I moved about after the meeting was over and felt so rested and beyond aches or pains; they were all things of the past. I remember one sister coming to me as I sat giving the children their tea in rather a cold place (we take our tea with us as we have some distance to go), and saying, "Whatever are you doing here in the cold?" I replied that I was not cold, I was far above it all, and the cold could not reach me.

For days I lived in that ecstasy of peace and joy, and often felt that I wanted to go out into the street and shout out those words, "I know that my Redeemer lives," and they kept with me some weeks, constantly, till I stood up again in a meeting and spoke them.

Since that time I have had some sore trials to go through, and doubtings have risen in my mind, but again and again it comes back to me, so clear and plain, "I know that my Redeemer lives," and the doubts disappear and only the cross remains. Lately my cross has been very heavy and my body weak and I am impatient to get some of the load off.

"But oh! how different will it seem to be
When I have learned its preciousness to see;
No longer will I unbelieving say,
'Perhaps another is a better way.'

"Ah, no! henceforth my own desire will be,
That He who knows me best should choose for me;
And so whate'er his love sees good to send,
I'll trust it's best, because he knows the end."

And he has said that he will not give us more than we are able to bear. Though I fail and come far short of what I should be, it is comforting to know that he thought me worthy of the same witness as he gave that faithful and sorely tried servant of his thousands of years ago, and I pray that he may witness to others even as he did to me, and that I may ever be able to say, "I know that my Redeemer lives."

Your sister in the faith,

CARPENTER, OHIO, August 17, 1909.

Dear Herald: We are having quite an improvement on our church at Vales Mills, as we have the house raised and a new roof on, also the doors changed to the center of the building. The paint is already purchased to paint the building as soon as the weather fairs. If Brother Becker sees this it will remind him of his promise to paper our church if we would give him three meals a day; and we surely will do so. If nothing prevents we will have our church ready to paper this fall.

The few that are left are striving to do what they can for the cause and upbuilding of the kingdom. We have heard no preaching for quite a long while and we would love to have some elder come and stay a week or so with us. Sometimes it looks very discouraging, but we still try to press onward and follow in the footsteps of our Lord as near as we can. We ask an interest in your prayers that we may strive to come up higher and higher, that others may see this is the way and follow in the straight and narrow path.

It is storming this evening and it brings to mind a song Bro. L. R. Devore used to sing. I will write a couple of verses of it:

"Dark is the night, and cold the wind is blowing,
Nearer and nearer comes the breaker's roar,
Where shall I go or whither fly for refuge?
Hide me, my father, till the storm is o'er.

"With his loving hand to guide,
Let the clouds above me roll,
And the billows in their fury
Dash around me;
I can brave the wildest storm,
With his glory in my soul,
I can sing above the tempest,
'Praise the Lord.'"

If Brother Devore should see this, we would like to hear from him at Vales Mills once more, or Sister Devore either, also Bro. James Moler. We heard he was quite poorly. These brethren were the ones that brought the gospel to this country.

May God bless all of his children,

MISS EFFIE McLAUGHLIN.

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS, August 29, 1909.

Editors Herald: I send a loving greeting to your many readers, and must say that having had no opportunity for some time to get my paper I have missed the perusal of its much loved pages.

Boston is a beautiful Puritan city, picturesque and full of relics of the past. Boston Common, one of the old landmarks, has forty-eight acres which has been set apart for the use and pleasure of the people since 1640. It was at one time used for a training ground for the British soldiers, and people accused of witchcraft, murder, and piracy, here met their doom.

I find the world in general so engrossed in money-making and pleasure that they have no desire to hear anything concerning eternal things, although I met some who were interested and longed for something more real and satisfying. I spent two afternoons on Boston Common, giving literature. I was treated with respect and thanked very cordially for the reading. Many seemed to enjoy the literature and after reading for some time folded the papers carefully and tucked them in their pockets to be read at leisure. Some refused to take any reading matter, but among those who took it I noticed one young man in particular of more than average intelligence and of respectable appearance who appeared to be deeply interested in what he read. He would pause as though in deep thought before commencing again. One lady who sat by me told me she was very much interested in our conversation and gave me her address on leaving, as she wished more reading.

One of the ways to reach the people is by giving literature. I find that people are very easily approached in this way, and by this means the way is paved for conversation along gospel lines.

MRS. A. MCKENZIE.

CAVE ISLAND, ARKANSAS, August 17, 1909.

Editors Herald: The first part of June I made my way to the little city of Yellville, Arkansas, and opened up in the court-house. This was the first preaching ever done in this town by our elders, and as Yellville is not far from the town of Harrison, Arkansas, where a part of the ill-fated emigrant train bound for the West, was made up, the name "Mormon" has been written on their memory with a bloody pen. One can get an idea of what Brighamism has done (not only in Utah but in Arkansas) for the fair name of "saint." But I am thankful, indeed, that by the grace of God I have been able to get the truth before many of the good people of that part of Arkansas.

When once the curtain is lifted and the world sees Brighamism as it is, then will that "stumbling stone" of corruption sink into the quagmire of shame and give place in the host of nations to the angel message brought to Joseph the Seer.

Having closed my effort in Yellville I made my way to "Old Ennon," a hardshell Baptist stronghold, where a big day is announced for the second Sunday in June; singing, preaching, and feetwashing is the order of the day. Permit me to say that I had visited this part of the country in the month of May and had promised to come back in June. Well, in the afternoon of the second Sunday in June, I had the privilege of preaching to a large crowd of enthusiastic listeners. I am about to forget to say that Old Ennon is where my half-brother, G. G. Davis, a hardshell Baptist preacher, has preached for twenty years. He was present, and the whole thing was no doubt one cause of the excitement. Brother George took notes after Brother "Jimmy," and asked me to give him a few moments to reply. This was granted, but to his surprise he found that he needed more time; so by the time we closed the tilt some two hours had been spent in the fray.

Having already signed up papers for a big debate with Campbellites at Pyatt, Arkansas, four miles from Ennon, to be given the 15th of July, I made my way to Zinc, Arkansas. The Methodist preacher came out (behind the bush) and did all he could to close my effort. The town mayor sided in with him and run over town reading an "expose" of Mormonism by a Baptist preacher. When I called upon Mayor Cave and asked him for his reason for treating a citizen of the State of Arkansas as he had me, he flew into a rage and wanted to know if I would pretend to prove that "Joe Smith" had a good moral character. I told him, "Yes, sir, a better character than you can prove for yourself." I noticed this statement of mine got close to the mayor, and I found later that his character was anything but good. When I informed them that I would preach the gospel to them or sacrifice my life on their streets; and that if they caused me much more trouble I would call on the Governor of the State, Jeff. Davis, they made up their minds to "make haste to go slow" with the Davis family. They shut and then opened the schoolhouse for me and were glad to get off without prosecution. I preached in Zinc nearly two weeks and sold five copies of the Book of Mormon, made many friends, and received many invitations to come again.

My debate at Pyatt nearing and not being able to reach other places after some effort to do so, I made a flying trip home, got my books, and hied away for the battlefield. A little penning brought the gospel tent from Naylor, Missouri, and with it came Bro. H. V. Braun, whom I used as moderator. The tent came in time and the big guns were stationed. July 15, at 10 a. m., Bro. J. T. Davis was called upon to open fire on the enemy of the truth. The hot shot of truth fell so thick and fast in the ranks of the enemy that from the first hour it was seen by the great crowd that victory would crown the truth. Here I want to mention an incident that took place the morning of July 14: I was feeling despondent and uneasy over the outlook of the debate, hence concluded to go up into the mountain to pray. After finding myself alone I bowed and had the privilege of laying my troubles before the Lord, telling him that he could see how the enemy had defied the truth and that he knew the needs of his servant to insure victory for the truth. While thus engaged it seemed as some one was singing these lines,

"Fear not, I am with thee; O be not dismayed,
For I am thy God and will still give thee aid.
I'll strengthen thee, help thee, and cause thee to stand,
Upheld by my righteous, omnipotent hand.

"When through fiery trials thy pathway shall lie,
My grace all-sufficient shall be thy supply,
The flames shall not hurt thee, I only design
Thy dross to consume and thy gold to refine."

That night I dreamed that I saw all the Campbellites with blue tags on them for shipment. There were from five hundred to fifteen hundred attending the debate.

My opponent's name was T. S. Nallon. The voice of the people was unanimous for our side of the question. Worlds of misunderstanding were removed and hundreds of true friends made for the cause. My opponent said that he had asked me to work a miracle, but that I had not tried it. I told him that it was clear to the mind of the people that I had worked the greatest miracle of ancient or modern times, seeing that I had killed Campbellism, and for ever buried it in that country, and would raise a monument with this inscription:

"Here lies Campbellism, a terrible monster that's dead,
It died of a broken heart and a dreadful crack in the head."

At this the chairman had to call for order, such shouts and applause went up from the hundreds of people that I had to wait for a calm. I used my wheel chart on organization and used a crippled wheel in showing Reverend Nallon's church. In my least speech I said, "Mr. Chairman, I have tried for two days to get this man to take a ride on his wheel, but he has never touched the matter; in fact, he knows that should he try to ride on this broken-up outfit it would be a 'Rocky road to Georgia on a long summer day.'"

"Yes," said he, "but I rode that other wheel for two days."

I looked at him for a moment and then said, "Yes, elder, and that is the only gospel ride that you ever took in your life."

I have letters from Pyatt calling me to come in September. The work is onward in Arkansas.

Word comes from home that my little girl has the fever, so will go and see about the matter. Ever looking for the coming of the Lord,

In bonds,

J. T. DAVIS.

Extracts from Letters.

O. J. Hawn, McGregor, Michigan: "I baptized nine at Shabbona in the last two weeks, making twenty-two this conference year. I am now sick in bed. Doctor says it is a general breakdown from overwork. But the harvest is truly great. I hope to be out soon. Tell the dear Saints to remember their little brother."

Leroy Colbert, Chetek, Wisconsin, August 23: "Reunion of which I was secretary was a grand success. Four baptisms and a great deal of good was accomplished and we have twenty dollars on hand for next year. It seemed everything was pleasing to the Lord. One thing I believe worthy of mention and of interest is the statement of our cook (non-member) that one sack of flour made about one hundred loaves of bread, and many other things which she and others have and are advertising yet."

News From Branches

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

Last Friday night I was made correspondent for the branch, so herewith present my first effort:

The Cleveland Branch is still moving along, but not so fast as I would like to see it. Our principal way of bringing our belief before the public is at the open air services at the park. We have held meetings there for eight summers. We have usually had a missionary for this work. Brother Baldwin has spoken here this summer three times and Brother Haynes, of this branch, has spoken to the crowds on the other occasions. The crowds number from fifty to two hundred hearers. This part of the work does not show for much, but at least has done much toward breaking down prejudice against the church.

There is another meeting held immediately after ours; it being a union meeting of other churches. Their early arrivals have a chance to hear some of our belief. There is a platform with seats arranged around in the shade of some tall trees. We have a telescope organ, some hymn leaflets, also some booklets for distribution furnished by Bro. E. A. Webbe. We always have had the weather in our favor since several years ago, Bro. O. B. Thomas told the congregation that it would not rain until he finished. It rained as soon as the meeting was closed. This same thing has happened several times.

Our Sunday school is holding its own with steady attendance. The Religio has had something of a relapse, but is trying to pull onward and upward.

DES MOINES.

On account of feeling unwell I have neglected sending items from this place as often as I should, but as I am feeling better at present I hope not to disappoint the readers of our paper in the future by reason of neglecting to send items of interest.

The reunion of this district was held at Good's Park this year, from August 13 to 22 inclusive, and the results were elevating to the Saints and instructive to the few who attended. The preaching as a rule was good, and the prayer meetings were quite spiritual. A more particular account of this meeting will be given by the secretary.

The drought has caused a yellow sere to appear on the lawns, which hastens the appearance of autumn, and shortens the vegetable crops. The fruit will be quite plentiful, but the price will be high, and is high. This makes the prospects anything but bright for the poor of earth, and it is to be hoped that they will be more willing to listen to the word of prophecy that has foreshadowed these conditions, and what God is offering the people that they may be prepared for the rule of righteousness in the earth.

Many of the Saints are now visiting the greatest fair that has ever been held in this State. Some who did not find it convenient to tent at the reunion and thus receive spiritual blessings, and assist to make this feature of the district work a greater blessing to the church have, I learn, found it convenient to tent at the State Fair. I question whether this is representing our profession correctly. I fear that love for pleasure is in the ascendancy with many of God's professed followers. While there is much to be learned at the fair, and much of interest, yet we should be as willing to sacrifice of our time and means for the spread of the truth, and to receive spiritual development, as for the purpose of attending such places.

Several of the Lamoni Saints have enjoyed the privileges of the city during the summer, and some have been present at the reunion, and others have made a visit to the fair, but their stay at the fair has been short. Sr. D. C. White and her daughter Frances have both spent some weeks visiting with their daughter and sister, Sr. Mae Skinner. Sr. Frances returning home that her mother might come. The mother is still in the city. Sr. Carrie Lester made several days' visit with the young folks of the writer, participating in the latter part of the reunion, returning home Monday. Bro. Hollis Yarrington has spent a few days visiting the son of the writer. Bro. Hollis is an old acquaintance of the family, both living at Woodbine at the same time, and the young people attended the same school and Sunday school together.

Bro. Raymond Scott has been engaged as stenographer for the Capital City Carriage Company for the last three weeks, but has decided to resume his studies at Graceland, and complete a course in bookkeeping. This is a wise conclusion. What a blessing that our young people can secure an education that will place them where they can secure a competence, and stand in the front ranks among business men, or should so occupy if they associate with their education the development of gospel influences, and keep free from such habits as tobacco using, or drinking. It should be known that those who have contracted these habits can not hold the best positions in the commercial world. The better class of business men will not keep in their employ those addicted to these habits, even if they themselves indulge. While they may keep such ones for a time, they will keep their eyes open to find some one equally as well qualified to fill the position and free from these pernicious habits. The commercial schools of the city have advertised that they will not recommend their graduates who use tobacco or liquor, and they do not invite such to become their pupils.

I learn that Miss Elva Scott, with some of her friends, are in the city, but have not had the pleasure of seeing her.

The writer was called from the city on a very sad duty last Sunday to preach the funeral sermon of Miss Blanche Brockett, daughter of Sr. Clara Brockett. What made this doubly sad is that the father was at the critical point with the same disease, typhoid fever, and a younger brother was just recovering, but not able to be up, or to be privileged to see the remains of the sister. Miss Blanche was past eighteen, and just in the bloom of young womanhood, and such a pure-minded and noble-spirited girl, and such a help to her mother. But it was thought wise that she should be permitted to rest rather than labor, but we know not the reason why. On the way to the place of the funeral, Runnells, the engine run over a cow, and was thrown from the track, which delayed us for two hours, and on the return trip a delay of three hours was experienced, so that the great anxiety of the sister for the sick ones at home was very much intensified.

Last Sunday week the writer was called from the reunion to preach the funeral of Mrs. Knouf, whose husband was laid to rest about five months before, just before our departure to General Conference. The relatives are greatly impressed with the beauty of the gospel as outlined in the judgment and resurrection.

Many evidences of God's grace have been manifest in the power to be healed of late among the Saints. There have been some severe cases, and God has come to their relief.

Following the reunion it was thought advisable to continue the services at the church, so that the interest on the part of a few might be satisfied by permitting them continued privileges of investigation, but none came but Saints, and the meetings were discontinued after two nights, when Bro. W. Christy gave excellent instruction and encouragement to those present.

It is expected that tent meetings will be held at Carlisle, beginning the latter part of the week. During the tent meetings held there last summer quite an interest was manifest, and it is thought some harvesting may now be done. The appointment at Hastie has been temporarily discontinued on account of the reunion and the State Fair, but it is hoped to continue a series of services there in the near future.

CENTRAL CHICAGO.

Sunday, August 29, such a lovely day, so bright and cool. No one could have the weather as an excuse for not attending services to-day. Sermon in morning by Bro. Harry Passman from the West Side. Elder Pement occupied in the evening.

The West Side Sunday school sent an invitation to the South Side to attend a picnic at River Forest on Labor Day, the 6th instant, which was gladly accepted, and hope for a large attendance from both schools. We feel if we could meet oftener and get better acquainted we would love our brothers and sisters better, which would indicate spiritual growth. Do we consider what it means, and can we understand fully what it requires to "Love our neighbors as ourselves"?

Elder Allen returned Monday from the Plano reunion and reports an interesting and enjoyable time. Bro. Ed Lang and wife, also Bro. McGann are at home again, and delighted with the good sermons.

Branch business meeting was postponed one week from Monday, the 6th, on account of the picnic.

Last week we were sweltering and wishing for some cool breezes, this week we are shivering in the morning and evening and wishing for the heat, and some have started the fire in their furnaces.

Your correspondent will be at the Hotel Frontenac, (Thousand Islands) Frontenac, New York, Monday, the 13th, and expects to be very busy until the evening of the 16th, Thursday, acting as stenographer for "The Union" an insurance organization, but will have the privilege of staying a day longer to go sight-seeing, and I desire to visit the Falls on my return, so would be pleased to meet any of the Saints who may be located near.

He was the first person baptized into the Reorganized Church in Burleson County, Texas. He was a man of strong convictions, he acted upon his convictions, no matter what others thought about the matter. He died, as he had lived, in the faith once delivered to the Saints. He was buried near his home; a large concourse attended the funeral, which was conducted by E. W. Nunley.

WALLACE.—Grace Lovina, darling little daughter of George and Sr. Margaret Wallace, was born August 6, 1908, and died July 4, 1909, at Jobs, Ohio. CROPS AND RAINFALL

Visitors to the Omaha Corn Show will remember the magnificent display of farm products from Weston County, Wyoming, grown on exactly the same kind of soil that can now be taken in 320 acre homesteads. The Mondell Act applies to lands that receive from 18 to 21 inches of rainfall annually, and you only need to see the crops grown by the farmers already located there to be convinced. These homesteads can be taken along the Burlington's new line now building in Wyoming.

Editorial

THREE VIEWS OR DOGMAS.

We present below articles in contrast, which will prove sources of considerable thought among the readers of the HERALD. The first is an editorial digest of the attitude of Mrs. Besant, the high priestess of theosophy. The second is an extract from a sermon preached by Mrs. Mary Baker G. Eddy as to what Christian Science holds; and the third is an extract from the writings of Epicurus, who lived and died two hundred and seventy years before Christ. The first is in the form of a "Little lay sermon" appearing in the Kansas City Journal for August 8, 1909. The writer of this lay sermon does not make claim to ecclesiasticism, but in his title admits his claim to be of the laity. It is not a little curious that an acknowledged lay writer in a public journal should have so fair a conception of the claims made for any specific form of belief as this writer has shown in the discussion of the peculiar cult for which Mrs. Annie Besant stands as chief exponent. The other articles are direct, and speak for themselves.

A LITTLE LAY SERMON.

Mrs. Annie Besant, the high priestess of the fascinating but somewhat nebulous cult of theosophy, has been giving utterance during her lecture tour to some sentiments and opinions which would be very interesting if probable and very important if true. To the first class undoubtedly belong her views on sin and suffering, which Mrs. Besant declares are in the world as aids to progress through successive reincarnations. The sad and thorny problem of sin has burdened the hearts and wearied the brains of thousands of the world's thinkers. Those who only imagine that they are thinking, however, have no difficulty in airily settling these questions. Mrs. Besant says that through the experience which comes from sin human beings are prepared for higher planes of consecutive existence through all the long years and ages that intervene between the Alpha of the first beginning and the mighty Omega of Nirvana, or ultimate perfection.

This theory is not so revolutionary as might be expected from a devotee of occidentalized oriental philosophy. The doctrine of growth through error, or rising by falling, of purging in the fire of evil, of climbing up the ladder of our own frailty, appears in numerous guises through all the meandering gamut of secular and ecclesiastical thinking. With Longfellow's "Ladder of Saint Augustine" in mind, Tennyson, the great singer whose centennial birthday anniversary was observed last week, wrote:

"I hold it true with him who sings
To one clear harp in divers tones
That men may rise on stepping-stones
Of their dead selves to higher things."

Theodore Parker had for the keystone of his arch of belief that every fall was "a fall upward." The child learns to walk by his failures as a toddler, and the toddling human race learns and grows and progresses after much the same fashion. It is only when Mrs. Besant forsakes the broad highway of reasoning which appeals to the normal mind, and wanders among the daisy meadows of fascinating and unprovable mysticism, that her doctrine wavers and ceases to preserve a commanding form. There is no possible way of proving that human beings are reincarnated. The whole world is torn in the throes of the effort to demonstrate, or convince the multitude, that there is one more life than this. We can perceive something immensely alluring in the thought that there is no hurry about progressing; that if one does not reach a higher level this time, he has uncounted æons ahead of him and can try it again and again; that if he gets lost in his wanderings through the shadowy corridors of the labyrinth of existence in searching for the ultimate opening, he may have all the time he wants, certain of coming out on the sunlight level before eternity's sun sets—to adopt a figure no more parabolic than the creed discussed.

Much the safest plan is to go on the theory that no time is to be lost if one desires to get ahead. Every hour the realization of a high desire is delayed is an hour irrecoverably past. We are sure of to-day. To-morrow never comes and yesterday is dead. The present moment is the only one of which we are certain as an asset making for upward progress. Men may fall and rise, for that is the way of humanity, but every fall may be the last and it is best to get up as quickly as possible.

Mrs. Besant entertains some iridescent soap bubble views on reincarnation, the most interesting of which is the idea that Christ is soon to appear in a reincarnated form, probably that of a woman. With all reverence, such doctrines must be protested. Jesus Christ belongs to humanity and not to the narrow confines of a cult. There are something like four billion people in the world. Whatever the number matters little. The fact is that Mrs. Besant is grotesquely provincial in circumscribing the divinity of humanity. It is mere juggling with the terms of speech to say that Christ exists to-day or will ever exist in one human form alone, whether he is regarded as the actuating motive of Christian conduct, as the type of the universal divinity to which humanity is heir, or as the personal Savior of a sin-ridden world. What real difference is there between the cultured egotism of reincarnated divinity and the poor ignorant street corner enthusiast who proclaims himself to be God? The fantastic doctrines of Mrs. Besant in this respect may while away an idle dilettanti hour of speculation, but they can never command the serious consideration of thinking people. This world and one more, this life and another, have engaged the attention of the race for several thousand years and have proved a hard enough problem to handle, without multiplying the complexities of the tangled sum.

The second article is taken from a sermon preached by Mrs. Eddy in Chickering Hall, Boston, Massachusetts, on the Sunday before Christmas, 1888, and published in the eighth volume of Masterpieces of the World's Literature, pages 4056 to 4067. The text of this sermon is from Isaiah 9:6. The subject is, "The corporeal and incorporeal." Leaving out the preliminaries which led up to the point we present, Mrs. Eddy says:

Only three years a personal Savior! yet, the foundations he laid are as eternal as truth, the chief corner stone.

After his brief, brave struggle, and the crucifixion of the corporeal man, the incorporeal Savior—the Christ or spiritual idea which leadeth into all truth—must needs come in Christian Science, demonstrating the spiritual healing of body and mind.

This idea or divine essence was, and is, for ever about the Father's business; heralding the principle of health, holiness, and immortality.

Its divine principle interprets the incorporeal idea, or Son of God; hence the incorporeal and corporeal are distinguished thus: the former is the spiritual idea that represents divine good; and the latter is the human presentation of goodness in man. The Science of Christianity, that has appeared in the ripeness of time, reveals the incorporeal Christ; and this will continue to be seen more clearly until it be acknowledged, understood,—and the Savior, which is truth, be comprehended. . . .

The last appearing of truth will be a wholly spiritual idea of God and man, without the fetters of the flesh, or corporeality. This infinite idea of infinity will be, is, as eternal as its divine principle. The day-star of this appearing is the light of Christian Science—the science which rends the veil of the flesh from top to bottom. The light of this revelation leaves nothing that is material; neither darkness, doubt, disease, nor death. The material corporeality disappears; and individual spirituality, perfect, and eternal, appears—never to disappear. . . .

The material questions at this age on the reappearing of the infantile thought of God's man, are after the manner of a mother in the flesh, though their answers pertain to the spiritual idea, as in Christian Science:

Is he deformed?

He is wholly symmetrical; the one altogether lovely.

Is the babe a son or daughter?

Both son and daughter; even the compound idea of all that resembles God.

How much does he weigh?

His substance outweighs the material world.

How old is he?

Of his days there is no beginning and no ending.

What is his name?

Christ Science.

Who are his parents, brothers, and sisters?

His father and mother are divine life, truth and love; and they who do the will of his Father are his brethren.

Is he heir to an estate?

"The government shall be upon his shoulders." He has dominion over the whole earth; and in admiration of his origin, he exclaims, "I thank thee, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them unto babes!"

Is he wonderful?

His works thus prove him. He giveth power, peace, and holiness; he exalteth the lowly: he giveth liberty to the captive, health to the sick, salvation from sin to the sinner—and overcometh the world!

Go and tell what things ye shall see and hear; how the blind, spiritually and physically, receive sight; how the lame, those halting between two opinions or hobbling on crutches, walk; how the physical and moral lepers are cleansed; how the deaf—those who having ears, hear not, and are afflicted with "tympanum on the brain"—hear; how the dead, those buried in dogmas and physical ailments, are raised; that to the poor—the lowly in Christ, not the man-made rabbi—the gospel is preached. Note this: Only such as are pure in spirit, emptied of vainglory and vain knowledge, receive truth.

Here ends the colloquy; and a voice from heaven seems to say, "Come and see."

From a second point Mrs. Eddy says:

It is plain that the me spoken of in the first Commandment, must be mind; for matter is not the Christian's god, and is not intelligent. Matter can not even talk; and the serpent, Satan, the first talker in its behalf, lied. Reason and revelation declare that God is both noumena and phenomena,—the first and only cause. The universe, including man, is not a result of atomic action, material force or energy; it is not organized dust. God, spirit, mind, are terms synonymous for the one God, whose reflection is creation, and man is his image and likeness. Few there are who comprehend what Christian Science means by the word reflection. God is seen only in that which reflects good, life, truth, love—yea, which manifests all his attributes and power, even as the human likeness thrown upon the mirror repeats precisely the looks and actions of the object in front of it. All must be mind and mind's ideas; since, according to natural science, God, spirit, could not change its species and evolve matter. . . .

According to reason and revelation, evil and matter are negation; for evil signifies the absence of good, God, though God is ever present; and matter claims something besides God, when God is real all. Creation, evolution, or manifestation,—being in and of the spirit, mind, and all that really is,—must be spiritual and mental. This is science, and is susceptible of proof.

But say you, is a stone spiritual?

To erring material sense, No! but to unerring spiritual sense, it is a small manifestation of mind, a type of spiritual substance, "the substance of things hoped for." Mortals can know a stone as substance, only by first admitting that it is substantial. Take away the mortal sense of substance, and the stone itself would disappear, only to reappear in the spiritual sense thereof. Matter can neither see, hear, feel, taste, nor smell; having no sensation of its own. Perception by the five personal senses is mental, and dependent on the beliefs that mortals entertain. Destroy the belief that you can walk, and volition ceases; for muscles can not move without mind. Matter takes no cognizance of matter. In dreams, things are only what mortal mind makes them; and the phenomena of mortal life are as dreams; and this so-called life is a dream soon told. In proportion as mortals turn from this mortal and material dream to the true sense of reality, everlasting life will be found to be the only life. That death does not destroy the beliefs of the flesh, our Master proved to his doubting disciple, Thomas. Also, he demonstrated that divine science alone can overbear materiality and mortality, and this great truth was shown by his ascension after death, whereby he arose above the illusion of matter.

The quotation from Epicurus is found on page 4274 of the Masterpieces of the World's Literature:

THE PHYSICAL PHILOSOPHY OF EPICURUS.

Everything that exists is material; the intangible is non-existent or is empty space. If a thing exists it must be felt, and to be felt it must exert resistance. But everything is not intangible which our senses are not subtle enough to perceive. We must indeed accept our senses; but we must also believe much which is not directly testified by sensation, if only it does not contravene our sensations, and serves to explain phenomena. We must believe that space is infinite, and that there is an infinite number of indivisible, indestructible atoms in perpetual motion in this illimitable space. These atoms, differing in size, figure, and weight, move with equal and inconceivable velocities, and are for ever giving rise to new worlds, which are perpetually tending toward dissolution, and toward a fresh series of creations. This universe of ours is only one section out of the innumerable worlds in infinite space. The soul of man is only a more subtle species of body diffused throughout every part of his frame. It pervades the human structure, and works with it; but it could not act as it does unless it were corporeal. The phenomena of vision for instance, are explained on the principle of materialism. From the surface of all objects are constantly flowing filmy images exactly copying the solid body from which they originate; and these images by direct impact on the organism, produce the phenomena of vision.

Henry Ward Beecher once said in reference to the religions of the present day that the idea of getting religion was all a mistake; that religion was not a commodity that it could be said of it, or of the great variety in existence, "You pay your money and you take your choice"; that a man could not get religion, but that his religion must get him, mind and body, and all there was of him. But here are three views, the dogmas of Mrs. Besant; the dogmas of Mrs. Eddy, and the dogma of Epicurus, the last one having been written in the lifetime of a man who died two hundred and seventy years before Christ was born. The contrast is striking; and will provoke thought in the minds of the readers.

AN IMPORTANT NUMBER.

The next number of the SAINTS' HERALD Historical Series will be entitled, "Obtaining the plates, work of translation, and publishing of the Book of Mormon." This article will be by Elder Walter W. Smith, pastor of the church in Philadelphia. Brother Walter has charge of the normal work in the auxiliary societies and is author of the normal course on the Book of Mormon. While engaged in that work he made an exhaustive study of historical facts connected with the Book of Mormon and is consequently well qualified both in point of ability and knowledge to handle the subject taken up in this article.

With the article will appear a half-tone reproduction of a page from the original manuscript of the Book of Mormon. There will also be a fine half-tone reproduction of the characters drawn by Joseph Smith and sent to Professor Anthon by the hand of Martin Harris. The slip of paper bearing these characters was preserved by David Whitmer and passed into the possession of the church in connection with the original manuscript of the Book of Mormon. Cuts have been printed from drawings made from this famous paper, but this is probably the first reproduction from a photo taken direct, consequently it is the most exact likeness of the original Book of Mormon characters ever printed. We will also print it on plate paper as a supplement for the benefit of the ministry and other students of the book who may desire to preserve it for reference.

EDITORIAL SELECTIONS.

THE TEN "LOST TRIBES."

Hundreds of volumes have been written about the possible fate of the ten "lost tribes" of Israel. As a matter of fact, no one knows what became of those tribes.

When the twelve tribes of Israel broke their long alliance the tribes of Judah and Benjamin remained in Southern Palestine, with Jerusalem as their capital. The seceding Israelites, generally known as the "ten tribes," settled to the northward, in Samaria and elsewhere.

In 722 or 721 B. C., Sargon, King of Assyria, swept down upon Samaria, carried away many thousands of its citizens into captivity and repopulated the conquered country with Babylonian and Syria colonists.

The "ten tribes" carried into captivity or driven from their homes by Sargon seem to have vanished thenceforth from the face of the earth. What became of them? Where did they go? And why has no definite trace of them been found?

When the descendants of the remaining two tribes of Israel were overcome later, and finally driven from their own land, so strong was their personality and racial power that they endured, despite bitter oppression, throughout the centuries, with splendid tenacity and courage keeping their religion, history and customs intact.

Why did the "ten tribes" (practically of the same race) vanish? It can scarcely be that all were slain, or that all died in captivity, leaving no descendants?

They presumably migrated somewhere. Where? The question has puzzled archaeologists and historians for centuries.

Some authorities say that the lost tribes long afterward appeared as the lawless, gallant Anglo-Saxon, whose origin is still more or less obscure.

Other European races have been supposedly traced to these missing Israelites, while a few commentators suppose the captives were gradually merged into the nationalities of their conquerors and of neighboring peoples:

Most interesting to Americans of all the varying theories is that the ten tribes in some way crossed to this country and became what were later known as "Indians."

Early Spanish priests who settled in America firmly believe this. So did Roger Williams, Cotton Mather, and many later theologians and scientists.

Certain Indian dialects were found to have words, phrases and other forms of speech strongly suggestive of Hebrew origin. Several other characteristics seemed to bear out the theory.

Charles Beatty, an eighteenth century missionary, wrote in 1768 that he was sure he had found traces of the "lost tribes" among the Delaware Indians. He repeated a story (whose truth can not, of course, be established) that Indians had once shown to the white men an ancient scroll that contained portions of the ancient Hebrew law.

Despite all the theories, rumors and hazardous guesses as to the ten "lost tribes," no absolutely authentic word as to their fate has ever been, or ever can be, learned.

Fully twenty-seven thousand men, women and children were driven from Samaria about 722 B. C. And from that moment history is silent regarding them.

The earth in those days was more sparsely populated than now and its unknown regions were many. There were countless places where the Samaritan refugees might have settled and flourished as an independent nation.

Yet the archives of no nation or land describe such a settlement. There is no certain trace to be found anywhere of the missing race.—Albert Payson Terhune in Post-Dispatch.

THE BROKEN SWORD.

There is a fine old story about a fighter who had battled bravely all through the battle until his sword was broken. He despaired of the victory at this disaster and after longing for a jeweled sword such as the king's son carried he threw away his broken blade and fled the field. The king's son, having lost his sword in the fight, came that way, longing for any sort of weapon that would strike a blow, and seeing the sword that had been cast aside seized it and waving it at the head of his troops, carried the day and gained a great victory. It is only a little flight of eloquent fancy, but it illuminates like a lightning flash the irrepressible conflict of to-day, the Armageddon which is being fought now and not in the ultimate time. Many a fighter does not strike a blow that might prove strong and effective, because he hasn't a gilded sword or the command of chosen troops, and many a victory is won by weapons that others have cast away in despair, which is often only vanity. The organization of this federation is something like the coming of the king's son—if not to take up these discarded blades, at least to strike mighty blows for good, to put new courage into the brave ones who have fought on and on through the years when the king's son seemed not to be concerned in the issue of the fight.—Kansas City Journal.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

The Herald Office has just finished a pamphlet for Elder Macgregor entitled, "A marvelous work and a wonder," giving a splendid presentation of the establishment of the primitive church, the apostasy, the reformation, and the restoration. Several have asked Brother Macgregor for his evidence, touching the date of the apostasy, which he claims was 570 A. D., and the brother has made presentation of the evidence in this work. It sells for ten cents and can be had from the Herald Office. This article is now running as a serial in the Autumn Leaves.

The HERALD editors are in receipt of number one, volume one, of the Central Church Bulletin, published at Kansas City, Missouri, W. E. LaRue, editor. This, as the name indicates, is a publication issued in the interests of the Central Branch of Kansas City. It is a four-page paper, published monthly, and no doubt will be a help to Pastor LaRue and his associates in their work in the Central Church.

The Saints of Western Iowa seem to have conducted themselves in such a manner as to win the esteem and confidence of their neighbors and friends. We notice by the Denison Review, published at Denison, Iowa, September 1, that the people of Denison are preparing to make a determined effort to secure the Western Iowa reunion for next year. They are sending a delegation to meet with the reunion people at Little Sioux, and will offer strong inducements to them to meet in the city of Denison in 1910. This speaks well for the personal lives of our church members in the field, and shows that they have overcome prejudice and compelled respect.

After going to press with our last issue in which we mentioned Doctor Cook's discovery of the North Pole, word came flashing from the North that Lieut. Robert E. Peary had found the pole. At present there is a lively controversy going as to whether Doctor Cook really reached the pole. Peary wires that Cook's story should not be believed. Cook insists that investigation will prove the truth of his claim. At any rate, the North Pole has been reached and the honor of this discovery comes to America. One wag says Americans have discovered everything but America and they didn't get a fair show at that.

Elders Gomer Wells and Wardell Christy were Sunday's speakers at Lamoni.

On last week the Lamoni branch choir lost both their chorister and organist when Bro. and Sr. David Anderson left for Iowa City. Their year's work with the choir was marked by a substantial gain in choir interest and performance.

"The sure way to miss success is to miss opportunity."

Laying up treasures in heaven is not a nickle-in-the-slot business.—Baptist Chronicle.

A good deal of cheap ethics clothed in fine phrases is passed off as religion these days.—Epworth Herald.

"What shall we say of a bishop in these days who addresses a conference of young men thus: 'I beg you, I beseech you, not to read any works on evolution or higher criticism; but live and die in the faith of your mothers. And if it be said that then you will die in ignorance, be it so, and praise God for an ignorance that will give you peace. This is simply a recurrence of the dear old doctrine that ignorance is the mother of devotion.'"—Selected.

Let us clasp hands and cover one another's faults. Let us sympathize more and criticize less; let us love more and hate less; let us bear more and smite less; and by and by, as we stand disenthralled from our petty prejudices and our little narrowness, we shall pity ourselves for every stone we threw, but we shall never be sorry for any tear that we shed, or any hour of patient endurance that we experienced for another. Not the songs you sang and not the wealth you amassed, but what you did for those who needed your help will be your supremest joy in that hour.—Jewish Progress.

Elders' Note-Book

DEDICATED TO THE FEDERATION OF CHURCHES.-

In the month of December, 1908, over thirty so-called evangelical churches met as a "Federation of the Churches of Christ." They represented eighteen million souls. Some of our brethren applied for admission, but were denied on the ground that we believed in present revelation and the gospel gifts.

They did not kick us out, for they would not let us in
To their Federation, for they said, "It is a sin
To believe that God has spoken since the Apostle's time
And has taught us by the Spirit to know the truth sublime."
They say it is absurd to believe Christ's sacred word
When he sent out his disciples to represent their Lord, (As recorded in the gospel of Saint Mark so plain
A wayfaring man may read though the world may disdain)
To declare his glorious gospel to sinful, dying man,
And the blessings that should follow all who accept his plan.
And so they have no use for Saints of latter days,
Because we firmly stand for God's wonder-working ways.
Believing that his promises are yea and amen
To all who would receive his word in this our day, as then.
So in their blind conceit this Federation goes,
Drawing aside their garments, as piously they pose,
Lest the touch of truth defile them, or open their eyes
To their true condition and the truth which they despise.
May God have mercy on them and lead them to the light
From bigotry's gross arrogance, and sin's dark night.
May he his saving truth unto their souls reveal
That they may be his children and by his Spirit sealed,
And know that he is willing to reveal himself to all
Who truly seek to know his will, when we humbly call.

OBLIVION PREFERRED.

PERHAPS.—A traveler in Tennessee came across an aged negro seated in front of his cabin door basking in the sunshine.

"He could have walked right on the stage for an Uncle Tom part without a line of make-up," says the traveler. "He must have been eighty years of age."

"Good morning, Uncle," said the stranger.

"Mornin' sah! Mornin'," said the aged one. Then he added, "Be you the gentleman over yonder from New York?"

Being told that such was the case, the old darkey said, "Do you mind telling me something that has been botherin' my old haid? I have got a grandson—he runs on the Pullman cyars—and he done tells me that up thar in New York you all burn up youah folks when they die. He is a powerful liar, and I don't believe him."

"Yes," replied the other, "that is the truth in some cases. We call it cremation."

"Well, you suttently surprise me," said the negro, and then he paused as if in deep reflection. Finally he said, "You-all know I am a Baptist. I believe in the resurrection and the life everlastin' and the comin' of the Angel Gabriel and the blowin' of that great horn, and Lawdy me, how am they evah goin' to find them folks on that great mawnin'?"

It was too great a task for an off-hand answer, and the suggestion was made that the aged one consult his minister. Again the negro fell into a brown study, and then he raised his head and his eyes twinkled merrily, and he said in a soft voice:

"Meanin' no offense, sah, but from what Ah have heard about New York, I kinder calcerlate they is a lot of them New York people that doan' wanten be found on that mornin'."—Cosmopolitan.

THE PASTOR.

Ian Maclaren says, in the Cure of Souls: "If the preacher be ill, there are paragraphs in the newspapers, but if that preacher be a true pastor, there is concern in humble homes." One preacher in a city follows the plan of insurance agents; he makes night calls. After supper he can see all the family. The writer has tried it in the last two months, and it is an open secret for the alert minister. One preacher that I heard of puts on a business suit, puts on a cheery and natural manner and calls briefly on business men, unless urged to stay longer, and talk church matters. One minister at the New Orleans convention sent home a number of postal cards to his flock and some men outside his congregation that he hoped to make Christians. It is unnecessary for me to illustrate further. "The earth is the Lord's" and "all things are yours," said Paul. The Bible leaves a man free to use anything and everything, and do anything and everything, that does not pander to lust.—Christian Standard.

WHAT IS INSPIRATION?

Worcester states that it is an infusion of supernatural ideas into the mind. To infuse, to animate, to enliven.

If we depend entirely on the first definition given, it limits inspiration to the supernatural only, while the other definitions simply suggest a spasmodic response to an awakening stimulus which may be permanent or transitory.

Inspiration, in the mind of the writer, is not always a supernatural transmission of unimpeachable facts; nor is it a thing apart from the possible researches of the human mentality.

Job says: "But there is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding."—32: 8. According to this statement it is the spirit which has the understanding, and is the presiding essence of the human intellect. It is the inspiration of the Almighty which giveth them, the spirits, understanding. According to this, understanding, wisdom, intelligence, and inspiration are simply degrees, and are to all intents synonymous, for the spirit's understanding is a part of the inspiration of the Almighty.

If, then, understanding, wisdom, intelligence, mental comprehensions and inspiration are simply degrees of mental development, we might classify inspiration as the acme of mental attainment.

True, there are times when the inspiration of the Almighty operates upon the subjective mind of an individual, or we might say the superior intelligence overshadows the lesser, magnetizing it for the time being, that they both act synchronously, and the result is a revelation of the superior mind, for the lesser must always partake of the greater.

Inspiration, like spirit, can not be fettered by material substances; it is undemonstrable, non-analytical, and incomprehensible so far as the modus operandi through materialistic things is concerned.

Inspiration, then, is the revelation of superior intelligence, or the transmission of knowledge, or the comprehension of the fundamental laws and principles which form the government of all things.

We read that "the glory of God is intelligence." It is the transmission of this intelligence, line upon line, precept upon precept, to mankind that constitutes inspiration. Therefore inspiration is transmitted knowledge through application and endeavor, and is not necessarily or entirely a supernatural infusion.

Plenary inspiration, or full and complete inspiration, is a revelation of the mind of the Almighty, and is supernatural so far as human objective intelligence is concerned, but in the actual relationship, or spiritual comparison, to my mind it is simply the subjective sense in communication with the essence of intelligence, or the master mind operating in a psychological sense.

SECTION 106 PUBLISHED AS EARLY AS 1842.

A CHAPTER FROM THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH IN PHILADELPHIA.

[EDITOR'S NOTE.—This article is not admitted with a view to reopening the well remembered discussion of section 106; but because of its historical interest to those who wish to know if the revelation now known as section 106 was known and published during the life of the Martyr. A copy of the book referred to may be found in the library at Columbus, Ohio, and the revelation in question has been verified by Bro. Winn and others of the branch in Columbus.—EDITORS.]

Early in the year 1841 efforts were made to introduce the gospel in the village of Frankford, Pennsylvania, some five miles above Philadelphia. In February the auditorium of the Academy was obtained and preaching begun by Elder Benjamin Winchester. At the close of a discourse upon the subject of "The second coming of Christ and the establishment of his kingdom," opportunity was given for anyone to make a remark on the subject or ask a question. A Mr. Lee arose and said that he had no confidence in the new sect, that they would soon ask all the converts to give up their properties. He then displayed a ten-dollar Kirtland bank note, saying, "If you are honest and want to show that you are, redeem this note of the Kirtland Safety Society," etc. Elder Winchester gave an account of the Kirtland bank and its discontinuance and the causes that led to it, assuring the audience that he could find plenty of ministers of other churches who had been caught by the financial collapse of banks in which they were interested. He also defined the law of tithing and consecrations taught by the church.

This seems not to have satisfied Mr. Lee, as he wrote quite a sharp article entitled, "Mormon delusion and great excitement in Frankford," which appeared in the Philadelphia Daily Chronicle for Friday, February 19, 1841. Elder Winchester sought an opportunity to answer the matter in the same paper and was refused. He however answered the article through the Philadelphia Public Ledger and Daily Transcript, of Tuesday, February 23, 1841, in which he says no excitement existed except that caused by Mr. Lee. He further stated that every note issued by the authority of the president and treasurer of the Kirtland Safety Society bank, was redeemed dollar for dollar at par; but that certain persons well known had stolen several thousand dollars' worth of the notes and forged the names of the officials of the bank and circulated them, and that the bank had wisely refused to redeem the spurious notes thus fraudulently issued, and would hardly be expected to redeem a note that had been forged and circulated without bringing anything into the bank.

Still Mr. Lee was not satisfied, it seems, as he wrote to Kirtland, making inquiry about the Saints, the Kirtland bank, and the common stock enterprises. The letter was answered by Mr. Smalling, of Kirtland, Ohio, portions of which we copy from Gleanings by the Way, by Rev. John A. Clark, Philadelphia and New York, 1842, in which the letter or portions of it were published.

"KIRTLAND, OHIO, March 10, 1841.

"Dear Sir:

"By request and a duty I owe to my fellow-man I consent to answer your letter. [Here follows a tirade upon the Saints and the Kirtland bank in general.]

"The church have not now nor never have had any common stock, all that has been consecrated Smith and the heads of the church have got and what they get now they keep. For to show this I send you a revelation which is as follows:

“Revelation given July 9, 1837, in Far West, Caldwell County, Missouri,—Oh Lord show unto us thy servants, how much thou requirest of the properties of thy people for a tything? Answer;—Verily, Thus saith the Lord, I require all their surplus properties to be put into the hands of the bishop of My Church of Zion, for the building of mine house, and for the laying the foundation of Zion, and for the priesthood and for the debts of the Presidency of my Church, and this shall be the beginning of the Tything of My people and after that those who have been tythed, shall pay one-tenth of all their interests annually, and this shall be a standing law unto them forever, for my holy priesthood saith the Lord: Verily I say unto you it shall come to pass, that all those who gather unto the land of Zion shall be tythed of their surplus properties and shall observe this law, or they shall not be found worthy to abide among you: and behold I say unto you if my people observe not this law to keep it holy, and by this sanctify the land of Zion unto me, and my statutes and my judgments may be kept thereon that it may be most holy, behold: verily I say unto you it shall not be a land of Zion unto you, and this shall one example unto all the states of Zion, even so Amen.’

“Yours, etc.

“CYRUS SMALLING, of Kirtland.”

It will be observed that Elder Winchester was on the ground at Kirtland, Ohio, when the Kirtland Safety Society bank was running, was well acquainted with the circumstances leading to its discontinuance, and probably gave a very correct explanation of the matter. It will further be observed that the text of the revelation as given in Smalling's letter differs very slightly from the text of section 106 in the present edition of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, the chief error being in the date.

That this revelation was in general use very early after it was given in 1838, and was even had by the opposers of the church will be seen by the foregoing and will be interesting to some.

John A. Clark was rector of the P. E. Church at Palmyra, New York, 1830, and had some recollections of the Saints and of the Smiths, etc. A copy of the book is in the State Library at Columbus, Ohio, where I copied the matters from it in this article.

His book, Gleanings by the Way, is a book of 304 pages, twelve mo., published in Philadelphia in 1842, and also in New York at the same date from the same plates, and I am informed that it also appeared in London, England, about the same time, or later, though I do not know this.

Yours in the interests of truth,
WALTER W. SMITH.

JASON BRIGGS NOT AN APOSTATE.

What is an apostate? A definition lies before me which reads, “Change in belief; pervert, renegade, faithless.” “Originally,” says Webster, “applied to one who had abandoned his religion.” Now, is it a proper thing to apply these terms to Jason W. Briggs and Zenos H. Gurley? We say no, and challenge their correctness. The writer chanced to be quite well acquainted with both Jason W. Briggs and Zenos H. Gurley and knows something of their beliefs and opinions.

Jason W. Briggs will be noticed in particular in this article, as Zenos H. Gurley is still living and can speak for himself. No doubt it affords a certain class of people considerable comfort to characterize Jason W. Briggs as an “apostate” for the reason that Jason W. Briggs stood ready with a challenge in his hand to prove them “apostates.”

Jason W. Briggs was an important personage in the early history of the Reorganization and some people would like to see a cloud placed upon his name for the effect it would have, or be likely to have, upon others. He was a strong personality, had a gifted mind, was a first-class thinker, and accustomed to challenge, analyze and examine into things as they came to him, old and new. Apt to talk on either side of a question at times, in order to call out the views of the other man. Reconsider what he had gone over before to be sure that it was sane and safe. Should it appear strange then, that such a personage as this would entertain views and opinions at one time that he would modify or abandon at another? Who is it that does not change in his beliefs and opinions about many things who is capable of consecutive thought? Who is it that never changes? “Fools,” it is said. But did Jason W. Briggs go back on and deny the foundation principles upon which the church is built? We have yet to learn that he did. But did he not withdraw from the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and did not that make him an “apostate”?

Perhaps a little light thrown on here will help to arrive at a proper conclusion in regard to this. What were some of the causes which led to his withdrawal from the church? They were these. He did not agree with some other men's opinions and views in the church in regard to church policy, conference actions, and church tendencies, interpretations of scripture, etc. He believed that there was a changed attitude being assumed by the church in its policy, and one of illiberality and intolerance was being fostered, a strike at the free expression of opinion. He expressed it, “There was an attempt to gag me.” Now, whether this was real or imaginary it would have the same effect upon his mind. He thought he saw a disposition in some quarters to rule with a high hand and dominate after the manner of Brighamism, which was ever obnoxious to his way of thinking and believing. Zenos H. Gurley was affected with similar views and feelings. They may have been supersensitive on this point. Men who had been watching Strangism, Brighamism, and a great many other isms for more than half a century and noted the tyranny and oppression perpetrated by one class upon another, would be likely to see things of that class when least looked for by others. They thought they saw a change in the spirit and tendency of the church and because dissatisfied. They sent in their request to withdraw from the church. It was presented to the General Conference then in session and was acted upon in mass, without making inquiry into the causes that led them to take the step. The rules governing in the church for expelling or releasing members require a court of inquiry and labor to be performed with the parties affected before expulsion or release, neither of which was done in this instance. As on similar occasions there was party, division, prejudice. The members of the Quorum of Twelve saw the error and haste in procedure and voted as a unit against it. Of course, the conference being all powerful, followed its own course. Did not have to regard the rules and precedents made to apply to similar cases when members were being dealt with for their membership.

But aren't you broadly hinting, some may say, that the conference may have erred in that matter? It will be time enough to answer that when some one advances the claim that the conference decisions, like that held for the pope of Rome, are infallible, and that it can not err.

The writer saw Jason W. Briggs at his home a few days after the action of the conference in this case and its adjournment. He listened with interest to the news and doings of the conference and then stated, "Had I known that the conference would have passed the resolutions and adopted the policy it did, I would not have sent in my request to withdraw." He expressed himself as satisfied with the work of the conference relating to its regular business. He seemed to realize that he might have been hasty in sending in his name, and so expressed himself; but went on to say that Brother Gurley wrote him and wanted him to sign with him a request to withdraw from the church, and he signed with him. Both of these men were disaffected in regard to the course some things were tending in the church, but both believed in God as the Creator of all things and in Jesus Christ and in the Holy Ghost. Both believed in this last dispensation as announced in the angel's message, the Book of Mormon and the revelations, and now, after being informed in regard to the doings of the General Conference, Jason W. Briggs expresses himself as being duly in accord with even that. Wherein lay this man's apostasy, then, that is being so flippantly asserted, printed and circulated? Why this: he did not believe in some things that some people believed in, and some other people did not believe in some things he believed in. The same old hydraheaded enemy that has been forging conflict and divisions since the world began; I am orthodox, you are apostate; Islam is the true faith, Christianity is false; the holy Roman Catholic faith is the true one and all Protestants of whatever name are apostate and will be damned.

The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints is built upon a broader and better foundation than this; she is more tolerant of individual rights, beliefs, and opinions. She has never resolved a set standard of belief that every one must subscribe to or be left exposed to be branded as "apostate." When men and women manifest a belief in God, the Creator of all things, in the mission of Jesus Christ in the world, and in the Holy Spirit, and wish to unite with the church, they are not even asked as a prerequisite to baptism to believe in the Book of Mormon, or that Joseph Smith was a prophet. Once in the church it is believed that the enlightening influence of the Holy Ghost will lead them into the light of these things, if they are in search of the truth. A belief in Jesus Christ and his gospel is considered a sufficient test here to admit into communion and fellowship. The other flows in with enlightenment as the judgment is informed and prejudice removed. These are main tests of Christian belief.

Hundreds and thousands who belonged to the church at the time of the breaking up at Nauvoo, Illinois, utterly refuses to indorse, fellowship, or follow any of the various factions growing out of it. Each of the factions branded them as "apostates," and put the same brand upon each other. Strangites called Brighamites "apostates." Brighamites called Strangites "apostates." Brighamites call the members of the Reorganized Church "apostates," and they take great delight in it. The elders of the Reorganized Church stand ready to prove that Brighamites are "apostates," not because of an illiberal and intolerant feeling harbored toward them, but because they have departed from the fundamental belief of the church and set up false standards instead. To be in the faith in Utah is to support Joseph F. Smith and the polygamous hierarchy dominating there. Refusing, you are "apostate." But does that make the one who refuses to support them an apostate from the truth? Of course not. He simply refuses to follow a set of polygamous bandits set on mischief and evil. A person may be a member of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ and hold to any shade of opinion or belief, just so he accepts the revealed will of God and conforms to the moral code, in other words, if he is loyal to the teachings of Jesus Christ and the apostles. Until some fixed standard is resolved upon and declared to be the best, this thing of one person pointing to another and exclaiming, "You are an apostate," should receive no encouragement from sensible people. Once the standard set, then there is a chance for the inquisitions and Old World troubles can begin.

During the first visit of the writer to Utah, among the accusations made against him was, "You are an apostate." This was an easy thing to say, but there was no truth in it. It is a compliment to anyone to be called an apostate by a foolhardy, vicious, polygamous set, who have been the chief means of causing the truth to be evilly spoken of. One must eschew foundation principles of a system of belief to be an apostate. Has any court or council, or conference ever proved that Jason W. Briggs did not believe in God, in Jesus Christ, in the angel's message of these last days and the hope of the Saints? No. Then, it occurs to the writer that common prudence together with the Golden Rule would admonish writers to exclude from our literature such epithets as "apostate," "apostatize," etc., applying to Jason W. Briggs.

The last account remembered of being received from Jason W. Briggs in regard to his faith was from Patriarch Alexander H. Smith and Bishop E. L. Kelley. They reported him in the faith, a believer in the Reorganization. See also his testimony in the Temple Lot Suit. It is likely that Zenos H. Gurley holds a similar belief now.

In the dark and cloudy days, when iniquity stalked abroad and there was lo here and lo there endeavoring to point to the true order of things, God raised up Jason W. Briggs as a power and defense for the truth. He was told not to fear the adversaries, these blind guides representing the factions and calling after people to follow them, that none should be able to confound him, or stand before him. He went forth and met them. Even Strang, the most gifted of the lot, quailed before him. Under God he was made the chief exponent, leader, and defender of the church and the Reorganization from 1851 to 1860. He represented the lawful heir until he presented himself and his claim or right to preside over the priesthood, at Amboy, Illinois, in 1860.

It would be very natural for Jason W. Briggs to receive strenuous opposition and scathing criticism from others. What strong characters, both good and bad, have not? Jesus Christ, by his enemies was called a glutton and a wine bibber, an apostate because he did not believe in the traditions of the elders. "By our law he ought to die," said they. The indefatigable Saul of Tarsus was a stirrer of sedition by his enemies. The strong men, Martin Luther and John Wesley, were "heretics" and deserved death. George Washington, the father of his country, at one time was called "incompetent" and a "wooden head," and Abraham Lincoln was denounced as a "failure." The great political parties, the Republican and the Democratic, call each other renegade and other things not nice, and what of the strong political characters to the front, Theodore Roosevelt, and William Jennings Bryan. Their enemies call them both disloyal, chief of sinners, apostate, and worthy of death. What people say, then, does not always declare the facts. Then men of sense and thought and conscience should go slow in denouncing others as apostate and heretic, simply because they hold opinions at variance from what they approve. It appears to us to be the part of wisdom and justice to so treat Jason W. Briggs. He held views not just in accord with others, some of which certainly have not been proven yet as to which is the correct one. God Almighty used him to his glory and the good of his work and he made a splendid defense. "He was not perfect," says some one. Who is? Have you seen anyone that is? Let him who is a standard of holiness and has no sin, cast the first stone at Jason W. Briggs for fancied errors held. "Be not deceived, God is not mocked. Whatsoever a man sows that shall he also reap," and God is judge. It illy becomes a vicious, polygamous alien to characterize Jason W. Briggs as an "apostate," or anyone else as to that; better turn the lantern towards home, reëxamine and wait events.

It has never been shown by any competent council that Jason W. Briggs went back on the faith or his own revelation. Stop these "apostate" flings, then, and be prudent and sensible. "With what measure you mete, it shall be measured to you again." There doesn't seem to be any exception to this rule.

THE MYSTERY OF LIFE AND DEATH.

Services were held in Lamoni, Iowa, August 30, over the remains of Sr. F. G. Pitt. At that time Bro. Heman C. Smith delivered the following address, reported by Sr. Estella Wight.

The sadness of occasions like this is not without its consolation. The consolation arising from the fact that the change that brings to our hearts grief and sorrow, has been provided for, and that the Lord in his wondrous mercy and his loving-kindness has made special provision for our comfort and our blessing in this sad hour. Without the Christ, circumstances like this, it occurs to me, would be almost or quite unbearable; and that suggests to our mind, and with that suggestion comes infinite peace and satisfaction, that it is but an illustration of the fact that the Christ was needed in the world, and that mankind would have been in a much worse condition, infinitely worse, if God had not sent his Son into the world to bring to us the gospel of salvation, the gospel of peace and consolation in this, one of the darkest hours of our existence.

The mind is called back always upon occasions like this to the instances in the life of the Christ when he visited the sorrowing, the broken-hearted, and administered to them the comfort needed. We remember with gratitude, even in our deepest sorrow, the time when the Master visited those broken-hearted sisters at Bethany, and when he came to the tomb where Lazarus was laid, commanded that the stone should be rolled away, and when it was rolled away he looked down at the silent form that lay beneath and commanded, "Lazarus, come forth." And Lazarus heard. His ears were deaf to every other sound. No other voice could have penetrated. No other sound could have been heard. No other will could have been obeyed. He heard the sound of that voice and hearing he obeyed, and it suggests to our mind that if that voice could be heard by the ears that were dead, that when that voice shall speak, whenever it shall speak unto the sleeping dead, that the dead again will hear the voice. They may be oblivious to every other sound, but the sweet accents of the voice of the Son of God will be heard, and when he shall speak to those who have departed, just as truly as Lazarus heard him so will they hear, and as he obeyed and came forth, so will they come forth.

That it is a mystery no one would deny. That it is past comprehension we must all admit. But if death is a mystery, if the hope of eternal life is a mystery, so is the present life a mystery.

We have not been able in the years that we have been here, the best of us, to fathom its depths, to understand its intricacies, to be able to explain life. We rejoice in it. Our souls are filled with ecstasies and delight in life where life and pleasure abound, but after all it is as mysterious as death itself, if not more so, nor may we expect to get beyond the realm of mystery until our minds shall have become strong enough to solve the problems of the universe. It is mysterious simply because we can not fathom it. Our minds are so limited that we can understand nothing that we see here below. There's not a single thing in all the creations of God, no matter how minute it is, that the strongest mind that ever lived knows all about—not one single thing. And while we are so weak in this regard that we can not understand the least of the creations of God, we may not expect to explain, but as I said before, Christ comes into our life in hours like this, and we see the necessity of him, and our hearts are filled with gratitude to God that he made this provision, that he can come to us in our extremity and give us hope, and thousands, aye millions, no doubt, have looked down into the silent tomb since the day of Bethany, and when they saw loved forms lying there, they have remembered the event that happened in that little village, and the results that came from the voice of God being heard through Jesus Christ have brought comfort and consolation and made the hour sweet indeed compared with what it would have been without him.

And so to-night we feel that this hour, though sad, is full of comfort, full of consolation, full of peace. I have no doubt that these hearts who feel this loss the keenest, feel in the fullness of their hearts to thank God for the provision that has been made for our sister, in common with all others of humanity, through the offering of the Son of God to the world, for they have this consolation that in a life of suffering, a life of trial, she did not forget to make the effort to serve God and to place herself in close relationship with him, that all the good that humanity can get from that wondrous provision made through the gospel of Jesus Christ might come to her. She has found hours of comfort, days of peace, years of hope in that gospel while she lived, and doubtless she has felt a renewal of it, an increase of that hope, of that consolation, of that peace and happiness in the hour when she passed over the dark river to rest upon the other shore.

The following items have been handed me, or dictated to me in regard to her life. I will read them, as they are brief:

"Clara Catharine Abbott was born in London, England, June 14, 1840, came to America in early womanhood, where she was united in marriage to Frederick G. Pitt. From this union there were born five children, of which four, three sons and one daughter are living. The youngest, Jessie, preceded her to the other world several years ago. Of those surviving are William, the eldest, residing in Independence, Missouri, Ada Cudworth, Frederick M., and Alma A., all in Chicago, Illinois.

"She united with the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints at Plano, Illinois, in 1871, the ordinance of baptism having been administered by President Joseph Smith, and the confirmation by President Smith and Elder Isaac Sheen. She has been practically an invalid for twenty-five years, but during all these years of trial and suffering, I am assured by those who knew her best, that she was always hopeful and cheerful, at least as nearly so as more healthy people usually are. She was a devoted wife and mother, a true friend, and a consistent Christian."

What more could be said? I think it was in the spring of 1880 that I first met this sister, partook of the hospitality of her home on one or two occasions while at the General Conference of that year, and I have known her at different times, met her at different places, in all the years that have transpired since, and I have known much of her life, and especially when it fell to my lot to be associated with her husband and herself on a foreign mission, in England, where perhaps we were thrown more nearly in association than we were or had been in our own land. In all the acquaintance that I had with her I never knew her to murmur or complain, but as has been asserted by those who knew her better than I, my observation is that she was hopeful and cheerful, trustful and dependent upon God and God alone, so far as the ultimate result was concerned. She leaned, of course, upon those who loved her for much of the comforts and blessings of life, but in God was her trust. She had no hope of gaining even health in this world through any other source than by the power of God. She had hope that this might be, and no doubt her life has been made more tolerable and more prolonged because of her trust in him, and she has received special strength in the hour of her weakness to bear the responsibilities that rested upon her in her adopted country, and in her own native country. And can we believe that God, who has sustained her through these years of affliction would desert her now in this extremity? A thousand times no. The kind hand, the kind loving heart that has cared for her and her necessities is caring for her still.

Mystery, mystery surrounds everything! But it appears to me that this is a safe and sure deduction from what we know of her life, and what we know of conditions, that God is with her still. Those who love her most will sorrow not because of her; they will find, no doubt, truth in the statement made by the Son of God when he was led forth to death and he said to those who were weeping, "If ye love me ye would rejoice." I have no doubt but these sorrowing ones will rejoice on her account. They will sorrow because of their own condition. They will feel the loss to them, but for her they will have not a word or not a thought of remorse or of regret; but they will rejoice that she has been relieved from her suffering and that she is safely in the hands of Him whom she trusted, and whom, we are assured, she trusted not in vain.

I do not know that I can say anything that would add to the consolation that these sorrowing ones must have when they consider the wonderful provisions of the gospel and the fact that she availed herself of its privileges and placed herself in harmony with its requirements. They perhaps understand as much in regard to this as I can express; but I will say, and I say it from my heart, say it without a shadow of a doubt, say it because of my own experience and my observation in the past, that there is in the gospel of Jesus Christ, in the atonement made by the Son of God a balm for every wound, a solace for every sorrow; that there can be nothing that shall come to human hearts in the form of grief or sorrow or pain that the wonderful provisions that God has made does not reach. Those provisions are complete. They lack nothing. They are full, and He, whose hand has created all things, and by whose grace we exist in this world, has pledged to carry out all the promises that he has made to suffering humanity.

I have said often, and I repeat it now, I repeat it as having special application in this case when I think of the suffering and struggles of the departed one, that somehow, somewhere, sometime the mighty hand, the loving hand of God will be placed beneath the struggling ones and they will be saved. We shall look forward to the time when we shall meet our sister again, and shall no doubt not have occasion to sympathize with her in suffering as we have had here, but will rejoice in seeing her enjoying all the privileges of health of body renewed, of spirit made perfect, of redeemed soul, where suffering and sorrow and pain shall come no more.

We would not if we could take pain and sorrow out of this world; we would not ask that death be taken away in our present condition, for God has placed them here for a good purpose, no doubt, and they will be removed in his own time, and his time should be our time. When he is ready, and when no longer these things are needed, he will speak the words and death will be no more, sorrow will pass away, pain shall no more come, and life everlasting, life—vigorous life—vitality which knows no bounds shall come to all those who have suffered and waited here. And I want to say too, that the hope of our sister will be realized as she hoped year after year of life for a strong body that she might enjoy the things of life. It was only delayed, it was only postponed a little farther, perhaps, than she may have hoped, but new life will be given for she has not trusted in vain; she has not hoped without abundant reasons for hope, and all that she desired will be hers, and more than she could possibly have thought of. That is our faith, and I might say that it is more than faith, it has passed beyond the realm of doubt with me, I am as certain of the future that a man will still live as I am that he lives now. I can not explain what that life will be, I can not explain what this life is; one is no more mysterious than the other; one is as much a reality as the other so far as my firm convictions and assurance are concerned.

I am glad to know that I can bid, if it is necessary, these sorrowing ones to hope. Our sister leaves behind her this loving companion, of whom our brother spoke so beautifully in his prayer, who through these long years of suffering has been ever faithful and ever attendant upon her every want. He will miss not only her society, but he will miss this loving service of his own to her life. An aching void, no doubt, will be left when he can no longer with pleasure wait upon one who needed him so much. She may not, will not need this kind of service when he meets her again, but he will be more than compensated in the thought that more has been done for her than he could do, greater results have obtained than would have obtained from his loving service, and I trust that God will comfort him, bless him, make him strong to bear, and patient to wait; and that her children, and grandchildren will also be directed, sustained, admonished, and every necessary thing done for them by a loving hand that will cause them to take pleasure in their mother's religion and their mother's hope, and in the assurance of her everlasting peace in the life that knows no end. And may God's blessing and peace rest like a benediction upon all, sanctifying this occasion to the good of all, is my prayer.

Of General Interest

A LAND WITHOUT MISSIONARIES.

(By Frederick Palmer, in the Chicago Tribune.)

Why do so many missionaries go to Japan, China, India, Turkey, and Corea, and so few to Central America? They are as inconspicuous in all the country between the Guatemalan border and Panama as they are conspicuous elsewhere.

Partiality for distant lands can not explain their neglect, for Alaska is most abundantly supplied. Is it possible that the soul of a Caribbean Indian in twenty-five cents' worth of cotton drill is less worth saving than the soul of Aleut in furs? Latitude can not matter, else the Fiji Islands, which have been well cared for, would be under the ban.

Any excuse that Central America is already a Christian country is inconsistent, if not otherwise untenable. Mexico is a favorite field, and Mexico is far more Christian than Guatemala or Nicaragua. Although the Mexican state has made war on the Roman Catholic Church, the Mexican peon is a most devout religionist, reverent and superstitious.

All the missionaries in Mexico, where the government is doing much for education, are most enthusiastic over their schools and their work in spreading the English language. They are also trying to teach the Mexican Indian that when a man and a woman live together and rear a family of children a marriage ceremony is a praiseworthy prologue.

Mention Central America to the missionary in Mexico and he looks blank. You almost expect him to ask where Central America is. That terra incognita seems crossed off the maps of the missionary boards for the same reason that the American sees it only as a source of humor. A cynical trader of Honduras explained that the missionary has no interest in hot countries, where the male inhabitants had learned to wear trousers and the women a mother hubbard. The pioneering work is finished with such an expansion of the breech-clout or with the greater progress represented when there was not even a breech-clout to give with.

To me, however, the absence of missionaries in numbers was deplorable. The modern missionary who founds little communities in foreign countries where the humanities and hygenics are taught is a spreader of civilization regardless of his creed. For every one of him in Japan, that learned for itself, and in China, that is learning for itself, there ought to be a hundred in this field at our door, that can not learn for itself, for which our Monroe Doctrine is responsible.

Only satire would call Central America Christian to-day. Its people are lapsing into paganism, even as the Haitian negroes have lapsed into African voodooism. By people one means the native Indian, who, with those of half Indian blood, make up nearer three fifths than three fourths of the three million who live between Mexico and Costa Rica.

The history of the church here is, broadly, its history in the Philippines and other Spanish-American countries. The priests who came with the conquerors settled the Indians on the land and taught them agriculture and religion. Generally the conqueror was an adventurer and a gold-hunter. He did not come as a settler. When the movement against Spain culminated in La Libertad on September 16, which is the Fourth of July south of the Rio Grande, the church was regarded in many quarters as a part of the oppression. But in Mexico the martyr of independence was a heroic priest, Hidalgo, who first raised the banner of rebellion and was excommunicated for his act.

Undoubtedly the church was on the side of Spain. Later its influence was with the conservatives who represented the well-to-do, the land holders, and the old Spanish element, which sought to rule by force of intellect, but fell through its own factions and unworthiness, and is now engulfed by the "liberalism," so-called, of the Zelayas and the Cabrerases—of the man who can gather a band of soldiers and capture the capital, which he holds as long as he can, or until his fortune is made. And the vandal play of this new class of leaders in public opinion, so far as there is any public opinion, was against the church and the well-to-do, whose wealth they would despoil.

In Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua the priesthood has fallen into the lowest state of any countries in Christendom not in the Caribbean region. The bayonet no longer considers it as a factor to be reckoned with. It has neither political power nor religious power of any account. When I asked a young woman, head of a girls' school in Guatemala, if she had been educated in a convent, she was quick to free herself from any such prejudicial charge against the administration, which does not permit convents to exist. When I asked if she were a Catholic she answered, "Oh, yes," carelessly. The pope of Guatemala is Cabrera. His name is posted in every school as the giver of education and all blessings.

If you are looking for real church ruins go to Central America. Many churches are disused, and those that are not are almost invariably in disrepair. The people, poverty-stricken and hopeless, take little interest in them. Religious ideas are dying, and with them moral ideas. A settled indifference of day-by-day existence characterizes the masses, who are reverting to Indian superstition. What support there is for religion comes from women of the better classes.

In morals the people have the examples of their leaders. Our hopeful politician in a Central American country, usually a lawyer, regards himself as an "intellectual." His views of life are formed on all the faults of Latin civilization, which are so frequently and wrongly mistaken for Latin standards. His ambition is any government position or revolutionary opportunity that may win one.

Gradually the old Spanish element is being driven to the wall; the old families are being ruined; their heads persecuted and assassinated. Among the masses Spanish courtesy, which makes a Mexican peon a knight, is disappearing. Added to the Indian blood and the buccaneer strain is the infiltration of negro blood, especially predominant on the east coast of Nicaragua and Honduras. The Indian strain is purest in Guatemala. Some of the mountain tribes have never been civilized, though they are within three days of New Orleans, and they are better off than the ones who were Christians and have lapsed into paganism.

On paper much is done for education. But that is to be expected in countries with constitutions forbidding confiscation, when confiscation is regularly practiced, with constitutions that most amply protect the rights of its citizens when execution without trial is frequent. Everything to which free and independent nations are entitled the military despots are bound to have. Frequently they amend the constitutions in order to make them more liberal. They make progressive laws without any thought that laws are made to be obeyed.

All the glowing reports of progress which are sent to the United States indicate a desire to be in style. When the dictator tells you that school attendance is compulsory he is being polite. He knows that it is so in your country. If you were equally polite you would say out of compliment to the customs of his country that Mr. Taft had secretly had Mr. Bryan tied up by the thumbs and made him confess he was still for free silver at heart.

When you examine the compulsory system more closely you see that it is suspended indefinitely, like the constitution. But by this it must not be implied that education is altogether neglected. The sons of people with any means at all are most ambitious for learning. They study at private schools and become more proficient, in French at least, than the graduates of most of our colleges. Capable as they are of better things, the military and political system demoralizes them.

Every capital has some form of institution which is called a university where the teaching is of the old-fashioned Spanish style. These universities bestow degrees as liberally as the army makes generals. You meet doctors of letters and philosophy at every turn. One president was introduced to me as "His Excellency, President, General, Doctor, Lawyer." He was not of much account in any capacity.

Cabrera of Guatemala, tyrannical, corrupt, and murderous as he is, should receive credit for one thing. His Estrada Cabrera schools may be due to his vanity, but, nevertheless, they are a beginning. He has inaugurated institutions where agriculture and the practical sciences—Central America's most crying need—are taught. Many of the country school-houses—which have meant profitable contracts to political favorites—are, I fear, little used except to house the guests and friends of the jefe politicos. Guatemala City has a university which was generally attended by Central American students—before they were in danger as political suspects under the reign of terror following the attempted assassinations—and also a medical school where the sessions of the Pan-American Medical Congress were held.

At least eighty per cent of Central Americans can not read a line of print. If they could, what would they have to read? No newspaper may print anything but praise of the dictator. No literature is circulated except governmental proclamations. No knowledge of the outside world is spread.

Barbarism enervated by certain civilized forms, without barbarism's vigor, tells all in a word. Scenes of disgust I might repeat to the point of nausea; utter lack of sanitation, of care of body as well as of mind, expose a scrofulous people to all the tropical diseases, which keep the death list pretty well balanced with the birth rate.

Meanwhile the missionaries look past the fields thick with ignorance and unbelief, to China and India and Africa, where the missionary teaches everything from the hygienic to the moral law—everything that Central America lacks.

The Bible as Good Reading.

THE QUICK, SURE THRUST.

I have not been long in telling this. And yet, condensing it all I can, I have been a good deal longer than the Bible is in relating this story. And I have left out a good deal at that. That is one characteristic of everything that is written in the Bible. It is condensed. It fairly snaps and sizzles with condensation. It is full of action, and although it reports conversations, gives the arguments that are used pro and con, describes incidents, it is all done so quickly and naturally and to the point that you can read it in five minutes.

A good way to test the tremendous pith and point of the Bible narrative is to read over a portion of it, get it thoroughly in mind; then close the Bible and try to write out the very things you have read yourself. You will find that you will use two or three times as many words, do the best you can.

Of course, these stories of adventure are very numerous in the Bible—the volume is packed full of them.

But suppose you want some other kind of story—intrigue, let us say, or diplomacy. You will find it in this same history of this same David. His craft in statesmanship equaled his courage in war. It is fascinating to see how he laid the foundation of that dynasty from which sprang our Savior. Of course, I am not going to attempt to repeat it here—that would be merely to repeat what you will find in infinitely more fascinating form in the Bible itself. All that I am doing is to tell you that if you want "human interest" stories that yet involve statesmanship, diplomacy, and war you will find them all crowded into the life of David. And through them all you will find fundamental, almost primal, human passions running at high tide.

For example, David loved women—man-fashion and violently he loved them—and that led him, man of God though he was, into wrongdoing. And the hatred of the people of that time was equal to their love, and their grief was something terrible. When the men of that time and race hated, that meant a killing. We see it in the same race as late as the time of the play of The Merchant of Venice, where that wonderful old character, Shylock, exclaims, "Who hates the man he would not kill!"

While David is the master character throughout all this period, and, indeed, one of the master characters of all time and of all peoples, that period was full of characters. The fact is that the Bible is made up of big characters, men and women and children loving, plotting, warring, hating, intriguing, philosophizing, praying, forgiving, doing justice and working righteousness, yet falling to the lowest depths. But always there is "something doing."

A curious study is that of the circumstances attending the birth of the great. It would seem that Fate plans their entrance into the world as carefully as this mistress of human destiny arranges the whole pattern of their lives. And yet it is not Fate at all. The great are made so by the vigor of parents, prenatal influences, early environment. Who doubts that Bonaparte would not have developed into Napoleon, the world conqueror, had not his mother been a woman of immense abilities and extraordinary energies? And also before he was born had she not ridden, by day and by night, with her husband in the Corsican campaigns, studying, witnessing, practicing strategy with the ablest soldiers on the field, enduring privations of march and experiencing the determined courage which the battlefield inspires?

Was not Alexander the son of Philip? Was he not born in the very whirlwind of warfare? Did he not spring from the loins of an unexhausted statesman and warrior; and are we not told that the queen dreamed that she was to be the mother of a lion? It was not for nothing that Abraham Lincoln's parents were the poorest of the poor and the commonest of the common people. It was this which gave him his blood understanding—so much deeper and truer than the brain understanding—of the masses, of their wants, needs, destiny. It was this which gave him the breadth of wisdom to know the common mind—the breadth of wisdom so much wider and deeper than that of the ablest statesman who does not have this kinship with the millions.

If you look narrowly you will see how Fortune marks those whom she means to make the officers of her large designs by peculiarities of their birth and parenthood. It is all quite natural and entirely scientific; but it is so striking and apparently exceptional that we can not wonder that ruder people were superstitious about such things.

MOSES IN THE MAKING.

This same thing was markedly true of the man who is one of the greatest of all merely human personages—the Jewish law-giver, statesman, leader—Moses. In the first place, the Egyptians in their fear of the multiplying power of the children of Israel, as a means of retarding it used the very methods to advance it. They put the Hebrews at hard work in the open air. Still they waxed stronger! Of course they waxed stronger. But this astonished the Egyptains, so they set taskmasters over them, and regulated the work of the Israelites with rigid severity.

"And they (the Egyptains) made their lives bitter with hard bondage, . . . all their service, wherein they made them serve, was with vigor."

And, of course, they grew harder-muscled, steadier-nerved, and, because of the watchfulness constantly maintained over them, quicker-minded. Every year they learned discipline and acquired an instinct for solidarity. It was the very training necessary to produce a people from whom should spring a fearless, methodical, inventive statesman, full of initiative. And it was from parents of the more intellectual type among such people, whose very intellectuality had been vitalized and made orderly by disciplined work, that Moses came.

He appeared, too, at a time when all of the male children of the Hebrews were to be killed under the orders of Pharaoh. That her son should escape this fate was undoubtedly the consuming thought of Moses' mother. She kept Moses to herself until she could conceal him no longer. Then she made her famous ark of bulrushes, put Moses in it and sent him afloat in the waters where the weeds were thick enough to keep him from being drawn away by the current. Then comes the incident of Pharaoh's daughter finding him; unwittingly giving Moses' own mother to him as a nurse; bringing up the future deliverer of Israel in her own house; thus bestowing upon him all the instruction and training of a prince. An ideal birth and an ideal training for a great work, was it not?

Then comes the incident of Moses killing the Egyptian, which proves his volcano-like passion; the discovery of his crime and his flight, which proves his prudence; his courtesy to the daughters of the priest of Midia, which demonstrates the human touch in him; his service as a shepherd of this Midianite, whose daughter he had married (for Moses was a marrying man from the first).

THE CRAFT OF THE ISRAELITES' LEADER.

I am not going to tell you all of this fascinating history of this mighty man, so full of human incident—read it for yourself in the words of the best of story-tellers and biographers. Find out how he got back to Egypt; the boldness and craft of his leadership of his oppressed people and all of the circumstances of his development as statesman and law-giver. There is not a dull line among them except the occasional genealogies—which are always dull, in the Bible and every place else.

I do not recall a more tremendous picture in any literature I ever heard of than that of the passage of the children of Israel through the Red Sea, and the catastrophe that overthrew the Egyptians following them. This whole paper might be written on the fourteenth chapter of Exodus.

How like the fear of masses of people was the terror of the Israelites when they saw the Egyptains coming after them! And how like real greatness in all times is the splendid spirit of Moses when he told them: "Fear ye not; stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord!"

Moses was always thus inspiring the people when they needed it, and rebuking them with equal vigor when they needed rebuke.

But I will pass all this and get to a few paragraphs upon the laws of Moses—his real work and his immortal monument.

From the very day of his return to Egypt we find him giving orders of one kind or another to all the children of Israel; and, significantly enough, they are nearly all of them about eating and drinking—evidently the prime importance of the laws of hygiene impressed itself upon this practical statesman. Moses had great difficulty with the children of Israel in the wilderness. It is interesting to see him enforcing one simple commandment after another, such as the keeping of the Sabbath—Moses, I believe, was the first of the Hebrews to put that custom into actual practice. As fast as he could get them used to it he assumed a judgeship over them. The Bible says:

"Moses sat to judge the people: and the people stood by Moses from the morning unto the evening."

Moses' father-in-law objected to this; and they had an argument about it. Here is the way the Bible puts it:

"The thing that thou doest is not good (judging the people). Thou wilt surely wear away, both thou and this people that is with thee: for this thing is too heavy for thee; thou art not able to perform it thyself alone."

Decidedly the old man was wiser than Moses, as witness his following remarks to Moses:

"Hearken now unto my voice, I will give thee counsel, and God shall be with thee: Be thou for the people to Godward, that thou mayest bring the causes unto God: And thou shalt teach them ordinances and laws and shalt show them . . . the work that they must do. Moreover thou shalt provide out of all the people able men, such as fear God, men of truth hating covetousness; and place such over them to be rulers of thousands, and rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens: And let them judge the people at all seasons: and it shall be, that every great matter they shall bring unto thee, but every small matter they shall judge: so shall it be easier for thyself, and they shall bear the burden with thee."

Moses saw the good sense of that, and instantly adopted the idea. There again was greatness. A great man is not he who thinks up everything for himself. The great man is he who is hospitable to ideas, no matter from what source they come.

So this was the origin of the judicial system of the Jewish people.

Very soon Moses saw that practical judgments were not enough. The people must have moral laws and observe them from generation to generation until they were transformed into human character. So God delivered to him the Ten Commandments, which he delivered to the Jewish people; and these commandments, handed down from Sinai, are, with the modifications which the Savior made, the foundation of the morality of all the civilized world in the twentieth century.

Letter Department

SEATTLE, WASHINGTON, August 18, 1909.

Editors Herald: From time to time I read much good, sound thought expressed in the columns of this valuable paper. All intelligence is good. I enjoy the deep expressions of Brother Tubb; the experiences of "Ye Jots Man"; The doctrinal dissertations of Bishop Evans, and many, many others. Of course, I may differ in some minor details and expect to until we are able to see "eye to eye."

I often feel like an extreme radical among my friends, which are those of the church. I realize there are powerful and inspired men and women in this church, whom God has raised up to guide the minds and destinies of Israel, and they do and can write. Ideas conflicting with mine cause me at times to "fire up" and I desire to answer, but the thought comes, What is the use? the truth will eventually prevail and it, only, endure.

The following is highly interesting to me, but it may not be to others. I notice the moving hand of God in many ways which others may not stop to fathom. There is an exposition in progress in this city. There have been several larger and grander, as I have seen them at Chicago, Buffalo, Portland; besides many museums, such as London, Liverpool, New York, Chicago, Vancouver, Victoria; but none of them have brought the latter-day work before the nations as has the little concentrated, dynamic, Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition. The whole thing appears to me as providence causing the Seattle bankers and other influential citizens of the great commonwealths of the West to act as nursing fathers and sponsors to scattered Israel, from the caves and deserts of our mainland and the islands of the sea. Cutting out the exhibits of the rich mines, the majestic forestry, extensive agriculture, and fisheries of the "choice land," we have before us in grand display, "the Lamanite" as represented in the Hawaiians, the Filipinos, the Samoans, aborigines or their works of New Mexico, Arizona, and all other western and Pacific States from California to Alaska, and lastly the sturdy pioneer and Latter Day Saint, whether the apostate or the true original. Representatives of these nations are visiting the exposition to see and to learn. There are also important visitors from Japan, China, and other venerable and awakening nations of the Orient. The mask for once seems to be torn away. Although Catholic dignitaries and Protestant clergy incidentally are ever present in every public function, still they are lost sight of entirely when the bare facts and force of everything seen, when once inside the gate. We see the army and navy of this republic in detail. What has God used them for? To defend the defenseless Israelite or the Lamanite and to raise him to a higher level. But I will write again more especially about the Islanders and what "Uncle Sam" is doing for them.

In the Government building, the largest on the grounds, and in direct charge of the Smithsonian Institute and United States National Museum, which stands "for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men," is a large and conspicuous division devoted to exhibits of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints (Mormon Church). I asked the gentleman in charge why the church had such a prominent place, and he said, "It is because the Government recognizes her influence in the development of the West." Rejecting the errors of Brigham Young, we must give them honor and credit for all the good they have done and let us hope the good deeds of the majority of them will weigh in their favor in final reward. There are shown twenty-four wooden maps about seven feet long by eight feet high, showing the travels of those who claim a belief in Joseph Smith as a prophet of God and the divinity of the Book of Mormon, from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Gulf of Mexico to the Hudson Bay.

The maps indicate that Joseph Smith was born December 23, 1805, at Sharon, Vermont, and Brigham Young, June 1, 1801, at Whiting, Vermont. The line runs through Montpelier, crosses Hudson River south of Lake George, goes through New York, south of Lake Oneida, to Manchester. The maps also show ancient record found 1823-1827, hill of Cumorah; Book of Mormon printed in 1830, at Palmyra, same was translated 1829; at Harmony, Pennsylvania, church was organized April 6, 1830; colonies land at New York City and go north along east bank of Hudson River and cross at Albany; migrations to Kirtland, Ohio, as place of first gathering and first temple in 1836; migrations to Missouri from 1830 to 1838, going through Indiana and Illinois to Independence, where in 1831 a temple site was selected and called "The future Zion"; on the move again to Far West, where in 1836 cornerstone is laid on a temple site; in 1838 and 1839 migrate back to Nauvoo, which in 1844 had a population of twenty thousand; here in 1846 a second temple is built, but an exodus began in February of that year and Joseph and Hyrum had been killed by a mob at Carthage, Illinois, June 27, 1844; other migrations are shown from Europe via New Orleans, the Mississippi, and Missouri rivers. Thus far we are a united people, but Brigham Young left us then. He founded Garden Grove in 1846, but it was abandoned in 1852; Kanessville (Council Bluffs) was founded in 1846, and the famous Mormon Battalion was enlisted who marched to Nebraska and camped at Winter Quarters (Florence), near Omaha; the trail leads along the north bank of North Platte; Wyoming, Nebraska, was another outfitting point and colonies settled in Oklahoma and Texas; migrations cross Kansas River at Topeka and the Arkansas River at Great Bend, cross New Mexico via Santa Fe and the Rio Grande near Albuquerque and go south and finally west for Arizona; many colonies were settled here and in Mexico in 1878; march continued along Gila River where settlements are made and also along Little Colorado River 1876; a detachment of the battalion goes north and winters, 1846-47, at Pueblo, Colorado, and rejoin the Mormon pioneers at Fort Laramie, Wyoming; trail leads along headwaters of the Platte, Sweetwater, and Green rivers; they arrive in Salt Lake, July 24, 1847.

Then follows maps of colonies to Canada, Oregon, and the northern and southern routes to California; Mormons purchase San Bernardino, 1851; battalion mustered out July, 1847, at Los Angeles; gold discovered by members of Mormon battalion in Sacramento, 1848. In Oregon the maps show the Mormons own the Sumpter Valley Railroad, from Baker City to Austin, and a road from Hoodriver to Dee. They own several sugar factories and have established a colony at Portland, and one at Viento, Washington, on the Columbia River.

On exhibition is to be seen the press upon which was printed the first edition of the Book of Mormon, of five thousand copies, for Joseph Smith by Egbert B. Grandin, at Palmyra, New York, 1830. The pioneer printing press which on June 15, 1850, printed the first number of the Deseret News, the first newspaper published in the Rocky Mountain region, may also be seen. This paper, originally a weekly, then a semi-weekly, now a daily, wields a powerful influence throughout the inter-mountain west. The Pioneer Odometer is a machine invented by two of the pioneers who crossed the great plains in 1847 and was used by Brigham Young and his company to measure the distance between the Missouri River and Salt Lake Valley. Subsequent measurements by the Government surveyors differ less than sixty feet. The pioneers while crossing the plains in 1847 occasionally used the skull of a dead buffalo as an improvised post-office in which to deposit messages for their friends who followed them. "Bulletin of the plains" is a skull that has been used for such purpose. Across the front is written: "Pioneers camped here, June 3, 1847, making 15 miles to-day. All well, Brigham Young."

There is also a plaster model of the Salt Lake Temple; a wood and metal model of the Tabernacle, showing interior detail. Specimens of the coin of the Deseret, first paper money of the West; five and ten cent tithing certificates; a library of over a hundred church books and writings, including the Book of Mormon in several translations and a very interesting book of the pioneers in two volumes, compilation authorized by the Utah Jubilee Commission, July, 1897, and presented to the State of Utah as a souvenir of the semi-centennial celebration of the arrival of the pioneers upon the shores of the Great Salt Lake. It contains the names of the Original Pioneer Company and many of those who arrived in Salt Lake Valley immediately after them; also autographs and brief biographical sketches of over seven hundred of the veterans who struck the first blow in the redemption of the Great American Desert. Hanging up in plain view of many, many eyes are very good life sized pictures of Joseph and Hyrum Smith.

Since writing the foregoing we have attended the reunion of our Washington, Oregon, and British Columbia districts and have heard several comments of our brothers and sisters in viewing the old press, especially the testimony this morning of Elder S. S. Smith, of Spokane District. By the way we have a sister in the Seattle Branch who owns a copy struck off the press and at the Washington University museum company, located in the Forestry Building, is a copy of the Book of Mormon of the 1840 edition. When viewing the old press a great power of light came upon me and made me feel happy for hours and its influence has not left me after ten days. Not far from the pictures of our martyrs are those of the most illustrious men this or any other country ever produced; statesmen, soldiers, patriots, inventors, discoverers, etc., a galaxy of them. I could see that God had guided our destinies. I could see the slow but sure triumph of the Saints and all Israel. I saw that even the powerful arms of Uncle Sam, the army and navy, mainly exercised themselves in protecting the scions of ancient Israel against the rabble of Babylon and continue to lift up the work God designs to lift up and trample to pieces that which must fall. Yes, the glory is ahead. The American eagle calls to her young, the Hawaiian, the Cuban, the Filipino, the Guamese, Porto Ricoan, Samoan, and all the islands of the sea, yes, and lo, he is poor no more; for the time is fast approaching when the so-called Indian will be in advance of the average American youth in civilization. It is hard to believe, but even the Japanese and Chinese of Seattle seem to be superior and get along better, are better educated, more moral and progressive than most of the new crop of city youths whose pernicious habits are telling sure and fast. Then again notice the fine new building of the International Bureau of the American Republics at Washington, District of Columbia, not monarchies, all standing in line for honor, peace, light, and civilization of the highest type: United States, Argentine, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominica, Equador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Salvador, Uruguay, and Venezuela. Guess these nations are not asking any odds of the pope or the Duke of Wellington, etc. No, the light has gone forth, and it shines from 1830. The teaching of Jesus Christ, the angel's teaching, our teaching, is working. A priest tells the father that he will not christen his child unless he renounces socialism and out walk the father, brother, friend, thousands of them. Nations will now have a hard time pitting soldier against soldier. The soldier has a little light and nations must learn peace. Of course a crash will come and we hope to be in Zion when it gets here, but are any of us ashamed of our faith and the faith of our fathers?

The church is coming more and more into prominence in spite of the seclusion of many of its members. This time it is the Brighamite flashing our searchlight with his jack-o-lantern. I pick up a pamphlet descriptive of the Hawaiian Islands and behold it is written "Mormon Colony." Stick my head out of my window and in bold type see: "Coming, the Mormon Tabernacle Choir of Salt Lake City"; and all the papers give it a boost and decided favor. I have to laugh at the disconsolation of ye orthodox and eastern Gentile and surely he must be a "green" man who has not heard of the name "Latter Day Saint" out here this summer. I have no use for Utahism.

The Utah building is built to imitate an Indian pueblo and is well decorated with mystic signs, quite aboriginal. Inside the building is quite an elaborate display of what the Latter Day Saint schools are doing for their youth and is to be applauded. In talking to one of the exhibitors, a non-Mormon and a non-Christian (that is speaking strictly in Babylonish or orthodoxy) he said, "The Utah people make the best of citizens and are welcome; that we just tolerate the evils of the old fellows who will soon die off and in future, all the younger generation guilty of polygamy will be put over the road like a bigamist in any other State." He considered that the young Mormons would renounce the evil doctrines and are now undergoing a change in principle.

I do not see the use of nagging about the Utah faction going to a land of salt, for salt is one of their most valuable assets. Nowhere in the United States is salt more prevalent than in Utah. The Monhelo Salt Beds on the Western Pacific Railway are a sample. Their area is eighty square miles and run ten feet thick, and it was necessary in excavating for telegraph poles to blast the salt out with dynamite. The land is rich also in marble, onyx, granite, slate, clay, gypsum, sulphur, coal, iron, zinc, etc. Over eighty-two millions of dollars have been paid in dividends from its gold, silver, copper, lead, and mercury mines. Much more could be written to show the State to be one of the richest spots of Joseph's "choice land."

There is plenty of evidence that the so-called desert was thickly populated by the prehistoric race or the Jaredites and Nephites. The pioneers did suffer and die and their bones lay bleaching on the great plains for many years. It goes only to show the mettle and the grit they were made of. They had been blinded by false leaders and forgotten their God, and because of sin were driven from their homes and vineyards. Many of our best families were among those pioneers: The Clapps, the Keelers, the Davises, and thousands more. Their names are on the records of the Reorganization. Surely we can give honor to whom honor is due. The residue is in the hands of a just God. Do not run down a land because of a people, for it seems to us as if Zion itself is getting the judgments with its terrible floods year after year; its vivid lightnings and thunderings; its frosts and droughts. Let us hold up the greater light and live the higher law and then we will be seen and known: If we do not, as surely as we live will we be left away behind and other peoples will come into the church and carry the banners of Zion to victory.

Pres. F. M. Smith, Hale W. Smith, Isaac N. White, A. V. Closson, Marcus Cook, W. W. Fordham, S. S. Smith, Brother Condit, and several other visiting officers are attending the reunion. Missionary in charge, F. A. Smith, just reached the city when news reached him telling of the death of his illustrious father, the Patriarch. We all sympathize with the bereaved families and realize the church has sustained a heavy loss.

ARTHUR W. GORBUTT.

Dear Herald: As my years are being numbered, my time is short here, and I will soon be called home to rest in the paradise of God. I want to leave on record some of the great blessings I have received from the bountiful hand of him who called me into this great and marvelous latter-day work.

I was brought up a Methodist, and taught that God was a Spirit without parts or passions. I believed it fully, though I had been taught to take everything to the Lord in prayer, and that in his own time he would answer. Not by word but by causing it to come to pass. When I first heard of this work from Elder T. W. Smith I heard the news (to me) that I must repent, believe, and be baptized for remission of my sins, and I read the same from Acts. I was confounded and astonished to think that I had been taught wrong all my life and therefore feared I was not a child of God.

Well, I took it to the Lord in prayer, asking what I should do: leave the Methodist and accept this church, or could I remain in the Methodist where my parents, brothers, and sisters had lived and died, and as I believed had gone to heaven? I plead with God for an answer, when suddenly the thought occurred to me that God was a spirit and could not speak. I dare not ask for a sign, for I was taught that that was wrong. So then I cried out earnestly, "Lord, I don't know how to pray or how to ask, but tell me some way which is right and what I shall do!" I then decided to remain on my knees until I received an answer in some way.

Directly a cloud appeared above my head and I looked at it in wonder. Then it parted and a great light appeared and from the light a hand was stretched forth to me and a voice from the light said in clear and distinct words, "This is my church, even the Church of Jesus Christ; clasp thine hand in mine and I will lead thee, even into the waters of baptism. With me shalt thou be buried and with me shalt thou arise to a newness of life and then shalt thou receive the baptism of the Holy Ghost."

I said, "Lord, if thou wilt lead me I will go forth." I arose satisfied, my mind at ease. The next Sabbath my husband and I were baptized by Elder T. W. Smith, thirty-one years ago. We are still firm, yes, firmer in the faith of the restored gospel. Many lights have shone forth to guide us in the straight and narrow way.

That we may be faithful till the Master saith, "It is enough, come home," is my prayer.

Your sister,

A. V. HOXIE.

Given while in the Spirit, August 3, 1909.

"Thus saith the Lord by the power of the Holy Ghost; I will that my church shall be a holy church and my people shall walk in holiness before me. But there are those among you who are wearing a robe of righteousness put on when they entered the door of baptism and now they wear it to hide their crimes and iniquities. They have polluted and stained their robe with sin. But soon, very soon according to the time of man, I will cause my sword to fall upon such and cut asunder their robe and expose their iniquity to themselves and to all around them, and they shall then be dealt with according to the law of my church. For, saith the Lord, I will have a pure and holy people. They shall come before me in their assemblies with clean hands and humility of heart. They must put pride and selfishness from among them and come before me with one accord and in the Spirit of truth. Then I, thy God, will not visit you with the sword of my judgment, but with a blessing of peace, comfort, and great joy. Amen."

WARD, IOWA, August 31, 1909.

Dear Herald: This is a new mining camp about three miles from Hiteman, Iowa. It is very "rocky," but we think it will be all right after a while, at least the company has just built twenty-three new houses and are going to build a lot more. The few Saints here hold services in the miners' hall, but will have a place of our own by the 1st of October.

We held a business meeting and appointed a committee to see the Bishop about the Cleveland church. These Saints all helped build it and the Bishop thought they were entitled to it and gave us permission to move it. The next thing was to get the lease and raise the money. Brn. Ed Rowley and Dave Thomas took a paper and saw the people about the mine and got a good amount, with what we put in ourselves, but not enough. Bro. Dave Thomas, being a good hustler and acquainted at Albia, canvassed the town and in one day collected one hundred and thirty dollars, making in all, four hundred dollars.

We have the contract let and it will be on the lot ready for use in thirty days. Then we will paint and paper it. The cost will be about four hundred and fifty dollars. The larger part of course comes from outside people. We have been censured by some of the Saints for going to the outside for help. Well, if we had depended on the Saints for help we would never have had a church here, not at present any way. There are always some who will not work and complain when they see others working, but the church will be here and God will reward those who have helped in this good work. Do you want others to receive a reward? If so, give them a chance to help in some good work.

We have three local elders here now, and will have a priest and another elder soon. Brn. John Jervis and Ed Rowley and myself are the elders.

I have just returned from Texas where I visited my brother whom I had not seen for thirty-four years. I went more to preach to him than anything else. He has a son who is a Methodist preacher; of course we exchanged views and he seemed to think I had a beautiful doctrine. His daughter was very anxious to hear and expressed her wish that some of our elders would come that way. I could not get a place to preach when down there. There was a big revival of Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and Campbellites all together, so I left tracts, all of which were gladly received. If any of the faith get tired when traveling let me tell you how to put in your time: Get one of E. K. Evans' pamphlets entitled, "Hell." It will attract more people than all of the books and tracts you can carry. I had one and I was in conversation all the way down and back, or nearly so.

I preached three hours on the train coming back to sixty-two men, and four women. I talked on the divine mission of Joseph Smith. They said he surely was a good man. A big ranchman said he wanted all the different tracts I had. I had a great many kinds and I gave them to him. I had to give my tract on "Hell" to a young lady who got so interested that when she had to get off she asked to keep it, so I gave her some of all I had.

Your brother,

G. W. HULL.

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS, August 16, 1909.

Dear Herald: Our district convened July 23, at Tuff, Texas, about seventy-five miles west of this city. Brn. McRae and Palmer, with their families, went in private conveyances, the writer accompanying the latter. Bro. W. M. Aylor, missionary in charge, preceded us ten days, stopping on the way at Pipe Creek for about a week, where he baptized three and left a good interest.

Our journey was uneventful, with the exception of coming in contact with about ten miles of mud, which hindered our progress considerably, and also tired the teams. About dark we came to a small residence by the road and stopped to inquire if we might get lodging, as the ground was too wet to sleep on. Finding the occupants away we were discussing what was best to do, when the landlord drove up, with his family and some visitors, and we soon found there was no room for us. We learned that the rain extended but about four miles farther, and decided to feed the teams, eat lunch, and travel on until we came to dry ground where we could camp.

It was eleven o'clock when we struck camp, all feeling grateful for a few hours' rest after our cramped position. We arose early the next morning in order to have the cool of the day in which to travel.

We arrived at Tuff about 11 o'clock and pitched our tents on the opposite side of the river from the schoolhouse where conference was to be held, on account of it being near the water. It was very dry there, only a few holes of water where the horses could drink. There was a spring running out of the opposite bank; but owing to the dry season it was very small. However, we had plenty of water ere long. It began raining the next morning and continued all day and night. When we saw there was no sign of the weather clearing up we decided to move back across the river into the schoolhouse. So the brethren hooked up in the rain and we moved over. About noon we ate a small lunch. As we had no chance to cook we ate what we had left from the evening before. At about 4 p. m. Bro. McRae drove with his daughter and Sr. Vida Johnson, over to Bro. Love's and baked some bread. The rain stopped the preaching for that night and as we had the house to ourselves we retired early, and although our bedding was damp, we slept sound and next morn on awaking we found the river away up. But it had ceased raining and Brother McRae had a bright fire burning. We sisters took advantage and soon had a warm breakfast ready to serve. The sun soon began to show his splendor, so we dried our bedding and felt thankful that the rain came, as the crops were in great need of water.

The preaching service was not well attended that night on account of the roads being washed out so.

The following morning the members met to organize conference. Brother Aylor was invited to take charge of conference, which he did. We had a good conference and all felt amply repaid for hardships and privations in getting there. There are some good Saints living there; their hearts are in the work. On Sunday the house was crowded; everybody brought his dinner and all spread together and had an enjoyable time. They invited us to eat with them, as we hadn't a very convenient way of cooking; so we accepted, and enjoyed the good, wholesome dinner very much.

The attendance was good throughout the remainder of the meeting. The sermons were fine, Brethren Aylor, Palmer, and McRae being the speakers. Five were baptized and others seem near the kingdom. Starting homeward we stopped again at Pipe Creek for a few days and three more were baptized. We felt to rejoice that the gospel was spreading. The writer felt doubly grateful for the blessing of health and strength received, my health being bad before starting on the journey to the degree of being unable to do very much. The Lord truly heard my prayers, making it possible for me to attend every service.

After returning to San Antonio we began holding meetings in the gospel tent, and are having good interest. Brethren Aylor, Palmer, and Mannering were doing the preaching till Brother Mannering was called to Central Texas. The Lord is blessing them in their efforts. One has requested baptism and others seem interested. Brother and Sister Dobson have rendered invaluable assistance in the song service.

Ever praying for the redemption of Zion,

Your sister in the one faith,

RUTH GIFFORD.

Des Moines District Reunion.

The Des Moines district reunion was held at Good's Park in Des Moines, August 13 to 23. Reunion organization was effected on Friday, August 13, at 2.30 p. m.

The program provided for at least four sessions each day with special services on Sunday. The meetings were of the nature of prayer and preaching services, Sunday school and Religio. There were two baptismal services at which five entered the church. Small attendance during day services, but better attendance at night by people of the world.

Considerable sickness, but all returned home without any serious results.

The expenses were met by donations from the Saints and others, by one collection, and from the boarding tent.

It was voted to hold another reunion next year, the time and place to be selected by the committee.

RUTH I. MINTUN, Secretary.

BROOKINGS, SOUTH DAKOTA, August 27, 1909.

Editors Herald: My colaborer, Brother Rannie, met me at Madison in this State last May, and we were associated for some time at Arlington.

It was at the latter place that I exchanged my companion pro tem for my companion for life who joined me from Idaho a few days after the departure of the former for other points.

Ere we left Arlington for Huron in the latter part of June I received correspondence from Sister Maloney in eastern Wyoming, near the Dakota boundary, requesting me to come there and baptize their daughter, bless their child, and preach a memorial sermon for two of her little boys, who at the ages of four and six had passed away last February and March. We complied, to the extent of the request indicated, and preached four sermons (including memorial) in their neighborhood, which is in the region of the far-famed Black Hills. Services were held in the union chapel, an edifice open to all. The Baptist pastor, under a stipend of a one thousand dollar annuity attended every effort and rendered every assistance solicited,—more liberality than we have been accustomed to receiving from that cult.

We returned to Huron, South Dakota, and began work in the tent and on the street, my wife having remained there, and my colaborer joining us in the fore part of July.

In the latter part of the same month my colaborer repaired to other parts of the mission and we came, on July 31, to Madison to do street work. Here I preached nightly on the street, save two nights when rain prevented, until August 12, when in answer to request I left for the Des Moines reunion, the first I have attended in Iowa or anywhere in this country except North Dakota. The nine days of its continuance was the opportunity of many new acquaintances and the extension of some already begun. It was during these educational sessions that word came of the death of the church's Patriarch, of the renewed inroads and invasion of the "pale reaper." Why should we shrink from that which, after all, is a blessing?

On the 23d, the writer returned to Madison, preached two more sermons on the street, and on the 25th, with my young companion, came here to this college town of about three thousand population.

Last night in Brookings I delivered my first sermon to a large audience of attentive hearers. "But," some one says, "I don't like to preach on the street." Neither do I, in a sense. "Then, why do you do it?" Simply because I can get countless ears that way that I can not get in any other way. Simply because I find town after town and city after city where there is but one Saint or one family of Saints, who are able and willing to support a missionary or two with their table and bed, but who are not equal to the demand that would inevitably be entailed by the renting of some central, important, and sufficiently respectable hall or theater to get any one in. Then there is the expense of advertisement and the tardiness of people to come in on account of the heat. The street costs no rent; the sermon is the advertisement; the lamps are already lighted and everything is ready; large audiences are available; the auditorium is never too small, for it holds a billion and a half. Why not take advantage?

"But," says Mr. Sensitive, "it is so embarrassing." And so it is to me, especially was it at first, and is yet in the renewal of the process after a winter's dormancy. But when it becomes a matter between us and duty or the best thing that is to be done, should we not account embarrassment and capricious dislike as odious invaders and endeavor to dismiss them from the premises of our soul? The great Master was a street preacher, a boat preacher, a plains preacher, a mount preacher. He was the friend of opportunity. Opportunity was preference with him and embarrassment a foreigner.

Another says, "I can't preach on the street." That is a different proposition, another question. We do not deny it. He ought to know. We concede such cases and dissent not from the word of him who knows himself best. But it is apparent, very, that the refusal should only proceed and is justifiable only from that standpoint.

Another says, "Where has there ever any good been done from street preaching?" Let the multitudes of our church answer, who heard their first sermon on the street, whose interest and investigation was begotten there; whether or not ultimate conviction culminated indoors.

On September 13 to 20 we expect to speak on the street in Huron during the state fair, when the city is full of visitors from all over the State, affording a very expansive dissemination of the truth.

I was told that South Dakota was the hardest field. It is for a loafer. But I can say that it has afforded me opportunities of that amplex that I believe I will reach more ears this year than any year of my ministry hereunto, and I have not missed a night for weeks when not obstructed by real causes.

My wife's presence and accompaniment is not merely one of companionship, but of positive assistance, in solos, in calling, as also along literary lines. She has not missed one meeting and is ready with every possible assistance.

ALVIN KNISLEY.

MANHATTAN, KANSAS, August 31, 1909.

Dear Herald: I wish we could have some preacher sent here before college begins. This is a pretty big place and I don't believe there has ever been any preaching done here. College begins September 20. There are three families of Saints here.

MRS. MARY NUNAMAKER.

"It's nothing against you to fall down—flat, but to lie there—that's disgrace."

NEW YORK CITY.

Saints' Herald: One can learn much here in New York City by comparing the revealed gospel of Christ with the forms of godliness men are professing, their shams and evasions of the real truth, etc.

Never has there been a day and age in which the promises of God were made so plain as in this great and enlightened age, when men could partake of heavenly things because of the fulfillment of God's promise to pour out of his Spirit upon all flesh. Will it not be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for the people of this great and enlightened city? They have had the opportunity of hearing the gospel of the kingdom as it has been preached in the last days, restored through the Lord's martyred prophet, according to the promise. But instead of receiving the message and heeding the warning, they turn it aside as a thing of naught, and thus seal their condemnation and fulfill the prediction.

While I sit here soft and beautiful music floats over those that fill the great dining hall, fulfilling the word of God that it shall be as in the days of Noah; they shall be eating and drinking (liquors), marrying and giving in marriage, right here in this most wonderful gathering of the great men of the whole earth. The splendor of dress and jewels, the beauty of women, and the nation's strong, level-headed men, handsome men of vast wealth and business ability, are mingling, heeding not the message of the Latter Day Saints, but taking notice of the fact that they are evilly spoken of, unless you specially hold one of them and broach the subject of the claims made for the restoration of the gospel. Then you will find the Book of Mormon an interesting subject to these men who have been schooled in these forms of godliness. And you will discover there is a greater knowledge of the gospel, the subject of temple building, and so forth, among these men; than you would suppose.

Never was there time in the history of the church when men would give such respectful attention to the book that slumbered in the dust, and they have a desire to possess a copy of it. I have one man here in New York City who has made many new friends to the Book of Mormon, and will soon order a dozen for his friends who are wanting them. I have been teaching him the restoration of the gospel for several years. He is a Baptist, but has lost his interest in that church. His splendid friendship coming so healthfully to our claims is surprising to me. The pioneers of our work have fought manfully and persistently to bring the work properly before the world, and it is, to an extent, taking its proper standing among men of influence who are becoming stronger in our claims, and making their lives sweeter and cleaner because of this knowledge and the stand taken. A terrestrial glory awaits them, and, it will be our pleasure, if faithful, to minister unto them in that day when He whose right it is to reign shall reign as king over all nations.

Surely all nations are flowing in here and out again, encouraging their once benighted people to set up governments after our pattern. Kings and rulers are toppling over, because of our nation's leaven, set up as an ensign. The heathen nations have come into remembrance before the Lord.

The Jews are finding an asylum here. The Zionist society is here with a ten million dollar trust company, to aid the poor Jew back to his own remembered land of Palestine, not knowing how completely it is carrying out God's will and Christ's predictions.

A Jew I well knew in Boston I met here for the first time in many years. He was overjoyed to see me and made an effort to introduce me to his noble friend, Mr. Jacob H. Schiff, at his office of splendor. They are husbanding their wealth for the purpose of lifting the Jews out of poverty, sending the outcasts and oppressed of all nations over to Jerusalem. But Mr. Schiff was away on his vacation. I will meet him when he returns.

In gospel bonds,
A. N. HOXIE.

Saints.

Who are the real saints? A saint is one who is holy or sanctified. Saints, as the scriptures teach, are not those who have retired from the world by seclusion that they might not be contaminated by the corrupting influences of the world. Saints are in the world, but not of the world; busied in the common work of life, mingling with other people in the factory, shop, counting room, in the market place, the field, in every vocation that is honorable; but keeping themselves free from the vices of the world, by a close walk with God and in the footsteps of Jesus, thus shunning the appearance of evil or the pleasures and amusements of the world which are sins for a season. Saints may be known by their meekness, they are not easily provoked, temperate in all things, slow to wrath, long-suffering, full of patience, not given to profanity nor vulgarity, not boisterous nor proud, but given to prayer, seeking the good of others, especially the household of faith: "Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering; for he is faithful that promised; and let us consider one another to provoke unto love and to good works; not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another: and so much the more as ye see the day approaching."—Hebrews 10: 23-25. The Saints must be called together, for, "Gather my saints together unto me: those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice."—Psalm 50: 5.

There were saints among the people in Paul's day, for he followed Christ (Ephesians 3: 8), and he wrote to the saints at Rome (Romans 1: 7), to the saints at Corinth (1 Corinthians 1: 2), and to the saints at Ephesus (Ephesians 1: 1); hence, if living right while we do live, it matters not if we die, for, "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints" (Psalm 116: 15), for when he comes he will bring those with him.

"O, it is good to be a Saint in latter days."

W. N. DAWSON.

Lamoni Stake Reunion.

For the past few years, during the fall season, usually "on or about" the latter part of the month of August, and just before the children resume their attendance at school, a microbe, seemingly unknown to and unclassified by the scientist, seems to invade the systems of the inhabitants of Lamoni, also those of the surrounding branches of the stake. These people, usually steady and complacent in their course of life, deliberate in their methods of action, become agitated and moved upon by some compelling force which stirs them to strenuous activity. It is not confined to father, mother, or children; all partake of it, the level-headed breadwinner, the mild-mannered homekeeper, the children of all ages and sizes manifest the same general symptoms—all have the disease simultaneously. It runs its course—no use to try to stop it—for about ten days, reaches its climax on the second Sunday, causes no pain or suffering, and leaves the afflicted better in every respect than before the attack. This microbe evidently is altogether benevolent in disposition and altruistic in purpose. It is in a class by itself and deserves more extended eulogy. No doubt extensive cultures will be made of his royal line.

The symptoms manifest are in general about as follows: The wife rushes about the house in hastening zeal to gather up bedstead, cots, bedding, wearing apparel, cooking utensils, etc. The children dance around in high glee, while the homes take on the appearance of the domiciles of those who move out for parts unknown to take up claims elsewhere. With the first odor of cooking doughnuts and fried chicken, the man of the house senses the situation and stops all mere work. The instinct, now evolved and well established by annual visits of the aforesaid microbe, seizes him, soul and body; in this instance the usual imperative edicts of the lady of the house are unnecessary. Without objective compulsion he hunts up his team if he has one, or starts out for a dray wagon, the word exodus stamped upon the lineaments of his determined physiognomy. Then strange scenes appear and a varied panorama shifts itself before the vision of the gawking beholder. Gates open, wagons loaded with all manner, form, and species of household goods, crowned with the distributed, grinning family, appear, and all move in the same direction—down they go to the south end of town, grins broadening as they near the objective point; and soon there is a scene of bustling activity. Tents go up, stakes are driven, furniture is installed, and in a short time people are visiting, smiling, and chatting in a general spirit of enjoyment. They are again at the yearly reunion of the Lamoni Stake, at that celebrated spot where annually gather the people of Lamoni and brethren and sisters from other localities in the regular vacation of rest, relaxation, and enjoyment. A look of satisfaction rests upon every countenance; every one in himself is a study in content.

The large tabernacle (60x90), new and white, soon is surrounded by office, dining, rest, and camping tents—about seventy-five in all, stretching away from level ground up the green sward of sloping hill, overhung by widespread elm and overarched by the expansive blue, a scene of quiet sylvan beauty gratifying and restful. Those who rush pell-mell in crowded cars to distant points where they are pent up in crowded hotels seeking for change and recuperation, may be benefited; but those who come to the Lamoni reunion and who rest amid the quiet shade of its groves, who commune with the genial souls who gather at its shrine, are sure of physical invigoration and spiritual and mental retuning. Come, if you ever can, and we will do thee good. The Vale of Tempe and the plains of Attica, with the wondrous harmony of scenery and climate of that ancient land of culture, may be beyond compare; but suffusing all was the great desire unsatisfied, expressed in "the unknown God." But here dwells the Spirit of the God of Israel, teaching truth, inspiring love, exhaling friendship, creating a social spirit and establishing a Zion consciousness unknown to and uncomprehended by those who were and are aliens to the commonwealth of Israel. Not upon any modern Olympus, but in Mount Zion, is enshrined our inspirations.

The reunion was well attended and was in every respect a success; this is true of the preaching, prayer, and auxiliary sessions. The preaching was of a high order, a great degree of inspiration being manifest in this leading branch of spiritual teaching. Among the people there was noticeable a spirit of unity, of closer relationship, of nearer approach and communion. If any wall of social distinction or line of artificial differentiation has existed, it seems to have disappeared. These gatherings have done much to eliminate lack of approach and acquaintance. If they have accomplished nothing else, this work has justified them. Unity of spirit, oneness of heart and mind, in the truth, the bond that truly unites in fellowship, is that for which we are striving. We have substantial reason to be gratified in the development already attained and the promise of added progress.

The Sunday attendance was unusually large, when the people of the surrounding country drove to the reunion grounds and spent the entire day. Thousands of people thus hear the gospel, many of whom otherwise would not hear our message. They visit among themselves and among the Saints alike and are thus made more friendly and brought nearer to the work. There is a marked distinction in spirit and tone between the general features of this church reunion and that of the ordinary "town reunion," so prevalent throughout the country districts. The former is spiritual, social, and intellectual; the latter noisy, rough, and uncouth in some of its features, conspicuous by the absence of prevailing educative forces. This difference in spirit justifies the statement that visitors among gatherings of our people will readily recognize the higher spirit and purpose animating assemblies of the Saints.

One of the missionaries in charge, present, and the stake presidency presided. Sister Case and family were in charge of the commissary department, where good wholesome food was served. Bro. and Sr. D. A. Anderson had charge of the vocal and instrumental music, giving satisfaction with the high class of work done by the general choir and soloists.

President Joseph Smith, Sister Ada, and family were invited, but the recent demise and funeral of Patriarch Alexander H. Smith forbade a second visit now by the President and family. We hope to see them often, but do not feel justified in urging our aged and beloved President to travel and visit at the risk of illness following over-exertion. Bro. Fred M. Smith and Sister Ruth and children, homeward bound from California and the Northwest, were greeted with pleasure by friends and former neighbors. Bishops E. L. Kelley and G. H. Hilliard were also welcomed, and their efforts in their special lines duly appreciated.

Bro. and Sr. F. G. Pitt were present by invitation of the committee. They had hardly arrived when Sister Pitt became ill with what proved to be her last affliction. All that tender sympathy and faith could do was freely given in behalf of both, but the end came.

The brethren named, together with the home talent, made up the speakers.

We noted among other visitors the ample form and genial face of Bro. S. R. Burgess, of Saint Louis. He is almost an annual visitor and we have learned to look for him. Bro. Joseph B. Rodger, son of Elder Glaud Rodger, and wife, of Batavia, Illinois, formerly of Lamoni, esteemed by all, were likewise welcomed among the visitors. Elder William Bradbury, of Providence, Rhode Island, was present. Others were present from various points.

At the business session the reunion of 1910 was provided for. The committee was increased to seven, including Srs. J. W. Wight and Charles Goode. A resolution favoring purchase of the grounds was adopted; also an expression of opinion that the afternoons of Monday to Friday inclusive of the meeting of 1910 should be devoted to Sunday school, Religio, Daughters of Zion, and Graceland College work. Action was taken dispensing with the sale of all refreshments except meals on Sundays.

A five-cent hack fare brought travel between the city and grounds within the means of all.

Last but not least, honorable mention is made of the force of men who helped in the hard work of hauling, erecting, and taking down tents and otherwise doing the hard work necessary to the reunion.

R. S. SALYARDS, Secretary.

LAMONI, IOWA, September 8, 1909.

A man must keep his eyes on the face of Jesus Christ to-day, because there is none else so noble. Money, fame, poetry, music, art may all do something for us in our world development, but no one of them, nor all together, can take the place of the face of Emmanuel. Without it a man must inevitably fail to attain the highest, because he has as his inspiration something less than the best.—C. F. J. Wrigley.

We in the Tahitian Mission are rejoicing since the steamer arrived with Brethren May and Savage aboard. The large majority of the Saints on this island gathered in the chapel in Taronia to greet them, and if you could have seen the pleased expression on every face, you would know that the two brethren had made a good impression.

We feel that a large part of the burden has been taken from off our shoulders, and feel assured that it will continually decrease as the brethren progress in the study of the language. Being young men, and under the promises that have been made them, we are assured that they will speedily master the native tongue.

The writer has had his first experience as an interpreter, and can tell you that it is far more difficult than translating the written word, but hope to improve with practice. We have enough work ahead of us to keep them from getting homesick; such as printing Sunday school lesson books, the Lectures on Faith, tracts, etc., besides the regular editions of the Orometua, our monthly paper.

They will be expected to supply your pages with news from this mission, as everything is new to them, and this is the time to write. However, we may inform you, from time to time, of things they are diffident about writing.

With best wishes for the Saints everywhere, I remain,
Sincerely,
C. H. LAKE.

STOCKPORT, ENGLAND.

We have had a cloud over our branch now for over twelve months, but praise the Lord, it seems to be lifting again, and I for one have taken a new lease of gospel life, and am determined to go forward in the responsible office in which I was placed over three years ago, that of branch president.

I would express my sympathy with the bereaved ones of our aged brother, Alexander H. Smith. Personally, I do not feel sorrow but joy for his departure, at his glorious entry into the joys that await the faithful. I would desire that my life may be faithful like to his.

I am your brother,
WILLIAM WORTH.

Resolutions of Sympathy.

Whereas, our heavenly Father has suffered to be taken from our midst our beloved and reverend brother and Presiding Patriarch, Alexander H. Died.

MARSHALL.—Mrs. Elsie Marshall, daughter of J. L. and Alice Simmons; was born December 18, 1889; died August 27, 1909. She united with the church at the age of ten years, and has been a faithful server of the Lord ever since. She was united in marriage to Charles Marshall, January 26, 1905. To this union was born one child which lived to be two months and one week old. She leaves a husband, father, mother, two brothers, two sisters, and a host of friends to mourn. She bore her lingering illness well, and was conscious of everything up till a few minutes of her death. She bade them all good-bye, and said she was not afraid of death. Funeral services were held at the home of her parents, conducted by Bro. N. L. Upton. Her remains were laid to rest in the Stiritz Cemetery, two and one half miles northwest of Johnston City. May God comfort those who mourn.

BURK.—Sr. Eugenia H. Burk, daughter of Bro. and Sr. R. F. Hill, of Guilford, Missouri, died September 4, 1909. She was born August 21, 1889, at Stanberry, Missouri; united with the church August 30, 1900; under the administration of Elder D. C. White, and ever lived a faithful and upright life. She was active in the Sunday school and church work, and was esteemed by all her associates. Funeral services were held in the Baptist church, burial in the Platte Valley Cemetery, sermon by A. E. McCord.

CANTRELL.—At Mount Ayr, Iowa, August 27, 1909, Ward Allen, son of Mr. Isaac N. and Sr. Alice F. Cantrell, born at Dorchester, Nebraska, and at time of death was 18 years, 11 months, and 4 days of age. Left home in the morning in usual health, and while scuffling with a friend, died in the car seat without a struggle. The funeral was held at the home southwest of Lamoni, near the maples, attendance was large. Elder D. D. Young offered prayer; sermon by Robert M. Elvin; interment in Rose Hill.

SNIVELY.—Twin boys, children of Bro. George E. and Sr. Ethel M. Snively, born September 5, about 2 a. m., and funeral at the residence, three miles south of Lamoni, at 3 p. m. Elder Robert M. Elvin conducted the service. Interment in beautiful Rose Hill.

SHEEHY.—Sr. Orilla Sheehy, wife of Apostle Francis M. Sheehy, passed from this life August 29, 1909, at Brunswick, Maine. Interment was made at the Lisbon Falls, Maine, cemetery, in the family lot, M. C. Fisher officiating. She was born November 7, 1845, at Bolton, Massachusetts, and was baptized at Providence, Rhode Island, May 17, 1874, by Charles N. Brown. She has been a sufferer for years, having had an operation performed on her eye about four years ago, which deprived her of its use. She has been gradually failing for some months, and thinking the seashore climate might be beneficial to her, came east from Oklahoma, where she has been living for four years with her daughter, Mrs. C. Oliver Leeka. In her death, the church has been deprived of one of its most noble women, and her reward is sure.

STUDY.—Mary Ann, daughter of Henry and Christina Etleman, was born October 14, 1835, in Stark County, Ohio. Moved to Missouri in 1835, and to Illinois in 1839. Was baptized in 1841. Came to Iowa in 1846. Married David Study June 28, 1849. Was baptized into the Reorganized Church August 25, 1888, by Elder Joseph Luff. She was afflicted with apoplexy about eight years and died September 2, 1909. Husband and one daughter had preceded her. She leaves two brothers, two sons, and four daughters. Funeral at Saints' church, September 4, sermon by Elder J. M. Baker.

COLLEGE DAY.

The first Sunday in October is understood to be College Day; that is to say, the day fixed by the Bishop, and I think the conference, for the taking up of the collection among the churches to be devoted to a deficiency in the running expenses of the college, should any occur. The Saints of the different branches should not forget this day. The college is not yet upon a full paying basis, and it belongs to us as a people to see to it that this point be reached at as early a day as practicable. No class of church people was ever ruined by giving too much. Charity is a great healer of mental, moral, and material ills. To give liberally is to put oneself in the way of receiving liberally. It is said that the liberal soul shall be made fat. But laying aside all scriptural injunction, and putting ourselves on the basis of a conscious pride in sustaining an enterprise like Graceland College, let us begin to count the matter over, and on College Day make up a sum total that will be worth reading about all over the church. Let it not only be a matter of duty, but let it be a matter of proud achievement, to which the donations of the many may give the full completion of the object. What say you, brothers and sisters?

JOSEPH SMITH.

GRACELAND COLLEGE DAY.

Sunday, October 3, of the present year, is the day set apart by the action of the church upon which to take special collection in all the branches and districts of the church to help the college in its work.

Bishops, Bishop's agents, and their solicitors in the various branches of the church, together with branch presidents and treasurers, should remember that the college collection takes precedence of any and all other collections on that day. The general body having taken action and previously selected one day in the year for this work, fixing the time, this must be given first place upon this particular day. And it should be remembered that if we do not honor and respect the order of the body of which we are a part, we do not honor ourselves.

The better way, except in emergencies, is to take no collections upon this day except for college purposes; but should circumstances for any reason which can not well be avoided require a collection for some other purpose, let the same be taken after the order and direction of the body has been complied with, and after a full statement of the matter to the Saints who are present at such place has been made.

If the collection is taken together let it be reported, the day taken, the place, and the amount. If taken by entering names and amounts, let each name and the amount contributed by the party be reported. In every instance in sending in funds be sure and give the name of the place, or persons, contributing, and the amount.

Reports of collections should be made to the treasurer of the college, Bro. Oscar Anderson, address, Lamoni, Iowa, or to E. L. Kelley, Trustee, Box 125, Independence, Missouri.

In this work as in every other, let us each seek to honor the Lord in our efforts and do what we can, and then all will be blessed and his name glorified.

Very respectfully,

E. L. KELLEY, Presiding Bishop.

HIGH MORAL CHARACTER AND THE SALOON.

One of the strongest material arguments which can be made in defense of conflict against the liquor traffic, is found in the fact disclosed by the report of a grand jury sitting in Saint Louis County, Missouri. This report states that in what is called Luxembourg District there is one saloon for every forty-six and one half tax payers. This is equivalent to saying that out of the earnings of every forty-six and one half of the population who meet the taxes, there is collected into the tills of the liquor sellers a sufficient of their income to sustain one saloon with all its dependencies, and to maintain the traffic as it preys upon society.

When it is understood that not many years ago a similar report of the same county made the statement that more than one half of the criminal prosecutions in the court was the result of the use of intoxicating drinks, and the two thirds of the pauper element depending upon the charities of the people organized and unorganized, were also the result of the traffic in liquor, it would seem that common sense of society ought to force the conviction upon the lawmakers to put a stop to such preying upon society.

The same grand jury urged as a remedy for the condition of things stated to exist that the tax for licenses issued to saloon keepers should be made so high that "men of high standing and good moral character" only could afford to enter the liquor selling business.

The same grand jury reported that the laws restraining and regulating the keeping of saloons were not observed, and that even the side doors were open on Sundays.

What a remarkable travesty upon common sense and municipal logic is couched in this statement, that licenses should be issued to men of high moral character only. How many such men, men of high moral character, are known to society? The very trade itself is demoralizing, and there is not a man of good moral character in the community who does not know it. And to parade before the people a rule of law in which such a requirement should be spread upon the statute books of the State is a huge travesty upon moral character and good common sense. We doubt very seriously whether there is another profession or occupation for engaging in which, high moral character could be made a qualification with less propriety than in this. There never has been a time in Missouri or anywhere else where the selling and drinking of intoxicating liquors has been conducive to high moral development. There is no condition in society which requires such combination. There can be none. It may be true that there are many men in society, possibly in every community, whose sense of propriety restrains them from excessive indulgence in strong drink. But not a day transpires but what the press of the country brings to the notice of the people instances where moral character has been ruined, fortunes have been wrecked, families broken up, domestic happiness destroyed, and lives crushed, by the poverty and deprivation that intoxication is chargeable with. There is not a police station, a city holdover, a jail, or a penitentiary in the country, in which the greater part of the inmates therein confined, temporarily or continuously, have not been brought there by the liquor traffic and its use. There is not an officer upon the judicial bench, from the justice of the peace and judges of the criminal courts, the courts of appeal, the pardon boards of states, and the governors thereof, who does not know that more than half of those who are brought before their respective courts for infringement of the laws of society, have been made breakers of the law by the use of intoxicants. What a travesty, then, is this idea of high moral character as a qualification for saloon keepers!

It is not always the fault of the preacher or the teacher when men refuse to believe the gospel. The failure may be in the barren soil of the hearer.—Peloubet.

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS.

A news item, just a common, obscure news item, given four inches of space in the dailies, says that when aviator Nansan of St. Louis attempted a flight in his dirigible airship in Ottawa the propeller caught in an electric light wire. The framework of the machine was electrified and when a crowd rushed to assist the aviator some forty people who laid hold upon the machine to steady it were more or less severely shocked. One man (like Uzzah) died because of his presumption. In a later flight the machine caught fire and shot skyward raining fire upon the house tops so that several small conflagrations were started.

What a spectacle for the ancients if they could have seen it! An airship afoul of an overhead wire and so charged with some mysterious power that those who touched it were immediately stricken rigid; A blazing airship in the heavens raining fire on the house tops! Our fathers could not even understand a description of such an occurrence. Aviator, airship, electric light wire,—those terms would have conveyed no meaning to them.

No generation can fully comprehend and intelligently discuss the achievements, possibilities, mysteries, and glories of the next generation. All of which suggests that we may with profit go slow in our discussions of conditions that will obtain in millennial and post-millennial periods. Let us not be too minute and positive in our explanations of the state awaiting the lost or the saved, in heaven or in hell, or even in Zion within the next twenty years, imagining a thousand things that will be as unreal as moonshine in the light of actual experience when the times anticipated shall have fully come.

It is a good plan to be positive about such matters only when the revealed word is clear, definite, and full, conveying a statement well within the comprehension of an ordinary human mind aided with such inspiration as is the common lot of common church people. Nothing is half so mysterious as the vapourings of some who attempt to explain mysteries.

Did Dr. Frederick A. Cook reach the North Pole? He certainly started on an expedition in that direction; and he returned and announced to the world that he had succeeded. Some believed him and some did not. A lively controversy ensued. His enemies immediately made an attack upon his personal character. They said that he was unreliable. His personal friends as quickly rallied to the defense of his character. According to them he was the personification of courage, fortitude, and truthfulness. Clearly the question could not be solved in that way.

Soon the public decided that it would wait and see what kind of a message he brought back from the North. It was claimed that his story would stand or fall on its own merits. It is said that astronomers with their knowledge of the heavenly bodies, and Arctic explorers with their knowledge of conditions at the North, can analyze his daily observations and determine exactly whether or not they were made at the points where it is claimed they were made. This is a wise conclusion and all that Doctor Cook asked for. If, when his records are made public some shall refuse to examine them and shall persist in an attack on his character, it will argue that they are afraid of the records. Clearly, after several centuries of vain endeavor to reach the pole, it is worth while to examine the evidences of a man who says that he has been there.

Did Joseph Smith see an angel, converse with the Son of God, and secure a message for the world? He said that he did. He went to God seeking for revelation. He came back and sent a message from "Battle Harbor" and the war was on. Certain dull red stains on the floor of an old prison house in Carthage show that it was no sham battle.

Some believed his message and some did not. Enemies immediately made an attack upon his personal character,—still continued. For bitterness and persistency that attack has seldom been equalled. His friends rallied to his support. Thousands who knew him personally, intimately, being his daily companions, believed him to be an honest, earnest, and spiritual man. Many so testified. The question can not be settled in that way.

Is it not about time for the world to examine his message on its merits? His public teachings and the matters contained in the Book of Mormon and Doctrine and Covenants should be compared with that which is known of eternal truth and the character and plans of God and the heavenly host.

Surely after eighteen hundred years of suspended revelation it is worth while to examine the message of a man who claimed to be a prophet. It will not do to say that his story can not possibly be true. Anyone can reach the pole who is master of Arctic environments and will travel fast enough and keep it up long enough. Anyone can reach God who will obey his commandments. He is much nearer than the North Pole. And having reached him, it is quite possible that an important message may be given; especially in an age like this, when a message is sadly needed. To refuse an examination of his message and persist in an attack upon his character indicates a fear of the records.

Doctor Eliot says that the religion of the future will be entirely divested of the idea of authority. His notion is in harmony with the teachings of some of his fellow college presidents and professors who hold that there are no fixed lines between right and wrong and that there is no being or person anywhere with authority to say, "Thou shalt." Perhaps he is right, in a sense. No doubt unauthoritative religions will be popular in the future, as in the past. But on the other hand the religion of authority will be prominent in the future, as it has been in the past,—much more prominent than at present.

The statement is that of old, "holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit." They spoke authoritatively, dogmatically, being sent commissioned by one who had a right to say, "Thou shalt." Joshua brought the people up with a square turn, and when he had gained every ear he declared, "If it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord, choose ye this day whom ye will serve."

Does such a declaration sound presumptuous to modern thinkers? It is not a matter of record that anyone laughed at Joshua, or said, "Who are you to force a choice upon us?" Joshua spoke authoritatively.

When Paul stood before Felix to be judged he opened his mouth and reasoned concerning judgment and justice, and a peculiar thing happened. Felix, the judge, trembled before Paul, the prisoner at the bar. When the walls of the prison at Philippi were shaken another singular thing happened. The jailor, ignoring all precedents, fell at the feet of his captives and said, "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?"

"What must I do?" That is the question that thousands still ask. They want an authoritative answer; an answer from one who knows the will of God and dares to tell it. Such an answer always will be authoritative and dogmatic.

Christ himself declared that all power both in heaven and in earth was given into his hands. He commissioned his disciples to go and tell the world what they must do. To their astonishment even the devils were subject to them. It is no wonder that Felix trembled,—only a poor, debased, bribe-seeking politician.

The dominant religion of the eternal future will be authoritative. The forces of evil snap their fingers at a religion that disclaims authority. Repentant sinners have no use for such. They would rather hear from one Paul than from a thousand college presidents. The religion that is divested of the idea of authority appeals only to the man who wishes to retain his title to all heavenly blessing while he rushes headlong in pursuit of worldly pleasures. He is pleased to forget that there is a power with authority to say, "Stop! Choose this day!" He sincerely and enthusiastically hails the religion that has a form of godliness but denies the power thereof.

E. A. S.

So many in the world to-day are worshipping the gods of fashion and fortune and fame.—R. F. Y. Pierce.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

Elder Mark H. Siegfried writes from Nauvoo as follows: "A serious accident occurred in town last Monday night. The store of Jacob Richtman (on the flat) took fire. In about five minutes after the fire was discovered by those living next door, an explosion of one thousand pounds of dynamite and five hundred pounds of powder took place. One little girl five years old was killed. Her grandfather, Mr. Albert Ketcham, was seriously injured, besides several others were badly cut and scratched from flying glass and other missiles. Two dwellings were destroyed, and the store. All the window lights were broken in several houses near by and many from houses at a distance. About two thirds were broken in the Mansion House, a great many in the Old Homestead, and a goodly number from the Nauvoo House. Besides, the lightning struck the latter house during the burning of the store. This is the fifth time this house has been struck in the last thirty years,—since Emma Smith's death,—twice this year. The old "brick row," familiar to many, was demolished and thrown to pieces. Mr. Ketcham and Mr. Richtman are firm Strangites. I was called to officiate at the funeral of the little girl."

It will be understood that the Old Homestead is the house first occupied by Joseph Smith in the city of Nauvoo. The Mansion House was his home at the time of his death. The Nauvoo House, mentioned in the Doctrine and Covenants, was in course of construction and was later occupied by Joseph Smith's widow and family. The "brick row" consisted of store buildings and other buildings, relics of former times, when Nauvoo was the home of the Saints.

"Pleasure is seldom found where it is sought. Our brightest times of gladness are often made by unexpected things."

"Every man's religion is good enough for him, and no doubt Doctor Eliot is pleased with his. Curious thing about most men's religion is that they seem obsessed by the idea that they must make others accept it."

Hymns and Poems

Selected and Original

Faith and Duty.

[One who has often heard great congregations of men sing this song wonders why it is found in so few of the great hymnals. Written by an active, popular preacher, it may perhaps lack that finished polish and literary grace that belongs to some, but it makes up for any such lack with a force and vigor of its own, and a message that will sing itself helpfully over and over to those who catch its refrain. It is a good hymn to add to that altogether too small collection of suitable hymns for men. Norman MacLeod (1812-1872) was a Scotch divine, the author of "A highland parish" and other stories.]

Courage, brother! do not stumble,
Though thy path be dark as night;
There's a star to guide the humble,
Trust in God, and do the right.

Though the road be long and dreary,
And the end be out of sight,
Tread it bravely, strong or weary,
Trust in God, and do the right.

Perish policy and cunning,
Perish all that fears the light,
Whether losing, whether winning,
Trust in God, and do the right.
Shun all forms of guilty passion,
Fiends can look like angels bright;
Heed no custom, school, or fashion,
Trust in God, and do the right.

Some will hate thee, some will love thee,
Some will flatter, some will slight;
Cease from man, and look above thee,
Trust in God, and do the right.
Simple rule and safest guiding,
Inward peace and shining light,
Star upon our path abiding,
Trust in God, and do the right.

Sabbath Worship.

[This is another of the many good hymns by the one time infidel, slave trader, and profligate sailor, John Newton. He wrote it first as a poem on gratitude, for publication in Saturday Evening, and afterwards changed it not a little for church purposes. It might have perished in its original form, but it has attained universal popularity as a hymn for Sunday morning worship.]

Safely through another week
God has brought us on our way;
Let us now a blessing seek,
Waiting in his courts to-day:
Day of all the week the best,
Emblem of eternal rest.

While we seek supplies of grace,
Through the dear Redeemer's name,
Show thy reconciling face—
Take away our sin and shame;
From our worldly cares set free—
May we rest this day in thee.

Here we come thy name to praise;
Let us feel thy presence near;
May thy glory meet our eyes,
While we in thy house appear;
Here afford us, Lord, a taste
Of our everlasting rest.

May the gospel's joyful sound
Wake our minds to raptures new;
Let thy victories abound—
Unrepenting souls subdued:
Thus let all our Sabbaths prove,
Till we rest in thee above.

The Straight Road

CHRIST'S PROMISE TO THE CHURCH.

"And upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."—Matthew 16: 18. The writer believes that the pronoun it found in the text, stands for the noun church. He believes that the promise is a gospel promise, hence it is conditional, and can never be realized except as the enjoined conditions are observed. He believes, too, that it is prophetic, and the complete and final victory will not be secured until the last conflict is ended, between God and his people on the one hand, and Satan and his hosts on the other.

"The gates of hell" represent the evil forces of the invisible world, which are brought to bear against the people of God. They represent an offensive, more than a defensive power and warfare, and the purpose is to open wide the gates before the people of God, and if possible get them to come in, rather than to keep them out.

The church of God or Christ, which is the same thing, is, in its organized form, a divine institution, composed of men and women who believe in God and Christ and the gospel, and who have been called out of the darkness of the world into the marvelous light of God through the preaching of the word. As each individual member has the right and power of choice, and may choose good or evil (as he may elect), so it must be and is with the church. She is a probationer, and no guarantee of protection and blessing can possibly apply, or does apply, except as she lives in obedience to the divine will.

The church must not only preach the gospel to the people, but honor it in their lives, for she is called to be "the light of the world." (Matthew 5: 14.) No word of prophecy, no divine blessing, or promise, through men, angels, Christ, or God can set aside gospel conditions. Jesus said to his apostles:

Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, [upon this condition] I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen.—Matthew 28: 19, 20.

I have emphasized certain words, to show that the ministers of Christ's church are under the most solemn and strong obligations to teach Christ's doctrine, in its purity, to the people. No church which fails to do this can justly or consistently claim the promise contained in our leading text. (2 John 1: 9; Galatians 1: 6-9.)

We must conculde from what is written that the church of God, as its name implies, is an important and divine institution. Christ gave his life and entire life work to establish and perfect the church. Indeed, his fixed purpose to accomplish this important work is portrayed in the statement, "Upon this rock I will build my church." When addressing the elders of the church at Ephesus, Paul said:

Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood.—Acts 20: 28.

This indicates what Christ has done for the church, and what the elders of the church must do in order to acquit themselves before God.

Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it; that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, that he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish.—Ephesians 5: 25-27.

Surely if Christ has given himself for the church, that is, his entire life work, and his life on the cross, we should be moved with a holy and constant zeal in performing the work which he has enjoined upon us. The above passages of scripture lead to the inevitable conclusion, that if we are "laborers together with God," in the full sense intended, we will become members of his church. That is, presuming of course, that proper opportunity is afforded; for it is a fact that there is abundant room for all who love God and his truth to stand together with perfect safety, and with divine assurance of success, upon the broad and solid foundation upon which the church is built. (1 Timothy 3: 15.)

The ministers of the church are called and if faithful are qualified to represent God; or, in other words, to represent the kingdom of God, or the kingdom of heaven. It is important that this fact should be divinely impressed upon our souls. (Matthew 16: 19; 18: 18; John 20: 23; 2 Corinthians 5: 18-20.) To those who are called to be his leading ministers to the church and the world, Jesus said:

Wherefore, seek not the things of this world; but seek ye first to build up the kingdom of God, and to establish his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.—Matthew 6: 33, Inspired Translation.

We conclude therefore, that it is our duty as ministers of Jesus Christ, to keep the high standard of gospel truth before the people. It is true that our conduct may and probably will fall below the standard, in some things, and at some times; but God has never authorized us to lower the standard. We should, however, give reasonable evidence to all who love the truth, and all who are searching for the truth, that we are indeed making constant progress in the divine life, and commendable efforts to live up to the standard we preach to others.

This church of Jesus Christ, organized according to God's revealed will, and moving in harmony with the instruction he has given, represents all the forces of truth and righteousness, as opposed to error and wrong. On the other hand, as opposed to this divine institution, we have the kingdom of darkness, represented by Satan and his ministers. This kingdom represents that which is false and unrighteous, with all the seductiveness characteristic of Satan and his work. Between these two kingdoms the conflict of the ages has been going on, and is still raging. In all the temporary losses and defeats which the church has sustained (and they have all been temporary and permitted because of the failures and wrongs of God's people) there has been a literal fulfillment of the prophetic word. This same prophetic word tells of the time when glorious and complete victory will come to God and his people, and inglorious defeat and disgrace to Satan and his hosts. (Revelation 20: 1-6; 6: 15.) If the predictions of the prophets and apostles have been fulfilled in apostasy and temporary defeat, will they not likewise be fulfilled in final and complete victory? We think so.

When we consider the provisions of the gospel and church for the safety, development, and triumph of God's people, we can not wonder at that brief but significant historical statement found in Acts 2: 47. "And the Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved." Christ is the great architect and builder. "I will build my church." And we are compelled to believe, because of what is written, that he will do all the work in accordance with his Father's will. He also informs us that he will build on a certain foundation, which is indicated by the words "upon this rock."

Christ builds through the instrumentality of the men and women belonging to his church, and their work will be accepted by him only when they build on the true foundation and in harmony with the instructions given by the Master Builder. So long as they do this, the gates of hell will not prevail against them, individually or collectively; but as we have seen, the final and complete victory for the church as a body will come at the end of the conflict. It should be permanently settled in our hearts, then, that only so far as we do the will of God can we enjoy the protection against the gates of hell. It is consummate folly to presume that anything at any time or anywhere, can take the place of gospel conditions. It is certainly as fatal a mistake to overlook the conditions and expect the promise as it would be to observe the conditions and deny the promise. "What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder."—Matthew 19: 6.

As the Lord has said to his people in the last days, even so it is: "I, the Lord, am bound when ye do what I say, but when ye do not what I say, ye have no promise."—Doctrine and Covenants 81: 3. Now, to show that our interpretation of Matthew 16: 18 is correct, we simply appeal to other passages, contained in the sacred text-books of the church, and relating to the same subject. From an earnest and spiritual prayer, offered up by Nephi of Book of Mormon fame, we select the following words:

O Lord, wilt thou redeem my soul? Wilt thou deliver me out of the hands of mine enemies? Wilt thou make me that I may shake at the appearance of sin? May the gates of hell be shut continually before me, because that my heart is broken and my spirit is contrite? O Lord, wilt thou not shut the gates of thy righteousness before me, that I may walk in the path of the low valley, that I may be strict in the plain road?—2 Nephi 3: 6.

We call attention to the following points: First, Nephi prays that the gates of hell may be kept shut continually before him, not open that he may pass in; second, that the gates of God's righteousness may not be closed before him, but kept open, so that he might be able to "walk in the path of the low valley," and that he might "be strict in the plain road." Third, this conclusion is logical and plain: When the gates of hell prevail, they stand wide open to receive us; but when we prevail, they are kept shut before us continually.

Again I say unto you, Ye must repent, and become as a little child, and be baptized in my name, or ye can in no wise receive these things. And again I say unto you, Ye must repent, and be baptized in my name, and become as a little child, or ye can in nowise inherit the kingdom of God. Verily, verily I say unto you, that this is my doctrine; and whoso buildeth upon this, buildeth upon my rock; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against them. And whoso shall declare more or less than this, and establish it for my doctrine, the same cometh of evil, and is not built upon my rock, but he buildeth upon a sandy foundation, and the gates of hell standeth open to receive such, when the floods come, and the winds beat upon them. Therefore, go forth unto this people, and declare the words which I have spoken unto the ends of the earth.—3 Nephi 5: 9.

This is the language of Jesus Christ to the twelve Nephite ministers whom he had chosen and ordained to be his leading witnesses on this continent. From it we learn that the way to keep the gates of hell closed before us is to build on the true foundation with the right kind of material, that is, teach and obey the doctrine of Christ; but the way to insure them to be flung wide open to receive us, is to teach something different from what Jesus taught for the doctrine of Christ, and build on another foundation. Certainly no true Latter Day Saint will put up the claim this teaching is not authoritative and correct. It came from the lips of the same Christ who said, "Upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." It will be noticed, too, and the point is an important one, that what we are about to introduce from the Doctrine and Covenants, given to us through Joseph the Seer, is in complete harmony with this doctrine of the infallible teacher:

Therefore fear not, little flock, do good, let earth and hell combine against you, for if ye are built upon my rock, they can not prevail.—Doctrine and Covenants 6: 16.

Wherefore, if you shall build up my church upon the foundation of my gospel and my rock, the gates of hell shall not prevail against you.—Doctrine and Covenants 16: 1.

“Rock” and “gates” are evidently figurative expressions, the former representing the truth of the gospel; the latter, the forces employed by the Evil One in his warfare against the kingdom of God.

Yea, repent and be baptized every one of you, for the remission of your sins; yea, be baptized even by water, and then cometh the baptism of fire and the Holy Ghost.

Behold, verily, verily I say unto you, This is my gospel, and remember that they shall have faith in me, or they can in nowise be saved; and upon this rock I will build my church; yea, upon this rock ye are built, and if ye continue, the gates of hell shall not prevail against you.—Doctrine and Covenants 32: 2, 3.

In paragraph three, a small portion of which we have quoted, we have the following statement: “And the Book of Mormon, and the Holy Scriptures, are given of me for your instruction,” etc.

So the Doctrine and Covenants indorses what the Book of Mormon says about the true foundation (the “rock”), “the gates of hell,” etc. When we so interpret as to be in harmony with all that is written on the same subject, is it not good evidence that our interpretation is correct? By accepting this common sense method, we take Matthew 16: 18 out of the realm of speculation and uncertainty, and place it where there is harmony and safety. When we behold the bad results that have followed wrong teaching and false interpretation, it should teach us to be more guarded against this particular kind of leaven, lest in time the whole lump become leavened thereby. Nevertheless, I certainly feel that it is my duty in this matter, as in others, to hold myself open to conviction.

IV. OBTAINING THE PLATES. THE WORK OF TRANSLATION. THE BOOK OF MORMON PUBLISHED.

BY WALTER W. SMITH, PASTOR OF THE CHURCH IN PHILADELPHIA.

BOOK OF MORMON CHARACTERS.

This cut is from a photograph taken under the direction of President Frederick M. Smith. It was taken directly from the original slip of paper prepared by Joseph Smith and conveyed to Professor Anthon by the hand of Martin Harris. The paper was preserved by David Whitmer and passed into the possession of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, together with the manuscript from which the Book of Mormon was printed. This is probably the only cut ever published from a photograph direct from the original paper; other cuts have been made from drawings.

Following the vision of September 21, 1823, the youthful prophet, in accordance with the instructions of the heavenly messenger, annually visited the hill where the sacred plates were deposited. Each visit brought him further instructions regarding the work which was about to be intrusted to his care. When the time was fully come and the prophet sufficiently matured the sacred plates containing the Book of Mormon were delivered into his hands, with the charge that he should be responsible for them.

Very early in the morning of September 22, 1827, Joseph Smith, jr., repaired to the hill where the plates were buried by Moroni the prophet in A. D. 421. This hill is some four miles southwest from Palmyra, Wayne County, New York. The chest in which the plates were hidden consisted of a stone box, formed by laying a flat surfaced stone in the cavity dug in the side of the hill for that purpose, and setting about its edges four other stones, securing them with cement, the corners being also fixed with cement so as to render it water-tight. This box was covered with a stone which had a flat lower surface and a crowning top. How deep in the earth this box was buried we are not informed, but it was sufficiently deep for the fourteen hundred years of its burial to reveal the crowning top of the upper stone alone; not conspicuous enough to attract the passer-by, and yet enough to attract the attention of the prophet when directed to it by the angel.

Just as the gray dawn of the morning was giving way to the light of day, the prophet bowed down before the Lord at the place appointed, and in accordance with the promise made four years before, the angel delivered into his hands the plates, the Urim and Thummim, and the breastplate, with the injunction to be faithful to the trust reposed in him.

The plates were made of pure gold, about eight inches long, seven inches wide, and about as thick as common sheet tin, the whole being about six inches thick. They were secured together as a book by means of three rings which ran through holes in the edge of the plates. Some of the plates were also fastened on the other edge, thus sealing them so that they could not be seen without opening the seal on them, which the prophet was expressly forbidden to do at that time. The Urim and Thummim, by which the translation was made, consisted of two transparent stones set in the rims of a silver bow similar to old fashioned spectacles.

The excitement which had been provoked by the relations of the former visions was only increased by the story of the obtaining of the plates, and so bitter did the persecution become that it was deemed advisable to seek a more quiet environment for the work of translating. In the month of December, following, the prophet and his wife went to Harmony, in Susquehanna County, Pennsylvania, where they made their home for the time with Mr. Isaac Hale, the father of Mrs. Smith.

Between the time of his arrival and the month of February, 1828, the prophet transcribed some of the characters from the plates and translated a few of them by means of the Urim and Thummim. During this month Martin Harris, a well-to-do farmer residing near Palmyra, New York, who had become interested in the work begun by the prophet, believing implicitly the narration of the manifestations he had received, came to inquire after the progress of the work. He carried the transcript to New York with the view of laying it before linguistic experts in order to obtain their view of the matter. He accordingly called upon Dr. Samuel L. Mitchill, and Prof. Charles Anthon. The latter for some time held the chair of belles-letters and Semetic languages in Columbia College, New York. Professor Anthon testified to the genuineness of the characters (Doctor Mitchill corroborating this certification) and subsequently in a letter in answer to inquiries touching the interview with Mr. Harris, said that he was visited by a plain, apparently simple-hearted farmer, who brought a singular scroll which had evidently been prepared by some person who had before them at the time a book containing various alphabets.

This record was written in a dialect of Hebrew in the reformed Egyptian characters, which were translated into English by Joseph Smith, as already stated, by means of the Urim and Thummim, and written at his dictation by those who acted as scribe for him. The work of translation began about April 12, 1828, with Martin Harris as scribe, and continued until June 14, when one hundred and sixteen pages of foolscap had been written, covering the history of the Nephites from the time they left Jerusalem until the reign of King Benjamin; this was taken from the abridgment made by Mormon from the larger or historical plates of Nephi. When the smaller or ministerial plates of Nephi were reached and a duplicate history found, a respite was taken in the work of translating. After much importuning upon the part of Mr. Harris he was permitted to take this record home with him, where it was lost.

The messenger who communicated these things to the prophet took away the plates and the Urim and Thummim; these were returned and taken again, and again returned on September 22 following. The work of translation was not taken up immediately, as Mrs. Smith was the only scribe the prophet had and she, with the cares of her household duties, had very little time to devote to the work of writing, though she did write some.

Upon the 5th of April, 1829, Oliver Cowdery, who had been teaching school near Palmyra and had there heard of the work, being directed by the Lord, joined himself to the prophet in answer to his earnest prayer for assistance. Mr. Cowdery was a ready writer, and began on April 7 to write, as the prophet translated from the plates, the record of the Nephites, and continued without interruption until May 15, when a goodly portion of the book was translated. Upon this date the Aaronic priesthood was conferréd upon them and they gave some of their time to reasoning out of the scriptures the things concerning the kingdom.

Early in the month of June the prophet, his wife, and Oliver Cowdery removed to the home of Peter Whitmer, sr., near Fayette, Seneca County, New York, where they remained until the translation was finished and the copyright secured. Just prior to finishing the work of translating, the plates were shown to three witnesses by the power of God and by his voice they were commanded to bear record of the same, and some days later the plates were shown to eight witnesses who also bore testimony to the truth of the work. We are not informed as to the precise date of the completion of the work of translation, but the copyright was secured on June 11, 1829.

ORIGINAL MANUSCRIPT OF THE BOOK OF MORMON.

This photo is from the original manuscript from which the Book of Mormon was printed, bearing the marks of the compositors and proof readers, now in the possession of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. The cut shows a page from the second chapter of the Book of Jacob, containing the famous pronouncement on marriage, "There shall not any man among you have save it be one wife: and concubines he shall have none."

The translation being finished and the copyright secured, a contract was made with E. B. Grandin, of Palmyra, New York, to print five thousand copies for three thousand dollars, which Martin Harris mortgaged his farm to secure, and subsequently testified that every penny of it was paid back to him. The work of printing the first edition of the book was not an easy task. There was much opposition to be encountered, and great precaution had to be taken to prevent the loss of any of the manuscript. To avoid this danger a copy of the entire work was made, and while one copy was in the hands of the printer, or such portions of it as were granted at any one time, the other copy was carefully guarded by some one interested in the work. The book was proof read by Joseph Smith, jr., and Oliver Cowdery, and possibly others. The first announcement of the Book of Mormon for sale was published in the Wayne Sentinel, Mr. Grandin's paper. The announcement bears date of March 26, 1830.

The second edition of the Book of Mormon was printed in 1837, at Kirtland, Ohio, by O. Cowdery & Company, for P. P. Pratt and J. Goodson. To correct the typographical errors of the manuscript edition the work was carefully proof read by Joseph Smith, the translator, and Oliver Cowdery, the writer of the major portion of the book. The third edition was printed in 1840 at Nauvoo, Illinois, by Robinson & Smith, and was carefully revised by the translator. The first European edition was printed in Liverpool, England, in 1841, by J. Tompkins, for Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball, and Parley P. Pratt, from the second American edition. The fourth American edition was printed at Nauvoo, Illinois, 1842, by Joseph Smith, carefully revised by the translator. These were all printed during the lifetime of the prophet, and all but the European edition under his personal supervision.

Since his death there have been many editions. The following are the most important: Second European edition, 1849, printed at Liverpool, England, by Orson Pratt; third European edition, 1852, printed at Liverpool England, by F. D. Richards; fourth European edition, 1854, printed by S. W. Richards for Orson Pratt; fifth European edition, same place, same year, by F. D. Richards; all of these from the third American edition. An edition was gotten out by James O. Wright & Company, New York, in 1858, as a literary curiosity. From the plates of the latter there was issued an edition with an introduction written by Elder Z. Brook, which has been known as the Brook edition; this was distributed the same year. The Reorganized Church got out an edition printed at Plano, Illinois, in 1874, and several reissues have been made from these plates. The church in Utah got out an edition in 1879, divided into chapters and verses by O. Pratt, sr. Several reissues of this have been made. An edition was gotten out by the Church of Christ (Whitmerites) in Kansas City, Missouri, in 1889, bearing the name, The Nephite Records, and lastly the "Authorized edition," published by the Board of Publication of the Reorganized Church, Lamoni, Iowa, 1908, divided into verses.

The Book of Mormon has been translated into many languages. Editions are known to have been issued in the following: Danish-Norwegian, 1851, and by Reorganized Church in 1903. German, French, Italian, and Welsh, in 1852. Hawaiian, 1855, and later by Reorganized Church; later in the Swedish, Dutch, Spanish, Tihitian, Maori, Turkish, and Japanese and others.

It is safely estimated that nearly one million copies of the Book of Mormon have been circulated since 1830.

THE SABBATH DAY.

(The third speech made by Elder W. E. Peak in his debate with C. A. Beeson, Comstock, Nebraska, May 31, 1909. Reported by Miss Katie Ellswick.)

Mr. Chairman; Gentlemen of the Moderating Board; Ladies and Gentlemen: I am pleased to have the privilege of continuing the investigation of the question we have under consideration, which resolves itself into this: "Is the seventh-day Sabbath binding on Christians?" It is the duty of my opponent, as the affirmative of this proposition, to produce evidence from the word of God to show that the seventh day is binding upon Christians.

Now, there is no dispute between us but what the seventh-day Sabbath was given by Moses or through Moses, and that it was binding upon the children of Israel. No doubt in regard to that. No dispute between us on that subject. But the question is, Is it binding upon Christians?

My opponent says that he agrees with me that there have been two systems of worship given by the Lord. I am glad that we can agree even so far. We are starting out pretty well. We are beginning to agree upon the fundamental principles.

Now, one system was delivered to the human family through Moses, and it is known as the law of Moses. The other system has been delivered through our Savior. It is known as the "gospel of Jesus Christ" (Mark 1: 1), "the law of Christ (Galatians 6: 2); it is known also as the "perfect law of liberty" (James 1: 25). This system of worship is binding upon the Christians. Nowhere will we find an account of how to worship according to these two systems? Well, we go to the Old Testament scriptures to find an account of how to worship under the Mosaic law, and the New Testament scriptures to find an account of how to worship under the second system. This religious system that was known as the law of Moses was binding until the crucifixion of our Lord. After that it was not binding upon mankind, and should not be observed any longer. From the day our Savior died for us, from that date, the system known as the gospel of Christ becomes binding and that system should be observed until the second coming of our blessed Lord. Now, here is the question, and it is simply this: Is the seventh-day Sabbath binding after the crucifixion of our Lord? It was to be observed before that. We both agree that circumcision should not be observed, and that sacrifices of lambs should not be offered, and that the feast of the Passover should not be observed after the crucifixion of our Lord, but we do not agree in regard to the Sabbath. Where will you find the law that tells us how to live according to the system that was introduced by Christ and the apostles? In the New Testament scriptures. But in it do you find the statement that you should keep the seventh-day Sabbath? No, my brother admits that you can not. I will read what he said: "The Sabbath was not commanded in the New Testament scriptures." He would not have represented the scriptures correctly if he had said anything else. No, there is not a word that indicates that we should observe the seventh-day Sabbath. Then why are we to drag this Mosaic system into the Christian dispensation? Simply because my opponent says so. I told him last night to find one statement in the New Testament scriptures that Christians should keep the seventh-day Sabbath and it would settle the question. And he can not do it. Then why keep it? Just as well keep the feast of the Passover or circumcision, or sacrifice of lambs, etc. There is no proof for it. We desire to have him produce it if there is.

He has been continually telling us that the Sabbath has been in force since the day of Adam. I asked him last night to produce the scriptures that say so. Has he done it? No. He has simply said it was so. Let us examine the question now, and see what the Bible says in regard to it. He was trying to show from the Bible last night that the Sabbath was observed before Sinai. Did he trace it back to the garden of Eden? Did you notice how far he traced it back? He said about a month before Moses was given the ten commandments on Mount Sinai. That was as far back as he could get it. And you will see there was no Sabbath given to man until after they left Egypt, and he couldn't find one before that time. He hasn't found one yet, and he can not to-morrow, or the next day, or the next year.

Now, let us read what was written on the two tables of stone. There was more than my brother has on his chart. I will tell you why he left part of it off his chart. The seventh-day Sabbath was given to the children of Israel in the days of Moses after they left Egypt, and it was given to them as a memorial of deliverance. I fear that is the reason it is not on his chart. In the fifth chapter of Deuteronomy, sixth verse,

I am the Lord thy God which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage. Thou shalt have none other gods before me,

Thou shalt not make thee any graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the waters beneath the earth: thou shalt not bow down thyself unto them, nor serve them: for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me. And showing mercy unto thousands of them that love me and keep my commandments. Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain; for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain. Keep the sabbath day to sanctify it, as the Lord thy God hath commanded thee. Six days thou shalt labor, and do all thy work. But the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thine ox, nor thine ass, nor any of thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates; that thy man-servant and thy maid-servant may rest as well as thou. And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord thy God brought thee out thence through a mighty hand and by a stretched-out arm: therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the sabbath day.

To leave out the part that my brother has is like leaving off the author's name of an official document. Who gave it? You can not tell from his chart. But if you read the Bible the author's name was there. "I am the Lord thy God"; that is the name, that is the one that gave it, telling them why they should keep the sabbath day and sanctify it. Notice the reason given: "And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt"; "therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the sabbath day." Why did he command them to keep it? Because he brought them out of the land of Egypt. Do you think that they would have kept the Sabbath day before the event transpired which caused the Lord to command them to keep it, which was because they were taken out of bondage? Why do we celebrate the 4th of July? Because we were freed from England. Did we celebrate that day before the Declaration of Independence was written? No. Then, did those people keep the seventh-day Sabbath before they were delivered from bondage? No. England might just as well have celebrated the 4th of July before this continent was discovered.

Now, we will see that the seventh-day Sabbath was a Mosaic institution, just as the Passover was. The seventh-day Sabbath was to be observed by the people for just the same length of time as the Passover. I will show you that this is so before our debate is over, if my opponent does not.

But now we will notice another statement in regard to the institution of the Sabbath and he has quoted it several times. Genesis 2:2:

And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it; because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made.

When did he bless and sanctify it? Was it before he rested or after he rested? Let us get this point settled. Can't you see that he blessed and sanctified the day after he had rested? How long? That is the only question. I think my opponent will agree with me that the Lord blessed and sanctified the seventh day after he had rested. How long afterwards? When did he command the people to keep it? My brother says he commanded it to be observed by Adam and Eve. But did he quote the Scriptures to prove that? Did he read a verse to prove that? No, he didn't read that from the Bible. What proof have we that what he says is so? He didn't even say that he got it from Mrs. White's vision. He can't find it in the Bible, but he has told us at least a dozen times already that the Sabbath was instituted at creation. We simply have his word for it.

I have already told you why God commanded the children of Israel in the ten commandments to keep the Sabbath. The reason was that he brought them out of the land of Egypt, as I have read to you.

Now we will read and see where it was first made known, in Nehemiah 9:13:

Thou comest down also upon Mount Sinai, and speakest with them from heaven, and gavest them right judgments, and true laws, good statutes and commandments. And madest known unto them thy holy sabbath, and commandest them precepts, statutes, and laws, by the hand of Moses thy servant.

Made known by whom? By the hand of Moses, thy servant. Who said that? The Almighty, through Nehemiah. No wonder you can't find an account of where it was kept before that time. God made it known by the hand of Moses, and yet in the face of such scriptures my opponent will tell you it was made known to Adam and Eve and Abraham. Why, ladies and gentlemen, we want proof in this debate, Bible evidence. Men-made statements are sufficient with some people when listening to a sermon, but not sufficient in an investigation of this kind. What we want is evidence. If I didn't want to produce evidence to a congregation you couldn't drag me into a debate.

Now, my opponent says the Sabbath was made known to Adam. What does the Bible say? Nehemiah says it was made known through Moses. Could we have any plainer proof? And remember now when you keep the Sabbath, remember that you were "a servant in Egypt." But he has been trying to make you believe that the Sabbath was commanded for at least twenty-five hundred years before that.

He tells us about the annual sabbaths. There were annual sabbaths, and he says these were the sabbaths that were nailed to the cross. But he gave no scripture to sustain his statement. Let us see what Paul says about the matter. We will turn to and read Colossians, second chapter, and we will see whether it was the annual sabbaths and yearly sabbaths, or was it the Sabbath days:

Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross; and having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it. Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days:

It is still there.

which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ.

Having abolished in his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances; for to make in himself of twain one new man, so making peace.—Ephesians 2: 15.

What was it he abolished? "The law of commandments contained in ordinances." My opponent calls the ten commandments "the law of commandments." And the laws that were "contained in ordinances" were abolished. What part is contained in ordinances? Let me read to you, and you will see the seventh-day commandment is one. Numbers 28: 9:

And on the sabbath day two lambs of the first year without spot, and two tenth deals of flour for a meat offering, mingled with oil, and the drink offering thereof. This is the burnt offering of every sabbath, beside the continual burnt offering, and his drink offering.

Now the Sabbath was to be kept in a certain way. There were ordinances in connection with it. And that command "contained in ordinances" was abolished. You couldn't keep the Sabbath according to the law unless you offered the burnt offering. It was observed by this ordinance and you see that this commandment was abolished. The seventh-day Sabbath is the only one in the ten commandment law that is observed by ordinances. Then why argue that we should keep it? Why say it is binding on Christians, when Paul said that it was abolished? Then why ask us to comply with it and make out we are all going to the bad place if we do not keep it when the word of God says it was abolished? The more a man examines this question the plainer he can see there is nothing in it. It is all noise. It is a scarecrow. Don't be afraid of it. It is dead. It won't hurt you. Anyone that examines it can see that it rests upon assertions and man-made statements instead of biblical proof and evidence. We want evidence. We are not young robins ready to swallow everything given us.

Now Christ gave commands. The apostles gave commands. The Holy Ghost gave commands. But nowhere do we find the command to keep the seventh-day Sabbath, and my opponent admits it. Where does he get it? Back in the old Mosaic law. You can find more proof in the New Testament to sustain circumcision than to sustain the seventh-day Sabbath. Listen to the sixteenth chapter of Acts, first three verses:

Then came he to Derbe and Lystra: and, behold, a certain disciple was there, named Timotheus, (the son of a certain woman, which was a Jewess, and believed; but his father was a Greek:) which was well reported of by the brethren that were at Lystra and Iconium. Him would Paul have to go forth with him; and took and circumcised him because of the Jews which were in those quarters: for they knew all that his father was a Greek.

Paul took Timothy and circumcised him, but I can't find any place where Paul ever kept the seventh-day Sabbath, not even because of the Jews. But we do find where Paul circumcised Timothy. He says "Christ kept the Sabbath and so should we." Why, just as well say we should keep the Passover. Christ kept the Passover. Certainly Christ kept the Passover. Christ kept the Passover and the sabbaths, the seventh-day and annual sabbaths also. But you see that was before these things were nailed to the cross. But since then we have no account in the New Testament that Christians should keep them. Neither have we any evidence that they keep them. We have no more evidence that we should keep the seventh-day Sabbath because Christ kept it, than we should keep the Passover and other Jewish feasts, for Christ kept them all. And let me tell you this man can not produce a passage that we should keep the Sabbath, but that I can produce parallel passages that we should also keep the seventh-day ordinances of the whole law of Moses. They were all binding until the cross and then they were done away with. They were all nailed to the cross at the same time and went out of force together.

Prof. Camden M. Cobern, writing in the September Chautauquan, tells of a sport more exciting than that of lion hunting. It is no other than the hunt for the papyrus, the business and recreation of archaeologists. The home of the papyrus is Egypt and here the valuable documents which give modern scholars their knowledge of ancient civilization are unearthed in great quantities in the sands of the desert. It is the desert which has preserved these papyri unharmed for centuries and the modern archaeologist, skilled in his business, can tell at a glance the nature of the soil which is likely to repay the work of excavation. One most interesting discovery of recent years has been that mummied crocodiles often served as libraries. By accident, one of these mummies was broken open and revealed an interior crowded with papyrus rolls. Since then about one in every fifty of the crocodile mummies has proved to be similarly filled. Mr. Cobern recounts the nature of many of these papyri, showing alike their tremendous value to scholars and, as well, their interest to the general reader. From them we get a most interesting insight into the life of two and three thousand years ago.

THE CARE OF THE CRIPPLE.

When the doctor placed my little one in my arms with just the faintest whisper of the dreadful truth, my heart sank. Cripple! What terrible pictures the word brought to my mind, as I sat looking down into the baby face so sweetly innocent of the life before him.

Above all rang the words I had so often heard in reference to other cripples I had known,—“Hump-back disposition.” Would my baby grow into the morose, spoiled child I had so often seen afflicted children become? And again arose the question, what made the majority of cripples selfish and overbearing? Was it that their affliction affected their mental being until they grew peevish and exacting, or was it partly due to unwise training?

The cripples in the families I had noticed, were either the petted one or on the contrary the pushed out one,—the one to whom every member in the family were but as serfs, or an individual put off by himself and neglected. Was there not then a happy medium, that would make the child feel as other children? Was it possible to so combine training and sympathy for that child, in such a way that could help him in some measure to throw off the effect of his malady, and be a happy, normal child mentally? Consequently, with this idea in mind I watched the baby mature from day to day and studied into his temperament.

Paralyzed limbs and a weak spine,—what outlook could be more forboding for the little one? In my imagination existed the picture of a lame boy I had known in my childhood, a son on whom were showered all the luxuries that money could buy. His brothers were compelled to give in to his slightest whim, and his parents sacrificed their every pleasure to minister to his wants, thinking in so doing, to make up for the loss that would necessarily be his.

Needless to say, he grew up a selfish, overbearing boy, disliked by his playmates, and most unhappy. While his parents lived his path was made comparatively smooth, but at their death what a poor, pampered object of humanity he became; his mind in as sunken a condition as his crippled limb, with no object in life save to struggle through the best way he could. His brothers soon became tired of his numerous demands and left him on his own resources. It made me shiver and breathe a prayer for guidance in the disciplining of my little one. Thoughtfully I planned my future course of training. I have labored to treat the three children equally, as far as their different ages and dispositions would allow. The afflicted child has never been the pet, or set apart from the others in any way. The few rules that apply to the brothers, he has had to obey as well. In other words, he has been treated as a normal child as far as possible. Because he was hampered by the defect in his limbs was no excuse to let him destroy the block houses his little brother had built, or allow him to have the best of the dainties; feeling that his bodily affliction was bad enough not to add to it a shriveled state of mind, that would make for him only a life of bitter disappointment in after years.

From the time his back was strong enough to allow him to sit on the floor, propped about with pillows, I have taught him to amuse himself and be independent in as many ways as was possible in his condition. I have never believed in giving children what they tease or cry for, so he soon learned to accept a denial calmly, almost cheerfully, knowing that it was final.

His rubbings, electrical treatments, and so forth, necessarily took more of my time, but they were performed in a playful manner, never bringing his affliction before him as something to be dreaded in the least.

As he grew older I allowed him to be with other children a good bit, entering into their plays as much as possible. A large sand pile in a healthy nook in the yard enticed several playmates there and he was one amongst them, building houses as deftly as the rest, or making sand pies. These little plays made him for a time a normal, happy child, seeing his hands accomplish what the other children did.

When we made our garden he had his short-handled rake and hoe and, seated on the ground, planted with the rest. A tiny watering can filled his little heart with delight and again he was happy in watching the beautiful flowers grow, knowing his hands had planted and tended them.

When the other children rode their velocipedes up and down we purchased him a small tricycle wagon, strapping his feet to the pedals, so while we pulled him his feet went through the motions like the other children, strengthening his muscles and adding to his little world.

He is a little past five years of age now and is taken a short distance to a private kindergarten of about a half dozen children. The teacher thoughtfully appreciates his condition, letting him feel that he is one of the children even in the circle games, allowing him to hop about the floor as he can not stand alone.

He has always been a fresh air baby, consequently has a good, healthy complexion and fully developed chest.

Whatever he can do toward helping about the house or helping himself he does, dusting the lower articles of furniture, drying the saucers, or crawling up and down the stairs or out and in his little wagon. Every new thing he finds himself able to accomplish adds just so much to his independence for after years. With this end in view I dress him in heavy overalls when the days are warm enough and let him crawl about the lawn. The electricity of the earth helps his limbs, while playing with the other children teaches him unselfishness. Of course it makes considerable washing and adds to the darning pile, but what is a little mending in comparison to a child's health? What makes my heart bleed is to see an anæmic looking child compelled to sit in his high chair the best part of the day while the mother goes through the daily routine of work, or when out for his airing strapped in his go-cart for fear he will soil his befrilled clothes. How I long to snatch him from his dainty prison, put on a pair of gingham rompers, set him on the ground with a spoon and whisper, “Dig, dig, until your poor little white face is covered with God's earth. Let the sunshine brighten your lips and fill the great want in those sad baby eyes.”

So much for his physical development. Now, in regard to his mental training which is just as important as the physical.

Studying cripples in general, as a rule I find them to have a loving, sensitive disposition, which must be tenderly cared for in the proper way. If this disposition is not allowed to develop, crushed or thwarted in any way it will give place to a cruel, selfish nature, we see so often in unfortunate children.

As I have said before, I find it best to speak as little as possible of his condition, especially in his hearing. Some people are thoughtful enough not to refer to it while he is present, God bless them. Others make remarks or ask questions regardless of time or place. When I meet the latter I make the best of it, passing over their remarks quietly or answering their questions in about the same tone as if they had simply spoken of the color of his eyes or hair.

No one can ever tell how much mental suffering they cause by referring to a person's physical condition. Oh, that I could shout this aloud before the world and lessen some of the mental struggle I have seen poor sensitive mortals undergoing because of some thoughtless remark.

Referring to his condition makes him feel the sad difference between himself and his playmates. Ignoring it will help him to be and act more like them. There is no reason why a cripple should not be a happy child. In fact, my boy is even happier than most little ones. Even in his babyhood he was christened "Sunny Jim" by many of my friends, such a fun-loving, rollicking disposition he possessed. I wish my readers might see him now as he plays "keep house" with his little brother, or last summer as he hopped about the lawn chasing the neighbors' chickens, squealing with delight as they fluttered their wings in escape.

Children, like grown people, imbibe much from the surrounding atmosphere. Hope or despair, courage or cowardice may be instilled into their little hearts just as their surroundings hold one or the other. Therefore, if there is a grain of hope for your child let him feel it. Keep that day before him when he will be well and strong. If there is no hope in this world there is a time some day when all will be well. Some day, when all our hopes will be satisfied in that fair morn "bye and bye." After all it is only a short time. Why not let him feel it, too, and realize the great comfort that comes from knowing we are held by the hand of a loving Father who knows all our griefs and fears, and has gone to prepare a place for us where there are no tears, neither sorrow nor crying?

If your physician tells you your hours are limited, how quickly your hopes and ambitions sink and you fall into a mere existence; but, on the other hand, if he holds forth a single ray of hope, how your every effort is called into action because of that little word. Just so your child will accept your view of his case and become mentally morbid, or on the contrary, live a wonderfully happy life in spite of his physical condition.

Last, but surely not least, make your little one feel he has a life purpose before him. What did the thorn in the great apostle's side matter to him once the light of his wondrous calling was shed in his soul? Your child may not be a Paul nor a Peter, but there is a work for him to do as truly as if he were one indeed.

The life of a cripple is a hard one at best, but how much harder can it become by allowing him to develop a selfish, narrow disposition that will make him unlovely and unloved.

My boy may be compelled to sit in a wheeled chair all his life, but hands and mind will be trained to do wondrous things. Above all he will be able to look into his future with a sunny disposition that will help him over the hard places and win him many friends along the way. He has not had his every whim gratified, so he will be content to let others live and not expect too much of his fellow-men.

No matter how great a deformity or how cruel the crippled condition of a child, develop in him the lovable, helpful, spiritual side until he shall truthfully say: "Somewhere there is a place for me that no one else can fill. Somewhere there is a work for me that no one else can accomplish," and the beautiful side of him shall be so wonderfully developed that the world will stop to look at him; not because of his de-formity, that will only mar the outward man for a time, but on account of the sweet contentment that shines from his eyes—and speaks of the inner spiritual being, for this will pass on from glory to glory for ever.—Jane Parker in American Motherhood.

Questions on October Reading.

What disposition is liable to be manifest in afflicted children? What would be the kindest course to pursue with an afflicted child? Did the unselfish devotion of the parents mentioned prove to be true kindness to the child? On what footing did the writer of this article place her afflicted child? What added affliction did she fear might result from undue humoring? What qualities did she seek to develop from the time her child sat on the floor at play? How did she seek to prevent self-pity in him? In what would his play with other children result? What benefit would he receive from his garden work? What would be the gain in his feeling himself one with other children? How would he be helped by the doing of different kinds of work? What is to be considered in the dressing of a child? Which should be sacrificed, health or beauty of clothing? By what is the loving, sensitive disposition of the afflicted child liable to be replaced? What treatment may prevent this? What should be avoided in the presence of the child? What wisdom did this mother show in replying to thoughtless remarks? What delicacy should be shown in regard to afflictions which render others peculiar? What help should an afflicted child receive to make him a happy child? Why should he be taught to have a purpose in life? What will a loving, spiritual determination to engage in some good work accomplish for him in life?

Spain Pursued by Disaster.

This sudden appearance of a very serious evil leads us to reflect upon the hidden causes which have silently brought about the present state of affairs. Since the loss of her colonies Spain has been for ten years trying to profit by the terrible lessons of Cavite and Santiago, and partly by means of a natural evolution, partly through the agency of the governmental parties, was beginning to awake to life. The present disturbances afford us an opportunity of making a brief study of the social conditions through which Spain is passing. We shall endeavor, both in our censure and in our praise, not to be influenced by prejudice. Although "to aid in the disheartenment of the mother-country is in truth an impious work," to present her defects "without jeers, or insults, or contempt" is almost always salutary, for with the clear consciousness of one's sins may come a stimulus to betterment.

Three events of the utmost gravity and importance have just taken place at the same time, damaging still further the already impaired credit of the country and not leaving unscathed its institutions,—the outbreak of the Rffian tribes, the death of Don Carlos, and the abortive revolutionary movement of Barcelona. We must not, of course, consider these events as mere accidents without consequences. Whether they were the result of long and studied preparation or due to chance, they took place almost in unison, and their united weight fell upon a mass of people very ready, after so many disasters, to seek safety wherever it might be found.—Luis Garcia Guijarro in the American Review of Reviews for September.

Letter Department

Moline, Illinois, Reunion.

A joint reunion of the Eastern Iowa and Kewanee districts is now held in remembrance by the loving band of Saints, both old and young, who participated in the great blessings of our heavenly Father. Of this reunion held at Moline, I desire to pen a few lines, in hopes that other dear Saints may be encouraged to trust in our Lord and the hope we have in the salvation of our souls. Of the reunion committee we could readily see that they desired to please and make all as comfortable as possible, and in this they did not fail. And as the brethren and sisters began to gather from the different parts of the field, the writer felt glad to meet with so many energetic workers. Many of these Saints had never met before; but all greeted each other as brothers and sisters, and thus we felt as one great family in Christ. Oh, how grand it is, and greatly to be appreciated, when the dear Saints can forget the pleasures of this evil world and meet together with the Spirit of God to comfort and cheer the sorrowing, the sad, and those who have become discouraged! And as we met together in the prayer service each morning, how we felt to rejoice under the influence of that Holy Spirit. Each day, as we became more acquainted, that Spirit gently felt its way into our souls, blending our lives together, making us one in the gospel of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

It was Sunday morning at 6.30 that a large band of our young people met in prayer and fasting, and while these dear young Saints were gathering to the place of service, it could be seen that each face beamed with that holy influence, and as we arose to sing the first song, we were clothed upon with that holy influence. And all felt to shed tears of joy. There were ten prayers offered before the Lord and thirty-seven testimonies, together with three prophecies. We would like to insert them all, but will give one as we have it before us: "Verily, thus saith the Lord unto you my young people who have now assembled together. It is pleasing in the sight of your heavenly Father that you have come before him in the spirit of humility and love for each other. I desire to bless you with all heavenly blessings, but my people have not hitherto hearkened unto my counsel already given to you through my Spirit; and many blessings I have withheld; but verily I am fond of you at this time. Your heavenly Father has seen your efforts and heard your prayers in times past, and my Spirit has striven with you many times, when your minds were set upon the pleasures of the world. Upon you, my dear young people, soon will be placed great responsibilities, because a great work will I the Lord require of you. But this promise I leave unto you: Inasmuch as you continue humble and prayerful before me, I the Lord will qualify you for my work. Many of you will soon know that the gospel shall be proclaimed in all languages and tongues to all nations. Some of you, my people now assembled, shall yet bear these tidings to the nations of the world, and I the Lord will qualify you for this part of my work, inasmuch as you seek me with your whole heart. And while the tempest shall rage without, and the thunders roar overhead, my people shall be held in remembrance before me, saith the Lord. And when ye see these things come to pass, lift up your heads and rejoice because your redemption draweth nigh. And as you shall go out from this reunion many of you shall be tried, and Satan will seek to darken your minds, but you know my power, therefore be ye very humble before me, and my Spirit shall enlighten your minds, and my peace and blessings shall be with you."

And let me say to you, dear young brothers and sisters in Christ, do not forget these plain and precious truths, as they came to us from our heavenly Father. This was our first attempt at holding a reunion at Moline, and we believe it will not soon be forgotten by those who sacrificed to attend.

Those of the general missionaries present were Brn. J. W. Wight, O. H. Bailey, Amos Berve, J. B. Wildermuth, J. Turner, George J. Brookover, and James McKiernan. Bishop E. L. Kelley was with us a part of the time, who endeavored to teach us the financial law. Many beautiful truths were presented by these brethren.

We would not forget the efforts of Sr. M. E. Etzenhouser, who had charge of the auxiliary work. From the remarks of our young people we believe her work was greatly appreciated, and much good accomplished along that line. We close by saying, May God's peace and blessings be with you all till we meet again.

GEORGE J. BROOKOVER, Secretary.

HARTFORD, ARKANSAS, August 25, 1909.

Editors Herald: This leaves me domiciled with Bro. and Sr. David Chronister near the above-named place, preaching at night in the district schoolhouse.

Our labors have been confined thus far during this year to western Arkansas, and we can nothing like answer all the calls we have for preaching. When we entered the field our first stop was Grannis. We stayed in this vicinity for two months. During this time our railroad fare amounted to less than fifty cents. We visited the neighboring vicinities adjoining Grannis and as a result of our labors we baptized seven adults, some of whom had never heard the angel message, but who received it gladly.

We found the once flourishing Grannis Branch in a sleeping condition. The church had been blown off its foundation during a windstorm and was standing in this dilapidated condition. No preaching services had been held for months; the Sunday school had been abandoned; the Saints' children that attended any school had to go to the sects. They had not had an election of branch officers for more than two years and I could find no one who remembered when they had taken the sacrament last. So we saw that something ought to be done. So after a consultation it was agreed to call a business meeting to be held July 24. The Saints responded well and a fair representation was present. Some important business was transacted and we hope there will be a revival of the work at this place. While in Grannis we made our home with Bro. W. E. Clinton and his excellent family, whose latchstring hangs on the outside with an invitation to the wandering missionary to pull and a royal welcome awaits him.

While laboring in this part in company with Bro. James M. Smith, we were assailed by a Baptist preacher who came to our services and wanted to reply to our sermons. We refused to let him interfere with our services, but told him if he wanted to debate we would accommodate him. He said he would get a man to debate with us, but refused to meet us himself. He announced that he would lecture against us at his regular appointment. So we made it a point to happen in and listen to his "effusion." So we accordingly announced an answer after he was through. Most all the people stayed. Although our time was limited we think the reverend gentleman will be more careful next time. He used extracts from the writing of W. M. Hicks, who wrote a pamphlet against us with extracts from others. We happened to have a copy of the Arkansas Baptist where the editor of that journal explained to his readers that Bro. W. M. Hicks was in jail in Smithland, Kentucky, charged with going under an assumed name and obtaining money under a false pretense, and that his name would be stricken from the editorial staff until he was cleared of these charges. The people could easily see the character of his arguments. He threatened us with "Ben Bogard," but we did not feel in the least intimidated.

Since coming to Hartford we have attended two services of a new sect which call themselves "apostolic." They claim this because they speak in tongues. This is the evidence, they claim, of the baptism of the Spirit, is to receive this gift. They conduct their meetings on the same plan as the Holiness people. I saw two little girls about ten years of age under the "power," as they call it. They were stretched out on the floor, eyes closed; they were singing in a familiar tune, but with some kind of a gibberish which they repeated over, sometimes together, and their hands were in continual motion. I also heard three others speak in tongues, but no interpretation was given. Two of them were testifying. They would speak a few words in the tongue and then would continue in English as though there had been no tongue. They claim the movement began in 1900 in Topeka, Kansas, by an old Methodist preacher. Sometimes several speak at a time. I heard two tongues at one time. Surely we are living in the time spoken of by John the Revelator in the sixteenth chapter and the thirteenth and fourteenth verses, where he saw the unclean spirits working miracles.

I am still in hope of final victory,
JESSE M. SIMMONS.

LITTLETON, COLORADO, August 19, 1909.

Editors Herald: I would like to say a few words to the youth, notwithstanding the fact that I have scarcely reached the age of maturity myself, or by any means attained perfection. But I have been impressed to write along this line.

The noun youth indicates a new life, and naturally new ideas, new modes and ideals of life. The man or woman who has no ideas of his own, and who is used as a tool in the hands of his superiors, will soon become rusty and worn out, and before he is aware of it, a new and modern tool will be placed in his stead.

The youth is looked up to with bright hopes by the older generation. He is not only expected to carry out the ideas and undertakings of his parents, and the nation, but he is expected to make advancement, step out of the old path and make a new one, one that is more straight, and that will help him to reach the desired goal at a much earlier date. While I am dwelling on this subject I would like to ask, Have you any ideal, any goal? Or have you been simply drifting along aimlessly in life? Do not follow the example of the ancient poet who said, "All things come to those who wait," but rather follow the example of the modern poet who said, "All things come to those who 'hustle' while they wait." Remember it all depends on self. The man or woman who says, "I can't," is taking his or her first step into the mystic veil of another world.

We will consider nature and see what example she has for us in that line of advancement. The flower, we think, will be a good subject. From the time the tiny seed has been placed in the ground until it has blossomed, we have noticed a continuous advancement. We first note the seed beginning to swell, then a little later it bursts and puts forth the plant in its infancy. It now begins to take root and grow, and we follow it all along the line of its growth, and from time to time observe it putting on new leaves; finally the bud appears, and it is then that we begin to anticipate that our hopes will be realized, and when it has blossomed we look upon it with admiration, knowing it is a perfect flower, and that it has attained all that nature intended it should.

No end is attained without an effort. In view of this fact is it not wisdom that we start as early in life as possible to bring about those conditions which will better qualify us for the position which we desire to occupy in life, for we do not know how arduous the task may be, or the length of time required to accomplish the same? We can now begin to comprehend the wisdom in the statement which Christ made: "Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth"; also, "Come up higher."

The worst of all is, we are permitting to-day to slip by unheeded, notwithstanding the fact that opportunities are being offered us, and that yesterday can never be recalled. The poem I shall quote has impressed itself so strongly upon my mind:

"Listen to the water mill,
All the livelong day,
How the creaking of the wheels
Wears the hours away.
Languidly the water glides,
Ceaseless on and still,
Never coming back again
To that water mill.

"And the proverb haunts my mind
As the spell is cast,
The mill will never grind again
With the water that has passed.
Take this lesson to yourselves,
Loving hearts and true,
Golden years are passing by,
Youth is passing too.

"Try to make the most of life,
Lose no honest way;
All that you can call your own
Lies in this, to-day.
Strength, power, intellect
May not, can not last,
The mill will never grind again
With the water that has passed."

If the reader will carefully scrutinize these lines he will readily see how applicable they are to our lives.

Fraternally yours,
D. D. SHIRK.

KIRTLAND, OHIO, September 2, 1909.

Editors Herald: I take pleasure in writing a few lines to your pages which we appreciate so much. We have been laboring in Kirtland since the 5th of May, being in charge of the Temple, which work I enjoy very much. Eleven hundred and ten have visited the Temple up to date. Some from England, Ireland, France, and almost every State in the Union. So many had never heard the difference between the true church and Brigham Young's church, and were glad to learn the difference. It affords us great pleasure to explain the difference to them. The Temple stands on a beautiful lot which is planted in sugar maple trees. From the tower we have a magnificent view of the surrounding country, also Chagrin River and Lake Erie. Many compliments are passed upon the cleanliness of the building. Some say they never saw it so clean before. Some do not hold the building as sacred as they should, and need to read and reread section 92 of Doctrine and Covenants.

We pray the time will soon come when hundreds, yes, thousands of Saints will gather to this historic place, and thus build up one of the waste places of Zion.

There is a good flour mill here run by the waters of the Chagrin River. There is also a good high school, a home for the aged, hotel, two stores, three blacksmith shops, and a wagon shop in connection. The Saints also have a nice little chapel about two blocks from the Temple. They have lately purchased a piano for the Religio, and have money enough on hand to buy a new organ.

This is a good fruit country. The largest fruit trees that I have ever seen anywhere, grow here. Some cherry trees are eighteen inches in diameter and very tall, bearing the best of fruit. I suppose the trees were planted by the Saints in the thirties. Ever for the welfare of Zion,

Your brother in Christ,
D. E. TUCKER.

KOSHKONONG, MISSOURI, August 30, 1909.

Editors Herald: I am laboring at present with Elder J. F. Cunningham who has left his farm work for a few days to "warn his neighbors." We are simply rejoicing in the good work because of the interest that is being manifested. We came here over one week ago. Our meetings were not largely attended, but last Sunday we crossed the line into Arkansas with a little group of Saints and friends and baptized three precious souls into the kingdom, Elder A. M. D. McGuire officiating. We had our lunch with us and had an enjoyable time. Came back last night to Shiloh chapel and preached to a full house. Intended to close last night, but the people urged us to stay. We have decided to remain another week and no doubt the waters will be troubled again next Sunday.

Saints, we want to have a good conference at Pomona, September 25 and 26. Come prepared to feast on the good things of God. Remember also your duty in tithes and offerings. The district needs your help.

Your brother in Christ,
A. M. BAKER.

VALLEY CENTER, MICHIGAN.

Dear Saints: We have a Sunday school and Religio organized here and also a prayer meeting. We have an attendance of about thirty. We had no preaching here for about four or five weeks when Elder C. C. Whitford came up and gave us a sermon. It was very much appreciated, as we have no elder here. The Saints have erected a church here in which to hold our services and would be pleased to have an elder come to this part any time. I ask all to pray for me that I may ever be found faithful.

Your sister in Christ,
ANNA NICHOLSON.

FLINT, MICHIGAN, September 2, 1909.

Dear Herald: Last April, through the kindness of my two daughters and their husbands, in sending me the means to pay my car fare, I went to visit my brother, C. F. Dowker, at Dayton, Tennessee. I preached several times while there and had quite a good interest. I baptized my brother's wife. I just received a letter from them saying there were three more who wanted to be baptized, and I hope the ministry in that field will take notice, and if possible go over and see them. They are not very wealthy, but you will find a welcome at my brother's, and they would like to have some tracts to hand around among their neighbors.

I came home the 6th of May, was released from the field for the month of June, and went to work at carpenter work; but the extreme heat affected my head so I had to quit, and the Saints in Flint bought a large tent and wanted me to take charge of the tent work, and I have done so. In connection with the branch officers we have been doing what we could for over two months. Bro. B. St. John also dropped off and gave us a few good chart talks. Then Bro. O. J. Hawn came intending to stay a while, but took sick the same night he came, and was forced to go home. We are moving the tent to different parts of the city. We are not having very large crowds, but are succeeding in getting a few to hear. Do not know what the harvest will be.

As my wife's health is some better I think I will soon be able to go to my field in southern Indiana, which is a hard field; but we are not looking for flowery beds of ease, so long as the Lord will bless us that we may do good in bringing others into the fold.

Ever praying for the Saints of God,
Your brother in the faith,
WM. DOWKER.

WESTFIELD, IOWA, August 29, 1909.

MR. JOHN SMITH, Lamoni, Iowa.

Dear Sir and Brother: Do not let any of our friends be fooled into going to the Ozarks to farm or raise stock. It costs six dollars an acre to get it ready to plow, and none but a Missourian can plow it, and then one can raise more on one acre here than he can on fifteen acres there. The ticks and chigres are so terrible, their scourge can not be imagined by a northern mind, but they disappear after the land is cleared and in cultivation. No northerner would go down there if he knew beforehand what he would endure, and the labor of it. Only the natives have patience and endurance. They are the kindest hearted people and the most trustworthy friends.

I have no reason to think it is unhealthy there, and some day its minerals will be a source of wealth to Missouri, which is at present unknown, but I would not recommend the Ozarks to anyone if I knew I would lose all I have in consequence. Land agents are everywhere ready to deceive the unwary, like spiders in dens, watching for prey. The deceived, in turn, deceive others in order to make good their loss. The advertising mediums see that nothing gets in to counteract their work. I feel sure that God will bless the right only.

In bonds of truth,
Route 2. MELISSA J. KEAGLE.

DES MOINES, IOWA, September 15, 1909.

Dear Herald: The occasion of the Jewish new year to-day is of interest to all. According to the Jewish ecclesiastical calendar the world is five thousand six hundred and sixty-nine years old to-day. The dawn of the new year, 5670, begins at sunset to-day. The beginning of the new year that marks the distance between the present time and the creation of the world is an event in the lives of Jewish people. A solemn festival was held in the local Jewish temples in the city on the New Year's eve, and this service is the most sacred observance of the Hebrew people. It opens the penitential season, which closes at the end of ten days with the atonement. The rituals for the service are much modified from what they were years ago, and yet they are very impressive. Most of the orthodox Jews in the city closed their places of business during the day.

Saint John's Lutheran Church of this city is, this week, holding their annual special fall services, and the Martin Luther Club of the church has a special part in the exercises. A Martin Luther Club? What would the world say if any branch of our church would organize a "Joseph Smith Club"?

An Iowa pastor is quoted as having read the following unique notice to his congregation on a recent Sunday morning: "The funeral service of the late Mrs. Prayer Meeting will be held in the Sunday school room of the church on Wednesday evening at 7.30. She had been feeble for some time, but recently her decline has been rapid. Her death was not unexpected. The doctor could scarcely detect any pulse on Wednesday evening of last week. Cause of death is said to be heart failure from want of exercise and neglect of her family. The officers of the church are requested to act as pallbearers and the teachers and officers of the Sunday school as honorary pallbearers. The choir is requested to sing."

It is a strange thing that funeral services might as well be held in so many churches over the remains of the midweek prayer meeting, and the Latter Day Saints are no exception.

The following is an extract from a speech, and is vouched for, delivered at Columbus, Ohio, before the State Liquor Dealers' convention: "The success of our business is dependent largely upon the creation of appetite for drink. Men who drink liquor, like others, will die, and if there is no new appetite created our counters will be empty, as will our coffers. Our children will go hungry, or we must change our business to that of some other more remunerative. The open field for the creation of appetite is among the boys. After men are grown and their habits are formed, they rarely ever change in this regard. It will be needful, therefore, that missionary work be done among the boys, and I make the suggestion, gentlemen, that nickels expended in treats to the boys now will return in dollars to your tills after the appetite has been formed. Above all things create appetite."

The delegate who made the speech supposed that only liquor men were present. Boys, beware of the first drink. Parents, beware also.

The "Messenger," the announcement leaflet of Grace Church of Des Moines, has the following under the head of "Courtesies and customs," and it has so much of good in it, that we give it to the HERALD readers:

"Silent prayer when you take your seat.
Reverent behavior.
Join in responsive reading and hymns.
Ladies remove hats before the sermon.
Tarry at close of service to greet fellow worshippers.
Seek to welcome strangers."

"Whosoever thou art
That enterest this church,
Remember
It is the House of God.
Be reverent, silent, thoughtful.
Leave it not
Without a prayer to God.
For thyself, for those who minister,
And those who worship here."

In bonds,
A. A. REAMS.

ERAS, LOUISIANA, August 25, 1909.

Dear Herald: I feel to rejoice in what the Lord has done for me. I rejoice to know that the great Redeemer has brought me out of darkness into the marvelous light and made me walk in newness of life. I had been impressed so forcibly of my awful condition for years, but could not see or understand the right way.

My parents were primitive Baptists, and I was taught that way from my youth, but I could not join them, as I did not believe as they did. On May 17, 1909, I was married to Mr. W. S. Williams, a great worker and a true member of the Latter Day Saints' Church, and he conversed with me and read the Bible to me, and I read and prayed earnestly from my heart to have the right way revealed to me, and I feel to rejoice that He has put a new song in my mouth and taught me the right way.

I am now a member of the Latter Day Saints' Church, and can say that I am praising God to know that I could unite with such a wonderful work. I was baptized by Bro. Heman Fuller, and I was made to sing praises to God that he had led me in the right way and blessed me with a glorious name among such true believers in Christ.

I beg all of the dear Saints to remember me in their prayers, and pray that I may hold out faithful and grow stronger in faith every day, and that we may realize that Jesus is our friend on whom our hope of heaven depends.

Your sister in hope of eternal life,
JESSIE WILLIAMS.

WHITNEY, SOUTH DAKOTA, August 30, 1909.

Dear Herald: We enjoy reading the HERALD and other church papers, as we are of the isolated ones. We do not get sermons only as we read them in the HERALD. We are the only Latter Day Saints here that we know of, and how we would enjoy shaking hands with some of our elders and having the gospel preached in this locality. There are surely some honest in heart here that would obey the true teachings of Christ.

The Lord has been very merciful to us, and we have had many blessings bestowed upon us from time to time. I have been raised from the bed of affliction, slowly as it were, but surely by the Lord, when earthly help was at the limit. And still it seems sometimes we grow careless in performing our duties toward our Lord and Master as we should.

I ask that you would pray for us, that we may overcome our faults, that we may be worthy of everlasting life when our Lord and Savior comes. Dear Saints, while I was raised from the bed of affliction, I was not healed, and I ask that you will pray that I may be healed if it is the will of the Lord.

Your sister,
L. A. HERR.

JONESPORT, MAINE, September 6, 1909.

Editors Herald: Yesterday in a heavy rain we baptized one more precious soul at Head Harbor Isle. This made seven at that place, all heads of families. We left others believing and hope to see them obey soon. We left a fine feeling on the island among the better class of people. We have other places to visit this month, and will attend the conference at South Addison, September 25, and in October we will return to our home in Independence, Missouri. We feel that our very hard summer's work has not been in vain, for we have already baptized fifteen good people that would not have been baptized had we not come here.

Yours truly,
J. C. FOSS.

DENVER, COLORADO, September 7, 1909.

Editors Saints' Herald: Our silence for a season, so far as writing is concerned, must not be interpreted to signify a loss of interest in the work on our part, nor that we have lapsed into inactivity in the work of the Lord. Not for a moment.

Last winter was the most severe that Colorado has witnessed for thirty years. Snow and storm "closed up the hands of the sons of men," largely, to the fulfillment of labor. That the seasons are changing quite radically is noted by many. As a result much stock died on the eastern plains of Colorado. But the severe winter was followed by one of the greatest wheat and fruit crops Colorado has nearly ever, if not ever, known. People were, and are, so busy with their harvest of wheat and culture of beets, that no attention by the masses could be given to the preaching, and appointments for preaching were without results in the country. It is difficult yet to get much of a hearing.

After an effort to do what I could in the eastern part of the State, at Wray and vicinity, also over on the south divide, as it is there called, (South Yuma County,) I left that part of the field and came to the city of Denver, where I have made myself busy ever since, trying to do what I could find, laboring privately and publicly, as the attention of hearers could be reached. But everybody is so busy with the world and its ways in this State that it is difficult to get very much of a hearing.

I have preached twice each Sunday since my arrival in the city, until September 5, when the district conference was on, and Brn. Jacob Curtis and F. A. Russell gave us "meat in due season" on that date. The Saints of the district and mission, so far as I can learn, are courageous, and seem to be pressing on along the line of duty as best they may. Lines of competition in business are so tightly drawn that the world "rushes on without taking time to be holy," that but few pay any attention to religion; but the question, "What must I do to be saved from falling through to failure in business?" seems vital. And it is vital to the temporal existence of the middle and poorer classes. Sunday is largely given over to pleasure, while some feel it necessary to labor on that day. Conditions strike no one more directly than the sincere missionary for Christ, and it is a continuous problem with him, how to reach the people with the truth, and accomplish what he desires in the Lord's work.

The conventions of the Zion's Religio-Literary Society and the Sunday school, and the conference of the Eastern Colorado District, were held at Denver, September 3, 4, and 5, Bro. E. F. Shupe was in charge of the first and the last, and Sr. Lydia Schmutz of the Sunday school convention. Reports showed a forward movement on the part of the societies and the church. The Wray Branch reported not only an active Sunday school, but the organization of a Religio local, with Bro. George Bullard superintendent; Sr. Nora Bullard secretary. Most of the branches reported gains in membership.

Bro. James K. Adams, of Loveland, Colorado, was received into the church on his original baptism, and he is glad to be found within the fold.

The former president and vice-president of the district were sustained for the year to come. Secretary, Bro. W. E. Wolf, offered his resignation, and Elder F. A. Russell was elected secretary.

Much of the Spirit was enjoyed by the Saints at Sunday sacrament and social services. We were comforted with the gifts of the gospel, and exhorted to duty along both spiritual and temporal lines. We were instructed that it would not be very long until Zion would begin to be redeemed, and all hearts were made glad as diligence to duty, as enjoined in the divine law, was impressed upon us all. Everyone seemed humble and ready to do his part.

The ever busy president of the Denver Branch, Bro. C. E. Everett, was busy as usual, and at his post of duty. Bro. Myron McConley fills appointments occasionally, and is busy at home departments of auxiliary work. Local ministry in the districts are striving to be found at the post of duty. It is regretted that our missionary in charge, Apostle F. M. Sheehy, is unable, by force of circumstances over which he has no control, to be with us in the mission. We need his counsel.

All feel deeply the loss of Patriarch Alexander H. Smith, and all sympathize with his bereaved. But, ye scribe and missionary, who will answer for you, and what will be the answer?

May our Father bless Zion and all her beautiful children.

C. SCOTT.

WALLACE, ALABAMA, September 7, 1909.

Editors Herald: I am still alive in this glorious work, and am still praying for the upbuilding of Zion, and I desire the prayers of the Saints for myself, and also for my eleven-year old boy, who united with the church last July, that as he grows in years he may grow in grace also. Sr. Ardilla Dubover passed over the river July 17. She is gone but not forgotten. She said she was ready and willing to go, and that she felt her way was clear.

Pray for me that I may overcome all my grief, and that I may be not only a hearer of the word, but a doer of it also.

Your sister in Christ,

ELIZABETH BOOKER.

Editors Herald: I have been a member of the Latter Day Saints Church only one month the 4th day of this month. One of the elders came to San Murar and held a meeting in the schoolhouse. It was the first time I had ever heard the gospel preached, and I had to accept the truth, and now I have been blessed and my prayers answered. This is God's work.

There are only two families of Saints here. My husband has not yet obeyed the gospel, but he is interested, and my prayers are that he will accept and obey the truth soon. Any and all Latter Day Saint preachers are welcome at our house. I am willing to do all I can to advance the cause of truth.

A sister in the faith,

MRS. J. A. MOORE.

News From Branches

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

The Cleveland Branch is having a little boom; Bro. T. U. Thomas, of Sharon, Pennsylvania, dropped in on us at Wednesday evening prayer meeting. We had twenty-three present which is a good number for us. Brother Thomas stayed with us over Sunday. He preached to a goodly number at the morning service, and at the park service he spoke to about one hundred and fifty people in the afternoon. About thirty of these came to the platform at the close of the services for a booklet, which we distributed free, which is entitled, A Few Facts to the Point. This booklet was gotten up mostly by Elder LaRue when he was here a few years ago. Brother Thomas also spoke at the evening service to a good congregation and the Spirit was manifest in him. Religio also had about double the usual number present. Baby Robert Henry Tibbits was blessed in the morning by Elders Thomas and Theo. Schmidt. Harry Kozman has left this branch for Boston. Brother Williams, from Pennsylvania, was with us Sunday.

F. WEBBE.

LONDON, ENGLAND.

Just a word from London to say that there are still a few faithful Saints in this great city who have yearned and prayed for a long time for a revival of God's work, and at last there are signs of their prayers yet being answered; for we are glad to say that Brn. J. W. Rushton and G. Leggot are here and making a noble effort to reach the people of this place, and up till present with far more success than any effort I have seen made since my association with the church. Not that they have baptized any yet, but what they are doing is in meeting with large crowds of earnest listeners in Victoria Park, also Hyde Park, and also in the north part of the town, and also on the corner of Saint Paul's Road and Burdett Road, which is near our hall. I may safely say that I have witnessed larger congregations listening to our brethren than I have ever seen before, and I feel sure that their labor will not be in vain. Saints, far or near, will you pray God that he will abundantly bless the seed sown. We feel very thankful to God for such men as Brethren Rushton and Leggot, who are willing to sacrifice for the love of God's work, and to say the least, such masters of their situation through the power of God.

We feel very much encouraged to think that the church has made it possible for this effort to be made, and when we think there are about six millions of people in this great city, we know that the effort is very much needed. We, as a few resident Saints, often feel our position very much, I mean our helplessness to deal with conditions as we know them, and I feel if only it were possible for such an effort to be started right in the spring of next year and faithfully continued all through the fine weather till the chilly days come round, we should find that the work had made a good impression on the people in general, and I believe we should have a good many converts besides. I believe still, as I have always believed, that if only the confidence of the public at large can be gained, and a proper hearing can be continued, thousands are seeking after truth, and surely they will find it.

Let me say in conclusion that I feel very thankful to God that I came in contact with this glorious work. My prayer to God is that I have power to live the life requisite for a Saint of God.

In hope,

JOHN W. WORTH.

SAINT LOUIS, MISSOURI.

The work among the young seems to be moving along nicely. We have had some excellent programs of late. On the evening of August 27, the single ladies gave a program, which was very much enjoyed. The married ladies' program, which preceded it, was also very fine. We are planning a picnic for the near future and expect to have a good, social time. We desire to keep our young people together as much as possible, and that we will profit by the opportunities afforded us to study and become acquainted with God's law and apply it to our daily lives.

Your sister in Christ,

AGENTS' NOTICES.

To the Saints of the District of Saskatchewan, Greeting: As most of you already know, I have been assigned the duties of Bishop's agent for our new district, which includes the Province of Alberta and all the Province of Saskatchewan except five ranges on the east side to Manitoba. I realize that I am undertaking no small responsibility, and I appeal to you for your coöperation and assistance in this work. No doubt you have seen some of the discussions in the church papers in regard to the financial law. I hope we are among the leaders who understand and observe this law. The observance of the financial law is necessary to our spiritual growth. I shall be pleased to hear from you by letter in regard to any question on tithing that may not be clear to you. I am ready to receive offerings of money or property for the benefit of the church, to be given as tithing, or for the benefit of the various church institutions. With best wishes for the spread of the gospel and the building up of Zion, I am

Respectfully yours,

W. E. NELSON.

FRANCIS, SASKATCHEWAN, September 10, 1909.

Special Appeal to Saints of Des Moines District: Dear Saints, we are needing financial aid and needing it badly. Can I have a hearty response from every member of the church in the district, even if by special sacrifice, of a small or larger amount to help in spreading the gospel. The Lord instructed us to "pray the Lord of the harvest to send more laborers into the harvest." Let us make a determined effort to see that those already sent are not compelled to retire from the church work and engage in secular work to support their families.

Now, Saints, to you individually, as you read this request, ask yourself and decide in your own mind the answer, Can I make a little sacrifice for the work to-day? If so, send at once.

Your servant in the Lord's vineyard,
W. CHRISTY.

LAMONI, IOWA, September 12, 1909.

The Order of Evangelists.

Having been appointed to a temporary charge of our Order, a few words from me seem to be in place.

Our beloved brother and president has passed over to the other shore, to his place of peace and rest, we believe, freed from the sufferings and conflicts which are incident to our work here, and we are left to care for the work belonging to this order, without him, as best we can.

It is common, under such conditions as these, for men to lose some of their interest and zeal, and slacken their efforts in the work intrusted to them. This should not be. Let us avoid this mistake. The demand for wise and earnest effort, upon our part, has been intensified by the departure of our brother. Will every man do all he can to supply this demand? I hope so.

Bro. C. E. Butterworth, of Dow City, Iowa, is the secretary of the order, and I trust that your names with the required items of ordination, etc., are all on his book; if not, will those who ordained, or directed ordination, please furnish the items at once. Let us try to be punctual, orderly, and faithful in all our work.

I would be pleased to receive a brief letter from each one of you, that we may become better acquainted, know more about your condition, physical and otherwise, your work, desires and prospects. We can not acquit ourselves before God, whose servants we are striving to be, without a constant effort to do what we can, striving always to be careful and earnest. Rightly understood, the injunction, "Trust in God," covers the whole ground.

Please send me a report of labor performed within or during the conference year, sometime between the dates of March 15 and 31, 1910, that a proper report of the work done by the order may be presented to the First Presidency and the conference.

Let us not forget that our first and most important work is to "preach, teach, expound, exhort," etc. The giving of patriarchal blessings, though needful and important, is secondary and incidental. We are called to be "revivalists" and "evangelists" to the church, but not in the common and popular senses in which these terms are used. Let us try to demonstrate to the truly spiritually minded, the importance of the work God has called us to do by the character of our work.

Let us not forget that what God requires (and it is all that he does require) is that we do all we can for the good work intrusted to our care. In order that we fail not in this important work, whether we are able to do little or much, it is very important that we should be exemplary in our words and deeds. May the God in whom we trust qualify us for the work.

J. R. LAMBERT.

Notice.

FIRST QUORUM OF ELDERS OF THE INDEPENDENCE STAKE.

According to previous announcement the elders of the Independence Stake were called together September 11, at the Stone Church in Independence, Missouri, for the purpose of reorganizing the First Quorum of Elders to be composed only of elders living in the Independence Stake.

President Fred M. Smith was in charge of the meeting, and made a statement of the purpose of reorganizing the quorum, the object being to provide for more frequent quorum meetings, for coöperation and instruction as to their relation to branch and stake work.

He further stated that the authority for so doing came direct from the last General Conference, and the original First Quorum of Elders.

The resignation of Brother Hedrick, the former president of the quorum, was presented and accepted for the reason that Brother Hedrick does not live in the Independence Stake.

The direct work of the reorganization was then taken up, which resulted in the following officers being elected: J. A. Gardner, president; Seth S. Sandy, secretary and treasurer; Valentine White, historian. The president chose his counselors as follows: W. O. Skinner, first counselor, and Hosea B. Sterrett, second counselor. These names were ratified by the quorum, and their ordination together with that of the president provided for on the following Sunday.

By resolution the quorum voted to hold meetings just prior to the General Conference and the two stake conferences of each year, and the officers were authorized to call special meetings as the occasion may demand.

A further resolution was passed assessing each member ten cents to defray immediate expenses of the quorum.

By direction of President F. M. Smith the secretary was authorized to enroll the names of ninety-six of the elders in the Independence Stake as members of this quorum. Notice to this effect will be sent to those enrolled as soon as their addresses can be obtained. Those elders in the Independence Stake who are now enrolled in the First Quorum, and who were formerly members of the other quorums should advise their respective secretaries of the reorganization of the First Quorum in the Independence Stake, and ask that their names be dropped from the records of the quorums to which they had previously belonged.

Respectfully,
J. A. GARDNER, President.
SETH S. SANDY, Secretary.

PROFESSOR ANTHON AND THE BOOK OF MORMON CHARACTERS.

In the fourth number of the SAINTS' HERALD Historical Series, appearing last week, mention was made of the transcript of the Book of Mormon characters submitted to Professor Anthon. Owing to the comprehensive nature of the article the space devoted to that particular incident was very limited. We herewith reproduce from the first volume of our Church History a record of Martin Harris' own account, as written by Joseph Smith:

Sometime in this month of February (1827) the aforementioned Mr. Martin Harris came to our place, got the characters which I had drawn off the plates, and started with them to the city of New York. For what took place relative to him and the characters, I refer to his own account of the circumstances as he related them to me after his return, which was as follows: "I went to the city of New York and presented the characters which had been translated, with the translation thereof, to Professor Anthon, a gentleman celebrated for his literary attainments. Professor Anthon stated that the translation was correct, more so than any he had before seen translated from the Egyptian. I then showed him those which were not yet translated, and he said that they were Egyptian, Chaldaic, Assyriac, and Arabic, and he said that they were the true characters. He gave me a certificate certifying to the people of Palmyra that they were true characters, and that the translation of such of them as had been translated was also correct. I took the certificate and put it into my pocket, and was just leaving the house, when Mr. Anthon called me back, and asked me how the young man found out that there were gold plates in the place where he found them. I answered that an angel of God had revealed it unto him.

He then said to me, "Let me see that certificate." I accordingly took it out of my pocket and gave it to him, when he took it and tore it to pieces, saying that there was no such thing now as ministering of angels, and that if I would bring the plates to him, he would translate them. I informed him that part of the plates were sealed, and that I was forbidden to bring them. He replied, "I can not read a sealed book." I left him and went to Dr. Mitchill, who sanctioned what Professor Anthon had said respecting both the characters and the translation.

Some forty years later Martin Harris renewed his testimony regarding the Anthon incident in a letter written to Mrs. H. B. Emerson, of New Richmond, Ohio, from Smithfield, Utah, under date of November 23, 1870, (see SAINTS' HERALD, volume 22, page 630), as follows:

I do say that the angel did show me the plates containing the Book of Mormon. Further, the translation that I carried to Professor Anthon was copied from these plates; also, that the Professor did testify to it being a correct translation.

Herewith will be found a cut of the famous transcript of characters submitted to Professor Anthon. This cut we have had printed on plate paper so as to bring out all the details, and in such form that it may be preserved for study and reference without mutilating the HERALD. The cut is from a photograph taken under the direction of President Frederick M. Smith. It was taken directly from the original slip of paper prepared by Joseph Smith and conveyed to Professor Anthon by the hand of Martin Harris. The paper was preserved by David Whitmer and passed into the possession of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, together with the manuscript from which the Book of Mormon was printed. This is probably the only cut ever published from a photograph direct from the original paper; other cuts have been made from drawings.

WALTER B. STEVENS ON NAUVOO HISTORY.

Charles Dana Gibson suggested this plan to a young girl graduate who desired to learn how to write: "Secure an idea. Permit it to ferment for several days. By and by a thin scum will rise to the surface. Remove this scum and sell it to the publishers and keep the residue of clear thought for yourself."

That is the plan adopted by most writers on "Mormonism." Once in a while, however, one careful and candid writer appears who gives the public the residue of clear thought and throws the scum away. Such an occurrence is as refreshing and encouraging as it is novel.

As a case in point we reproduce a portion of an article entitled, "A corner in Illinois," that appeared in the Saint Louis Globe-Democrat, September 19, from the pen of Walter B. Stevens. Mr. Stevens is a man of prominence and good standing. We are informed that he was the secretary of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company, and was active and successful in that position. Mr. Stevens says:

Nauvoo, "beautiful situation for rest" the Mormons named it, finding the word in Hebrew. Before the coming of the Mormons in 1839 it had been Commerce—a promoter's proposition, with a few houses besides that of Captain White, the original settler, and great prospects with a city laid out on paper. The Mississippi River makes almost half of a circle, or a horseshoe curve, in a distance of eight miles. In the bend is, first, a bottom just above high water, then a rise to an elevation on which the Mormons located the $1,000,000 temple, and finally a second gradual rise to the plateau extending far eastward in a succession of Illinois' most beautiful prairies. In the bend and upon the ascents the Mormons laid out and built Nauvoo. Five years, beginning in 1839, they carried on the making of the city—homes, the Hall of Seventy, the Mansion House, factories, stores, and the Temple with its three stories of limestone, 128 feet long and 88 feet wide, and tower 165 feet high.

One day, in the early summer of 1844, a new newspaper appeared in Nauvoo. It was called the Expositor. Only one issue was published. That exposed Mormonism. The publishers were the Higbees who had withdrawn from the church. They attacked Joseph Smith and the organization. The City Council of Nauvoo met and ordered the Expositor suppressed. The order was carried out by breaking up the contents of the newspaper office and throwing the type into the Mississippi. Then followed the Mormon war, the taking of the Smiths to Carthage Jail, the shooting of the prophet and his brother by the mob, and the spectacular campaign of Gov. Ford and the volunteer army, ending in the expulsion of the thousands of Mormons from Nauvoo. It is a strange, almost unbelievable story. Sixty-five years, to the month, have calmed the passions and removed the prejudices. The conclusion at Carthage, in the summer of 1909, is that "it was not religious controversy that led to the Mormon troubles in Hancock County and adjoining counties, but that it was purely political." And Hon. Orville F. Berry, who is here quoted, believes "from well-established facts that have come to him from men then in active life, that a large majority of the people here known as Mormons were good citizens, but that it is equally true there were among them men who no doubt used the church to cover up their own wickedness."

The Mormons were driven out of western Missouri because they preached against slavery. They settled in Nauvoo. The Mormon war in Illinois grew out of politics. Polygamy was not practiced or taught at Nauvoo. It did not originate with either Joseph Smith, the prophet of Mormonism or with Hyrum Smith, his brother. Brigham Young introduced polygamy into his branch of the Mormon church after the expulsion from Nauvoo and after the removal to Salt Lake City.

These are conclusions at variance with much that passes for history of Mormonism. The church has thrived on the claim of persecution for religion's sake. The members were described as very bad people by those who wrote about them when feeling was strong. From recent researches by those who are without prejudices and who have lived long in Hancock County, it does not appear that the whole truth was told when feeling ran high. Religion had very little, if anything, to do with the troubles in Missouri or in Illinois, if these latest investigations may be accepted. Mormonism, as Joseph Smith taught it, and as many Mormons in Hancock County still preserve the faith, was very different from the ordinances, and the practices which Brigham Young set up in Utah, and which have given the rest of the United States so much concern.

One of the best known and most highly respected residents of Carthage is Hon. George Edmunds. He came to Hancock County, a young lawyer, in the midst of the Mormon troubles. He is to-day, undoubtedly, the best qualified of anyone living to give information and opinion about the so-called Mormon war. Of the Mormon population in Hancock County before the expulsion from Nauvoo, speaking generally, Judge Edmunds said recently:

"I think I never knew so indusrious, frugal and virtuous people as they were. There were among them a few people who were of the criminal class. When outsiders committed depredations and ran to Nauvoo they were no doubt protected. There was an organization called the 'Danite band.' The Danites' manner of dealing with persons they did not want to stay in Nauvoo was to 'whittle' them out of town. That was done in this way: Twelve or more men would get together with long bowie knives and pine sticks in their hands. They would march in the direction of the person they wanted to leave and whittle, striking the knife towards him. The man took the warning and invariably left town. There was a universal feeling in this county among the Gentile population that was very inimical to the Mormon population. I do not think that any Mormon could get a fair and impartial trial before a jury of the county selected from the anti-Mormon population. I do not believe a Mormon could get a fair trial anywhere in the circuit, which was composed of the counties of Hancock, Adams, McDonough, Schuyler, Henderson, Warren, and Knox. It really, in my judgment, had become so thoroughly established by the acts of one side and the prejudice of the other that it was not possible for the two elements to live in the same community and it was wise for them to separate. Though the killing of Joseph and Hyrum Smith was a murder, it was done, beyond any question, by a respectable set of men—outside of these prejudices."

Senator Orville F. Berry of Carthage has made an exhaustive study of Mormon history in Hancock County. He was for years the law partner of Judge Thomas C. Sharp, although a much younger man. Judge Sharp was the editor of the Warsaw Signal at the time of the Mormon troubles and was one of the anti-Mormon leaders on "the military tract." He was so active that his name was included with a dozen others in an indictment for the murder of the Smiths. Trial resulted in acquittal. The conclusions reached by Senator Berry are these:

"The reason I do not believe that Joseph and Hyrum Smith taught polygamy is that more of the immediate family live here possibly than in any other locality. Several of their sisters live here and a number of their nephews. The followers of Brigham Young have frequently come here to interview them on this subject and have been told repeatedly that Joseph did not so teach. I have been unable to find any person who ever heard either Joseph or Hyrum Smith so teach. The further fact remains that Joseph Smith's son and legal successor does not teach this doctrine. The reorganized Mormon Church of which he claims to be the spiritual successor, and which has been determined by the courts to be the legal successor of Joseph, the prophet, does not so teach. The Reorganized Church is as bitter in its denunciation of polygamy as any other denomination. There are in Hancock County many members of the Reorganized Church. As citizens they stand high. There resided in this county, from the death of Joseph Smith until her death a few years ago, his sister, Catherine Smith Salisbury. I knew her personally and have been in her house many times. I grew up from boyhood with her sons and grandsons. The world would be wonderfully well off if all women were as good as Catherine Smith Salisbury."

Senator Berry has the statement which Catherine Smith Salisbury made about her brothers a short time before her death.

"I was in Nauvoo a few days before my brothers were brought to Carthage," she said. "I shall never forget that Saturday when I last saw my brothers alive. Joseph had preached a sermon to the largest crowd I have ever seen. It was his last sermon. I might say it was more in the nature of a prophecy than a sermon, for he said, turning on the platform where he stood, and facing some of the high priests and elders sitting there: 'There are those among you who will betray me soon. In fact, you have plotted to deliver me up to the enemy to be slain.' He was betrayed, and by his own alleged friends. These same fellows attempted to assume charge of the church at his death. They not only attempted this, but they also attempted to introduce obnoxious teachings into the church. My nephew, the present Joseph Smith, president of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints of Lamoni, Iowa, is the true and only successor of Joseph Smith, the martyr."

THE THREE WITNESSES.

The next number of the SAINTS' HERALD Historical Series will consist of a critical examination of the testimony of the three witnesses to the divinity of the Book of Mormon. The article is by S. A. Burgess, attorney at law, and a student well known throughout the church. He is well qualified to handle the matter of evidence and, as might be expected, his article is one of the strongest and best in the series.

"FAMILY" OR "FAMILIES"?

In chapter 1, paragraph 41, Utah edition of the Book of Mormon, the Lord is represented as speaking to the brother of Jared, "Go to and gather thy families," etc. The footnote in the edition reads, "From the verse it is seen that the brother of Jared had a plurality of families." The original reads, "Thy family." Bro. Walter W. Smith has an article in the October number of the Exponent dealing with this change. A half-tone reproduction of the original in the exact handwriting showing this particular paragraph accompanies it. If you are not receiving the Exponent, subscribe now and get this number. Subscription price, 50 cents per year. Address Herald Publishing House, Lamoni, Iowa.

ARE AMERICAN COLLEGES UNDERMINING CHRISTIANITY?

Following the recent series of articles in the Cosmopolitan Magazine on the above subject, the Christian Statesman, the magazine published by the National Reform Association, showed that these articles dealt with the situation in not more than a score of institutions, while no attention was given to the more than five hundred smaller colleges of the United States, and promised to secure a report from this larger field. This work lies within the proper field of the Christian Statesman because, in its defense of our National Christianity, the National Reform Association withstands the de-Christianizing of the state universities as well as of the common schools. A carefully prepared letter was sent to the presidents of nearly all colleges and universities in the United States. The response has been prompt, and the letters full of valuable information. A careful analysis and summary of these replies, with many of the letters in full, will be published in the November issue of the Christian Statesman (ready by the middle of October), together with the findings and conclusions, which are sustained by the evidence. The importance of these conclusions, and of the whole subject, is self-evident. More and more our state universities and larger colleges are determining the character of our whole educational system, and our educational system is molding the character of the nation. Single copies of this issue can be obtained for ten cents postpaid, and six copies for fifty cents, at the office of the National Reform Association, 209 Ninth street, Pittsburg, Pennsylvania.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

The following news item is clipped from the Nauvoo Independent of September 22:

"C. E. Bidamon has sold his residence at the foot of Main street to the Latter Day Saints' Church, Reorganized. The deal has not been closed, but Mr. Bidamon has accepted their offer of four thousand dollars, and money has been paid on it. This is one of the historical Mormon places here, known as the Riverside Mansion, and is dear to the Latter Day Saints' heart."

The house referred to, properly known as the Nauvoo House, is the house mentioned in Doctrine and Covenants, section 107, designed as a lodging house wherein the "weary traveler" might find rest while inquiring into the faith and history of the Saints. We are not prepared to vouch for the truthfulness of the news item in detail. If the deal is finally completed we will give full particulars later.

Miss Kate Barnard, who has been studying social conditions in New York City, says, "The misery of the poor in this city is enough to shake the soul of any thinking human. And I have seen the rich side, too, and have come to believe that the price of the New York millionaire is the dreadful misery and poverty of the East Side. In a community where 10,000 families are in utter destitution, where in the course of a year 750,000 men are homeless, jobless, and hungry; where 17,000 babies die annually from preventable disease; where meat is 25 cents per pound and eggs 45 cents per dozen, and food and rent increase annually; where labor is $1.50 per day, and the mother neglects the little ones because the harsh struggle for bread compels her to sit in the filth of her tenement and finish garments for six cents apiece to get food for her hungry brood; where the death rate from childbirth is a scandal to the nation, and the charity organization, which tried to get six weeks of rest for working mothers to prepare them for this terrible ordeal, was met with the cold response that two weeks were enough, and that "women should be encouraged to return to work"; where working girls don't get a living wage and total depravity is on the increase, and in a city where in the dark, lonely hours of midnight 50,000 young girls pass annually through the pitiless halls of police courts, while one million Christians peacefully sleep—there is no room for a Christian millionaire."

A press item from San Francisco contains the following:

"On board the whaler Jeanette which arrived in this port yesterday, heavily laden with furs, blubber, and tales of the frozen north, was W. J. Bower, an arctic explorer, who reports the discovery of a new tribe of people never before seen by the eyes of a white man. This new tribe of Eskimos, according to Bower, live on a point in Prince Albert Land. Bower left this port two years ago on board the ship James Drummond and he has spent the interval wandering about among the Eskimos. Unlike the usual type of Eskimos, the newly discovered natives, who call themselves Nunacotics, are very tall and look like North American Indians. The explorer was cordially welcomed by the strange tribesmen and he procured many rich furs from them. From the town of the Nunacotics, Bower proceeded north, where he discovered immense copper deposits."

The October Exponent will contain a half-tone cut of a portion of a page of the Book of Mormon Manuscript, and an article by Bro. Walter W. Smith, superintendent of the Normal Department, calling special attention to a change made from the original, which is used by the Utah church in support of the doctrine of polygamy. It is of value to every true Latter Day Saint. The Exponent is issued monthly and only 50 cents per year. Send your address to the Herald Publishing House, Lamoni, Iowa.

Comfort.

[William Cullen Bryant (Cummington, Massachusetts, 1794—New York City, 1878), journalist, newspaper editor, author, and poet of nature wrote several hymns which are found in our hymnals. Bryant made the force of his religious faith and high moral living felt everywhere. This hymn, especially appropriate to times of sorrow, is usually sung to the tune of Bradbury]:

Deem not that they are blessed alone,
Whose days a peaceful tenor keep:
The God who loves our race has shown
A blessing for the eyes that weep.

The light of smiles shall fill again
The lids that overflow with tears,
And weary hours of woe and pain
Are promises of happier years.

O, there are days of sunny rest
For every dark and troubled night!
And grief may bide, an evening guest;
But joy shall come with early light.

And thou who o'er thy friend's low bier
Dost shed the bitter drops like rain,
Hope that a brighter, happier sphere
Will give him to thy arms again.

—William Cullen Bryant.

After All.

We take our share of fretting,
Of grieving and forgetting;
The paths are often rough and steep, and heedless feet may fall.
But vet the days are cheery,
And night brings rest when weary,
And somehow this old planet is a good world, after all.

Though sharp may be our trouble,
The joys are more than double.
The brave outrank the cowards, and the leal are like a wall.
To guard their dearest ever,
To fail the feeblest never;
And somehow this old earth remains a bright world, after all.

There's always love that's caring,
And shielding and forbearing.
Dear woman's love to hold us close and keep our hearts in thrall;
There's home to share together
In calm or stormy weather,
And while the heart-flame burns it is a good world, after all.

The lisp of children's voices,
The chance of happy choices,
The bugle sounds of hope and faith through fogs and mists that call;
The heaven that stretches o'er us,
The better days before us,
They all unite to make this earth a good world, after all.

TRUE EDUCATION.

AN ADDRESS AT GRACELAND COLLEGE, BY HEMAN C. SMITH, CHURCH HISTORIAN.

[EDITOR'S NOTE.—This address was delivered in Graceland College chapel at the opening of the present term, and was reported by Sr. Estella Wight. The year's work began with enthusiasm and vigor. Readers of the HERALD should remember Graceland College and help to the extent of their ability. The first Sunday in October is College Day.]

Mr. President, Members of the Faculty, Students of Graceland, Ladies and Gentlemen: I feel honored to be called upon the stand in the capacity that I am this morning, and yet, I must confess that I feel a little out of place among college people, for I took my degrees in the cornfields of western Iowa, and took considerable pleasure in the institution where I learned what I did. While I would like to know some of the things that I did not learn there, I do not want to forget what I did learn there, and if I had to forget it, to know some things that you get in college, I do not believe I would be willing to make the exchange.

I feel about as enthusiastic over the institution from which I graduated as our enthusiastic American did when he was told that England was the mistress of the ocean, and he said, "What makes the ocean but the Mississippi River and her tributaries? Should we turn the Mississippi into the Mammoth Cave you would find your English navy floundering in the mud." So I think, if we turned the products of our cornfields in another direction you would find your colleges and universities floundering in the mud. I am therefore glad that you have decided to add a cornfield to this institution. I think it was one of the best movements I ever knew you to make and will insure success as much as anything you ever did, and I bid success to the enterprise.

This matter of education is a subject far-reaching, and there are so many complications connected with it, that it is very difficult for us to know just what education is. There are some people who have learned a great deal by reading books, and they think they are educated. I have met some who have been considered as among the best educators who think they really know things because they saw them in a book. Now as far as I have been able to discover, that is a very superficial idea of education. I heard a definition once, and I say I heard it so you won't think it is original with me, that suits me very well, and that definition was this, that education is "the discovery and application of truth." The more I thought about it when I heard it the better I liked it. It would make no difference where you would discover that truth, if you will apply it you are, to the extent of the discovery and application, an educated person. Whether you get it in school, whether you get it in the field, whether you get it by observation of nature, whether you get it from conversing with individuals, whether you get it from reading books, or wherever you may get it, if you discover the principle of truth and apply it to your lives, you will have added that much to your education; and the school, or the person, or the book, so adding to your education has been a benefit to you, more than you can ever repay.

I think, then, there can not be too great an effort made, or too much money spent in providing for institutions where truth is taught. And there can not be too much discouragement placed upon institutions that introduce into their philosophy that which is not true. It is a hard matter for us to draw the line between truth and error. A hard matter for us to know just what to encourage and what to discourage, and I think that is one of the reasons why this institution was founded. It was because the people who were interested in founding it had a love for the truth as they had discovered and applied it, and they wanted to disseminate that truth, not in a sectarian way, but in a general way; to diffuse the knowledge which had come to them, abroad, or so far as the people were able and willing to receive it.

But the founding of this institution was no modern idea, so far as the church was concerned. The standard was erected early in the history of the latter-day work, as we call it, when there came to us what we received as instruction from on high that a school should be established, and men were commissioned to write books for the purpose of being used in public schools, and that long before our public school system was what it is now. They were instructed to prepare for it, and they made several efforts to do so. Away back in the forties when the city was founded at Nauvoo, Illinois, and the charter obtained for the city, there was connected with that charter, authorized by the State of Illinois, a charter for a university. Circumstances interfered with this being carried into effect, and I believe though there was some kind of a school kept there for a short time, there was no building erected and but little was done. It only indicates that all along the years that idea of education, of instruction to the young and to the old as well, was uppermost in the minds of the people. At length it was thought that the time had arrived when it was possible to found an institution of learning, and it was started here, and this is the result.

We do not come before you this morning to say to you that it has been an unqualified success, or that errors have not been made. It would be unique indeed if that were true. Mistakes have been made in everything that has been started in this world. Success has never attended anything to the extent that its promoters hoped for. We have desires and anticipations for the success of everything that we undertake that are never realized in full. I am glad that we have our ideals beyond what we have ever acquired; for if we did not have our ideals in advance we would go no farther. It is because we look to something better than we have ever attained that we make effort, and faith springs eternal in the breast in this making effort to do something in the hope that our desires and expectations will sometime be realized. There are, however, things that have obtained among educators that I believe are wrong. I am going to mention one or two, one anyway, this morning. I will do it to caution the young people here against the effort upon the part of some leading educators of the day. Now there are some who think that you can come to an absolute certainty in regard to subjects that are before you. I have heard them talk about things being absolute. I do not believe that. I believe that it is possible for us to know a great deal about things that are presented for our consideration, and the mind of man is such a wonderful thing for the reception of knowledge that it seems sometimes that there is no limit. I think we would do well to teach the sciences as far as we know them and to present what we know, but do not state, and if it is stated do not believe it, that you have solved the problem fully, and that the conclusion you come to can not be wrong. If you do you stop progress. Whenever an individual comes to the conclusion that he has arrived at the ultimatum, and that the deduction he has made from anything that is presented to him for consideration is absolute, there is no inducement to go any farther. Why, you can not do it. There is not any single thing in this world, I care not how minute it is, that the wisest man that ever lived knows all about. No one thing that any one mind knows everything in regard to. There remains something the more you study to know in regard to it that you never thought of before. We can not reason ourselves into the conclusion that we can arrive at the end in our present condition and that we can absolutely demonstrate any deduction of science so as to remove it from the realm of doubt.

Sometimes I hear people talk, not only in college, but I hear it in the pulpit, I do not know but I have talked it myself, that we can absolutely know some things from our experience, on the hypothesis that the same cause produces the same effect always. Now I have no doubt but that this philosophy is true, but the difficulty is that the same cause never happens twice, never did in the world. Similar causes happen sometimes, and we can look for similar results, but there are so many things entering into the causes, so many complications that we can not have two results exactly alike.

I think it is Blackstone that says that the law does not take into consideration the remote causes of an act, but simply the immediate cause, because you are not able to trace the remote causes to the effect. He might have said more. He might have said and said truthfully, we are not able to comprehend the remote causes. The remote causes lie beyond our comprehension. We are moving in a little circle here. The future can not open to us, and the past only a little way back. When we undertake to go back and trace from cause to effect and find out the reason why things are so, we can get only a little ways. The remote causes lie back of it, and you will pardon me, I know, when I tell you I believe that there, right upon this point, is where we have need of religion. We have need of faith. Science has never gone back into those remote causes. Something lies back there that we know nothing about naturally. And I think that it is reasonable, is logical, is philosophical, to conclude that back in those remote causes there is some being that has called these causes into operation. They come to the light occasionally, and we see the results, and as Blackstone says, in the courts of jurisprudence in consideration of the immediate cause, we recognize that there is back of it the remote causes that we know nothing of.

All these considerations enter into education. Indeed, we are only partially educated, any of us, for we know but few of these things, very few indeed. And I want these young people to understand in whatever they study, whether in Graceland or somewhere else, that they can never come to the conclusion that they have solved any science or any study so that their conclusion is absolute. There is always a chance for a mistake. Mistakes have been discovered where it was thought absolute conclusions had been reached. They will still be discovered. The philosophy of our fathers is crude to us, ours will be crude to our children, and we will continue to rise so long as we keep our minds open to learn. But whenever we come to the conclusion that we know, it is the end of progress.

In your efforts to understand and when you come in contact with those who have been appointed as your instructors, it is safe to conclude that they know a great deal more than you do. It is wise to give them the benefit of the doubt when you are not sure, so far at least as to take into consideration the theory they present and carefully investigate it. They know more than you do. They may think they know what they do not know, but they are not so full of conceit as you are. They have had some of it taken out of them by experience, and if they succeed in taking some of it out of you they will be benefactors to you, and to the neighborhood in which you live. Give them the benefit of the doubt, and give it with careful investigation, and then you will probably discover that in many things that seem strange to you now, that probably you are doubtful in regard to, they are right. And it will do you good to learn, keeping yourself all the time in the condition that I have been speaking about, that there is something to learn. Not only other branches to learn that you have not touched yet, but there is something in every branch of learning for you to get yet. You have not concluded any of them—you never will.

I once heard an individual who was lecturing on astronomy. I happened to have an appointment in the neighborhood where he wanted to lecture; he wanted the hall where I was occupying and he came to me and asked me to allow him to use it and I told him I would and he presented me with a complimentary ticket with the remark, "I do not think you will regret it, for I know all about astronomy."

I told him he was welcome to the use of the hall so far as I was concerned, but I was a little doubtful whether I would go or not, for I did not care much to hear a man who thought he knew all about astronomy; a man who knew so little about it as that seemed hardly worth hearing. And that is the truth in regard to every other subject. A man who thinks he knows all about anything is hardly worth hearing. Why, if he has studied it at all he knows better than that. He knows there is a great deal to learn, and that is the very thing that I said a while ago that I find fault with in some of our institutions of learning, and I hope we have one here where it will never obtain, where we are told we have absolute deduction from premises that can not be wrong. Now I know that is not so if I did get my education out here in the fields of western Iowa. I know that is not true. When a man teaches any science and says that it is absolutely so, that it is demonstrated to be so, and hence everything that conflicts with it is wrong, and tries to shake your faith in the religion of your fathers, upon that point he is not an educated man. If he has not faith in the religion himself that is his business, but to tell you that you shall take his deduction from science as absolute, that you shall take his deduction and conclude that your faith is wrong, is not an indication of education, but the lack of it. Why, men who have communed with God, and I believe there are such men and have been all along the ages, have never been able to come to absolute certainty by that communion. They may have walked and talked with God. Not because God did not know and is not willing to tell, but because we misunderstand God. No, they do not comprehend him always when he does speak. Why, our minds are not capable at one time of grasping all these things. We are placed here in a limited sphere, our opportunities are limited and our ability is also limited; and while, as I said before, the mind of man seems to be wonderful in its capacity, the most prominent thing about it is its limitations. There is not anything that is so prominent in the mind of man as the limitation of man. It is always bobbing up. There may be other things that are wonderful, but it is always present and whatever he undertakes to do or undertakes to think about, the limitations are there, and therefore anyone who asks the young people to believe that he has demonstrated anything beyond the possibility of an error, is not fit to be an educator of young people. Young people do not want to get that idea into their heads. We have had too much of it, too much of the false, and if this institution could steer clear of it, and while they teach the sciences, all that is known about them, teach that it is a theory, teach it if you will as possibly correct and without an error, but teach it as a probability. Do not teach it as absolutely complete. If you do you will be subject to mortification. If you do not experience it now your posterity will be ashamed of you.

Education, as was stated at the start in the definition I quoted a while ago, is the discovery and application of truth. There are educated people outside of college walls. There are educated people who never went to school. There are educated people who do not know one part of speech from another, would not be able to parse a sentence, would not be able to solve a problem in mathematics, yet they have discovered truth and applied it in the sphere in which they move, and have filled the position they occupied according to their environments and circumstances as well, or possibly better than those who have been crammed full of books and thought they were educated. Whenever a man thinks he knows a thing because he has read it, he has not the first elements of education. Learn what you can from books, learn what you can anywhere else. Let your field be as broad as it is possible to make it. Take into consideration everything that is presented to you for consideration, and deduct, so far as you are able, good lessons therefrom, making yourself useful in the walks of life, but remembering all the time that there is something else. I think schools are a good thing in one respect at least, and that is, that when a man does learn in school he knows that somebody else knows it as well as he. Somebody told it to him; but if he finds it out himself he thinks nobody else in the wide world knows it but himself, and he becomes what we call in common parlance a self-made man and he may be a pious man and as such he is very liable to keep the command to worship his maker. But if somebody else has taught it to him, he knows that there is somebody else in the world that knows it and he doesn't get the big head as badly as self-made men.

I think it is a good thing to have schools, and learn there, though it may be possible to pick up learning ourselves.

When anybody tells you anything give it consideration. Do not push it off as unworthy of attention and thought. As though you know too much to entertain a thought like that. It will not do. Whenever a man presents a thought to you for consideration, give it consideration. You may find a gem of truth there that you little expected, though it comes from a source that seems beneath you. Perhaps it is not beneath you. Perhaps you have been flattering yourself that you have been occupying higher ground than you really were. But whether it is or whether it is not, accept the truth.

I am glad, I will say right here, that everything is uncertain in this world. That is, that there is a mystery of uncertainty surrounding everything. I am glad, for that is what makes men. If they understood the situation, if they could be absolutely certain, there would not be inducement for study and development that there is now, we would not make the effort that we do now, because we could learn too easily. I like those lines of the poet which say,

"God by succeeding changes tempereth all,
That man may hope to rise, yet fear to fall."

Always afraid to fall, always hoping to rise, and this mystery that surrounds us which we are trying to solve, is a good thing in that connection, showing us the necessity of being on our guard, of being careful, and we may ascend the heights of wisdom and gain more and more of the things that will go to make life pleasant and profitable by taking advantage of our opportunities and becoming informed.

That reminds me of another theory we hear so much about, and that is an equality of opportunity. It sounds well, but there never were two opportunities alike in this world, never will be. They are always like the causes we were talking about awhile ago, so many things enter in in the circumstances and environments that they are never alike. We can not make them alike, but we can try to equalize them as nearly as possible. We can make the effort to give as nearly the same opportunities as our conditions will allow, and that is our mission.

There is one thing I want to emphasize, though, before I close, and that is this. In our efforts to educate ourselves, gain knowledge, and become proficient, we will make a mistake if we have our whole attention fixed on our individual selves. The selfish man will not make advancement. To have enough regard for self and enough interest in self to make what we can of ourselves is commendable, but to desire to gain anything at the expense of another, and disregard the rights of another in order that we may acquire, will bring any man down. It is a delusive thing when you think you are going to rise in that way. You are deluded, for it is just as certain that you are sinking as that you believe you are rising. We are just a part of this great world. Leaving out every other consideration but humanity, we are just a part—a small part of humanity, and being a part, our good depends upon the good of the whole. The part can not be benefited without we benefit the whole. Separate yourself from humanity, from the world, from your fellows, and expect to build yourself up, it is a false philosophy, I care not whether you apply it to finance, I care not whether you apply it to education, I care not whether you apply it to any of the things that may be desired in this life, you can not build yourself up while you disregard the rights of your fellows. We must go together. It is an immutable law, fixed by the great Creator, that humanity must rise or fall together. Though there may be differences, and are differences in individuals, and always will be, as a whole, humanity will go up together or down together, and if you undertake to get above at the expense of your fellows, you will go below as far as the influence of humanity will allow you, and if you are ever saved at all it will not be by these efforts, but it will be by the efforts of your fellow-men holding you up. Consider yourself a part and only a part and work to that end that you will be useful to humanity.

It is a good thing to have in consideration the possibility of making money, and that is one of the things I want to emphasize. Our children are learning it in the schools (there are exceptions to this), they are learning it at home, that they should prepare themselves so as to occupy positions that are remunerative, that they can gather for themselves the things that make life comfortable and desirable. That is right as far as it goes, but there is another side to it, and that other side is this, we ought to teach our children, it ought to be taught in the schools, it ought to be taught everywhere, that we have no right, they have no right, to ask a community to give them that which they are not worth. They ought to be instructed that when they go into business, or even a profession, that it should be their desire to render to that community value received, and they have no right to accept a salary unless they are worth it. Neglect of this has brought about the conditions of business that obtain now largely. It is the result of teaching and believing that we ought to engage in something remunerative without teaching legitimate obligations to society. Such teaching has brought about disreputable business. We would need no effort on the part of the temperance cause, there would be no need of such efforts by the Anti-Saloon League and others of the kind, if all men were governed by the principle that while they expect to be supported by the community, they will not accept of that support only when they have rendered service to the community for that support. They would scorn the saloon business, they would scorn to engage in anything that is disreputable because it is not right to the community.

I admire the position taken by Gen. Robert E. Lee. Rebel though he was, he was a noble man in many respects, and the thing that I am going to relate perhaps may illustrate the point under consideration. When a position was offered him in a great insurance company of New York because of the influence he had, he said, "Gentlemen, I can not earn that salary."

"It makes no difference to us," was the reply, "your influence in the South is worth that much to us."

He said, "Gentlemen, what little influence I have in the South is not for sale."

That is the true principle. That is the principle that I wish governed all men, that is the principle that I want to see obtain in Graceland. These young people will be taught not only that there are remunerative positions awaiting them, when they have prepared themselves and they can take positions where there will be competency, but I want to see them taught, and I hope they will be taught in this institution, that they have no right to accept of the community unless they return to that community value received, and they should engage in an enterprise only that will be beneficial to the community; to ask the question always, What will this business be worth to the community? and not only, Will it bring means to my coffers? Will it be of benefit to the community? If so, it is worthy of my attention. If not, it is not worthy.

I want to see this institution have such a record, that the young man or woman who goes out of this place would not deign to choose a vocation with the sole purpose of serving self, but will say in love for Graceland, It is unworthy of Graceland, and it is not proper that her students should engage in such a thing.

Let us try to be just along these lines, and we will find education to be a good thing, a great thing. I am not so much interested as to whether this institution shall ever be a financial success as I am that it shall be a success in other lines. If it becomes a financial success it will be an exception to the rule. I know of no such institution that is a financial success, that has paid its own way. They have all been supported by charity, by the liberality of men and women who are willing to sacrifice for the results that would obtain to the rising generation. Most of our larger institutions are endowed by people who are able to do so. We have no endowment here, but we are getting from people, none of whom are able to do much, but each is able to do a little, and if we shall continue to do so for the rest of our lives, and during the lives of our children, it shall continue to be an effort to keep it moving financially. If we could turn out of its doors young men and women who are educated in the true sense of the word, it is worth the effort and worth the sacrifice. But if we should make it a financial success, and even make money out of it, and did not turn out that kind of material, but turn out men and women who would enter into disreputable things, it would be a miserable failure. Millions would not offset the evil that it would bring if such a condition as that should obtain.

Many of our larger institutions have done great good, and some of them have done harm, and the harm that they have done is upon the principle I have been telling you to-day, teaching that theory is absolute certainty, and that they have arrived at the final conclusion where there can be no mistake. There is no true education I am sure that ever brought man to that condition—never could. So let us continue to learn and try to educate ourselves, and let us remember this definition, I believe it is a good one, that education is the discovery and application of truth wherever we find it, or wherever it may be studied and applied. That the false detracts from education though it may be learned in a university. I thank you for your attention.

THE STUDENT AND THE COLLEGE.

ADDRESS AT GRACELAND COLLEGE, BY E. L. KELLEY, PRESIDING BISHOP OF THE CHURCH.

[EDITOR'S NOTE.—This address was delivered in Graceland College chapel at the commencement of the present term, reported by Sr. Estella Wight. The plea for harmonious work between the faculty and the student body made a very favorable impression. One of the students, a bright, active young fellow, remarked to the editors recently that the students are starting out with an unusually good spirit. They feel united, and like doing everything just right. The prospects for a good year are very encouraging. Remember College Day, the first Sunday in October.]

Of course I understand that on this special occasion there ought to be from me only a few words, but I am glad to meet you and see so many students here with the object, doubtless, that all of you have in view, of bettering yourselves during the present year, so that you may think better and act better, and be better by reason of having attended Graceland for the term or terms that are immediately ahead of you.

I believe in the development of education; the development of the brain; the development of the faculties in such a way that men or women can think better, and thus be more useful than they can without it, and in the application of the knowledge of which you have just heard (in the address), by the addition of new truths which are so beneficial to the student in the development of the mind, which make him better prepared to discover and gather and apply that which is for his highest and best good.

There is no part of a boy or girl's life, to my mind, that is more important than the time of beginning their college work. I remember when a boy of making the first effort toward an education for myself; at the time I was the only student from western Iowa to the State University. I did not know what I wanted when I went there, but after fifteen months of study under trying circumstances under the superintendency of the first president of the normal work of the State of Iowa, D. Franklin Wells, I struck out for other fields, and after I had attended a commercial school in the East, and ran out of change so that I could not go any farther, I wanted a position, and thought I would turn back to where I had made my first effort and ascertain what kind of a recommendation they would give me—what help I could obtain from President Wells, as we called him at that time. He gave me such a recommendation that I realized quite fully at once that the members of the faculty in a school are the best friends of the student. The recommendation was handed to the state superintendent of schools of Pennsylvania at Harrisburg, who furnished me a school at once, the Boys' High School in Williamsport, Pennsylvania. I was but a boy myself, but from the thoroughness of the instruction that I had received under that great educator (and President Wells was a great educator) I had gathered sufficient that I was enabled to maintain the position and fill it with satisfaction to pupils and patrons. I mention it only to call your attention to the fact that while you are pupils here you must not forget that the faculty are your best friends, and any boy or girl coming to Graceland College, becoming discouraged, or who may get into trouble of any kind, whether with reference to his studies, financial matters, or anything else, whatever the condition, they should make the faculty their first confidant all the time. They are the ones who are responsible for you.

In our work as individuals in this world we may gather, whether we are in the field, or in the public the journey of life, and it is true, as stated in the lecture to which you have just listened, that we may gather, whether we are in the field, or in the public school, or in the college halls; but remember this, that it is but the few individuals in life who can gather sufficient knowledge and also toil in the fields to give them great success in life. They are the isolated ones. We can take Abraham Lincoln and he would work in the field and gather as he went. We might mention a few distinguished men who have risen to the top in this way; but the majority of men and women who have attained success started by gathering in the schoolroom. They are the ones who have made the triumphs when you come to numbers.

It is correct, as stated by our brother, that there are no exactly equal opportunities; but these opportunities, to the students entering Graceland, we are working to level up and equalize so far as possible, so that it may truthfully be said of the youth of the church, that all have an opportunity to obtain a good education which will be a blessing to them in life. If they fail, it is to them a lost opportunity—was not improved as it should have been. So where some who have unequal opportunities who are before me this morning, by a little adjustment here and there, opportunities have been leveled up to a certain extent. In the world it is what is called beneficent work, and the highest and best work that can be done for the people in this world.

Now I know when you come here you are much like I used to be when I went to school in new places; and I rather think you experience what I heard only yesterday of a pupil who had just entered the high school in Lamoni, and when members of the family were naturally inquiring as to what his studies were, what books he would need, and what he was going to do, he said he did not know. They asked him why. He replied, "How could I remember when I was scared nearly to death?" He was just entering high school. I do not want to give you an insight into his name, but it is all right to give you to understand it was not one of the high school girls who was so badly scared; but doubtless if you have just come this morning to Graceland, never been here before, you are worrying over the fact that possibly the first lesson you will get will be something that you can not master, and you are hesitating and possibly trembling. Suppose you do, it's all right. Boys and girls in this world who meet the things that are very difficult and tremble over them sometimes, are the ones who come to the top bye and bye. Do not get discouraged because you have to make these great efforts, but move right along, and all those who do at the end of the school year will find themselves better prepared for the activities of life than they ever could have been without the work and the opportunities that you have here.

Now I wish you all success, and I trust that in the work of the year, if there is one here who gets so far behind and discouraged that he thinks he can not move forward a little farther, that he will confide his difficulties to the faculty, and they are very free sometimes to confide to the trustees, and sometimes they write the Bishop, and I am free to say that he has never complained yet because a difficult case was brought up.

I thank you then for your presence here and trusting that the results of your work will fully repay for any efforts that may be put forth by yourselves, or by the general body of the church, or the friends (for we have a great many friends of the institution who are putting forth good efforts to help), and thus fully answer to all the efforts that are put forth, to your good and that of the college, I thank you.

DARKEST MEXICO.

What promises to be a most enlightened and at the same time astounding series of articles begins in the October American Magazine under the title of "Barbarous Mexico." The author, John Kenneth Turner, writes with first-hand knowledge, having been an eye-witness of many of the things about which he writes. The first of this series of articles is called "The slaves of Yucatan," and Mr. Turner's opening paragraphs best illustrate the importance of the work he has undertaken and its profound significance to every citizen of the United States. They are as follows:

"What is Mexico?

"Americans commonly characterize Mexico as 'Our Sister Republic.' Most of us picture her vaguely as a republic in reality much like our own, inhabited by people a little different in temperament, a little poorer, and a little less advanced, but still enjoying the protection of republican laws—free people in the sense that we are free.

"Others of us, who have seen the country through a car window, or speculated a little in Mexican mines or Mexican plantations, paint that country beyond the Rio Grande as a benevolent paternalism in which a great and good man orders all things well for his foolish but adoring people.

"I found Mexico to be neither of these two things. The real Mexico I found to be a country with a written constitution and written laws as fair and democratic as our own, but with neither constitution nor laws in operation. Mexico is a country without political freedom, without freedom of speech, without a free press, without a free ballot, without a jury system, without political parties, without any of our cherished guarantees of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. It is a land where there has been no contest for the office of president for more than a generation, where the executive rules all things by means of a standing army, where political offices are sold for a fixed price, where the public school system in vast country districts is abolished because a governor needs the money. I found Mexico to be a land where the people are poor because they have no rights, where peonage is the rule for the great mass and where actual chattel slavery obtains for hundreds of thousands. Finally, I found that the people do not idolize their present, that the tide of opposition, dammed and held back as it has been by army and secret police, is rising to a height where it must shortly overflow the dam. Mexicans of all classes and affiliations agree that their country is hurrying towards a general revolution in favor of democracy: if not a revolution in the time of Diaz, for Diaz is old and is expected soon to pass, then a revolution after Diaz."

Prayer, continually lived in, makes the presence of a holy and loving God the air which life breathes, and by which it lives, so that, as it mingles consciously with the work of the day, it becomes also a part of every dream. To us, then, it will be no strange thing to enter heaven, for we have been living in the things of heaven.—Stopford A. Brooke.

The Bible as Good Reading.

THE TEN LAWS OF RIGHTEOUSNESS.

That is a vast thing, when you think about it. All the righteousness of the world is condensed into a few sentences given to a semibarbarous people thousands and thousands of years ago, and perfected by our Lord two thousand years ago. I defy any man to read the Bible without being immensely interested, and also without acquiring a respect amounting almost to awe for the mind and conscience that could have devised it—this at least, if indeed, like myself, you do not come to see that it was more than a human wisdom; it was entirely a divine wisdom.

Now we get to the laws of Moses. I do not think that the lawyers that are being developed now are so good as our earlier lawyers; because not many of them read the Bible, and very few, indeed, are well grounded in it. In a former time, boys who afterward became lawyers were really deeply read in the ordinances of the first and greatest law-givers of the world—the ancient Hebrews. You will be astonished to find how the roots of our law run back to the Hebrew encampments in the wilderness. But there is not time to trace out that most engaging connection.

Let us take a few of these statutes as examples of wonderful and exceedingly practical human wisdom. The very first thing we notice is a tendency toward liberty—even toward democracy; for you must know that the Jewish people were the first champions of liberty the world ever saw. Don't forget that it was a time when slavery was universal. Yet, here is this law:

"If thou buy an Hebrew servant, six years he shall serve: and in the seventh he shall go out free for nothing."

There are many and rigid laws against murder, wounding and fighting of all kinds—evidently Moses' people were very hot-blooded. Here again the tendency toward freedom occurs—Moses never lost an opportunity to make an excuse to set servants free. For example:

"And if a man smite the eye of his servant, or the eye of his maid, that it perish; he shall let him go free for his eye's sake."

And the same of a tooth.

The law of damages is minute; and up to a hundred years ago the preceding thousands of years had wrought very little improvement in it. In some respects the laws of Moses were better than ours.

"For all manner of trespass . . . the cause of both parties shall come before the judges; and whom the judges shall condemn, he shall pay double unto his neighbor."

In the more delicate affairs of human life the laws of Moses were most humane, considerate and just—in some respects much more so than our own to-day. And occasionally he rises to the heights of Him of the Mount of Olives, as, for example, in his famous ordinance:

"Ye shall not afflict any widow, or fatherless child."

And this was not only moral law, but a practical rule of action and punishment rigidly enforced. And his laws against usury are equally effective.

FOR THE HEALTH OF THE PEOPLE.

The foregoing laws are pretty good, are they not? But, mind you, they are only the beginnings—the first attempts of Moses. Here are some examples after he got thoroughly trained to his work. We must note that the very first and most numerous of these concern the health of the people. From the time of Moses until this day, the most perfect laws of hygiene ever developed were the health ordinances of the great Hebrew law-giver:

"Whatsoever parteth the hoof, and is clovenfooted, and cheweth the cud, among the beasts, that shall ye eat."

But they were forbidden to eat anything else, and, as we know to-day, for most excellent scientific reasons. And as to water-animal life:

"Whatsoever hath fins and scales in the waters, in the seas, and in the rivers, them shall ye eat."

But everything else in the waters were "an abomination." Then he enumerates all the kinds of birds they may not eat. Every kind of scavenger on water, on land or in the air was condemned. Moses was so particular about it that he commanded that

"Whosoever toucheth the carcass of them shall be unclean until the even."

Even to the varieties of fowl, fish, and beasts to which Moses confined the Israelites he applied the most searching methods to determine whether even these were in good health. I know nothing more impressive than this fact, that down to twenty-five years ago the most perfect method to determine whether any bird, fish, or animal was healthful was the Jewish method of Moses. In America, up to the time of our Meat Inspection Law, passed at the last session of Congress, the Kosher slaughter houses were the most scientifically hygienic in all the thousands of years from the time of Moses.

Take, for example, the precautions in determining the wholesomeness of beef. In the Kosher slaughter house the animal is elevated by the hind quarters, so that all the blood runs toward the head. Then the throat is cut by a single stroke of a long knife, designed for the purpose. And every drop of the blood is drained away. The animal is then cut open and the hand inserted and the sides within carefully felt to see whether there are any adhesions. If a single one develops the animal is condemned. The lungs are blown into, and if the least air escapes the animal is condemned. And so on with other like precautions, every one of which, as we know, being entirely scientific. And yet this practice is not one whit different to-day than it was in the days of Moses.

The truth is that the Jews are the only people who as a people, and speaking by and large, have been eating wholesome meat for several thousand years. Sometimes this entailed sacrifice among the poor. For example, I know of one instance where a Jewish family in Germany had fattened a fowl for one of their holidays. As they were required to do, they took it to the priest, who, upon examination according to the Mosaic rules, found it unwholesome. This family immediately sold it to Christians in open market, as they had a perfect right to do, because the Christians were then eating, and have always been eating, a good, fat fowl without ever thinking whether there was anything the matter with it or not.

We sometimes wonder at the amazing vitality of the Jews—their physical persistence as a people—but if you read the laws of Moses and reflect that they have been observed rigidly even to this day, wonder begins to dissolve.

Of course I can not take up all of this paper with the laws of Moses; but suffer one or two further examples. Nothing shows the deep statesmanship of this wonderful man and his craft in the service of liberty so much as his institution of the year of the Jubilee, which came every fifty years. In that year every bondsman went free and every man returned to his own possessions.

"And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof: it shall be a jubilee unto you; and ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family."

Everybody set free; all debts discharged; all mortgages lifted. It was something for the people to look forward to. They were not to be eternally chained to existing conditions. There was to be a new deal all around. What a large wisdom—what a far-seeing justice! It is far beyond anything of which we are capable to-day. Any person preaching that doctrine to-day would surely be called an anarchist.

The large tolerance and nobility of mercy in the laws of Moses, even with all of their rigor, are inspiring. For example, if a man got to be so poor that he had to sell his possessions, any of his kin could come around to the buyer and redeem them. With us in this twentieth century when a man sells anything it is gone for good and all, no matter why he had to sell it. The Mosaic law of redemption applies now only to tax sales.

JUSTICE TO THE WIFE AND HUSBAND.

The Mosaic laws on divorce contain the highest justice toward woman the world ever saw down to the time of Christ. Before Moses (and, excepting only among the Jewish people after him, for that matter), a man took or put away his wife at will, and she was more or less an outcast. But with Moses there was a regular bill of divorcement. Everything is so full of common sense. For example, take these statutes concerning the honeymoon:

"When a man hath taken a new wife, he shall not go out to war, neither shall he be charged with any business: but he shall be free at home one year, and shall cheer up his wife which he hath taken."

This was not only kindness and an understanding of the situation; but it was great shrewdness, also. The man would probably be worth very little that year, anyhow. I must again repeat the element of mercy running through the laws of Moses, and in an age, remember, when mercy was very little heard of or understood. For example:

"Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother";

or,

"No man shall take the nether or the upper millstone to pledge: for he taketh a man's life to pledge":

or,

"If the man be poor, thou shalt not sleep with his pledge":

"In any case thou shalt deliver him the pledge again when the sun goeth down, that he may sleep in his own raiment, and bless thee":

or,

"Thou shalt not oppress an hired servant that is poor and needy. . . . At his day thou shalt give him his hire, neither shall the sun go down upon it; for he is poor and setteth his heart upon it":

or,

"When thou cuttest down thine harvest in thy field, and hast forgot a sheaf in the field, thou shalt not go again to fetch it: it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless and for the widow":

or,

"When thou beatest thine olive tree, thou shalt not go over the boughs again: it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless and for the widow."

"When thou gatherest the grapes of thy vineyard, thou shalt not glean it afterward: it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless and for the widow."

This mercy extended even to the animals, as, for example:

"Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn."

Or take this, at a time, remember, when everybody thought it perfectly right to cheat—even the ancestors of Moses himself, as witness the deceit of Esau and the trick of Jacob played upon Laban. Moses would have none of that, and said:

"Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small. But thou shalt have a perfect and just weight."

In short, go over the laws of Moses. They will surprise you much more than any flimsy sensation that you see in the newspapers, and they will instruct you mightily. They are golden hours indeed one spends with this master wise man of the ancient time, statesman and law giver, dreamer, and man of affairs, physician and poet.

Editors Herald: Here we are more than two thousand miles northwest of Kansas City, writing, keeping in touch with our associates and field, preaching an occasional sermon, meeting with the Saints in Sunday school and Religio, attending the reunion at Seattle part of the time, visiting the great Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition for two days, enjoying the cool breezes from the Pacific and her sounds, sleeping between woolen blankets with an additional heavy quilt or two during the months of July and August, and enjoying an occasional boat ride in a boat diminutive in size, something like our Evanelia. The boat acted a little crazy just because the wind turned to be a little "galey," but I thought we could trust to Providence since we were on a church trip. However, as the captain helped my good wife from the boat, he remarked: "I got you over all safe, anyway."

"But you will not get me on that boat again," quickly answered my wife.

I was of the some opinion, but thought best not to show the "white feather" just at that time. These are some of our experiences, but somehow we are feeling much improved in health—nervous system under better control than when we left our little Zion home at Independence, though we did feel a little bit shaky when our boat would not behave itself.

While admitting this "greater West" is a wonderful country, abounding with many good things of the "ancient mountains," yet we are fully convinced that God made no mistake when he chose Independence to be the center stake of Zion. While attending the exposition, we saw probably more than one million dollars' worth of the yellow metal incarcerated behind iron bars, probably the proceeds of the West. Yet there is something more enticing to the word Zion, to the faithful Saints of the West, than is found in the hustle and bustle for the almighty dollar of this "greater West." But I have met others who have grown cold from the influence of the hurry-to-get-rich spirit, and have entailed into their lives a "don't-care" indifference to all the bidding of the Spirit to "come up higher," and prepare themselves to meet the hurried coming events that are now knocking with no uncertain sound at the door of all nations. With tears we have asked the question, "Who will abide his coming?" We are pained to see the condition of some of the Saints, and only wish we were physically able to do more to relieve the situation.

We note the pale reaper is doing his work this year in the church, as our venerable President predicted at our late General Conference. Who can afford to be idle when the reckoning time for work done may be called for at any hour? Neither youth nor age can merit the plaudit, "Well done," if they suffer themselves to be "lovers of pleasure" more than of the building up of this great work that God has caused to be sent to us through Joseph the Seer, by his angel.

Our lives must be daily epistles of righteousness, in order that we may be examples to those with whom we associate—whether it be the youth, the middle-aged, or the aged. He that knoweth the Lord's will and doeth it not, "shall be beaten with many stripes." Ignorance that can not be helped, might be tolerated in some measure; but that, we feel, would be risky in this enlightened day of revelation to the church. "We don't know," did not satisfy the unlearned youth of Palmyra as being acceptable even in his day of little learning, when forced with, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him."

The Palmyra youth felt that where there is a will there is a way, and thus came to us this great latter-day work. Who would be ignorant of what his duty is, when through humility and right living it can be so easily determined.

Dreaming of the needs and wants of my field has made me restless, and ere long we expect to start homeward, calling, probably, at Portland, Salt Lake City, and Denver on our way, through kind invitation of interested ones in the faith we love so well.

WAREHAM, MASSACHUSETTS, August 20, 1909.

Editors Herald: It has been sometime since I wrote for the columns of the HERALD, not because there was no good news forthcoming, for there has been much to inspire me with a greater desire to work for the interest of the Master.

I can see many things in the church that indicate a marked development among our members, especially the young. There seems to be existing within their hearts an increasing desire to reach the height of spiritual attainment. One instance which comes to my mind took place at the Eastern Reunion of 1908, when ten of our young men, averaging perhaps twenty years of age, experienced a spiritual feast which they will undoubtedly never forget. Previous to this time, I think, I am safe in saying, some of their number had not given much attention to the church, nor had they any particular interest in it. During the silent hours of night, when the Saints were sleeping in their tents, these young men arose from their cots, got down on their knees, and poured out their souls to God in prayer, each one taking his turn. They repeated this three times during the night. And God did certainly bless them with a great outpouring of his Holy Spirit, and the boys were made to realize that he had heard their prayers. And from that time each one vowed that he would support the cause under every condition. Two have since been ordained to the priesthood, while others were warned to prepare themselves for greater work in the Master's service, and all seem to be putting forth their energies for the accomplishment of the designs of the Almighty.

One morning before the prayer service at our last camp, one of the same young men said, "Come on, fellows, let's do our part toward making this meeting a success." And we heard testimonies from them that would arouse both old and young to a sense of duty. To my mind this shows that there is a work to be accomplished by the young of our church. For when they put forth the effort, God does seem to bless them abundantly.

Along with the spiritual advancement of our young people, during the last few years I have noticed a greater desire to cultivate their talents, especially the gift of music. We find singers and players who are striving to become proficient along their lines, and who are realizing fine results from their efforts. Others are taking advanced steps along literary lines and other possibilities. We can not all be musicians and singers, but we can all be effectual workers in the place God has assigned us.

I feel encouraged in the work and wish my life to be one of usefulness. The encouragement received from the Ohio Saints during the first part of my missionary experience has been of great assistance to me, and I feel to thank them for it.

At present Bro. A. B. Phillips and myself are holding tent services in the center of this town. Upon erecting the tent, as usual, we were surrounded by some inquisitive lads who questioned as to whether it was a merry-go-round or a show. The boys, in this case, did not prove to be half the mischief-makers as did a Methodist preacher in the neighborhood. Just as soon as he heard that we were in town, he came down to have a look at us. I told Brother Phillips that we made a bad impression on him, and I guess the conclusion was right, for he immediately began to revive his members by a series of meetings. He called upon a couple of professional singers, one of whom was the famous "Gypsy" Smith's son, who proved to be the main attraction. At the time I could not but think that had I a pedigree, we might have had crowds too.

We went to hear his sermon on Sunday morning and the preacher read from the Psalm like this: "I would rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God than to dwell in the tents of wickedness," emphasizing seemingly the last three words. I do not think he meant that all people who live in tents are wicked, but I have a feeling that he aimed at two undesirable citizens holding tent services near by.

During our services, this same minister has falsely represented us as Mormons to the whole townspeople. This, of course, has had a tendency to reduce our audience. His case is hardly excusable, as he has been rightly informed by two noble sisters living here, who have been attending his church, as there is none of our faith in the town. Brother Phillips has visited him and talked with him concerning the matter. But he seemed loath to rectify the mistake. However, this has not discouraged us from laboring in this place, as we contemplate beginning our next season's work right here.

Trusting the Lord will aid us in removing obstacles from our path, that our works may be conducive of good,

Yours in gospel bonds,

ELDORADO SPRINGS, MISSOURI, Sept. 18, 1909.

Editors Herald: In humility and earnestness I desire to bear my testimony through your columns of the goodness of God to one of the weakest of his children. I can truthfully say that he has never failed to answer the prayer that I put to him in faith and lowliness of heart without causing me to see, sooner or later, that it was for my own good that the petition was not granted; and that I never made an effort to do good but what he has blessed such effort, although not always in the manner that I expected. And yet with such testimony to me, I at times allow little things—very small things—to try me severely.

I sometimes wonder how long it will be till Zion is redeemed. When will the Saints (I, among the rest,) learn to labor continually, zealously, and faithfully for those treasures which neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and which fade not away, instead of centering our mind and bending every energy to obtain that filthy lucre called the "almighty dollar?" Paul says that money is the "root of all evil." I believe this to be true in the majority of cases. A man becomes so engrossed with the financial side of life that he is pretty apt to neglect the real object the Creator had in view in placing him here. For instance, the father neglects to improve every opportunity he has to teach his son a father's love. The boy grows indifferent and fails to meet the father's expectations. The father allows himself to lose confidence in the boy and then he has lost his boy, maybe for ever! Why do not parents have more confidence in their children? Fathers, why lose faith in the boy? A boy is a queer combination anyway, and it takes a wise father to bring out the best there is in him.

Another thing that worries me is the habit which a great many men have, especially those professing the life of a true Christian, of telling vulgar stories, repeating profane and indecent language. It is not strange to me the number of divorce cases and cases of a like nature that fill our court dockets when we consider that more than nine out of every ten men allow their influence directly and indirectly to go that way. The young and rising generation will have enough of this great evil to meet without the present one feeding the flame with this diabolical scheme that Satan has instituted and given to men of impure minds to peddle out to the whole race.

Ever praying for the right to triumph over wrong and the pure in heart to be gathered in that the millennial reign may be ushered in with all of its possibilities, I am,

Your brother,

JOHN T. WOOD.

CLINTON, MISSOURI.

Dear Herald: It has been a long time since any letter from me appeared in the HERALD, but I appreciate the church publications; for I am not only isolated from church privileges, but as those of you who know me are aware, I am entirely deaf, so that, when by chance we get any preaching, I get no benefit. Nevertheless, I can give many testimonies of God's goodness to me, and many gifts, the greatest of which is the peace that passes understanding.

Twenty-eight years ago, Brother Joseph spoke the words of confirmation to me, and said, "You shall have peace, the company of Saints and angels and the Son of God." All this has been fulfilled. That which has moved me to write this, is the account I have read on several occasions of those who have in dreams or visions heard a voice or voices singing the third stanza of the hymn, "How firm a foundation," and I felt moved to give an experience of mine.

About fifteen years ago, during a season of perplexity and trouble, when I knew not what to do, alone, lying on a couch one day, but whether asleep or not I can not say, I seemed to hear the voices of three people in the room. One seemed to be sitting a few feet from my head, another about an equal distance from the foot of the couch, and the third was on the opposite side of the room, facing me. They at first seemed to be in conversation. Let me first state that I have always been able to hear the sound of speech, without being able to distinguish any words, and for this reason I pay no attention to the sound when I do hear it. So on this occasion I did not try to hear the conversation, knowing I could not, until the one at my head began to read, and I thought how like the voice of my father when he read the Bible aloud. This made me listen more attentively until it seemed that I could, here and there, catch a word, but not enough to make sense. After a while the reading ceased and they all joined in singing. I knew by the sound that they sang, but I knew no words. Presently the one across the room walked over by the couch, still singing, one at the head, one at the foot, and one by the side. Still I did not distinguish what they sang, until the one at the side bent down and with his mouth close to my ear, sang that third stanza:

"Fear not, I am with thee; O be not dismayed;
For I am thy God and will still give thee aid;
I'll strengthen thee, help thee, and cause thee to stand;
Upheld by my righteous, omnipotent hand."

And now reading the testimony of Bro. J. T. Davis, and recently of some one else, I have thought that hymn must be a favorite among the angels as well as among the Saints. On another occasion I heard the voice of the Redeemer himself, and I recognized it as the voice of the Son of God. That filled me with wonder, not that I heard, but that I recognized the voice, until a sister quoted, "My sheep hear my voice, and they know me."

So, dear isolated Saints, we can have royal company, even when barred from church associations, for those are not the only times that I have been cheered and comforted by heavenly visitants.

May God's care and blessings continue to all his Saints in all places.

M. ELEANOR KEARNEY.

HOWELL, MICHIGAN, September 13, 1909.

Editors Herald: As I have not seen any account of the Lansing Branch reunion which was held at Long Lake, four miles from Howell, and which is too good a thing to let pass, I will write a short sketch in regard to same.

On Saturday, August 14, in the wee small hours of the night, Brother Borie and family were first on the grounds, and from that time to the end, he and Brother Backus were ready and willing to transfer all passengers and belongings to and from the depot. Although the conveyance was not a Pullman car, the seats were cushioned with love and good cheer, which made them seem like downy beds of ease. By evening the tents and cottages were filled with life and activity, and as they would meet each other you could tell by the warm hand clasp that they had come together in the Spirit of the Master. I am sure that no one that was there can ever forget the ten days of that reunion. Everyone spoke of the peace and harmony that existed through all, and although the Spirit was not manifest by tongues and prophecy, yet all felt that it was there in wonderful power.

Divine services commenced on Saturday evening, and every service from then to the close of Sunday, August 22, was a feast of good things. Each morning at 6.30 the Saints gathered at the large tent and had family prayer; then at 8.30 all came together fasting for an hour of prayer and testimony. How many hearts were warmed and cheered by those hours? None but the Father alone can tell. On Sunday evening there were one hundred assembled in tents and from time to time increased, till I venture to say there were one hundred and fifty. All were scattered Saints from Oak Grove, Webberville, Williamston, Flint, Lansing, and Howell, as well as many others. We were blessed by having such noble men as Patriarch J. J. Bailey, of Ubley, Michigan, who gave kind, fatherly advice and admonition. One could not but feel that he was indeed a father in Israel, and though many winters have passed over him, he is at heart but a boy. May God bless him, and also Elder Samuel Stroh, of Coldwater, Michigan, Bishop's agent, who kindly, yet plainly, explained to the Saints their duty and obligations regarding tithing. Then comes Bro. R. Etzenhouser, of Independence, Missouri, with his wonderful discoveries and relics of ancient times, which were of great interest, and all will long remember; J. A. Gunsolley, of Lamoni, Iowa, as he taught not only the children, but also the older ones, that life is full of responsibilities, and that in every act of life truth should predominate; William Collins, of Flint, Michigan, and J. Dexter, of Lansing, Michigan, gave satisfactory evidence of the truth of this latter-day work and the divine origin of the Book of Mormon; then last but by no means least, comes S. W. L. Scott and B. St. John, of Canada, who gained the attention of many outsiders that are now anxious to hear of this great work.

We are glad to say, also, that many were led into the waters of baptism, and took upon them the covenant of the Lord, and when on Monday, August 23, we gave the parting hand, we could but feel that if there is so much joy and happiness in meeting here, what will it be when we meet to part no more? And thus ended the first reunion of the Lansing Branch, but we hope and trust it may not be the last, as we feel that God so wonderfully blessed us all.

Your sister in the one faith,

MRS. DESDE J. WILHELM.

BEARDSTOWN, ILLINOIS.

Dear Brothers and Sisters: The letters of the dear brothers and sisters encourage me so much. As the letter of Brother Slover was read to me last Sunday morning it made my heart rejoice and my eyes fill with tears. How many times the encouraging word helps me when I feel so weak. He spoke of the hope there is for the faithful, and how often I think of that. I feel glad for what the Lord has done for me. When I read the dear crippled sister's letter, it made me think of some of my own sore trials. I am not a cripple, but I have suffered very severely from sickness, and I am grateful that we have a merciful Father to lean upon in our times of trial, and I want to please my heavenly Father and do his will. How often these words come to me: "Fear not, I am with thee, oh, be not dismayed; for I am thy God, and will still give thee aid." I desire an interest in the prayers of the Saints,

Your sister in the faith,

MAGGIE LEEGER.

LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA, September 17, 1909.

Dear Brother Elbert: Our reunion passed off pleasantly. Much good accomplished; Saints strengthened and many friends made to the cause. Fifteen sermons, four baptisms, one marriage; two sessions each of Daughters of Zion, Sunday school, and Religio. About eight hundred dollars subscribed to purchase a permanent reunion grounds. This represents some of the work done. We were denied the use of the Methodist pavilion. Cause? Our "doctrine was in conflict with the Methodist Discipline and the teachings of the Bible." So said the Methodist Association having charge of the pavilion. We made a public comparison, avoiding personalities and harshness. Some of our Methodist friends present volunteered the information that the Methodists "did not believe such nonsense as was found in the Discipline." We did not call it nonsense. It represented the views of God and service held by men a hundred or more years ago. The world has grown. The creed has not. One Methodist preacher, a woman by the way, who was present, asked for the privilege of making a five-minute speech. She admitted that I had correctly represented the Discipline, but endeavored to divert attention therefrom by saying "Joe Smith went to Canada and taught polygamy there and brought several wives away with him." She said she knew because she was from Canada. After she had taken her seat I asked her how long ago that had been and she answered, "Forty years." The audience saw the point. I had no occasion to go farther.

We had a good crowd of outsiders. Many expressed pleasure. The preaching was by R. Bullard, C. E. Crumley, L. Hemmingway, Nat Carmichael, and the writer. We were signally blessed in some of the services.

The whole trend of the Spirit teaching was for growth, development, enlargement, expansion. We must look ahead, not back. Leeks and onions are synonyms for bondage. Manna stands for liberty and progress. We must forsake the leeks and onions of the world to-day and God will give us manna. Too many of us like the onions best.

Effectual work was done by the Sunday school, Religio, and Daughters of Zion. The few sisters who were interested in the Daughters of Zion work were well nigh disheartened because of the opposition which has existed; so many not understanding the movement and by adverse criticism retarding its progress. All the sisters did nobly. The papers were excellent, some of which should find place in the columns of the HERALD. A stirring series of resolutions were unanimously adopted calling upon state and national legislatures to provide for sex education in the public schools and likewise the suppression of the white slave traffic now so prevalent in all the large cities of the world. There is a bright future for the organization if all will fall in line and work.

The resolutions were as follows:

"Whereas the home is the true citadel of the nation, the bulwark of civilization, and the nucleus of mind and soul culture, and

"Whereas there is now in existence a well organized white slave traffic in all the large cities of the world, where ignorant and innocent girls are lured for immoral purposes to their fall and ruin; sold into perpetual slavery that fiends incarnate may flourish off the revenue of their degradation, and

"Whereas purity of life and purpose are essential to civic righteousness, the well-being of the individual and the preservation of society, and

"Whereas we believe that legal steps should be taken to enlighten the young and likewise to abolish this menace to virtue and civilization, therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the ministry and membership of the Southern California District of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints in conference assembled, herewith petition the state legislature of the State of California and the Senate and House of Representatives of these United States to provide such legislation as will furnish suitable sex education in our public schools and likewise the abolishment of this traffic in girls now prevailing throughout the United States."

Surely this latter-day work is a marvel and a wonder. It is a profound mystery to the many. Some of us have scarcely sensed its magnitude and its power. Its all sufficiency, its all inclusiveness charms me. Its field is the world; its service the good of all; its power love.

With redoubled diligence we move out for another year of active self-sacrifice and self-effacement, to live and work for the common good.

Your brother in Christ,
T. W. WILLIAMS.

1307 WEST FORTY-FIFTH STREET.

DALBY SPRINGS, TEXAS, August 30, 1909.

Editors Herald: A few lines from Eastern Oklahoma District, which comprises northeastern Texas, western Arkansas, and eastern Oklahoma. After General Conference I took a trip through eastern Oklahoma, doing my first preaching at Fanshawe, where I baptized the first people there. About six years ago, the first night I preached in the little town, I went to a little schoolhouse with Bro. O. C. Brannon. The grass was growing up around the house and it looked like the owls and bats were making this their habitation; so I began to think I would not make much effort there. That night the Lord made known to me in a vision that he had some noble people there. I went to work by the help of the Lord to bring them out of Babylon. The result of my labor was that I baptized about seventeen good people, among them Doctor Lewis, the physician of the town, and C. E. Goss, who is now preaching the gospel and who is a very fine man indeed. Now there is a branch of forty members. They continued to worship in the little schoolhouse until this summer, when they were driven out by the powers that be.

Last summer Bro. Hubert Case was called upon to meet a freewill Baptist preacher in debate. The Lord blessed Brother Case with such a complete victory that the Devil saw he could not meet truth, and so, as in the days of old, they must be driven out. Now the Saints are trying to build a church and may God bless them in their efforts. I trust all who can will help them a little.

After laboring about five weeks in eastern Oklahoma, I returned home for a few days to do some preaching near Wilburton, and meet with Bro. Lee Quick, missionary in charge of the district. He did a week's fine preaching in Wilburton, and built up the Saints in the faith. It makes my heart rejoice to form the acquaintance of so noble a man as Brother Quick. We attended district conference at Haileyville, Oklahoma, on July 29. From there I started for eastern Texas, and held a meeting near my old home. Bro. P. B. Bussell assisted me, and we had a good meeting, baptizing four. Bro. Fine Thompson and his son George are still there, and Bro. Naith Marshbanks. They are doing all they can to hold up the gospel flag and are building themselves a nice little church.

Bro. P. B. Bussell and myself came from Manchester to this place and began a meeting on the 21st. The Baptists started up a meeting within a mile and a half of ours, but we have had good crowds all the time, and the interest has been increasing. On the 28th I was permitted to lead ten noble people into the waters of baptism, four men, four women, and two young ladies. There are several others near the water's edge, and the people are stirred up all over the country. On Sunday, the 29th, we administered the Lord's supper to the Saints, and held prayer meeting, and indeed we had a grand outpouring of God's Holy Spirit in the gifts of the gospel. Bro. V. L. Lumb, of Wilburton, was with us and rendered valuable assistance in the meetings. He was ordained July 30, to the office of elder, and he is going to be a fine worker in the church.

Bro. Will Calley lives near this place, and his life has been so good that his neighbors have been led to think that he has something better than they have. He and Sister Wages have been battling it alone in this community, but, thank the Lord, they will now have some others to help them.

To-night we began a meeting at Cedar Creek, where Bro. William Aylor and P. B. Bussell held a fine meeting last fall, baptizing three, and left a good interest. We hope to gather in some more.

I go from here to Oklahoma to hold some meetings. There is a great demand for preaching. How badly we need workers in the field! Our future is bright if we will only live for it, and may the Lord bless his work in every part of the world.

How sad my heart was made when I read of the death of our noble Bro. Alexander Smith, but, thank the Lord, a bright crown awaits him.

Asking an interest in the prayers of all who read this letter,
E. A. ERWIN.

KEWANEE, ILLINOIS, August 28, 1909.

Dear Herald: Please permit me to submit to your many readers a few extracts from some letters. The subject of these letters are mother and daughter who, though thousands of miles apart, yet are in very close touch with each other. Call it telepathy, psychology, or whatever you please, it has often been when either was in trouble that the other would receive evidence of it beforehand, or at the time.

"Dear Mamma: Your last letter received and fully appreciated. I was not at all surprised, but understood the spirit that prompted your pen all the way through. I am glad to note the cheerful tone of your letters, and though it doesn't blind me to your trials, it shows me that you are gaining in courage, and that helps to strengthen my faith, for I have earnestly prayed the Lord to show you the silver lining behind the clouds, and help you to see his hand in your trials.

"I seem to be walking through the valley of the shadow of death, and were it not for a mother's anxieties for her children I would go down. However, I have the promise in my patriarchal blessing that if I am faithful He will assist and aid me in having my heart's desire, that I may be able to make my calling and election sure, and 'If He be for us, who can be against us?'

"About six months ago I was dreaming of you and papa, and passed again through the grief of losing him, and in my dream I said, 'Now, when mamma is gone, I won't have a friend on earth,' and I woke up crying like my heart would break. I pray also that our Savior will help us all up, for we have none to spare.

"I believe the vision you had of the Lord was real; not that he came to earth to visit you, but that the mists were cleared away so that you could see him in the realms above. While lying here in my room, trying to regain my strength, many beautiful thoughts have come to me. I wish I could write them all to you, for I know you could drink them all in, where no one else would. I have often wondered why we were left alone to wander through such darkness here in this world, and long for the day when we shall know each other better, and thoughts come to me like this: that our earth and many other planets are whirling through a strong current of darkness, lighted by suns which affect only our physical beings, and above this dark current is light, where planets move through eternal day. This is why the spirit, in leaving the body, has to cross the dark river; and the thought also came, that we received our mental light from the eternal light, but because of the darkness through which we are passing, we only 'see in part, we know in part, but when that which is perfect is come, that which is in part will be done away,' and our earth will roll out of its dark path into the glorious light above.

"I wish we were near enough to each other to have a good talk sometimes, but it don't do to get my mind off home duties too often, they carry me too far away."

The vision mentioned above was a beautiful dream. Sometime in the night of July 12, 1909, I woke up under the influence of the most beautiful dream I ever had, although I have been blessed wonderfully with spiritual dreams. I thought in my dream that I was attending a reunion of the Saints somewhere, and was in company with Sr. F. C. Smith. Something called our attention, and as we looked up there a very little north of the direct east, we saw the Savior standing in the crimson clouds of heaven, a most magnificent sight to behold, far beyond my powers to describe. From the horizon, far up and beyond the zenith, and far around on both sides, north and south, the clouds were deep red. The outer edges grew to a mellow pink, from the edges toward the center they grew deeper and deeper to a dark crimson, and in the center stood our blessed Lord, against whom there was not a single charge, perfect, majestic. He seemed to stand out a little from the cloud, a little nearer to us, his head slightly bent, and his hands and arms extended towards the earth in a pleading posture. The scriptural quotation came to my mind: "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." My feelings to go to him were so intense that I started to go, but he receded into the clouds, and long after he was out of sight, the glory remained in the clouds, but gradually grew smaller until it was a mere speck, where our Lord stood, and finally all disappeared. I woke up with a feeling in my heart and a prayer on my lips that I might leave nothing undone to hinder me from going to Him who gave his life for the world, and that I might see the Lord always before my face, and I wished in my soul that all the Saints might see him and feel the power of his great love for all mankind, the workmanship of his own hands.

"Dear Mamma: I have been afraid since sending you my last letter that you would get worried and think I was awful sick, which, of course I am not; but I feel so completely worn out with everything that it amounts to about the same thing. . . . I think so much about your dream of the Savior in the clouds. I wonder when you dreamed that?

"One night, the latter part of June, I think it was, I went to bed between eight and nine feeling so worn out, and after lying down, I felt the spiritual body lift partly out of the natural body, so I could distinguish between the two, and I spoke of it to several. When you wrote your dream, I could not help connecting the two together. Sr. and Bro. F. M. Smith were here to see me and Brother Fred administered to me. I believe he was prompted by the Spirit. . . . I am too tired to write more this time."

Dear Saints I ask an interest in your prayers for my darling child. She has two little boys, and six little girls to lead to the arms of Jesus. One has gone on before.

Your sister in gospel bonds,
BETTIE BELLE SMITH.

DES MOINES, IOWA, September 13, 1909.

Dear Herald: We have been interested in a study of what has been said concerning the Mormons. We have made use of the city library and make note of what we have found.

The Encyclopædia Britannica, volume 16, in its article on the "Mormons," the historical matter given fills ten pages of typewritten matter, the date of this work being 1892.

The Encyclopædia Americana, bearing date of 1903, volume 10, article on "Mormons," gives historical matter sufficient to fill four pages of typewritten manuscript. This article is marked as being revised by Joseph F. Smith, of the Presidency of the Church of Latter Day Saints, and also refers to the article, "Latter Day Saints, Reorganized Church."

A Standard Dictionary of the English Language, 1895, one page of typewritten matter is given defining the word Mormon and all the derivatives therefrom.

The Encyclopedic Dictionary, 1894, two pages of typewritten matter defining the word Mormon.

The Century Dictionary and Cyclopedic, 1897, four pages of typewritten matter.

Johnson's Universal Cyclopedic, 1894, five pages of historical matter on the Mormons.

The New International Cyclopedic, 1903, sixteen pages in the article on the Mormons. We quote what this article has to say under the head of "Bibliography." "The four chief collections of Mormoniana in America are: The Church Archives at Salt Lake City; Government Publications at Washington; The Berrian Collection, New York Public Library, rich in first editions and rare publications of the early church; the collection of the State Historical Society of Wisconsin, at Madison, which includes the unique private collection of Mr. A. T. Schroeder, late of Salt Lake City, Mormon periodicals: Deseret News (Salt Lake City, 1852-1887); Elders' Journal (Kirtland, Ohio, and Far West, Missouri, 1837-1839); Evening and Morning Star (Independence, Missouri, and Kirtland, Ohio, 1832-1834); Journal of Discourses, and the church leaders, Liverpool, (1854-56); Latter Day Saints' Messenger and Advocate, (Kirtland, Ohio, 1834-37); Latter Day Saints' Millennial Star, (Liverpool, 1840); Times and Seasons, (Nauvoo, Illinois, 1834-45; vol. 3, edition by Smith; early files suppressed by Brigham Young). Pro-Mormon works: Bancroft, History of Utah, (San Francisco, 1890); Handbook of Reference to History, etc., (Salt Lake City, 1882); Joseph Smith, Book of Commandments, (Zion, Jackson, Missouri, 1833, exceedingly rare; Salt Lake Tribune, (reprint, 1884); Book of Mormon, first edition, (Palmyra, New York, 1830), second edition equally rare, (Kirtland, Ohio, 1835); The Pearl of Great Price (selections from the writings of Smith, Salt Lake City, 1891); Lucy Smith, biographical sketches of Joseph Smith and his progenitors, (by the mother of the Prophet; suppressed by Brigham Young; Liverpool, 1853, and Plano, Illinois, 1886); Joseph Smith, Third, and Heman C. Smith, History of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, (from the standpoint of the Reorganized Church, Lamoni, Iowa, 1901); Thompson, Evidences in proof of the "Book of Mormon" (suppressed by Brigham Young; Batavia, New York, 1841); Tullidge, History of Salt Lake City, (1886); Whitmer, An Address to All Believers, (written by a primitive, non-polygamous Mormon, Richmond, Missouri, 1887). Anti-Mormon works: Ferris, Utah and the Mormons, New York, 1854); Gunnison. The Mormons, description of army life in Utah by an officer, (Philadelphia, 1856); Howe, Mormonism Unveiled, earliest first hand information against Smith; very rare; (Painesville, Ohio, 1834); Hyde, Mormonism; Its Leaders and Designs, the confession of an apostate, (New York, 1857); Linn, the Story of the Mormons, the most complete and exhaustive story of the Mormons, (New York, 1902); Riley, The Founder of Mormonism, (a psychological study of Joseph Smith, jr., New York, 1902); Stenhouse, The Rocky Mountain Saints, a vivid portrayal by an ex-Mormon, (London, 1870); Tucker, The Origin, Rise and Progress of Mormonism, (the exposure of a fellow-townsmen of Smith, New York, 1867); Utah Commission, (Government Reports under the Edmunds Law, Washington.)

The New Standard Encyclopedia, 1907, article on the "Mormons," four pages of typewritten matter, written by Lorenzo Snow.

The Encyclopedia Americana, 1903, article "Latter Day Saints." The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ, (anti-polygamists). This article of four pages of typewritten matter is by Heman C. Smith, Church Historian, by H. H. Smith.

We have copied these articles on the Mormons from the eight different encyclopedias, making fifty pages of typewritten matter, and filed with the Church Historian. They are certainly a full, complete, and exhaustive study of the work of the unlettered boy who introduced the work which has stirred the world.

The list of publications on the subject of the "Mormons," quoted from the New International Encyclopedia, is perhaps exhaustive. We do not suppose that the Reorganized Church, as a body, or the individual members have all of the works mentioned.

Through our efforts in the literature department four years ago, we obtained from Sr. Lucinda Murdock, of Liscomb, Iowa, a copy of the first edition of the Book of Mormon, the volume mentioned above as being "very rare." This old volume was placed in the hands of the Church Historian.

Yours in the interest of history,

A. A. REAMS.

Is It Necessary to Delay Opening the Sanitarium?

Is it necessary that the Sanitarium with its sixty-five rooms be furnished very complete in all of its apartments before it can be opened?

Is it necessary that this be done and a full corps of officials, consisting of superintendent, care-takers, engineers, house-keepers, helpers, nurses, and assistants be employed before the institution can be set going for the service for which it was intended?

Is it necessary to wait an indefinite time for all this equipment and the formal opening with music, flowers, speeches, banquet, etc., before a single sufferer can enter for care and treatment?

We have seen the origin and growth of several institutions of this kind in our home city, all of which have made a splendid growth, but had a very modest beginning.

The Christian Home started with one little waif left on the doorstep of the home of the late Rev. J. G. Lenion. It has grown until now it has four large brick buildings and several smaller ones well equipped, and caring for several hundred of all ages, many crippled and infirm.

The Jennie Edmunson Hospital started in the old residence of Dr. M. C. Mohn and was conducted on a very modest plan for a number of years until endowed by Mr. J. D. Edmunson. It now has large and commodious quarters on East Pierce street.

Saint Bernard's Hospital or sanitarium started in the same way, beginning business in the old residence of Mr. John Hawthorne, containing about fifteen rooms. It has grown to very large proportions.

It seems to us that the Lord intended that we should build a modest building and begin business in a like modest manner, as those herein referred to. Our institutions should be launched so they can grow up with us and so that we are not continually overreaching to get up to them. In the light of what has been stated regarding the institutions of our home city we must admit that the children of this world are wiser in this generation than the children of the kingdom.

The report of committee made to the late General Conference was to the effect that the Sanitarium was completed, fixtures contracted for, and furnishing had begun. Now let us go to and open the institution, for the purpose for which it was erected, beginning with what we have furnished, and grow into it as necessity demands, and may the Lord add his blessing and come to the suffering Saints in such healing power, that the Emmanuel movement will not be considered as even incidental to it, is the desire of your brother in the gospel. Why not make a special call for an opening contribution?

C. A. RILEY.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA.

Seattle Reunion.

"Among the beautiful pictures that hang on memory's wall," the one of the Saints' reunion at Alki Point, Seattle, occupies a prominent place. Though it lingers only in memory, who can measure its far-reaching influence? If we who had the privilege of attending are not a wiser, better, and happier people than before, it must be because we fail to improve the opportunities afforded all. Not often is it the good fortune of some of us to hear the grand truths of the gospel presented in such varied, forceful, and pleasing ways by able and eminent speakers. With some of them we have felt acquainted for years, though never before having met them.

It is truly gratifying to find him whom we regarded as a shepherd of the flock so broad and deep of intellect and soul and so full of that sweet spirit of charity that recognizes all men as brothers and who is able to go in and out of the fold and find pasture. One pleasing feature was a visit from our circus Saints from Ringling Brothers' circus, Brother Turnour, Brother and Sister Clark, and Brn. John and Olie Washicheck. The latter are two bright, promising young men, converts of Brother Turnour, who were baptized during the reunion. How glad we are that the good seed is being sown beside all waters, and the true leaven that expands and elevates the soul is working even in the circus. The Lord added twenty to the church during and immediately following the reunion. Bro. Hale Smith delivered two very interesting and instructive lectures at the Labor Temple on the Sunday following the reunion, proving conclusively by scriptural, historical, and archæological evidence that God has not left himself without a witness. Even the stones are crying out in defense of the word, and truth is springing out of the earth in both the old and the new world to corroborate that which is written in both the Bible and the Book of Mormon. Brother White gave us another characteristic sermon last Sunday night, before departing for the East.

We feel grateful for the refreshing times we have had, for the pleasures of meeting with old friends and new, that our prayers have been answered, and hope to be able to show our gratitude to the Giver of all good by better service, more faith, unity, and love.

Our beloved Sister Johnson is suffering greatly at the time of this writing. We earnestly solicit the prayers of all the Saints in her behalf. Sister Kinghom is in the Miners' Hospital, having undergone a surgical operation. Others of our sick are improving.

Services to-day were conducted by our presiding elder, D. W. Davis, assisted by Bro. Arthur Gorbutt.

Eastern Iowa and Kewanee Reunion.

It has been one month since the reunion of the Eastern Iowa and Kewanee districts began. We have thought that some one would send in a report of same, but have seen none. This was the first reunion held in this district and we feel that some record should be made of it. We shall try to tell how things appeared to us and of the good we received and hope that it may be a means of encouragement to others.

The committee to arrange for the reunion consisted of Brn. W. E. Turner, J. B. Wildermuth, and C. G. Dykes, of Eastern Iowa, and Brn. O. H. Bailey, Amos Berve, and J. W. Peterson for the Kewanee District. All of these brethren were at the reunion except Bro. Peterson. Besides these there were many of the local ministry. There were also Brn. E. L. Kelley, J. W. Wight, O. E. Sade, G. J. Brookover, and James McKiernan. There were others we do not recall at present.

Prospect Park, Moline, Illinois, was the place selected for the reunion. It was away from the noise and bustle of the city, in a quiet place. On one hill was a large amphitheater where the services were held. On the hill opposite was the city of tents, there being thirty-five tents. In the valley between was the dining hall where meals were served to those who wished. The scenery all around was such as to inspire one with a love for nature and for nature's God. Mr. Freed, the gentleman who has charge of the grounds, treated us royally. He was ready to lend a helping hand in every way, and was always so kind, good-natured, and smiling, and had a cheerful word for everyone, that made us feel at home. This counted for a great deal.

The day before the reunion was to begin there was a great Sunday school rally in Moline, and then picnic dinners at the park. On account of this the committee were unable to put up any tents until Friday.

From the time the reunion was planned difficulties presented themselves and had to be met by the committee. There was much to try them and the Saints who had gathered there. Brother Wight was very sick and we heard of Brother Alexander's serious sickness. It was rather a sad time. On Saturday morning we were asked to meet in fasting and prayer, and the Lord surely met with us. In the afternoon we were to meet for organization. While some were discussing the advisability of putting Brother Wight, who was a very sick man, in charge of the reunion, that party walked in and there was great rejoicing. Many fervent prayers had been offered for him at the morning prayer service and the Spirit had said that he would be there to give us the benefit of his counsel and labors.

During the day we had heard of Brother Alexander's death. Our hearts were made sad. How we had planned that he would be there to comfort and bless us by his work as Patriarch, and as one whose life was given to the service of others. God had planned otherwise. He had entered into rest and the church was left to mourn. We all miss him and we pray God to comfort the members of his family as he alone can do.

The order of the reunion was as follows: At 8.30 a. m. normal work; then prayer service, and preaching or normal work again. In the afternoon, preaching, sometimes a priesthood meeting, and round table. In the evening, preaching. Sr. Etzenhouser had charge of the normal work and her work was certainly an inspiration to try to know more of God's work and his laws. We can not go into details in regard to all of the work but there are some things in regard to the spiritual part of the reunion we wish to mention. That is the important side. We can say this. The preaching services proved to us the truthfulness of the claims we make of divine inspiration. The Lord was truly with his servants, giving us food for our spiritual natures. In the prayer services we were greatly blessed. God was true to his promise and we only wish that all had done as we were urged so many times by the Spirit to do. There is this one thought that is impressed upon my mind so much and it is that we should prepare ourselves for God's blessing. God wanted us to fast and pray; we were told over and over to do this, and to prepare ourselves and we would receive blessings such as we had not experienced. We are to fast and pray, not to remind God of the promise made or to bring him to us, but, dear Saints, we are to do it to get ourselves in a condition that he can bless us, and to bring us to him. While there was so much to make us rejoice there was this to make us sad. We hope that we may learn to prepare and I do wish to urge upon all to use the blessings that they receive during these meetings and retain that Spirit that will help us to make better preparation for our next reunion, and if we do this we can not fail to be blessed. There are heights to reach which we have not attained, there is a glory and power of which we have but a faint conception. May we work and labor for the highest and best.

We must speak of the conduct of the young people. As a rule we feel that they are to be commended for their attendance at the services, and their good behavior and the interest they showed in the work. Of course there were exceptions, but we feel that it was thoughtlessness and lack of wisdom.

There were those who went away from those meetings feeling that God had been very near. I can say that I have never felt the power and influence of God's Spirit as I felt it there. I felt that we had been together in heavenly places. I know that there was a strength given me that I had never had before. This work opened up to me as it never had in the past. I saw how each part of the body of Christ had its work to perform, and how if each one did the work he was called upon to do, the work would move on till all was accomplished. We want a part in this, we do not want to be cast out as one who did not do the necessary work in the hour of preparation.

At the young peoples' meeting which was at 6.30 a. m. the last Sunday morning, there were many great blessings received and promises given that were cheering and strengthening. There were also warnings given. God, who knows the temptations, the trials, that his people have to meet, especially those who are young in years, and in his service, does not leave them to press forward blindly, but warns them of the dangers.

God's Spirit gives life and we feel that we have more abundant life since attending these meetings. Not simply at the reunion did we feel God's Spirit with us, but since returning to our work we have felt that God was near and have seen the fulfillment of some of his promises made by the Spirit.

Let us, dear Saints, begin now to prepare ourselves for the next reunion, for surely after this one being a success financially and spiritually, there will be continuation. We feel that a reunion each year will be of great strength if we meet in the right way, and it will be a means of preparation for that grand reunion when we will meet and will not have to break up camp and part as we did here. May the Lord bless the committee who worked so faithfully to help us have a successful reunion.

Brother Kelley was there to teach us in regard to the temporal law, and let us remember that only by obedience to it can we realize to the full extent the blessings pertaining to the spiritual part of God's kingdom. All must work together; and by obedience to every part of God's law we will be able to gain an entrance into his kingdom. Let us consecrate our time and our service to God's work and we will be given blessings which we now are not able to comprehend.

Yours in favor of another reunion,
NETTIE I. HEAVENER.

Florida Reunion.

A reunion of the Florida District was held at Santa Rosa, Florida, commencing on Saturday, August 21, 1909.

At ten o'clock on Saturday Bro. W. A. West called the meeting to order and the following officers were elected: T. C. Kelley, chairman; O. O. Simmons, secretary; N. L. Booker, chorister; Bessie West, organist; W. M. Hawkins and J. G. Ellis, ushers; the chairman was authorized to appoint the speakers. Sunday, August 22, regular Sunday school service was held, preaching at 11 o'clock a. m., after which dinner was served on the ground. Preaching again at 3 p. m. and at 7.30 p. m. During the following week the Saints met at 9 a. m., for prayer service, and preaching services regularly at 11 a. m. and at 7.30 p. m., except on Friday, August 27, when an entertainment by the Sunday school took the place of the evening preaching. The reunion closed with the preaching at 3 p. m. on Sunday, August 29. The visiting brothers and sisters from Mississippi aided very much.

Northwestern Oklahoma Reunion.

The first reunion of the Northwestern District of Oklahoma convened here at the time appointed, with F. C. Curtis, Hubert Case, and A. M. Chase as chief speakers. Though the attendance of Saints throughout the district was small, we feel that all were much strengthened and encouraged by the preaching and prayer services, the Spirit being present to a marked degree. The afternoons were devoted to street services which proved to be a great success, and increased the attendance at our evening meetings. On the last Sunday baptismal services were held and two souls were added to the kingdom, Sisters Redmon and Mooney. In the sacrament and confirmation meeting immediately following the Saints were greatly blessed, the Lord assuring them of his approval, and promising success to the missionaries and guidance to the Saints in the year to come. Owing to the generosity of the Saints, the expenses of the reunion were provided for beforehand, thus dispensing with the unpleasant feature of collections. The reunion was voted to be held at Alva again next year.

Yours in gospel bonds,

News From Branches

ELK MILLS, MARYLAND.

I came here with Bro. U. W. Greene, to be present at the church opening on Sunday, September 12. Brother Greene preached the opening sermon. A large and attentive audience listened as he in a forceful way portrayed to them some of the faith of the Latter Day Saints. He took as a text that passage of Scripture well known to us all, "My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me. If any man shall do his will he shall know of the doctrine," and logically showed why we were different from other faiths. Bishop Zimmermann offered the dedicatory prayer, the Spirit being felt to a marked degree as the brother offered the house to the Lord to be used for his work and then asked the direction of God's Spirit to be with the people as they worshiped there and endeavored to teach their children.

In the afternoon U. W. Greene spoke to the Little Elk tribe of red men, a society in the southern country. He spoke to them on the origin of the true red man. The church was comfortably filled and much appreciation was shown by members of the order. There was preaching again in the evening.

By dint of much sacrifice and hard work the Saints here have built a nice chapel, forty feet by twenty-six feet, and when completed with furnace and other necessities it will have cost about eighteen hundred dollars. The Saints here by their right living have gained the respect of the public. The town is small, its principal industry being mills. There is one other church, the Methodist. The field for missionary work is large and the prospect good. There are several small places not far from here which we propose to try to open up. There are only two branches in this State, one being organized at Sidletree by Brother Greene. Brother Greene leaves for Washington, D. C., Thursday to look after the interests of the work there.

CENTRAL CHICAGO.

Sunday, September 13. Cool and pleasant. Elder Pement occupied in the morning and Elder Allen in the evening.

Sr. George Warlick and her husband have returned from their eastern trip, having stopped at Niagara Falls a few days.

We are very glad to report a very pleasant time on our business trip to Frontenac, and only wish we could portray some of the beautiful sights. The Hotel Frontenac is located on an island about three miles in circumference and about two city blocks from the Saint Lawrence dock. We have often heard of the "Blue Saint Lawrence," and how often in the morning and also during the day the blue of the sky paled, when viewing the lovely expanse of water. The flowers on the islands are very varied and luxuriant, and some tourists have considered the Thousand Islands one of the beauty spots of the world. We took the trip through the islands Friday in a small launch, leaving shortly after three and not arriving at the hotel until nearly seven o'clock, and to say it was enjoyed exceedingly is putting it mildly. Some of the islands are very small, simply rocks extending above the water, others are just about large enough for a small cottage, some have been enlarged in order to build a home and have a nice yard, while others are large enough for a good sized farm. At one place the wall of rock extended sixty feet above us. One island was for sale at one hundred and twenty thousand dollars, containing a lovely home and a three hundred acre farm in connection. Some people have built lovely palaces, one costing a million dollars, which seems a lavish expenditure of money when the homes are only occupied about three months in the year. We left lovely Frontenac on Friday evening, arriving at Niagara Falls Saturday morning, and were very kindly entertained at the home of Bro. and Sr. George Landes. Saw the wonderful Falls, and took a ride on the Maid of the Mist, and also the famous "George ride," all grand and beautiful. Worshiped with the Saints on the New York side Sunday morning in a nice little brick church, Elder Frank Mesle expressing many good thoughts on the topic, "We must give an account of our doings before a just Judge."

Sunday, September 20. Brother Johnson, of Grant City, Missouri, and Bro. M. T. Chapman were visitors at the South Side in the morning, Elder J. Vanderwood occupying. Elder M. H. Bond discoursed in the evening. Many compliments regarding both sermons. Sister Bond was a visitor and a number of the West Side Saints favored us with their presence.

Elder Allen visited Elder F. G. Pitt on the 23d. He is sick at the home of his son Fred, at Maywood, 140 Twentieth avenue. He has typhoid fever, but the fever is broken, and he expects to be able to sit up the latter part of next week. He desires to say to his friends who have written him that this accounts for his not answering. We are quite sure that all the sick ones, yes, even those who are well and strong, desire the prayers of our brothers and sisters, that we may live in such a way that we may merit the Father's blessings.

Died.

THOMAS.—Mary Louisa Thomas was born May 20, 1854, at Warwick, Wisconsin. Her maiden name was Powell, daughter of Elder David Powell, formerly of Plano, Illinois. She was baptized by Elder F. G. Pitt, February 14, 1874, at Plano. She was married to J. B. Thomas in 1887. Died September 18, 1909, at Hutchinson, Kansas, with that dreadful disease, cancer, from which she suffered four years before death. She leaves husband, one daughter, and two sons to mourn their loss. A kinder wife and a better mother is not often seen. Funeral at the Saints' church, Norborne, Missouri, in charge of Elder J. N. Cato. Sermon by Elder W. M. Aylor. The remains were then taken to the New Hope Cemetery, eighteen miles northwest of Norborne, there to rest until the resurrection of the just.

Resolution of Condolence.

Whereas it pleased God to remove from earth life our dear and beloved Patriarch Alexander Hale Smith; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Saints and delegates of the Independence Stake in conference assembled, do hereby express to the family and relatives of the deceased, our condolence.

We recognize that a great man in Israel has fallen. Standing as he did, as the son of the martyred prophet, his life and work have been stamped indelibly upon the character of the church at large. Of him it has been fittingly said, "that a truer man never lived."

After a long life fraught with unique experiences, he has laid off the toils of earthly conflict and entered into the rest prepared for the people of God.

As a father to the church, he was a father indeed, and while we mourn our loss we rejoice in his gain, and bow to the divine will of the Eternal One; and pray that God will bless and console the bereaved ones in this their hour of trial.

May we emulate his godly life and fight the good fight and run the course and keep the faith until the end, as he did.

What the Baby Needs.

A baby must have a plentiful supply of pure, outdoor air. A baby can not thrive on poisoned air. It can not grow healthy and strong on air that has been breathed over and over again, that may have passed in and out of its own lungs half a dozen times. It simply poisons itself under such circumstances. The baby should have fresh air and plenty of it. You really can not give him too much fresh air. If he can live or sleep out doors, so much the better. The more nearly the quality of the air he breathes approaches that of the pure outside atmosphere, the stronger and healthier he will become. If you are afraid of a draught on your little one, then he must suffer because of your ignorance. Indeed, it is pitiful that a poor little innocent human mite must be deprived of that which is food and health and life, one may say because of a mother's or a father's gross ignorance. A draught has never hurt a baby and never will hurt one, and thousands, yes, I venture to say, millions of little ones have struggled and suffered and gasped solely from the want of life-giving oxygen. The circulation of a new-born baby is as a rule for better than your own. Although it is not advisable to expose it to cold, it should nevertheless be supplied with pure, outdoor air; no matter how young it may be. As long as the baby is kept warm, with a sufficient amount of clothing, there is not the slightest danger of catching cold. In fact, even if the body is not kept warm, if it is not overfed or the blood filled with poisons of various kinds, a cold can not possibly result.—Bernarr Macfadden, in Physical Culture for October.

It is written in a calm, argumentative manner, giving authorities for all the allegations the author makes, so that no offense is felt by a mason while reading it. The connection of Freemasonry with the Roman Catholic Church before the edict of excommunication by Pope Clement XII in 1738, shows the family relationship, and accounts for the similarity of practices and usages of both organizations.
 A Study in American Freemasonry, also contains reasons why Latter Day Saints should not affiliate with any oath-bound secret combination to get gain. I commend the book to those who are interested in the subject. Please mention SAINTS' HERALD when answering this advertisement.

Editorial

"THE BOSTON TRAVELER" AGAIN.

Some weeks ago an editorial writer for The Boston Traveler became greatly agitated over the report that certain Vermont officials were to cooperate with Reed Smoot in certain exercises at the dedication of a monument to the memory of Joseph Smith, at Sharon, Vermont.

Not knowing anything about "Mormonism" himself, he immediately turned to the American Cyclopaedia, book 11, page 834, and spent fifteen or twenty minutes in study, after which he felt prepared to give the history of Joseph Smith and the church that was founded under his administration. This came out in the form of an editorial, August 30. It attracted our attention first because he said that Joseph Smith was "brutally" ignorant, and he himself immediately proceeded to display gross ignorance upon the subject concerning which he wrote,—and it will be remembered that the schoolboy defined "gross ignorance" as "one hundred and forty-four times ordinary ignorance." Leading dates were wrongly stated; important events were assigned to a wrong locality; and what is infinitely worse, not one true statement concerning the character of Joseph Smith or his associates appeared in the entire article.

We gave this editorial a very brief notice, pointing out some of the prominent errors, and mailed a copy of the review to the editors with the following letter:

EDITOR OF The Boston Traveler,
Boston, Massachusetts.

Dear Sir: Enclosed you will find a clipping from the SAINTS' HERALD, September 8. Will you please convey it to the editorial writer who wrote an article on the work of Joseph Smith, as published in The Boston Traveler, August 30? We are surprised that a man so careless in his research, and so ignorant on the subject on which he is writing should be kept on the editorial staff of a paper like The Boston Traveler.

Sincerely yours,

HERALD EDITORS.

September 20 The Boston Traveler came out printing our private letter and a portion of our editorial as follows:

The editorial is full of blunders. For instance, the Traveler says he organized the Mormon church in 1833 in Ohio. It is a fact well known to most writers that he organized his church April 6, 1830, in New York State. The statement is also made that he started a bank in Kirtland, Ohio, and flooded the country with worthless bank notes for which he was tarred and feathered in 1832. The truth is that the bank was not started until January, 1837, nearly five years after the time when he and Sidney Rigdon were tarred and feathered. To cap the climax this ignorant beaneater says that Joseph Smith was killed at Carthage, Missouri.

There are so many blunders in the editorial that the fact is clearly shown that the writer knew nothing of the subject on which he wrote. Yet he calls Joseph Smith ignorant. We do not know what "brutal" illiteracy is, but it must include such mutilation of facts as we have noted.

The Traveler then continues:

We note in their quibble over dates that our critics refrain from any attempt to refute the historical fact that Mormonism was conceived in fraud, and is maintained even to this day in violation of the laws of the land, but as far as we know our dates are correct.

The American Cyclopaedia, book 11, page 834, says that "Smith and Rigdon in 1831 established a mill and store and set up a bank without charter," and proceeded to skin the farmers in the vicinity by "a flood of worthless notes," in consequence of which "a mob on the night of March 3, 1832, dragged the prophets from their beds and tarred and feathered them."

Regarding the establishment of the church, the Book of Mormon was published in 1830, but, according to all authorities, it was not until '33 that the first government of the church was organized, under Smith, Rigdon, and Williams. This statement is confirmed in the Encyclopædia Britannica, volume 16, page 852.

As for putting the killing of Smith at Carthage, Missouri, instead of Carthage, Illinois, we admit a typographical error, but the essential fact is that Smith was killed at Carthage on the date mentioned.

Mormonism, since its beginning, has been defiant of the law; it puts fealty to its priesthood above the law of the land, holding itself "to be the only legitimate power that has a right to rule on earth." The Mormon church has been in open rebellion against the government more than once. The bloody slaughter at the Meadow Brook massacre is yet remembered by men and women who are still in their prime. The Mormon hierarchy, not content with controlling Utah and Idaho, are reaching out to other States, and to-day Mormon missionaries are in every large eastern city and in Europe, attempting to make converts, special efforts being made to entrap the young, especially of the female sex.

Mormonism is a national menace equally threatening in its consequences to the East as to the West. It is only when the Mormon leaders, emboldened by their success in the West, attempt to work their way into the East that it becomes necessary to discuss them, and it is no doubt uncomfortable for these missionaries to have the facts as to the chicanery, fraud, and immorality which mark the beginnings of Mormonism made public, but they are true.

ORGANIZATION OF THE CHURCH.

It is not our desire to quibble over dates, but we made the argument (and it is a good one, so good that the editor carefully omits it from the report of our editorial) that those obvious blunders in regard to times and places show extreme carelessness on the part of the writer, as well as ignorance, and discredit all of his utterances on the subject concerning which he wrote. Grapes are not gathered from thorns nor truth from a blunderbus.

Let us examine the three errors that we first pointed out. In editorial number one, the Traveler stated that the "Mormon" or Latter Day Saint Church was organized in 1833. In editorial number two, they say that "all authorities" support them in that statement. Let us see how "all authorities" support this statement:

Bancroft, the well known historian, author of Native Races of the Pacific Slope, says:

The rise of the Church of Jesus Christ in these last days is on the 6th of April, 1830, at which date the church was organized under the provisions of the statutes of the State of New York by Joseph Smith, jr., Hyrum Smith, Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer, Samuel H. Smith, and Peter Whitmer.—History of Utah, page 65.

In History of All the Religious Denominations in the United States, by I. Daniel Rupp, page 407, we read:

On the 6th of April, 1830, the "Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints," was first organized.

Lieutenant Gunnison says:

The idea of founding a church with the new Seer as chief, does not, however, appear to have been entertained, until just before the printing of the Book of Mormon. This was issued in 1830. . . . On the 6th of April of this year, the church, out of the Gentiles, was organized.—The Mormons, page 100.

Thomas Gregg says:

The church was organized on the 6th day of April, 1830.—The Prophet of Palmyra, page 15.

Stenhouse says:

On Tuesday, April 6, 1830, the "Church of Christ" was organized in the house of Peter Whitmer, in Fayette, Seneca County, New York.—Rocky Mountain Saints, page 30.

Beadle says:

The year 1830 ranks as number one of the Mormon era. Early in the spring, the "Book of Mormon" appeared, and on the memorable 6th of April following, the Mormon church was organized near Manchester.—Mysteries and Crimes of Mormonism, page 32.

A similar statement is found on page 772, volume 3, of the History of our Country, by Edward S. Ellis. These are all non-Mormon authorities, and all support the statement made by Joseph Smith himself (who ought to be pretty good authority on this question) that the church was organized April 6, 1830, with himself and Oliver Cowdery as first elders. We have never seen a single authority that gave the date of its organization as 1833. In fact, long ere that date elders were prosecuting missions in all directions and important local churches and conferences were established in New York, Ohio, Missouri, Illinois, and other States. The Traveler was wrong on point one.

THE KIRTLAND BANK.

The second error pointed out was the statement that Smith and Rigdon flooded the country with worthless bank notes which aroused such indignation that they were tarred and feathered in 1832. This statement was absolutely false, as the Kirtland bank was not organized until some five years after that date. The records of the society that founded the bank show that the articles of association were adopted by a meeting held January 2, 1837. (See Church History, volume 2, page 90; also Journal of History, volume 2, number 4.)

The first notes ever issued by the bank were dated 1837. We print herewith a facsimile of note number 102, now in possession of the Presiding Bishop, Bro. E. L. Kelley. You will observe its date, January, 1837. According to the Traveler Joseph Smith had been tarred and feathered five years before on account of that note. There were other prophets in those days, evidently.

The facts are that when Smith and Rigdon were tarred and feathered in 1832 the bank had never been dreamed of. Their maltreatment was the result of religious prejudice. Of that occurrence Bancroft says:

On the night of the 25th of March, [1832], Smith and Rigdon were seized by a mob, composed partly of the Campbellites, Methodists, and Baptists of Hiram, twelve or fifteen being apostate Mormons. The captives were roughly treated, and expected to be killed; but after they had been stripped, beaten, and well covered with tar and feathers, they were released.—History of Utah, page 90.

Of the various church members figuring in that transaction the Saints were the only ones who had any cause to feel proud.

It is true that a financial institution commonly called the Kirtland bank was started by members of the church. It was started with honest motives. It failed in the financial crash of that period, as did hundreds of other banks controlled by members of other churches. The Saints left Ohio soon after. But after they settled in Missouri they caused Oliver Grainger to return to Ohio and settle in full with all creditors who would present claims. We are prepared to publish certificates from leading citizens of Ohio that the church obligations were honorably and fully settled. Some of these certificates may be found in Journal of History, volume 2, number 4.

THE DEATH OF JOSEPH SMITH.

Regarding the third error made by the Traveler, in stating that Joseph Smith was killed at Carthage, Missouri, the second editorial says, "we admit a typographical error, but the essential fact is that Smith was killed at Carthage on the date mentioned." There was no date mentioned, which shows that the writer can not even keep his own ideas straight.

There are two typographical errors in this editorial. In the first place the statement "Our dates are correct," should read, "Our dates are wrong." In the second, the statement, "We acknowledge a typographical error," should read, "an editorial blunder." It is not fair to lay the blame on the compositor. It does not become one who is engaged in the work of exposing fraud.

THE SOLOMON SPALDING ROMANCE THEORY.

The Traveler says:

We note that our critics refrain from any attempt to refute the historical fact that Mormonism was conceived in fraud.

The Traveler seems to feel grieved that we did not point out more errors. This we can soon correct.

We quote their statement:

The facts afterwards elicited were, that the manuscript [of the Book of Mormon] was written in 1812 as an historical romance by one Solomon Spalding, an insane preacher. Later it fell into the hands of an unscrupulous compositor named Sidney Rigdon, who copied it and gave it to Smith, who used it as a base of his fraudulent scripture.

This is just as false a statement as the one that the church was organized in 1833, or that the Kirtland bank existed in 1832, or that Joseph Smith was assassinated in Missouri.

The facts are that Sidney Rigdon at the time of the publication of the Book of Mormon was a well-known and respected preacher of the Christian or Campbellite persuasion, residing in Ohio, and never saw Joseph Smith or heard of the Book of Mormon until after the book was copyrighted and published.

The Solomon Spalding theory of the origin of the Book of Mormon has been abandoned by all intelligent and up-to-date opponents of Mormonism, and The Boston Traveler should qualify for that class ere it attempts to write on this question. D. H. Bays, one of the ablest opponents of "Mormonism," in his book entitled Doctrines and Dogmas of Mormonism, says:

The usual debater undertakes to trace the Book of Mormon to the Spalding romance through Sidney Rigdon.

Nothing can be more erroneous, and it will lead to almost certain defeat. The well-informed advocate of Mormonism wants no better amusement than to vanquish an opponent in discussion who takes this ground. The facts are all opposed to this view, and the defenders of the Mormon dogma have the facts well in hand. I speak from experience.—Page 22.

The Traveler should go faster or else quit traveling.

In 1839, L. L. Rice purchased from E. D. Howe, a former exposé of Mormonism and one of the fathers of the Spalding romance theory, the Painesville Telegraph, of Painesville, Ohio, with all the type, presses, books, and manuscripts belonging to the office. Years later, in connection with his friend, President Fairchild, of Oberlin College, while going through these old manuscripts, he found the original manuscript of the Spalding romance, bearing the signature and verification of E. D. Howe and others who had been interested in exposing "Mormonism." The manuscript was placed in the hands of President Fairchild, and is now in the library of Oberlin College, Ohio, where it may be viewed by anyone who chooses to take the trouble. It has been published in book form and the HERALD Editors will take pleasure in securing a copy of it for The Boston Traveler, if it is desired. It is about as much like the Book of Mormon as a mud turtle is like an eagle, and that is why Bays said that the facts were all opposed to the Solomon Spalding romance theory. The Traveler is as weak on facts as it is on dates, and loses out on point four.

THE THREE WITNESSES DID NOT RETRACT.

We next notice the following statement found in editorial number one:

Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer, and Martin Harris each made a sworn affidavit that an angel of God had shown them the plates from which the book was a translation. Before each of these men died they testified on their sacred oath that they committed perjury and that the entire proceedings were a fake.

This valuable information probably was gleaned from the musty pages of one of the encyclopedias referred to, and it is as false as the other four misstatements that we have examined, as we are prepared to prove.

David Whitmer, one of the best known of the three, died in Richmond, Missouri, in 1888. In 1887 he issued a pamphlet entitled, "An address to all believers in Christ," and we quote from page eight of that pamphlet a complete refutation of the statement made by the editorial writer of The Boston Traveler.

It is recorded in the American Cyclopaedia and the Encyclopædia Britannica, that I, David Whitmer, have denied my testimony as one of the three witnesses to the divinity of the Book of Mormon; and that the other two witnesses, Oliver Cowdery and Martin Harris, denied their testimony to that book. I will say once more to all mankind, that I have never at any time denied that testimony or any part thereof. I also testify to the world, that neither Oliver Cowdery or Martin Harris ever at any time denied their testimony. They both died reaffirming the truth of the divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon. I was present at the death bed of Oliver Cowdery, and his last words were, "Brother David, be true to your testimony of the Book of Mormon." He died here in Richmond, Missouri, on March 3, 1850. Many witnesses yet live in Richmond, who will testify to the truth of these facts, as well as to the good character of Oliver Cowdery.

"A PROCLAMATION.

"Unto all nations, kindred, tongues, and people, unto whom these presents shall come:

"It having been represented by one John Murphy, of Polo, Caldwell County, Missouri, that I, in a conversation with him last summer, denied my testimony as one of the three witnesses to the 'Book of Mormon.'

"To the end, therefore, that he may understand me now, if he did not then; and that the world may know the truth, I wish now, standing as it were, in the very sunset of life, and in the fear of God, once for all to make this public statement:

"That I have never at any time denied that testimony or any part thereof, which has so long since been published with that book, as one of three witnesses. Those who know me best, well know that I have always adhered to that testimony. And that no man may be misled or doubt my present views in regard to the same, I do again affirm the truth of all of my statements, as then made and published."

This testimony David Whitmer caused to be printed at his own expense and under his own supervision only a few months before his death, and scattered it broadcast to the world. In view of that fact what word shall we apply to the statement of the Traveler that he stated on his "sacred oath" that he had "committed perjury" and the "whole thing was a fake"?

It is true that all the three witnesses withdrew from the church because they differed from the leaders on questions of policy, but they did not deny their testimony regarding the Book of Mormon. All reiterated their testimony when close to the end of this life, further proof of which will be found in the article appearing in this issue under the heading, "The SAINTS' HERALD historical series."

The fact that they persisted in their testimony when entirely removed from the influence of Joseph Smith gives it added strength.

ORIGIN OF POLYGAMY.

The next statement that we notice is:

To justify his immoralities, in 1843 Smith produced another revelation, establishing and approving polygamy.

This is of the same character as the other statements that we have noticed. Joseph Smith did not give a revelation sanctioning polygamy in 1843 or at any other time. His teachings on the marriage question are found in the Book of Mormon, second chapter of the Book of Jacob, where it is said, "There shall not any man among you have save it be one wife: and concubines he shall have none." And also in the Book of Covenants, section 42, where it is said, "Thou shalt love thy wife with all thy heart, and shall cleave unto her and none else."

These words came direct from the pen of Joseph Smith, and we call for the production of a single sentence that ever came from his pen sanctioning polygamy.

It is true that eight years after his death Brigham Young brought forth such a document that he claimed had been given to Joseph Smith. That statement we challenge.

Here is something on this question a little more modern than the Encyclopædia Britannica. Senator Burrows was chairman of the committee on privileges and elections during the famous Reed Smoot case, and of a necessity went thoroughly into Mormon history, and especially into the question of the origin of polygamy, and in a speech made before the Senate of the United States, December 11, 1906, he gave the true origin of the revelation on polygamy. We quote from the Congressional Record.

In order to induce his followers more readily to accept this infamous doctrine, Brigham Young himself invoked the name of Joseph Smith, the martyr, whom many sincerely

ANOTHER DEFENSE GONE.

In the first chapter of the book of Ether in the Book of Mormon there is recorded the separation of the people of Jared and his brother from the tribes of men on the plains of Shinar at the time of the confusion and dispersion. It is there said that Jared asked his brother to go present their petition to God for direction. It is further recorded that God did wonderfully answer their cry. In the direction that God gave them they were told to gather together their flocks of every kind, and seed of every kind, and it is further written that the brother of Jared of 1830 on page 540, and has been repeated in every edition of the Book of Mormon except the "authorized edition," lately published and proof read from the original manuscript, where it will be read "thy family." Ether 1, page 716. When Orson Pratt, sr., made his references and annotations to the Book of Mormon he says in a footnote that "It seems that the brother of Jared had a plurality of families." But another error has been corrected, and with it another defense of polygamy is gone. One by one they fade away, as the light is turned on.—Walter W. Smith, in Sunday School Exponent, October 1, 1909.

 They were not confounded. And it came to pass that Jared spake again unto his brother saying Go to inquire of the Lord whether he will drive us out of the land & if he will drive us out of the land cry unto him whether shall we go & who knowe the Lord but the Lord will carry us forth into a land which is choice above all the earth & if it so be let us be faithful unto the Lord that we may receive for our inheritance. And it came to pass that the brother of Jared did cry unto the Lord according to that which had been spoken by the mouth of Jared. And it came to pass that the Lord did hear the brother of Jared & had compassion upon him & said unto him Go to & gather together thy flocks both male & female of every kind & also of the seed of the earth of every kind & thy family & also Jared thy brother & his family & also thy friends & their families & the friends of Jared & their families & when thou hast done this thou shalt go at the head of them down into the valley which is north ward & there will I meet thee & I will go before thee should gather his "families" and Jared should gather his family.

THE BOOK OF MORMON MANUSCRIPT

The entire manuscript is in the possession of Pres. Joseph Smith. Special attention is called to the last word in the ninth line, "family."

This would seem a very strange direction to be made to one so favored as the brother of Jared, and many have asked themselves, and often asked others why this should be recorded so. But an appeal to the original manuscript has relieved the situation materially, by the fact that in clear and bold hand it is written "thy family," so that it is clear that the brother of Jared had only one family, though that family did consist of twenty-two souls.

How this error crept into the Book of Mormon we are not informed. It occurs in the first edition

LITERAL TRANSLATION OF ISAIAH 29:14.

While in a bookstore in Saint Louis I was introduced to Rabbi Solomon S. Kohn, of 208 Soulard street. Mr. Kohn graduated as a rabbi in Europe, and is a graduate of Yale, having obtained the degrees of Ph. D., LL. D., and M. D. He is one of the faculty of the leading Jewish school in Saint Louis.

After a brief conversation in the bookstore we went to Rabbi Kohn's office where we continued our conversation. We were talking about the gospel. In the course of our two-hour intercourse Rabbi Kohn was reading the twenty-ninth chapter of the Prophet Isaiah in Hebrew and translating literally as he went along. I was following him in the same book by reading the King James' version in parallel columns. When he came to the fourteenth verse Rabbi Kohn translated it as follows: "Therefore, behold, Joseph, I will cause to work marvelous to this people, very wonderful, and they will lose the wisdom of their wise, and (the) understanding of (the men that) understand shall hide itself."

Upon investigation we found that the same Hebrew characters and words in the thirty-sixth chapter of Genesis, and elsewhere in the Bible that are translated "Joseph," are identical with the proper noun "Joseph" in Isaiah 29: 14. Rabbi Kohn can not understand why the translators of the English Bible should have omitted the name of Joseph in their work in this verse.

The book which I obtained from Mr. Kohn is the Hebrew and English Old Testament, published by the British and Foreign Bible Society at Vienna, Austria, in 1877, compiled by Myer Levi Leteris. Rabbi Kohn has translated and published our Declaration of Independence in ten languages. He suggested that I enter his class in Hebrew this fall, saying that I would be able to read the scriptures in the original before June 1, 1910. Before we parted the old gentleman gave me fifty-five cents and requested me to order the Book of Mormon with relative tracts sent to him. I have complied with his request and have a desire to study the Hebrew language.

Rabbi Kohn said the term Josephites is very fittingly applied to the members of our church.

THE SAINTS' HERALD HISTORICAL SERIES.

THE THREE WITNESSES. A CRITICAL EXAMINATION OF THEIR TESTIMONY FROM A LAWYER'S STANDPOINT. THEIR CHARACTER AND HISTORY. BY S. A. BURGESS, ATTORNEY AT LAW.

The time is past when we may have the privilege our fathers had of visiting and hearing the testimony of a living witness to the bringing forth of the Book of Mormon. We may each study traditional, biblical, and archæological evidences for ourselves. We may each receive a personal testimony of its divinity by putting the matter to a fair test. (Book of Mormon, p. 775, pars. 3-5); but as to the existence and character of the plates, their material and appearance, we are dependent on the testimony of those who were present when the book came forth. Eighty years have elapsed since the plates were seen, so that the evidence pro and con is not quite definitely known.

THEIR TESTIMONY.

Now what is the testimony that these men commonly referred to as the "three witnesses," give? It is found in the opening of the Book of Mormon as follows:

Be it known unto all nations, kindreds, tongues, and people, unto whom this work shall come, that we, through the grace of God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, have seen the plates which contain this record, which is a record of the people of Nephi, and also of the Lamanites, their brethren, and also of the people of Jared, who came from the tower of which hath been spoken; and we also know that they have been translated by the gift and power of God, for his voice hath declared it unto us; wherefore we know of a surety, that the work is true. And we also testify that we have seen the engravings which are upon the plates; that they have been shewn unto us by the power of God, and not of man. And we declare with words of soberness, that an angel of God came down from heaven, and he brought and laid before our eyes, that we beheld and saw the plates, and the engravings thereon; and we know that it is by the grace of God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, that we beheld and bear record that these things are true; and it is marvelous in our eyes, nevertheless, the voice of the Lord commanded us that we should bear record of it; wherefore, to be obedient unto the commandments of God, we bear testimony of these things. And we know that if we are faithful in Christ, we shall rid our garments of the blood of all men, and be found spotless before the judgment seat of Christ, and shall dwell with him eternally in the heavens. And the honor be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, which is one God. Amen.

OLIVER COWDERY.
DAVID WHITMER.
MARTIN HARRIS.

Their testimony as given above is also confirmed by Joseph Smith.

Not many days after the above commandment was given [section 15], we four; viz: Martin Harris, David Whitmer, Oliver Cowdery, and myself, agreed to retire into the woods, and try to obtain, by fervent and humble prayer, the fulfillment of the promises given in the revelation; that they should have a view of the plates, etc. We accordingly made choice of a piece of woods convenient to Mr. Whitmer's house, to which we retired, and having knelt down we began to pray in much faith, to Almighty God, to bestow upon us a realization of these promises. According to previous arrangements I commenced, by vocal prayer to our heavenly Father, and was followed by each of the rest in succession. We did not yet, however, obtain any answer, or manifestation of the divine favor in our behalf. We again observed the same order of prayer, each calling on and praying fervently to God in rotation; but with the same result as before. Upon this our second failure, Martin Harris proposed that he would withdraw himself from us, believing as he expressed himself that his presence was the cause of our not obtaining what we wished for. He accordingly withdrew from us, and we knelt down again, and had not been many minutes engaged in prayer, when presently we beheld a light above us in the air of exceeding brightness, and behold, an angel stood before us. In his hands he held the plates which we had been praying for these to have a view of. He turned over the leaves one by one, so that we could see them, and discover the engravings thereon distinctly. He addressed himself to David Whitmer, and said: "David, blessed is the Lord, and he that keeps his commandments." When immediately afterwards, we heard a voice from out of the bright light above us, saying, "These plates have been revealed by the power of God, and they have been translated by the power of God; the translation of them which you have seen is correct, and I command you to bear record of what you now see and hear."

I now left David and Oliver, and went in pursuit of Martin Harris, whom I found at a considerable distance, fervently engaged in prayer. He soon told me, however, that he had not yet prevailed with the Lord, and earnestly requested me to join him in prayer, that he also might realize the same blessings which we had just received. We accordingly joined in prayer, and ultimately obtained our desires, for before we had yet finished, the same vision was opened to our view; at least it was again to me, and I once more beheld, and heard the same things; whilst at the same moment Martin Harris cried out, apparently in ecstasy of joy, "'Tis enough; mine eyes have beheld," and jumping up he shouted, Hosanna, blessing God, and otherwise rejoiced exceedingly.

TESTIMONY OF THE EIGHT.

And this testimony is further confirmed by the testimony of eight other witnesses, as follows:

Be it known unto all nations, kindreds, tongues, and people, unto whom this work shall come, that Joseph Smith, jr., the translator of this work, has shown unto us the plates of which hath been spoken, which have the appearance of gold; and as many of the leaves as the said Smith has translated, we did handle with our hands; and we also saw the engravings thereon, all of which has the appearance of ancient work, and of curious workmanship. And this we bear record with words of soberness, that the said Smith has shown unto us, for we have seen and hefted, and know of a surety, that the said Smith has got the plates of which we have spoken. And we give our names unto the world, to witness unto the world that which we have seen; and we lie not, God bearing witness of it.

Thus we have twelve witnesses in all, twelve men testifying as to the one fact, the existence of the plates.

Here, however, we desire to take into more particular consideration the three witnesses. What is their character and credibility? Oliver Cowdery was a school-teacher in western New York, but acted as a scribe for Joseph Smith, jr., in translating the Book of Mormon. (Church History, vol. 1, p. 33.) He was baptized and ordained to the Aaronic priesthood, May 15, 1829, by Joseph Smith, jr., for whom he performed a like service. (Church History, vol. 1, p. 34.) In June, 1829, in the vicinity of Fayette,

OLIVER COWDERY.

New York, he was one of the three special witnesses to whom were shown the plates of the Book of Mormon (Church History, vol. 1, p. 46), and the same month he was called to the Melchisedec priesthood at the same time as Joseph Smith, jr. (Church History, vol. 1, p. 59.) He was also present at the first organization of the church, April 6, 1830, being one of the original six members. (Church History, vol. 1, p. 77.) Then by vote of the church he was accepted and ordained an elder. But shortly after this he severely criticised Joseph Smith, jr., on account of section 17: 7 of the Doctrine and Covenants as now published. (Church History, vol. 1, p. 113.) This matter was satisfactorily adjusted. He was present at the dedication of the Temple Lot, August 3, 1831 (Church History, vol. 1, p. 209), and also acted as missionary in Missouri and to the Indians. (Church History, vol. 1, p. 180.) In May, 1832, he was one of a committee to review and prepare the revelations for publication. (Church History, vol.

MARTIN HARRIS.

1, p. 249.) He was editor of the Star at Kirtland for a time (Church History, vol. 1, p. 372); also of the Messenger and Advocate (Church History, vol. 1, p. 515), and on February 17, 1834, he was chosen one of the first High Council. (Doctrine and Covenants, section 99; Church History, vol. 1, p. 432.) He with the other two witnesses, on February 14, 1835, chose the first Quorum of Twelve. (Church History, vol. 1, p. 541.) He was later elected president of the High Council (Church History, vol. 2, p. 6), and on April 3, 1836, in company with Joseph Smith, jr., he saw a vision in Kirtland Temple, in which the Lord Jesus Christ appeared to them, then Moses, Elias, and Elijah in turn. (Church History, vol. 2, p. 46.) In September, 1837, he was chosen assistant counselor to the First Presidency (Church History, vol. 2, p. 107); and also acted in other capacities in the church. In 1838, some difficulty arose between him and some other officials of the church, which resulted in his expulsion on April 12, 1838. (Church History, vol. 2, p. 150.)

We see from the above that he was a man closely associated with Joseph Smith, jr., in all the early history of the church, and was in a position to know the real facts in regard to the Book of Mormon and the early history. He repeated his testimony at various times in the years immediately following the vision of the angel and the plates. But even after he had left the church, we find no variation in his testimony in regard to the divinity of the Book of Mormon; though he then believed the church had gone astray. He was a man of sterling worth, and we may rest assured that it was not fear that held him steadfast, since we see how readily he criticised Joseph Smith, jr., in the matter of Hiram Page, and what is now section 17: 7 of Doctrine and Covenants; also in the matter which led to his separation from the church.

David Whitmer informs us that he was present with Oliver Cowdery at his deathbed, March 3, 1850, and that his last words were, "Brother David, be true to your testimony to the Book of Mormon." (Church History, vol. 1, pp. 49, 50; David Whitmer's Address, p. 8; Church History, vol. 4, pp. 446 to 449.) Also Hiram Page, in a letter to Dr. Warren Cowdery, informs him that he, too, was present at his deathbed and Oliver Cowdery said that any organization that does not agree with the order laid down in the Bible and the Book of Mormon in the gospel dispensation, is to be rejected; knowing that for us to support such errors would be opposing the order of God, and would be worshiping the man of sin. Among his last words, was to reaffirm his testimony to the Book of Mormon. (Church History, vol. 4, p. 515.)

Martin Harris was a man of business, of good standing, and assisted Joseph Smith, jr., in printing the Book of Mormon, although he informs us he lost nothing whatever by that work. (Church History, vol. 1, p. 52.) Mr. Harris was born May 18, 1783, Saratoga County, New York; moved to Palmyra about 1792, where he met Joseph Smith, jr., in 1827. (Church History, vol. 1, p. 18.) In February, 1828, he visited Doctor Mitchill and Professor Anthon with a transcript of the characters from the plates of the Book of Mormon. (Church History, vol. 1, p. 19.) After the plates were restored to Joseph, Mr. Harris acted as scribe from April to June, 1828. (Church History, vol. 1, p. 23.) He also was one of the three witnesses in June, 1829 (Church History, vol. 1, p. 46), as well as being one of the six original members of the church, April 6, 1830. (Church History, vol. 4, p. 108.) He was present at the dedication of the Temple Lot in Jackson County, Missouri, August, 1831, (Church History, vol. 1, p. 209,) and was also a member of the first church. (Doctrine and Covenants, section 99; Church History, vol. 1, p. 432.) He went on several missions during these early years, but in September, 1837, was objected to as a member of the High Council. (Church History, vol. 2, p. 108.) After the death of Joseph Smith, jr., Mr. Harris remained at Kirtland for a number of years, being associated with David Whitmer in a faction for a short time (Church History, vol. 3, pp. 79 to 82); but in 1870 he went to Utah, where he died, July 10, 1875. (Church History, vol. 4, p. 108.)

He is generally considered to have been disaffected and to have withdrawn from active relations with the church before the death of Joseph Smith, jr., but despite his disaffection, we find him time and again reaffirming his testimony, in 1853 to David B. Dille, at Kirtland, Ohio, again in letters to Mr. Emerson, November 23, 1870, and January, 1871. While Simon Smith states that he was present with Martin Harris during his last sickness about four days before his death, and says, "He (Martin Harris) certified to me that his testimony in connection with the Book of Mormon was true, and added: 'I tell you these things that you may tell others. I can not and dare not deny it lest the power of God consume me.'” (Church History, vol. 1, pp. 51 to 53.) Also Martin Harris, jr., in an obituary published in the Ogden Junction, says that his father always bore a “faithful and undeviating testimony to the divinity of the Book of Mormon, whether in Kirtland, in the midst of the wicked and ungodly, or in Utah.” Also, “He was in his happiest mood when he could get somebody to listen to his testimony, and he never appeared to get tired of talking about the coming forth of the Book of Mormon, and testifying to its truth. . . . His last audible words were something about the Book of Mormon and the three witnesses.”—Church History, vol. 4, pp. 108, 109. So we see that despite his disaffection, he still remained firm to his testimony even to the end.

DAVID WHITMER.

The third witness, David Whitmer, was also an early associate of Joseph Smith, jr., and was baptized in June, 1829, (Church History, vol. 1, p. 44.)

DAVID WHITMER.

about the time of the vision of the plates. (Church History, vol. 1, p. 46.) Considerable of the translation of the Book of Mormon was done in his father's house. (Church History, vol. 1, p. 42.) He went on various missions, and July 3, 1834, was elected president of the High Council of Zion in Clay County, Missouri. (Church History, vol. 1, p. 503.) But in 1837 he was arrayed with others against Joseph Smith, jr. (Church History, vol. 2, p. 101.) Although November 7, 1837, finds him elected as president of the Far West Branch, he was deposed from office the following February, (Church History, vol. 2, p. 142,) and expelled from the church the following April 13, 1838. (Church History, vol. 2, p. 150.) He became president of a small faction at Kirtland for a short time (Church History, vol. 3, p. 78 and following), but was unalterably opposed to polygamy and the church in Utah. (Church History, vol. 1, p. 55; “Address to all believers in Christ,” pp. 8, 9.) At the death of Oliver Cowdery he received from him the original manuscript of the Book of Mormon, which has the original printers' marks. (Church History, vol. 4, pp. 245 and 458; General Conference Minutes, p. 1129; Church History, vol. 4, pp. 446 to 448.) Orson Pratt with others visited him and told him simply to name his price for the manuscript, that the church in Utah had millions behind it, and were ready to pay him his price. He showed his sterling character in informing them that it was not for sale, not at any price, and that “there is not enough gold in the world to purchase them” from him. (Church History, vol. 4, p. 447.) After his death the manuscript was turned over by his heirs to Joseph Smith, President of the Reorganized Church. (General Conference Minutes, 1128.) Mr. Whitmer lived until January 25, 1888, (Church History, vol. 4, p. 587,) and so had a longer opportunity than the others of bearing his testimony. One of the encyclopedias printed that the three witnesses had denied their testimony. This caused Mr. Whitmer to come forth time and again in defense of his testimony and that of his associates, (Church History, vol. 1, pp. 54 to 58; vol. 4, pp. 361 to 371, 446 to 449, 587.) Although he had been disassociated from the church for nearly fifty years, and men went to him even in his last years to secure a denial from him of his testimony. (Church History, vol. 4, pp. 361, 447, 448; Kansas City Journal, June 5, 1881.) Without there being any possibility of anyone being able to disprove it, had he denied it, since he was the last of the whole twelve witnesses, still he remained unalterably, unchangeably firm to the end. He was visited time and again by men of the church and by others, but it was invariably to reaffirm his testimony. In March, 1881, he issued “An address to all believers in Christ” (Church History, vol. 4, p. 350), touching on the point of the denial of his testimony as one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon. Therein he said:

It having been represented by one John Murphy, of Polo, Caldwell County, Missouri, that I, in a conversation with him last summer, denied my testimony as one of the three witnesses to the “Book of Mormon.”

To the end, therefore, that he may understand me now, if he did not then; and that the world may know the truth, I wish now, standing as it were, in the very sunset of life, and in the fear of God, once for all to make this public statement:

That I have never at any time denied that testimony or any part thereof, which has so long since been published with that book, as one of the three witnesses. Those who know me best, well know that I have adhered to that testimony. And that no man may be misled or doubt my present views in regard to the same, I do again affirm the truth of all my statements, as then made and published.

“He that hath ear to hear, let him hear;” it was no delusion! What is written is written, and he that readeth let him understand.

To this statement there is attached the following, signed by twenty-two of the most representative citizens of that place:

We, the undersigned citizens of Richmond, Ray County, Missouri, where David Whitmer has resided since the year A. D. 1838, certify that we have been long and intimately acquainted with him and know him to be a man of the highest integrity, and of undoubted truth and veracity.

The Richmond Conservator, March 24, 1881, publishes the above statement, and the editor voluntarily adds:

There is no doubt that Mr. Whitmer, who was one of the three witnesses of the authenticity of the gold plates, from which he asserts Joseph Smith translated the Book of Mormon (a facsimile of the characters he now has in his possession with the original records), is firmly convinced of its divine origin. . . . Having resided here for near a half of a century, it is with no little pride that he points to his past record with the consciousness that he has done nothing derogatory to his character as a citizen and a believer in the Son of Mary.—Church History, vol. 1, pp. 56, 57.

NO ONE OF THE WITNESSES EVER RETRACTED.

Many other such testimonies could be given, but to avoid too great length we will close with the statement that on his deathbed, after asking the physician who attended him whether or not he was in his right mind, and securing an affirmative answer, "He then addressed himself to all around his bedside in these words, 'I want to say to you all, the Bible and the record of the Nephites (Book of Mormon) is true, so you can say you have heard me bear my testimony on my deathbed. God bless you all. My trust is in Christ for ever, worlds without end, Amen.'"

It is worthy of note that not one of the eight witnesses, nor Joseph Smith, jr., ever denied their testimony, though several of the eight witnesses also became disaffected.

None of these men seemed to fear or hesitate to denounce a wrong, whenever they believed one appeared. All were in a position to know whereof they spoke. Yet, having every reason to change their testimony, if it were not true, and such temptations as would have caused many men to change it, even though it were true, still one and all remained steadfast until death had sealed their testimony. All appear to have been honorable, truthful men, and a careful consideration at this time would modify some of the harsh statements made on both sides at the time of the difficulties in Missouri, when they separated from the church. Nothing has been shown affecting their credibility in any way, so far as we have been able to discover.

SUMMARY OF POINTS.

Now what was their testimony? 1. That they saw the plates, from which the book was translated. 2. They saw the engravings upon the plates. 3. These things were shown them by an angel. 4. They heard the voice of God declaring that the translation was by the power of God, and that by the grace of God and his power they beheld and bore record, a thing marvelous in their sight, as it would be in the eyes of all men, but nevertheless true. 5. That the voice of God commanded them that they bear record, wherefore to be obedient unto the commandments of God they bear this testimony. 6. That they now know the work is true. 7. That the plates have been translated by the power of God, for his voice hath declared it unto them. (Church History, vol. 1, pp. 47, 48.)

On all these points their testimony is confirmed by Joseph Smith, jr., and on the first and second points, as to the existence of the plates and the engravings thereon, their testimony is confirmed also by eight other witnesses, making twelve, in all.

The eight testify:

1. Joseph Smith had shown them the plates. 2. The plates had the appearance of gold. 3. They handled the plates, and particularly the leaves Joseph Smith had translated. 4. They saw the engravings thereon. 5. The engravings looked like ancient work. 6. They had not only seen, but had also hefted, and so knew the plates were material and real. (Church History, vol. 1, p. 48.)

Other points of explanation and description as to the size and appearance of the plates are proved by their oral and written testimony at other times and places to wit: The plates were about six by nine inches, and six inches thick, thin like tin, and attached together by a ring at the back, and that part of them were sealed. (Church History, vol. 1, pp. 50 to 52.)

OBJECTIONS.

But it is objected that the testimony agrees with that in the Doctrine and Covenants, regarding the character of the plates. Suppose that it did not agree? We think there would then exist much stronger objection. While it agrees in all the essential particulars, as we might expect, if true, the style and writing is such as to show that the statements in the Book of Mormon and those in the Doctrine and Covenants were not written by the same person, as the style is quite dissimilar, as must appear on examination.

The next objection is made that there should be but three witnesses (Book of Mormon, 150: 133, 134; 726: 2, 3; Doctrine and Covenants 4: 3), while in fact there were eleven besides the translator. A careful examination of the above statements will show that three special witnesses were foretold, also that the plates should not be generally shown, yet no statement prevents them from being shown to a few others at the command of the Lord. In fact the book itself says, "And there is none others which shall view it, save it be a few, according to the will of God, to bear testimony of his word unto the children of men."—Book of Mormon, 150: 134. "Save it be a few" is sufficient to justify the eight witnesses.

A few have claimed that the witnesses have denied their testimony, but on the most favorable view this seems to be a misunderstanding, or misrepresentsentation. There has not been a single instance where anyone of them denied or contradicted his testimony in any material point, but rather they reaffirmed it even in the face of death.

It is again objected that their testimony is not independent statements, but a joint draft. As to this, it will be noted that since all testified to the one event, for economy of space it was wisdom that they should all sign one statement. But many other times did they give their separate testimony, both orally and in writing, whether among friends or among those who desired to undo their work. (See citations above.)

A further objection is that the revelation of Martin Harris told him to lie. (Doctrine and Covenants 5:5.) A careful reading of this paragraph is all that is necessary to show this statement is not true, and the objection not well taken.

Another objection is that their testament does not speak of their seeing the Urim and Thummim, the Breastsplate, and other things as provided for in the Doctrine and Covenants. (Doctrine and Covenants 15:1.) This is true so far as the single statement in the Book of Mormon is concerned, since in it the only material features were those which related to the plates of that book. But in their individual testimony this objection is fairly met, since there they state they saw the other articles. Church History, vol. 1, p. 50; vol. 4, pp. 361, 370, 447.)

The only other explanation ever offered has been the Solomon Spalding Manuscript. But the presumptions are so numerous, there is so little evidence to sustain them, that even its principal defenders have admitted it will not stand examination. We are now told there were four Solomon Spalding manuscripts. Why four? Simply because their testimony is so contradictory that it would take that many different drafts to protect all the witnesses. Given the facts, that a man in a certain State, writing a manuscript, and another man enters the same State, they assume without evidence that (1) the manuscript is of a certain character; (2) that this manuscript is stolen; (3) that it was stolen by the second man. By making such presumptions as these, it would be easy to prove any man a criminal.

THE LOGIC OF THE SITUATION.

Affirmatively then, we have the unimpeached testimony of twelve men to the actual existence of the plates and the characters thereon. They are men who were in a position to know and of such characters as to be worthy of belief. Again, one who can say, "I saw," is worth more than a thousand who would say, "I did not see, and therefore, do not believe." In this case twelve men saw and handled. The most conservative conclusion we can make, is, that plates of that character were then in existence, and those plates had the appearance of gold, and on them were marks of ancient appearance; that four of these witnesses heard a voice or manifestation, which was not of themselves, and which they believed to be divine.

Ordinarily we would rest here, but some undertake arbitrarily to reject the evidence and say it is not according to earthly logic, nor in accordance with the rules of evidence. This we suggest is rather a confusion of terms. "Logic is the branch of philosophy that treats of forms of thinking in general, and more especially of inference and of scientific method."—Murry's Dictionary, vol. 6, p. 401. A form of thinking, a method of reasoning, which proves some part of truth, and utterly fails when used to test some other portion of truth, is fatally defective; if there is such a system. But usually the difficulty is not so much with the logic as it is a certain unwillingness or inability to accept the conclusions of logic unless those conclusions fall within our own very narrow experience. It is true that we do not now know in the absolute sense of the word. Our knowledge is relative. Or as one great logician states it, "Now we see through a glass, darkly."

THE LAWS OF EVIDENCE.

As to the laws of evidence, that standard work, Greenleaf on Evidence (sixteenth edition), states: "While unbounded credulity is the attribute of weak minds, which seldom think or reason at all, . . . unlimited skepticism belongs only to those who make their knowledge and observation the exclusive standard of probability."—Page 22.

The laws of evidence do not prevent proof by any means, though in any particular case it will demand the best evidence obtainable, and that such evidence be relevant to the case.

Merely because the evidence offered does not come within our personal experience, would hardly be sufficient grounds to justify its rejection. The King of Siam would not believe the Danish Ambassador when he told him of ice and snow, that the rivers of Denmark became solid during part of the year. Shall we believe, if one tells us, that after the long polar night the snow is purple at the North Pole? When we were told that geraniums grow in California six or seven feet high, we doubted it very much, but that did not change the fact. One hundred years ago, who would have believed it, if a picture of to-day with its various modes of rapid transit, electric lights, telegraph, and telephone had been reported? Yet we have passed even that stage and have wireless telegraphy and aviation. Also the society for psychic research is gradually establishing some facts, which are outside the realm of mathematics or chemistry, though their parallel is found in the pages of history. In fact, the following has been repeatedly held by our highest courts:

"Express testimony can not be rejected on the sole grounds of its improbability." (16 N. J. Eq. 172.)

"It would be a monstrous proposition, that an improbable fact can not be established in a court of law." (113 F. R. 378.)

Again, "Science has not yet drawn, and probably never will draw, a continuous and permanent line between the possible and impossible, the knowable and unknowable. . . . Advance in the use of electricity and experiments in telepathy, hypnotism, and clairvoyance warn us against dogmatism." (Post vs. U. S., 135 F. R. 1.)

Human knowledge is acquired in but a small part from our own perception and reflection. The greater portion comes from others. Children believe all things, till later finding some things not true, they learn to distrust. So in later life we learn to test, and hence come to a more rational belief. Every fact is tested by facts previously accepted as known or believed; but we should not, for this reason, unduly distrust all others.

Even in that one science capable of exact demonstration, mathematics, ignorance will prevent belief and proof. Unless he has learned the fundamental principles and then progressed, so his mind is able to receive, algebra, let alone calculus, is to him a realm unknown. A certain one says that he does not believe we know anything about the distance of the sun, moon, and stars; that it is all the merest assertion. Though he be a man of considerable education, yet if he does not know trigonometry, the demonstration or even the most ordinary proof is difficult, if not impossible. Yet it does not change the fact that with a probable error, enormous when stated in miles, yet relatively small, some fairly accurate demonstrations can be made.

We do not and can not expect the same method of proof and experiment for mathematics, chemistry, physics, psychology, and sociology, to say nothing of the spiritual realm. Yet the same method of proving all things, of earnestly seeking the truth regardless of what it may be, can be and should be used in the study of each and all. Qualification as a mathematician does not fit one to talk Greek, nor does chemistry prepare for psychical researches, although such an one should be able to more quickly prepare himself for intelligent study and experiment.

Logically, the conclusion we should draw from the testimony of these twelve men is not at all uncertain. From the standpoint of evidence the great preponderance sustains them. The ability of these twelve men to observe accurately and to report correctly, what they have seen, has never been impeached, nor has their credibility been questioned. Were it necessary we could introduce many living witnesses who have seen an angel, as well as corroborative testimony on other points. The fact that the evidence may be outside the previous experience and knowledge of the jury, is not important, since by their oath they must "a true verdict give according to the law and the evidence."

INVESTIGATION AND RESEARCH INVITED.

As to the matter of the testimony of the three witnesses, the case is fully proven by a clear preponderance of evidence. But since the book contains so much of importance to us, as students and lovers of truth, so much of vital interest, as it concerns the questions of eternal life, it becomes us as individuals to study and prove for ourselves. We have no quarrel with the skepticism which proves all things, holds fast to that which is true. We hold no brief for credulity or blind faith; but we do for an intelligent growing faith, which becomes knowledge. We do affirm a faith that works, that tests and tries and questions, having "an assurance of things hoped for, an evidence of things not seen." But a man who arbitrarily rejects evidence, because not within his experience as yet, is acting contrary both to the principles of science and of logic. Man has powers as yet undeveloped and little understood. We want neither credulity nor incredulity, but investigation and proof. It requires sincere work, as does any other search for truth. If made with sufficient care, the investigator becomes no longer a fit juror, but instead a qualified witness.

The reason is found in the Book of Mormon itself, very near its close:

And when ye shall receive these things, I would exhort you that ye would ask God, the eternal Father, in the name of Christ, if these things are not true; and if ye shall ask with a sincere heart, with real intent, having faith in Christ, he will manifest the truth of it unto you, by the power of the Holy Ghost; and by the power of the Holy Ghost, ye may know the truth of all things.—Book of Mormon 775: 4, 5.

This certainly is a remarkable promise and a test worthy of our thought and consideration. Here we rest, confident of the outcome to all lovers of truth, to all those who are willing to "prove all things," and "hold fast to that which is true."

SAINT LOUIS, MISSOURI.

"Somebody has said that many an one becomes better than he was by being thought better. Remember that loving faith and trust is the greatest inspiration we know to better living, and if you can not help your friends in any other way, help them by trusting them."

"We do not gain anything by being impatient with ourselves. There are some girls who discourage themselves because they are such hard critics of their own actions. Remember that the blossoms of character, like those in our gardens, need the gentle rain and sunshine, but impatience and harsh criticism, like the pelting hailstones, lay them low."

Of General Interest

The work of the Iowa Anti-Saloon League is becoming more and more important, and much advantage has been obtained over the liquor forces in the past six months. Rev.

REV. W. C. BARBER.

W. C. Barber, superintendent of the Iowa branch of the league, is a strong man at his post. He gives the following brief review of temperance reform in Iowa:

"The Iowa Anti-Saloon League will close its ninth year of public activity September 30, 1909, and begin its tenth year encouraged in every department, looking forward at the possibilities and opportunities of greater accomplishments than ever.

"It is impossible to enumerate in detail the results of nine years of agitation with education, strenuous efforts towards law enforcement, and the battle for supremacy with the liquor traffic in the State Legislature. Only a few years ago very few of the large cities pretended to obey the mulct law, and any person or organization that attempted to enforce the law was either boycotted, thrust out of the city, or suffered injury in various ways. We are reminded of the death of Reverend Haddock, of Sioux City, some years ago because of his efforts to compel some of the saloon keepers to obey the law, and for several years following his death no man or organization made any effort to advocate law enforcement so far as the saloon was concerned. However, two and a half years ago the State league began a crusade against the flagrant violation of the law on the part of saloon keepers and brewers. Over ninety cases were fought out in the district court and permanent injunctions were granted in each instance and the lid went on in Sioux City in spite of the protest of the saloon element and the local newspapers. Over two hundred and sixty prosecutions have taken place during the past two and a half years, and the sentiment has so developed against the saloon that the press of Sioux City is advocating law enforcement and the administration seeks to compel strict observance of the mulct law. Sioux City of the past with its anarchism and lawlessness has disappeared. Sioux City of the present is marked particularly by its sentiment for strict enforcement of law throughout.

"Over forty-six drug stores have been permanently enjoined in Des Moines alone and a number of them were recently fined for contempt of court. This has decreased the number of drug stores in Des Moines and the sale of liquor by the druggist has materially decreased.

"The general result of this law enforcement crusade has had a tendency to establish a strong temperance sentiment until we were able to go before the last General Assembly and pass the resolution seeking the resubmission of the prohibitory amendment to the people and its adoption to the constitution in the house of representatives. We were defeated in the senate by reason of the fact that the committee on constitutional amendment and suffrage withheld the resolution and it died in the committee.

"The league has a strong constituency both numerically and financially. It is larger than any party and its power has been felt throughout the State. It federates the churches regardless of denomination. It mobilizes the forces without reference to organization and with such a constituency in its favor it has massed its forces like a mighty army against the enemy, and to-day the enemy is upon the retreat defending itself as best it can. Two years ago the temperance forces were upon the defensive, the liquor forces were the aggressors, but now the conditions are reversed and the enemy is making every effort to defend itself from the onslaught of the federated church, the Iowa Anti-Saloon League.

"We are now preparing for the primaries and the results will depend largely upon the local people. The temperance constituency must select men who stand right upon the temperance question. They must give the man their individual support at the primaries. They must not divide their strength with two or three candidates who stand for the same thing. Let the enemy divide its strength if they will, but they are shrewd enough to consolidate their forces upon one man and render unto him their undivided support. We must do the same.

"The next election will tell the story and we must use every legitimate method to elect a General Assembly that will repeal the mulct law, pass a constitutional amendment, and give to the State of Iowa immediate relief from the nefarious traffic that exists in thirty-eight counties of the State. The future is bright and the light is breaking, the day is at hand and we need now to exercise ourselves and exert all our strength in this great effort to abolish the saloon in Iowa."

Religion and Politics.

But for repeated rumors of a political alliance between the Republican party and the Mormons of the Rocky Mountain States, the flurry of protest in Salt Lake against the President's speaking in the Mormon Tabernacle would be altogether meaningless and un-American.

There is nothing in the American system of government that is wiser than its absolute divorce of church and state. The President's form of worship is dictated by his own conscience, and the same is true of every American citizen. In following his own conscience the President completes the full measure of his religious duty. In his public capacity he is not permitted to take notice of the difference between one religious sect and another.

If it is proper for the President to speak in a Christian church or in a Jewish synagogue, no objection can rightly be made to his speaking in a Mormon church building. He would be violating the spirit of his oath of office if he favored one religious sect more than another.

Because of the wars and persecutions which grew out of the union of church and state in the Old World the founders of the American system dissolved the association between them. Americans of this generation will do well to frown upon everything that leans toward its restoration.—Saint Louis Republic.

"Many a Christian would doubtless be much ashamed to have friends who hear his fervent exhortations in the prayer meeting, hear some of his words in the family circle or among his business acquaintances. The child who hears his father pray and exhort in church, often hears him grumble and say un-Christian words at home."

The Bible as Good Reading. (Continued from last week.)

AFTER A HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS.

Finally, Moses came to his end. How grandly tragic was his final day! He never set foot in the promised land toward which he had led his people. But he was permitted to look upon it. Indeed, that is the most, it seems, that is permitted to the vastly great. They see the vision; they plan the march; they captain the advance—but they enter not into the fulfillment. And so Moses, the greatest of the great, went up into Mount Nebo, and the promised land unrolled before him. And then the great one fell. His work was finished, and he fell. And, a hundred and twenty years though he was, "his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated."

Stories of adventure never lose their fascination. Indeed, Mr. A. Conan Doyle, in a thoughtful essay, says that there is an increasing love for tales of this kind, and explains it upon the ground that it is a reaction against our neurotically complex civilization. The Bible is full of these narratives. As I pointed out in the first article, there is not a Hebrew to-day who does not glory in the craft, courage, and inspiration of Gideon. Who can forget the exaltation of Disraeli, that greatest of English statesmen, when speaking of the princes of Israel, always naming Gideon! The famous night attack of this Hebrew captain has always reminded me of Washington's night passage of the Delaware and his thunderbolt assault on the Hessians at Trenton. The Israelites had fallen into bad straits.

"And the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord; and the Lord delivered them into the hand of Midian seven years."

And the Midianites "didn't do a thing" to the Jews. They "destroyed the increase of the earth, till thou come unto Gaza, and left no sustenance for Israel, neither sheep, nor ox, nor ass."

In that black hour a leader arose for the oppressed people, just as leaders for the masses always rise when their situation becomes desperate. It is true that the Bible says that "God sent his angel to Gideon"; but for myself I believe that all great leaders of the people always have been and always will be directly inspired from on high. I find no difference between the divine guidance of Moses and a like direction of Washington and Lincoln.

It is picturesquely characteristic that the angel found Gideon "threshing his wheat by the winepress to hide it from the Midianites." Nearly all the great leaders of the people are found thus in the common occupations of the people when they are called to lead the people. So with Jackson and Cromwell and with Joan of Arc; and the mighty Peter threw aside the barbaric pomp and luxury of czarism to work as a common laborer in a humble shipyard of Holland. Gideon himself says:

"My family is poor in Manasseh, and I am the least in my father's house."

Nevertheless, the angel hailed him, "Thou mighty man of valor!" for he saw quite through the externals into the soul of the man. It is a curious thing how the mysterious quality of daring is almost impossible of discovery until occasion develops it. The quiet man may have it, and, on the contrary, the most ostentatious and vainglorious man may have it; as witness Major Burnham, the famous American scout, who, so far as deeds prove anything, is the most daring man alive to-day. On the other hand, consider Murat, Napoleon's famous marshal, who was vainglorious to a ludicrous point, but who was as brave as he was vainglorious.

Gideon was a good deal of a doubter. He could not make out how he, with the poor material he had among the deteriorated Hebrews, could prevail over the well-equipped Midianites. And he asks miracles to prove it; and so you will remember that the dew fell only on the fleece and none on the floor around it, which was dry. Even that did not satisfy him, and he reversed the process, and the dew fell on the floor and none on the fleece.

HOW GIDEON CHOSE HIS MEN.

He was convinced at last, and gathered the Israelites about him. But they were too many, and everybody that was afraid was sent back. That test lost Gideon twenty-two thousand soldiers and rid him of twenty-two thousand cowards. Ten thousand remained. But Gideon needed tempered steel for this enterprise; he couldn't take anybody with him who was too nice, on the one hand, or too slovenly, on the other hand. So he took them down to the water to drink. Those that bent down on their hands and knees he excused, and those that lapped water with their tongues like a dog he took. That gave him three hundred men—three hundred men against the "Midianites and the Amalekites and all the children of the east lay along in the valley, . . . and their camels were without number as the sand by the seaside for multitude."

But they were picked men that Gideon had. All the chaff was winnowed out from among them. It was the same situation when a handful of high grade Greeks utterly overthrew the enormous hosts of the Persians. It is the same situation that all men find everywhere. Do we not see it in politics, where a small band of pure, true, brave men can put to utter rout an immense number of baser quality?

Then came the strategy of the blowing of the trumpets and the breaking pitchers and the lights suddenly revealed, with the result of confusion, dismay, flight in the hostile camp, and the resistless onslaught of the Jewish warriors.

I am sorry that we can not talk for a little while about Esther. And the story of Daniel is almost as charming as that of David. But you can't describe these rare and engaging narratives in a single paper. Indeed, I am at loss how to close—so many examples in the Bible as "good reading" contend for choice.

Everybody is interested in oratory. Some of us may think we are not. But let such a scoffer at the power of speech fall under the spell of a master of the art and he changes his mind. So, let us take the master effort of the most finished orator of ancient times, and possibly of all time—of course you know that I am referring to Paul's oration on Mars Hill. We hear this perfect example of the art of oratory read to us and get very little of its meaning, none of its beauty, and absolutely no idea whatever of the power with which it was spoken and of its almost hypnotic effect over Paul's difficult audience. It is hard, of course, to get it to you in cold type. But, perhaps, we can get some notion of it.

PAUL, THE ORATOR OF ATHENS.

In the first place, then, remember that Paul was a man of finished education. He had been very decidedly a man of the world. There was little that anybody could teach him.

It is easy to see how, after his conversion, he became by common consent the leading advocate of Christianity. He went about preaching the gospel with inspired eloquence and with a logic that no man before or since has equaled.

This was the state of affairs when he came to Athens. The Athens of that time was in her decadence. She had reached the height of her achievements in the time of Pericles—heights so lofty and made by her genius so brilliant that they yet flame before our eyes across the centuries. In Paul's time Athens was the center of a super-civilized, over-educated, decadent people. The Athenians believed in nothing, and, like all agnostics, were really superstitious about everything. The Bible says that "All the Athenians and strangers which were there spent their time in nothing else, but either to tell, or to hear some new thing."

So when Paul came among them they were interested, curious, amused. Here was "something new" at last. So they asked Paul to exploit his doctrines, and, of course, he consented. That's what he was there for. They took him to the Areopagus, saying:

"May we know what this new doctrine, whereof thou speakest, is? For thou bringest certain strange things to our ears: we would know therefore what these things mean."

Paul understood his audience. He waits till there is absolute silence—until you can "hear a pin drop," as our saying has it. And then quite naturally, as though he were uttering the most commonplace truism imaginable, he began his immortal address, as follows:

"Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things you are too superstitious."

Then he paused. That sentence fixed them—absolutely chained their attention. He struck them at their weakest point; for, although they were the most superstitious of creatures, they prided themselves that they were not superstitious at all. After a moment, when he had let this thunderbolt of a sentence penetrate into their very souls, he went on proving the statement by example—(and here the rules of the art are perfectly observed; you must support each statement by an illustration). So he continued:

"For, as I passed by, and beheld your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription, TO THE UNKNOWN GOD."

Undoubtedly this sentence was delivered with a little more earnestness, but still not much. It was a mere matter of fact. But he delivered it with a little more earnestness; so that the following sentence, which was to be spoken with fervor, might not be too abrupt. For the next sentence captured that audience.

"Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, Him declare I unto you."

This was not shouted, we know very well; but we also know that it was uttered with an earnestness and a physical and nervous power which was all the more overwhelming because not violent. In three sentences he had caught their attention, challenged their pride, illustrated it, and reached the climax of his exordium.

To describe the remainder of this oration would be merely to repeat it. It is the shortest important speech ever made, excepting only Lincoln's undying Gettysburg address. In less than one hundred and fifty words he put the argument for and assertion of the living God, of salvation and of the resurrection of the dead. And in doing this he even included a quotation from the Greek poets. It is all very simple, powerful, convincing.

When he had closed, some mocked. But others said, "We will hear thee again on this matter." So Paul accomplished what he came to Athens to do. He had planted the seed. He had aroused interest. He had spoken words that his hearers could never forget—words that would be in their minds when they went to rest, and in their hearts when, awakening, they arose from their couches.

I recommend you to read, just as a matter of entertainment, the whole story of Saul's conversion, and, as the renamed Paul, of his travels, adventures, and final end. And if in the search for "good reading" you want a little very solid, very sensible and very beautiful ethics—philosophy that passes that of Emerson, both in its charm and in its truthfulness (and that is saying a good deal)—then read the twelfth of Romans.

The Bible is the most quotable book in all literature. You may take Shakespeare and Dante together, take Milton and Horace, put in the Koran and Confucius, and then boil them all down, and the quotable things in all of them put together are but a fraction of the sayings in the Bible that fasten themselves on your mind.—Senator Albert J. Beveridge in The Saturday Evening Post.

Requests for Prayer.

Sr. Mary J. Calhoun, of near Dixonville, Alabama, desires the prayers of the Saints, that the good Father may heal her of her affliction.

Mrs. Joseph Elliott, of Fergus Falls, Minnesota, desires the prayers of the sisters of the Prayer Union in behalf of her father and mother who are very low, that if it is God's will they may be raised to health, or if not, that they may have strength given them to bear their trials patiently.

Sr. Avis S. Ore, Stockton, California, asks the sister's Prayer Union to pray for Sr. Annie Tullery, who is an inmate of the State Hospital for Insane at Stockton, California. Sr. Tullery is a sister to Bro. A. T. and Sister Nettie Martin, of Knobnoster, Missouri, and they are deeply grieved about her condition, and as they are deprived of the privilege of visiting her, have requested the Saints to visit her, which they have done a number of times. Sister Smith is permitted to visit her whenever she wishes, as she is well known to the matron and attendant of the women's ward.

Letter Department

FANSHAWE, OKLAHOMA, August 30, 1909.

Editor Herald: We write to say to the Saints who have responded to our call through the Ensign and HERALD that we have received fifty dollars and fifty cents from donations of our brothers and sisters, for which we are so thankful. We have secured our lot, laid the foundation, and will have the carpenters to work September 1. We still lack one hundred and twenty-five dollars of having enough to pay for our windows and the workmen for their work. Then we will have as nice a little church building (24x30 feet) as the population of the town requires. The deed to our lot is made out to the Latter Lay Saints, and belongs to every Saint equally, and every Saint will have an interest in it. The deed, as soon as the church is dedicated, will be turned over to the Bishop as custodian. Every penny sent us will be used with thankfulness, until we raise enough to complete the building. Should there be more than enough, it will be sent to the Bishop to be used as the donors advise.

The dreadful drought has been upon us for the past seven or eight weeks, having almost burned up the crops—about one third of a crop anticipated. It has made it severe upon us to go as far with the building as we have. Right here I desire to say to those who have sent us their money, you have made our hearts and the hearts of our wives and children leap with joy, and have caused us to lift our prayers to God for them with the exclamation, "God bless the giver!" Dear brethren and sisters, God will bless you for such noble work, and add to your store every year. Our young women would exclaim, "Thank the Lord for such a noble church," and people in the sects are amazed at such a people. Something new to them. Brethren and sisters, you have preached kindness and have done a grand work for the church at large here. Those who turned us and our sweet little children out of doors, can not understand what power is at work that filled our hands with money to build a good church, far better than the schoolhouse that they turned us out of, so soon after they had accomplished such an injury. They are amazed, and say one to the other, "They must have the doctrine; yes, they have the money to build a better building than the schoolhouse." One man said to me, "This is the religion for me," after asking about the Saints helping us.

Dear editors, I write this to let the Saints know that by their kindness and donations they not only help us in building our church, but they are preaching grand sermons to those ignorant and benighted people who have been brought up in this lawless territory, without law or order, until a year or so ago, and hence have had no chance to learn how to act civilized. I thank God that I was made to know him and his people in my old age. My God, I praise thy holy name that I am counted worthy to suffer with thy people and to share their blessings. I am feasting on his love. Excuse me that I thus express my feelings while I write.

When we get through we will give the names of those who have donated money and in other ways helped us in building the first church in Fanshawe. The sects made an effort to build them a house a few days since, but failed. Their lobbying with our officials fell back on them after they got a decree for the Mormons to stay out of the schoolhouse. My complaint to the county superintendent that they were using the school building exclusively, led to an order for them to quit the building, and hence they are without a place to worship. They are now forced to build a church or have no place to worship.

Thanking you, dear editors, for publishing our request on June 11, and hoping you can find space for the most important part of this, we are in bonds, TAMMIS, ILLINOIS, September 19, 1909.

Editors Herald: I am still very much interested in this great latter-day work, and am doing all I can to get others interested, and I feel I have succeeded to a certain extent. There is no one here of our faith but my mother, brother, and myself. I believe there would be more if they could hear the gospel in its purity. I have distributed a few tracts and have sold one Book of Mormon. It seems to have taken effect upon some of them and they want to hear more of our faith. Others say it makes no difference what you believe just so you are honest in it. We know that there are many who have been honestly deceived. We also know it makes no difference how firmly you believe anything, if it is not true it does not establish a fact. This I try to show those with whom I talk. I am truly glad we as Latter Day Saints can prove our belief from the words of our Savior.

Remember, brothers and sisters, all help in this work and the more we do the better it is for us in this world and in the world to come. May God bless us all and help us to see our whole duty.

Your brother,
B. F. GRACE.

EXLINE, IOWA, September 19, 1909.

Dear Herald: I take this means of making our whereabouts known to any elders who might be passing this way. We are anxious to have an elder come and preach this fall. I do not know that the restored gospel has ever been preached in this community, and quite a few of our friends have expressed a desire to hear it. We just moved here from Payne County, Oklahoma, last spring, and are not acquainted with the missionaries of this district, and if any who see this can find it convenient to come here, we will do all we can to get a hearing. We are located, for the present, three miles southwest of Exline on the Cincinnati and Exline road.

Your sister,
MRS. W. L. BEARD.

DETROIT, MICHIGAN, September 17, 1909.

Editors Herald: I wish to say to the Saints in eastern and southern Texas that I will be glad to hear from those desiring preaching. I will be in northeastern Texas until the latter part of October, then on south. In the meantime we will be glad to get acquainted with the needs of the work further south. My mission address is Avery, Texas.

R. M. MALONEY.

MAYWOOD, ILLINOIS, September 18, 1909.

Saints' Herald: My father, Elder F. G. Pitt, wants me, through your columns, to tender his heartfelt thanks to the many kind friends who have written him letters so full of love and sympathy, which have been such a comfort to him during long hours of pain and bereavement. He was able to reply to but few of these letters when he was interrupted by sickness and he now lies prostrate at our home with typhoid fever and lumbago. He has suffered much, especially during the first few days of his illness, but is now feeling better, though very weak. He states, "While I expect the disease will run its regular course, I hope to survive, to spend a few more years in the cause of the Master, if it is his will, and to this end I ask for the prayers of the Saints."

In bonds,
F. M. PITT.

TROBRIDGE, ONTARIO, September 18, 1909.

Dear Herald: I love to read the HERALD, and we feel that we could hardly get along without it; there is so much good to be gotten from it. We are trying by the help of the Master to live worthy of the name we bear, and he has promised that he will help us when we ask him. He is a friend that will stick closer than a brother. We have many trials and difficulties to contend with, yet we know he is faithful. There are but a few Saints in this part of the vineyard, yet the Lord meets with us, as he has promised to do where two or three meet together in his name.

On Monday, September 13, death claimed one of God's children in the person of Bro. John Robertson. Brother and Sister Robertson came here from Kansas City to visit friends, thinking that the change might do him good, as he was afflicted with cancer, but they were here just a month when he died. The funeral was conducted by Bro. J. B. Howlett, of London, Ontario, who gave an able discourse, taking for his text Numbers 23:18. Sister Robertson is left to mourn a loving and kind husband, but she has the comforting hope of meeting him in the sweet bye and bye. Brother Robertson was a Christian and worthy the name he bore.

"Oh, how sweet is the soul cheering thought,
There is rest for the pure and the good;
'Tis a rest that the Savior has bought
By the shedding of his precious blood."

MRS. A. SMITH.

PROVO, UTAH, September 21, 1909.

Editors Herald: Since my last communication to your columns, our district reunion has convened and passed into history. We are satisfied with the results. The attendance of Saints from a distance was not what we would like to have seen, but those who did attend seemed to feel amply paid for the time and expense of coming.

The preaching was by T. W. Chatburn, H. N. Hansen, G. J. S. Abels, John Davis, and L. G. Holloway. Bishop William Anderson, of Lamoni, Iowa, was also present, and favored us with one of his good sermons, which was appreciated. He and Sister Anderson were visiting relatives and friends in different parts of this State, but Sister Anderson's health did not permit them to remain until the close of the reunion.

Some members of the dominant church here in Utah attended several of the sessions and since the close of the reunion I have heard some very favorable comments. It seems that there is a brighter day dawning for this mission, at least present indications point that way. The last two days of the reunion were devoted to conference. There was an effort put forth to aid the people of Salt Lake City to obtain a place of their own wherein they could worship, and we hope to see a building erected which will be a credit to our work and give those in charge of the work in that city an opportunity to reach hundreds of tourists and other people who visit the Mormon mecca each year.

Sr. Flo McNichols, of Atchison, Kansas, represented the auxiliary work, and much good will result from her work. She is a tireless worker, and gives satisfaction wherever she goes. This was the first reunion held in this State where a field worker was present, and several normal classes, we understand, will be organized as a result of her coming. Bro. James Downs is in charge of the class here in Provo. We think we can truthfully say that our work is slowly advancing here in this field. We trust the good work may go on until all the honest in heart are reclaimed from superstition and the fetters that bind them.

Yours hopefully in the conflict,

L. G. HOLLOWAY.

WILLOW SPRINGS, MISSOURI, September 24, 1909.

Editors Herald: I have just returned from the battlefield at Rome, Missouri, where I met Rev. C. A. Sutton in public discussion, on church propositions. There was a good attendance all through, but on Sunday, September 19, there were about five hundred people present. Elder W. P. Bootman was my moderator, and furnished able assistance. We went in as perfect strangers, but the Lord opened up the way and we could not begin to fill all the invitations, and at the close of the debate there were a dozen invitations to remain and hold meetings. We were compelled to come to conference, but have appointments to commence right after it closes. Many got references at the stand and said they were learning. "We never heard the Bible explained this way before."

My opponent wanted a sign, and urged it very vehemently, and I finally told him I would give him one, but I had to have a subject to work upon. Therefore I requested him to stand on the other side of the platform, and urged him to get up, and had taken off my coat so as not to be encumbered; but when I saw that he would not, I put on my coat and proceeded with my argument, under the vociferous applause of the people. I am rejoicing in this angel's message. I have two more debates on hand with the Campbellites.

Reverend Sutton threw but very little dirt. We had a rule that nothing but the Bible could be used.

Brother Bootman is doing an excellent work in Shannon County, having baptized seventeen and more to follow. We are billed at Naylor, Missouri, November 16.

Let me say to the Saints that the church stands in need of your assistance right now. We do not want to call on the Bishop to help us out on the present financial strain. Do you love this work? Then help to sustain it with your temporal means. Some have assisted nobly. This is one way of determining who the true disciples are. Send all moneys to me at Willow Springs, Missouri, R. F. D. No. 2. Prove the Lord; get a testimony. What Latter Day Saints need is more of this Holy Ghost religion.

Yours truly,

A. M. BAKER.

HAMILTON, N. S. W., AUSTRALIA, August 28, 1909.

Editors Herald: Please say to your readers that Bro. E. F. Robertson and myself arrived safely in Sydney, New South Wales, on August 10, after a quiet but beautiful voyage. We sailed from Vancouver, British Columbia, on July 16, arriving in Honolulu on the 24th, in Suva, Fiji, on August 2, in Brisbane, Queen's Land, Australia, on August 8, and in Sydney on the 10th. We proved to be good sailors, being slightly indisposed for one day only.

We were met by Bishop George Lewis, of the Australian Mission, W. J. Haworth, editor of the Gospel Standard, and John Jones, president of the New South Wales District. We were royally received by the Saints and made to feel very welcome. The country is beautiful, and we see no reason why our stay here may not be both profitable and pleasant.

We will write in greater detail later on. My mission address will be 623 Darling street, Rozelle, Sydney, N. S. W., Australia.

Very respectfully,

J. W. DAVIS.

SCRANTON, PENNSYLVANIA, September 14, 1909.

Editors Herald: The season has been spent in tent work in company with Bro. E. B. Hull, a very companionable person. The first six weeks we were located in the city of Scranton, Pennsylvania, but the prejudice was so great that few could be persuaded to enter the tent. The cry had gone forth from the "hiring," "The Mormons are in operation in our city; keep away from them." One Christian (?) gentleman was heard to say, "What do they want to come into this Christian community for; why don't they go to the heathen?" The question might rightly be asked, "Where shall we go?" If heathenism is not to be found in this community it certainly does not exist on the earth, but while the heathen raged and the people imagined vain things, we continued to preach to those who would come. Our congregations were largely composed of Saints, and a few that were not of the faith, but good was done, for the few Saints who rallied to the cause have stated that they were blessed and much benefited.

Finding that nothing of very great moment could be accomplished there, we raised the tent on July 29 and shipped it to Archibald Mines, Taylor, Pennsylvania. Now the day previous to moving the tent, the writer had the privilege of baptizing five precious souls into the kingdom of God on earth. On Friday, July 30, we attended a Sunday school picnic at Lincoln Park, and had a very enjoyable time.

On Monday the tent was put into operation at Archibald Mines, in a Methodist stronghold. Opposition was rife, prejudice was high, but by persistent effort and the rallying of the faithful, with singing the beautiful songs of Zion, and the preaching of the word of God in love, it was plain to be seen that the barriers were giving way, and those who were the loudest to proclaim against us were now coming our way, and in spite of all their shepherd might say against us, and all the advising he might do to keep away, his flock was leaving him. As a last resort he called them together and told them that he had always preached the gospel to them according to the best light he had, and that while those men in the tent were not taking any money out of town, he wanted it understood that they were not doing his church any good.

We continued four weeks with increasing interest and numbers until the capacity of the tent was taxed. On August 22, I again had the pleasure of baptizing three souls, the confirmation immediately following.

On August 28, the tent was taken down and stored for the winter season. We then attended a very spiritual conference in Philadelphia, the afternoon meeting on Sunday being a spiritual feast. While Apostle F. M. Sheehy was relating the experience of his late bereavement in losing his companion, and while he was paying a tribute to her memory for her true Christian spirit and fortitude; her fidelity to God and his cause; how his life had been influenced by her noble work, every true servant of God was moved to tears, especially those who are away from home and loved ones. Our hearts were sad to read of the death of our venerable Patriarch, Alexander H. Smith, but with all there comes that blessed assurance, "He was faithful to his trust, his reward is sure." May God help us all to be faithful.

Your brother in the bonds of peace,

HUNTINGTON, WEST VIRGINIA, Sept. 20, 1909.

Editors Herald: I am well pleased with the HERALD and love to read its letter department. As there are only five Saints here, and we have had no elders here, until this summer, it has been my only preacher. Elder Brown, of Canada, preached for us a while and I think some good was done. I love this gospel plan and have started to live up to its requirements. I want to pay my tithing as the law is plain in the Bible, Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants, and I think anyone can understand it. I have given in a list of what I have and think it no more than my duty. I am only sorry that I did not begin much sooner. I have been sick eighteen months, and my wife is sick a great deal of the time. We would like the Saints to pray for us that we may be healed and prove faithful to the end.

Your brother in Christ,
G. F. TAMPLIN.

SACRAMENTO, CALIFORNIA.

Editors Herald: It is with sorrow that I think of our great loss in the departure of our esteemed Patriarch Alexander H. Smith, but I suppose his work here was done. I had hoped to receive my patriarchal blessing from him, but now I look forward to receive it from his son, Fred A., for surely he will be called to that office.

Bro. Fred B. Farr is now with us, and he has preached some most excellent sermons. He is the right man for this city, as we need stirring up, and surely he can do it. I often think how we should be up and doing, for we are not our own. Jesus bought us with his precious blood. How he suffered for us, even so that he sweat drops of blood. Then he told the disciples to pray earnestly that they enter not into temptation. Then how those wicked ones took him, put a crown of thorns on his head, blindfolded him, and smote him, and spat in his face; yet he did not resent all this. Then they nailed him to the cross and left him there to die the most ignominious death that was possible to inflict; all this he did for each one of us. Then he told us what to do to show that we remember his suffering and death. That is the supper or sacrament, that we might show that we do remember him till he comes. What wonderful love he has for us!

Let us pray for one another, that we may live worthy of such great love. Can we do so by forsaking the assemblies of the Saints and going after the amusements and pleasures of the world, or shall we give heed to what he says: "Pray earnestly, that ye enter not into temptation"; "shun the appearance of evil"; "keep yourselves unspotted from the world"; to assemble often together to speak of the great work in which we are engaged?

I learn from Brother Farr and others that Saints and those of the ministry often pass through Sacramento, and have to wait here, but do not know where the Saints are, or our place of meeting. I am very sorry, as any Saint would be gladly received at my house at any time, to rest and visit with us. My house number is 2118 I street, and the chapel is on the corner of Twenty-fourth and K streets. Hoping those who pass through will take notice.

Yours in gospel bonds,
W. N. DAWSON.

COFFEYVILLE, KANSAS, September 18, 1909.

Dear Herald: About three weeks ago I received a letter from a sister in Independence, Kansas, by the name of Sister Muck, I believe. The letter has been lost and I can not write to her as I have not her address. I have decided to write a letter for the HERALD in hopes she may see it.

I am sorry to say I can not report our Angola Branch in a flourishing condition; yet we have a few Saints who feel it their duty to come out and worship God the first Sunday of each month. A few of our Saints do not seem to be blessed with a desire to attend church, or perhaps there are reasons we know not of that keep them away. We should not let the busy cares of this world stand between us and God. We pray that he will bless each Angola Saint with a desire to humbly serve him.

The first Sunday of this month some twelve Saints gathered and after an instructive sermon by our branch president, Elder Westervelt, a good Saints' meeting was held which was enjoyed very much by all present. The Saints who stay at home do not realize what they miss.

The sister of Independence, Kansas, spoke of coming out and worshipping with us. We would be glad to have her come. We meet at 11 a. m. the first Sunday of each month. If she could come to Coffeyville on the street car she could catch a Katy train which leaves Coffeyville at 9.50 a. m. We would be glad to meet her at Angola and take her on to the school-house, two miles north, where we worship.

If there are any other Saints in Independence or Coffeyville we would like for them to come out and be one with us.

Praying for the success of God's people and asking an interest in your prayers,

Your brother and sister,
MR. AND MRS. ELMER HART.

LONDON, ENGLAND, September 18, 1909.

Editors Herald: Apropos your note in the issue of August 25, regarding the Glasgow Branch, permit me to say that your correspondent is mistaken in each of his items of information.

The condition of the Glasgow Branch was duly and properly reported by the president of the mission to the proper authorities at the time; but for the edification of your readers I may say,

First, owing to the death of some and the removal of others from Glasgow, the branch which we did have there lapsed; there never was any "disorganization," for the reason that such action was never necessary.

Second, the property of the said branch was not turned over to the Saints of Manchester; but was provided for as follows: The cash, amounting to thirty shillings, was in the possession of Bro. James Wilson, late of Glasgow, now in the United States, until some two years ago, when he forwarded the same to the undersigned and it was then placed in the hands of Elder Charles H. Caton, the late Bishop's agent, who had the item on his books, and the same was duly transferred to his temporary successor and in turn was by him handed over to Elder Joseph Dewsnup, the Bishop's agent for the Manchester District and the Leeds branches, who is in possession of that amount now.

The other property, consisting of record, minute book, and other effects, was placed in the keeping of Elder Robert Murray, of Hamilton Branch, and he was instructed by the undersigned to forward the same to Elder W. R. Armstrong, the secretary and historian of the mission, of 12 Rye street, Manchester; but up to September 13, 1909, this was not done, but according to the promise of the brother will be done by this time. So that all the property of the Glasgow Branch is in the possession of the mission officers, and can be located, or if necessary produced at any time it is required by the proper officials.

Yours respectfully,

JOHN W. RUSHTON,

President of the British Isles Mission.

The Wise Brought to Naught.

After the morning services at San Francisco, on July 18, 1909, I returned to my home and on my arrival found that my family wished to go to Oakland. After we arrived in Oakland, to my surprise, we found ourselves bound for the First Presbyterian Church to hear Rev. Charles T. Russell, of the Brooklyn, New York, Tabernacle. His subject was, "Where are the dead?" The keynote of his discourse was that there is no hell. His audience consisted of about one thousand five hundred people. He was blessed with good liberty and attention, and explained very clearly where the heathen thinks the dead are, and then told where the Catholic Church thinks the dead are. Then he told of the great error of the Christian world, especially our ancestors. How they had misunderstood and misinterpreted the word of God. To my understanding he claimed that they are all wrong and on sinking sand. So he attempted to explain where the dead really are. He said the Bible states they are dead. They have gone to Sheol. This is the word undoubtedly that has made the trouble. It does not imply a hell as we have been taught to understand the term, an existence unending of torment and agony. It means merely the grave, the tomb, the state of death, unconsciousness. The idea of eternal torment that has frightened and oppressed us for ages is a myth, delusion, and the evolution of an imaginative mind, although supposed to be based on the teachings of the Holy Bible. There is nothing anywhere in the Scriptures that even hints at such a thing.

He also explained the millennial dawn very nicely, and in harmony with God's word, although I did not approve of the dead being unconscious until the morning of the first resurrection. At the transfiguration of Christ on the Mount, Moses and Elijah appeared to him and three of his disciples and they seemed quite rational. I think that would condemn his argument about the dead. At the close of the meeting I shook hands with a Latter Day Saint who sat just in front of me, and asked him how he liked it and he said, "Fine." I replied that he didn't explain how Christ preached to the spirits in prison. I talked with my relatives regarding the discourse as we went to luncheon. They being readers of the preacher's literature and believers in his doctrine said that his knowledge of the gospel was unlimited, and that in the evening he was going to answer all the questions that all the wisest men of all the churches could write, and insisted that I write a question, one of those so-called Mormon problems, and see how quickly he would crumble it with his wisdom and knowledge. I said if I did he would lay it aside and answer the easy ones first, and leave the hard ones till the hour was late and then close without answering it. They thought this excuse very lame, so I finally consented to write one. I wrote, "What sealed book did Isaiah refer to in the twenty-ninth chapter that would be found in the hands of an unlearned man, as God would proceed to do a marvelous work and a wonder just before Lebanon (Palestine) would become a fruitful field?" The question was passed around among the party so they all knew what it was.

My question was the last one placed on the tray and was the first one for him to read. There was perfect order in the church and I think every eye was fixed on him. He took my question and read it to himself; then took the Bible and read it to himself; then looked over the paper again. Of course my relatives, knowing what the question was, were expecting to see it crushed, but he stepped forward and read the question something like this: "What sealed—I don't seem to—the person that wrote this didn't seem to—at any rate, I will just lay it aside and answer the other questions and will probably refer to it later." The rest of the questions were easy for him. He closed the meeting at about 10 p. m., and showed a large pile of questions that he had not time to answer. I give him credit for two things, viz, he was wise enough to make the audience believe that the paper that I wrote was from a fool or a very poor scribe; and, second, he knew that if he read the question aloud he would be in an ironclad trap. If he had been a good Saint he would have asked the person to step forward and read it, or ask someone else to step forward and read it if he couldn't.

On the way home the folks were anxious to know what I thought of him. I said I thanked God that we had men that taught as much of the truth as he did, and that could show the people their errors, and lead them just far enough to show them he is blind also. After he has accepted all the gospel truths he has to organize in perfect harmony with it; because God has set the members in the body as it pleases him, and those we think the most feeble are the most necessary. God has set them in the church, apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers; after that, miraculous gift of healing, tongues and prophecy, for the perfecting of the Saints and the edifying of the body of Christ, till we all come to the unity of the faith, and the signs shall follow the believer. It is very evident that they will all come to a unity of the faith, because the kingdom that Daniel saw established broke in pieces and consumed all the other kingdoms, and if they do come to a unity of the faith they will have to come over and accept the faith of the Latter Day Saints, because they observe all things, and God is with them. They sought to excuse Mr. Russell by stating that my question was not plain enough for him.

Desiring to make it more clear I wrote him a letter after he had finished his tour, which read as follows:

"Rev. Charles T. Russell: I have read some of your teachings and I attended your discourse at the First Presbyterian Church at Oakland, and enjoyed it. If it would not be asking too much, please inform me a little more about the dead: 1 Peter 3: 19, where Christ preached to the spirits in prison; and 1 Peter 4: 6: 'For, for this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit.' I don't think this refers to the angels that kept not their first estate, because he has a place reserved in irons for them. It was I that wrote the first question that you couldn't seem to read or understand. It was: What sealed book did Isaiah speak of in chapter 29: 11, that would be found in the hands of an unlearned man at a time when God would do a marvelous work and a wonder, just before Lebanon or Palestine would become a fruitful field? It seems to be referring to a people from the city where David dwelt, and as if a record of them would speak from the dust. And the marvelous work that God would do I should think would be to establish a church. If you will, please inform me about this, and you will greatly oblige, your brother in Christ."

I received the following answer:

"Mr. Wesley Parks, San Francisco, California, Dear Brother: I have your kind letter of the 4th inst., and am glad that you attended the services in the First Presbyterian Church during my discourse there. I am having sent to you under separate cover, a copy of the September, 1903, Watchtower, which contains an article treating on 1 Peter 4:6 fully, and in which I think you will find light and assistance to a fuller understanding of the scriptures. I also send you a booklet on spiritualism which I hope you will read carefully. In it you will find a full explanation of our understanding of 1 Peter 3:19. Yours in the love and service of the Lord, C. T. Russell."

I took a copy of my letter pinned to Mr. Russell's and showed it to my folks. They requested that I write again regarding the sealed book, because they thought he had overlooked it by mistake. So I took the liberty and wrote as follows:

"Rev. Charles T. Russell, Dear Brother: I have received your booklet on spiritualism, and also the Watchtower, for which I am exceedingly grateful, and now, dear brother, if I am worthy of further notice, please inform me about the Prophet Isaiah. Do you think that God inspired him to write about the Christ that did come, and of the destruction of that great city of Babylon, that even to this day the Arabs will not pitch their tents there, thus fulfilling that prophecy to the letter? I have read that God said a false prophet would teach other gods, and if a prophet prophesied in the name of the Lord and it came to pass, he was a true prophet of God. Now Isaiah said in the twenty-ninth chapter that at this specified time the fear toward God would be taught by the precept of men. 'Therefore, I God, will proceed to do a marvelous work and a wonder among this people.' Now this vision that is to come to all—sealed book, unlearned man, marvelous work—is the most important thing to me in all the world, because if God's word will not return void, but will accomplish its purpose, there must be a work done by an unlearned man before Palestine can become a fruitful field.

If you ever heard of such a thing please inform me so I can give it thorough investigation. I care not what people shall say about it. I fully realize that the way of truth shall be evilly spoken of. I find that where the best apple tree is there is where the most sticks and clubs are carried by the boys. So I believe that Satan would throw more sticks and lies and obstacles at God's church than any other. But Paul says to prove all things and hold fast to that which is good. So if he has a church I expect to find it rejected to-day as in other ages. I would like to ask a favor of you. The Bible says: 'Let him that lacketh wisdom ask of God who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not,' and 'if your son ask for bread would you give him a stone,' etc., and that 'I am God; I change not'; and that he is 'no respecter of persons.' So for my soul's sake please inquire of him if he fulfilled the prophecy, and I will be glad to repay you for your trouble. You remember he says, 'In the last days I will pour out my Spirit on all flesh. The old men shall dream dreams, and the young folks will have outward manifestations of the Holy Spirit.' So if God has not changed he will make this known to a faithful, humble man who has devoted so many years to his work. If there is a God at all, I think it would be the most terrible thing in the world if his work should be overlooked by me. Like the high priests and elders of all sects at Christ's time, I ask this of you because if he would not hear you, I do not know what he would think of a poor proletarian.

So please offer this in my behalf and I will gladly pay you or reward you for this most valuable information, and I am sure that your kindness will never be forgotten. Most sincerely, your brother in love and fellowship, Wesley Parks."

He answered me thus:

"Mr. Wesley Parks, Dear Brother: I am in receipt of your kind letter of the 31st ultimo. Replying, I would say that I not only believe that our heavenly Father inspired Isaiah but all the apostles and prophets who wrote in his name. I am sending you under separate cover a pamphlet edition of the Divine Plan of the Ages, and I am sure that as you give it careful study, desiring to be taught of the Lord and walk in his ways, you will be more rooted and grounded in the faith once delivered to the saints. As what is printed in this volume will be of much more value to you than anything I might say in a letter, I commend it to your careful and prayerful study, testing its statements by the sure words of prophecy. Yours in the love and service of the truth, C. T. Russell."

Now, dear readers, this again fulfills Isaiah's prophecy concerning the book, that the wisdom of the wise would be brought to naught and the understanding of the prudent would be hid. I claim Mr. Russell to be a very fair sample of the wise or prudent. He claims to trace the gospel from Adam to the present day, only losing track of one day, which is most remarkable. But if he would turn his heart to communicate with God, and find out and trace God's marvelous work and a wonder, he would have a far greater reward. I have tried to find error in this latter-day work, but I have utterly failed. I have read many articles against the work, but when sifted from a fair-minded standpoint, they contradict themselves, get dates twisted, and tell stories of Joseph Smith years after his death. I met a lady who said that she knew Joseph was not a prophet of God because she had seen him. I have often wondered what some people would expect to see when they see a prophet of God,—an animal or some specie of man? It reminds me of Jesus' words concerning John the Baptist: "But what went ye out for to see, a reed shaken with the wind? But what went ye out for to see, a man dressed in soft raiment? Behold they which are gorgeously appareled and live delicately are in kings' courts." I have met others that say, "Why didn't God do this through some other person instead of Joseph Smith?" I believe that thoughts were in their hearts about Christ, because he stated at Nazareth after he had read from the Prophet Esaias, "Many widows were in Israel in the days of Elias when great famine was in the land. But unto none of them was Elias sent but one. And many lepers were in Israel in the time of Elias the prophet, and none of them were cleansed saving Naaman, the Syrian. So many babes were in Bethlehem at Christ's time, but only one was the Christ, and many virgins at Mary's time, but only one chosen for the mother." So there were many young men at Joseph Smith's time, but only one was appointed to establish the work at the appointed time. Only one was worthy and able to withstand the persecution and opposition. God's way is not ours.

Others say there are to be no more prophets, and if he was a prophet of God he would not have been killed in these civilized times. That same thought was in the hearts of the people at Christ's time. He said, "Oh, you generation of vipers, you decorate the graves of the prophets and say, if we had lived at the time of our ancestors we would not have killed them; but, verily I say their blood is required of this generation."

Now read Revelation 16:3-6: "God is going to pour out his wrath on the seas and rivers and they will become as the blood of a dead man; and every living soul in them will die because they have killed his saints and prophets." Now if any one can show me that this is not God's marvelous work and a wonder, and the sealed book was not the Book of Mormon, please do it to-day; to-morrow may be too late. I don't wish to fall into the ditch with a blind leader. If this is not God's work it is the cunningest piece of deception in the world. But I have a personal testimony that the work is of God, and my heart and soul are in this work. I only hope and pray that when death calls me I will be found defending God's work.

Extracts from Letters.

John Romphf, Burke Falls, Ontario: "There is only one family of Latter Day Saints in this place beside ourselves and we would be glad to see an elder come this way. We would try to keep an elder as long as he would stay. I think good could be done here."

"THE BOSTON TRAVELER" AGAIN.

believe to be a true prophet, and ascribed to him the reception of a revelation from the Almighty in 1843, commanding the Saints to take unto themselves a multiplicity of wives, limited in number only by the means of their desires. . . . Such the mythological story palmed off on a deluded people.

Here is something else: Under date of September 19, 1909, Walter B. Stevens appears in the Saint Louis Globe-Democrat with an article entitled, "A corner of Illinois." Mr. Stevens was formerly secretary of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company. He is a well-known writer, and has made a thorough study of conditions in Hancock County and Nauvoo, formerly the home of the church at whose head Joseph Smith stood. On this subject of polygamy he says:

Polygamy was not practiced or taught at Nauvoo. It did not originate with either Joseph Smith, the prophet of Mormonism, or with Hyrum Smith, his brother. Brigham Young introduced polygamy into his branch of the Mormon church after the expulsion from Nauvoo and after the removal to Salt Lake City.

Senator O. F. Berry, of Carthage, Illinois, was formerly a law partner with Judge Sharp, editor of the Warsaw Signal, a paper that played a prominent part during early Mormon troubles in Illinois. He has had an exceptionally good opportunity for studying the history of the Saints, at first-hand, being acquainted with all of the old residents of Hancock County. He has improved his opportunity to get at the facts in the case. In an address before the State Historical Society, at Springfield, Illinois, January 24, 1906, he had this to say:

The writer is satisfied, from evidence entirely satisfactory to him, that Joseph and Hyrum Smith did not teach and preach the doctrine of polygamy. I believe the facts justify the statement that polygamy was first promulgated and taught by Brigham Young.—Page 6 of his pamphlet.

These men know more about "Mormon" history in a minute than the Traveler man knows in a year.

JOSEPH SMITH AND THE LAW OF THE LAND.

Now we want to notice just one more misstatement in this editorial, as follows:

Mormonism since its beginning has been defiant of the law.

It may as well be understood now, if the Traveler has not understood it before, that we have no affiliation or fellowship with the Mormon church in Utah, or with Reed Smoot, and that we are not defending the wisdom of certain Vermont officials in being present when Mr. Smoot makes an address at the dedication of the monument to Joseph Smith in Sharon, Vermont. We have no part or interest in that proceeding whatever. We are simply defending the history of Joseph Smith and of the church during his life and prior to the apostasy that was led by Brigham Young; and we say here and now that the statement that "Mormonism since its beginning has been defiant of the law," is not true. The attitude of Joseph Smith and the church toward the law is expressed in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, which contains the law to the church, as follows:

Let no man break the laws of the land, for he that keeps the laws of God hath no need to break the laws of the land. Wherefore be subject to the powers that be until he reigns whose right it is to reign and subdues all enemies under his feet.

That was a part of the constitutional law of the church and should be strict enough to satisfy the editor of the Traveler. It binds members of the church, both priesthood and laity, to implicit obedience to the law of the land at all times until the coming of the Son of God to rule in person.

That injunction was observed by Joseph Smith and the church as an organization from the time of its founding in 1830 until the death of Mr. Smith in 1844. They were not killed; their homes were not burned; they were not tarred and feathered; they were not driven in harmony with the law, but contrary to the law.

If Brigham Young and his followers and his successors who are now living in Utah and elsewhere have been defiant of the law, that is their matter, and they must answer for it; but they do not in any way represent Joseph Smith or the church that he founded, as we are prepared to prove.

In the Court of Common Pleas, Lake County, Ohio, February 23, 1880, the following decision was rendered:

That the church in Utah, the Defendant, of which John Taylor is president, has materially and largely departed from the faith, doctrines, laws, ordinances and usages of said original Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and has incorporated into its system of faith the doctrines of celestial marriage and a plurality of wives, and the doctrine of Adam-god worship, contrary to the laws and constitution of said original church.

And the Court do further find that the Plaintiff, the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, is the true and lawful continuation of, and successor to the said original Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, organized in 1830, and is entitled in law to all its rights and property.

This decision was supported in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western Division of the Western District of Missouri in 1894.

The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints and not the church in Utah, is at present in fact (and also in the eyes of the law) the successor to the church organized by Joseph Smith, and the only existing organized exponent of true Mormonism, and it is not and never has been defiant of the law. It has strong organizations at Lamoni, Iowa, where THE SAINTS' HERALD is published; at Independence, Missouri, where the church presidency reside; and has centers of culture in Boston, Chicago, New York, Kansas City, Saint Louis, Omaha, San Francisco, Denver, and in fact all of the leading cities and most of the smaller towns of the United States. Its members everywhere are law-abiding.

Some may feel contemptuous of us in point of numbers as compared with the Utah church. But this is a question in no way affected by numbers. The fact remains that the Reorganization in spirit, doctrine, organization, and policy, is in harmony with the church under Joseph Smith and in succession thereto, and to it men must look for a correct interpretation of the work begun in 1830.

IN CONCLUSION.

We have given this incident extended notice because it has attracted more than local attention. Other daily papers have commented on the Traveler editorial, and one goes so far as to invite any paper on earth to refute the statements contained therein. This kind invitation we have accepted. We have met the Traveler on seven points and have supported our assertions with proof, something that the Traveler did not do.

We meet the challenge and say that "Mormonism," applying the name to the work founded by Joseph Smith, was never at any time a menace to the nation, either during the life of Joseph Smith or in the Reorganization under his son and successor. It never was and is not now defiant of the law. It ever affirmed all the true principles of Christianity, morality, and good citizenship. It never affirmed doctrines that are criminal or abhorrent to the best Christian conscience.

If the conduct and religious belief of Senator Smoot and his associates in Utah are such that Vermont officials should not associate with them at the dedication of a monument to Joseph Smith, that is a matter with which we have no present concern. But we have for many years studied the life, character, and teachings of Joseph Smith himself, and with exceptional opportunities to arrive at the truth, and we candidly say that we have never found anything in his life, his character, or his teachings that should bar him from honor in his native State, among the best Christian people of Vermont.

A NEW PUBLICATION.

Next week the October number of Poultry Pointers, formerly published by E. B. Blett at Farwell, Michigan, will be issued from the press of the Herald Publishing House. Bro. Blett is to take the place of superintendent of the college farm and as he is a practical poultry man, this industry will be given special attention. He will continue as editor of the journal, but as he has turned it over to Graceland College it will be published in the interest of the Industrial Department of that institution.

The journal, which sells at twenty-five cents for the year, is a splendid help to those keeping poultry, and the knowledge gained by a careful reading will more than justify the small outlay for subscription. It is hoped that the list of subscribers will multiply until Poultry Pointers will be one of the leaders.

Send your subscription to Herald Publishing House, Lamoni, Iowa, who are the publishers.

A TRIP TO CANADA.

Elder F. B. Blair will leave Lamoni next week to attend the conference at Chatham, London, and Toronto, in the interest of the church publishing department. He will take with him a trunk full of church books for sale and will give receipts for subscriptions to all church periodicals. Old subscribers can renew and new subscribers can make a beginning.
