NOVEMBER READING.—CONDITIONS THAT FAVOR BODILY GROWTH

Sleep

FOR REPAIR OF TISSUES

Sleep is necessary in order that the body, and especially the brain and nervous system, may be renovated by the formation of new tissue to take the place of that which by use has lost its normal characteristics. For the substance of the brain is consumed by every thought, by every action of the will, by every sound that is heard, by every object that is seen, by every odor that is smelled, by every pleasurable or painful sensation; and so each instant of our lives witnesses the decay of some portion of its mass, and the formation of new material to take its place. When we are awake the expenditure exceeds the income, but when we sleep, the balance is restored. . . .

"The same effect is of course produced upon the other structures of the body, but this is not of equal importance as regards them, for while we are awake they all obtain a not inconsiderable amount of rest. But for the brain, as a whole, there is no rest except during sleep and even this condition is only one of comparative repose. . . . The movements of the heart, of the respiratory muscles, of secretory and other organs, (all requiring the expenditure of brain power) are rendered less active by sleep, and during this condition the nervous system generally obtains the repose which its ceaseless activity during our periods of wakefulness so imperatively demands."—W. A. Hammond.

TO CLEAR THE MIND

"Besides acting to recharge the batteries of life, sleep has a settling and confirmatory influence upon the mental activities which precede it. To 'sleep over a problem' is a means of transforming a chaos of puzzled mentation into order and clarity. The learning processes which are initiated during the work of the day take deeper root during the hours of sleep. In sleep life purposes may mature and ideals take shape."—Professor Lewis M. Terman, in The Hygiene of the School Child.

TO PROTECT FROM POISONING

Doctor W. H. Burnham, of Clark University, one of the highest authorities in matters of hygiene in this country tells us that in addition to furnishing the opportunity for repair of the tissues, sleep is a protection from poisoning by hypnotoxin which accumulates in the brain when we are awake. He holds that cerebral fatigue is due to the accumulation of this toxin, which is really dangerous to life if sleep is put off too long. The toxin accumulates during all our waking hours whether we exercise or remain quiet.

FURTHER SUGGESTIONS FROM DOCTOR BURNHAM

"We sleep to prevent exhaustion. Anything that interferes with sleep should be prohibited.

"Since nature develops the instinct of sleep to avoid fatigue it is better to prepare for a hard day's work by a long night's sleep preceding it than to take extra sleep after becoming fatigued. This would save one from nervous breakdown and add to his working power. One of the most effectual means of preventing nervous breakdown is to sleep a great deal.

"There is danger in working at too high pressure so that sleep becomes broken or one can not sleep at all. The quality of sleep is important. There should be complete relaxation."

All authorities agree that a sufficient amount of sleep is essential for efficient activity either of the mind or of the body.

NEED OF THE GROWING CHILD

The foregoing paragraphs show the necessity of sleep as it affects the adult or completed human organism. It is not difficult to see an added significance in this requirement of nature in its effect upon the growing child. Not only must the wasted tissues be repaired, but added tissue must be built, and the constant activity of childhood leaves little opportunity in waking hours even for repair. When, after recognizing this demand, we are made to realize that a poison acts upon the tender brain cells unless counteracted by the needed amount of sleep, then we understand why much emphasis is laid upon giving children a proper amount of sleep.

One writer says: "Many persons are rendered irritable as soon as they become sleepy, and children are especially liable to manifest ill temper under the uncomfortable feelings they experience when unable to indulge the inclination to sleep." A writer in the Mother's Magazine tells of a boy who was stubborn and disobedient while taking insufficient sleep. When his hours of sleep were increased he became obedient and cheerful.

We have seen in former studies that the greatest rate of growth occurs in the first few months of life, the first month exceeding all later periods. To meet the demand of this growth we find the normal infant sleeping from twenty to twenty-two hours daily in the first month of its existence. Of the sleep of the infant the United States bulletin, Public Health Supplement No. 10, on "The care of the baby," says:

"Every baby needs twenty hours of sleep a day in its first month and not less than sixteen up to the twelfth month of its first year. It should sleep alone, not in a cradle but in a crib. If no crib is available, a clothes basket or a box of sufficient size is a good substitute. An expensive mattress is not necessary. A simple mattress made of excelsior and covered with a heavy blanket will answer very well. A sufficient quantity of clean bed-clothing should be provided.

"The room should be darkened and well ventilated; the windows should always be open at the top at least six inches, except in the coldest weather. If the baby cries when it should be asleep, it is probably sick, overfed or hungry, [or possibly thirsty].

"All children should take a nap of from one to two hours in the middle of the day until they are six years old."

AMOUNT OF SLEEP NEEDED

Tables, giving the number of hours of sleep for children of different ages, show two authorities, Bolton and Duke, setting the amount required at thirteen and one half hours for the age from five to six years, decreasing about one half hour for each year until reaching nine and one half hours at fifteen, then falling off more gradually to eight hours (the accepted average of sleep required by the normal adult) at twenty. Other authorities consider these hours too high for the given ages. However, Dr. Burnham says that most investigations show that children sleep too little. He tells us that ten hours of sleep should be the minimum for the growing girl or boy and he advises that the hygiene of sleep be explained to children to increase their willingness to sleep when they ought.

Let us recall that the second period of rapid growth occurs at the time of puberty in the years from twelve to fourteen.

Doctor Bolton says, "Without a doubt, a large percentage of the cases of nervous breakdown reported among high school pupils can be traced to irregular, inadequate and unrefreshing sleep."

The data secured by experiment have shown that loss of sleep causes a decrease in the number of red corpuscles, the oxygen carriers in the blood, "while the beat of the heart is accelerated to compensate for the poverty of the blood."

In regard to the amount of sleep needed Professor Terman says: "In all probability, the wisest course is for us to make the conditions such that the child will sleep as many hours per day as he wants to sleep. We should avoid either abbreviating or unduly prolonging the sleep beyond this standard. Liberal allowance should also be made for individual differences. There are probably physiological idiosyncrasies which make nine hours for one child equivalent to eleven hours for another."

With grown people still greater variations in the amount of sleep required have been observed. In some instances five hours of sleep have seemed sufficient to bring about complete recovery even after a day of severe mental strain, while in others any less than eight hours has been found detrimental. In some conditions "both body and mind may for many years withstand with apparent success a real and considerable sleep deficiency, while at the same time the reservoir of energy is being insidiously depleted. It would be rash to infer that a mode of life is safe because it does not produce immediate and evident injury. The factor of safety must be kept intact. We want not merely the strength to do the average work of each day, but we need to keep the reservoirs of energy well supplied, so that we may withstand the sieges of deprivation, disease, accident, and overwork which are almost inevitable."

HOURS OF RETIRING

The Lord has given commandment that we should retire to bed early that we may not be weary and also that we should arise early that our bodies and our minds may be invigorated. Unless we do retire early it will not be invigorating to arise at an early hour. As one writer says, "If we do not take sufficient sleep, we are burning our candle at both ends, and we are in the position of the spendthrift, whose receipts not being sufficient for his extravagances, makes inroads upon his capital."

Especially is it necessary for children, if they must arise early that they should retire early. It is undoubtedly better for them to sleep until they awaken spontaneously, but various disturbing causes may interfere with morning sleep, even if they are not called, and it is held that the best sleep is had in the early hours of the night. Regularity in keeping to an early bedtime hour in babyhood will help to establish the habit for the years of childhood that are to follow.

CONDITIONS OF CHILDREN'S SLEEP

Good ventilation is a large factor in securing the best quality of sleep. In fact it is claimed that outdoor sleeping excels any other in its invigorating effect. "Temperatures much above sixty degrees are unfavorable both to quantity and quality of sleep; hence children sleep more in the winter than in the summer. The late sunrise of winter mornings exerts an influence in the same direction. Some children sleep poorly from insufficient protection from cold"; others from being covered too warmly.

Improper diet is one of the most important of the internal conditions that influence sleep. Engagement of the stomach at the evening meal is especially unfavorable to sleep.

Scientific experiment as well as common observation established the opinion that tea and coffee induce sleeplessness in many men and women. And yet many children are permitted to use these stimulants. "The experiments of Hollingsworth show that one cup of coffee for the seven-year-old child is equivalent to three cups for the average adult. Even this may understate the facts, since it is probable that the child's body does not adjust and become habituated to the evil effects of drugs as well as the body of the adult. . . . Hundreds and thousands of school children in the United States are kept in a constant state of semiintoxication by the use of coffee and tea."—Terman.

"Children should never, in any case, drink wine, alcoholic liquors, tea or coffee—in other words, stimulants, which are poisons to their childish organisms."—Doctor Montessori.

"The nervous child is notoriously a bad sleeper. Such a child is likely to be obsessed by fears, tormented by absurd pangs of conscience, excited by an overactive intelligence, or worried by trivial happenings which would be forgotten by the normal child in a few minutes. Religion-bred fears, fear of the dark, and vague, indefinable anxieties haunt the evening hours of more children than most of us suspect; for children learn that it is pleasanter to bear many a secret pain and sorrow than to hazard reproof and misunderstanding by imparting them to unsympathetic elders."

The importance of sleep as made evident by the teachings of science makes it worth while to see that children go to their beds in condition both of mind and of body to favor repose. Instead of being disturbed by religion-bred fears, they should feel the comfort of religion both in their own thoughts and as it surrounds them in the atmosphere of love and cheer that pervades their home.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYER

A sister in Missouri, whose husband is a drinking man, desires the prayers of the union that the Lord will give to him moral strength and greater determination, such as shall enable him to overcome this terrible habit. He is not a member of the church, but she loves the gospel, and her hope is in God.

Higdon-Young Debate

Brother Amos T. Higdon came here by special request, as I felt that some good could be accomplished. He preached the gospel in an affirmitive way, saying nothing about the church of Utah. One night he preached concerning Zion. He showed the land of Zion to be in Missouri, and spoke with reference to the school in Zion. He showed that there was to be a house built unto the Lord in the land of Zion. He showed that the land was to be had in purity of heart. Upon this land was the city of Zion to be builded. Sidney Rigdon was to write a description of this land, that was in the State of Missouri. At this time there was already in the hands of the Saints sufficient to secure the land promised.

This was too much for our Brighamite friends. At the close of the service Elder Young, a grandson of John Lee, asked permission to say a few words, which was granted. He contended that the Reorganization, established through such men as William Marks, J. W. Briggs and Zenos H. Gurley was very unstable, and without authority. This was all he could say. He made no attempt to show where these men repudiated the principles as given to the church and recognized during the life of the Martyr.

Our Brother Higdon then spoke, showing that polygamy was not taught by the church; rather was it denounced, even as late as February 28, 1844. He stated that if Elder Young wished to discuss the proposition further they would enter into a written agreement. Elder Young replied that he would like to do this. The propositions were drawn up and arrangements made for the discussion.

Elder Higdon affirmed that the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints of which I, Amos T. Higdon, am a member, is the true and lawful continuation and successor of the church organized April 6, 1830. Elder Young affirmed the same for his church. The discussion covered two nights of two thirty-minute speeches each, being held in the Kirtland Brighamite church.

Elder Higdon in his first speech showed that the president of the priesthood was to be ordained by proper direction, and that the successor to Joseph Smith the Martyr was to be appointed by himself. The blessing pronounced upon Joseph showed that this successor should come from his own seed. He showed further that our President Joseph Smith was appointed by his father at Nauvoo, and that he was ordained by the direction of the General Conference, therefore was his appointment in harmony with the law.

In his first speech, Elder Young dwelt mostly on baptism for the dead. He contended that William Marks and others had no authority to ordain. The contention of the churches with reference to temple building were discussed. Brother Higdon showed that a commandment was necessary before building.

On his own proposition Young endeavored to show from a statement by Wilford Woodruff that the president of the Reorganization was not set apart by leading men of the church. Elder Higdon replied by showing that the First Presidency was composed of three high priests, ordained to that office. He asked who ordained Brigham Young. Answering the contention of Elder Young that Joseph Smith had not been true to the testimony of his father, our brother showed that he was true to this testament, and that it was Joseph F. Smith who was untrue to the testament of his father. Elder Young contended that since Joseph Smith had ordained Brigham Young to be an apostle, that gave him the right to be president of the church. Elder Higdon referred to the statement of Brigham Young when he asked who had ordained him to be president. Since he had received no ordination he was not president.

Elder Young attempted to defend polygamy as a righteous practice, reading from their revelation on plural marriage. He referred to the blessings of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, Moses, David and Solomon. He tried to show from Book of Mormon, Jacob 2, that the Lord would command his people otherwise.

Elder Higdon showed that the Lord did not give Hagar to Abraham; it was Sarah who did so. It was Laban who deceived Jacob, and not the Lord who gave him Leah. Elder Higdon strengthened his position by reading from Book of Mormon, Jacob 2, where the Lord stated that the wives and concubines of David and Solomon were an abomination in his sight, and where it is stated that a man shall have only one wife, and concubines none.

This place is headquarters for the Utah church in New Mexico. They still teach and practice polygamy.

Editors Herald: I am an isolated sister, seventy-eight years old. I love this latter-day work. My faith in it is strong, though I have heard only a few gospel sermons since 1871, and that was in Portland, in 1911.

I was living in Caldwell, Idaho, when my husband died in 1910. I brought his body here and laid it away, as the most of our children were living here.

I have nine children living, all married, and I would be glad if an elder would come here and preach the gospel, that they might hear it and obey and go to work for the Lord. There is much to do, and helpers are scarce, or there would have been some one out here before now. There are thousands here who never heard the gospel preached. My own dear children, or the most of them, have never heard it.

I was baptized into the Reorganized Church in 1868, by George Smith, confirmed by him and Steven Woods, in Nevada. I take the HERALD and Ensign. It is a great comfort to me to read them. I give them to anyone who will read them, though I do not find many who like to read what I do, but I am going to keep trying to do what I can for the work of the Lord.

When I look back over my life and see how I was left here on the earth an infant, my father dying when I was three weeks old, my mother following him two weeks later, I being their first child, and see what I have gone through these many years, and yet remain as well and strong as I am, I can not help but think that I was left for some good purpose. If so, I am ready and waiting to do whatever there is for me to do.

I ask the prayers of the Saints, that I may hold out faithful to the end. Now think of me, dear brothers and sisters, isolated so long, and I have not found anything that interests me like this gospel work. And I hope to hear it preached again soon.

An isolated sister,
MRS S. C. YANCEY.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, September 22, 1914.

Editors Herald: In a Dutch paper printed in Chicago, Illinois, under date of September 19, 1914, we find an article discussing international peace and written by Elder S. N. Duijzers of the Reorganized Church. In this article our brother sets out the teachings of the church with reference to peace, indicating that this teaching is the only true way to the "peace of Christ." He invites readers to come and search after the truth of his statements.

Elder David Dowker and Brother Duijzers, church missionaries in Chicago, are endeavoring to secure a building in the center of the Dutch settlement here, where Elder Duijzers would preach in both English and Dutch. A good-sized congregation is awaiting him and his work. Although suffering from illness, Brother Duijzer expects to put in all of his time translating our tracts and in providing a Dutch hymnal.

TOPIE.

PARIS, TEXAS, September 20, 1914.

Editors Herald: We had the pleasure of attending our reunion at Avery, Texas, an account of which has been published. It was quite a success. The Saints at that place were wonderfully built up in the faith, as were those from other points. At the close of the reunion Brethren Harp and Chrestensen went to Dalbey Springs to do some preaching, assisted by Elder Frank Pollard, a young elder of Avery, and a promising young man. Elder J. M. Smith came to Detroit and preached a few sermons, and thence to Sylvan in company with Brother Allen. We announced preaching at my house for that night. We had a good crowd of earnest listeners, as we did the second night. We then announced preaching at a schoolhouse, but on account of rain we were disappointed.

We still held the fort at my house, and the next day announced for the schoolhouse, and were on the ground that night, notwithstanding mud and darkness. I phoned to Avery for Brother Pollard, and he came up and helped us. We closed with a full house and good interest. Brother Smith had to attend the reunion at Baileyville, Oklahoma, and Brethren Allen and Pollard returned home.

Not willing to give up the fight at that place, I announced meeting for last Sunday. I was there at the hour appointed, with no Saints present but my own family, and before a congregation of people of several different churches. It was my first time to try to preach. The Lord stood by and gave me great courage, and I spoke for an hour of the wonder of the resurrection of the dead, concerning which I was once in blindness, but now having been led into the light I tried to impart that light to others. At the close of the service I again announced for the next second Sunday, and so hope to continue on till the battle is over and the victory won.

We feel and verily know that the time is at hand when present conditions shall be no more. The war in Europe has caused no little talk, in this great cotton belt, where the staples of purple and scarlet are grown from the black, sticky soil. We admire the admonition given by President Wilson, and especially the spirit of prayer which he makes manifest. May God bless us all, is my prayer.

G. N. Cox.

ORLANDO, FLORIDA, September 18, 1914.

Editors Herald: This is our first summer in this part of the country. We find the days warm and the nights cool. We are just planting our gardens now. We have flowers, fresh fruit and vegetables most of the year.

I like Florida very well, but I long to hear a good Latter Day Saint sermon. One of the Utah elders called on me last spring and wanted to know what the difference was between their church and ours. He had told several of my neighbors that we were all the same. When I read to him the words of the Lord, from the Doctrine and Covenants and the Book of Mormon, his only answer was, "Well, the Lord sometimes changes his mind." I then reminded him that the Scriptures teach that God is the same yesterday, to-day and for ever. He promised to call again, but has not done so.

I believe there is a work to be done here. This is a nice place. They keep the Sunday closing law here very strictly. I pray that some day I may hear God's true words preached here. I ask the Saints to pray that my husband may accept the truth. He does not now see the need of it. I have a son nine years old who is in the church, and we both need your prayers.

In gospel bonds,

MRS. W. T. ENTRICAN.

ARNETT, OKLAHOMA, September 22, 1914.

Editors Herald: The reunion at Dunlap, Oklahoma, convened on Friday, September 4, at Kelleys Grove, a short distance from where the train stops, there being no depot as yet. Brethren J. H. Baker, the old reliable wheel horse of western Oklahoma, and H. F. Durfey were present, Brother Durfey only remaining a few days. Alvin Mooney, a priest, assisted during the fore part of the week. He was unable to remain longer, as he has an invalid wife. Brother Case was expected to be present, but sent Brother Joseph Arber in his stead. With all due respect to Brother Case, we heard some say he sent a mighty good substitute. We can truly say that with his quiet, modest way, Brother Arber made many warm friends among the Saints. And should it ever be deemed wise for him to break over the boundary lines again, he will receive a warm welcome from the western Oklahoma Saints.

The numbers attending at any one time were not large, but they were coming and going. As the Saints do not meet often, we were pleased to thus meet so many. Sister Sylvia Webb, now past eighty-two years of age, was present the last three days, having ridden forty miles in a spring wagon on Thursday to be in attendance. She never missed a service, not even Thursday night. Her testimony was cheering to the Saints, as very few of them have ever seen an early-day Saint. It is now seventy-four years since she was baptized into the church. She is one who has worn out, not rusted out.

Brother William Traut was ordained to the office of priest. He is a very exemplary young man, and we feel sure he will be a faithful servant.

The latter part of the week was rainy and windy, and the meetings were continued in a hall owned by Brother Sibels.

This could have amply accommodated twice the number present. As Brother George Swain had placed a cookstove therein, many ate, some slept and all worshiped here together.

I have had the blessed privilege of being at the reunions at Lamoni in the past, but I want to say, although sick and suffering from a general nervous breakdown, I have never enjoyed more the companionship of Saints, and never felt more blessed in the large congregation than among the young Saints at Dunlap. They are largely the fruit of Brother Baker's work, some never having seen any other elder until this reunion. Brother Joseph Arber remarked (not with any degree of jealousy, but with approval) that in his whole life of service he had not before seen an elder who had labored so long in one territory and who was so greatly beloved, so highly esteemed among those with whom he had labored as was this gray-haired soldier of the cross. May God abundantly bless him for his work so faithfully rendered and the exemplary life he lives.

If numbers count, then our reunion could have been called a failure, but otherwise it could be called a success. I heard one brother say how glad he was he came here instead of attending the state fair, as he had intended to do. This I appreciated, as he was young in years, and with ample means to attend any such place. Another thing I was much pleased to see was our young men and women taking part in both prayer and testimony.

In conclusion I will say I was seemingly exhausted on Sunday, the last day of the reunion. In the evening I was taken to Brother Sibels' home and administered to by Brethren Arber and Baker, and special prayer was made that I should be able to return to my home. I rode the entire forty-four miles, feeling little or no fatigue; but when I reached my home I was unable to walk alone to the house, and was again prostrated. I am praying for patience and strength to endure until I may be again restored to my place in my home.

May God bless all the Saints, from our aged Prophet unto the least, and help them to put their whole trust in him, although it be a cross that raiseth us nearer to him. With love for all his children, I remain,

Your sister in gospel bonds,

ELLEN SHERARD ADAIR.

News from Missions

Tahiti

We left our loved ones in Michigan, August 10, and started on our trip across the continent by way of Chicago, Omaha, Denver, Pueblo, Salt Lake City, and Ogden, reaching San Francisco about 9.30 p. m., Saturday, August 15, being met by Brother C. A. Parkin, Sister DeSalier and daughter. We were at once taken to the Netherland Hotel, of which Sister DeSalier is proprietress, where we were domiciled until the following Wednesday.

Our trip from Denver to Salt Lake City was very interesting to us as we had never seen the Rockies before. It was especially interesting while going through the Royal Gorge, as we had the privilege of riding on an observation car the entire distance. The immense perpendicular walls of rock, with here and there peculiar rock formations, gave evidence to us beyond any question of a doubt that there is a God, who is wonderful in power and works. It is a stimulus to our faith in him. The grandeur and wonderfulness of these things is so astounding to one who had never seen them before that it is impossible to express it in words.

At Salt Lake City we were royally entertained at the home of Brother C. Smurthwaite. While there we visited the Saints' church, which is indeed a credit to the branch. Here we met Burton McKim, who is a missionary in Utah. We visited many other points of interest, including the temple grounds of the Mormon Church. While visiting these grounds we were led to sense as never before the greatness of the latter-day apostasy. It is, indeed, sad to think of the great amount of money that is being expended for a cause that is so unworthy. For had not these been led astray much more aid might be given toward the redemption of Zion.

We left Salt Lake City on Friday afternoon, August 14, crossed the desert and went through the famous snowsheds, reaching San Francisco on the afore-mentioned date. Our stay here was an appreciated one for many reasons. On Sunday morning, August 16, we preached in the Saints' chapel, and also attended young people's prayer meeting. In the evening we were piloted across the bay to Oakland, where we attended Religio and preached afterward. Here we met Brother Roy L. Parker and wife, Brother Parker being a missionary in that city. One or two days before leaving San Francisco we met Brother M. A. McConley, late returned missionary from Hawaii. We enjoyed his association, although it was for a short time. The kindness of the Saints in these two places will not soon be forgotten by us. Brother Parkin was kindness personified in assisting us to make arrangements to sail.

We boarded the boat Moana, Wednesday, August 19, at 11 a. m., and amid the waving of handkerchiefs and loud good-byes we sailed out into the bay. We did not go far, however, before we noticed they were anchoring the boat, which was due to the fact that there was a German war vessel waiting outside the bay for us. At least we were told this was the reason. We laid at anchor until the next day about 6 p. m., when we left with all port holes and doors closed. We sailed out through the Golden Gate and took our last look at American soil, perhaps for a number of years.

About eight or nine o'clock in the evening a peculiar feeling took possession of us. It is impossible to describe it, and only those who have had like experiences can fully understand what it was like. Only one or two meals were missed, so we considered ourselves very fortunate.

After we had been on board for a few days we learned that the wireless operator was a Latter Day Saint, Brother Arden D. Logeman, of Independence. We felt more at home to find that we were not alone.

We sailed a little over ten days before we sighted land, some small coral islands about ten miles away. At last we sighted the island of Tahiti. This was about 6 a. m. September 1. We were met at the wharf by Brethren May and Christensen, who at once piloted us to the mission house, thence to the chapel in the rear, where the Saints were assembled to give us a reception in welcoming us to their mission. As soon as we entered the chapel the Saints arose and commenced singing in their peculiar tongue, after which the president of the district delivered a speech of welcome, to which we replied. The spirit of welcome was manifested to a great extent by them, and we could not help but feel at home, although they seemed very peculiar in their customs and manners. We assure you we were glad to reach our destination, after the trip of about three weeks.

The natives were very anxious for us to preach, so much so that they announced us to preach the first evening, which we did, and for the first time to the natives of the South Seas. It was our first experience in preaching with an interpreter. Brother May acted as such. The following Sunday we also preached with good liberty, evidencing to us that the Master accepts these as his children.

Since meeting the Saints here we have had a feeling of love for them, and a desire to assist them has been given us. Notwithstanding their peculiar ways they manifest a spirit that is well worthy as an example. Their earnestness in the gospel is far in advance of some of our Americans. I do not believe their faith in the gospel and church could be stronger. We were surprised to see the understanding they have of the gospel, and how well posted some of them are. We learn that some of the native elders here are very good preachers, yes, as good as some of our American preachers. It is a strong evidence to us that they have been enlightened by the Master's Spirit.

One very strange thing they do is to give away their children to other natives, or to some one they especially like. They consider it an honor to give them to an American missionary. This of course seems strange to us, but it is not nearly so bad as it is to resort to some of the things that so-called civilized nations do. While the natives have very queer traits along this and similar lines, they are not guilty of infanticide, and many other things equally as bad, which can not be said for civilized America. We look upon their customs as being wrong because we have not been confronted with them so much as we have the evils of America. In many things they give worthy examples, and it would not be out of place for other nations to accept them.

Tradition has taught them that it is not wrong for man and woman to live together without a marriage ceremony, and thus raise families. While this, to us is not right, it does not occur as being so bad as it is to disgrace the marriage relation as many nations do in courting divorces and kindred evils. When natives agree to live together in this way they do not forsake each other, as a usual thing, but remain together through thick and thin, in fact, the white man is guilty of bringing the many diseases here that are found among them. Looking at it from all sides, the white man is as deep in the mire, if not deeper, than these poor creatures are.

The next Sunday after reaching here we had the privilege of baptizing for the first time in the great Pacific. Peculiar changes come to us in life. Little did we think a few years ago that we would be baptizing in the Pacific Ocean on this side of the equator. Our impression thus far is that the natives hold the ordinances of the gospel very sacred.

Last Sunday, September 13, we went out to Heberona, a branch about two or three miles out on the beach road, and attended their services. They were looking for us, hence preparations had been made. Shortly after reaching there Brother Christensen preached, and at the close of the service we were presented with a quilt and a purse of eight dollars. In about one half hour after this service we preached to them, after which we all went over to the himine house, where an excellent feast was spread for the missionaries and their wives. In one end of this building was a table and seats for us, while the natives sat on the floor, with leaves for table-clothes. This himine house is used for their song services, Sunday schools, and discussions, as well as feasts. They hold that the dedicated church is a sacred place.

While we were at Heberona we thought of the rejoicing there must have been when Brother Griffiths was privileged to lead them into the waters of baptism after they had been out of the church for a number of years. These Saints are among the best of the Saints on the islands, and through the kind labors of Brethren May, Griffiths, and others, they were finally brought back to the fold. While in their midst we felt the Master's Spirit evidencing to us their acceptance by the Father. There are some very bright men among them, and good workers for the cause.

The natives all have great confidence in their missionaries from the land of Zion. They seek our counsel in nearly everything, and usually when we give our decision on a thing they will abide by it. It brings to our minds forcibly the need of living close to God so as to be worthy of divine direction and wisdom in every act and teaching.

At present we are busy studying the language, and helping in the printing office. We hope soon to be able to preach to them in their own tongue. We trust for the Master's aid in this direction, and we are sure we will have it if we do our part humbly and prayerfully.

We expect to take a trip around to the different islands with Brother May in a short time. Hoping and praying for the onward march of the Master's cause, we remain,

Your brother in Christ,

CLYDE F. ELLIS.

Southeastern Illinois

This has been a very busy season so far, and the chances for labor seem never to end. I have not lacked interest in this department of church work that I have not written, but the thought has been entertained that others might write and save the preacher from telling the events in which he has been conspicuous. Never before was the writer so constantly engaged in preaching. As I look back over the summer's work, it seems like one long, protracted meeting. I have been greeted with good-sized audiences to speak to, as a whole, and I have not failed to have patient hearers wherever I have been.

I question the propriety of keeping so many of our experienced seventies in fields sparsely settled, where if they get a dozen out to hear they think themselves lucky, when riper fields are waiting, and opportunities are knocking to come in and occupy to so much better advantage. So far I have only baptized five, yet I feel the measure of good is not altogether determined by this. I am confident many have heard who were never before greeted with the message.

I can testify of a truth God has been with me in my efforts to build up the kingdom. It is with profound gratitude I bear witness to this fact, for nothing fires a man to further activities like the daily consciousness of the Spirit's blessing. Listless, indeed, would be our interest in the good cause were it not for the little glints of divine sunlight that cross our path. I have been made to rejoice many times because of this beaming grace and love which God has shown to me, his erring and faulty servant. It is that which has given me hope and nerved me for a better sacrifice. It has taught to me a more full realization of duty.

It sometimes takes suffering and grilling experiences for us to learn some things to become acquainted with God's power and goodness. Like Abraham Lincoln, I can truly say, "I have been driven many times to my knees by the overwhelming conviction that I had nowhere else to go." I have received much comfort from my prayers, and I have no hesitation in saying it is one of the greatest of duties, and no man should evade it.

The pathway at times has been difficult, for it is hard to think lowly of one's self. We so often shirk the trial, and do not always want to give in and endure. By reason of wordly environment we do not always long after perfection, and carry a tender heart. Yes, the passion for better things is not always upon us, to sweeten human life and to be true to our highest ideals. Dost thou still retain thine integrity? is a potent question to all Israel to-day. Integrity is the basis of all high ideals in man. Other virtues are essential and add to our quality, but integrity is an essential requisite, in the presence of which all other possessions are but secondary.

The summer in these parts has been very hot and dry, and shortage of crops is reported from nearly the whole of the land of Egypt. I have preached in the open air nearly all summer, and reluctant, indeed, am I to go in the house as long as the hot weather lasts. The people, too, have seemed to prefer the open air, out under the trees, or in some commodious yard, to that of a hot, stuffy hall or church. I find this way is better than to be cumbered with a tent, which is expensive to buy and run, and is no small responsibility.

The district has a tent, but the fund for running it for some reason has been lank and lean. This has been the principal handicap. Some, no doubt have wondered why the tent has never been brought to their town. Brethren S. H. Fields, E. W. Sutton, who have had the tent in charge, no doubt have also wondered why contributions have not been forthcoming as per district conference resolution. They can't run the tent without means. So by reason of this fact the brethren have been considerably hindered in keeping it going.

The interest around Xenia and Orchardville seems to be growing. However, much opposition is met at nearly every town. The Brush Creek Branch, near Xenia, is an organization that has endured for upwards of seventy years. Brother William Clemmons is president. Here also resides one of the old veterans in the cause, Brother I. A. Morris, who has a clean record of gospel service of over fifty years.

At Orchardville I held forth in the old Free-Will Baptist church for ten nights, assisted by Brother Hilliard Henson, who is district president, and resides there. We had an audience of at least three hundred every night. This is the point where Brother I. N. White met and vanquished Clark Braden a few years back. The "Holy Rollers" or members of the Apostolic Church are infesting this region now. They are the people who speak in tongues and claim the power of God. The power they get seems to affect their muscular system more than it does their intellect. A few nights before I occupied in this church the boys had thrown eggs into their meeting, but they gave me the best of attention and respect. The Christian church at this place, which a few years ago was a flourishing community, is now dead, and their meeting-house is turned over to the bats and owls. Our branch here, the Poplar Creek Branch, is still intact, presided over by Brother Hilliard Henson. At Orchardville I was called upon to give an address to the G. A. R. post which I think did some good in allaying prejudice.

My meeting north of Claremont was only fairly well attended, owing to the busy season. Nevertheless, I think good was done. Some very clever and warm-hearted Saints live in this community. At Goreville my meeting, at least in point of attendance, was a success. I was assisted in this meeting by Brethren William and Frank Kelley, brothers to T. C. Kelley. Brother John Reed and wife at that place have gained the respect of their fellow townspeople, and have done much to maintain that opening.

In all, the points I have made this conference year have been Odin, Xenia, Brush Creek Branch, Orchardville, Cisne, Claremont, and three places in the environs of the Tunnel Hill Branch, which were Goreville, three miles southeast of Goreville and the Tunnel Hill Branch, and in the town of Tunnel Hill a few sermons. After spending a short time at home to rest up and see my family, I have returned and opened up a meeting at Belliar. This branch is presided over by Brother Shaw Harris, assisted by Brother L. M. Edmonds. They have a nice church, formerly moved from the old Kibby Branch. This is in the oil field.

I have felt well in the work, and have striven to become as efficient as possible in the presentation of the work. How well I have succeeded remains for others to tell. I have tried to follow a course of reading and study on the general evidences of the Christian faith, which I consider has been beneficial to me. However, it is hard to be systematic in such matters of study, for one is shifting about so much, and then the weather has been very hot and disagreeable. In the homes of the Saints and friends where we are domiciled we are expected to be sociable and spend some time in visiting. One thing these people down here in Egypt are noted for is hospitality and sociability. We have seen no Egyptian taskmasters, but we have seen a few Israelites, in bondage to sin.

The branches need regulation more fully in these parts, with a more rigid enforcement of law. We have long seen the need of more diligence in the regulation of branches. In my judgment, we are not in so much need of more seventies as we are of high priests, whose hands are freed to look after district work and the large branches. The trouble is not so much in the lack of competence on the part of the local eldership, as in that they have no sustenance only by their own labor. They simply do not have time to look after the work and give their attention to it, when they have to labor hard at manual labor for a livelihood. When Sunday comes the elder is worn out, and feels more like resting than attending to his spiritual duties.

War absorbs our attention these days, to some extent. Nevertheless, despite the stringent press censorship on news, the papers teem with accounts fresh from the battle front. We measure our civilization by the dissemination of intelligence. The newspaper is the handmaid of modern progress. One of the most dreaded things in the estimation of modern calamity, whether in fire or flood, is to be "cut off from communication" between those victims and the world at large. Yet in this greatest of all calamities of modern days, when all Europe is seething in a mighty war, there rests the censorship on intelligence which is hard to bear. Like swatting the fly, this time the "swat" is on the reporter. Nevertheless, we get enough news even as it is to keep us keyed up in expectancy for the next daily.

Judging from the rate things are moving it portends the time of the end. Pastor Russell says these are the skirmishes leading up to the battle of Armageddon, which possibly will be fought next month, for he has set the time for Christ to openly come upon the scene; but we hardly think Christ will come then, even if Mr. Russell has said so, for the gospel has not as yet been preached to all nations.

Evidently these are the latter days. In the face of the current facts of history, what becomes of the cry of "peace," "no more war," "international arbitration settles all disputes," and "the world is growing better"? An optimistic outlook on such matters is hard to maintain.

Let us contemplate the era of peace. Let us pray for the time of peaceful prosperity and progress on all lines, under a far better environment in that "ideal commonwealth," when "every man shall sit under his own vine and fig tree." Let us set ourselves to the task—the unfinished work before us, of making our Zion a refuge, a place of purity, peace and contentment, that we may have a legacy of priceless value when our Lord returns. Let Zion stand, and her beauteous ensign still wave; and may she even be emblematic of all that is pure, noble and just, all that draws closer together in bonds of closer union the brotherhood of saintly souls, and may she stimulate and inspire her struggling thousands to the issues and forces that are approved by Jehovah, to the duty that is greatest and the accomplishments that are the most lasting, until our Zion shall be "clear as the moon and fair as the sun and terrible as an army with banners." Then "out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem."

Let this vision of the future arise. Shall we keep it before us in our eyes of faith? It will indeed be a happy day when thrones have crumbled, and the aristocracy of the corrupt shall be no more, and justice and equality be our portion for ever.

My mission address is Xenia, Illinois, my home address route 6, box 119, Independence, Missouri.

Your brother in Christ,
S. S. SMITH.

News from Branches

Saint Louis, Missouri

In accordance with President Wilson's request, that October 4 be observed by all the churches as a day of prayer for peace to the warring nations, at our sacramental service such prayers as were no doubt considered to be in accordance with God's will were offered.

After our district conference, which convened in September at Alton, Illinois, Brother Christy held tent services there, and this, the first week in October, he is doing tent work in Oak Hill, Missouri.

Our Sunday school and Religio are progressing nicely. Brother Harold Burgess will be pleased to know that last Sunday's Sunday school attendance was one hundred and thirty-six.

The Children's Day exercises which were followed by a splendid discourse to the young by Brother Archibald were very good.

First Chicago, Illinois

Sunday was a very nice day, and was quite appropriate for the great peace demonstrations which took place in the "loop" district. Also it enabled some of our aged members to meet with us in the regular monthly sacrament service, which was a good meeting. The evening hour was occupied by our pastor, Elder James F. Kier, who in a comprehensive manner, discoursed on the apostasy. Both services were marked by the attendance of several visitors, which has been our happy experience for quite a season.

The Gospel Study and Social Club met in the afternoon, and after a brief testimony service, all speaking in regard to individual and collective benefits derived from the past year's activities, elected officers.

We feel well satisfied with our finance plan, as after our many deeds of sunshine (including furnishing flowers for the pulpit, which after service are taken to the sick) our treasury still contains about six dollars.

The Ladies' Aid Society are working hard with a view to holding a bazaar December 4 and 5.

Independence, Missouri

On September 20, the Child Welfare Department met in regular monthly meeting. The Study Club met to prepare for future work, on September 22, on which date, also, the union prayer meeting of the Religio home department was held, about twenty-five attending. The Spirit was present to testify of the good work of this noble society. At the Religio session on September 25, the program hour was devoted to war scenes. The bugle was sounded, America was sung, the cause of war was discussed, as was the war itself. October 4, prayers for peace were offered at all the meetings in compliance with the proclamation of President Wilson. On October 6, the Sanitarium Patronesses met for business in the welfare of that institution, concerning which the Saints will hear later.

On the evening of October 9, in Rosedale, a suburb of Kansas City, for the third time within a month occurred a flood. The hailstorm attending did much damage. Fear was upon the people, so that over three dozen families fled from their homes and took refuge on adjacent higher grounds.

In the light of all the grand truths presented from time to time by God's ministers, and the increasing intelligence bestowed upon his Saints, it is no wonder that our Prophet and President saw a glowing vision over fifty years ago of the consummation of the glorious work, and exclaimed, All Israel shall cry Glory to God in the highest be given, for he that is long-suffering and shall enter shall arise and shall bring again Zion!

The Bishopric

APPOINTMENT OF AGENT

To Whom These Presents Shall Come: This is to certify that pursuant to the recommendation of the conference of Eastern Montana District, Culbertson, July 25, 1914, B. D. Stratton is hereby appointed bishop's agent in and for said district, and authorized to act as such in and for the territory comprised in same.

We take pleasure in presenting Brother Stratton to the Saints and friends of Eastern Montana District and also bespeak for him the help of each friend of the work in his labor as bishop's agent.

The address of Brother Stratton is Fairview, Montana. Those who can not reach him in person can drop a letter to him at Fairview and they will receive due consideration and reply to same. Trust the Lord will bless and help the work, both that which relates to the temporal and that which relates to the spiritual in the newly-formed district.

Very respectfully,

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, October 13, 1914.

AGENT'S NOTICE

To Saints of Eastern Oregon, Unorganized Territory: This is to let you know that I am still bishop's agent for Eastern Oregon, and am anxious not only for the work of the church but for your own blessing and welfare. I am satisfied that those who do not pay their tithing will not be prospered, and eventually will be ruined financially as well as spiritually. The process may be slow, but inexorable. Hoping my experience may help some to put more trust in the Lord, I will try to relate it briefly.

I came here about eleven years ago, with not much more than enough to buy a team and wagon. I began keeping my books carefully and paying tithing, and in about seven years we had a home and a business, making a good living and a surplus in cash, my half (my wife is not a member of the church) amounting to about six hundred dollars, which I could have consecrated to the Lord; but, instead, I made an investment which promised big returns, and which enabled a brother and his family to gather to the land of Zion. Thus my eyes were blinded. We were worth four thousand dollars or more, and have been losing ever since, and unless things change it looks as though we will gradually lose everything.

The brother who went to Zion has had sickness and misfortune, and I heard is coming back. How I could have been so blind as to have made the investment I can not understand, when I knew and had taught that Bishop Kelley had called for the surplus six or seven years before, and had advised against investing or enlarging one's business. I would like to blame my wife for not advising me differently, but as she does not belong to the church she could not be expected to do so. But the fact remains that we have been slowly and steadily going down ever since, financially, and, I fear, spiritually.

Another consideration is the worry of not being able to decide what best to do, while things are going wrong and property slipping from one's grasp. Pray! I have prayed for guidance, but having offended God he has allowed me to suffer, and I see how I deserve it. It is terrible agony to want and need guidance and not be able to obtain it.

October 4 was set apart by General Conference as a day to take up contributions for Graceland College. I wish the special call of the Presiding Bishopric, appearing in SAINTS' HERALD of September 30, and in Zion's Ensign of September 24, might have appeared sooner. But even now let us try to help that worthy cause. Crops are harvested and threshing done. Let us now make effort and sacrifice, that we may enjoy with grateful hearts and clear consciences the day of Thanksgiving so fast approaching.

I am interested in the welfare of each one of the Saints of the district, but have been unable so far to visit you as I would like. If any are in need of advice perhaps the Lord will enable me to help you. Very little has been received from you this conference year, and as this is the "hastening time" we need to hurry.

Your brother in Christ,
H. E. MERRYMAN.

ENTERPRISE, OREGON, October 13, 1914.

To District Sunday School Officers

It is quite essential that district officers keep the general officers informed of conditions in their respective districts if good is to result from the work of the association. We suggest that when notices of conventions are sent in for publication in the church papers the address of the officer be given, as well as the name. If notice is given in some other way, kindly notify the undersigned of the date and place.

Book Reviews

THE NEW TESTAMENT, A NEW TRANSLATION.—By James Moffatt, D. D., D. Lit. Published by Hodder and Stoughton and George H. Doran, New York City, price $2.50. Doctor Moffatt is the Yates Professor of New Testament Greek and Exegesis, Mansfield College, Oxford. This is an attempt to render in modern English the New Testament Scripture. The following extract from Mark 11 will give an idea of the method of treatment: "Now when they came near Jerusalem, near Bethphage and Bethany, at the Hill of Olives, he dispatched two of his disciples, saying to them, 'Go to the village in front of you. As soon as you enter it you will find a colt tethered, on which no one has ever sat; untether it and bring it here.' If anyone asks you, 'Why are you doing that?' say, 'The Lord needs it, and he will send it back immediately.' Off they went and found a colt tethered outside a door in the street. They untethered it; but some of the bystanders said to them, 'What do you mean by untethering that colt?' So they answered as Jesus had told them, and the men allowed them to go. Then they brought the colt to Jesus, and when they had put their clothes on it Jesus seated himself. Many also spread their clothes on the road, while others strewed leaves cut from the fields; and both those in front and those who followed shouted, 'Hosanna! Blessed be he who comes in the Lord's name!'" must be the watchword when the housewife buys baking powder.

Alum is well known to be a powerful astringent, and should never be used in food.

Food economy now, more than ever, demands the purchase and use of those food articles of known high quality and absolute purity and healthfulness.

LOYALTY

Text: For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ: for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek.—Romans 1: 16.

The latter-day gospel is pure gold. It rings true. It has stood the "acid test" of time and persecution. It asks for and is worthy of the undivided love and loyalty of all Latter Day Saints. Adherence to an unworthy or mistaken cause may become fanaticism, but a worthy cause claims a fixed and unwavering devotion.

Our men and women must not forget that they are parts of a closely allied fighting force—the church militant. They should never disown their church membership, remain silent concerning their faith, when the times call for a defense, or fail to improve a good opportunity to do something to advance the work.

We can not excuse ourselves on the plea that there are no opportunities. There are more opportunities than we are willing to admit. The Lord has commanded that those who are warned should warn their neighbors; he will help us to make opportunities if we want them. The trouble is that we sometimes weakly shrink from improving a splendid chance to speak a word for Jesus and his kingdom as restored to earth.

We are prone to make concessions to the world. The world believes that we are fanatics, and we supinely concede the point and think to keep entirely still about our church membership in order to retain the good fellowship of our neighbors. How about the good fellowship of our God?

Our neighbor believes that we are wrong. We know that we are right! We have the scriptures, logic, and personal testimony on our side. Why should we yield an inch? When the test comes, let us not evade or retreat. If we tell our neighbor plainly what we are and why we are what we are, and back the statement up with a heartfelt testimony, standing ready to explain and defend our position, we will hold his good fellowship if it is worth holding; if otherwise, let it go. And there is always a fighting chance that we will win him into the true church and fold of our God and his Christ.

One young sister entered into a persistent correspondence on religious topics with a certain friend. She finally converted him and he became a Latter Day Saint, in time an elder, and in his ministry he converted and baptized probably at least one hundred and fifty people. The sister was Carrie A. Church, author of the hymn, "In the light"; the man was Elder Charles Brown. Both have gone to their reward, laden with sheaves, all because she was not ashamed of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the power of God unto salvation. Many such cases could be cited where by a resolute testimony and a fearless defense of truth one has been converted, and in the way thus opened (or through his ministry) hundreds have come in.

Can we afford to miss the golden opportunities that are around us? Our boys and girls, our young men and women, should be talking to their friends about the gospel, giving tracts, praying with and for those who are in darkness, living in and loving the gospel light. "'Tis a glorious thing to be in the light."

Our young men who hold the priesthood should be busy magnifying their calling, seeking opportunity to preach in schoolhouses, churches, or on the street corner. You are inexperienced? That is the way to get experience. Do not fear. We have a plan of salvation that is defensible. If you study hard and pray earnestly God will not leave you to be overthrown. He will help you to declare his word in such a way that others will be touched thereby. There are many honest people everywhere, and it will be the happy lot of some one to take the message to them. Will you go?

The world has a thousand devices to test the loyalty of the young Latter Day Saint. If a frown will not intimidate, a smile and a little flattery may prevail. Here is the test of character! Some stand proudly fast when among the home folks and with the people of God. When out in the world they adopt the customs of the world and are no better than worldly people. Such men and women are weak in character. The test of strength is to stand by the right when the right is unpopular.

We must be loyal to our profession and to our church. We can not join hands with the world. We never can meet the world on common ground until the world changes ideals, or the church abandons her ideals. We do not need to change our ideals. If we stand by them resolutely, in time the whole world must come to our standard. In fact, the world has to an extent changed its base. Things that we defended in 1830, and for which we were assailed, are now quite generally accepted. Things that we defend to-day will be accepted fifty years from now—possibly at a much earlier date.

We must be loyal in deed as well as in word. One man was reviling the Saints and declaring that they were an ignorant, fanatical, and dishonest lot. Another replied, "I know better than that. They are an honest, intelligent, and good class of people."

"How do you know that?"

"I have lived among them and had them for my neighbors."

That is the best possible argument in defense of our position. The ignorant, tobacco-stained, lazy "old settler" who lived (according to his story) in Kirtland, or Missouri, or Nauvoo, and now delights to paint his own picture when describing the Saints who lived in the days of Joseph Smith gets no encore when his audience has had an opportunity to observe the consistent, Christian life of a true Latter Day Saint. Be loyal all the time.

The Evangelical Free Church Catechism (London) says, "The essential mark of a true branch of the Catholic Church is the presence of Christ, through his indwelling Spirit, manifested in holy life and fellowship."

We admire the sentiment, and change the wording to read, "The essential mark of a true member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints is the presence of Christ, through his indwelling Spirit, actively manifested in holy life and fellowship."

GOOD ADVICE REPRINTED

IV.—HINTS TO ELDERS AND MEMBERS

Everyone who attends the prayer meetings where prayers are offered, with testimonies given, is anxious that the meetings shall be enjoyable and profitable to the Saints and others who may be present. It may be that a few thoughts and suggestions in respect to these meetings will be helpful in the way of aiding the presiding officer (who, of course, is to be a model of good behavior and spiritual presence) in securing a "good meeting."

1. Before starting to meeting, or on the way there, put from the heart every feeling of soreness and bitterness against a fellow creature, whether in or out of the church. He who prays, "Father, forgive me of my trespasses," must forgive those who have trespassed against him.

2. Be sure that you start from home in time to be in your place and hear the opening hymn and prayer. By so doing you will keep your appointment with the Lord, be free from the fretfulness usual on being late, and will not disturb the devotional spirit of others who may have been more prompt than yourself.

3. Enter the house of worship and prayer with the feeling upon you that it has been promised by the Lord that where "two or three are met together" in his name, "there he will be," and "that to bless"; hence, that in going to engage in prayer you expect the Lord to be there according to his promise; meet him in the proper spirit to receive his blessings.

4. Do nothing and say nothing that will irritate or annoy anyone in the meeting. Let all old grievances ("sores," as some call them) alone. Make no reference to what another has said or done to call out a retort; if you can say nothing good, better to be silent.

5. Open the door carefully and shut it without noise—don't slam it. If you are late do not go in during the opening prayer, wait until it is closed; or if the weather be cold go in quietly, but do not go to a seat, or the stove, but stand until the prayer is over.

6. Sit still in your place; avoid shuffling your feet on the floor, and keep them off the seat, or chair in front of you. Do not talk to your seat mates while services are being conducted. Do not cough, hawk, and spit, or blow the nose noisily. Do not laugh—no matter what takes place, keep sober.

7. When you desire to speak be sure that no one is on his feet, or kneeling in prayer, or speaking; rise, and be sure the presiding officer sees or hears you before you begin. Speak sufficiently loud for all to hear you; for while it is perhaps particularly essential that God hears your prayer, how can those with you say "Amen" to your prayer unless they hear it; or how can they agree with your testimony unless they hear and know what it is. Do not undertake to tell the whole story of your life, but cut your story short, remembering that if one occupies much time, others are prevented from speaking at all. Avoid vain repetitions, either of the names of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, or of any other name or word. Do not speak so loud or so fast that those listening to you can not understand what you say. You can be fully in earnest and still be quiet and gentle in both manner and speech.

8. An elder should by no sort of means take advantage of an opportunity to speak in a testimony meeting to preach a sermon, ventilate his views on any given topic, or to rebuke or "lampoon" some one who does not agree with him on doctrine, or in theory; let that sort of discussion be for other places. It would be just as pleasing to the Saints—possibly to the Master—if the elders would permit the Saints to use the opportunities of the prayer meeting while they use the pulpit; or if constrained to pray, or exhort, or testify they would do so as briefly as possible.

9. A man may say one hundred and fifty words in a minute, this is about the average; if then one person would use one minute only, sixty might speak in an hour; but if each occupied two minutes, only thirty could be heard; if five minutes, twelve; and if a man was thoughtless enough to use ten minutes, only six; if fifteen minutes, four; if twenty minutes, only three. It sometimes happens that two or three or four occupy all the time of the service, which invariably hurts the spirit of the meeting and causes dissatisfaction; and if one of these prayer meeting "bores" allows the habit to fasten upon him permanently, he will spoil nearly every meeting he may attend, unless, indeed, the presiding officer has the wisdom and moral courage to prevent or stop the waste of the time properly belonging to the Saints. It is a bad job for a prayer meeting when some uneasy elder mounts a hobby to ride it during the prayer service.

10. When you rise to speak in a testimony meeting don't waste the time in excusing yourself by saying, "I don't like to see the time go to waste," "I feel like saying, dear Saints," "I would feel condemned if I went away without bearing my testimony," etc. All such expressions take up time and spoil the effect of what one starts to say, or intends to say, and it would be better to say what one wishes to say than to tell the Saints, "I want to say, right now, and right here," so and so; etc. Of course, we remember that the Master said: "Take no thought what you shall say," etc.; but this was in reference to being brought before kings and rulers for the gospel's sake, and should not be made to apply to prayer and testimony meetings.

If the Spirit constrains you to speak, you should have something to say. If wisdom directs you to speak or pray, wisdom will suggest that you waste neither your own time, nor that of the meeting. If you have spoken once in a session, don't occupy the second opportunity until others are all done, or you have some special good reason for so doing. Don't tell the Saints that you have "just a word," and then ramble in talk for a quarter of an hour, or twenty to twenty-five minutes. Watch your presiding officer closely, and if he shows signs of uneasiness, you may safely conclude that the folks are not interested in what you are saying, and you had better stop and sit down.

11. Lastly: If anybody says something that may possibly be meant for you, or you think it is, do not rise and resent it; the presiding officer is there to protect your good name as well as all the rest, and he will notice any improper attack made on you; but if he does not, it is better, far better, to let it pass unnoticed. Think what would be a fact to you, that you are in the house of prayer, in the presence of the Lord, and that is no place for resenting an insult, or stirring up strife. Take no notice of anything of the kind—let it pass.—President Joseph Smith, in SAINTS' HERALD, vol. 37, p. 290.

CURRENT EVENTS SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

HAITIAN REBELLION.—The Haitian revolutionists have occupied Cape Haitien. The ministry of President Zamor retired on the dispatch boat Pacificque. United States marines were landed to control the situation. The revolutionists are said to be forming a new government.

WAR TAX PASSED.—The war tax bill as amended in conference passed both Houses and was signed by the President, on the 22d. A motion for adjournment of Congress was defeated in the Senate, for want of a quorum, and by senators from the cotton belt demanding action to relieve conditions there. Adjournment was reached on the 24th, the Southern senators failing in their efforts for legislation.

RAILROAD RATE INQUIRY.—In the inquiry into the affairs of the Rock Island Railway, in progress before the Interstate Commerce Commission, F. E. Sharwood, the commission's expert, stated that, with some of the entries unexplainable, the net results of his investigation had been that security holders had lost about thirty-five million dollars through the purchase of the Frisco system and its subsequent sale to B. F. Yoakum. Mr. Yoakum, testifying on the following day, placed this loss at seven million, five hundred thousand dollars. That security holders of the two Rock Island holding companies will probably lose their entire investment, in the forced sale of stock, was intimated by J. M. Wallace, president of the Central Trust Company of New York.

PORTO RICO LABOR TROUBLES.—The Free Federation of Working Men of Porto Rico, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, has presented to Governor Yogar statement and complaint with reference to unwarranted increase in the price of food-stuffs, and unemployment. The Insular Government is asked to prosecute conspirators in price raising, to institute municipal markets, and to consider the establishment of dependent families on Government land and privately owned, uncultivated land to be taken over by the Government, these settlers to be supplied with seed and public work until self-supporting. The Free Federation represents about one hundred twenty-three local bodies and ten thousand workmen.

RELIEF TO BELGIANS.—Through the cooperation of the United States, English and German Governments, distressed Belgians are to be furnished relief by America, via London. This action, involving the importation of supplies from a belligerent country, the American Relief Committee, headed by Brand Whitlock, minister to Belgium, having gathered food supplies in London for shipment to Belgium, is said to be without precedent in the history of warfare. Germany hesitated because of possible far-reaching effect; and Great Britain insists that the supplies be consigned to Mr. Whitlock, making certain that they will not be used by the German army.

RATE REHEARING.—A rehearing of the request for rate increase of the thirty-eight eastern railroads involved was on the 19th begun at Washington before the four Interstate Commerce Commissioners who last July joined in an adverse ruling. Daniel Willard, president of the Baltimore and Ohio, in urging the necessity of the increase so that prices of American securities held abroad might be upheld on the reopening of stock exchanges, when asked if this were not in effect a request that the railroads' share of war burdens be put upon the shippers, made no reply other than an unsupported denial.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—The convention at Aguas Calientes has voted itself the supreme sovereign authority of Mexico, and has appointed a committee of five "to assume the duties" of a cabinet in Mexico City, taking charge of the portfolios of foreign relations, war, public instruction, justice and finance. The delegates have taken oath to abide by a majority vote on all questions, including the form of government and presidential succession. This convention has assured the United States of immunity for Mexicans who have served the United States during the occupancy of Vera Cruz, and that customs duties collected at this port during said occupancy will not be reimposed. Pending the action of the convention, a truce has been declared at Naco, and the Mayorena troops have withdrawn to the south of this besieged town. The action of the convention thus far is taken as favorable to the stand of General Villa, who, on visiting the convention, was embraced by General Obregon and received with storms of applause. Report from Eagle Pass, Texas, states that the family of General Carranza has retired to Pieduras Negras, across the border from Eagle Pass, as a protection in case of developments unfavorable to him.

PROTEST SHIP SEIZURE.—The seizure by British vessels of the John D. Rockefeller, an American Standard Oil tank steamer, flying the United States flag and en route bearing illuminating oil from Philadelphia to Copenhagen, following seizure by the same power of the Brindilla and the Palatura, on a like mission for the same company, to neutral ports, and under the United States flag, drew from the United States Government a protest and request for release. The seizure of the Brindilla and Palatura, changed from foreign to United States registry under the recent congressional action, involved questions that might arise in connection with said registry, and was not protested. In the case of the John D. Rockefeller, under the United States flag before the European war was begun, these questions are not possible. The understanding of the British embassy at Washington is that illuminating oil, which may be converted into fuel for motor trucks and airships, has by Great Britain been declared contraband, notice of such action having not yet reached the powers, and that it was to prevent possible help to Germany through this means that the seizure was made. This case is similar to that of the seizure a short time since by England of copper-laden ships, en route from the United States to Holland, in advance of notice that copper had been declared contraband, and which dispute was adjusted not by the United States abandoning its contention that neutral goods, in neutral bottoms, passing between neutral ports, were exempt from seizure, but by an understanding reached between the Dutch and British Governments extending the Dutch embargo to copper, used in the manufacture of munitions of war, and which England feared would pass into Germany.

EUROPEAN WAR.—Following their success at Antwerp and Ostend, the German forces in Belgium attempted to push on to the Belgian frontier and into France. The retreating Belgian army, save for that portion comprising Belgian soldiers and British marines and interned in Holland, joined the allies and by heroic action, supplemented by the British fleet, aided in checking the German advance along the coast and to the south of Ostend, the allies holding in the east as far as Armentieres on the border, and Lille, occupied by the Germans, in France. Eleven British vessels are reported to have been engaged in protecting the allied lines and bombarding the German trenches, fire from which is said to have killed the German general, von Trip, and staff. The English fleet was protected from German submarines by destroyers. Heavy fighting is reported from the North Sea to the Meuse. Austrian claims earlier in the week of gains in Galicia were followed by reports from Petrograd stating that Russia had advanced all along the line in Austria, when again Austria claimed gains in south Galicia. ### EFFICIENCY

It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. (Matthew 4: 4.)

Running like a golden thread throughout all the revelations of God to man is found the central thought and message, Come up higher. The unchangeable voice of God is repeating over and over again the same message to his church to-day. Perhaps it has been due to the whisperings of the "still, small voice" that many of us have made the necessary effort to attend this reunion, where our associations and surroundings are such as to be conducive to a higher order of thought.

God has said, "As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts." At one time man walked and talked with God in the Garden of Eden; but man sinned, and the fall, which banished him from the presence of God, was the inevitable result. Mercy, as well as justice, being an attribute of God, he has made it possible for man to restore himself to his former glory. The gospel ladder has been lowered to earth, and our loving Father is pleading with humanity to come higher, even into his very presence, that we may walk and talk with him.

A long and hard climb confronts all who endeavor to rise above the beggarly elements of this earthly life. The ladder is steady and unwavering, being founded upon the solid rock of truth, but the arm of flesh is weak. In the upward journey many must pass through dark clouds of doubt and unbelief, but it is possible to rise above them, as clouds are found only near the earth. The forces of the Evil One will send their soul-destroying darts against all who take hold of the ladder, but if they arm themselves with the whole armor of God the weapons of Satan will prove harmless to them.

EFFICIENCY

Efficiency signifies state of being competent, capable, qualified for duty. We have met to-day in the interests of auxiliary work. The object of the Sunday school and the Religio is to assist the church to bring souls to Christ and to build up souls in Christ. This is surely an important work, because we are building not only for this life, but also for eternity. Let each ask himself, "Am I competent, capable, qualified for duty? Am I an efficient worker for the Master? Have I armed myself with the whole armor of God?"

In Doctrine and Covenants 119: 8:

All are called according to the gifts of God unto them; and to the intent that all may labor together, let him that laboreth in the ministry and him that toileth in the affairs of the men of business and of work labor together with God for the accomplishment of the work intrusted to all.

In section 42: 12 we read, "Thou shalt not be idle; for he that is idle shall not eat the bread nor wear the garments of the laborer." The Church Recorder reported to the last General Conference that there were seventy-one thousand, seven hundred and two enrolled upon the books as members of the church. That means seventy-one thousand, seven hundred and two called according to their talents to be laborers together with God for the accomplishment of the "marvelous work and a wonder." Are you one of the seventy-one thousand, seven hundred and two upon whom this high calling has been placed? If so, now is a good time to examine yourself and determine whether or not you are "competent, capable, qualified for duty."

The Lord tells us in Doctrine and Covenants 11: 4, "No one can assist in this work, except he shall be humble and full of love, having faith, hope and charity." Again, we ask, are you one of the seventy-one thousand, seven hundred and two? If so, your presence at this religious gathering is taken as evidence of your desire to assist in the Lord's work. It is a good desire and one that should be carefully and prayerfully cultivated, as the Lord does not force anyone to assist in his work. He has endowed man with intelligence and given him his free agency. The statement uttered by Joshua is applicable to all, "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve;" and the Lord is pleased when we decide as did Joshua, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

QUALIFICATIONS

After the manifestation of a desire on our part to assist in the Lord's work, the first requirement above mentioned is "except he shall be humble." However bright one's talents may be, pride will disqualify him for efficient service with God. Perhaps this is why the Lord calls and chooses the weak and humble ones of the world to accomplish his peculiar work. God is all-wise and all-powerful, and is fully capable of directing his work. The limited wisdom and power of man can never accomplish it, worlds without end. The learned and rich ones of earth are usually too well satisfied with their own abilities and attainments to lay them to one side and say, "Thy will, not mine, be done." On the contrary, the poor and the unlearned will more often recognize their own insufficiency and be more dependent upon direction from on high.

It should not, however, be necessary for the Lord to withhold blessings in order to keep his people humble. With thankful hearts we should recognize and acknowledge God as the giver of "every good and perfect gift" that we may enjoy, and further prove our appreciation by laying our God-given talents upon his altar of service. By so doing it is possible to become polished shafts in the Lord's work. God does not desire inefficient servants. He usually calls those from the lowly walks of life because more often they are willing to follow the leadings of his Spirit and under its power and guidance be developed into efficient workmen that need not be ashamed.

"Full of love" is the second-named requirement in order to assist in God's work, but surely it is second to none in importance. The Master has said, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Again we are told, "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar; for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?"

The gospel is founded upon love. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life." It is evident, then, that gospel work is rightly termed "a labor of love." "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor; therefore love is the fulfilling of the law." "For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments; and his commandments are not grievous."

Faith, hope and charity are also mentioned as necessary possessions in order to be of service in God's work.

For the definition of faith, read the eleventh chapter of Hebrews. Also study the many inspiring examples of faith enumerated therein, and surely you will be convinced that without faith it is impossible to please God.

Paul says, "We are saved by hope;" and again he admonished all to put on "for an helmet the hope of salvation." The hope of eternal life held out in the gospel promises is to the true believer and follower of Christ an anchor to the soul both sure and steadfast.

"Now abideth faith, hope and charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity," we read in the 13th chapter of 1 Corinthians. Also:

Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing. And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing.

Comment might be carried along indefinitely, but we fear it would not be wise to do so, inasmuch as there is more in the word of God with reference to the subject assigned to us than it is possible to bring out at this time. The longer we consider the subject of efficiency, the stronger it appears to be emphasized and demanded in the teachings and principles of the gospel. In fact, it is the central theme and object of the gospel. In Ephesians 4:11 we read,

And he gave some, apostles, and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the Saints . . . for the edifying of the body of Christ: till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ.

Let us repeat, "till we all come unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ."

Referring to the gospel, the Apostle Peter says:

Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises: that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust. And beside this giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge; and to knowledge temperance; and to temperance patience; and to patience godliness; and to godliness brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness charity. For if these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. But he that lacketh these things is blind, and can not see afar off.

Do we lack faith, or virtue, or knowledge, or temperance, or patience, or godliness, or brotherly kindness, or charity? Inasmuch as we do, we are spiritually blind, which signifies incompetence, incapability and unqualifiedness for duty in the Lord's work.

Paul's admonition to the Ephesian Saints is also worthy of notice at this point:

Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. Put on the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the Devil. For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places. Wherefore take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand. Stand therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breastplate of righteousness: And your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace; Above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God.

A WAY TO PERFECTION

In Matthew 5:48 we read, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." This divine standard should be the ideal of all who desire to assist in the Lord's work. The nearer we attain to perfection in thought, word and deed, the more efficient instruments we shall be in God's hands for the accomplishment of good. We can not afford to dismiss from our minds the Master's command to become perfect and excuse our failings and shortcomings by saying that perfection is impossible of attainment. In the first chapter in the Book of Mormon, Nephi tells us, "I know that the Lord giveth no commandment unto the children of men, save he shall prepare a way for them that they may accomplish the thing which he commandeth them."

The Lord has commanded perfection on our part. There must, then, be a way provided whereby we may accomplish the thing which he has commanded. There is. It is the gospel way, sometimes called the straight and narrow way. It is so narrow that it takes a broad-minded person to walk therein.

Have you ever watched a tight-rope walker perform his dangerous feat? Apparently he performs his task very easily. But suppose one without any training should undertake to follow in his footsteps. Would he not quickly learn that it requires a very high degree of efficiency to pursue the straight and narrow pathway of the rope? In like manner, it requires efficiency for one to follow the Savior in the straight and narrow path revealed in the word of God.

We have but one perfect example of efficiency, and that is in Jesus Christ. He came down to this earth and took upon himself flesh and blood, was tempted in all things like as we are, but he always did only those things that pleased his heavenly Father. As workers together with God, this should be our ideal of efficiency, to be able to do only those things that please our heavenly Father. Not until we acquire divine strength and wisdom sufficient to do this shall we be perfectly efficient.

"Fierce and long may be the direful conflict, against the hosts of unbelief and sin," as we so often sing, but we are told that Christ was made perfect by the things he suffered. The story of his life is evidence that he was a man of sorrow and acquainted with grief. Satan offered him all the wealth and power of this earth if he would but bow down and worship his Satanic majesty, but Christ, commanding Satan to get behind him, moved along in the pathway of duty towards the accomplishment of the work intrusted to him and in due time was able to say, "It is finished." The great and important question now confronting us is, "How can you and I partake of the divine nature and develop unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ?"

THE GOSPEL SCHOOL

As a people we believe, and the Scriptures abundantly support us in the belief, that the everlasting gospel has been restored to earth for the last time to prepare mankind to meet their Savior. What is the gospel? Paul says, "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation . . . for therein is the righteousness of God revealed." Here Paul has explained what the wonderful saving power of the gospel is. It is righteousness, or, in other words, right doing. Sin is a violation of law, and the penalty is sure to follow. Righteousness, or right doing, fulfills law, and the blessing and protection of the law are equally sure to follow. In the gospel (the perfect law of liberty) the righteousness of God is revealed. God is all righteous, that is, in harmony with law; hence he is all-powerful. It follows, then, that inasmuch as you and I fulfill "the perfect law of liberty" we shall be living above and rendered free from "the law of sin and death." Of course, Paul was not ashamed of the gospel of Christ. There is nothing in it to be ashamed of.

The gospel is educational in the broadest and completest sense of the word. The true meaning of the word educate, as it comes to us from the Latin, is "leading out," not "pouring in," as many may suppose. Christ came that we might have life, and that we might have it more abundantly. Obedience to the life-giving principles and teachings of the gospel will develop men and women physically, mentally, and spiritually; and as they thus grow they will be led out into broader fields of activity and greater usefulness. The possibilities of advancement are unlimited, insomuch that the gospel may be truly called the highest school in the universe.

In this school the Holy Spirit is our teacher; truth is our textbook. "Truth is knowledge of things as they are, and as they were, and as they are to come." The promise coming down through the ages is: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." When we know the past, present, and future of all things, our wants and desires will necessarily decrease, because then we shall desire only those things that will be for our best good.

To seek first to build up the kingdom of heaven and to establish its righteousness, should ever be the guiding principle of our lives. We must "establish its righteousness" within ourselves, and in the degree that we do so will truth in its fullness make its abode with us, because righteousness and truth are inseparable companions. The knowledge of truth and the power of righteousness are the invincible forces which produce efficient men and women in the Lord's work. Lives that are thus guided and sustained will be crowned with peace, honor, and success, which this world can neither give nor take away.

BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD

ITS USE AND ABUSE

Go where you will among the Utah people, one of the very first accusations made against us of the Reorganized Church is, "Well, you people don't believe in temple building and work therein, in the way of salvation for the dead, marriage for eternity, endowments, etc." To the marriage charge we gladly plead guilty, as well as to some of the etc's. We will not discuss them at this time, however, but to the point: "Baptism for the dead by proxy," or in other words "salvation for the dead."

I quote from their own publications as follows:

Question, Why should so many temples be built?

Answer, Because that in them, they that are holy could be baptized for them that died without a knowledge of the gospel, and would in the same go through all ordinances to salvation and exaltation for themselves and their dead friends.—Danish Catechism, p. 103, par. 33 (published in 1860).

Their Elder M. F. Crowley, in speaking of baptism for the dead, said, "The millions who died without the gospel in this life must hear and obey in the life to come . . . thus salvation for the dead is a scriptural doctrine." (See Crowley's Talks on Doctrine, p. 172.)

Franklin D. Richards says on this subject, "Ordinances for the salvation for the dead require temples."—A Compendium of the Gospel, p. 45.

D. M. McAlister writes, "The restoration of the gospel which is God's plan for the redemption of all his children, would not be complete without this ordinance of baptism for the dead, which extends its saving power to all who have died without obeying that law in life."—The Great Temple, Salt Lake City, p. 24.

Joseph F. Smith, jr., says, "The spirit of Elijah's work which had rested so mightily upon the Prophet Joseph, continued with Brigham Young and the 'Mormon' people during their travels in the wilderness, and when they arrived in the valleys of the Rocky Mountains, the first commandment to them from the Lord was to build a temple to his name where the ordinance of salvation for the living and for the dead could be performed."—The Reorganized Church, vs. Salvation for the Dead, p. 7. (Also see Origin of Reorganized Church, p. 57.)

Every man and woman of the Brighamite Church with whom I have conversed upon this subject was in full accord with the above writers, and informed me that some had traced their genealogy away back into past centuries, yes, hundreds of years, and had afterwards gone into one of their four temples where they were baptized for their ancestry without knowing whether they had ever heard the gospel, believed and repented, or not, simply bulking them off to salvation in a haphazard way, contrary to law and good sound reason; a zeal without knowledge—false enthusiasm brought about by an unauthorized priesthood, hence the blind leading the blind until all so concerned tumbled into the trench together. Eight years ago I had the privilege of seeing two of their large temple work records which contained only about one half of the work of one lone man in one of their temples; the records containing his work in another temple I did not see. I took notice that he had not been able to attend to all of that work himself, but had employed male and female assistants to do much of the work for him.

Mr. — and his male assistant were baptized for the males, while his female assistants were baptized for the females; the rate of baptisms was generally fifty-six by each person per day. Said records were paged with twenty-eight lines to a page, and two generally filled four pages per day, making one hundred and twelve persons baptized for each day, or fifty-six per day each. They did their work usually on some certain day of each week, and week after week for months, until the number thus baptized for ran up into the thousands by the one person and his assistants.

Sometimes in baptizing for the males, Mr. — and his assistants filled six pages per day, making a total of one hundred and sixty-eight, or eighty-four per each person baptized. Once Mr. —'s assistant, filled six pages in one day, himself, having been baptized for one hundred and sixty-eight persons in one single day,—that is "going it some"; and it may not have been a very good day for the salvation of the dead, either. Persons thus baptized for received their endowments, husband and wife through proxies, their endowments included ordinations, but to what office is not stated. I did not count the names of all that had been baptized for in the two records I saw, but wrote for them and received the following reply: "First record, 1,372 males and 1,432 females. Second record, 1,820 males and 2,943 females, making a total of 7,567." The reader will note that they had an over supply of females.

The cost to Mr. — for doing and having the said work done, I know not, but last year I saw the records of two other individuals, and in looking them over I found that one had been baptized for something over thirty persons at a cost I was told of twenty-one dollars, for book clerk fee, endowment, and garments; and the other for something over fifty persons at a cost of a considerable amount more. But be that as it may, we shall not try to deny, or prove that baptism for the dead is improper, but are ready to confess with the foregoing writers and others that baptism for the dead is a saving ordinance, and pertains to the plan of salvation, if properly administered, and by proper and lawful authority, at the right time and place; but what of the following:

On the fourteenth day of October, 1913, I, together with a number of others, possibly fifty, more or less, took in the sights on the Temple Lot in Salt Lake City, on or about 11 a. m.

As usual, the authorities sent out one of their representative guides with us, who after entering the tabernacle gave us a very good and complete description and history of the same, as well as of the Temple without, and the ordinances within. Among other things he stated that in that and other temples they practiced the rite of baptism for the dead, and, to my great astonishment and surprise, he gave us to understand that it was not a saving ordinance, or salvation to them that were dead, but simply the fulfilling of the law.

After he got through with the lecture, he kindly gave anyone liberty to ask questions, and for fear that I had misunderstood him, I put the following question to him: "Did you say that baptism for the dead was not a saving ordinance, but simply the fulfilling of the law?"

His reply was, "Yes, sir," and he stated the same thing over again as given above.

Being somewhat acquainted with their history as a people, their temple work, etc., I know that he gave a very good outline of their faith and church work, with but that one exception; and thinking that there might possibly be a denial of same at some future time, I secured the address of some of the party present, to whom I wrote for statements, and received the following reply:

On October 14, 1913, while visiting the temple grounds in Salt Lake City, we were taken into the tabernacle and listened to a short talk by one of the Utah elders, and in speaking of the temple and its uses, said, among other things, that they baptized for the dead in there. That it was not a saving ordinance but just to fulfill the law.

I agree, however, with the writers, that baptism for the dead is a saving ordinance; but in favor of whom, when, and where can it be administered? Joseph the Seer gave his views on the subject as follows: "We may be baptized for those whom we have much friendship for; but it must first be revealed to the man of God lest we should run too far."

In the History of Joseph Smith, jr., for May 12, 1844, Millennial Star, volume 23, page 487, we read, "Where may baptism for the dead be administered?" Note the answer:

For it is ordained that in Zion, and in her stakes, and in Jerusalem, those places which I have appointed for refuge, shall be the places for your baptisms for your dead.—Doctrine and Covenants 107:11. Utah edition, 124:36.

Note the statement, the "places I have appointed [up to 1841] shall be the places," not Utah, Mexico, or Canada.

Question, Whom may they be baptized for? Those who have died without hearing the gospel, or those who have heard, and gone to the prison house, rejected?

Answer. The latter, after they have heard, repented, and accepted the plan of salvation when the same have been revealed to the proper authorities, and to none else. For proof, I wish to cite you to the Book of Mormon:

And if they will not repent and believe in his name, and be baptized in his name, and endure to the end, they must be damned; for the Lord God, the Holy One of Israel, hath spoken it; wherefore he has given a law; and where there is no law given, there is no punishment; and where there is no punishment, there is no condemnation. And where there is no condemnation, the mercies of the Holy One of Israel have claim upon them, because of the atonement: for they are delivered by the power of him: for the atonement satisfieth the demands of his justice upon all those who have not the law given to them, that they are delivered from that awful monster, death and hell, and the Devil, and the lake of fire and brimstone, which is endless torment; and they are restored to God who gave them their breath, which is the Holy One of Israel.—2 Nephi 6:49-55. Utah edition, 2 Nephi 9:25, 26.

For behold, and also his blood atoneth for the sins of those who have fallen by the transgressions of Adam, who have died, not knowing the will of God concerning them, or who have ignorantly sinned. But woe, woe, unto him who knoweth that he rebelleth against God; for salvation cometh to none such, except it be through repentance and faith on the Lord Jesus Christ.—Mosiah 1:107, 108. Utah edition, pp. 168, 169.

And these are those who have part in the first resurrection; and these are they that have died before Christ came, in their ignorance, not having salvation declared unto them. And thus the Lord bringeth about the restoration of these; and they have a part in the first resurrection, or have eternal life, being redeemed by the Lord. And little children also have eternal life.—Mosiah 8:58-60, Utah edition, pp. 196, 197.

For behold that all little children are alive in Christ and also all they that are without the law. For the power of redemption cometh on all they that have no law; wherefore, he that is not condemned, or he that is under no condemnation, can not repent, and unto such baptism availeth nothing. But it is mockery before God, denying the mercies of Christ, and the power of his Holy Spirit, and putting trust in dead works. Behold, my son, this thing ought not to be; for repentance is unto them that are under condemnation, and under the curse of a broken law.—Moroni 9:25-28, Utah edition, p. 617, pars. 22-24.

And now, in conclusion, we ask the question, To whom did Christ go and preach in the prison house? Was it not to those who had heard the gospel in Noah's day, having rejected the council of God against themselves? Was it not to those who found themselves locked up in the prison house? Was it not to those who were compelled to remain there until Christ who held the keys of death and hell—came to unlock the prison doors, and to whom he preached the gospel of repentance and baptism for the remission of sins? Whom do we as men send to jails or prison houses? Is it not the lawbreaker, and not the one who has broken no law? Would God be more unjust than men? And might it not be possible that children and people who died without law or the hearing of the gospel and who are permitted, through the atonement of Christ, to come forth in the first resurrection by reason of their innocence—might they not during the thousand years reign have the privilege of accepting and complying with its requirements?

The dominant church in Utah charge us of the Reorganized Church with having done nothing for the dead, but I am reminded of the fact that the same God that gave the command to discontinue that ordinance, baptism for the dead, for reasons then given away back in the forties, still lives, and we are quite safe in waiting for his appointed time to officiate in that most holy ordinance. And when that time shall come he will surely command his chosen and elect people. That he has not done as yet, so far as we know. If he has, will some one that does know be kind enough to tell us when, where, and to whom?

THE ADVICE OF MOTHER

We are familiar with the old saying: "A boy's best friend is his mother," and while this may be said of boys, it is equally a fact of girls,—this is, of course, with reference to earthly friends, for we all admit that Jesus is our best and that through him we receive all the mercies, love, and blessings of the Father.

If mother is our best friend, why is she so? We love her; she loves us. And what is it that prompts these loves? Our only answer seems to be, "It is naturally so." There is an instinct created within us to love mother, and within mother to love us, growing out of the great rule governing creation,—love.

Let us turn now to mother's advice. We all agree that we get good advice from mother. What prompts her to give such discreet advice? Back of it all is the love that she bears for us. Because she loves us she would not have us lie, steal, swear, injure others, or harm ourselves in any way. So she advises, "Tell the truth about it; take nothing that does not belong to you; keep your tongue and lips pure; treat others as you would be treated; do not eat too much of this or that which would injure; be in the home early."

Would you think for a moment that she means to deny us pleasures, or what we term a good time? Ah, sometimes we have entertained just such a thought, and this is one reason mother's advice is not heeded.

Her own experience has taught her—yes, and with her wisdom she has been able to see the folly and mistakes of others in not heeding the advice of mother. With these as her reasons, knowing the outcome of wrongdoing, she seeks to advise us that we go not astray.

Let us think of the numbers of times we have gone to her when in trouble (how many times it was too late!) pleading for her help, her sympathy, and her favor. Though she may say, "I told you it would be so," and reminds us of advice she had given, yet she loves us and is not slow to show that she does. Her heart aches—we have suffered the pain for the lesson—all too late to mend. Is mother's advice worth heeding?

Then let us heed her advice each time, knowing it is born of true love for us, and thus will we fulfill the command given to former-day Israel, applicable to us in latter days, "Honor thy father and thy mother," with the promise, "that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." Again, Paul admonished thus, "Children obey your parents in the Lord, for this is right."

Most of us are familiar with Whittier's painting of his dear old mother. The next time you see it, note the word picture of a mother which accompanies it: "It is a wonderful thing, a mother. Other folks can love you but only your mother understands. She works for you, looks after you, loves you. Forgives you anything you may do. Understands you. When she leaves you, her memory like a guardian angel is ever with you."

Of General Interest

SECRETS OF A SPEAKER'S POWER

From boyhood I have been interested in eloquence and oratory. They have had the place in my mind that music has in the minds of many. Public speech, in political gatherings, on lecture platforms, in deliberative bodies, in courts of justice, or in the pulpit, has always had a fascination for me, because of my interest in the manner and methods of the speaker, apart from the theme of his discourse.

When I have noted points evidently deemed worthy of attention by public speakers generally, I have often ventured to question a prominent orator as to his personal preparation, and as to his ways with an audience, and this has brought out points worthy of consideration by others. Orators, like audiences, have much in common, even though each one has its distinctive peculiarities.

The Honorable Henry C. Deming, a former mayor of Hartford, again an officer of the Union Army, and later a prominent member of Congress from the first Connecticut district, was an eloquent orator, with remarkable fluency and finish of impressive rhetoric in his ordinary addresses. On an occasion, when he had spoken with exceptional power and polish, as unexpectedly called on, without any time for special preparation, I asked him how it was possible for him to secure such apparent results of preparation without preparation. He said, in reply: "Whatever of finish my address on this occasion may have had was given it a long time before, with no thought of being used now."

Then he added, what I have never forgotten, as an important truth concerning the way of orators: "The difference between speakers, in what is called the power of impromptu speech, is the difference in the relative ease with which they recall previous exercises of mind."

That gave me the key with which I afterward opened many a problem of extemporaneous address.

TRIUMPH IN EXTEMPORE SPEAKING

At a convention some time later I heard the Honorable Henry C. Robinson, an able lawyer and a well-known orator, use a finished rhetorical figure of the sea and the surf and its influence and lessons that was profoundly impressive, as a fresh and striking as it was ornate and forceful. I went to him afterward and asked if he would tell me its history, for I knew it must have one. He frankly said in reply:

Two years ago the germ of that thought first came to me, as I was walking all by myself on the shore of the southern side of Long Island. I saw possibilities in it. I walked the beach thinking it over and working it up. When I went back to my room I sat down by my table and wrote it out fully with care. I folded up the sheet, and pigeon-holed the paper in my desk, and the thought in my brain. It was a figure that needed a special occasion, however, to make it seem just in place. I've watched for that occasion ever since. It came this morning for the first time. I thought, as you did, that it now seemed timely. That's the whole story.

Here was a deliberate recalling of a previous exercise of mind that was fitting to the occasion. Again I have found the unpremeditated recalling of such exercises of mind by orators as felicitous as the deliberate. When Senator Hawley, of Connecticut, was in the House of Representatives, he made a brief speech on the "Force Bill," in reconstruction days, which contained characteristic and eloquent utterances that thrilled and swayed his hearers. I read the report of them in the next morning's New York Tribune, as I was on my way to visit him in Washington.

When I saw him I expressed my admiration of his fervid eloquence. To my surprise, he said: "Chaplain, I had not intended to speak on that bill until ten minutes before I spoke. Mr. Blaine [the Speaker] sent down a page to say that if I wanted to speak next he would recognize me. So I spoke as I did."

"Do you mean to say, General, that such expressions as these," and I quoted two or three of the most brilliant ones in his speech, "were struck out at white heat, with no previous preparation?"

"Oh, no, of course I don't mean that. You will remember that this question has been in discussion before Congress and the country for now six weeks or more. I have written scores of letters on the subject to constituents who have been prodding me, and I have been talking it over day after day with keen-minded members. I have given my best thoughts on the subject their best expression, in one way or another. When I was on my feet for my speech I had to use these at a moment's notice."

There it was again. An orator must be prepared to give his best thoughts the best expression when he addresses the public, and to have the benefit of ample preparation—recently or long before.

STARTING RIGHT WITH THE AUDIENCE

If there be one thing more important than another in a speaker's effort to win his hearers, it is that he shall take his start at a point where he and they are in agreement, and not at a point of their difference. The rustic prophet of Israel asked a question long ages ago that is as pertinent and unanswerable to-day as it was when first spoken, "Can two walk together, except they be agreed?" Two can not walk together unless they are together; and in order to be together they must first get together; and they can not be agreed unless they have something in which they agree. This is important for every speaker to have in mind before he begins to address an audience.

When I was a young superintendent of a mission Sunday school in Hartford, there were in it scores of Roman Catholic children, and dozens of Jews. Of course it was necessary to be careful in dealing with such a gathering, lest we arouse their prejudices by unguarded remarks. One Sunday there came into the school a Protestant preacher who had been trained as a Catholic priest. He wanted to address the scholars. I told him the state of things there, and said that he must be careful not to say anything that would offend the religious prejudices of the young Roman Catholics. Looking at me with surprise, because I felt it necessary to suggest that caution to him, he said with true Irish wit: "D' ye think I'd be after h'avin' a stone into a flock o' birrds I wanted to catch?"

I felt that that man was safe as a speaker to a popular audience. I have often thought since then that it would be well if more speakers had his views of prudence, and his idea of winsomeness, when they began to talk to antagonistic hearers.

In the stirring times which preceded our Civil War the two great political parties were closely matched in Connecticut. William A. Buckingham, of Norwich, was the governor, and was a candidate for reelection. In the effort to defeat him the Democrats had taken up, because of his special popularity, Thomas H. Seymour, who had, in former years, been more than once in the gubernatorial chair, and had represented the United States at the court of Saint Petersburg. Colonel Seymour was a hero of the Mexican War. He was the popular idol of the young men of Hartford, where he belonged. There seemed to be more than a possibility that he would now draw away from the supporters of Buckingham, in Hartford alone, enough to turn the scale in the State as a whole.

When the canvass was nearing its close, Daniel P. Tyler, of Windham County, a grandnephew of General Israel Putnam and an eloquent popular speaker, came to Hartford to address the citizens on the issues of the day. The hall was crowded to hear him. Many of the admirers of Seymour were there, for many such had voted for Buckingham while Seymour was not an opposing candidate. To the surprise of all, after a few general remarks on the political contest as a whole, Mr. Tyler began his speech by speaking warmly of Colonel Thomas A. Seymour as a favorite hero-son of Connecticut.

No sooner did he mention that name than it was greeted with rounds of applause. This seemed to arouse and inspire him. He launched out in praises of the gallant soldier,—repeated the story of his triumph on the battle-fought heights of Chapultepec, and in the political field,—and gladdened the hearts of the Colonel's admirers with such evident appreciation of their hero that he seemed to leave nothing unsaid that they could desire. They were wild with enthusiasm.

"Connecticut honors her gallant hero-son, Seymour," he concluded. "She has honored him. She will honor him again. Connecticut never forgets her worthy sons who deserve honor for their deeds and their worth. But, God be thanked, Connecticut is not so poor that she must rob one worthy son in order to reward another. She will see to it, in the future as in the past, that Thomas H. Seymour is honored as he deserves; but she will not, in order to do this, tear from the brows of her honored son, Buckingham, the civic wreath which he wears so worthily, to bestow it on another, as if she could not render justice to both."

It seemed as if all present were swept along by this convincing argument. The friends of Seymour felt that the speaker could not say more for their favorite, or less for the governor whose record called for public approval. I felt that year, as I feel to-day, that very many voters in Hartford were secured in that crisis to the support of Governor Buckingham, by the orator who realized that they were to be led only by his starting right,—showing sympathy with his hearers at the beginning, and then appealing to a like spirit of fairness on their part toward one who had deserved their confidence and now sought their approval of his course.—H. Clay Trumbull, in The Sunday School Times.

NORTH PHILADELPHIA INSTITUTE

The Progress of September 25, published at Philadelphia, contains an interesting report of the work of the North Philadelphia Institute. Elder Walter Wayne Smith, pastor of the Reorganized Church in Philadelphia, is principal of this institute. We are also in receipt of their announcement for the season of 1914-15, the report of which is as follows:

The North Philadelphia Institute is an institution that North Philadelphia has reason to be proud of. Founded and maintained upon the principle that anyone who has been able to succeed, even in a comparative degree, owes it to the less fortunate to assist them in their endeavors. The motto of the school is, "For those who must work but are willing to study." And this expresses the broad view of those interested in this worthy work. It is primarily a matter of supplying the need of the young man and woman who have discovered their unpreparedness for life's battles, without regard to their station in life or religious affiliation.

This institution "is the fruit of the tireless effort of a small band of devoted workers, who, without compensation (except as the success of their pupils might recompense them) have striven for years to gather together and teach those who were compelled to leave the day schools and go to work, but who nevertheless were willing to study in order that they might advance beyond the mediocre in life.

The instructors in the institute have without exception given their time entirely free to the pupils who might seek their instruction. Service first has been the program, and the institute opens its fifth year upon this same basis. If there are those within the reach of the school who have been denied the privilege of day school, and who now feel that they need further training for more effective service, the North Philadelphia Institute stands ready to lend a helping hand. A fine body of self-sacrificing men and women with college and technical training, and experience in teaching, offer to the public their services for the good of the community and the betterment of mankind.

The school offers a general course of study covering the ordinary high school work, and various classes in commercial and industrial subjects. It has been the policy of those conducting the work to supply any subject for which there was sufficient demand. If enough pupils register in a given subject a teacher will be supplied. The field of the school is thus well-nigh unlimited. More than two hundred students enrolled in the classes of the institute last year. The fall term of the institute begins October 2, when any young man or woman may register, at eight p. m. It is hoped that the neighborhood will not miss the opportunity afforded by the presence of such an institution.

It is also due those who have given so freely of their time and energies to support this work that such assistance as may be needed by the institute may be freely granted. It is not money that the school needs now; it is the assistance of those who have been able to secure college or technical training, who are willing to lend a hand to help the other fellow. The Progress extends its congratulations and best wishes for the success of such a worthy work, and offers its meed of praise to those who have labored so unceasingly to establish and maintain the institution upon such broad and liberal lines.

LABOR LAWS AND CHILDREN

The science of eugenics organized by the late Sir Francis Galton, developed by Professor Karl Pearson, of the Calton Laboratory of National Eugenics, London, shows that upon the acts of Parliament, 1864 to 1867, applying, among other things, to the iron, steel and copper industries, forbidding employment of children under eight and from eight to thirteen years except "half timers" down went the birth rate in mining districts.

Upon the passage of the compulsory education act of 1877 and the act of 1878 raising the age of child employment and throwing discouraging responsibility on the employer of child labor, down went the birth rate in the factory towns.

In 1887 the mines act passed, applying to child labor on minerals, fire clay, pottery clay, etc., as well as iron and coal above and below ground, and again down went the birth rate in mining districts, trading towns and county centers like York.

The factory act of 1891, raising age of child employment and restricting employment of women after childbirth, and the education act of 1899, excluding the employment of children under twelve in any way to interfere with full attendance at school were passed, and the whole birth rate of England responded with a brisk decline.

Dreadful, is it not, that in England at the present time a childbearing woman is economically nonproductive, and so is a child under twelve years of age; while the productivity of a child under sixteen is stringently restricted. True of the United States, true the world over.

Every child labor law, that puts an economic penalty on parentage reduces the birth rate.

In 1852 the wives of Bradford, England, bore a child once in four years; now they bear a child once in ten years.

There was a time under more natural conditions when the first-born and second children were the most virile and forceful, but abnormal labor conditions for the children who later become parents, and of those parents, husband and wife, have so lowered their early virility that now, the first and second children are under heavy social handicap through abnormality, so that decrease of birth rate under present condition cuts out the fittest.

THE HIGHER IDEAL

The higher ideal of the child should begin at home. From the time the little eyelids open, and the childish gaze begins gradually to visualize its surroundings, its ears cognize the varying sounds, and each sense assimilates the expression of love, envy or hatred, courage or fear, peace or unrest, enjoyment or dissatisfaction, confidence or distrust, truth or error, order or discord, disorder, all depends upon the thoughts, the words, the actions, of those upon whose care the child must depend, and upon its environment otherwise.

The true purpose of education should be to fit the child for life. He should become capable of adapting himself to the condition of his environment, of enjoying the higher pleasures, and of taking his rightful place in society.

THE CHILD

The child possesses all the impulses and activities of life. In waking moments constantly in motion, its quietest time while taking nourishment from its natural fount, or later from the mother's hand, but ever on the alert.

Alive with intuitive perception, though trusting, it is not easily and continuously deceived, for a false note sounded is apt to awaken within a sense of discordance, calling for some satisfactory explanation.

The first eight years of a child's life has much to do in determining the bent of mind, for good or evil, not because

Higher Ideals for Children

It has been said that the foundation for character building (the higher ideal) of a child should have begun one hundred and fifty years before his birth, and without doubt there is much of truth in that statement.

But we can not go back, and must, therefore, commence now to create the impulse which shall press on to future generations.

THE PRESENT QUESTION

We know the strong effects of prenatal influences reaching back to the primal impulse from the infinite, but modified through each succeeding generation, the environment of each strongly affecting those subject to its influences, environment and heredity constantly acting and reacting upon each other.

The question is of the present—heredity is past, environment potentially here—hence to obtain higher ideals we must modify and shape the environment so that every force shall be brought to bear for the higher development of the child, while recognizing the fact that every element of power, light, sound, sensation, and intelligence comes to the children—little men and women—from without, and that all development is from within.

A young couple approaching the threshold of the mating period of existence feel their hearts swelling with that almost inarticulate ecstasy which draws them close together—the mating longing—how pure, how noble should be their ideal of the expected fruitage of their union.

RESPONSIBILITY

Were this the thought, the grand emotion, that, in cooperation with the Infinite, they should bring into this world one whose life would be a benison unto others, how considerate each would be of the other's welfare, their every relation loving, tender, wise and good.

The great Teacher once said, Suffer the little children to come unto me, forbid them not, for to such belongeth the kingdom of God.

Such they were, such they are, or should be, if the men and women of to-day fail not in their supreme responsibility.

Not only parents, but brothers, sisters, those of other relationships, Sunday and day schools, church, synagogue, society, the community, city, county, state and national governments, with all their varying functions and functionaries, employers of every grade, may not escape responsibility.

For long there has been an invasion of such responsibilities; and women, mothers, boys, girls, little children, have been withdrawn from the legitimate avenue of development to engage in competition with husband, father, son, brother, in almost every class of human industry, and, as animate machines, to supplement the action of inanimate machines—product of human genius perverted from their labor-saving purpose by human greed—until the attempt at amelioration of the abnormal system thus established, for a time, at least, has proven disastrous to those it sought to benefit.

the child is evil, but because it does not understand what is right. Given a reasonable chance to know the right, the child will be good and normal, capable of almost infinite development.

In our industrial era, book learning is plainly inadequate; it does not train the hand, although the vast majority of all persons become manual laborers. Brain and hand should be educated together.

Many practically minded children lose interest in their work and drop out of school. In actual practice a tremendous decline in school attendance occurs after children leave the fifth grade. In New York City, the sixth grade classes show a decline of nearly fifteen per cent from preceding year. Eighth grade students are less than half as numerous as are those of the fifth year. Forty per cent of the children in this fifth year are above normal age. Other cities show similar experience.

A REMARKABLE CASE

Doctor Boris Sidis began to train his boy. William James Sidis, in the use of his observational and reasoning faculties before he was two years old, playing with him by aid of alphabetic blocks, shifting them around to spell different words, pointing to objects spelled, and naming them, teaching him thus to spell and read and giving him a thorough grounding in the principle of sound reasoning. His attention thus arrested, little William James was not content until he learned the exact nature of whatever excited his curiosity.

At three and a half years he saw a typewriter in his father's office. On his father's lap he pressed his little fingers on the keys and exultantly read the words his father showed him how to form. This first lesson was followed by others until within six months, when he was four years old, he was typewriting with considerable dexterity. He had already learned to write with a pencil. At six he was sent to a public school and passed through seven grades in half a year. An interval followed of two years' study at home; then three months at Brooklyn High School; then two years more study at home.

Then at eleven years of age he became a special student for Harvard, and read a paper before the mathematical club, taking as a subject the theme, "Four dimensional bodies," a profound study.

The principle of suggestion was constantly used by his parents in his education, stimulating his interest through play—arousing curiosity.

When but a mere infant, a little room was set aside for him, bright, cheery, well lighted. A little writing table was placed in one corner, with pad and pencil. A small bookcase was supplied, furnished with ordinary books of childhood, nursery rhymes, fairy tales, picture books, but also books of serious interest, tales of travel, history, science and the like. As he grew older, studies in literature and biography, mathematical and scientific textbooks were added, as was a large revolving globe, showing the countries of the world in bright colors. Toys, also, had a scientific basis, making of his room an educational museum.

The boy played with his toys, played with his books, got so interested in his study that it became his play. So will it be with others. Get the child so interested in study that study will be play. It has been done, therefore it can be done.

ANOTHER CASE

A boy of fifteen, a foreigner, without schooling in his native land, knowing scarcely a word of English, ignorant of even the elementary knowledge possessed by the youngest primary child, applied for admission to a high school.

Rejected because he did not know enough, he was in despair, when Doctor Sidis said to him, "You wish to get into the high school, I hear. Very well, you shall. Go and find out exactly what they require you to know before admission and then come back."

For hours daily in spelling, reading and arithmetic, by methods which trained him to use his mental faculties correctly and use them fully, he worked with this boy. The result achieved was the same as in his own son's case, and at the end of eight months the young foreigner passed the examination with flying colors for admission to the high school.

THE BERLE FAMILY

Reverend A. A. Berle, pastor of the Shawmut Congregational church, Boston, and his wife commenced teaching Lina, their oldest child, first of all to express herself in various languages, teaching her the Lord's prayer in English, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, then some Greek prayers and Hebrew psalms, which they translated into English for her, gradually enlarging the language lessons, and when she was between three and four years old began to give her some mathematical training, teaching her definitions of circles, angles, etc., in scientific terms. After this they taught her to spell, to read and write, all of which she could do well before she was six years old, and all without forcing, Lina losing none of the joys of childhood, but having her dolls and other toys. Four children came to the family, Lina a sophomore at Radcliffe College at sixteen, Adolph, a sophomore at Harvard at fifteen, Miriam, in one of the Cambridge high schools at twelve, Rudolph attending high school at nine.

OTHER INSTANCES

"A little London lady, lacking two months of completing her second year is a familiar sight pedaling along the Thames embankment and in the London parks on a Sunday morning. Her father accompanies her on the bicycle trips, keeping a few feet ahead of her to see that the way is clear."—Popular Mechanics, February, 1912, p. 206.

The writer while walking the streets with his father learned the multiplication tables before yet he had reached it in his studies at school.

Horace Greeley had learned to read at two years of age.

IN CULTIVATING THE CHILD

Many more might be added. The thought is this, that the faculties of children at their most plastic and receptive time should be diverted and developed, not only through such normal ways as have thus been illustrated but also along the lines of highest ideality, to be kind, loving, considerate, graceful, not rude and boisterous, polite little ladies and gentlemen, and above all things unselfish, all the powers of body, mind and spirit brought actively into play.

Taught by precept and example to be clean and pure in thought, that while in process of their playful work the higher ideal may be created, and when through with the play, the child having a place for everything, should put each plaything or work thing just where it belongs and not leave the litter for some one else to care for.

It is said that order is heaven's first law, and if the child feels not this great law, it will minimize his usefulness and be a handicap to him throughout his life.

Parents, brothers and sisters should cultivate in themselves the thing desirable in the younger children, not making of them a plaything for their own gratification and not granting them undue privileges to their own detriment. So the home, in all its parts, should be orderly and harmonious; its surroundings neat, well kept in lot, sidewalk and gutter, trees, grass, plants, flowers, and vines, each matter of interest and pleasure; kindness and courtesy should be manifest to every living thing; for everything is affected by kindness; dog, cat and bird, originally wild or tame, all conquered by the law of love.

Economic troubles outside the household, in shop, factory, store, transport or government should be obviated by stable provision for employment. Paternalism, fraternalism, should reign supreme, and, as governments may properly exist only for the best good of all the people, so should they be operated with that end in view, i. e., the betterment of the whole.

Schools should be thrown open for the meetings of the children, with small parks and playgrounds throughout the city alternating so that the children may feel that they are considered little men and women and such they are; and as little men and women they should be taught how to play fair, should form little model communities of their own and learn the method of self and community government by actual practice, as in the Junior Republic.

In conclusion, let me suggest that the move for economic change and provision is world-wide.

SUGGESTIONS

Throw open the schoolhouses for the entertainment and education of the children at times when not in use for regular sessions, and not for children only, but for adults likewise, in lecture courses, social meetings of all kinds, concerts, well controlled, and regulated gymnastics, all under control of the board of education, and as part of educational development, the school should be a social center.

Have for the children of all ages means for such amusement in the inclement weather when outdoor play can not be had.

Throw open the churches, under like regulation of their respective governments. Athletics of various kinds should be encouraged, and the church be a center of physical as well as mental, social and spiritual development.

Let convention or other halls be turned over to the city governments. Let these governments install grand organs, and throw the halls open to the public on every warrantable occasion, where men or women of state-wide, national or international reputation may have opportunity to speak on any great subject of interest to the people.

Let charges, if any, be nominal.

With a seating capacity of five thousand, any reasonable expenditure could be covered by an admission charge of ten cents. Fifty years ago in Glasgow, Scotland, in its great city hall, organ recitals with solos of some of the finest singers of the west of Scotland were regularly given at charge of two pence admission fee. I assume that now no charge is made.

Arrange for parks and playgrounds not further than ten blocks apart, each way, where appliances for play of children of all ages may be provided under proper instruction; where parents may find relaxation and comfort, too, while children play—swimming pools, ball grounds, etc.

Recreation centers embracing a number of blocks should be planned for at well selected intervals, as now well demonstrated in New York, Boston and Chicago.

Let cemeteries be thrown open to the public, where the workers in various industries may, under the shade, rest and eat their lunches during the noon or other intervals of work, as in the Old Trinity Church Yard and Broadway, New York, and many others, cemeteries may not be so conveniently located. There are many ways and means if we have but the will.

Yards there are, too, attached to some of the factory buildings, which might be used in similar fashion.

The moving picture should have a place in public education. It is here to stay. The object lesson is of greatest educational value. Cut out suggestive songs and scenes in connection with such places of entertainment, and they will prove of untold good. Some classes of pictures are of much higher grade than those of some years ago, and highly instructive to any open mind. While under a high censorship, it would be well to have them also under censorship of a local board, not the police. If convention halls be used, a full equipment for the highest class of educational moving picture should be provided—a true, high-grade of community work without a trace of commercialism in it.

The matter herein considered has been but touched upon. Would that the time might soon come when the true spirit of altruism might sweep into the hearts of all our people, so that poverty with its oft accompaniment of suffering and degradation might once for all be abolished to return no more for ever.

Prayer Union

SUBJECT FOR THE FIRST THURSDAY IN NOVEMBER

The church, its priesthood and lay members, that all may earnestly engage in the building up of Zion to the ideal condition of oneness and equality revealed in the word of God to the church.

Pray that each member of the church may be clothed with that charity which will lead him to speak evil of no one, but to regard the reputation of a brother or sister as his own.

Lesson, 2 Corinthians 4.

Memory verse, Philippians 2: 3.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYERS

Prayers are requested by Sister Ira W. Humes, of Elk Mills, Maryland, for her aged mother, who is afflicted with cataract which threatens blindness. This afflicted sister is isolated, and in especial need of spiritual strength, as well as the favor of God, that she may retain her sight. She should be remembered.

Church Opening at Santa Ana

[The following letter was sent to a brother in Lamoni and was by him mislaid, which accounts for its failure to appear at an earlier date.—EDITORS.]

The Santa Ana Branch of Southern California District having completed their modest little church at the corner of Fifth and Flower streets, occupied it for the first time Sunday, August 16. The building was filled to overflowing with visiting Saints and friends from Southern California District, Bisbee, Arizona, Fresno, California, Independence, Missouri, and local members.

The entire day was devoted to various exercises. Sunday school convened at 9.45 a. m., followed by services at 11 a. m. The 11 o'clock services consisted of two short discourses; one by Brother W. A. McDowell, setting forth the differences between the Reorganization and the Salt Lake faction; the other by Brother F. M. Sheehy, who told the people what we believe. These two discourses were for the purpose of setting right the ideas of the people who may not understand our position.

At noon a basket lunch was served in the splendidly equipped basement of the church. Everyone partook of the sumptuous feast that had been prepared by the sisters.

Again at 2.30 all were assembled in the upper auditorium to listen to Brother McDowell upon "The magnitude of the gospel and what it comprises." He also advised the Saints in regard to the decorum that should be observed, the sacredness of the building and the opportunity the Saints have in getting the gospel before the people.

This service was followed by a good social time during the remainder of the afternoon, until 6.45 p. m., when young people's meeting convened, with Brother J. W. Inman in charge.

The closing address of the day was very ably delivered by Brother Sheehy, who spoke on "The impartiality of God and the necessity of revelation to-day."

Special music was rendered by the choir, composed of members from the several branches in the district.

The Santa Ana Saints extend welcome to all who may at any time have the opportunity to visit them.

A VISITOR.

Bombardment of Papeete

(The following letter to Brother and Sister Samuel Shakespeare, of Lamoni, Iowa, father and mother of Sister J. Charles May, will be read with interest by the Saints.)

I am pleased to inform you that we are all well, even though we have gone through a little war in the South Sea Islands.

Three days ago in the morning two steamers were seen at sea, heading for Papeete Harbor. We could see them from the steeple of our new church in Taronā. At first they were thought to be one of the Union Steamship's boats with a British cruiser along with her for protection; but when they drew up closer it was seen that they were both cruisers. They would not answer the sounding signals from shore, and would raise no flag. Both came up alongside the reef, about one mile out, and apparently were counseling with each other. It was then decided by the French that they were German cruisers preparing for an attack, at which time all residents of Papeete were ordered out of town. The Germans raised a flag of truce, desiring to communicate with the French officials ashore. We all took to the streets trying to get out of town, we had to leave immediately and had nothing but the clothes we had on our backs.

While we were passing through the streets, the French opened fire, and after about seven volleys, and after raising flag of truce and communicating with the German cruisers, the Germans opened fire, and within two hours Papeete was on fire, and the Zelee, a French gunboat, was sunk in the harbor. The Zelee is a small boat, and had been stripped of most of her guns, which had been taken up on the hill to the fort. I was standing on a hill about three hundred feet above the sea level, and saw the most of the fighting. It is said that the fort was damaged some. It is also said that the French raised a flag of truce after the city took fire, but that the Germans paid no attention to it, and kept on firing.

We were at Haapape, about five miles around the island, in a different direction from where the Saints lived, as we had no time to go through the other side of the city. We were taken in by some Protestant friends, who gave us beds for the night, and cared for us as well as they could. After the Germans did all the damage they could, they left Tahiti. They did not come ashore, but sailed away from Tahiti with Papeete in flames, since when we have seen no more of them.

Papeete is badly burned up, that is, the business portion. The custom house near the beach was burned to the ground, but the wharf house still stands, with holes shot in the roof. The large British store of Donald and Edinburgh was almost totally destroyed, and the market place (market) was burned up, also three other blocks in the business portion of the city, to the west, north and south of the market. Two saloons, the ice plant, and scores of Chinese business houses were totally destroyed. Papeete doesn't look like itself.

A large lumber boat, standing almost in front of a lot of these buildings was not touched; an American flag was flying over it. The American consulate was not touched. All the church property was not touched, or damaged in the least, and all of the Saints are uninjured, but were certainly excited during the fray. Our church building, which is now well under construction, is quite a way from the part of the city which was destroyed by shell and fire. There were only one or two people killed during the battle, which only lasted about two or three hours.

We were surprised to see a British boat pulling into shore after all the excitement. They had seen nothing of the warships, and were surprised to see and hear of the damage done to Papeete. They will leave this morning at eleven o'clock for America. I am at the missionary house writing this letter, but we are all located at Heberona for the present, where we are pleasantly situated. The Saints of that branch are doing all they can for us to make it comfortable.

We are having hard times here in Papeete. Food has gone up, and dried coconut has gone down to where the natives have stopped making it. We are pleased, however, to say that we are all well and enjoying good health.

May the Lord bless all of you is the prayer of,

Yours sincerely,

J. CHARLES MAY.

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS, September 22, 1914.

Editors Herald: This finds me at my post of duty, doing what I can to assist in building up the cause of Christ. While we find many obstacles in the way, yet by the help of God and persistent effort on our part we can remove each sufficiently to get by and go on to the next one. So many of the Saints get tired of the fight and go off and lay down under the shade tree of life, and leave the hard task to the few, which adds to their burden. If all would help and do their part the load would not be so hard to carry. But we are thankful for the few noble ones that are doing all they can to help roll on the gospel work, and who bear their part of the burden in the heat of the day. They will get their crown.

These are perilous times, surely. And as we near the end the battle becomes more severe. The Devil knows his time is short, and is doing all he can to destroy peace and hinder righteousness on earth. We are still praying for that time to soon come when the will of the Lord will be done on earth as it is in heaven, and when nations will learn war no more.

I arrived in this city the night of the 18th. Was met at depot by Brethren D. S. Palmer and John Harp. Was glad to see them, and was immediately informed they had a message for me, which conveyed the sad news that my father had passed from this earth life the day before. Thus was my joy interrupted and turned to sadness. It was then thirty at night, and it had been nearly two days since his death, and I nearly a thousand miles from the scene, as he lived in the eastern part of Missouri, Bellflower, Montgomery County. I stood still and thought, and thought, for thirty minutes, then wired them I regretted I could not come now, as it would be too late for me to attend the funeral. To do so I would have to let go undone some important work intrusted to my care. Such are some of the trials of the missionary. Their loved ones oftentimes have to be laid away without their presence.

This is my first experience with death in our immediate family. My father was eighty-six years old. He came from Old Virginia, about 1860, and settled in Missouri, where he resided until his death. He did not belong to the church, but was one of the honest, honorable men of the world. What little opportunity he had had to hear the restored gospel brought him in sympathy with it, and he would tell other people that he believed the Latter Day Saints were right. He did not have an opportunity to hear this gospel until he was old and feeble, and did not obey; but God is just and will take care of such men; and where they lacked in opportunity in this life it will be supplied in the other; otherwise would not be just.

I had a dream about two months ago. In the dream, or night vision, I saw my father come to us in a great hurry. He stopped only a moment and went on down a road. I followed him a short distance, and saw him cross a river. I told the folks he would soon leave us. In the conflict,

W. M. AYLOR.

HAMBURG, IOWA, September 24, 1914.

Editors Herald: I have spent three weeks in preaching, when the weather permitted, in a schoolhouse about five miles from Hamburg, and as my congregation has dwindled down to four, including my host and hostess, Brother and Sister Mattes, I have concluded that my services might be appreciated better somewhere else, and so will go.

Three things stood in the way: It rained several times; the Methodists have a church near by with regular services and a Sunday school that is fifty-seven years old, with only short intermissions during that long period of time; and, last, but not least, the people have no special interest in religion, and especially in our message. I did not abuse anyone, neither did I seek to conceal the truth with ambiguous statements.

I recall reading in an old volume of the Millennial Star reference to the Crimean War, which set forth this war as a sign of the near approach of Christ and the end of the world. More than sixty years have passed away, and the event then thought to be very near has not yet come to pass. There is no doubt but that before that time and since, events have occurred that caused many people to think Christ's coming was very near at hand. Of all people in this world who should not deceive themselves or others it should be the Latter Day Saints. With the light of present revelation before us it would seem to be a travesty on our intelligence to be deceived, "And whoso treasureth up my words, shall not be deceived." (Matthew 24: 39, I. T.) If we are deceived it will be because we have not paid heed to the instruction of Jesus.

One of the sure ways to prevent deception is to know what is to happen, and to know if it has happened. There are four very important things yet to happen before the coming of our Lord, three of which are stated in Doctrine and Covenants 49: 5.

1. Jacob, which term represents Israel, "shall flourish in the wilderness." What will make Israel flourish? It will certainly be the light of the gospel; and Jesus says they will receive it (3 Nephi 9: 69-71). In the preface to the Book of Mormon we are told that one of the purposes of that book is to convince "Jew and Gentile that Jesus is the Christ." Has the Jew been so convinced? The deliverer of Israel is to come out of Zion (Romans 11: 26), and we have not yet received command to take it to the Jew. Read Doctrine and Covenants 87: 3, 4 and see what marvelous things are to happen.

2. The Lamanites shall "blossom as the rose." The work among the Lamanites so far has only been of a preparatory nature. Read 1 Nephi 4: 16-24, and observe that the Lamanite is to come to a knowledge of the gospel and be numbered among God's people, and one day they shall become a blessed people. (Jacob 2: 56.)

3. "Zion shall flourish upon the hills, and rejoice upon the mountains, and shall be assembled together unto the place which I have appointed." Zion is the pure in heart (Doctrine and Covenants 94: 5). Is that the kind of people that inhabit the land of Zion now? Have we gathered to the place appointed? We are only making a small effort, and much of that is contrary to the law. We are following our own wisdom instead of closely observing the law.

4. Christ said the end would come when this gospel was again preached in all the world for a witness. (Matthew 24: 32, I. T.) Has this mission been performed? Read Doctrine and Covenants 87: 4 and note how the world is to be reached with the gospel message.

Sometimes persons who are anxious to have the coming of Jesus very close take a grain of comfort from the statement, "But for the elect's sake, according to the covenant, those days shall be shortened." (Matthew 24: 20, I. T.) To apply that statement to our day is a perversion of the Scripture. By reading Matthew 24: 13-21, I. T., we will learn that it applied right at that time, and in connection with the destruction of Jerusalem.

Yours in gospel bonds,

EDWARD RANNIE.

SAULT STE. MARIE, MICHIGAN, September 25, 1914.

Editors Herald: We were pleased to see Brother G. C. Tomlinson. It has been a long while since there was an elder here. Last Sunday we had a good spiritual meeting across the river, and then a good preaching service in the evening. He came over on this side and gave us some good talks Monday and Tuesday, which we appreciated, as those on this side of the river do not get to church much.

We pray the heavenly Father to send some one to open up the work again in this part of the vineyard. We need some one here with great courage and strength, for we are persecuted from all sides, even in the modern churches from the pulpit, as well as on the outside.

Pray for us, dear Saints, that the way may be opened. Our prayer is for all.

Your brother in Christ,

JOHN F. WEINER.

WEST JONESPORT, MAINE, September 25, 1914.

Editors Herald: I can truthfully say the HERALD is edifying my soul, as I read it from time to time.

I regard the situation here below as three systems, termed Christianity. My heart yearns with sympathy and charity for all, for I realize there is burning beneath the breast of humanity an unspeakable desire and longing to regain the glory they had even before the world was made.

First, we have the system known as Catholicism, which teaches a continuation of the priesthood, and that those affiliating therein have the right to administer the different ceremonies in the house of the Lord. Consequently, they deny the apostasy. Jesus declared that the gospel should be preached in all the world as a witness, and then the end should come. Pray, how could it be preached as a witness except there be a falling away, or a silence between the time he made the statement and the time of his second coming, and of the end of the world?

Second, is Protestantism established upon earth by the good, and, I dare say, inspired reformers, which prepared the way for a better work, which was to come. The word reform needs no interpretation. It shows clearly that they realized a falling away, for these men would not undertake to reform perfect law. Consequently, they realized that the conditions were as the Prophet Amos of old said should be, down the stream of time. Not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the word of the Lord, which they did not hear in the mother church.

Third, we have what is known to the children of God as the restoration, which is the only system recognized of God, in the sense of accomplishing the work whereunto it was sent, and which shall not return unto him void. Its design is to transform a fallen and a wicked race to a perfect condition, and only those who attain to that condition can receive or regain the glory they had even before the world was made. And only a perfect law can accomplish the work.

So my heart goes out with longing to poor humanity, that they may see the necessity of accepting the gospel that has been restored in these latter days.

With these facts before me, I accepted this great latter-day work, whose architect is God. I am trying day by day to present my body a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God, which is my reasonable service. It is far greater to live for Christ than to die for him, although both are required, if needful. Christ told the Jews that they paid tithes of mint and anise and cummin, and had omitted the weightier matters of law; those they ought to have done, and not left the others undone.

This great work is truly a revealed science, in harmony with God himself. I hope we all will be clothed with sufficient power and wisdom so as to enable us to comprehend fully the grandeur and beauty of the gospel of Christ, that we may be lights unto the world, that they may see our good works and be led to glorify our Father which is in heaven.

Yours in the one faith,

MERTON L. CROWLEY.

Extracts from Letters

Brother W. M. Young writes from Grahamdale, Manitoba: "This is my last year on a Canadian homestead, and I am near the starving point for a good gospel talk. During the last twelve months, I have conversed with acquaintances relative to the latter-day work, and two of my neighbors, Roman Catholics, hied themselves to Winnipeg last month, to trouble the waters in baptism. A worthy brother who cared to sojourn with me during the coming winter would be welcomed, free of charge. I am fifty-three years old, and live alone."

Brother C. E. Willey writes from Kewanee, Illinois, under date of October 12, as follows: "We have been holding meetings at Matthewville the last two weeks; one young man baptized. Had a union meeting at Joy yesterday. Three other branches met with Joy Branch, viz, Millersburg, Matthewville, and Buffalo Prairie. It was a success. Large audiences and spiritual feast for all present. In two weeks the above-named branches meet with the Buffalo Prairie Branch in like meeting."

Edward Rannie, Independence, Missouri: "In the HERALD of October 14, page 985, in my account of the Thurman reunion, among the names of the ministry, that of Elder E. F. Robertson does not appear. This brother was 'on the job' from start to finish, and took part in the preaching and singing, was on the program of the 'rest hour,' and took part in the work and play hours. He was an all-round useful man. I write this explanation so that the brother, the reunion committee, and those who attended the reunion will know that the lack of his name was an omission and not an intentional slight."

J. W. A. Bailey writes from Scranton, Kansas: "In writing of the work at Netawaka, Kansas, it was not my intention to do anyone any injustice. When I went to this place I found the church standing idle, the paper and plaster being badly damaged, and the chairs in the Modern Woodmen hall. We used the hall in holding services, and the interest being so good the Saints and friends came together and decided to repair the church. I remained there about three weeks, then went to Topeka and Scranton. On my return I found the church repaired and repapered. We began a meeting in the church and the following Sunday reorganized the Sunday school. A number told me they were very glad to get back into the church, as there had been no services there for about three years. Brethren Walters, Arber, and others had labored in Netawaka and done faithful work. I am now informed that Brother Arber did some preaching in the church, aside from which the church stood idle for about three years."

News from Missions

British Isles Mission

[EDITOR'S NOTE.—We are privileged to make the following extract from a report to the First Presidency.]

You are already aware of the events transpiring about the time of our annual mission conference, and also of the nature of that gathering. I instructed the secretary of the mission to supply the SAINTS' HERALD with an account of the conference, which was accounted to be one of the most important held in this mission. I was especially comforted in many ways.

I have read the letter of President Joseph Smith, to the secretary of the mission, and I personally thank Brother Joseph, for the reason that I have sought to have our scribe write to the HERALD from time to time, and thus record the efforts made here, if not the progress.

I am pleased to say that with one exception our staff is intact, the exception being Elder W. H. Chandler, of Warrington, who has enlisted for service during the present war. We have also lost James Bunt, of Plymouth, a priest. He is with you in Independence, I understand.

Commenting upon the work accomplished during the quarter, I must commend the brethren for the work they have done, under most trying circumstances.

The services rendered during the past quarter in the open air by the brethren have been very good indeed, and up to the last month the interest was all that could be desired. I have not been able to get all around, but I have tried to get to the places where they needed help the most.

Our season for open-air work is about over for this year. I have, therefore, arranged a plan for the purpose of assisting the branches during the winter months, and also during the present crisis, owing to some of the branches having suffered through the calling of the young men into the service of the king and their country. We have lost about twelve as far as I have learned up to date, and this is a great loss to some of the branches.

The condition of the country is very unsettled indeed, as you would no doubt judge. There is scarcely a single article of food, or anything else, but what has been raised in price. There is much unemployment in every direction. Within six miles of my home there are twelve mills and factories closed, each of which employed from one to four thousand hands. So you may judge what that means to the poor. I visited a brother only last night, when he told me of a case that he had visited that night where the people were starving. Our bishop [Bishop May] is having a hard time, too, and he has experienced misfortune lately; he may have already reported to you. I will let him tell his own story. I hope that Bishop Kelley will be enabled to assist us. I feel sure that the Saints in the States will do all they can to make our burden as light as possible.

You will be interested to learn of the spiritual condition of the mission. The reports that come to me are full of promise for the future. Our conferences have been a great success. The Saints are making an effort to live their religion, to be good, and do good. The young men in particular are much in evidence in this regard.

Statistically, we stand very fair; our baptisms number for the entire mission up to thirty-five, and we expect to trouble the water long before you read these pages. I expect to baptize a lady next Wednesday evening, and there are several more who are ready.

Our quarterly conference of the Manchester District was held in the new chapel last Sunday, October 4, and was a grand success. At the evening service there were present about three hundred. The services were of a very high order all day.

So we have our blessings as well as our burdens. We are hopeful, and I believe that, notwithstanding our present struggle, we shall be able to present a better report to next conference than we did for 1913.

I hope, too, to be present myself in conference next year. The Saints are most anxious that I should be there, but there is time to talk about that matter later.

I am making a special effort everywhere I go to comfort the Saints, and build up the branches. I am a firm believer that it is possible to feed others while our own are starving. It is necessary to look after those whom the Lord has given us; we can then sing intelligently, "How firm a foundation, ye Saints of the Lord."

I will conclude my report with a word of thanks on behalf of the mission, to Brother President Joseph Smith for the letter that he sent to Brother W. R. Armstrong. It brought pleasure to our hearts to learn that Brother Joseph was well enough to take an interest in our doings.

And on behalf of the mission I assure him that we ever and always remember him before the throne of grace, and we feel that God is taking especial care of his servant. His visit to England will never be forgotten. I can assure him that it lives in the memory of many here to-day, and is a great blessing to us all.

Please convey my kindest regards to all the presidency.

Your brother,

W. H. GREENWOOD.

Lamoni Stake

The opportunities for tent work this year were all that could be desired. Although the results might not be fully satisfactory to some, I feel that much good has been done. The seed has been sown, and hundreds of people have heard; several have been interested and a few have been baptized. Surely the Lord has been with his servants in the ministration of the word and the ordinances of the house of God.

At Chariton and Lucas, I was associated with R. S. Sal-yards, and assisted by the Saints located in those places. The cheerfulness and liberality with which we have been assisted both by those within and those without the church has been quite satisfactory. Many favorable comments relative to our faith have been heard, and honorable mention has been made of the integrity of the majority of the membership of the church.

The Saints at Chariton have a Sunday school and choir, and preaching and prayer services are held each week. The late stake conference has authorized the organization of a branch, and the ordination to the office of priest of Brother James Robinson, who will be of great assistance to the branch when organized at that place. At this place four were baptized.

At Lucas the services continued six weeks, and the Saints appear much encouraged. A choir and Religio were organized following the tent services, and six were baptized. One of those baptized has been a wanderer from the fold as a result of the blighting and soul cursing effects of drink, and since his return is rejoicing in the reception accorded him in his Father's house. Even the business men of the town have expressed great satisfaction at the reformation in the life of this brother, and they rejoice with the Saints in what the gospel has done.

To mention all who have been so liberal and hospitable to the servants of God would not be profitable to the general reader, and to mention a few and omit the many would be unwise. At Lucas the branch organization has been strengthened by the addition of Brother James Wilkinson and his son Fred, who have lately returned to that place, and by the ordination of C. C. Hawkins to the office of deacon. The aged president of the branch, John R. Evans, is showing his old-time zeal, but because of an afflicted body and an afflicted companion is much crippled in his work. At Lucas several who had been somewhat cool and indifferent, and a few who had been sadly in the dark, have renewed their covenants.

After returning from the Evergreen Branch and Lamoni, where I was from Thursday to Monday last, I am engaged in a series of meetings at a schoolhouse west of Lucas, where reside a few Saints and several who are much interested in the gospel, but have not yet been fully persuaded of the importance of obedience.

Concerning the late stake conference, will say that the Lord was present in the gifts of faith, tongues, interpretation, prophecy, ministering and knowledge. A discourse delivered by the stake bishop was associated with much of spiritual power, and the Saints were encouraged along temporal lines. The prayers for the peace of nations were touching and fervent. Through the prophetic spirit instructions of a very vital character to present conditions were given, and reproof ministered in a very positive way on account of worldliness that now exists, the Lord seeking to set the Saints in the way of his steps.

The Order of Enoch in the Lamoni Stake is suggesting to the more thoughtful the progress being made for the place of safety, properly prepared, to which our brethren and sisters in foreign lands and in isolated places may flee. Great care is being exercised to proceed along lines that are sane and safe, both from a spiritual and a business point of view. To prepare a place of safety and a place where Saints may be profitably employed, there is need that the stakes of Zion shall purify themselves from all that is worldly, for certainly that is a safer place where it is the easiest to practice pure religion, a part of which is to keep unspotted from the vices of the world, as well as to be correctly directed in visitations to the widows and orphans.

The Saints of Lamoni are considering their favorable opportunities to provide a place of safety, a stake of Zion, to which the people of God may gather, more seriously and righteously, and some things which have been participated in are being looked upon by many as a menace to the spirituality of the people of God, and a healthier condition in social lines is more fully prevailing, upon which God is setting his seal of approval; however, much needs to be done ere Zion is redeemed, but the prospects for a safe gathering place are brighter. May God speed the right.

Hopefully in Christ,

LUCAS, IOWA, October 7, 1914.

J. F. MINTUN.

Northern Wisconsin

As the yellow leaves fall, the cool winds blow, and the farmers are making ready for winter, we are reminded that another year of sowing and reaping will soon pass. And as we look over the world's great field of nations and view the scenes of war and sorrow, of sin and perplexity, we are again reminded that the Lord's great harvest is soon drawing nigh. The question comes to each of us, Are you ready? As each year passes we wonder what the next will bring. It is easy to discern that the powers of evil are massing their forces for the last great conflict of the ages.

This year finds me again laboring in missionary work in the Northern Wisconsin District. I find many good people here, and plenty to do. Have been very busy most of the year so far. The annual reunion convened on the beautiful camp grounds at Chetek, the last of June and the first of July. The first five days of the reunion we had rain which hindered the attendance somewhat. The last part of the reunion, however, the weather was nice and the attendance was quite good. The meetings were good also. Brethren F. A. Smith, J. F. Curtis, J. W. Wight, F. M. Cooper, and J. A. Gunsolley, besides the district missionaries and the local ministry were present.

Some improvements had been made on the grounds and buildings by the committee. The auditorium had received the second coat of paint, as had the dining hall and new confectionery stand. The white buildings sitting among green pines and other native timber, close to the beautiful waters of the lake, present a pleasant scene. The dwellings and grounds I think are worth from fifteen to eighteen hundred dollars. We still owe about seven hundred dollars on the buildings. Many of the Saints have donated liberally in helping thus far to complete the buildings and pay for same. We hope all will continue until the last is paid, which ought not to be long if all help. The property is well worth all that has been put into it, and we trust will be a benefit to the district for years to come. Let the Saints remember the financial part of the Lord's work; while he is giving us a harvest from year to year, let us remember that he has said that one tenth is his and nine tenths ours. Not a hard bargain, is it Saints?

Brother Lyman W. Fike and the writer have labored together a little during the summer, and should have labored together more had it not been for the urgent need of missionary work in various parts of the district. Brother Fike is doing well for a young man, and we hope he will continue. Five months or more at a time, a thousand miles from home, wife and little children, in missionary work, is a sacrifice not all young men of the church at the present time are willing to make. In different parts of the district there are those who are investigating the gospel, and in due time, if all goes well, they will be conducted into the Master's fold. Several have been baptized during the summer, I think twenty.

The Northern Wisconsin District covers a large field, about forty-two thousand, seven hundred and thirteen square miles, with a goodly number of scattered families of Saints and a few small branches. Brother Fike is developing a good interest, and has baptized four in the little town of Union Center, and has also had interest in a little branch at Necedah, and interest has been shown at Ashland, Goodnow, Burn Valley, Black River Falls, Valley Junction, and Porcupine. We are trying to keep the camp fires burning in the old places and to build new when possible.

This leaves the writer at Appleton, in the eastern part of the State, where we have a small branch. Brother Edward Nelson is president here, but is soon to move to Idaho. We are sorry to lose him from the work here, because we greatly need men and workers to help carry on the local interests in this field.

I kindly remember the Saints in my former fields of labor.

LEONARD HOUGHTON.

APPLETON, WISCONSIN, October 14, 1914.

News from Branches

Perry, Iowa

The Saints at Perry have another occasion for rejoicing. Sunday the 4th, three of our most talented and noble women and two little boys joined our ranks, following an investigation covering two years. Since hearing the first sermon they have stood by us financially and in every other way as helpers. They are scholars and workers of ability. The two little boys have been bright lights in the Sunday school and Religio. When they went out in the water with Brother Hand, to be baptized, we felt the need of a hymn dedicated to the youth of the church. The father of these boys has talked to the men of the Milwaukee Railroad concerning the gospel ever since he heard it, but is yet not one with us. He expects soon to join his wife and children in the church. The prayer service on the 4th was an occasion never to be forgotten. The Lord recognized our great struggle here when there were but a few of us, and added that he was pleased with what had been accomplished.

Sister Sheets, who lately joined us, came in in a different way. By careful study of the scriptures she felt that neither of the churches to which she had belonged filled the bill, and she so expressed herself to Sister Bolander, who said, "Go to the Latter Day Saint church and hear Elder Long, and you will find exactly what you are looking for." She came, and the first sermon was so convincing she was baptized at once. Thus it is that God's sheep know his voice. Fourteen others are investigating, and we feel certain some will unite with us.

One pleasing part of the service of the 4th was the manner in which our president directed in the singing of the hymns. He suggested that we notice the hymns selected, which were prayers. He requested that we sing them softly and pleadingly, minding the embellishments and thinking of the sentiment, at the same time speaking the words plainly. I am sure that in observing his wishes, from the way the voices were carried upward, this part of the service aided in the preparation of the meeting. Brother Hand's instruction to us in all this is, Prepare your music before you come to the house of the Lord; study it individually; get the sentiment of the hymns in your hearts. He reminds us that God will help us if we study that we may be given knowledge.

Yours in the work,

NELLIE M. MARTIN.

Not by appointment do we meet delight
And joy; they heed not our expectancy;
But 'round some corner in the streets of life,
They, on a sudden, clasp us with a smile.

—Gerald Massey.

Saints Warning

The Saints of the British Isles Mission are hereby warned against an individual who is going about this mission, imposing upon the Saints by professing to be an actor, out of work, and also stating that he and his people have been interested in the work.

This man is an impostor, and I take this course of warning the Saints of the mission, because they have been so repeatedly deceived by one and another.

This man is apparently an American, and is very gentlemanly in address, and appearance. He also presents a letter purporting to be a letter of recommendation from a certain brother, whereas it is a refusal to loan money. So please beware, Saints.

Respectfully,

W. H. GREENWOOD, Minister in Charge.

The November Century

The war articles in The Century for November deal with the European conflict from many angles. W. Morgan Shuster in the "Breakdown of civilization" reviews impartially the case of each nation at war, and leaves the reader to judge of the justice of their cause. Professor Samuel P. Orth, of Cornell, has written of "Germany's destiny." He marshals the real facts of Germany's progress, aside from her militarism, and shows that even the defeat of her armies can not stop her from her destined goal. The third article, "The coming of the storm," by H. Fielding-Hall, is a picture of how England suddenly awoke to find herself at war. The rigid despotism of the Russian autocracy stands revealed in the account of a young Russian woman's experiences in the last revolution. Marie Sukloff's "The making of a Russian terrorist" is more than a description of the workings of the Nihilist movement, it is a personal record of intense bitterness and suffering, undertaken for the cause of human liberty. Having completed his studies of the immigration problem, Professor Edward Alsworth Ross begins his new series on the people of South America in the November Century. The first of the "South of Panama" articles treats of Ecuador and Colombia, and is prefaced by John Barrett, director of the Pan-American Union. The series will be a study of the lives of our South American neighbors, from the standpoint of a trained observer and a sociologist.

Why the Youth's Companion Should Be in every Family

"If I could take only one paper," said the late Mr. Justice Brewer of the Supreme Court, "it would be The Youth's Companion—a little of everything in a nutshell, and unbiased." The Companion is a family paper in the completest sense. It provides reading that, without failing to interest the young, still interests the mature. It unites young and old through their common enjoyment of delightful fiction, agreeable miscellany, and the clear exposition of public questions.

So carefully is it edited, so varied are its contents, that it would easily supply a family with entertaining fiction, up-to-date information and wholesome fun, if no other periodical entered the house.

If you are not familiar with The Companion as it is to-day, let us send you sample copies and the Forecast for 1915. New subscribers who send $2 for the fifty-two issues of 1915 will receive free all the remaining issues of 1914, besides a copy of The Companion Home Calendar for 1915.

WHAT IS AN ORTHODOX CHURCH?

The world has chosen to exclude us from the magic circle of orthodoxy. If the word orthodox really means what it is made to stand for we do not care very much. If it means to be widely and favorably known, then the church of Christ in the days of Christ could not claim to be orthodox because it was neither widely nor favorably known. But if the true definition be given, we can and will contest the decision and prove our right to be called orthodox as did Paul of old even though his was called the "way of heresy."

Orthodox, Sound in opinion or doctrine; particularly, sound in religious opinions or doctrines. . . . In accordance with sound doctrine, or with the opinions or doctrines generally held to be correct.

That is Webster's definition. The last clause is generally accepted as covering the whole ground, yet really it has no great meaning. Noah was sound in doctrine and opinion, but was not in harmony with the "doctrines and opinions generally held to be correct." According to this definition, idolatry was orthodox in Noah's day, while he was extremely heterodox—only eight persons accepting his teaching. And so in the days of Christ, paganism was orthodox in Rome, idolatry was orthodox in Egypt, and Judaism was orthodox in Palestine; but Christianity was not orthodox anywhere.

The former definition is obviously correct,—to be "sound in religious opinions and doctrines." And is it not a little strange that the very churches that claim to be most orthodox are the ones that decry the teaching of doctrine? If they have none, how can they be orthodox? And if they have doctrines, they evade an examination of the very thing on which their claim to orthodoxy rests. But did it ever occur to you that the man who says that one must not preach doctrine now because it will create contention and division is himself enunciating a doctrine? He is preaching the doctrine that all doctrine should be abandoned. His doctrine is intended to take the place of all others, and if there are any left who love Bible doctrines he is pretty sure to stir up opposition, because he is teaching a doctrine that has nowhere in the Bible any sanction, the while he rebukes many who are teaching Bible truths.

An orthodox church from a Bible standpoint would be one that believed first in God and in his Son and in the Holy Spirit. And one moreover which believes in the unchangeability and the divine form of God. Yet many of the would-be orthodox churches believe neither of these doctrines. "It is true," they say, "that the Bible speaks of Moses meeting God face to face; it speaks of his hands and of his feet and of his eyes, but in reality he has none of these bodily parts." It is strange that the only thing in the world that these people are content to have without tangible existence is their God. He must be without form or parts or passion—immaterial, intangible. You could not pass them that kind of a dollar, or sell them that kind of a cow.

Again, we learn from the Bible that God used to reveal himself to those who were righteous, but when an indifferent or wicked age came on he withdrew himself from them. Now it is reversed, and we are told he reveals himself no more because the world has improved so much and become so generally Christian that it is not necessary. The only way to hear from him again is to burn our Bibles and go back to idols. As students we are too far advanced now to expect further instruction. Does not that argue an entire change in the plans and very nature of God?

The orthodox church will not only believe in God and Christ, but in their gospel or doctrine. That is their "power of God unto salvation." If while on board a foundering schooner, where the waves dashing over us threaten our immediate destruction, we should see a member of the life-saving service appear on the beach and fire a rocket over our heads bearing to us a line, would it save us to have confidence in the man as a government servant who knows his business the while we refuse to trust his rope? Yet many profess to believe in Christ who absolutely refuse to obey his doctrines. And strangely enough great organizations claiming to be strictly orthodox have entirely eliminated his doctrine from their teaching. Many are foundering in the sea, and while Christ stands upon the shore prepared to save, they propose to eliminate his life-saving apparatus, i. e., his doctrine, for we are told, "Take heed unto thyself, and unto the doctrine, continue in them: for in doing this thou shalt both save thyself, and them that hear thee." Who is orthodox, the man who clings to the rope, or the man who refuses its aid?

If one really wishes to know if his church is orthodox or sound in religious opinion and doctrine, he may find the principles of the doctrine of Christ named in the opening verses of the sixth chapter of Hebrews. They may be counted on the fingers, unless one is physically as well as theologically mutilated. In how many pulpits have they ever been preached without variation or reservation? Who is orthodox?

Contrast the statement of faith of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints with the Bible statement of faith found in that chapter, and tell us if you do not think that the decision excluding us from orthodoxy needs revision about as badly as some of the "orthodox" creeds. E. A. S.

THE LAW OF PSYCHOLOGY EXTENDED

It was our privilege some time ago to listen to a lecture on the laws of psychology, or "soul phenomena." In dealing with telepathy or mind reading, the lecturer stated that it is a law recognized by psychologists, that certain people are attuned by birth so that psychic messages pass easily from one to the other; just as in wireless telegraphy two instruments must be attuned to each other, and if so attuned the message will pass from one to the other, while all other instruments not so attuned will be unmoved. So certain individuals, such as a mother, and daughter, father and son, or brother and sister, are often attuned by nature or birth, being alike in soul characteristics as well as in outward appearances, and mental messages may pass from one to the other, even over great distances, and especially in times of stress or danger when the mind is very active, so that the one will be aware of the situation in which the other is found.

If this is indeed a law, it must be a spiritual law, and it will operate anywhere in the spiritual realm. It occurs to us that we might carry it further, and see in it the reason why Christ said, "Ye must be born again." To get into communion with God we must be attuned by birth. We must become the sons of God. We must be like him.

Most Christians will agree with us on that point; but now comes this proposition for the consideration of those Christians who do not believe in present revelation: If men are born of God to-day, and come into the relationship of "sons" to him, there should be the same communion that there was of old, running the scale of revelation, from a simple prompting of the Spirit to the giving of a great message, such as moved Isaiah and Jeremiah and John. There will be a continuous giving of revelation, some of which can not fail to arise to the dignity of scripture. There will be men in such close communion with the Father that they will be worthy to be called prophets.

If these things do not occur, where is the trouble? Are not people really born again, or has your law of psychology gone out of business? Is it still operating between man and man, but not between man and God?

CURRENT EVENTS SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

ILLINOIS MINE DISASTER.—An explosion in a mine near Royalton, Illinois, on the 27th, caused by a miner's lamp coming in contact with a pocket of gas, reported before noted and marked dangerous, resulted in the death of fifty men.

DISTRESS IN BELGIUM.—Seven million Belgians are said to be facing famine, with rations in some places for only a few days. All industries are paralyzed, and many of those who have not fled to friendly territory wander aimlessly from city to city seeking food and shelter. The first shipment of foodstuffs has been received from England by the American Relief Commission, and has ere now, no doubt, been distributed where most needed. Report from Amsterdam says that Holland declines aid from England for Belgian refugees, and will bear the burden of their care alone.

GOVERNMENT MAY MINE.—President Wilson is said to have been advised concerning and to be considering the operation of the Colorado coal mines under governmental supervision, pending agreement between operators and miners. It is urged that the continuation of the strike interferes with interstate commerce and transmission of mails, and that the president has supreme authority to close the mines or operate them under Federal control.

HAITIAN TROUBLE.—Davilamr Theodore has proclaimed himself president of Haiti, and is marching against the capital. The United States transport Hancock, carrying a full regiment of marines, and the cruiser Kansas have been ordered to Haitian waters. These movements are to protect Americans and others in Haiti.

FOREIGN SHIPPING.—The Brindilla, bearing illuminating oil and previously reported detained by British authorities, has been released. England has announced that conditional contraband shipments, such as petroleum, between neutral countries will not be liable to seizure. All articles not contraband or conditional, and carried by neutral vessels, will not be molested, even in shipment to belligerent nations. Cotton, though not listed as absolute or conditional contraband, has previously been detained. While most of the mills of England and France are closed, there is said to be a fair market for cotton in Germany. German buyers are already securing American cotton for shipment.

ALBANIAN TERRITORY OCCUPIED.—Greece has occupied considerable territory in southern Albania, explaining that same is not for conquest, but in interest humanitarian. While police precautions are being taken to assure the security of Grecian frontiers, the premier states that Greece recognizes the decision of the London conference creating an autonomous Albania, and that her action has the approval of the powers. Italy has landed a naval force and is occupying the Albanian seaport Avolona for the purpose, as explained, of seeing that the London decision is carried out. Various separate governments have been established in Albania, some of which are nothing more than independent municipalities. Essad Pasha, in the north and representing Turkey, seems to be in preparation to occupy the throne vacated by William of Wied.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—Reports from Mexico are conflicting and uncertain. Zapata delegates have arrived at Aguas Calientes, and are participating in the peace convention. A coalition of Villa and Carranza delegates was reported on the 27th to have been in control of the convention. Carranza is said to have expressed his willingness to retire as Constitutionalist chief on condition that the tenure of the provisional government be brief, and that he be permitted to be a candidate for the presidency. From Mexico City, it was later reported that he had submitted his resignation to the peace convention, conditional upon the retirement of Villa to private life. An attempt by a Carranza supporter, by the hand of an agent, to assassinate Villa is reported, the would-be assassin having been executed following confession. General Herrea, a Carranza follower, is said, by attacking Parra Chihuahua, defended by a Villa garrison, to have broken the armistice agreed upon by the peace convention. A battle between Carranza and Villa forces to the east of Aguas Calientes is reported. Villa has a large army at his command ready for an emergency, and which has been placed near Aguas Calientes. Carranza has stationed ten thousand men at Leon, twenty-five miles south of Aguas Calientes, ready to block any advance of Villa in case of failure of a peaceful solution in the convention. The outcome of the convention seems uncertain.

EUROPEAN WAR.—The week covered by this report has seen continued activity in the fighting centers, and the entrance of new forces into the already terrible European war. Following their advances reported last week, the Germans crossed the Yser River in northwestern Belgium between Nieuport and Dixmunde. Most if not all of the German forces have since been driven back across this river, with allied successes at other Belgian points. Heavy losses were sustained by both lines in the severe fighting of this region. Germany seems to have partially abandoned her attempt to sweep along the coast, and to have massed her forces elsewhere, especially in the vicinity of Lille, where she claims gains, as well as in the Argonne forests, to the east. Germany is putting Antwerp in a state of defense. France reports gains in upper Alsace. Official German report says that the German and Austrian forces in Poland have been forced to withdraw from before fresh Russian troops advancing from Warsaw, Ivangorod and Novogeorgievsk. Austrian successes are reported along the lower San River in Galicia. The setting in of the severe Russian winter is expected to make for advantage to the Russians. Austria reports the Servians being driven from Bosnian territory. The rebel forces of Lieutenant Colonel Maritz, wounded and fled to German territory, are reported completely routed by Union of South African troops. Another rebellion has broken out, in the Orange Free State, led by General D. DeWet, and in western Transvaal by General Beyers, war leaders in the South African War, the latter commander of the Union forces until his resignation on the taking up of arms by Premier Botha against Germany. Beyers' forces are said to have been routed by Botha. Encounters between British and Indian troops at Alexandria are reported. A British freight steamer has been sunk by a German mine to the north of Ireland. A German steamer converted into a cruiser has been sunk by British torpedo boats in the Adriatic. The German Emden has sunk a Japanese liner. Disguised, the Emden approached and sunk, at Penang, a British possession at the southern extremity of Asia, a Russian cruiser and a French destroyer. Without a declaration of war, a Turkish cruiser on the 29th bombarded Theodocia, a Russian port on the north coast of the Black Sea, and on the same date a Turkish cruiser demanded the surrender of Novorossysk, one hundred twenty miles from Theodocia, and withdrew. Turkish destroyers on the 29th sunk a Russian gunboat and damaged a French and three Russian liners off the coast of Odessa. Odessa is said to have been bombarded. Turkish and Russian fleets are thought to be engaged near Odessa. The Turkish army is being recruited to its fullest capacity, with men forced into service, and supplies seized wherever obtainable. The entering of Turkey into the war is expected to involve Greece, Bulgaria, Roumania, and probably Italy. The Russian ambassador and consuls have been recalled from Turkey. Holland has three hundred thousand trained troops stationed at strategical points along her Belgian and German frontiers. The River Scheldt and all the canals are mined. Cruisers and torpedo boats are at anchor, prepared to cooperate with the land forces. These preparations are for the defense of the neutrality of Holland, should same be violated.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

NEWS FROM ENGLAND.—Under date of October 9, Bishop Roderick May wrote from London, England, reporting that the prospects for work in the British Isles Mission are excellent, despite the present war situation. He reports a much more favorable attitude on the part of the public toward our American missionaries. Numbers are calling and making inquiries, these callers including not only members of the Utah Church but outsiders as well. He states that he has learned on good authority that the Utah Church is calling in its missionaries from England and the European nations. Many of these elders were to sail for Canada on October 16.

PROHIBITION IN RUSSIA.—At the beginning of the present war in Europe, the Russian Government prohibited the sale of alcoholics throughout the country. This action followed continuous and drastic criticism of methodical stimulation of the desire for alcohol and Russia's whole system of taxation, and was enforced upon the eve of a great war, in consideration of the wholesome effect of abstinence on the soldiery. That this decree enforcing prohibition has had an incalculable effect upon the entire country, as well as in the ranks of the army, is shown by the following dispatch from Petrograd, and appearing in The New York Sun:

The temperance leader Tchelysheff, reviewing the effect which the prohibition of vodka has had in the extinction of liquor licenses, remarks that there has been a great reduction in crime, disorder and sickness and a great increase in savings bank accounts on the bourse.

That the nation in peace or in war is inestimably better off without alcoholics is evident to very, very many; that the world will be better off without the consumption of liquors as a beverage is certain to opposers of this traffic, and such condition will continue to be their goal.

OLD ENEMY IN NEW ROLE.—R. B. Neal, notorious for misrepresentation during his checkered career as an antagonist of the latter-day faith, in criticism of certain writers, warns, in the Word of Truth, against misstatement in discussing this faith, for the reason that "one misstatement in an article, with 'Mormon' readers, is like a fly in a 'bowl of syrup'—spoils the whole thing." The writers mentioned state that the three witnesses swore they saw the Book of Mormon plates, when, according to Mr. Neal, "It is evident that Joseph Smith, jr., wrote the statement and they signed it." Thus correcting one misstatement, he, himself, is caught red-handed in another. Mr. Neal comments incidentally, "Wonder he did not have them make oath before a notary! Would have given weight to their testimony." Having no regard for their testimony as given, and reiterated, this objector would have none for it if sworn to as suggested. This comment is beside the point, anyway, as much so as if the suggestion were made in connection with the visions of John on Patmos, or concerning any other like testimony. For Mr. Neal to be insincere is for him to be himself; for him to be beside the point is for him to be consistent with his former methods as an enemy of the faith.

LIBERAL OFFER.—We call attention to the very liberal offer of the Herald Publishing House found in the advertising department of this issue of the HERALD, and made to those who wish work done in printing or advertising. The first work of this institution is not a work for profits, but a work of service. It is in keeping with these basic principles of the latter-day gospel that the management places at the disposal of our people their equipment in the lines mentioned. Whether your work is done by the Herald Publishing House or not, they are at your service.

SENTIMENT IN UTAH.—Referring to a recent meeting of principals of public schools and juvenile court officials in Salt Lake City, the Deseret Evening News for October 23 says:

At the meeting the surprising statement was made that the real cause for indifference upon the part of the authorities in the matter of enforcing the law relating to the sale of tobacco to minors lies in the fact that the law lacks the healthy support of an active and interested public sentiment.

The Deseret Evening News to the contrary notwithstanding, this statement comes without surprise to those who are mindful of the disregard for the constitutional law of the church on other points, and manifest in Utah from the very beginning, in which law is written by the hand of God, "Tobacco . . . is not good for man." It is little wonder that children, taught that the books are not to be considered in the presence of the "living oracles," and before whom is placed the example of church officials using tobacco, purchased at mercantile establishments managed by the church or church dignitaries—it is little wonder that minors under these conditions are found to be afflicted with "the evils of the tobacco habit," with no public sentiment to enforce a law intended to prevent these evil effects. With The News, we agree that "there is immediate need of an awakening" all along the line.

Life's Beauties

Do you look for life's beauties as onward you go?
Do you see all about you its verdures which grow
Resplendent in glory, in perfume, and form—
The beauties which greet you at dawning of morn'?

Do you look at the sunrise expecting to see
A flood of real beauty which never can be
By artist, or poet, e'en faintly portrayed?
Such glories as sunrise alone has displayed?

Are you open, receptive, in heart and in mind,
To beauties, real beauties, what'er be their kind?
And oft they are hidden, as nuggets of gold,
O'erlooked through the ages as onward they've rolled.

Is your vision of beauty o'ercast by a cloud?
Have you not smiled at roses as gently they've bowed
When kissed by the dew on a bright summer's morn,
And softly their perfume the breezes have borne?

Would you like to see clearer the Great Artist's work?
Then put forth an effort, and think not to shirk;
He made naught but beauty in earth or in sky,
And gave us the power to see, if we'll try.

Though radiant the morn, unto you 'twill be night,
If closed are your eyes excluding the light;
The song of the birds though 'tis sweet, and 'tis clear,
Your soul can not touch unless you will hear.

You may soar if you will to paradise now—
The angels of glory were once e'en as thou;
They toiled and looked upward for beauty and light,
Till now they abide where 'tis never called night.

Why look to the future for glory and song,
The present is with us, and here we belong.
E'en now does the sun shine—e'en now is the flower
An emblem of God—the Almighty's great power.

Let us look for real beauties what'er be their kind,
And beauties, true beauties, new beauties, we'll find;
All men will seem better in face and in form,
And love from our souls unto theirs will be borne.

LAMONI, IOWA.

AUSTIN M. DOBSON.

Blemishes

I saw her in the cloistered dimness where
We stranger twain a moment bowed in prayer
Upon her cheek a grossly-blemished place
Made hideous an otherwise lovely face.
I pitied her, deep in my inmost soul,
That Fate on her had levied such a toll.
Then in new radiance the lights upsprang
And with relief my spirit leaped and sang.
The scar that lashed my sympathy like whips
A red rose was, its stem between her lips!

Oft in the darkness of our clouded ken
We note shortcomings in our fellow men:
Soul-blemishes and mind-disfigurements,
Faults past denial, traits that give offense.
We pity or we blame, inquiring: "Why Must others so less perfect be than I?"

Then comes the clearer light of graver years—
Virtues enlarged, sins shrunken, through our tears—
Till that which seemed a fault in blinder days Shines out a glory and compels our praise!

—Strickland W. Gillilan.

He Careth for Thee

What can it mean? Is it aught to him
That the nights are long and the days are dim?
Can he be touched by the griefs I bear,
Which sadden the heart and whiten the hair?
Around his throne are eternal calms,
And strong, glad music of happy psalms,
And bliss unruffled by any strife,
How can he care for my poor life?

And yet I want him to care for me,
While I live in this world where the sorrows be;
When the lights die down on the path I take,
When strength is feeble and friends forsake,
When love and music that once did bless,
Have left me to silence and loneliness,
And lifelong changes to sobbing prayers—
Then my heart cries out for a God who cares.

Oh, wonderful story of deathless love!
Each child is dear to that heart above:
He fights for me when I can not fight,
He comforts me in the gloom of night,
He lifts the burdens, for he is strong,
He stills the sigh and awakens the song,
The sorrows that bowed me down he bears,
And loves and pardons, because he cares.

Let all who are sad take heart again,
We are not alone in hours of pain:
Our Father stoops from his throne above
To soothe and quiet us with his love,
He leaves us not when the storm is high,
And we have safety, for he is nigh.
Can it be trouble which he doth share?
Oh, rest in peace, for the Lord doth care.—Selected.

The Second Mile

Stern Duty said: "Go walk a mile,
And help thy brother bear his load."
I walked reluctant; but, meanwhile,
My heart grew soft with help bestowed.

Then Love said: "Go another mile."
I went, and Duty spake no more.
But Love arose, and, with a smile,
Took all the burden that I bore.

'Tis ever thus when Duty calls;
If we spring quickly to obey,
Love comes, and whatso'er befalls,
We're glad to help another day.

The second mile we walk with joy;
Heaven's peace goes with us on the road;
So let us all our powers employ
To help our brother bear life's load.

—Stephen Moore.

"GOD IS LOVE"

(Synopsis of a sermon by Elder Ralph W. Farrell.)

I am to speak to you to-day of the tenderness and goodness of God. To open to your vision, if it please the Author of our hope, a broader view of this mighty text. I realize that many persons may not agree with my conception of the broadness of love; I am not the framer of your thoughts. Nowhere in the Scripture do we read that God is hate, evil, death; but rather that his attributes are kindness, forgiveness, and charity.

Time changes many things, especially the theories of man. Your speaker has not escaped, and realizes with deep regret that his position relative to the depth and breadth of divine affection has been very narrow, and that many a stake was driven into treacherous sand; but now old views have been reviewed and retouched with the pencil of safer judgment; clouds of pessimism have been dissipated before the sun of truth; narrow grooves made somewhat broader, and the sharp sting of bigoted sarcasm dulled by a nobler view and action. Knowing this, he has endeavored to tune his lyre to a more hopeful strain; to freight the air with happy melody; minister kindness, good cheer, hope, and sunshine to all men; recognizing the rights and sincerity of all men, believing that in doing this he is not offending the great Creator, but rather looking upon the sick and bruised Samaritan as being a child of God as well as the man who leaned upon the Savior's breast. If this be heresy, then he must go down as a heretic, for nothing short of good evidence to the contrary will ever change his mind.

I am sure you will pardon me for this bit of prelude. I realize that my thoughts are directed to both Saints and sinners, and I want to be fully understood. I want to defend this position, namely, that many a Christian (in name at least) has been too radical in thinking himself the special creature of God's care and love, while the man in the gutter is fit only to be stamped deeper into the mud of forgetfulness as a subject of heaven's wrath. Some Latter Day Saints have talked and acted as if they were the pets of the universe, while their neighbors were objects of God's neglect, fit only as targets for the arrows of ridicule and denunciation.

I do not believe this doctrine of narrow-mindedness. If, through the providence of Deity, I have been made a custodian of the gospel laws, and my life lines have run in pleasant places, it is not because God loves me more than he does the poor sin-crushed being who is waiting behind prison bars until the agony of suspense is ended by that last walk across the "bridge of sighs." No! It is because the omnipotent Father is working for the good of all his creatures, and using me only as a means to this end. Heaven forbid that I shall ever become so narrow-minded that I shall look upon my fellow men and think that God does not love their souls as much as he loves mine!

God is love, the embodiment of all that is good. Why attempt to reason on the opposite by dragging into the arena of thought some obtuse illustration that has no bearing on the question? Then, the way of the transgressor is hard, yet the punishment inflicted is for his good. Hell, that place of misery, that great crucible we shrink to enter—and may it never be our fate so to do—is an institution of God's mercy as much as heaven. Do not get away with a misunderstanding that may clog the avenue of your impartial judgment. I do not claim that man will not be punished for his sins, but that this punishment is the result of the Father's love, that good may be the outgrowth.

Why not let the future, which must be wholly in God's control, take care of itself, and teach the gospel of the eternal now? Heaven is not a vast corral into which souls, like cattle, are stampeded by force or fear. No child was ever fully developed by constant threats of punishment and an everlasting nagging at its faults and weaknesses. That preacher who appeals to fear, to sheer cowardice in his audience, picturing the horrors of hell as the means of influencing men to accept religion, belittles his calling and insults intelligence. We might as well try to frighten a flower into lifting its face toward the sun as to frighten a soul into lifting itself toward God. The very words, gospel of fear, are a paradox—there can be no good news of fear.

Alas! how cruelly we have misrepresented God when we have taught that the Christ was sending forth a curse when he said, "He that believeth not shall be damned." It was a note of warning, uttered in pity, not in spite. He that believed not the gospel should be condemned from celestial glory, but even then not forgotten. Christ will not let us go beyond the reach of his mercy, for through the plan of ages, mercy and justice go together. Sin goes not unpunished, neither does the hand of repentance reach to the throne of mercy in vain.

Earth holds no truth so practical as this: God cares for his creatures. Man is not a victim of chance, a child of the night, wandering alone in the forest of despair. It is not true that matter and force use the soul for a lifelong game of battledore and shuttlecock. No sect, or creed, or people has a monopoly on God's goodness and blessings.

Shall it be said that good is not behind the act that separates men from their friends that they may devote lives of privation in caring for the lepers? That heaven is not pleased with the life-saving inventions?

Tell me, in the pages of what book is recorded the statement, "Whatsoever constraineth to do good is from God"? Has the eternal One made you a judge of the motives and doings of his creatures, to say that everything which does not harmonize with your conception is of necessity wrong?

Let us believe that the Father is blessing all his children, and that there are yet many of his Saints who have not been called out of Babylon. They are God's people, living up to the light which they have, and so are visited by the spirit of peace. The Book of Doctrine and Covenants teaches me that many souls have been so deceived that the reception of the restored message is not altogether possible. They will come forth in the first resurrection, and then receive of the advanced laws, and it will be our duty to work for them then as it is our duty to strive to save fallen men to-day—not by contending against their belief, which often is sacred to them; not by the illogical cry of "Mother of harlots," "Babylon," to any moral teaching or particular person, but rather to men of corrupt minds anywhere and every time, this being shown by the "three books." Babylon is spiritual iniquity, and is responsible for the death of all the prophets and saints that have been slain upon the earth. It is the church of the Devil, and the only church against which we are to contend.

Here, then, let us pause, while I gather up the threads of a former thought, which were broken by the introduction of the remark on Babylon.

The quality of mercy is not strained. God cares for me and you, it matters not who we are. Shall we deny the mercy of heaven to the man whose father only a few years back was the creature of God's special creation, when the body formed from the dust of the earth was pronounced good? Ah, no.

Man seems to be a creature of emotion; hide it as he will, every trace is not covered. He is the only animal that smiles. In every human heart there is some affection, manifested towards something. The most hardened criminal loves wife, child, dog, or horse, and this tender attachment is intense. This universal characteristic, call it love, affection, devotion, or what you will, proclaims, loud as a peal of trumpets, that there is some of God in all men, excepting, perhaps, the sons of perdition. And who knows but that the enlargement of this good is the very means by which fallen man is to be freed from evil? Granting this, can we effectually preach any other than the gospel of love, hope, peace, and good will, endeavoring to awaken men to a consciousness of the love of God toward him?

Perhaps I can illustrate this by relating an incident which occurred in one of our large zoos. Rajah was the name of a large ape, and, through the extreme kindness of its keeper, a love was developed in the heart of the animal. A slow but fatal sickness came to Rajah. In the semidarkness, one night, the keeper came to see how his patient was resting. He was startled to see a dark, bent figure waiting for him. It tottered painfully toward him and stretched up its arms as much as to say, "Pick me up." The keeper bent over and took the ape. The arms of Rajah closed around his neck with a sigh of relief. The keeper stroked him sorrowfully, and there in the dead of night, the man-beast died, like a poor, fevered child in its father's arms. And this is the lesson taught by Christ—that love begets love, that righteousness cleaves to righteousness, and as a man sows so shall he reap.

Then spoke the Christ (so wondrous was his vision)

(Deep, deep his voice, with a sorrow's cadence fraught):

This world to-day would be a realm elysian,

Had my disciples lived the love I taught.

Augustine entered England. The Druids were tearing the warm hearts from living victims. In the darkened minds of those men, the seed of God's love was planted, and the harvest was mercy and pity and love. God is love, and love is the keynote of the world's happiness. It was mingled with the tears of the Savior when he gazed over the sun-kissed homes of Jerusalem and cried, "Oh, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how oft would I have gathered you!" Yet he still loves Jerusalem. So the theme that whispers and thrills with infinite tenderness in the music of the prodigal son story is that God is ever watching and waiting and longing for the return of his other son, and when he comes back, will give him the best robe and the ring of authority.

I want to tell you boys something. There isn't a day passes that does not see hundreds of letters sent to the large cities. Letters written with the trembling hand of poor, lonely mothers, asking the whereabouts of absent sons—careless, wayward children—but still loved. Boys and girls, I want you to be kinder to your mother and father. You will never fully realize what I mean until you have children of your own.

Permit me to indulge in the use of another story: Not long ago in one of our New England States, a man built a magnificent house, and, when he married, the house became a beautiful home. The woman ran away with another man. The house was closed. No person ever enters its doors. The piano is open, the shades are up, a garment half finished resting on the machine; everything is as she left it, but the one mighty force, love, is gone, and where there is no love there is no home, no hope, no nothing but the gloom of despair and death.

Some of the old reformers said things about God which were the blackest lies that ever originated in hell. Think of Edwards picturing the kind Father as a lion tearing men to pieces and spattering his face with their blood in order that the vindictiveness of heaven might be illustrated! My friend, I do not know that I can express my feelings better than by reading this sublime poem by Sam Walter Foss, entitled, "The house by the side of the road":

There are hermit souls that live withdrawn
In the peace of their self-content;
There are souls, like stars, that dwell apart,
In a fellowless firmament:
There are pioneer souls that blaze their paths
Where the highways never ran—
But let me live by the side of the road
And be a friend to man.

Let me live in a house by the side of the road,
Where the race of men go by—
The men who are good, and the men who are bad,
As good and as bad as I.
I would not sit in the scorner's seat,
Or hurl the cynic's ban;
Let me live in a house by the side of the road
And be a friend to man.

I see from my house by the side of the road,
By the side of the highway of life,
The men who press with ardor of hope,
The men who are faint with the strife.
But I turn not away from their smiles nor their tears—
Both parts of an infinite plan;
Let me live in my house by the side of the road
And be a friend to man.

I know there are brook-gladdened meadows ahead,
And mountains of wearisome height;
That the road passes on through the long afternoon,
And stretches away to the night.
But still I rejoice when the travelers rejoice,
And weep with the strangers that moan,
Nor live in my house by the side of the road
Like a man who dwells alone.

Let me live in my house by the side of the road,
Where the race of men go by—
They are good, they are bad, they are weak, they are strong,
Wise, foolish—so am I.
Why then should I sit in the scorner's seat,
Or hurl the cynic's ban,
Let me live in my house by the side of the road
And be a friend to man.

Bernard, a saint of long ago, shivering in his rugs, yet with his heart warm with the love of righteousness, cried, "God cares for me," and the garret became a king's palace. Xavier, falling helpless in the jungles of India, rested his head on a moss-covered log and breathed a prayer of faith to God, and every bush burned with the holy presence. John, the apostle, bowed under the weight of fourscore years, said, "God cares for me, I can not live too long." Huss, marching to the martyr's stake, whispered in his prayer, "He cares for me, I can not die too soon."

Shall we deny these men and thousands of others, dead and living, faith in God, good works, and the love and favor of that Father?

Ah! if you can only catch the sun-flash of my message to you this morning, so freighted with the glorious truth that God cares for you, loves you, walks with you, and talks with you! And I can not believe that the rank and file are less objects of heaven's love.

Who has not been comforted and broadened by reading the ninety-first psalm, and twenty-third psalm? And surely David did not mean himself alone, when he said, "When my father and my mother forsake me then the Lord will take me up." Do you grasp the meaning of this statement? When your mother forsakes you! God kinder than mother! She who gave you birth, whose dry lips of misery smiled a blessing on your upturned face, will not forsake you. David was not speaking of mothers, he referred to monsters. But God is more tender than a mother; he hates the sin but loves the sinner infinitely, and when we reach out our arms to him, he will take us up.

And, too, it is a narrow, distorted theology that says God's love ends at the grave; that those blessed hands of mercy and entreaty held toward man a few years of his mortal existence are withdrawn forever, when the first handful of earth is cast upon the silent face. If a mother can kiss the dead eyelids of a wayward son, think ye that the heavenly Father's love will go out as the light of a candle extinguished by a breath of wind at the casement?

That awful punishment inflicted upon the children of disobedience is not to harden, to torture, but to reform and reclaim. And when the uttermost farthing has been paid, the soul of man will rise to inherit some degree of glory that has been prepared by the wisdom of God. Yet, "Every man in his own order; they that are Christ's at his coming."

Thus looking upon men of all ranks and conditions as my brethren, children of the same King; thus pitying their mistakes and trying to encourage them to do right, recognizing that if they do not believe as I do there must be some reason, and that I have no right to ridicule their faith and think that God has forgotten them; this desire to recognize the good everywhere, is what I call charity, and without charity I realize that I am a being of all beings who most needs God's pity and mercy.

In closing, may I remind you that Christ came not into the world to condemn the world, but to save it; and his messengers are sent forth to bind up the wounds of suffering humanity, to invite and encourage all to come to the Father's house. And all true Saints are messengers of peace, and their mission is to say to the children of men, "Behold the mercy of Christ, the love of God, how infinite! Come home and rest."

ALL THINGS COMMON

And they continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers. And fear came upon every soul: and many wonders and signs were done by the apostles. And all that believed were together, and had all things common; and sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men, as every man had need.—Acts 2: 42-45.

Neither was there among them that lacked: for as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them, and brought the price of the things that were sold, and laid them down at the apostles' feet: and distribution was made unto every man according as he had need.

And Joses, who by the apostles was surnamed Barnabas, (which is, being interpreted, The Son of Consolation,) a Levite, and of the country of Cyprus, having land, sold it, and brought the money, and laid it at the apostles' feet.—Acts 4: 34-37.

It is an interesting fact that though we have a great many self-called preachers, trying to turn their hearers back to the old path, very seldom if ever, do we hear of any of them trying to restore the condition known among God's people as "all things common." While they are very strenuous in calling the attention of the people to the rites and ceremonies and faith of the early Christians, when they come to the question of having all things common their silence becomes almost painful. In our ministerial work we have asked some of these men who claim to be trying to restore Christianity why it is they are so very painfully silent with reference to this condition.

The text quoted at the beginning of this article is too plain to be refuted. The condition of the saints at this time was one of high spirituality, and this condition known as all things common, was without doubt the result of living on a high spiritual plane. And as the same cause will always produce the same effect, if primitive Christianity is ever restored in its completeness, there must again be a condition known among God's people as all things common. Among those who believe that this condition should obtain we have a variety of opinions as to just what constitutes all things common. Even in our own church we have various shades of belief.

We find that not only the historian Luke understood that all things common was a necessity for the brotherhood of man, but the Apostle Paul understood it also. In Romans 12: 13, we find Paul giving advice to his brethren as follows: "Distributing to the necessity of saints; given to hospitality." This comes as a command to the saints, that they shall distribute according to the necessity of saints. Here notice that the saints' needs are made the basis of distribution, nothing else.

Young, in his Analytical Concordance, tells us that the word distributing comes from the Greek word koinoneo, which literally means, to make common. According to this literal interpretation, the Apostle

Paul tells the Roman brethren to make their property common, so as to divide according to the needs of the saints.

In 1 Timothy 6: 17, 18, the Apostle Paul advises Timothy as follows:

Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not highminded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy; that they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate.

Here the apostle instructs Timothy to teach the saints that they do good with their means, ready to distribute, willing to communicate.

Turning to Young's Analytical Concordance, we find that the word communicate comes from the Greek word koin, meaning, inclined to use things in common. That is, Timothy is to charge the saints that they do good, and that they be rich in good works, and then tells them just how it is done, namely, by being ready to distribute, willing to communicate, or inclined to use things in common. Doing these, he says, they will lay up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come that they may lay hold on eternal life, or as Christ puts it:

And I say unto you, Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations.—Luke 16: 9.

Again, teaching the Hebrew saints, in Hebrew 13: 16, Paul makes the following statement: "But to do good and communicate forget not; for with such sacrifices God is well pleased." Translated literally, you might read it: "Forget not the act to use all things in common."

In Jude, third verse, we have the word common as follows: "Beloved, when I gave all diligence to write unto you of the common salvation," etc. Here we are told by Young in his concordance, that the word common is from the Greek word koinos, which is the same word used in Acts 2: 44; 4: 32. Now this common salvation, spoken of by Jude, we believe the Saints will agree with us, is a salvation of degrees, a salvation in which every man will receive according to his deeds. If the word common in this paragraph means according to a man's deeds, by parity of argument, the word common in the expression of "all things common" will mean that every man receives according to his needs, just as the Apostle Paul puts it. We find the same expression in Titus 1: 4, where he speaks of the common salvation. Here the word common comes from the same Greek word koinos.

Evidently Jude has contrasted two kinds of salvation; he speaks of having written to the saints of the common salvation, and then says it was needful for him to write unto the saints that they should contend earnestly for the faith which was once delivered to them, indicating the common salvation as contrasted with the special salvation. Paul agrees with this in 1 Timothy 4: 10, where he says that God "is the Savior of all men, especially of those that believe." Here again is the common salvation contrasted with the special salvation. In 1 Corinthians 15, he has contrasted these different degrees of salvation, likening them unto the different glories, when speaking of the common one, the telestial, he likens it unto the stars, and states that one star differs from another star in glory, showing here that the telestial or more common salvation is the one in which there are degrees of salvation, and as the same Greek word as used in Jude is used in Acts 2: 44, it indicates that the holding of all things common means to hold according to a person's needs, and not everyone having the same amount. Notice the connection between Acts 4: 34 and 2 Corinthians 8: 10-15.

The condition of having all things common resulted in a brotherhood in which none of them lacked anything (Acts 4: 34). Paul makes the argument, in 2 Corinthians 8, that the condition of equality (verse 14) brought about the same state of affairs as is found in Acts, namely, that they lacked nothing (see verses 14 and 15). Now as the same cause always produces the same effect, all things common and equality are by inference here proven to be the same.

Modern revelation agrees with this position. In Doctrine and Covenants 81: 4, we have the following:

And you are to be equal, or in other words, you are to have equal claims on the properties, for the benefit of managing the concerns of your stewardship, every man according to his wants and his needs, inasmuch as his wants are just, and all this for the benefit of the church of the living God, that every man may improve upon his talent, that every man may gain other talents; yea, even an hundred fold, to be cast into the Lord's storehouse, to become the common property of the whole church, every man seeking the interest of his neighbor, and doing all things with an eye single to the glory of God.

A close reading of this quotation will reveal the following facts: A clear cut, inspired definition of equality, namely, every man shall have his stewardship; every man shall have claim on the common property of the organization as he needs it, but he shall use this stewardship primarily for the benefit of the church and the living God. The reason given that every man shall have his stewardship is that he may have a chance to improve upon his talent, that he may be able to get other talents, these talents so given, whether of an hundred fold or less, to be cast into the treasury, called the Lord's storehouse, this treasury to be known as the common property of the whole church.

This is identical with all things common, as referred to in Acts 2: 44. When this is done, then every man will be "seeking the interests of his neighbor," in other words, "loving his neighbor as himself," and every man will be doing things "with an eye single to the glory of God," or, in other words, will be doing all things in perfect harmony with the intelligence of God, or God's law. Here is the true definition of equality, or all things common, leaving every man to retain his true individuality, yet working collectively in perfect harmony with God.

The Apostle Paul puts it this way in writing to the Corinthian saints (2 Corinthians 8). In verse 11, he urges the saints to perform the doing of it. He wants them to go to work at doing something. In verses 10 and 11 he tells them that those who had been willing to do it over a year ago, should continue to have a will to do what is right, and tells them in verse 12 that they must first be of a willing mind, and that it does not make any difference how much or how little a man has, he should do what he can. In verse 13 he tries to show them that he does not expect that by doing their duty it will make other men idle, and the ones who perform it to be overburdened. He explains it in verse 14 thus: That by living in a state of equality our abundance will go to those who want. (The word abundance here corresponds with the word surplus in modern revelation, and this want, according to Doctrine and Covenants 81, must be a just want.) Then Paul continues to urge that those who have received from us, when they have a surplus or an abundance will supply our wants, and doing thus will produce equality and will place us (verse 15) in a condition in which there would be no lack. "He that had gathered much had nothing over," because he had given his surplus to the common treasurer; and he that had gathered little had not lacked, because he had a right to go to the common treasury and get according to his needs and wants.

That the Apostle Paul, in 2 Corinthians was writing to the Corinthian saints about just such an organization as we have now under the name of "Order of Enoch," we fully believe. Lying before us is a translation of the New Testament by Professor James Moffat, Professor of Greek in Oxford, giving a free translation to this chapter, he translates it as follows, (italics mine):

Now, brothers, I have to tell you about the grace God has given to the churches of Macedonia. Amid a severe ordeal of trouble their overflowing joy and their deep poverty together have poured out a flood of rich generosity; I can testify that up to their means, aye and beyond their means, they have given— begging me of their own accord, most urgently, for the favor of contributing to the support of the saints. They have done more than I expected; they gave themselves to the Lord, to begin with, and then (for so God willed it) they put themselves at my disposal. This has led me to ask Titus to complete the arrangements for the same gracious contribution among yourselves, as it was he who started it. Now then, you are to the front in everything, in faith, in utterance, in knowledge, in all zeal, and in love for us—do come to the front in this gracious enterprise as well. I am not issuing any orders, only using the zeal of others to prove how sterling your own love is. (You know how gracious our Lord Jesus Christ was; rich though he was, he became poor for the sake of you, that by his poverty you might be rich.) But I will tell you what I think about it; it is to your interest to go on with this enterprise, for you started it last year, you were the first not merely to do anything but to want to do anything. Now, carry it through, so that your readiness to take it up may be equaled by the way you carry it through—so far as your means allow. If only one is ready to give, according to his means, it is acceptable; he is not asked to give what he has not got. THIS DOES NOT MEAN THAT OTHER PEOPLE ARE TO BE RELIEVED AND YOU TO SUFFER: IT IS A MATTER OF GIVE AND TAKE; AT THE PRESENT MOMENT YOUR SURPLUS GOES TO MAKE UP WHAT THEY LACK, IN ORDER THAT THEIR SURPLUS MAY GO TO MAKE UP WHAT YOU LACK. Thus it is to be give and take—as it is written, He who got much had nothing over, and he who got little had not too little. Thanks be to God who has inspired Titus with an interest in you equal to my own; he has indeed responded to my request, but he is off to you by his own choice, so keen is his interest in you. Along with him I am sending that brother whose services to the gospel are praised by all the churches; besides, he has been appointed by the churches to travel with me on the business of administering this fund to the glory of the Lord. His appointment has my full consent, for I want to take precautions against any risk of suspicion in connection with the administration of this charity; I aim at being above reproach not only from God but also from men. Along with them I am also sending our brother: I have had ample proof of his keen interest on many occasions, and it is especially keen on this occasion, as he has absolute confidence in you. Titus is my colleague, he shares my work for you, and these brothers of mine are apostles of the church, a credit to Christ. So let them have proof of how you can love, and of my reasons for being proud of you; it will be a proof read by the churches.—2 Corinthians 8.

Indeed it is quite superfluous for me to be writing to you about this charitable service to the saints; I know how willing you are, I am proud of it, I have boasted of you to the Macedonians: "Achia," I tell them, "was all ready last year." And your zeal has been a stimulus to the majority of them. At the same time I am sending these brothers just in case my pride in you should prove an empty boast in this particular instance; I want you to be "all ready," as I have been telling them that you would be, in case any Macedonians accompany me and find you are not ready—which would make me (not to speak of yourselves) ashamed of having been so sure. That is why I have thought it necessary to ask these brothers to go on in advance and get your promised contribution ready in good time. I want it to be forthcoming as a generous gift, not as money wrung out of you. Mark this: he who sows sparingly will reap sparingly, and he who sows generously will reap a generous harvest. Everyone is to give what he has made up his mind to give; there is to be no grudging or compulsion about it, for God loves the giver who gives cheerfully. God is able to bless you with ample means, so that you may always have quite enough for any emergency of your own and ample besides for any kind act to others; as it is written, He scatters his gifts to the poor broadcast, his charity lasts for ever. He who furnishes the sower with seed and with bread to eat will supply seed for you and multiply it; he will increase the crop of your charities—you will be enriched on all hands, so that you can be generous on all occasions, and your generosity, of which I am the agent, will make men give thanks to God; for the service rendered by this fund does more than supply the wants of the saints, it overflows with many a cry of thanks to God. This service shows what you are, it makes men praise God for the way you have come under the gospel of Christ which you confess, and for the generosity of your contributions to themselves and to all; they are drawn to you and pray for you, on account of the surpassing grace which God has shown to you. Thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift!—2 Corinthians 9.

BEARING FRUIT

God said: "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness." (Genesis 1: 26.) God said, "I will do all my pleasure." He has unlimited power; as the Savior expressed it, "All power is given unto me."

It is distinctly affirmed that God proposed to make man in his likeness and image. I do not see how we could be told plainer that God made man like himself in form. It has always been a mystery to me that people do not understand, in the light of this text, that God is a personage. If man is in the image and likeness of God, then God must be in the image and likeness of man. But I am fully persuaded that God intended to have man even more like himself, even to "the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ." Christ prayed that he and his disciples might be one "as we are." Christ said: "I am the way, the truth and the life, no man cometh to the Father but by me." As Christ understood all things pertaining to life and godliness, he evidently wants his children to be educated in the way of life, too.

If there is any one thing clearly affirmed in Holy Writ, it is that God has a purpose to be accomplished in his children. In all the material expressions of God in nature, we find undeviating order and system. God said to mankind: "Replenish the earth." One specific divine law was given by which it could be done. There can be no deviation. In this is expressed his will and purpose, perpetuity. This shows the nature of God to be, as the Scriptures have said, Whatsoever he doeth, he doeth it for ever. If it expresses his will at one time, it always does. For in him is no "variableness neither shadow of turning."

God has an end to be reached—the perfection of mankind. It can only be reached through the narrow way, "the perfect law," the "perfect law of liberty." We must be doers of the law. The law points out how we may be perfected—nothing else can perfect us. The law points to the performance of two kinds of works, those which are defined distinctly spiritual and those more specifically material. In the spiritual there comes to one the deep conception of God as our Father; his bountiful love is seen clearer and our eyes are opened to our defects and we are anxious to please him; and to know his will is to do it. And so his law is the "beacon light" to guide us. When we are born into this spiritual life of incorruptible seed "by the word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever," we want to be like God—be real sons, or children, and so we see that the only way we can reach this condition is by an observance of the whole law, not only to say, but to do; and when we are confronted with an opportunity to help we will not be anxious to see how little we can do and escape, but will gladly do all we can. We will not only use diligence in the expression of our faith, virtue, knowledge, self-control, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and love, but if these abound we shall not be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. We will be fruitful in all that relates to the expression of our love for our Father.

When we come across such words of God as these, "Will a man rob God?" we will say "No," and when we learn that our Father requires and asks of us one tenth of our increase in temporal things, we will be not only willing, but glad to do his will. It will be a pleasure. God wants a tried people. He will not have any others in the great glory. So just ask yourself, "What do I want, and how can I get it?" The word answers only one way in the perfect law.

Please read Bishop Kelley's sermon in the HERALD of September 2, page 830, "Bearing fruit," and see if you are bearing any. If not, what kind of a tree are you? We can only judge by your fruit.

JEWS RECLAIM PALESTINE

Sioux City Jews will give their financial support to the "back to Jerusalem," or Zionist movement. As a result of an address last night in Bennett's hall by Rabbi Saul Silber, of Chicago, more than fifty local Jews subscribed money to aid in the reclamation of Palestine by the children of the people who left that country centuries ago.

Palestine is to-day, as of old, the land flowing with "milk and honey," said Rabbi Silber. The purpose of the Zionist movement is not merely to reclaim the land of the early Jews for sentiment's sake and to disprove the statement that the Jews were for ever doomed to be without a country, but it also seeks to establish a home for the oppressed Jews of Russia and Roumania. It is not thought likely that many American Jews will return to Jerusalem.

PER CAPITA WEALTH LARGE

There have already been fifty-four colonies established in the vicinity of Jerusalem. One of these colonies, made up of more than nine hundred families, is declared to be the richest colony per capita in the world.

The audience was enthused by Rabbi Silber's speech, and although it was nearly twelve o'clock before he ceased speaking, none left the hall.

The colony will be under the control of the Turkish Government, but a local self government will be allowed. Rabbi Silber asserted that the Turkish Government is anxious for the Jews to settle in Palestine, as the Jews who are now there pay to the Government ten times the taxes that were formerly paid by the Arabs. Olives and oranges at present are the principal products of the colony, although the wine industry promises soon to lead all others. The climate is the same as that of California.

SUCCEED IN AGRICULTURE

Jews from any country in the world are permitted to take up land in Palestine. If the family is without funds the Zionist society will provide passage to the old country and land and implements will be given to him on the cooperative plan. There are now eight Jewish banks in Jerusalem, which have been established by the Zionists. These banks extend credit to the newcomer and see to it that he is established financially.

The speaker declared that the Jews in Palestine are surprising the people of that country by their success as agriculturists. The old saying that a "Jew can make a coat, but can't farm," was branded as false by the rabbi. He pointed to the fact that the Jews were the original farmers of the world, and that while the modern Jews use latest agricultural methods, the patriarchs of old had practices which the farmer of to-day could profit by.—The Sioux City (Iowa) Journal, July 30, 1914.

RUSSIA OUSTS LIQUOR

A press dispatch from Russia brings the interesting news that the czar has issued an order driving intoxicating liquors out of the Russian army. The following is the text of the dispatch:

Emperor Nicholas has just promulgated a general order dealing with the drink evil in his army. Its provisions are of the most drastic character and as such will doubtless commend themselves to Secretary Joseph Daniels of the United States Navy. Vodka is forbidden to the men at all times, and the czar directs that the most stringent measures shall be taken to prevent them from buying it. No soldier if he is known to be inclined to drink is allowed to receive money from home without special permission from his commanding officer.

Officers of every rank are forbidden to drink spirits in camp, on maneuvers or while on any kind of duty, and those in high command are ordered by the emperor to discourage as much as possible the drinking of alcohol and to set an example in the matter of total abstinence to the subordinates. All cases of drunkenness either among officers or men are to be dealt with in the most severe manner possible. Medical officers of the army are to deliver periodical lectures to officers on the harmful effects of alcohol.

Commanders of regiments are instructed to do their best to improve the mess life of the officers under their orders and to foster the introduction of games, the addition of libraries to the mess quarters and to arrange for facilities for the study of foreign languages. In the same way the company officers are required to improve the lot of the rank and file by devising and organizing games and sports which will keep them out of doors, wholesomely occupied during their free time. Soldiers known to be addicted to drink are to be the subject of special solicitude by the regimental officers, chaplains and surgeons.

This is the first occasion on which any such general order has ever been issued to the Russian troops. But the emperor has been led to issue it by the necessity of adding efficiency to his own army. Field Marshal Kitchener demonstrated in his various Soudan campaigns culminating in the crushing of the Dervish Mahdi Omdurman in 1898, the military advantages of total abstinence of alcohol when on active service, and since then has been a disposition on the part of military authorities in all countries to discourage the use of alcohol among officers and men, modern methods of warfare and arms of precision, decision demanding an extremely level head and steady hand rather than reckless gallantry prompted by what is popularly known as "Dutch courage."

What have the defenders of booze to say in answer to this very conclusive evidence of the evil of alcoholic drinks?

If the soldier must give up alcohol because it interferes with his efficiency why should not the civilian promote his efficiency by giving it up? And if it is demonstrated that alcohol is an evil and only an evil; if it is proven that it lessens the productive value of the citizen, who will say that the nation should look upon this great evil with indifference merely because a few people want to grow rich out of a drink that is destructive? Why should we condemn opium, morphine and cocaine if we are to worship at the shrine of whisky and beer?

Secretary Daniels need not fear that his policy of excluding intoxicants from the navy will be condemned by the American people. In putting a ban upon alcoholic drink in the navy he is showing the same wisdom that characterizes Emperor William and the czar in their efforts they are making in behalf of total abstinence.—W. J. Bryan in the Commoner.

HOW THE WAR AFFECTS OUR INDUSTRIES

America leads all other nations as a self-supporting country. This is true either in times of peace or war, and yet, it is now being demonstrated how vastly dependent is the most independent nation in our modern complicated system of civilization.

Chemistry is the least national of all our industries. It is international. Our International Chemical Congresses recognize five official languages—English, French, German, Italian, Russian, and a first-rate chemist is supposed to read any of the five scientific languages fluently; in fact, it is almost a necessity for a chemist to be a pentalinguist.

The present European crisis is emphasizing how complicated is our civilization, even here in independent America.

For example, the glass industry. Our potash comes from the Strasburg deposits in Germany. Our potash supply is cut off, and our glass industry is in imminent danger, for potash is absolutely necessary in the making of all our ordinary glass.

Many of our photographic supplies are imported. The present war has sent the prices soaring. Metol is a substance which has risen in price in three weeks from three dollars to twelve dollars per pound, and other photographic chemicals have risen in like proportion.

A common article is carbolic acid crystals. This chemical has risen in price from eight dollars per hundredweight to fifty dollars and is still rising. Presumably this material is needed as a base for explosives in mellinite and lyddite shells and a disinfectant, and an embargo has been placed on its present export by Great Britain and Germany.

The steel industry is also affected. The iron ores, the coke and coal are all mined in this country, but in the making of manganese steel pyrolusite is necessary, and this chemical has risen in price from thirty-eight dollars to one hundred and twenty-five dollars, and the supply is limited.

Magnesium oxychloride, from which artificial marble is made, is imported from the Mediterranean. The source of supply has been cut off from the United States, at least temporarily.

Celluloid and gallolith are chemical products in common use everywhere. All the cheaper grades were imported from Europe. The source of supply is completely cut off, and America must look elsewhere for her supplies or have her chemists double and treble their present output.

Almost every dye product has risen in price, although this is unreasonable in many respects, as America makes large quantities of dyes, and while the present conditions may require a rise in prices to pay for the uncertain venture in increasing factories to meet what must be considered as temporary conditions, yet the price is in many respects unreasonable. For example, two dye firms in Chicago were asked to bid on the same day at the same hour, over the telephone, on one of the commoner dyes, tartrazin. The regular price does not exceed seventy-five cents per pound. One company offered the dye at the regular price, the second company asked three dollars and fifty cents for one fourth of a pound, and we were told we would have to talk fast to get it at that price, as the demand was very heavy. This reminds one of the talk recently about the necessity of raising prices on beef to protect the customer, consumer, etc.—a rather doubtful form of protection at the best!

Research chemistry is paying its portion also on the increased prices. Jena glass has advanced thirty per cent, as it is imported from Germany, and a continuation of the war means a complete exhaustion of the small supply carried here in America.

Fortunately, we have some chemicals which are distinctly American products, and these jog along at the regular pace and price—alcohol, wood alcohol, turpentine, rosin, acetone, formaldehyde, acetic acid, and wood products generally are holding their own against the menace across the sea.

If the European war continues for eighteen months or longer, it gives the American chemist a rare opportunity to double and even treble his factory's output in order that he may supply the American market with American-made chemicals and stop the heavy toll of sixty million dollars per year, which we are paying to the European chemical market. Not only will we save the sixty million dollars, but America will be yet more unaffected in times of peace or war.

The manufacturer may ask what are the chemicals which are so needed at the present time in America and which have been restricted or cut off entirely by the present war.

We buy annually from Europe three fourths of a million dollars' worth of quinine, four million dollars in glycerine, one million for indigo, two fifths of a million for licorice, crude tartarates, two and one fourth million, for carbolic acids four millions of dollars are paid annually to Scotland, Great Britain, and Germany, one million for fusel oil, three fifths of a million in gums, two and one half million dollars for aluminum, potash salts ten million of dollars, four and one quarter millions for platinum.—L. V. Redman in Scientific American, October 24, 1914.

If everyone were wise and sweet,
 And everyone were jolly;
 If every heart with gladness beat,
 And none were melancholy;
 If none should grumble or complain,
 And nobody should labor
 In evil work, but each were fain
 To love and help his neighbor—
 Oh! what a happy world 'twould be
 For you and me—for you and me.—Selected.

Seasonable Suggestions

The following suggestions concerning autumn dressing are taken from Good Health, published by Doctor J. H. Kellogg, at Battle Creek, Michigan:

"Don't wear more clothing than is really necessary for comfort. Many people render themselves sensitive to cold by wearing too much clothing.

"Don't forget on going out of doors to slip on an outer garment of some kind if the temperature is considerably lower than the indoor temperature; especially protect the head and the feet.

Don't dress the neck too warm when going out in cold weather. A little extra protection is required for the ears, but it is not necessary to muffle up the neck with thick furs to protect the ears. A light scarf or ear muffs are all that is needed. Warm wrappings about the neck cause the skin to become moistened with perspiration. When the wrappings are removed indoors, the slow cooling which takes place in consequence of the evaporation chills the parts and may produce sore throat or nasal catarrh.

"Don't forget, on going to bed at night, to hang up the underclothing in some place where it will air overnight. It is a good plan to lay the clothing over a warm steam coil when it is convenient to do so. Persons who perspire freely should employ two suits of underclothing, wearing each every other day, allowing one day for airing and drying.

"Don't wear thin-soled shoes. One may take cold from chilling of the feet as the result of wearing thin-soled shoes in walking over a cold pavement, even when the pavement is perfectly dry."

The Dress of Schoolgirls

The writer recalls hearing the mother of two high-school girls speak in a troubled manner of the burden upon fathers and mothers caused by the extravagant dress of teachers and pupils in the department named.

And young girls who find it difficult to meet the expense of high school years are sometimes heard to speak of other girls who dress with unnecessary display and expense in their school costumes.

The latest number of the Mother's Magazine contains an article on the subject by a physician who says truly that simplicity and suitability should mark the clothing of school-girls throughout the entire school course. He points out that it is the duty of mothers to see that their daughters are suitably and sensibly clothed. He says:

"The mother should point out to her daughter the far-reaching influence of her inordinate love of finery and her practice of dressing beyond her means. The girls who associate with her are more or less influenced. Jealousy and envy are aroused. Other mothers are teased for fine clothing, too, and girls who might otherwise pay attention to their studies are diverted to frivolous things. Oftentimes a rivalry creeps in as to who can make the greatest display, and habits of extravagance are formed which make it harder every year for the father, who is the wage earner, to provide for his daughters at school and at home after they are through school. Such girls are often tempted in later life to marry men who can afford to give them the desired fine clothes, even though those men are not of a character to make true husbands.

"Some of the best private schools in the country have a school uniform, a dark blue serge suit and hat for week-day wear and a white serge suit and hat for church and special occasions. This plan has proved so successful that one is inclined to wonder if such a rule might not be good for public schools as well. Such a neat, modest costume could not but have a refining influence upon the characters of schoolgirls.

"With the rivalry in dress eliminated, there would be greater opportunity for rivalry in learning, and there would be no occasion for the criticism of high-school girls: Oh, yes, the schools are good, only some of the girls think more of rouge than they do of rhetoric, and more of pompadours than they do of philosophy; more of fashion than they do of first-class work.' The criticism is undoubtedly severe and applies to but a small number of girls. The pity of it is that parents so far forget their responsibilities as to permit it to be true of any."

This article might be extended to mention the heavy burden often felt by fathers in the closing months of the high school course, but we barely mention it here as an unnecessary source of perplexity, which communities might study to avoid by taking proper action in the matter. There are schools of high standing which limit the expense of the graduate's dress, and, we believe, with good effect in several directions.

Prayer Union

SUBJECTS FOR THE SECOND THURSDAY IN NOVEMBER

Parents' Day.—Prayer for our families and for the families of each other; for the conversion of kindred; that we may all have a greater growth in spirituality; that the homes of Saints may be model Christian homes. Pray for all sick and afflicted.

Lesson, John 3: 16-22, Inspired Version.
Memory verse, John 3: 3.

REQUEST FOR PRAYERS

Sister Lily Ashbrenner, of Glasgow, Montana, asks for the prayers of the Saints in behalf of her little girl who is suffering with a very severe case of whooping cough.

Sister Emma Mock of McKenzie, Alabama, requests the prayers of the Saints. This sister has been afflicted for many years. Under administration, she has received relief. She is now informed that she has appendicitis and must undergo an operation. She should receive the prayers of all.

Kirtland "Welfare" Conference

Saints from all over Northern Ohio and many from other points gathered at historic old Kirtland Temple for a "welfare" program, covering three days, from October 9 to 11.

These welfare meetings are purely educational in nature, no district business being considered. The various papers and talks were of a high order, bespeaking the intellectual outlook of the Saints as a body. Some of the papers were recommended for publication. The good feeling that prevailed was enhanced by the perfect fall weather, and the autumnal coloring became a fit setting to the occasion. The one sad feature was the absence of a veteran worker, our Sister Griffiths, who came on to Kirtland, but was unable to attend any of the meetings, despite the kindly offices of physician and the elders.

The work of the choir deserves mention. Time was when little appreciation, apparently, went out to this branch of service. We feel these workers won attention and did the assembly honor. Among the many good things, we were glad to hear so able a definition drawn between the objects of the auxiliary societies, the Sunday school and Religio in particular, the exponent in this matter being Elder Pycock.

Patriarch F. G. Pitt's anecdotes of world travel were much enjoyed, as was a fifteen-minute, free-for-all parliamentary sharpshooting drill. Sister Lake's talk on her work in the islands, with descriptive objects was followed by a saxophone solo during which our illustration was taken by a detective camera, showing a portion of the lower auditorium at night; a few Saints moved and were "lost." The exposure took seven minutes, illumination being by the electric system, installed in the Temple recently.

We regret that in these programs no provision is made for the various quorums to meet without losing part of the sessions, or other inconvenience, for these gatherings offer the best opportunity for developing quorum work for the good of the districts. The social purity movement was given a hearing both in separate and mixed audiences. We are inclined to the opinion that those who undertake to present this subject should acquaint themselves with "words of wisdom out of the best books" rather than be influenced by exaggerated and lurid examples of ultra-abnormal conditions. A good point we heard was: "Hold up a high ideal, and its opposite becomes repulsive in contrast,"—appeal to our best rather than play upon morbid chords.

Resident Saints vied with each other in their kindly hospitality to the visitors, and an efficient automobile service was maintained by several of the brethren who possess cars, and everything was done to make the trip a pleasant one for the sojourners.

HISTORIAN.

U. S. S. San Francisco, Navy Yard,
PORTSMOUTH, NEW HAMPSHIRE, October 1, 1914.

Editors Herald: I desire the Saints to know that I am now one of them. I am the sailor boy who wrote from New Orleans in June, and from Tuxpan, Texas. When I wrote from New Orleans, we expected to go back South for another six months, after repairing a leak around the rudder post of the ship. After this repairing was finished, and called a good job, we started back to Mexico. I prayed that the ship might go North so that I could come into the kingdom of Christ. We had hardly put out to sea when the rudder post began leaking again, about eight hundred gallons per hour. In a few days we were ordered north for repairs, this time to the Portsmouth navy yard, and to stay about four months.

Upon my arrival here I received so much mail from the brethren and sisters in answer to my letter in the HERALD, that the postmaster must have thought I was running a mail order business. I was directed to the Onset, Massachusetts, reunion. Upon arrival at this reunion, though I knew no one present, all seemed to know me and received me with open arms. I was made to feel as one of them, even this large family. Though a stranger, I was received kindly.

I was introduced to Brother F. M. Smith. One look into his face told me what a great man God is raising to lead his people. He is not a distant man who tries to exalt himself in high honor. Like the prophets of old, he is humble, meek and kind, but determined. I told him of my desire to be of service to this church of which I was soon to be a member, and of the kind of work I had in mind to do. President Smith informed me that he had been looking for such a man to engage in this same service. But when I come to realize what a great thing it is to enter upon service for the Master, I feel as a child. I have placed myself at the disposal of the church.

I was baptized the next day, August 9, by Brother H. J. Davison, of Somerville, Massachusetts, and confirmed by Joseph Luff and P. M. Hanson, which confirmation was taken in shorthand. While here, I met Brother H. C. Smith, and other church officials. The parting was the saddest of all.

September 5 to 25 I enjoyed a furlough with the Saints at Brockton and Boston, Massachusetts. While in Brockton, I witnessed the gifts of the true church, and received great promises upon two occasions when spoken to by the Spirit. I remember that all things depend upon my daily actions and faithfulness, and that these promises are only so to be fulfilled. I recognize that I must study to show myself approved, a worker that need not be ashamed. I hope to spend a few years at our Graceland College after my time in the navy expires, a year from now.

I am the one referred to in the poem by Sister Vida E. Smith, second verse, published in a recent issue of the HERALD.

I will not be able to answer all letters received, only as this letter may be in answer to some.

Your devoted servant,

B. L. MAYNARD.

GRIFFIN CREEK, ALBERTA.

Editors Herald: The climate here, taken as a whole, is far ahead of Ontario, my old home. The winters are pleasant, with no changeable weather. Winter begins early, about the middle of October, and continues getting colder until the middle of January, when the mercury reaches its lowest ebb, until about the middle of February. Then it gradually gets warmer until the snow is all gone, with no thaws or blizzards from fall to spring.

Spring begins about the middle of April, and the weather is ideal for seed time. The summer is lovely for breaking for the next year's crop. The fall is ideal for cutting and saving the crops, as it seldom if ever rains after the first of September.

There is a plenty of timber for all purposes, with a few springs of water rising out of the ground, and here and there a small lake. But, generally speaking, water is hard to get.

ROBERT GRAY.

PORTLAND, OREGON, September 26, 1914.

Editors Herald: We wish the missionaries in this territory to know that we would like to have them call on us. I am a stranger here in this city, and would be glad to see any of the elders or Saints. I have been isolated from the church for a long time, and have not heard a gospel sermon preached for nearly two years, only when Brother Johnson, of Seattle, Washington, preached the funeral of my little girl, the 8th of January. I would like to again associate with the Saints and to hear the gospel. I long to be among the true people of God and to be one with them.

Pray for me dear Saints, that I may ever be faithful, and that my daughter and two boys may be brought back into the straight and narrow way. I am out of work and hardly know what to do, as I am required to support myself since the death of my husband, Lewis F. Crandon. But I know that God will take care of me and bring me something to do, for he has never forsaken his children.

May God bless all.

Your sister in the faith,

ANNIE I. CRANDON.

COLO, IOWA, September 27, 1914.

Editors Herald: With the advice of the district officers and some of the elders laboring in the Des Moines District, the few Saints here have purchased the Baptist church at Nevada, seven miles west of this place, and the county seat of Story County. We were organized into a branch in October, 1913. While there are only a few of us, the Lord has blessed us with his Holy Spirit, and many times we have been made to rejoice at his wonderful power.

Brethren Parker and Williams, two young missionaries, did a splendid work at Colo and Nevada the past summer, greatly encouraging the Saints of our branch.

Your sister in Christ,

SUSIE L'HOMMEDIEU.

BEMIDJI, MINNESOTA, September 28, 1914.

Editors Herald: The Bemidji Saints are not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation. Elder Delbert Whiting has been speaking to a full house for six or seven successive nights at what is known as the East Schoolhouse.

The first marked interest manifest was shown when he preached on church organization and the Book of Mormon. He spent two evenings on the Book of Mormon. The power of God was made manifest to a goodly degree, and he spoke with the Spirit. Several expressed a desire to listen longer, and to hear more. People are saying that they did not know anything about our belief before. One man said: "It is truly a wonderful thing." It is only a short time ago, two or three years since, when in this same community the schoolhouse was closed against our elders, after a few efforts to present the gospel. We are truly thankful for the change.

In these perilous times every Saint should be up and doing and on guard. We ask the prayers of the Saints that we may receive the help so much needed.

I long to see the Oregon Saints. Having just read of the success of Brother Crumley's debate, I am reminded of the many good sermons I have heard him preach, and of the many evenings spent at our fireside. Am also glad to note the success of Brother Chase's family, and hope we may be remembered by him.

Ever praying for the work, I ask an interest in your prayers, especially for my boys, that they may retain their love for the Master.

Your sister in Christ,

MRS. LUCY WILLIAMS.

GLENN EMMA, BRITISH COLUMBIA, September 29, 1914.

Editors Herald: Since subscribing for the same, I have read the HERALD with great interest. I heard the gospel message about forty years since, my father being a missionary when I was born. My family was broken up and scattered, but I have lived thus far in faith and prayer. I have enjoyed the ministrations of the Spirit of God, although I have not been baptized into the church. I hope to be baptized at the first opportunity. My wife and two boys, eight and ten years old, believe the gospel. These are good boys, and my prayer is that they may both be preachers of righteousness. We are anxiously awaiting the visit of an elder of the church, when the four of us will be baptized.

When I subscribed for the HERALD, some six weeks ago, the nearest Latter Day Saint I could find was Elder Darey, of Winnipeg. He had advertised a sermon in the Telegram, and I wrote him. His wife answered and sent me his address. I see by reading the HERALD that there is a branch of the church at Calgary. I desire the name of the presiding elders at Vancouver, New Westminster, and Calgary. Calgary and Vancouver are about six hundred miles apart; we live about half way between.

We have some lovely nieces and four sisters, quite clever girls. One is a splendid musician. Some regard us highly, and we hope to bring them into the church.

In bonds of gospel love,

JOHN WINSLOW.

WORTH, MISSOURI, October 1, 1914.

Editors Herald: The Roberts-Holloway debate is a thing of the past, and we are rejoicing over the victory to our cause. Brother Holloway's meekness made friends, while Elder Roberts killed his influence by his methods. Even the members of the Church of Christ do not manifest any disposition to talk of the debate. Very many tell us that Brother Holloway was a gentleman, and had Elder Roberts bested from the start. There are some who seem interested, and who wish to have the debate repeated seven or eight miles southwest of Worth. I understand that the Church of Christ people say they may furnish a man, but that he will not be Elder Roberts.

I think the debate did good here in Worth in getting our views before the people. Very many wished that the brethren might remain, as they wanted to hear them preach.

May God bless the work everywhere, is my prayer.

Your brother,

E. P. HAWLEY.

GALES FERRY, CONNECTICUT, September 20, 1914.

Editors Herald: We understand from the scriptures that the time has passed when the kingdom was to be set up in the last days in fulfillment of the dream of Nebuchadnezzar, and that this kingdom has been set up. This was not that effected in the days of Christ, when the Roman or Iron kingdom was in full power. The church as then organized, went into the wilderness, not to return until 1830, when, in fulfillment of Revelation 14:6, 7, God sent an angel to bring the gospel and cause his kingdom to be set up in the "days of these kings," or in the days of the European kingdoms, partly strong, partly broken.

Since 1830, several of these kingdoms have been transferred into republics, and are kingdoms no longer. The kingdoms mentioned by Daniel are actually passing away.

Since the establishment of the church, or kingdom of God, there has been a falling away, which departure has taken up its habitation in the parched places, in the wilderness of a barren and salt land. In the endowment house their leader has sat on a throne, therein representing himself as God. Representatives of this departure have endeavored to show me that men could or would become gods.

Many false spirits are abroad in the land, some of whom profess to have the gifts of the gospel, and claim to be able to cast out devils, heal the sick, speak in tongues, etc. We should not allow ourselves to be moved by these things. The teachings of such are not in harmony with the word of God. A leading minister of these movements told me that a man could be saved and sanctified and preach the gospel, and not be baptized at all. Instead of teaching the sinner that he must repent and be baptized for the remission of sins, after telling a few deathbed stories and relating some so-called wonderful experiences, they say, "Now if anyone wants to be saved, just let him raise his hand and we will pray for him." They talk very nice to persuade the people to go forward, then dictate the prayer, "Now, Lord, I am sorry for all my sins; I am confessing with my lips, and believe in my heart on you, and you have said if I do this I am saved. I take you at your word, and, bless your holy name, I am saved."

The representatives of these people are not open to the suggestion, Come, let us reason together, or bring forward your strong reasons, as the Lord has said. They seem to fear that the word of God would uproot their false plants. They inform those who contend for the faith once delivered to the Saints that they must not speak in their testimony meetings. If one wishes to know the spirit of which these are, all he needs do is ask if it is necessary to be called of God as was Aaron, and why their organization does not have apostles, prophets, etc., in harmony with 1 Corinthians 12, and Ephesians 4.

Brethren, we have the only thing that really fills the divine pattern and will stand the test. These false instructions will be weighed in the balance and found wanting, and among those who will say, Lord, have we not spoken in thy name, and cast out devils, and healed the sick, etc. Their institutions are builded upon the sands, and they are afraid to have the light of the word turned on, because they used portions of the scriptures that suit their case, but can not stand the truth.

Hoping that this letter may keep some one from being led astray, I am,

Yours in faith,

F. G. WHIPPLE.

BERLIN, NORTH DAKOTA.

Editors Herald: As we are nearing the happy Yuletide, my mind reverts to the past, and I reflect with a degree of soberness on the amount of money I have spent in the giving of useless and unnecessary, and sometimes foolish gifts. And concerning the thousands of dollars spent annually by the Saints at this season of the year, the thought naturally presents itself, What a vast amount of good these same thousands would accomplish in the hands of the United Order of Enoch.

We would not take from the little ones their Christmas joys, or rob from the happy Yuletide, with its beautiful spirit of giving. But, after all, would not the little ones be just as happy with one or two little gifts and some nuts and candy, as with a dozen? And if mother and father are able to supply these, of what useless waste it is for aunts, and uncles, and cousins and grandmas and grandpas to also flood these same little ones with all manner of toys—tops and blocks and whatnots. Would not a Christmas card, or sweet little letter with a Christmas stamp make them just as happy?

And what about the grown-ups. "We have never made a practice of sending anything more than a small remembrance to the nearest relatives on both sides, and yet we have never gotten out of it under ten dollars." I love to give, but will I rob God and give to man? Will I think it of more worth to give gifts to my friends than the money that these gifts represent to the advancement of God's work?

Will we, then, make this year no different than those that are past and gone? This year with wars and famines and earthquakes, tidal waves, pestilences, storms with fierce and vivid lightnings and destructions of all descriptions coming upon us? At this critical time, with the church groaning under a burden of debt, the hands of the Bishop tied for lack of funds, will we not this year sacrifice our Christmas presents and offer them with a willing spirit and a contrite heart to the work of the church?

I hereby faithfully pledge that whatever amount of money I would otherwise spend for Christmas this year, will be instead thereof sent to the United Order of Enoch. I shall write to each one of my relatives asking them not to send me any Christmas gifts, explaining to them that I am using my money this year for the Lord's work. Who will be next?

Verily this is a day of sacrifices.

MRS. A. H. FREIE.

LAS ANIMAS, CALIFORNIA, October 2, 1914.

Editors Herald: The HERALD, Ensign, Autumn Leaves and Sunday school Quarterly contain all the gospel we hear. I am one of the isolated ones. Brethren Petre and Barrett were here in August and did some preaching, but I did not get to attend the meetings.

I ask the prayers of the Saints that I may continue faithful until the call home.

Ever praying for the spread of the gospel, I am,
In gospel bonds,

MRS. P. V. BROWN.

WAYNE, NEBRASKA, October 4, 1914.

Editors Herald: This leaves me in not the best of health, though not in the worst condition. I have realized a gradual improvement. I have hoped to have faith to be healed.

Trusting in the kind providence of God in his wisdom, I am,
Your brother,

GEORGE ELSON.

VANSCOY, SASKATCHEWAN, October 4, 1914.

Editors Herald: We are still trying at this little outpost of the army of the Lord to keep the camp fire burning. Many of us of the Minnesota Branch were permitted to attend the district conference in July, held with the Iowa Branch. We enjoyed the meetings and appreciated the kindness of friends, who did much for our comfort. We feel that our entertainment must have been burdensome to them, yet Latter Day Saints enjoy meeting with kindred spirits to tell of Jesus and his love.

The Saints here were blessed by a visit of a few days from our beloved patriarch, F. A. Smith. Quite a number received their blessings under his hands. It is now about sixteen years since his father, Alexander H. Smith, was at our house in Minnesota, when my husband, myself and our oldest daughter, Alice, received our patriarchal blessings. I receive much strength from reading these blessings. I have a little photograph taken a few years later at Clitherall, Minnesota, near the reunion tent, of Alexander H. Smith and son, F. A., Elder Eli A. Steadman, and my husband, of which group only F. A. Smith remains. The others have been gathered with the faithful. We are looking forward to the happy reunion time when we hope to be worthy to meet with the Saints of bygone days.

Our hearts often turn Zionward, especially since the recent wars and rumors of wars. Our hearts are sorrowful to think such things can be. Our sympathies go out to the troubled, sorrowing, wounded and dying of the nations involved. The prophecies are being fulfilled, and the Saints should stand in holy places that they be not removed. Some feel like fleeing to Zion when conditions permit. We are all looking to the Lord for guidance, and like Brother Greene and the Saints in Jerusalem, our trust is in the Lord. May he watch over and protect all his Saints.

Your sister in the one faith,

EMMA L. ANDERSON.

THAYER, MISSOURI, October 5, 1914.

Editors Herald: This part of the field is at last coming to the front. There is an awakening on the part of some who are willing to sacrifice of their means in the paying of tithing and free-will offerings. There is a greater interest in preaching than I have ever known in this part. We have had some of the best meetings and largest crowds we have ever had in our ministry, and more have been moved to investigate the work than ever before. There are better opportunities for preaching, and more people hungering for the truth. I have baptized sixteen since July 25, and have left that many more almost persuaded. I can see a better day for the Saints in this part of the country if they will live their religion.

Our district conference was held at Thayer, October 3 and 4, and was a spiritual feast to all those who were present. The visiting Saints brought a good spirit with them, and found the selfsame spirit among the Saints of Thayer. Would to God that all Saints of the district might have been present, with others who have lived here in former days.

Our heart's desire is for this work, and that all the Saints might live their religion. With these conditions we would not have such hard trials.

Yours in bonds,

J. F. CUNNINGHAM.

SENECA, MISSOURI, October 7, 1914.

Editors Herald: Near Fairland, Oklahoma, I recently led three down into the waters of baptism. One was a full-blood Wyandotte Indian. The Spirit told him if he would live humble he would bear the gospel to his people. I will go there again after the conference, when I expect to baptize more.

In gospel bonds,

W. E. YOUNG.

RIPLEY, OKLAHOMA, October 8, 1914.

Editors Herald: Twenty years ago to-day, the writer with his bride started for the South Seas on his first mission, a life mission, in fact, for that work has never ceased. We stepped aboard the Evanelia at San Francisco, and for thirty-five days were tossed by the breeze and waves until we moored our little craft in Papeete Harbor. Nearly four years of active service there was terminated in a release, not from our mission work, but simply by a transfer to our home State, Iowa. From there we came to Oklahoma and have been here ever since.

We have seen mission work grow from a mere beginning to a great state, with many branches and hundreds of scattered members, and calls for preaching so numerous that we can only fill a small portion of them. We now have the Lamanites coming to life after the many years of inactivity since their fathers buried their records. Now is beginning the fulfillment of the prediction pointing to their awakening to the true gospel, and the divinity of the record of their ancestors. Many are the signs denoting the times in which we live, concerning which Mr. Wesley said, God will gloriously display his power and set up his kingdom on earth.

Our work this year has been rewarded with good results. We have held a number of excellent meetings. Many have heard the word and some have obeyed. The Saints seem to be awakening to the needs of the hour.

Your coworker,

HUBERT CASE.

WESTON, IOWA, October 11, 1914.

Editors Herald: Hearing of the progress of God's work is an encouragement to the writer, and having good news to communicate, felt that I should contribute as well as receive. The last year has been one of progress in the Pottawattamie District. Wherever our brethren of the missionary force have made an effort, they have proceeded in the spirit of humility and love and God has recognized their labors, causing their ministrations to not be "in word only." The evidences of especial direction are not confined to one place, but he whose work it is has sustained his representatives wherever they have occupied, bringing glory to his cause.

It is, however, of the recent effort of our brother W. E. Hayden that I wish to write. One month ago he began services at the Boomer Branch, and for three weeks made the "message plain and clear." At the close of two weeks, six concluded to walk in the Master's way, and were inducted into the kingdom. We rejoiced, thinking a great work had been done. The services still continued, and three more were gathered in: Our brother was then on the verge of leaving for other parts, but before going concluded to spend a few days calling on some of the good friends. This resulted in his departure being delayed, as twelve more desired an entrance into the kingdom, which was attended to this afternoon. The Spirit of the Master attended the baptisms and the confirmations, and we felt there was great rejoicing in heaven, and the Saints partook of the same Spirit.

All who united with us we have learned to regard as good men and women. It was a beautiful sight to see those young in years, strong in body, with earnestness of purpose enter into the new life, and I thought of the good they may do, if they will continue faithful.

Each added experience brings confirmation to the work, and I find that nothing else can furnish the happiness and joy of an association in the Master's work among his people.

Hoping the gospel may accomplish in the lives of all the Israel of God that for which it is designed, I am,

J. A. HANSEN.

NEBO, ILLINOIS, October 8, 1914.

Editors Herald: We are still interested in the brightness and wonder of the theme of the message of Jesus, the brightest thing on earth. After twenty-two years of somewhat complex experience in this work, I have no reason to regret the, to me, solemn step of serving my connection and relation with a church where easily rested and rest all my ancestry and relatives, save my own progeny, and leave all they had, which according to their point of view was a sacrifice no reasonable man could well afford to make. However, as my love for the knowledge of this work grows, my love for these of God's creation grows.

Together with diversified secular affairs, in two new places I preached the first Latter Day Saint sermon, one in township building east of Louisiana, Missouri, on the main Louisiana and Pleasant Hill road. This meeting was presided over by a Christian minister, and they gave us a hearty invitation to return, which I did for a basket meeting, with the Christian minister presiding, who enthusiastically complimented me, although I tried to define our faith as plainly as I knew how. I was invited to preach a memorial sermon where once the doors were locked against Brother Paxton and I. At this place the old soldiers both complimented and donated freely.

Many new openings are presenting themselves. I hope to soon be able to lay down some of my secular burdens and take up more fully a business which will not be canceled at the inevitable tragedy known to us as death and the grave.

In company with son Oral and his wife and baby, and my daughter Vera, we had a pleasant as well as spiritual feast at the late district conference at Alton, Illinois. Prayer services were uplifting and spiritual, the Lord speaking through his servants.

In company with Brother Granville Trowbridge, of Saint Louis, secretary of the Saint Louis Elders Quorum, I visited Beardstown, Illinois, where they were holding the conference of the Central Illinois District. Here we held another quorum meeting. This is the place where a few years ago we held two discussions a few months apart, with one Reverend H. S. Deer, a Baptist. This conference was a spiritual feast from beginning to end. The memory of our conflict seemed to be fresh in the minds of all who attended. We were pleased to meet of the missionary force, J. W. Rushton, J. W. Paxton, A. M. Baker, and R. Fulk. Seven were baptized and three ordained to the office of elder. Each service was enjoyed, and many regretful good-by's were heard.

Hoping latter-day Israel's weapons may never become carnal, I am for truth's success,

W. A. GUTHRIE.

Extracts From Letters

Benjamin Pierson, Tigris, Missouri: "We are trying in our weak way to get the gospel before the people, and appreciate the space allowed us in the church papers."

Ervin J. Lenox, Soldiers Grove, Wisconsin: "A two-day meeting held in this (Wheatville) branch October 10 and 11 was a success, the church being crowded at times despite stormy weather, and a good spirit was manifested. Brethren J. W. McKnight and Arthur Davenport were in charge. Preaching by L. O. Wildermuth, J. W. McKnight, and Arthur Davenport. Everyone was left enjoying the good Spirit. This is not a large branch, but the Lord is still adding to our number one by one. We have Sunday school every Sunday possible, and preaching twice, prayer meeting Wednesday evening, and Religio Friday evening. Our crowds are growing, and we consider that we are well paid for our labors."

A brother writes from Provo, Utah, as follows: "I thought I would drop you a line concerning my work and the conditions in this field. I find that the people here as a rule are very nice and well-behaved, and seem to be fixed in their church affairs, but yet they do not attend their own services very often. I have attended a few, and out of a membership of two hundred and fifty, and all of them living in close proximity to their church house, an average of about thirty are in attendance. There seems to be no religious fervor at all among them. One may say anything about Jesus Christ or Joseph Smith and it will be passed by lightly, but one word about B. Young, and the fat is in the fire. I attended their General Conference on the 6th. There was a great crowd in the city (Salt Lake City). One would be led to believe that they were really in earnest. One man remarked to me, "It is a much greater crowd than you have at your General Conference, is it not?" I answer, "Yes, for we don't have a state fair and carnival, and a big prize fight to attract the people all at the same time as you are having just now." He just laughed. The people went to the fair in the afternoon, and at night attended the theaters, and attended conference in the forenoon. The people seem to be held by various ties to the Mormon Church, principally local business affairs, endowment obligations (or oaths), under which they are sealed up unto eternal life in the temple. They do not cut anyone off from the church for unchristian acts, so they in this manner hold all they get. This gives great latitude to the members, especially the young. What would be the use of cutting anyone off from the church when they have been sealed up to eternal life? They are just now in the throes of a great campaign in politics. Five big meetings are held this week. Those not interested in politics are to be found at the picture shows or in the tango halls (churches)—it is too bad, indeed. Yet, I like the people very much. How can one stop all this nonsense and foolishness? It is enough to discourage any one. As I told a gentleman the other day, this ought to be positive evidence to him that the church did not come here, for there was none here. It reminded me of a very large department store, or a large commercial institution. I visited a prominent gentleman the other evening. There were present two other gentlemen. I was invited in (after knocking). I excused myself and stated that I represented the Reorganized Church, and the claims of the seed of the Prophet Joseph Smith. After a little while he stated that he felt sorry for our case. I asked why, and he said that the Reorganization was brought about by men who had been cut off of the original church by men of authority. I asked who he referred to. He said, Marks, Briggs, Gurley. I stated that he was mistaken as to that. Well, he said, they were rejected by the Twelve, and they all laughed. I referred to the revelation of Jason W.

Briggs that to me was one of the cleanest and most pointed revelations I ever read. He said that the testimony of a man or men, cut off from the church, was of no effect with him, that he could not build upon the testimony of apostates, or give credence to their statements. They all agreed to this. Then I asked them if they believed in the Book of Mormon. They said, Why certainly, why do you ask. I told them that Oliver Cowdery and David Whitmer were both cut off from the church and were apostates, in their opinion, yet they were witnesses to the divinity of the Book of Mormon, and, of course, their testimony was of no effect, according to the statement of my friends. You would have smiled to have seen them try to change the subject by asking how Brother Joseph was, and how the church was getting along? Well, I had a very pleasant visit afterwards. I visit around among the Mormons, and had some nice chats. I believe that the day is not far away when there will be an awakening among these people, and that these visits and talks privately, and the distribution of tracts will have the hoped for effect.

Toronto, Ontario

The second annual banquet of the Toronto Branch was held Thursday, September 17, and was a grand success. The affair was in charge of the priesthood, as per resolution of the body, and was twofold in character: First, in honor of Bishop and Sister R. C. Evans, as a tribute and appreciation of their past labors; second, to bring about a general good feeling of sociability and brotherly love among our people. The banquet was absolutely free. Everybody come, was the common statement, the banquet being financed by Saints and friends by voluntary contribution. The people were asked to meet the committee and contribute provisions or cash, which would be appreciated. The scheme proved successful, and scores of people besieged the committee with real heart contributions, given for the sole purpose of making the banquet a success and promoting a more social feeling among our people.

When the eventful evening arrived, the people were ushered to the main auditorium, where they were entertained by the church orchestra, while a small army of young folks, in the basement, made ready the bountiful feast. Covers were laid for four hundred, who filed in and sang while the honored couple took their places beside their children at a specially arranged table. Elder A. F. McLean, president of the branch, announced that Elder James Wilson would ask the blessing, after which all would partake freely of the bounties of life as provided.

During the evening, impromptu speeches were given. A presentation was made to the bishop and his wife, address being read by the presiding priest, J. F. Whitehead, with presentation made by Elder Frank Gray. A real good time was had, and we realized, to a large degree, what communion with Saints really means.

The decorations were a grand illumination, artistic in design. Hundreds of electric lights blended together with drapery of red, white and blue, flags and flowers, producing a perfect harmony of color and shades, which added to the beauty of the hundreds of smiling faces of the people of God.

Toronto branch will long remember Sunday, September 23. This was the regular morning prayer and sacrament service. The Spirit of the Lord was upon the people in great power. Bishop Evans was blessed with the gift of the gospel, and several were called to the priesthood and others addressed. Among this number were A. F. McLean and A. E. Gray, who were called to be counselors to the bishop, and J. T. Whitehead, who was called to the office of elder. Toronto Branch is prospering spiritually, numerically, and financially, and great interest is already manifested in the coming winter campaign.

FRANK GRAY.

Boston, Massachusetts

I find plenty to occupy my mind and body, and having the interests of the Boston Branch first in mind, the tendency has grown until finally it has become first, and, perhaps unfortunately so for me, last as well. Of course, in a general way, the whole church has its share of interest.

We were pleased to hear Brother Paul M. Hanson state in our prayer meeting last evening, which, by the way, was a good meeting and well attended, that about all the branches in the eastern mission seemed to be especially advancing along right lines, Boston with the rest. We can not report many precious souls baptized of late, but there are many who ought to be, and quite a number who have been in days gone by. These were precious souls long before they were baptized, and have stayed precious ever since. Several of our aged ones have passed away, and also one of our younger ones. We had one addition to our membership a few days ago, when Brother J. C. Foss baptized a niece of his who has been investigating the work for some time. We were glad to greet her.

The Sunday school and Religio are doing good work. District representatives, Lucy Sears and Frank Dobbin visited us officially about two weeks ago. Elder Paul M. Hanson sailed this evening for Jonesport, Maine, to attend the district conference. Bishop M. C. Fisher accompanied him. Brother Hanson expected to go to Washburn from Jonesport in about two weeks to prosecute missionary work.

The choir, under the leadership of Sister Whiting, has been making marked progress since our reunion. Brother A. N. Hoxie made us a visit a few weeks ago, and directed the choir rehearsal. We are pleased to remember that Brother Hoxie is a Boston product.

Our church building on Sewall Street has been undergoing some renovating both on the upper and lower floors, and another hundred dollars is to be applied on the church debt. Before Sunday we expect to have a nice iron post and a black and gold sign erected on the corner of Broadway and Grand Streets, which will help visitors to readily find the church.

Visiting Saints are always welcome, especially those who can preach. We have had such in recent weeks, Elders F. J. Ebeling, P. M. Hanson, Joseph Luff, M. H. Bond, F. M. Smith, H. C. Smith and J. C. Foss.

The writer attended a very interesting lecture a few evenings ago in one of the large popular churches, and found in the pew a program of the Sunday service, discovering that the sermon came on as number 16 on the program. We wonder how some of our everlasting gospel preachers would like that as an inspiration! Let none be alarmed, as we will not adopt this system right away.

Just now we are praying for some wise Daniel to rise to tell us just where to draw the line on the social feature of church work. This is a difficult question. To overdo means spiritual death; to eliminate means disaster. In the meantime we are trying to take a temperate course and are making provision to that end.

I wish to congratulate the editors of our periodicals upon their strict neutrality regarding the great European war. It is quite difficult to read the secular papers without partaking of the war spirit, especially when the spirit of neutrality has been violated. How much more difficult would it be should a partisan spirit be manifested in our own papers, is quite hard to tell. But we depend largely upon how well we are shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace. With a strong desire to see a world in which there is no room for a war department, I remain,

In gospel bonds,

H. J. DAVISON.

St. Nicholas Notes

St. Nicholas is to have other serial features in 1915 beside Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett's "The lost prince." The story of "Peg o' the ring," by Emilie Benson Knipe and Alden Arthur Knipe, is the third in the series begun with "A lucky sixpence" and carried on with "Beatrice of Denewood." The new volume will have also a mystery story especially for girls in "The boarded-up house" by Augusta Huiell Seaman, author of "Jacqueline of the carrier pigeons," etc., and a serial for younger readers in "Silverheels," a story of a wandering boy and his trained horse by Gabrielle E. Jackson. The publication in the November St. Nicholas of the first chapters of Frances Hodgson Burnett's new story, "The lost prince," recalls the fact that almost all of Mrs. Burnett's stories for young folk were written for and published in St. Nicholas—"Little Lord Fauntleroy," "Editha's burglar," "Sara Crewe," "Racketty-Packetty House," etc. St. Nicholas promises during 1915 to make a special feature of practical mechanics for boys.

SERVICE

The word service is the watchword of the twentieth century.

The human family is awakening to the fact that they are indeed a family, and such relationship demands service to and for each other.

We desire to be of some service to you in a line in which we are peculiarly fitted—hence our new department.

It's this way:

There is a right and a wrong way of doing things—an effective and an ineffective way. We want to help you do your advertising or announcing in the right way, without cost to you. It is entirely free to our people.

The proposition is to get the most out of what you pay for printing. We want to show you how.

We have recently seen samples of advertising used by some people that were certainly unattractive, and could not command respectful attention. It often happens that your facilities for getting what you want are not good. The place you have your printing done may not be equipped for doing the kind of work you want unless you are able to specify exactly what you want and how it shall be done, and then they may not be able to handle it.

This Is Our Proposition

If you intend to do any advertising in your missionary or branch work, no matter what kind, just send us your copy, and without cost to you, we will promptly advise you, by personal letter, with careful suggestions as to the best way to get the results you want.

If you intend to advertise in any way to increase your business, send us a copy of the wording you want to use, or give us the idea as clearly and definitely as possible, and we will word it for you in convincing style.

It doesn't matter whether you have your printing done at the Herald Publishing House or not. We will give you the same careful attention whether you do or not. However, if you wish to have us give you the advantage of our extensive equipment and facilities, we will promptly quote you lowest prices delivered to your post office.

We are prepared to do this because we have on our force a brainy young fellow who has a complete course in advertising to his credit and is experienced in this work. He feels the true spirit of a Latter Day Saint and is willing to be at your service. Complicated work will receive the combined attention of the departments concerned.

Four splendid cloth volumes, full of portraits, sketches, maps, diagrams

Today is the climax of a hundred years of preparation. Read in this timely, authoritative, complete, AND THE ONLY CONDENSED classic world history—of which over 2,000,000 copies have been sold in France alone—just what has taken place in the inner councils of Europe during the past one hundred years. Read in these entrancing pages how Russia has for years craftily been trying to escape from her darkness—to get a year-round open port, with its economic freedom. Read how Germany and Austria, fearful of the monster's latent strength, have been trying to checkmate her and how they have pinned all in this last, supreme stake.

The Lesson of the Past

THIS master of the pen shows you the glory that was Greece's and the grandeur that was Rome's. He guides you through the Middle Ages, the picturesque old days of feudalism and the crusades; through the Renaissance up to contemporaneous history, which Prof. Grosvenor completes in brilliant manner. In the story of the past lie the secrets of today. And you will understand them better when you get the Review of Reviews for a year—for the Review of Reviews will give you a sane interpretation of the events that are taking place with such rapidity. It is not enough to read the daily news reports. Your ability to comprehend conditions, and to discuss them rationally depends on a true interpretation of the meaning and the "reason why" of events. In your mind you must bring order out of chaos—and the Review of Reviews will do it for you.

of England, France, Germany and Russia are not permitted to use a pound of alum baking powder. The efficiency of the soldiers depends too much upon their health and endurance to risk the use of food which the authorities believe would be detrimental. Therefore the manufacture and sale of the alum powder is prohibited.

Royal Baking Powder is extensively used privately and by the military forces throughout the world. Its absolute wholesomeness, imparting as it does, healthful as well as appetizing qualities to the food, and its perfect keeping qualities in every climate and under different conditions, make it particularly desirable for all conditions of use.

CAUTION ENJOINED

A SECOND WARNING

It will be remembered by the readers of the HERALD that not long ago the editor in chief in an editorial presented the subject of the struggle going on in Europe as a possible subject of prophecy among the Saints, warning them against indulging in such prophecies. He stated that it was not his intention to proscribe any investigation, or to smother anyone's opinion, but that the position occupied by the Saints as a religious body was strikingly dissimilar to all others, as by virtue of its profession of faith it had placed itself in the limelight of public opinion as advocating certain belief in the spirit of prophecy, and that he had fear that it would be unnecessarily indulged in respecting the issue of the war.

An echo to his fear has appeared. We are informed by letter from a leading missionary that an elder, quite noted in his position before the church, in a prayer service in one of the large branches, stated in prophecy that the war would end in the wiping out of Germany and the occupation of Turkey by the Jews as a nation.

The object of this writing is to again warn the Saints against indulging in prophecies touching the war, or as regards its final issue, knowing that the nationality of anyone through whom such a prophecy would come would furnish to an onlooker an excusable basis for suspecting that the wish for the success of his nation in the conflict was the root of the prophecy. And this warning is issued by us with the direct understanding that "the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets" and that therefore unless the prophets shall exercise due wisdom, trouble must inevitably ensue.

We acknowledge the teaching of the Apostle Paul, "Covet to prophecy," for the reason that the "spirit of prophecy is the testimony of Jesus"; but this sort of prophecy is far different from the expressing of the prophetic opinion, or making a prophetic statement touching the event of things that are going on in everyday life.

The presidency does not propose to stand responsible either by silence or by actual indorsement of untimely prophecies, and we issue this warning to the Saints and especially to the eldership, that they remember the statement that the spirit of the prophets are subject to the prophets, and likewise men keep themselves within legitimate bounds. If the Lord has any manifestation or statement to make to the church as a body it must be considered as a fact that he would address the body through an accepted channel, appointed and acknowledged by the church.

We greatly fear that the peculiar strangeness of the conflict and its results are not sufficiently understood; and the importance of the issue being so great as it is, must not be put into the hazard of the class of prophecies coming in the province of the testimony meetings such as the Saints are used to. Again we issue the warning. "Be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves,"—or "be ye therefore wise servants, and as harmless as doves." (Inspired Version.)

THAT QUESTION OF LOVE

He drew a circle that shut me out—
Heretic, rebel, a thing to flout.
But Love and I had the wit to win;
We drew a circle that took him in.—Markham.

A statement is found in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants to the effect that no one can assist in this work except he be humble and full of love, having faith, hope, and charity. Especial emphasis is laid on the quality of love, in that it is said that one must be filled with love.

This question of love is important. No man can preach or pray or practice or pay acceptably toward the advancement of this work unless prompted by love for God and for other men.

It may be a question with some who fully realize the need of Christian love how it may be obtained,—they by nature being exceedingly reserved. We may be pardoned if we give a short account of our own experience.

The love that Christ feels for all men is in a measure a gift that must come to us as one of the fruits of the Spirit; and as such it must be prayed for. Yet it must also be worked for, and will never come to abide with the man who confines his efforts to prayer alone.

We remember how some years ago we often sat in the congregation and listened to sermons on love and wondered how one could get that great love which Christ had for the many. We looked over the audience and tried to embrace it in our love, and wondered how one could so enlarge his affections as to reach beyond his little circle of intimates and include the whole church of God,—and more. Many of those whom we saw we did not personally know. Being diffident and reserved, we seldom talked with anyone who did not make an effort to talk with us.

It was not until we took up the work of the ministry, and the duty of talking to people and sympathizing with them was more plainly placed upon us, that an attempt was made to do so, and then we learned what we did not know before; that it was not only a duty but a pleasure—one of the greatest in life. We learned that one can not sit down and love a crowd of people by force of will. We must go among them and take individuals by the hand and come to know them as individuals. We can not love people and always keep them a mile away.

More than that, we must learn to overlook faults and see virtues, and if we do that we will find something in each one to draw our affections out. Love can not be sent by force of will to that which our hearts esteem as unlovely; but when we look into the lives of people and find something fine there, our love goes out without effort because we know that it is justified. There are few indeed who have no traits that justify love.

I come into the church as a learner and perhaps am surprised to learn the first thing that my newly-found brethren are not perfect. I ought not to expect them to be so; but perhaps I did, for many do. My brethren came into the church, as did I, bearing the impress of the world. They are what the world made them; now the church is making them over. They are in process of making, and I must bear with their faults until they are made. I ought to be willing to do that if they will agree to bear with my faults until I am made over; and God only knows how long a time that will take.

If I do not take the correct view of the matter I will find some failing in each individual that will rise up as a barrier and shut him away from my love. I meet Brother A. He is a blunt, free-spoken man, and soon offends me. Shall I steer clear of Brother A. in the future and have nothing to do with him?

I remember starting out to scatter tracts with a certain brother some years ago. It was new business to me. I was no talker, and it was beyond me to call a total stranger to his front door and immediately engage in an animated and interesting conversation on religious topics. Soon this brother turned on me and said, "Why don't you talk? I wouldn't give you twenty cents a day to canvass for me!"

I did not know him well then, and it made me angry. My first impulse was to throw the job down right there and tell him, "You need not set a price on me, for I would not travel with you for any price"; but I did not. I reasoned thus: Who am I working for? Not for this brother, or I might quit my job at will. I am working for God and the church, and must do my work, no matter what others do. Remember that thought when tempted to drop your work, whatever it is. You can not afford to drop the work that God gave you because some man offends you.

I went on with this brother, and soon learned to think nothing of his abrupt speech. I learned to love him as much as I ever did any fellow laborer, because of the integrity of his soul.

So it will be as we go on down the alphabet. Brother B, Brother C, Brother D, each has his fault,—it may be pride, it may be a hasty temper, anything, everything that an unholy world has saddled upon him. Bear with it! Bear with it! As you expect Christ to bear with you, bear with that man's fault; and soon you will see the warm heart, the honest spirit, the real worth of the man, and you will love him without any effort of the will.

In youth we learn to mispronounce certain words. Later in life we discover the mistake; yet when off guard and while talking earnestly we pronounce them in the old way. Habit gets the start of knowledge. We note the mistake just when it is too late. So with all our early training; it fosters certain faults in us. Later, after hearing the gospel, we learn the correct way; but at times habit gets the start of knowledge and we note the old fault only after the mistake is made. It is so with all; and we must bear with all who are making an effort to correct bad habits until they have time to destroy the awful hold of early training.

If we want to love, we will still find plenty to love in the people of God, providing we will get near to them and learn to know them.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

CURRENT EVENTS SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

CANADIAN CENSORSHIP.—The Canadian Government has ordered the suspension of newspapers publishing articles prejudicial to the allies.

AUSTRALIAN EMBARGO.—The Australian Government has placed an embargo on meat, wool, wheat, flour, and coal, except as shipped to England. This embargo affects United States trade to a considerable extent.

SHIPS RELEASED.—On the assurance that oil would not be reshipped to Germany, England has released the John D. Rockefeller and the Platuria, American oil-bearing vessels bound for European neutral ports.

NEW HAVEN INVESTIGATION.—Indictments were handed down on the 2d by a federal grand jury against twenty-one present and former directors of the New Haven, New York and Hartford Railroad, for alleged criminal violation of the Sherman anti-trust law.

ANOTHER CANAL SLIDE.—The Panama Canal has again for a short time been closed to traffic by another landslide in the Culebra Cut, said to be an aftermath of the slide of October 14, and which had been sufficiently cleared to admit of navigation.

ASSASSINS GUILTY.—The court at Sarajevo is reported to have found guilty of treason, Gavrie Prinzip and twenty-one accomplices in the assassination of Archduke Francis Ferdinand and wife.

THE ELECTION.—Advices at this writing estimate the election of fourteen Republican, eleven Democratic and one Progressive governor in the twenty-eight States selecting governors this year, with two States yet uncertain. In the Senate the Democrats gained four, their majority in the House being very materially decreased. Returns indicate that woman suffrage carried in Nevada and Montana, losing in Ohio, Missouri, Nebraska, North and South Dakota.

STOCK INFECTION.—To prevent among cattle, sheep and hogs, the spread of what is known as the mouth and hoof disease, found for the first time since 1908 among cattle exhibited at the National Dairy Show at Chicago, all markets in Illinois have been closed, and the States of Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York have been placed under quarantine, not being allowed to make interstate shipments. Infected herds are killed, the Federal and State Governments sharing in reimbursing the owners to the extent of the meat value of the animals killed.

ROCKEFELLER RELIEF.—The Rockefeller foundation has entered the relief work for noncombatants in the countries affected by the European war. A commission is to be sent to Europe to report first-hand when and where aid can be most effectively administered. Four thousand tons of provisions are already en route to Belgium. Ambassador Page, at London, is authority for the statement that "it will require a million dollars a month for seven or eight months to prevent starvation" in Belgium. Other institutions are continuously active throughout the United States in relief work.

ARKANSAS LABOR TROUBLES.—Under orders from Secretary of War Garrison, four companies of cavalry have been transferred from Fort Sheridan, Illinois, to Fort Smith, Arkansas, to enforce the orders of Federal Judge Youmans in maintaining order in the Hartford Valley coal strike district. Major Nathaniel F. McClure, who has been with the troops in Colorado, is in command of these forces. It is said that the Bache-Denman interests will attempt to operate under the protection of the troops.

IN MEXICO.—The statement in these columns last week that a coalition of Villa and Carranza delegates were in control of the Aguas Calientes convention should have read Villa and Zapata. On the 2d Eulalio Guterrez, said to be of the lower middle classes and a grocer before he became a revolutionist, was by this convention selected provisional president for twenty days, the resignation of Carranza having previously been accepted. The convention adjourns to meet at Mexico City, when the Zapata delegates are expected to be authorized by him to vote in the selection of a permanent provisional president. Carranza now states that he did not send his resignation to the convention, that the report was a telegraphic error; he refuses to recognize the action selecting Guterrez, and seeks to maintain his position. On the 3d Villa forces occupied Aguas Calientes. Guterrez maintains his cabinet at Aguas Calientes, while Carranza, who has been for several days at Puebla, between Mexico City and Vera Cruz, is said to have ordered his ministers to remove to Puebla. Carranza forces have retreated from before Villa forces to the south of Aguas Calientes. Fighting is reported near the international border in the vicinity of Del Rio, Texas, and between the troops of Maytorena and Hill, formerly engaged at Naco, near Magdalena, Sonora. Carranza is reported as having said that he would fight to the death, if sustained by any part of the constitutionalist leaders. Villa has formally notified the convention at Aguas Calientes that he will retire to private life, if necessary, to bring about the elimination of Carranza.

THE EUROPEAN WAR.—The stubborn resistance of the allied lines and the inundations along the Yser River, affected by the allies, have forced the Germans to retreat from the Yser district. Besides activities near Lille, reported last week, the Germans are bringing up heavy reinforcements at Ypres, to the north of Lille, where it is thought they may mass a new attack in another attempt to break through the allied lines. The allies report gains in the Vosges, Germany claiming slight advances near Sissons and Verdun. The entire German and Austrian armies are reported in retreat before the Russians. In the east Prussian district the Germans have been driven back to their own soil. In Poland, with the Austrians, they continue to withdraw. In Galicia the Russians have crossed the San River, and have retaken Jaroslau. The Austrians are advancing into Servia. The rebellion in South Africa, poorly organized and without adequate equipment, is reported practically crushed. On the failure of Turkey to satisfactorily explain the actions of the Turkish fleet in the Black Sea, to withdraw her navy from said sea, dismiss from the Turkish navy German officers, and dismantle the cruisers Goeben and Breslau, said to have been purchased from Germany, diplomatic relations were broken by Great Britain, Russia, France, and Servia and hostilities begun. Russian and Turkish troops are massed along the Russo-Turkish border and have been engaged in preliminary fighting, with success reported by each line. French and British gunboats have been bombarding the Dardanelles, with slight damage to the forts there. A British vessel has fired on Jaffa. The British cruiser Minerva has destroyed the Turkish fort and base of operations against Egypt at the head of the Gulf of Akaba, on the east coast of the Red Sea. Great Britain has declared martial law in Egypt. England on the 5th formally annexed the island of Cypress, which since 1878 had been occupied and administered by Great Britain, though remaining under the suzerainty of the Sultan. The defensive alliance between Great Britain and Turkey having been violated at the outbreak of the war, the British Government considers it necessary to appropriate this island in the interests of good government and protection. A dispatch from Salonika, via London, says Greece has annexed Epirus. Desperate fighting at Tsing-Tau is followed by announcement from Tokio, said to be official, and stating that this German stronghold has surrendered to Japan. England has closed the North Sea to traffic, and merchant vessels entering it do so at their peril, from mines and warships searching for suspicious crafts. The British light cruiser Hermes, was on October 31 sunk in the Straits of Dover, by a German submarine. The German Pacific fleet of five vessels, on the 3d, off the coast of Chile, sunk the British Good Hope and probably the Monmouth, damaging the Glasgow. A British submarine trailing retreating German vessels in the North Sea was sunk by a mine thrown out by a rear German vessel. The British hospital ship Rohilla was wrecked on the rocks of the Yorkshire coast, en route to the continent. The German cruiser Karlsruhe, on the 3d, captured three British steamers in the Atlantic. Reports of naval activities between Turkey and the allies resulting in the destruction of vessels on both sides are not authenticated.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

SALOON A NUISANCE.—The saloon is a nuisance. The evil can no more be confined to the building in which it exists than the odor of a slaughter house to the block in which it is located. I know, and you know, that they are in league with every other form of evil. As a rule, if you let the liquor dealer have his way, he will have a disorderly house upstairs, he will have a gambling den in his back room, and his place will be the center of every sort of evil. The saloon is the bureau of information for every sort of crime. It is the first place that a policeman looks for crime and the last place he would go to look for virtue.—W. J. BRYAN.

CHRISTMAS OFFERING.—Bishop E. L. Kelley is in receipt of the following letter from Edgar A. Wetmore, in behalf of the Boston, Massachusetts, Sunday school, which contains suggestions that might furnish a worthy example for other schools. The letter reads as follows:

In our last Sunday school business meeting we voted to the effect that when our Christmas offering amounted to the sum of fifty dollars to send it to you on account. We thought that by so doing you could use the money to advantage, while it draws no interest in the banks here while subject to check. Although the interest on such a small sum would amount to very little, if all the schools were to adopt this plan it seems to us that quite a little interest would be saved in the course of the year. Please find my check for fifty dollars inclosed.

THE POET'S SOLITUDE

To sit on rocks to muse o'er flood and fell,
 To slowly trace the forest's shady scene,
 Where things that own not man's dominion dwell,
 And mortal foot hath ne'er or rarely been;
 To climb the trackless mountain all unseen,
 With the wild flock that never needs a fold;
 Alone o'er steeps and foaming falls to lean—
 This is not solitude; 'tis but to hold
 Converse with Nature's charms and view her stores unrolled.
 But midst the crowd, the hum, the shock of men,
 To hear, to see, to feel, and to possess,
 And roam along, the world's tired denizen,
 With none who bless us, none whom we can bless;
 Minions of splendor, shrinking from distress!
 None that, with kindred consciousness endued,
 If we were not, would seem to smile the less
 Of all that flattered, followed, sought and sued;
 This is to be alone; this, this is solitude!—Lord Byron.

ARE WE TRANSGRESSORS?

I recall having once preached a sermon from the text, "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul," at the close of which a person approached me in this manner: "You preached a very nice discourse to-night, my friend, and I think it a great pity that you people do not believe what you have been preaching." When I asked upon what grounds the assumption that we did not believe it was based, I was answered, "Because you do not keep the law; you do not keep the Sabbath of the Lord." On other occasions I have been asked, "Why don't you people observe the Sabbath of the Bible?"

It is with a desire to free ourselves from these and similar charges that we begin this paper, rather than with a desire for controversy, and in order to proceed logically we wish to state in the beginning that this question is not of our own raising. It is an issue brought forward by others, and it is but fair to state the proposition as affirmed by its defenders, and then proceed to examine it negatively.

ADVENTIST CLAIMS

I believe I am correct in saying that the leading claims of Seventh-day Adventists in regard to the Sabbath are about as follows:

The Sabbath of the Lord is the seventh day of the week. We should consider all days as beginning at the going down of the sun, hence we should begin to keep the Sabbath when the sun sets on the sixth day, and continue until sunset on the seventh. The time between sunset on the sixth and seventh days is holy. This law has been in force since the beginning of creation, and will be until the end of time. Seventh day observance is the seal of God. And Sunday keeping is the mark of the beast.

THE UNIVERSAL SABBATH

As a people we have given this subject earnest and prayerful consideration, and we are unable to admit the truthfulness of any phase of the question as stated by Sabbatarians. We can not accept their idea of a universal Sabbath of holy time beginning at the going down of the sun, from the simple fact, so patent to all, that there is no universal sunset. There are places in this world where the sun does not set at all in summer, and where it does not appear in winter, where a Sabbath observed in this way would continue for a full year, after which we would have no Sabbath until six years had passed; and in the zone in which we are living there is no moment in which the sun is not setting at some point and rising at another.

Thus it can be readily seen how impossible it is for us to have a universal Sabbath in which the time is holy, and regulate the time by the setting of the sun; for if I begin to keep Sabbath when holy time begins, or when the sun sets in Iowa, and my brother in China continues to work for twelve hours longer until the sun sets there (then, evidently, if it is holy time that I am keeping, he must be working on holy time, for he is working while I am keeping the Sabbath. If God has blessed a certain portion of time, and if he continues to observe that time by resting every seventh day, then all men should observe the identical moments that God does, regardless of the position of the sun; whether it be setting, rising, or in midheaven.

I have been told that Seventh-day Adventists have experienced some difficulty in getting their theory to work in the north of Norway, where the sun shines all summer, and never appears in winter. They have there adopted the plan of dividing the time into days of twenty-four hours each (which God has not done), and setting apart every seventh one of these man-made days as a Sabbath.

This seems to be the only practical thing to be done there, but it does not answer the query, "Would God make a law for universal application after having made a place where it is impossible to apply it?"

We think the fact that there exists a place where Christian men dwell where it is a physical impossibility to apply the Sabbath commandment proves that God, who created that place, and determined who should dwell there, did not give the Sabbath commandment for a universal law.

DROPPING A DAY

It was once my privilege to take a long ocean voyage in company with several missionaries of the Seventh-day Adventist persuasion, on which we crossed the one hundred and eightieth meridian west (or east, either,) from Greenwich, which is the day line established for the convenience of mariners, but for which no one makes any claim for divine sanction.

The establishment of this day line is unquestionably the work of man, uninspired, and unauthorized from heaven; but, surprising as it may seem, it is the day line for Seventh-day Adventists; and those on this side of it keep one day for the Sabbath while those on the other side of it keep another.

We approached this man-made day line on the evening of a Saturday, and our Adventist brethren had been faithfully keeping Sabbath that day. They bowed, however, to the authority of man to set the day line, for had they allowed the sun to set six times before keeping another Sabbath their Sabbath would have fallen on the day that other people call Sunday.

Now we are not able to understand why a people should make so great a complaint about the wonderful presumption of man in changing the Sabbath, and then admit without any complaint whatever the right of man to drop a day out of the week entirely because it suits his convenience to do so.

I must say, it looks to me like a determination on the part of some folks to preserve their own eccentricities regardless of reason, logic, or the law; for if God gave the Sabbath law, and there should be six sunsets (or six days) between Sabbaths, and we allow uninspired and unauthorized men to remove one of those days entirely without protest, we are certainly as guilty as though we substituted another day in place of the day that he commanded. Does not reason declare it so? Is it not logical to so conclude? If the law says the Sabbath should be observed every seventh day, does not reason, logic, and law declare that six days should intervene?

Nevertheless, our friends did not follow the demands of the law on this occasion, but instead of observing their own rule and allowing the sun to set six times between Sabbaths, and thus being in harmony with logic and law, they kept Sabbath on the sixth day, and thus avoided observing the day that uninspired men called Sunday, although they knew that these same uninspired men called it Sunday simply and solely because, without any authority from heaven, they had chosen to remove a day entirely from the week in crossing the Pacific Ocean.

We can see no logic in being branded by our Adventist brethren as heretics unless they can show that God had something to do with the establishing of that day line, when they themselves keep one day on one side of it and another day on the opposite side.

As a matter of fact, our people in Australia keep the same time as do the Adventists in America. We are unable to see why God should commend Seventh-day Adventists in America for keeping a certain day as holy, and condemn our people in Australia for keeping the same identical moments.

WHO WILL ANSWER?

You of the logical mind—will you answer?

If God has sanctified the time that Seventh-day Adventists in America observe as the Sabbath, will he denounce Australian Christians because they observe it?

If God has sanctified the time that is observed by Seventh-day Adventists in America, will he justify Seventh-day Adventists in Australia for not observing it?

Is the fact that a certain set of uninspired and unauthorized men took the liberty of establishing a day line for their own convenience a reasonable, logical, or lawful excuse to Seventh-day Adventists over there for not observing the same holy (?) time they do in America?

Is it consistent to insist so strongly on the observance of a certain day, and then consent for uninspired men to tell us when that day shall be?

If God has sanctified a certain time, is it not holy? If men for their own convenience have established a day line without divine authority, is not the time as holy on the one side of that line as the other?

A SUPPOSED CASE

Let us suppose we are approaching that man-made line: It is Saturday morning. All the faithful children of God are keeping Sabbath, thereby manifesting the seal of God; at noon we cross the line, and are overtaken by Sunday. (That is, uninspired men agree that we shall call the remainder of the day Sunday.) Do our Adventist friends now observe the law of God and keep Sabbath (for, understand, they have but kept a part of a day after six days of work)? Or do they allow this man-made day line to come between them and the law of God? Why, every Adventist sister will bring out her knitting, and every Adventist brother will produce his writing material or other work, and they will proceed to show us their contempt of this old "pagan Sabbath."

Again, let us suppose we are approaching that line from the west. It is Sunday morning, and while all other Christians are devoutly keeping the "Lord's Day" our Adventist friends are busily engaged at any kind of work they may happen to have at hand. At noon we cross the line and are overtaken by Saturday. (That is, uninspired men agree that we shall call the remainder of the day Saturday.) Now, our Adventist friends have kept Sabbath but yesterday, and the law of God specifies that there shall be six sunsets (or days) between Sabbaths. But what do they do? Do they keep the law of God? No, we see them all bowing to the authority of those uninspired men, and allowing that it is now the seventh day of the week, when it is really only the first, and keeping it as a Sabbath. And yet they say that observing the first day is the "mark of the beast." Consistency is said to be a jewel. Do you discover that there is any jewel here?

We are unable to see wherein it is reasonable to presume that those who observe the Sabbath on the one side of this day line thereby manifest the seal of God, while those who observe the Sabbath on the other side of it the same day thereby manifest the mark of the beast. We can't find any jewel here, either.

WHAT SAY THE SCRIPTURES?

But, we may be asked, Do not the Scriptures teach that Sabbath keeping is the seal of God? We reply, There is no text that affirms any such thing. The best that Adventists can do is to affirm that texts which do not exactly say so do really imply that it is so. It is claimed that sign and seal mean the same thing, and that the term sign is applied to the Sabbath in such a way as to clearly show that it is the seal of God.

SIGN OF MOSAIC COVENANT

We make the claim without fear of successful contradiction that the Sabbath, (or Sabbath keeping) was made the sign of the covenant of which Moses was mediator, and that when the Mosaic covenant was superseded by the new, (or gospel) covenant of which Christ was mediator, people were no longer to be recognized by that sign.

Here is one of the texts used by Adventists to prove that Sabbath keeping is the seal of God:

Speak thou also unto the children of Israel, saying, Verily my sabbaths ye shall keep: for it is a sign between me and you throughout your generations; that ye may know that I am the Lord that doth sanctify you; ye shall keep the sabbath therefore, for it is holy unto you. Every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death: for whosoever doeth any work therein, that soul shall be cut off from among his people. Six days may work be done; but in the seventh is the sabbath of rest, holy to the Lord: whosoever doeth any work in the sabbath day, he shall surely be put to death. Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the sabbath, to observe the sabbath throughout their generations, for a perpetual covenant. It is a sign between me and the children of Israel for ever: for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day he rested, and was refreshed.—Exodus 31: 13-17.

I have emphasized certain parts of this quotation that you may particularly notice that this sign and this covenant was between God and the children of Israel.

Here is another:

Wherefore I caused them to go forth out of the land of Egypt, and brought them into the wilderness. . . . Moreover also I gave them my sabbaths, to be a sign between me and them, that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them.—Ezekiel 20: 10-12.

Both these texts are used to show that the Lord made the Sabbath a sign by which he was to recognize his people. I wish to call the reader's attention to the fact that in both of them the Lord speaks of the Sabbaths in the plural, and that he repeatedly states that the Sabbaths were to be a sign between him and the children of Israel throughout their generations.

Now, the question is, How long were their generations to continue? Matthew informs us that all the generations from Abraham to David are fourteen generations; and from David until the carrying away into Babylon are fourteen generations; and from the carrying away into Babylon unto Christ are fourteen generations. Can any of our Adventist friends trace the generations farther? Paul also tells us in the Galatian letter that the law given through the mediatorship of Moses was added because of transgression until the promised seed should come, and that the seed promised was Christ. Thus we see that by allowing scripture to interpret scripture we learn that the Sabbath was a sign between God and the children of Israel from Moses to Christ.

If we wish to learn how that sign was regarded under the new covenant we may do so by searching the New Testament scriptures. Read Colossians 2: 16: "Let no man judge therefore you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a holy day, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days."

Now we found it plainly stated under the Mosaic dispensation that the Sabbaths were a sign, and men could be judged by that sign, and put to death if they failed to observe it. It was the test by which they were to be proven, "whether they will walk in my law, or no." (Exodus 16: 4.) But here the apostle just as plainly tells us that it is the sign no more, and that the disciples of the Master were to let no man judge them by it. A man might be a faithful Sabbath keeper and not a follower of Jesus, or he might be a follower of Jesus and no Sabbath keeper.

The Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak thou also unto the children of Israel, and say, Verily my sabbaths ye shall keep. But did the Lord ever speak unto Christ, or to any of the apostles, saying, Speak thou also unto all the world, saying remember the seventh day to keep it holy? Did he? Echo answers, Did he?

OTHER SIGNS

Whenever the Lord made a covenant with man he gave a sign or token of the covenant, as may be seen by the following:

And God said, this is the token of the covenant which I make between me and you, and every living creature that is with you, for perpetual generations: I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth.—Genesis 9: 12, 13.

Here is a token of a covenant between God and all the earth, moreover, it is an everlasting covenant (see verse 16). Why not make it the seal of God? It at least has the merit of having been made without limitation as to extent or duration, (which the sabbath sign has not).

In Genesis 17: 11, circumcision is given as the token or sign of the covenant between God and Abraham, and death was made the penalty to all who refused to conform to it. It is given in almost identical words as the Sabbath sign. Why not say that it is the seal of God? It has a decided advantage over the Sabbath in this regard, for it is actually called a seal in the common version of the Bible, while the Sabbath is not (see Romans 4: 11). Abraham received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had.

Yes, it is called a seal, and a God-given seal.

There is no text in the Bible that comes so near calling Sabbath keeping the seal of God.

THE SEAL OF GOD

Although it is not essential to the purposes of this article that we define the seal of God as it pertains to the gospel covenant, yet we will digress briefly and present a little scripture bearing on the subject.

We have shown that a man could be identified with the children of Abraham by the sign of circumcision, and that without that sign a man should be "cut off from among his people." We have also shown that Sabbath keeping was the sign of the Mosaic covenant, and that any man in that covenant who had not the sign was to be put to death.

Now, what sign must one have to be in the covenant of Christ?

In Romans 8:9, we read: "Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." And again in verse 14, "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God."

We see, then, that in the same manner as the sign of circumcision identified a man with the children of Abraham, or the keeping of the Sabbath identified him with the Mosaic covenant, possession of the Spirit of the Master identified him with the gospel covenant.

In first revealing the Sabbath law to Moses (Exodus 16:4), the Lord said it was "that I may prove them whether they will keep my law or no." We see, then, that it was the test. Now the great apostle declares that the test is being in possession of the Holy Spirit, for if any man be not in possession of it he is none of Christ's.

As many as observed the sign of circumcision entered the covenant of Abraham, and as many as were led by the Spirit of God (under the gospel dispensation), they were the sons of God.

But some one may ask, If the Holy Spirit be the seal of God, why do you not present a text that really says so, instead of, Seventh-day Adventist-like, deduct that it is from texts that do not exactly say so? We appreciate the pertinency of this question, and will proceed to give a few plain texts that mention the seal of God in specific terms.

And grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption.—Ephesians 4:30.

That we should be to the praise of his glory, who first trusted in Christ. In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation: in whom also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise.—Ephesians 1:12, 13.

Now he which stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God; who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts.—2 Corinthians 1:21, 22.

Comment on these texts is unnecessary, as anyone can see that they declare the Holy Spirit to be that by which we are sealed unto the day of redemption.

ANTIQUITY OF THE SABBATH

We are met with the objection, however, that the Sabbath was before the law, and hence not a part of the law of Moses. To this we reply, as can be said of almost every one of the Sabbatarian positions, there is no text in the Bible that affirms what they believe in this connection. They deduce, though from certain texts that do not exactly so state, that the Sabbath commandment was given to Adam in Eden, and that it was to be binding on the race to the end of time.

One of these texts is found in Mark 2:27, and reads thus, "And he said unto them, the sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath." By assuming that the word man as here used necessarily implies the whole human family, and showing that Adam and present-day Christians are men, Adventists make this a stronghold for their theory. They will put the question to you in this way. Was not Adam a man? Are not you a man? Then they will follow up with the text, placing great stress upon the word man, "That Sabbath was made for man."

A small amount of thought, however, breaks the force of this argument, for everyone knows that the term man may signify the whole race, or it may mean any part of the race, even to a single individual. Were I to take a walk through the forest where I supposed no human creature had ever been before me, and should find in my ramblings a tree that had been blazed with an ax, I would probably say, This spot has been visited by man; but I would not mean that the whole human race had visited that place: I would simply mean that what I had noticed was the work of a human being.

We have already shown that the Sabbath was given to the children of Israel, and it requires no argument to prove that any commandment that was made for the children of Israel was made for man. And we contend that that is all that this text necessarily implies.

If Sabbatarians are justified in making this apply to the entire human family because of the use of the word man, then we would be equally justified in contending that the whole race should keep the pass-over, be circumcised, and keep the whole of, what Adventists term the "ceremonial law," for according to the Old Testament scriptures all of these things proceeded out of the mouth of the Lord, and Jesus tells us in Matthew 4:4, "Man shall live . . . by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord." Every Sabbatarian will admit that the word man as here used does not apply to the race in the sense that every man must obey every word that the Lord has ever spoken, regardless of to whom it was spoken, or why.

The Lord commanded Noah to build an ark, and told him why he was required to build it. We are not required to obey that command to Noah, for the Lord has not warned us of a coming flood of water. He does not require it of us. The Lord, by the prophet, commanded Naaman to dip seven times in Jordan, because he was a leper and wished to be cleansed, but we are not in a condition to need to live by every word of that commandment. No one will believe that we should. The reason for the Lord making that requirement of Naaman is clearly evident, and does not apply to us in the least. We claim that the reason for the giving of the Sabbath commandment is just as evident, and more clearly expressed, and that that reason does not apply to us any more than does the reason for Naaman to dip in Jordan apply to us.

And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord thy God brought thee out thence, through a mighty hand and by a stretched out arm: therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath Day.—Deuteronomy 5:15.

ANOTHER DEFENSE

We pass now to the next great citadel of defense, Genesis 2:2, 3:

And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it: because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made.

Here, we are told, is undeniable evidence that the very first seventh day was made a Sabbath and blessed and sanctified to the use of man. And at the risk of being considered very dense for not being able to do so, I must state right here that I see no evidence of any such thing in the text.

Let us consider, first, by whom it was written, and when. Moses is conceded to be the author; then why should his making mention here of a fact known to him prove that all who lived before him possessed the same knowledge. It is strange, indeed, that if all the fathers, including Adam, Enoch, Noah, Abraham and his descendants knew all about the Sabbath commandment that we have no mention of it until the days of Moses, except in this incidental way. What a pity it is that no one of the patriarchs of the race prior to the time of Moses is mentioned as having kept it.

Suppose, my friend, that the only mention of a seventh-day Sabbath in the Bible were this one under consideration, could you find anything in it to justify you in the thought that man was required to observe it? If we for the sake of the argument admit that all the fathers knew as much as is stated in this text about the seventh day, do we of necessity allow that they were under obligation to observe it as a Sabbath?

The first time in the Scriptures that it is intimated that man has any obligation regarding a Sabbath is in Exodus 4, and then the Lord tells Moses it is "that I may prove them whether they will walk in my law or no."

It is strange, also, that if the Sabbath was known and observed by all the fathers, that Moses tells them in Deuteronomy 5:2-5 "that the Lord made not this covenant with the fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day." He continues to remind them that he was the mediator who stood between them and the Lord when it was given, and then proceeds to read the words of the covenant, the ten commandments, and when he comes to the fourth he tells them it was given as a memorial of their deliverance from Egypt. As we have before shown, the Sabbath was given because they had been delivered from Egypt, and inasmuch as we have not been delivered from Egypt we are not required to keep the Sabbath as a memorial of our deliverance.

We will here submit another text which plainly declares that the people did not know about the Sabbath until the Lord made it known to them through the mediatorship of Moses.

Thou camest down also upon Mount Sinai and spakest with them from heaven, and gavest them right judgments, and true laws, good statutes and commandments: and madest known unto them thy holy sabbath, and commandest them precepts, statutes, and laws, by the hand of Moses thy servant.—Nehemiah 9:13, 14.

It would be hard to frame a plainer declaration than is here made that all that was given from Sinai, including the holy Sabbath, was "by the hand of Moses thy servant."

TO SUM UP

We have found, first, that "the Lord made not this covenant with the fathers;" second, that the fathers can not be shown to have ever observed a Sabbath; third, that when it was made known to man it was revealed by the hand of Moses; fourth, that it was given because of the deliverance from Egypt.

But, say our Adventist friends, if God did not bless the very first seventh day and sanctify it to the use of man; and if he did not require the observance of every seventh day after the first, then the text in Genesis 2:3 is misleading. Let us examine it and see. Suppose we had no other text on record but this one, would it lead us to believe that a commandment was issued in the beginning for man to observe the seventh day for ever as a memorial of creation? Does it even lead us to believe at all that God blessed the very first seventh day?

It certainly does not read that God blessed the seventh day because in it he was going to rest. It does not lead us to believe that it was blessed first, and then rested on. It does not say that God blessed that day because he was resting. We are not led to believe that he blessed it while he was resting. But the text says that the Lord blessed the seventh day and sanctified it because in it he had rested. We are given to understand that he rested on the seventh day, and that afterward he blessed it. But we are not given any information as to how long it was after he rested before he blessed it. If we wish to know at what subsequent time he blessed it, and made his blessing known to man, and why he commanded man to observe it, other texts will have to tell us, and, as we have already shown, they do tell us in no uncertain tone that when he came down upon Mount Sinai and spake from the heavens and revealed statutes, judgments and laws by the hand of Moses, he made known his holy Sabbath; they tell us further, that he did not make the covenant with their fathers, but with them, and Moses was the mediator; they also tell us that the reason for which he required them to observe it was that he had delivered them from the land of Egypt.

Thus we have shown to whom the command was given, through whom it was given, and how long it was to be observed. The people were the children of Israel, the mediator was Moses, and the time was between Moses and Christ.

THE LAW OF GOD

Adventists tell us, however, that the ten commandment code is the immutable law of God, and that we are wrong altogether in calling it the law of Moses. To this we submit the following questions: Who was in the mountain with the Lord when he wrote the ten commandments? Who received the tables of stone from the hands of the Lord? Who stood before the children of Israel and delivered the words of that law to them? Adventists must answer each of these questions with the word Moses. Then who will dare to say that Moses was not the mediator of the ten commandment code?

We refer now to Hebrews 8:6, where the apostle referring to Jesus, and comparing him with Moses says: "But now hath he obtained a more excellent ministry, by how much also he is the mediator of a better covenant, which was established upon better promises."

We will not here enter into a lengthy discussion of the two covenants, for to do so would make our article much too long; but we will notice one or two of the first questions that are likely to be asked by the advocate of the continuity of the ten commandment code, who will say, Is it right to kill now? Is it right to steal now? Is it right to bear false witness now? Is it right to dishonor parents now? Is it right to be covetous now? Is it right to worship idols now? etc.; and if you say none of these things are right at the present time, he will urge that they are wrong because the law as engraved on the tables of stone is still in force.

We reply that though we are not now under the Mosaic covenant with its peculiar signs and ceremonies, that we are under that other, and better covenant, of which Christ is mediator, and which is based upon better promises than the Mosaic covenant, and that under this covenant it is wrong to do any of these things by which our neighbor is made to suffer or God is dishonored, for this new covenant is based upon two great commandments, neither of which is found in express terms on the tables of stone, the first of which is, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, might, mind, and strength," and the second of which is, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

Paul tells us that love is the fulfilling of the law; and that when we love our neighbor we will not need a system of laws engraved in stone to keep us from injuring him. Those statutes with penalties are needed where love is not, but where love for God and man reigns, God is honored and the rights of man regarded, without penalties and without commandments.

There were, however, in the early church some who clung to the old law with its statutes, and its ceremonies, and its signs. To such Paul wrote in Galatians 4:10, 11, "Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years. I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labor in vain."

By referring to Leviticus 23, you will find that first and foremost among the days the people were required by Moses to keep was the seventh-day Sabbath; then follow a number of other Sabbaths, all of which, including the seventh day, were to be observed by certain ceremonies.

Seventh-day Adventists try to evade the force of the language in Colossians 2:16, that followers of Christ were not to be judged in meat or in drink, or in new moons, or Sabbath Days, by making a distinction between the seventh day and other Sabbaths of the law, and saying that the Sabbath Days in this text refer to the other Sabbaths, and not to the seventh-day sabbath. We call their attention to the fact that where the Sabbath is called a sign in the Old Testament, it is used in the plural. If the sign of the Sabbaths is the seal of God, and we do away with the plural Sabbaths of the law, do we not dispose of the seal of God?

TO CONCLUDE

In conclusion, we refer the reader to Romans 14: 5, where it is said that, "One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." The apostle here refuses to take dogmatic ground, but allows every man to be his own judge as to whether he will esteem one day above another. Would it be consistent for him who is God's chosen witness to all men to allow this, if regarding one day as the chief of all days were really the seal of God as our Adventist friends believe? Or if failing to esteem a certain day above all other days were really the mark of the beast as they would have us believe?

When the inspired apostle, especially indorsed as God's witness to all men (Acts 22: 15) says, "Let no man judge therefore you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath Days," are we to be considered as transgressors because we refuse to be judged and branded as followers of the beast because we do not keep the exact time as a Sabbath that certain people think we should? When this same inspired witness allowed that a man might be approved of God who esteemed every day alike, are we to be considered transgressors simply because we fail to esteem one day as of supreme importance.

We claim to have completely freed ourselves from the charge, on the ground that there was never a time given for Sabbath observance that was to be observed universally, and on the ground that when the seventh-day Sabbath was commanded, it was given to a certain people, to be observed for a certain time. Have we not shown our grounds to have been well taken? Are we transgressors?

Of General Interest

ACTION OF BEER ON THE SYSTEM

Professor Reinitzer, of Graz, has affirmed that beer has an injurious effect on the body beyond that which comes from alcohol, and is evidently due to some chemical changes dependent on the hops. This was discovered in the efforts to find some preservative to keep beer from souring. The bacterial life forms of beer are hindered from multiplying by the resins of the hops. These resins do not destroy the yeast plant as high percentages of alcohol do.

Nevertheless, both hops and alcohol are bactericide, and in all probability both of them have deleterious effects on the sensitive human cells. It is a well-known fact that the effects of both hops and alcohol accumulate in the system. There is a chemical makeup to be recognized. The so-called glands of the hops, which contain the elements of possible poison, hold an ethereal oil, comprising various terpenes in which other elements are held in solution. Among these are the hop acids which pass by oxidation into resins, and these resins are numerous and cumulative. They act on the nervous system, as terpenes and on the kidneys.

There are alkaloids too, which have a strong affinity for the nerves and cells of the kidneys. The hop is very closely related to the hemp. On the female blossoms of the Indian hemp plant, the same as on the blossom of the hops, there are glands holding a narcotic, bitter-tasting substance, which forms the active element of the hashish from Indian hemp. This is a very powerful narcotic.

It is a striking fact that in the hashish, exactly the same elements are found as in the lupulin glands of the hops, namely, an ethereal oil and various bitter resins, and one or more alkaloids. It is not improbable, then, that hops exert an effect on the human body, similar to that of hashish, only weaker, while hashish is used in a very concentrated form, and beer is very diluted.

Curiously enough, effects follow from drinking of beer which are not referable to the alcohol alone. Other influences are at work. Thus the beer drinker presents a series of stupefactions, which have been termed the Beer Philistine and depressions of the nervous system with derangement of the food supply that must come from some particular cause. This action seems to fall on the nervous system, and leads to that clumsy, provisional heaviness of mind, so observable in heavy beer drinkers. Another fact suggests some other cause, except that of spirits, namely, the special thirst of the beer drinker and the injurious effects noted on the kidneys.

The preservative effects of this resin of the hops must act on the human cells in some way to diminish their activity and vitality and also to check their growth or turn it into another direction. From these and other considerations, the author concludes that hops in beer is not harmless, but may be one of the most dangerous of the bacterial contents. This conclusion has been sustained by other researchers.

Doctor Rudin pointed out the fact that beer checked elimination and hence was among the most subtle of the alcoholic drinks, and both directly and indirectly diminished vitality and lowered the chemical relations of the cells to the organisms. The same author considered alcohol to diminish the eliminative processes and derange the harmony of the working of the nervous system, and hence was like sand thrown into a delicate machine, hindering, breaking up and disturbing its activity.—The Journal of Inebriety.

PROHIBITION IN WEST VIRGINIA

West Virginia is now in the second month of real state-wide prohibition, and the more we see of prohibition and its wonderful results, the better we like it.

I have had numbers of men who were really opposed to prohibition and who voted against its adoption, state to me that they were convinced that the people were right in adopting a prohibition clause in the State constitution, eliminating the manufacture and sale of whisky and all other kinds of intoxicants, and should the opportunity afford itself that they would unhesitatingly register their influence and support in behalf of the dry cause.

The results have been marvelous to everybody and we find even among the element that opposed the State being voted dry a disposition manifested to give their support to seeing the law carried out in force and effect. We have experienced no serious obstacles to the strict enforcement of the law.

West Virginia's prohibition law is the strictest found on any of the statute books in the Union, and for this reason I believe it to be the best.

Our organization for the enforcement of the prohibition law is small, inexpensive, yet complete and effectual. We are accomplishing satisfactory results, and it can not be said that West Virginia's prohibition law is not indeed a complete success.

In the enforcement of the law we have had the hearty cooperation of the municipal and county officers. The Anti-Saloon League organization is doing good, effectual work, and is assisting the prohibition commissioner in a way that means a great deal in the accomplishments thus far obtained in the administration of this new law.

While West Virginia loses about $700,000 a year in revenue from the saloons, within the next few years we expect to reduce our State expenses for the handling of criminal charges, and the maintenance of State asylums that will offset the loss from revenues paid for legalizing the saloon traffic.

We also feel that our standard of citizenship will be higher, and that generations to come in West Virginia will be better from a standard of strength, intelligence, education and other environments which mean so much to the success of a great and growing State, unlimited in natural wealth such as ours, and upon which depends our standard of citizenship as to what the future of our State and its achievements may be.

Our anticipations have been more than realized, and West Virginians expect to make their State the ideal prohibition State of the Union. Legitimate business enterprises has not suffered, but thousands of families have been made happier, and grocery bills, rentals and other necessary items of expenditure are being paid promptly by hundreds of men who formerly drank and gambled away their earnings, while wives and children were left by these husbands and fathers without subsistence.—Governor Hatfield.

THE MENACE OF DRINK

It is quite true that I have taken much more interest in the temperance question in the last ten years of my life than I did earlier, and this increase of interest has come from certain studies and opportunities for observation. These studies related to the terrible effects of alcoholism in increasing the number of the feeble-minded, insane and criminal in our American communities.

Later I had the opportunity of studying the German investigations on the mental effects of very limited doses of alcohol, doses which most people have always supposed to be completely innocuous. The German investigations seemed to me to prove that even twenty-four hours after taking a small dose of alcohol the time reaction in the human being is unfavorably affected.

Now the quickness of the time reaction is important to every mechanic; to every artisan, and particularly to every person who is engaged in a dangerous occupation, like driving a motor car, for instance, or managing a circular saw, or, indeed, in the tending of any powerful machine or hot furnace.

Lastly, somewhat more than a year ago I had a long opportunity of observing the difference between the white race and the Japanese, the Chinese, the Indian, the Malay and some of the Mohometan people in regard to susceptibility to the alcoholic temptation. The white race is inferior to all the other people I have named in regard to this susceptibility to the temptation of alcoholism. No observant person can travel through the East for a year without being shocked by the manifest tendency of the white race temporarily resident there to destroy itself through alcoholism.

Alcohol is destructive in the highest degree to the white race in the tropics, and all through the tropics the white race exhibits a terrible lack of self-control with regard to the use of alcoholic drinks. It is mortifying to the last degree for an American to see intoxicated American soldiers and sailors staggering about the streets of the Chinese cities where we now have troops, and never to see a Japanese soldier in such condition, although the Japanese have five times as many troops there as we have. I mention but a single fact; but the lesson of the East in that alcoholism of the white race must be overcome, or that vice, with the licentiousness it promotes, will overcome the race.—Charles W. Eliot.

READING FOR DECEMBER—CONDITIONS THAT AFFECT BODILY GROWTH

Fresh Air

TO CLEANSE THE BLOOD

Fresh air and the ability to take large portions of it into the system through well developed lungs are among the first essentials to healthy growth.

Doctor Mary Wood-Allen, in The Man Wonderful, writing for children about the marvels of our bodily dwelling, refers to the lungs as the laundry in which the blood is cleansed. This wonderful process is here very clearly described.

"We are constantly using up material, and one office of the blood is to gather up the little dead particles that result from all the activities of life. The blood also brings back to the tissues that which will replace what they have lost. The blood comes into the lungs dark and impure; it gives up its carbonic acid gas, and by taking up oxygen is changed from its dark color to a bright scarlet. . . . This giving out of one gas and taking up of the other is the washing process. . . . The blood runs through minute channels in the membrane of the air cells and the air fills the cells on the other side of the membrane. The carbonic acid gas slips through the membrane from the blood into the air, and the oxygen slips through the membrane from the air into the blood and the washing is done.

"Eighteen or twenty times a minute the air comes in bringing supplies of oxygen and goes out with the carbonic acid gas, and the more deeply we breathe, the more perfect will be the cleansing of the blood. Doctor J. H. Kellogg says that every time we breathe we spoil at least a half barrel of air, or six hundred barrels every hour. This gives us a very good idea of how needful it is to have some way of letting pure air into the rooms we inhabit. If every door and window is tightly closed and the fire and lights are burning, using up our oxygen as they must in order to burn, we can not wonder if we have a headache and feel stupid, for we are poisoned by breathing in the waste matter from our own lungs and we are not taking in oxygen to give us new material. Tracey says that a five-foot gas burner creates as much carbonic acid gas as five men."

A NEW THEORY

Experiments in recent years have modified the view so long held in regard to poisoning from carbonic acid gas, though it is still recognized that this gas must be thrown out of the system, and that confinement in stagnant air results in injury. These experiments seem to establish the importance of air currents to change the atmosphere which surrounds the body. The reason for this is briefly explained as follows:

The skin is an important factor in the elimination of waste matter from the body. It is also "the regulator of temperature; if we get too warm, all the little doors of the skin are opened and water is poured out on the surface to cool us off."

In a room that is warm and close, the air next the body soon becomes saturated and can not receive additional moisture. "It acts as a steam jacket, enveloping the body and causes languor and depression. The perspiration is not evaporated, . . . the pulse is accelerated, more blood is sent to the skin and less to the viscera and brain. The blood vessels of the skin dilate, the blood pressure is lowered, and extra work is thrown upon the heart. When the dead air is set in motion, the steam jacket is dissipated, the sweat evaporates, the circulation becomes more normal and we are refreshed.

"The free play of the air over the surface of the body is termed 'perflation.' Air currents and perceptible variations of temperature are the essence of good ventilation. . . . It is largely our prejudice against air currents and variable temperature which makes our indoor life so unhealthful."—Terman.

THE NEED OF VENTILATION

This is emphasized by instances in which death has resulted from the confinement of a large number of persons in a small space without ventilation. One such instance is here quoted.

"In 1848 about one hundred steerage passengers of an English ship were locked up in a room 18x11 feet, without ventilation. When, a few hours later, an exit was forced amid scenes of frenzy and violence, seventy-two were dead."

Professor Lewis M. Terman, in The Hygiene of The School Child, from which this is taken, says: "The immediate effects produced by ill ventilation are headache, drowsiness, lassitude, faintness, dizziness, nervousness, and in extreme cases even death. . . .

"The indirect and remote effects of chronic exposure to unsuitable air are not so well known because they are not so spectacular, but they are none the less real. Bad ventilation is a factor in the production of nearly all kinds of diseases which have their seat in the respiratory passages. . . . Imperfect aeration of the blood causes general debility. This means lowered resistance to fatigue, to disease, and probably also to temptation. Neither physical nor moral victories go to the anæmic.

"Red blood is at a premium everywhere. . . . It protects us from tuberculosis, pneumonia, influenza, and many other diseases, or enables us to win in the fight against them when they have secured a hold. Hardly a disease is known which may not be more or less favorably influenced by the open air treatment. . . .

"If we close all the windows to prevent drafts and install a system of heating which keeps the temperature of the air at exactly the same point, the walls of our surface blood vessels grow lax from disuse and forget how to act. Then when the draft is encountered, or when the room is cooled a little below the ordinary temperature, or when we go out of doors lightly clad, the body is too rapidly cooled. This is the way we train our children to catch cold. . . . As long as we are healthy, it is only the little draft, which cools but a small part of the body, that is injurious. . . . Even the sickly pupils of the open air school do not catch cold. . . . However, persons who have been weakened by hot-house culture have to take special precautions with clothing in making the transition to outdoor life.

"Indoor schools which have to depend on windows for their ventilation may be more healthful, in case the windows are frequently thrown open to admit a fresh supply of cool air, then those with the most improved system of artificial ventilation. . . . Frequent flushing through opened windows is a necessary adjunct to any system of ventilation."

THE NEED OF MOISTURE

The degree of moisture in ordinary outdoor air is usually far greater than that in the average home or school in weather when artificial heat must be employed.

"So great is the drying capacity of warm air at the degree of humidity found in the average school on a winter day that it voraciously licks up every available particle of moisture from the furniture . . . and from the skin and throats of the children. All the mucous membranes exposed to such air become parched and unhealthy. . . . Diseased conditions of the nose and throat result: catarrh becomes the rule; other diseases are more easily contracted.

"When the mucous membranes of the nose and throat are healthy, they produce a germicidal secretion which rids the incoming air of nearly all its bacteria. When changed in texture by air of deficient humidity, the membrane is no longer a 'bulwark against disease,' but a 'host for the culture of germs.' It turns traitor to the body by giving aid and comfort to its enemies."

"This drying process causes children to become irritable and nervous. Self-control and concentration are made more difficult.

"The experimental evidence seems to justify the conclusion that living in stuffy rooms is unhealthful mainly because of the excessively high temperature, unsuitable humidity, and motionless uniformity of inclosed air, combined with the habits of physical inactivity which usually go with this mode of life."—Terman.

Where stoves are used for heating, moisture may be added to the air by keeping water on the stove where it will rapidly evaporate.

THE GOOD OFFICES OF OXYGEN

"A large supply of oxygen stimulates metabolism (the interchange of matter in the cells), not only because the organism as a whole is enriched in the substance essential to this process (oxygen) but because the heart responds to the increased activity of the lungs by more energetic pulsations calculated to set the blood circulating in far greater quantities.

"The digestive system does nothing more than to prepare a blood that is unfitted to irrigate the tissues for the purpose of supplying them with nutriment; it is only after this blood has passed through the lungs that it is transformed into oxygenated blood and is adapted to assimilation. The intestines prepare the raw material; the lungs perfect it; while the heart drives it through its circuit into contact with all the tissues of the organism.

"Whoever has inadequate lungs is for that reason alone a person who necessarily receives insufficient nutriment and frequently is also a melancholiac. Melancholia accompanies every form of physiological decadence. On the contrary, persons with ample lungs are generally serene of spirit and joyous. In fact, the emotion of joy is at the same time both the cause and the consequence of an active circulation of oxygenated blood. . . .

"Certain experiments conducted with birds have proved that if free oxygen is introduced under an air-bell in which the birds have been inclosed, they gradually become more and more excited, singing and fluttering as if possessed by a frenzy of joyousness. It is a fact that we often rid ourselves of a fit of melancholy by taking a walk in the open air. Persons possessed of good lungs feel within themselves a vital potentiality that aids them to make what we call an 'effort of will;' when sorrow befalls them, or over-exertion has exhausted their strength, persons of this type feel some force spring up within them that seems to give them fresh hope and courage. It is their oxygenated blood which neither weariness nor depression of spirit can stay in its luxuriant course. The man of weak lungs, on the contrary, is mentally depressed because his physiological life has slowed down; and instead of aiding him, it is his physiological life which demands of him a genuine effort of will to reestablish its equilibrium.

"Accordingly, those persons who have a well-developed chest are certainly the healthiest and happiest."—Maria Montessori, M. D., in Pedagogical Anthropology.

DANGER IN UNUSED LUNG TISSUE

One authority tells us there is seldom a person whose lungs are not large enough if he will use what he has. The danger lies in unused lung tissue. Breathing the free outdoor air gives the best results, but we need to breathe deeply wherever we are. To keep the lungs in health the air cells must be dilated; the muscles used in healthful, natural breathing need exercise; all the tissues are starved for lack of oxygen if we do not take in enough air. The restrictions of women's clothing often prevent natural breathing, and even the clothing of growing children is sometimes allowed to bind in a way to interfere with this process. Especial care should be given to guard against this.

THE NEED OF BATHING

Closely related to the need of fresh air is the need of frequent bathing. The skin needs to work in harmony with the lungs to free the body from impurities, and the skin can not be kept in healthy condition without bathing. And further, in a room where many persons are assembled, as with children in school, unbathed persons make the air unclean for the breathing of themselves and others.

Professor Terman says, "Air is food as truly as meat or bread"; and he tells us that while we are very careful that the food we partake of at the table shall be clean, we are very careless as to the cleanliness of the food we receive through our lungs.

Fresh air is essential to health; to maintain the purity of the air we breathe, attention must be given to cleanliness of person and of surroundings and to proper ventilation; to receive the benefits of fresh air "we must breathe with the whole body, not with the upper one seventh of our lungs."

Prayer Union

SUBJECTS FOR THE THIRD THURSDAY IN NOVEMBER

Prayers for our missions and our missionaries in all places, especially remembering the dangerous and trying mission at Jerusalem and those who have been sent there, that God may protect and prosper their work and that they may be successful in winning many souls to Christ and his truth.

Remember the Lamanites and the islands of the sea. Also pray for the Saints and missionaries in the war-torn countries of Europe.

Lesson, Ezekiel 34: 11-16.

Memory verse, Revelation 22: 14.

REQUEST FOR PRAYERS

Mrs. H. C. Pitsenberger, of Council Grove, Kansas, sends in a request for the prayers of the Saints in behalf of her husband who is suffering from an affliction which prevents his doing his work and gives him so much distress as to prevent his getting rest from pain. This family is isolated from the society of Saints; the wife is a consistent member of the church, and her husband, though not yet numbered with us, gives to his companion his fullest support and the free enjoyment of her faith.

Sister Lue Sinclair, of Coldwater, Michigan, sends in her request for our prayers, that she may be relieved of an affliction that greatly annoys her and disturbs her peace. She is a sister of Elder Columbus Scott. May she be sustained in the prayers of God's people.

Letter Department

HONOLULU, HAWAII TERRITORY, September 16, 1914.

Editors Herald: As we have been requested many times during the last few months, especially by the friends we knew last year in New England, to give account of ourselves through the HERALD, I will record a few of our wanderings and adventures since we decided, or rather had it decided for us, not to return to Providence, Rhode Island. There were many things to hold our hearts in that city, not the least of which were the Saints we had learned to love there, and the place we called home. When we were leaving for this Eastern mission a friend of Brother Davis's wrote, saying, "May Providence be kind to you"; knowing where we were going, he said it with double meaning. If ever a wish was more than fulfilled, it was that one. If we had cherished longings for a "home" when we went to that city, and we had done so, we had not even dreamed of having things as nice as we had them there. So often as we thought of it we said: "It just seems too good to last!" Well, it didn't last, and the night after Conference closed, as we were leaving the comfortable home of a young couple in Independence, past the houses of others we knew, who had been privileged to build up homes of their own, never did the home lights as they shone out in the darkness seem to be so beautiful and mean so much, and we suddenly felt like outcasts, indeed, and it seemed such a very big sacrifice. As we walked along talking of the many little things that had endeared our Providence home to us, we met Brother Butterworth, and stopped to speak to him. I am sure he did not know our thoughts when he began to tell us of the mission home in Honolulu; and as he gave us a graphic description of the home that was to be ours here, we felt better, although I am sure that first home of ours will always seem very fair to our memory. The Saints of Honolulu certainly have a royal way of making a missionary feel at home, by establishing this real "home" for him.

From Independence I went to my father's home in Lamoni, while Brother Davis went back to Providence to break up the home that we had left just ready to step back into. It seems to me that if I were to go back to Providence I could go to those rooms and find them just as they used to be; but to Brother Davis fell the hard task of tearing them up, and just how hard a task that is no one knows until they form a perhaps foolish attachment for a house that they have lived in.

I joined him in Michigan in May, and he was busy for six weeks helping to remodel his mother's house on the old home place near Ubyly, Michigan. I enjoyed the visit with home folks, especially with my husband's mother, whom I honor as one of the truest Latter Day Saints I have ever met. Her love for this work has been such that she uncomplainingly gave all she had for it, first her husband, and then her son, while she labored on upon the lonely farm. There she worked harder than she should have done, raised nine of her ten children to manhood and womanhood, getting joy and comfort during the lonely hours of her life through the gospel promises. Although she and the many other women who make like sacrifices may never gain great prominence in the church, yet, to us who know them, their great faith and many sacrifices are a perpetual inspiration.

In June we started for my home in Lamoni, stopping at Detroit to visit and say good-by to my husband's sisters. Upon leaving this city, Brother Davis made a discovery of a sort not very encouraging to a missionary,—his pocketbook with all its contents was missing. He immediately telegraphed back, but it was never recovered. All the money we had, forty dollars, was in this pocketbook, and, as we had tickets only to Chicago, we had to borrow money to get to our destination. It happened that this was a time we could ill afford to lose so much money, but we tried to feel as optimistic as possible.

The special reason for my being home at this time was the marriage of my sister Earlita to Mr. Evan E. Inslee, of Seattle, Washington. The wedding took place the day after our arrival, on June, and we found ourselves alone with father and mother. We had intended leaving right away for the coast, and thence to this place, but as father and mother [Brother and Sister Heman C. Smith.—EDITORS.] were planning to leave in a short time for an eastern trip, we decided to wait and go when they did.

No one who has not experienced the same feeling can realize how strange and silent this childhood home of mine seemed. The night before I left, I went upstairs alone. There were the three rooms that had been "the children's," now deserted; the furniture was all there, but the gay school and college pennants and trophies, and all the little intimate possessions that told of happy schooldays were gone, and would never come again. A little over three years before we had all been there; but we would never all be there again. For us there will never come a glad reunion in this world, but in the hope that this brief span of days is not all of life, we

"Stretch our hands in darkness and call our loved ones o'er and o'er,

Some day their arms shall close about us, and the old voices speak once more."

By July 2, the last good-bys were spoken, and together with my father and mother we took the train for Chariton, Iowa. Father and mother took the train for Chicago, while we took the Omaha train, a few hours later.

Some few years ago I had taught a term of school in the beautiful hills of western Iowa, near Pisgah. I wanted to go back before I left for so long a time and visit my friends there, especially Brother and Sister John Lane, with whom I had found a home indeed when I came there,—a homesick and lonesome little schoolma'am, four years ago. It was but a short distance to Pisgah from Council Bluffs, so we went. We arrived at noon the day before the Fourth, to find all at this "other home" of mine well and happy. The little lad who was born during my stay with them, and whom I had taught to expect and demand special notice just after four o'clock every afternoon, was a big boy of nearly four, and the little girlie, my own namesake whom I had never seen, was not far from two years old; so we had to get acquainted all over again.

The next day we attended a real old-time Fourth of July celebration, and enjoyed it all,—even (if I must confess it) the merry-go-round, on which the four of us, Brother and Sister Lane, Brother Davis and myself, chaperoned the three children.

Brother Davis preached four sermons during the time we were in Pisgah. We had not intended to stay longer than a day or two, but my father's cousin, Heman Crandall, who lived near Pisgah, died early on the morning of the day we intended to start, so we stayed to attend the funeral. We had been out to the farm where he lived the day before, and found him, as he thought, much improved, and talking confidently of the future. Although our personal acquaintance with him has been very brief, yet he was bound to us by the ties of nature, and we felt to mourn with his family. He left a wife and two small children.

From Pisgah, we went to Council Bluffs, testifying to the kindness and generosity of the Pisgah Saints. When we went there, we feared we could not afford the pleasure of that visit, but we found ourselves better off financially than when we went there, on account of the generous way the Saints there have of wishing the missionaries "Godspeed." Brother Robertson, my husband's missionary pal, met us in Council Bluffs, and took us to his staying place, which happened to be the home of Brother and Sister Paul Wight, with whom I claimed relationship. Here we attended the Sunday school picnic, and enjoyed ourselves greatly.

Upon July 10 we took the train from Omaha to Denver. Here we hunted up Brother Barrett, who had recently returned from Honolulu, and spent the day with him and his wife, talking over conditions in Hawaii. That evening we went on to Colorado Springs, where I expected to meet a friend of Graceland days, "Betty" Hoffman. She was there to meet us, also Brother Frank Russell. We spent four days there and found Brother and Sister Russell ideal hosts, and learned to love their interesting family. Even as I write this, I stopped to read in a letter from Brother Clark the sorrow that has come to that happy household in the last few weeks. That letter surely brought sorrow to us. It seems only such a short time ago that we left that home so bright and happy. We had only intended to stay in Colorado Springs over Sunday, but the mountain picnics planned by Brother and Sister Russell were so alluring that we did not go on our way until Thursday, July 16. While in Colorado Springs we heard the famous evangelist "Billy" Sunday, who was just closing his series of meetings there. This experience was a disappointment to me, as I expected to see a much more powerful and talented speaker than he seemed to be.

My visit to Salt Lake City was also a great disappointment to me. I had heard of its great beauty, but saw very little to admire. I hope it was not on account of prejudice against its founders. I had heard and pictured in my imagination the mountain streams that ran along the streets and kept the city pure and clean, and was surprised not to find them, as I had pictured. We went out to see Great Salt Lake, on a lumbering old steam train,—any other city would have had an electric line, long ago; this railroad is owned by the church, and the tourist has not only to contend with coal dust and cinders from the engine, but the sewage from the whole city is carried out there, and the odor upon approaching the lake is terrible. It seems peculiar that a place which is visited by so many tourists would be left in such a disgraceful condition. Out over the lake is a shabby pleasure resort and dancing pavilion, also owned by the Utah Church. We saw the Temple (as much as we could see above the wall), the Tabernacle, and the big Utah Hotel, the Lion House and the Beehive, and were glad to get away. We saw there Brother Burton McKim, whom we found at the home of Sister Winkworth, a good, old-time Saint.

On Sunday, July 19, Brother and Sister David Strasbaugh took us to Ogden in their car. On this trip we saw the prettiest part of Utah that we were privileged to see while there. We passed through pretty little villages and by really fine farms. But when we had admired all we could, we felt there was no comparison between these places, reclaimed from the desert as they were, and our rich fertile farms of Iowa, Missouri, Nebraska, Kansas and other States of our Middle West.

We took the train at Ogden, and went straight to Portland, where we found friends of Brother Davis's, Brethren L. B. Shippy and P. G. Hager and families, and also Lamoni friends, Brother and Sister Mark N. Smith. We took a short trip south to Albany and Mill City, Oregon, to visit my husband's brother and other relatives. While at this latter place I had an experience new to me. I went through a large sawmill. I also went up on a log train to where they were cutting logs, and after walking from one camp to another, climbing over and walking along the largest logs I ever saw, went back to Mill City in the locomotive of a loaded logging train, about as tired and stiff as I ever was in my life. I will never forget, however, what I saw of the process of converting these giant pines into lumber.

We went back to Portland on the 25th, as we expected to see Brother Sheehy the next day at the reunion at Estacada. As he was in charge of the Hawaiian Mission, Brother Davis wanted to see him and talk over the work there with him. We met him as we expected, and many of the Oregon Saints.

From Portland we went on to Seattle, Washington, where I had the pleasure of a week's visit with my Brother Hale and his wife and boy, and my sister Earlita and her husband. We left Seattle August 4, in order to take the Niagara from Vancouver, British Columbia, at noon the 5th. The evening before our departure from Seattle and the "States," a gathering of the Seattle Saints met at Brother Johnson's and made us feel that it was good to be Latter Day Saints. That little band of loyal Saints did much to help us both temporally and spiritually, and it was an occasion we will not soon forget.

The next morning we left Seattle, waving good-by to the loved ones at the wharf, so long as we could see them through the Seattle fog. We changed boats at Victoria, and had time enough there to walk up the street and see a little of the capital city of British Columbia. The sun was shining brightly; such a contrast to the week of fog we had just experienced in Seattle. We went on to Vancouver in an hour or two, arriving in that city about 7 p. m., and as we boarded a street car to go out to Brother McMillan's newsboys were just out with their extras, announcing that Great Britain had declared war on Germany, at this same hour, 7 o'clock. It was also announced in this paper that the Niagara would not sail, as the port of Vancouver would be closed. Well, we spent the night at Brother Isaac McMillan's, where we met Brother R. D. Davis and Brother Budd, who are doing missionary work in that city, and in the morning, upon telephoning the steamboat office, we were told to be on board the boat at midnight of the 5th, and we were, although the various extras during the day insisted that the Niagara would not leave Vancouver.

We went aboard, found our cabins, and slept soundly without symptoms of seasickness, and arose in the morning to find ourselves still at the dock in Vancouver. We were told to stay on board, that the boat might sail any moment; and we did so until late in the afternoon, when the boat was posted to leave the dock at six. We had a little more than an hour to run up to Brother McMillan's and back, and took the chance, and, accompanied by Brother and Sister R. D. Davis, arrived at the wharf just a few moments before the time the Niagara was posted to sail. The big boat left the wharf just at sunset, while the newspapers were still announcing that she would not sail. We waved to Brother and Sister Davis, until a rainstorm drove them from the wharf, then went below, to begin what was to me my first ocean voyage.

When booking our passage we had been unable to secure a two-berth cabin, and had to take berths in adjoining cabins; but for some cause or other I found myself to be the only occupant of a large, four-berth cabin! By agreement of the steward, our baggage was transferred to this cabin, and we found ourselves in much more comfortable quarters than if we had obtained the two-berth cabin we had desired. I was quite sick for the first two days out, and spent the time in my berth. I tried to eat everything that I had heard was good for seasick people to eat, and finally tried a plan of my own and ate nothing, and it was not long until I was better and up on deck. However, I am not too good a sailor, and would say to those who have never had the pleasure of an ocean voyage that seasickness is no joking matter. There are three distinct motions to the boat. If one can imagine a giant "teeter-totter" going three ways at once, perhaps he can realize something of the sensation, although I believe experience is the only way to actually learn the pleasures and otherwise of being seasick.

The Niagara is the biggest boat on this line, and would be something of a prize to a wandering German cruiser; we therefore sailed some two hundred miles out of the course, sailing at night without lights,—even a head light,—and sending no messages, although war news was picked up every day by the ship's wireless apparatus, and posted for the benefit of the passengers. We arrived in Honolulu on the morning of August 13. As, of course, nothing had been heard of the Niagara since she left Vancouver, some of the Saints in Honolulu were a little worried about as, especially as a German cruiser had been lurking about the Honolulu harbor. However, when the boat appeared off Honolulu harbor, her arrival was soon known to those who were appointed to meet us, and we found Brother Waller, Brother Jones, Sister Kanui, Sister Thompson, and Mrs. Mesik there to meet us as we stepped on the wharf.

We went out to the mission house and met Sister Jones, and partook of our first Hawaiian dinner, prepared by Sisters Kanui and Thompson. We had poi and fish, the fish, some of it being baked in tea leaves, a way of cooking fish of which I have grown quite fond. I have not yet got to be much of a poi eater, but hope I shall learn to like it, as most Americans do sooner or later.

My experiences in Honolulu would make another chapter to this already lengthy letter, so I will not speak of these now, but leave them until some future days. Since starting this letter we have moved from Honolulu to Hilo, and brother Davis is going to try to start the work here, as Brother Waller, with the local help he has, can ably manage the work in Honolulu, where practically all the Saints now reside. The work should be brought to these other islands, but the cost of living is very, very high here, and it is difficult to maintain oneself on a missionary's meager allowance.

While in Honolulu, we were constantly made to admire the work that has been done in that city by Brother Waller, under circumstances at times so discouraging that almost any man would have given up; but he has stood by the church with his time, his money, and his influence, until he has built up, with the help of the loyal church workers, a really fine little branch of the church in Honolulu. It is not saying too much to say that Brother Waller has made the name of the church honorable in that city, and we hope that whoever has the difficult task of following him as pastor of that branch will be able to maintain the dignity of the church as he has done there. He has planned for some time to leave Honolulu for the coast, but has not done so, so the branch is still profiting from his labors, the value of which to this branch we believe can scarcely be overestimated. All of his time outside of business hours is spent in church work, calling upon the Saints, and taking part in all the activities of the branch work, until we wonder if Brother Waller never gets tired. Certainly we know he never gets too tired to answer any call to serve the branch or its members. There is one passage of Scripture which will always remind me of Brother Waller, and that is, "He who would be greatest among you, let him be the servant of all."

While Brethren McConley and Barret were here they visited this island (Hawaii), and among other things organized a Sunday school here in Hilo. The people who have attended this Sunday school have been anxious to have some one come over and continue the work here. We left Honolulu a few days ago, and arrived in Hilo the following day. Found the few members of the Sunday school very glad to see us, and to welcome our aid. We will remain here as long as we are financially able to do so, which from present prospects does not appear to be long. Unless we get some help from some source or other before long, we will be "up against it"; but we are still trusting in the Good Friend who has helped so often before. If the Lord has a people in this place we think the way will be opened for us to make our home here for awhile. We are praying to that end.

With best regards to all the Saints, I remain

Your sister in the faith,

INEZ SMITH DAVIS.

Palestine

Things grew interesting here almost as soon as war was declared. The moratorium closed every bank in the country; you could not draw any money above ten per cent, neither would they cash checks, bank drafts, or money orders. Thousands were without funds and great distress prevailed everywhere. It was pitiful to see the crowds surrounding the banks and post offices begging for their money. They would wring their hands and cry, "What shall we do?"

It so happened that we had some of the funds sent us by the Sunday school and Religio conventions, and a little of the Bishop's funds in the bank, but it was not available. The little we could draw was expended for provisions, and we have managed to get along to the present time, but the future is not bright. A draft for one hundred dollars sent by the Bishop in July reached me in September, but thus far the money is not available, and there is no prospect of being able to cash it, till the war is over.

Our faith is being tried to the limit, and each week's experience adds to the burden; and this in spite of the promises that have been made that we shall be cared for. America seems far away, and at times it seems we are forgotten, for the difficulties must be known to the people who control the finances of the church. We hope they have not adopted the policy of "watchful waiting," for our needs are urgent, and becoming more so each passing day.

At first we were told that American greenbacks could be used here; then came the news that they were discounted twenty-five per cent. We did not have any, so lost nothing. Then provisions began to go up, and up, and are still climbing. Then Turkey began to collect an immense army, that at present numbers over two million men, and they are forcing men to come daily. The American papers say only two hundred thousand have been raised, but that is a mistake. They forcibly take everything they need.

The latest firman is that they must raise fifty thousand Turkish leras; five million measures of grain, and many other things, in this district. As they have been robbing the people for months now, I do not see how so much can be collected. One of the officers who was collecting from the village of Beer Zate said: "You can take a carpet from the floor and beat it, and get a lot of dust; if you take it out again, you get a little more dust; and as often as you beat it you will always find a little more dust; so it is in these villages." Yet the men bowed their heads and wept and said, "We have not enough for our families to live on through the winter."

One of the significant things is that the army is being trained by German officers, and is becoming a formidable force to be thrown into the conflict now devastating Europe. We have expected a declaration of war daily for weeks, and all the signs point to its being very near.

There is much fear in the city among the Christians, of a Mohammedan uprising, who at the beginning of the war they were heard saying, "Now is our chance to drive the hated Christians out." This culminated last week in an effort to celebrate the taking of Jerusalem from the crusaders by Saladin. In one part of the city they were busy for days sharpening swords and knives, and expected to have their thirst for blood satisfied last Friday, October 2. Hundreds of Europeans left the city, in fact nearly everyone, who had the price, started for more congenial climes. The English consul sent all their subjects out, save one man and the consular attachées. When we knew the American missions were sending their women out, we felt it would be wisdom to do the same, but did not have the price to get them to Jaffa, much less to England, or America. The natives were informed that if they heard the ringing of the great bell of the Franciscan monastery they were to assemble there as quickly as possible. It is reported they have arms of all kinds and vast quantities of provisions and can stand a long siege.

The oldest men here never saw anything like it, and hope they will never have to repeat the experience. We keep closely in touch with the consul, and felt relieved when he informed us that four British and one American battleship had arrived at Jaffa, and would remain there, or in this vicinity, for a time. We also learned they could throw a large army into Palestine, from Egypt, in less than twenty-four hours. Turkey evidently can not read the handwriting on the wall, which means the loss of much territory, if not the destruction of the Government.

The first of October the Government closed all the post offices in the city and removed the protection of the consular courts. This will produce a bad mixup in mail matters, and cause no end of trouble. Then they had refused to recognize the French napoleon as the money standard, and insist that we must use Turkish money. A franc is worth only fifteen metalliks to-day, and may be worthless to-morrow.

One does not enjoy seeing what little money he has shrink in value, with commodities soaring like a balloon while he knows it is practically impossible for money to reach him, only as deposited with the United States treasury, to be cabled to the American minister in Constantinople, who cables it to the consul here, who can draw it, less ten or twenty per cent. Thus far the payments have been in French gold, which is shrinking in value daily. It is not a pleasant picture to contemplate.

The other day a large contingent of troops started for the Egyptian frontier, by way of Hebron, but were ordered back when about fifteen miles out of the city. The day was intensely hot; they were in heavy marching order, and began to fall out by the way. As they straggled back to camp and passed our place they were pitifully begging for water. Four died, and twenty-six were placed in the hospital, and the little two-wheeled, red crescent wagon was busy nearly all night bringing in the men.

There is a large army stationed along the Turkish-Egyptian frontier, and two large camps near the city; one on the plain of Rephaim, the other near Lifta. Every day men are coming in to enter the army. It may mean neutrality, but the indications are that it means war, as soon as they are ready. They have stopped all the Arabic papers in the city, and will not allow any reference to the army, or the war, in any paper. We go hunting news daily and find telegrams from the French and German consuls that contradict each other; but thus far the French have given us those that have been confirmed when our papers arrive from America.

Many people are asking for assistance who never did such a thing before, and much suffering prevails. Some of us tried to organize a relief committee that would provide for all the needy, but the Jews preferred to make their appeal separately, and their different sects are asking for American cash; but it is being used strictly along sectarian lines, and no people on earth are more fanatical than the Jews of this city. The result is that many deserving people are suffering, and no relief is in sight. Catch a Jew giving alms to a suffering Mohammedan or Christian? They will see them die first. Jerusalem is a long way from exhibiting the spirit of the golden rule.

During the past two weeks we have had five cases of malarial fever among our people at the mission house. This gave us great concern for a time, but all are well but Sister Jenkins, who seems to be having a serious time of it.

We have closed the school for three weeks, or until after the Jewish feasts. Thanks to the assistance sent us last spring, we have fitted up three rooms for school purposes, and still have need to branch out. A serious handicap is our inability to speak Hebrew. We have tried for over a year to secure the assistance of a brother who could render the help we need, but funds are not available. It is too bad, for religious instruction can not be given till we can talk with them.

We are so poorly equipped to do what we want to do that it is discouraging, and the Saints do not realize conditions, but expect us to obtain results. If there was the spirit of sacrifice and cooperation on the part of those well able to help, the work of the missionary would be more successful than it has been, and the men would feel more like sticking. We criticise some of the boys who have returned home and call them quitters; but if some others could pass through their experiences they would quit, too, and be in a great hurry about it. It certainly is discouraging and takes all the grit a fellow has not to join the quitters.

I am sorry that it is not possible to follow the good opening in the Lebanon, but it requires a little cash to live there as well as elsewhere.

We are informed that all European nations will boycott Turkey and not carry mail on any of their ships. That may shut us out entirely from communication with America; and if war is declared we are fixed for an indefinite stay, no matter what conditions develop. We feel a little envious when we learn of other missions receiving funds for any emergency, and getting their women away to places of safety, while we are wondering where bread will come from.

It is hard to sing,

"O for a faith that will not shrink,
Though pressed by every foe,
That will not tremble on the brink
Of any earthly woe,

"A faith that shines more bright and clear
When tempests rage without;
That when in danger knows no fear,
In darkness feels no doubt."

Lord, give us such a faith as this, we all pray, and are holding on.

We are in need of your prayers amidst the trials of the present, but we feel also to say, Lord send us means that we may live, and do the work asked at our hands or a ticket to return home.

FLOYD HOUSE, JERUSALEM.

U. W. GREENE.

[EDITOR'S NOTE.—We are assured from the Bishop's office that every effort has been made to reach Brother Greene with funds. The aid of the Department of State was solicited some time ago, and money was cabled. We hope it has reached Brother Greene ere this.]

Western Maine

After enjoying a week with the Saints and loved ones at the Onset reunion, I returned to my field, going to Stonington, where I stayed a few days. Then on to Castine, where I had previously arranged to hold some meetings, it being a new opening. We have a family of Saints there, Brother and Sister Clark, who are anxious to have their townspeople hear the message of life. They opened their house, and we had some very good meetings. The attendance was not very large, yet some were interested, and we feel that the effort was not all lost.

Castine is a very pretty little place, and has its historical value, having been the scene of many a bloody conflict between the Indians and the settlers, as well as the scene of conflict between the English and the American soldiers in the struggle for national freedom. We visited old Fort George, where the American soldiers were successful in defeating the English. We thought of what it has cost to obtain and maintain freedom. I enjoyed my stay there, and hope to have the privilege of returning.

From Castine we went to Little Deer Isle to attend convention and conference. We had arranged to get the forces of the Sunday school together so as to have the district fully organized for work as an association. We met at one o'clock August 29. The attendance was small, owing to a heavy rain that fell that day. The interest was not as small as the attendance; all seemed to be anxious to see the Sunday school work built up. It has been at a very low ebb and needed a new start. We were successful in getting the forces organized for work, and we are hopeful for the future of the Sunday school work in Western Maine. Our conference might easily be termed a success. Quite a number of the Saints braved the elements and were in attendance at the evening meeting on Saturday, many more coming on Sunday and filling the little church.

Our next stop was at Sargentsville, where we were successful in organizing a Religio local, with about fifteen members. We preached a few times and then said good-by, going to North Penobscott, where we had arranged to open up the work. We were successful in securing the Grange hall after an attempt to get the Methodist church which was closed, there being no minister there.

We arrived on Saturday and were not able until evening to see the one who had charge of the hall. Well, we had to advertise, with only a short time in which to do it, and were at a loss as to the best way to do it, when they informed us that there was to be a dance in the hall that night, so I asked the one in charge of the dance if he would announce it for me, and he said he would, so our advertising did not cost much. We used the best means at hand.

Our success there can not be measured as yet. We had good audiences and a fair interest, many wanting us to stay with them all winter; but we could not do that, as we had other work mapped out. Brother John Sheehy was with me for a week and we had the privilege of baptizing the three boys and one girl of Sister Hutchins of that place. John is a good congenial fellow to be with, and I was loath to part company with him, but the missionary in charge had directed him to go to the other district, so he had to leave.

Our next stop was West Surry, where we have a small branch located. We held some very successful meetings in the schoolhouse there, and we think some little good might have been done. The few Saints there are trying to keep the camp fire burning, and are to be commended for their effort. Our next stop was Morgans Bay, where we held a few meetings and had good interest, being forced to leave there to see about some matters in other parts of the district.

I see many opportunities in this part of the field. It is not a question of getting places to preach, it is a question of where we will get men to fill the places. The missionary force in these parts is not large enough.

My next stopping place was with the Mountainville Branch, where we did some preaching and tried to regulate some matters. The Saints there are not in as spiritual a condition as we would like to see them. Yet we are hopeful of seeing them roused up. Leaving there I went to Stonington, holding meetings over one Sunday, but owing to many having to work in the sardine factory in the evenings the meetings were not very well attended during the week.

On the 23d instant, we had the opportunity of taking a trip to Jonesport to attend the conference of the Eastern District. Brother Moody Eaton made the trip in his new gasoline boat. We had in the party Brother and Sister Eaton, Brother Sheehy, and the writer. We had a very nice trip, making it in about eight hours. We were pleased to be able to meet with the Saints there, not being acquainted in that part, we were glad to get acquainted. The conference was well attended, and was enjoyed by the writer, and I think by all present. We had the pleasure of meeting with Brother Hanson and others of the missionary force. The Saints of Jonesport have a very fine church building, not all finished. They have the basement finished and expect to finish the other part of the building this winter. Brother Ebeling has lots to do in that part of the field.

On Monday morning we set out on the return trip, but it was not so pleasant as it was going. The waters were troubled for some cause, and our little boat tossed about some. We had with us on the return trip Brother M. C. Fisher, who may have been the Jonah. However, we arrived at Stonington with nothing more than a wetting down by the spray. Brethren Fisher and Sheehy, not caring to risk seasickness by sitting in the small cabin, stayed out and took the water. I think Brother Fisher would have to invest in a new pair of shoes. Not being afraid of sea-sickness, I stayed inside, so did not get wet as the others.

Having appointments at this place, Vinal Haven, I started next morning in a snowstorm, and came here and began work. We have a few Saints on this island, among them two priests who are doing what they can to get the gospel before the people, holding six meetings a week. The island is about thirteen miles long, and yet you can not get more than a mile from salt water.

The way looks bright, and I am enjoying my mission very much, and am hopeful of final success.

Yours in bonds,
WILLIAM ANDERSON.

New York

At Buffalo, October 24 and 25, I attended the best conference I have been privileged to participate in in this district, having attended two previous conferences here. This conference was educational in character. Between September 13 and October 24, I visited East Pharsalia, Sherrill, Fulton, Rochester, Oakfield, and Niagara Falls, New York.

At East Pharsalia I found a small band of Saints with a comfortable little church building, where Brother F. H. Rathburn is shepherding the flock. We were well received, and while the attendance from those not of the fold was not large, the Saints came out, and from three to five outsiders were present at each of the services. The Master gave us his Spirit to assist in our work. The Saints made it pleasant for us in many ways.

From East Pharsalia we went to Sherrill and Oneida, three miles apart, spending the fourth Sunday of September with the Saints of the two places, who met at Sherrill at the home of Brother and Sister F. C. Mesle. These removed from Niagara Falls, New York, last June, coming to Sherrill with the Oneida Community silver plating establishment, removed from that place to Sherrill. The families besides that of Brother F. C. Mesle, already mentioned, are those of Brethren Fred Mesle and J. O. Montgomery. F. C. Mesle was president, and Fred Mesle and Brother Montgomery were deacons in the Niagara Falls Branch, so they are quite fully equipped for the work in their new location. The service with them was spiritual, and all seemed to enjoy the occasion.

Elder Mesle has been making friends for the work. This does not say that the others have not been doing the same, but Brother Mesle has had and improved the opportunity of preaching in one of the churches of Sherrill a few times, and has been well received in his efforts. I look for these, who, like the Saints of olden times have been preaching the gospel, to open an effective door in their locality.

Our next move was to Fulton and South Granby, a part of the Fulton Branch. Brother A. E. Stone was laboring in South Granby, so we walked out, a distance of about seven miles, and met with him one evening. We returned to Fulton, where we held cottage meetings at the home of Brother and Sister Ed. Loveland. We preached three times here, closing our meetings October 5. The evening of the 3d we held no service in Fulton, walking out to South Granby, where we participated in a meeting with Brother Stone, and the next day were present at the Sunday school, prayer and sacrament, and business meetings, the latter for the reorganization of the branch, remaining to hear Brother Stone preach in the evening, after which we walked back to Fulton with Brother Loveland. Tuesday morning we expected to go to Rochester, but an unexpected demand for baptism held us over another day, and about 4.30 p. m. we baptized three in the waters of Lake Neahtawanta.

From the 7th to the 13th inclusive, we were in Rochester, holding four cottage meetings at the home of Brother and Sister A. H. Dammon. We enjoyed here a reasonable degree of spiritual blessing.

From Rochester we went to Oak Field on the 14th, where we found Brother F. W. Jacobs and family, and where I attended to the ordinance of blessing a fine baby boy for them.

The 15th found me once more at Niagara Falls, and from this time until the 24th I divided my time between this place and Buffalo, preaching in the Falls the night of the 15th. I found Brethren Stone and Angus at this place, where Brother Angus had been helping the work as only a patriarch can.

At present I am on my way to Maryland, as per instructions from Brother Paul M. Hanson. Elk Mills is my objective point, and I am going via Philadelphia. I held a cottage meeting here last night at the home of Brother E. Loveland, and have services billed for Sunday and Monday nights as well. I expect to go to East Pharsalia as I go south, and will reach Philadelphia November 15.

We can not report any great things accomplished in the district worth mentioning; but we have tried and been tried, and he who knows the former will experience the latter.

Until further notice our address will be Lamoni, Iowa.

Sincerely yours,
A. M. CHASE.

News from Branches

Second Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

Until recently the work at the Beacon Light Chapel was conducted as a part of the First Philadelphia Branch. But on September 30 Brother Paul M. Hanson organized the Saints at the chapel into a branch, the membership at the beginning being fifty. The official name of the branch is the Second Philadelphia Branch.

The following services are conducted: Two preaching services, Wednesday evening prayer service, Sunday school, young people's meeting. Industrial classes are conducted on Tuesday evenings for boys and girls between the ages of ten and fifteen. Besides this, we try to carry on classes in elementary and high school subjects.

A singular feature about the work here is the large attendance of boys and girls, children of parents who are non-members; practically all of the attendants at the young people's meeting and the industrial classes are children of this class. The attendance at both these services is usually about one hundred and fifteen.

Seven members were added by baptism this year. This does not seem like a very healthy increase; but those who know the field here must appreciate the fact that until the working nucleus becomes large enough to be an attraction in itself, the increase will be slow as compared to some other places. Our hope is in shepherding the young people until they shall become material for membership and service in the church. And we have some very energetic workers who seem determined to make the branch work here a success.

Independence, Missouri

The attendance at Religio on October 16 was two hundred and forty-five. At 4.15, October 18, the Child Welfare Department held an instructive session in the church. On this latter date a vast concourse of people heard a lecture on "Citizen building," by Judge E. E. Porterfield, of the Juvenile Court, and one of the large-hearted promoters of the Boys'

Home, situated in the suburbs of this city. A rising vote of thanks was extended the speaker. The judge presented in detail the working features of the Jackson County Humanitarian Institute, carried on in behalf of its delinquent youth, and with high courage spoke a cheering word in praise of the work's prerogative to be helpful to the mother in caring for her wandering boy, and of the parent-teachers' work.

While some of the Saints have been interested in attending political meetings in the town, others, especially the sisters, have been busy attending to duty at the Study Club, the various home department classes, at the aid society meetings, etc.

Elder O. R. Miller has for several evenings been interesting the older Saints of the branch with a series of lectures of an ethical and religious nature. The choir and orchestra have given excellent service, and much good has been derived by those who attend. Our brother presents much food for thought, and in a very pleasing and instructive manner. A few of the subjects taken up have been, "Jesus, divine or human, which?" "The rejection of Jesus to-day," "The cause of infidelity," "The sowing and reaping," "The mission of Joseph Smith," "Things are not what they seem," and "The spiritual gifts."

Religio postponed its weekly meetings for two weeks, giving opportunity for the young to attend the night lectures. Some of them are interested, other features claiming a few. The Sunday school has lately held its own, the attendance having been normal, the historians of all departments being kept busy.

Saint Louis, Missouri

Three precious souls were confirmed at our last sacrament meeting, one a little girl, baptized by our pastor, Brother T. J. Elliott, the others a father and daughter, baptized by Brother Ward L. Christy. This meeting was soul-inspiring and uplifting. We had a goodly attendance, and all seemed strengthened and encouraged. Brother S. A. Burgess, who was welcomed home by his many friends, was the speaker in the evening.

We feel that there is renewed interest in the work, which will be encouraging to our untiring branch officers. Brother Christy has been with us several Sunday mornings, and has delivered some very inspiring discourses. He promises to continue occupying Sunday mornings until some time in December. He has been holding forth the last eight weeks in Lansdowne. Splendid interest is reported from there. Some have been baptized, while others are near the kingdom.

Our missionaries in this district have been very active, indeed, and surely the seed sown will bring forth much fruit.

To the Saints and friends of the Kewanee District, we bespeak for Brother Henry C. Ziegenhorn their special help and assistance, and as his work is for the benefit of the children of our heavenly Father, helping the needy, looking after the Lord's servants, and providing for the aged and helpless, we hope each one will feel as he helps in the work that he is helping in the Lord's work and is prospering Zion's cause.

The address of Brother Henry C. Ziegenhorn is Joy, Illinois, Route 2. Saints and friends please remember, and if he does not come to see you call upon him either in person or by letter. Let us all work together for the accomplishment of the work intrusted to all, and then there will be success, and each will be blessed of the Master.

In the interest of the truth, and in behalf of the Bishopric,
Very respectfully,
E. L. KELLEY, Presiding Bishop.

Died

BOYD.—Eva Eleanor, youngest child of Brother and Sister J. N. Boyd, was born March 6, 1903, at Crescent, Iowa; died at Norton, Kansas, September 14, 1914, of acute appendicitis. Her sudden death, after an illness of three days, was a shock to all. Funeral at the home, conducted by James Teeter, of Seldon, Kansas. Interment in Norton Cemetery. Deceased leaves father, mother, 3 sisters, 3 brothers, a host of friends.

CARTER.—Kate King was born December 21, 1892; died, with her daughter, Marjorie Etta, October 27, 1914, at Blair, Nebraska. Marjorie was born May 18, 1914. Deceased married Earl D. Carter, March 13, 1911, at Logan, Iowa. Two children were born to them, Sylvia Ann, who died March 17, 1913, aged 7 months, and Marjorie. Deceased leaves a son, Guy Khaler, by a former marriage. She had started a fire with coal oil; the stove blew up, enveloping her in flames. The baby was in the room and both she and the mother were so severely burned that death came shortly after aid reached them. The house was destroyed. Besides the heart-broken father and mother, many sad relatives and friends remain. The Saints' chapel at Blair, was filled to overflowing at the funeral, conducted by Paul N. Craig, of Omaha, Nebraska.

WILLETT.—Woodrow Waine, son of Thomas and Esther Willett, was born August 16, 1913; died October 28, 1914, of cholera infantum. Funeral at the home and at the Methodist church, Mapleton, Iowa. R. A. Ballantyne, of Moorhead, Iowa, officiating. Interment in Heisler Cemetery. This beautiful little bud will blossom in God's own garden. His will be done.

TEETER.—Henry Harrison Teeter was born in Jefferson County, Iowa, February 21, 1853, where he grew to manhood and later married Miss Mahala Hawkins. They removed to Fairfield, Nebraska, where they resided until a month before his death, October 18, 1914, at the home of his son James, at Seldon, Kansas. He was baptized August 21, 1914. His greatest ambition was to tell others of the glorious gospel he had espoused. Interment at Fairfield, sermon by W. M. Self.

WILLIAMSON.—William E. Williamson died at his home in the town of Miller, La Salle County, Illinois, October 29, 1914, aged 62 years, 8 months, 25 days. He was born February 4, 1852, in the neighborhood where he spent his entire life, and where he died. December 12, 1879, deceased married Miss Sallie O. Sampson, Miller, Illinois. To them were born 7 children, 2 of whom died in early life. The wife, 5 children, 1 grandchild, 1 sister, 5 brothers, survive him. The children are, Mrs. O. T. Hayer, Silas E., Ethel H., Earnest C., Miller, Illinois, and Mrs. C. B. Hartshorn, Chicago, Illinois. Brother Williamson united with the church about eighteen years before he died. Funeral in Saints' chapel, town of Miller, November 1, 1914. Thomas Hougas in charge, sermon by F. M. Cooper, of Plano, Illinois, from 2 Timothy 4: 7, 8. It was estimated that from nine hundred to one thousand were on the grounds, in attestation of the high esteem in which Brother Williamson was held by the community at large. His faithful services as a public official, ideal life as a husband and father, unswerving devotion to the cause of his Redeemer, all placed him before the people as a beautiful and practical illustration of a holy life as seen in his daily walk. No higher proof can we give in support of the divine verities of the gospel of Jesus than in the concrete deeds of human life which are in manifest accord with the Christ ideal. True religion, therefore, can have no existence in the individual unless it finds expression in the affections and daily activities of personal life. In these shining virtues the life of our departed brother was a true example and, "though dead, yet he speaketh."

WALLING.—Mary Walling was born in Ohio, January 2, 1849; died at Glenwood, Iowa, October 26, 1914. She married Archibald Walling, November 8, 1875. She was baptized in early womanhood, at or near Glenwood. Funeral in Saints' church, Glenwood, in charge of Edward Rannie.

CLARK.—Charles Nuten, son of William and Alice Clark, was born January 3, 1887, in Pittsburg, Pennsylvania; died at Saint Joseph's Hospital, Joliet, Illinois, of tuberculosis, November 1, 1914. His father died 17 years ago, his mother 14 years ago. He married Cora King, daughter of William and Laura King, November 8, 1911, two children were born to them, Mercedes and Myrtella. About January 23 he was baptized into the Reorganized Church. Services in charge of F. F. Wipper, interment in Oakwood Cemetery, Joliet. He died in peace.

What the War Means to the Farmer

The foreign demand for our surplus food supply is growing stronger every day. This country is being called upon to supply the bulk of the food needed by the warring nations of Europe. This means an almost unheard of demand for agricultural products of all kinds and at prices that will be high.

Why not grab opportunity by the forelock, get in on the ground floor and reap your share of the benefit? There are plenty of places in the West where renters and farm hands can secure good lands on easy terms, where they can raise crops that will pay for the land in from one to three years. Hadn't you better arrange to go with me on the next home-seekers' excursion, and see for yourself the opportunities that await you at certain points along our line? A postal saying you are interested must reach me before I can tell you more about the matter.

THE PROOF OF THE PUDDING

(Synopsis of a temperance sermon delivered by Elbert A. Smith, at Lamoni, Iowa, Sunday, November 1, 1914, under the auspices of the Lincoln-Lee League. Reported by Winsome Smith.)

My text this morning is found in proverbs, not, however, the Proverbs of Solomon: "The proof of the pudding is in the eating." One of the liquor houses of Saint Louis kindly sent me this text since I was requested to deliver this address. I will explain that later.

WHY SHOULD WE OPPOSE DRINK TRAFFIC?

We might ask the question, first of all, "Why should we as a people take an active part in the campaign against the drink traffic?" I will answer this question in a general way by saying that it is written: "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the Devil." We believe that we are commissioned to assist Jesus in all of his work.

We might almost reduce our answer to the terms of a syllogism: Jesus came to destroy the works of the Devil and commissioned us to assist him; the drink traffic is of the Devil; therefore it is our duty to oppose and attempt by all legitimate means to destroy the drink traffic.

TRAPPING FOR SKUNKS

It may not be a pleasant task to assail entrenched liquor interests. It may be more unpleasant in some places than it is here in Lamoni. The liquor interests never hesitate to reply with slander and abuse, stopping not at violence and even murder if it suits their purpose.

I was talking a few days ago with some boys who were setting traps for skunks. I said, "You will not get many skunks around here."

But one of them replied, in the boy's vernacular: "Every once in a while a guy does get a skunk."

You know, to a boy in these days everyone is a "guy." I was riding along the street with a dignified high priest, president of one of our western churches, when we passed a young man who was stalled with a motorcycle. He hailed us, "Say, will you two guys get out and give me a lift?"

I do not think my companion enjoyed the title given us, but the young man was in trouble, so the two "guys" in the buggy got out and assisted the gentleman with the wheel,—emulating the example of the "guy" from Samaria who assisted the man who got in trouble on the Jericho road.

But to return to the boy with the traps. He said: "Every once in a while a guy does get a skunk." And I felt to warn him that the reverse was true also, "Every once in a while a skunk gets a guy."

It is that way in fighting the saloon. I was in Independence, Missouri, last summer when their election was held on the liquor question. I saw them carry Reverend Pendleton, pastor of the First Christian Church, up the stairs in the Clinton Block to rooms adjoining the offices of the First Presidency. He had been assaulted and knocked down on the streets of Independence in broad daylight by liquor men, and that within about a block of the courthouse.

They killed the saloon skunk in Independence, but before it died it "got" some of the citizens who were fighting it. They were more fortunate than in some cities where murder results from such an attack upon the liquor interests.

THE HARVEST OF BOYS

We say that the liquor traffic is of the Devil because we have judged it by its fruits, in harmony with the divine commandment, as well as the time-honored custom of humanity.

Each individual looking at a particular thing sees in it that which appeals to him. A farmer looking at a plot of ground sees in it the corn or oats or wheat that it will produce. A florist looking at the same plot of ground sees tulips, lilies, and carnations.

A farmer looking at a group of boys in our high-school yard, or over here at the West Side grade school, sees the prospective farmers,—agriculturists. An educator looking at the same group sees the prospective teachers, professors, lawyers, physicians.

But a liquor dealer looking at this group sees only prospective whisky soaks. Each one that can be induced to patronize him for the next twenty years means a clear profit of four thousand dollars.

For that reason a prominent liquor dealer in addressing a great liquor dealers' association some years ago exhorted his associates to go after the boys, to educate their appetites for strong drink by treating them, and in similar ways.

Here in Lamoni they have no opportunity to exhibit their wares publicly to entice our boys; but do not think that they are not reaching after them.

Within the past three days, since I began to think upon this address, the mails brought to my desk a letter from a Saint Louis firm addressed to a twelve-year-old boy, advertising liquors and offering a bottle free. You may guess whose son that boy is.

I see in him the making of a noble man; but they see only the possible whisky bloat that they would like to produce.

I notice that the dealers who sent this letter did not put their names upon the envelope. It simply says, "Return to 102 L— Street, Saint Louis, Missouri."

The element of shame enters here somewhere. When some great milling concern sends me a letter asking the privilege to put a sack of flour into my home to feed my body they are proud to have their card displayed publicly on the envelope for all to read.

When a great publishing house writes to me asking permission to put books on my shelf to feed my mind they care not who may read their names on the envelope. They crave publicity.

But when a great liquor concern sneaks into prohibition Iowa and crawls through the mails into my home seeking to sell me that which will destroy my body and damn my soul they are ashamed to put their names upon the envelope, or else they think that I would be ashamed to have it known that I was receiving such literature,—as no doubt those are who patronize these people.

So they prefer to be known publicly only by a number, like a convict in the penitentiary, where by rights they should be.

"Every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be re-proved."

But I notice here on the second page of their advertisement my text. They say: "The proof of the pudding is in the eating. If you could while reading this place your lips to a glass of this delicious whisky you would not hesitate to send your order at once."

Yes, "The proof of the pudding is in the eating." But we do not want the testimony of those who have only just begun to nibble at the pudding. Let us observe those who have eaten their fill.

THE PROOF OF THE PUDDING IS IN THE EATER

I make this proposition: Let anyone secure a list of the men in Lamoni and vicinity, or elsewhere, who patronize such houses,—those who get liquor by express from these mail order booze joints and those as well who buy it after dark or in shady corners from bootleggers,—let them get a list of such habitual patrons and see if they can find among them one,—one,—clean, decent man who is a source of strength and credit to the community. "The proof of the pudding is in the eating."

I will tell you what you will find: When you get a list of such men you will find them to be a bunch of bums and loafers. They spend their time on the street corners, or in old shacks playing with greasy cards, drinking, smoking, chewing, spitting, swearing, and telling vile stories.

There may be exceptions, but if there are they are disgraced by the company they keep. The proof of the pudding is in the eating; or we might revise it to read, "The proof of the pudding is in the eaters."

Under date of December 3, 1913, a great distillers' distributing company of Kansas City wrote to the Keeley Institute, at Dwight, Illinois, offering to sell a list of their patrons with their addresses. Their letter began with this significant statement:

"OUR CUSTOMERS ARE YOUR PROSPECTIVE PATIENTS"

The Keeley Institute was unkind enough to publish the letter. "The proof of the pudding is in the eating." Those who have eaten their fill are ready for the Keeley Gold Cure for habitual drunkards.

To use a common expression, these people "catch them both going and coming." They sell the whisky to make the drunkards, and then sell the drunkards to the Keeley Institute.

Senator Brown, of California, made a statement in Out West for July, 1914, to the effect that in the state penitentiary at San Quentin in 1911 there were one thousand, eight hundred and eighty-one prisoners, and of this number one thousand, three hundred and twenty-six were addicted to liquor,—about seventy-five per cent.

Statistics show that in New York State thirty-one per cent of the inmates of insane asylums are insane because of drink.

Thus we have traced the users of this pudding to three great terminals, the penitentiary, the insane asylum, and the Keeley Cure. Truly "The proof of the pudding is in the eating."

DOES PROHIBITION PROHIBIT?

But how about those who abstain? Does the adage hold good there, too, that the proof of the pudding is in the eating? We have been told that prohibition does not prohibit.

Let me read you an extract from an address by the governor of prohibition Kansas. This is from the American Patriot, December, 1913:

The death rate in Kansas is only ten to every one thousand inhabitants, and we feel assured the abstinence from liquor gives that low rate of mortality; while the same abstinence contributes to about thirty-five thousand healthy, newly-born Kansans every twelve months. Every year our State creates a new wealth; last year a wealth of two million dollars a day was the record. Only one dollar twenty-five cents was spent on an average by each person for intoxicating liquors during the year, while one of our sister States spends twenty-eight dollars for the same purpose. We have an enactment that requires the deliverers of liquor into Kansas to record the shipment and amount with our county clerk, and the statement I make as to the per capita consumption is authentic and based upon the compilations of these reports. This difference of twenty-six dollars and seventy-five cents went into new homes, schools and churches. . . . With a population of 1,690,000 we had an enrollment of 9,600 students in our state universities, and 7,500 in our denominational schools. Six thousand students attended our State University and agricultural college last year. This is a remarkable showing when compared with Missouri, which has 3,500,000 population, and only 3,317 students in her university and agricultural college. . . . We have only 724 inmates in our State penitentiary, while Colorado, with half our population, has 800. We have only 214 boys in our State reformatory, and a vast majority of the inmates of both penal institutions were transient in our State when they committed their crime. . . . We have only twelve women in our Kansas penitentiary. Eighteen counties have no poor farms, and one of our best counties, Barton, has no use for its poor farm, but turned it into an asset by renting it. Twenty-nine counties have no inmates in their poor farms. We had only 625 paupers in the State last year, and they are taken care of in the poorhouses of seventy-six counties. . . . Kansas has only one insane person to every 560 inhabitants, while New York has a proportion of one to every 276. There must be a reason for this, and there is; it is in the limited use of alcohol by our citizens. Our scientific gentlemen report six kinds of alcoholic insanity. The commitments in New York for 1909 showed thirty-one per cent, Massachusetts thirty per cent, due to excessive use of alcohol, while in prohibition Kansas for six years ending July 25, 1912, our admissions showed only five per cent due to alcoholic troubles.

Notice that whereas prohibition Kansas spends only one dollar and twenty-five cents per capita for liquor each year a neighboring State with licensed saloons spends twenty-eight dollars for that purpose. Does prohibition prohibit?

Kansas with scarcely half the population of a neighboring saloon State has nearly twice as many students in her university and agricultural colleges.

Five per cent of the insane in prohibition Kansas are insane because of drink; in whisky-soaked New York the percentage is thirty-one.

AN ENEMY TO MAN

For long ages alcohol professed to be a friend to man. It was supposed to brighten the intellect. It professed to promote good fellowship, to give health and strength.

But now the mask has been stripped away by sci-

CURRENT EVENTS SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

VESUVIUS THREATENS.—Mount Vesuvius is showing an activity which threatens to become serious, and which it is feared may reach the proportions of the eruption of 1906, when property to the value of twenty million dollars was destroyed and five hundred lives lost.

GOVERNORS MEET.—Governors from the majority of the States of the Union went into session at Madison, Wisconsin, on the 10th, in their seventh annual conference, for the consideration of means for improvement within the States and the simplifying of relations between the States.

NEUTRALITY DEMANDED.—Protesting against the alleged coaling of German vessels and the furnishing by wireless of information concerning the whereabouts of the British fleet from territory in Ecuador and Colombia and in violation of neutrality, Great Britain and France have given these countries to understand that further offenses will not be tolerated.

ENGLISH PARLIAMENT.—King George on the 11th opened the English Parliament. The immediate business before this Parliament will be the providing of sinews of war. A credit of one billion one hundred twenty-five million dollars is asked to cover naval and military expenses until March 31. This enormous sum is in addition to five hundred million dollars previously allowed. It is not expected that controversial political questions will be raised at this session.

ELECTION RETURNS.—Latest election returns give the Democrats in the House a majority of twenty-three, as against one hundred and forty-five in the present House, and fourteen in the Senate, as compared with the present majority of twelve. The contest for prohibition resulted in a "dry" vote in Oregon, Colorado, Arizona, and Washington, while Ohio and California continue "wet." In Ohio the liquor question was complicated by political entanglements, and in California, referring to the coming exposition, the "wets" influenced the vote by the cry, it will "kill the big show."

THE CHRISTMAS SHIP.—As this column is closed, the 14th, the press announces that on this date the far-famed Christmas ship, bearing from nearly all parts of the continent Christmas gifts to war-stricken Europe, sails from New York harbor. The Jason carries one hundred cars of merchandise, clothing, foodstuffs and toys to the mother country to bear the semblance of the Yuletide spirit to her devastated and sorrowing homes. These supplies were delivered in New York harbor free of charge by the railroads of the country. The ship's departure is accompanied by the ringing of bells, the blasts of whistles, the waving of flags and the shouts of school children. The like has never been known before.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—General Guiterrez on the 7th, took the oath of office as provisional president of Mexico. On the 9th, Carranza, from Cordoba, whither he has removed his cabinet and archives, issued an ultimatum declaring himself to be the chief head of the Mexican Republic. For refusing to recognize the provisional president, Carranza has by the Aguas Calientes convention been branded as a rebel. Villa, without resistance, has occupied San Luis Potosi, and is said to be making ready to attack Tampico, after Vera Cruz the most important port in the country. Strong Villa forces are reported converging at Lagos, south of Aguas Calientes, with General Gonzales, directing the Carranza forces, moving toward Silao, to the south of Lagos. Fighting is reported at Leon, between these points. Hostilities between Hill and Maytorena forces have been renewed at Naco. Both the Aguas Calientes convention and Carranza having given guarantees demanded by the United States Government pending the evacuation at Vera Cruz, Secretary Bryan is reported by the press to have announced the purpose of the administration to withdraw the troops from Vera Cruz on November 23.

EUROPEAN WAR.—Fighting in the vicinity of Ypres, Belgium, during the early part of the week covered by this report, announced by the official British press bureau as the heaviest yet experienced by the British troops, was followed by the capture by Germany of Dixmunde, previously occupied by the Germans and from which they had been forced to retreat. Unofficial report says this latter occupancy by the Germans was brief, and that the allies have again retaken the place. Dixmunde is to the north of Ypres, and within fifty miles of Calais, France, opposite Dover, England. Efforts on the part of the German army to retake possession of the left bank of the Yser have been defeated, as have violent attacks elsewhere. The allies claim gains near the coast, where the Germans have renewed their attack. The allies also report gains along the Yser and around Ypres. Near Ypres four German aeroplanes were destroyed and eight German officers killed. The struggle continues all along the line to the Swiss border, without material change other than that reported. The Russians have taken additional territory in eastern Prussia, capturing Johannsburg. Their advances in Poland continued the early part of the week, but were later checked, as reported from Berlin, with the Russians claiming German soil at some points. The Russians continue to advance in Galicia. The siege of Perzemysl is reported renewed by the Russians. The Austrians are said to have abandoned the San River and to be retreating toward Cracow. Austrian advance across the Danube into Serbia is reported repulsed. In the capture by Japanese and British forces of Tsing-Tau, which marks the passing of the last German possession in East Asia and the Pacific, six to eight thousand prisoners were taken. It is announced that, during the war, Tsing-Tau will be administered by Japan. Reports of Turkish victories on the Russian and Egyptian borders are denied. The German cruiser Geier, undergoing repairs, and the schooner Locksun, a naval tender, were, on the 8th, placed under guard at Honolulu, to be held until the cessation of hostilities, as prescribed by international law. The Emden, after sinking twenty-two vessels, mostly British, and capturing one, has been destroyed in the Indian Ocean by the Australian cruiser Sydney. The German Koenigsburg is bottled up by the Australian Chatham in a German South African river. The British torpedo boat, Niger, has been destroyed by a submarine. A German submarine has been sunk off the coast of Belgium by a French torpedo boat. The Swedish steamer Atle has been blown up by a mine in the North Sea.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

FIRE AT LAMONI.—Anything affecting Lamoni and her people is of general interest to the Saints. All will be pained to learn, therefore, that the elegant new school building at Lamoni was on the morning of November 8 partially destroyed by fire, the source of which is uncertain. The grades, aside from those previously cared for at the west side school, have been taken to the old school building, and the high school is occupying the Graceland College building, the management of the college having ordered their work to admit of this arrangement. The inconvenience to all concerned will continue until repairs are made, which will require several months. The loss is fully covered by insurance.

ABIDING LOVE

It singeth low in every heart,
We hear it each and all—
A song of those who answer not,
However we may call.
They throng the silence of the breast;
We see them as of yore—
The kind, the true, the brave, the sweet,
Who walk with us no more.

More homelike seems the vast unknown,
Since they have entered there;
To follow them were not so hard,
Wherever they may fare.
They can not be where God is not,
On any sea or shore;
Whate'er betides, thy love abides,
Our God for evermore!

ence. Alcohol is revealed as the enemy of man.

It is his enemy physically. A great alienist has said that alcohol is one of two great race poisons. It attacks the race germ of life.

It is now held to be a fact that acquired tendencies are not inherited. Only the tendencies that were mine when I was born are inherited by my son. So it is argued by some that alcoholism can not be inherited.

It is not inherited as are some evils. The injury is suffered individually by the germ cell in the alcohol-soaked tissues of the father or mother before it is conceived or born. It is either destroyed entirely or comes into the world poisoned and perverted from before generation.

Alcohol is an enemy to man mentally. A drunken man is temporarily insane. The tendency is to become permanently insane. So that in New York State thirty-one per cent of the insane are insane from drink, and the same is true in other States. Instead of brightening the intellect, alcohol quenches the divine spark of reason.

It is an enemy to man morally. All manner of crimes are committed under its influence.

Alcohol is an enemy to all our most cherished institutions. It is the enemy of the home. It attracts first of all the head of the family, the breadwinner, and drags him down in besotted poverty, disgrace, and disease.

Next it seduces the growing sons, and even the mother; and she whom God has crowned with the sacred gift of motherhood is dragged like a sow in the mire by this monster.

It is an enemy to the school, sending underfed, poorly-clothed, degenerate children to the pupils' desk.

It is an enemy to the church. Every convert made by John Barleycorn is lost to the church. Every convert made by the church is lost to John Barleycorn. There can be no peace or union between the two, but ever the greatest enmity.

Last of all, it is an enemy to the Nation. That this is now recognized we have been given the most striking proof during the past few months.

THE NATIONS "ON THE WATER WAGON"

When the great European war broke out one of the first acts of the Czar of Russia was to prohibit the manufacture and sale of vodka. Vodka is the national drink of Russia, and the Government has had a monopoly of its sale, deriving millions of dollars of revenue therefrom.

The improvement in the nation has been so marked and instantaneous that the Czar declares that never again will the sale of vodka be tolerated.

When France went to war, steps were taken to restrict the sale of absinthe, the deadly national drink of France.

Every soldier that Great Britain sent to the war carried in his knapsack a leaflet signed by Lord Kitchener in which he was warned against strong drink.

And now the leading men of Great Britain are causing posters to be put up throughout England, a copy of which I find in The Outlook for October 21, 1914, which I will read:

EFFECTS OF ALCOHOL ON NAVAL AND MILITARY WORK

To All Men Serving the Empire: It has been proved by the most careful scientific experiments and completely confirmed by actual experience in athletics and war, as attested by Field Marshal Lord Roberts, V. C., K. G., K. P., Field Marshal Lord Wolseley, K. P., G. C. B., and many other army leaders, that alcohol, or drink slows the power to see signals, confuses the prompt judgment, spoils accurate shooting, hastens fatigue, lessens resistance to disease and exposure, increases shock from wounds.

We therefore most strongly urge you for your own health and efficiency that at least as long as the war lasts you should become total abstainers.

Signed by Thomas Barlow, M. D., F. R. S., K. C. V. O., Pres. Coll. Phys., Physician to His Majesty, the King. Frederick Treves, F. R. C. S., G. C. V. O., Hon. Col. R. A. M. C., T. F. Sergeant Surgeon to His Majesty, the King. G. J. Evatt, M. D., C. B., Surgeon General R. A. M. C. Victor Horsley, F. R. C. S., F. R. S., Captain R. A. M. C., T. F. G. Sims Woodhead, M. D., F. R. S., Lieutenant Colonel R. A. M. C., T. F.

As long ago as February, 1911, the German Crown Prince said: "That nation which takes the smallest amount of alcohol will win the battles of the future." While here is a report from the Kansas City Times for August 25, 1913: "The German Emperor, one of the world's leading advocates of efficiency, has become a total abstainer."

NO DRUNKEN NATION CAN FIGHT A GOOD FIGHT

Why is it that when the great war broke out all these nations took steps to prohibit the use of intoxicants?

It was because they knew that no drinking nation could carry on a strong aggressive warfare. They were forced to abstain at least temporarily in order to win, like all contestants in great struggles.

Alcohol destroys all the better qualities that make a nation great in war. What are these qualities? Courage, steadiness, intelligence, endurance.

'Since this address was delivered our attention has been attracted to the following from the pen of Bernhard Dernburg, a prominent banker of Berlin, member of the upper house of the Prussian Parliament, formerly minister of colonies: "There is a very determined war being conducted in Germany against alcoholic beverages, and no soldier has been permitted even a drink of beer since the first days of mobilization."—Review of Reviews, November, 1914, p. 580.

Alcohol destroys courage. The drunkard dare face no danger unless he is at least half tipsy. It is so in peace as in war. When the drinking man encounters loss or trouble he flies to drink to drown his sorrow, having no courage or fortitude in and of himself.

Alcohol destroys steadiness, giving the unsteady hand and nerve; it destroys intelligence and undermines endurance.

LET US LEARN LESSON IN AMERICA

Now here is the great lesson for us to learn, here in America. We are not at war. But the same good qualities that make a nation great in war make it great in peace. The great enterprises of peace call for courage, steadiness, intelligence, endurance, no less than those of war.

Surely if Russia could afford to forego her great revenue from the sale of vodka and the pleasure of drinking it, in order to become great in war, this Nation can afford to forego all revenue from the sale of intoxicants and all pleasure from tippling, if there is any, in order to become great in peace. It is the price. Only thus can we fulfill the mission imposed by divinity, as stated in the Book of Mormon.

For that reason we plead for Nation-wide prohibition and constitutional amendment to enforce it.

IN LEAGUE WITH OUR ENEMIES

Not only is alcohol an enemy to all good institutions, it is a friend to all evil influences and institutions. It is in league with that terrible trinity, disease, poverty, crime.

Wherever you find a gang of corrupt and grafting politicians you will find it allied with the saloon.

Wherever you find a gang of white slavers you will find it in league with the saloon. Vice commissions from our great cities report that the social evil could not exist in its present proportions without the aid of the saloon.

Wherever you find a gang of murderers and toughs you will find it allied with the saloon.

Wherever you find a gang of gamblers fleecing the people you will find it operating through the saloon.

OUR RECORD AS A CHURCH

Had I time this morning I would review our church legislation against this evil, for we have opposed it from our very inception. In Ohio, in Missouri, and in Illinois, in the early history of the church we legislated against it and did not permit the sale of liquors anywhere where we had a community and it was possible for us to prevent it.

This record runs from the early thirties until the present time, and is continued in Lamoni and Independence.

Thus having given first a general reason for our opposition, I have proceeded to give more particular reasons.

We might ask in conclusion, How long should this opposition continue? In view of the fact that Jesus came to destroy the works of the Devil, we as his servants must continue the fight until this evil is destroyed.

Our opposition must continue until the blue sky is swept clear of the defiling smoke of the last great brewery; until the sweet airs of God's green footstool are no longer tainted by the pestilential breath of a single distillery; until the last sloppy licensed barroom is closed for ever, and the last sneaking bootlegger is in the penitentiary; yes, until the dragon is bound with a great chain and cast into the bottomless pit; and until men everywhere learn to add to their faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge, temperance.

CHARITY, THE TRUE EVIDENCE OF RELIGION

In discussing this question, I take pleasure in presenting these texts:

This is the love of God, that we keep his commandments, and his commandments are not grievous.—1 John 5: 3.

We know we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren.—1 John 3: 14.

Have fervent charity among yourselves.—1 Peter 4: 8.

These texts I think will impress your minds with the greatness and the vast importance of the question of charity. We should bear in mind that a reasonable rendition of the term charity would imply the pure love of God. To justify this position I shall present two references that at least all Latter Day Saints will accept:

The Lord God hath given a commandment, that all men should have charity, which charity is love.—2 Nephi 11: 107.

Wherefore cleave unto charity, which is the greatest of all, for all things must fail; but charity is the pure love of Christ, and it endureth for ever; and whoso is found possessed of it at the last day it shall be well with them.—Moroni 7: 52.

Of course the term may be given a more extended meaning, implying benevolence, kindness, goodness, graciousness, tenderness, liberality and good will; but the word love covers all this, and suits the Lord admirably, it seems, hence we use it in that sense.

It is a gentle word, and comes freighted with its soothing essence of good cheer. It sounds an optimistic note, in contrast with its opposite, hate; and, too, it brings invigorating hope, and refreshing exhilaration.

This "love" to the human ear is indeed pleasing, and brings the glad message that God is good, and we are to strive for a divine reflection.

CHRISTIAN ESSENTIALS

Christianity in its essentialities consists of at least three things: obedience in the life, knowledge in the mind, and love in the heart. The first implies the practical; the second, the theoretical; and the third, the realization of the highest ultimatum of Christian endeavor in earth life. The first leads to the second, and the second points unerringly to the third.

These terms of obedience, knowledge, and love, taken separately, are only deficient parts, but together they furnish the bulwark of the faith. The texts to be considered refer to these principles, which is one reason we present them.

The first text refers to obedience and love, and then affirms that this obedience is not grievous. The second affirms knowledge, for it starts by saying, "We know"; then the earnest affirmation of, "We have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren," impresses two things as being very necessary to know: one is our natural and baneful condition in our lost state, which is termed death; and the other is the happy fact of a deliverance therefrom, and a knowledge of an avoidance of this ruin by the evidence; "because we love the brethren."

The third text is a simple declarative command to have this charity, which is qualified by the adjective fervent, which implies an ardent, earnest, or zealous condition of life. This kind of charity we are supposed to have among ourselves.

Christianity in its multiplied component factors is truly a great system of evidence, and is a work of hallowed and felicitous comfort and pleasure; and charity is the crowning work of our genius, and will ever redound to our triumph and salvation in the end.

In making a more full exposition, first, let us notice these two points in the first: Obedience to God's commandments is the best evidence of love to God; and, his commandments are not grievous. From the secondary text we notice that a change is described, and the evidence adduced shows that change.

OBEDIENCE BEST EVIDENCE OF CHARITY

This is shown by the following: Love is truly said to be a well-spring of action. We know it is that which influences the tongue and the life, and if we love God it is sure to affect us in every way. This love or charity finds in itself the cause and end of labor and exertion. When it truly is in our hearts it knows no danger, and takes pleasure in sacrifices of toil and privation to the interest of the object of our love.

Man may obey others because of self-interest, and cower because of fear; but the service most potential is that obedience because of love. The Saint should obey "because the love of Christ constraineth him."

Love always produces the most constant obedience, for it fetters us to the object of our happiness. Drenching waters can not quench it, or death itself destroy it. As the loving child freely obeys his parents; as the amiable servant uncomplainingly goes with delight to the task his master has given him; as the devoted vassal yields willingly to his sovereign, so does the Saint give to his God the homage of heart, the service of hand, and the dedication of life that he requires.

I think I can see a grand reason in the early revelation to this church, "Be patient; be sober; be temperate; have patience, faith, hope and charity." (Doctrine and Covenants.)

It was no trivial thing, and the Lord sought to impress this lesson at the start. The Master when interrogated by the lawyer as to which was the greatest commandment of the law, said, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. . . . The second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." (Matthew 22: 37-39.)

These two commandments are inseparable; the one is predicated on the other; to demonstrate one is to vindicate the other. If we claim our affections are on God, the way to show it truly is to love our fellow men. Thus the fatherhood of God makes possible the brotherhood of man.

This charity is the factor of utility that ennobles man. It is the very opposite of hate. In no sense are we allowed to hate, with the exception, of course, of hating evil. Charity ennobles; hate lowers us in standing before God. When our Master said, "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you," it was necessary not only for the benefit of the enemy, but also for the beneficial effects on praying man. The exercise of ourself under this requirement is certain to beautify the character, leaving it richer than before.

Our actions must show the excellency of our religion, for judgment is determined on works. Thus our eternal destiny is determined by the way we love God and treat our fellow man. The extent of our practical concern towards the lowly, the needy, the distressed and the afflicted, is the God-like index that demonstrates our charity and shows the practicability of our Christianity. It is not only a condition of feeling that is insisted upon, but a fellowship of practical helpfulness to mankind, that takes us out of ourselves and our selfish feelings for self, and makes us see and feel the throb of others' sorrow and pain.

This is that true fellowship of those who have learned to efface self in the joys of others. Love is the life and helpfulness, the exemplification of it to man and God. In our estimation of all that goes to make life and happiness, it is practically impossible to leave out this principle of love and show a rational Christian life. No, we can not leave it out of the question, it must be reckoned with; it is our darling ideal, and to reach it is our fondest ambition.

GOD'S COMMANDMENTS NOT GRIEVOUS

Evidently this does not mean that God's commandments are not grievous to some people. To the carnally minded they are but drudgery. The unrepentant and unregenerate professor of religion finds the law of God a constant chafe. Neither does it mean they are not strict, for they extend to heart and life. It means they are not grievous to those who love God. If the love of God is in our hearts, his commands will be our daily delight. We will then esteem his yoke easy and his burden light. To the good and willing they are not grievous, because they are commanded of God, who is the exemplification of goodness itself.

God is good and perfect, and his decrees are the regulations of that goodness, and not the exactions of a despotic mind. His commands do not issue as those from an arbitrary overseer, an enemy, nor from the cupidity of a selfish or unrelenting tyrant; but from the loving Redeemer, the great benefactor of man, who has loved us even unto death. All these dictates are reasonable, and give indorsement to all that is high and noble in life. They urge us to adore the highest and best standards, to serve the greatest good, to love the best, and trust in the most wise and merciful.

Such a law commends itself as deserving of our most "reasonable service." It indeed conduces to our present advantage, for the living of this law tends to health, reputation, and longevity. Is there anything that produces cheerfulness, serenity, and contentment as does this law? It weds to duty and helpfulness. It builds loving homes and metes our benefits to those in need. It trains the hand for its work. It brings the greatest good. Its true glory is not dependent on the wreck and ruin of others, but in those deeds of charity that lightens the burdens and sorrows of others. God's commands are not grievous because of the glorious promises they unfold, for, "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." (Revelation 22: 14.)

Paul assures us, "Let us not be weary in well doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not. (Galatians 6: 9.) Then, again, we find comfort in the admonition, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." (Revelation 2: 10.)

With these assurances before us, we have the strongest kind of an incentive to continue on; yet we must ever bear in mind that "no one can assist in this work, except he shall be humble and full of love, having faith, hope and charity." (Doctrine and Covenants 11: 14.)

CHANGE FROM LIFE UNTO DEATH

John in this secondary text affirms, "We know we have passed from death unto life," which, of course, represents a change. Death is a fitting representation of an unregenerate condition. The disobedient are dead in a spiritual sense—or dead to law. "He that believeth not is condemned already." (John 3: 36.) Again, "Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." (Romans 5: 12.)

They were then spiritually dead, for every sign of death was upon their souls; as respecting God, religion, and a proper enjoyment of the faculties, their souls were really dead. There was that coldness and want of feeling for they had no desire after God, or abiding sense of God's existence, omniscience, omnipresence, justice, and mercy. In other words, they were "without God in the world." No power of their being was employed for God. In no way were they responsive. Their tongues did not praise him, and their feet walked in by and forbidden paths. Their hearts were cold and icy and their will rebellious. They held dark understanding, their judgment was perverted, and their conscience like an impure stream. The spirit in its carnal state was crooked and perverse and diseased with the foulest leprosy. In every way they were unfit for God's service, and incapable of heavenly felicity. They had truly realized that "The wages of sin is death," and they had been paid their portion. This death was the first death, the death in state, which was a legal separation of the soul from God, which truly is a spiritual death.

But Paul also expresses another fact: these to whom he was writing were no longer under this condemnation, for they had come to life. They had "passed from death unto life." "For the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death." (Romans 8: 12.)

Thus they were no longer in a state of death, for their souls had been quickened and made alive. Every sign of spiritual life was shown. Their pulse beat was one of prayer, and their heart was warm with love. Their powers were employed for God, they were "created anew," "born again," "quickened," had "put off the old man with his deeds." They were now "partakers of the divine nature." They were no longer exposed to death, for they had been made a "new man in Christ Jesus," and possessed the vitality of eternal life. They had come into their heavenly gift, "for . . . the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Romans 6: 23), and now they delighted "in the law of God after the inward man."

Then, too, they had a knowledge of this change, for they said, "We know." Knowledge is more than a belief. Paul says, "I know whom I have believed" (2 Timothy 1: 12); John assures us, "If any man will do his will he shall know of the doctrine" (John 7: 17); and "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free" (John 8: 32); and, again, "This is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." (John 17: 3.) Peter also testifies of this knowledge, (1 Peter 1: 3-9.) This knowledge is the Saints' privilege, and nothing is so capable of creating an abiding faith and great comfort of mind.

THE EVIDENCE ADDUCED

They knew they had "passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." The brethren here I would take to mean all fellow men, for it would be more in accord with God and his Christ in their attitude to the world. "God so loved the world," "love your enemies," "for if ye love them which love you, what thank have ye? For sinners also love those that love them."

So we prefer a more extended meaning to include all men, love, or charity, signifies affection, and must be spiritual and not carnal. It was not commanded because of any human excellency, gift, endowment of mind, or disposition; but because they are spiritually begotten, and when born are truly the spiritual seed of Jesus Christ.

This love in the new life is one of constancy, evidencing life at all times and under all circumstances. To all men there must be that bounded charity manifested, by preference, by words of love, and by beneficence, sympathy and hearty good will. This kind of love will be evidence that we have passed from death unto life. It will show the fruit of the spirit which is "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; against such there is no law." (Galatians 5: 22, 23.)

There will be conformity to Christ's holy likeness, "As I have loved you, that ye also love one another. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." (John 13: 34, 35.)

Again, "And this is his commandment, That we should believe on the name of his Son, Jesus Christ, and love one another, as he gave us commandment." (1 John 3: 23.) When we learn that this is the recognized badge of our religion we have learned an important lesson in gospel development. This will ever be our truest sign of our love to God, for "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" (1 John 4: 20.) Again, "But he that hateth his brother, is in darkness;" but to love, is commended, for, "He that loveth his brother abideth in the light." (1 John 2: 9-11.)

There is no theme that can engage our attention that is any more necessary than this. It is that which guarantees our success here, and the eternal bliss of the future. It certainly brings happiness, dignity, and safety to us here. If we are a subject of the life spiritual here, we will be an heir to the life eternal of the future.

What is the holy amiableness of Christian piety if it is not the exemplification of love or charity? Are we to believe there are other attainments that can transcend this one? What would the home be without love? Would the world be better without it? What is it that impels men to work early and late, through sunshine and rain, and the sweat of their brows, at the anvil and lathe, at the plow and pruning hook, at the mine and quarry, to provide for wife and children, unless it is for this principle of love? Would these be happier without home, and without love? Can you tell why so many crooning mothers spend their powers and energies so many weary years, caring for their little ones, in nursing and feeding as well as clothing them, children helpless and in their charge, unless it is done because of their deep, instinctive mother love? Why is it so many tax their energies to the utmost in caring for the weakly and crippled children whom they know can give no reward or earthly advantage, unless these in this service are actuated by love? Why do men and women go to the battle fields under the Red Cross, there to face danger, disease, and the wreck and ruin of war, unless they are impelled by regard and feeling of their fellow man? Are we to believe that so many good men and possibly more good women who watch patiently and unwearied at the bedside of the sick and dying, and on the battle field by those who are shot and torn, in binding up their wounds and wiping the death dews from their feverish brows—are we to understand that these are laboring for any other than a high sense of duty and a deep regard for their fellow men? We do not say this is as high a degree of love as can be developed under gospel influence; but it is charity, nevertheless.

"Charity suffereth long and is kind." Let us be impressed with the necessity of having this evidence of our Saintship. Nothing else can take its place, for, "He that . . . hateth his brother is in darkness even until now." (1 John 2: 9.)

We might say there are two kinds of love—love to God and his Christ, and love to man. These two are essential to our religion and never can be divorced from it. Genuine love is an operative, influential principle. The materialist would describe it as "an obscure magnetic attraction between heterogeneous substances; a chemical affinity," if you know what that would be.

I like the way Paul puts it, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maranatha." (1 Corinthians 16: 22.) If we have this love in us, our tongues will express it, our profession will exhibit it, and our daily walk and very life itself in thought, practices, and sacrifices will evince it continually. We should remember this is not a principle inconsistent with philanthropy, love of species, love of country, or conjugal, paternal or fraternal affection. Nay, these it hallows and increases, for over all these it has the ascendancy. These are to be loved in a subordinate degree. Love's sacred evidences are sympathy in trouble, support in affliction, and peace in death; at the judgment a glorious vindication; and in glory a crown that fadeth not away.

God, the Father of all men, commands, begs, and warns us as individuals and nations to meditate on that which makes for peace, to do justice, to eschew evil, and to love one another. He has required us to bear one another's burdens, to forgive and bless, instead of giving railing and vile malediction. He has promised to bless us beyond all desire when we truly have these things within us. He will stay many dangers, and lessen the ravages of disease, and pestilence, if we attain this true condition of heart and soul. We should also consider that God, "doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men." (Lamentations 3: 33.) These adversities are permitted to come upon us "for our profit," and worketh out for us a more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

God's claims are just; and we should fear him and walk in his statutes and make his law our rule of life. Christ is our altar, as well as our sacrifice. On this we must place ourselves, trusting him for pardon, justification, and eternal life. He has asked us for the consecration of our love, our talents, our influence, our time, our property, in fact, our all; and all these should be used for the glory of God.

It is hardly possible to give this subject a clear treatise without using Paul's noble suggestions on charity, given to the Corinthians. If his other instructions are precious, this is golden, and comes freighted as a priceless legacy. I am sure the world has been made better by such inspiring words.

Charity is here represented as the crowning feature of all earthly life. All else is as nothing without charity.

Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.—1 Corinthians 13: 4-7.

Charity is that which never fails. It is that which touches men's hearts and wins the lasting esteem of the very roughest. If a man is truly a Saint and has charity, even his horse, his cow, or his dog will know it, for they will feel his kindness and sympathy.

What is life without charity, kindness, tenderness and sympathy, but a barren waste, or a moral bankruptcy? Love in man is that which awakens in us a nature more than human, and links our humanity with the divine. Nothing will bring us closer to the divine touch, and the holy, mellowing influences of divine power than this highest of all attainments, true and acceptable charity. Paul understood this to be the greatest of all adornments when he said, "And above all these things put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness." (Colossians 3: 14.)

ITS NOBLE EVIDENCES

These are patent to all. They bespeak not a life of isolation from the world, as the solitary recluse of the mountain, or the retired and lonely penitent of the monastery; but one that mingles with the world and is kind, and is a friend to man, a benediction to every creature who is in distress and needs the administrations of a brother. This kind of religion is not sentiment, but practical, real life; and the man who travels this road is going the royal road to glory.

There are so many hearts that are hungry for association; there are so many in misery and wanton with sin and degradation; there are so many who need you, and need you to-day, and should have the balm of your friendship and sympathy, which, if given freely, will heal a multitude of ills. There is power in the tender sympathy and charity of a friend, power that dispels the gloom of despondency and causes the orb of hope to shed its rays in troubled lives for ever. He who possesses charity is the true gentleman, whose nature has been fashioned after the highest model. The Psalmist would sum him up as one "that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart."

Other qualities may make our lives more resplendent; but if this essential requisite, love, is not possessed by us, our luster fades and our religion is vain. Let a man possess charity, and he is an asset to the community; but if he possess it not, his religious standing is in jeopardy and his influence crippled. Is it any wonder Peter said, "And above all things have fervent charity among yourselves: for charity shall cover the multitude of sins. Use hospitality one to another without grudging." (1 Peter 4: 8, 9.)

Let us not think this is too high an attainment for us—that this high altitude is a little too rarified for our weak lung capacity. We are glad the standard is high, for it stimulates us to greater endeavor.

This disposition of always putting self first is not condoned in the law. Paul says, "By love serve one another. For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. But if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another." (Galatians 5: 13-15.)

The little acts are those that count in the battle of life. The little things we do are those that really make us great. They enhance our spiritual value like the cipher at the right of the figure. They are the legitimate test of our character to God and man. Acts of love are the straws on the river of time that show the course of its waters.

Charity, shown in benevolent acts, is the benefactor of life, and helps to make men immortal. It is not of so much concern where we are as what we are, in moral, spiritual and practical worth. The best guarantee one can have of his continual happiness and favor with God is to live in possession of this ennobling, elevating, and dignifying quality of charity. That it is the true evidence of religion, and the man that bears it will always find an echo in the hearts of his fellow men.

It behooves us to think while we are making a living, Are we making a life? That is, a true one? So many make a good living, but have no real capacity for enjoying it, or using it acceptably after it is made. The true living is the living that includes faith, hope, and charity. It is from such lives, dedicated to the highest aim, that our Master derives his greatest joy.

It is when the whole brotherhood in Christ becomes filled with his ennobling charity that the world will be made conscious of our better claims, and Zion, our Zion, shall be made "clear as the moon and fair as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners."

WAR'S EFFECT ON IMPORTATIONS

In considering the industrial situation created by the European war we must keep in mind these three things:

(1) All foreign merchandise imported into the United States is less than ten per cent of the merchandise consumed here, reaching an annual total, however, of the enormous sum of about two billions of dollars.

(2) Of such goods as cottons, woolens, linens, silks, laces, hosiery, gloves, which make up most of our imported dry goods, there was in bond on October 1, in New York, scarcely a million dollars less than last year at that time, making less than a ten per cent shortage.

(3) The shortage of foreign merchandise, due to the war, will be felt very little this fall and winter, as shipments are generally completed. The great shortage, if war continues, will come next spring.—From "Made in America," by Joseph H. Appel, in the American Review of Reviews for November.

AID TO JEWS

A conference of national Jewish organizations was held under the auspices of the American Jewish Committee, at Temple Emanu-El, yesterday afternoon, to consider the best means of raising a large fund for the relief of Jews in the war zone. Louis Marshall, president of the American Jewish Committee, was elected chairman and Cyrus L. Sulzberger secretary.

Mr. Marshall pointed out that more than half of the Jews in the world live in those parts of Russia, Austria-Hungary and Prussia in which the fiercest fighting is now going on, and that the Jews of the United States must do everything possible to relieve their brethren.

A resolution was adopted authorizing the chairman to appoint a committee of five empowered to select a national committee of one hundred, on which every Jewish national organization invited to the conference was to be represented by at least one member, and that this committee of one hundred was to elect from its numbers an executive committee of twenty-five. The chairman appointed the following committee of five: Oscar S. Strauss, Judge Julian W. Mack, of Chicago; Louis D. Brandeis, of Boston; Harry Fishel and Meyer London, of New York.

Among the prominent Jews present were Doctor Cyrus Adler, of Philadelphia; Louis D. Brandeis, of Boston; Jacob H. Schiff, Oscar S. Strauss, J. L. Magnes, Judge Julian W. Mack, of Chicago; Judge Mayer Sulzberger, of Philadelphia; Rabbis Samuel Cchllman, Moses J. Gries, of Cleveland; Stephen S. Wise, Joseph Barondess and Louis Marshall.

Louis Marshall, the chairman of the meeting, issued the following statement on behalf of the conference:

To the Jews of America: One half of all Jewry dwells in the very heart of the conflict. Hundreds of thousands of Jews are fighting in the ranks of the contending armies. Fire and sword are devastating the homes of millions of them. Their slender possessions are vanishing. Universal destitution, famine and disease confront them.

It is the imperative duty of those whom God has spared from such affliction to extend the helping hand to those of the house of Israel who have been so sorely visited.

Representatives of the leaders of the important Jewish communities of America have formed a general committee for their relief. All Jews, of every shade of thought, irrespective of the land of their birth, are solemnly admonished to contribute with the utmost generosity.

Felix M. Warburg has been designated as treasurer of the fund. Contributions should be sent to him, care of Kuhn, Loeb and Company, New York.—New York American, October 25, 1914.

"THE NEW PARENTS' ASSISTANT"

But why should we be afraid of talking grown up to the children? It makes them feel, to their delight, that we are trusting them, honoring them, linking them into our thoughts, and widening the horizon of theirs. Always it is like wormwood in a child's mouth, the sense that we are playing down to him, putting him off with baby talk. Let us give him not that bitter stuff, but something more nourishing.

I have often wished that I could write a little book of philosophy for children. Only, this juvenile version of "The Foundations of Belief" would be, like its great namesake "Notes Introductory." It would be intended to prepare the children to think as they ought of Christianity. It would be an attempt to give them some sort of hold, according to their strength, on the assurance "that among the needs ministered to by Christianity are some which increase rather than diminish with the growth of knowledge and the progress of science; and that this religion is, therefore, no mere reform, appropriate only to a vanished epoch in the history of culture and civilization, but a development of theism now more necessary to us than ever."

For the children have so far to go, from their earliest love of pictures of baby Jesus to any sort or kind of grown-up Christian faith, that they had better be off as soon as possible. Go they will, let us hope, whether we send them or not; so we might as well begin to get them ready now. For none of us knows how long we shall have them with us.—Stephen Paget, F. R. C. S., in the September number of The North American Review.

Get in Line

November! 'Tis Nature's pay day! Now it is that she undertakes to render tribute to whom it is due. For kindnesses received throughout the year, she heaps her lavish measures,—pressed down and running over. Truly, a Christian payment and a Christian spirit, glad to acknowledge her debts, and right royal in the generosity of their liquidations!

For witness, lo her yellow coin in corn and pumpkin! Behold her "promise to pay" in grape and apple, always at par and redeemable at sight! See her "notes of hand," scattered far and wide, to form gay bedclothing for sleepy, shivering, roots and bulbs! Gaily she signs the quitclaim deeds, which transfer to bins and barrels her rich store of fruit and vegetables! Her "rewards of merit" she incloses in the hard shells of nuts, bestowed only upon those who show perseverance as well as industry!

However, the persimmons on our table remind us that it is unwise to rashly insist upon any premature tolls,—in that line at least. Mother Nature, lavish and generous, is also just and deliberate; and he who would seek to hasten her process, or to take bounty before it is due, may well beware; for she exacts penalties, as well as pays her debts! Have a persimmon!

Was it puckery? Too bad; well, try another! Life is full of just such hazards and just such disappointments, and lucky, indeed, is he who can, in spite of all, cling to his childhood faiths and try again!

We're going to try again—to arouse our singers to an early falling in step! Please do get busy—at once! Cheery messages are coming from headquarters—delightful whippers of new, and for us as yet unexplained fields of happiness and pleasure in the preparation of the conference music.

The conference music! How much it means—how much of work, of real, hard digging, and often joy of achievement and success are crowded into that phrase!

So just "Hurry up!" Mr. Choir leader, or Miss Organist, please just step over to your secretary, or librarian, or president as the case may be, and remind him that it is time to send in your order for the conference music! Don't allow another choir rehearsal to pass without definite steps being taken to get in line!

What if you are at a distance from Lamoni! What if you do not expect to attend conference! Is it not a happiness to know that even in your corner you are joining with all the other singers 'mong God's people, and with them sending upward the grand chorus of praise to him?

Remember that in the busy conference time, no one has either opportunity or desire to teach anyone the cantata or the anthems. All we can reasonably expect our General Chorister to do is to coordinate and blend into harmony the materials already prepared. So don't delay; don't put off acting upon the promptings until too late. And then, as opportunity opens the way for you, you may come to conference, and your fine musicianship, your talents and efficiency, may get a severe bruise by your being invited to listen instead of participate in the grand chorus of joyful praise, swelling and surging through the annual assemblies of the Saints!

District Choir Work

Many anxious inquiries have been directed to the General Chorister relative to the organization of district choirs, and the appointments of choristers in charge. That we may have no further misunderstandings, let us remember that district choristers are appointed by the General Chorister of the church, and we endeavor in each instance to have these appointments ratified by the district conference. In cases where this ruling has not been observed and choristers have been appointed by conferences, we have, in a number of instances, indorsed these appointments, but we know of a number of cases where great confusion has resulted by not being informed of these appointments. We would, therefore, ask that in all instances where secretaries of districts have not been notified of district chorister appointments that we be advised in writing, in order that we may have indisputable record of "who's who!"

In the matter of organizing district choirs, we earnestly urge that the chorister of the district have full and complete charge of the musical activities of the district, with power to choose such assistants as he may deem necessary in order to carry out his work successfully. Many months of study and experimenting have demonstrated to us that a chorister and a corresponding secretary are all the officers required to rally the singers of the district together in a unified effort. The choir movement work is not sufficiently advanced to warrant us forming a complex organization, and simplicity should be our keynote. The best results can only be obtained by having one who is gifted in the power of directing, and can devote sufficient time to the needs of the district to make the effort worth while.

ALBERT N. HOXIE,
General Chorister.

The Art of Expression

A "BRIDGE-PASSAGE"

There is a definite correlation of art to life—meaning the practical side of it—the experiences of the senses and all that implies. We are struggling to see that relation clearly, and to get it into definite, helpful form.

Sophocles insists that one can not "see life steadily and see it whole," unless one sees this relationship. That takes us back into the processes of evolution or progress (for the one means the other), for we must consider everything philosophically, step by step. We should hold before us more the analogy between mental and physical evolution, or development. The history of the church should be viewed in the light of being a process of evolution. Bringing it down to the concrete, each life, each individual life, should be so considered also.

George Eliot's works are marked by the unfolding of the characters she has written of. "They do not appear ready-made and finished at the beginning of a story, but, like real, human beings amid the struggles of life, her characters change for the better or the worse."

Some one has said that there is no doubt that the highest forms of physical evolution had the greatest enjoyment in life, and that the groups which developed the highest powers were the least precocious. The Carnivora was a precocious group, and had the aspiring ape appreciated the Carnivora's condition and the choice been open to him, he would have refused to change places! But he was saved this discouragement by the fact that he had to climb busily, and had no time for meditation!

Sometimes it seems that maybe a saving provision for our race, the fact that we are so busy we can't think! Yet, a certain degree of meditation is necessary to a proper appreciation of the arts. There is a danger, however, of becoming pessimistic, at times. Most of us have a streak of melancholy in our natures, which at times gets hold of us and threatens to destroy the beautiful structures our meditations have built.

George Eliot says: "To be a poet is to have a soul so quick to discern that no shade of quality escapes it, and so quick to feel, that discernment is but a hand playing with finely ordered variety on the chords of emotion,—and a soul in which knowledge passes instantaneously into feeling, and feeling flashes back a new organ of knowledge."

And so we feel in regard to music. To be quick to see, to feel what we see, and to be able to put that feeling into our song, that the heart of sorrow may be touched as with an angel's finger, and the woe lightened, the faltering instincts upward strengthened and a new endeavor, a new purpose implanted in the minds of the listener. LORENA LEEKA.

Masters of Music

GEORG FRIEDRICH HANDEL

Genius is a hard matter to explain. It flowers in unexpected times and places; and where it is most looked for it seldom appears. Just when one thinks he has solved the problem, and marshals the facts of heredity to prove it, the spark goes out and springs up in a line utterly devoid of the qualities he had sought. Never was genius more unexpected nor more humbly announced, than Handel.

The same year, 1685, gave birth to both Bach and Handel, and the same country and community claimed the honor of their nativity. But never were two men more different. Bach was born with a heart and soul steeped in music. All his ancestry and many of his line after him were musicians,—noted musicians. Handel stood alone, an unsponsored gift to the world. He was born with no musical heritage save his own genius, and he made his way with no antecedent name to conjure with.

The father of Handel was a barber and town surgeon, the two offices in those days being performed by the same man. His life and interest were centered in the little town and community of Halle, in Saxony, where he had always lived. And here Georg Friedrich came to him, late in life.

Though poor himself, the father planned to give his boy the honorable career of law, and bent all his energies to that end. But Georg Friedrich loved music even from his babyhood, and his wild enthusiasm over it gave his father no little concern. At last it became so serious that lest he should be entirely ruined for the profession of law, he was forbidden music absolutely. He was neither to play nor to listen to music under penalty of his father's wrath.

But genius is not to be thwarted in that way. Georg Friedrich had a little harpsichord hidden away in his room, and muffling the strings, he practiced secretly, and made great progress. At eight years of age, and with no training, he could not only play, but actually compose!

One day when he was nine or ten, Fate gave him a kindly smile. The father traveled to the court of his elector, and little Georg was with him. He made friends with the court musicians, and when given a chance to play the organ, so surprised them that the duke immediately decreed that the boy should have training as a musician. His gold and his command reconciled the old father, and Georg Friedrich was installed at home with a professor, and was rapidly taught the fundamentals of music.

It is needless to remark his aptness. When yet a lad he was called to the post of organist in the town church, and for a year filled the position, playing and writing his own music. And then the wider world called him. At eighteen he started out in search of fame and place.

He first went to Berlin, though he knew no one there, and was thrown entirely on his own resources. But he could play a violin, and that earned him bread, and he was not long without friends. He learned much of practical life in Berlin, but it was not the mecca he sought, and he is next found in Hamburg, then noted as the patron city of opera. The best he struck there was a partner poor as himself, but ambitious, and together they dreamed wonderful dreams. Their first try for fame was a failure: the opera which they labored so long to produce and which they thought so good was not even given a hearing.

About this time Handel received a call from Lubeck to play the organ made vacant by the great Buxethude, but as the hand of Buxethude's daughter was a condition of the place, he flatly refused and went off to Italy instead. The fame of Italian opera had reached his ear, and he was drawn to it irresistibly. When he came back from Italy he was a confirmed advocate of the opera, and the fame of his travel gave him quick recognition. His first opera, "Almira," was an immense success, and he followed it with others in rapid succession.

Handel was ever a popular man, and in these early years the handsome, brilliant young composer was almost lionized.

His genius was the charmed word to every circle, and he was courted by all the elite. When twenty-four he was at the court of Brunswick, the man who was later to be King George I of England. It was while at the court of Brunswick that the great change in the course of his life came. Some English nobles who were visitors at the court, became greatly interested in him, and persuaded him to return with them to England. The year of Handel's entrance to London, 1710, marks the period of his greatest glory.

England was ripe for such a genius as Handel, and was ready for the Italian opera. She had no musician of her own; she adopted this German with enthusiasm. Of course there was much petty jealousy, and some vindictive criticism, but his art was given wonderful support, and Handel took the musical future of England to mold and stamp with his own individuality. From that time on Handel was English rather than German, and he has been called by no less man than Gladstone, "the greatest English composer." Arthur Sullivan has said, "Musical England owes more to Handel than to any ten men who can be named: he led the way for us all, and cut out a score we can only imitate."

Handel crowded his life full of purpose and labor, and leaves, after these centuries, a splendid record of achievement. One work alone was enough to have for ever made the name of Handel a synonym for genius. Far and above all his other service to society stands the "Messiah,"—his greatest work,—the greatest story of the Christ yet told in song. It has been said that the "Messiah" has clothed more orphans and fed more hungry than any music that has been written, and it seems especially fitting that it should have been conceived and dedicated to that sacred purpose.

Handel wrote the "Messiah" in twenty-one days—wrote it out of his heart with his own hand. It was first produced in Dublin, and never was there such a "first night." It took the warm Irish heart by storm, and charity was overwhelmed by the tide of offering. It was given for the poor, and the voice of Christ was answered in the response.

In London the "first night" was repeated. The debtor in jail and the poor in the almshouse were doubly blessed by the story of Christ transmuted into gold for them by the genius of Handel. The noblest of England were at the opera, and when the great "Hallelujah chorus" was reached, the King stood and with the people sang it again. Since that time the English audience has always claimed its right to stand and join in this chorus. The "Messiah" was Handel's greatest pride, and through his long life he conducted it once each year.

Handel never married. He was wedded to his art, and gave it his fullest devotion. He never lacked for friends, and was always a much-sought guest. And he not only had success in his art, but money flowed his way in a golden stream. At thirty he was independently rich, but again at fifty he was a bankrupt. Italian opera ruined him this once, and his experience as impressario cost him fifty thousand dollars in one week. He met his creditors honorably, and before he died had paid every dollar and was rich again. It was during this stress period that he composed "Saul," the immortal "Dead march" which will never be forgotten. In his last years, like Bach, he was blind, but he never grieved or worried. He died April 14, 1759, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, the greatest honor in the gift of the English people.

He was a foster-son to England, but he gave her the best his soul could give. He was German,—his home England, but then, as again the time must come, the brotherhood of man was bigger than the petty differences of race, and the German Handel, lying in England's honored sanctuary, is a holy pledge of the kinship of all men. A. E. M.

Our Familiar Hymns.—Part 2

"God moves in a mysterious way," was composed by Coper when the shadows of his troubled mind were darkening heavily. Believing that he was doomed to end his life in the River Ouse, he had ordered a carriage, and bidden the driver to proceed to a certain spot. For some reason this spot could not readily be found, and as the poet considered that this was the only place for such a suicide he reluctantly gave orders to turn homeward. Arriving there, he sat down and composed this hymn.

"Blest be the tie that binds," was written by Reverend John Fawcett, an English Baptist. He had received a call to London, and his farewell sermon had been preached, but his loving people clung around him and could not let him go. Finally, overwhelmed with the sorrow of those whom they were leaving, Doctor Fawcett and his wife determined to remain. He resolutely returned to his work on a salary of something less than two hundred dollars a year, and wrote this hymn to commemorate the event.

For wide usefulness and acceptance, scarcely any hymn can dispute the supremacy of Charles Wesley's, "Jesus, lover of my soul." Henry Ward Beecher once said of it: "I would rather have written that hymn of Wesley's than to have the fame of all the kings that ever sat on the earth." It is often called the sailor's hymn.

The hymn beginning, "I love to steal awhile away," was written by Phoebe Hinsdale Brown, and is another proof of the fact that a hymn must be lived before it can be written. It is never sung as it came originally from the pen of the author, but this is an instance where the pen of an amender was a necessity. Mrs. Brown was all her life poor. An orphan at two years, she was eighteen before she even learned to read. When this hymn was written she lived in a small, unfinished house, and with four little children and a sick sister, her only opportunity for meditation was to creep away, after the little ones were asleep, to the spacious grounds of a neighbor. Here, under the great elms, she believed herself alone, and the fragrance of the flowers, though their beauty was hidden in the darkness, was grateful to her starved senses. But even this was to be denied her through the stories of gossips who saw her, and one day the owner of the beautiful grove, a woman of wealth, meeting her at the home of a neighbor, said to her in a sneering tone, "Why do you come up at evening so near our house and then go back without coming in? If you want anything, why don't you come and ask for it?" The manner even more than the words grieved her. That evening she was alone; after the children were in bed, except the baby, she sat down in the kitchen with the little one in her arms, and out of her grief wrote what she called "My apology for my twilight rambles, addressed to a lady."

The first stanza of the hymnal version was the second of the original hymn (there were nine verses) and read: "I love to steal away from little ones and care." Read the hymn again with this story in mind, and you will appreciate its pathos. It will be of interest to know that one of her sons was the first missionary from the United States to Japan, and was sent out by the Reformed Dutch Church. It was he who composed the tune, "Monson," so named from Monson, Massachusetts, where she once lived. William B. Bradley also wrote a tune for it, naming it "Brown" for the author. Ninety years ago, this poor woman, beset by poverty and evil tongues, wrote these verses to ease her own aching heart, and how many another has found solace in singing them!

"Jesus, Savior, pilot me," was from the pen of Reverend Edward Hopper, for many years pastor of the Church of Sea and Land, New York City. His work among seafaring men made this phraseology familiar to him, but, while this hymn appeals especially to those who follow the sea, its simple imagery creates an instant picture for any who sing it. The hymn is especially fortunate in being wedded to a harmony that fits it perfectly. With only three distinct strains for a six-lined stanza, the music is full of the sweep of the wind and the dash of the waves.

It is difficult to realize that the author of "Lalla Rookh" also wrote "Come, ye disconsolate, where'er ye languish;" but genial Tom Moore was a writer of beautiful hymns. There is an Irish lilt and fervor in his lines, and they almost sing themselves. "O, thou who driest the mourner's tear," and "Thou art, O God, the life and light," are his also.

Fanny J. Crosby, blind from infancy, who wrote "Safe in the arms of Jesus," was the author also of the once popular songs "Hazel dell," "Rosalie, the prairie flower," and "There's music in the air."

Miss Sarah Doudney, author of "Savior, now the day is ending," was also the author of "The mill can not grind with the water that is past."

Addison, the well-known essayist, was at one time a passenger on a vessel off the coast of Italy in a terrible storm. Here, while the captain in despair was confessing his sins to a Capuchin friar who chanced to be on board, and the others gave up all for lost, Addison solaced himself by composing that hymn of trust and praise beginning, "How are thy servants blest, O Lord." Especially significant, remembering this, are the lines "When by the dreadful tempest borne, high on the broken wave." This was first published in the Spectator, and is usually called the "Traveler's hymn."

"One sweetly solemn thought" was written by Phoebe Cary when she was only seventeen years old. The great writers have contributed largely to our hymnology. O. W. Holmes has given us several, among them: "O love divine! that stooped to share our sharpest pang, our bitterest tear"; Whittier, the very human "We may not climb the heavenly steeps, to bring the Lord Christ down." Longfellow, T. W. Higginson, N. P. Willis, Adelaide Proctor, and Emily Huntington Miller are names often found in our hymnbooks.

One of the most beautiful of all is E. H. Sears's Christian carol, "It came upon the midnight clear, that wondrous song of old." It seems almost to sing itself, especially when set to the tune of "Carol." Heber, Bonar, and Faber and holy George Herbert are dear to all hymn lovers. One of our happiest translators is Doctor Neale. "Art thou weary, art thou languid?" and "For thee, O dear country," are his, and there are many others.

Few are aware that Toplady's well-known "Rock of ages" was originally written to clinch a controversial article against Methodism. Letters that passed between the author and John Wesley at that time are rank with bitterness. Toplady was a stern Calvinist, and he attempted in the article and hymn to show that God's sovereignty was all, and man's efforts availed nothing. "Should my tears for ever flow, should my zeal no languor know, this for sin could not atone," was really written in derision of Wesley's belief. In the years that have intervened the dispute has died a natural death and is forgotten, but as is frequently the case, the hymn has taken to itself a life of its own, and heavenly wings.

I have only skirted the vast shores of this subject, but I must mention one more. For exquisite beauty of imagery and word, read the early translation of "Jerusalem, my happy home, When shall I come to thee?" It was written in the time of Elizabeth, by a priest of the Roman Catholic Church, and in quaintness of diction it is like a rare jewel. This should not be confused with the hymn of Bernard of Cluny, which in the original is three thousand lines long; from the latter are taken the paraphrases, "Brief life is here our portion," "For thee, O dear, dear country," "Jerusalem, the golden," and "Jerusalem, the glorious." Neale translated the entire poem.

To the mass of people that sing them, our great hymns are creedless; but it may be of interest to them to know that in one of the most widely-used hymn books, Laudes Domin, the church affiliations of the authors are as follows: Episcopalians one hundred and twelve, Congregational forty, Baptist twenty-nine, Presbyterian twenty-eight, Methodist eleven, Roman Catholic seven, Independent six, Dutch Reformed three, Universalist two, Unitarian twenty-six, Plymouth Brethren five, Friends two.

Some music celestial lingers in every heart, kept alive by the fragrant memory crystalized in a hymn. Such hymns, whether old or new, will always be cherished.

Musical Notes

Lillian Nordica is said to have left nearly two millions by her will recently made public. By its terms her husband, George W. Young, receives nothing, the will claiming that he has already had $400,000; but Mr. Young's lawyer disputes this.

The Redpath Musical Bureau recently presented a Schumann-Heink recital at Omaha, the auditorium being crowded with eight thousand or more people, it is said. Tickets for the recital were sold at a moderate price, thus enabling many to attend who otherwise might not have done so.

The New York schools are giving a number of free lectures on music, under the management of the Board of Education, that are being well received and are growing in interest to quite an extent. Some results worth while are looked for as the outgrowth of the movement.

That there are still many American musicians in Berlin is indicated by the fact that in response to the call of a meeting of the American Luncheon Club, numbering one hundred and twenty Americans, seventy-five of the number had responded prior to the date set for the meeting.

Doctor Muck opened Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts with a German program. There are fourteen nationalities represented in the membership of the orchestra, and several of these will be represented in the future programs, the next one being provided with French music. Some thought that Doctor Muck read more eloquently than he did in 1912, when he presented some of the same program, but this may have been in the fancy of the hearers.

At the Metropolitan, German opera will be given this season, according to official reports, the concerts being largely for the benefit of the war sufferers.

Horatio Parker has won the $10,000 prize offered not long ago by the National Federation of Music Clubs, for an opera by an American composer. He was winner of a similar prize given by the Metropolitan Opera Company in 1912, and also of a prize given by Paderewski in 1901. Cambridge University conferred the Musical Doctor degree upon him some time ago.

Independence Music

We were privileged to hear the concert given by Independence choir preceding the talk by Judge Porterfield of the Juvenile Court of Kansas City, on "Citizen building," October 18, and we thought of the wonderful progress the church has made along musical lines.

We became reminiscent, and thought of the time when we had "congregational singing," and, according to our light, we did fairly well. One good brother made up in volume what he lacked in harmony. I doubt if he knew there was a key to music; anyway, if he did, he had lost it; the laborer is worthy of his hire, and he certainly earned his money! And dear Sister L., who loved to slur-r the high notes, and she did it real well, too, she was quite an artist at it. It certainly was effective. "Music sweet can soothe a savage, rend a rock or burst a cabbage."

Later on we thought we would try Bible music, which took us back to the time of Jubal, when they had the harp and organ. We bought an organ, and then we had "music." Some lost the key to harmony and dubbed the organ "wooden brother," and they "did not propose to sing with the wooden brother, so there!" Well, time heals all things, and a choir was started, made up largely of the music pupils of "Uncle Mark," and gradually harmony prevailed.

To-day we have in reality the Bible music; the flute and the cornet, violin, organ and "all kinds of musick"; and, told by the Lord to cultivate the gifts of music and song, as a result, efficiency is the watchword.

When the chorus choir and the large congregation arose to sing that grand old hymn, "Coronation," we felt that it was as pleasing to the Lord as the anthems of the angels, and truly accepted as such.

We were asked to criticize the choir work, but have been a Christian Scientist in that regard, and have been so satisfied that we saw nothing to criticize. You know that a bona fide, nickel plated, eighteen carat Christian Scientist never criticizes, as they only see the good and do not allow themselves to see the bad, if there is any. So our enjoyment of our splendid choir left nothing to be desired.

Items of Interest

I have been called to account by "ye editor" for not having outlined an account of my visit to the eastern reunion in behalf of the choir movement, and my regrets for my neglect are hereby posted. I will endeavor to review the effort and add a word or two relative to a more recent visit.

It is a wonderful feeling to leave the troublous world and drift in upon a camp of Israel with its spiritual calm and industrious students knocking at the gates of knowledge and wisdom, and fortifying themselves against the unfortunate conditions with which they might become enveloped unless this constructive work were a part of their development.

I was not surprised, and even anticipated that Arthur B. Phillips would find a blackboard and gather about him a few enthusiasts who were anxious to understand the mysteries of music. It was good to behold this splendid and humble beginning, and it added much to my own enthusiasm. I was happy at the large meeting of interested followers of this gentle art, and to feel the presence of the Spirit intimating that the time was ripe for a more consecrated service.

Sister Whiting, whose services in the past as soloist and choir director have been so deeply appreciated, has decided to render a more valiant service, even though it may be at a sacrifice of her musical education for the time being. This talented sister has been appointed as chorister of the Massachusetts District, and her visits to some of the branches have created enthusiasm in local endeavor. This whole district has caught the spirit of combined work, and are rehearsing now with an end in view of having a district choir at the Fall River conference. It was my pleasure to conduct two rehearsals of the Boston and Providence choirs. In the coming year I hope to become better acquainted with the musical forces of the Massachusetts District.

The Brooklyn, New York, and Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, choirs are in full swing for the winter's work. The combining of these two splendid organizations of over a hundred voices for concert and oratorical work as the season progresses is looked forward to by the music lovers of the district. The choirs are attracting singers from outside our church membership, and many are increasing their talents by studying under competent instructors. The vision of our work is enlarged with each successful venture, and the interest manifested stirs us to constant activity.

We were glad to welcome Sister Marie Riggs, our gifted pianist, who by reason of the troublous times in Germany was forced to discontinue her studies with Lavine. Sister Riggs is to study in New York for a few weeks, and the Saints of this district hope to hear her in concert before her return to the west.

Sister Ethel Kinnaman has returned from a successful tour of the country with Pryor's Band, and is continuing her studies with Percy Hemus, the famous baritone.

We are adding to the list of students Sister Nell Atkinson, of Lamoni, who has just arrived to take up the study of vocal endeavor. We are glad to see the serious intentions of those who are so wonderfully gifted.

We are looking forward to the time when every branch will have its own choir, no matter how small, so long as it is performing faithful and conscientious service. This effort has its own reward.

ALBERT N. HOXIE.

Independence Quavers

Just any occasion would have served the purpose, but it happened to be a wedding anniversary, which furnished the pretext for a most enthusiastic choir party on November 5, at the home and in honor of our faithful organist, Brother Ralph G. Smith. It was a complete surprise, too; in fact a chapter of them, not the least being the one Mrs. Smith sprung upon the surprisers, by having prepared a most dainty and delicious lunch, which threw their homemade candy entirely in the shade. A short program preceded the presentation to Brother Ralph of ten well chosen Victor records, and the playing of those same records, as well as others in his interesting collection, rounded out the pleasing and profitable entertainment. Thus did the members of the big choir delight to pay affectionate tribute to the faithfulness and efficiency of an officer, who, in all the sixteen years of his consecrated work here in the capacity of organist, has never failed to respond with courtesy, promptness and willingness to all demands made upon him.

Brother O. R. Miller has just closed a series of eleven "live-wire" sermons here, which have caused many people to "sit up and take notice." Welcome anything which will serve to awaken the Saints from their lethargy, and there is nothing clearer than the sight of a visitor among us—especially if he has his eyes open. The choir, because of the shortening time of preparation for their annual concert, was unable to come out in full numbers every night, but responded well when they were scheduled, the services intervening being brightened by individual solos or duets, and always by song services. The Sunday School Orchestra took charge for two of the evenings, one being their regular semi-monthly, half-hour concert on Sunday evening.

Savior, lead me lest I stray,
Gently lead me all the way;
I am safe when by thy side,
I would in thy love abide.

—Frank M. Davis.

Mothers' Home Column

EDITED BY CHRISTIANA SALYARDS

(We are exceedingly willing to give place this week to a letter, written by one of the noble mothers of the church. The spirit of the letter commends itself to those who read. This is gladly given space, as will be those of other interested women of the church who will send in their contributions to the Column. It is not designed that the editor of the Column shall fill its space at all times. Every communication that can be used to the general benefit of all is cordially welcome.—C. S.)

Dear Sister: While reading the April Autumn Leaves, I read a little verse which appealed to me so strongly that I am sending a line which may encourage some sister or friend, and in so doing fully repay me for my effort.

The quotation from Henry van Dyke is:

"Let me but do my work from day to day,
In field or forest, at the desk or loom,
In roaring place or tranquil room:
Let me but find it in my heart to say,
When vagrant wishes beckon me astray—
'This is my work, my blessing, not my doom,
Of all who live, I am the one by whom
This work can best be done in the right way.'"

Wouldn't it be wonderful if we could all say: "This is my work, my blessing,"—never think of our condition as a sacrifice, but really as a blessing, a work which can only be performed in the way God wills, by us, and then concentrate our efforts to make it a success.

As mothers, we may not find our work in "tranquil" rooms. My little ones (four of them) furnish many deep and interesting things to think about and to pray over, because I do not believe I could train my children in the way I wish them to grow if it were not that I have such a patient and loving heavenly Father.

I used to think of the rearing of children as a task, and a very, very difficult one at that, but now, when I think of it more as a privilege, and reflect that such an all-wise Father is ready to guide and assist me, it doesn't seem nearly such a formidable task. Not that I do not feel the responsibility resting upon me, but it makes me more patient and helps me to be better, in order to set them an example worthy of imitation.

I heard a mother, not long ago, when her little son ran to her calling: "Mamma! mamma!" impatiently exclaim, "Oh, I wish I had never heard that word, mamma;" and I wondered in my heart if that mother loved her boys. She asked never a question of what was wrong. Possibly a minute's time would have settled the matter, and how much better the child would have felt.

We forget, some of us at least, that we were once children. Instead of living with them, we seem to place ourselves in one class and them in another, as something vastly inferior, when, really, if we studied, watched and prayed, ever keeping as nearly as possible ready for the inexhaustible supply of questions with which they seem to be endowed, we might more fully appreciate our work and look on our babies, not as a hindrance or stumbling block to some ambition we may have had, but regarding the care of them as a nobler, grander career God has chosen for us, knowing us so much better than we know ourselves.

We must wage a constant battle for self-control, against an unruly temper or some other enemy. We can not all have good tempers, but we may have good control of bad ones; and I have found that to be an accomplishment requiring quite a lot of work.

None of us, we are taught, are perfect, but many of us are weaker than others, and as one of the weak ones I desire the prayers of God's people, that he in his infinite wisdom, will make me a better mother and Saint in rearing my little ones, so they may be upright, worthy women and men, and that I may diligently strive to perform my work acceptably before God.

We may never be known outside our own family or immediate community, but if we train our boys and girls to be godly men and women, we will have really achieved a work as great in results as has been done by our more talented sisters along some other line.

FLORENCE DUNCAN.

Auxiliary Work Among Young Women

The editor was specially pleased recently to receive a letter from a young sister who at one time attended Graceland College. In the letter she refers pleasantly to her enjoyment of the work taken there; of experiences since out in "the world"; of enjoyable meeting since then with an old-time Graceland roommate, and other matters of interest.

But that which causes the editor to mention the receipt of this letter is the inquiry of the young lady for information concerning literature to be used in a circle of the Woman's Auxiliary just organized in the branch where she lives.

The letter says: "We have a goodly number of young people under twenty years of age, and also we have a good many mothers, young and inexperienced."

This is a field in which the Woman's Auxiliary is particularly anxious to work, among the young women who are entering upon the especial work of women, that work of which the writer in the letter published above wrote, naming it "a noble and grand career" appointed unto women by Him who knows better than we that which is best calculated to develop us in worthy directions.

As we have already said, we were very greatly pleased to receive the letter of our young friend, and to note the awakening interest in a movement that can not fail to yield good results, if the work be carried on.

The letter states that the circle is as yet a very small one. It is a sad fact that this is true of many circles that should be largely attended. The reason is that the merit in the work of the Woman's Auxiliary is not realized. We trust, however, that the good work may grow and prosper and yield its contribution to the general work of uplift going on in the world at the present time.

This letter of our young sister, inquiring for literature of the Woman's Auxiliary, is the second we have recently received, since mention of our work was made in these columns. Let others come, should there be any who desire information. We hand them over to Sister Callie B. Stebbins, to whom you may write direct should you choose.

Prayer Union

SUBJECTS FOR THE FOURTH THURSDAY IN NOVEMBER

Thanksgiving Day: As this is our national Thanksgiving Day we will conform our program to it, and make it a day of thanksgiving for all the blessings that we as a church have received, as well as for our national peace and prosperity. With prayer that the same may be continued.

Lesson: Psalm 107; memory verse, Ephesians 5: 20.

REQUEST FOR PRAYERS

We are in receipt of a letter from Sister Ida Mae Bergeresen, of Radville, Saskatchewan, requesting an interest in our prayers. This sister was formerly a resident of Lamoni and is well and favorably known to many here. She is troubled with nervous weakness, from which she has suffered for some time. She desires to be more able to do a mother's duty toward her two young children. One of the children has been afflicted from birth, has been operated upon and seemed to be greatly improved, but needs to undergo another operation. This tender little child is but three years of age. Her mother asks the Saints to pray also for her, seeking unto Him who is both powerful and kind to relieve our distress.

Cooperative Missionary Work

[The following, from a nonmember of the church, should serve as a stimulus to those who are able to assist in the spread of the truth by means of the very liberal offer of the Ensign Publishing House, referred to in the communication as appearing herewith.—EDITORS.]

The time of year for the great reduction in price of the Ensign has come, being reduced to fifty cents a year to nonmembers. By economizing and staying away from the shows and parks, I was able last year to send the Ensign to nearly 500 nonmembers in different parts of the world. Now the time is at hand to send to nonmembers again; and if all will help we can send Ensigns to two or three thousand. So let everyone send as many as he can, whether it be one or one hundred.

If you can't pay for all you know will read it, send to all you can, then send me the names and addresses of those you can not send to, and I will send to them. Also you missionaries, when you get someone interested in this latter-day work send me his name and address; also you nonmembers send me your addresses. You are only asked to read and investigate; that is all it will cost you.

Let's all help together,

E. STAFFORD.

Emma Burton

Do you wonder why I use this heading? Well, I will tell you. It is to attract your attention. If that name will not do it, I know of none among the myriad hosts of womankind that will.

But I have another, and deeper reason for using it: Sister Burton has written her autobiography. Notice of it has been given in THE SAINTS' HERALD, with request that those who wish to buy the book will send their names to her to insure its publication.

When I saw the notice my heart rejoiced, and I said, "Is such a treat in store for us?" and at once wrote to the sister submitting my name for the book. But judge my surprise when she replied that the probabilities are that the book will never be published, as only a few names have been sent in compared with what are required, and its publication depends on one thousand names being sent in.

When the first surprise passed away I began to think: It is over twenty years since her autobiography under the name "Beatrice Witherspoon" appeared in the Autumn Leaves, and we who were then the young people of the church are not any longer designated as such. And those who are now rising to the cause of Zion, the boys and girls of the church, do not know what a rare treat is offered to them in this book. Besides this, thousands of the older members of the church have come in since that publication in the Autumn Leaves, and they, too, have no idea of the value of this autobiography.

I was young and inexperienced in the church when I read

Sister Burton's autobiography, and its effects have never left me. In many ways it has been an inspiration to me through life. Her rich spiritual experiences have been like a beacon light to beckon me on to nobler effort when the way has seemed dark and lonely.

Think of it, Saints; you are offered for the small sum of one dollar a book which contains the life history of the greatest woman missionary of former or latter ages of whom the church has knowledge.

Blessed in her childhood under the hands of an angel; marvelously rescued from the very jaws of death in her girlhood; passing through varied and wonderful experiences in her early womanhood; brought in touch with the gospel at a later date, and finally entering her great life work as a missionary, traveling with her husband from land to land, and from ocean to ocean, she is at once a unique character in the church, and one from whom we may all learn a great deal.

Nor is this all: for the Almighty, recognizing her faithfulness and usefulness in his service, conferred upon her a degree of authority through the laying on of hands of his priesthood, by which she was more fully endowed with the qualifications necessary for her extensive missionary labors; and by which she was given the right to anoint with oil for the healing of the sick.

I believe that five different times she and her husband prosecuted missions in the South Sea Islands, and as the Spirit of the Lord indicated when she was set apart for her work, she was of much benefit to her dark-skinned sisters on the islands of the sea. Canada, the United States, and far-off Australia have also been blessed by her missionary labors.

It was she, who, with her husband, crossed the Pacific in the little Evanelia, braving the perils of the mighty deep in a vessel the only fitness of which for such a trip was its dedication to the Lord.

Librarians the world over, you need this book in your libraries.

Parents, you need it in your homes. There is no book issued by the church (except the standard works) which will, in my estimation, prove a greater blessing in the hands of your children than this one.

When we Saints in Ontario read that part of it that was published years ago, we feasted upon it as it appeared in the Leaves from month to month, and then we went over it again in our conversations among ourselves when we met. The Autumn Leaves were passed from one to another, that all might have a chance to read the beautiful story; and I am satisfied I could renew the conversation with the same parties to-day, though twenty years have glided by since reading it, and in many instances memory would be true to the interesting charge we then committed to her care.

Sister Burton's husband has passed over the great divide, and she is no longer in the active missionary work, but the publication of her book will allow her labors to go on and on and be reproduced in the lives of others. For if you want your young people to be active workers in the cause, to become the great men and women of the church, great as the Savior interpreted greatness, you must feed them on that kind of food.

Books are companions, and we become like the company we keep. Ideals are formed from what we read, and we become what our ideals are; and you can find no higher standards in the books of the world than those erected in the life work of this wonderful woman.

We owe to ourselves and to our young people the purchase of this book. It will prove a character builder among us. And we owe to Sister Burton at least this recognition of her labors of the past. Let it not be said of us as was said of Spain in the Middle Ages, that she cared little for her servants when their days of usefulness were over.

Young people of the church, in whose bosoms the zeal of youth is throbbing, you need this book. You will not consider it any trouble to write to Sister Burton and tell her you want it. Write to-day; for we need its publication just as soon as we can get it—we need it now. Her address is: Mrs. Emma Burton, 620 West 5th Street, Santa Ana, California.

Some may think this is written from a motive of personal friendship for the sister. That could scarcely be true, for I have never had the pleasure of meeting Sister Burton, and until I sent my name as one who would purchase her book I never heard from her. My only acquaintance with her has been through her writings, and I am thankful for that acquaintanceship, for eternity alone will tell how much it has helped me. And I am only one of thousands who have benefited by the same privilege, through the church publications.

No money is required at present for the book, but only the promise to take one when it is published.

May everyone who reads this appeal say within himself, "It is the lack of my name that is preventing the publication of this book," and write Sister Burton at once and give her his name, that the church be not deprived of this choice gem of literature. Let your name be one of the thousand that shall call for its publication.

MAGGIE MACGREGOR.

BENZONIA, MICHIGAN, October 7, 1914.

Editors Herald: I never tire of telling how I love this gospel. I am grieved many times because I do not live more faithful. When I feel down-hearted and discouraged, it affords me much comfort to read the cheering and instructive letters in the HERALD. God has been very good to me, and I feel like sharing my blessings with the Saints.

A little over a week ago a serious illness came near being my undoing, and were it not for the fact that God's Spirit protected me through a trying operation, I fear I should have lost hope and given up in despair. God will never forsake us if we only put our trust in him.

The time is very near when the Shepherd will call his sheep. I humbly ask the Saints to pray for me that I may live well enough to be gathered into the fold with the rest of his precious ones.

Praying that we may all soon be united in the one band, I remain,
EUNICE SCOFIELD.

GALES FERRY, CONNECTICUT, October 20, 1914.

Editors Herald: Myself and two sons attended the conference at Fall River, Massachusetts, and were very greatly edified by the sermons and testimonies. My soul was blessed in listening to President Fred M. Smith, Sunday afternoon. The sermon was "The war in Europe." He discussed the many occasions when nations had settled far more serious questions by arbitration, and stated that he hoped Palestine would fall into the hands of a Christian nation.

My daughter and her husband live near New Britain, Connecticut. She says a census taker came and asked her what church she attended, and when she told him the Reorganized Latter Day Saint Church he informed her that there were some Saints living in Middleton, and that they met in one of the sister's houses. I wish any of the Middleton Saints who may read this to inform me of their address, as my daughter and her husband expect to move near Middleton, and would be pleased to meet with them.

Ever praying for the redemption of Zion, I remain,
THOMAS E. WHIPPLE.

Pittsburg, Ohio

At the last General Conference I was appointed to labor in the Pittsburg, Ohio, District. After reaching home and making the necessary preparations, I left for my field via Steubenville, where I joined the district president, James Bishop. I remained over night with him, being royally cared for by his noble companion, and in company with him, we departed for Wellsburg, West Virginia, where we held forth in a neat little hall which had been fixed up by the two or three brethren residing there. This meeting required considerable expense, which evidenced the interest on the part of these brethren, and their desire to get the gospel before their neighbors. At the close of our effort, we were privileged to baptize two precious souls in the Ohio River, husband and wife. We left others near the kingdom.

Brother Bishop and I separated, he going to Glen Easton. The writer was permitted to associate with the new missionary, John Carlisle, of New Philadelphia, Ohio. Together, we made our way to Glencoe, Ohio. We occupied at this place in a hall until we were excluded by the rent being raised to $5 a night. Satan is very cunning in the invention of schemes and the securing of servants to carry them out, and he is no respecter of persons, for every nationality that will work for him is accepted of him. We left two young ladies with the desire to be baptized, but whose parents thought they should wait a while.

From here we went to Wheeling, West Virginia, to attend a two-day meeting, after which we were requested to put forth an effort on the streets, which we did with good interest, James Pycock and R. C. Russell occupying the two nights. A good work might have been done had proper encouragement and support been given. May the Lord hasten the day when all will see that the greatest investment that can be made outside of the necessities of life is in helping every department of God's work.

From Wheeling we wended our way homeward, and to the reunion at New Philadelphia. Here we enjoyed immensely the association of the Saints. We were requested to go to Southern Ohio where Brethren N. L. Booker and Cecil Neville had held tent services three weeks before the reunion. None were baptized, but prejudice was removed and many were interested. We left this place with a request to return. If the effort is properly followed up, a number will unite with the church.

From here we went to Hazel, Ohio, where arrangements had been made for a debate between N. L. Booker and an Elder Lay, a representative of the non-Progressive Christian Church. Each affirmed his church six nights, with half hour speeches each. Our opponent signed propositions affirming his church restored by Alexander Campbell, and tried to prove a continuous succession from Pentecost, but failed to produce a single link in the chain.

He claimed the man child of Revelation 12 was Constantine, and Brother Booker made it so warm on this point that the next night he had him the man of sin. He stated that they had twelve apostles, but that they were all in heaven, as also were their prophets. He contended that these were not needed now. Brother Booker showed the purpose of God in the placing of these officials in the church, and that they were to be continued until a unity of faith was reached, which time was not yet come, as evidenced by this discussion.

Elder Lay boldly called Brother Booker a liar two or three different times. Brother Booker just looked at him and laughed, and by doing so won the confidence of the people.

The squire who acted as chairman, gave our opponent a calling down for the third offense.

The only thing used against us outside the Bible were some of R. B. Neal's trash, which was misapplied, especially the extract that Brother Roth had used from another man's sermon in one of his subjects, in which it was said that McKinley would be the last president, and that one State would be carried over into the other. An effort was made to show that Brother Roth had made these predictions. Brother Booker requested that he be permitted to read the pamphlet, but was refused. As Brother Booker's moderator, I appealed to the chairman, who requested Elder Lay to allow Brother Booker to read the statement. He still refused. I then appealed to the audience, who sustained our contention, and still the man refused. He later acknowledged that he had misapplied this reference, claiming it was a mistake.

He read from the Book of Mormon, making it to say the world would be judged out of it and by it. Brother Booker showed that the statement in the Book of Mormon said that the world would be judged out of the books that should be written. Similar attempt was repeatedly made to misquote from the other books of the church. At different times Elder Lay asserted that the books said so and so, when they said no such thing. Brother Booker placed the books before him and ask him to read from them. He did not touch them only once, and then could not find what he wanted.

When Brother Booker spoke the people were orderly and attentive, but when Elder Lay occupied they were very disorderly and many left the room. The discussion was begun in a schoolhouse, but when one of the school board found that his man was getting the worst of it he called the board together and when we reached the building Saturday evening we found a notice: "Schoolhouse closed against Sunday schools, debates, and other services, except by permission of the board." Some of the crowd wished to enter, others did not. We took the boards we were using for seats and seated the people along the side of the road, and went on with the debate. Next day lumber was secured and seats arranged on Brother Clay Jones's land near the schoolhouse, where the debate was continued to its close.

After holding two sessions on Sunday that we might close the debate that night, and just as we reached our destination, three miles away, we discovered a fire in the vicinity of the schoolhouse. Next morning Brother Jones informed us that some one had burned his barn. How Satan will rave when the truth is being presented!

Every barrier seems to be torn down, most all prejudice removed and many are interested. At the close of the debate three were baptized, all heads of families. At the last session I gave opportunity to any who wished to unite with us, and these parties stepped forward and gave their names. Brother Booker returned home, while I remained and preached in private houses for two weeks. Some who were most against us at the beginning of the debate invited me to preach in their homes. The man who had acted as chairman, and his family, were especially urgent in their invitation. Lay had baptized the daughter, and this gentleman himself was thinking of joining their church, but he said he was going now to make a thorough investigation of our work.

There are about thirty members at this place with no one to lead them. An effort is being made to solicit funds and build a church. May they be successful. We pray God to add his blessing to this end.

Still in the conflict, and hoping to remain faithful until the victory is won, I am,

Your brother,
JAMES MCCONNAUGHY.

AKRON, OHIO, October 22, 1914.

New York

We are laboring in New York District, territory embracing that part of the world in which the church had its beginning in this dispensation, including Palmyra, Manchester, etc., and whence arose the bitter persecution that finally terminated, in a way, in the death of the Prophet.

In passing through this section as I have often done, my eyes resting upon the four spires of the four churches in the town of Palmyra, situated as they are on the four corners of the main street, their spires pointing heavenward, there has been brought to my mind the trials, the suffering, and persecution endured by those who were intrusted with the sacred and solemn truths of God, at the hands of those who in their way worshiped beneath these spires. I have often thought that from the appearance and actions of the people at large through that section they are left to themselves since their rejection of the servants of God, and hence rejected Christ and his work, are lacking in his favor, and apparently show it.

I have been informed that the Brighamites have purchased the farm on which the Hill Cumorah is situated. It has been asked, Why do our people stand by and permit these from Utah to have first choice and chance at all the sacred spots. One reason I assign is that the elements which compose this hill are little different from those of any other hill, hence are of no greater value, and need not be honored any more. The monument of God's mercy has been removed from Cumorah. The sacred thing which this hill once held within its grasp has been taken therefrom, and, by the wisdom of God and by his mighty power manifested in behalf of the much persecuted instrument of his choice, has been translated and given to the world, that men might profit by its glorious truths; while those who pretend to reverence the hill have very little use for that which the hill gave forth for the benefit of man. Better is it that we honor God and the sacred record which through his loving mercy was brought to light in this age, than pretend that we reverence the mound of dirt or earth that once held the sacred record entombed.

In the Holy Land to-day thus I presume are those who look upon the tomb that once held the holy and undefiled body of the Christ and reverence this sepulcher, but at the same time deny the one who once laid there.

The work in the district seems to be onward. Efforts are being made for further development spiritually. The waters have been troubled a number of times this year, and quite a number of young men have come forward and offered themselves a sacrifice. I trust God will grant unto them the grace necessary to keep them faithful.

There has been organized in one of the branches a young men's study class, the object being to learn what the standard books of the church contain, which is commendable. Every two weeks they earnestly study from the Doctrine and Covenants, in order to become better acquainted with the teachings and doctrines of the church.

Our two-day meeting held at La Salle, New York, October 8 and 9, was a very pleasant occasion, all present enjoying themselves. Our district conference held in Buffalo, New York, October 24 and 25, was certainly an educational one. It was well attended, and quite spiritual. The papers contributed by A. H. Parsons, M. C. Fisher, A. M. Chase, F. C. Mesle, and A. D. Angus were of excellent quality, and did excellent service. The music was of a high order and well rendered. The round table feature was the means of advancing many good thoughts upon the Order of Enoch and its relation to the church. All were benefited.

The prospects for the future in this district seem bright.

I find an excellent class of people throughout the district, who with proper education will certainly develop in a way that will help to push the work of God forward. Financially they are doing well, and spiritually they are improving. We are hopeful for their future, and the future for the district seems brighter as the days come and go.

A little band of Saints at South Granby, New York, have been organized into working condition. Those of the elders who have worked in and around Fulton, New York, will be interested to know that the Fulton Branch has been, in a way, transferred to South Granby, the greater part of the work being done there at present. Sunday school work is flourishing there, and their record is commendable. There are some twenty-four members, and their record for sixteen weeks shows an average attendance of a little over one hundred per cent. Three classes in the school, and two full classes every Sunday, three full classes every Sunday except three. All officers and teachers were in their places every Sunday except two. A good record; may it be followed up.

We are hopeful for the future, and pray God's blessings will be upon every effort for the advancement of the work.

Your brother in gospel bonds,

A. E. STONE.

Kewanee District

The work in this district tends to move upward; although many may think it moving slowly, yet, to us, conditions look brighter and brighter each day. The spiritual condition of the Saints seems to be better than heretofore, which we believe is largely due to the special efforts being put forth among several of the branches.

Since the Millersburg two-day meeting, September 26 and 27, we have held special union services at Joy and Buffalo Prairie, which created so much enthusiasm that Matherville has asked for one November 8, and Dahinda for a two-day meeting November 14 and 15. Saints from the surrounding branches attend and enjoy a sociable time, rejoicing in the influence of God's Spirit. At least such has been the case thus far in our assembling. The gifts of the gospel have been manifested, bringing peace to our souls and filling each with a determination to press spiritually onward and upward.

Monday, October 26, we went to Moline, in company with Brother O. E. Sade, to begin a series of meetings with the Twin City Branch, which convened October 31 and November 1. We did not have a large attendance, due to the fact that many of the Saints were busy preparing to entertain the coming conference. Monday evening I was called to officiate at a wedding, and Thursday evening, by invitation from the Kewanee Religio, I attended their Halloween festivities. This left Brother Sade to hold the fort alone, and I assure you he is thoroughly competent.

Arriving at Kewanee, great was our surprise to see the church decorated so beautifully, and especially the basement, where the festivities occurred. These decorations consisted of corn stalks, corn on strings, autumn leaves, etc. The lights were secured with yellow crepe paper, around which witches were riding on broom sticks, while black cats and bats of every description were clinging to a network of decorations, amid Japanese lanterns of every hue. A lovely program was rendered in the upper auditorium, after which all were invited to the basement for refreshments. As president of the Religio at this place, Brother Roy Healy is doing a good work. We are certain of a bright future for him, if faithful to his covenant.

Saturday morning, in company with Brother William R. Norris, Sisters Richard Norris, and Isabell Bentchan, of Kewanee, we boarded the train for Moline to attend the Sunday school and Religio conventions, meeting at 3 p. m. These societies met in mass convention, with the writer and Brother William R. Norris in charge. Delegates were selected to the General Conventions, for which the order of the meeting was changed to a round table discussion. A number of speeches were made on points vital to Sunday school and Religio work. A program given in the evening was a success, thanks to those who so kindly responded to our invitation to help in the preparation of same.

Conference opened Saturday at 9 a. m., with prayer service, and this, as well as all other sessions, was attended by a goodly portion of God's Spirit. The Sunday morning prayer session was marked by an extra portion of the Spirit's presence, which brought peace and comfort to all. The dedicatory service at 2.30 was the largest attendance of the conference. Brother Sherman Hartsock, president of Twin City Branch, had charge of this session. The prayer was offered by Elder Alfred C. Needham, the sermon being by O. E. Sade, president of the district. A fine sentiment prevailed throughout the service, bearing witness that the offering of the people was accepted.

Wednesday we came to Matherville, where O. E. Sade and the writer are holding services. We are expecting a goodly number to attend a special meeting to be held here Sunday. The Saints here have purchased the Family Theater building, and are quite cozy in their new quarters, now having a place they can call their own.

From here we go to Dahinda to begin meetings preparatory to the two-day meeting already mentioned.

Knowing that the cause of God will triumph, let us press on with renewed vigor.

Hopefully yours,

MATHERVILLE, ILLINOIS, November 6. JOHN R. GRICE.

Omaha, Nebraska

"Standing by a purpose true,
Heeding God's command,
Honor them, the faithful few,
All hail to Daniel's band."

The sacrament service was well attended, the glorious first Sunday, and quite spiritual. How willingly the "faithful few" would listen to others, whose voices are so seldom heard. What greater blessings the body would receive if all were "valiant in testimony."

The visits of Elder J. A. Gillen, on October 25, and Bishop E. L. Kelley, on November 1, were much appreciated. Others who have occupied the pulpit of late are: Elders M. A. Peterson, H. A. Scott, Paul N. Craig, and W. E. Stoff, priest.

A number of the Saints are afflicted, including: Brother Glenn Lynch, in South Omaha, Willie Eden, at Saint Joseph's Hospital, J. A. Williams, Bancroft, Nebraska, at the Swedish Mission, and Brother Arthur Spence, still improving. The prayers of God's people are asked for these dear ones and others. Sister C. E. Butterworth is at the Omaha General Hospital, and trusts all will remember her.

The Sunday school classes until Christmas time are competing for a banner: each member after being present four Sundays on time will receive a blue button, and the class receiving the largest percentage of buttons will be awarded the banner. The Religio officers have also started a rivalry by dividing the members into the reds and blues, each receiving credits for being on time, bringing new members, etc., the losing side at the end of the year to furnish refreshments to the winners.

In two of our public schools five hundred boys have prom-

What There's Time For

Lots of time for lots of things,
Though it's said that time has wings.
There is always time to find
Ways of being sweet and kind;
There is always time to share
Smiles and goodness everywhere;
Time to send the frowns away,
Time a gentle word to say;
Time for helpfulness, and time
To assist the weak to climb;
Time to give a little flower,
Time for friendship any hour;
But there is no time to spare
For unkindness anywhere.—Jewels.

Do Your Shopping Early

---

When you do your Christmas shopping, remember these commandments:

“The Spirit saith further . . . and both in private and in public expenditure carry into active exercise the principle of sacrifice and repression of unnecessary wants.”—Doctrine and Covenants 130: 7.

“Seek ye out of the best books words of wisdom; seek learning even by study and also by faith.”—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 36.

“I give unto you a commandment . . . study and learn and become acquainted with all good books,” etc.—Doctrine and Covenants 87: 5.

Put these commandments together and you will feel that you are keeping the spirit of them by investing in any of the church publications, either for others or for yourself.

A Christmas or New Year's present of this character will be of the very best kind—real, satisfying soul food.

To study and learn good books, we must possess them, and in securing them we are avoiding expenditure of our means for unnecessary wants.

If you haven't one of our catalogues, send for it immediately.

Health First

In buying food articles we must consider several things—economy, results, convenience, reliability; but the most important is Health.

Health means everything. If one gets cheated in buying dresses, shoes or bonnets it is provoking, but the harm is chiefly loss of money. In buying food articles, if imitations or poor stuffs are supplied, there is a loss of money and probably an injury to health also; and good health is beyond price.

Remember these facts when buying baking powder.

STANDING OUR GROUND

Paul exhorts us in the Ephesian letter, "Having done all, to stand." There come times when having done all that is possible the best we can do is to hold our position. Those are trying times. Any soldier will tell you that the hardest experience in soldier life is to be placed where one must serve as target for the enemy without the privilege of replying, and without permission to advance or retreat. It is comparatively easy to go forward when the bugles are sounding a charge, when everyone is cheering, and enthusiasm is in the air. It is easy to run away when everyone is retreating and rout and ruin is all around. It is quite a different thing to remain, holding our ground, waiting for the moment to come when we or our comrades may strike the effective blow.

Yet those times come in our warfare in the great latter-day work,—times when we are waiting for God to speak and it seems not wisdom to go forward without direction; times when to go backward is ruin. There are times when God tells us to occupy in a lowly place and we think we ought to go to a higher place; and times when he says to come to a high position and we do not feel competent to occupy there. There are times, also, when we are exposed to the attack of pulpit and press and are denied any opportunity to make effective reply.

At one time the church under Moses reached a critical period in its history. Moses had gone from the midst of the people and was communing with God. God was giving him the law. When that law was fully given they would be in condition to go forward in its execution; until then, all that the people in wisdom could do was to wait. But they were like men to-day,—they could not stand still. They must be doing something; so they made them an image of gold. "Up," they said, "make us gods, which shall go before us." The anger of God was kindled against them, and instead of making progress they lost a great deal of the advantage they had gained.

In 1844 there came a critical time in the history of God's people. The church had lost its earthly leader and was exposed on every side to the attacks of bitter and unreasoning persecution. It was a time of darkness and confusion that tried men's souls. Many went squarely back on their position, lost faith, and laid down the armor. Others essayed to go forward without waiting for God to speak. They only brought dishonor and disaster upon the cause.

But there were some who said, "We can not go backward because we know the work is of God. We can not go forward without direction. We have done all we can, and here we stand until God speaks, if we stand here for ever." It was a wise decision—"Having done all, to stand."

In time God spoke, a leader was sent, and the work moved forward under the Reorganization. Those people who stood their ground saved the name of the church. They were the only men in all that number who kept pure and clean the good name of the cause they loved. In the inexorable march of events some of those others have been compelled to stand up in the chief city of the Nation, with the eyes of the world on them, and admit that they have kept neither the laws of God nor the laws of the land. The men of the Reorganization before as great a multitude may truly say that they have kept the laws of God and therefore have not found it necessary to violate the laws of the land.

CURRENT EVENTS

SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

ALEXANDRIA MODERNIZED.—The municipality of Alexandria, Egypt, has ordered for that city a modern drainage system, comprising sewers, pumping station, and outlet to the sea.

ITALIAN AGRICULTURE.—A school of colonial agriculture has been established by the Italian Ministry of Agriculture, at S. Llaro, Italy. A three-year course is prescribed for fitting students for practical farming in the Italian colonies.

SCIENTISTS HELD.—A number of distinguished German scientists attending a meeting in Australia of the British Association for the advancement of science, are interned on account of the war. They are receiving the best of treatment, and are supplied with funds by the treasury of the British Association.

LORD ROBERTS PASSES.—Field Marshall Lord Roberts, eighty-two years of age, and at the time visiting troops in France, died of pneumonia, on the 14th. Lord Roberts was for many years active as a soldier in various British colonies. He was regarded as among the first military men of his time, and was loved by his countrymen.

AMERICAN BOAT UNDER FIRE.—For reasons yet unknown, the Turkish forts at Vourla, commanding the entrance of the Bay of Smyrna, on the 16th fired on a launch sent by the United States Tennessee to inform the authorities that the warship wished to enter the harbor of Smyrna. The United States has asked the Ottoman Government for an explanation. The Tennessee and North Carolina remain near the forts pending information.

STOCK INFECTION CONTROLLED.—In addition to the eight States named in our report of the 11th of the spread from Chicago of the foot and mouth disease among stock, Maryland, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, New Jersey, and Delaware were placed under quarantine. Yielding to the stringent regulations in operation, this infection seems now well under control. The Chicago yards were on the 16th opened to stock from territory not under quarantine, and the packers of the city resumed work.

PROHIBITION IN RUSSIA.—On the 16th an edict went into effect in Russia prohibiting the sale of alcoholic beverages throughout the country. This was the last of three prohibitive acts, the first curtailing the sale of vodka, the second abolishing it, third the prohibiting the sale of all alcoholics. These reforms have been brought about since the declaration of war and in the interests of an efficient army and people. Since the manufacture and sale of vodka has been a government monopoly, enforcement of the prohibition edict should not be difficult.

ENGLISH PARLIAMENT.—On the 16th by unanimous vote, the House of Commons authorized a war loan of $1,725,000,000, and 1,000,000 additional men for the army. Fifty million dollars is to be loaned to Belgium and $4,000,000 to Servia without interest until the end of the war. Chancellor Lloyd-George stated in the Commons that 2,000,000 men were already serving the country under arms, and that it would require $2,250,000,000 to finance the war for a year. Premier Asquith on the same day announced in the Commons that the whole of the North Sea had been put under martial law, and that oil and copper would be declared contraband.

LABOR TROUBLES.—Additional authority to operate certain coal mines in Arkansas was on the 16th granted the receivership by Judge Youmans. The American Federation of Labor, on the 18th, by unanimous vote petitioned the President to insist that the Colorado coal operators immediately comply with the federal plan of settlement, and that in their failure to do so a receiver be appointed and the mines be operated under federal supervision until an adjustment be reached. The salary of the president of the American Federation was increased from five thousand to seven thousand, five hundred dollars per year, and that of the secretary from four thousand to five thousand.

BOLD ROBBERY.—On the 17th, two men, leaving a touring car chugging at the curbing, entered the North American Loan Bank in Chicago and with drawn guns drove the manager into the private office, forcing him to open a safe from which they secured diamonds and jewelry valued at twenty-five thousand dollars. Leaving tied the manager and three other men who had entered the office on business, the thieves took to the automobile with the jewelry in a suit case, and before alarm could be given were rapidly driven to hiding. So daring and so skillful have men become in plying their vocations of vice that such an event may occur during the broad light of day and in the very presence of the police protection of our larger cities.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—Report the first of the week that General Guitierrez, chosen provisional president by the Aguas Calientes convention, had demanded Carranza's retirement as first chief of the Constitutionalists within twenty-four hours, was followed by the announcement that Carranza was willing to withdraw in favor of Guitierrez and go into exile if Villa would do likewise, and that Villa was ready to comply with these conditions if necessary for peace. Then came the statement from Carranza that he had been misunderstood; that he had never intended to deliver the executive power except to General Gonzales or some other of his own selection and in whom he had confidence. Villa is retained in charge of the forces representing the Aguas Calientes convention. He has occupied Leon without resistance, the Carranza garrison having retired. He continues his undisputed march toward Mexico City, latest advices stating that he has entered Irapuato, south of Leon, and is pressing on to Queretaro, about half way between Leon and Mexico City. General Obregon is reported entraining troops at the latter point for Orizaba, near Cordoba, where Carranza has been stationed, and to the west of Vera Cruz. Six civilians have been injured and one killed by stray shots crossing to the United States side of the boundary line at Naco where desultory fighting continues.

EUROPEAN WAR.—A lull in the fierce fighting in northern France and Belgium was reported the first of the week. Severe storms of rain, sleet and snow, however, prevented rest to the exhausted troops. The struggle in these regions has been resumed, with conflicting reports. The heaviest encounters of the week are reported to the south of Ypres and in the Argonne region. Germany is in possession of Dixmunde. Russia claims additional gains in east Prussia, Germany reporting advances checked. The Russian advance in Galicia has proceeded to within twenty-five miles of Crockow, where the Austrians seem to be gathering in force for a stand. The trenches about the fortifications of Prezeymsl are taken by the Russians. The Russians are also active in the Carpathians, seeking to cut off the Austrian retreat. The Russian center has been checked and their advance guards hurled well back into Poland, where a severe battle is reported in progress. The Servians and Montenegrins, once aggressive in Austrian territory, are now on their own soil in desperate defense. The Austrians have taken Valjevo, Servia, and Belgrade is under bombardment from Austrian forces which have crossed the Danube. Fighting continues at various points between Russian and Turkish and British and Turkish forces, with uncertain results. The Swedish steamer Andrew was on the 16th sunk by a mine in the North Sea. The German steamer Karno has been declared by Chilean authorities to be an auxiliary transport and is retained in the harbor of Antofagasta. The German cruiser Berlin has been disarmed in a Norwegian port. Turkish and Russian fleets have been engaged on the Black Sea and have bombarded towns on its coast. Japan is reported from Sydney as having expressed her readiness to hand over to Australian forces German islands occupied by herself in the Pacific, Great Britain being favorable to the proposition. Italy is said to be concerned over the advance of Austria into Servia.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

APOSTLE GRIFFITHS ARRIVES.—In the News from Missions columns of this issue of the HERALD will be found letters from Brethren C. Edward Miller and W. J. Haworth telling of the departure of Elder G. T. Griffiths from Australia for America. We are in receipt of a brief note from Brother Griffiths, written at San Francisco, but not dated, announcing his arrival. This note was probably written about November 12 or 13. He was to proceed directly to Wiloughby, Ohio, to the bedside of his wife who is seriously ill. He was called home by cablegram by the family on account of this illness.

NEWS FROM GERMANY.—Elder A. Kippe writes to Bishop Kelley from Halle under date of October 22. A free translation of his letter is as follows:

Your letter of the 15th of September containing check for two hundred and seventy-five francs, family account for the months of August and September, thankfully received. The mission work in Germany goes forward in spite of the war. One Brother Olson at Hanover was killed in the battle with the English at Saint Quentin in the north of France. There are thirteen others of the brethren in the war, mostly against Russia. As you know, all of the Germans from seventeen to forty-five must go into the army. It is the same for the brethren. What the Kaiser has he must use. Two of the wounded soldiers who have returned from the war I have converted.

REPORT FROM ENGLAND.—Bishop R. May writes from London, October 28, as follows:

To my mind the chances for church work in London never were better, it only needs help. We are sleeping on good time, that is all. This war has not, so far, done us any harm. Other people are going ahead as if nothing has happened. Financially we are better off than at any time since I came here. I did not have a penny from the bishop this year, and from what I can see ahead we will manage the year out, at least. I can see now if I had the necessary help, and who could do missionary work as well, we could have supported two or three more missionaries in the general field.

MACGREGOR VERSUS HAYWOOD.—We are in receipt of handbills sent us by Elder Daniel Macgregor from which it appears that Reverend Haywood, pastor of the Methodist Church at Viceroy, Canada, made an attack upon the Latter Day Saints. In reply to this attack, Elder Macgregor distributed handbills challenging Reverend Haywood to meet him in debate, Macgregor to affirm that the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints is in fact the church of Christ, being in harmony therewith, in matters of faith, teaching, practice, and ordinances; Haywood to affirm a similar proposition for his church. Mr. Haywood distributed handbills declining to meet this challenge, stating that he was too busy to accept it, but that he would deliver a lecture defending the Methodist Church. The man who is too busy to meet our elders should be too busy to make an attack upon our people. Elder Macgregor reports intense interest in the town and several baptisms.

"Patronize your own official church paper."

The SAINTS' HERALD is the official organ of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. It is devoted to the promulgation of the gospel of Jesus Christ. It seeks first to build up the kingdom of God and to establish his righteousness.

It endeavors to educate the people, realizing that freedom is found in knowledge of truth, "You shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

EDITORIALS

The editorial staff consists of Joseph Smith and Elbert A. Smith, editors; and John F. Garver, assistant editor.

The editorials are devoted to religious, educational, and general topics. Our ambition is to make them concise, lucid, absorbing, direct, scholarly, convincing. If they do not leave their readers wiser and nobler we have come short of our ideal.

Read them and judge for yourself.

CURRENT EVENTS

One section of the Editorial department is given over each week to a review of current events. This review is conducted mostly by the assistant editor, John F. Garver.

The events of the day are reviewed briefly, in the least possible space, yet comprehensively. This review is dispassionate and nonpartisan. It merely endeavors to give facts, or what purport to be facts, as they are reported by the press of the world.

It covers events both secular and religious,—such for instance as the great European war, the war in Mexico, clashes between capital and labor in the great industrial struggle, events and pronouncements of importance in the religious world,—the thousand and one items of interest the year around.

If you are busy, but wish to be informed and desire to review each week events that you have scanned hurriedly in the daily papers, read this department.

ORIGINAL ARTICLES

The department of Original Articles is filled constantly with contributions from our very best writers. The articles are of a nature to interest you, covering as they do a wide range of subjects. They afford you an opportunity to hear the pro and con of vital questions,—as for instance in the discussion of the atonement carried on during the past summer by Elders Joseph R. Lambert and Frank A. Russell.

Also from time to time we publish reports of excellent doctrinal sermons. If you are a "scattered" member this feature should appeal to you. Let us "send you a preacher by mail."

Another feature of interest in this department is the occasional biography or autobiography of well-known church workers. These are always welcomed by our readers.

DEPARTMENT OF GENERAL INTEREST

In the department of General Interest from week to week we publish extracts from leading newspapers, magazines, and periodicals of various kinds. Thus readers of the SAINTS' HERALD get an excellent review of current opinion, especially on religious topics.

LETTER DEPARTMENT

The Letter Department is one of perennial interest to Latter Day Saints. Here they exchange notes the world over. Through it you may keep in touch with brothers and sisters in all parts of the world.

Somewhat akin to the Letter Department is the News from Missions department, excepting that the writers in this department are mostly of the missionary force. Through this forum the missionary reports his labors to the people.

What interesting reports they are! Here Brethren Greene, Koehler, and Jenkins report to you conditions in Jerusalem and the Holy Land. Brethren Greenwood, Armstrong, May, and others write from England. Kippe, Hanson, and others write from Germany, Holland, Sweden, and Denmark; Davis, Jones, and Waller from Hawaii; May, Savage, Ellis, and Chrestensen from the Society Islands; Griffiths, Miller, Haworth, and other brethren from Australia.

Here you get the mission news from Canada and from all parts of the United States. You should not fail to take the HERALD and keep in touch with events in the field.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

The SAINTS' HERALD has just admitted a new department that we feel will be of great interest and profit to our readers.

We refer to the department of Education edited by Professor S. A. Burgess, president of Graceland College.

This department will be devoted to the cause of education in general. Graceland College will receive her share of attention; also Graceland Extension Institute, founded one year ago to reach the man who desires to improve himself but can not attend school. Here he finds help and is directed in his studies.

This department will be one of vital interest. A valuable addition to the SAINTS' HERALD.

THE STAFF

Since the organization of our musical talent was undertaken some years ago, beginning with the appointment of our efficient and popular General Chorister, Brother A. N. Hoxie, jr., interest in musical matters has been very keen.

To satisfy and increase this interest, the SAINTS' HERALD runs a monthly department devoted to music. This department, is appropriately named The Staff, edited by Sister Audentia Anderson. It is one of the brightest, spiciest, most readable departments that we have.

Are you a musician? You should take the HERALD and read The Staff.

Have you friends who are musicians? Send them the HERALD for one year.

A NEW SUNDAY SCHOOL DEPARTMENT

Sunday school workers, take special notice of this important announcement!

THE DECREE OF WAR

War! What measureless misery couches in that word. Three little letters never signified more woe. Hell itself can dispense no blacker horror in kind, and yet how readily nations plunge into war. With gala demonstrations and buoyant confidence men rush to arms as to a picnic; and nations seemingly unmindful of the awful gory story of history where mangled, torn, and tortured humanity has bled, continue to scurry into the clutches of the war fiend,—there first to realize that he is a fiend.

A few short months ago it was supposed that Christianity and civilization had so progressed that another great war was impossible. Civilization breaks down at the point of the test where the war floods rise. Boasted culture has gone to seed in one branch and been depleted in another.

True spiritual culture has failed to develop in strength sufficient to prevent the drawing of the sword. But the war devil's cunning begins further back than the date of the war proclamation. The spirit which will prompt a man to ignore righteousness and pursue frivolities to-day will evolutionize him until he is ready to kill (in war) to-morrow.

The war devil prevails upon nations to equip themselves in time of peace for war, and persuades them that great standing armies (however expensive), horrible, destructive guns, and swords ready to drink blood are the greatest insurance of permanent peace. It has been argued that the most formidable strength of arms is the greater guarantee of peace. When in history has such ever proven true?

What nation ever maintained a great equipment for war without feeling flashes of desire, or a steady undercurrent of anxiety to see the pride of their "defense" brought into action? What insignificant occasions will then serve as an excuse for a nation to draw its flood of blood? What mere trifles grow to war proportions when nations are ready?

A little spark will explode a great magazine of powder if the powder be prepared; but many firebrands could do but little harm where there are no explosives gathered.

Careful study and time's adjustment will prove that a government's strong armament is its own great menace; and that in times of stress and turmoil it is the one without a foot stuck forward to dare others off, without any false dignity to protect, and the one absolutely without armament which will fare the better in the long run.

The idea that it would be better for governments to eliminate all war paraphernalia entirely and divert the money now used for such purposes into the channels of peace is scouted even by lovers of peace and considered to be radicalism. But those who believe that the time is coming when men shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks will be consistent if they support that principle now.

Christ set forth the simple formula for the maintenance of peace when he taught that when smitten upon one cheek, the one suffering the grievance should turn the other cheek to the offender. That prescription does not cost much except Christian fortitude, but it will preserve peace to nations or individuals when demonstrations of prowess fail. There can be no Christian nation until one shall rise demonstrating the Christ plan in more than mere hollow precept. But aught that we may say will not alter the fact that multiplied thousands will continue to love darkness rather than light, and that for this fact wars are decreed to continue intermittently until the consummation decreed shall make a full end of all nations who persist in disregard of the Christ method of law, liberty, and peace.

As ambassadors of the gospel and watchmen on the towers, it becomes our duty to point out that the same spirit of wickedness which called down the judgment of God and destructions ensuing when men withdrew from him in past ages will result in similar calamities now.

By way of comparison with present tendencies we recall the godless hilarity of Belshazzar's feast when the startling finger of a hand wrote the reveler's doom upon the wall, and parallel that circumstance with present-day conditions of which the following is a small index.

In the city of the writer's residence, the following sketch from a daily paper places the observer's finger upon the spiritual pulse of the throngs catering to such, and furnished opportunity for a fair diagnosis, and a safe basis upon which to predict what the culmination will be.

Headline:

WAR WILL GIVE INCREASE TO ENTERTAINING

Mr. J. M—— A—— who has taught many of eastern smart set latest dances, expects more fashionable gayety. "Will there be less entertaining because of the war?" That is the question that leaders of the smart set have been asking one another, and which is answered to-day by Mr. J. M—— A——, one of the greatest exponents of dances, new and old.

"No," emphatically declared Mr. A—— last evening; "excitement creates excitement, and the war influence will be made manifest by a desire for greater gayety in which the fashionable world will continue to indulge.

"There will be no depression in dancing, at least that was my impression when I left New York a week ago, and as for Phoenix, why I hope to make everyone in Phoenix dance!"

Then follows a suggestive cut representing a man and woman stepping some fancy dance—the essence of vanity—and then a two-column write-up about the "Lulu Fado" dance, the "Brazilian Polka," the

"Tango," concluding by solemnly assuring us that "Maxixe" will be standardized by time, but that the "Polka Bresilienne" the "Fulano" the "Tattoo" and the simplified "Fox Trot," are really the latest ball-room creations.

Of course we were disappointed that the "Lulu Fado" did not take first place—not being acquainted with the step exactly but assuming that a combination of steps having such a name would furnish exercise equal to sawing wood. But in our opinion some of this "Lu-lu-Fado" business will be "Lay Low Fido," with an accent on the low before these nice entertainment-producing wars are ended.

Such an item as the above sketch might be considered a small matter if it were merely a local affair, but such is not the case. The same spirit of wickedness finds expression in this and various other ways throughout the world, but all tend to whirl toward the same inevitable vortex suggested in the following Scripture:

And your covenant with death shall be disannuled, and your agreement with hell shall not stand; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, then ye shall be trodden down by it. From the time that it goeth forth it shall take you: from morning by morning shall it pass over, by day and by night; and it shall be a vexation only to understand the report. . . . Now therefore, be ye not mockers, lest your bonds be made strong; for I have heard from the Lord God of hosts a consumption, even determined upon the whole earth.—Isaiah 28: 18-22.

The Prophet Joel speaks of this same event:

Proclaim ye this among the Gentiles; prepare war, wake up the mighty men, let all the men of war draw near. . . . Put ye in the sickle; for the harvest is ripe: come, get you down; for the press is full, the fats overflow: for their wickedness is great. Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision: for the day of the Lord is near in the valley of decision. The sun and the moon shall be darkened, and the stars shall withdraw their shining.—Joel 3: 9-16.

Jesus connects this prophecy with the sign of his coming as is recorded in Matthew 24: 29. Let us read the word of the Lord upon the subject in modern revelation:

Wherefore the voice of the Lord is unto the ends of the earth, that all that will hear may hear: prepare ye, prepare ye for that which is to come, for the Lord is nigh; and the anger of the Lord is kindled, and his sword is bathed in heaven, and it shall fall upon the inhabitants of the earth; and the arm of the Lord shall be revealed; and the day cometh that they who will not hear the voice of the Lord, neither the voice of his servants, neither give heed to the words of the prophets and apostles, shall be cut off from among the people; for they have strayed from mine ordinances, and have broken mine everlasting covenants; they seek not the Lord to establish his righteousness, but every man walketh in his own way, after the image of his own God, whose image is in the likeness of the world, and whose substance is that of an idol, which waxeth old and shall perish in Babylon, even Babylon the great, which shall fall.—Doctrine and Covenants 1: 3.

The destruction of the wicked from among the people mentioned in the above is supported by Acts 3: 23. Again we read:

I, the Lord, am angry with the wicked: I am holding my Spirit from the inhabitants of the earth. I have sworn in my wrath and decreed wars upon the face of the earth, and the wicked shall slay the wicked, and fear shall come upon every man, and the Saints also shall hardly escape; nevertheless, I, the Lord, am with them, and will come down in heaven from the presence of the Father, and consume the wicked with unquenched fire. And, behold, this is not yet, but by and by; wherefore seeing that I, the Lord, have decreed all these things upon the face of the earth, I willeth that my Saints should be assembled upon the land of Zion; and that every man should take righteousness in his hands and faithfulness upon his loins, and lift a warning voice unto the inhabitants of the earth, and declare both by word and by flight, that desolation shall come upon the wicked.—Doctrine and Covenants 63: 9.

Again we read in Joel:

And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be delivered: for in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem shall be deliverance, as the Lord hath said, and in the remnant whom the Lord shall call.—Joel 2: 32.

Representing the "remnant" whom the Lord has called, alluded to in the above, it becometh the Saints to seek to be armed with righteousness only to make their peace secure.

We now read from Book of Mormon a prophecy respecting this same remnant, in the following terms:

And it came to pass that I beheld the church of the Lamb of God, and its numbers were few, because of the wickedness of the whore who sat upon many waters; nevertheless, I beheld that the church of the Lamb, who were the Saints of God, were also upon all the face of the earth; and their dominions upon the face of the earth were small, because of the wickedness of the great whore whom I saw.—1 Nephi 3: 226-229.

The next paragraph depicts a great gathering together for war, and then this beautiful prediction next:

And it came to pass that I, Nephi, beheld the power of the Lamb of God, that it descended upon the Saints of the church of the Lamb, and upon the covenant people of the Lord, who were scattered upon all the face of the earth; and they were armed with righteousness and with the power of God in great glory.—1 Nephi 3: 230-232.

Let righteousness be an all-sufficient armament, and if we dwell where it is necessary to take up arms in order to be obedient to the laws of the country, may the way be prepared for a removal to the place designated by the Lord as a place of safety from the clash of arms.

There is a land of pure delight,
Where saints immortal reign;
Infinite day excludes the night,
And pleasures banish pain.
There everlasting spring abides,
And never-withering flowers;
Death, like a narrow sea, divides
This heavenly land from ours.—Watts.

PRAYER

To cover the ground afforded by the subject would mean to write the history of religion. For prayer is the fundamental principle upon which the higher religions have been built; with one notable exception—Buddhism, which, believing that human life is under the inviolable order of Karma, has no room for prayer, and for it substitutes meditation. As fruits from their assiduous labors, archaeologists have from time to time presented to the world monuments of the prayer instinct; Egyptian papyri, Babylonian tablets, the sacred books of India and Persia, crowded with prayers.

All through the ages, as far back as history goes, we read of prayer. From Genesis to Revelation, the record describes man engaged in communion with God.

The fact that prayer is the most essential element of worship is effectually illustrated and magnified by the vital part it played in the life of Christ. He demonstrated to an unbelieving world that it was his armor, his scimitar, his staff. During the period of three and one half years, when establishing his church upon the earth, Jesus utilized much time in teaching the disciples to pray properly.

In indelible letters, the Savior wrote across the blackboard of time the immortal words:

Our Father who art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth, as it is done in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us. And suffer us not to be led into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever, Amen.

The admiration of every succeeding generation has been excited by the sublime beauty couched within our Lord's prayer, matchless for its authority, brevity, fullness, and the perfect order of its petitions. Jesus gave unto us an infallible guarantee in his word,—“Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, the same shall be given unto you.”

Through the wisdom and love of our Redeemer, a provision has been made for us to gain access into the storehouse of the Great Supply. We approach as supplicants, and return heavily laden with his manna. Thus prayer becomes as an “open sesame” into the treasure vaults, the key to the secret chambers of heaven, which contain divine blessings and spiritual gifts.

The young of the church I especially desire to impress with the intrinsic value of audible prayer. Language is not only the channel through which thought flows, but language has a reflexive effect on thought itself. By speaking, our ideas become clearer; we gain the power of analyzing and defining them, when we have the opportunity of telling them forth, and the material which was fusing in the mind is thereby cast into shape and fixed in a mold for permanent use.

Let us not forget that prayer is a universal art in which all may become well skilled, and to the acquirement of which all should bend their energies; for it is the employment of man's noblest powers, intellectual and spiritual, upon their highest object.

As from the fleshly heart goes forth the blood in which is the animal life, so from the heart of the human soul goes forth the entire mental and moral activity. Prayer is occult activity; it is a vital act by which the entire mind seeks to save itself by clinging to the principle from which it draws its life. To quote Balzac:

Prayer is all action, but it is spiritual action, stripped of substantiality and reduced like the motions of the worlds to an invisible, pure force; it penetrates everywhere like light; it gives vitality to souls that come beneath its rays, as nature beneath the sun.

We learn there must be faithful regularity in our periods of devotion. The true spirit of prayer comes as the direct result of carefully formed habit of supplication. The action must of necessity be systematic, methodical, and with precision. A real effort must be made to banish distracting thoughts, and to overcome the sluggishness of the corruptible body which weighs down the mind that would rise to muse on heavenly things. In order to obtain the desired effect we must retire into the inmost citadel of consciousness and shut the door of the heart against intruding worldliness.

One will discover that prayer is not only a shrine, but also an arena, with self to contend with as an opponent; the victory is only accomplished after severe struggle and prolonged spiritual wrestling against the opposing powers. Many times we are bruised and lamed from the experience, but are triumphant in the end.

The attitude of prayer establishes a harmony between the two wills. The human is attuned with the infinite; and we are lifted to a plane where God's holy influence can and will invigorate our exhausted vitality and radiate new energy into our lives.

Prayer is the chalice the Creator has provided for the use of humanity to sip from the fountain of eternal life. Oh, traveler on life's rugged road, weary and feverish from the strain of the journey, drink often to become refreshed; to receive strength to press onward, and to bear up against evil which enslaves and torments our existence!

Prayer has been the bridge which has spanned many dark gulfs of despair. It enables one to reach in safety the opposite shores of a new hope. When we are under the pressure of merciless, unrelenting conditions, and are surrounded by a myriad of woes, remember—

Oh, how praying rests the weary,
Prayer will change the night to day;
So when life gets dark and dreary,
Don't forget to pray.

Department of Education

EDITED BY SAMUEL A. BURGESS

QUESTIONS AND ANNOUNCEMENTS

This month we are fortunate in having an article from the pen of Miss Mabel Knipschild, professor of modern languages of Graceland College. It is written in answer to the question, "Why did the Lord command us to study foreign languages?" We hope to present additional discussion as time passes, and solicit comments and questions.

We received no special notes from the Extension Institute, but special announcements are being sent out from the Herald Publishing House, also special department leaflets are in course of preparation, outlining the work of each department with greater particularity. Two fellows in English already have their hands full.

Since the announcement appeared in the HERALD two weeks ago, that there remained one or two openings for those who desire to work their way and secure an education, we have received quite a number of letters from those who desire to help themselves. Three have come, two more have been arranged for, but we still have six boys and girls who want to come, for whom we have not yet provided. It has been the policy of Graceland to always prefer those who are the most in need. But it is regrettable that we can not accommodate all of our young people who wish to work for their schooling. For those who are able to pay, there is abundant room, and we are doing all we can for those, who find it necessity to work. The following question has been received:

"If my boy goes to Graceland one year will he be permitted to enter the state university as a sophomore? If he goes for two years can he enter the state university as a junior?"

Answer: As stated in the annual report and in the catalogue, college students from Graceland are accepted at the state universities. The rules generally made as applying to all educational institutions apply here. That is, if advanced work be taken and pursued successfully, credit will be given for past work taken at Graceland, or if preferred by the student, examination may be taken. This is the general rule existing even among the larger institutions, when a student goes from one to another. In actual practice when it is found that the students from a particular institution usually make good, their credits are granted as certified. In fact, this is the general practice so far as Graceland is concerned, as our students have not only done well, but very well as a rule.

Q. Is it advisable to send my boy to Graceland for the first year or two, or should I send him to the state university direct from high school?

A. Graceland is not a university. It is a small college. Much of its work is done in the preparatory department fitting boys and girls for college; especially those whose early opportunities have been unfavorable. The small college has several advantages in religious influences, closer association, more special individual attention to the student. For these reasons we consider it advisable to spend one or two years of college work at Graceland.

Another reason is to assist in the change which must be made from a simple, unreasoning faith to one founded upon knowledge. This transition period is more or less dangerous. It is well that we should be able to help in some extent to gain the proper perspective. On the other hand, at present we consider it preferable that the third or fourth years be taken at a university, and we prefer that our young people attend different universities in order to come in contact with different sets of men and of minds, and for the sake of the general broadening influences, having in mind the preparation as a church which must be made for the solution of the problems lying before us.

WHY STUDY FOREIGN LANGUAGES?

Teach ye diligently . . . that you may be instructed in . . . things which are at home; things which are abroad; the wars and the perplexities of the nations; . . . and a knowledge also of countries, and of kingdoms.—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 21.

Study and learn, and become acquainted with all good books, and with languages, tongues and people.—Doctrine and Covenants 87: 5.

These words were given to the Presidency and ministry in order to help them prepare for their duties in the church. If the Lord found it necessary to give this instruction in the early years of the church, we can see that the same is very applicable still, even more so, to the present needs of the priesthood. The church has increased in numbers, and is established in nearly all the leading nations and islands of the world.

To keep in touch with the whole church from a business standpoint and to share a general interest in foreign members, the Presidency will find it most essential to have a knowledge of "languages, tongues, and people." What is said of the Presidency applies also to the ministry. An elder never knows when he may be called to a foreign mission or to labor in a portion of the country where a foreign element prevails. The greatest influence can only be had if the missionary is able to appreciate the interests of his people, enter into their life and habits, and impart his thoughts to them through their own language.

And should we limit these instructions of the Master to the priesthood of the church? If we do not want to apply to ourselves anything in the sacred books given to the disciples or ministry, we should have to eliminate many of Christ's important teachings. Though the words quoted are given to the "first laborers in this last kingdom," surely in the broad sense of the term in which we interpret so many other passages we all want to be and are "first laborers." We each have our work to do in this great kingdom. Paul says, "We are laborers together with God." As we view the passages then we take them to be a command to all the church people. Besides this, there are enough vital reasons from the practical point of view and from that of the leading educators to warrant our learning the foreign languages.

First, the commercial value. In our country one person in every seven was born outside our borders. We have to-day thirteen and one half million foreign born. The Germans together with their neighboring nations are here in greatest numbers. Nearly three fourths of the immigrants have remained in our large cities, and are engaged in all manner of industrial pursuits. To meet the demands of this foreign element, the man or woman in the business world will find that a practical knowledge of the foreign tongues, especially the German, is of greatest worth. The employee with a command of more than his mother tongue is in demand everywhere and is always better remunerated financially.

Another notable fact is the present situation in the business world due to the existing war. Trade has been cut off with Europe and an ever increasing trade is going on in South America. It would be a financial profit to anyone who could establish business in the southern continent. To do so a knowledge of French and Spanish is very necessary. Our American Bureau of South American Republics tells us over and over again that we are losing all these markets because we do not know French and Spanish.

Second, the value for one who travels. If we seek to gain a "knowledge of countries and kingdoms" nothing will help us more than to travel in these countries and kingdoms. This indeed affords us pleasurable respite. But we can only enjoy and study a foreign nation in the greatest degree by being familiar beforehand with its people, industry, social and religious life. A foreign language expresses most adequately the life of a race, domestic, industrial, social, political, and religious. The modern textbooks are filled with material of instruction taken from the life of the people, whose language is studied. If it is French, there are pictures, stories of Paris and its various institutions, songs and music of the folk lore, imaginary trips through various parts of France. Exercises are on such practical matter as directions on the street, clothing, food, occupation, and industry, weights of measure, money and all the common experiences of a traveler.

Third, the scholastic value. We are to "study and learn and become acquainted with all good books." We must be an educated people if we are to cope with the intellectual world. G. Stanley Hall says, "To be a citizen of the world, as the educated man and woman of to-day must be, we must at least know several tongues." To do work as specialists for a master's or doctor's degree we must to-day command two or three foreign languages sufficiently to absorb their subject matter or otherwise we remain handicapped. Science to-day speaks three or four tongues and not only one. Moreover, translation is decreasing. Not to be able to know the latest and best productions at first hand in the field of his own science or in letters stamps the scholar as provincial in the world of learning.

A science which is spreading throughout the church is that of music. The great mass of composers has lived in a foreign country. Their compositions have foreign names and the technicalities are strange. The whole selections express in music or song the feelings and impulses of the composer who so often gives to the world not only his own but the spirit that animates his entire race. The beautiful songs lose their charm if we can not appreciate them in the original. We need the foreign languages to master the technical and also for a full appreciation of the message the composer has for us.

Fourth, the disciplinary value. Until we study a foreign language, speech has been a more or less unconscious process. But with the study of a new tongue we discover the necessity of making sounds and giving them careful attention. We gain a conscious control of our speech organs. We learn the significance of sound distinctions, and to enunciate clearly when we speak. This is greatly needed by the English-speaking people, for they so often pass off a lazy mumbling for English speech.

Not only does the study of a language discipline our own speech sounds, but it teaches precision in the use of words and gives a clear understanding of the grammatical relations and of the common terms which state them. English grammar has usually been taught in such a mechanical way, or when we were too young to comprehend it, that men and women often say they did not like grammar and could never understand it. But the drill in the technical forms which are so necessary when studying a foreign language will remove all the puzzling mysteries of our English grammar. If no other good could be obtained than the mere fixing of our English foundation we should be most fortunate, for no person is truly educated who has not a knowledge of his own language and can express his thoughts with accuracy.

This grammatical drill may cultivate ideals and habits which will carry over into life in general. The learning of a foreign language implies persistent application to tasks not wholly pleasant at times; alertness of mind and retentiveness of memory; the building of a unified structure, each part of which must rest on previous work done well. In other words, we acquire the will power to overcome hard work.

Fifth, the cultural value. And what is culture? President A. Ross Hill, of Missouri University, says, "Culture is an attitude of life. It consists of insight into civilization and an appreciation of what that civilization means." This thought is in keeping with—"that you may be instructed in things which are; things which must shortly come to pass; things which are at home; things which are abroad; the wars and perplexities," etc. It means a world knowledge. The present war situation of our kindred nations can be best understood by those who can appreciate the life and meaning of each nation. G. Stanley Hall says, "Nothing gives such insight into and respect for another country as to study its language and thus to get into touch with its soul." He also says, "To do this, to feel the aspirations, to know the achievements, to be spurred by the sentiment of emulation, to seek the virtues, to avoid the errors of other countries—this is the new, large, and truly humanistic culture."

Professor Albert Guerard of Stanford University says, "America needs the influence of European thought and culture." Our country has produced great thinkers and great works, but the center of learning has been in the foreign nations. Our "insight into civilization" can never be complete without a knowledge of the vast fields of foreign literature, for nothing more reflects a nation and its people than the literature it produces. This literature can be read in translations, but the natural air and beauty which are to be gained from a perusal of the original are lost.

We should not be willing to accept a foreign translation of Shakespeare's "Macbeth" or "Hamlet." We should not find all the innate beauties of Longfellow's "Evangeline" in a French or German translation. Just so with some of the greatest masterpieces the world has ever known: Goethe's "Faust," Schiller's "Wilhelm Tell," Victor Hugo's "Les Misérables" if we read them in any tongue except their own. There are lines in these works of art where the union of thought with sound is so perfect that the feeling engendered in our soul is akin to that of worship. Our life is made richer by such impulses; our aspirations are for higher things.

Professor Pyle, a psychologist, once said that it does not matter how successful or unsuccessful the farmer is in his material gains, so long as he knows how to spend his leisure moments. The man for whom life will be worth while is the man who can mount his horse at evening and on his way home, with all the beauties of nature about him, be able to recall some thought in literature, either native or foreign, and be exalted by the inspiration after a day's toil and drudgery. Surely "man does not live by bread alone," nor does his life consist of the abundance of things that he possesses!

Thus, in view of the commercial, travel, scholastic, disciplinary, and cultured values of foreign languages, together with the instructions of our Master, as well as the sentiments of our foremost thinkers, can we not all, each and every member of the church who has high ambitions to promote his own welfare and that of the church, see an urgent need for a knowledge of "languages, tongues and people?"

MABEL KNIPSCHILD.

Of General Interest

WHAT SCIENCE SAYS ABOUT ALCOHOL

Several years ago the advocates of alcohol found considerable comfort in the work of Professor William O. Atwater, of Wesleyan University. Professor Atwater was unquestionably a great scientist as well as a most ingenious gentleman. He enjoys a particular fame as the inventor of a celebrated contrivance known as the "respiration colorimeter." This was a box-like structure, in which Professor Atwater imprisoned the human subjects he had selected for experimentation.

The purpose of imprisoning a man in this manner was to study the effects upon his system of his indigested food. Professor Atwater, after several days' experimentation, could tell to a nicety just how much food his subject had devoured and what had become of it—how much the body had transformed into heat or energy, how much it had stored up in the tissues for future use—in other words, he could determine the "fuel value" of the several articles of diet.

A FOOD

The experiment that made Professor Atwater and his cabinet especially famous was the one undertaken to determine whether alcohol, in moderate quantities, was a "food." As a matter of fact, science had known for fifty years that, in a certain sense, it was a "food." What Professor Atwater demonstrated was that it had greater food value than had hitherto been suspected. If consumed in modern quantities, the body actually utilized about ninety-eight per cent. That is, the human system does not throw it off, as it does other substances not useful to the bodily organism, but actually absorbs it, makes it a part of itself, and transforms it into heat that may, under certain conditions, ultimately serve a physiological purpose as muscular power.

Although, as already said, scientific men manifested no surprise at the outcome of this experiment, it produced an enormous sensation in temperance circles. The fact that Professor Atwater's experiment had been performed at a Methodist university gave his discovery a touch of unconscious humor. The distinguished professor announced his discovery in language that seemed to imply a keen relish in the outcome—as though he had succeeded in "putting one over" on the W. C. T. U.

But, after all, the disclosure was not a startling one. When Professor Atwater declared that "alcohol was a food," he did not mean that it was a food in the sense that beefsteak, rice and Boston-baked beans are food. When a scientist says that a certain article is a food, he means that it consists of one or all of the chemical molecules known as proteins, carbohydrates, and fats. Everything that the system receives, it ultimately transforms into one of these mysterious substances. The first is the chemical constituent that develops into muscle; while the carbohydrates and fats are the things that the body burns or oxidizes and changes into energy. Proteins make the inert body itself—the bones, tissues, fingernails, internal organs and brains; the carbohydrates and fats are the agencies that galvanize this helpless mass into action—that make it breathe, think, walk and work. Anything transformable into any one of these substances, or into all of them at once, is physiologically a food.

Alcohol, as Professor Atwater and many predecessors had found, did change into heat. However, it contained no protein and so could not serve as a tissue-builder. It was therefore an incomplete food, or as Professor Atwater himself described it, "a one-sided food." "Again," says Professor Atwater, "it can not be taken in large quantities by ordinary people without intoxication, and even if large quantities are tolerated, it can not support life permanently; it lacks the nitrogenous and mineral material constituents which the body requires for tissue building and numerous other purposes."

A DANGEROUS FOOD

And so Professor Atwater seems to have damned his own discovery with faint praise; other physiological chemists, equally distinguished, bombarded it from other standpoints. Unquestionably the greatest American in this line is Professor Chittenden, of the Sheffield Scientific School of Yale University. Another is Doctor Reed Hunt, at present professor of pharmacology at the Harvard Medical school. Both these men have given years of study to the physiological effects of alcohol. Both, while freely admitting that alcohol is a food in the sense that the cells oxidize it, have found that, for other reasons, it is an exceedingly dangerous food.

The trouble, according to Professor Chittenden, is that alcohol even in innocent amounts, seriously interferes with other body processes. The function of the liver, for example, is largely to destroy the poisons taken in with our food, notably uric acid. But alcohol so interferes with the liver that it can not perform this duty acceptably.

"Alcohol," says Professor Chittenden, "presents a dangerous side wholly wanting in carbohydrates and fats. The latter are simply burned up to carbonic acid and water, or are transformed into glycogen or fat, but alcohol, though more easily burned, is at all times liable to obstruct, in some measure, at least, the oxidative processes of the liver and probably other processes, too, thereby throwing into circulation bodies such as uric acid, which are inimical to help; a fact that at once tends to draw a distinct line of demarkation between alcohol and the two nonnitrogenous foods."

Man, therefore, can not live on alcohol alone; but has it not other uses? Is it not "an aid to digestion?" Since it is burned and transformed into heat, as we have seen, does it not increase muscular efficiency? Does it not transfer some of its sparkle to the mind? Can not the writer write better, the poet pour forth more ecstatic strains, the orator feel inspired to more heroic flights? We have all been often told that Byron did his finest work under the inspiration of his "hock and soda water," and that Daniel Webster was never so effective as after having freely imbibed. In recent years cold-blooded scientists have submitted the eloquent claims of Omar to the unfeeling test of the laboratory. And Omar, splendid poet as he is, turns out to have written his immortal quatrains under the saddest kind of a misapprehension.

ANOTHER FALLACY DISPOSED OF

This same Professor Chittenden, who assails Professor Atwater's "food" theory so scientifically, has pretty conclusively disposed of another fallacy of the tippler: That alcohol "aids the digestion." The professor handles this alcoholic superstition quite gently, but none the less effectively.

If you take a preliminary cocktail, the digestive ferments will begin to pour into the stomach. So far so good. In a few minutes, however, the alcohol is absorbed, and then its destructive effects begin to manifest themselves. At first, as the toper fondly believes, it does "aid digestion" and is actually an "appetizer"; presently, however, it tends to "stop digestion." The net results, therefore, so far as digestion is concerned, is just about the same as though you had taken no alcohol at all. On the other hand, there are certain alcoholic drinks, like sherry and most white and red wines, that positively retard stomachic digestion. Whatever else they show, these Chittenden experiments show in rather a strange light the good old family doctor who prescribed various wines and whiskies with meals as auxiliaries to the simulation of food.

But how about muscular work? Doesn't a frequent glass of beer or a little wine at meals, such as many people take habitually, stimulate muscular activity? Professor Atwater's dictum on the food value of alcohol has considerable importance in this connection. The heat it generates ought certainly to expend itself in the shape of muscular energy. The Germans, in their dreary, scientific way, have pretty thoroughly canvassed this question. Anyone who wishes can find the answer in bewildering statistical form in several of the "Behandlungen" in which weighty and conclusive matters of this kind are usually entombed. Doctor Schynder's experiments, for example, are entitled to be regarded as "Classicle."

One of the most used muscles of the human frame is the index finger of the right hand. A celebrated Italian, Angelo Mosso, has invented an instrument known as the ergograph, which accurately tests the efficiency of this indispensable member. The mechanism is so arranged that the wrist and arm muscles are held tight, and the energy of the finger tested by the number of times it can lift to the length of a meter, a single kilogram weight. The purpose of the experimenter was to test the extent to which moderate amounts of wine increased or decreased a man's capacity to perform this simple operation.

A long and elaborate series of experiments clearly demonstrated that moderate amounts of alcohol diminished the energy of this index finger. The experimenter pitted alcohol against tropon—a nutritious food, consisting of animal and vegetable proteins, which is given to the sick and convalescent. That is, the subject would eat a meal of tropon and then test the energy and endurance of his index finger. He would then drink a ration of alcohol which had exactly the same "food value"—that is, the heat and energy—as the tropon. Had there been any scientific truth in the idea that alcohol is really a physiological food, both tropon and alcohol ought clearly to have done the same amount of work. But the subject was able to lift this tiny object many more times with the heat supplied by the tropon than with that supplied by the alcohol.

This simple demonstration, however, did not complete the experiment. Food, as commonly understood, clearly has greater energy-producing powers than alcohol, but there still remains the practical question: How about the value of alcohol when taken with other food? The experiment showed that alcohol does produce utilizable heat energy, though not in such quantities as "regular" food; does not the "usual glass of wine" taken regularly with meals, therefore, serve a real physiological purpose? Does it not make us stronger, more capable of work?

The examination of this point brought out an amazing fact. This was that a meal made up of such materials as soup, meat, vegetables and bread had greater fuel value than when the same meal is taken with moderate quantities of alcohol. A man who had taken an unalcoholized meal could lift this weight a certain number of times in a given period; after eating the same meal, with a little wine added, he always fell far behind this record!

The conclusion is apparent: Though alcohol, in Professor Atwater's sense, is a food, the body will not use it when it has other available nutriment at hand. And so at the hands of the scientist, falls another cherished idea, the belief that "drinking with meals"—the universal European custom—is, if not physically beneficial, at least not demoralizing.

But there still remains another age-long tradition. There is mental life in the sparkling bowl; it stimulates thought, makes us mentally keen, alert, capable of our highest mental flights. Here again it is laboratory workers in the great beer-drinking country, Germany, that lay another alcoholic ghost. Here are a group of average men, capable of the usual high mental operations of human kind; how do their minds work first without alcohol, and secondly, with it? The experimenters are the famous Professor Kraepelin, and his pupil, Kurz; if you want the results in fine scientific German, you will find them tucked away in the volumes of the "Psychologische Arbeiter."

SIMPLEST THING

It is the simplest thing in the world to test a man's mental capacity. A favorite method is to find how many ordinary additions of single-placed figures he can do in an allotted time. This is known as an "habitual association of ideas"—a mental process, that is, which we are constantly performing. The Herr Professor tested his subject with his faculties as nature gave them and discovered his normal capacity. He then tested the same man after he had been slightly alcoholized. Alcohol greatly reduced his ability at this simple operation. Moreover, the man's mathematics became worse day by day; the effect of daily moderate drinking was cumulative.

Another mental test had the same result. This involved a higher psychical faculty, that known as its "free association of ideas." For example, think of the name of any object—say a "house." Then immediately write down the other things that this word suggests—people, home, the family cat, an overdue mortgage, a wedding, a funeral, and so on. An active and trained mind reveals itself in the number and logic of the ideas presented; they flow out of it almost automatically. Try this one day in a perfectly sober state. Then try it ten or twelve hours after imbibing a small amount of champagne. Perform both of these experiments many times as Kraepelin's subjects did, so that the results can not be explained by other causes; our minds, of course, are notoriously more active on some days than on others.

A record of your experiments, extending through a considerable time, will show that "idea-association" comes far more quickly to the normal than to the alcoholic brain. Alcohol affects these higher mental faculties even more than it does the lower. Other experiments likewise demonstrated that the same mind, without alcohol, is much better at remembering than when it contains a little alcohol. One does not have to get repeatedly drunk to impair his memorizing ability; a little strong drink, taken every day, will do the trick. And the memory becomes weaker the longer the alcoholic process continues.

And so science disposes of most of the superstitions that have accumulated about alcohol in several thousands of years. And it has discovered many more things more recondite. It does not believe that alcohol is a heart stimulant; "it is a heart depressant," says Lafayette B. Mandell, professor of physiological chemistry in Yale University. It lowers one's resistance to contagious disease.—Burton Hendricks, in Munsey's Magazine.

Mothers' Home Column

EDITED BY CHRISTIANA SALYARDS

The Principle Governing in Zion

A college class in Bible study had it in their lesson recently that the principle governing in Zion in Enoch's time was that every man should seek the interest of his neighbor.

The class learned that the ancient city of Enoch is our pattern by which to build up the New Jerusalem, of which city the Lord talked to Enoch, telling him of a time when the Zion of old will come down to meet the Zion of modern times.

If we are to affiliate with those saints of earliest times, we must build by the same principles. We must learn as did they to seek the good of the whole body of the church, to act for the interest of our neighbors.

Theory and Practice

It is one thing to have a theory and another thing to put the theory into practice.

One time a girl joined this church, a girl who, before, had lived out in the world and had not known the principles in the financial law of the church. A few weeks after having joined the church, a neighbor boy came to the door one frosty morning without socks on his feet to keep him warm.

The girl's money was small in amount, but the principle taught by the church, that we ought to seek the interest of our neighbors, had found a strong response in her heart; she felt under the responsibility of putting into practice the beautiful theory of the church. She went to town, a mile distant, bought yarn for the socks, and the boy's mother sat up late that night to knit them.

The girl's application of the principle of brotherly kindness warmed the boy's feet and his mother's heart. A universal application of this divine principle would result in warming the hearts of us all, as it did in Enoch's time when his people, under its beneficence, became a city of righteousness, whose inhabitants were all of one heart and one mind.

The same principle in Melchisedec's city made it a city of peace. It knit together the hearts of Jerusalem saints in the days of the apostles, as also it did the hearts of the Nephite saints, so that there could not be a happier people than were they who applied to their actions the theory of seeking the interest of one another.

What of Ourselves?

The writer does not know and does not presume to guess how many Saints in the present time are applying the theory by which Zion is to be built up. But it occurs to us to ask the women who read this column to answer to themselves whether they are living as closely to it as they might.

There are Saints at home and abroad who are feeling keenly the pressure of the times. There are conditions which cry for relief and none can be given, if the individual Saints do not do their part.

What can we do to seek the interest of our neighbors, near or far though they may be? You, my sister, who read this, may be doing all you can. And you, my sister, might do a little more, if you could realize the need of your sharing the sacrifice the church as a whole is making to carry this gospel of the kingdom to the people of the earth in a time close to the coming of the Lord from heaven.

If your coat is warm, could you adjust your feelings to wearing it another season? If you need a new one, can you be satisfied with one of modest price, instead of the more expensive one you have it in your power to buy? And could you turn into the treasury of the church the money you thus save to let it be applied in one of the many places in which the church needs money?

Can you do this and have your heart warmed with the glow of joy in knowing that you are sharing the burden of the church? If you are one of the comfortable ones, you may have to think hard and exercise your imagination strongly to know the sacrifice a portion of the church is making all the time, year in and year out.

No one has the right or the complete opportunity to decide whether you are doing all you can do and ought to do. That privilege belongs to each individual who knows fully the situation in which he is placed. We presume, however, to say that it is highly probable that the treasury of the church might be materially benefited, were there turned into it the amount women might save by holding in restraint their desires in the matter of their expenditures for dress.

"Be Not Harsh in Judgment"

In giving one of the revelations to the church, the Lord gave also this incidental warning to his Saints: "Be not harsh in judgment but merciful in this, as in all other things."

The principle of mercy should govern us, not only in prompting us to contribute to the coffers of the church for the benefit of the needy, but also in holding in check the criticisms upon the outward appearance of others which may be unwarranted by the facts, were we in possession of them.

Persons who receive allowance from the church are sometimes criticized for wearing things of value, when, were it known, as it need not be, the articles in question were the gifts of kind-hearted friends. Persons are sometimes criticized for the poor appearance made by them, when, were the full truth known, they would be praised for sacrifices nobly made.

"Be not harsh in judgment but merciful in this, as in all other things." To be merciful in all things is enjoined upon us in many teachings in divine writ; merciful to the poor to the relieving of their wants, merciful to the well-to-do and the rich, to the withholding of criticisms which may not be well founded; merciful to the well-dressed; merciful to the poorly-dressed; merciful to all people and in all things.

SUBJECTS FOR THE FIRST THURSDAY IN DECEMBER

The church,—prayers for its priesthood and membership, that all may earnestly seek to build up Zion to the ideal condition of oneness and equality revealed in the word of God to the church. Pray that each member of the church may become so pure in heart that he will not even think evil of a brother or sister, but will regard the reputation of another as his own.

Lesson, Romans 13, Inspired Version; memory text, 1 Peter 4: 7, 8.

REQUEST FOR PRAYERS

LEON, IOWA, November 10, 1914.

Dear Sisters of the Prayer Union: I am afflicted with diabetes and almost blind, having lost the sight of one eye from cataract, and the other is closing over. I wish to be remembered in prayer by the Saints.

May the good Lord bless all in the work we are engaged in. I have been in the church thirty-one years. My faith is strong in the gospel we have received.

Your sister in Christ,

MRS. MARTHA J. EHM.

Letter Department

AT SEA, October 5, 1914.

Editors Herald: Although not actually brought into action as yet, the last ten weeks has been one continual search on the high seas for any of the enemy's ships that may be at large. I am not at liberty to say just what has taken or is likely to take place, but it has meant very little rest for most of us. Some have scarcely seen their hammocks since war was declared; no one is allowed to undress for sleep; while every few days we have rushed into harbors to fill up with coal, and off and out again before the coal dust has been washed away; while all the time it has been one continual, strict vigilance night and day. Saturday or Sunday, harbor or sea—one long, keen lookout for the enemy; this, at any rate, is the experience of the squadron to which my ship is attached, and this constant watchfulness, so far from daunting the spirit of the men, has, on the contrary, increased it, which attitude is the keynote of what I really want to talk about.

No Saint is a fatalist in the generally accepted term, but is a firm believer in the will and plan of God, and from this standpoint it is safe to say that no power on earth could have prevented this terrible war. Those who have read that valuable book of Elder Daniel Macgregor's, A Marvelous Work and a Wonder, can not fail to realize that what is going on in Europe fits in exactly with the time or period of the world's history, as wonderfully foretold in the prophecies.

That at any rate is my belief, and is the spirit by which I am obsessed and animated in my daily life, and creates in me what I should never have thought possible two years ago, viz, an absence of fear! I will try to qualify that statement by a few observations which, although personal, are none the less true; we are told that "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man, availeth much"; very humbly I have put my whole trust and confidence in that statement during this conflict, and, as a result, I realize how it is that I am still afloat, instead of sharing the same fate of the cruisers Aboukie, Hogue, and Crecy.

This will be better understood, perhaps, when I say that we were engaged in exactly the same work, sometimes in the same vicinity, but, on each of the last four occasions of putting to sea, we have experienced rough weather, which makes it almost impossible for the submarines to carry out their deadly work, while during the four interims in harbor it has been very fine weather, during which the disaster occurred; by the same source I believe we have been preserved from contact with the enemy's mines.

One of the greatest lessons I have ever learned in my life has through the power of the gospel just been taught me, and that is to regard our enemies with more kindness than hatred.

It is very wonderful, too, how I have been able to speak to various men while passing the deck during the quiet hours of the night, and unfold to them in my humble way the mysteries of God's dealings with mankind, and especially as it bears on this war; hour after hour has been spent in this way; but as soon as one gets down to the period of 1830, they show signs of incredulity. Only this evening one of them, an ardent Roman Catholic said, "What about the millennium now? When is it going to come?" "Perhaps about the year 1920," I replied; "but it is impossible for anyone to tell, the thing that matters is to be ready when it does come;" and although I have spoken to him for several nights for hours at a time, I feel impelled to repeat to him the false position of the papacy according to prophecy; he seems very anxious to hear the truth, tells me he has never read any of the Bible. He is now reading, A Marvelous Work and a Wonder. Sometimes I wonder whether he is really seeking the truth, or whether it is just curiosity that prompts him to listen; in any case, he can never say he has not heard or known the truth.

Others I have been able to speak to in a little storeroom that I have at my disposal, which is very convenient in rough weather, and it is really pitiful to note the serious attention they give to one dispelling the powers of darkness, and yet, as I have said, the idea of latter-day revelation is too much for them.

I am aware that I have attracted a certain amount of attention, especially on the part of my own messmates. I was asked point blank at tea time a few days ago just what I thought about the war, and my interpretation of it generally. I accepted the challenge, starting from the beginning of the prophecies, and finishing at John's revelation. The one who asked me is something of a cynic, of the high church party, from which body I myself have only recently emerged, and I did not spare his feelings; it was nearly supper time when we finished.

The great point to observe is this: That amongst even the most careless of our naval men, this war has produced in the minds of some of them a feeling of wonder and apprehension, not altogether unnatural considering the stupendous issues at stake, and is typical of what we read of in Luke 21 about living in perilous times, on the earth stress of nations, with perplexity, men's hearts failing them, with fear, for looking for those things that are coming upon the earth, etc. I feel deeply my responsibility whenever I have the opportunity of speaking a word in season, and my one prayer is that I may be able to point out the truth with wisdom and humility.

It was in such circumstances as these that I feel constrained to transfer some of my thoughts on the matter to verse, and which was placed on the ship's company's notice board, many copies of which were sought after, that the men might send home to their families.

October 7, 1914, 9.20 p. m. Last night about this time I was talking to another Roman Catholic in response to his query as to my impression of the war. It was a lovely moonlight night. We paced up and down the deck, and I was surprised to find he was a confirmed agnostic of the Voltaire school, and although he goes to mass, yet he doesn't believe the Bible to be the inspired word of God. (I am afraid there are a lot more Roman Catholics of the same mind.) I asked him who he worshiped when he went to church? He saw the trap into which he had fallen and evaded the issue by saying, "Well, as far as I was led to believe as a child it is God, but my reason now tells me that there is no positive proof of his existence, and if he does exist, then his character as a God of love is a false one for allowing this war to go on, and setting back the clock of civilization a hundred years. And if the millennium does come, it will only be through the common sense and justness of men."

I tried to show him how this could not possibly depend on man, but that God uses human agency in the carrying out of his plans. But what a world of darkness these people live in who believe this kind of thing; and it really seems as if there are those who are absolutely incapable of seeing the hand of God in anything. The glorious hope of the resurrection to the Saints of God has no meaning for them, and, as he told me himself, he was quite prepared to accept the consequences, if what I told him should be true.

Had he been on deck this afternoon I would have called his attention to a small school of whales disporting themselves away in the offing, and asked him if he believed in the story of Jonah. He would probably have said, like a good many, that the throat of a whale is not large enough to swallow anything bigger than a dog, forgetful of the fact that if God made the universe and the wonderful creature called man, nothing is impossible for him to do.

I have an idea that others in England, Australia, Denmark and even America, will be interested to know how the war is affecting me. I know their prayers are daily offered for my safety, and the columns of the HERALD afford a means of assuring all of my condition, and the confidence I feel in the efficacy of their prayers, as also of my own for the safety and well-being of the Saints all the world over.

In conclusion, may we all have that feeling of constant watchfulness of the enemy Satan, the signs of the times, the second advent of our Lord, and the glorious consummation of the kingdom of earth, when all the kingdoms of this world will have become the kingdoms of God and his Christ.

SHAWNEE, OHIO, October 11, 1914.

Editors Herald: I am at this place preaching to a few with good liberty. Some are much interested, but Satan is raging, insomuch that we are obliged to close our effort for this time. The companions of those who are interested are bitter against our faith, and are charging them with going crazy, saying I have hypnotized them. One wishes the Book of Mormon, another the Doctrine and Covenants. Others will order the Book of Mormon later. I preached last night on the Book of Mormon with excellent liberty. All who were present accepted the message as truth. I am preaching at a private house. There are two churches here, with no minister, but we could not get either of these.

Your brother in Christ,

JAMES C. MCCONNAUGHY.

WEST JONESPORT, MAINE, October 14, 1914.

Editors Herald: The standard work now being done by the HERALD and those called to be Saints as world witnesses can hardly be appreciated, it is so great: Great in the sense of its origin, the spirit of truth; great in the sense of its instrumentality and mighty development by way of man.

Never before in all man's creation has time called with such a voice as now.

The HERALD voices what no man can deny, and while it is a well-known fact that in time past the good has constantly suffered defeat by and through the dissenting spirits of the world, time now produces a more excellent spirit in the heart and mind of man, and through grace and favor do the Saints of the Most High prepare a way before him and the invisible church of the first born, brought near. Its windows are open and its gates are ajar, an altar is erected near the doorway, a fountain is opened. This temple of the eternal is better realized than described, is seen only by promise, and felt only by him who "knows."

It gives me great pleasure to be able to place confidence in all, and with others to partake of the grace and favor of God.

Sincerely yours,

F. L. NORTON.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, October 14, 1914.

Editors Herald: I appreciate the HERALD and its valuable contributions in recent months. The work at the Independence Second Branch is moving forward slowly but surely, we trust. The Lord has been near his Saints, possibly nearer than we realized. I think I am speaking the sentiment of the branch, when I say that we rejoice that we may worship in a dedicated edifice, entirely clear from debt.

I hope to engage in the gospel work in such an humble way that I may be of service to my brethren and sisters, and in that way serve him who saw fit to call me into this grand and glorious work. Additional responsibility has recently been placed upon me that has caused me to indeed feel my nothingness before God. It seems I have never before felt the need of humbling myself, so that the work intrusted to myself might be faithfully and intelligently done.

There have been some things to try my faith this last year, but I am still looking on the bright side of life, and hope for the blessing of God to be with me and all of his children.

I pray to be faithful in the conflict.

Your brother,

D. L. BARNETT.

MASONTOWN, WEST VIRGINIA, October 14, 1914.

Editors Herald: The HERALD is a welcome visitor in our home and brings strengthening, spiritual food for our hungry souls. In perusing its interesting pages, I am made glad to know of the many dear Saints engaged in the service of the Master, and of the work they are performing for the upbuilding of Zion. My greatest desire is that we may faint not, but press onward and perform our duty and earnest work in the army of the Lord.

The work in this part of the Lord's vineyard is progressing fairly well. We continue to hold prayer services, and have a fair attendance. We had the pleasure of having Brother H. E. Winegar with us for a meeting of two weeks, in which he preached spiritual sermons, strengthening to all the Saints. We delight in hearing the gospel preached. Brother Winegar is an able man. My prayer is that he may ever be found faithful, and that he may be blessed in his efforts, and be the means of bringing many precious souls into this glorious work. He organized a Sunday school while here. We ask the prayers of the Saints that the Lord will bless this little school, and bless us in our efforts, that we may assist in bringing earnest souls to the light.

About a week after Brother Winegar left, a Salt Lake Mormon preached at Hering, about three miles from where we live. He told the people the faith of Utah was the same as that of the Reorganization, as we were only a branch off of their church. Such statements are unfortunate, as people listen to them and turn a deaf ear to the truth.

There is only a small band of Saints here; but as the Lord has said, where two or three are gathered together in his name, there will he be, and that to bless. What greater promise could we have as Saints, than when we are endeavoring to live righteously and to perform our full duty, we are to enjoy the presence of the Spirit of God, and be laying up a crown of righteousness?

Though young, in the church as well as young in years, I desire to be one with God's people. I wish to be found faithful and ready to tell the good old gospel story whenever I have an opportunity. Satan tries in many ways to lead the young away from the church, but if we put forth an effort and call on the Lord to help, we will receive strength to press onward. The young of to-day will be the church of the future, and we must remain true to the covenant made with the Lord.

Brethren of the ministry are ever welcome in our home. Whenever any can come, we will be glad to have them do so. Our door stands open for all. We ask the prayers of the Saints that we may have more knowledge and wisdom concerning this glorious work. We remember all the Saints.

Ever praying for the welfare and redemption of Zion, I remain,

A sister in the one faith,

RESSIE RADABAUGH.

BLOOMSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA, October 15, 1914.

Editors Herald: The writer is at present doing missionary work in the town of Bloomsburg. We are trying to persuade the Saints to subscribe for the church periodicals and to purchase the church publications. We are pleased to report that the work is growing in this place.

About thirteen years ago Brother Herbert A. Cunningham moved his family here, and for twelve years they were the only Saints within a radius of sixty miles; they came from the State of Maine. They had no acquaintances in these parts, and seemed unable to get in touch to receive help from the brethren. But thanks to the HERALD and other periodicals, together with other good literature, and consistent, prayerful, virtuous lives, after these twelve years of isolation, they were found to be still very much alive in the work, and warm in the faith.

At their request, Brother U. W. Greene instructed Brother E. B. Hull to visit them and do some work, with the result that we had the privilege of conducting a precious soul into the kingdom, who since passed over to the other side. Brother Robert Walters and wife were added to the faith. By request of Brother Cunningham, pastor of the Scranton Branch, Brother T. U. Thomas visited Bloomsburg during the month of August or September, 1913, for a few days, and preached and baptized Brother Roy Shaffer, who was followed later by his wife. Shortly thereafter, Brother R. J. Hawkins, instead of spending his vacation bathing in the surf, improved the opportunity of preaching the gospel to the people of this place, and two others, husband and wife, Brother Isaac and Sister Lydia Shaffer, were convinced of the truthfulness of the work and made preparations for baptism, but, sad to relate, the husband and father was removed from this world in one of the worst accidents the writer has ever known. As soon as possible, the deceased brother's wife went bravely forward and obeyed that which she believed to be the will of the Master, and though oftentimes weighed down by so great an affliction, she finds consolation and comfort in the sweet fellowship of the gospel and the Spirit of the Master.

Immediately following the General Conference, the missionary in charge expressed his wish that the writer labor here in tent work during the summer months, if a co-laborer could be secured. In conjunction with Brother Hanson, we solicited the help of Brother Angus, who willingly responded. The Lord has surely been with us to bless in our instructing, as we have since baptized eight precious souls. At the close of our tent work Brethren Hanson and Angus proceeded to organize a branch, to be known as the Bloomsburg Branch. We sincerely hope this branch will "bloom" and be known for its spiritual life, and every effort be crowned. Brother H. A. Cunningham was ordained to the office of priest and elected president of the branch, and Brother Roy Shaffer was ordained to the office of deacon and elected branch deacon. Sister Inez Cunningham was elected secretary.

We pray that the Lord may add unto our number those who shall be eternally saved. May he ever keep us from evil, and strengthen us to do good, is our prayer.

In gospel bonds,

Editors Herald: My wife left Tahiti for America last June, to consult with physicians. On reaching her destination

she found that she was afflicted with a tumor in her right side which required immediate attention. She was successfully operated upon. During this time, I remained in the Islands and did what I could to help the work along. I made a trip with Brother Chrestensen through the Tumatu Islands interpreting for him, and generally introducing him to his new mission. My intention was to go on my mission field in New Zealand, where I hoped to be joined by my faithful companion after her recovery. But I was unexpectedly impressed to come to America; it was as though some one had spoken to me. After prayerful consideration, I decided to come.

There was no money worth mentioning in the treasury. The trip seemed impossible, at least difficult, as the war had caused a fifty per cent advance in the cost of living in Tahiti, and I could not take the money the other missionaries needed to buy food with. I found a way opened before me. The chief steward was willing and anxious to sign me with the crew, so I worked my way home. Anyone questioning my ability as a steward will please confer with Brother F. G. Pitt and wife, who suffered at my hands on that never-to-be-forgotten trip to Hao.

Brother and Sister May and family and Brother and Sister Chrestensen were well and happy when I left them. The French were making grave preparations to defend the place against the Germans. We saw them every day drilling, mounting cannon on the hills, storing ammunition, and maneuvering with their quick firing guns on motor trucks. The largest gun they had was only a three-inch gun. That is why they lost the day when the two German cruisers attacked them September 22.

We left Tahiti, August 30, for San Francisco, but went to San Diego to avoid the two German cruisers awaiting us on the coast. We passed between them the night we arrived in San Diego. We reached San Francisco, September 14.

I found my wife looking fairly well, but she was very weak. The doctor had ordered that I be sent for, but I had not received the letter. We are now enjoying the hospitality of Brother J. D. White's country home, while wife is convalescing. Yours truly is acting as nurse, general housekeeper, chore boy and cook. I am learning what Job suffered in his trials. This would be an ideal place for those who believe in disciplining themselves with rigid discipline and haircloth.

There are no Saints here. I preached in the Congregational church last Sunday. They have no pastor. The Methodist minister preaches for them. I tried to secure their church for a week, but they at once began to make excuses. They think, perhaps, we are of the Utah Mormons. I have the Methodist church for next Wednesday evening. I think that on that occasion I may tell them the difference. However, one does not like to touch upon that so soon.

Your brother in bonds,

H. W. SAVAGE.

GLOUCESTER, ENGLAND, October 22, 1914.

Editors Herald: The past month we have had with us Elder Thomas Jones of the missionary force. We have a nice branch of about forty members, with one elder, two priests, two teachers, and two deacons. We had the mission conference at Gloucester in August, which was a time never to be forgotten. I had not been in the church long, only about eight months, yet I felt the power of God at that meeting, and it was something real. I shall never forget it. Oh, that I had known this church long before! As a people we have cause to rejoice in the gifts of the everlasting gospel, enjoyed as in the days of Christ.

There are many honest in heart in this city, and, if we are faithful, God will bless us and assist us that they may see that we are his people. A few attending our meetings have expressed their desire for baptism, and there are others near the kingdom. There are some in our branch who are sorely tried and afflicted in many ways; with illness and shortage of work it is trying.

I have never had such good health as since being a member of this church; this alone is worth trying for. Christ has promised to each continuing faithful a crown of life, which is the prize for which we are working.

Yours in the hope of the promises which are in the gospel of Jesus Christ.

WILLIAM M. STOKES.

Extracts from Letters

Sister A. N. Locking, Cross Timbers, Missouri: "I do not feel that I could do without the HERALD. It is laden with wholesome food to enlighten and comfort all who read with the understanding. We are few in number here, some having moved away. We have lost one faithful sister, Cora Thomas, who was always ready to discharge her duty."

A. M. Chase, en route to Wilmington, Delaware: "I expect to reach Elk Mills, Maryland, my destination, at 2.40 p. m., to-day. Had an excellent day in Philadelphia yesterday, in spite of rain and wind. The work in our Quaker City is moving in the right direction. It is a long time since I enjoyed as much of the divine Spirit as I felt in the young people's prayer meeting at 8 a. m., with the first branch. The good influence was with us during the rest of the day."

F. T. and Maggie Coats, Talbot, Alberta: "We have been here two years and have not in all this time been visited by any of the ministry of the church. We are isolated in every way only for the church papers. We are becoming very hungry for a feast of the good things enjoyed in a branch of the church. We hope it will not be two years more until we have again the privilege of association with the Saints. We ask an interest in the prayers of all that we may prove faithful to the end."

'Neath the Southern Cross

At last writing I was in the neighboring state of Queensland. On October 18, I received instructions by telegram from Apostle Gomer T. Griffiths, our worthy minister in charge, to return home for consultation with him prior to his departure from these shores, as he had received a cablegram from his daughter worded: "Mother very sick; better come home." I returned by train the following morning. Am pleased to say that I left the work in the northern state in very good condition.

Arriving in Sydney, I found that our brother had attempted by cable to his folks to find out if it was really necessary for him to return. He hated to leave the mission before the work he had set out to do was accomplished; but as no response came to his cablegram, there was no other option but for him to return. He could not ignore a call like that. In thirty-four years of married life, spent in the active ministry, he had never before received a call to come home either by telegram or cable. He knew that matters must be serious or no such call would be made. Hence he is due to sail by the American steamer Ventura, on Saturday, October 24.

The sympathies of the whole mission are with our brother, who has endeared himself to all classes here. He is a man of action, and the Australians admire men who have the power to do things. He is keenly sympathetic towards all, especially the young. Many look up to him as a father and friend and will miss his cheery word and good advice. He has done much to put the affairs of the mission upon a sound basis. We regret that he was not permitted to be longer among us that he might be able to continue his good work of organization, but under the circumstances we would not be so selfish as to wish him to remain.

He has placed Elder J. H. N. Jones of the Seventy in charge of the work in the great state of western Australia; Elder C. Edward Miller in charge of South Australia, Victoria and Tasmania; while the writer has been made responsible for the states of Queensland and New South Wales, and the Dominion of New Zealand. We all understand his policy and the significance of the forward movement, and will prosecute the work in such a way that there will be no relapse.

Our brother has been wonderfully blessed since coming to this mission, and the work in Australasia has benefited as a result. The work of all, especially the local workers, has been systematized and placed upon a footing compatible with progress. He has been over the more important parts of the mission, and where he has not been we will put his policy in operation, so although he goes from us the work will go on just as he would wish it. The value of the work he has done since he came among us one year ago can not be lightly assessed, and I feel that I could not let him go from the mission without putting upon record my appreciation of his work. I am sure, also, that I voice the sentiments of all the Saints of Australasia.

It is a trying experience for a man placed in his position, so far from home, knowing that one of those dearest to him on earth is seriously ill and yet not able to obtain news of the condition of her health. Then there is the long journey on sea and land, over ten thousand miles, every mile of which will be crowded with anxiety and sadness. We pray that God will bless him on the dreary journey and keep his loved one safe till his return to her side, and that she may be spared for his companionship for many years to come.

We have much to do before he leaves—much to be arranged. Elder C. Edward Miller and Bishop Lewis come to-day to join in our councils.

Your brother in Christ,

WALTER J. HAWORTH.

Australia

I am mailing this letter on the same boat on which Brother Griffiths is leaving for America, he having received a cable message to return, that his wife was very ill. I went to Sydney from Melbourne, a distance of over five hundred miles, to see him off and receive instructions regarding the work here.

God moves in a mysterious way, and his ways are not ours; but I can't imagine Brother Griffiths arriving home too late to see his wife alive. It will take him nineteen days to arrive at San Francisco. Surely the Lord will permit Sister Griffiths to again see her husband. In all the years of his missionary experience she has never wired him to come home.

Because of his large experience in the church, and his talent for organizing, he was just the man for this mission at this time, and the work has taken on new life, so it seems strange he should be taken away right in the midst of this development. He waited until the very last moment, hoping to hear favorable news so he could continue here until his work was finished.

I shall certainly miss him, as he has been more than a father to me, and I fully expected to return with him after our three years' mission was ended, so I shall feel very lonesome here by myself. We have not been together very much over here, as we were laboring in different parts of the states, yet we were in constant touch by correspondence. The Lord is blessing my labors and I am thoroughly convinced I still have a work to do in Australia, or you may be sure I would have returned with Brother Griffiths to my native land and my loved ones. It is a great temptation.

In a number of localities there were twenty-five to forty Saints living within a few miles of each other. Brother Griffiths went to these various places, and a number of branches were organized. This seemed to have injected new life into the Saints and word has come that baptisms are taking place in a number of places. Two branches have each had ten added, another thirteen, and so the work is moving grandly on. Brother Griffiths organized six branches altogether and one district. These new branches each have a membership of between twenty-five to forty.

A new method to reach the people has been inaugurated. Gospel wagons are being started. This is an ideal country for such a method of proselyting, as there are practically no winters to speak of. Two men will travel together in each wagon, which will be equipped with cooking utensils and sleeping accommodations. Many homes by the wayside can thus be visited, church literature can be distributed, and preaching done on the streets of the towns, when halls are not accessible.

Last night the Saints assembled at the Balmain Branch to bid farewell to Brother Griffiths. Representatives of various branches in the mission, including Bishop Lewis, made speeches expressing their appreciation of our brother's labors and regrets that he must leave the mission. The hope was expressed that he either himself or some one who would continue his policies would be returned. The conference appointees here have been placed in charge, so the work will not be neglected.

There are only three branches, I believe, in the mission that Brother Griffiths has not visited, so he has been very active, and knows what the work needs in the future.

It has now been fifteen months since we left home; it will be a year the 10th of November since we landed in Sydney, the balance of the fifteen months being spent at the Society Islands, where Brother Griffiths did a good work, and on the great deep.

The steamer leaves this afternoon, and I shall certainly reluctantly bid Brother Griffiths farewell. May God's protecting power be over him on the deep, and may he find his noble companion spared to him. He cabled, hoping word would be sent that she was better and it would not be necessary for him to leave, but no word has been received, so he is reluctantly leaving the mission.

Sincerely,

C. EDWARD MILLER.

Northeastern Kansas

Leaving my home in Kansas City, Missouri, I arrived at Scranton, Kansas, in company with Brother J. W. A. Bailey, where we held a few meetings with a band of Saints, almost, if not altogether, Scotch and English. One child was blessed by the writer. Brother Bailey went from here to Carbondale, and the Englishmen to Fostaria, a hotbed of the Holy Roller Faith.

Learning of my arrival, these people sent for some of their representatives from Topeka. Among those who came were eight preachers. We were holding our meetings in a school-house, every seat being filled. The Holy Roller people raised a most terrible uproar in a Methodist church about one hundred and fifty feet from the schoolhouse. We were informed that they had driven the Methodist people out of this church, and it seemed that they were endeavoring to drive us from our place of meeting. Brother Munro and the writer were not made of running material, however, and so we stood our ground.

Before going to this place, I was told that when a searchlight was being demonstrated at Topeka, the illumination happened to strike Fostaria, and some of the Holy Rollers fell on their faces, exclaiming that they had seen an angel and that Christ was making his second advent. The Lord did not come that night as they expected, and they said the people were too wicked for him to come at this time. Some of this faith who come to our meetings complain because after we preach the people into the prison house we do not leave them there.

I was joined in this meeting by Brother J. W. A. Bailey, after the conclusion of his effort at Carbondale. By request of Brother F. G. Hedrick I left him in charge of the meeting and went to Council Grove. Here I found Brother H. C. Pitsenberger very much afflicted with an abscess under his arm. He received relief under administration. Brother and Sister Pitsenberger are alive in the work, as also is Sister Blasser.

The work we were sent here to perform was not completed by the writer, as we were unable to influence obedience to the law. We think, however, that the time is near when all concerned will see the necessity of obedience, and the extending of the principle of mercy. At this place we found an alarm bell which used to ring when the Indians were about to raid the town. This bell was erected in 1863, broken down in 1884, replaced in 1901, the corner stone of the monument being laid September 19, 1901. This monument is located on North Third Street. From this point we pass along the Santa Fe Trail, and come to a marker whereon is inscribed a treaty made with the Osage Indians for the right of way of the Santa Fe Trail, marked by the Daughters of the American Revolution and the State of Kansas in 1822, 1876, and 1906.

At this place we found a fine walnut grove, a beautiful place to hold a reunion, with plenty of water, shade and band stand owned by the city. If the Saints could meet here it would be a good place to introduce the angel's message.

I left this point for Green, Kansas, to hold a series of meetings. I can truthfully say that I have had a fine reception at each place I have visited in the district, and have been blessed in presenting the work, and look for a harvest by and by.

GEORGE EDWARDS.

Incidents of Travel

Being late getting into my field this year on account of home duties, I began the season's work at Boone, in the district tent, assisted by the local brethren, and continued four weeks, baptizing three. A fairly good interest was manifested by outsiders, but our message was handicapped to some extent by local conditions.

How important the admonition to the Saints to keep themselves "unspotted from the world," and to "stand in holy places!" The dance hall, card table, pool room, and theater can hardly be classed as "holy places." To frequent such places one is compelled to sit in the seat of the scornful, and stand in the way of sinners. Many writers of note are attributing the present European calamity to social madness—a just recompense for national unrighteousness. Who will dare deny it?

From Boone I went to Perry for a few days, then on to the Des Moines district reunion, at Rhodes. This was said to be one of the best ever held in this district. The Spirit of the Lord was present from the first, especially in the social meetings. The early morning priesthood meetings were a feature worthy of note. A lively interest was manifested in the several questions discussed, and light was shed on matters of importance.

From the reunion I went home, expecting to return to the district in four days, but was drafted into service as moderator for Brother L. G. Holloway, who was to meet W. G. Roberts in debate at Worth, Missouri. We arrived at Worth, September 2, and found quite an interest already manifest in the debate with the Church of Christ people, as usual, confident of victory. The usual church propositions were discussed first, then the Book of Mormon, and two sessions on continued revelation, Elder Roberts affirmed that the Bible was the complete will of God to man.

We were fortunate in securing a good chairman moderator, in the person of a Reverend Wilbur, I forget his first name. He was impartial all through, and presided with dignity.

Brother Holloway showed that to be in harmony with the church of the first century in origin, the Reorganized Church had to begin in the same way. He built solidly from the start, fortifying his position with numerous scriptures and authentic history. Elder Roberts sought to lead him away from the main issue, but in this he failed utterly. His stock in trade being objections to the Book of Mormon, the Inspired Translation, Joseph Smith, etc.

Elder Roberts began his opposition with his usual gush and bombast as to what he would do before the debate was over; but the audience waited in vain for him to make good. He sought to create prejudice against us by charging that we wanted the "life blood" of all others, and intended to "put out the light and life of most of us." He said the Saints could eat "corn bread, possum, and drink water" when partak- of the sacrament. "I'll skin you alive when we get on the next proposition"; "I'll run you into your Adam-God theory"; "these men are nothing but infidels, worse than Catholics"; "I honestly believe these two men right here would take our life blood if they could"; "strike me dumb if you can," were some of the things he repeated in nearly every speech, until even some of his own people became disgusted with him.

He admitted that the priesthood was inherited, but said a boy could not hold priesthood until his father died, therefore John the Baptist never held the priesthood because he died before his father did. He made no effort to prove it. He said he could not swallow such an old carcass as Joseph Smith set up. Brother Holloway replied: "Perhaps not; but he can swallow A. Campbell, hair and all."

A minister of another church said to us: "I would not stoop to meet such a man if I were you men." We told him that it was easier to meet a man like Roberts than it was to meet a man who would be fair and honorable, for the reason that usually after his first speech the people were disgusted with him, and could see that he cared only to get in his time.

When the "Church of Christ" came up for trial it was not long till the Christians betrayed a sad disappointment. Brother Holloway showed that at best they had no more than a clumsy counterfeit. One lady, who always sat in a conspicuous place, hissed Brother Holloway twice. The second time he remarked that snakes and geese were about the only animals that hiss, the former being noted only for their poison, and the latter for a lack of brains. There was no more hissing.

On the Book of Mormon proposition Roberts claimed the New Testament was the sealed book of Isaiah 29, and that Jesus was the angel of Revelation 14:6. He pretended to have a great many letters from Jews saying they had no desire to return to Jerusalem, but he would not read them—was holding them till the last session when there would be a bigger crowd; but it rained and the audience was small, so he never used his wonderful argument at all. He became rattled and started to read certain matters only to lay them down and pick up something else, then repeat the performance and put in his time without doing anything.

His object failure was more manifest on the last proposition. He had boasted so many times what he would do when he came to it, and the keen disappointment of his friends was plain to be seen when he failed utterly to show that the New Testament was God's last word to man. It was really the climax to the whole affair. Our brethren should insist on this proposition in every debate. Make them affirm what they teach in a way that we can have a chance at it.

Without any disposition to boast, the debate was a success from our point of view. Prejudice was broken down and many new friends made to the cause of truth. Brother Holloway made an able defense of our position, and gained the respect of all by his deportment. A saintly deportment carries weight always.

Returning to my field, I joined Brother D. J. Williams at Hubbard, where he had an appointment in a schoolhouse. We held forth with a fair interest till the conference at Nevada. Though it rained and the roads were muddy, the conference was well attended, and the visitors well cared for. The district reunion meets at Nevada next year, and if the reception tendered the visiting Saints at the conference indicates anything, the reunion will be a good place to go.

While at the conference I was urged by Brethren Hand and Settles to accompany them to Perry and hold a few meetings; but there were a number of calls from other points, and, Perry having had considerable work during last year, I was in doubt as to the wisdom of going. Saturday night I was shown in a dream that it was my duty to go and baptize three persons. Accordingly, I went and preached two weeks and baptized two noble men and a woman, Sunday, October 25, after which I felt free to move on.

From Perry I went to Union and joined Brother Williams where he had an appointment in a theater, having been denied the use of the church. We laid plans for some extensive advertising the next day, expecting to remain a week or so; but again I had a dream showing me that there was nothing there for us, so we left without further effort and came to Iowa Falls, where we secured the Christian church. What the results will be time must determine.

While in Perry I had a short article in two papers every day. Since coming here word comes to me that a minister of the Christian church in Perry wrote an article protesting against such articles, mentioning my name. His position was indorsed by the ministerial association, and their action published. The editor came back with a spirited editorial, in which he gave them to understand that the columns of his paper were open to all, and that if they so wished they could reply to any article so long as the discussion was not "personal" or "vicious." The work in Perry is growing and the preachers, unable to meet the situation honorably, sought to close the press against us. Their failure must be humiliating. I wrote a two-column reply, which was published November 6.

We troubled the waters yesterday, and Brother Williams baptized two little girls, Pearl and Ethel Oliver. Brother Oliver and family are the only Saints here, but if energetic zeal and a saintly life will reach the hearts of their neighbors there will be others some day.

There are a dozen or so Brighamites operating in Waterloo and vicinity, and seeing an item in the Waterloo Courier that the Mormon Church was organized at Manchester, New York, by Joseph Smith in 1830, I wrote an article correcting the error, and showing from Brighamite records that the "Mormon Church" was organized near Council Bluffs, in 1847; and that according to court records they were apostates from the original church founded by Joseph Smith, and represented by the Reorganized Church. It was published on the editorial page with a large heading, in the issue of November 7.

Word comes from Boone to the effect that a Free Methodist minister had signed propositions for a debate. This is so unusual that it is almost doubtful. Right here I would like to say a word about debates. It makes a big difference how propositions are worded and arranged. Personally, I will not debate any proposition that is so worded or arranged as to give an opponent the advantage. Prospective debates should be referred to the minister in general charge before propositions are signed, allowing the man who must do the debating something to say. The word origin should never be omitted from any church proposition. The origin is the first thing other ministers strike at when our work is on trial, and the one thing they seek to evade when it comes their turn to defend. I am not posing as a know-all, but I have learned a lesson or two as to the manner of writing propositions. "Resolved that the — Church is in harmony with the Bible in origin, organization, doctrine, and practice," is the only fair form of church proposition. Beginners take notice. It covers the whole ground, and is free from ambiguity.

Independence, Missouri

The Saints have been of late enjoying a shaking up spiritually so to speak, through the sharpshooting of Elder Oakley R. Miller, a fearless and loyal warrior in the army of the Lord. Referring no doubt to some of us laggard recruits in this chosen field of Zion, he broke out in stern reproof for our lack of interest in not waking up, and told us about Mary McCarthy, who had a character in the old country but lost it in coming over on the boat. This was the way with many Latter Day Saints, said he, who begin all right but who lose their first love, and the Spirit of the Lord. Another shot that resounded from his lips as from the battalions of heaven made the sleeping soldiers wake up. He said, "I am going to-day and all the time to denounce the inconsistency of man. The most important work in life is the seeking for and helping others to seek for salvation. But there are people within a gunshot of the churches who would rather play a game of cards than come out and hear a missionary. And they who whisper to their comrades that the ministry of the church are living on charity have not the Spirit of Christ."

At the sunrise meeting at 8 o'clock, November 8, though a beautiful morning, there were only twenty present. There was however, an excellent service, and those attending rejoiced in the Holy Spirit. The morning preaching hour at the close of the Sunday school was given to the national prohibition movement. At this meeting the young people gave a spicy entertainment consisting of rare vocal and orchestral numbers interspersed with readings by two of our rising young men. The signing of the pledge as issued by the executive of the Lincoln-Lee League followed. There was an attendance of the Sunday school of 863, beginners 91, teachers 84. The meetings in the evening and afternoon were inspiring.

Brother O. R. Miller presented himself before a very large audience at 8 p. m., at the close of a half-hour orchestral entertainment, and by his zeal, broadmindedness, and plain presentation of the gospel message enthused both young and old to a degree seldom observed heretofore. In the ministry of Brother Miller during the past two weeks, the wisdom and forethought of our presiding officers have been clearly seen.

Our business meeting on the following night was a lively one. Several reports from bishops' courts were read and findings affirmed. The condition of the branch finances was stated, and the matter of the gymnasium considered, a competent committee to look after the latter being chosen. Sister C. J. Hunt was elected to succeed Brother McKim on the library board.

Your sister in the faith,

MRS. ABBIE A. HORTON.

With the demise of the Exponent, the Sunday school people felt the need of an avenue of expression.

To meet this need we have offered them the use of a department in the SAINTS' HERALD under the management of Elder Gomer R. Wells, superintendent of the General Sunday School Association. Watch for this department soon!

MOTHERS' HOME COLUMN

For many years past this department, first founded by that noble, capable, and consecrated worker, Sister Marietta Walker, has been a splendid feature of the SAINTS' HERALD.

In the hands of the present department editor, Sister Christiana Salyards, it is a feature of which we are justly proud. She is well known for her Sunday school quarterly work. She brings to this department the same patient research, coupled with originality of thought, that made her quarterly work successful.

All mothers and home keepers should read this practical and valuable department.

MAGAZINE NUMBERS

From time to time during the year we publish splendid magazine numbers.

These numbers are filled with the very best matter that we can secure. They are profusely illustrated.

The pictures alone in some of these numbers are worth the subscription price for a year. The articles in such a magazine number for instance as the one devoted to "Our Church Courts" are worth many times the yearly subscription price.

We have some excellent Magazine Numbers in course of preparation. They come along at intervals as a special treat,—to give you good measure, pressed down and running over.

TERMS

The SAINTS' HERALD is published weekly at Lamoni, Iowa, by the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. The subscription price is only $1.50 per year, in advance.

The SAINTS' HERALD costs a little more than some religious periodicals. But then it covers a far wider range.

You do not need to be ashamed of your own church paper. It will bear comparison with the best religious weeklies on the market. Give it your financial support. Subscribe now. Try to get us a few new subscribers.

AGENT'S NOTICE

To the Saints of Spokane District; Greeting: We thank all who have honored the law of Christ in temporal things. We teach the unchangeable God and the everlasting gospel, hence in every age the law of tithes is set forth. Nothing in this world can help us to overcome the selfishness of our natures so well as giving to the Lord that which is his in tithes and consecrations. We are asking a great deal of God, eternal life; what are we willing to give in return?

Have we departed from the narrow way which leads to success? The world about us is full of the spirit of speculation, and there are so many ways open before us that we are liable to put off giving God his portion of that which he has given us until it is too late, and withholding that which is his is robbing God. The debt to him is the oldest we have. Saints must prove themselves and make a reasonable effort to do their part.

This year is nearing an end, and our books will be closed December 31. We will be pleased to hear from all, including the silent ones. W. W. FORDHAM, Agent.

Spokane, WASHINGTON; South 238 Haven Street.

Do Your Shopping Early

When you do your Christmas shopping, remember these commandments:

“The Spirit saith further . . . and both in private and in public expenditure carry into active exercise the principle of sacrifice and repression of unnecessary wants.”—Doctrine and Covenants 130: 7.

“Seek ye out of the best books words of wisdom; seek learning even by study and also by faith.”—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 36.

“I give unto you a commandment . . . study and learn and become acquainted with all good books,” etc.—Doctrine and Covenants 87: 5.

Put these commandments together and you will feel that you are keeping the spirit of them by investing in any of the church publications, either for others or for yourself.

A Christmas or New Year's present of this character will be of the very best kind—real, satisfying soul food.

To study and learn good books, we must possess them, and in securing them we are avoiding expenditure of our means for unnecessary wants.

PRESIDENT SMITH ILL

The Saints throughout the world will be pained to learn of the serious illness of President Joseph Smith, Senior Editor of the HERALD. President Smith was stricken at his home in Independence, Missouri, on the morning of November 26 with heart failure, superinduced by acute indigestion. He is in a critical condition. Latest word as we go to press this, Wednesday, morning is that symptoms are less favorable and that he continues to grow weaker. The outcome is uncertain.

President Smith is comparatively free from pain, and his mentality is unimpaired. All his immediate family, with President E. A. Smith and others, are at his bedside, President F. M. Smith having reached home from the East on Sunday.

In this hour of anxiety and painful waiting, we bow in recognition of the wisdom of God, and await in faith the order of his divine will. J. F. G.

OUR GUIDE

There are various operations of the Holy Spirit and various manifestations of it. On one occasion it rested upon Saul at Gilgal and while clothing him with prophetic power made "another man" of him in a single day, so that the proverb obtained through all the land, "Is Saul also among the prophets." That was a great display of spiritual power.

On another occasion the Spirit came upon the disciples who tarried at Jerusalem waiting their endowment from on high, and cloven tongues as of fire rested upon them, while the room was filled with the sound as of a mighty rushing wind. Tongues and prophecies were heard. So great was the wonder that the multitudes hearing of it rushed to the scene of the miracle to speculate and marvel and hear and be converted.

Yet wonderful as these experiences are, they do not appeal to us so strongly as does the constant daily guidance of the Holy Spirit that may be given to a man all his life long. Saul fell from grace. The day of Pentecost came to an end like all other days.

It is good to have these especial days of Pentecost to look back to, but it is also essential that there should be a constant daily guidance upon the part of God and a constant daily following upon the part of man. Christ said that we should live by every word that proceeds from the mouth of God. When in need, it is not the best friend who bestows upon us a ton of bread to mold and waste—better the daily loaf. Pray for an occasional Pentecost; but pray more earnestly for the constant, never-ending, un-failing daily portion of spiritual good.

There is another thought concerning the Spirit as a guide. When men travel into the woods of the far north, or into the jungles of Africa, or into the Alpine fastnesses, they employ a guide. They are entering upon territory that is new to them and they secure one who is familiar with the region.

Each man may select his own spiritual guide. He is given the utmost freedom. God forces his Spirit on no man. But once the choice is made and the Christian journey is begun, we should follow the guide.

When I go into the Alps the guide ties a rope around his waist and around mine. He is instantly ready to save me if I fall into a crevasse. As we journey I may express some wishes as to our conduct and choice of trails; but if I persist in going where there is imminent danger, he says, "No; you must not go there. It looks safe to you but I know that it is not."

If I still persist, he says, "Then cut yourself loose. You go at your own peril."

As we follow the Spirit's guidance we may express our wishes freely, but if we choose to go where there is danger, the Spirit says, "No; you must not go there." If we unwisely persist, the command comes, "Cut yourself loose. You go there at your own peril." The Spirit will not always strive with man.

One of the beauties of the journey is that we are led into new regions. We are guided "into all truth." If the regions were not new we would need no guide. That is, they are new to us. The truths daily discovered may have been old to Job or to Enoch or to Paul; but as we learn them they are new to us, just as every ancient forest to every lad is the forest primeval.

It does not mean alone the memorizing of truths gleaned while perusing the Bible or listening to a sermon; but truths discovered by original exploration into the fields of meditation, so that one sees and knows things for himself.

Sometimes we envy one who is gifted with a splendid memory so that he can memorize chapters and verses and whole sermons. While that is a splendid gift, give us the ability to think a few thoughts for ourselves rather than the best memory that ever treasured the thoughts of the dead and gone.

Let us be faithful and intelligent followers of our guide, taking part in the God-given plan of a cooperation between human and divine wisdom.

E. A. S.

CURRENT EVENTS SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

NEW HAITIAN GOVERNMENT.—The United States has been officially notified that a new government has been formed in Haiti with Davilmar Theodore, the victorious leader of the recent rebellion, at its head.

CANAL AND TEMPERANCE.—Colonel Goethals, governor of the Canal Zone, has issued an order requiring all persons employed on the Panama Canal and who hold marine licenses, including pilots, captains of tugboats and mates, to abstain from the use of liquor.

PROPOSED CANAL.—A commission appointed four years ago by the Russian Duma and Senate has reported favorably on a proposed canal to connect the Baltic and the Black seas. The scheme contemplates canalizing the Dnieper and Dwina rivers, the former flowing into the Black Sea, the latter into the Baltic. The sources of the rivers would be connected by artificial waterways. The length of the canal would be one thousand, five hundred and forty miles.

TURKEY EXPLAINS.—It has been officially announced that delayed messages inform the United States Government that before Ambassador Morgenthau was directed to make inquiry Turkey volunteered information concerning the firing on the launch from the Tennessee seeking entrance into the Bay of Smyrna, explaining that the harbor had been closed, that the launch bearing Captain Decker of the Tennessee was in the act of passing through the mine zone contrary to Turkish regulations, and that the shots were only meant as a warning to stop the launch. Captain Decker reports the "act not hostile, but unfriendly."

APPEAL FOR NEUTRALITY.—In the matter of difference between Great Britain and France and Colombia and Ecuador over the use by the Germans of Colombian wireless stations in directing the German fleet in the Pacific and the coaling of German vessels from bases in Ecuador, the allies have appealed to the United States to use its good offices to have the offending countries observe more strictly the requirements of neutrality. It is reported that announcement has been made in the English House of Commons that if these countries continue their former attitude the powers affected may deem it necessary to take protective action.

AMERICAN PROTECTION.—The United States is said to have been asked by Argentine, Chile, Peru, and Uruguay, to cooperate with the countries of South America in negotiating with the powers now at war to bring about the exclusion of belligerent war vessels from American waters, to insure the safeguarding of trade between the American countries, and to remove the possibility of friction between the American nations and the belligerent powers. Brazil is considering the advisability of joining the South American countries in this request.

CHRISTMAS SHIP ARRIVES.—The Christmas ship, Jason, steamed into Plymouth Harbor November 25, to leave for Great Britain and Belgium their share of Christmas gifts. With British marine bands playing "The Star Spangled Banner," with British soldiers and sailors standing at salute, and with the United States flag flying from British flag staffs, the Jason moved majestically into harbor, receiving, it is said, the highest honors ever paid an alien ship by the British admiralty. The Jason will continue to distribute her cargo of peace and good will amidst feverish preparations for carnage and war.

SCIENCE AND THE DEAD.—A message from London in reporting a recent address of Sir Oliver Lodge, president of the Society for Psychological Research, stated that he announced that he was absolutely certain of a future existence; that he had conversed with friends who had passed away. The parties communicated with were said to have been scientific men. Sir Oliver is reported as having said, in part:

Communication is possible. One must obey the laws and find out the conditions. I do not say it is easy, but I do say it is possible, and I have conversed with them as I could converse with anyone in this audience. . . . That the Master himself is helping us is, I believe, literally true.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—On November 23 the United States forces were withdrawn from Vera Cruz. These forces reached Galveston, Texas, the 26th. With the four thousand, forty-four officers and men of the army and the two thousand, six hundred and forty-two of the marine corps, were five hundred and twenty-eight refugees. On the same day General Aguilar took possession of Vera Cruz for Carranza, who has since entered the city and established his headquarters there. No faction was recognized by the United States in the evacuation of Vera Cruz. The one million dollars in customs duties collected during the United States occupancy will be held until a government is formally recognized. The United States fleet in Mexican waters remains, in readiness for possible emergencies. Reports from various parties of Mexico are many and conflicting, seeming to be sent out to make for the disadvantage of the opposition. The following appears reasonably reliable: The Carranza forces having withdrawn, Zapata has entered Mexico City and is in control there. Villa is nearing the national capital. A portion of Villa's army is en route to Tampico, held by General Cabellero, once a Carranza supporter, but now said to recognize the Aguas Calientes party. Carranza representatives report that the Carranza forces have withdrawn from Mexico City for strategical reasons, and that they expect confidently to eventually control the situation. On the other hand, Villa announces his preparedness to sustain the action of the Aguas Calientes Convention.

EUROPEAN WAR.—The struggle between Germany and Russia in Russian Poland has been the center of interest during the week covered by this review. The second German advance into Poland has been checked forty miles from Warsaw. Reports from Russian sources indicate a decisive victory for Russian arms with a large part of the German army in a position of extreme danger; Germany reports victories, but the arrival of Russian reinforcements postponing a decision. The Russians have again invaded Hungary. Nothing of importance is reported from eastern Prussia or Galicia. In the western theater of war, following sharp activities the early part of the week along the coast, in which the British fleet participated, in the vicinity of Dixmude, Ypres, Verdun, and in the Argonne regions, partial cessations of hostilities is reported, due, it is thought, in part at least, to the withdrawal by Germany of forces to reinforce her army in Poland. Austria claims success in Servia. Servia announces victory in her northwestern territory. Russian reinforcements are said to have reached Servian soil and to be in advance to the front. Russia reports victory over the Turks in the Caucasus, England claiming success over them at the head of the Persian Gulf. The defeat by Turkey of British troops along the Suez Canal is reported via Berlin. The defeat of a British expedition against German South Africa is announced. Meager news indicate that the Boer rebellion is making no headway. General De Wet has been defeated, and his forces, except himself and twenty-five men who escaped, have surrendered. Two British steamers have been sunk by German submarines, and a British collier blown up by a mine. The British warship Bulwark was on the 26th sunk off Sheernees, on the Thames, by an accidental ex-losion while ammunition was being put aboard. The vessel went down three minutes after the explosion, only twelve of the crew of between seven and eight hundred escaping. Bulgaria has officially announced that she intends to maintain her neutrality. Dispatch from Lisbon, via London, announces that the Portuguese Congress on November 24 decided that Portugal should cooperate actively with the allies whenever it was considered necessary. Partial mobilization was to be ordered. A holy war is reported formally declared by the Sultan of Turkey, who calls upon the millions of Moslems the world over to join in the war against the allies.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

ANNOUNCEMENT TO SUBSCRIBERS.—After due consideration, the Board of Publication announces a change in the method of managing the circulation of the various church publications. Heretofore the publications have been sent one year after becoming delinquent. Hereafter all church publications will be discontinued promptly on the date of expiration. The growth of this department of the church work necessitates this change, and announcement is made so that the subscribers to the various church publications will understand why their publications are discontinued, if discontinued.

ELDER GRIFFITHS REACHES HOME.—We call attention to a letter from Elder Gomer T. Griffiths appearing in our Letter Department of this issue, telling of the condition of Sister Griffiths on his return home from Australia. The Saints everywhere will rejoice with the family in their hope for the recovery of our sister, and everywhere will they join with them in fervent prayer for her recovery.

LONESOME JOHN.—News of additional prohibition gains come in close succession these days. The armies of Europe in deadly combat are held from liquor that they may be the better able to fight a good fight; Russia is under prohibition that her people may conserve their energies against the day of possible exhaustion; the United States Navy in the interests of efficiency has gone "dry." All this after prohibition gains in many States and in every field of human endeavor; and still comes Colonel Goethals with his prohibition of the use of alcoholics among employees working on the Panama Canal. Once popular John Barleycorn is much despised these days, and with hardly a one to openly minister to his loneliness.

Go to thy rest, fair child,
Go to thy dreamless bed,
While yet so gentle, undefiled,
With blessings on thy head.

A Little Nearer

A little more gray in the lessening hair
 Each day as the years go by;
 A little more stooping of the form,
 A little more dim the eye.
 A little more faltering of the step
 As we tread life's pathway o'er,
 But a little nearer every day
 To the ones who have gone before.

A little more halting of the gait,
 And a dullness of the ear;
 A growing weariness of the frame
 With each swift-passing year.
 A fading of hopes and ambitions, too
 A faltering in life's quest;
 But a little nearer every day
 To a sweet and peaceful rest.

A little more loneliness in life
 As the dear ones pass away;
 A bigger claim on the heavenly land
 With every passing day;
 A little farther from toil and care,
 A little less way to roam;
 A drawing near to a peaceful voyage
 And a happy welcome home.—Anon.

Glories--Present and Future

Oh, this world is so big, so glorious, so grand,
 We never can know all this beautiful land,
 Its reasons and causes and why their effect,
 So vast are its beauties we ne'er can detect.

With rivers, and woodlands, with mountains so tall,
 Deep oceans, great harbors, and lakes o'er it all;
 Its flowers with their beauty, their perfume so sweet
 Are scattered profusely, e'en right at our feet!

The bird's sweetest music can ever be heard,
 But vain the attempt of all tongues for a word
 Which uttered in prose, or warbled in song
 Can tell of the glories to earth which belong.

This life with its toiling, its sorrow, its woe,
 Is yet worth the living, as well we all know.
 More precious than rubies, more treasured than wealth
 Is liberty, friendship, honor, and health.

The world of the future if better than this,
 Indeed, must be heaven, a place of great bliss.
 Through faith we believe that 'twill even be so,
 The shore just beyond, yes, the land we shall know.

In reverence we stand, and with awe we behold
 Such glories e'en now as have never been told!
 Then vain the attempt of a mortal, as mortal,
 To peer through the veil of the heavenly portal!

But yet, through the Spirit, in faith's beaming eye
 Bright glimpses of glory are ours if we try.
 With earth for the present, then heaven our home,
 Why should we e'er sorrow, or mourn, or bemoan!

Then, well may we praise him, yes, greatly adore
 Earth's Planner and Builder, the Author of Lore;
 The one whose great glory will banish the sun
 Through heaven's vast portals when earth-life is done!
 LAMONI, IOWA. AUSTIN M. DOBSON.

The Call to Service

Hark, the voice of Jesus calling,
 "Who will go and work to-day?
 Fields are white, and harvests waiting,
 Who will bear the sheaves away?"
 Loud and long the Master calleth,
 Rich reward he offers free;
 Who will answer, gladly saying,
 "Here am I, send me, send me"?

If you can not cross the ocean,
 And the heathen lands explore.
 You can find the heathen nearer,
 You can help them at your door;
 If you can not give your thousands,
 You can give the widow's mite;
 And the least you give for Jesus
 Will be precious in his sight.

Let none hear you idly saying,
 "There is nothing I can do,"
 While the souls of men are dying,
 And the Master calls for you;
 Take the task he gives you gladly;
 Let his work your pleasure be;
 Answer quickly when he calleth,
 "Here am I, send me, send me."

If We Had the Time

If I had the time to find the place
 And sit me down full face to face
 With my better self, that can not show
 In my daily life that rushes so—
 It might be then I should see my soul
 Was stumbling still toward the shining goal.
 I might be nerved by the thought sublime—
 If I had the time!

If I had the time to let my heart
 Speak out and take in my life a part,
 To look about and to stretch a hand
 To a comrade quartered in no-luck land,
 Ah God! if I might but just sit still
 And hear the note of the whippoorwill,
 I think that my wish with God's would rhyme
 If I had the time!

If I had the time to learn from you
 How much for comfort my word could do;
 And I told you then of my sudden will
 To kiss your feet when I did you ill;
 If the tears aback of the coldness feigned
 Could flow, and the wrong be quite explained—
 Brothers, the souls of us all would chime,
 If we had the time.—Richard Burton.

Out of the shadows of night
 The world rolls into light;
 It is daybreak everywhere.—Anon.

THE YOUNG MAN IN CHURCH WORK

The importance of young men in the work of the church can hardly be overestimated, when we consider that they are now preparing for the future work of the church. The work that our forefathers have done is completed. There remains the need of preparation for a different work than theirs. If it should be in advance, that will not be to the credit of the young man, as it will be only what should be done, building on the foundation that is left us. The work of the church in the past has been affected by peculiar conditions existing in the world—opposing the work not only in general, but also in particular.

A NEW AGE

We are not only approaching, but already living in an age when healing by faith is believed in by a very large percentage of religious people.

It is also a time when men are awakening as never before to a realization of unjust economic conditions, and they are groping in the dark to find a plan of cooperation, of mutual helpfulness, which will rectify these conditions. The world is moving forward not only to permit, but almost to demand an answer to these questions, and when we consider the more friendly public attitude towards our work as a whole, it does not appear at all unreasonable to suppose that the work of some young men, at least, will be more to the world in answering these questions than has some been in the past.

DISCIPLINE AND PREPARATION

The characteristics, discipline, and preparation that the young men need is that needed by all of us, whether old or young. No man can assist in this work, save he shall be "humble and full of love."

Some years ago we heard President Frederick M. Smith say in a public meeting that he had often looked over the congregation of the Saints and noticed those men growing old in years and gray-headed in service, who had stood by his father and upheld his hands, and had assisted him with their counsel and prayers, and that in thus looking had asked, "Where are the men that will stand by me? Who will uphold my hands in time of trial, and sustain me with their prayers and assist me in carrying on the burden of the work? I do not know, but I have now this satisfaction, that they are known to my heavenly Father, and will be made known in due season."

The Spirit which was present could not be ignored, and with a great wave the thought came over us, as we considered how our Father had been preparing him, his character and his mind, for the work he would have to do, that not only were those who were to stand with him and bear the burden known to our Father, but that they had been known for many years past, and that he had doubtless been preparing them also, each for the individual work they each shall have to do.

ADOPTED BY A KING

When we consider even in the smallest degree the greatness of the work that lies before us, and what it means to work for God, and with him, to stand as his representatives, even in the least capacity in the church, we can but feel how earnest the preparation should be and how soon begun, which is to fit us for work in his kingdom on earth. "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart therefrom,"—but in our own hands is left much of this training.

We are not speaking now of official position, because after all we are all called to the highest of all callings, to be a Saint of God. Did you ever think why your parents were so glad when you were baptized? Would they not rejoice if some earthly king had adopted you? Yet by that ordinance you were adopted into the family, not of any earthly king, but of the Lord of lords and King of kings, and to be not only his child, but also to be his heir, as well as a joint heir with the Savior. Nor is that all. For it has not pleased this King to remove us, but rather to leave to our parents and ourselves that training and preparation for full sonship. Nor does he leave us alone, but from time to time comes with rich gifts, the greater part of which we have not received because not old enough in a spiritual sense.

The young man then in the church should be as strong physically as he can. He should be as well informed in regard to the affairs of the world, as well founded as possible in truth, be it so-called scientific, or religious truth; he should also be sufficiently humble to seek frequently his heavenly Father in prayer, so as to be fitted spiritually for the position of a Saint and son of God. And if he is to be efficient in the coming work of the church, he must be so far led by divine direction as to be greatly assisted in his preparation. We can not hope for the right kind of preparation, if our time is taken up on the streets, and with those who are light and frivolous in manner. We need association with those in advance of ourselves, so that we may learn. But above all we need divine guidance.

There is open a large field to all the young people in the Sunday school and Religio work, but some soon get to feel that they are too far in advance, that they gain but little from the study. In many instances they are mistaken in self-judgment. But if correct, our preparation requires something more than getting something all the time, even if it is so excellent a thing as knowledge. We should be prepared for the highest possible service and our greatest delight taken in giving help to others.

As the Savior went aside many times to pray in secret and alone, and as most of the great religious teachers are represented as seeking wisdom by prayer and meditation, so must we, at times, seek to commune with God for divine direction.

FASTING AND PRAYER

Fasting of itself may do but little good, unless it is combined with a most earnest effort in prayer as well. There is a natural law back of that, and it is because of it that we are admonished at times to fast and pray, so that the higher and spiritual part of our nature may be more clearly manifest and the approach of the divine more readily made. Yet we know of those who have injured themselves by too great abstinence,—though the reverse is more frequent. So man should be temperate in all things, and while that means he must avoid overeating, it also means that he must avoid undereating, so far as possible, if he is to attain the largest possible manhood and service.

YOUNG MEN OF SERVICE

Joseph, who was sold in Egypt, had his vision when only sixteen years of age, and so was still a young man, according to the standard of those times, when called to prominent service. David ascended the throne when twenty-three years of age. Samuel the prophet heard the voice of the Lord when only six years of age, and at thirty years was numbered with the prophets. Our Master discussed with the doctors when twelve years of age, and undertook his work at the age of thirty. Now it may be noted in this that while it has pleased our heavenly Father to give revelations to those young in years for their own teaching, still they were not called to active service so long as the law of the land gave their parents a claim upon them. So we see that even our Master observed this law and did not enter into active service until thirty years of age.

Noah was ordained when ten years old; Enoch when twenty-five years of age. John the Beloved and Nephi were both young men.

While in this present day and age Joseph Smith, who translated the Book of Mormon, saw his wonderful vision when only fourteen years of age, was visited by the angel when eighteen years old, received the plates when twenty-two years of age, and organized the church when only a little past twenty-four years old; also five of the Twelve, when the quorum was first organized, were under twenty-five years of age, and the average was twenty-eight years.

We note that President Joseph Smith assumed the leadership of the church in his twenty-eighth year, while President Frederick M. Smith was ordained to the First Presidency when only a little past twenty-eight. An examination of the Twelve in the Reorganized Church also shows a surprisingly large number of young men. To some this seems a mistake, yet we may remember that our heavenly Father has called men young enough in years to permit them to qualify, and still have many years of active service. Then when the latter years come, when we are not able to work so many hours, nor so many years, still the training and knowledge that we have received may make us continue of great worth to the church. Youth alone is not a qualification for any position, nor is it a disqualification.

"THE THOUGHTS OF YOUTH ARE LONG THOUGHTS"

Youth will question God, the church, and anything else. It is ready to prove all things, and should be ready to hold fast to that which is true. While it is impossible for us as yet in a day to attain to equality with the supreme Being, or even to comprehend him in all his ways of glory, still it is possible for him to make himself manifest to us from time to time. But many, when they find there are many things they can not understand as yet, ask the preacher. When he can not answer in full for all things they are ready to reject both him and all of his message. They forget that he also is but a child of God, seeking the light. It is not given to him, even though his position be large in the eyes of men, to know all things now. But it is given to him, as it is to us, to study, to pray, to grow, and at last to understand and know. What would we think of a young man who would reject all that the masters of the laboratory had to say, and yet had himself made no experiment? The masters do not know all, but they have proven more than we.

ALL TRUTH HARMONIZES

Another point worthy of our consideration is that truth must be harmonious with itself. If, then, our concepts of scientific or historical truth conflict with our ideas of religious truth, what the church teaches, we err in one of three particulars; our ideas of scientific and historical truth are wrong, or our ideas of the teachings of the church and religious truth are wrong, or both. The creed of the church is "All truth." The Comforter will guide us into all truth, not in a day, but as we grow that which was difficult before becomes plain and easy to understand. The writer has found it so in times too numerous to count; that is, as we grow in knowledge, and spiritual insight, that which was difficult and unanswerable has become easy. Yet we can not understand until we are old enough spiritually and the proper foundation has first been laid; nor can another explain to us until we are sufficiently grown up. But while as yet we only know in part, we have this consolation, that what we do not know our Father knows, and we, too, shall know when we grow up, for he surely will tell us, as soon as it is for our best good, and we can understand.

But though many young in years have been chosen to responsible work, there is no room for seeking for fame, as is the way of the world. The man who desires and seeks an office has at least one qualification why he should not be chosen. Because the fit man will be one who will realize his own shortcomings, and in humility will know that regardless of how much knowledge he may have had, or schooling, when it comes to the work of the church of God he must needs have divine direction and help.

There remains, then, for the young man of the church that work in the church and its auxiliaries for which his education and spiritual training have fitted him. There is a need, not only for able men to occupy those positions, which in the eyes of the world are chief, but also for a whole body of people ready to move forward with devoted purpose, to labor for the common good. Nor is the field limited. It may require a seeming sacrifice, yet what is sacrifice but sacra facio, to make sacred, or in other words, to consecrate and dedicate to the service of God?

LIFE BEFORE US

Each of us has his life before him. Each hour is set with sixty minutes, each minute with sixty seconds. In the market of life we can not be all things, as Professor James says: "Not that I would not if I could, be both handsome and fat and well-dressed, and a great athlete, and make a million a year; to be a wit, a bon vivant, and a great lady-killer, as well as philosopher; a philanthropist, statesman, warrior and African explorer, as well as a 'tone poet' and saint. But the thing is impossible. The millionaire's work would run counter to the saint's; the bon vivant and the philanthropist would trip each other up, and the philosopher and the lady-killer would not well keep house in the same tenement of clay."

We must then choose what is worth while. Shall we buy with our time the fame that is perchance but a breath? Or shall we rather use it to develop the highest possible within our reach, both of service and growth, and by so doing, lay up treasures which are everlasting? It may seem in some ways to be a sacrifice, yet in the right sense of the word it is only taking that which is temporary and passing and making it that which is eternal and sacred.

What we know of our heavenly Father is subject to our own efforts, almost solely. We are affected in part by our associates, but if we will, we may rise even superior to environment. What we shall do is left at the court of our own will to determine, and that means what we shall be here and hereafter.

If we choose right the terms are peace, the highest possible happiness here, and eternal life in the world to come. Eternal life means to know the eternal Father; that means to understand all of his works,—the truth,—and use that knowledge for good.

Will it pay?

Rather, have we time for aught else?

WHAT IS MISSIONARY WORK?

The above question at times confronts the best of us, and it is well that it does, for such matters are worthy of our most serious consideration.

Too frequently we err in supposing that missionary work is confined to the traveling ministry alone, or at best inheres only in the "preacher"; and while we labor and think thus, the church is handicapped, and the work of the ministry impeded.

Missionary work is primarily intended to stimulate and rejuvenate the life of mankind; it is intended to renew the heart and develop the character, so that the creature will become better fitted for the duties of life, socially, ethically, and intellectually. Therefore, we should not lose sight of the fact that whatever works to this end is in its truest sense missionary work.

Mere argument, or a strife of words, does not constitute missionary work, and we should never be so unwise as to mistake these things for the real, vital and all transforming service that is rendered humanity in true self-sacrificing missionary work. True missionary work, therefore, is that which brings humanity to a knowledge of Christ through a belief in him as the Master Teacher, the superlative character, the transcendent life. So that it may or it may not be preaching. Various methods may be employed, but above all one method should be observed, and that is the living of a Christ-like life, the developing of a Christ-like character.

The writer remembers being in one town where an aged couple lived who were Saints indeed. The people of that town said to the writer and Brother L. O. Wildermuth, who at that time were laboring together, "Grandma Olson is the nicest and best old lady we have ever known," and of her companion, "Grandpa Olson is the finest old man in this town." This good old brother and sister did not argue; they did not contend; they did not make themselves obnoxious by finding fault with the belief of others; but their consistent, Christ-like lives and conversation preached eloquent sermons. They performed acceptable and profitable missionary work, and their lives became living epistles, read and known of all in their community, at least. This is one way in which to do missionary work.

The writer is acquainted with a good sister, and one in very ordinary circumstances, too, who availed herself of the offer made by the Ensign during the two missionary months, and sent the Ensign a year to several of her neighbors. She informed them that the paper would come to them and that it was paid for. She lived a quiet, consistent, Christ-like life, and when the time was opportune made mention to them of some of the things which appeared in the paper. She intensified their interest by being wise and discreet, with the result that by reason of her efforts friends were made to the church; and the writer had the pleasure of baptizing her husband. Others will follow in their time by reason of her missionary labors.

Others judiciously distribute tracts or pass along their church papers, HERALDS, Ensigns, or Autumn Leaves; others loan books to their friends and neighbors, such as the Two-Story Book, The Old Jerusalem Gospel, Bishop R. C. Evans's Sermons, and many other books of that kind, and thus do effectual missionary work. Still others honor the law of tithing and bring in their substance into the storehouse so that the church can send out men to proclaim the gospel to the ends of the earth, by reason of being able to provide food and shelter for the families while they are thus engaged in missionary work. So do they who assist in a material way with tithes and offerings also have a part in true missionary work.

There is a work for all to do, none are forgotten or left out; and while we are all workers together with God we should remember that all work is alike honorable, and that the missionary work is the life of the church, that is, if we had no missionaries we would have no church; so all may readily see the need of rendering the best possible service.

Many are making sacrifice. The writer is acquainted with men and women who are denying themselves daily for the church and the missionary. What are you doing? Are you reflecting the Christ-life and Christ-character in your life and character? Does your life argue an at-one-ment with Christ so that those who have known you will be made better by reason of your acquaintance and influence?

The thing I should concern myself about is, am I an honor or a disgrace to the church? If the church is judged by me, what will people think of it? Is my demeanor such that others will be drawn to the church and thus to Christ by reason of my friendship and love for humanity? Or is my attempt at Christ-like service precipitated into a mere strife of words, to the detriment of the hearer? Do I make the truth offensive because of my falseness? Or does the sterling worth of my character bespeak an at-one-ment with the divine?

These matters are for each of us to determine for ourselves; and, determining, let us labor as those who shall give an account to God, living as those who would uplift and bless mankind.

FEEDING THE MULTITUDE

All day the Savior had been in the temple at Jerusalem, answering and refuting the scribes and Pharisees and declaring to the multitudes gathered there the plan of salvation as God revealed it to him. By the side of the still, untroubled pool of Bethesda, he had said to the waiting lame man: "Rise, take up thy bed and walk." There he had boldly declared to the persecuting Jews that he was the Son of God, and that all the works which he did were done at the behest of his Father. He had told them the love of God for him, his power to raise the dead, and that to him all judgment had been committed by the Father that all men might honor the Father who had sent him. He had declared to them the glorious truth that the time was near when even the dead should hear his voice and as many as heard should live—live because of that life which was in the Father, and which the Father had given to the Son to have in himself. He had plainly declared to them not only the resurrection but the fact that there was to be more than one. There was to be a resurrection of the unjust as well as one of the just, that those who had done good would come forth in the resurrection of life—that life which the Father had given him to have in himself—and those who had done evil in the resurrection of condemnation. He had told them that his words and teachings were sealed by the witness of the Father; that John was a burning and a shining light, had borne witness to him; but that the works which the Father had given him to do bore a witness which was greater than that of John.

He had declared that no man had any honor to confer upon him, that his honor came direct from God, and he had enunciated this truth concerning a condition which to-day is keeping thousands out of his kingdom: "How can ye believe which receive honor one of another and seek not the honor that cometh from God only?" and he had there, once and for ever, silenced the traducers of his grand anti-type, Moses, in the words: "But if ye believe not his writing, how shall ye believe my words?"

Review in your mind, kind reader, the scope and grandeur, the height and depth of the sublime teaching of this day at Jerusalem, and will you find any cause to marvel or wonder that the great Teacher was brain-weary, and perchance felt much need of physical refreshment as well as mental recuperation? In the distance rolled the blue waves of Galilee, the place dear to Jesus, and embarking in a fisher's boat he passed over its clear, tranquil waters to the other side.

But however little we earthly toilers may have thought of it, the close student of his life knows there was in it very little of seclusion, and less of rest. The multitude, the weary, restless, unsatisfied multitude, the poor, afflicted, sad, and disheartened ones of earth, were ever close about him, pressing in the way which he took and following him wherever he went, if so be they might touch the hem of his garment, and become partakers of that virtue which went out of him. And now, even beyond the clear waters of blue Galilee, "a great multitude followed him, because they saw his miracles which he did on them that were diseased."

Ah, thou all-sufficient, all-pitying Savior, how often lately, as we have seen with what eagerness the poor, afflicted ones of earth reach forth their trembling hands to grasp every straw of hope which is borne within their reach—how often have we thought of thee, and pictured what would be the scene if thou wert here again, walking as then among the multitude, and healing with one touch of thy divine hand these poor and weary sufferers so long bound by the hand of disease and pain! The earth to-day is groaning under its load of sin, and the suffering which entered in with sin.

Has not the church of God a mission, an obligation laid upon her in this direction? If so is she living near enough to thy bleeding side to gain from thee the grace to discharge this duty which she owes to humanity at large? "Freely ye have received, freely give," is the command of the Master.

But this great multitude by the sea of Tiberias! They have followed Jesus afar from the city, and now the evening comes down and they are awfully hungry, also, and there is in all the company only a little lad who has aught to sell and he only five barley loaves and two small fishes. "And what are they among so many?" said Andrew, the brother of Peter.

Jesus, after the five thousand people had obeyed his command to sit down, gave thanks to the Father, and breaking the five barley loaves and the two small fishes distributed to the people; and when the hunger of all was fully appeased they gathered up twelve baskets of the fragments.

Thou must be true thyself,
 If thou the truth wouldst teach;
 Thy soul must overflow, if thou
 Another's soul would reach;
 It needs the overflow of heart
 To give the lips full speech.
 Think truly, and thy thoughts
 Shall the world's famine feed;
 Speak truly, and each word of thine
 Shall be a truthful seed;
 Live truly, and thy life shall be
 A great and noble creed.

"The world's famine!" ah, how great it is, and as it is borne in upon the soul by daily transpiring events, the heart bleeds in sympathy and cries out, "How long, O Lord, how long?" As the multitudes, amounting to thousands, even millions, pass us by hurrying in their mad race for wealth, or fame and power, again and again the question with which Christ sought to prove Philip, "Whence shall we buy bread that these may eat?" comes home to us.

In the HERALD we once noticed an excellent article by Brother Edward Rannie on "Gospel work in large cities," and remembering how these great multitudes which Christ fed were gathered about him in the city, and in this way were attracted to follow him even into the desert places where he broke the bread of life as well as supplied them with the meat which perishes with the using, we can not help thinking that Brother Rannie's plea was a good and wise one. The famine of the world—for the bread of life, the pure, unadulterated word of God, is something awful to contemplate.

We do not overlook the fact that the first duty of the minister is to feed the flock "over which the Holy Ghost has made you overseers," for we have seen too much evil resulting from such neglect in the past; but here in our large cities seems to be a golden opportunity for combining the missionary with the pastoral work—the overseeing of the flock and at the same time wisely directing various missionary efforts for the feeding of the starving multitudes.

Is the day of miracles past? Not if our faith is equal to the occasion. God is making demands upon his people to-day, and making them for the express purpose of proving the world and trying his people. When Christ said to Philip: "Whence shall we buy bread that these may eat?" John tells us, "This he said to prove him, for he himself knew what he would do." So, to-day, God is proving us and if we are not willing to buy the little, the five barley loaves and two small fishes which we have the means to pay for, how can we expect the Lord to do what we are not able to do?

Strange experiences come to those who come in contact with the world, and they learn more of the way in which the churches are satisfying the demand made upon them for the bread of life. We confess having been both pained and shocked while in conversation with a most lovely, amiable, and intelligent Christian woman to hear her say, "I will never become an object of charity; I will chloroform myself first!" She had at one time been wealthy, but had lost her property and was supporting herself. She spoke of two friends who had recently had the courage to take their own lives because they were old and penniless. Now, while this threw light upon the fact of the wonderful increase of suicides in the world, this idea that to take one's own life is an act of bravery, not a crime, the question was forced home upon us as to the responsibility of the church to provide labor for those who are able to labor and to recognize the obligation God has laid upon all of us to love our neighbor as ourself. This woman was a brave, lovable, and noble woman, but her spirit was proud and the thought of dependence was galling.

We may be wrong, but confess to you that we would rather take our chances with the poor, tortured spirit thus escaping from life, from the inhumanity of man, than with the one who has heaped up to himself treasure undivided, and gone down to his grave honored of men. We see no bravery in suicide, to us it is cowardice and rebellion against God; but some time, some day in the great hereafter, God will answer the question of Cain, and man will know that he is his "brother's keeper."

The inheritance belongs to the family of one Father, and to his people he has given a law of division. How is it with us? Is his storehouse established? and have we consecrated of our properties that the poor may receive their inheritance—not as objects of charity but as heirs, joint-heirs, of the riches even of this world which all belong to God? It may be that in all our company there is even less than five loaves and two small fishes, but as surely as we have faith to do our part, God will do his, and ample provision will be made for the hungry, famishing multitudes, and those who love truth will be gathered out and a people prepared to meet Christ at his coming.

Of General Interest

A STUDY OF THE JEWS

[The following extract from an article by Israel Zangwill, the Jewish novelist, and appearing in the New York American for October 25, is of interest as the expression of a leader of this people. That it seems impracticable that all the Jews should be gathered into a Jewish state, and that they may be assimilated by other races, does not in any sense affect the fact of a final gathering to Palestine. In this connection, the prophecies state that it is a "remnant," not the entire people, that it is constitute the return.—EDITORS.]

While the Christian consciousness busies itself more or less megalomaniacally with the Jew, whether as Zion-builder or world power, the Jew himself is dolefully announcing the end of his race. The American anthropologist, Maurice Fishberg, even doubts whether he has ever existed.

Scientific research shows that his racial unity is a myth—he includes Teutonic, Slavonic, Turanian, Mongoloid, Negroid, Spanish, Assyrian and other types, and even his notorious nose is found in only twelve to fifteen per cent.

The Viennese anthropologist, Ignaz Zollschan, challenging with his book, Das Rassenproblem, the famous thesis of Houston Chamberlain and his disciples that civilization is a creation of the Germanic race, and that the Jew is an inferior breed (Jesus being a German of Rhinish-Westphalian origin), yet remarks at the end of his brilliant work that his vindication of his race has only the value of an epitaph, since unless a territory can be found for them, the Jews are destined to disappear.

The same conclusion is reached in Mr. Israel Cohen's more pedestrian study of Jewish Life in Modern Times, the most compact and comprehensive work of its kind in existence, a treasury of facts and figures, which should be in the hands of every student of the Jewish problem.

COLONIZING PALESTINE

Mr. Cohen claims indeed that the Jews are to be conserved by colonizing Palestine, and to that extent he will bring comfort to the amateurs of Armageddon.

But to more scientific thinkers it is not easy to see how the plantation of three million Jews in Palestine can suffice to rescue the other ten million, five hundred thousand from the melting pot. It is more likely to precipitate the melting pot process.

Mr. Cohen has an eloquent passage on the pitiful waste of blood, of hope, of prayer, through the dark ages of Jewry if national restoration were now surrendered as a mere fable.

But this is an absolute falsification of history. The national restoration for which the Jew prayed had become inseparable from the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth. The Jewish martyrs of the Middle Ages went to the stake, not for the unity of Jewry, but for the unity of Jehovah. "In that day the Lord shall be one and his name one."

What would make these old Jews turn in their graves would be to read the atheistic articles of Jerusalem journalists, or to witness the crusades of the young colonists of Palestine against the Holy Sabbath. . . .

NO PROSPECT OF DESTRUCTION

It does not follow, however, that even the destruction of the religion which has preserved the Jew since the destruction of his state will succeed in destroying him. Possibly the "hard-shell" Judaism which replaced the Jewish state was only a secretion of the instinct to live, race masking itself as religion.

This vital instinct may work its cunning will even if religion as well as territory fail it. Already baptized German Jews marrying among themselves constitute a new incarnation of "the eternal people."

The difficulty of regathering the Jews into a Jewish state, their passionate preference for the lands of their birth (Russian Jews safely in England or France flocking now to fight for Russia), suggests that each section has evolved into a separate subspecies, the original type crossed by the particular country.

For a new environment is as capable of modifying a race as a new strain, and the Jews are everywhere sons of the soil, as well as children of the ghetto. They were a scattered people long before the fall of Jerusalem; does not the Book of Esther recount how their destruction was planned in Persia?

FALSE ANALOGY ENDS RACE

They are still undestroyed, and indeed biologists tell us that the more widely a species is disseminated, the greater its chances of survival. Perhaps the instinct of Israel is wiser than his latter-day leaders. Those who menace him with disappearance, unless he establish a state, are inspired by a false analogy.

What has happened in the West, where he has been emancipated in his tens of thousands, is no clew to what will happen in Russia, where he will be emancipated in his millions, and where, moreover, he will only be exposed to the absorptive power of an illiterate peasantry, which, even in his present degraded status, has yielded no few converts to his religion.

In New York, with the greatest aggregation of Jews the world has ever known, the action of the crucible is impeded by the social anti-Semitism which leaves the Jew out in the cold, and by the continuous immigration from Russia, which replaces the atoms liquefied.

FUSIBILITY TO BE TESTED

Not till the Czar waves his wand and set the Russian Jews free will the fusibility of the race be really tested, or its melting point established—if it has one. In either case the profit to Russia will be measureless.

From that popular work, Men Around the Kaiser, I gather that out of thirty-one "makers of modern Germany," no fewer than seven are Jews, a proportion all the more awkward for Houston Chamberlain, inasmuch as the Jews of Germany are less than one per cent of its population.

Jewish writers tell us too much of the restrictions on the Russian Jews—which are only the psychology of the Russian bureaucracy—and too little of the Russian Pale, which, pitifully cramped and tragically baffled as its life is, is yet one of the richest reservoirs of genius on the planet.

And its spiritual fermentation is as precious as its intellectual and artistic resources—there was recently even a propaganda for the reception of Jesus as a Hebrew prophet. The rise and development of a free Russian Jewry will be one of the most fascinating phenomena of the century.

NEW JEWISH NATION

The rebirth of the Jewish nation is no longer a dream. It is in the process of accomplishment in a most practical way and the story is a wonderful one.

So said Louis D. Brandeis, chairman of the Provisional Executive Committee for General Zionist Affairs, addressing a congregation of the Free Synagogue which filled Carnegie Hall yesterday. Mr. Brandeis seeks to raise a fund of one hundred thousand dollars to tide the Zionist movement over the European war crisis; the English, German, Austrian and Russian Zionist Federations are entirely disabled at the moment. Said Mr. Brandeis:

Zionism is not a movement to remove all Jews to Palestine. There are fourteen million Jews, and Palestine would not accommodate one fifth of that number. Zionism seeks merely to establish in Palestine, as a part of the Turkish Empire, for such Jews as choose to go there and for their descendants a legally secured home where they may live together and lead a Jewish life and look forward to what we could call "home rule."

Jewish life can not be preserved and developed, assimilation can not be averted, unless there be reestablished in the fatherland a center from which the Jewish spirit may radiate.

Though the result of this war should be, as we hope, the removal or lessening of the disabilities under which the Jews labor in Eastern Europe, nevertheless when peace comes, emigration from the war-stricken countries will certainly proceed in large volume because of the misery incident to the war's devastation.

Is it desirable that America should be practically the only country to which the Jews of Eastern Europe may emigrate—is it not desirable that Palestine give a special welcome to the emigrant Jews?—New York American, October 25, 1914.

SOMBER DRESS IN WAR TIME

The war has brought the textile, toy, and drug trades and agriculture in the United States face to face with a number of serious, untried problems. It has threatened to demoralize these trades and agriculture to such an extent that last month Mr. Herman A. Metz, an extensive importer and dealer in dyestuffs from Germany, headed a syndicate of business men to charter a vessel under the American flag to bring dyestuffs, potash, drugs, and other much-needed German products from Rotterdam to New York. This is an enterprise that at best, Mr. Metz admits, can only partially relieve these sorely depressed trades, and then only for a few weeks at a time, for Germany is now operating her dyestuff factories and potash mines only on half time, and under the protracted stress of war she may soon be compelled to shut them down entirely.

Then what? The people of the United States may in another twelve or eighteen months have to dress in cheap, logwood blacks, dull vegetable blues, browns, yellows, and drabs, and the unbleached whites of our grandfathers and grandmothers—for the war-swept countries also furnish our bleaching-powders. To all women, and to many men, such would be one of the darkest prospects of the war, for the new, variety, delicacy, beauty, and fastness in shades of color in dress have become one of the most distinctive features of all fashion. Every season brings scores of new shades of color into the market in its effort to charm and win the eyes of trade, and never has color in raiment, and especially in woman's raiment, become so human and personal as now. But along with Europe, the war may yet garb us in the somberness of mourning, in sackcloth and ashes.

Nearly all the dyestuffs now on the market are made from benzol, a coal-tar product. With two transformations benzol becomes aniline. Germany now supplies the United States with eighty per cent of all the dyestuffs it consumes. Last year we imported twelve million dollars worth of these dyestuffs, over eight million coming from Germany and the balance from Switzerland and other countries. We, ourselves, manufacture practically none. We import from Germany and Austria the raw material for more than a dozen of our twenty principal drugs. Three fifths of our Christmas toys come from the cities of Nuremberg and Sonneberg. Every ton of potash and two thirds of the sulphate of ammonia put into the fertilizers that are used on our farms come from Germany.—From "German dyes and American clothes," by David F. St. Clair, in the American Review of Reviews for November.

AMERICAN POTASH

The two minerals which the United States seems absolutely to lack are nitrates and potash salts, both important fertilizers, and both used in the manufacture of explosives. The nitrate supply of the world comes from the Chilean deposits and the potash from the German deposits. The Geological Survey and the Department of Agriculture have for several years been prosecuting explorations in the West for both of these minerals, and doubtless the cutting off of the world's potash supply from Germany will further stimulate the search. Our imports of these two salts last year represented nearly forty million dollars.

The Searles Lake deposit, not far from Death Valley in southeastern California, probably contains the most promising immediate source of potash in this country. It consists of a smooth plain of crusted salt underlain by a bed of salt and brine to a very uniform depth of about seventy-five feet and extending over an area of twenty or more square miles. The area of the ancient Searles Lake as it overflowed its present valley into several adjoining valleys was about two hundred and fifty thousand acres and its depth was at least six hundred and forty feet, and probably much more. The aggregate volume of minerals, including potash, held in solution in this enormous body of water, has been largely concentrated in the present Searles Lake basin. The major part of the potash in this deposit is contained in the mother-liquor, or brine, which saturates the deposit and which is available in immense quantities, the content as potassium chloride being about four per cent, by weight of the brine. The deposit also contains other valuable materials which may be produced as by-products in a potash industry, such as soda ash, borax, and, if a market for them is obtained, common salt and sodium sulphate.

The American Trona Corporation has installed an experimental unit for the manufacture of chloride of potash and other salts at the Searles deposit. The thirty-one-mile railroad from the station Searles on the Southern Pacific Railroad to the new town of Trona, where the works are situated, is now completed and in regular operation. The experimental unit of the new plant is reported to have a capacity for handling twenty thousand gallons of brine daily. When the process and equipment have been thoroughly proved by actual operation it is proposed to increase the output many fold. As yet, however, the process remains in the experimental stage, and it is not certain just how soon we may look for an actual potash production from this deposit.—From "America's mineral reserves," by Guy Elliott Mitchell in the American Review of Reviews for November.

Prayer Union

SUBJECTS FOR SECOND THURSDAY IN DECEMBER

Parents' Day.—Prayer for our families and for the families of each other; for all the youth of the church; for unconverted kindred; for greater growth in spirituality; and for a greater realization of personal responsibility. Pray for all the sick and afflicted.

Lesson, Isaiah 56: 1-7. Memory verse, Ecclesiastes 12: 1, 2.

A LETTER

A few weeks ago this column presented for prayers Brother Pitsenberger, of Council Grove, Kansas. Understanding that he was not a member of the church, though very favorably disposed toward it, a statement to that effect occurred in making the sister's request for her husband.

We are now in receipt of a letter which corrects this mistaken statement, much to our satisfaction, and reports the good news that, through prayers and the administration of the elders, the brother has received the blessing sought from the Lord.

The letter says concerning the brother's membership in the church:

"He was baptized through my feeble efforts in trying to explain the gospel to him. He never heard a sermon preached before his baptism and never saw an elder until about half an hour before Brother Parsons baptized him in the font at Independence one Saturday evening.

"We have never been permitted to attend any meetings or reunions together. His acquaintance with the Saints is limited to those who have been in our home, that is the elders. Nothing gives him more pleasure than to have them make his humble home theirs, which they have done when in Council Grove. Your statement is true that he has given me his fullest support and the free exercise of my faith in this work. When I first united with the church, he took care of the home, the children, and the shop to give me these grand opportunities, and now they are being rewarded in blessings on his head."

The editor recalls that the sister in conversation at General Conference, told her these things concerning the disposition of her husband toward the church and of his taking upon himself her responsibilities to permit her to enjoy some of the church gatherings. We recall also that we said to her so sincerely that the memory remains, "Sister, appreciate your good husband. There is nothing greater than kindness in a man."

We have more than once remembered the conversation alluded to when casting about for material to place in this column, and now seems to be the opportunity to say we are reasonably sure that a kind man will stand higher in the estimation of the Lord than one who may be brilliant but not kind.

In the long distant past a man famous in the church for his eloquence as a speaker directed his sarcasm against a brother, noted for humility and gentleness of spirit rather than for brilliance. Afterwards, comfort was administered to the humble man in these words: "My son . . . humility will stand when eloquence will fail."

So also will kindness and all the virtues which make men like the Master. And where should a man be more kind than in his own home?

REQUESTS FOR PRAYER

Sister Myrtle Williamson, of McKenzie, Alabama, requests prayers. This sister is very sorely afflicted. She wishes to be spared for the sake of her husband and two children, and for the hope she has of benefiting humanity. Yet she has confidence in God to say, "Thy will be done, not mine."

Brother and Sister Fred Skank, of Henderson, Iowa, ask prayers for their little son, born with a serious rupture.

Brother E. H. Thomas, 2322 Palm Beach Avenue, Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, sends request for prayers in behalf of Sister Elsie Lang, daughter of John Lang, sr. This sister is very low with heart trouble and general breakdown. She is talented and is needed among the young of her community. The brother states that had it not been for administration, this sister would likely have passed over some days before his writing.

I like to think when western skies are bright
With twilight's gold, that far beyond our sight,
Beneath the world's dim verge where day has gone,
Our sunset is, for other lands—a dawn.
And ever does it symbolize to me
The promise sweet of immortality:
Beyond the darkness waits for us alway
The looming glory of a perfect day!

Bevier Church Dedication

In March, 1904, there was a resolution presented looking forward to the building of a new church in a more suitable location at Bevier, Missouri. This was carried and a committee of ten appointed.

This committee went to work with zeal, having a strong desire to accomplish their work. They solicited the members and friends and received promises to the amount of about two thousand dollars. And part of the committee obtained option on our present location, also purchasers for our old church and lot, which were sold for one thousand dollars. The committee made their report to the branch, their success being beyond expectations. The branch adopted the report and instructed the committee to proceed with the work.

We were called upon to give immediate possession of our old property, which forced us to rent till we got our new building ready. The committee secured the services of Elder Arthur Allen to draw plans for them, and who rendered very valuable services in the plans he drew, and in superintending the work, also in the purchasing lumber and material. His services were truly a great help, which the Bevier branch very much appreciated.

August 24, 1904, Elder Allen took the first shovelful of dirt from the lot, and thus the work commenced in earnest. On Sunday, November 27, 1904, we commenced holding meetings in the basement. We continued holding meetings here till January 8, 1905, when we commenced holding services in the church. But it was not till April, 1905 that the pews were installed, and since then we have continued regular services.

The committee found themselves under the necessity of borrowing considerable money to complete the work, and the obligation of meeting this debt was quite a problem. The interest was a great drawback and in considering this question we thought there was plenty of money in the hands of our members, if they would let the committee have the use of it, that would relieve the burden of interest. So there was another special effort made which met with fairly good success, and all except nine hundred dollars was freed of interest. One of our sisters hearing of our effort came forward without solicitation and advanced the nine hundred dollars without interest.

This encouraged the branch and all our efforts were centered on reducing the principal. We would have accomplished our work one year earlier, but the branch decided on making extensive repairs and to do a general cleaning and painting. This was accomplished at a cost of about six hundred and fifty dollars. However we finished paying all the notes that were against the church at the close of 1913. We may say that there was splendid unity on the part of all.

The amount paid out on the property was $8,276.92. Our receipts were from the following: Donations from members, $2,667; donations from friends, $236; sale of property, $1,240; rent, $348; Zion's Religio-Literary Society, $1,031; Junior Aid Society, $212; Ladies Aid Society, $2,542; total, $8,276.

As stated, we finished paying these obligations at the close of 1913. We then commenced making necessary preparation by way of improvements for dedication. In August we took the question of dedication under consideration and set the second Sunday in November as the date. We obtained favorable replies from Brethren E. A. Smith and J. W. Rushton to be present for the occasion. The day at last dawned, and it brought with it a goodly number of visitors to enjoy the event with us.

Our services commenced at 2 p. m., November 8. The choir rendered some beautiful selections, as also were the solos by Sisters Maggie Tanner and Bessie Williams. The sermon by Brother Elbert A. Smith was indeed a treat, the brother saying that we were not to have a double standard. Splendid thoughts were impressed on the minds of the hearers. The prayer offered by Brother Rushton on the occasion was exceptionally good, and we trust we may be able to live to enjoy the blessings invoked. After these Brother Delong, on behalf of the branch, turned over to Brother Smith as a representative of the general church the deeds and keys, who with a few well chosen remarks urging the proper use and care of the building returned same. The comments on the entire services have been very favorable.

The Saints in Bevier are truly rejoicing because of accomplishing their work and the dedicating of the same to the services of God.

Brother Smith occupied again in the evening on the signs of the times, which effort also was full of splendid thought and instruction, a goodly degree of liberty being enjoyed by the speaker. Brother Rushton remained and occupied the week following to fair crowds and with splendid interest. The comments are favorable and many. . . . Thus ended the special services, leaving the Saints rejoicing in the success of their efforts and in the good sermons they heard.

Praying for Zion's success, W. B. RICHARDS.
BEVIER, MISSOURI.

Cooperate

"To act or operate jointly with another or others; to concur in action, effort, or effect."—Webster.

I wish to offer a few suggestions on this subject, and then should anyone possessing added light be prompted to let it shine in this direction, cooperating with us, we shall feel thankful indeed that our effort though weak was not in vain.

I believe there can in a few years be saved to the church hundreds of thousands of dollars, if the Saints will be wise and cooperate in the expenditure of their means for the necessary comforts of life—and all other expenditure if there be such. But there should be no unnecessary expenditures, as such would be waste. We are admonished on this point in Doctrine and Covenants 130: 7: "Both in private and in public expenditure carry into active exercise the principle of sacrifice and repression of unnecessary wants; and thus permit the accumulation of tithes and offerings in such amounts as may be needful to properly discharge the existing indebtedness of the church as a body. And the Spirit counseleth the church in this regard."

The Lord has clearly stated in present-day revelation to his church that his people are "stewards." (Doctrine and Covenants 42: 9, 14, 19; 48: 2; 51: 1, 2; 58: 7, 10-12; 64: 8; 70: 1-3; 72: 1-5; 81: 3, 4; 118: 3, 4; 101: 2, 10.) Please take time to look up these scriptures and to deliberate upon them, and then let us see if there is not some way for the people of God to more fully cooperate in temporal matters.

I dare say the great majority of Saints are buying at retail prices most of the necessities of life; and some of that buying is sugar, potatoes, etc., in ten cent lots! Thus paying two or three prices. Now, permit me to suggest a plan that will, if adopted, be a great saving in money for the Saints—hence for the church.

Let all Saints in each branch (and where branches are in close proximity to each other they could invite) get together and unite as near as possible on what articles of food, clothing, and other articles they would use, for example: Mrs. A. now uses certain brands of spice, tea, coffee, lard, syrup, soap, and so on, Mrs. B. some others, Mrs. C. still others, and we count up until within an average branch or community, say of twenty or twenty-five families there would be found several brands of different articles. Now if they would unite and buy but one brand they could perhaps make up a case or more—not in quarter pounds for spices, etc., but perhaps in pound cans, or better yet, make an individual list of all that is needed, say for three, six, or twelve months; then lump this lot—buy wholesale, (of the producer or manufacturer direct) in bulk as much as possible; say, lard from one hundred pounds and up, in kegs or barrels; and spices in bulk; and everything possible the same. Nearly all have sufficient cans, bottles, boxes, bins, and sacks, into which these commodities can be placed to keep them clean and wholesome; thus you save in the packing and get full weight.

Some one will say, "I can't pay cash and buy in large quantities." Let me say this: As a rule the person buying in such small lots and by the credit plan is thirty days or more behind the world, and is paying (to say the least) a great deal more for the same goods than if paying cash and buying in large quantities. You had far better borrow fifty, one hundred or more dollars at six per cent interest for a short time and pay cash.

I kept grocery for about five years, and know where I went or sent the wagon regularly to time customers the bills were higher as a rule than the cash customers of same number in family. Where a solicitor calls regularly the cost (as a rule) of living in that home is higher whether time or cash purchases are made.

Now, about flour: you who are on farms, raise if possible your own wheat, stop buying flour. Get a mill and grind your wheat and use the whole thing for mush, biscuits, gems, bread etc. If a little fine flour is needed for pie crust, etc., sift some and you have it. You can save over fifty cents on the dollar and have better health. Other Saints can do the same if they will buy and grind the wheat into flour. We have a small hand mill, buy wheat, and make our flour, and save fifty per cent and more. I want no more fine bolted flour!

This cooperative plan will apply on all or about all that should be purchased, such as dry goods, especially, and to quite an extent in clothing, boots, shoes, etc. Suppose there are enough families in a branch or community to use a bolt of muslin or other cloth, just send to the manufacturer if not buy of the wholesaler and save profit of the middlemen.

Let each community organize into a cooperative society, choose a president or board of directors, secretary, and treasurer, and let the business all be done systematically, officers only to receive pay for traveling expenses where such occur, and to be reimbursed for loss of time from their several duties or occupation.

This perhaps is but in the rough and very crude, but will not another take this up and give us additional light?

Get busy Saints,—there are millions in it!

Yours for cooperation,

T. J. LAWN.

Elder Griffiths Reaches Home

[The following personal letter from Elder Gomer T. Griffiths is reproduced here for the reason that we have had so many inquiries as to the condition of Sister Griffiths.—EDITORS.]

WILLOUGHBY, OHIO, November 20, 1914.

Dear Brother Elbert: Your letter just received, and was glad to hear from you again. I reached here Tuesday night and found my wife very weak and ill. She has been in bed for about seven weeks, and during three weeks of that time she did not know her own daughters. No person around here had any idea that she would live, even the doctor did not think that she would pull through. He says that her case was the worst that he ever saw and for the patient to get well. She is as helpless as a newborn babe.

The Saints here and all over the East fasted and prayed for her, and I am confident that the prayers and fasting of God's people were what saved her life. I really believe that she will get well; however, it will be a long time before we can take her home. The elders and the Saints told the girls that it was their duty to send for me, because the Saints and most of the elders thought that she would die.

I have to stay right by her, as she will not let me go out of her sight. She feels very sorry that I had to be called from the mission. She is true blue, always interested in the great latter-day work. She has told me that she thought that her time to die had come, and she was willing to go. She called the girls to the bedside and gave directions as to what should be done with home affairs and said good-by to them and told them what to tell me when I returned home. The only thing that troubled her was my being so far away from home and she could not see me before she died and have me with the girls in their sorrow and to look after them and the home.

She is not yet out of danger, but we have great hopes that with good nursing and the Lord's power resting upon her she will live. I administer to her every day.

Please ask the Saints of Lamoni to pray for her.

Your brother in gospel bonds,

GOMER T. GRIFFITHS.

[The following letter to President Elbert A. Smith is of interest as setting forth conditions in the British Isles during these days of war in Europe.—EDITORS.]

4 Evenglyn Crescent, Penyrheol, Caerphilly,
GLAMORGANSHIRE, WALES, November 3, 1914.

Dear Brother: In our military and naval towns the war interest takes up most attention. There is a great drain on the male population, mostly where there is trade depression consequent to the war.

The western part of South Wales is being hit hard because anthracite coal is not in demand as a steam coal; it is a hard coal. In the greater part of East Glamorganshire and nearly the whole of Monmouthshire affairs are going on as usual, except that numbers of men are drawn from every department in life. The cotton industries suffer badly all over England. There is a boom in the leather, woollen, and clothing departments. The Government has been compelled to refuse khaki orders from Russia.

For economic reasons I suppose there is a pressure being brought to bear between employers and employees who are thrown out of work,—they have a sort of unwritten agreement between them, and the enlisting sergeant is in close proximity on the date when single men are drawn out of their regular employment. That unmarried men are always the chief aim is evident. Some employers leave matters open for volunteers, guaranteeing fifteen shillings per week to legitimate dependents during the war to a father, son leaving any dependents, sisters, invalids, or parent or other relative,—illegitimate children being included and provided for, as we seem to always get revelations on the immoral side in big disasters everywhere. Yes, fifteen shillings, rent in some cases free, and colliers' rate for coal (house) which runs at usual rates to colliery workmen, from three shillings to ten shillings per ton, including delivery according to distance. Whereas now coal runs about one shilling and two pence to one shilling and four pence per hundredweight in the towns and cities. Other employees give ten shillings per week. Some offer no inducements. Their inducements are not high, where the best steam coals are raised.

Committees are being formed everywhere to meet distress without discrimination as long as the distress has come about owing to the war.

There are not a great many of the Saints in the war,—I think about three from Wales, two of whom were previously connected with the territorials.

I inclose a little pamphlet that was sent to the inhabitants of Gloucester City where a number of soldiers, horse and infantry are training, chiefly men of the shire. Some people took exceptions to it as a reflection upon the girls and the soldiers. I think it was good advice. Lord Kitchener has issued a somewhat similar statement to all the troops, which is in substance, "Beware of wine and women."

This war is all too terrible, and while humanity has such sham religious systems there can not be the sacrificing spirit that will make possible peace on earth and good will toward men.

Turkey must be dealt with sooner or later so as to give stability under a new government. I hope for the return of the Jews and the rebuilding of Jerusalem. I trust our brethren at Jerusalem are being taken care of. I feel, too, for our brethren and sisters in Germany, as we have formed spiritual ties in Christ that are above all others. Nationalism, internationalism, and all the rest sink into nothingness in comparison to the real ties that keep the Zion of God in latter days in that spirit which can truly breathe.

Your brother in Christ,

THOMAS JONES.

Editors Herald: Brother C. E. Willey and myself are holding meetings here at present. Quite a number of outsiders are attending, and we hope some good may be accomplished. The daily papers print a synopsis of each sermon, and are very fair to us.

The work in this district is moving upward, though somewhat slowly. Yet we are hopeful of many good things yet to come by way of advancement.

Trusting that all is well, I am,

[The following personal letter to one of the editorial staff will be of interest to all, as indicating the blessings following faithfulness on the part of ministry and membership.—EDITORS.]

CRESTON, IOWA, October 26, 1914.

I baptized Sister Elsie J. Hammer here yesterday. She is one of a noble spirit, and when confirmed the Spirit of God came upon her in power, acknowledging her acceptance with God. There are a few others here who will accept the gospel in the near future. Since the organization of the Sunday school here last February not a Lord's day has been missed, and the benefit accruing to the Saints, both young and old, and to their children is very noticeable, and God has indicated that a greater work will yet be done in this place, the first baptism into the church being that of yesterday. For sixteen and more years Brother Hammer and family have lived in this place, isolated from Sunday school or branch privileges of the church, and all their children are members of the church save one, and he too young, yet even now having a desire for baptism. All now living at home, numbering five besides father and mother, are active defenders of the church and its faith, and not given to spending their money on the frivolous pleasures of life. This speaks volumes for the training and nurturing given the family by father and mother, and is worth more to them than any financial acquirement.

I baptized four at the Spring Hill Schoolhouse, near Lucas, all heads of families, and those who have become thoroughly convinced of the necessity of obedience, after prayerful investigation. Others there are near the kingdom, and will in time obey the gospel.

I have been greatly blessed in all my ministrations since last writing for the HERALD. Do not know that I have ever been more blessed. My hope grows brighter, and my joy in service gives greater joy as the years come and go.

J. F. MINTUN.

LONGSIGHT, MANCHESTER, ENGLAND, October 26, 1914.

Editors Herald: In August, 1913, the writer was appointed to labor as missionary, succeeding Elders W. R. Armstrong and John Bailey, mission secretary and president of the district respectively, in Farnworth, in a mining and cotton district, eight miles from Manchester. Having been a student for many years under the tutorship of both these worthy and capable brethren, I felt the responsibility rest heavily upon me. Up to this time I had never taken charge of a branch. Only one thing stood in my favor, and that was I understood the peculiar Lancashire dialect spoken in Farnworth, and how difficult this is, only the American brethren who have labored here can appreciate.

Brother Armstrong introduced me to the Saints as their servant for the remainder of that conference year. I was welcomed with the only welcome these plain, honest, sturdy people can give, namely: "Mak thi sel awlum"; and so far I have made myself so much at home as to be still laboring in the Farnworth Branch, where we are making the name of the church something to be looked up to and the name of Joseph Smith worthy of a place in the history of the world of good men.

Many pleasant memories are awakened when the Saints of the British Isles Misson speak of Farnworth and its history in connection with this great latter-day work. Such stalwarts as Brethren Boydell, father of the branch, Ramsey, Spargo, of whose family there is no end, Coweill and Hope, all have gone to the great beyond to continue their labors of sacrifice and love. Other well-known men who have labored at Farnworth are, the late Brethren J. Dewsnup, sr., H. Greenwood, J. Baty, W. H. Greenwood, Joseph Dewsnup, and, most versatile of all our pleasant, social reform orator, G. W. Leggott, who is well known wherever he goes, with his peculiar style of presenting the latter-day message. Those acquainted with our brother will agree that a season of street preaching in company with "Genial George," is a time never to be forgotten.

When I took up my labors at Farnworth, I found conditions not the best. The work was in charge of the faithful veteran, Elder Joseph Harper, a steady, plodding collier, who for many years has stood by his testimony to the truthfulness of the angel's message. What the district owes to the fidelity of this brother will not be known this side of eternity. Brother S. H. Hope was acting as priest, Brother J. Spargo as deacon. These two young men have, under the most trying times, stood fast and true to the careful and wise teachings of steady and true parents. They have stood ready at all times to sacrifice that the work of the Lord might continue.

Some time ago Brother Hope met with a very serious accident in the mine, having the muscles of his right arm almost torn asunder. So serious was the case that the doctors at the infirmary feared the total loss of the use of the limb. Brother Hope had been hurt in the mine before, and his faith was as strong as ever in the Lord. He was administered to and to-day can use his arm fairly well, though not as heretofore. This brother is growing old, and may soon have to cease from active labor. We hope that he may be spared to see one of his younger brethren take over the presidency of the branch.

There are a few faithful Saints at Farnworth who are doing their best to keep the flag flying. We started on the advice of the so-called prophet who said, If the mountain will not come to me, I will go to the mountain. People did not come to our room, although the branch has held forth in this room for over twenty years, so we went out on the streets and into the market places, and began the gospel story. Opposition developed, and at times we have been threatened by mob influence, but almost invariably help unexpectedly arrived, and those who sought to slay us have stayed to bless us.

This summer we began preaching in June and kept at it until October 15. We have had good crowds, assistance from the Saints, and good liberty, leaving behind an excellent impression and a better understanding of our position as an organized force among societies born to do mankind good; also a better conception of what and who Joseph Smith was. In the language of one brother, we have converted more than we have baptized. As a young man in the work, and one of the babes of the missionary staff, I am satisfied with the results of the labor of two seasons expended in Farnworth Branch.

Yesterday, Sunday, the 25th, was a red letter day with the Saints. The Wigan Branch came over to see its parent branch, for out of Farnworth the Wigan Branch grew, and became a fine, robust, healthy branch. They have for their leader young Elder Albert Smith, who gave us a fine discourse on the baptism question. The reunion of the families of Saints was a grand success. Many happy times of the past were related, pleasant memories revived, hardships and difficulties smiled over, and all were built up and edified. Another of the "old brigade," in the person of Brother William Spargo, with his good and faithful companion, related times of the persecution of the Wigan Branch, followed with success. Others who had stood the strife for many years, even longer than the writer has lived, gave testimony to the angel's message. I had thought to have a quiet day, but this was not allowed, and I had to occupy both in the school session and for ten minutes at the close of the evening service. Rain spoiled our arrangements for a final rally for the last street meeting.

The outlook is good, conditions are better, and we are looking for a harvest in God's own time. The war cloud is heavy over us, causing distress among many, but to-day the Saints have cause to be thankful.

May we be faithful to our mission, telling the story to those nearest at hand.

Ever praying for the emancipation of the human family,
I sign myself,                      Respectfully yours,

ORCHARDVILLE, ILLINOIS, October 28, 1914.

Editors Herald: I am trying to please the Lord in all my ways, that he may be glorified in my body and spirit, which are his. In my weakness I have been endeavoring for four years to present the gospel, which work has been my meat and drink. For the last two years I have served as president of the Southeastern Illinois District.

On October 1, I was appointed to take the place of Brother E. A. Sutton as missionary in the field, and had scarcely started on my mission when some person or persons burned our church, which was located three and a half miles west of Orchardville, at Poplar Creek Branch. The fire was discovered at 3.30, the morning of October 12. Sunday school literature, songbooks, a Bible, and some pieces of dry wood were used to start the fire. Nothing was saved. We had insurance on neither house nor contents, hence all was a total loss.

We tried to secure bloodhounds, but failed. We then offered reward for the arrest and conviction of the guilty person or persons. We had the matter under good headway, when the authorities of the State Fire Department took it up. The Saints and others have gone to work to arrange to rebuild. We are organized, and our committee is working.

I love this work with all my heart, and would be glad to see it prosper in every land. Elder S. S. Smith begins a meeting here to-night at the Christian church, which has been granted to us without the asking. We have some good people here who are helping us on our church.

Our prayer is that Zion may prosper and grow and fulfill her mission, when the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

R. H. HENSON.

SANTA ANA, CALIFORNIA.

Editors Herald: The many good things brought to us by the church papers are my companions, my stepping-stones to the higher life, as well as messengers from which we learn of the work of the Saints of both far and near.

We are enjoying our work in the new church at Santa Ana. Last week we secured a nice-toned organ, one of unusual cabinet work. This instrument was placed to one side of the choir stand by Sister Staut, for the Sunday school to use as long as they wished. We also have a new piano of our own on the other side of the stand, all paid for, and there is an organ in the basement, also.

Our Religio is doing well, and the Sunday school is a pleasing feature of activity. The children evince their enjoyment in the spacious as well as commodious basement, with plenty of tables and chairs and places for blackboard work on three sides of the room. Sunday school is opened in the upper auditorium. After the opening exercises a march is played, and those of fourteen years and under file to the basement in class order, with their teachers. In the upper auditorium is one class of young people and two of adults.

Last Sunday I went to the basement to see the order of the school there, and found it pleasingly interesting. There were three well-filled tables of the intermediate department. Each scholar had pencil and tablet, and all were busy. None of the teachers were sitting down. They were either writing on the blackboard, asking questions, or giving especial attention to first one of their class and then another. The beginners were in a small room by themselves. When class work is over, all march to the upper auditorium and take the front seats for the review, when there is an eager show of hands, even among the little tots, in response to the questions. It is gratifying to see such interest manifested by the children.

The most serious situation confronting us is that there is still money owing on the church, though in this, too, the children manifest an interest to liquidate the debt. Last month the children of the intermediate department, with the help of their parents, gave an ice cream social in the basement. They made candy, and their ice cream was also home-made, and the cakes were of the best. There was first a short musical program, followed by a spelling match, then came the feasting. There were plenty of chairs placed around the tables so that none had to hold their plates. A nice little sum was by this means netted by the children. On Thursday, the 29th, the young people's class will give a harvest home supper. The sisters were also on the alert to take advantage of every opportunity that came to turn in a few dollars. Beside the general work of the society, they are preparing to hold a bazaar in November. "When woman, with her faith and courage high makes doubting cease, and fears of failure fly," one needs to look only for success.

But, oh, who can be cheerful and happy with the war going on! And some of our missionaries feeling severely its effects! Personally, it produces a feeling of solemn awe. America is in one sense Zion, and Doctrine and Covenants 45:13 seems to refer to a fleeing of other nations to America, rather than to Saints of America fleeing to the center stake, though I believe that the Saints must needs flee to the center stake, since Saints are not mentioned. There are Americans scattered among all the nations. Many nations are now at war, or contemplating war, and as they become involved the Americans will not take up the sword, and must needs flee to America for safety. It looks as if there were to be a literal fulfillment of this revelation, though the time may come when the Saints must needs flee to a central stake for safety. It behooves all of us to do that which is right, so that our standing may be holy before the Lord; then will they be entitled to his care wherever they are. While I feel sorrow and sympathy for the suffering nations, I thank God daily that our Nation is at peace, that our sons are not called to enter the war.

I was mistaken when I said, in my former letter, that a thousand names would be needed to secure the publication of "Beatrice Witherspoon." Not nearly so many will be needed to place the book on the market.

I pray that the purposes of the Lord may continue us in peace, and that peace may again be restored to the earth.

Editors Herald: I have been a member of the church since I was a little girl. There is on earth, to-day, no other gospel so full of truth and light as this. I ask the prayers of the Saints that I may remain in the true work of Jesus Christ, and that I may not become worried or left by the wayside.

My mother has been blind for two years. I ask the prayers of the Saints that she may receive her sight in this life. She has five little children to be seen after, and we desire that God shall watch over them and guide them in the way he would have them go.

I am striving to hold my light high that men and women may see my good walk and follow therein.

Ever praying that we may be called the children of the kingdom, I am,

Your sister,

MARY BOOKER.

Editors Herald: One thing I greatly appreciate in this latter-day work is the association and counsel of real, God-fearing men, who have not been followers of Baal or become entangled in any of the devices of the Adversary, and whose presence and prayers infuse new life into the drooping soul.

For nine months past I have been wandering about like a pilgrim and stranger upon the earth. With the difficulties and storms incident to such a career, there has come to me much of peace, joy and sunshine. It is a great lesson to learn that others of like precious faith have crosses to bear, battles to fight, foes to conquer, and victories to win, as they wend their way toward the "fair fields of immortality."

An all-wise Creator who sends the sunshine and the rain, and allows the storms to beat upon "these wild, rocky shores," also lets the hammer of affliction beat and the grievous storms of adversity descend, that we may learn to cultivate the spirit of humility, patience, submission, and endurance, which will result to the glory of God and in an abiding rest.

The Saints usually are hopeful and confident in the ultimate triumph of this latter-day work, but many of them are swayed by the glittering and transient things of life, and often lose the Spirit which guides into all truth. It is sad to think of the foolish virgins being left outside to weep and lament when they really expected to enter into the marriage supper. "Well done," can only be said to those who do well and continue in the faith to the end.

Many are not living up to the privileges and advantages within their reach; for they are without the church books and weekly papers, and are too tired, or have some other excuse for not attending the regular services on the Lord's day. We must not forget that he that knoweth his Master's will and doeth it not shall be beaten with many stripes. The admonition of the Spirit in much emphasis of late has been to "stand in holy places," which is surely impossible unless we, as the Zion of latter days, make these places holy by our walk and conversation.

The sifting time is at hand, and all those who build with hay, wood or stubble must suffer loss when the day of burning comes, and when they receive no inheritance with the Saints in Zion. Let us put on the whole armor of Christ and get into harmony with him, both spiritually and financially, that whatever we do may prosper.

My faith is still in the Lord and in the accomplishment of his great cause, and I wish to work harmoniously with all to this end.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, November 2, 1914.

Editors Herald: Sunday, October 25, was a day of rejoicing to Elder Solomon Duijzers, a native of Holland, it being the first anniversary of his ordination to the office of elder, and the date of the opening of the Holland-American mission, referred to in our previous correspondence to the HERALD. On this date, at 10 a. m., our brother opened this mission, speaking from 2 Chronicles 6: 40-42, in the Dutch language. A few Dutch people were present.

In the afternoon our brother commemorated his ordination of one year ago, speaking from Mark 4: 14. Quite a number of Saints were present at this hour, including Brother Burwell, who was also with us in the morning service, and who witnessed the ordination of Brother Duijzers a year ago, in Detroit, Michigan. This latter service was also attended by Elders D. E. Dowker and Burns, who spoke a few words to Elder Duijzers and his wife with reference to the work they had entered upon. Truly God's Spirit was with our Dutch brother in delivering his addresses, as well as during the entire day. In the evening he spoke in the Dutch language, from Revelation 3: 20-22.

We have a nice hall where we are able to seat about one hundred and twenty-five persons and which can be made to accommodate two hundred and fifty. Brother and Sister Duijzers have their rooms at the rear of the hall. To God alone be the glory, is the expression of Brother and Sister Duijzers. Much has yet to be done in the arrangement of these rooms and the hall, but which must wait until financial conditions are better. Fuel is needed to heat the hall. Brother Duijzers requests those who are able to do so and wish to contribute same, to send him tracts, books and old volumes of church papers.

Our brother wishes by this means to thank God and to acknowledge receipt of $100 from the Presiding Bishop, and an offering of $16.25 from the Chicago Saints, which makes possible the opening of this mission. We have yet to pay $135.75.

Trusting in the prayers of God's people, we enter this work, not in our own strength, but in the strength of the Lord, and remain faithful in God's service.

Your brother and sister,

ELDER AND MRS. S. M. DUIJZERS.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, 101 West One Hundred and Fifteenth Street, Roseland.

TULSA, OKLAHOMA, November 2, 1914.

Editors Herald: A mere handful of Saints decided to build a church in Tulsa. They went to work, and yesterday saw the house all completed, painted, seated, pulpit carpeted, etc. The building is thirty by forty feet, and was erected at a cost of a little over twelve hundred dollars, all of which is paid.

The dedicatory service was in charge of Brethren William Aylor and Hubert Case. The entire program was fine and very impressive. Short talks were given by Bishop Ellis Short and Hubert Case. Brother W. N. Robinson gave a brief history relative to the work here, telling how and when it started, and speaking of its development to the present time. Sister W. N. Robinson and Brother O. L. James, two of the sweet singers of Israel, rendered beautiful solos, which revived pleasant times and memories. In a few, well-chosen words, Brother Robinson presented the deed to Bishop Short, who responded in the same manner. Brother William Aylor offered the dedicatory prayer. I am sure all present felt the power and force of this petition. Throughout the service, we were blessed with the presence of the Spirit of God, and we felt that the Father had accepted of our labors. From the beginning, this work seemed to be a labor of love. The Saints willingly donated work, time and money, all of which was cheerfully and faithfully done. A few visiting Saints from near-by towns joined us.

The only cloud that came to mar the full pleasure of our enjoyment was the death of our Sister Potter's husband, who passed from this life at ten o'clock Sunday morning, and whose funeral was announced at the close of the service. This was the first funeral held in our new chapel.

It was decided that this building was to be the home of the missionary. Let all take notice, therefore, that Tulsa is on the gospel map, with a big dot. Come and visit us often.

Brethren Aylor and Case held a week's meeting before the dedication, their efforts being of a high order and seemingly enjoyed by all, outsiders as well as those within the fold. Brother Case remained with us to continue the meetings. One man has given his name for baptism. We give God the glory for all.

Wishing all Godspeed in their work, I remain,
Your sister in the faith,

MRS. H. L. LOGAN.

PEORIA, ILLINOIS, November 5, 1914.

Editors Herald: A little more than one half century has passed since Kewanee District was organized. As early as the year 1860 there were at least two branches of the church in this section, namely Abingdon and Henderson Grove.

In November, 1863 an effort was made to organize a district. The first district conference, proper, was held at Henderson, the next spring, March 5 and 6, 1864. Closely associated with these early days are the names of Joseph Smith, Alexander Smith, Mark H. Forscutt, W. W. Blair, Zenos H. Gurley, and a host of others none the less worthy. For more than fifty years men and women have labored, sacrificed, and prayed for this part of the Lord's work as revealed in the latter days.

At least one man who attended that first meeting in Galesburg in November, 1863 is living, and still working for the establishment of truth. David S. Holmes, who went there in the early morning of his life, and who was a factor, with others now passed on, in bringing about the planting of the gospel standard in many places, still lives at Buffalo Prairie, and attended the last session of Kewanee District, which session was held at East Moline, October 31 and November 1.

During this interval, branches were organized and added to the original number, until altogether there have been twenty-three such organizations; but to-day there remain but ten, with a total membership of nearly eight hundred. Could all those who have either "planted" or "watered" the seed in this district be gathered together, what an army it would be! And how these faithful ones will rejoice to learn that the work is yet being carried forward. From time to time, the ranks of the priesthood are replenished by young men who come forward to take up the work left unfinished by those who are called to pass on. Branches may become disorganized in one locality, but others are organized in other places, so that the work of reaching the "honest-hearted seeker after truth" in northwestern Illinois is not yet abandoned.

At the last session of the district conference held at East Moline, last Saturday and Sunday, there was a fairly good attendance, and a very nice time had. Meetings were, generally, calm and peaceful.

We believe that the great majority of the Saints of Kewanee District are really interested in the uplift of all, and that the tendency is "upward"; but in our very earnestness we sometimes seem to have forgotten Paul's injunction to the Saints when he said, "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted." (Galatians 6:1.)

The preaching services were all very good. The speakers, D. S. Holmes, C. E. Willey, O. E. Sade and J. R. Grice, seemed all to be blessed with good liberty, and we felt that the hearers must certainly be edified.

During the morning sacrament service, Brother O. E. Sade gave the voice of the Spirit; also Brother Grice sang what was given, about the same hour. The Saints rejoiced and were comforted. Especially was this true of those of the Twin City and the Rock Island branches who have labored so many years amidst great difficulties to erect and complete the little building which was dedicated during the conference. Of the ten branches now numbered in this district, six now own their buildings, and another is in a fair way to do so ere another conference shall have passed.

The passing away of the only resident high priest within the district, John Chisnall, of Kewanee, is here noted. His life work was written into the history of not only Kewanee Branch, but also Kewanee District. As those who were instruments in God's hands in the founding of this district will soon all have passed on, and as we contemplate their passing, we are reminded that "this generation" is drawing to its close; and the thought will come, Are we as ready to sacrifice and finish the work as were these who first were called to labor? Will we be found so doing?

Editors Herald: Arriving here November 2, I found the Saints well and striving to serve the Master. I am trying to tell the gospel story, and wish to reach all the new places I can. Any isolated Saints in northern Michigan who desire preaching may drop me a line and I will try to respond. If we all work together this great cause will roll on and prosper.

Your brother in Christ,

GEORGE E. BURT.

BEAVERTON, MICHIGAN, Home Address.

ASHLAND, WISCONSIN, November 7, 1914.

Editors Herald: I am busy in the gospel work at this place. We are having some fine meetings here, with interest manifested, even among the Methodist people. One lady told me she thought she would be with us soon. She said she could not believe as the Methodists do. Her husband is favorable. I preached in their house and expect to preach there again.

I left home in October. I will have plenty to do all the remainder of the conference year, as the calls are many. I am feeling fine in preaching the word, in fact, I never felt better. I feel like one who had been bound and turned loose. And so it has been. For over three years I have been detained at home on account of the condition of my wife. I could not leave her much of the time. She is much better, so that I can go and labor for the Lord and the work which I love. I will fill all the calls I can this winter, endeavoring, with the help of God, to spread the work.

The missionaries are all busy, with good results. Brother Fike has gone home.

Your brother and colaborer,

A. L. WHITEAKER.

Western Maine

After the close of the daily vacation Bible school in Providence, Rhode Island, and the reunion at Onset, Massachusetts, the missionary said good-by to his family, and was on his way "down east," after an absence of eight months from the missionary field.

Arriving in this district in August, plans were immediately made to push the work along. Many places needed help. Openings were offered all over the country. The first place visited was Surry. After a week's labor there, I met Elder William Anderson, and together we made a new opening at North Penobscot, where the writer led five precious souls into the waters for baptism.

Elder Anderson remained in Penobscot while I journeyed on to Corea. Here we met a few Saints who had just seen the storm cloud of persecution roll away, leaving them with a beautiful new church building, where unmolested they can worship God. Corea is the battle field of Arthur Koehler, a noble man, who performed a noble work.

After three weeks labor in Corea and Birch Harbor, the cry for help was heard from Sargentville. While reluctant to leave Corea, Sargentville needed help, and help it must have. The work here is just two years old. Brother Ebeling opened up this place and created an interest that has reached into many little surrounding towns. When Elder Ebeling was appointed to labor in eastern Maine, I was requested to look after the interest of the church here. We now have a fully organized branch, with a loyal band of Saints. Through the untiring efforts of the sisters' aid society we have a church building almost completed. Although not very large, it is an honor to the town, and a place where the people can meet with God.

We have been preacher and carpenter. Pounding nails will produce blisters on preacher's hands, if preaching does not cause them on the tongue. We are holding services here at the home of the deacon, Fred Gray, Sunday evenings. Our Wednesday evening prayer services, Sunday morning services and Sunday school are held at the home of our priest, Arthur Robbins. The president of this new branch, Elder Edgar Robbins, is sixty-eight years old, and has to walk six miles to attend the services. He does all the preaching when there is no traveling elder present. And he is always on the job.

We hold our Religio Friday evenings, in which is being manifested a lively interest. There is a fine class of young people here who will help carry on the good work in the future.

The first of this week, I walked to West Brooklyn, where I preached in the union church. There are no Saints there. It is a new field, and no one there has heard the gospel except a few old people who heard a few sermons twenty-five years ago. After two nights I had to pack up and leave. A cold had settled in my throat, leaving it very sore, and I am hoarse.

I am now working on the church, while my throat is resting. I shall go to Brooklyn on the twenty-third of this month, after which I expect to go to Corea for the rest of the winter.

Ever praying for and trying to help the good work onward, I beg to remain,

Your humble servant,

JOHN F. SHEEHY.

SARGENTVILLE, MAINE, November 14, 1914.

Gallands Grove and Des Moines

By invitation of O. Salisbury and E. O. Clark, president and bishop's agent respectively of the Des Moines District, I spent forty days in that district presenting the temporal law of the church.

Services were held in every branch except Packard, and in seven other places where only a few "scattered" members reside. I was kindly received by all the branch presidents, officers, and members, preaching forty-two times, besides the many heart to heart talks in the homes of the Saints, all of which I hope will be productive of good to the Lord's great cause.

A noble people reside in the Des Moines District, and I believe the church will continue to receive much substantial help from them. Brother Clark is an energetic, self-sacrificing worker. Although not in a position to travel in the district as he desires, yet he will do a good part toward helping the Master's cause along.

I have returned to the Gallands Grove District, and will say to its members that during my appointment to this field my mission address will continue to be Deloit, Iowa, and I sincerely trust that every member will do what he can to help the good cause along by sending in his tithes and offerings.

With confidence in the final triumph of the gospel intrusted to this church, I am,

Very sincerely,

November 18, 1914.

Australia

A number of our American brethren are wondering if we are in any danger from the war. Apparently not, unless the Germans land an army here, and that hardly seems probable. Heavy warships could bombard Sydney, as shells could be thrown into it from the ocean, but Melbourne is too far away from the coast to be in danger along that line, and it would be extremely difficult for war vessels to enter the "heads" where there are modern fortifications and mines. Australia has two dreadnaughts and a number of smaller warcraft, and it is doubtful if the Germans have anything in this part of the world heavy enough to do us any harm. But if the enemy should land an invading force, and we have to meet them face to face, I shall present my passport, which I secured from the Secretary of State before leaving United States and if that is not sufficient to protect me, then I shall be glad I still remember a little German prayer my mother taught me, so as a last resort I shall get down on my knees and pray: "Lieber Gott, mach mich fromm dasz ich zu dir in der Himmel komm. Amen." (Bishop Becker, Kirtland, would interpret it for you: Dear God, make me worthy that I may come home to thee, in heaven.)

There is a severe drought over a large part of producing Australia, and, in connection with the war, this sunny land is feeling the effects of it, which may retard the Lord's work to some extent; but Brother Griffiths is sending additional ministers into the field, bright young men who will make their mark. It is one of the wonders to us the number of young men who have been raised up here, and who are ready to give up everything to preach the gospel. They are able young fellows, too. It seems to me the Lord is lining up an army here as sure as Europe is lining up soldiers for a war of blood.

We are anxiously waiting for news from Brother May, at Papeete, to learn if the missionaries there are safe, and if our church property has been damaged by the bombarding from the two German warships which were there last month.

It was a year August 15 since I left home and loved ones. A number of my correspondents are predicting that I will be at the Lamoni Conference, but I think they are wrong. I do not intend to desert, but will stay the three years out, unless something unusual turns up, or I am ordered home. My various experiences in the church are of great benefit to me here, and I am trying to be useful, and believe I am accomplishing a good work for the Lord. Feeling that I am needed here recompenses me to some extent, and helps to make me feel reconciled to stay in this mission until my work is done and the Lord permits me to feel that I can go home. That word home sounds holy to me just now.

I very much doubt if the church can expect that very many men in the future will leave their families for three years and take a mission like this, and I think Brother Griffiths is about the last of the "old guard," who, at his age, will consent to it. Let the church make up its mind if it wants men to go on foreign missions that it must send their families with them, then they would stay longer and would not cost much more in the end. The average missionary's wife can also be of use in the foreign missions. I know how my wife could be a great blessing to the people here.

She could teach the people how to make a good, old-fashioned, American pie! The sisters here are good cooks, but their talents do not lie in making pies. They simply do not know how. I haven't even seen a pie pan, let alone a pie, since coming here. You can go all over the cities, and you will never see in any bakeshop the legend the old country lady marked on the two pies: "T. M. 'Tis Mince," and "T. M. 'Tain't Mince." If any Australian sisters see this and are inclined to challenge my assertion, I certainly would like to locate them! Their ice cream is a sixteenth carbon copy of the real thing. And I haven't seen an ear of sweet corn! I sent over to Mr. Frank Hardins, Uniopolis, Ohio, for seed, and Sister Helen Taylor sent some on, which I forwarded to a brother in New South Wales. I am devotedly hoping it will grow.

Brother Griffiths is in the New South Wales districts. Has organized a number of new branches, and seems to have the gift of finding prospective workers for the Lord. He has ordained quite a number of young men, who are giving the Lord their energies, their enthusiasm, and their talents to help along God's holy cause.

I never felt better physically or spiritually, but of course can't help but wish my family were here with me. However, I will try and do my duty, and stay the allotted time, unless the Germans run me out, then "home, sweet home" for me!

Sincerely,

C. EDWARD MILLER.

AGENT'S NOTICE

To the Saints of Northern California; Greeting: All who wish to be credited with honoring the Lord with their substance and doing their part to build up the kingdom of God will please take notice that 1914 is drawing to a close. This reminds us that there will be a time come to all when our earthly career will close and we will be called to the other side to give an account of our stewardships. We are called upon to give an account in time, that is, now, as well as in eternity.

"Therefore, if any man shall take of the abundance which I have made, and impart not his portion, according to the law of my gospel, unto the poor, and the needy, he shall, with the wicked, lift up his eyes in hell, being in torment."—Doctrine and Covenants 101:2.

This we wish to avoid, so now is the time to do as the Lord directs—pay our tithing, make our offerings. It will be too late when we get over there. "Let us be wise servants," and do our service now and all will be well.

Yours in gospel bonds,

C. A. PARKIN.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA, 575 Fifth Avenue.

Book Reviews

A YOUNG MAN'S JESUS.—By Bruce Barton, the Pilgrim Press, Boston, Massachusetts, price $1. An interesting book for young men, the object of which is stated in the preface as follows: "It is time for those of us who are this side of thirty-five to unite and take back our Jesus. We have been too carelessly generous. We have allowed him to be appropriated here, there, and everywhere until we have forgotten how indisputable is our own first claim to him. We have surrendered his statues to cathedrals and hospitals and— heaven forgive us—even to monasteries. We have looked on unprotestingly while painters have made him soft-faced, and effeminate; and hymn writers have written of his sufferings as though that were all in his life worth writing about. We have only ourselves to blame, if out of all the repellent medley of hospitals and monasteries and weak pictures and spiritless hymns, the public has formed its own conception of a tired, unhappy, martyred Jesus, who lived without a real laugh and looked forward to dying in a sort of fanatical eagerness. If this is the picture which red-blooded men have of him, then it is our fault who are still this side of thirty-five. For he is our Jesus in a special sense. He died before he was thirty-five. He had our bounding pulses, our hot desires. He felt his spirits leap in the bracing air of the new morning. He knew the stirring cheer of good fellowship. We who dream our dreams of success know how he felt that morning when he rode into Jerusalem over the strewed palms; and because our road stretches out a long way in front, through years of sunshine, as his might have stretched, the agony of that cry from the cross rings more sharply in our ears than in any others. He is our Jesus, and we have surrendered him to priests and to women, to hospitals and monasteries, without so much as a struggle.”

THE ART OF BEING ALIVE.—By Ella Wheeler Wilcox, Harper and Brothers, New York and London, 200 pp., $1 net. This is a helpful little handbook, in which each of the thirty-seven chapters is complete. The author shows, both in poetry and prose, the tonic effect of right thinking and how each of us may achieve contentment, strength, and ability by the use of our mental forces. It has the elements of theosophy, some of the rules of mental science, and a great deal of what used to be called “common sense.” The author applies the principles of thought to every condition of daily life, to every class of people, and gives for every one helpful counsel and good suggestions.

UNIVERSITY SERMONS.—This is the title of a volume of sermons by Reverend Henry Sloane Coffin, minister in the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church, and associate professor in the Union Theological Seminary, New York City. These sermons were delivered in the chapels of Yale, Harvard, Princeton, Columbia, New York, and Chicago universities, and of Williams, Dartmouth, Wellesley, Vassar, Mount Holyoke, and Bryn Mawr colleges. Some of them before conferences of the Young Men's Christian Association and the Young Woman's Christian Association. Of special interest to those who wish to get in touch with contemporary religious thought as expressed in institutions of higher learning. Published by Yale University Press.

BOOK OF SERMONS

BY R. C. EVANS

The great demand for his sermons has made it necessary for Bishop R. C. Evans to publish another book, this time with but eight sermons, that really tells the gospel story in an unanswerable way. This book is nicely bound in strong paper cover, and has a splendid picture of the bishop on the front cover. The sermons are on the following subjects:

“Infant baptism,” “Pouring, sprinkling, immersion,” “The two lepers,” “Was the thief on the cross a baptized believer?” “Did Jesus baptize with water or the Holy Ghost?” “How can a man be born again,” “The blood of Christ” and Christ's great invitation: “Come unto me.”

Here the student will find the cream of a great library. In these sermons, leading scholars, church historians and lexicographers are heard upon these questions, and the Bible in all its strength and beauty is made to have Christ and the apostles talk to us on these very important questions.

This book of sermons will be expressed or mailed at the following prices, 15 cents each, 8 sermons for $1; $12.50 per 100.

Let every Saint send for some sermons now. Just think! A sermon for one cent, or a book of sermons for fifteen cents. Have you warned your neighbor? Remember one cent will perhaps awake him out of his sleep and start him toward the sunny path that leads to Christ and the life that is more abundant.

Young People's History Now Ready

Especially Suitable for Holiday Gifts

What It Is

An interesting history of a peculiar organization—the Latter Day Saint Church. As readable as a story, yet every historical statement has been carefully written and may be relied on. All the important events of church history are mentioned in their proper relation to other events, with just enough detail to incite and hold the interest. The book is intended to interest the young especially and make the general church history already published in four volumes, of greater value because of added interest in it.

Dates Covered

It begins with the remarkable visit of the angel to the young lad, Joseph Smith, in the year 1820, and tells the interesting story from that date till the sad breaking up of the church following the death of Joseph and Hyrum Smith. The last chapter closes with the year 1848, the beginning of the gathering of the scattered people for the Reorganization.

The Style

The dates of the events are over each page, so one can easily locate them. There are numerous side notes in the reading page, showing at a glance the principal facts dealt with on the page. The type is the pica, a large face, with the footnotes in brevier. No eyestrain. Bound in durable cloth. Size 5½ by 8 inches. Over 400 pages. About 90 illustrations.

The Author

The book was written by Mrs. Vida E. Smith, wife of Church Historian, Heman C. Smith. She is well known to church members in general by her poems and other literary productions. Her long association with people and things historical, coupled with her natural ability, enables her to present all these matters in a pleasing and attractive way.

PRESIDENT SMITH'S ILLNESS

In our issue for last week we made mention of the unfortunate illness of President Joseph Smith. At this writing, December 5, there is no marked change in his condition. He is not suffering so much pain and discomfort as during the first few days of his illness. He continues quite weak with occasional sinking spells that at times are alarming in their nature. At other times he rallies and regains considerable strength. He is able to partake of nourishment, gets considerable sleep, and his mind remains very clear and active. The latter fact is a matter of congratulation, and one of the marked features of his illness.

At intervals he talks at some length with those about his bedside. At such times he asks questions about current events or people whose memory may be called to mind. He recounts his past experiences in church work, remembering all of the details with the greatest of accuracy. At other times he will bear his testimony for the strengthening and edification of those present. He testifies to the most profound belief in God the Father, Jesus Christ the Son, and in the Holy Spirit, and expresses a deep conviction that Jesus Christ as the Savior of mankind will carry on his work until it is ultimately triumphant. He also testifies to the purity of character of his father (Joseph the Martyr) as he remembers him.

Those gathered around the bedside of President Smith have witnessed a remarkable demonstration of the power of mind over matter and its independence of matter to a certain extent. While his body was prostrated and his physical forces apparently at the lowest ebb, his mind continued strong and active on the same high, intelligent plane that it has ever occupied.

At this writing it is impossible for us to judge as to the outcome of his illness. He is receiving every care and attention that loving devotion can furnish him, and rejoices in the thought of the very many personal friends who have become attached to him under the influences of the gospel of Christ. The members of his immediate family including all of his children who are living are with him. Also Bishop R. C. Evans, formerly his counselor, and intimately associated with him, came down from Toronto during the week, but was obliged to return on account of the theater meetings now in progress in Toronto. An effort will be made to keep the Saints further informed so far as possible in the columns of the HERALD.

LATER

On Sunday the 6th, word from President E. A. Smith was that the condition of President Joseph Smith was unchanged, and that there was hope of his recovery. Word to-day, Monday, is that his condition is not quite so favorable. We append this statement that the Saints may have the latest report we can convey to them through the HERALD.

INDIANS PRACTICE LAYING ON OF HANDS FOR BLESSING CHILDREN

The following very interesting extract is taken from volume 17 of the Collections of the Nebraska State Historical Society, edited by Albert Watkins, historian of the society, published at Lincoln, Nebraska, by the Nebraska State Historical Society. It appears in an address by James Mooney of the Bureau of American Ethnology, Washington, District of Columbia. This address was delivered at the annual meeting of the Nebraska State Historical Society, January 10 and 11, 1911. The extract is as follows:

When the baby is about a year old its ears are pierced. In the summer season it often happens that a large party of visitors from some neighboring tribe will come down to dance for several weeks. Let us suppose that about five hundred Cheyenne are coming to visit with the Kiowa. The first intimation will be, as I have seen it, that a wagon drives up near to our camp and a strange man and woman get out, set up a little tent, and then sit down and await developments. Our women go into the tipi and prepare to receive them. After some time our man goes out to welcome the strangers and bring them up to dinner. They can not speak Kiowa; but in the sign language they tell us that a large party of their own tribe are on the way and close at hand, to visit the Kiowa and dance in their various camps. About the middle of the afternoon there is a great noise in the distance, out on the prairie. We look out and see several hundred Indians coming, the women and children in wagons, and the men, all in full buckskin, riding ahead, shouting and firing guns. When they get in, the wagons are unloaded, the tipis are set up, and then the visiting and the dancing begin; to continue for several weeks, from one tent to another.

The ceremony of piercing the children's ears takes place at one of these dances. A priest of the visiting tribe does the work. The baby, dressed in a buckskin suit, is held up in the arms of its mother, and the old man pierces both of its ears with an awl. At that time, or very soon afterward, the grandmother of the child, or some other relative, gives the child its name. The name of a girl is not very apt to change, but the name of a boy changes as he grows up, according to circumstances. The old man who pierces the ears receives as a fee a horse, a blanket or some other valuable gift of that kind. After the ears are bored the father of the child asks the old man's prayers for the child, that it may have long life, health, and success. He does this by laying both his hands upon the old man's head, who in turn puts his hands upon the head of the child, praying that it may grow up well formed and healthy and have long life.—Pages 96, 97.

The salient features of this statement are that the Indians practiced the laying on of hands, and that they seemed to have some knowledge of the blessing of children. It is another evidence of their Jewish descent, and evidently was a ceremony that came down to them from their fathers. Their custom of blessing children under the hands of a priest was also strikingly in harmony with our own custom along that line, however, of course, perverted and somewhat distorted owing to their ignorance and superstition. Their thought seemed to be that while the priest laid his hands upon the head of the little child to bless it under his priestly authority the father by imposing his hands upon the head of the priest delegated to him as well a father's authority and blessing.

We have considered this item worthy of publication, believing that it will be of interest to the Saints, and that it may very profitably find a place in the scrapbooks of the elders.

CURRENT EVENTS SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

GERMAN WAR CREDIT.—On the 22d, with only one dissenting voice, the German Reichstag voted a new war credit of one million, two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

CHRISTMAS TREES.—Vermont is shipping one million Christmas trees to city markets. For these trees the owner receives six or seven cents; they retail at fifty cents and upwards.

DYNAMITING IN PERU.—On November 29, a special train in Peru, bearing Doctor Jose Pardo, ex-president of that country, was dynamited. Doctor Pardo was unharmed; six others were injured.

INDEMNITY TO LUXEMBURG.—Report which is said to be official is that Germany has paid to Luxemburg in reparation for crossing her territory in connection with the present war an indemnity of two hundred and fifty-six thousand dollars.

RETURN TO PARIS.—The French Parliament has been called to meet in extraordinary session in Paris, December 22. Members of the cabinet will return at once to Paris from Bordeaux, where the seat of government was transferred in September.

SERVICE RENEWED.—Postmaster General Burleson, on November 30, announced the resumption of parcels post service between the United States and Germany and Austria-Hungary, discontinued because of lack of means of transportation, occasioned by the European war.

GERMANY BARS LIQUOR.—Official order prohibits the sale of all alcoholic liquors in the eastern German provinces. This order is issued on recommendation of courts martial, which finds that in nearly all cases of desertion the offenders claim to have been under the influence of intoxicants at the time of desertion.

DEATH IN MINES.—The casualty list issued at Washington on the 1st by the Bureau of Mines shows 3,651 men killed and 100,000 (estimated) injured in mines and quarries of the United States during the year covered by the report. The death rate was 3.49 per cent of each 1,000 of the 1,047,010 men employed.

ITALIAN PARLIAMENT.—At the opening of the Italian Parliament on the 3d, Premier Salandra advised that the Government maintain an attitude of watchful and armed neutrality. At the suggestion that greetings be sent to "heroic and unfortunate Belgium," the entire chamber arose and shouted, "Hurrah, Belgium!"

UTAH INDEPENDENCE CHURCH.—A new twenty-five thousand dollar Utah Church building was dedicated at Independence, Missouri, November 22. Of the Utah dignitaries, Joseph F. Smith, sr., and Charles W. Penrose, of the Presidency, George Albert Smith and Joseph F. Smith, jr., of the Twelve, and Presiding Bishop Charles W. Nibley were in attendance.

BIBLE SUNDAY.—December 6 was observed by many churches of the country as Bible Sunday. It is proposed that the arrangement be made permanent, and that on a given Sunday of each year churches and other institutions urge the value and necessity of a study of the Scriptures. The movement has the indorsement of the International Sunday School Association.

WESTERN FREIGHT RATES.—Investigation of western and middle western freight rates was ordered November 30, when the Interstate Commerce Commission suspended increased tariffs filed by western carriers, to become effective December 1, and under which the western roads sought to advance rates in conformity with the so-called five per cent increase recently applied for by eastern carriers.

LONG STRIKE ENDS.—Fifteen thousand employees of shops of the Harriman railroad lines have voted their three-year strike a failure, and that they will return to work. The men had demanded an eight hour day, an increase in wages, and recognition of their federated system, under which they sought to deal with roads as a federation instead of as separate unions.

RAILROAD ARBITRATION.—Arbitration of matters at issue between ninety-eight western railroads and sixty-four thousand engineers and firemen was begun at Chicago, November 30, before a board appointed under the Newlands act. The enginemen contend that of sixteen concessions demanded, all except two comparatively minor ones are already in effect, some on one road, some on another; they ask that they be adopted on all lines.

AMERICAN BUSINESS.—The New York stock exchange has been reopened under restrictions. Business throughout the country is reported picking up, with money somewhat easier. Efforts are being made to widen trade relations between the United States and South American countries. Concerns are considering the manufacture of material hitherto secured from Europe, and which may be made at home. Altogether, the business outlook seems brighter than at any time since the outbreak of the European war.

PROGRESSIVE PARTY.—A considerable falling off in the Progressive Party vote at the recent election, as compared with the vote at the last presidential election, has suggested in some quarters the discontinuation of the party. At a meeting of the Progressive National Executive Committee, on the 3d, at Chicago, the determination to continue the party was declared. A meeting of the national committee for 1915 was provided, to arrange for an international convention for 1916.

PACKERS ASK AID.—Chicago packers have filed with the State Department protest against Great Britain for failure to release or pay for meat products valued at eight million dollars, and seized while en route to Norway and Sweden. The packers claim that the products in neutral vessels, consigned to neutral countries having restrictions against exportation to belligerents, were not contraband, and hence not subject to seizure. The case will be taken up with Great Britain, though Secretary Bryan promises no relief.

PAN-AMERICAN CONFERENCE.—A conference of the governing board of the Pan-American Union, comprising the diplomatic representatives at Washington of twenty American republics, with the Secretary of State of the United States as chairman ex-officio, is called for the 8th, to consider suggestions of Argentine, Chile, Peru, Ecuador, and Uruguay, looking to action to relieve the American countries of conditions incident to the European war, including provisions for safety to trade and the exclusion from American waters of belligerent war vessels.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—General Villa and Provisional President Guitierrez are said to be in Mexico City and in conference with Zapata, Zapata in conjunction with Villa agents having previously administered affairs there. Reports indicate that Villa and Zapata are united in support of Guitierrez. Order prevails at the capital. On the 30th, at Naco, where hostilities continue, one United States soldier and four Mexican children were wounded by stray bullets crossing the border, the American probably fatally, and one child seriously. On December 4, a United States soldier was wounded and a Mexican civilian killed at the same place, in the same manner.

COLORADO LABOR TROUBLES.—On November 29 the solicitor of the Department of Labor and the officers of the Department of Justice, to whom had been referred resolutions of the American Federation of Labor asking governmental operation of the Colorado coal mines, rendered the opinion that the President had no power to seize the mines for the purpose named. Notwithstanding the former rejection of such plan by the miners, President Wilson on November 29, announced the appointment of a commission of three, Seth Low, former mayor of Chicago, chairman, through which future differences between operators and miners may be adjusted. Reverend Henry A. Atkinson, investigating the Colorado trouble for the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, in a report to the council on November 22, declared that the coal companies control the government of the counties where the mines are located, and that it is impossible to enforce the law in these counties, since the courts are practically closed to those who have incurred the enmity of the companies.

EUROPEAN WAR.—Interest in the European war for the past week has continued to center in Russian Poland, where the German army, by shifting of forces, bringing up of reinforcements and desperate fighting, has extricated itself from the embarrassing position previously reported. Losses on both sides are reported heavy. Both lines claim success. The struggle here continues, each army being aggressive at different points. Russian forces have advanced to within ten miles of Cracow, and are preparing to attack the outer forts. Prezemyse is said to be in a desperate condition. Russia claims minor gains in eastern Prussia. Across the Carpathians, the Russian advance guards continue to harrass Austro-Hungarian forces. In the west the week has been comparatively quiet, and for the more part confined to artillery fire. Minor engagements have occurred in the vicinity of Ypres, Dixmude, Arras, and in Argonne regions, with the allies aggressive at some of the points named. The Montenegrins are reported victorious over the Austrians in Bosnia. Belgrade has been taken by the Austrians, and the Servians have elsewhere suffered losses. The Austrian Government has confiscated the entire output of oil in Austria-Hungary. General De Wet, leader of the rebellion in the Orange Free State, has been captured. Great Britain has arrested a Danish and a Norwegian trawler, on a charge of having sown German mines in the Irish Sea. The British collier Kingsway is held at San Diego, California, pending orders from Washington, under suspicion that it has been taking coal to a British and Japanese fleet off the California coast. The Kaiser, Czar, Kings George and Albert, and President Poincare have all been at the front at various points, King Albert of the Belgians remaining, as heretofore, with his troops.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

AT BOONE, IOWA.—The Boone News-Republican for November 13 contains a comprehensive synopsis of a sermon by Elder J. S. Roth on church organization, delivered the evening before in our church building there. Other subjects to be treated are announced in a way to attract attention, thus manifesting the disposition of The News-Republican to generously serve the church as a medium for advertising. During the labors of Brother Roth at Boone, conditions, developed in part prior to his visit, culminating in a situation requiring a debate. Propositions are at this writing being discussed by Elder E. E. Long and a representative of the Free Methodist faith.

PECULIAR ADMIXTURE.—The following from The Register and Leader for November 13, published at Des Moines, Iowa, appears as a verbatim report of an expression by "Billy" Sunday in a sermon at Des Moines the day before. This peculiar admixture is typical of the point of view not only of Mr. Sunday, but of others in their interpretation of the work of the prophets and of the gospel, and of their conception of the love and ministrations of God toward the wayward. The speaker said:

The preachers of to-day are just as much prophets as the prophets of old. It's their business to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ, and if they don't do it they're not true. If the people don't like it let them go to the Devil. If they don't believe it they're disgraced, not you.

NEWS FROM GERMANY.—Under date of November 14, Elder H. N. Hansen writes from Copenhagen, Denmark, of a visit just made to Germany. This interesting letter contains the following:

The war has been quite severe on our small membership in Germany, as out of only a little over one hundred, fourteen brethren have had to respond to the call to arms. I have not learned of the fate of all, but out of six from Hanover and Braunschweig, one is dead, three wounded, and only two were, when last heard from, still unharmed and well. It is hoped that the eight from the eastern part of the country have been more fortunate and fared better. Brother Blome, whom I met in Hanover, being one of the wounded, relates heartrending experiences that I shall not here attempt to repeat. . . . The brethren in Germany . . . are not participating from choice, but are compelled by the law of their country. They especially deplored the thought, as well they may, that some of their English brethren are in the opposing army.

DECEMBER "CURRENT OPINION."—The December Current Opinion maintains well the most excellent service of this popular magazine. The department A Review of the Word contains a discussion of the various phases of the European war, the effect of Japan's triumph in the East, America's part in the great drama, and a discussion of politics in the light of the recent election. The department of Science and Discovery is unusually interesting, including a consideration of the "Practicability of the contemplated raid of Zeppelin airships" on England from Germany. The department of Religion and Social Ethics treats, among other features, on "The American spirit that overcomes race prejudices," "A Mohammedan indictment of the Christian civilization of white races," and "Effecting a reform in the country church." The departments of Persons in the Foreground, Music and the Drama, Literature and Art, and The Business World round out a number of many interests, and suited to the varied tastes of intelligent readers everywhere.

GREATEST WONDER.—We note in The Jeffersonian for October 8, published at Thomson, Georgia, a discussion of the latter-day work in answer to a question by a sister of the Reorganization concerning some previous statement in The Jeffersonian regarding the work. Our self-styled informant in the following language shows his utter ignorance of the development of the movement. He was speaking of the delivering of the plates by the angel, and adds:

Joseph Smith claimed that the angel continued to make revelations to him, occasionally; and these revelations bore a striking resemblance to those made to Mohamet. . . . What the Reorganized Saints are, I do not know, but would be glad to learn.

The editor of The Jeffersonian, concluding his discussion in the spirit of ridicule, says: "It [the restored church, HERALD EDITORS] is the greatest miracle of modern times." On this point he also is in error. The greatest wonder of modern times is the man who admits that he knows nothing about the latter-day movement, and then proceeds to discuss the same.

BENEFITS TO YOUNG STUDYING THE BOOK OF MORMON

Seventy-three years ago the Book of Mormon was first published to the world. Its believers at first were indeed few, but have constantly increased until the present, though they are yet few in comparison with the unbelievers. Many of the latter have been bitter opposers of the book and the work being done in connection with it, and in the earlier years indulged in barbarous persecutions to accomplish its overthrow. Of later years, however, the conflict has been along the lines of reason, and at the present time is being fought more by stern argument based upon evidences gathered from innumerable sources.

The conflict over the Book of Mormon is merely begun, and in the future will be along the lines last mentioned. The opposers are gathering fighting materials from scripture, history, ethnology, American antiquities, tradition, and other sources, and are using them against the book. The learning of the wise, aided by the wealth of the rich, is even now operating to destroy it. If the book be false it must surely fall; if true, there must be sufficient evidences to uphold it against every attack.

What is its record thus far? It has stood firm against every point of attack. Not one of its positions has been proven false, either doctrinal, historical, chronological, or otherwise. The book is true; so it claims and so we claim for it. Not only is it truth but it is divine, in that it contains a revelation of God and his will to man. It is certainly of importance, then, to all mankind, and while the opposition is developing strength to destroy it there is need for a development of strength for its defense. God never leaves his children without means to defend and sustain his work; so with the Book of Mormon he has brought to light the evidences in many ways, which, if his children will gather them and place them around it, will form a defense that can not be broken down. The evidences that have been used to sustain the book in the past may not be sufficient for the future; hence our young men and young women have need to study faithfully the book with the evidences for and against, that they may do their part in the growing conflict when they shall have taken up the responsible burdens of life.

The individual benefits may be considered under the following topics:

TEACHINGS LEAD TO RIGHT LIVING

The moral and spiritual teachings of the Book of Mormon are such as to be commended to every person, regardless of age, profession, social standing, nationality, or other condition. Every virtue is taught by precept and exemplified in the lives of holy men whose history is recorded therein. Every vice is condemned in strong and definite language that all may understand. With the Bible it forms the strongest weapon against infidelity, deceptive creeds, and vain forms of worship. It confirms anew the saving power of the gospel of Jesus Christ and brings the promises thereof directly to men of the present.

What person would not be helped all through life by a careful study of these things during childhood and youth, applying those pure principles to the daily actions while the character is being formed which afterward grows into permanency? A pure character, with obedience to the gospel ordinances taught therein, brings a peaceful life here and celestial glory in the life beyond,—a benefit that surpasses all.

HELPS IN UNDERSTANDING BIBLE

The Bible teaches the gospel of Christ and is also an inspired record. It is evident at a moment's thought that those who profess to understand and teach that book do not understand it in fact. Thousands have made a life study of it and the principles taught therein, but, oh, how they have divided upon even the fundamental doctrines! The learned are arrayed against the learned, and there are many contentions over those doctrines. There are hundreds of different forms of belief, each supposed to be based upon the teachings of the Bible, and yet that book says "there is one faith." The wise and the learned being divided on what it teaches, how can the unlearned expect to understand?

The Book of Mormon comes confirming the present truthfulness of the Bible doctrines, calling both Jews and Gentiles to accept and obey them and prove for themselves that God is unchangeable and that the blessings promised may be realized even now. Many matters of history and of prophecy found in the Bible which are as enigmas are made plain by the revelations of the Book of Mormon.

SOLVES PROBLEMS OF AMERICA'S PAST

The question asked in the days of Columbus, "Who are the American Indians," has not been answered by the scientific researches of four hundred years, but with each new discovery the wonderment at America's past greatness is increased and the mystery of that ancient people is deepened. Men have spent their fortunes and their lives to unfold the past, with but small success. What has been unfolded, however, corroborates in every way the wonderful history of the two great civilizations on the American Continent as found in the Book of Mormon.

What young man or young woman is there that would not be glad to understand through this humble gift of God what the great and wise of earth are unable to understand by human power? What young historian or antiquarian or teacher or preacher would not be greatly benefited by a study of the book, even for its historical matter, if nothing more? The future defenders of the Book of Mormon will need to study along these lines, and all knowledge gleaned from within it will prove of great benefit to them.

HELPS UNDERSTANDING OF CONDITIONS OF TIMES

Many things pertaining to present and future conditions in America and also the rest of the world are pointed out in prophecy in the Book of Mormon. National affairs, the Monroe doctrine, social and religious conditions are referred to a considerable extent; also is pointed out the overruling providences of God in the preservation of the righteous and the destruction of the wicked.

Thus kings and rulers, statesmen, soldiers, and citizens would all be better prepared for their work by having a knowledge of these things, and the purposes of God concerning this land. Every young man and woman will be benefited and prepared to do their part better in the drama of life in the thrilling times in which they live by a careful study of the remarkable book, in which these things are pointed out in prophecy. If Maximilian had read the prophecy against kings upon this land, and heeded it, he would never have attempted to set up his throne in Mexico, and his life would have been saved. Our national safety is in a policy that harmonizes with the will of God; the Book of Mormon reveals that will.

GIVES BETTER APPRECIATION OF OUR COUNTRY

The God of heaven held America in reserve from the rest of the world until he saw fit to reveal it. He directed in its discovery and settlement, in its liberation from foreign oppression, in the setting up of this Republic under the banner of liberty, and in its preservation from foreign invasion—so the book teaches. A study of these things would cause every young person to love his country more, and to labor more earnestly for the sustaining of its integrity. A government which God helped to establish and in which his wisdom is manifested certainly invites our love and admiration, and the young man who learns from that sacred record that God was and is the God of this land will be better prepared to serve his country and his God than would otherwise be possible.

IN CONCLUSION

A constant study of the Book of Mormon and a practical application of its teachings in daily life will bring the young man or the young woman to a condition of purity and strength of character that will command the respect of all. They will become better citizens, better Saints, useful instruments in the hands of God to help carry out his designs; better in the home, in the church, in the world, everywhere; better in the kingdom of God.

Who would seek for the attainment of goodness and truth and virtue and holiness and all those pure qualities that emanate only from God and them who are his, and not be benefited by them? The pure principles of God are taught in that book—a sacred book—despised of the world because they despise the truth of God, but loved by the righteous who have been brought to regard it because of its truth and light. Opposition to it may increase, but let the young rally to its support; let them search the book and learn where it stands and gather together the outside evidences in its defense, and the same God who gave the book will give them power to meet the opposition victoriously. “All victory and glory is brought to pass unto you through your diligence, faithfulness, and prayers of faith.”—Doctrine and Covenants 100:7.

TRUE KNOWLEDGE

What is meant by true knowledge? Is there such a thing as false knowledge? True knowledge, indeed! What can I tell you about it when all down the ages philosophers and sages, sovereigns and scientists have sought for it and sought in vain? Have striven for it until they realized the utter inability of the weak, little, infinitesimal minds of men to grasp the almighty, infinite truth, and have given up in despair, saying like the great Greek philosopher that they knew nothing; or like the apostles looking forward to the time when they should know the truth and the truth should make them free, and they should be developed and taught by the great Teacher himself until, as Paul says to the Ephesian brethren: “We all come in the unity of faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ.”

What a comprehensive, omniscient, eternal subject! True knowledge! How gladly the sixteen-year-old student in the high school would seize on such a subject for his tri-weekly essay! I think I see him even now, as he proceeds with lofty brow and careful pen to elucidate and elaborate upon it. Filled with a consciousness of the vast learning he has acquired, and made strong and valiant by the idea of the absolute finality of the statements in the little two-by-four textbooks he lugs to school in a shawl strap each morning, how eagerly he proceeds to make worldly-wise and superlatively positive statements on “True knowledge,” and anon steals bodily whole sentences and paragraphs from Locke, and Milton, and Emerson, and from dictionary, and encyclopedia, and textbook. How true it is that fools rush in where angels fear to tread! Fools and angels! I must confess in all meekness and yet with hope that I am not of the latter class.

Young people as a class are positivists. This world seems very real to them. Their faith in their senses is strong. They are blissful in their ignorance. How many of you have heard a pupil at school say: "It is so, for the book says so," or how many of you have known a young school-teacher who thought he would lose his prestige with his school if by any chance one of his pupils found out that he did not know everything, could not solve every problem in the arithmetic, or answer any question that might be asked? Indeed, I remember one egotistic boaster who boldly proclaimed to his pupils his ability to answer any question they might ask. The high school student will boldly tell you that mathematics is the exact science, and the wise teacher forbears to shake his tender faith at this early period by solving before his eyes the algebraic proposition wherein one is proven equal to two.

The fact is all sciences are exact, necessarily must be, for true science is knowledge of God's works and laws, and as such is truth, or true knowledge. It is the theories of men in regard to those sciences that are at fault.

The young student passes sleepless nights in great anxiety when he first gets the idea that evolution and geology conflict with the Bible, but later on believes that the theory of evolution is a series of guesses each depending upon the others, some of which may be very good guesses, and some of which have been proven to be very bad guesses indeed. And geology is in about the same boat so far as that part of it that appears to conflict with the Bible is concerned. While many scientists have discovered many useful truths, yet they are still groping about like blind men in a fog, their finite minds being absolutely unable to drink of the great ocean of truth that permeates and surrounds them, except as the Infinite Being himself chooses to permit them. And right here may I be permitted to attempt a definition of true knowledge without being accused of rushing in where angels fear to tread? True knowledge may mean knowledge of the truth, and according to holy writ the word of God is truth; hence man can not hope to attain true knowledge by his unaided efforts, for Christ said to Peter: "Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven."

True knowledge, then, is revealed truth; and as such I believe it may not be confined to the department of religion alone, for I hold, in common with many others, that all true knowledge comes by revelation, either directly or indirectly; for is not God the creator and giver of all things, both seen and unseen, whether in the realm of the different arts and sciences or in religious affairs? And man is but trying to comprehend by the mental powers with which God has endowed him—is but trying to comprehend what God has instituted or revealed, whether in mathematics, or astronomy, or geology, or art, or literature, or mechanics.

They say the telephone was accidentally invented. Was it an accident, or was it a revelation?

When our ordinary physicians despair of a case they send for the noted men of their profession, and there they stop, and rare indeed is the instance when they think of appealing to the great Physician of all, who made them and the remedies they use, and endowed them with their limited faculties, and to whose great and supreme mind the secret diseases that baffle them are as an open book.

True knowledge; comprehension of the truth; things known to be true. One despairing philosopher says, "All our knowledge must ultimately rest on propositions unproved and unprovable." Socrates, the great Grecian philosopher, maintained that he knew nothing. Solomon, king of Israel, says in the Ecclesiastes: "All this have I proved by wisdom. I said I will be wise; but it was far from me. That which is afar off, and exceeding deep, who can find it out?"

And yet it will not do to become discouraged because man may know so little here below, but on the contrary it is proper for us to strive earnestly for the best gifts, and accept prayerfully and humbly the measure of true knowledge that is given us, until in that future glorified state the great Teacher shall discipline and educate us up to the attainment of his full stature and we shall be like him and know him as he is.

And again the king of Israel admonishes us, "How long, ye simple ones, will ye delight in simplicity? and the scorers delight in their scorning, and fools hate knowledge." "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." "Therefore, get wisdom; and with all thy getting get understanding." Therefore, whether our station be high or low let each do his best, for as Longfellow says in Prometheus:

Though to all may not be given
Strength for such sublime endeavor
Thus to scale the walls of heaven,
And to leaven with fiery leaven
All the hearts of men for ever,

Yet all bards whose hearts unblighted
Honor and believe the presage,
Hold aloft their torches lighted,
Gleaming through the realms benighted,
As they onward bear the message.

THE EFFICACY OF PRAYER

Efficacy means power to produce effects,—force, energy, ability. Do we want to find out how our prayers are to become effectual? We are told in the word of God that we are to be instant in prayer, and in another part of the word it is written, "Pray without ceasing." This does not mean that we are to shut ourselves up in our rooms all the time, or be on our knees in the attitude of prayer. Our Father knows that amid the very many duties of life we could not do this. But although not always in the act of prayer, we should ever be in the spirit of it.

In spite of the contempt often thrown upon it, we may believe prayer still remains the highest of agencies. It can still, as of old, bring down from opened heaven showers of blessings, and, if need be, scatter foes and remove mountains. In order to do this, however, there must be importuning, seeking, and knocking, as well as asking, and a patient, trustful waiting, whatever the delay.

"The method appointed for the attainment of blessing," says John Newton, "is the most simple imaginable. It is only 'ask and ye shall receive';" but then we are not going to give a runaway knock at wisdom's gate, but humbly and patiently wait until it is opened.

When we were children we were always told to say our prayers. I feel that that is the trouble with many people to-day, they say their prayers instead of praying. They do not know anything about the effectual, fervent prayer of the righteous, and so thereby miss many of the blessings which they might enjoy. Even we, who know and have seen the power there is in prayer—do we not often fail just here? Are we as earnest as we ought to be in these matters?

It is in the time of deep trial and trouble that we get close to God. It is at such times as these that the true prayers of God's children ascend to him. When we are in the sick-room and see our loved ones suffering, and know that nothing that we can do can give them relief, then our hearts go up in earnest, heartfelt prayers. It is then we forget all our surroundings, and our minds are centered on the Father, who can answer our prayers.

In these days much has been said and written about the place and power of prayer, and things that may or may not be presented at the throne of grace. Paul had no difficulties regarding this matter, but ever carried out to the full the blessed command, "Be careful for nothing; but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known to God." He prayed for things spiritual as few before or since have done; but, if needful, he prayed equally for things temporal: In sore hungering, he prayed for "food"; in perilous times, he prayed for safety; in bonds and imprisonment, he prayed for escape and liberty, and very markedly, too; in hindrances, he prayed for providential guidance. So it should be with us; but often we pray about things concerning which we have doubts, especially if we are not answered at once.

Nothing gives such efficacy to prayer as abiding intimacy with the Lord. When we are not in touch with him, prayer is usually a cold, burdensome, heartless task, in which there is neither faith nor expectancy; but when there is loving intimacy with God, prayer becomes sweetly natural, and has life and power in it. We always feel more or less restraint in the presence of strangers, and it is with difficulty we bring ourselves to ask any favor at their hands. With intimate friends, however, we have no such hesitancy or reserve, but feel as free and ready to ask a kindness as they are ready to grant it. It is just the same in the Christian experience. The nearer we come to God, and the more intimate our fellowship, the easier it is to pour out our hearts in fervent supplication. Further, such intimacy makes prayer wisely appropriate.

In daily life, there is a great deal of what the Scripture calls "asking amiss," and, in very mercy to the supplicant, asking of this kind is not followed by any receiving. Although a needful experience, this is often a very bitter one. Now, in such a case, abiding communion would be an effectual remedy; for by its very nature it tends to assimilate the will of the believer with the will of the Lord, and to control and wisely regulate the manifold desires of the heart, so that if we ask in accordance with the will of the Lord we shall receive the answer; for we are told in John 15: 7, "If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you."

Has not the church almost yet to learn what is the power of prayer? What conception have we of believing prayer before which mountains depart? What of persevering prayer which causes us to stand continually on the watch-tower? What of practical prayer which fulfills itself? Let such prayers be understood. Let our spirits but break with such longing, and the expectations of our hearts shall be fulfilled. So we will find that the influence of the Holy Spirit is the life of prayer.

The power to pray comes from God. The thoughts to which you give utterance in prayer are, when acceptable to the Lord, suggested by him. Therefore, ever seek his influence when you begin to pray. Another thought: If we want our prayers to become effectual we must learn to pray for others; we must not be selfish in our prayers. In interceding at the throne of grace for others, we will receive much blessing ourselves.

May each one of us know what it is to be in habitual converse with the Master at every time, and in every place. If we thus walk with Christ we will be more likely to walk in holiness through an evil world.

HANDICAP OF THE CIGARETTE

Cigarettes handicap in some way everyone who smokes them. It is a habit—with its attendant evils, the saloon and vice—that is sapping the mental and moral stamina of America's young men, gnawing at the very vitals of their physical well-being; more deadly in a way than intoxicating drink, because indulged in by much greater numbers, and because the cigarette habit, begun in boyhood, often sends the young man to the saloon later on to appease the abnormal appetite created by the cigarette.

Cigarette smoking is also increasing crime, making criminals and sending more of our boys to the police and juvenile courts than all other habits combined. It is impossible accurately to determine the exact influence of any one habit in leading to crime, but it is significant that the familiar yellow-stained fingers mark almost every boy on trial in our courts charged with crime. One city magistrate says: "Out of 300 boys brought before me charged with various crimes, 295 were cigarette smokers." The cigarette fiend is practically certain to become a young man who places a very low estimate on virtue.

Teachers all over the land recognize the cigarette as the school's deadliest foe, and confess without reservation that they find it practically impossible to educate a cigarette-smoking boy. In fact, a physician, a specialist, of country-wide reputation, puts cigarette smoking down as "one of the chief causes of insanity."

The arguments advocated by cigarette devotees defending their use are foundationless to anyone at all informed on the subject. Statements founded on physical reasons are absolutely baseless. Cigarette smoking does not aid digestion, nor do cigarettes preserve the teeth; they do not disinfect; the fact of the business is that tobacco is not a remedy for anything—unless it be the one thing vouched for by our friend, the late Mrs. Carrie Nation, when she said, "I never knew of but one good use that tobacco was put to, and that was to kill lice on cows."

Yet, strange as it may seem, Uncle Sam still does a rushing, ever-increasing tobacco business, as a study of "Uncle Sam's Tobacco Account" for the fiscal year 1913 will show. The figures given in the "account" have been compiled from reports given by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and Department of Commerce and Labor. The very magnitude of these figures stagger the mind.

These official reports tell us that we manufactured 693,384,529 pounds of tobacco (plug, twist, fine-cut, snuff, etc.), or 1,899,683 pounds per day.

Our cigar consumption was by far the greatest ever known in the history of the cigar business. We "smoked up" 8,887,301,900 cigars; that is to say, we burned out 24,348,772 cigars each day of the year,—an increase over the previous year of 1,397,302,000.

The largest increase, however, is noted in the case of cigarettes. Of these we consumed the amazing number of 14,530,486,200,—an increase of 2,186,633,708 over the previous "banner cigarette year." This means that we smoked 39,809,551 "coffin nails" each day. The money value of our 1913 cigarette crop was no less a sum than $72,781,626.

To take care of this rapid increase in the number of cigarettes consumed last year, a conservative estimate is that it must have required that at least 1,500, American boys fell victims to the devastating cigarette-smoking habit each day of the year. Not only so, but it is unquestionably true that the habit is annually sending to the saloons at least 100,000 (one in five) of these boys to keep up the grind of the "gin mills," to be turned into drunkards and bums, who will populate our jails, mistreat their wives, neglect their children and disgrace their homes and parents a few years hence. Doctor Dennis of Cornell Medical School says: "The tendency to beer drinking is greatly strengthened by cigarette smoking, because this habit becomes almost constant, causing a dryness of the throat and fauces, and hence irritating the throat."

We also produce 218,106,984 pounds of smoking tobacco; and for making cigarettes and cigars 196,807,761 additional pounds of tobacco was used,—so we had 414,914,745 pounds of "tobacco to burn" last year. The total value of this mountain of tobacco was the stupendous sum of $742,978,015; that is to say, each day in the year our American people, men renowned for their business acumen, destroyed by fire 1,136,752 pounds of tobacco, representing an expenditure of $2,035,556.

For manufactured tobacco we spent last year $651,540,771; to this we must add our cigar bill, amounting to $452,089,405, and then for cigarettes the debit would be $72,781,626,—thus you have Uncle Sam's total tobacco bill for the year amounting to $1,176,411,802, or $3,223,046 per day. On this business Uncle Sam collected his Internal Revenue toll of $76,789,424.75; an increase of $6,199,273.15 over the previous year. Surely there is some truth in the accusation: "We are fast becoming a nation of 'sots' and 'walking chimneys.'" . . .

But we have been dealing largely with money values and financial wastes in the paragraphs preceding. Let me call the attention of our fathers and mothers and Sunday-school teachers to another account, "The schoolboy and the cigarette," here shown, presenting a loss more precious than gold, and which any true parent will prize above all the dollars they may have stored away in bank safety deposit vaults, invested in stocks and bonds, or represented by houses and lands: the loss of the mental faculties, the physical make-up and the moral character of their sons—and daughters. Did you know that girls and young women now consume millions of cigarettes annually? . . .

Another unauthoritative statement prevalent among young men, as fallacious as it is prevalent, is that cigarette smoking, while injurious to boys, does not harm young men. This is not borne out by facts and investigation. . . .

These 201 college students were divided into three groups:

Habitual smokers, 41 students, 20.4 per cent.
Occasional smokers, 52 students, 25.9 per cent.
Nonsmokers, 108 students, 53.7 per cent.

Note that more than one half of the men who pursued their studies to the point of entering college were nonsmokers. (Nonsmokers enter college about one year younger than smokers).

Of the total college enrollment, 31 students were either dropped or required to take an extra year to complete the prescribed course of study. Of these 31 men:

The habitual smokers (20.4 per cent) supplied 16 students, or 51.6 per cent.
The occasional smokers (25.9 per cent) supplied 8 students, or 25.8 per cent.
The nonsmokers (52.7 per cent) supplied 7 students, or 22.6 per cent.

While the smokers constituted but 46.3 per cent of the student body, they supplied more than 77 per cent of the dull students of the institution. Many of them lost a year before entering college, and then required an extra year to complete the course. Smokers leave college about two years older than nonsmokers.

In this college 41 men were classed as athletes, as follows:

Habitual smokers, 9 men.
Occasional smokers, 15 men.
Nonsmokers, 17 men.

The smokers supplied 24 athletes in all, or 58 per cent of the athletes,—25.9 per cent of their enrollment. The nonsmokers furnished 17 men out of their enrollment of 108. While less than 16 per cent of the nonsmokers were athletes, yet they won nearly one half, or 41.9 per cent of all athletic honors.

Harvard University records show that for fifty years past not one tobacco user has stood at the head of his class, although five out of six (83 1-3 per cent) Harvard students use the weed.—C. W. Bains in The Sunday School Times:

HONESTY AND SUCCESS

During the forepart of May the writer had one of the most impressive lessons taught him, from the standpoint of higher morals in business, than had ever come to him.

This year the State University of Kansas, located at Lawrence, put on a three days' Merchants' Short Course. The faculty, or rather the lecturers, were men from widely scattered sections of the United States, the editor of the Journal being honored by being one of this company. The number of merchants attending was two hundred and sixty-six, covering all lines of trade.

But the remarkable thing, the thing that caused more comment than anything else, was the fact that practically every man on the teaching staff, that is on the program, spent a portion of his time emphasizing the value and importance of higher ideals in business.

Several of these lecturers stood before the audience of business men and university professors and openly declared themselves to be Christian men; but aside from these pronouncements, there was that strong upward tendency toward higher ideals.

This probably was all the more impressive to the writer for the reason that the Journal has for several years, in fact all during its history, stood for these things; but little did we expect to find, in such a place, such a marked tone of emphasis. Sometimes it has been thought that men talking on business subjects should not emphasize what, in the years gone by, has been termed the moral phase of life. Sometimes we have thought that such procedure might be embarrassing and misunderstood when expressed before a body of business men, but this short course has opened the eyes not only of the men who did the lecturing but of every merchant and business man and university professor who attended the sessions.

Reader, does this mean anything to you, does it pass over your head unheeded, or is it a hint that the merchant who to-day is not emphasizing these things in his own life is discounting himself, and is really out of harmony with the whole business tendency of our time?

Going further with this thought, we must, if we will open our minds, realize that this condition in a few years is going to mean the passage and enforcement of both state and national laws which will practically make it impossible for the dishonest man to stay in business.

Here is another suggestion in connection with this idea that is worth taking into consideration; every man on that program, and especially those who emphasized more forcibly than others the question of higher ideals and absolute honesty in business, were successful business men. One of them, an Irishman by birth, in fact he served his apprenticeship as a clerk in England and has only been in this country for about seven years, but to-day is at the head of one of the large wholesale dry goods houses, very forcibly, and earnestly, urged the merchants attending the short course to the thought that honesty and uprightness of living were the powers and forces which would rule the business world in the future.

In every walk of life in this day we are learning that the condition of a man's mind makes him what he is. We are learning the lesson that we emphasized on this page three or four months back, the lesson taught by Solomon, which goes something like this, that "as a man thinketh in his heart so is he." And right there is the basis, the foundation, the value of this emphasizing of a higher and better life among business men. For it is impossible for any man in business, merchant, manufacturer, traveling man or whoever he might be, to be continually emphasizing these things in his own life and fail to be a stronger man because of it. Such a man becomes a leader, and stands out above all others in his local community. He is recognized as a leader, and the very principles underlying his own life develop in him that strength of character which makes him a leader of men. And this is the reason why the merchant who practices these principles in his life becomes a leader. It is a perfectly natural development. Any other development would be out of harmony with every law that influences our lives.

To the merchant who yet feels that it is all right to be a little "tricky," and to take a little advantage of the other fellow, we want to say to him that he is on the wrong track, and is developing within his inner self that which sooner or later will tear him down. People of your community know you, and many times they know you better than you know yourself.—Merchants Trade Journal, vol. 15, no. 6, 1914.

LODGE SAYS DEAD SPEAK

Sir Oliver Lodge, president of the Society for Psychical Research, in a lecture delivered in England, November 22, expressed his conviction of a future existence, and stated that he had conversed with departed friends. In the course of the address, Sir Oliver said that once one realized that consciousness was something outside of the mechanism it made use of it, he realized that survival of existence was naturally the simplest thing. He said that it was unreasonable that souls should pass out of existence when the body was destroyed, and added:

Communication is possible. One must obey the laws and find out the conditions. I do not say it is easy, but I do say it is possible, and I have conversed with them as I could converse with anyone in this audience.

Now, being scientific men, they have given proof that it is real, not an impersonation, not something emanating from myself. They have given definite proofs. Some of them are being published. Many are being withheld for a time, but will be published later.

I tell you that it is so with all the strength of conviction I can muster—that it is so; that we do persist; that people still take an interest in things going on; that they still help us and know more about the things than we do, and that they are able from time to time to communicate with us.

I know that man is surrounded by other intelligences. If you once step beyond man there is no limit until you come to the Infinite Intelligence himself. Once having gone beyond man you go on and must go on until you come to God.

But it is no strange land to which I am leading you. The cosmos is one. We here on this planet are limited in certain ways and are blind to much that is going on, but I tell you that we are surrounded by beings, working with us, cooperating and helping, such as people in visions have had some perception of and such as religion tells us saints and angels are.

That the Master himself is helping us is, I believe, literally true.

Mothers' Home Column

Right and Wrong Punishment

The following paper written on the above subject was obtained by us and we believe the subject and the way it is treated will interest the readers of this Column. The paper was written as a basis for discussion at a meeting of mothers, held under the sponsorship of the teacher of the kindergarten department in public school.

PUNISHMENT DEFINED

Punishment is defined as any pain, suffering, or loss inflicted on or suffered by a person because of a crime or evil-doing or wrongdoing. For violation of any of our laws there is a punishment prescribed or implied. This punishment may be of various kinds and degrees, according to the wrong. No one punishment will do for all kinds of errors, for the purpose is to right the wrong and perfect the individual, and not revenge by those in authority.

HOME STANDARDS

In our homes we may not have written laws and punishments for violation thereof, but we do have certain standards of right and wrong, and we are to be the judges as to whether they are lived up to or not. We may not always know it without taking thought concerning this standard, but nevertheless we do have them, and by them we judge our children and others. We must have them in mind well enough to realize what they are and raise them at any time we find they are not high enough.

KEEP UP IDEALS

In our home life we should be very careful of our ideals. We should not allow ourselves or our children to believe that certain conduct is right, while in reality it destroys self-confidence and self-respect. It requires a constant effort to keep the high ideals before the minds of the children that they may know what you consider right and wrong. You may punish your child for doing certain things that you think are wrong according to your way of thinking, while another would overlook the same offense because she considered it only as a matter of course. Another might punish, and you allow to go free. It depends largely on the ideal you have in mind.

JUDGING OUR CHILDREN

We ought not only to have an ideal or standard in building the characters of our children, but we ought also to have it so definitely in mind that we can judge offhand, on the impulse of the moment, whether the child has broken any of our unwritten rules or not. Children are active and move quickly, and we must do likewise.

A child seldom fully understands these ideals of ours until they have grown into them. He acts on his own impulses and we have to determine the right and the wrong and show him the difference. While he is very young, we decide for the child, but we should always aim to do so in such a way that he will learn the reasonableness of it and soon judge for himself as he has seen you do.

SELF-PUNISHMENT

The child should early learn for himself that wrongs largely bring their own punishment. Elizabeth Harrison says in her book, A Study of Child Nature: "That the child should early learn that 'the way of the transgressor is hard' is an important part of his education."

In other words, those who persistently do wrong must consistently suffer for it, and the child should early learn that he is no exception to the well-known rule. As we sow, so also shall we reap. It is a calamity to the child to think that because of certain favorable conditions in his life that he may escape what he knows others would suffer for.

SHALL WE COMPEL OBEDIENCE?

There are times in about every family where children are found when there will be clashes between the judgment of the parent and the child as to whether certain rules have been broken. The parent has the power to arbitrarily decide and compel obedience to her will. She may make her will supreme and disregard the ideas or desires of the child, but this would be wrong as a rule, for it would make slaves of our children to do this, and we do not want slaves; we want equals. We expect to rear men and women who are better than we are.

Over two hundred years ago, John Locke wrote: "Such a sort of slavish discipline makes a slavish temper. The child submits, and dissembles obedience, whilst the fear of the rod hangs over him; but when that is removed, and by being out of sight, he can promise himself impunity, he gives the greater scope to his natural inclinations, which by this way is not at all altered, but, on the contrary, heightened and increased in him; after such restraint, breaks out usually with the more violence."

CALM JUSTICE IN PUNISHMENT

We should punish for wrongdoing, but be able to distinguish between the right and the wrong way. No matter what the offense nor under what condition, we are expected to be cool-headed and clear-brained and be able to keep in mind what the result of our conduct shall be.

If we punish our child because we are angry with him, our judgment may not be good. We lose control over ourselves and may lose control over the child at the same time. The child will soon come to realize that we are unjustly meting out punishment and will cease to have respect for us as one who knows how to decide these things for him. He will lose faith even in our good intentions.

It is best to avoid the use of arbitrary punishments but rather use the retributive form when possible. In other words, let the righting of the wrong be its own punishment.

For instance, should my boy willfully overturn the toothpick holder just before he had expected to run outdoors and engage in other play, it would be better to require that he replace each one in the holder than to send him into a dark room while we did it ourselves. He would likely see no relation of the punishment to the misdeed should we pursue the former course. The mere act of replacing makes a strong impression of the right and wrong; much stronger than could be obtained in any other way.

WRONG METHODS

We should vary our punishments according to the degree of the offense, thus teaching the child the relative importance of things.

The habit indulged in by many parents of frightening their children into obedience by saying that they will be put into the dark, or that a dog will bite them, or that their fingers will be cut off by the butcher man, or that the marshal or policeman will carry them off to jail, are unqualifiedly wrong. Whether an attempt is made to carry any of these into effect or not, they can but have ill effect on the disposition of the child and increase nervousness, sleeplessness and lack of self-control and can not do good in any way.

NATURE'S METHOD

If we keep nature's method in mind in dealing out justice to our children, it would perhaps be much more effective. As it is nicely illustrated by Elizabeth Harrison, we quote:

"A little one puts his hand upon the hot stove; no whirlwind from without rushes in and pushes the hand away from the stove, then with loud and vengeful blasts scolds him for his heedlessness or wrongdoing. He simply is burned—the natural consequences of his own deed; and the fire quietly glows on regardless of the pain which he is suffering. If again he transgresses the law, again he is burned as quietly as before with no expostulation, threat or warning. He quickly learns the lesson and avoids the fire thereafter, bearing no grudge against it."

This is always nature's method; the deed brings its own results, and nowhere is arbitrary, unconnected punishment inflicted. Some of God's punishments are public and some are private, just as ours should be. We would resent as unjust a public punishment for a mere private wrong, and on the same grounds we should not punish one child before another when it is possible to avoid it.

DECIDE OUR OWN DETAILS

As to various details of punishment we can not dwell at length here. Some may ask: Shall I inflict mental punishment, physical pain, use the ruler, isolate the child, use the white sheet with black marks for serious wrongs, or any of dozens of other ways that mothers punish their children? We could not properly decide these things for you, not knowing your child. There are right and wrong punishments and we should be willing to give some of our time to deciding our course in this important feature of child training.

There are some things that we would not do under any circumstances. We would never deprive a child of his meals nor unduly expose him to the elements to punish him. We would never frighten him intentionally. He should not be kept from school as a punishment. And we would avoid violent scolding.

Prayer Union

SUBJECTS FOR THE THIRD THURSDAY IN DECEMBER

For missions and missionaries in all places; especially remember the mission at Jerusalem in the present dangerous and trying times, that those who have been sent there shall be protected, and that God will prosper their work that they may be successful in winning many to Christ and the islands of the sea. Pray, too, for the war-torn countries of Europe.

Lesson, Doctrine and Covenants 85: 20-24. Memory verse, Habakkuk 3: 2.

REQUEST FOR PRAYERS

Sister S. T. Burgess, of Huntington Beach, California, asks prayers for her son that he may receive his sight. One eye is blind and he can only see a little out of the other. His wife died, leaving him with five children to care for. Though not a member of the church he requested that his name be sent to the Prayer Union. He lives near Renfrow, Oklahoma.

Sister Sadie Burch, of Ute, Iowa, requests the Saints to pray on December 20 for her sister, Sister S. I. Willett, of Iowa. This sister is almost blind and suffers excruciating pain from granulated eyelids and other bodily ailments. Her great desire is to become a scholar, but in the condition of her eyes she can not even read the church papers. To be able to read would afford her much comfort. May she be remembered.

Question of Separate Meetings

BY A COLORED BROTHER

"Come now and let us reason together, saith the Lord."—Isaiah 1: 18.

I see no need for a change. I am not antagonistic to either white or colored people, nor any religious sect. But the Bible is against all counterfeit and craft of the Devil's choicest. I see no need of a religious quarrel about white people and colored people meeting together in the same church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints; for there is but one church, as you will see in Matthew 16: 13 to last of chapter, and James 2: 1-10, 1 Corinthians 12: 12-28. All Saints' eyes ought to be "single to the glory of God," that their whole bodies "may be full of light," and not their eyes be full of evil and great darkness. (Matthew 6: 22, 23; Acts 10: 33, 34, 35, 36; Ephesians 2: 13-22.) Also see 1 Corinthians 12: 11-25, which says that there should be no schism in the body, but the same care one for another, verses 26-29.

Now the question, so-called "a perplexing one," is not a colored man's question, but a question of a white man? Now my experience of many years has suggested that the colored people ought to have had churches of their own from the beginning, and be organized into a body by the First Presidency and the Twelve, and that the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints should have sent from General Conference, white elders among the colored American people as well as sending white elders among the black colored people on the islands on the other side of the seas; but we have always been neglected until this hour, from 1830 up to 1914, and it can't be denied.

Now the outcry is, "What shall we do with the negro race as members in the white people's churches, prejudice existing between the white and black?" Is that the teachings of the Lord Jesus Christ? If so, show the writer in the New Testament. (Matthew 16: 17-19; Ephesians 3: 21.) Now my opinion is that the white Latter Day Saints of themselves don't want the colored people in the church and not God; and that is why prejudice exists in the church, with schism in the body.

Now of separate meetings for the colored people: At this late hour if this is God's plan, then our mother church should lay the foundation. According to the grace of God which was given unto me, from the beginning, as a wise master builder, the white men have laid the foundation, I have builded thereupon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon, for other foundation can no man build upon but the foundation church built by Jesus Christ; and I thank God I am in the right one, for every man's work shall be made manifest, for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire. And the fire shall try every man's work, of what sort it is, for he, the Christ, taketh the wise in their own craftiness.

Therefore, let no man glory in man, for he might be like the heath in the desert, not see when good cometh. That was the way of Brigham Young's latter-day apostasy. He inhabited the parched places in the wilderness, in a salt land not inhabited. Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord and whose hope the Lord is. So mark the perfect man and behold the upright; for the end of that man's peace. Peace is what we want in the church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

I have this much to say on the "white man's question" which is here raised, a "perplexing one, involving as it does, racial prejudices existing between white and black." Do away with respect of persons, and take Brother James for our guide, chapter 2: 1-10. "My brethren, have not the faith of our Lord of glory with respect of persons." But ye have despised the poor black people, and have oppressed them in the church, and have no difficulty with them, and put them in the gallery during preaching services, and in a corner to themselves during sacrament service, and use separate glasses to serve the wine. Please tell me how God or Christ could bless the bread and wine? Objection is urged to mixing colored with the whites, "and because of this a number of the sisters refused to partake of the sacrament." Let the sisters, if you please, read James 2: 1-10, then Acts 10. "God showed me that I should not call any man common or unclean." The Saints must think the colored woman and man common and unclean. Same chapter verse 28, and 22 to 27. All the chapter is very good to read, and also John 10: 1-5. Don't use the "Negro race," for there is no such name in the Holy Bible.

In Africa the white man found the black man living in the Negro country, and brought him and made slaves out of the black race, male and female. So I don't go about carrying a coon by the shoulders. My name is George H. Graves, and I am not a country. Look out for the intelligent and wise colored women and men who may read those three letters in HERALD of October 7, 1914, for they will recognize the fact that on account of prejudice against colored persons associating with the whites we need separate meetings for colored people, churches, and missions.

I think it will make it much better for both classes of people with a colored minister. But what will the white elders do with the colored people that they convert in colored churches? will they send for the colored minister to baptize them? And when I convert white people shall I send for white missionaries in the field to come and baptize the whites? We are at all times a good way apart. It will put the church to a good deal more expense to send both white and colored to and fro from state to state oftentimes to baptize one man or woman, and, money is the root of all evil; we ministers would have to have plenty of that root.

Now I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no division among you; but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment. Though I speak with the tongues of man and of angels, and have not charity, I have become as a sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. My sisters and brethren have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory with respect of persons.

So you can now readily see, brethren and sisters, prejudices that exist between the white and black must be forced out of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, that there be no degree of darkness left in the church, for the light of the body is the eye; and if therefore thine eye be single thy whole body shall be full of light, and if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness; for no man can serve two masters: ye can not serve God and mammon. In the church are you all the seed of Abraham? So am I. Are you the ministers of Christ? So am I. So let all Saints work together with one another; and if not so we would become false and deceitful workers, transforming ourselves into ministers and Saints of Christ. We remember that Satan himself was transformed from an angel of light. So, sisters and brethren, take heed unto yourself, and unto the doctrine, and continue therein. In doing so you shall save thyself and them that serve thee.

My kind regards to all Saints, and peace and good will to all, and no ill will to anyone.

ELDER GEORGE H. GRAVES.

KALAMAZOO, MICHIGAN, 524 East North Street.

FANSHAW, OKLAHOMA, November 8, 1914.

Editors Herald: Our branch is moving along slowly. Brother J. W. Dubose went to Poteau, Oklahoma, October 27, and began preaching on the streets. The gospel restored as taught by Paul and Silas was new and strange to the people. They began to say to themselves, "Who is this man, and where is he from?" By invitation he preached a few times in the courthouse, returning to the streets. While preaching on the apostasy, a man rushed at him and gave him a shaking, but this gave Brother Dubose more friends and prestige. The Baptist people, through their deacon, offered him the keys to their church building. Here he continued the presentation of the truths of the gospel until seventeen were added to the church, same being enrolled with the branch at Fanshaw. Elder E. A. Irwin came to assist about the third week of this grand meeting.

Brother Dubose was visiting relatives at Poteau with the consent of the minister in charge, and while on this visit was led to preach on the streets with the above results. His meetings were brought to a close Sunday night, November 1. He went from here to Grannis, Arkansas, leaving a crowded house and much interest.

We believe that some of our able missionaries should follow up this work at Poteau at once. It has heretofore been difficult to open up the work at this place. It is the county seat of Le Flore County, and an important point. Brother Dubose was blessed here with great liberty and spoke as one having authority. He was remembered in a temporal way by Saints and friends. Brethren B. A. Gass and O. N. Brannon assisted in the meetings here; quite a number of our membership also aiding in the same, which added stimulus to the work. The writer was also in attendance.

In bonds,

J. H. LEWIS.

MARLETTE, MICHIGAN, November 9, 1914.

Editors Herald: I feel to rejoice in this latter-day work. I am superintendent of a small Sunday school. We have a few interested. Brother Guy of Shabbona has been preaching for us. Sunday evening, November 8, Brother Arthur Allen delivered a sermon here. We greatly enjoyed this preaching.

Our Sunday school is composed largely of children of those outside of the church. Our collection being small, we have not been able to secure the Sunday school papers. If any have back numbers of these papers, or reading suitable for young children, we could use same to advantage.

I feel like doing all I can for the Master, who has done so much for me among earth's children. I have great love for the young. If they could only realize that some day this great work would rest on their shoulders, how earnest and careful they would be.

Ever praying for the welfare of the work, I am,

Your sister in the faith,

Route 5.

MRS. E. J. MAXWELL.

HORNINGS MILLS, ONTARIO, November 9, 1914.

Editors Herald: In my letter of August 26, 1914, published in HERALD of September 23, 1914, first paragraph should have read, After an absence of about four years, instead of an absence of two years, and that the church was closed at Manitowaning for preaching service for lack of interest. Third paragraph, last two lines, should have read, Brother Gordon has held the office of trustee and councilor for years, and M. R. Brown is a young man of a very fine family, and if humble and faithful will be heard from.

Respectfully yours,

Route 1.

G. C. TOMLINSON.

HOUGHTON LAKE, MICHIGAN.

Editors Herald: For eleven years I was a member of the Butman, Michigan, Branch. I am now a member of the Houghton Lake, Michigan, Branch, which was organized ten months ago, December 18, 1913. Although some are weak for want of knowledge of this great work, we are doing well considering the experience had. Our officers are all new to the work.

Two years ago I asked through the HERALD for some one to come and preach to the people of this place. I had felt that some would receive the gospel. I had spent much effort in fasting and prayer. In answer to my request and prayers, Elder S. G. Pendleton of Beaverton, Michigan, was sent to us. He has done a good work here, as in other places. Brother Pendleton came here March 26, 1913. At this time my husband, myself, and five others were all the Saints there were near here. Our branch numbers now about fifty members. We have a full list of officers, all ordained recently.

We are poor in this world's goods. Many have sacrificed to help the work. We bought a schoolhouse for a church. It will make a good church when finished, but we had to move it a long way. We owe some yet on the building and lot. With the assistance of other sisters we have raised about twenty dollars to apply on the building. We have a fine lot.

We wish to furnish the names and addresses of some of the Saints who have moved from here, who are lonely for the companionship of those of kindred faith, and who would like to know if there are any Saints near them, and where they might find the nearest branch.

Goldie Ballard, Delta, Ohio, desires some of the Saints of Toledo to write to her, stating where she might find them and where she might find the church; she is often in the city. Clara Brooks, 589 Woorow Avenue, Detroit, Michigan, and Florence N. Libey of Dowagiac, Michigan, route 3, would like to hear from the Saints. The latter is the invalid to whom many of the Saints sent reading matter, cards and letters, three or four years ago, and who was later baptized. She thinks that she is the only Saint in the community where she lives. She is very lonely and would appreciate a letter or a visit. How often are our isolated ones left in want of spiritual food, and how often we lose faith in the weak, and forget that they are our Father's children as much as we are, and that they must be led and dealt with in kindness and love.

If more Saints understood the principle of fasting, better results would follow their efforts in this connection. We find many who have been in the church for years, but who do not understand what it means to fast. They only refrain from such food as bread and meat, and at the same time eat fruit, nuts, candy, etc. Others refrain from all foods and drink all the water they want. Some fast because others of the church do, without understanding the motive therefor. A fast entered upon with a better understanding would bring better results.

We wish the Saints to remember our little branch, to pray that God will prosper us, and that much good may go out from this people. I love this work beyond power to express; it is more than life to me. Great joy, peace, and comfort has come to me since I received my patriarchal blessing. In this blessing I am commanded to do the very things that others have condemned me for endeavoring to do. I feel that God is pleased with my work, even if man is not. I ask that all the Saints will pray for me that my eyes may gain their sight. I do not ask for the sight of youth, but I ask for a blessing in keeping with my years. I will be fifty-one years old December 22.

Your sister,

MRS. A. B. HAWLEY.

BOONE, IOWA, November 16, 1914.

Editors Herald: I came into the church nineteen years ago last September. I have never forgotten my first experience with the Saints. It was at Kewanee, Illinois, that I met them first. About one hour after arriving in that city, I was walking along the street when I came to a church building. Something called my attention to this building. It was not a magnificent stone structure with marble front and great spires reaching heavenward. It was only a little frame building. I stopped to look at it and wondered what people worshiped there. Little did I think it was God's people. Something, I can not say what, called my attention to this building. There was something peculiar about it.

In a short time I had learned that the Latter Day Saints, of whom I had never heard, worshiped there. And when my good Methodist brothers and sisters learned that I had attended one of the Saints' meetings, I heard everything mean that could be said about Joseph Smith and the Saints in his day.

One of the first houses I went into in Kewanee was that of Sister Rachel Palmer. Her husband was not in the church at that time. They were keeping boarders and I went there to board. A young Sister Jemima Burch was working for Sister Palmer. One day a Methodist lady came to the house. As Sister Palmer and Burch, like all good Latter Day Saints, were ready for any opportunity to talk with reference to the Scriptures. They and this lady entered into a discussion which was strange and new to me. I had heard nothing like it before. I was attentive to what they had to say, and when the Methodist lady withdrew, although I had taken no part in their former discussion, they turned their guns on me.

The Lord was with them and they gave me several scriptural references and invited me to attend their church. I accepted the invitation and next Sunday morning was there. This happened to be the sacrament meeting. I shall never forget the influence that came over me. I did not understand at the time what it was, but I had a desire to go to their church again. I then became acquainted with some of the brethren, and they, like Acquilla and Priscilla of olden time, began to expound unto me the way to God more perfectly. In about a month I was baptized. I shall never forget the feeling that came over me on my way home. I felt that so far I had done God's will, and I was anxious to learn more. I thought myself the happiest man on earth; and why should I not be happy? I had found the pearl of great price.

While I have been away from the Kewanee Branch for many years, many times I have thought of my early experience there and have felt to thank God for the interest the dear brothers and sisters took in teaching me the plan of salvation more fully. Dear Saints, this is the greatest and noblest work on earth. The more I read concerning it the more I can see it is God's work. I love to tell the angel's message to all who are willing to listen. For the past three years we have been making especial effort to get the gospel before the people.

Three years ago Brethren J. F. Mintun and M. M. Turpen were here for six weeks with the district tent. Two years ago Brethren J. L. Parker and D. J. Williams were here five weeks, and last summer Brother E. E. Long was here for the same length of time. They all did a good work, several were baptized and many interested. Brother J. S. Roth is here at present preaching to a crowded house every night.

Some are coming a long distance to hear, who have never been to hear any of our ministers before. Some are becoming stirred up. The Free Methodists challenged us for a debate. When I learned of this, in company with Elders Henry Pratt and J. L. Parker, we called on the minister with propositions and he signed them, and we are going to give the people something that they have not had since the McDowell-Pegg debate about thirty years ago.

We have a movement on foot to build a large church, and to show how the Saints stand in the estimation of the people, some outsiders here, including infidels, have offered to assist us in building. That God may bless his people and that we may ever be true to our covenant is the prayer of,

Your brother in Christ,

CLEMENT MALCOR.

LOGAN, IOWA, November 12, 1914.

Editors Herald: We always enjoy reading the letters in the HERALD and feel that we receive as much benefit and strength from them as we do the other writings. We appreciate the desires expressed in these letters, as well as thankfulness for the goodness of God.

The Spirit of God has been with us the past few months. God has answered our prayers and blessed us in every way that has been for our good, both temporally and physically. We have often asked ourselves why God did not answer some of our prayers, and now we know it was because we had gone contrary to his will, not because of a desire to do so, but because of being in the dark, not striving hard enough to come to the light. It is often by our own neglect that we do not receive more blessings, and again oftentimes we are blessed in ways we do not realize at the time. We need your prayers in the performance of our spiritual and temporal duties.

I desire that you will especially remember us in our Religio work, that the officers and teachers may be able to be of benefit to the membership and make our Religio like unto a magnet, that it may draw and hold. We feel our weakness, and if it were not for the ever present help of the Father we would fail utterly in accomplishing that which seems to have been placed in our hands to do.

Our desires and prayers are that we may ever be helpful in the service of the Lord, and keep ourselves pure and acceptable before him, that by our example we may lead others to the light, and in the end be with those who will receive a crown of eternal life. So we ever endeavor to press "Onward and upward."

Your sister,

OLLIE DERRY.

CALDWELL, TEXAS, November 12, 1914.

Editors Herald: On last Friday a gentleman from an adjoining county called on me, and requested me to baptize him on the following Saturday, which I did, and confirmed him the following night at our church. I also preached to quite a crowd who seemed to be very much interested in the sermon. They pronounced it a real gospel sermon with the right ring.

The gentleman baptized was an old acquaintance, one who married several years ago a nice lady and a member of the church. At the time they were married he had been a member of the Baptist Church for several years: He has a nice family, a wife and three children, two boys and one girl. His wife went on her way rejoicing after her husband was baptized and confirmed a member of the church. The branch of the church at this place has a Sunday school, and preaching occasionally.

SAINT CLAIR, MICHIGAN, December 1, 1914.

"Thy neighbor, it is he whom thou hast power to aid and bless."

The other day there sailed from New York City the Jason, a naval collier, laden as ship was never laden before, with many thousands of dollars in Christmas packages for the women and little children of war-torn Europe. These packages were rushed to New York from every nook and corner of this great union, from north and south, east and west. Washington sent thousands of dollars worth of warm clothing; New York put about ten thousand dollars aboard; the school children of Austin, Texas, sent in a collection of seventy-three dollars. The great sympathetic American heart, ever warm to the suffering of humanity and ever ready to respond, has been touched by the sufferings of thousands upon thousands of little children who are cold, hungering, homeless, and orphaned by the war in Europe.

The unselfish spirit of noble sacrifice shown by a little girl is said to have been the beginning of this expression of generosity. Natalie Hammond, daughter of John Hayes Hammond, of Washington, touched by the stories of disaster in Europe, said to her mother, "Mamma, I am so sorry for the poor little children in Europe. I am afraid they won't have any Christmas. How much would you be likely to spend on my Christmas?"

The mother thought a moment and replied, "About twenty-five dollars."

"Then let me have the twenty-five dollars," said little

Natalie. "I want to give up my Christmas for the poor little children in Europe."

And so the mighty ship was loaded with six million gifts bound for Europe. When the Jason left the pier, there floated from her mast with the stars and stripes a large white pennant with the single word inasmuch.

This is the true spirit of the gospel—the spirit of unselfish love, ready to sacrifice and anxious to help those in trouble—a noble, gentle spirit, forgetting self and reaching out its arms of sympathy and love to the sorrowful and downcast. None are so neglected as those outside the pale of this help. There are no barriers it can not climb. It knows no creed, recognizes no class; to be trodden in the dust is a sure passport to its notice.

Can we not do as well as little Natalie this Christmas? How many will be willing to give up their Christmas for the poor? Is this asking too much? Can we say we love the gospel if we steel our hearts and close our purses as soon as mention is made of the needs of the poor? Can we not give up one Christmas and its gayeties and make the Bishop's heart rejoice and ourselves feel that pure joy which comes from giving? We have our Children's Home, our Christmas Offering, and other institutions. Shall they be allowed to need and suffer while we spend extravagantly?

Will those who have been blessed with prosperity not share a portion with those who are in need of the barest necessities this Christmas? The church has about seventy-five thousand members. If each member were to donate even five cents it would total near four thousand dollars to put in the Christmas stocking of our little ones at the Children's Home.

It is not heartlessness but thoughtlessness that makes us neglectful of these responsibilities. The word of the Lord to his people is that both in private and in public expenditures they shall carry into active exercise the principles of sacrifice and of repression of unnecessary wants. This sentiment is found in a statement in the SAINTS' HERALD for November 25, as follows: "There are Saints at home and abroad who are feeling keenly the pressure of the times. There are conditions which cry for relief and none can give if individual Saints do not do their part."

The handwriting on the wall plainly indicates the signs of the times.

Let us heed the warning now.

MRS. A. MCKENZIE.

WEIR, KANSAS, November 14, 1914.

Editors Herald: Several of our local brethren are doing what they can to instruct, exhort, and invite all to come to Christ. Last evening we met with the Religio for a program and light refreshments. A good peaceful spirit prevailed, and the desire to remain true to the motto "Onward and upward" was evidenced.

A few weeks ago a Brother Carson, a colored brother, came here from Shawnee, Kansas, and held a few services in the interests of his race residing here. Some of the white Saints attended to assist in opening the services and in singing. We were pleased to note the logical way this brother handled the word of the Lord, bringing in his own personal testimony. He showed that it was eternal life to know God, the Scriptures, and proved that God was not what we have been traditioned to believe he is, that he is not without body, parts or passions. Following along various gospel lines, our brother was abundantly able to teach the truth as restored. He informed the people that he labored with his own hands for a livelihood, and that he hoped to be able some day to preach every day in the week. He is a railroad man and travels on a pass. We trust that he may be encouraged and that the Lord may bless him and keep him humble and faithful.

In reading the many grand articles in the HERALD and Ensign, for instance those of Brother R. W. Farrell, and S. S. Smith, and the host of others, including writings of our beloved President, we note how the blessed gospel is brought into the mind and touches the soul until it reflects the image of its maker. This is an incentive to us to strive on unto perfection, until we shall be fit subjects for the celestial kingdom.

In gospel bonds,
SISTER H. A. CRAWLEY.

LIVERPOOL, WEST VIRGINIA, November 16, 1914.

Editors Herald: God still has a few Saints here who are trying to serve him in their scattered condition. The Buffalo City Branch, has become disorganized. The love of some has waxed cold, others have died, and still others have moved away. An elder drops in now and then, gives us a few sermons and baptizes a few.

We had with us last winter Brother A. V. Closson, who stayed two weeks and baptized three. He made a good impression among some, also causing the heathen to rage. He holds a warm place in our hearts. We have also had some good preaching from Brethren Samuel Brown and J. M. Stubbart, who are held in fond remembrance by the Saints. Last but not least we are enjoying the presence of Brother F. M. Jeffries every four weeks. He is strengthening the Saints and encouraging them to live their religion. Our Brother Jeffries is developing into a very good speaker, and holds the respect of the people, both Saints and sinners.

This latter-day work will bear investigation. The more one examines it the more is he convinced it is of God; and it surely is of God, for it has all the marks of divinity when viewed in the light of truth.

Pray for us. Your brother in the one faith,
W. H. HICKMAN.

Ontario, Canada

The conference at Saint Thomas, October 9 to 11, with auxiliaries, conventions, etc., was splendid in detail. The attendance was so large the church building on Balaclava Street would not accommodate us. The proprietor of Princess Theater placed his building at the disposal of the conference, gratis. The afternoon and evening services were held in the theater. The Spirit of the services was elevating. Business moved off in a business way. Two were baptized and one ordained. The president of Saint Thomas Branch was elected president of the district. His assistants were elected by conference, and Brother Philippin was sustained as secretary of the district.

After this district gathering, we moved along up to London and conducted a series of meetings, preaching nine sermons to some very large audiences. I made my home with Brother and Sister Richardson, whose kindness will ever linger in memory. The London Saints need no commendation from my pen; they are a kind, considerate class of Saints. Anxiety appears on many faces, as thousands crowd around the bulletin boards to learn what they can of the conflict on European soil that has called Canada's gallant sons to the defense of the mother country. The Government at Ottawa announces that one hundred and eight thousand will be the quota of men furnished by the Dominion for the front.

October 25, we met with the Chatham Saints in anniversary services. The program was followed to the letter: Prayer services at 9 a. m., preaching at 11 a. m., 2 and 7 p. m. Am not able to say what the president, Elder Lamont, has against me, but I was the speaker three times on Sunday, and each evening during the week up to and including Friday evening. The anniversary services were largely attended. Here at Chatham is a good branch of Saints, under the energetic presidency of Elder Lamont, who will not permit an elder to be in the city two minutes without knowing it and getting the telephone lines to humming, and the printers to sit up and take notice. Blessings attend the busy bee!

At this anniversary, Sister Scott and baby Ellen, met us in a much enjoyed service—many such to which she is entitled—the London Saints paying her fare both ways. We tarried at the home of Brother and Sister Hildreth, and we do not forget their unstinted kindness and hospitality.

November 8, we met a prearranged service in the Grange Hall at Girard. A fine, elderly, attentive congregation was present to hear the prophecies of latter-day events, and particularly on the eastern question. We were repeatedly urged to return.

November 15, attended anniversary services of Windsor Branch. A Scotch mist rendered the atmosphere dense and gloomy, but the attendance was fair. District President Snobelen preached at 11 a. m., Patriarch Shields, at 2 p. m., and your correspondent at 7 p. m. (central time). The influences of the Holy Spirit were very effective at the seven o'clock prayer service, and our heavenly Father was very near his children—manifested by blessing. We were announced to lecture on Monday evening on the "war question from prophecy," at 8 o'clock (eastern time). A supper was served in basement from six to eight. A very large crowd attended. The committee reported "profitably" as to supper, lecture free. We occupied Tuesday evening, we believe, to the mutual satisfaction of all. On Wednesday morning a telegram was delivered to my address calling me to officiate at the funeral of little Roline Rice, who departed this life at the age of 10 years, 10 months, and 15 days, after more than four weeks of typhoid fever. We tried to comfort the bereaved ones. Sunday, the 22d, preached at Saints' chapel in Windsor.

The branch at this place is presided over by Brother Leslie Brown, a young man of rare and sterling qualities. He is associated by Priest Albert Bennett, Teacher George W. Daiken and Deacon Hurley Bennett. The Windsor Saints are in line, trying to push the good work along. Some of them are sacrificing greatly for the gospel, and all of these manifest commendable zeal for the great cause. We made our home with Brother and Sister David Hunter, pioneer gospel children, and whose hospitable home can be remembered by some of the pioneer ministry on Canadian soil. Sister Nellie Hunter, a daughter, is now doing stenographic work for Patriarch John Shields. They are all good church workers here, but need encouragement.

Last evening we preached, by invitation of President J. A. Grant, at Detroit. Were announced to repeat the subject, "The eastern conflict as viewed through the tubes of prophecy." We were greeted by a splendid audience, and, afterward, learned the proper touch was given the public pulse. All acted like they were pleased. I know I was. I hold that the events developing in the marshaling of nations, afford us psychological moments, and opportunities, as never before, to get the claims of the latter-day work before the people. The literal fulfillment of prophecy—the concatenation of startling events, than which there is no system of dependencies more intimately linked—is a millstone around the neck of skepticism, and evolution, "the higher criticism," with all the concomitants can not move. The Bible becomes a live wire, and faith may be increased in the earth, while the weapons forged to overthrow the confidence of the people in God and destroy the authority of the Bible lose the keenness of edge.

Hopefully,

S. W. L. SCOTT.

WINDSOR, ONTARIO, 97 Pitt Street, West.

Northwestern Kansas

The Baptist church being refused us, I started a meeting in the Cue Schoolhouse, seven miles northwest of Green, Kansas. At our first effort a crowd of thirty attentive listeners were present. We held sixteen services at this place, it being a new opening. Brother V. F. Rogers lives near here, and is the shepherd of the little flock at Idlewild, nine miles from his home.

While visiting from house to house and talking the principles of tithing to the few Saints living about nine miles from where our meetings were held, we influenced some to pay their tithing, with the result that we sent to our Bishop's agent one hundred dollars, also a subscription for the HERALD and Ensign.

The Spirit of the Master was present in our weak efforts in presenting the word. Some of the best people of the settlement attended our services. The larger part of the time standing room was at a premium. Some were melted to tears, the Spirit of God touching their hearts. After preaching twelve nights they voted I should stay longer. Many are near the kingdom. They took up a collection of $4.70 for the writer, making a total of $12.50 given me by outsiders. I had the finest of receptions, the people asking me to accompany them home.

When I first came here it was stated in the Sunday school that I ought to be drummed out of the settlement. Yet in a few days most all came out to hear the angel's message. This would be a good place to hold a reunion. I promised to return during the winter months. Some are near the kingdom, and are left to be cared for by our worthy Brother, Elder V. F. Rogers.

I go from this point to Blue Rapids for over Sunday, then to Okato and Home, Kansas, also Netawka. I have more calls for preaching than I can fill.

I learn that Brother J. W. A. Bailey was very ill and had to return home at Warrensburg, Missouri, so I am left all alone. I will try to do my best to keep the angel's message before the people. We look for an ingathering in the near future.

If our worthy district president could visit Green a few days it would be very much appreciated.

Yours in bonds,

GEORGE EDWARDS.

Maryland

Since last writing I have made a change from the New York District to Maryland. On my way to this place I stopped a week at East Pharsalia, preaching each night while there. As on my former visit, I was well received, and the Master gave of the good Spirit in our work. We feel that good was accomplished, as it must always be when the Lord works with us.

I do not think these blessings come altogether because of the efforts or the ability of the elder, but very largely because of the fact that those among whom he labors are willing to do God's will, and desire to be instructed in that will. Shall we call this the psychology of preaching to this people?

John's statement in the Inspired Translation, "No man can come unto me except he will do the will of my father who hath sent him" is certainly true, and when God's people are as willing as they should be "In the day of thy power," willing not only to know but to do, when the ministry ceased to be unto this people as "a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument: for they hear the words but they do them not,"—when this time comes for the church, then may we look for the "endowment" we all pray for. Can it come before?

On our way from East Pharsalia to this point, we stopped two nights in Scranton, and four nights in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, being well received and finding live workers in both places. Both places, including both branches in Philadelphia, are to be congratulated on having such energetic and consecrated workers as Brethren Thomas Smith and Koehler, with their families. And the brethren are to be congratulated on the hearty response to their efforts which they are receiving from the Saints, and the corps of efficient workers they are developing.

At Scranton I attended one Religio service and the mid-week prayer service, which a little to my disappointment they set aside announcing a preaching service for me. Of course I complied, and a fairly good audience greeted me, and the blessing of the Master was given. The Latter Day Saint brass band turned out with a banner announcing "Preaching To-night, at the L. D. S. Church."

I reached Philadelphia just in time for the rally day at the second branch, with two nights to spare, which we spent meeting with the mid-week prayer service, Thursday night, and on Friday night with the class of sociology at the first branch. A good time was spent between the two churches and their services. Sunday, the fifteenth, we began with attending an early prayer meeting for the young people at eight o'clock. Rain was pouring down, so the attendance was not numerically large, but I am sure that all present felt that the house was "filled." As a result I felt that the day was well begun, and the blessings given during the remainder of the time in the two preaching services at this branch, where I was the speaker, as also at the services I was privileged to attend at both the churches, fulfilled the promises of the early morning.

While at Philadelphia, by the kindness of Brother Zimmermann, I was privileged to visit many historical scenes, not the least of all being Valley Forge. While I am not going to inflict upon any a reputation of the "oft told tales," permit me to say I enjoyed my visit to these places.

I reached Elk Mills the afternoon of the sixteenth, and found a meeting announced for that night. A good attendance greeted me, and we continued during the week with excellent liberty, meeting early for the regular mid-week appointment, and also song practice. Sunday, the 22d, was a special meeting, with Bishop Zimmermann and Elder W. W. Smith of Philadelphia, in attendance. We gladly turned the preaching services over to them, and were blessed in so doing. The lodge of the "Golden Eagles" turned out in force at 3 p. m., and Brother Smith gave them an excellent address, which was well received. This day was begun with an 8.30 prayer meeting, and six services in all were held. All seemed strengthened and helped.

We are settling down to our routine work here, that of assisting in the work generally. We have a class organized in vocal music, a night school forming where some are trying to make up for lack of early chances, and where others are preparing for Graceland College, a senior Bible class in Sunday school, and an opportunity to do as much other work as we can find the time, including the preaching work. We are receiving excellent response here from the Saints, and are encouraged. Yesterday, in answer to my suggestion, the Saints and friends held a basket dinner in the basement of the church, preceded by a social service at 10 a. m. and an address at 11. After this they met, at our suggestion, for an impromptu program at 2.30, and supper at 5, and again had a little gathering at 7, where, after a short talk, we sang the Doxology, had the benediction, and separated feeling that it was good to meet together.

Hoping for the good work to succeed, and trying to so work that this may be realized, I am,

Sincerely,

A. M. CHASE.

ELK MILLS, MARYLAND, November 28, 1914.

Florida

As the hand of the frost king was giving his first touches to forest and field in our southland, the annual reunion of the Florida District convened at the Alafloa church. Judging from the businesslike and harmonious way in which the meetings were conducted, even to the last on November 8, wisdom must have directed in selecting F. M. Slover, Swen Swensen, and Hale W. Smith to preside.

While the meetings were not so well attended as at other times, and while no baptisms were recorded, yet those attending manifested much interest. The preaching was good. At the social hour each day the spirit of prayer and humility seemed to rule the Saints, and that assuring influence which binds human souls together in love and brotherhood seemed manifest to a large degree. One who had attended many reunions was heard to say that he had enjoyed this one as well as any he had ever attended.

An interesting and instructive feature was the auxiliary work conducted each day by our new field worker, A. E. Warr, who also had charge of the special services for children. These meetings were first introduced into the South by Brother J. A. Gunsolley this year. We believe that they have proved so valuable that they will be a prominent feature of every reunion hereafter.

The Southeastern Quorum of Elders held four sessions, which were instructive. Members of the quorum not present can not realize what they missed by not being there. We hope that more meetings of this kind may be held oftener. We should not forget to mention the ordination of D. M. Rudd to the office of elder, who we believe will be a valuable addition to our corps of workers.

May the good work go on till the bride is adorned in her white robes and prepared to go out and meet the king.

In the ranks for peace,

E. C. SHELLEY.

MCKENZIE, ALABAMA, November 24, 1914.

West Virginia

This writing finds me in the rough hills of West Virginia. I left my home in Independence, Missouri, May 16, stopping off in Ohio by request of Brother J. M. Hardin, of Uniopolis, Ohio. I was glad to meet with the Saints of that branch again after an absence of three years. I preached several times in their little chapel, erected since I was there.

From this place I went to Ironton, Ohio, via Columbus, stopping over night at the hospitable home of Sister G. T. Griffiths, of that place. In Ironton I preached several times and baptized four, all being children of members of the church.

From here I went to Goose Creek, West Virginia, where I met Brother Fred Moser, jr., who was to be my partner for a while. We went from this place to Cabin Run Branch. After preaching here for two weeks or more two young ladies presented themselves for baptism, and we troubled the waters again.

Time passed on until our joint district reunion was to convene, which was July 25, and which was held at New Philadelphia, Ohio. We attended and had a fine time, meeting with many new Saints, and with many we had met at Kirtland reunion in 1911. Even though it may be quite a while before I meet with them again, I shall never forget our reunion of 1914. May we all meet in the glad reunion where we will never have to say good-by and separate as we do in this life.

I was encouraged to go back to my field of labor again after such a spiritual feast with the Saints. But it takes much courage to go back on the firing line at the battle's front.

I attended our district conference at Clarksburg, West Virginia, September 26 and 27. A good time was enjoyed by all. During the conference on Sunday, I again administered the rite of baptism to four young ladies, who were confirmed at the evening session. I wish to mention the ordination of Brother Lawrence Thomas, of Morgantown, West Virginia, to the office of priest. He is a fine young man and will do a good work for the Master if faithful.

After our conference at Clarksburg, I took a vacation, if there is such a thing for a missionary, having had the misfortune of meeting with an accident with a runaway horse. Being unable to get out and hold a series of meetings, I went to the district conference at Wheeling, West Virginia, that of the Pittsburg District. By invitation from several and by permission of the missionary in charge, Brother R. C. Russell, I went from there to Kirtland, Ohio, where the Kirtland district conference was in session. It was quite a treat to meet and again visit old Kirtland and go through the temple and visit with the Saints of that place.

After conference, I started back to West Virginia, stopping with the Saints of Cleveland, Wednesday night, for prayer meeting. Then on to Canton, Ohio, for a church opening. Arriving in Canton, I was informed of a place where preaching was wanted and of a lady who wanted to be baptized. So I came to Indian Creek, Ohio, where I baptized the lady and held forth there for three weeks. I am going to try to go back there and follow up the interest.

I am feeling fine in the work, and can say that the Lord has been very good to me in many ways. The Saints have been good to me also, remembering the needs of the missionary. To-day is Thanksgiving Day, and I have many things to be thankful for. Although far from where I was at this time last year, which was in Hagerman Valley, Idaho, I still remember the Saints and friends I made there.

May the Lord bless all those who help to support this glorious gospel. I hope the time is not far distant when the Saints from everywhere will awaken to the fact that this is a day of sacrifice, and that the time is near at hand when we who are not working for the redemption of Zion will be weighed in the balance and found wanting.

In the conflict,

H. A. WINEGAR.

CLARKSBURG, WEST VIRGINIA, 404 Stealey Avenue, November 26, 1914.

Have you found the heavenly light?

Pass it on,

Souls are groping in the night,

Daylight gone.

Hold thy lighted lamp on high,

Be a star in some one's sky;

He may live who else would die.

Pass it on.—Henry Burton.

News from Branches

Saint Louis, Missouri

Our last sacrament service was a spiritual feast, making us anxious to meet again in like capacity. We have been greatly strengthened and instructed during the past month, the gospel message having been delivered under the inspiration of the Spirit by divinely appointed men. Both speaker and hearer were blessed.

Two splendid discourses were delivered by Brother J. C. Foss who labored in Saint Louis some thirty years ago, our pastor, Brother T. J. Elliott being one of those baptized by him at that time. At the Sunday evening prayer service Brother Foss bore a strong testimony to the work. Brother Christy has been preaching to us every Sunday morning for some time past, and the increased attendance and attention evidence appreciation of his efforts. The local brethren have creditably occupied.

Brother W. A. Smith, one of our district missionaries, has been profitably and fully occupied during the year. The past few weeks he has been holding forth in Belleville, Illinois. Good results are reported.

We have been having a number of strangers at our services, who by their frequent attendance evidence their interest in the work, and we trust their understanding will be opened so that they will yield obedience to the blessed gospel.

The Sunday school and Religio are doing nicely. The district recently held a joint convention in Saint Louis. Encouraging talks were given the young both morning and evening by Brother Christy, and in the afternoon a nicely-arranged program was rendered. It was the initiatory effort for some who took part. A very pleasant day was enjoyed by all privileged to attend.

We must not overlook our active Mite Society, which Thanksgiving evening gave a bazaar and supper. Judging from the attendance, good must have resulted.

Your sister in Christ,

2739 Greer Avenue.

ELIZABETH PATTERSON.

Independence, Missouri

At the conclusion of his sermon on the morning of November 29, Brother Joseph Luff repeated the testimony borne to him by President Joseph Smith a day or two before, and during his serious illness. This testimony was in effect as follows: What I have said in health, I say now: My father was a good man, true to the principles revealed to him by God, and he has committed to me a heritage which I have kept pure and unsullied. This is my testimony, that I know Jesus is the Christ.

About one hundred were present at the nine o'clock prayer meeting on Thanksgiving morning. Every heart seemed burdened with grief, incident to the condition of President Joseph Smith. At the opening, Patriarch F. A. Smith, after reading a portion of the Psalms, proceeded with a troubled spirit to speak a few words of thanksgiving for the mercies vouchsafed us the past year. Being strengthened by the Spirit, he presented many beautiful thoughts. At the dinner hour and during the afternoon, the Saints were entertained at the South Side Church and by the good people of Enoch Hill. Elder William Aylor in his sermon at the South Side Church held forth to a full house in a fine discourse on the message of the angel as told by the ancient prophets.

The auxiliaries continue to be earnest and diligent. The Englewood Sunday School were the guests of honor at our school the twenty-ninth, and were well pleased with their visit.

ABBIE A. HORTON.

Providence, Rhode Island

This city is not so rich in things of historic interest as Boston and Philadelphia, but it has a gospel record extending back into the early thirties, at which time the message of life was being delivered to the interested few who gathered in a house on Main Street. After the lull of the forties and fifties, elders came with the news of the Reorganization, since which time the authority to represent God and officiate in his ordinances has remained to the present day. It is of the present I wish to write.

What are we doing? We are doing many things to spread the gospel, among which, and not least, is a systematic effort to reach every house in our vicinity and extend to the inhabitants, either personally or by printed word, an invitation to attend our services. Each active member of the priesthood (and we have a goodly number) is given a certain list of streets as his stewardship, and he visits and revisits the houses. To offset the expense of this work we utilize Ensigns, HERALDS, and other church publications. (It seems that every church paper should be placed in the hands of the public.)

Being a comparative stranger in this branch, I can not consistently compare the present state of the work with the past. I am not concerned with the past (much of it is dead—at least beyond recall); I am interested in the present and hope for and expect success in the future, through him who strengthens me.

I know that all phases of the work here manifest symptoms of a healthy growth, or healthy growing. A tone of humility and a spiritual atmosphere characterize our prayer services; the auxiliaries are holding their own; the attendance at the preaching services compares favorable with the attendance of other branches in the district. Strangers are coming in among us. I enjoy liberty in dispensing the word of God. A Woman's Auxiliary has been organized, and in due time will assist in perfecting the Saints. "Knowledge is power." The summer school was a success. For lack of money we have not been able to make the Boys' Club interesting. Other things have militated against our social work here, but these will be banished in time. To sum up: We report progress, and ask for more time.

The branch here entertained the late district convention of Sunday school and Religio. I have never seen less confusion in caring for visitors, thanks to the Saints, who invited the guests before the committee on entertainment could get around, in many instances. The delegation attending was not so large as in former years. Some think the shrinkage was due to "hard times." The convention compared well in interest and progress with former gatherings. One feature was commendable: there were fewer displays of amateurish attempts to instruct the delegation. (I believe we should put forth our best instructors at all large gatherings. Let the young learner practice in his local.)

The convention was not free from the ubiquitous bugbear, namely, the ever sleep-producing papers. It matters not how well written, how full of meat, the paper will lull people to sleep. The closing address was not given. The writer was ill and could not prepare it. His effort in substitution was poorly received by the audience, much to the credit of the audience.

To the frequent question, "How do you like Providence, and how are things moving there?" I answer, "I like Providence very much, and the branch there has a bright future, of which we see present signs."

The papers here are fifty per cent more liberal than they are in many other eastern cities. The city is behind the times in sinfulness; it has a quaint atmosphere; the people think less of their clothes; they live more modestly (notwithstanding it is learning the ways of Core fast enough). Still, people are people wherever you meet them—it is environment that accounts for the differences, plus (?) preexistent agency.

The pencils of several men have painted the picture of this branch, some of the colors of which have faded and vanished, just as some of their creators have faded and passed away. In the pages of old HERALDS I notice, connected with the work in Providence, the names of Charles Brown, Frank Potter, F. M. Sheehy, M. H. Bond, George Gates,—some of whom are living, others dead. "We all do fade as the leaf."

I shall keep the Saints informed of the progress of the work in this city, one of the principal centers of the church work in the East. What I have written is but the introduction to what is to follow, which, I trust, will be cheering and hopeful. Like our friend, Sister Schwartz, I will close with a snatch of poem:

"Then youth, flame-earnest, still aspire
With energies immortal!
To many a haven of desire
Your yearning ope's a portal.
And though age wearies by the way,
And hearts break in the furrow,
We sow the golden grain to-day,
The harvest comes to-morrow."

R. W. FARRELL.

AGENT'S NOTICE

To the Saints of Western Colorado; Greeting: The year 1914 is almost gone, and our books will soon be closed and our reports sent to the Bishop. While there is general complaint of hard times, yet we are in a land of peace and plenty, with no foes to fear, no famine, no pestilence, unlike war-torn Europe with its deadly conflict, vast armies devastating the land, killing the men by the thousands, making homeless many thousands of women and children. We should be thankful that we live in this land of promise, this Nation from hence was to go the "ensign," the gospel, to every nation, kindred, tongue, and people. As believers in God's word as revealed, we should express by a thank offering our gratitude for the blessings we enjoy at home in the midst of peace and plenty.

As a nation we are going to the destitute in the war zone, and so as a church we should not forget our valiant soldiers of King Emanuel, the ministry of the church, who go forth without purse or scrip, to work against Satan, enemy of all mankind.

Christmas time is near. Let us remember that by making a thank offering we may help to relieve the wants of the families of those who labor in God's vineyard. Therefore, let us lessen the ordinary Christmas giving, and if we have given neither tithe, consecration, nor any other offering, let us sacrifice something for the work of the Lord. There is urgent need, so let all who love God and his work give gladly and freely to help the church to spread the gospel of Christ.

Let us instruct our children, and when they understand I am sure they will gladly forego some pleasure or gift that they may be of help in moving the work along.

Hoping for a hearty response from all the members of the district, I beg to remain, Your humble servant and coworker,

J. D. Erwin is reported to be assuming at times the rights and prerogatives of a minister among the Saints of Oklahoma and Arkansas. Notice has heretofore been published to the effect that Brother Erwin is under silence and is not authorized to represent the church, although he has persistently refused to surrender his license. This is to again notify the Saints that J. D. Erwin should not be permitted to officiate in the priesthood in any way, and his ministerial acts will not be recognized by the church. Branch authorities in these districts should see to it that he is not permitted to impose upon the Saints as a minister of the gospel.

Librarians! Attention!

Every now and then the Library Commission is in receipt of a letter asking about good books. Some time ago it was announced in these columns that if one thousand copies were subscribed for in advance, the life or autobiography of Sister Emma Burton, under the name of "Beatrice Witherspoon," would be published in a book, the price to be $1. If you did not read this autobiography in Autumn Leaves years ago, read Sister Macgregor's description of it in the HERALD for November 18, 1914.

Every library in the church should have one or more copies of this book to circulate among the young people. Subscriptions are to be sent to Mrs. Emma Burton, 620 West Fifth Street, Santa Ana, California. For the good of all who desire this valuable book, do not delay sending your order to Sister Burton.

tive to the adoption of a paper called Unity, prepared and submitted by the president of the stake, the committee appointed to finally decide the matter met at the stake offices on November 12 for the purpose of appointing the various offices, it having been decided by the committee that said paper be published in the interest of the priesthood.

In this way the work of the priesthood will be enhanced, and shall fall in line with the Psalmist David in saying, "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

Young People's History Now Ready

What It Is

An interesting history of a peculiar organization—the Latter Day Saint Church. As readable as a story, yet every historical statement has been carefully written and may be relied on. All the important events of church history are mentioned in their proper relation to other events, with just enough detail to incite and hold the interest. The book is intended to interest the young especially and make the general church history already published in four volumes, of greater value because of added interest in it.

Dates Covered

It begins with the remarkable visit of the angel to the young lad, Joseph Smith, in the year 1820, and tells the interesting story from that date till the sad breaking up of the church following the death of Joseph and Hyrum Smith. The last chapter closes with the year 1848, the beginning of the gathering of the scattered people for the Reorganization.

The Style

The dates of the events are over each page, so one can easily locate them. There are numerous side notes in the reading page, showing at a glance the principal facts dealt with on the page. The type is the pica, a large face, with the footnotes in brevier. No eyestrain. Bound in durable cloth. Size 5½ by 8 inches. Over 400 pages. About 90 illustrations.

The Author

The book was written by Mrs. Vida E. Smith, wife of Church Historian, Heman C. Smith. She is well known to church members in general by her poems and other literary productions. Her long association with people and things historical, coupled with her natural ability, enables her to present all these matters in a pleasing and attractive way.

DEATH OF PRESIDENT JOSEPH SMITH

Many years ago the poet wrote:

Joseph, Alexander, David, three remaining pillars still,
Like the three remaining pillars on the hill.

The last of those three pillars has fallen. President Joseph Smith passed from this life December 10, 1914, at about one o'clock in the afternoon. Although he had been critically ill for a period of about two weeks his death came so suddenly that it was a shock to all.

He had rested comfortably during the forenoon and talked with friends and relatives in his usual cheery manner. Apparently he was feeling much better. Just before one o'clock he called suddenly for his wife Ada and requested to be lifted to a sitting posture. This was done and he passed away almost immediately, quietly and without pain.

Although his departure will be deeply mourned by the Saints everywhere, all will rejoice that he could thus pass peacefully to his well-earned reward without pain and with his faculties undiminished.

At the Sunday afternoon prayer and sacrament service at Independence the Sunday before his death the following word of prophecy was given:

The anxiety of my people concerning the condition of my servant Joseph is known unto me, saith the Lord. I have heard the prayers that have come up from many homes; and I perceive that many hearts have been made very tender and devout. Let not your hearts be troubled in this matter. It is not given unto you to know my will as to the time of his departure. Whether he depart or tarry, what is that to thee? But my will shall be done in this, as hitherto, for I have directed his life even from the day when the light of this world first dawned upon his eyes,—yea, and I am with him now though that light has failed.

Never at any time have I deserted him, neither in darkness nor in light, neither in storm nor in calm. Because I have loved him I have withheld neither joy nor sorrow that might be for the perfecting of his character. Because his patience was un failing and his charity broad and deep, I have loved him and have not given him of my Spirit by measure. Because he has loved righteousness and hated iniquity I have anointed him with the oil of gladness and his name is numbered with that illustrious company of whom Jesus Christ is head and front. In due time his now blind and sightless eyes shall behold all the glories of eternity.

It remains for the church to profit by his life.—to be loving as he was loving, to be charitable as he was charitable, and to go on in faith. They are admonished also to look beyond him to the Man of Galilee whose great sacrifice has been celebrated here to-day and whose example they should imitate in all things.

His lingering illness gave him ample time to call his children and other relatives about his bedside and give them parting blessings, admonitions, and instructions. His growing sons he pledged to lives of sobriety and honesty. To Elder T. W. Chatburn who stood by him to the last with all the fidelity of a brother he left his blessing.

He discoursed upon many topics and left for the church a personal message which will no doubt be made public in due time. From it we venture to reproduce only the following words at this time:

"I have not consciously wronged any man or woman. I have no fear to go beyond the vale. . . . My peace I leave with those I have labored with. My blessings I leave with those I leave behind me. . . . The Spirit and the Bride say come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. Have faith in God and worship him for ever and ever. Amen."

He remained to the last considerate of those about him and with true inborn courtesy never failed to thank them for any little act of personal service. To eulogize a life that commands its own eulogy from thousands of living and loving hearts would be a waste of words. The tribute of true friendship and comradeship of the brethren was his by right and was prized by him above all earthly things.

His faith remained unshaken. His hold upon the divine grew stronger. And there was evidence that the hymn of his own composition was answered:

Tenderly, tenderly, lead Thou me on,
On, o'er the way where my Savior hath gone,
Bright on His pathway the sunlight hath shone;
Tenderly, tenderly, lead Thou me on,
Close to His hand I so tremblingly clung;
Faint were the songs I so doubtfully sung,
Brokenly falling from faltering tongue;
Tenderly, tenderly, lead Thou me on.

Trustingly, trustingly, forward I go,
Waiting instruction the pathway to know;
Watching the promise that beams from the bow;
Tenderly, tenderly, leading me on,
Angels have trodden the thorn-planted way;
Guide Thou me, Lord, that I go not astray;
Strengthen me Lord, that like them I may stay;
Tenderly, tenderly, led by Thee on.

Faithfully, faithfully, holding my hand,
On the rough, slipp'ry heights safely I stand;
Looking away to the heavenly strand;
Tenderly, tenderly, leads He me on,
Now has my weak heart grown trustingly strong,
Ways have grown short that seemed once to be long;
Gladly I join in the triumphant song;
Tenderly, tenderly leading me on.

While life lasts those who watched by his bedside during his illness will never forget their emotions and experiences. They witnessed the passing of a Prophet. Their faith was most profoundly strengthened in the work of God, in the mission of Jesus Christ the Savior of the world, and in the quickening, comforting, and enlightening influences of the Holy Ghost.

The funeral services were held at the Independence church at two o'clock p. m., Sunday, December 13, in charge of George E. Harrington. The prayer was offered by Bishop E. L. Kelley, with sermon by Joseph Luff. The prayer at the cemetery was offered by John W. Rushton.

The pallbearers were: Gomer T. Griffiths, E. L. Kelley, Edwin A. Blakeslee, John W. Rushton, Joseph A. Tanner, Thomas W. Chatburn.

Those of the Quorum of Twelve present were: Gomer T. Griffiths, John W. Rushton, Robert C. Russell, James F. Curtis, Paul M. Hanson, William Aylor, James A. Gillen, Cornelius A. Butterworth, and James E. Kelley.

The members of the Twelve mentioned above met at nine o'clock a. m., with the two remaining members of the Presidency, Frederick M. and Elbert A. Smith, to arrange for the work of the balance of the conference year.

The sermon will appear in the HERALD next week.

Let us now, brethren, go on with the great work left for us to accomplish,—undivided, with mutual trust and good fellowship and with greater faith and consecration. There is no occasion for doubt or fear, no cause for division or confusion. There is every reason to have confidence and courage. Good men and well-beloved men pass, but God remains. His work must prevail. The living must redouble their efforts in his service. May his favor and blessing abide with us.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

BIOGRAPHICAL STATEMENT

[The following biographical sketch of President Joseph Smith was prepared by the Church Historian, Elder Heman C. Smith, for the Associated Press. We are privileged to reproduce it here.—HERALD EDITORS.]

President Joseph Smith, son of Joseph Smith the Prophet, and Emma Hale Smith, daughter of Isaac Hale, was born November 6, 1832, at Kirtland, Ohio. The Smith family came to America in 1638, settling at Topsfield, Massachusetts, where they lived for one hundred and fifty years or more, and maintained an honorable name. No suspicion of evil attached to the family name until the religious movement began with which they were so prominently connected. Then their names were used in connection with disreputable stories as a religious persecution.

Some members of this family were prominent in the founding of the Government of the United States, and Captain Asael Smith, grandfather of the Prophet, was engaged at the head of his company in the battle of Lexington and Concord April 19, 1775. Samuel Smith, the father of Asael Smith, was a member of the legislature of Massachusetts for several succeeding terms. The families into which the Smith family married in these early days, the Frenches, the Townes, the Goulds, the Curtises, the Dutys, the Macks, the Golds, and the Hales were all families of high respectability.

The story of the Prophet Joseph Smith in translating the Book of Mormon from the golden plates is well known. His chief counselor, adviser and co-worker, Oliver Cowdery, was also a member of a family of great distinction among the nobility of England. They came to America in 1630 and settled at Lynn, Massachusetts. There is no evidence that the two families ever became acquainted while in Massachusetts nor in Vermont, where they again resided near to each other; but after members of both families went to New York, Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery became associated and were the prime movers in this religious movement that has gained such notoriety in the world.

President Smith passed through the trials and persecutions that his father was subject to while in his boyhood, and in 1838 was thrust from his father at the point of a sword by a mob militia, and when under the cruel edict of Governor Boggs of Missouri his mother and her children left the State while his father was confined in a dungeon, he clinging to his mother's clothes while crossing the Mississippi River on the ice. He was familiar with the scenes at Nauvoo and had a very distinct memory of some of the leading acts of his father and some of the teachings.

His father on several occasions in public and private declared that he should be his successor; and when Brigham Young led a party to the valleys of the mountains, Emma Smith stayed in Nauvoo with her children and reared them up with a love for honesty, sobriety and virtue, and instilled into their minds a hatred for immorality and evil practices, especially polygamy and its kindred evils.

President Smith had three brothers who were reared to manhood, namely: Frederick, Alexander, and David. All of these were as uncompromising opponents of the evils of the Utah system as was President Smith. They all passed away before President Smith, each leaving a posterity of honorable, virtuous citizens, not one of whom has ever been in any way allied with the people of Utah, nor has any person connected with this family by marriage ever given allegiance to those evils.

President Smith associated with that part of the membership of the church under his father that protested against the work of Brigham Young and his colleagues, and in 1860 was accepted as President of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, to which position he was entitled by the organic law of the church, as well as his appointment by his father. He has held this position from that time until this by unanimous consent, there never having been a single vote to the contrary, thus being sustained each succeeding annual conference.

In 1855 President Smith was married to Miss Emaline Griswold, at Nauvoo, Hancock County, Illinois. By this marriage three daughters were reared to womanhood, namely: Emma J., wife of Alexander McCallum, of Independence, Missouri, Carrie L., wife of F. M. Weld of Lamoni, Iowa, and Zaide V., now deceased, who was the wife of R. S. Salyards, now secretary of the church, of Lamoni, Iowa. President Smith's wife died in 1869, and he subsequently married Miss Bertha Madison, who was the mother of Frederick M., Israel A. and Hale W. Smith, all of Independence, Missouri, Audentia M., wife of B. M. Anderson, of Independence, Missouri, and Lucy Y., wife of J. M. Lysinger of Lamoni, Iowa. His second wife died in 1896, and subsequently he married Miss Ada Clark, who survives him. She has three sons, all living, namely: R. C., Wallace and Reginald. All his living children were present during his last illness and death. His nephews, Elbert A., son of his brother David, and Frederick A., Joseph G. and Arthur M., and his niece Vida E., wife of Heman C. Smith, children of his brother Alexander, were also present. There were present also several grandchildren, to witness the closing scenes of his life.

President Smith removed from Nauvoo, Illinois, to Plano, Illinois shortly after taking his position as President of the church, where he became editor of the church organ, the SAINTS' HERALD, which position he held during his life. From Plano, Illinois, he removed to Lamoni, Iowa, in 1881, and was the most prominent citizen of that place until 1906, when he removed to Independence, Missouri, making his home there until his decease.

President Smith has always been an uncompromising opponent of the liquor traffic, and always took a prominent part on the public platform and otherwise in the advocacy of temperance. Under his leadership the membership of the Reorganized Church of Latter Day Saints at Plano, Illinois, Lamoni, Iowa, and Independence, Missouri, cast over ninety-nine per cent of their vote against the sale of intoxicants.

By revelation through President Smith, his son, Frederick M. Smith, has been designated as his successor, and if sustained by the church in General Conference will doubtless occupy that position. Frederick M. and Elbert A. occupied as the counselors of President Smith at the time of his decease.

INSTRUCTIONS REGARDING PRESIDENT SMITH'S FUNERAL

Some years ago President Joseph Smith placed sealed envelopes in the hands of his son, Frederick M. Smith and Bishop E. L. Kelley containing directions regarding his funeral services. These instructions when opened were found to be very characteristic of the man. We reproduce them herewith.

He also stated orally before his death that he wished no elaborate display of flowers; he stated that if any desired to contribute money for the purchase of flowers it should be given to some poor widow who is struggling to support her family of children.

A pure, noble, Christlike life thus closed with a tender thought for others and in characteristic, life-long humility.

The letter of instructions is as follows:

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, March 29, 1911.

MEMORANDA TOUCHING MY FUNERAL SERVICES

To My Son, Frederick M. Smith, Counselor, and E. L. Kelley, Bishop of the Church: I make the following suggestions, touching what I desire to be observed regarding the funeral services and funeral of my body when death occurs:

First. I do not desire an expensive funeral service. A plain casket dressed in black, without metal trimmings, similar to those in which the bodies of the Saints who die at the Saints' Home are laid at rest in, is all I desire.

Second. I want the funeral services to be without extra expense, as I desire no ostentatious display, either in draping the pulpit or the building.

Third. I wish no expense to be incurred further than absolutely necessary for carriages or any other show of service.

Fourth. I desire that my body be clothed in such ordinary clothing as I have at my disposition at the time of my death. I do not want my black suit used for that purpose, as it has been no favorite of mine.

Fifth. I desire that there shall be no lavish display of flowers. A single wreath of native grown flowers, should my death occur in the flower season, will be all sufficient, either on the casket or at the grave. Should my death occur in seasonable weather, I should like that my body might be exposed in the casket in the open air on the church lawn, where as many as choose to review the remains could do so. If in the cold weather, the ordinary routine of viewing the body will be satisfactory.

Sixth. I desire that there shall be no extra song service. The ordinary funeral hymns which our books contain will be preferred. I have no preference as to who shall preach the funeral sermon, but should like the services to be under the charge of the branch authorities, my body to be consigned to the care of the Mound Grove Cemetery authorities. I should like the choir or selected singers to use the following hymns, in their order: Number 135, and number 187 in the Saints' Hymnal; and if the weather is seasonable, let the hymn, "There is a land immortal," number 207 in the Saints' Hymnal, be sung at the grave before the benediction.

As to other arrangements not named here I leave them for consideration between my son, Frederick M., Bishop Kelley, and the branch authorities.

AN APPRECIATION OF PRESIDENT SMITH

The following appreciation of the life and work of President Joseph Smith and the value thereof to the church and the cause he so devotedly served during the fifty-four years of his presidency, taken from an article appearing in Autumn Leaves some years ago, and written by Albert Carmichael, is particularly fitting and appropriate at this time, as suggesting the predominating character trait of our departed president—a man who in his breadth of view and love of justice stood ever for the liberties of his brethren and all the people.

"Actions speak in thunder tones." Character is not what a man alone knows but what he is. No better way could be found to measure a man than "by his fruits." As a leader, what has been his policy? What the results?

From the very first of his regime every law known for freedom of speech has been strenuously insisted upon and conserved by him. The sacred right to think and to give expression to those thoughts has never been denied or curtailed. With a broad, comprehensive grasp of the rights of his fellow laborer, yet with the keenness of an able jurist—to be

THE THEOLOGY OF WORSHIP

From the thunders of Sinai is echoed to us this precept of the decalogue: "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." In modern conception this is equivalent to saying that supreme devotion to anything less than that which comprehends the attributes of God is idolatry—is degeneracy. Supreme devotion is due only to an object having the supreme excellencies.

Phrasing this precept was evidently not accidental. Honor, reverence, gratitude, devotion, praise, homage, and love, are due others than God, but subordinatedly so. As properly rendered to him they all merge in supreme adoration which comprehends the tribute of all our faculties. It is called worship when it embraces our deepest veneration and service, and also when it does not; but in the latter case the tribute is not as fully acceptable. It is evident, therefore, that there may be different degrees of worship rendered, dependent upon the nature of the object worshiped, upon the conception of the worshiper, and upon the responsiveness of the worshiper.

THE OBJECT WORSHIPED

It is not so important to designate the object worshiped as it is to conceive him rightly who is worshiped. It is possible to identify one's worship with the creator and still fail to ascribe to him the qualities of justice, mercy, truth, love, goodness, omniscience, or omnipotence. And even if one believes him to be possessed of any or all of these attributes and does not rightly conceive the attributes themselves, he in reality ascribes to Deity qualities which he misnames and misunderstands, and which Deity does not possess.

The fundamental differences existing between some of the religions of the world arise largely from the different conceptions of the Supreme Being, or of the object most worthy of homage. With some there is no very clear idea about him, but what he is believed to be represents, as the rule, the embodiment of an ideal. As these ideals differ according to the individual so does the degree of worship differ in each.

The Egyptian objects of worship were almost without number, as they had a god for nearly every separate purpose and for nearly every force of nature; and although some of these were regarded as more important or powerful than others, there seems to have been no object venerated as embodying all of these qualities in a preeminent degree. In fact, it would have been quite impossible to clearly conceive such an object, apparently, because many of their gods represented quite opposite characteristics to others, and a god of very contradictory qualities must have resulted.

The contrary nature of the deific conceptions are fundamental, and the difficulty of properly molding them, to say nothing of the impossibility of reconciling them, will be apparent when we note what some of them are as found among various nations.

Somewhat analogous to the idea held by many Christians, are those of the Brahmanistic, Buddhist, and Zoroastrian faiths in regard to the objects of worship: Brahma is the all-inclusive spirit, the supreme soul of all, and the cause and goal of all things having life. Through the trinity of Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva, are manifested the creative, conserving, and destructive forces of the universe; but growing up in this atmosphere are legions of superstitions in the worship of minor gods, spirits, devils, ghosts, female village deities, and many other objects of mysticism. The Zoroastrian supreme god, Ormazd—the Lord Wisdom—created and rules the universe, and with six presiding deities holds the power of animal life, plant life, water, fire, earth and metals. Next below these are angels who direct the many forces of nature. Ahriman, the Devil or spirit enemy, who is sometimes designated as Satan, has invaded the world and disorders it; but the forces of right will finally prevail and rule supreme, and evil will be overthrown for ever in the ultimate conflict in which fiends, evil spirits, and demons innumerable will contend against the good in vain. The resurrection and the dawning of eternity shall be the culmination of this great event.

The gods in the Osirian myths were demons, according to Plutarch, and the Aztec gods were supposed to be gods of cruelty. The chief god of the Hottentots is conceived to be a deceased sorcerer, while the Zulus worship ancestors who are supposed to appear as snakes, and the Bushmen revere an insect called the Mantis, as the greatest object of religion. To mention all the deific conceptions of the world would be an endless task, but most of them pertained to gods of specific functions as, for instance: Aurora was goddess of the morning; Neptune was god of the sea; Venus was the goddess of beauty; Vesta was the god of fire; Somnus was the god of sleep; Orpheus was the god of music; Hymen was the god of marriage; Minerva was goddess of wisdom; and Morpheus was god of dreams.

Distinguished from these gods in endless variety is the Christian's God, holding the power of all of the functions of life as well as those of nature and of the universe in general; whose wisdom is omnipotent, and whose love is all-pervading; in whom is merged all of the attributes supremely desirable, because inclusively they comprise perfection and pre-eminence in all things, together with executive judgment and prescience during both time and eternity; and whose immutability guarantees our reliance upon him in all things for ever.

In designating God as the only object of supreme worship he can not be identified by the substances of the earth, as wood, stone, metal, water, or air; for these symbols serve to obscure him rather than to reveal him. These all are subject to change or decay, while he is changeless and immortal. Neither can he be personified as like man, because man does not possess these attributes in entirety or perfection, and he is of visible substance while God is invisible; but man is the highest expression of God's creative work, and it is but natural and reasonable that we should believe that expression to be in his own image. We therefore worship God as a personage of most refined substance called spirit, divine in all perfections and supreme in rulership and power, and who, though invisible, manifests himself to man in such ways and under such conditions as accords with his wisdom and purposes.

DEFINING GOD

Christian worship being the response of man to revealed religion including the revelation of God, the object of worship must accord with that revelation or it is not in the fullest sense Christian. It makes a vast difference whether I worship ignorantly or intelligently. Jesus said to the Samaritan woman, "We know what we worship." The fatal defect pointed out by him in her case was, "Ye worship ye know not what." Ignorance of him who is worshiped can not be commendable, otherwise it would be superfluous to reveal himself to man, or for man to teach others this revelation. Worship may be of something existing only in the imagination. It may be argued that the Mohammedan, Jew, and Christian, all worship the same God; and this is true in a sense, but is not the essential point, as they will readily admit. The name matters less than the nature or attributes of him who is worshiped. It is possible to attach the same name to an object without conceiving the same qualities of the object as another. This is true also in regard to the personality of the object, as will be seen.

In seeking to define the individuality of God there is as much disagreement among various worshipers as exists concerning his attributes, or perhaps even more if it were possible. One sect believes, indeed, that he has no individuality; while another thinks he is the subtle life-substance existing in everything animate or that may become animate, and that all collectively in the universe comprise him. Still others suppose that he has no substance, but is almost wholly inconceivable and incomprehensible, as in fact he would be if such were the case. The definition given by Professor Luther Lee seems quite appropriate to some of these ideas. He said:

God is a spirit without body, parts or passions; whose circumference is everywhere, whose center is nowhere, who is indivisible, indissoluble, uncompounded simple essence, with no exterior nor interior surface, without weight, shape, size or color, and can in nowise come in contact with matter.

After determining that he is without all these material characteristics, we wonder if what is left is not suspiciously suggestive of the monkey and the cheese; or of the boy who replied, when asked for the core of his apple, "There ain't going to be no core."

It is doubtless true that the finite mind, with its limited powers of comprehension, may neither be able to adequately define or fully comprehend God who is infinite; but so far as the human may understand the divine, it is essential that our conception of him be not a misconception; otherwise we are of those to whom Jesus said, "Ye worship ye know not what." Our limitations are no excuse for our failure to correctly conceive him as far as our powers of cognition extend, and as far as he has revealed himself; for it is then become a matter of faith in what he has revealed.

The Christian's source of authoritative teaching informs us that God is our father and "we are also his offspring"; that man was made in his image, and that Christ, the divine Son, though in fashion "as a man," was in the "express image" of his father's person, being in the "form of God." It tells us that though God is invisible he may become visible when he so wills, and that he has manifested his person to chosen witnesses, Moses, the seventy elders, Isaiah, and others being among those who have seen him. He is represented in their testimonies as having the form of a man, with a head, nose, eyes, mouth, ears, body and feet; but whose substance is spirit, and not of earthly material. Some worshipers conceive him thus, accepting this revelation literally; while others do not believe this, and have no distinct conception of God as a being in this respect.

WHY DOES MAN WORSHIP?

It is the inherent tendency of man to struggle upward, to reach out for something better than he possesses, and to prize superior things. He admires the beautiful, reveres the good, respects the virtuous, loves the benevolent, honors the just and the wise, serves the powerful, and endeavors to emulate or attain to the things he considers most worthy. And for the great and sublime that is beyond his limited comprehension, he feels awe, fear, wonderment, or surprise, according to the nature of his reflections. Worship may have in it any or a combination of these elements, actuated by a conception of certain of these qualities or combinations of them in the object worshiped; but aside from these, specifically considered, is a rendering of gratitude, honor, veneration, devotion, homage, or adoration.

Man's worship is therefore either prompted by his desire, will, or compulsion. All do not worship for the same reasons. The heathen are represented as being actuated by fear, by the hope of appeasing Deity, or by the expectation of compensatory returns. Many secondary reasons for worship might be mentioned, varying according to the intelligence and responsiveness of the worshiper and his conception of what is worshiped. It may be readily perceived that the reasons for worship may become very complex and intermingling, insomuch that few persons would very closely analyze or even understand them all in their own cases, and much less so in others. Worship by coercion or compulsion would at best be artificial, and if rendered to God must be displeasing both to him and the worshiper, hence valueless; while to worship solely because one wills to do so is to worship perfunctorily without heart devotion, and besides dishonoring God is a disgrace to the individual in the divine sight if not in that of men. Worship from desire, which is heart worship, in which the soul's adoration and consecration are intelligently blended in an offering to the Creator, is pure and acceptable to him because it is real and true. Anything less than that is not, in the fullest and best sense, worship; the word itself being derived from the Anglo Saxon, worthship, which is to render worthy devotion.

INCENTIVES TO WORSHIP

In highest sense worship can not be commanded or compelled, neither can it be actuated by policy, expediency, or convenience, because the essentials of true worship are centered in the desire rather than in the will to worship. The ideal offering is largely spontaneous, and herein arises its most fragrant in-cent. Worship is impelled by the responsive emotions more than by conclusions of calculation, when most acceptably rendered; otherwise its nature is commercial and speculative, and not of the affections, which is fundamentally different. But in individuals the incentives to worship may differ as greatly as fear differs from love; and we find this to be the case not only of the various cults but also of those holding the same or similar dogmas of worship. In other words, pureness of worship is not guaranteed by religious affiliation, just as life is not insured by correct physiological proportions; its form may be present though the spirit is fled.

A number of persons may, ostensibly at least, believe in the same God and hold to the same religious faith, and still worship from quite different incentives; for their mental and moral tendencies may be diverse, and may even be opposite in some respects, so that their mental processes actuate them variously. One may worship from a sense of fear, while another is moved by gratitude, and some one else may be actuated by a feeling of obligation. The varying incentives to worship result in different degrees of worship, and are not the same at all times in an individual; for which reason his worship may be more acceptable at one time than it is at another. He whose intentions are commendable renders a perfect worship when he is moved by a perfect combination of right incentives. To the extent that we rightly conceive God and his relationship with man we shall be able to discern the incentives to worship him, if we are responsive to the extent of our discernment; true worship being dependent upon them. He who is not responsive to God can not, in the truest sense, worship him. Responsiveness, then, is one of man's natural characteristics, and he who does not possess a responsive nature is unnatural or abnormal. The supreme joys are impossible to him, for he can not feel them, not having the qualities of which they are the fruitage. Such an individual is an ingrate, and unconsciously robs himself of one of life's richest treasures.

To the one who rightly conceives God the most powerful and comprehensive incentives to worship are gratitude and love—reverential love. The worship of one whose incentive is desire for reward is at best largely adulterated, and the worshiper is liable to exhibit kinship to the groveling, fawning, or sniveling sycophant. His real spirit is often discerned by the observant person, and must be even more abhorrent to God than it is to us. The personal direct incentives to true worship are therefore the responsive faculties, which impel the individual to make an offering to God. They are distinguished from those things which comprise the qualities of the divine being, or the acts which he performs; the latter are reasons why we should worship, but exist independently of man's recognition of them; the former are fundamentally of the worshiper, and determine the value of worship by him. In this sense a zealous heathen might render a more acceptable worship than a believer whose incentives were unworthy. Paul recognized a commendable purpose in certain of the Athenians when he said: "Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you." Though God was unknown to them yet they sought him in worship.

THE PURPOSE OF WORSHIP

God has so created man that the deeds of his life are retroactive in so far as they are purposeful; the bread cast upon the waters will return to him. It has been asked: "What benefit is there in worship?" To understand this principle is to understand the answer to the question to a great extent. But it should be remembered that the purpose of worship is not to derive profit, but relates to ethical and æsthetical rather than to material things. It is one of the beautiful offerings of the soul, and adds to the sum of human happiness as surely as do the offerings of love, friendship, esteem, kindness, and mercy; but in it is merged more than in any of these, as careful reflection will enable one to recognize. It is one of the natural and divinely appointed outlets of the soul, and like the river of "the water of life," flows even unto the throne of the Most High. It renders to God that which is his due, being a form of communion with him that at the same time enriches the soul of the worshiper.

The purpose of worship is accomplished more fully by praise than by petition; by service rather than supplication; in giving instead of receiving; and therefore it can not be said that all prayer is worship. Prayer is worship only so far as the spirit of worship enters into it, or is in the one who offers it. To beg is not to worship, necessarily. Prayer has doubtless been made many times when the most important elements of worship did not enter into it, if, indeed, any such elements were present in a respectable degree. He whose address to Deity consists in reciting what, or how much, he knows, does not thereby engage in either prayer or worship in the true sense, but is wasting his time in the attempt to inform the Almighty of things which he knows infinitely better than does the one addressing him.

Such form of address should, to say the least, be used sparingly.

The purpose of worship is, fundamentally, response to the divine being, and the welding of man to God by transmutation; and subordinately is for enjoyment of the divine atmosphere. Man inherently seeks the favor or mercy of the Creator, and the boon of enjoying his realm; and in doing so his noblest passions and purposes are aroused and given definite trend. Worship therefore is potent in soul development, and is ordained very largely to that end; being preeminently of the divine plan for the transformation of the earthly into the heavenly life. Without it the heavenly bliss is impossible of man's attainment, for it is the very portal through which he may reach the transcendental state. In the heavenly place the soul's supreme rapture is hallowed by its spirit of sublime worship, which overflows in spontaneous ecstasy. Such worship is worthy the omnipotent Ruler in the midst of his majesty, power and dominion, and augments the glory of celestial life.

Without purity of worship religion is a mockery, and those whose worship is superficial are grievous backsliders if not apostates. Such worship borders upon blasphemy; in fact it is not worship, but is at best only comparable to the Savior's metaphor of a whited sepulcher. To the casuist such worship savors of hypocrisy, and must bring condemnation instead of commendation from Jehovah, because it is not genuine.

Principle, instead of policy or pretension, must actuate the person who would attempt to enter into the service of worship to secure the recognition of heaven; and the environment of this service should be created, to the extent that man does create it, for the purpose of pleasing God rather than for the pleasure of man. Ostentation is liable to divert the mind from the real object of worship, and to arouse hauteur and vanity instead of humility and modesty, which characterizes true devotion. Refinement, symmetry, harmony, beauty, and sublimity of surroundings are proper and desirable supplements to the devotional offering; but should be subordinated to the purpose of worship, and form the soul's sanctuary, or oblation, instead of its idol, or goal.

Exterior worship, comprising the words, acts, gestures, and appointments of devotion, are beautiful and acceptable to the divine King when the service is not artificial but is the sincere expression of veneration and response to him and his requirements. This response to the divine requirements is in fact a part of man's response to God, and is inseparable from it, whether those requirements pertain to external ordinances or internal devotion; for without it worship is futile. Substitution of something preferred by the worshiper, for any part of the sacred dicta, is fatal to the offering's acceptance. Cain preferred to offer the fruit of the ground rather than the first born of his flock as God had directed, but his offering was rejected. This example was set forth at the dawn of history as a reminder to the whole human race. That offering was designed by the Almighty to symbolize his own Son, "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." It was a fearful error, and resulted in murder and a living death. The same principle was reiterated and emphasized by the Christ when he uttered the ominous warning: "In vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." Man's submission to the will of the Infinite Being is essential to the spirit of worship.

It matters not whether one worships upon the peak of Sinai, or in earth's lowest vale; in the most sumptuous temple, or under the starry cope; amid the hosannas of a multitude, or within the closet's lonely silence; the divine condescension is not limited by any of these things. But there are certain considerations of tremendous import, because they are absolutely indispensable, and it is our sacred duty and privilege to hold them inviolate. They issued from the heart of the great Master when he declared, "They that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." That is, they must rightly conceive him and his requirements, and must render with all the heart the response which that conception demands. Such worship brings heaven very near, for it is a correspondence with divinity, and means the immanence of heavenly influences in the life, if the relationship is cherished and maintained.

MAKING GOSPEL ATTRACTIVE TO YOUNG

The great and final aim of gospel education is the knowledge of God, and of Christ his Son. Like all other knowledge or information, this can only come through association with our superiors—certainly never by companionship with inferiors.

The appeal to the reasoning faculties in our young people along the highest lines of ethical argument which they are susceptible of appreciating seems to be among the first things that present themselves to the practical mind.

I am separating this from what may be termed the superficial, but perhaps necessary and lawful, supplementary work of physical attraction that must be employed to allure infantile or immature minds, minds undeveloped as yet up to the point of appreciation of subjects, the analysis of which can only be unfolded under the light of intellectual and moral processes, to be had only in the schools of reason and experience.

The one question then of association and companionship—how much depends upon our choice in this regard—should, it seems to me, be the theme that might attract and claim the attention of those who have yet to have written over their life the word success, or failure, from a gospel point of view.

It has been said that the road to hell is paved with good intentions. We need, first of all, as teachers, parents, guardians, to warn young people that a friend of good intent only may be of very doubtful value as an associate.

Our young people should become interested in the great value of the thought that an individual whose knowledge and understanding of their real needs, that which is best for them, wisest and most applicable to their highest happiness, their permanent and lasting good, is the one whose friendship they should seek, whose acquaintance they should covet.

Their associates may be well meaning and of good intent; they may be very clever fellows, but the cleverness that offers to treat, often paying more than its share for the cigars or wine, a cleverness of good nature or generosity that ministers only to the carnal and hurtful appetites, that provokes only a thoughtless, harmful, animal sense of pleasure, is far, very far removed from proving its owner a real friend. There are very many really unselfish, generous-minded people in this world, who are, nevertheless, dangerous associates, simply because they do not know enough to be a friend in the true sense of the term.

And now, while this may be commonly accepted as being quite true by the so-called moral and religious sense of communities at large, yet, to us, to whom a special dispensation as teachers of original pure gospel principles has been committed, there is given the delicate and not always pleasant, and yet altogether necessary task of placing before the minds of the young the dangers that lie in the way of attainment to the real Christ character, by the substitution by modern religious teachers, supported and entrenched behind centuries of custom and tradition, of a modernized and corrupted form or forms of religious systems deceptively misnamed the gospel. I would have our young people learn to appreciate the fact that real character building in this age, from our gospel point of view, comes from a deep consciousness of the fact that our time calls heroism in the attempt to push our way back through tradition and error as revealed in the Christ of the first century, or in such glorious examples as the converted zealot, bigot, and hero—Saint Paul.

That there have been more mistakes of a fatal character, as affects the question of religion and the progress of religious truths in the world than in any other feature of the world's history, as affects its peace and its welfare, we must be made to understand.

"The road to hell is paved with good intentions." Saint Paul upon the road to Damascus, bearing the death warrant of the disciples of Jesus Christ, was as earnestly endeavoring to prove himself a friend to the world and humanity, to religion, and to God, as he ever was in his later life while striving to atone for what he afterward calls his "ignorance and unbelief."

The trouble lay in the fact that his early religious education and training did not permit him to know enough to be a real friend to God and humanity. Let us listen to him and the contrast made in his life by the eye-opening processes of the gospel as hinted at in this text: "And this I pray, that your love may abound more and more in all wisdom and knowledge."

Saint Paul had learned that it was not a zeal or good intent alone, from a human point of view, that affected humanity for its best good, but that the truths alone could and would "make men free"; that the only proper and real standard of friendship was that which God had erected.

The religious zeal whose chief counselor has been an ignorant, intolerant, spirit, whose profession and assumption of superiority is woven in phylacteries, but whose war against wisdom and reason has made it the enemy instead of the friend of mankind is a harmful zeal, a religious service which was characterized by the Master, himself, as "vain," and useless for good purposes.

It is, then, the gospel that saves that is to be made attractive to the young; not the church building, the service of song, the social functions that may be largely permitted to cluster around, adorn, or aid in its presentation or its development. Neither is it a genuine gospel attraction to present the doctrines of Jesus Christ as a prescribed form alone. The young must be made to feel and understand that baptism into Christ and his character is the necessity which the gospel imposes; and that water is only the outward symbol of obedience to his commands.

The intellectual and heart-force, then, the real spirit of the individual, must be appealed to in addressing the young, and the attractions of association must always take into account this important fact, "Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life," said the wise man. Let not a sensual, superficial, unintelligent, though good-natured and well-meaning companionship bar the way to your heart or engage its service or sympathies to the exclusion of the safe and permanent attractions of a gospel education, companionship, and life.

We have spoken of Saul as a zealous, but narrow, bigoted, honest religionist, but the gospel-transformed Saint Paul as of another and quite different value as a teacher of saving truth. So let the young people who come under our influence be made to feel in as kindly, wise, and yet forceful and earnest way as possible the danger of confounding the moral code, whose superficial contention has generally been associated in all ages with every species of religious bigotry and intolerance, with the high character and association that belong to the gospel revelations whose purpose is to perfect character, to furnish the world with ideal men and women—individuals in whom the purposes of God can be fully and completely wrought out. These are some of the intellectual and moral and social attractions which the young should be educated into.

Let us, then, as teachers and preachers, in making our appeal to the young endeavor to set before them the great and lofty ideals presented in the life of Jesus Christ. His complete and constant elevation above the commonplace, and policy motives that actuate men and women whose short-sighted vision prevents them from seeing in his perfected life the promises of eternal reward and glory that shall never fade.

Let the young be given to understand that the day and time, the worldly surroundings, the multiplied forces of evil lodged behind centuries of religious habit, call for an exhibition of intellectual analysis, moral courage, spiritual perception, the constant and persistent exercise of which will give us a repetition of the history of the first century, and furnish future history a list of homes successful in the imitation of the divine, as revealed in a Moses, a Jeremiah, a Saint Paul, and a Jesus.

AMERICAN CHURCH CONGRESS

The thirty-second session of the American Church Congress, recently held in New Haven, was especially interesting because the place of assembly was Trinity Church, of which the Reverend Doctor Harwood, who was largely instrumental in organizing the Congress forty years ago, was once rector. It was an outgrowth of the feeling among open-minded and broad-minded members of the Episcopal Church that there was needed an opportunity for the free discussion of matters vital in the life of the church, and a platform from which laymen as well as clergymen could be heard. It has offered organized hospitality to new ideas as well as old ones.

The topics discussed at New Haven showed the disappearance of most of the old ecclesiastical questions, and the coming to the front of questions vitally affecting the joint life of the church and the country. Especially valuable was the urgent appeal for closer watchfulness over the immigrant, and a more thoroughly organized service to him. The widespread destruction abroad will send a new wave of immigrants to this country; and we have not only to deal intelligently with these immigrants, but with the far-reaching impulses of cosmopolitanism.

Race prejudice continuing in this country may have a very serious meaning for the Nation, and it is impossible to escape the fact that the most potent influence in keeping race prejudice alive in American communities is religion; and the deepening of religious activity may, under certain conditions, increase the difficulties of the problem. There is demanded, therefore, constructive human fellowship between the Christian churches and the immigrant. The immigrant must be brought up to the standards and into the association that make American patriots. In a word, we must make the immigrants our neighbors, if we are going to allow them to share our destiny.

Attention was called to the fact that Sister Bartholomew's Parish, in New York, has for many years maintained the work in Chinese, Swedish, German, and Armenian congregations with foreign ministers in the churches; but children trained in this way have not come into the American church. Bishop Greer is deeply interested in the use of the chapels at the Cathedral of Saint John the Divine as centers of work among the foreign peoples of the city, with a definite object of bringing the foreign children as quickly as possible to membership in English-speaking parishes.

The discussion of the religious problems in schools and colleges evidenced the growing conviction that the religious element must in some way be emphasized in education in this country. The need of college churches in the great academic centers, especially in the universities of the West, was emphasized.

The "Relation of Christianity and the war" brought out the expression that the war was "a stupendous example of misdirected, misinformed, self-sacrifice." The Reverend Mr. Shipman, formerly chaplain at West Point, declared that peace in the hearts of men and among the nations is one of the essential features of the kingdom of which Christ laid the foundations; but that he put righteousness first, not peace. There can be no peace while unrighteousness has the upper hand.—The Outlook, November 25, 1914.

ADVANCE OF PRISON REFORM

The latest and most important testimony of the year as to the rapid advance of prison reform was presented by the recent meeting of the American Prison Association at Saint Paul last month. This annual conference brings together the wardens of prisons, the superintendents of reformatories, and the managers and directors of all manner of corrective institutions, both public and private.

It was very evident from the tone of the conference that many old and harsh theories of prison discipline and administration are giving way to a newer and more liberal philosophy of punishment. Wardens and superintendents vied with each other in Saint Paul in the recounting of successful and even hazardous experiments with the honor system, and the dominant note of the conference was, not only that "a man's a man for a' that," but that the man inside the walls deserves recreation within proper measure, consideration of his intellect and his loyalty, and, within reasonable limits, a share in the minor governmental affairs of the prison's daily life.

The persistent and thorough study of individual inmates, with the compilation of personal histories reaching back to early life and continuing into and during the full period of parole, was urged particularly by representatives of the Massachusetts Reformatory Prison for Women, where already very complete records are kept, not for the sake of keeping records, but for the sake of saving souls.

Finally, the question of the revision of prison architecture was raised, and it was asked whether the huge cell block and the high wall are not passing, before the small-group plan of housing inmates and the wallless prison camps with their healthier and more cheerful dormitories.

On one day of the session the most modern and complete example of the American prison of to-day was practically formally opened at Stillwater, Minnesota, by the excursion thereto of several hundred members of the conference.—The Outlook, November 25, 1914.

PREHISTORIC AMERICAN CIVILIZATION

[The Bureau of Geographic Information of the National Geographic Society, Washington, gave out the following bulletin last summer, which will be of interest to many HERALD readers.—EDITORS.]

WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.—Edward H. Thompson, former United States Consul at Merida, Yucatan, in a communication to the National Geographic Society, at Washington, District of Columbia, describing Chichen Itza, the home of a forgotten race, on the peninsula of Yucatan, declares that the American people should awaken to the fact that they have right at home architecture essentially American and ruined structures every whit as interesting and massive and possibly as old as those of other lands, who boast that Americans must come to them.

"Within these mysterious American ruins are great books, with pages of stone, writ in characters that no man may yet read," he declares. "Are the mysteries they hold, the wonderful facts that certainly lie sealed and mute within them, hidden from us, less interesting to Americans than are the tales of Egyptian dynasties, the rites of Druids, Roman campings, or Saxon raidings? I think not."

Mr. Thompson describes what was probably the first tennis or basketball court on this hemisphere and possibly in the world. "The ruined group of Chichen Itza covers a space of fully three square miles," he says. "Over all this wide territory are scattered carved and squared stones, in countless thousands, fallen by the hundreds, while the formless remains and outlined walls of huge structures fallen into ruin are seen on every side. Seven massive structures of carved stone and adamantine mortar still tower erect, and almost inhabitable. Their facades sustain the claim that Chichen Itza is one of the world's greatest monuments of antiquity.

"Several hundred feet to the west of the Castle Temple rest two great parallel moles of solid masonry, each two hundred and seventy-five feet long, thirty-four feet wide and twenty-five feet high. Between these moles is the Ceremonial Court. This level cemented space was probably the theater for the performance of certain rites and games of a ceremonial character. This belief is borne out by the fact that at a distance of six feet from the level upper surface of the mole two great rings of stone were fixed into the perpendicular wall surface, directly opposite each other."

Mr. Thompson declares estimates as to the age of the city vary from less than two thousand years to more than eleven thousand and five hundred years. An idea of the intricacies of the language of the people of the city is given by the following quotation from a document found there: "Lai u tzolan katun lukci ti cab ti yotoch Nonoual," which is translated to mean, "This is a series of epochs that elapsed from the time of their departure from the house of Nonoual in the land of Tulapan."

The writer tells a legend concerning Canel, the impetuous ruler of Chichen Itza, who loved the daughter of the ruler of a distant province. One day, a runner brought him the news that the Batab of a neighboring and far more powerful province had married the maiden. Canek and his warriors went to his enemy's city under cover of darkness, while all was revelry there in celebration of the wedding. After venting their fury on the drunken celebrants, they stole the bride of an hour and disappeared. Never again did Chichen Itza know its Lord Canek nor any of his band of fighters. Years afterward, a hunting band from Chichen Itza made a long journey to the south. They finally reached a lake, and in its center an island city. The city was Tayasal and its ruler the now-aged Lord Canek.

He also tells of the arrival, reception and subsequent flight by night of Montejo, one of the early Spanish conquerors, in 1525. The Spaniards, besieged and almost without provisions, tied a dog to a rope of a bell and placed food just beyond his reach. His efforts to get the food kept the bell ringing and deceived the natives into believing their captives were still there. When the ruse was discovered, the little band of Spanish soldiery was nearly out of the enemy's reach. The writer expresses the belief that the natives, desiring to be rid of their burdensome guests, shut their eyes and let them escape unmolested.

It is well to have visions of a better life than that of every day, but it is the life of every day from which the elements of a better life must come.—Maeterlinck.

READING FOR JANUARY.—PHYSICAL EXERCISE

A country boy became a city boy whose work kept him indoors and standing in nearly the same position most of the time. While at home on a vacation he contrasted his lack of exercise with his former opportunity for it, and with the almost ceaseless activity of his parents' life on the farm. He sympathized with them in having too much to do, but feeling the serious detriment to himself from inactivity, he said, "I believe too much exercise is better than too little."

Why is exercise essential to health and strength? What is the process by which it benefits the body?

ENRICHES THE BLOOD

According to instruction given by Professor Terman, "Vigorous bodily activity impels the rapid production of red corpuscles, and the formation of haemoglobin; while "if the blood be deficient in haemoglobin (the oxygen carrying element of the red corpuscles) the cells of the body gradually suffocate. In increasing the hunger of the tissues for oxygen, nothing else is as effective as muscular activity."

PRODUCES HEAT

A further effect of exercise is the producing of heat. Concerning this we read from The Marvels of Our Bodily Dwelling: "We all know that a fire will not burn unless it has air. In the process of burning, the oxygen of the air unites with the carbon of the fuel. This is called oxidation, and by it carbonic acid gas and other products are formed. . . . Oxidation is a chemical process, and chemical processes are usually accompanied with the formation of heat. Foods consist of carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen and oxygen. These are taken into the body and undergo a process by which the carbon and oxygen unite to form carbonic acid gas, and the hydrogen and oxygen unite to form water. This process is called oxidation of the tissues; and as it goes on in every cell, we may call the cells little stoves.

"In our study of the lungs we learned that oxygen is taken in and carbonic acid gas given out at every breath, and this process keeps up the fires all over the body in these little cell stoves. We might almost call the lungs and the pores the stove pipes which carry off the smoke and bad gases. The more a man exercises, the more the cells will have to do to repair waste, so we learn how exercise makes us warm. It causes the cells to work harder, to burn more fuel and to demand more new material through the food for repair, and this demand we call hunger.

"We can also understand why we are cold when we sit still. We do not take enough oxygen in the lungs to feed the stoves, and the lungs do not carry out the waste material very fast; the cells, not being called on to work very fast, do not generate much heat.

INCREASES CIRCULATION

"If exercise produces heat, we can readily understand that active muscles are great sources of heat. By pressure on the blood vessels they increase circulation, and this brings more oxygen to the tissues. Exercise uses up the tissue cells and they call for new material from the blood, so you see heat is created by this process of decomposition or combustion, as we may call it."—Doctor Mary Wood-Allen.

THE CHILD'S NEED OF EXERCISE

"Metabolism (the interchange of matter in the cells) is far more rapid in children than in adults. . . . The child has more body surface in proportion to weight than has the adult. . . . This involves more rapid heat loss and necessitates relatively greater heat production. The infant requires a larger proportion of oxygen and the amount of carbon dioxide exhaled is correspondingly greater.

"It is not strange therefore that any disturbance of the factors which influence metabolism, such as insufficient food, deprivation from exercise, lack of fresh air, etc., produce their ill effects upon the child more quickly than upon the adult."

The wriggling of the little child is Nature's provision to meet the demands of his growing organism. He must have exercise. And later when his feet can carry him, he runs and jumps and rolls and stretches for the same reason. "We can not teach little children to sit still and should not if we could. The ability to do so will come with a later development of brain centers. . . . The development of the child's brain is fostered best by a play life which is rich and varied and by educational exercises suited to its stage of immaturity. . . .

"Helwig finds that school work not only imposes a strain upon the nervous system but it also produces a destructive effect on the blood corpuscles. He concludes that arduous mental work produces unfavorable changes in the blood; that recuperation is marked by the elimination of waste products and by a more or less active regeneration of corpuscles. . . .

"Results of investigation indicate that school entrance brings a shock to the nervous system of the young child severe enough to retard growth. The retarding effect was most marked in the youngest pupils, those under six years of age. The authors who made this investigation conclude that entrance before six years should never be permitted and that many pupils ought not to enter school before seven or eight." A study of the effect of the school upon the child's state of nutrition reveals a loss up to the eighth year, followed by a slight gain up to ten, after which it remains constant up to fourteen. "The condition of nutrition found at the onset, which is excellent, does not return. . . . Up to the fourteenth year, there is inability to reach the original excellent condition. . . .

"As regards the development of the skeletal system, the fact of greatest significance for hygiene is the extreme slowness with which ossification takes place, and the consequent possibility of deformity from incorrect posture, lack of exercise, etc., during the growth period. Much that is rigid bone in the adult is soft cartilage in the child, and the whole skeletal system of the latter is plastic to a degree rarely appreciated. . . .

"Oker-Blom concludes that all kinds of school activities, including handwork should be frequently alternated with change of position and with physical exercises. . . .

SHOULD DEVELOP LARGE MUSCLES FIRST

"What many a child most needs to keep him well is room to live, sunlight, air and the opportunity to play. . . .

"The well-known law, that voluntary control of the 'fundamental' muscles develops before that of the 'accessory,' indicates that plays, manual exercises or instruction of any kind demanding delicate coordination of the accessory muscles (the fingers and hands, for example) should have no place in the kindergarten and need to be subordinated in the first two or three years of the grades. Excessive employment of the accessory muscles to the neglect of the fundamental often gives rise to symptoms of nervousness. . . . The modern school program with its overuse of the muscles of the eye in reading and of the hand in writing, coupled with the still more injurious neglect of the large muscles of the arms, trunk and legs, constitutes a universal menace to healthy growth.

OVEREXERTION TO BE AVOIDED

"Child hygiene and child physiology are far from synonymous with the hygiene and physiology of the adult. . . . The child's heart, compared to his arteries is small and must beat with great rapidity to maintain the normal pressure of the blood. During growth the width of the aorta increases only three times; that of the heart twelve times. The adult ratio of heart and arteries is not attained until the later years of adolescence, previous to which time all exercises and games making heavy demands on strength or endurance are dangerous."—Terman.

Doctor Hall writing upon this point says that for boys under nineteen, cross-country running should not exceed one mile.

Doctor Montessori advocates "a rational system of gymnastics, designed in one case to develop the heart, in another the chest, in another to modify the intestinal functions or to stimulate the material renewal of the body; while every form of overexertion must be rigorously avoided." She quotes De Giovanni as follows:

"I think that we should regard as an error not without consequences what may be seen any day in the gymnasiums of the public schools, where pupils differing in bodily aptitude, and with different gymnastic capacity and different needs are with little discernment subjected to the same identical exercises, for the same length of time.

"And day by day we see the results: there are some children who rebel outright against the required exercise which they fear and from which they can not hope to profit, because it demands an effort beyond their strength. Some have even been greatly harmed; so that one after another they abandon these bodily exercises, which if they had been more wisely directed would assuredly have bettered their lot.

"Experience also teaches that one pupil may be adapted to one kind of exercise and another to another kind. Accordingly, a really physiological system of gymnastics requires that those movements and those exercises which are least easily performed should be practiced according to special methods, until they have strengthened the less developed functions, without ever causing illness or producing harmful reactions."

THERMAL GYMNASTICS

"It is a principle taught us by nature that organisms in the course of evolution have need of heat.

"To live constantly warm, protected either by clothes or by artificial heat, so that the organism remains always at a constant temperature, is not favorable to growth because it deprives the organism of the physiological exercise of adapting itself to variations in external temperature, an exercise which stimulates useful functions. By perspiring in summer, we cleanse our system of poisonous secretions, and by shivering in winter we give tone to our striped muscles and to our internal organs, as is proved by our gain in appetite. . . . What makes us robust is a rational exercise of all our energies. Thermal gymnastics is consequently useful. It consists in exposing a healthy, resistant organism to changes in temperature, trusting to our physiological resources for the means of defense. Thus, persons who are well fed and well protected from the cold for many hours of the day, may expose themselves to extremes of cold for a time, in the same way that one with robust arms may raise a weight of many pounds for gymnastic exercise.

"But this differs radically from living continually in a cold temperature. The child of the lower classes, half clothed and underfed, half frozen in his wretched tenement is already deficient in bodily heat because of malnutrition. . . . Whoever grows up, exposed to cold after this fashion, has, in the average case, a lower stature than those who grow up in the midst of warmth, or in the practice of that healthful exercise which constitutes the ideal: thermic gymnastics.

SEASHORE GYMNASTICS

"Light also has a perceptible influence upon growth; it is a great physiological stimulant. Light contains in its spectrum many different colors which act quite differently upon living tissues. . . . It has been demonstrated that many colors of light have an exciting effect, while others, on the contrary, are quieting. . . .

"In regard to the phenomena of growth, it has been noted that certain colored lights are favorable to it, while certain others, on the contrary, diminish or arrest it; as the red and the green. . . . But for normal children, we must consider the light of the sun as the best stimulant for their growth. . . . A life passed wholly in the sunlight would be too intense; an organism that is exposed a few hours each day to the rays of the sun is invigorated.

"A sojourn at the seashore, so favorable to the development of children, is now believed to owe its beneficial effects to the fact that the child, playing half naked on the seashore, bathes more in the sunlight than he does in the salt water. . . . Gymnastics in the sun while the body is still only half dry would bring about the triumph of physiological life.

"We must not forget this great principle when, by planning home work for the pupils, we practically keep them housed during the entire day, keeping them for the most part employed in reading or writing; in other words using their sense of sight. The eye ought to rest its muscles of accommodation and the whole body be exposed to the full light of the sun during a great part of the day."—Pedagogical Anthropology.

Other phases of this subject will be considered in our next reading.

Prayer Union

REQUESTS FOR PRAYERS

Christmas: Prayer for our Sunday schools and Religio Societies, for the Prayer Union, and for all the auxiliary departments in the church, that each may be blessed in its work for the general uplift. That the birth of Christ with its wonderful meaning be not lost in the observance of the day.

Lesson, Isaiah 9: 6, 7; memory verse, Luke 2: 14.

SUBJECTS FOR THE FOURTH THURSDAY IN DECEMBER

Brother J. N. Cox, of Dalby Springs, Texas, requests prayers for himself and companion. One of his eyes is affected so that he can scarcely read. His companion has what she fears is paralysis of her left arm. These people are alone and unable to read much. They should be remembered.

Prayers are asked for Sister Edna J. Cochran, of Vancleave, Mississippi. She has been in failing health for some time and is now confined to her bed. She is a faithful worker, prominent in secretarial work in the district, and has faith in the prayers of the Saints.

Oblations

Just a word about oblations. It should be thoroughly understood by every member of the church that a willingness on the part of each must be manifest, "to hear those whose duty it is to teach the revelations which my church has already received," and that unless attention is given to this matter there will be misunderstanding and confusion among the members.

The Lord informs us that the application of the revelations in reference to temporalities, as found in the Doctrine and Covenants, and defined by the bishopric, should be acceded to. Every form of contribution in monetary matters comes directly or indirectly under the law known as the law of tithing, and that branch known as the oblation is to be carried out at every sacrament service, whether conducted on the Lord's day or at any other time.

The Presiding Bishop writes me saying, "The agents, however, are instructed that the oblations are to be placed in the hands of the Bishop and his agents, and this instruction has been published in the HERALD a couple of times," and it should not be used for incidental expenses of the branch. He further says, "Any good word of encouragement or instruction that you can say to them (the Saints) will be appreciated."

I have labored where for some cause or other not a single branch has attended to this matter. I would encourage every branch from Palestine to Australia to begin this work at their first sacrament meeting, never ceasing until the millennium is at hand, that the law may be kept and the Lord honored in all his work.

C. A. BUTTERWORTH.

BAYFIELD, COLORADO, November 13, 1914.

Editors Herald: Our baby, Elsie Grace, is dead! While in perfect health, she was suddenly stricken with scarlet fever which quickly assumed the malignant form and after a few hours, only, a mother's heart was broken as she held in her arms the silent form of one who, for two and one half years, had shed sunshine and childish blessing wherever she went. The terrible disease had driven the spirit from its tabernacle, and death had one more victim. The father, on an errand hundreds of miles distant, hurried home at once, only to step from the train and be greeted with these words: "Frank, your little girl is dead!"

But why continue this sad story? The above briefly relates the sad experience through which my wife and I have recently passed. And the severity of our grief was intensified by the anxiety with which we watched and waited to see what would be the results of the same disease upon the bodies of our next two older children. 'Twould be useless for me to attempt to describe our feelings, when, but a few hours after we had laid our little one away, the physician left our home saying, "I can do no more for that child. Your only hope is in God!" But she is with us to-day, and we acknowledge the help of God in her recovery, though we can not understand why such help was not obtained in the case of our little one.

I have many times thought when listening to testimonies wherein certain ones felt that they had "a great confirmation of the truthfulness of this work" when a sick one was raised to health: How does that one who sits by your side, who lost a dear one with some disease, regard that loss, that seeming denial, as "a great confirmation"? Two such instances are combined in our home, and we confess a dazed feeling as we ponder. Our younger boy was greatly benefited through administration, and both he and our little girl are now well. Our elder boy did not contract the disease.

Being exceedingly anxious to save any others similar sorrow, I want to tell you how this happened. Our little boy who is in school got a whistle from another boy who, unknown to authorities, was just recovering from scarlet fever. Several of the children in that family had it in a very light form,—none becoming very sick. Each of our children who were taken sick blew that whistle; the older boy did not. Will not every reader do their utmost to save others from a repetition of our trouble? Caution your children not to take whistles, "mouth organs," or any plaything which has been in another child's mouth. Even in the purchase of whistles, etc., a great risk is assumed. Recently a man was seen to take a little horn from a box on the shelf, blow it, put it to the lips of his little boy who also blew it, then returned it to the box, where that innocent appearing little thing may be waiting to send some child into eternity. Parents, be careful!

And now here I am a long way from home! I could hardly make up my mind that God required what seemed to me almost a cruel thing,—leave the lonely, heartbroken wife and mother. But through blinding tears she seemed to obtain a vision of some possibilities! And though almost crushed with the terrible loneliness and grief she said to me, "Frank, when you feel you must go, go! Do not stay at home on my account." Very likely these words set in cold type mean little to many. Some of my readers know the strength required to utter and feel such.

Ere I close, let me pay a tribute to those who have offered a word of sympathy. They have been God's blessing-bearers. The various letters received have brought words fitting to our experience and our natures. The greatest comfort received in this hour has come to me through God's children. The Saints where we live were very kind, supporting their "God bless you" with material assistance. Even from a distance came food and money with willing offering of "more if you need it."

Am assisting Brother J. D. Curtis in meetings at this place. Free Methodists are not observing the injunction to "take sleep in the hours," etc., but instead are keeping people awake with their "shouting." Their service Sunday night was a bedlam of confusion. What an interpretation of the Christian religion is thus presented to the nonconverted!

Are we giving the attention we should to our own interpretation? Is it not possible that the glory of the work of our Redeemer may be in a measure dimmed by us because of our having absorbed heathen tradition or superstition? May our prayer ever be, "Oh, send out thy light, and thy truth, let them lead me"; and may our determination be to follow that light, that our effort may be fully sustained by him who sends the light, till we will interpret God and his work correctly.

In bonds,

F. A. RUSSELL.

BOISE, IDAHO, November 16, 1914.

Editors Herald: The majority, at least, of the Saints of Boise still have a firm hold on the rod of iron. We are learning to profit by our mistakes.

At the first business meeting held after the Bishop's report appeared in the HERALD, the matter of helping further on the church debt was brought to our attention by some of the zealous sisters, and they requested that a committee be appointed to work with the Bishop's agent in collecting money for the church debt. It was deemed a bad time to begin because of local conditions, most of the brethren being out of work, times being hard, etc. But the committee was appointed, consisting of the three sisters who instigated the movement, and they claim the chairman appointed them as a sort of punishment for their agitation. If this was true the tables were soon turned, for almost before he knew what they were doing they had a promise from him to pay twenty-five dollars by next General Conference. However, our chairman is game, and takes some of the credit to himself by looking wise and remarking, "I knew who to appoint on that committee!"

This committee, Sister T. B. Jackson, chairman, Sister Mamie Fuller, secretary-treasurer, Sister Bertha Anderson, have organized, and served notice on us that there will be no excuses accepted, but that six dollars is expected of every one, and more if they can get it. Already one hundred and three dollars have been pledged, and thirty of it collected. We have thirty members in the city of Boise, half of them children, and I understand that the committee's campaign has not yet extended to the scattered members. One hundred dollars is not much on the church debt, but, dear Saints, if every branch according to its size will fall in line and do as well the church would soon be out of debt, with money left in the hands of the Bishop for the poor.

Do we realize what a wonderful thing this church organization is? How much God has done for us, and how little we do for him? Have we stopped to think that if every Latter Day Saint paid his tithing there would be no church debt? Neither would there be any poor among us, but we would be as Enoch's city of old, Zion would be redeemed, and Christ would reign with us. Truly "when a man's pocketbook is converted" he is a good Latter Day Saint. But thank God we have many such, as our Bishop's report showed.

We are prone to make excuses, and in time we really get to believe in them ourselves. "Our families need so much of this and that; we are in debt, and we don't see how we can just now; but just as soon as we can we are going to help the church along." Ah, dear Saints, is that what God wants? Is it what we have no need of that he wants us to give to him? Could not he raise all the money that is needed for carrying on his work? You know he could. But suppose he did, what good would that do you and me? We must learn the lesson of self-sacrifice or we can not enjoy the redeemed Zion, even if we were permitted to remain in it. We must root out every selfish interest, put God's work first of all, and trust his promise that "all these things shall be added unto us. Latter-day revelation (Doctrine and Covenants 129) tells us that the church can not receive the blessings they are expecting when Zion shall be redeemed until we respect the temporal law. We are not helping the Lord by keeping this law; we are the ones that receive the benefit. It is a business proposition, laws given with promise:

"Honor the Lord with thy substance, and with the first fruits of all thine increase: so shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine."—Proverbs 3: 9, 10.

"Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in my house, and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it. And I will rebuke the devourer for your sakes, and he shall not destroy the fruits of your ground; neither shall your vine cast her fruit before the time in the field, saith the Lord of hosts."—Malachi 3: 10, 11.

God required the "first fruits" in times past, and he requires the same to-day.

"The first fruits of all thine increase." That is something for us to think about. What is our increase? What did we bring with us when we came into the world? Have we not received everything since from the hand of the Lord?

I wish to leave my testimony with all who read this, that I have proved the word of the Lord in the short time I have been in the church, and I know that his promises are true and faithful.

Dear Saints, let us awake to a realization of our privileges! Let the Bishop's next report prove that we are "doers of the word, and not hearers only." If we do have to forego a few fine feathers, a few worldly pleasures, or deprive ourselves of something we would be better off without, or even if we must go without a few absolute necessities, let us see that the church debt is wiped out before the General Conference of 1915.

Let us not put this thought away for the future, but act on it now, even if we can only lay away twenty-five cents on the debt, and thus start a fund of our own. Then let us be our "brother's keeper" also, by calling his attention to the matter, and insisting that he do his part, that he, too, may enjoy the blessings that we expect.

"Awake! Saints, awake!" and let us not be idlers "in the vineyard of the Lord."

Your brother in the Master's cause,
J. A. GREENE.

MYRTLE POINT, OREGON, November 17, 1914.

Editors Herald: The writer is busily engaged in missionary work in this part of the world. I am pleased with this goodly land and the many excellent people who reside here. Oregon is one of the foremost States in legislation. Its constitution provides for the initiative, referendum, and recall. Therefore, instead of indorsing the old formula "Be it enacted by the Legislature of Oregon," etc., we read "Be it enacted by the people of Oregon," etc.

In the late election a number of measures were submitted for popular vote. The most of these were good, but the people approved only three. The book of amendments and laws with the arguments on each question, pro and con, constituted a book about as large as our General Conference Minutes. The ballot paper was half a yard square. The following measures were carried: A provision for the consolidation into one municipality of towns in close proximity; the abolition of capital punishment; and the prohibition of the liquor traffic. The first was referred to the people for decision by the legislative assembly, the second and third being entered and listed on the ballot paper by a petition of the citizens. In other words, the former was by referendum, and the latter by initiative. More measures were submitted, twice as many more, by the latter than the former method. They received equal treatment at the hands of the public. Among the measures turned down were the enforcement of the eight hour law, and the abolition of the Senate.

Oregon has placed the destiny of the people in their own hands. It is as a State what Americans have always talked about and written of, and what they have all really hoped to obtain, that is, "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people." It is working on the hypothesis that to give power to the legislature is to take it from the people, and, on the other hand, to transfer it to the people takes it from the legislature. In addition to restricting the scope of representative government, legislation by initiative and referendum also prohibits the veto power of the governor.

Prohibition was carried by a large majority, about fifty thousand. Washington also went dry, but not by so large a vote. We learn that Colorado and Arizona also voted in favor of temperance. We regret, to note, however, that California went wet, as did Ohio also. Ohio will probably go dry in time, but there seems little hope for California. Extensive cultivation of hop and grape vineyards is in the way of California. This election brings the list of dry States to about fifteen. There has been a great course of education on the drink question. Hence the enforcement of the drink law is becoming more certain. We can not safely legislate beyond the point to which we educate. Public opinion must be in favor of what our officials do in order to make it effective.

We are pleased with the progress made in the direction to sobriety, but it is very difficult for any one State or group of States to keep sober when "Uncle Sam" himself is drunk. But it is only a question of time until he will sign the pledge, too, for a prohibition amendment to the National Constitution is one of the possibilities of the future.

How pleasant it is to contemplate that during the present European war we live in a land of peace, where "All is quiet (emphatically) along the Potomac." The administration is to be congratulated in that we are thus free from the tumult.

Just now I am on a mountain top, the summit of hope and courage, and am living in the most beautiful part of this great Republic. I am near enough to the ocean to feel the balmy, exhilarating breezes that blow across the sea from Australia. That may be one reason why Oregon is so democratic. Another reason is, we have woman's suffrage here, which they also have in Australia. And, besides, I would rather be a lamp post anywhere along the Pacific coast than a church steeple in an Eastern State.

In gospel bonds,
A. C. BARMORE.

[We make the following extracts from a personal letter to one of the HERALD Editors.—EDITORS.]

MCGREGOR, IOWA, November 21, 1914.

Dear Brother: Since last writing you I have had some new experiences. First, I spoke in the Presbyterian church in Emeline, Iowa, for a week. The Saints thought that I could not secure the use of this house, but to their astonishment I was told to go ahead and occupy, which I did. The attendance was only fair, but good was done, for matters were left so that we can use the church at any time in the future. I think this was the first time for me to speak in a Presbyterian church.

Last Wednesday night I had another new experience. A Congregationalist preacher and a friend lectured against us, and I replied. The discussion took place in our church in Davenport, Iowa, and was quite well advertised, so the church was packed with a fine audience. The main feature of the debate, if you could call it such, was the attack that was made on the Book of Mormon, which neither of them had read. They claimed it originated with the Spalding Romance. You can imagine what was done to them along that line. They looked like fifteen cents when we were through with them. Of course, Joseph Smith was said to have been a bad character, but all they presented was Neal's statements, so when I showed the source of their supply of ammunition their last hopes went glimmering. I challenged them to meet us for a ten-night debate, when both churches could be placed on trial, but they declined.

Strangers came to me at the conclusion of the affair with congratulations on our defense, and said they were pleased to learn some things in connection with the church. I left the Saints rejoicing and wishing the discussion might have continued for a longer time.

Faithfully in the conflict,
L. G. HOLLOWAY.

GRAHAMDALE, MANITOBA, November 19, 1914.

Editors Herald: Having recently espoused this grand and glorious latter-day cause, daughter and I feel to rejoice in the discovery of the whereabouts of our elder brother, the Lord Jesus Christ.

It seems to us remarkable that we are here in this north country which is but a wilderness. Still, it was our privilege here to come in contact with a lone Latter Day Saint, isolated and supposedly without a friend, and whose joy seems to be in explaining the Holy Scriptures to the hungry and famishing who ask him concerning the hope that is within him. We can but utter praise to whom is now our God and thank him from the depths of our hearts for the instructions sent to us, although delivered by man, weak and mortal. We were not despisers, but instead did believe.

Our lot seemed hard in attempting the sojourn of three years in these wilds to secure a homestead which would enable us to have a home. Yet, here we found an isolated one who with others under like circumstances, need our prayers.

We have never expected to find a good man or woman until after the veil is lifted. We all have our faults and must each help the other to overcome. Rash judgment should not be. It is good for each of us to fortify ourselves on our weak side if we love our peace. We must not be too inquisitive, nor hearken to talebearers, for to be overcurious is to have troubles in multiplicity. Many things are misunderstood, and many probable things prove false. We should never condemn a brother or sister unheard.

May our newly-found sisters kindly remember us in our isolation. Our work is but started. My life companion is on the outer door as yet.

Your sisters,
MRS. W. C. AND SADIE CLARK.

Extracts from Letters

Elder G. R. Wells writes from Montrose, Iowa, under date of December 3, as follows: "I am out among the branches. Am having fair success. I go from here to Farmington for a week, then to Fort Madison. My home branch (Burlington) will be without their pastor for a few weeks, and, if I did my duty to the others, I would not be in much during the winter. But they at Burlington have claims for services as well as the others."

Mrs. O. L. Rockhold, Los Angeles, California: "We are hoping for a home in God's kingdom, where we will continue our labors for the Master and learn more fully to become more perfect in his way. While the struggle may seem hard to some of us, and while we may grow weary and faint, yet when we think of the glorious resurrection, as we all should do, and of the hope of that perfect day, we can but have a desire to press onward and upward. At these times there is in our minds no thought of falling away. May the God of heaven with the blessed influence of his Holy Spirit come to those who need."

Bell Lenon, Wagoner, Oklahoma: "We are trying to let our light shine. We are distributing literature to outsiders, that they may learn more about the gospel of Jesus Christ. I ask the prayers of the Saints that I may be relieved from affliction."

Sister O. A. Boynton, Ben Hur, California: "I would like to do something to help support the gospel. If at any time an elder may come this way we would be glad to have him stop and preach in our little schoolhouse, three miles from here. We have four boys, the oldest being eleven years of age."

Sister R. A. Ferguson, Bellair, Illinois: "We praise our heavenly Father for the spirit which has been a light unto us. One thing we appreciate in the latter-day work is the association of the Saints. Much peace, joy, and sunshine come into our lives in the gospel way."

Germany

While millions are engaged in the terrible conflict of war, the destruction of property, and the shedding of blood, causing sorrow, death and desolation, I am glad to inform HERALD readers that there are a few even upon the continent of Europe who have enlisted under the banner of the "Prince of Peace," whose kingdom is not of this world and whose servants are not for carnal warfare. This army is small, but now and then it is being reinforced by men and women who enlist under its banner, and who feel confident of ultimate victory, as the Prince of Peace himself has promised to be their leader and to be with them always unto the end.

I have just returned from a brief trip to Germany, having gone there because of conditions that needed attention. As that country is engaged in the terrible conflict of war, I found it necessary to secure a passport from the United States Legation, in this city, and have the same indorsed by the German Consul here also. I left Copenhagen on the morning of November 2, and enjoyed a very pleasant trip by rail to Gjedser, where we crossed by steamer to Warnemunte, Germany. This arm of the Baltic is only about twenty-five or thirty miles across. We arrived at Warnemunte a little after four in the afternoon.

No sooner did we step on German soil than we were made to realize we were in a land engaged in war. We were confronted by officers in brilliant uniform, accompanied by soldiers bearing arms, and were requested to produce our papers. As I was prepared for that, it caused no surprise. My paper was evidently considered O. K., for after a hasty glance at the same I was permitted to pass. Some of the passengers were delayed a while, but I think all were finally permitted to go on.

Evidences of the war were soon observable upon every hand. More than half the number of passengers on the train that carried us towards Hamburg were soldiers, some of whom had already tasted of the realities of war, as was evident by the bandaged arms and other marks that told of their participation in the great struggle. I observed later that many trains were running special cars reserved for wounded soldiers, and that some stations had separate waiting rooms for the wounded where they were ministered to by members of the Red Cross Society and others, who were also on hand on the platform giving coffee, lunch, newspapers, and sometimes cigars to all soldiers going to, or coming from the battlefield. A soldier needed only to show himself at the car window and some one would hastily and cheerfully wait on him.

That which at first seemed new and strange, as we grew used to it became common, and a group of half a dozen wounded men together was nothing out of the ordinary. In the cities of Hamburg, Hanover, and Braunschweig we would not as a rule go very far without meeting a number of wounded men, all of whom bore evidences of the terribleness of war, even though we were hundreds of miles from the battlefields. Of course the severely wounded were not walking the streets, but were in the hospitals.

It seemed to me almost as if the very air was killed with the spirit of war. While yet reposing in my bed, at an early morning hour, before daylight had fully come, in the city of Hamburg, I could hear the soldiers marching by on the street, singing patriotic songs. Later I stood on the street corner watching company after company of soldiers marching by, apparently all young men or boys yet in their teens being drilled or disciplined for war. They were fine looking, bright, and apparently happy lads, and as I thought of what might await them my heart was made sad.

In company with Brother Kippe, whom I joined in Hamburg, I walked through the great city, before so full of business and industry, now comparatively quiet. We approached the harbor, said to be the largest and most important on the European Continent, and the third largest in the world. Before the war it was full of life and activity, with steamers coming and going, others busily loading and unloading their cargo, but now lying still, as if deserted by their crews. The warehouses where so many used to find occupation were closed, like deserted castles no longer needed, the men formerly employed there now in the war, or perhaps without an opportunity of earning a livelihood, their families being without the necessities of life.

Then came the thought of the scene on the battlefield, of the dead and the dying, the wounded, the sorrows at home, of wives and children, fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, of homes laid waste and properties destroyed, and the many seeking refuge in strange lands and among stranger people. No wonder the prophet speaks of war as "the abomination that maketh desolate."

My special object was not to write about war. Other pens abler than mine are doing that daily, yet I am persuaded that but few can realize its terribleness except they have had the actual experience.

The war has been quite severe on our small membership in Germany, as out of only a little over one hundred, fourteen brethren have had to respond to the call to arms. I have not learned of the fate of all, but out of six from Hanover and Braunschweig, one is dead, three wounded, and only two were, when last heard from, still unharmed and well. It is hoped that the eight from the eastern part of the country have been more fortunate and have fared better. Brother Blome, whom I met in Hanover, being one of the wounded, relates heart-rending experiences that I shall not here attempt to repeat, but will only state that out of his regiment, composed of three thousand men, about one thousand came out of the fire unharmed, the balance being dead or wounded. Brother Blome was rapidly recovering, and almost too rapidly, as he fears he will have to go back as soon as he is well again.

The brethren in Germany, so far as I could learn, are not enthusiastic for the war, but regard it as a calamity, and those engaged are not participating from choice, but are compelled by the law of their country. They especially deplore the thought, as well they may, that some of their English brethren are in the opposing army.

In company with Brother Kippe, I visited among the Saints and friends in Hamburg, and on the afternoon of the 4th spoke to a few assembled at the home of Brother Adamski. Our next stop was in Hanover, where on the evening of the 6th we preached to a nice audience of Saints and friends and ordained Brother Gustav Huvendick to the office of elder. I felt convinced when nine months ago he was ordained a priest that his calling was that of an elder, and his faithful and successful work since then has further confirmed my conviction. He has been quite successful in winning people to the church; in the Sunday school he has also been doing a good work.

We were permitted to meet with the Sunday school on Sunday the 8th, and though the day was rainy and disagreeable, yet there was an attendance of forty-five, of which thirty-five were children under fourteen years of age, mostly from families not as yet members of the church. I was informed that the Utah people have tried to establish a Sunday school in Hanover, but had been prohibited from doing it by the police. Brother Huvendick had expected no trouble, but, on the other hand, had been told, We understand, there is nothing in the teachings of your church contrary to good morals, and there is no objection to your Sunday school. Our position is thus beginning to be understood even in Germany, and a distinction is being made between us and the Utah people. If all continue in faithfulness and work together in harmony, I look for good results at Hanover.

At Braunschweig, where we preached on Sunday night and also the following Tuesday night, there has also been a good ingathering, and Brother Gustav Gerwien has also been blessed in his labors. The branch has nearly doubled in membership, since I was with them last February. The enemy, ever alert to destroy or discourage, had made his influence felt to the detriment of the work, but I left the Saints feeling better, and some of them told me they would do better. It is to be hoped they may all have learned a lesson for their own good through the experiences had. We ordained Brother Engleske to the office of teacher, and trust that under the blessings of the Lord he may be able to watch over and care for the little flock, as his calling requires him to do, and be able to guard against all that is calculated to mar the peace and prosperity of the Saints.

I parted with Brother Kippe in Braunschweig, as I left for Hanover. It was through his assistance as interpreter that I had been able to speak to the people, and for his help I felt grateful. He intended to remain another day or two, after which he was going to Eimbeck, where a family was waiting to be baptized the following Sunday. Brother Huvendick also expected soon to baptize some in Hanover. I came to Hamburg on the 12th and on the evening of the 13th arrived here at the capital of peaceable little Denmark.

Some excitement was manifested during my sojourn in Germany, as Turkey had just begun taking a hand in the war on the side of Germany, which made the Germans feel jubilant. And all citizens of Great Britain were arrested and made prisoners of war while I was in the country. I was treated with kindness and due courtesy by all.

I can not but admire the industry, energy, and perseverance of the German people, but it seems a pity that they should devote so much of their efforts to militarism and war.

I consider the mission in Germany an important one. The prospects for the work look quite encouraging, but we need help in that field. Yet, I do not know what we may hope for under the present disturbed conditions. I hope the day may soon come when the church may be able to supply the needs of that field, so that the gospel may be preached to its millions of people.

In gospel bonds,

New York

We have been kept busy since last report, and are gratified to see that there is a tendency upon the part of many of the Saints to learn more fully their duties toward their heavenly Father. I find this to be quite a healthy sign, when one becomes enough interested in his spiritual welfare to make inquiry as to what is required of him as touching his obligations.

It causes the very soul of the missionary to thrill at the opportunity of making plain the things the Saints wish to know.

There is a noble band of Saints to be found throughout this district. Their hearts are warm toward the work of God and those of his servants who are trying to forward the same. It seems that those who try to do the work of righteousness must suffer not only persecution, but disappointment. Persecution follows closely upon those of the church of Jesus Christ who try to live godly in Jesus Christ. Satan surely has agents who are about as capable of carrying on his work as he himself is, some of whom bear the title M. D., and some D. D. From these do the Saints sometimes receive persecution as from others.

As for disappointments, they have been mine this year. Upon at least three occasions I have been very much disappointed, the latest coming about as follows: I had arranged to spend Thanksgiving with my oldest daughter and family in company with my wife. In fact, I was upon the ground. Preparations were being made for a partial family reunion. Tuesday morning brought the news that I was wanted at East Pharsalia, to lay away all that remained mortal of Brother Wallace Griswold. So hastily bidding adieu to loved ones, I made my way to Norwich, New York, thence by sleigh to East Pharsalia, to the home of Sister Griswold, who was suffering the loss of a loved one.

Brother Griswold was one of the pioneers of the work in that locality, and was spoken of highly by his neighbors. It was he who made it possible for the Saints to have a house in which to worship, he having furnished the material to build the new church under the hill, in which a goodly number of the servants of God have set forth the principles of the glorious gospel of Jesus Christ. Services were conducted from the home, and if numbers count for anything as touching a man's standing in a community, then Brother Griswold must have been well thought of.

The work is still onward. Elder A. D. Angus and the writer are holding forth at South Granby. Later on we expect to hold forth at Fulton, New York, with prospects of the waters being troubled again. So the work moves on. A few are heeding the advice and counsel of God and are being baptized.

May God grant his choicest blessing upon his work and people everywhere, is my prayer.

A. E. STONE.

Southern Missouri

I am just in from a trip into the southeastern part of this field. I was called to Mill Springs, to debate with a Mission Baptist. They failed to sign up, so I preached there with some interest. I then went to Piedmont, Brother John Walker accompanying me to help with my grips. I wish we had a few more John Walkers. He has the true grit, and proved it. I stayed at Piedmont about ten days and baptized five, all adults, making nine members there now. Among these is a fine young man by the name of Claud Hartnip. I look for him to be useful in the work. There were others there who believed the work and will yet come in with us.

I next went to Dagonia. There was no one to meet me at the train, so I had to foot it, five rough miles. The letter I sent one week ahead reached there two days after my arrival. It took a few days to get a crowd. I baptized six, all adults, and sold three Books of Mormon, one Zion's Praises, and one Hymnal, secured one subscription to the HERALD, and four to the Ensign. These people have the making of railway ties to fall back on, which is quite a source of income, and which furnishes relief from conditions incident to the drought. We are getting quite a band of Saints here. Brother Cunningham had previously baptized ten, making, with the six I baptized, sixteen. They are talking of building a church.

I would like to hear from the isolated Saints in Polk, Webster, Wright, Stone, and Lawrence counties.

HENRY SPARLING.

SPRINGFIELD, MISSOURI, 2002 Kilham Street, October 24, 1914.

Idaho and Wyoming

At the General Conference of 1914 I was appointed to labor in Wyoming. Later I was requested by the minister in charge to labor also in Southeastern Idaho. In striving to meet the requirements of this mission, I was compelled to travel with a team of horses. I repaired the gospel wagon, one I had used in former years, and in this manner traveled nearly a thousand miles in the interest of the church. I visited Upper and Lower Star valleys, Thomas Fork and Bear River valleys in Idaho, including Gentile Valley. I also visited Lake, and Bear River valleys in Idaho, including Gentile Rice County in northern Utah.

I have tried to reach with the gospel message the people who reside in these places. I can not say how successful I have been. Hindering causes too numerous to mention prevented me from accomplishing the good I had hoped to do. Not only have contagious diseases and lack of interest in spiritual things on the part of the people hindered me from accomplishing the good I had hoped to accomplish, but sickness in my own family has hindered to a considerable extent. My son Andrew, had a very severe case of appendicitis, for which he had to undergo an operation, which was successfully performed. The doctor was in doubt concerning his recovery, but through the mercy of God and the manifestation of his matchless power my son is fully recovered. My wife has also been under the doctor's care. This illness in my family has detained me from mission work to a considerable extent.

Have some work yet to do in Idaho and then I expect to go to the eastern part of Wyoming. I will be pleased to hear from any Saints or friends in Wyoming who desire to have the gospel preached in their vicinity. Address me at Border, Lincoln County, Wyoming.

To those true Saints among whom I have labored in the past, I desire to say I am as much interested in their welfare as ever, and my prayers are for them, that God will ever bless, direct, and enable each to overcome the world, the flesh, and the Devil, and eventually to be counted worthy to dwell in celestial glory.

Independence, Missouri

During the eventful days while our beloved president is to all appearances prostrated in his final illness and suffering, with his relatives and many of the leading men of the church gathered near his bedside, the Saints of Independence are privileged to listen to sermons from those whom they seldom hear. Elder R. S. Salyards spoke in the Stone Church Sunday morning, Elder Heman C. Smith in the evening. In addition to the kindly words expressed by these brethren, President E. A. Smith gave to the Saints in the prayer meeting of Sunday afternoon words and message of comfort.

The work of the Sunday school, attendance of which last Sunday was a trifle less than usual on account of light rains, the Religio and the auxiliaries of the sisters, the child welfare department, and the ladies aid, together with the home classes still continue their work.

The children are looking forward with bright hopes of doing much good during the Christmas tide.

Your sister in the faith,

AN APPRECIATION OF PRESIDENT SMITH

able to draw the proper "bounds and limitations"—has he interpreted the law.

The many years' service as a presiding officer has been a crucible which few men would like to pass through—we might truthfully say which few men could pass through and still retain their integrity. These years have been replete with chances to show partiality and opportunities to retaliate, but through them all the characteristics which mark the follower of the humble Nazarene have predominated.

A man's ability to handle an assembly is not alone measured by his knowledge of parliamentary tactics; he must have a deep knowledge of human nature, a wide understanding of the principles of jurisprudence, and be withal an intense lover of "fair play." These rare accomplishments and qualities President Smith possesses.

As an executive factor as well as a constructive one his ability can not be called in question. Disappointed hopes, blasted faith, and crushed confidence almost universally prevailed among those who were scattered during the terrible apostasy. To restore this "eternal hope"; to speak words of comfort and, "phoenix-like," revive their faith; to hold the helm of the old Zionie boat and steer it through the fearful breakers; to occupy, faithfully and well, the position spoken of by the Master, many, many years ago—"a wise steward over my household"—and thus to restore confidence, has fallen to the lot of this man. How well he has done his herculean task can be testified to by thousands of earnest, God-fearing men and women.

The fruit of his wise administration is reflected in the spirituality and intelligence of his congregation or conferees. Probably no such gathering of equal size and from such diverse surroundings existing to-day can compare with the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ for broadness of faith, intelligent action, and freedom of thought. Servility is an unknown factor among them.

CURRENT EVENTS SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

AGAIN IN PARIS.—President Poincare, Premier Viviana, Foreign Minister Delcasse, and members of the diplomatic corps returned to Paris from Bordeaux on the 9th, after a forced absence of three months from the national capital.

CABINETS RESIGN.—Report from Nish, temporary capital of Servia, and from Lisbon, are that the Servian and Portuguese cabinets have resigned. Cause in neither instance is given.

THE "JASON."—The Christmas ship Jason was accorded a royal welcome at Marseilles by representatives of the French Government when on the 6th, it left there the gifts for the unfortunate of France. On the 7th at Genoa, Italy, where the gifts for Germany and Austria-Hungary were unloaded, the Jason was received by representatives of these Governments. On the 8th a banquet was given at Genoa in honor of the American representatives.

RESTRICTING DRUGS.—A bill which on the 10th passed the House of Representatives and is now in the hands of the President, compels registration with the international revenue bureau of all physicians, manufacturers, and dealers who handle opium or its derivatives and similar drugs, and prescribes formulas for written orders for certain drugs.

EDISON PLANT BURNS.—On the night of the 9th, eleven of the eighteen buildings of the Thomas A. Edison manufacturing plant at West Orange, New Jersey, were destroyed by fire, caused by an explosion in the film house. The laboratory and workshop of Mr. Edison, containing valuable records and materials, were saved. The damage is estimated at seven million dollars with insurance of five million. Three lives are thought to have been lost. Steps for immediate rebuilding are being taken.

COLORADO STRIKE ENDS.—On recommendation of the executive board of the United Mine Workers of America, the miners of Colorado in district convention at Denver, on the 8th, by unanimous vote ended the strike in the Colorado coal fields. It was the opinion of the executive board that in view of the appointment by President Wilson of a permanent commission to handle future difficulties in the coal fields, the discontinuation of the strike would strengthen the position of the miner's union.

FAMINE IN NEAR EAST.—Ambassador Morgenthau has reported to the State Department at Washington that in Albania and Palestine three hundred thousand people are facing famine, and thirty thousand have already died of starvation. The dispatch was reported immediately to the Red Cross Society, which has issued an order for public subscriptions for relief. The Turkish Government has signified its willingness for relief to be furnished the destitute in Palestine. Jewish philanthropic societies of New York are organizing relief movements for the people of this country. Much distress exists also in Russian Poland, where as a result of military operations two hundred thousand Jews have been driven from their homes.

PAN AMERICAN ACTION.—The Pan American Conference referred to heretofore in these columns, and involving twenty American states, on the 8th, in session at Washington, appointed a commission consisting of the Secretary of State of the United States, chairman ex officio, the ambassadors from Brazil, Chile, and Argentine, and the ministers from Uruguay, Peru, Ecuador, Honduras, and Cuba, to formulate steps contemplating a more vigorous assertion of the rights of neutrals in connection with the present European war. The conference expressed "disapproval of the effects of operations of the belligerents in the waters of the two Americas" and urged a definition of the respective rights of belligerents and neutrals "as promptly as possible, upon the principle that liberty of commerce should not be restricted beyond the point indispensable for military operations."

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—Villa agents announce that on the 6th Eualio Guterrez, provisional president, together with Villa and Zapata, formally occupied Mexico City. A detachment of Zapata troops were on the 6th defeated at or near one of a number of towns known as San Martin, location not stated. An early campaign of Villa and Zapata forces against the Carranza army is anticipated. The citizens of Naco, Arizona, having previously petitioned the administration, now appeal to the senators from Arizona and to the President, asking relief from the situation at Naco, where five persons, including a United States cavalryman, have been killed and forty-four wounded by shots crossing the international border. Their petition contains the statement, "There is no safety in the streets day or night and very little in the houses." On the 8th President Wilson directed Secretary Garrison to order sufficient troops to Naco for any emergency. Brigadier General Bliss will be in charge of the United States forces there. Villa and Carranza authorities have been warned against a repetition of offenses.

CONGRESS CONVENES.—The third session of the sixty-third Congress convened at Washington at noon of the 6th. In a message read before a joint session of the House and Senate on the 8th, President Wilson advocated a Government-owned merchant marine, until Government carriage has become sufficiently profitable to engage private capital; passage of the Philippine bill; conservation of natural resources; the development of water power; ratification of the London Convention for safety at sea; economy and efficiency in Government expenditure. For the Nation's defense, a matter recently discussed and for which legislation is proposed looking to an immediate and radical strengthening of national armament on both land and sea, the President advocated the development and strengthening of the National Guard and the maintenance of a powerful Navy, all with "no thought of offense or provocation." President Wilson is of the opinion that, "We shall easily and sensibly agree upon a policy of defense . . . which we will pursue at all seasons without haste and after a fashion perfectly consistent with the peace of the world, the abiding friendship of states, and the unhampered freedom of all with whom we deal."

EUROPEAN WAR.—Germany reports the occupancy of Lodz, Poland, an important railroad center, with one hundred thousand Russians captured. The Russians state that this point was evacuated without the loss of life, and fifteen hours before the Germans entered the city, and that the retreat was for strategical purposes. Russian advances in eastern Prussia and Galicia are announced. It seems to be the effort of Germany to mass an attack against the Russian center in Poland strong enough to weaken the extreme wings of the Russian line in eastern Prussia and Galicia. Russian reverses are reported in Hungary and the Carpathians. The allies have begun aggressive action along practically the entire line from the North Sea to the Swiss border. Slight advances have been made at various points, especially in Alsace-Lorraine. The allies are supposed to be reinforced and stronger than at any time thus far in the war. Servia has checked the Austrian advances, and at some points has inflicted upon the invaders severe defeat. Russian success over the Turks in the Caucasus is reported. British victory at the juncture of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers shows that they have advanced about one hundred miles from the coast, at the same time protecting the Suez Canal from attack. Reinforcements from Australia and New Zealand now secure the canal. Portugal is preparing to send more troops to Portuguese West Africa. General Botha has declared the rebellion in the Union of South Africa to be practically at an end. Seven hundred rebels have been captured, two hundred have surrendered, and Generals Maritz and Kemp have escaped to German South Africa. French success is reported in Morocco, as is British Indian victories over the Turks at the head of the Persian Gulf. Two Swedish steamers have been sunk by mines off the Finnish coast, and a British steamer off the coast of Chile by a German transport.

fully realize that the schools in the aggregate have done splendidly in helping along the work by their Christmas offerings each year; but I have been so favorably impressed with the thought since reading the letter of Bishop Kelley, that with just a little extra effort the amount received last year might be doubled, and instead of the gifts amounting to about $10,000 they might easily amount to $20,000 and the opportunity is now present, to use this amount for great good in the advancement and the care of the work.

Will you kindly join us in urging your school to be one of the many to double their Christmas offering, so that when the accounting is made we may find that while our hearts have been filled with the Christmas spirit each one has not forgotten to render unto Him who gave up his life for us a Christmas token in remembrance of his great goodness and love?

To Sunday School Superintendents

I desire to supplement the letter sent you by Bishop Kelley under date of October 30, in which he called your attention to the coming opportunity that your school would have to make a Christmas offering for the benefit of the work.

Since reading his letter I have been prompted to write you that if possible I might aid in impressing upon you this great opportunity that the members of your school will have in bringing a Christmas offering and giving it to him who said, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest."

The work has so grown and expanded that there is special need for a more generous gift this year than before. We

THE CENTRAL FIGURE OF CHRISTIANITY

There is one figure in the history of Christianity that overshadows all others,—the founder and central figure, Christ. The tongues that traduced him have long been dust. Their slanders fell away from him and left no scar, as must sooner or later be the case with every good man. The luster of his life is undimmed by time; the purity of his teachings unrivaled by man. There is not found now anywhere, among Jews or Gentiles, among infidels or believers, one who will say aught against his personal character, and few who care to attack his teachings, when they are stripped of the traditions of men. Of him Ingersoll said:

Let me say here, once for all, that for the man Christ I have infinite respect. Let me say, once for all, that the place where man has died for man is holy ground; and let me say, once for all, to that great and serene man I gladly pay the homage of my admiration and my tears.

It is a significant fact that when the great agnostic looked over the ages to find a man preeminently worthy of the "homage of his admiration and his tears," he selected Christ, the founder of Christianity, a teacher of and believer in the Bible that Ingersoll made it his work to fight, though perhaps it is true that his bitterest attacks were against false interpretations of the Bible.

All he knew of the life and teaching of Christ, he learned from the New Testament. It contained a picture of one man sufficiently reliable and forceful to compel his homage, his admiration, and his tears.

Is it not a sublime thought that man may so live that the enemy will be silenced and the skeptic forced to admire?

Christ did that and that we must do, because we are his followers.

To enlist in such an undertaking is the best honor we may render to his name at this Christmas time.

The life of Christ was a distinct victory for all that is good, in that while he stood for peace and for equality he impressed the world more than any or all of the men who have exalted themselves by war and carnage. Alexander, Bonaparte, Grant,—none of these changed the course of world events or controlled the lives of individuals as did this man of peace. Moreover, their active influence, limited as it was, is now largely ended, while his widens and is destined to widen until all kingdoms become his kingdom, and all men render him the "homage of their admiration and their tears."

ELBERT A. SMITH.

JOINT ACTION

QUORUM OF TWELVE, PRESIDING PATRIARCH, AND PRESIDENTS OF SEVENTY

Inasmuch as it has pleased our heavenly Father to take from us the presence of our beloved brother, Joseph Smith, who departed this life December 10, 1914, we sorrowfully express our resignation to the divine will; and in profound reverence offer our gratitude to Him whose inscrutable wisdom and inexhaustible love characterize all of his providence, for the long life, gracious and noble example and unswerving fidelity to the cause of our "common salvation" which were ever the leading virtues of our beloved brother's work, and for the long life so full of honor, justice and good works, and his final departure to a well-earned and honorable release.

And inasmuch as in this sad bereavement the family of our late beloved President has been called upon to mourn the loss of an exemplary father, an affectionate husband and its most honorable pillar and support.

And further, in the event of death, the church is bowed down in inexpressible sorrow realizing that indeed a "prince in Israel has fallen," and lost a father, brother and companion in a most intimate and affectionate sense. Also this intrusion of death has left us without a president and official head for the time being, and consequently the chief presiding quorum of the church has been partially disorganized, we therefore as members of the Twelve, Presiding Patriarch, and Presidents of Seventy, whose names are hereafter subscribed, do hereby present the following resolutions:

1. Be it resolved, That we offer to the family of the late President Joseph Smith our profound condolences in this hour of loss and grief, and assure each and all of our sympathy and prayers, beseech-ing God to supply the promised grace to all who thus are called to mourn the death of so good and true and loving a head.

2. Be it further resolved, We hereby pledge our confidence in support of and fidelity to our beloved brethren, F. M. Smith and E. A. Smith as the members of the presiding quorum of the church; and acting in the Presidency of the church, until the convening of the conference of 1915.

Resolved, That we willingly acquiesce in the suggestion made by the presiding quorum that they in conjunction with the Quorum of the Twelve now in council prepare a joint epistle of advice, counsel and direction to the church at large in the present sad emergency.

JOINT EPISTLE

FIRST PRESIDENCY, QUORUM OF TWELVE, PRESIDING PATRIARCH, AND PRESIDENTS OF SEVENTY

To the Saints and Friends of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints in All the World; Greeting: It is with deep sorrow that we are called upon to officially announce to you the death of our beloved leader and President, Joseph Smith, which occurred at one o'clock in the afternoon of December 10, 1914. After a brief illness, throughout which he was permitted to enjoy his mental powers unimpaired and the association of the members of his family in his closing hours, the silent messenger called him from the scenes of his earthly labors and faithful service to the rest and peace which is the promised reward.

We share this common loss with all; and while our hearts are sad and we feel the loss of his courageous and cheering presence, yet we are grateful to our heavenly Father for the long life, unsullied record, and peaceful departure into the heritage of "the saints in light."

As we bid adieu to the grand and noble leader of our cause, whose passing we mourn to-day, we also hail with love and esteem our brethren who now will bear the responsibility which has been laid down by our departed brother.

The Presidency called a council of the Presidency, Twelve, Presiding Patriarch, and Presidents of the Seventies for 9 a. m., Monday, December 14, the following brethren responding to the summons: Of Presidency, F. M. Smith and E. A. Smith; of the Twelve, G. T. Griffiths, C. A. Butterworth, J. W. Rushton, J. F. Curtis, R. C. Russell, J. E. Kelley, J. A. Gillen, P. M. Hanson and W. M. Aylor; F. A. Smith, the Presiding Patriarch; J. McKiernan, T. C. Kelley, J. A. Davis, and W. E. Peak of the Presidents of Seventy.

This was in accordance with the "Letter of Instruction" which had been presented by President Joseph Smith, March 4, 1912, and had been indorsed by the Quorum of Twelve. In harmony with this instruction, the council unanimously decided that Brethren Frederick M. Smith and Elbert A. Smith, who are the remaining members of the presiding quorum, should continue as the presiding officers of the church for the present.

We can not but express our appreciation of the foresight and even superhuman wisdom which are exhibited in this document, which our late President himself characterized as "one of the most important ever given to the church"; the splendid spirit and the absolute and almost unprecedented unanimity of the council is the fruit and testimony of the inspiration which developed the movement and policy contained therein. It is earnestly hoped that this unity and cooperation which binds the brethren of the leading councils may spread and deepen among all the Saints throughout the world.

Because of these happy conditions in the prevision already noted and the harmony resulting therefrom, it is the unanimous opinion that there exists no need of a special conference; and owing to the fact that our work has been so organized and developed and that everything is progressing smoothly, it is considered advisable and expedient to leave matters as they are. Should there arise any necessity for change or rearrangement in the interim between now and the General Conference the Presidency will take care of the matter in the usual manner.

We pray that God will mercifully comfort and sustain the household of faith in this crisis and give to us all grace to carry forward to final triumph the cause which is dear to us and our fathers who lived and died in noble endeavor and unflinching faith.

As we pray for the household of faith we solicit the faith, prayers and support of the church in our work, and especially that the brethren upon whom now rests such heavy responsibility may have grace and power as their need.

With thanks to God for the guiding and support of the past, and with profound thankfulness for the lack of apprehension of the present and the splendid promise of the future, we subscribe ourselves,

Your servants for Christ,

FREDERICK M. SMITH,

JOHN W. RUSHTON,

Secretary.

PRESIDENT SMITH'S LAST MESSAGE TO THE CHURCH

[Editorial Note.—During his last illness President Joseph Smith left a brief, last message to the church. This message was taken down by stenographers in the presence of numerous witnesses. To it we append his testimony regarding the life and character of his father. At a little later date he made a personal statement to his son Frederick M. Smith concerning his work and successorship which will probably appear in due season. The message here reproduced was dictated during the night of November 27.—ELBERT A. SMITH.]

In the presence of these witnesses, as a last word to the church: You of the priesthood all know how hard I have tried to give the church to understand that its life and work did not depend upon only one man; and I bequeath the church the mass of the eldership, beginning with those associated with me, the Twelve, and the Seventy, the responsible quorums of the church, together with all others. I counsel the church to choose wisely, according to the instructions given, the one who will succeed me as presiding elder of the priesthood.

I have not consciously wronged any man or woman. I have no fear to go beyond the vale. I know not what awaits me, but I have faith in Him who fashioned the world, and who gave the laws to organize the church and permit the Spirit of truth to rest upon the entire body, not confined to one alone, but to all who have had the ability to become conscious of knowledge.

My peace I leave with those I have labored with. My blessings I leave with those I leave behind me.

I counsel my boys to be honest in word and in deed. Honor is that which men do by virtue of their integrity. My boys I can not leave wealth, but I can leave them an honorable name. This I do.

I ask the church to give consideration to my family in the time they shall need it; and leave my blessing with my companion who has so faithfully cared for me, and on my boys who have stood by me, and my girls who have shown such love and regard for me; and the friends that I have I leave with regret, but they will remember me.

The Spirit and the Bride say Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. Have faith in God and worship him for ever and ever. Amen.

(Immediately following the word to the church):

What is this that steals upon my breath? Is it death? Is it death?

(When asked if he had word for Fred):

I leave the work with him and Elbert, and whom the church may appoint through revelation.

You men who hear me now must remember what I say: My father was not a bad man, as the Brighamites have charged him, to my knowledge. I knew him to be an upright, virtuous, pure man with his family; and I have maintained the uprightness and integrity of his character in good faith. I know of no reason that has been presented that I should change my belief and now admit that he was a bad man. That was my living testimony; that is my dying declaration. . . .

I have no fear. If a man can be happy in dying and leaving a home like mine and friends like mine, such a host of them for the Master's cause, I can die happy. O blessed rest! blessed rest!

CURRENT EVENTS

SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

SCANDINAVIAN CONFERENCE.—The kings of Norway, Sweden, and Denmark met at Malmo, Sweden, the 17th, in conference over interests involved by the European war. This is the first time these rulers have met since Norway severed her connection with Sweden in 1905.

SAFETY AT SEA.—The London convention for safety at sea, signed January 2, 1914, was ratified by the United States Senate on December 16, with a resolution reserving the right to enact higher standards to be imposed upon foreign vessels in United States waters.

EGYPT BRITISH PROTECTORATE.—Official announcement on the 17th announces that "in view of the state of war rising out of the action of Turkey, Egypt is placed under the protection of his majesty, and will henceforth constitute a British protectorate." Thus ends the suzerainty of Turkey over Egypt, and there is taken from Turkey her last foothold in Africa.

TO GUARD NEUTRALITY.—It is announced that President Wilson and cabinet will send warships to the Panama Canal Zone to guard against violations of neutrality by belligerent vessels. Colonel Goethals states that, according to reports, wireless regulations have been violated and the Canal Zone has been used as a base of supplies. The Tacoma has been ordered to Canal Zone waters.

RATE INCREASE.—Increases in freight rates approximating five per cent, excepting on certain heavy commodities comprising a large part of the traffic on all roads between the Atlantic and the Mississippi and north of the Potomac, were granted on the 18th by the Interstate Commerce Commission. These advances will add about thirty million dollars annually to the income of the one hundred and twelve roads represented.

POSTAL SERVICE.—Postmaster General Burleson, in his annual report to the President on the 13th, estimates that there will be a surplus in the postal department for the fiscal year of approximately three and one half million dollars. He recommends action towards governmental ownership of telegraph and telephone lines; cooperation with states in road building to insure better service; aerial service; raising of second class rates on publications other than newspapers issued weekly from one to two cents per pound.

MEXICO AND UNITED STATES.—Another United States soldier was on the 11th wounded at Naco, Arizona, by a stray bullet. Three thousand additional soldiers have been ordered to Naco. The United States forces here are said to be superior to the combined lines of Hill and Maytorena. United States batteries are in place at points of advantage opposite both Mexican lines. General Scott, chief of staff, left Washington the 16th for Naco to use his influence to have the Mexican lines withdraw from the border. Large Villa and Carranza forces are said to be preparing for the conflict.

EUROPEAN WAR.—Occupying Lodz, the Germans pushed on to within a few miles of Warsaw. Austrian advances are reported from beyond the Carpathians and in Galacia. A German attempt to reach Warsaw on the north from East Prussia failed. Germany claims advances all along the line from the Baltic to the Carpathians. Russia announces German advances checked, making no reference to retreat. The offensive movement of the allies has become general, and is pushed by strong reinforced lines. The allies continue to make slight gains, especially on both wings, and to withstand counter attacks. The Servians have retaken Belgrade, and report the last Austrian driven from Servian soil. Montenegrin victory over Austrian arms is reported. The German steamer Derentie has been sunk by a Russian warship in Turkish waters. Turkish cruisers have bombarded Russian Black Seaports. On the 16th, at Guam, a United States possession in the Pacific, the German cruiser Cormorant went into voluntary interment. Diving under a field of mines, a British submarine sunk the Turkish cruiser Mesudieh in the Dardanelles. On the morning of the 16th, under cover of a fog, a squadron of swift German cruisers bombarded the English coast towns, Hartlepool, Whitby, and Scarborough, on the North Sea, killing ninety-eight, and injuring one hundred and forty-seven. When apprehended, the German squadron escaped in flight without loss. Diplomatic relations between Turkey and Italy have been strained by Turkish attack on the Italian consulate at Hodeida, on the Red Sea, and the removal of the British consul who had taken refuge there. An Italian warship has been dispatched to enforce demand for apology. The Vatican announced on the 12th that the efforts of the pope to bring about a holiday truce had failed, "owing to the opposition of a certain power." It is reported from other sources that Russia was the power referred to.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

THE "ENSIGN."—We call attention to the announcement of the Ensign Publishing House found in the miscellaneous department in this issue of the HERALD. The Ensign is doing a work, worthy the support of all; and especially should the management have the cooperation of those who may assist in the effort to spread the gospel message by the plan long ago adopted, and suggested in the notice referred to.

DISCUSSION OF DIFFERENCES.—Brother Ed Melosh, of Bellingham, Washington, sends us a clipping from the American-Reveille, published at Bellingham, which discusses the differences between the Reorganized and Utah churches in a manner which shows the author and manager of this paper to be well informed as to the developments of the church and of the Utah departure. The article mentioned was voluntarily published in the American-Reveille, according to the statement of the author, in order that the constituency of this paper might have correct information and be able to distinguish the Reorganized faith and people from those of Utah. The coming forth of the Book of Mormon, the organization of the church, the Utah departure, and the work of the Reorganization in succession to the original church are set forth. It is explained that Joseph Smith had but one wife, and that "the most authentic information available shows that polygamy was in fact established by Brigham Young." Speaking of the Reorganized Saints, the author says:

They are strongly opposed to anything but the one-wife policy. They do not carry their church into politics or into commercialism. The things they teach, barring the fact that they believe their leader is a "prophet, seer and revelator"; that they steadfastly adhere to the idea that the Book of Mormon is the word of God coequal with the Bible, there is little in the doctrines of the "Josephites" that is offensive to those of other religious beliefs. They are hard-working people, good neighbors, and law-abiding, and it is eminently unfair to classify them with the "Brighamites," who also are proselyting in this country.

INTERESTING ITEMS.—We are in receipt of an interesting letter from Brother Frank Gray, of Toronto Branch, and a number of mission letters, all of which reach us too late for the HERALD of December 23, now on the press. These will be published in due time, and as other matter in hand will allow. Brother Gray's letter tells of the successful opening of the Majestic Theater meetings for the year, and gives other items of interest.

FUNERAL ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT SMITH

[The following address was delivered by Elder Joseph Luff, Sunday, December 13, 1914, at Independence, Missouri, over the remains of President Joseph Smith. The prayer appearing with the address was offered by Bishop E. L. Kelley at the opening of the funeral services of President Smith.—EDITORS.]

THE PRAYER

Father, who art in heaven, we are gathered here to-day in order that we might honor thee as we testify to our love and appreciation of this thy servant who has gone before. We know he tried to honor thee in life, and to glorify thy name, and in the good works that he endeavored to carry out while in this life.

We come to-day, Father, as children of thine, and as brothers and sisters, and not only would we pay tribute to him, but we desire to honor thee, for thou didst give him long life that he was permitted to do much for thy children here in this life, and thou hast taken him away in accordance with thy great wisdom and pleasure; and we would ask thee, Father, that thou wouldst regard each one upon this occasion. We are weak children of thine, and need help and strength upon every occasion, and we especially need thy holy and divine Spirit upon this occasion.

We desire to come before thee in this worship and service in order that we may bear the token of our love to the one who has departed, and more especially that we may continue to honor thy name, who hast given us of every good thing that we have in this life, and hast provided that as we depart to the other side we may still receive of thy goodness and mercy, and behold what thou hast provided for thy children who have wrought that they might honor thee. And we ask thee, in the great name of Jesus Christ, thy Son, that thou wilt be with us now; that thy holy and divine Spirit may rest and abide, and that the services may be such as shall be acceptable unto thee, for as children we desire to bring forth such an offering as will please thee, and that will conduce to our helpfulness in this life, in order that we may be more dutiful unto thee than we have in times that have past.

We desire, heavenly Father, as we may approach thee at this time, and ask that thou wilt regard especially those who are near and dear to the one who has departed, by the ties of kindredship in this world. Bless them. Bless the one who remains as his companion. Bless, we pray thee, heavenly Father, each one of these children who are called to mourn, and we especially, also, our Father, ask thee that thou wilt remember these brothers and sisters in the covenant of Christ, and the many others who have been gathered in order that they might honor him who has in his life always held out that thy goodness and thy mercy were the highest and the grandest and the best things that thy children in this life could reach out for, and walk in accordance with thy desires.

And we pray thee, Father, in the name of Jesus, that thy holy and divine Spirit may bless each and every one of these; and as we shall depart from the building may it be with more hopefulness in life, in the integrity of thy truth, in the constant supervision of thy holy and divine Spirit as citizens of the kingdom of Christ when by and by we expect to pass upon the other side and receive its manifold bounties because of thy goodness and love and mercy unto thy children in this world.

Then we pray thee that thou wilt bless the exercises of the hour, each and every one. May thy holy and divine Spirit be with each and every one, and those who may speak, especially, our Father, wilt thou bless them, and bless those who may hear. And unto thee, our Father, shall be the praise, through Jesus our blessed Lord and Redeemer. Amen.

THE SERMON

My duty on this occasion is such as rarely falls to the lot of man. This statement can, of course, be interpreted fully only by those of like faith with the departed. There is very much within my knowledge of our President which he deserves the expression of at my hands, but which I know he would rather would not be said. There is, therefore, very much expected of me in this line by some of those here assembled which will not be forthcoming in my effort. I know several men who could do better than I can, but I know of no man who could do full justice to the occasion.

I dare not trust my emotions nor my tongue in an extemporaneous effort, hence I have tried to commit my thoughts to writing, so that, should I fail of ability to read them, another may occupy and present them in my stead. The combined wishes of the general and local church officers as well as of the family that I make this attempt, and a complete willingness on my part to serve in any capacity where I may help to meet the solemn exigencies of the hour, and thus pay a feeble tribute to the man we all have so dearly loved, is my reason for attempting what I feel to be the task of my life, for in this event death has dealt as hard a blow as it can to me.

A reading of the instructions written by himself concerning the arrangements for and conduct of his funeral obsequies, in which he has plainly requested that everything that would present him more conspicuously in his deservings, before the public, than others of his faith-fellows, be avoided, will explain to you why my pen refrains from going into all the details of evidence that flood my memory and have marked his personal and official life, and by reason of which a legacy has been left the church and his family more precious than accumulated gold or rubies, and more imperishable than was ever acquired by the blare of trumpets, the clashing of steel, and the roar of cannon.

By the appointment of God, Joseph Smith believed himself to be largely the property of the church and the servant of men, and hence gauging his character development and facing his life obligations in the light of his Master's Sermon on the Mount, he gave himself to the people, and from the first moment of that consecration till that one when his heart suddenly ceased to beat he never once evinced a desire to remove from the altar what he had voluntarily placed thereon. No bait could lure him—no threat could drive him—no argument could persuade him to recall what he had once dedicated at the shrine of his love for God and man, and that dedication embodied his all, without reservation for sake of personal ease or wealth or pleasure. He had but one ideal before him in this, and that ideal was Jesus Christ.

In the course of some remarks made by him shortly before his death he said, "I have never handled a dishonest dollar, nor am I conscious of having ever done any man a wrong." Later he said to me (a few hours before he left us), "You know, Joseph, that no man, unless it was my father, has ever passed through this life circumscribed as my life has been." The full meaning of that statement but few, if any, can fathom. View his life of eighty-two years, and especially his official life of fifty-four years, from whatever angle we may, our vision can not escape the divine factors that equipped him and furnished the elements for development or restraint which enabled him to so well fill his place as a man of destiny.

Born under the ægis of that spiritual afflatus that characterized the church at Kirtland in 1832, and nurtured under the anxieties that persecution later gave rise to; then swept from pillar to post in the forced migrations of the church, from Ohio to Missouri, and from Missouri to Illinois; torn at the sword's point from his father's embrace when that father was in the hands of a military mob and under sentence to be shot; denied the privilege of a parting kiss from the lips of that father who was afterwards incarcerated in a dungeon; daily a listener throughout his boyhood years to the recitals that told of the brutal treatment, including the tarring and feathering to which that father and others had been subjected; the family home invaded time and again under or without pretended process of law, by men who sought his father's life; and, finally, when but twelve years of age, confronted with the mortal remains of that father as they were brought home from Carthage, riddled with assassins' bullets; a mother widowed and a home desolated, for no other reason, so far as he could learn, than that his father had persisted in maintaining his religious convictions under the direction of God. And all this, as to its final enactments, while his father was under the pledged protection of the State in which he lived.

Think of this, my hearers, and think how many men of strong will and natural impulses have, under less provocation, become poisoned against all governments and men, and, becoming bandits or anarchists have Ishmaelized themselves against creation, arrayed their hands against every man and made vengeance their watchword for ever afterwards. Add to this the infamy of that apostasy that occurred within the church, when men corrupted by lust and regardless of both divine and human law, first secretly, but afterwards (when drunk with self-assumed place and power) openly in Utah gave free rein to their adulterous amours, and turned the once pure church avenues into veritable cesspools of iniquity; then, in an effort to sanctify or make acceptable to the great body their abominations, they fabricated a document, calling it a revelation from God, authorizing their bestialism and published it to the church and the world, attaching the name of Joseph Smith to it in a way to indicate that as a Prophet of God he had received it a year before his death.

This occurred in August, 1852. Joseph Smith had been in his grave over eight years, and it was left, therefore, for his true followers and his family descendants or survivors alone to protest against this infamous and slanderous imputation. This they did. The Reorganized Church which had come into being the April preceding had also announced itself as unalterably and unequivocally antagonistic to polygamy and kindred doctrines, believing them to be the doctrines of devils.

Think of it, my friends: Little Joseph, or Young Joseph, as he was called, was then twenty years of age, just the age when budding manhood needed the help or support that makes for its encouragement in breasting the tides or launching forth to take advantage of the elements that the world should offer to every man who sees a purpose in life. But what did this young man find to encourage him to begin the prosecution of an upright career, or carve for himself a name of honor and credit?

The ear that he turned toward the world was saluted with the vituperation and anathemas that ignorance and religious bigotry through press and rostrum and pulpit were directing against his father's name and work; and even in the immediate locality where he lived the atmosphere was aflame with threats and calumny.

The ear that he turned towards the largest gathering of erstwhile Saints (now in Utah) was saluted with the sounds of sensualism and violated law—both human and divine, and amidst this revelry of sounds he heard his father's name interblended disgustingly and, as he believed, without warrant.

What was he to do? From whence was he to draw his help or hope or encouragement? The only passport to the world's avenues of success for him was a denunciation of his father's claims in toto. The only passport to Utah and the aggrandizement it offered was an admission that his father had been a criminal and an acceptance of the philosophy that was an offense to his righteous sense. Again I ask, Where was his source of help? Truly, as he told me just before his death, his life had been circumscribed as no other man's life had been.

Too just to arraign God, as many had done; too honorable to sacrifice a conviction in order to gain access to the world's avenues of promotion; too noble to accept a bribe or to consent for a moment to the imputations upon his father's name so apparently unwarranted in the light of his personal knowledge of that father and of the record made by him; too inexperienced to know how or where to turn in certainty as related to the walks of men, he resolved upon one thing, which I heard him publicly state years afterward in the city of Saint Thomas, in Canada, in 1878, I think, namely: that, whatever the facts might be, he would endeavor to live so that no man would ever be able to speak an ill word of his father because of the conduct of his son. Thus determined and pledging himself within himself to a life devoted to the redemption of his father's name from the ignominy to which an unjust world and traitorous associates had consigned it, he betook himself to God, and thence began the converging of the forces and graces within him, which under the divine economy were to become divergent in their outshining and make his life a blessing to many. So brilliant and extensive was the luster of that outshining that the mercy of it compassed even the cruelest of his father's persecutors in later years, and carried both forgiveness and aid from his heart and hand to certain of those whose hands carried the bloodstains of his father's murder, while his great heart breathed a prayer, mingled with the tears that channeled his cheeks, that God, too, would forgive the man who had helped to make him fatherless.

In response to his earnest appeal to God for direction, he was invested and environed on one occasion with what he called a glorious light, and told among other things that the light where he then stood was greater than that attending the people in Utah; that he was to have nothing to do with polygamy except to oppose it. To this counsel, as we all know, he proved faithful, and never allowed a fitting opportunity to pass without antagonizing the evil by all means within his power. I have stood or sat by his side on the public platform in Canada and in different States, including California, Idaho, Montana, Iowa, Illinois, Missouri, Massachusetts, and in many cities and towns in Utah (where we were associated as missionaries for over six months), and have heard him denounce the evil in unmeasured terms, employing the Bible, the Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants, as well as the statutes of the States under which the church had lived, to emphasize his arraignment and condemnation.

On one occasion in Provo City, Utah, in the largest public building, before an immense assembly and with a number of the strongest men and most ardent polygamists arranged in phalanx before him, their attitude betraying a determination to overcome him or minimize his effort by the magnetism of their presence and influence, I saw and heard him excel himself in the force and intelligence of the splendid effort he made as he measured out the cold facts, employed the strong arguments, introduced the law and laid the ax thereby at the root of their philosophy, and then coolly challenged them to take an advance step toward him, if they dare, to dislodge his position or offer even a faint apology for theirs. Needless to say, they did not attempt it; but, with all their combined and concentrated efforts to psychologize the man, he paralyzed them and left the place triumphantly, though the effort made him reel, till I had to steady him in his walk all the way home. Again in the Walker Opera House, in Salt Lake City, in 1885, before thousands of people, I heard him deliver a powerful arraignment, and then tell of the revelation authorizing him to oppose polygamy, after which he declared that he had never missed a proper opportunity for doing so, and, raising his right hand, he solemnly cried out: "And so help me God, I never will."

In Ogden, Plain City, Springville, Payson, Spanish Fork, Pleasant Grove, Logan, Lehi, American Fork, Ephraim Beaver and a number of other cities of Utah, as well as towns in Idaho and Montana, I was his associate and listened to him as he repeated his efforts in the same line, often in the presence of leading dignitaries of the dominant church in those places.

In the year 1853, after a severe and protracted illness, his mind was greatly disturbed in regard to what his life work was to be. He was then a student of law, but unsettled as to his future course. The Lord, however, was at work with him, and one day, in broad daylight, the walls of the building around him suddenly faded from his sight and there opened before him a vision of two conditions which we have not time to here detail. He was told by a personage who stood by him that he must make his choice between these, but to do it deliberately, for there could be no recall of his decision when once made. The vision then closed and he stood in the room as before. He acted upon the advice given, and settled himself as to his life purpose. And about the beginning of 1860 he received what he believed to be instruction from God to unite with the little band that had started the Reorganization, and in April, 1860, he accompanied his mother to the conference at Amboy, Illinois, and there was welcomed, elected and ordained by the assembled Saints who had been notified by revelation of his coming, to the office which he continued to hold till the day of his death.

Thus he began his public career, and from thence he has been ours in an especial sense, to be studied as a man, to be regarded as a counselor and leader, to be measured in the light of the gospel philosophy he advocated, and to have his entire career pass under our inspection and be judged by comparison with the Christ whose representative he claimed to be.

What is our verdict to-day as to the man, and what the character of the tribute we are justified in paying him—the last one while his mortal remains lie in our presence? He has asked that we speak but little of his virtues publicly; but this was only an additional evidence of his worthiness of a tribute at our hands. We must not go far afield, but his life was ours—he gave himself to us, and for fifty-four years he has walked among us—our companion, our brother, our servant by the will of God, and what shall our tribute be? God help us to pay it—not only in words of eulogy, but in life responses that answer to the virtue of his counsels and exhibit the fruit of his holy impress upon us, the reflections of his course as a president, his love as a brother, his deportment as a man. From every sphere occupied by him lessons have been learned by the observant and the benefits of them will continue to appear.

One lesson he diligently sought to impart was that the success of our church work depended not upon his continuance with us, or the presence of any man, save the man Christ Jesus. His example was one of lowliness. The consciousness of his official rank never took him above the social level of the rank and file of the great body. He was the companion of all, and no air of superiority was ever exhibited by him in his comminglings with the people. He never sought an easy place, but was always found where the heaviest burdens were to be borne, and with his hands at the lifting handles. It was never "Go and do," with him. It was always "Come and do" what was required. He was a man with whom you could safely intrust your confidence without fear of betrayal, even though you should later become estranged from him and act as his enemy. He never allowed the wrongdoings or abuses or bad qualities of his enemies to blind him to the good that was resident in them, nor to prevent him from acknowledging it. He never allowed a man to drop in his estimation or forfeit his affection because of having violently antagonized his positions in public discussions within the church. He acquiesced gracefully in the decisions of the body, even though they were sometimes contrary to the ideas expressed by himself, and was always willing to lend his aid to put those decisions into execution and to rejoice over their success, if they proved successful. If they proved a failure he never greeted the promoters of the movement with a tantalizing "I told you so," but usually found some modicum of good acquired by the experiment with which to congratulate them. He frequently paid high tribute to the nobility, the trustworthiness and devotion to principle which characterized the men who openly antagonized him at times, and only a few days before his death he mentioned the names of a few of them to me and said frankly, "They understood the situation better than I did at the time, but even while they opposed me I never loved them the less for it. They were noble men, and I could trust them anywhere." By divine help and early experience he had learned the lessons of self-denial and self-control, and his entire official life furnished a magnificent exhibition of it, even under the severest provocation.

His idea of the meaning of true religion made him a visitor in the sick chamber, a defender of the defenseless, a helper of the helpless, and always a sympathizer with the "under dog." He was a poor man, as to worldly possessions, when he accepted the church presidency in 1860, and, unlike many other religious leaders, he was just as poor a man when, at the bidding of death, he surrendered it in 1914. Office brought him no emoluments. Money, to him, was only worth what good he could do with it. He never kept a dollar that he knew some one else needed more than himself. He never had a penny for luxury for himself, but he had always one for the needy and a tear for the sorrowing. Many a journey has been undertaken by him under cover of night, to carry food and clothing, unseen, to the homes of needy ones with whom he was acquainted, and I could name some from whose door the "wolf" was kept thus by his ministrations in early days; and more than one missionary, far from home, has received in a time of extreme need the contributions of this man from his own meager store. But he always tried to keep the knowledge of these things from the public. There was no ostentation with him.

His early life and experience was enough to have embittered his entire life and make him revengeful and malignant of disposition toward all men; but instead of this he was the friend of all—he loved all men, and his chief delight was in drawing upon himself to his limit in his efforts to bless. Instead of being morose, he was cheerful and even humorous, and this disposition asserted itself almost to his closing breath and inspired a like feeling in all around him.

The first time I saw him was at Plano, Illinois, in April, 1877, as he was trudging along the center of the street, propelling a large wheelbarrow, filled with coal, from the coal yard to his home; and wherever I have seen him since that time, whether in private circles or public capacity, as the guest of my home or I at his, the same humility, the same distinguishing characteristics of the man have impressed me and made me feel anxious to get in closer touch with the sources of his excellence.

As presiding officer in the counsels of the church, before increasing infirmities of suffering and age began to incapacitate him, he always appeared to me like a man made for the place. His decisions were made with firmness, yet tintured always with those expressions that captured the hearts of belligerents. He seemed capable of deciding to a hair's breadth, and the predominating element of love that pervaded the atmosphere of his actions was the commanding grace that won us all. He never knowingly took advantage of his position as presiding officer to influence the action of the body. Whatever his private opinion on a subject under discussion might be, he was determined that both sides should have equal opportunity for ventilation of their views, and seldom, unless his opinion was asked for, could it be told by his expression where he stood on the propositions being discussed.

His titles include Prophet, Seer, and Revelator, but in service, to my thinking, he was more of a "revelator" than a prophet to the church, inasmuch as his communications had to do chiefly with explaining prior communications, and regulating and directing the church procedure, rather than foretelling the future or forecasting events, though in a number of those given through him, to private individuals especially, the prophetic feature was exhibited.

Over thirty years ago he said to the church, unofficially, that he did not know how long he would live, but he would remain till the name of Latter Day Saint was largely relieved of the odium unjustly attached to it and was made honorable in the places where it had been held in contempt. We have only to contrast the conditions when he began his work with those that environ us now, to note the fulfillment of this. Nauvoo and surrounding country was decrying, denouncing and threatening, traducing his father's name and forbidding Latter Day Saints from living, preaching, or even praying in that locality.

To-day the church is in receipt of numerous requests for its return and settlement there. Independence, Missouri, had recorded itself with Far West and other places with an emphasis of hate that warned the Saints that to come here was to take a terrible risk. To-day it is in tears. This present funeral gathering is eloquent in testimony of esteem and sorrow. Our telephones have for days been busy transmitting expressions of sorrow over his sickness and death, from the lips of scores who are not of our faith, but who knew the man or knew of him. Our public prints are teeming with articles paying magnificent tribute to his memory. Allow me to read just one, an editorial from The Kansas City Journal of yesterday:

In the ecclesiastical dogmas which made up the denominational belief of the late Joseph Smith the general public has no particular interest. But in the death of the late venerable head of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints the country loses an interesting and useful citizen. Joseph Smith was considerably more than a powerful churchman, into whose keeping had been committed the destinies of one of the great denominations of the world.

Those who ignorantly confounded the Reorganized Church with Mormonism, in the objectionable acceptance of that term, will not appreciate the theological distinctions between the two, nor understand that nothing was more hateful to Joseph Smith than the doctrines of Brigham Young, with their polygamous teachings and all the other features which make Utah Mormonism obnoxious in the eyes of the average American.

But all who ever came in contact with Joseph Smith could readily appreciate the broad charity of his tenets; the untarnished private life he lived; the unswerving devotion to duty which he always displayed; and the simple modesty of his relations toward his church and the world at large. To his church he was the Prophet whom all its communicants revered, but he was also the unostentatious leader who constantly practiced the virtues which he enjoined upon his followers. To the world he was the blameless citizen who walked before all men as an example, and whose interest in the movements that made for the welfare of the community always had his heartiest support.

Perhaps nothing could give a clearer insight into the character of Joseph Smith than the directions which he issued shortly before his death in respect to his funeral. Disliking nothing so much, next to sham, as ostentation, he directed that his funeral should be conducted with the utmost simplicity, without any of the elaborateness which his followers would otherwise have provided in order to testify to the honor in which they held him. He was the Prophet, but first of all he was the Christian gentleman and the good citizen. As such he lived; as such he died; as such he will be remembered by all outside the household of his faith. His followers themselves can have no legacy of remembrance more honorable than this appraisal of the people among whom he lived and labored so many years.

Kindly, cheerful, loyal to his own creed, tolerant of those of others, standing for modesty, simplicity, good citizenship, embodying in his private and public life all the virtues which adorn a character worthy of emulation—such is the revelation which Joseph Smith leaves to the world, as the real interpretation of an ecclesiastical message translated into terms of human character.

What better tribute could truthfully be paid to any man that ever lived? And this but voices the sentiment that pervades the atmosphere of all places where he has lived or been known. And remember that in earning these tributes or to obtain them, Joseph Smith never trailed his gospel flag—never sacrificed a church principle—never was disloyal in word or act to the restoration work of which he was made a leading representative and exponent. What language, then, could be considered flattery upon our lips, that was employed in uttering encomiums upon a life, handicapped as was his, that, perforce of its magnificence, could soften the heart of a world and elicit therefrom such a tribute as this? What could be more voiceful of a divine supervision of this man's life than this? Thank God for the arbitrations of time, and their assurances of final gospel triumph!

Thirty-three years ago Joseph Smith said he would live till a man would be able to walk from Lamoni, Iowa, to Independence, Missouri, and find homes of Latter Day Saints all along the route in which to take his regular meals and lodge every night. This, too, has been fulfilled.

He united his interests with the Reorganization when but a handful or "remnant" of faithful church adherents were available for aggressive or defensive warfare in the interests of the angel's message. Fifty-four years later he leaves it with an enrollment of over seventy thousand.

He was an ardent worker in the temperance cause and delivered lectures in many places in its interest. When our local option fight was on several weeks ago, though he was feeble in body, he had them take him to the polls to record his vote in its favor. He always held himself subject to the call of those directing the work of promoting its interests. A few days before his death, when told by his physician that his end seemed near, he called his three minor sons to his bedside, and, taking each in turn by the hand, asked for and received promptly a promise from them that they would never drink intoxicating liquor as a beverage, or use tobacco in any form. He then expressed his gratitude to them and breathed a brief prayer for God's blessing upon them.

As a husband and father he was all that his profession and position suggested he should be, or those relations called for; and but few can truthfully say what we heard him say a few days before dying, when speaking to his sorrowing wife, who had so faithfully attended him throughout all his afflictions, viz, that no mean or unkind word had ever passed between them. I heard him some years ago say the same thing regarding his former wife, just before her death.

He was a "large" man, made to fill a large place, and he occupied well. He was a born leader, and his winning charm was love, and he deserves well in tribute at the hands of all those to whom his life endeared him; hence, as one of many thousands I, in their behalf have offered this humble tribute as the last that can be paid publicly while his mortal remains are yet with us. And I feel indeed keenly the meagerness of it as compared with what his splendid life among us and for us has entitled him to.

I hope no person hearing this will think me a worshiper of this man, or of the class to whom men become heroes or Saints or angels simply because they have died. I do not wish to be understood as viewing Joseph Smith as a perfect man, or as one whose official work has, even to my eyes, exhibited no flaws or revealed no mistakes, for such is not the case. My attitude regarding these things has been well known, and even conspicuous in the church, and has not changed because of his death; nor would he have me change except I could do so conscientiously. But, viewing him as a man among men, and speaking of him, personally, only as a man, I point to him as one whose aims were always high, who never conceived an ignoble design, and who, as a consequence, reached and maintained a loftier plane than those whose standards were not so exalted.

I point to him as a man who, within my range of acquaintance, and to my viewing, has had no superior, and but few, if any, equals, when I consider his life here from its alpha to its omega, in the light of what I know circumscribed and environed it, and this I say after abundant opportunity, in almost all life's walks, for observing and judging. To say more is forbidden me. To say less would be unjust and unkind. If I know love's meaning, I loved the man for the nobility I discerned in him.

He was a sufferer for years from facial neuralgia, but was almost the personification of patient endurance, and the characteristic cheerfulness of his life never failed him during all his affliction. Almost four years ago the eyes that, as he said, served him so well for over seventy years, but for some six years previous had been gradually growing dim, lost their usual power, and his hearing became seriously impaired, and thus he was all but shut out from the world and deprived of the ability to circulate at will. He became dependent in this direction upon others, and this to a man of his disposition was an indescribable trial; still no complaint escaped him. He toiled on by the aid of his private secretary and amanuensis till his life memoirs were completed and turned over to the church, and he found abundant cause for thanksgiving to God for what he still enjoyed even in his life condition.

When, about a fortnight ago he was attacked with a form of heart neuralgia he was ill prepared physically to endure much further pain, and along during the continuance of his distress and increasing weakness he expressed repeatedly a wish to go. His life work was done, his race was run, as he viewed it, and seeing nothing further of usefulness for him in this life, or benefit to be conferred by a prolongation of his stay, like the real philosopher that he was he quietly folded his hands and announced his readiness to be transferred to the next condition, where he hoped to continue under the divine directorate and be obedient and contented under the requirements of the new estate.

At one time, when under the impression that he had only a few hours to stay, he called for his son, Israel, who was his scribe, and dictated a brief farewell to the church and to his family, all of whom, except his son Frederick M., were assembled around his bed; also repeated, as his dying testimony, the declaration he had through life made of his belief in his father's virtue, also that Jesus was the Christ, the Redeemer of the world, closing with the words, "The Spirit and the Bride say come, and I say Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

Shortly after this he revived, and his condition continued to fluctuate for several days, during which time his son Frederick M. arrived from the East, and thus completed the family group in attendance. On the morning of December 10 he seemed to revive considerably, inspiring a little renewal of hope in some who were near him. But suddenly he asked for his wife, and that he might be raised up in the bed. It was but the answering of the final summons, for scarcely had his request been complied with ere his tired heart had ceased to beat and the spirit had quitted its earthly tenement. At one o'clock p. m., after making the usual tests and examinations, his physician pronounced him dead, and the grief-stricken attendants at his bedside retired to mourn through coming years a loss which to them seems inestimable and irreparable.

Truly, as our brother said to me, his life, from the cradle to the casket was circumscribed by his birth as no other life had been; but, instead, as many would have done, of viewing this as the decree of cruel fate, and abandoning himself to its apparent forecastings, he accepted it as the behest of an infinitely wise Providence, and prepared himself to occupy within its limitations; nor once did he ever seem to chafe under its restrictions or look or long to step outside of them. He confined himself to an effort to fill becomingly the sphere thus narrowed for him, and as we stand by this casket and look back to that cradle, we are instinctively led to exclaim, "Who, thus circumscribed, could, within that circle, have been larger, grander or nobler?"

As if to still further restrict him and give, by a final test, his grand character opportunity to yet more resplendently shine out, put on its finishing touches, and illustrate in completeness the divine lesson intended, and under which influence to close his career as a teacher and an exemplar, he was deprived of the use of his eyes and nearly so of his ears—shut out from those beauties of sight and sound he used to so keenly relish, nor even permitted to look upon the faces of his family; but when words of commiseration were communicated to him regarding this, he cheerfully made answer, "Oh, well, these eyes have served me splendidly a long time, and till my work was practically done, and I have no complaint to make. I thank God that they lasted me so long."

Thus has this hero in the struggles that life has brought to few if any others in this world, lived and walked and talked among us. We welcome the blessed legacy thus intrusted to us, and, committing the interest of the family and church, as he did, to the care of the all-wise and loving God, we hail and apply the comforting words of the seer of Patmos, which may be considered as my text, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, from henceforth. Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors and their works do follow them."

Those eyes no longer dependent upon the clearness of fleshly windows for their vision, are now gazing upon the splendors of new realms of beauty and occupancy and beholding the faces of those who preceded him thereto, and those ears are now being saluted by the welcomes and the plaudits, and the music of that chorus which his voice will help to swell in singing to a present God and Savior, "Blessing and honor and wisdom and glory be thine for ever and ever! Hosanna for evermore!" Rest, rest, REST, to his noble, weary spirit. Peace, peace, PEACE to his sacred ashes.

MEMORIES---NOT FLOWERS

To find a friend along life's road
Who'll help to bear another's load;
To find a friend who'll claim a part
The burden resting on one's heart;
Is finding treasure yet untold—
A wealth that far outvalues gold,
In sun and storm; rich, full and free,
Just such a friend he's been to me.

That his friends should refrain from placing many or expensive flowers upon the casket containing his earthly remains was one of the last requests made of them by our departed friend and brother, President Joseph Smith. We have no reason to believe that this request will be disregarded by any of the friends who loved him so tenderly, so sincerely; and certainly we hope it will not be by anyone.

To-day while we are penning these lines—perhaps at this very hour—in the distant city of Independence, Missouri, the last tribute of respect is being paid to the earthly remains of one who for more than fifty years has “gone in and out among us,” has exchanged with us the hand of fellowship, and in many, many ways has been to us who with him have been traveling life’s weary and uneven road all which the poet has described. And it is because of this, because of what Brother Joseph has been to the people to whom the Lord gave him to be as an earthly shepherd and leader, that I would today bring not flowers, but memories to place upon his casket—bring them not for myself alone, but for the many others who have loved and honored him; honored him not because he was the son of Joseph Smith the Prophet, but because as a man they found him endowed with those qualities of both head and heart which were well calculated to command their respect and bespeak their love; found him richly endowed with the Spirit of the Master and ready at all times to share the burden he might lift from the shoulders of others.

Memory goes far back even beyond the dark and cloudy day of the sad tragedy which left him fatherless. We who were also among those driven from the State of Missouri by the inhuman edict of Governor Boggs have heard our mother relate how in the bitter cold of the winter the boy Joseph crossed the Mississippi River, clinging to the skirts of his mother to steady his feet upon the treacherous ice.

And it was told us by one who was his schoolmate in Nauvoo that it was his habit to share with boys less fortunate than himself any luxury that his dinner pail might chance to contain and which might be lacking in their own. And yet we are sure he had never met with Whittier’s line, “The meal unshared is food unshared.” It was simply that impulse of kindly helpfulness springing from the heart of the boy which through all his life even down to the hour of his death has ruled the man.

Again there comes to memory the sharp contrast between the environment of his own last hours and the terrible scenes of those surrounding his father’s closing hours of life. It is good to know that he was surrounded with every comfort, encompassed with every care which might alleviate or banish pain, and that his loved ones were all there to cheer and comfort him as well as to be warned and instructed by his wise counsel. But in these later years—the years since he has been shut in from the beauties which reach us through our sense of sight and partly from the melodies of sound—has his active mind reverted often to these scenes and has the consciousness of this contrast been present with him? These are questions which come to us, but find no answer.

And yet we know (at least the writer does) that one of the dearest aspirations of his soul, one which has been with him his long life through and to which he has been even to the end loyal and true, has been to so live that so far as possible his own life should be a witness to the purity of his father’s life and a vindication of his father’s character from the falsehood which hatred, calumny and religious intolerance have heaped upon it. And in all candor we ask, Could aim be higher than this?

In vindicating his father’s character, was he not vindicating truth? God does not send impostors and deceivers to do his work, and it was the high and worthy aim of the son to so live that none should be confirmed in their false opinion of the father, by any unworthy act committed by the son. His life should be a living witness to the purity of the principles taught by the gospel of Christ which his father had preached. This same gospel he would preach and with God’s help to it he would so conform, so govern his life by its principles that if any man should say, as men will say, “Like father like son,” it should be not an added reproach to his father, but a vindication of that father’s honor and truth.

And more than this I would ask: Has it not been to each one of us who know the truth of the message God commissioned his father to declare a vindication to the world that we have not followed any cunningly devised scheme of men, but that gospel which Paul declared, “Is the power of God unto salvation”? Is not this character of the son which stands as a strong bulwark of defense for the father a rich inheritance for the church as well?

High official position and wealth were offered the son if he would go to Utah and there join with those who in order to defend their own wickedness were trailing the name of his father in the mire of their own shame. He was then but a boy in years—a boy who knew and felt most keenly many of the ills of poverty—the struggle to keep the wolf from the door not only for himself but for loved ones dependent upon him. But he bore in his heart memories of the home life of his father which for ever set the seal of falsehood to the things he was asked to indorse, and his answer was firmly given, which in substance was: Keep your wealth and give to others all the honors you have to bestow, but as for me I prefer to retain my manhood and will never, never trail the honor of my father in the dust by dragging it through the mire of iniquities you are practicing, with the false claim upon your unholy lips that he indorsed them!

And later in life, after he had obeyed the call of the Lord, which came to him in ways he could not reject, and had consented to cast in his lot with the small band of Saints who also had called him—as the Lord had instructed them to do—to come as their leader and take the place which was rightfully his, he visited that stronghold of iniquity, Salt Lake City. He went there as a missionary of Christ, calling upon that people to repent of their sins and abandon the heresies into which they had been led. As such he most naturally came in contact with their leaders, the men who claimed that his father had himself taught them the doctrines he was pleased to brand as heresy.

However trivial this charge may seem to us at this distance from its stronghold, it was not so to our brother then. For while his allegiance to his father was not for one moment shaken, he was surrounded upon all sides by those who claimed that he was a traitor to that father's memory. Claim after claim was brought forward on all sides to establish their contention that he was false to the memory of the man they were honoring.

Unlike that other reformer, Martin Luther, he was not on his way to Rheims, but was already in a city where from every housetop the doctrine of devils was proclaimed and where false lips on every hand were bearing witness that this doctrine was promulgated and taught them by his father. It was certainly a trying time, but the God in whom our brother trusted did not forsake him. Prayer and faith brought him the needed help and calmly before the public, he met charge after charge, proving from their own published records that they were false, and finally after presenting to them the law of the Lord, he closed his testimony with these memorable words:

You charge my father with these things. I do not believe your charges nor that you can prove them. But admitting for the sake of argument that you can, what do you prove? Simply that my father was himself a transgressor of God's law, through teaching that which God's law condemns. Who then is honoring his memory, You or I?

It was shortly after his establishment in Plano, Illinois, as Editor of the SAINTS' HERALD, that we remember hearing remarks and speculation at different times by various of the visiting members of the church in regard to those Brother Joseph was most frequently known to select as his guests. "It is always the lame, halt, and blind that Brother Joseph takes home with him," was the truthful and pointed remark of one brother who at the time we could not help thinking would have liked an invitation for himself. But even hospitality has its limits, and the poor we have always with us.

It was most surely not because of the luxurious fare his table contained that so many would have sat at his board, for its plainness and simplicity might well have suggested these lines of the poet:

Unwrap thy life of many wants and fine:
He who with Christ will dine
Shall see no table curiously spread,
But fish and barley bread.

Where rearest thou that Jesus bade us pray,
Give us our sumptuous fare from day to day?

It was because of the "Feast of reason and flow of soul"—the ever kindly thought for his guest and the Christian spirit pervading all.

Brother Joseph came to his life work poor in purse but rich in spirit, in honor and integrity. He leaves no wealth behind him for his children to inherit save that which he brought with him and the precious added memories of a long life of service given to his fellow men.

Phillips Brooks has said: "The lives of men who are always growing are strewed along their whole course with the things which they have learned to do without." God grant that this which Brother Joseph's life has so well illustrated may prove not only to his children but to the entire church just what it should be, the very richest legacy in the power of any mortal to bestow. M. WALKER.

PRESS COMMENT ON PRESIDENT SMITH

The press of the country at the passing of our late and venerated President Joseph Smith commented quite generally on his life and work, not failing to set forth in contradiction thereto the departure of the Utah Church from the early tenets of the faith, in the teachings of which faith President Smith and the Reorganization have succeeded his father and the original church. The following is representative of this discussion:

In the ecclesiastical dogmas which made up the denominational belief of the late Joseph Smith the general public has no particular interest. But in the death of the late venerable head of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints the country loses an interesting and useful citizen. Joseph Smith was considerably more than a powerful churchman, into whose keeping had been committed the destinies of one of the great denominations of the world.

Those who ignorantly confounded the Reorganized Church with Mormonism, in the objectionable acceptance of that term, will not appreciate the theological distinctions between the two, nor understand that nothing was more hateful to Joseph Smith than the doctrines of Brigham Young, with their polygamous teachings and all the other features which make Utah Mormonism obnoxious in the eyes of the average American.

But all who ever came in contact with Joseph Smith could readily appreciate the broad charity of his tenets; the untarnished private life he lived; the unswerving devotion to duty which he always displayed; and the simple modesty of his relations toward his church and the world at large. To his church he was the Prophet whom all its communicants revered, but he was also the unostentatious leader who constantly practiced the virtues which he enjoined upon his followers. To the world he was the blameless citizen who walked before all men as an example, and whose interest in the movements that made for the welfare of the community always had his heartiest support.

Perhaps nothing could give a clearer insight into the character of Joseph Smith than the directions which he issued shortly before his death in respect to his funeral. Disliking nothing so much, next to sham, as ostentation, he directed that his funeral should be conducted with the utmost simplicity, without any of the elaborateness which his followers would otherwise have provided in order to testify to the honor in which they held him. He was the Prophet, but first of all he was the Christian gentleman and the good citizen. As such he lived; as such he died; as such he will be remembered by all outside the household of his faith. His followers themselves can have no legacy of remembrance more honorable than this appraisal of the people among whom he lived and labored so many years.

Kindly, cheerful, loyal to his own creed, tolerant of those of others, standing for modesty, simplicity, good citizenship, embodying in his private and public life all the virtues which adorn a character worthy of emulation—such is the revelation which Joseph Smith leaves to the world, as the real interpretation of an ecclesiastical message translated into terms of human character.—Editorial Department, Kansas City Journal, December 12, 1914.

The death of Joseph Smith the second, in Independence, Missouri, removes the last living link between the present time and that of Joseph Smith, the founder of the "Mormon" church, who produced the famous golden Book of Mormon. Joseph Smith the second died at the age of eighty-two years. At the time of his birth in Kirtland, Ohio, his father had brought into active organization the church which later was to attract great attention. The work of the present Smith grooves into that of his father. The elder Smith was born in 1805. In 1827 the Book of Mormon appeared.

When the church at Kirtland was organized, Smith was joined by Brigham Young and others. The band migrated to Independence, Missouri, but conflicts with other settlers caused the believers to move eastward to Illinois. By 1839 the band had increased in number to twelve thousand, and these bought outright the Illinois town of Commerce, changed its name to Nauvoo, and there settled.

For a time its prosperity was phenomenal. Nothing need be said of the tenets of the church. Suffice it that thousands were attracted. The harsh discipline within and criticism from without provoked conflict, as a result of which the elder Smith was arrested. While in jail in another city he was shot by a mob.

When word of the killing reached Mrs. Smith she took young Joseph into her arms and said: "My son Joseph, my prophet Joseph, it is you who must carry on the work of your dear father. Never forget his teachings, never depart from his ways." And so it came about that when Joseph reached his majority he became the leader of the "Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints," in contradistinction to the "Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints." "That has been the mission of my life," said the son Joseph in his old age. "The church under me is the true church. Brigham Young and the Utah branch are interlopers."

However that may be, statistics in 1908 gave the following of the Utah branch as 350,000, and that of Joseph Smith as less than fifty thousand. The Reorganized Church of Latter Day Saints was originally made up of the scattered "Mormons" left behind in Missouri, Illinois and Ohio when Brigham Young and the majority migrated to what was later known as Utah. A substantial element in the creeds of both churches is industry. Conscientious labor and the payment of debts have been insisted on, with the result that "Mormons" in Utah, Missouri and elsewhere are known for their prosperity.

The dark shadow on Mormonism is found in the charge of polygamy. Whatever the practices of the Mormons in Utah have been, it may be stated that the followers of Joseph Smith, both the elder in his day, and the younger in his, have been monogamists. Available records bear witness to this. The life of Joseph Smith the second, like that of his father, was one of labor, zeal and privation. He was sincere in what he taught. He lived simply and of late years his patriarchal figure had been familiar to the residents of Independence.—Editorial Department, Indianapolis News, December 11, 1914.

Joseph Smith, president of the Reorganized Church of Latter Day Saints of Jesus Christ, son of the founder of the original church, died at his home on West Short Street, this afternoon. His death was not unexpected, although for nearly a week hopes have been entertained for his recovery from a very serious illness. A few days ago his son and successor, Frederick M. Smith, planned to return to Massachusetts where he has been studying, but changed his plans to wait until the issue of the illness of his father should be better determined.

The aged President died with his six sons about him and his daughters all at his bedside. For days he has been making preparations for the end. A stenographer has been constantly near him, his counselors and his children have received words of wisdom from his lips, and he has repeatedly said that he was ready for the end and was indeed preferring that it come now as he felt that his work was complete.

Joseph Smith was a well known figure in Independence and has made his home here for many years. Many citizens knew his kindly face and heard pleasant words in his voice. For some years the curtains have been drawn over his eyes and the doors of his ears have been almost closed. His spirit never wavered. His was a life of love and service and in this way he ruled his people, holding each one of them in chains which galled not but were not to be broken. During the past few years the more arduous duties of the church have been taken from his shoulders by his son, Frederick M. Smith, and a few years ago he was named as the successor to the presidency. During this time he has lived quietly with his family at his home here. He appeared at the last General Conference of the church and spoke from the platform. It was through him that the revelations were given to the church.

A few days ago the editor of this paper sent to President Smith an article in which it was ably held that God did not send pain and misery for sin, and discussing this subject from a standpoint of love. The dying man sent back his thanks and a part of his comment was "That to hold that pain was an infliction of punishment for evil would be to make the Creator of Life a copartner in punishing a moral wrong where moral wrong does not exist. That to a large degree suffering in the world is endured by those who unfortunately have been forced to live under conditions where they have not consciously done moral wrong."

Joseph Smith was born November 6, 1832, at Kirtland, Ohio, when that town was the headquarters of the Mormon church founded by his father, Joseph Smith. His mother was Emma Hale Smith. A few years later the family moved to Nauvoo, Illinois, which became the center of the church activities for several years. He was a boy twelve years of age when his father, the Prophet Joseph, and his uncle Hyrum Smith, were killed by a mob at Carthage, Illinois, while confined in the county jail because of religious troubles between the Mormons and the Gentiles. In conjunction with his mother, he remained in that city several years more, engaged in conducting a hotel.

The movement to reorganize the "Mormon" church as a protest against polygamy as practiced in Utah began in 1858.

In 1866 [1860] a conference was held at Amboy, Illinois, at which the new church was launched, and Joseph Smith was chosen president. That was fifty-four years ago, and from that day to this he has regarded himself, and thousands of his religious followers have regarded him as the inspired successor of the Prophet, and the official mouthpiece of God to the church and the world.

Joseph Smith moved from Nauvoo, Illinois, to Plano, in the same State in 1866, and assumed the editorial charge of the SAINTS' HERALD, which had been established as the organ of the church. That position, also, he held till his death, though in recent years his duties have been of a supervisory than an active character.

In 1881 he left Plano for Lamoni, Iowa, which had become the church headquarters, and lived there till 1907, [1906] when he moved to Independence. His home in this city was in a modest little cottage at 1214 West Short Street, where he spent his declining years engaged in the writing of his memoirs, a task which is practically completed. . . .

President Smith, when he realized that the end was near, told his family to advise his friends that if they had any idea of spending money for flowers, to take the money instead to the funeral and put it into a fund to be used for some charitable purpose.—Independence Examiner, December 10, 1914.

Joseph Smith, president of the Reorganized Church of Latter Day Saints, died at his home in Independence at one o'clock this afternoon after several weeks' illness. The end came peacefully and the aged church head was conscious until the last.

All but two of his children were at his bedside when he died. He bore a smile as life passed from him.

Joseph Smith, president of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, was born in Kirtland, Ohio, November 6, 1832, the son of Joseph and Emma (Hale) Smith. He went with his parents to Independence when two years old.

When he was twelve years old his father was assassinated near Nauvoo, Illinois. He was the eldest of four sons. There were no daughters. All his brothers have been dead several years.

President Smith was baptized into the "Mormon" church when a small boy.

In 1860 he attended a conference at the Reorganized Church at Amboy, Illinois, and there connected himself with the ecclesiastical body of which he has ever been the head. . . .

President Smith's life work was to repudiate the fact that his father, the Martyr and Seer of the church, had anything to do with polygamy. He fought polygamy consistently as well as other beliefs of the Brighamite branch of the "Mormon" church which he considered heresies. During his presidency he announced to his followers he had received fifteen communications of divine nature. These have been indorsed by the church and given a place in its written laws and doctrine.

Joseph Smith's father was the founder and Prophet of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, known as "Mormons," because their sacred book, supplementary to the Bible, purports to be the history of an aboriginal American race by that name, to which they believe Christ appeared in keeping with his reply to the apostles, "Other sheep have I which are not of this fold."

When Joseph Smith, at the age of twenty-eight assumed the high priesthood of the church it was bounded by Nine Eagles, Iowa, on the west, and Shabbona, Illinois, on the east. Now its missions are in all parts of the globe.

Then it was a weak flock, preyed upon by false shepherds, or by "blind leading the blind," Independence members say. Now its congregations number thousands. Twenty years before Brigham Young had led the exodus into Utah. But there were those who said to him, "Go your way and we shall go ours and cling to Nauvoo and the ancient faith untouched by polygamous doctrines."

Several thousand members, often called Saints, live in Independence, the Zion of their prophecy, where "Joseph the Martyr," stood on an eminence in the early part of the last century and set the metes and bounds for the temple of the true faith eventually to arise, wherein the most holy ordinances of the church should be performed. No tabernacle elsewhere might be sanctified thus. . . .

A visit with President Smith was a tonic. He retained his mental vigor to the last.

He was almost blind and slightly deaf, the results of chronic neuralgia. But he had a fresh, boyish voice and, though he never lost his dignity, he overflowed with goodfellowship toward those whom he liked. He suffered almost constantly with facial pains. For thirty years he refused to consult a physician. When he did, they told him it was death of the nerves. He had a horror of narcotics. Latter Day Saints' teachings taboo tobacco and eschew the use of coffee and tea. These might have brought some relief, he was told, but he suffered stoically. Talking aggravated the ailment, but as soon as he could compose his features and get his breath after an attack he would take up the thread of conversation where he left off. He was neither arrogant in his attitude nor dogmatic in his views, but with breadth of vision that was like looking from a mountain summit.

His straightforwardness was a prominent characteristic. Some thought him gruff, blunt and unapproachable. There was nothing temporizing nor sycophantic in his manners. He flattered no man. Those who did not like his teachings were at liberty to leave them alone. He did not even take great interest in extending his acquaintance among the members of his immediate congregation.

As a schoolboy, he said, he wore out several arithmetics trying to get as far as common fractions. He liked history and grammar, but said he never learned enough mathematics to get the commercial instinct. He was required by his stepfather to study law, but said a good blacksmith was spoiled by the change. He often said he always had to pay a good price for all he bought, but if he had anything to sell, he had almost to give it away. He had some business sagacity, but was sadly nonplused when members would ask his advice about buying land in Texas or Florida for speculation. He was unsuspecting and forgiving and had a fine sense of honor. He once paid a hotel bill for a man whom he had recommended to a landlord, but who left without paying.

President Smith was fond of music but could not understand the classics. He recalled with fervor the time when he first heard "All the blue bonnets are over the border" on the streets of Glasgow, and would tell how his hair almost raised from his head with excitement when one day in New York City an Irish band came around the corner playing "Wearing o' the green." Once he awoke in the middle of the night and heard a man whistling, "John Brown's body lies a-moldering in the grave" and he could never forget it.

He wrote several songs which are sung in his church. This is the first stanza of a favorite one:

"Tenderly, tenderly, lead thou me on,
On o'er the way that my Savior hath gone;
Bright on his pathway the sunlight hath shown;
Tenderly, tenderly, lead thou me on.

Close to his hand I so tremblingly clung,
Faint were the songs I so doubtingly sung,
Brokenly falling from faltering tongue,
Tenderly, tenderly, lead thou me on."

In appearance, Joseph Smith was of imposing height. His benevolent face was crowned with white hair and beard. He had an intellectual forehead with strikingly handsome luminous, large brown eyes that dominated his whole countenance and held the farthest groups in his congregations. Blindness did not dim their luster and intensity. He was more logical than persuasive in debate, and was a thorough parliamentarian, as might have been expected of a man who had twice served as justice of the peace in a community that mobbed and killed his father. . . .

He found it hardest to bear the erroneous stigma of polygamy. He always asked pathetically if his fifty and more years of labor to exonerate his church from that false reputation will not at last be recognized. He always asserted his father neither taught nor practiced polygamy: that Brigham Young introduced that heresy a thousand miles from the scenes of his father's ministry and ten years after his father's death.

Talking about the days of his youth in Nauvoo, President Smith said: "I was twelve years old when my father was murdered. He was in Carthage, twenty miles away, but we heard of it before midnight. We stayed there and I grew up among those people. Many of them had been in the mobs that persecuted us.

"I did not permit myself to become embittered, though my earliest recollection was of being carried across the frozen Mississippi by my mother when twelve thousand of our people were driven like mad dogs from Missouri.

"I left those early times with the Lord. For years the church wanted me, but I would not go until I had a call at the age of twenty-eight. Then I was confronted with the fact that I could not say the Lord's prayer unless I forgave my enemies. I forgave them."—Kansas City Post, December 10, 1914.

Passing of Our President

Softly, gently the snow comes down enveloping all nature with a fleeciness at once dreary and comforting. Strangely it typifies the mantle of deep bereavement which has descended upon us, striking both a chill and a hope upon our hearts. At the last, the passing of the great spirit, came gently and softly, as the loving heart sank to rest, leaving us with a sense of utter desolation—and, as well, with an eager looking forward to the reunion beyond.

Our love for the kindly spirit was too great to wish to hold it longer a captive in the suffering body, if God were ready to say "Enough!" And so, though in agony at the parting, and in grief as we contemplate the desolation ahead, we are rejoicing through our tears because of his peace and content.

The deep waters are surging over our heads; in anguish of soul we mourn because of the emptiness of our lives; but, also, in humility we are thanking God for the past years—for the wonderful privilege which was ours—to have known and loved, and possessed so long!

To-morrow his earthly tenement, to us so endeared by tender associations, will be laid away beneath the hovering, sheltering snow, to await a glorious calling forth, but his beautiful life, his loving spirit, his broad mind and kindly heart are with us still, continuing their ministry, their gospel of good will and blessing. The sincerest cry of our hearts is that we may be worthy that close and intimate presence, and that we may bear witness by lives of devotion, of sacrifice and consecration, that our association with such a father have not proven fruitless. ### The Art of Expression

"Man can give nothing to his fellow man but himself."—Schlegel.

"Art expresses the common basis of human life through the medium of personality."

The first truth in regard to the human personality is that one is like all, yet each is also different from all others.

Basic elements become fresh when colored by the personality of the artist. Wagner transformed the old northern mythology through his powerful genius.

We must all struggle with the same problems, but there is infinite variety in the form they take. The individual struggle is no less absorbing because men have struggled with the same kind of difficulties for so long. Love and grief come to us with the same power as if they were not common to all. This law is recognized in revelation to us to rejoice with those who rejoice and mourn with those who mourn.

"Thought, emotion and will are known only in thinking, feeling, and doing." We interpret other lives only in terms of our own. The experiences of the human soul are the most vital elements in expression. In the interpretation of anthems one must grasp every scene, and identify himself with every situation, point of view or character, and express the deepest feeling of his heart. All expression centers in character, and character is developed by expression. "Character is the record which experience leaves on the soul." The interpretation is the revelation of the impression produced upon the individual heart. We give to each other the truth as we see it, feel it, and realize it. Expression that does not reveal experience is artificial and cold.

Natural expression comes from living the experiences which the art-form reveals. How is this done? By imagination and sympathy. "The highest characteristic of a human being is the instinct to identify himself with every situation, see things from the point of view of others, and share the experiences of his fellow men." Is not this the golden rule realized?

One soul can never reveal adequately to another its conception of the highest ideals except by suggesting them through the medium of art. Perhaps this will be questioned. Prayer meeting is most essential as a medium for expressing one phase of our relationship with God and with each other, but language on the plane of prose can convey mere commonplace truth or facts. Some form of art is required to express the deeper relations. "The soul's questions can not be answered with mere words." Therefore we have been commanded to cultivate the gift of song, as it is the medium through which we can express more adequately the exalted state of the spirit.

The Master himself was compelled to employ the art of using parables to convey the depth of truth he wished to get to the people. His message was too subtle to be presented directly on a common plane. It was necessary to have an art form to create conditions favorable to its reception. The mere fact stated that God has love for mankind, could not have been realized as when put in the form of that wonderful parable or the prodigal son. It touches our feelings and opens the door for imaginative activity as we picture the human scene of the Father and his unchanging love for both sons so different in type. This parable is perfectly human. It is our own spiritual case described. We can understand infinite love only through our human love.

Through music is power given to one human being to awaken the conscious and unconscious impulses of another soul and to cause it to realize the truth from within, just as the Master did with his parables.

To give full expression to the manifold sides of emotional life revealed in anthem work it is necessary for us to experience, to increase our capacity for appreciating all sides of life. There are some persons who have but one emotion; some have none at all; some have two or three; few have a large gamut. Only the latter can interpret successfully. The complete person has not yet come to birth, till it becomes literally true, which was said by the old Roman writer: "Nothing which is human is foreign to me."

In every relation of life, we learn to go by falling; we learn by our experiments, by mistakes, by failures. "It must needs be that offenses come." If they never came there would be no moral progress. When one has sinned he is sorry and ashamed, that when he had the chance to do good he was not equal to it; his intelligence and will failed. Yet in his shame he is forced to be glad of failure, because it showed him something, as when the burnt child learns what fire is. The worse the pain of his fall, the more he learns that man's strength comes not from himself, but only when his will is one with the will of God.

The best men have always suffered most from their own moral failures. Their suffering is proof of their sensitiveness. Heine has well said, "Whenever there is a great soul, there is Golgotha." But thanks to our heavenly Father, there is also the mount of transfiguration. He will not forsake us except to try our faith.

David Bispham on defining the main elements of interpretation says: "So very many things enter into the great problem of interpretation in singing that it is somewhat difficult to state definitely just what should be considered most important, but I can not emphasize too emphatically the value of a good general education and wide culture for the singer. Culture does not come from the schoolroom alone. The refining processes of life are long and varied. As the violin gains in richness of tone with age, so the singer's life experience has an effect upon the character of his singing. He must have seen life in its broadest sense to place himself in touch with human sympathy.

"The public wants to hear in the voice of the singer that wonderful something that tells them that he has had opportunity to know and to understand the human side of the songs he is interpreting, that he is not giving parrot-like versions of some teacher's way of singing the same songs, but that the understanding comes from the very center of his mind, heart and soul.

"To gain experience, one should hear a great many singers, (artists), actors, and speakers. One should read a great many books. One should see a great many beautiful pictures and wonderful buildings. But, most of all, one should know and study a great many people and learn of their joys and their sorrows, their success and their failures, their strength and their weakness, their loves and their hates. In all art, human life is reflected, and this is particularly true in vocal art. For years in my youth, I never failed to attend all the musical events of consequence in my native city. This was of immense value to me, since it gave me the means of cultivating my own judgment of what was good or bad in singing. Do not fear that you will become blasé. If you have the right spirit every musical event you attend will spur you on."

You may say that this is expensive, to hear great singers, and that you can only attend recitals and the opera occasionally. If this is really the case, you still have a means of hearing singers which you should not neglect. I refer to the sound, high class reproducing machines which have grown to be of such importance in vocal education. The modern records are nothing short of marvelous.

Hold fast to your ideals. Ideals are the flowers of youth. Only too often they are not tenderly cared for, and the result is that many who have been on the right track are turned in the direction of failure by materialism. It is so—so essential to the young singer to have the highest ideals. Do not for a moment let mediocracy or the substitution of artificial methods enter your vision. Holding to your ideal will mean costly sacrifice to you, but all sacrifices are worth while if one can realize one's ideals. The ideal is only another term for heaven to me. If we could all attain to the ideal, we would all be in a kind of earthly paradise.

It has always seemed to me that when our Lord said, "The kingdom of heaven is at hand," he meant that it is at hand for us to possess now, that is the ideal in life.

LORENA LEEKA.

A Greeting to Graceland

Long live Graceland on her sunny hill!

"Should auld acquaintance be forgot
And never bro't to min'

Should auld acquaintance be forgot
And days of auld lang syne?"

Many memories crowd for room in my thoughts to-night, even elbow each other for expression, yet only a few may go forth as greetings to those, pupils and others, who remember prosperous Graceland in the years of 1906-09.

The sturdy worth and honest effort of the dear students in the music school make me glad even yet, and in comparison with others I have since known I would prefer, above all, those country girls and boys who are living in earnest. I am now organizing a class in Grand Rapids, Michigan, where we are living at present, and I hope they may prove to be after the Graceland standard.

Robert Merlyn, aged four and one half years, and George Albert, aged three years, might prove interesting to some of my girls of days gone by. They are fair, blue-eyed laddies, full of fun and frolic, with a liking for classical music which one never expects to see manifested at such an early period. It brings to mind the fact that music is natural with all of us, an inherent capacity, but, nevertheless, experience has shown this ability must be nurtured, like the seed we plant in the soil, before it blossoms into self-expression. Even so, the seemingly slow development may bring to light a stronger and more beautiful flower. With faces to the light and true desires in our hearts, all of us may attain a steady growth each year in appreciating and understanding music.

I ever hold lovingly in thought Graceland and her girls and boys. How I would enjoy a line from each one who remembers the days of "auld lang syne!"

With much love and a Merry Christmas to all from "Miss Bond,"

Notes of the Staff

The annual concert by the Independence Choir was given Thanksgiving evening, and proved to be especially pleasing to the listeners. The seating capacity of the church was taxed to its limit, and throngs stood in the halls. The program consisted of the usual assortment of choruses, solos, quartets, etc., interspersed with instrumental numbers and one reading. The choir had the assistance of Sister Ethel Etzenhouser, who delighted the audience with her beautiful flute solos. Sister W. N. Robinson of Kansas City also assisted, giving in her own glorious manner the beautiful solo "Inflammatu" from "Stabat Mater," the choir accompanying. The contributions at this concert increased the fund for choir music by forty-five dollars.

Brother A. H. Mills has taken charge of the Sunday School Juvenile Orchestra, and is arranging a special program to be given by this enthusiastic bunch of embryo musicians about Christmas time. This organization is as yet chiefly notable for its promise, but it pays to begin early and time will justify a lavish exercise of patience and perseverance in this direction.

The Sunday School Orchestra under Brother Eaton's direction, is preparing for a special concert some time in the late winter, we are told. They still alternate with the choir, in furnishing the Sunday evening half-hour concerts which have proven so popular.

Have the Philadelphia and New York choirs had some special musical events lately, of which some remote echo reached us,—or did we but dream something of the sort?

The Omaha choir people are preparing to spring a real surprise on us soon, we understand! Well, "Leave it to Brother Paul" to see that things are moving! A. A.

Musical Notes

Prices on musical supplies have advanced nearly twenty-five per cent in America, owing to the European war. Germany exports more violins, 'cellos, various stringed instruments, bows, etc., than any other nation. As skilled labor is employed in their manufacture, prices are liable to further advance if the war continues much longer. Here is our chance to manufacture.

The national dairy show recently exhibited piano keys made of skimmed milk, which is claimed to be a practicable substitute for ivory at much less cost. The skimmed milk is condensed in retorts, thus expelling the gases and leaving the casein. To this are added certain acids, after which the substance is molded into the desired form and left until it becomes very hard. The keys are said to be very satisfactory, and may become the favorite material for this purpose among manufacturers.

A new violin bridge has just been patented and is being sold in Europe. It is of pine center with maple glued on both sides; the whole being the usual thickness. It is said to soften the tone considerably, and take away harshness, making the instrument sound much like the old Italian violin.

At the International Exposition in San Francisco next July about twenty-five cities will be represented in the choral contest, at which time prizes will be awarded as follows: Mixed choruses of from 125 to 150 voices will receive prizes of $10,000, $2,000, and $500, respectively; choirs of from 50 to 60 voices, $1,000 and $500; male choral contests, 50 to 60 voices, $3,000 and $750; children under sixteen, 40 to 50 voices, $250, $150, and $100.

In 1913 the United States exported 341 pianos to Argentine, and 484 to Brazil, while hundreds of instruments were sent to various other South American countries. An official of one of the large piano houses estimates that 200,000 pianos will be sold here in 1915. The piano department of one of the largest music houses claims a vast increase in the volume of business over that of a year ago this month. A. B. P.

Our Correspondence

ELDORADO SPRINGS, MISSOURI, December 7, 1914.

Editor of the Staff: After having "gone over" the sacred Cantata "Olivet to Calvary," by Maunder, selected by our general chorister for rendition at the next General Conference, I heartily commend the selection. The music, I think, is especially adapted to those wonderful events culminating in the awful tragedy at Calvary. It should help all who hear it to more deeply and truly appreciate the love and sacrifice of the "Man of Galilee." H. E. MOLER.

ANDES, MONTANA, December 1, 1914.

Dear Sister: Seeing your call to "get in line," in the SAINTS' HERALD for November 18, I am writing to you to inquire about the general conference music. Perhaps the prices, etc., have been quoted, but if so I have overlooked same, so am writing to ask you where to send for the music and for prices.

We have a branch here of over fifty members, a good many of whom are young people, and we think we have material for a good choir. We are bending our energies in that direction. We have, among others, Sister Maybelle Higgins, who is quite talented, and who has spent considerable time and money in the cultivation of music, and others who will do well with good practice.

Our branch here has only been organized two years, but we feel that we are doing as well as could be expected, as this is a newly settled country, only a few as yet having proved up on their homesteads. We have a nice little chapel, built last spring, and we wish our praises to God to rise from it in harmony and sweet accord. And though none of us may attend General Conference we would like to feel that we were singing the same sweet songs as they who do attend.

I am therefore writing for information.

In gospel bonds and love of music,

S. M. ANDES.

Special Announcement

For the benefit of those interested and who may have overlooked Brother Hoxie's announcement in former issues of the Staff, we state that a collection of five anthems selected by the general chorister may be had for twenty-five cents per copy. A large collection is now ready, price fifty cents per copy. The Cantata by Maunder "From Olivet to Calvary," which will be sung next General Conference, is also available at fifty cents. These orders should be sent direct to A. N. Hoxie, 179 Madison Avenue, New York City, and should be accompanied by cash.

Mothers' Home Column

EDITED BY CHRISTIANA SALYARDS

Christmas in the Home

[We present the following article by Sister Flora Adair, as especially appropriate for this season, and commend it to our readers.—EDITOR.]

Christmas and home! Two of the most beautiful words in the language! We can not think of either of them without a warm and living sympathy for all mankind outside in the busy marts of life. We are cramped and warped by the limitations of self, but our souls must swell with generic love when we think of home.

All men love home. Money or wealth can not make a home a success, but loving service which comes as a benediction, or as dew falls from heaven to soften and make ready the hearts of those around us; for that perfect love which comes from above. It has been said that home is the heart of the Nation, and we notice that wherever the best homes are founded, that nation becomes the greatest. Home is the nesting place of our fledglings and of the grown-up children as well; also many of us have the grandfathers and the grandmothers with us yet. And I believe we should do all that is consistent with our means and other capabilities to make it as pleasant a place to be in as possible.

What is more impressive than celebrating Christmas in the home? Christmas, the dearest of days; the birthday of our Master. By all means, bring Christmas with all its joys into the home. Let us make glad the hearts of the old as well as the young. One can have a very pleasant time without the outlay of great expense. How well I remember the good time I had as a child when perhaps one toy and some gingerbread dolls were the extent of the gifts. But, oh, those dolls with the whole spice for eyes and buttons on their coats of the same commodity. No child ever enjoyed a painted creation from Paris as we enjoyed those dolls; for hadn't our own dear mother made them with her own dear hands, and was not her love woven into every curve or line of their fat little bodies? Why shouldn't she do this? Were we not the children God had given her to make as happy as she could?

I have made it a practice to have as joyous a time at Christmastide as I could, so that in the years to come the children will never forget the joyous swelling of the heart they had at the mention of Christmas. For how soon they are men and women out in the world or in homes of their own, away from the old rooftree, and perhaps this precious memory will help soften the rough places or keep their feet from straying away from the good.

I think mothers especially should endeavor to make the little ones at least, as happy as possible, for they are small so short a time.

Alice Wellington Rawlins has written:

"Not long, alas, not long, the mother heart—
Knows quickly she will have to part
With all this wonder—she tries each art
To lure him on, then first to coax and praise
Each added grace: then in sore amaze
To mourn that he has lost his baby ways."

There is an old legend that tells that while the angels waited for the arrival of the hour of the birth of Christ they busied themselves condensing the wisdom and poetry and love of the ages into a Christmas greeting and this was the result of their musings:

"Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace and good will toward men."

Was not that the best wish that could have been uttered at any season? Then let us reach out our arms to those who are less fortunate than ourselves and try to make them happy, for the soul that makes others happy expands itself and has more room for happiness. Right lately I read a quotation that somewhat amused me, but its truth appealed to me. It read like this:

"The easiest and best way to expand the chest is to have a large heart in it. If you don't believe it, try it by lingering a bit by the wayside and let your heart be heard as it bids you pause by your brother man and give him a cheering word, for the life that loves is lovely and the soul that gives expands, and the heart that warms to a brother's needs is like the Son of Man's, and the meed will be right royal when he says to you and me: 'Inasmuch as you did for the least of these, you have done it unto me.'"

Prayer Union

SUBJECTS FOR THE FIFTH THURSDAY IN DECEMBER

National Prayer. That our country may be preserved in peace for Zion's sake. That our rulers may be blessed with divine wisdom in guiding the country's destinies. And, because the time is short, that the preaching of the gospel may make greater progress in winning souls to God. That God's will be done in all the earth, and his people in all the word may be the objects of his care. His peace be over them all.

Lesson, 1 Timothy 2:1-6; memory text, 2 Thessalonians 3:1, 2.

REQUEST FOR PRAYERS

ARBON, IDAHO, December 1, 1914.

Dear Sisters of the Prayer Union: My son Noel is sorely afflicted with heart trouble. Will you kindly hold him up before the Lord in your prayers? He was baptized July 6, 1913, by Brother J. C. Chrestensen, and has exceeding great faith in the Lord.

Your sister in Christ,

MRS. CLAUDIA WAYLETT.

News from Branches

Omaha, Nebraska

"It is not the deed we do,
Though the deed be never so fair,
But the love that the dear Lord looketh for,
Hidden with lowly care
In the heart of the deed so fair."

As we are making preparations for Christmas, bringing gifts to the Master, how many have the pure love of Christ in their hearts? Are we willing to live the plain and simple life, and be content with the necessities, in order that the debts may be paid as the Lord has admonished, the church prosper, and more missionaries sent forth? Are we making sacrifices, doing without those things that we really want to have and do, to promote the work?

The prayer meeting Thanksgiving morning was well attended, and choice blessings received. We were admonished to have love for our fellow beings if we expect to be privileged to see the Master.

May all be given the spirit of humility and love to perform their full duty with the guidance of the Spirit.

"Behold us, the rich and the poor,
Dear Lord, in thy service draw near;
One consecrateth a precious coin,
One dropping only a tear;
Look, Master, the love is here."

ALICE CARY SCHWARTZ.

Fourth Independence, Missouri

The Fourth Independence, Missouri, Branch was organized October 24. We are trying to carry on the work of a branch in the Lord's cause. We have a full quota of officers, with Brother George Jenkins as president. This branch was organized with forty-four members. The order of our Sunday meetings is Sunday school at 9.30 and preaching at 11 a. m., prayer meeting at 6.30 and preaching at 7.45 p. m. We also have prayer meeting Wednesday evening and Religion Friday evening. Our sacrament service is held at 11 a. m. the first Sunday of each month, instead of the preaching service. Our last meeting of this kind was a good one. We expect to have to secure more seats to accommodate the growing demands of our congregation. We desire to grow spiritually and in favor with God, as well as in numbers, and it is our ambition to use all means within our power to help make this glorious work a success.

Enoch Hill was chosen as the name of our branch, because we are located on the Order of Enoch grounds, at the summit of the hill. We thought the name appropriate. We trust that those living here now and those who will live here in the future will live such lives of purity that it may be said we are trying, indeed, to make this a place where the righteous dwell.

Your brother in the faith,

A. A. GAYLORD.

Hymns and Poems

Selected and Original

Silent Night

Silent night, holy night,
All is calm, all is bright
'Round yon virgin mother and child.
Holy infant so tender and mild,
Sleep in heavenly peace,
Sleep in heavenly peace.

Silent night, holy night,
Shepherds quake at the sight,
Glories stream from heaven afar,
Heavenly hosts sing Alleluia;
Christ, the Savior, is born!
Christ, the Savior, is born!

Silent night, holy night,
Son of God, love's pure light
Radiant beams from thy holy face,
With the dawn of redeeming grace,
Jesus, Lord, at thy birth,
Jesus, Lord, at thy birth.

—Joseph Mohr.

Our Lord Emmanuel

O little town of Bethlehem,
How still we see thee lie.
Above thy deep and dreamless sleep
The silent stars go by;
Yet in the dark streets shineth
The everlasting light;
The hopes and fears of all the years
Are met in thee to-night.

For Christ is born of Mary;
And gathered all above,
While mortals sleep, the angels keep
Their watch of wond'ring love.
O morning stars, together
Proclaim the holy birth;
And praises sing to God the King,
And peace to men on earth.

How silently, how silently,
The wondrous gift is given!
So God imparts to human hearts
The blessings of his heaven.

No ear may hear his coming,
But in this world of sin,
Where meek souls will receive him still
The dear Christ enters in.

O holy Child of Bethlehem,
Descend to us, we pray;
Cast out our sin, and enter in,
Be born in us to-day.
We hear the Christmas angels
The great glad tidings tell;
O come to us, abide with us,
Our Lord Emmanuel.

—Phillips Brooks.

Christmas Greetings

"Peace on earth, to men good will,"
In chorus sweet rang from the sky,
And rays of hope more bright than stars
Illumined earth on which men die.

The advent of the King of kings
Dispelled for aye eternal doom—
The realms of bliss he left that man
Should have relief from death's dark tomb.

The chorus heard by shepherds then
Still echoes through the dome of time;
Immortal voices sang that song
And still proclaim those truths divine.

Ah, sad the thought that man should strive
To drown this strain with cannons' roar,
The while, as smoke, arise the souls
Which journey to the distant shore!

To finite vision it would seem
Eternal plans at last must fail,
That love before the warring hosts
Would helpless be and quail.

But He who brought to earth its hope
Now reigns in glory, though he died,
And unto him is given the power
To stem the awful carnage tide.

And yet his angels from the heavens
Shall bid mankind to sheath the sword.
To earth he then will come as King,
And every tongue proclaim him Lord!

Ah, then shall Christmas greetings swell;
Each soul immortal they shall fill,
When Christ proclaims as King of kings
For "Peace on earth, to men good will."

AUSTIN M. DOBSON.

All heaven—her beauty, brim to brim,
Her crowns, her songs of Seraphim—
Was in that little, kindly deed
That propped a brother in his need.
All hell—its fang and serpent hiss,
Its treasons and its last abyss—
Was in that little, careless sneer
That struck a brother like a spear.

—Edwin Markham.

A Personal Letter

Dear Brother or Sister: Are you acquainted with the work of your own missionary paper, Zion's Ensign?

Have you ever thought of the liberality of the Ensign Publishing House in sending the Ensign to thousands of nonmembers at a nominal price? And do you not know that it is not possible to do so unless the first cost is met by a sufficient number of full priced subscriptions?

Do you know that the Ensign Publishing House has been built up and paid for entirely in a few years without costing the church a cent or the investment of a dollar, and that it is your institution?

Did you ever think how the light of the gospel has been sent to hundreds of dear souls through Zion's Ensign?

Do you not know that hundreds of dear Saints have stated that they knew nothing of the restored gospel until some one sent them the Ensign?

Do you know the Ensign has been known and recognized as the "Silent Preacher"? and this because of its missionary work?

Do you know that the Ensign has served as a forerunner to the missionary, educating and preparing many, and in many instances making them ready for baptism when he arrives?

If you are not taking the Ensign, don't you know that you are missing a great many good things that your missionary paper contains?

And, if you are not taking the Ensign you are not helping to make it possible to send it as a missionary helper, in making many acquainted with the gospel who otherwise would know nothing of it.

The Ensign is unlike most other papers which are filled with paying advertisements—the income to support it being almost entirely from subscriptions, and the readers get the benefit of full pages of reading matter instead of half filled with advertising, and yet it is published at $1 a year.

Do you know that the success of your missionary paper depends on you, not for your donation, but for your patronage, you to get full value for every cent you pay for it?

If you are not already a subscriber you may not know how the Ensign is featured. The first page is generally devoted to good sound editorials, mostly on gospel themes; this is followed by local items from the larger branches, then by letters from the missionaries, giving accounts of their labors and the prospects of the work in the various fields of labor, including Australia, England, Palestine, Society Islands, Hawaii, Scandinavia and other places. There are also letters from brethren and sisters, bearing strong testimonies to the truthfulness of the work and relating interesting experiences. The letters are followed by sermons and able articles on subjects connected with God's work. A portion of the paper is set apart for the Woman's Auxiliary, where topics of interest to this department of the work are discussed. The rest of the paper is taken up with miscellaneous matter.

This appeal is made to you, brother or sister, in your own personal interest, as well as in the interest of the church in general in the way of spreading the gospel, because the Ensign belongs to you individually as well as collectively. Let us hear from you.

Book Reviews

THE GAUNT GRAY WOLF.—An interesting boy's story of adventure in the far north. Written by Dillon Wallace, "the man who survived the perils of the great journey into the North that resulted in the death of Leonidas Hubbard, jr." Mr. Wallace knows the vast northern wilderness better than most men. His is a personal acquaintance. The cold, the isolation, the famine, adventures with Indians,—all are vividly reproduced in his book, The Gaunt Gray Wolf. Fleming H. Revell Company, 158 Fifth Avenue, New York City. Price $1.25.

THE BOY EMIGRANTS.—A boy's story of emigration to California during "the days of old, the days of gold," by Noah Brooks. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York City, Fifth Avenue, at Forty-eighth Street. An interesting and splendidly illustrated book for boys. The author states his object in these words: "This little story of the 'Boy Emigrants' is written that you and other little boys like you may learn something of the strange, eventful history of the early overland travelers to California. If you shall be amused and entertained while you read this simple tale of real adventure I shall be glad; for, although this is in some sense a historical sketch, it is not so long since I was a boy that I have forgotten that mere history is very dry reading to most young folks. The scenery of the book is all taken from nature; many of the characters were real people; and almost all the incidents which here befall the Boy Emigrants came under my own observation, or under that of people whom I knew on the trail or in California. I have said that this is a historical sketch: and I ought to add that it is a diffident attempt to rescue from forgetfulness some of the traits of a peculiar movement of American population. Many, perhaps most, of the people who undertook the toilsome journey across the continent have passed away. The trail, worn smooth by countless thousands of weary feet, is covered by an iron road; railway trains flash in a few days over the vast spaces where once the wagon of the emigrant crept painfully through months of travel. Towns and villages occupy the old camping-places of the wandering gold-seeker; and the telegraph wire sings through lonely hollows once lighted by his watch-fires. This is all right and natural; but it is only just that those who come after the pioneers should sometimes recall their trials, struggles, and triumphs."

LOVING AND LEARNING

I have loved to learn; and I have learned to love.

These words we caught from the lips of an aged man during his last illness. We refer to President Joseph Smith. As he uttered them they were riveted upon our attention.

Many could repeat the first article of this simple confession: "I have loved to learn." A passion for learning burns deep in the human heart. This passion is the incentive back of all exploration, physical, mental, spiritual.

This passion led Columbus to cross the stormy and uncharted Atlantic. It led Balboa through the wilderness to the Pacific; Magellan into the far northwest; Nansen and Peary into the frozen North, and Scott and Shackleton into the frozen South. This passion leads the mathematician through the labyrinths of the higher calculus. It fires the heart of the astronomer, as with telescope he penetrates far stellar spaces, weighs planets, catches star dust in his hands and analyzes it.

It is godlike to know. Given other necessary qualities, we become godlike as we learn. To love to learn must meet with divine approval. For we are commanded to "seek learning even by study, and also by faith."

Jesus himself voiced the invitation, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me." And it was said of the disciples that men took notice of them that they had been with Jesus and learned of him.

Our people should be intellectually active. It is perfectly proper for them to "love to learn." Our young people are justified in their ambitions along that line, and will be blessed in their studies, providing they retain a consecrated purpose and fail not to learn of Jesus.

A brother who was about to enter upon pastoral work recently asked us, "Do you not think it especially necessary that a pastor should study all the time?"

We replied, "Yes, he must study all the time or move all the time." And we added, perhaps crudely, "It is a case of dig in or dig out." But how about the people? As it is with the pastor, so should it be with the people. There should be a high level of intelligence. That level is not attained without labor. As Longfellow says:

The heights by great men reached and kept
Were not attained by sudden flight,
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward in the night.

Yes, there are many who can say, "I have loved to learn." How many can add, "And I have learned to love"?

John was the apostle of love. He who at one time leaned on the bosom of the Master caught the very heart throbs of the man of Galilee. And it is said of John that when he became very old, so that he could no longer preach, the Saints at Ephesus used to carry him into the church in a big chair and place him before the altar. Lifting his trembling hands above the audience he delivered himself ever of this one exhortation, "Little children, love one another."

As he grew old and approached death, or his change, whatever it was that awaited him, all other philosophies faded away into the dim background. This one philosophy of love endured: "Little children, love one another."

So with this aged apostle of love and charity of these last days. On his deathbed his confession was, "I have loved to learn; and I have learned to love."

This is a compound sentence. Neither part is complete in itself, so far as the Christian philosophy is concerned. There must be a dual development,—that of brain and heart. Neither alone is sufficient.

Scholasticism is prone to become cold, exclusive, select, bookish. Little feet must track the study floor. Little fingers must disarrange the books and tangle themselves among the heart strings. The love of some good woman must paint rosy dream pictures before the printed page to the confusion of habitually well-ordered mental processes. True friendship must light the altar fires of the soul. Pity for the poor, the sick, the distressed must break up the fountain of tears. Possibly personal bereavement must break the heart.

Perfect love casts out all fear, declares John. It also casts out mean selfishness. It is true, as Tennyson says:

Love took up the harp of life, and smote on all the chords with might;
Smote the chord of self, that, trembling, passed in music out of sight.

Not until love takes up the harp of life can we make divine melody. And at the first stroke the chord of self vanishes. For those whom we truly love we willingly die; more sublime sacrifice, for them we daily expend our lives in service, forgetting self.

In this church we have at times perhaps become contemptuous of sentiment. We have been disgusted with the cheap appeals of false evangelism to morbid emotions. We have trumpeted forth a gospel that appeals to the brain. That is as it should be; but we must not go to the other extreme.

Without true sentiment life would be barren and arid. We must stir the hearts of men. Appealing to their intelligence, we must not forget their emotions.

We can defeat men in argument on the first principles, using scripture texts as a bludgeon. But it is better to win them with acts of love, courtesy, service, simultaneously with the appeal to their brains. Logic and love are a strong team.

In all of our church work this principle should prevail. The pastor must love his people. The priest must go from house to house in pursuit of his priestly vocation with love in his heart. The teacher must feel the same Christlike impulse when he goes forth as a peacemaker to settle difficulties,—“no one can assist in this work except he shall be humble and full of love, having faith, hope, and charity.”

The fellowship, love, and confidence of the Saints is one of the most valuable and blessed inheritances that we can cherish here below. It should not be lightly forfeited.

To some, like the writer, the good Lord did not see fit to give brothers and sisters. Others know what it is to gather about them a large family circle of brothers and sisters. That sweet privilege is denied us. But there is a remedy. They have not been given us, so we must go out and seek for them. This course is open to all. Thus Jesus found John, and Lazarus, and Mary.

Doing this we can eventually complete the circle of development and come to say with our departed president: “I have loved to learn; and I have learned to love.”

ELBERT A. SMITH.

If a day spent is not entirely as you would spend it, at least the average of happiness is higher than if you passed the hours in vain regrets and vainer forebodings until no strength is left for sane living.

CURRENT EVENTS

SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

ROUMANIA RESTORES LAND.—Report from Petrograd states that the Bulgarian minister there announced on the 22d that Roumania had restored to Bulgaria much of the territory acquired in the last Balkan war.

JAPANESE DIET DISSOLVED.—For rejecting a measure to increase the army, the Emperor of Japan on the 25th, dissolved the Japanese Imperial Diet, upholding the program of the ministry for military development.

CANAL PAYS.—Colonel George W. Goethals is quoted as saying that Panama Canal tolls more than pay operating expenses. Colonel Goethals will ask for an appropriation of ten million dollars to finish terminals and coal stations.

UNEMPLOYMENT.—A million men are said to be out of employment throughout the United States, with a hundred thousand facing starvation. Private and public agencies are at work in an attempt to relieve the situation, by furnishing food and work.

REVOLUTION IN ALBANIA.—A revolution has broken out in Albania against Essad Pasha, whose palace at Tarina is reported pillaged and burned. The Italian Government has landed soldiers to restore order and protect foreigners and peaceful citizens.

SCANDINAVIAN CONFERENCE.—Report from the conference of the Kings of Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, in neutral interests involved in the European war, says that the meetings were harmonious, and that an agreement was reached on special questions raised. King Gustave, of Sweden, in an address before the conference, expressed the desire of these countries to maintain their neutrality. Additional meetings will be held when occasion suggests.

ARIZONA STILL DRY.—The special United States tribunal from which injunctions were sought to prevent enforcement of the Arizona prohibition law, passed at the late election, on the grounds that said law was confiscatory and denied constitutional religious rights by prohibiting importation of wine for sacramental purposes, refuses injunctions, and the law will go into effect January 1. Appeal will be taken to the United States Supreme Court.

PROHIBITION LOST.—After ten hours of debate, a resolution to submit to the States a constitutional amendment for national prohibition was on the 22d defeated in the House by a vote of one hundred ninety-seven for, to one hundred eighty-nine against, a two thirds majority being necessary for passage. Administration leaders contend that the matter is a State issue and not a proper subject for Federal enactment. Prohibition leaders have already in hand plans for renewing the resolution in the next Congress.

CENTURY OF PEACE.—December 24 marked the one hundredth anniversary of the signing of the Treaty of Ghent by the United States and Great Britain. Elaborate plans for the celebration of this event have been disarranged by the European war. However, the American committee urges suitable exercises in churches on February 14, the date agreed upon with the Canadian committee; addresses at State capitals February 17 and 18, the dates of ratification and proclamation of the treaty; and appropriate exercises in schools on February 22 or some later date.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—Puebla, the most important city between the capital and Vera Cruz, has been occupied by Zapata and Angeles forces, following the defeat of a Carranza army of twenty thousand. Villa is said to have taken a house in Mexico City as if he intended to remain indefinitely. Reports of executions of political offenders at Mexico City and elsewhere have been circulated. General Scott has been in conference at Naco with Generals Hill and Mayerona, seeking an agreement to create a neutral zone and stop firing across the border. He reports progress.

A DIFFERENCE.—A difference has arisen between President Wilson and the Senate over the matter of certain appointments of the President which the Senate has declined to ratify. The constitutional provision that the "President shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint," federal officers, seems to be interpreted by senatorial sentiment to mean, with the advice and consent of individual senators directly interested and the Senate, at least in cases like those involved. The President, on the other hand, is of the opinion that since the chief executive is responsible for the administration, he should be allowed to appoint, the Senate concurring, not dictating.

THAW HELD.—The right of the State of New York to extradite Harry K. Thaw from New Hampshire, was on the 21st upheld by the United States Supreme Court in an unanimous opinion reversing the opinion of Judge Aldrich, of the Federal District Court of New Hampshire. Conspiracy in escaping from the Matteawan Insane Asylum to which he had been committed for the killing of Stanford White, is the charge on which Thaw stands indicted in New York. Unless counsel conjointly asks action earlier, the decree of Judge Aldrich in habeas corpus proceedings, ordering Thaw released by the New Hampshire authorities holding him for extradition under the order of the governor, will be set aside, which will turn Thaw over to the New Hampshire authorities, and then to those of New York.

EUROPEAN WAR.—Interest continues to center in the incessant fighting of the eastern lines. The Germans have been checked about thirty miles from Warsaw, where they met the main Russian line and where desperate fighting is reported. The Russians continue operations in eastern Prussia, having driven back across the border the German advances. In Galicia the Russians have been compelled to withdraw from the siege of Cracow to about thirty miles east of that place, where they have taken a firm stand and checked the German-Austrian advance. In the Caucasian country the Russians are on the defensive, where the Turks, reinforced, have been making unsuccessful attempts to advance. Heavy fighting continues in Belgium and northern France, both lines reporting gains at different points. The allies are generally aggressive, though the Germans have made fierce attacks in the Argonne regions. The allies seem to be maneuvering to find a weak place in the German line. British war vessels continue to operate along the coast and against the Germans. The Servian and Montenegrin forces have again reunited for an advance on Sarajevo, the Bosnian capital. An allied fleet is reported to have bombarded the Dardanelles. The British steamer Tritona struck a mine off the Irish coast the 17th, and is thought to have foundered. Riotous demonstrations against Austria are said to be kept down with difficulty in various parts of Italy. Captain Fourie, a Boer rebel and a former officer of the Union of the South African army, was executed for treason at Pretoria, the 20th. This act is thought to be an indication of the attitude of the South African Government toward other rebels, including Generals Byres and De Wet.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

JOURNAL EDITORIAL AS TRACT.—The Bureau of Publicity in cooperation with the Herald Publishing House, has arranged to republish, in tract form, the editorial from The Kansas City Journal of December 12, headed, "Joseph Smith." A suitable introduction will accompany this editorial. The tract will be entitled, "By their fruits ye shall know them." A finer tribute was seldom paid to mortal man than is contained in this editorial. As the president, prophet, and leading representative of the church for fifty-four years, President Smith gave the world a splendid opportunity to judge the restored gospel by the fruits seen in his life and character. These tracts will be distributed free on receipt of postage to those who will agree to distribute them. Missionaries, local officers, and others should improve this opportunity. Watch for further announcement of details before ordering.

WISDOM

Wisdom is a power which gives prudence and discretion, that enables man to perceive what is fit to be done according to the circumstances of time, place, persons, manners, and end of doing, and whose origin is with God. In Ecclesiastes it says, "I saw that wisdom excelleth folly for the wise man's eyes are in his head." The wise man has the use of his eyes and reason. He sees his way and so acts with discretion and foresight. He avoids many dangers and much mischief by acting wisely and conscientiously.

Wisdom is a necessary attribute and has been so from the beginning. It is a gift from God. We read repeatedly in the Scriptures where men realizing their own imperfection sought this gift from God. Solomon desired above all things this gift. These examples show the contrasting difference between the human, self-reliant, imperfect, and perverted judgment, and the divine wisdom, truly showing us we must lean on Him who is the source of all wisdom and knowledge.

Wisdom is an ocean that has no shore; its prospect is not terminated by any horizon; its center is everywhere and its circumference nowhere. We brought its seeds into the world with us, but not wisdom herself. Nature causes the one, and study perfects the other. It can not be obtained without industry and labor. How can we expect to find gold upon the earth's surface when we dig almost to the center of it to find the baser metal.

It is necessary that wisdom attend the human footsteps from the dawn of life to the closing hours of the aged and worn-out warriors. Job says, "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." The wisdom which will enable to live aright and die worthily. It is the highest of all wisdom. It quickens the understanding and guides to light, truth, and knowledge. The outcome of this fear of God will be seen as spoken by the Psalmist, "The mouth of the righteous speaketh wisdom." They shall speak wisely and with understanding, for they have learned from the great Master.

There is a wisdom which is the outcome of many experiences, and which is often seen in the aged. This we respect and admire; but we can not all be old in a day, therefore we need to cultivate this from earliest youth.

James says, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him." Many in their extremities have given heed to these words and been answered in a wonderful manner. One instance we will give: When a young lad of fifteen, Joseph Smith became confused by the many churches which professed to be the true church of God. He went to the right source for knowledge. His own statement concerning these events is something like this: While moved religiously through revivals that were being held in his neighborhood and finding a conflict in his father's family and in the community as to which of the religious sects or churches they should join, as he was reading the Bible his eye fell upon the passage we have named, "If any of you lack wisdom," etc. He went into the woods and prayed, and heavenly beings appeared to him in answer.

Although answer to our prayers may not be in such a striking manner, yet again and again it comes in directing our steps in ways which many times are against our own will and inclinations. In youth we need wisdom to enable us to discern good from evil and to guide and direct us, to keep us from the snares and evils which beset the path of the youthful and ignorant. As we grow older we need it more than ever to guide us safely and wisely through all the allurements and temptations which will be brought to bear against us. If we are wise we will avoid the very appearance of evil, thereby making our own path easier for future service for God. As the duties and responsibilities of home and family come to us, we need wisdom to be our continual guide or we will make a disastrous failure of life.

Wisdom we will need to live aright, to direct our home, to train our children to love and fear God, to care for them, mind and body, to keep the laws of God in our own lives and direct our family so to do. Regarding the manner of food we should eat, as is given in the eighty-sixth section of the Doctrine and Covenants: We are instructed in those words of wisdom to avoid many things which would be injurious to us, both physically and spiritually, to use others sparingly, and to use those which are plain and wholesome. In doing this health will be given to our bodies and we shall find wisdom and great treasures of knowledge, even hidden treasures. We shall run and not be weary, walk and not faint, and the destroying angel shall pass by as he did the children of Israel, and not slay us.

What I have tried to express is beautifully given in these verses:

Oh, happy is the man who hears
Instruction's warning voice!
And who celestial wisdom makes
His early, only choice.

For she has treasures greater far,
Than east or west unfold;
And her rewards more precious are
Than all their stores of gold.

In her right hand she holds to view,
A length of happy days:
Riches, with splendid honors joined,
Are what her left displays.

She guides the young with innocence,
In pleasures path to tread;
A crown of glory she bestows
Upon the hoary head.

According as her labors rise,
Do her rewards increase.
Her ways are ways of pleasantness,
And all her paths are peace.

RACHEL PEISKER.

CEASE TO COMPLAIN

Among the weaknesses and imperfections of fallen humanity is the reprehensible habit of complaining; especially so in the matter of aches and pains and bodily distress. This perhaps belongs more to this age than to some others. The ancient Greeks and Romans would blush to speak of such things,—considering it a disgrace to be sick and ailing, and a shame to call attention to it, or to acknowledge that they were influenced by their sufferings.

Very few love or admire others because of ill health; to the contrary some hold them in a sort of a pitying contempt, especially if attention is continually drawn to the subject by the persons themselves. And yet there are hundreds of persons who seek admiration, who have formed the detestable habit of moaning and groaning and magnifying every little ache and pain until they become objects of pity and contempt, not so much because of what they are suffering as that they have not the manly or womanly courage to minimize their sufferings, if they really are suffering, by putting on a smiling face and a brave front.

Sympathy is sweet, but it is useless in this matter-of-fact world to seek it by continually whining about one's ailments. Your headache is no worse than other people's, your stomach, your tooth, your toe is much the same as your neighbor's, and perhaps is not aching as bad as his, and he is saying nothing about it, while you are continually trying to impress him, by a twisted countenance and piteous moans, that nobody ever had such a headache, or toothache, or toeache as you have.

The chances are that while you are complaining and seeking sympathy, your audience is inwardly saying, "Then, why don't you eat less fat pork, and drink less tea and coffee; or, why don't you do a little more deep breathing, keep better hours, and wear shoes that fit you."

The truly physical-cultured consider complaining not only a weakness but a disgrace. They are proud of what health and strength they have, and, knowing the value of it as a factor for power and admiration, they put the best foot forward, not even acknowledging what lingering relics of indisposition there yet may be about them.

Complaining in this way is not nice, nor dignified. Even the complainer despises it in others, yet fails to check it in himself.

In Saints it is not excusable. The Lord has pronounced against it. If it were not a thing that is unnecessary, and could be overcome; if it were not a thing that displeases him, he would not have said, "Cease to complain of pain and sickness and distress of body. . . . Bear the burdens of body," etc.—Doctrine and Covenants 119: 9.

The Lord, who is kind and loving, understands our aches and pains, and does not pity us in our fallen condition. Do not let us prevent him, by our continual complaining from admiring us.

The beginning of a new year is not the only time to make good resolutions. Let all the Saints make this one,—that is, those who complain: "Resolved, That I will heed the Lord's word, and from now on cease to complain and talk about my bodily ills; and if ever called upon to mention them at all, to render them as small as possible instead of as large as possible."

Remember that the world loves and admires the healthy and brave, but has contempt for the weak and contemptible.

Laugh and the world laughs with you;
Weep, and you weep alone.

H. J.

CLEAN HANDS AND A PURE HEART

While sitting at my work some days ago, the thought came to me, "Define clean hands and a pure heart."

It would take a long time to write or to stand in the pulpit and tell all that can be told regarding this text, if text we may call it.

We sometimes hear in the prayers of the Saints: "We pray that we may come before thee with clean hands and a pure heart." Do we at these times realize the great significance of the term? What condition are we in if we have clean hands and a pure heart? We are told that the pure in heart are Zion. And if we are pure in heart have we clean hands? Surely we must have, for they both go together, and form a team. And surely they make a good team, one that can pull us over the worst of roads if we can come into possession of them.

But how to get this team and keep it after we do get it—there lies the great work. We must observe all things whatsoever God has commanded us. Keeping ourselves unspotted from the evils of the world covers all the ground, no matter which way we turn; especially in our own individual work and the characters we make of ourselves by coming in contact with those we meet, with our lights so shining that they will illuminate our very being with so radiant a light that it will draw those from the darkness to investigate.

We must put on the whole armor of Christ, be Christlike in our walk and conversation, very careful what we say and careful how we understand and the things we hear said. We must learn to love our neighbor as ourselves. We are commanded to do so, and until we do we can not have that team.

Learn to sacrifice. Therein lies a large payment on the team we are trying to purchase. Make our bodies a living sacrifice; but make them holy and acceptable unto God. What is this sacrifice? Paul says: It is "reasonable service." Is not that fair enough? God only asks of us that which is reasonable.

Can't you do some little service for your brother, your sister, or your neighbor that is reasonable? But remember, one that is holy and acceptable unto God. We should keep this thought in mind: "Are we doing right in the sight of God?" All of these little things help us to get the team we are working for. Helping here a little and there a little, making some one happy, lightening another's load; lifting one that is fallen, never pushing him down. Don't say it serves him right, or he is not fit for one to be seen in company with. Leave that for the great Judge to decide. His soul is just as precious in the sight of God as ours.

All this calls for work; but it is cheerful work if we perform it in the right spirit. These are a few of the things that will help us to have clean hands and a pure heart. May we all labor to this end and finally stand approved before God.

MESQUAKIE INDIAN NOTES

Mesquakie (Iowa) Booster:

One hundred sixty tons of the finest quality Country Gentleman sweet corn, grown under contract for the Weir Canning Company, Toledo, Iowa, by Mesquakie Indians were delivered during the latter part of August, netting the Indians $1,600. Hundreds of dollars were also earned by members of the tribe who were employed husking at the cannery.

We have sown several acres of alfalfa for feed, believing that this crop will be a favorable addition to our forage crop.

We have erected a silo and are ready to cut our corn for ensilage. This will insure our Jerseys an abundance of milk-producing feed this winter.

Chuck has been successful in raising chickens hatched in his incubator last spring and has now the finest lot of friers on the reservation.

John Jones dug four pounds of ginseng at Jewel Junction last week. As ginseng is bringing about $40 per pound, John was well paid for two days' work.

Cruck, Frank, Earl and Charley Davenport ran the tribal binders all through the cutting season with only four dollars and eighty cents spent in repairs, which speaks well for their skill in handling the machines.

George and Dan Youngbear, Henry Morgan, Willie Poweshiek, Oliver Lincoln, Sophia Tesson and Ida Poweshiek left Tama recently, returning to Haskell. Little Bear Eagle accompanied them, being the only new pupil from here to enroll at Haskell. We were disappointed in that several others desirous of enrolling at Haskell were prevented from doing so by guardians or parents.

On account of the withdrawal of the Wilkerson and Spindler farms, the lease money this year will amount to only $1,200, about $950 of which must be paid out for State taxes. The $250 balance is our only resources for repairs to roads and fences, cutting weeds and items of maintenance, and this sum, of course, is inadequate to keep up the reservation. We must call upon each individual Indian having land to keep his farm in a good state of repairs, as otherwise it will be necessary for us to use other tribal funds for the purpose. So get busy; get a little public spirit, cut the weeds on the Lincoln Highway at least.—Register and Leader, September 21, 1914.

OUR NEW CHEROKEE CITIZENS

Far from being "a vanishing race, the Indians of Oklahoma are multiplying in numbers," remarks the Cleveland Plain Dealer, in commenting on the dissolution of the tribal entity of the Cherokee nation by treaty with the United States. The tribe passes out of existence, this journal explains, because the Indians, "as citizens of the Commonwealth of Oklahoma and possessing the full rights of American citizenship," have no further need of tribal government, and their progress, we are told, is "a convincing proof of the excellence of the American Indian when he is uncorrupted by the white man's evils." In the division of the tribal funds, press dispatches say, each member will receive a share of about fifteen dollars, and among the distinguished men who will partake United States Senator Owen is conspicuously named.

However, in speaking of the Cherokees as "the most advanced native American race that the continent has seen since the Spaniards wiped out the empires of the Incas and the Aztecs," a writer in The New York Times queries whether the Cherokees of to-day have any more right "to be called a native American race than the Mexicans or some of the South American nations." He reminds us that the tribe is "full of the descendants of white men, mostly missionaries and British traders, who married into it in the eighteenth century," as well as of "squawmen" who have been taken in since the Cherokees settled in Indian Territory, now known as Oklahoma. At present, the writer informs us, the tribe numbers forty-one thousand, seven hundred and ninety-eight members, including about "two thousand full-blooded white men who have been adopted into it, and about three thousand negroes, who are descended from the slaves freed in 1865."

As a sign of Cherokee enlightenment, the New York Evening Post calls attention to the fact that the tribe has "long maintained a constitutional government and native newspapers," while it has "produced more teachers than all the other tribes combined." The Cherokees' chief claim to notice, The Post thinks, may be "the alphabet invented by Sequoyat ninety years ago and its effect on their development," while, on the other hand, this journal continues, the prime importance of the present event is as:

the first large achievement of the Government in its policy of bringing about the cessation of all tribes as individual entities—the first policy worthy of the name it has had. The Cherokees were the last of the five nations to enter into a treaty to that end; and the record of the contentious lawsuits involved in completing the transaction is, with the tragic history of their early deportation, an epitome of much of the injustice of the United States towards its wards. The other nations, Creek and Chickasaw, Seminole and Choctaw, which suffered equally from an "independence" in Indian Territory that attracted every outlaw in the Southwest can rejoice that they also will shortly pass. . . .

The clearing up of their affairs and the conversion of all tribal property into cash to be distributed thus see a measure of final justice done a people that once claimed a vast empire. It is a first goal reached on the road marked out, when, in 1887, Congress, abandoning the wretched reservation idea, enacted the Land Allotment Law, authorizing the division of Indian lands into individual allotments, each to be held in Government trust until an allottee was felt competent to receive full letters patent. Such patents, carrying citizenship, have been issued to each member of the tribe.—Literary Digest, August 1, 1914.

Diction, Phraseology, Idiom

A FEW POINTED QUESTIONS

Will some one who knows please answer.

1. Why do we in addressing our heavenly Father always fall back on the diction of the sixteenth century, as thee, thou, thine, ye, yea, nay, etc?
2. Is there anything more sublime in this superannuated phraseology of the Dark Ages than in that of the modern English?
3. Is the development of our language retrograding?
4. Do we manifest more respect for the Deity by addressing him in the old, worn-out forms of thee, and thine, and ye, than we would by addressing him in the best and acceptable language of to-day?

5. Is there anything particularly sacred clustering about these words that causes us to hang on to them so tenaciously?

6. If the words thee, and thine, carry with them any more respect than do their equivalents in modern English, then why do we not manifest the wisdom of the Quakers and apply them to each other, especially to our superiors, our parents?

7. If there is anything coarse or vulgar connected with the words you, or yours, then who is to be blamed, and why do our linguists, our students of philology, sit stupidly by and say nothing?

8. Is the Midland dialect of the fourth period so much more sacred than newer expressions of the present that we must reserve the former for the exclusive purpose of clothing our religious expressions?

9. Is it to be presumed that God considers it any special honor to be approached in the otherwise obsolete, Teutonic dialect of the fifth century, or in that of the Moesogoths of the fourth century?

10. Do you presume that Enoch sheds any tears on account of his wonderful prayer to God having been translated into the modern English language, rather than into the idiom of the barbaric Goths? (See Doctrine and Covenants 36: 11.)

11. Will some one please tell us where we can secure a version of the Bible translated into the modern English language instead of the phraseology of the Dark Ages?

News from Missions

'Neath the Southern Cross

The writer has received many letters expressing regret at the sudden termination of the mission of Apostle Gomer T. Griffiths in Australia. He did a splendid work while among us, and it is to be regretted that he was not able while here to cover the whole of the mission. There were very few of the districts where our work is established that he did not visit, but those who did not have the pleasure of having him labor among them feel it very much. However, all realize that our brother's departure was unavoidable, and disappointments will soon be swallowed up in whole-hearted endeavor to spread the Master's cause.

While Apostle Griffiths was among us he organized no less than six branches and two new districts; he baptized quite a number, and a good many were ordained to office by his direction. One of the finest things he did, to the mind of the writer, was the systematizing of the work of the local ministry. He believes that the priesthood is not conferred on men for their adornment, but that they should "minister for men in things pertaining to God." He sought to give every man work and made arrangements whereby all shall be kept busy. There is no room for the idler in Zion, nor can the drone be tolerated in any of her outposts.

We are pleased to report that about forty baptisms have been registered during the past few weeks. Two were baptized at Wondai, Queensland, and thirteen at Inverlaw, in the same vicinity, where Elders Hermann Peisker and B. H. Longfield have been laboring for some time. A movement is on foot to erect a church building at the latter point. This is gratifying, for the district was practically unworked before Apostle Griffiths and the writer visited it in the month of July.

Brethren A. V. Robinson and Will Patterson have also had some good experiences on the north coast of New South Wales, where they have recently baptized a dozen. Elder John Jones, our New South Wales district president, laboring on the same coast, records the baptism of about fifteen. He is now engaged in preparing a gospel wagon for the field, in which he and some other young brother will embark on a test of the value of the gospel wagon as an addition to our means of reaching the people.

Elder J. H. N. Jones, of the Seventy, who is in charge of Western Australia, is now on the way to that field, accompanied by Brother J. M. Argent, a young man from Nambucca, New South Wales. Brother Jones is a tried and valuable campaigner, and we feel sure that the work in Western Australia will receive fresh impetus under his direction.

Elder C. Edward Miller seemed to be a little lonely at the moment of the departure of Apostle Griffiths. He felt the separation keenly, as he came to this country with Brother Griffiths and expected to return in his company. But Brother Miller is what the Australians term a "Briton"—if it is excusable to apply that term to an American. We don't mean that he has thrown the United States over and adopted this country as his. To call a man a "Briton" in this country is to pay the highest tribute possible to his pluck. We know that Brother Miller will not spend any time in idle repining. He is a live wire, and will keep on just the same as if Brother Griffiths were here. He loves this work and will keep busy in its promulgation. South Australia, Victoria and Tasmania, of which field he is in charge, are well served by such a superintendent.

Elder W. H. Gammidge, laboring in South Australia, reports ten baptisms for this year, which is an evidence that he has not been idle in "the city of churches." He and Sister Gammidge are "live wire" workers in every department.

Elder George T. Rawson, one of our missionary recruits, is laboring in Victoria, under the direction of Brother Miller and is "making good." He is a willing worker and possesses good qualifications. He is also an active Sunday school and Religio worker.

Elder B. H. Longfield, who has been laboring in Queensland during the year, is being transferred to New Zealand. He was successful in his former field of labor, and possesses the power of initiative necessary in a new mission, so we look for good reports regarding his work in the new field. For a time he will labor with the brethren of the Dunedin Branch. Elder H. W. Savage is expected to join him in December and then the field of their operations will be broadened. In the meantime Brother Longfield will reinforce Brother Hall and Leberz, who have for years held the fort on the streets of Dunedin.

The European war is having its effect in this country. We know nothing of war's devastating power, from the standpoint of actual fighting in this land, but our country is part of the great British Empire and owes its past peace and security to Britain's might. In the hour of the mother country's need our baby nation rushed to help. Our ships and men are already playing their part in the titanic struggle. Tens of thousands of our promising young men have volunteered for service. Some are already at the front. More men will be trained and sent as long as necessary.

All this requires money, and additional taxes are resulting. Then trade is dislocated to a certain extent. So many ships are engaged as transports in various parts of the world that it is difficult to find ships sufficient for our export trade. This means congestion and consequent financial stress. If Britain did not command the seas our condition would be much worse. Many sacrifices are being made and there is some unemployment, which the Government is doing its best to relieve.

We do not know how it will affect the church treasury in Australia, but we do not think that there is need for alarm. A good deal of our financial support comes from the farmers, who are profiting, rather than suffering from the effects of the war. They receive good prices for their produce and we trust will remember the Lord's work accordingly.

Our publishing house is, however, feeling the strain. We have wages and a heavy rent to pay. Unfortunately we were subjected to a heavy rise in our rent a week or two before the outbreak of hostilities. Like the American publishing houses, we take in as much outside work as we can possibly secure in order to keep our workmen fully employed. The war has had the effect of reducing our trade so that instead of the office working full time we have been reduced to the necessity of putting the staff on a half-time basis. This, of course, does not pay, for we have the full rent and just the same amount of incidental expenses, with only half the profit-earning power.

Fortunately for us a movement was inaugurated by Apostle Griffiths to purchase a block of land next to the Balmain church and quite close to the present rented premises. The church has acquired this land, and we propose to erect upon it, as soon as possible, our mission headquarters and printing office combined. For some years we have had a building fund in connection with the publishing house, but the funds in hand are quite inadequate for the purpose. We are therefore making fresh appeals for further help. We have a good, up-to-date printing plant, and it would be foolish to risk losing that through having to suffer the heavy burden of our present rent throughout a trade depressing war. So we trust that the Saints will rally to our aid and make it possible for us to escape this rent by building a place of our own.

Now we do not appeal to the American Saints to help us in this object by donations, though of course we are not so independent that we will refuse any help forwarded; but there is a way in which America can help us just the same. In 1911, the Herald Publishing House printed for us a book called, The Fall of Babylon. The profits from its sale go to the building fund which now requires help so urgently. The price of the book is $1.25, and it may be obtained through the Herald Publishing House. The sales of this book have been disappointing, possibly because the writer is unknown, personally, to the bulk of the American Saints, but it contains $1.25 worth of good gospel goods just the same. Get the book and you will be satisfied with it. At the same time you will help our publishing interests in Australia at a most critical stage in their history. Readers will confer a great favor if they will act promptly on this suggestion. If a generous response is made to this appeal, our building will soon be assured and the church printing plant in Australia saved. Are you interested?

Owing to the great distance of Australia from the church headquarters in America, it is an absolute necessity that we should have our own paper. News we send to the American papers is three months old before we ever see it. Our little paper has done much during the thirteen years of its existence, to knit together the various parts of this vast mission, and has been the means of whetting the interest of numbers for the gospel. It would be a retrograde step to abandon it. We must hang on, if there is a war in progress and trade does languish! Until this year the writer has spent much time and energy in building up the present plant, but the needs of the mission now require my presence continually in the mission field, consequently I can not be present in the office to stem the present tide of difficulty. However, my tasks will be lightened greatly if the Saints will rise to the occasion and help us to get a building of our own.

We regret to state that the sending of local newspapers out of this country is prohibited for the present, consequently we can not send the Gospel Standard to our American subscribers and exchanges. This will explain to our friends why that paper will be stopped temporarily after the October issue from reaching our American subscribers.

Our New South Wales conference will convene on New Year's Day and extend over the two following days. We are looking forward to an unusually good spiritual time. Each year our conference seems to become a greater success. The state will be divided into two districts at this conference, and we hope in this way to obtain better supervision of the efforts of the local workers, from a district viewpoint.

There is a universal desire among the Saints to actively push the work. Everyone wants to do something, which is a good sign. We are also looking forward to what General Conference will do for us. In the meantime we shall do our best to carry on the work and to bring success to the cause we love.

Your brother in Christ,

WALTER J. HAWORTH.

ROZELLE, NEW SOUTH WALES, AUSTRALIA, 623 Darling Street.

Arkansas

The Lord has greatly blessed the few that have labored in this field this year. There are only three of us, Brethren Riley, Dubois, and myself. We have baptized about one hundred. Since writing last I have labored in Johnson and Garland counties.

While holding a meeting on Mulberry Mountain one night, a gentleman stepped up to me and made himself known. He said he kept a mob from taking my brother, J. D. Erwin, out and whipping him, twenty-one years ago, when he was preaching in the southern part of that county. This man was the deputy sheriff at that time, and told the mob they would have to kill him before they took my brother from the house. He was a young man then. He now has a nice family and a fine home on Mulberry Mountain. I baptized him and his wife and his oldest son and daughter. I was made to realize the truthfulness of the statement of scripture where it is said that the kingdom of heaven is as a sower who went forth to sow, some seed falling on good ground, etc. I baptized eight fine men and four nice women in that vicinity.

From there I went to Conway, in Falkner County. From here I came to Little Rock, meeting Brother J. M. Smith. He and I went to Hot Springs. We preached a few days here, and I led into the waters of baptism two noble men and one fine lady, Mr. Flowers and his wife and son-in-law. They have a nice home. We anticipate that they will do good work in the interest of the church. We think a good branch will be raised up at this place. From here we went to the home of Brother Sanders, on Washington River, and had a fine meeting. Brother Sanders and his children are doing all they can for the work.

Brother Smith and I are now at Bigfork in the midst of a good meeting. He is a fine young preacher and a noble man to travel with. He often speaks of Brother J. D. under whose preaching he was converted. I have found many fine Saints in the State of Arkansas, and many other noble-hearted people. I think the future for the gospel work in this State is bright.

I have just read in the HERALD of the illness of President Joseph Smith. My heart and mind go out in prayer for him, that he may be spared yet a few years for the peace and consolation of the church. He certainly has been a great servant of God.

Ever praying for the success of Zion, I remain,

Your brother,

E. A. ERWIN.

BIGFORK, ARKANSAS, December 8, 1914.

Northwestern Kansas

This finds me at Lebanon, Kansas, where Brother Walter Johnson and I have been holding a few meetings. I baptized three Tuesday last. I stopped here a year ago and preached the first Latter Day Saint sermon ever presented here. At that time I spoke twenty-two times and baptized one. Would have continued longer but was called to Lucerne, where Brother Knisley and I held a meeting, with twelve additions. I was then called back to Lebanon to meet an attack made against our work, but our opponents refused to meet us on church propositions.

From here we went home to spend Christmas with loved ones. As opposition began to spread again, I came back and answered it and held another meeting, baptized seven more, making eight in two meetings, and with the three I baptized at this visit, eleven in all. May the good work go on and the Lord be praised, not man.

This has been a very successful year with me in the gospel work. Even as we heard at the last General Conference that the Lord would go with his servants this year in greater power than heretofore, I have surely experienced a greater degree of the Spirit of the Lord. I have had the privilege of baptizing some at each place I have held meetings in this district since last spring except two, one at Oberlin, where Brother Johnson and I preached only five sermons and were turned out of the Baptist church. I held a meeting in Norton in August, and failed to baptize any at that time, although several were talking of obeying, and a little later Brother Johnson and I passed through there and I preached one sermon and Brother Johnson baptized one. So that leaves only one place where I have held forth since last conference without having baptized some.

There are more calls for preaching in this district than we can fill between now and spring. We wish to say for the benefit of those waiting for meetings that we will do the very best we can under the circumstances.

Brother Johnson, my colaborer, is a fine young man, and worthy of the support of the district. He started for home Monday last. He did not say he was homesick, but I took note that he had been counting the days until time to go.

Bad weather has broken in on our meetings here, and I may go home because of sickness in my family, which has been a burden to me for some little time.

May the Lord's work go on.

In gospel bonds,

J. D. SHOWER.

North Dakota

As we draw near to the close of another year, sober thoughts come to us, and we are led to ask, What of the past? Have we occupied the last twelve months diligently and wisely? Alas! to be honest with my own heart I am compelled to answer, Not at all times. I am thankful to my kind heavenly Father, for lengthening out my days, and renewing opportunities for service. As I look back upon the thirty-two years I have spent in this northern territory, upon the whole, there has been fair progress, and the future is bright with hope in many ways, chief to me being the activity of our young Saints. I hope they will continue to be faithful.

Our district is a large one in area, but not numerically. We are all surrounded with neighbors that know little or nothing of the latter-day gospel; so we don't need to be idle. I always notice that the steady workers are the most cheerful and happy, and while it may appear strange to some, they seem to have the most time to attend meeting, and help others. The same is true of finances. I invariably have the most given to me for traveling expenses by those who periodically remit to the bishop's agent. And again the same is true of Sunday school and Religio.

During the past year I have received so many calls for administration, funerals, etc., that I have not spent so much time as formerly in new openings. Favorable results have followed in various instances, sufficiently to confirm my faith in the Savior's promise. I have had the pleasure of leading twenty-three into the waters of baptism, some the result of recent labors of myself and others, and some the fruit of seed sown in the years of the past, where the germ of the gospel, survived the lapse of years.

Among the Saints I have received much kindness and consideration, and even in the world the bitterness and opposition seem to have ameliorated. I had one attack during the past year, from a number of ministers in the western part of the State where our work was new, which resulted as usual in additions to our ranks, after a debate with a representative of the Lutheran persuasion, the main points dwelt upon being infant baptism, confirmation, and the doctrine of transubstantiation. I would not say that all the Saints and friends were satisfied with my affirmative, but we have positive evidence that not all his crowd were pleased with his rebuttal, alleging he kept too near the Catholic fold.

At present I am on the State line where Brother Swenson and I opened up thirteen to seventeen years ago, present audiences being mostly new residents. However, the few remaining old settlers make us welcome to their homes, and if it be true that old broth is more easily warmed up, than new made," let us hope the old adage may prove true in this case.

Attention and interest is very good. The people are asking questions and come forward to take tracts eagerly. I shall continue until the holidays, and were it not for the weak condition of my wife I should return directly after, there being work in a radius of fifteen or twenty miles to last until General Conference. As it is I purpose making a trip south for three months. Those who may have business with the district presidency will please communicate with Elders James S. Wagener, Bantry, North Dakota, or Warren McElwain, Lansford, North Dakota, my associates.

To those who subscribed to the Fargo church building fund, please accept our thanks for same; and for your information we wish to say that the committee thought it not best to buy the brick church, but we think there is enough subscribed to put up a medium-sized building, on a cheaper lot, without going in debt. With prayers for all the Israel of God, we are as ever, your servant in gospel bonds,

WILLIAM SPARLING.

BRAMPTON, NORTH DAKOTA, December 14, 1914.

What makes life worth living
Is our giving and forgiving;
Giving tiny bits of kindness
That will leave a joy behind us,
And forgiving bitter trifles
That the right word often stifles;
What makes life worth the living
Is the giving and forgiving.—Anon.

News from Branches

Toronto, Ontario

Since our last report to the columns of our HERALD from Toronto, in the land of The Lady of the Snow, many interesting features have taken place; for it is a well-known slogan, "There's always something doing in Toronto." And to know just what to write, what would be most interesting, is somewhat puzzling. However, the principal event of the season has taken place, namely, the opening of the Princess Theater. Bishop Evans is again on the firing line, with his old-time vigor and force of argument, telling the same old gospel story, preached by the worthies of old, to the thousands who flock to hear him.

Why do they come? Because they are starving to death on the husks of sectarianism and hungering for food that will satisfy the soul. They come and partake freely of the words of eternal life. Indeed, it must be gratifying to Brother R. C. to see such a throng of people waiting to greet him, on this the eleventh season in the principal theater and halls of Toronto, the educational center of Canada.

The crowds? Long before the doors were opened at 6.30 p. m. crowds gathered to get the choice seats; at 7 p. m. main floor and first gallery were full and a stream of people pouring into the gallery of the gods;" 7.30, full house and three hundred people standing on the stage behind the large choir of fifty-two voices. These are actual facts, as witnessed by the writer as we helped to accommodate the vast crowds on the last two nights previous to writing.

The Toronto Saints have the gospel at heart, and are anxious to warn their neighbors and friends by taking advantage of every possible opportunity of presenting the gospel to them. In keeping Bishop Evans in the limelight, they have a man who knows how to tell the "sweet old story," and who is blessed as a gifted speaker enabling him to reach all classes of people. He has accomplished as much with his pen as he has with his voice, and tens of thousands of his sermons have been scattered, as the good seed, in the surrounding country, producing fruits for his labors; terminating, we trust, in the salvation of hundreds of souls.

On Sunday, November 29, at the conclusion of the Princess Meeting, Brother Evans left for Independence, in response to a wire received by him from our late Brother Joseph Smith.

Sunday, November 22, Bishop E. L. Kelley and Bishop Blakeslee paid Toronto Branch a brief visit, and were given a right royal welcome. They were besieged by Saints anxious to shake hands with those they had often read about but never had been privileged to meet. Arriving at 4 p. m., they were met and taken care of. The evening service was given over to the brethren, Bishop Kelley being the speaker. He appeared in his old-time form, and told us the grand old story of Jesus and his love and life of sacrifice, interweaving it with a golden thread of thought, suggesting the necessity of living for each other. The brethren spoke very highly of Toronto Branch, especially mentioning the large number of young people who were very prominent among the large number who had turned out in the heavy downpour of rain. Toronto welcomes all who come, especially the officials who seldom come our way.

Brother Harry Young's class of young ladies recently put on a special program, including an "old maid's convention," in aid of the sermon fund. A large crowd responded, and the girls did splendidly.

At the seventh anniversary of Toronto local Religio a specially arranged program was given which showed that our local was producing results in their efforts to develop talent and character among our young folks. Elder J. T. Whitehead, an old charter member, presided. Elder D. B. Perkins, church district president, was present and gave an encouraging address to those privileged to attend.

The Ladies Sewing Circle recently held their annual sale of works, when many useful as well as fancy articles were offered for sale, all made by willing hearts and hands under direction of Sister Evans, whose heart and soul is as ever for the onward progress of the work.

Toronto will long remember Sunday, December 13, when a memorial service was held in honor of our late beloved leader, our Joseph, the prophet. Promptly at 3 p. m., Canadian time, of funeral, the service began. Bishop Evans was the speaker, and told of the many incidents that happened during his many years of association with him in Presidency and missionary work, with a brief history of his life and work as a leader of Israel of the latter days. Associated with Brother Evans on the platform were about twenty-five members of the priesthood; at the back in the choir loft were the singers, dressed in black and white, forming a living picture of tribute to the loving memory of him who lived for others. The church was crowded with sorrowing Saints and friends who came to pay the last respects to our beloved leader. The decorations were of black drapery, trimmed with purple.

A remarkable incident took place during this service which is worthy of note. The same hymns were sung as sung at the funeral services of the prophet, and as the quartet was singing that song written by Joseph, "Lights on the other shore," Brother Evans was wrapped in vision. A number of brethren noticed he was in the Spirit; among whom was Brother Pement of Chicago, who passed a note directly afterwards, asking him what he saw. There were two Utah Mormon elders in the congregation, and during the latter part of the service Brother Evans made some magnificent points to show how the church stood in regard to the teachings of Joseph the seer, and our Joseph, relative to the polygamy question, and under the Spirit he again buried Utahism deeper than ever, resulting in the following vision as he resumed his chair, which I requested him to write for me for the benefit of the Saints at large.

"Elder Frank Gray: According to promise, I write for you the vision. Last Sunday afternoon while the quartet was singing a song composed by Joseph, entitled 'Lights on the other shore,' I was wrapped in glory. The church passed away and I found myself in a most gorgeous park or garden with majestic trees, pretty flowers, verdant slopes and murmuring waters. While gazing with delight upon nature in all her wealth of beauty, I beheld six persons walking toward a magnificent fountain of water. I was given to know them, and with great joy in my soul I watched them as they approached the marble circle that surrounded the base of the fountain. The persons whom I recognized were Jesus, Joseph the Seer, Hyrum Smith, our Joseph, Alexander, and David. The Master was speaking and the brethren were listening with great attention as they neared the fountain. Our Joseph recognized me; he waved his hand and smiled very sweetly.

"Having arrived at the base of the fountain they stood there, when, all of a sudden the Master turned toward me, and walking four steps away from the brethren, he lifted his hand and looking at me, spoke my poor name, in a gentle but firm tone of voice saying, 'Richard, you are justified in taking the position that the principle of polygamy is an abomination in my sight.' I watched them for a moment as they stood by the fountain of water, when the vision closed, and I found myself bathed in tears, seated behind the pulpit, surrounded by Saints. Perhaps I had better say to you that none of the six persons looked to be more than thirty years of age. Our Joseph and Alexander, whom I knew in life to be men weighing more than two hundred pounds, were not nearly so fleshy as when in the flesh; they appeared as young men, strong and beautiful in the full vigor of manhood as did the others.

"My whole being was charmed and thrilled with joy when our Joseph, looking at me, smiled and waved his hand. When I saw him last he was looking worn, weary, decrepit and feeble, suffering, as he said, 'R. C., please do not pray that I recover; I am so tired I want to go to rest'; and now to see him young, strong, and smiling, in the company of the Master whom he served so faithfully, strolling along mid flowers of perpetual bloom, gazing with pleasure on the sparkling waters gushing from the majestic fountain, enjoying the society of his father, uncle and his two brothers, I was glad beyond expression. May the Lord give us each strength to wage a faithful warfare, so that when the struggle here is over, we, too, may be permitted to bask 'mid the sunbeams of celestial splendors in the presence of Jesus and those who have kept the faith is my prayer.'" "R. C."

Boston, Massachusetts

Boston Branch is still happily striving to work out the part of the destiny assigned to it. On Sunday evening last, we held a memorial service in honor of our dear departed president. In respect to his wishes, and in keeping with our inclination, the drapery and floral display were neither elaborate nor costly, yet enough to grace the occasion and cause it to be long remembered. The choir, under the leadership of Sister Elenora Whiting, rendered splendid music. The twenty-third Psalm was read by C. A. Rich, the prayer was offered by M. C. Fisher, and the address was delivered by Elder U. W. Greene, who only two days before returned. All of them made to the edifying of the body. The service was an impressive one, largely because of the sense of loss of one who has meant so much to the church, yet in it all was a calm assurance that the church is not dependent upon any one man, no matter how good or great he may be.

The confidence expressed and felt in the man designated to the office makes the future of the church look safe so far as the work of that office is concerned.

The Sunday school is quite busy preparing Christmas events, under the management of Doctor Saint Clair. The Religio is flourishing, with E. L. Traves at the head.

On Sunday evening, December 20, the choir will render a cantata in the church. On Christmas Eve, after the concert and tree, they will carol on the streets the same as last year, which was much enjoyed. We will have a meeting of the priests of the district in our church on the same day.

Among other activities we meet on Friday evenings to study rhetoric and homiletics. Everything seems to be moving on harmoniously. Brother Terry seems to have found something pretty fine in the form of a deacon. Good! Yet I should like to inform him that if he can surpass Deacons Eaton and Frost of Boston, he will have reason to be proud. The Bible requirement, however, they fail to fill, neither of them yet having become the husband of one wife. Why, no one seems to know. In gospel bonds,

H. J. DAVISON.

Book Reviews

NEDDIE AND BECKIE STUBTAIL.—This is a book for children, under the general heading "Bedtime stories." The author is Howard R. Garis, well-known author of a number of stories for children. The stories contained in this volume appeared originally in the Evening News of Newark, New Jersey. So many children, and their parents as well, have demanded the reprinting of these stories, that they have been issued in book form. The book may be obtained from R. F. Fenno and Company, 18 East Seventeenth Street, New York City. Price 70c in cloth binding.

THE BOY ELECTRICIAN.—By Alfred P. Morgan. Lothrop, Lee and Shepherd Company, Boston. Postpaid $2.25; net $2. This is the age of electricity. The most fascinating of all books for a boy must therefore be one dealing with the mystery of this ancient force and modern wonder, even a mere list of whose services is impossible. The best qualified of experts to instruct boys, Alfred P. Morgan, has in a book far superior to most of its kind, told not only how to make all kinds of motors, telegraphs, telephones, batteries, etc., and to do so economically, but has explained the principles upon which these depend for operation, and how the same thing is done in the every-day world. So well presented and so attractive is this really great book that it will be an education for any bright boy to have it, as well as the best kind of a moral safeguard, by leaving no time or thought for evil, and a means of future benefit beyond the power of anyone to reckon.

DADDY TAKES US CAMPING.—By Howard R. Garis, author of "Bedtime stories," illustrations by Edyth Garside Powers. R. F. Fenno and Company, 18 East 17th Street, New York City. Price 40 cents postpaid. An interesting story of a camping trip undertaken by Hal and Mab under "Daddy's" direction. A good story for children. This is the first of a series, including "Daddy takes us fishing," "Daddy takes us skating," etc.

MORE THAN CONQUERS.—Ariadne Gilbert. The Century Company, New York, 423 pps. Illustrated, $1.25 net. An excellent and invigorating collection of biographies, cordially recommended for home and school use. The title might lead one to believe that the author would rub in the moral example of her subjects, instead of which we find after a little reading that she attempts to make each person selected live before us in the midst of his or her human interest and foibles. A most graphic picture is given of Scott, and such treatment as is here practiced is sure to make the young reader want to know more about the Wizard of the North. A most lovable portrait is that of Thackeray, and the same may be said of the picture of Phillips Brooks. The author displays in this little book a sympathetic touch, and we like the way she herself has read biography. In her fourteen sketches, in their selection reminding one of a Hall of Fame, she has emphasized what seems to us to be just the right details, and the purpose of the book, as noted in the introduction, is allowed to take care of itself without any forcing. As a book of collective biographies, this is one of the best examples that has come to our desk for many a year.

GOOD STORIES FOR GREAT HOLIDAYS.—Frances Jenkins Olcott. Houghton Mifflin Company. Boston, Pp. 461, $2 net. To judge by the subject-index of this sumptuous volume, stout in variety, Miss Olcott has taken care of all sorts of virtues and all sorts of interests. To judge by the actual contents, she has shown a judicious method in her selections, planning her work primarily for the story teller who, on occasions, is most anxious for suggestive material. Due to copyright restrictions, we imagine that much Miss Olcott

SERVICE

The word service is the watchword of the twentieth century.

The human family is awakening to the fact that they are indeed a family, and such relationship demands service to and for each other.

We desire to be of some service to you in a line in which we are peculiarly fitted—hence our new department.

It's this way:

There is a right and a wrong way of doing things—an effective and an ineffective way. We want to help you do your advertising or announcing in the right way, without cost to you. It is entirely free to our people.

The proposition is to get the most out of what you pay for printing. We want to show you how.

We have recently seen samples of advertising used by some people that were certainly unattractive, and could not command respectful attention. It often happens that your facilities for getting what you want are not good. The place you have your printing done may not be equipped for doing the kind of work you want unless you are able to specify exactly what you want and how it shall be done, and then they may not be able to handle it.

This Is Our Proposition

If you intend to do any advertising in your missionary or branch work, no matter what kind, just send us your copy, and without cost to you, we will promptly advise you, by personal letter, with careful suggestions as to the best way to get the results you want.

If you intend to advertise in any way to increase your business, send us a copy of the wording you want to use, or give us the idea as clearly and definitely as possible, and we will word it for you in convincing style.

It doesn't matter whether you have your printing done at the Herald Publishing House or not. We will give you the same careful attention whether you do or not. However, if you wish to have us give you the advantage of our extensive equipment and facilities, we will promptly quote you lowest prices delivered to your post office.

We are prepared to do this because we have on our force a brainy young fellow who has a complete course in advertising to his credit and is experienced in this work. He feels the true spirit of a Latter Day Saint and is willing to be at your service. Complicated work will receive the combined attention of the departments concerned.

Joy is the breath of eternity; would have liked to use was denied her editorial grasp; her reference lists, therefore, supplement what she has gathered. The variety extends down the ages, and even the Venerable Bede, William Caxton, the Gesta Romanorum, and Orvid are represented in the Index of Authors. This book will do for many what Holy-Days and Holidays has done for the grown-up in the library; it affords much material ready at hand for the much material ready at hand for the teacher, the for the teacher, the librarian, and the mother either too busy to look elsewhere or too ignorant of sources to look anywhere. The cover design will assuredly catch the eye.
Sorrow is the sign of a day.—Olive Dargan.

THE BABY BEARS: THEIR WISHING-RINGS.—Grace G. Drayton. The Century Company, New York. Pp. 167. $1 net. A jolly collection of pictures for very young youngsters, telling of the good deeds—and in a few instances of the mischievous acts—of two little bears given wishing-rings. The nursery will delight in the simple little tales which may be amplified to the point of satisfying any number of questions as to the whys and wherefores. The book is oblong, and there are only two lines of text, proper and jingly, on an almost blank page opposite the full-page drawings, which are done in flat wash sepia. Small book-lovers enjoy just such a persistent hero and heroine as appear on nearly eighty pages of illustrations.

THE BOOK OF FRIENDLY GIANTS.—Eunice Fuller. The Century Company, New York. Pp. 327. Illustrated by Pamela Colman Smith. $2 net. All our lives we have been brought up in the belief that giants were ungovernable beings who roared and ate folk alive, and tore up California redwood trees—or trees just as large—in their rage. But here is a defense of giants. We come to find that they are good beings—some of them—careful not to tread on cities if they can avoid so doing, gentle in their promises, and considerate in their rewards. This book of giant fairy tales comprises legends from many lands—each tale exploiting the virtue of a giant. Imagine one of these heroes taking a poor little fellow on a trip to Central Park, imagine another giving to an ambitious lad a loaf of bread that turns into gold by simply biting upon it without destroying its size and shape. Young readers should welcome this entertaining volume; after going through it, they will modify their opinions of giants. Particularly decorative and agreeable are the illustrations.

Oh, may I join the choir invisible
Of those immortal dead who live again
In minds made better by their presence; live
In pulses stirred to generosity,
In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn
For miserable aims that end with self.
In thoughts sublime that pierce the night like stars,
And with their mild persistence urge man's search
To vaster issues.—George Eliot.

A Prayer

Oh! that mine eyes might closed be
To what concerns me not to see;
That deafness might possess mine ear
To what concerns me not to hear;
That truth my tongue might always tie
From ever speaking foolishly;
That no vain thought might ever rest
Or be conceived in my breast;
That by each deed and word and thought,
Glory may to my God be brought!

—Thomas Ellwood.

Less Than a Cent

You may know a woman who has a reputation for making delicious cake, biscuits, etc.,—who seems to hit it right every time.

You may also know a woman, who, no matter how painstaking, can't seem to get the knack of successful baking.

Both use the same butter, same eggs, same flour and sugar. What is the difference?

Very likely it's all in the baking powder. Undoubtedly the woman with the knack uses Royal Baking Powder, and the unsuccessful woman uses an alum baking powder thinking it cheaper.

Yet the difference in the cost of a whole large cake is less than a cent.

It is economy to use
