This is the conclusion of an article appearing in a former Centennial Number of the Herald, dated April 7, 1920.

Healing by Faith

Joseph Smith met furious and unrelenting opposition because his message contained the doctrine of healing by faith. Notwithstanding the fact that primitive Christianity gloried in the power of God bestowed on the apostles and ministry whereby the sick were healed and devils cast out, it was vociferously declared by the popular clergy that this, too, was "done away because no longer needed." It mattered not that Jesus said, "These signs shall follow them that believe" (Mark 16: 17); "He that believeth on me, the words that I do shall he do also" (John 14: 12); "I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world" (Matthew 28: 20). The supernatural blessings of divine favor were "limited to the first century," so it was said, and any manifestation of "power" was "of the Devil."

But time has overturned many popular notions, and reversed numerous so-called scientific "facts." Mary Baker Eddy discovered a "key" and Christian Science was born, which has impregnated modern Christianity, turned the tide of unbelief, and paved the way for a recrudescence of faith healing now becoming popular with numerous religious bodies.

At this time, James Moore Hickson, a noted English faith healer, is in America traveling among the churches and healing multitudes of people afflicted with various diseases. So great is the demand for his services that only the most violent cases can receive his attention, and applications must be made by card weeks ahead. Numerous other healers are abroad in the land and appear to be getting results, as the following excerpt indicates:

"The fact is that the healing of the nobleman's son is being duplicated every day of the year by modern followers of Jesus' methods. Healing of the nature done by Jesus, and counted 'miraculous' by those who do not follow him, is so common nowadays that it is not considered worthy of more than passing comment. On every hand are practitioners of Jesus Christ's healing system, and they have millions of absent patients whom they never see yet heal as effectually as Jesus healed this nobleman's son. The writer of this has similar cases a-plenty every day, and bushels of unsolicited testimonials to the efficacy of the so-called 'miraculous' absent healing. The light of truth is shining to-day as never before, and all who open their minds to it and relax their bigotry and intolerance, are having demonstrated to them that the same faith that healed the nobleman's son will heal every man's son."—Unity, February, 1919, p. 129.

From Spokane, Washington, there comes a little booklet, How to Protect Our Soldier, by F. L. Rawson, M. I. E. E., A. M. I. C. E. (who ought to know, if titles mean anything) from which the following is excerpted:

"To-day there are many millions of mental workers, divided into two broad classes, containing some fifty or sixty schools. Only four or five of these work on the basis that Jesus did, namely, by turning in thought to God. The remainder work in the same way as the sorcerers and witches of the past and the black magic workers and hypnotists of to-day, namely, with the human mind. This means that they use one or the other of the five different forms of hypnotism, all of which are more or less harmful, not only to the patient, but to the practitioner."—How to Protect Our Soldiers, p. 1, 2.

For the purpose of this article, it matters not whether these healers are working with hypnotism, mental telepathy, the human mind psychology, or what not. We do not indorse any of them. The point we make is that healing on a very broad scale is being done these days by some occult power, and this healing is being indorsed by the churches one after another as the power of God. Whether or no the power is of divine origin, the churches are committing themselves to the principle of divine healing, a thing they denied one hundred years ago. If divine healing is right and to be sought after to-day, it was right then, and all through the century between then and now.

Changes in the Creeds

In the 1896 edition of The Constitution of the Presbyterian Church, under the heading, "Historical summary," appears the following:

"The only amendment of the Confession of Faith since 1788 was effected in 1886-87 by striking out from chapter XXIV, section 4, the clause forbidding marriage with a deceased wife's sister.

"The Book of Discipline was entirely reconstructed and adopted in 1884-85.

"The Form of Government and the Directory for Worship have been amended in various particulars between the years 1805 and 1891."

If the Presbyterian Creed was right in 1820 when Joseph Smith said it was wrong, why was it necessary to amend or reconstruct it later? And if amendment and reconstruction were necessary in 1884 it was wrong in 1820. There is no escape from this conclusion.

But that is not all. In 1820 when Joseph Smith said God told him the creeds were wrong, the following was a part of the Confession of Faith:

"By the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death."—Confession of Faith, 3:3.

"Elect infants, dying in infancy, are regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit, who worketh when, and where, and how he pleaseth. So also are all other elect persons, who are incapable of being outwardly called by the ministry of the Word."—Confession of Faith, 10:3.

But in 1902, this unscriptural doctrine of "foreordained" fatalism had become so distasteful to the Presbyterian conscience that it was repudiated by the Synod at Los Angeles, and the following was adopted in lieu thereof:

"That concerning those who are saved in Christ, the doctrine of God's eternal decree is held in harmony with the doctrine of his love to all mankind, his gift of his Son to be the propitiation for the sins of the whole world and his readiness to bestow his saving grace on all who seek it; that concerning those who perish, the doctrine of God's eternal decree is held in harmony with the doctrine that God desires not the death of any sinner, but has provided in Christ a salvation sufficient for all, adapted for all, and freely offered in the gospel to all; that men are fully responsible for their treatment of God's gracious offer; that his decree hinders no man from accepting that offer and that no man is condemned except on the ground of his sin.

"Also that it is not regarded as teaching that any who die in infancy are lost. We believe that all dying in infancy are included in the election of grace and are regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit, who work where and how he pleases."

"For section 6, chapter 25, of the Confession of Faith the following is substituted:

"The Lord Jesus is the only head of the church and the claim of any man to be the vicar of Christ and the head of the church is unscriptural—without warrant, in fact—and is an usurpation dishonoring to the Lord Jesus Christ."—SAINTS' HERALD, July 8, 1903.

If the doctrine of infant damnation was wrong in 1902, it was wrong in 1820 when Joseph Smith declared that, among other things, it was "an abomination in the sight of God." So, despite their steadfast opposition to the prophetic calling of Joseph Smith, the creed makers and revisers have time after time vindicated Joseph Smith by their official acts, and to-day Latter Day Saints can point to the numerous revisions and amendments of the popular creeds and, with pardonable pride, say: "We told you so." But when we cried they would not hear, and when we piped they would not dance.

The Fatal Weakness of Popular Christianity

It remained for the World War to reveal the fatal weakness of the popular Christianity condemned by the voice of God one hundred years ago. The following fatal admissions by leading thinkers and writers of modern Christianity fully sustain the angelic indictment:

"The European war has, however, rudely shaken our complacent belief in ourselves, and we are discovering afresh, in the glaring light which it sheds on all human life, that we have only half understood the very doctrines we profess.

"We have tried to erect a civilization which is really grounded on a pagan philosophy of life, and the fact that we call it Christian has blinded many of us to the fact that its fundamental pre-suppositions are utterly un-Christian.

"The world needs a Christianity which is more Christian than anything we have yet seen.

"What is needed is a positive message. If a healing stream could be directed into the morass in which we find ourselves, and if the stream proved to have sprung from a divine source, might not something happen in human life which would both inhibit the power of evil and liberate the powers of good to a degree which we have never dreamed possible?"—Henry T. Hodgkin, M. A., B. M., in Christ and Peace, pp. 45, 56, 57, 59.

The "positive message," sighed for by Reverend Hodgkin, with its "healing stream," has been faithfully delivered, is still being proclaimed, but its harbingers are scorned and the message itself trampled under foot.

"Never in the history of the world has evil put up a stronger fight than in this day, especially in some instances in its wearing the outward garments of Christianity and denying its power.

"Not only has there been much false teaching in pulpits and schools, but those preachers and professors who have taught the right of physical force and that the only safety is in great military defenses, belong among the false prophets.

"The fact is that organized Christianity has collapsed—collapsed before the European war started and this war, with no voice from the church protesting against it, reveals a condition in the church that indicates impotency in the hour of a great trial.

"Our ignorance of the fundamentals in the religion of Christ has kept the church unspiritual, weak, and impotent. To live by the policy of heaven, which is practicing the ethics of Christ, and to grow into a united force, is a task that presses upon the church as never before. To even hint at these high ideals in this day seems like an idle dream, but these are the promises of God and this will be done. It must be sadly acknowledged that the road to this triumph cannot be found through present day organized Christianity."—Christ or Napoleon—Which, by Peter Ainslie, D. D., pp. 27, 34, 44, 61.

"The unavoidable result of the contentions and embarrassments of the spirit of denominationalism is to smother the spiritual life and destroy the spiritual power of the church. Denominationalism weakens the church's grasp upon the gospel. It distorts her faith. It separates from Christ.

"Such reasoning carries with it serious accusations. It is certain that some one has missed the teachings of God. Some one, it would seem from the Scriptures, has gone far astray."—The Divided House, by Edwin E. Rogers, pp. 127, 164.

"It is all very well for the ministers and churchmen to say Christianity has not failed and civilization has not collapsed. But the point is that a great and growing number, and that number comprising many thoughtful people, believe that both have failed. One has only to read the press of Europe and America to see a general agnosticism reflected on every page.

"My own feeling, just at present, is this: I do not believe civilization has vanished entirely from the earth, but I am absolutely convinced that the civilization, or at least the political order, of Europe of the last fifty years has proved an absolute and utter failure and has collapsed beyond repair.

"If you ask me if I believe that conventional Christianity has failed, I say yes, openly and frankly."—The Last War, by Frederick Lynch, D. D., pp. 11, 22.

"What a medley of teachers of religion we have! And a medley, because they are teaching not what God has revealed but what the people want. 'After their own lusts.' And thus are they turning their ears from the truth and being turned unto fables."—A Textbook on Prophecy, by James M. Gray, D. D., page 162.

"Nine tenths of the trouble and worry in the visible church to-day is explained by the fact that to a great extent we are working in opposition to God, instead of cooperating with him."—Reverend John M. MacInnis, B. D., Ph. D., in Light on Prophecy, p. 138.

"The present moral conditions of the world are making a new evangel necessary and possible. Human programs have failed. Human wisdom and virtue have come to naught. So-called Christian civilization itself has collapsed. A new revelation and arraignment of the world's sins is now possible. The Christianity of the nations has not been the Christianity of Christ."—Dwight Mallory Pratt, D. D., in The Christian Work, September 13, 1919.

"It is with a profound sense of relief that one sometimes turns from the tests of Christian faith which have been set up by the churches, to the test which Jesus himself imposed upon those who would enter the kingdom. We recently had occasion to examine the creed of a famous church, to which creed, until recently, everyone joining that church was supposed to subscribe. It is really a treatise on systematic theology—an able one, too, but quite as far from the words of Jesus as one could conveniently go. Neither was it greatly concerned with the facts of Christ. It was concerned with interpretation of those facts. But when one turns from the creeds and confessions to the gospels he finds himself in quite another atmosphere."—From an editorial in The Christian Work, July 1, 1916.

The Philosophy of the Youthful Seer Stands the Test

The foregoing self-imposed indictments of modern Christianity by leaders of the popular churches amply sustain the charge: "They are all wrong, and their creeds are an abomination in the sight of God." And, yet, they can be multiplied a thousandfold with available material immediately at hand, for with one voice the fatal facts are admitted. The atmosphere of the creeds is not the atmosphere of the gospel of Christ. Joseph Smith was mobbed, tarred and feathered for saying less about the churches than the preachers are saying of them to-day. For one hundred years, the battle between the truth and the creeds has been waging with unabated fury; and though assailed by the allied forces of sectarian hatred without, and the unscrupulous machinations of traitors within, the position assumed then is now as impregnable as the rock of Gibraltar.

The philosophy of the youthful seer immediately drew forth the maledictions of the learned, while the imprecations of the popular clergy were heaped upon his head. For one hundred years the world has witnessed the unparalleled spectacle of the combined hosts of learning arrayed in unequal contest against the wisdom of a country youth whom they branded as an idle impostor and an ignorant fanatic. Be it said to their everlasting shame, and to his credit, he solved the problem of religious controversy, but in doing so he trod the thorny path of persecution and sealed his testimony with his blood.

Strip the boy of every vestige of the supernatural, and measure him only by the work he accomplished as a church builder, and he stands out in bold relief as the foremost reformer of the age in the discovery and application of divine truth. The carping criticism of bigoted churchmen, the sneering anathemas of jealous priests, the proud denunciation of the worldly wise, and the frantic efforts of their combined forces to overthrow the work so humbly begun have failed, utterly failed. Though assaulted on every side and compelled to bathe its fevered brow in the blood of its advocates, the message delivered in 1820 has survived the ordeal and in 1920 challenges the admiration of the honest in heart, while to the hosts of Mystery Babylon it is the modern stumbling-stone.

The Significance of the Book of Mormon

BY A. B. PHILLIPS

"The Book of Mormon is a religious history of three small clans that at different periods migrated to America."

To understand what the Book of Mormon really is, and to be acquainted with its contents and historic and spiritual significance, is to realize that it is one of the most remarkable productions ever put into print. To approach the subject with a turned-up nose, figuratively speaking, is to do injustice to oneself quite as much as to the book. Hence I make the startling announcement at once that the Book of Mormon was never known to do the slightest harm to anyone. It never corrupted any man's morals, or shocked his feelings of reverence for things divine, and that is saying a great deal in these days, even in regard to a religious book. It has never decreased anyone's faith in either God or the Bible, and that is saying much more than can be said of some who have so vehemently opposed the Book of Mormon and misrepresented it during the past ninety years. Its morals are perfect; its language pure.

What Is the Book of Mormon?

Briefly stated, the Book of Mormon is a religious history of three small clans that at different periods migrated to America and occupied this continent until they became strong nations. This history extends from about 2,200 years before the Christian era, so called, to about 400 years after the birth of Christ. During this period of over 2,600 years these people had religious historians among them, whose records were handed down from one generation to another. One of the last of these historians was a prophet named Mormon, who was directed to make an abridgment, or condensed history, from the records thus handed down to his day. This condensed history, being written by Mormon, was called the Book of Mormon.

The Lord had a purpose in having the Book of Mormon thus written, and it was carefully preserved so that it might come forth in our day as a witness of God's overruling providence, and his unchangeable purposes and impartiality to mankind. Besides recording the history of the aboriginal peoples of America and their religious experiences and teachings, it contains the words of prophets of that age regarding our own times and people. Hence the Book of Mormon contains a message for you. And a most interesting message it is, as you will doubtless say after reading it, as many others also have done.

Its Value as History

One of the facts of importance to which your attention is called is the historic connection between the Book of Mormon and the Bible.

When God revealed the history of the past to Moses, the latter was informed that people were scattered from the tower of Babel over the face of "all the earth." This statement is supported by the Book of Mormon declaration that a colony from Babel came to this (American) continent, where they in the course of time became an intelligent and prosperous nation, which spread over a considerable portion of the land. The book is of great interest to us because it contains the history of these Babelites in America, from the time of their migration to their partial destruction many centuries later.

According to this record of ancient America, two other colonies came from Palestine about 600 B. C., and a few years later. In time they overspread a considerable part of South and North America, built great cities, and established an advanced civilization containing millions of people. Internal wars, however, caused a division that lasted till the more powerful people killed or conquered the weaker. Degeneracy set in, and at the time Columbus discovered this continent they were given the name of American Indians. At this time they were divided into a number of nations or tribes, some of whom were still a very intelligent and civilized people, particularly those of Peru and Mexico. The works by Prescott on the conquest of Mexico and of Peru will afford abundant interest to the reader in this connection.

These later migrations combined to form one people sometime after they arrived here. They were composed of Israelites, most of whom were called Nephites or Lamanites, who descended from the tribe of Joseph, one of the twelve tribes referred to in the Bible.

A careful study of the Bible shows that Jacob, Moses, Isaiah, and others predicted a remarkable future for descendants of Joseph. It was prophesied that they would cross the sea to a greater land than Palestine, become a great people, and that in the latter days their record should be revealed and come forth. The Book of Mormon fulfills and supports this Bible sketch in a perfectly reasonable way, and is recognized to be the record predicted in the Scriptures. For a study of these Bible statements the reader is for convenience referred to the work by I. M. Smith, entitled, The Book of Mormon Vindicated. The meaning of these prophecies is very clear.

Aside from its historic connection with the Bible, this remarkable record is the only known history of this mysterious people of antiquity, whose past is of absorbing interest to the student of history. It also contains matter for the student of natural history to contemplate, revealing the presence and use of the elephant, the horse, and other animals that scientists who lived when the Book of Mormon was first published did not suppose had ever been indigenous here. It is now known, however, that its account is true.

Scientific research and invention take on new meaning also to the Book of Mormon reader. This is indicated by the fact that it tells us of a remarkable instrument, in the nature of a compass, that guided the journeyings of the people nearly 600 B. C. While those who consider radium and helium most modern of discoveries will be interested to know that 2200 B. C. one of the Book of Mormon people obtained lights by melting out some peculiar substance that was placed in closed barges and gave light by miraculous means. The barges themselves were a kind of submarine construction with which they crossed the ocean to this continent.

It Reveals a God of Miracles

The Hebrew saints were taught by Paul that through faith miracles were and could be wrought by the power of God.

This precious truth is also taught and demonstrated among the people which the Book of Mormon tells us about. It encourages the faith to believe that those who seek the Lord sincerely may find him in every age. It tells us that the Lord is fair and impartial to all, and that his promises are made without respect of persons.

Thus we learn from this remarkable record that the divine guidance was with these descendants of Joseph, and from time to time prophets were sent among them to encourage, direct, or warn them, as might be required. This shows us the true God of the Bible, and is a wonderful incentive to faith to one whose heart yearns for the good old way—the divine way that leads to the Maker of our souls. Like a refreshing breath from heaven comes this testimony, recorded by Israelites in America, of what God loves to give to his creatures if only they will believe and not be faithless or of doubting hearts.

A Witness to the Bible

Paul said the time would come when everything would be shaken that can be shaken. Infidelity and unbelief are forcing their way even into the midst of those who claim Christ as their only hope. Blasted faith is claiming her victims by thousands, and as Jesus predicted, the love of many has waxed cold. Many who pose as teachers of Christianity openly admit that they do not believe the miracles of the Bible actually occurred, thus weakening the faith of many who look to them for leadership. Others even seek to discredit the Good Book in other ways, saying that they do not consider it to contain inspiration from God, but that they consider it to be the work of good men and of human inception.

As weary and thirsty travelers in a desert we find the Book of Mormon a veritable oasis of living water and refreshing. It increases faith in the truth of the Bible, witnessing to many of its holy precepts and promises, as the experiences of children of God on this continent have verified the certainty of heavenly care and fatherly blessing. It promises that God will continue to reveal himself to those who will do his will, regardless of the age in which they may live.

In other words, this record makes plain God's impartial love for all the world, as expressed by John: "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish." These ancient people believed in him, and were the recipients of his blessing. The offer of the atonement was world-wide and it came to them. This good book therefore, enlarges the Christian's vision of the Lord's great redemptive plan as has been done by no other book handed down as a record of his dealings with man, save the Bible.

Many other points of scriptural doctrine that were taught to the New Testament saints were also had by these ancient American Israelites. Much additional light is therefore obtained, confirming the teachings of New Testament writers and making plain matters that would otherwise be of obscure meaning. The reality of true religion as a divine message from God to all men is in this record reaffirmed so clearly that its meaning cannot be misunderstood.

A Message to This Generation

Of more significance perhaps than any other thing is the message which the Book of Mormon bears to those living today. While the import of what we have already noted is in a sense a message to us who will receive it, the book contains a prophetic message of as great importance as any message could well be, in which the state of the religious world is clearly foretold and a call to faith and obedience is earnestly sounded to this generation.

As a sign of this age the record states that the Jews shall soon be gathered to their land, and that God will begin his work among the nations to bring this great event to pass. This prophecy is now apparently in process of fulfillment. When the Book of Mormon came forth nearly every nation had laws that were against the Jews. Scarcely any Jews were then in Palestine, and few supposed that within so short a time the attitude of the nations would be so signally changed as is now the case. These oppressive laws have been changed, nations have been destroyed or overturned, and plans are well in operation to-day that envision the complete fulfillment of this Book of Mormon prophecy.

In this book a land of promise is located in America by prophetic inspiration, where those who love justice, freedom, and righteousness may find a refuge from oppression and the carnage of the world. The book witnesses for Christ and his gospel in the most earnest, lucid, and yet lofty and spiritual manner of any work coming forth in this age. This statement is not overdrawn, but will be admitted by the careful and impartial reader.

Other remarkable prophecies in this book equally attest its inspired origin. Besides this the book itself comes forth in fulfillment of Bible prophecy, after having been preserved by divine supervision through many centuries and protected from harm during the period of its preparation for the printer. The manuscripts of the Bible have not been more remarkably preserved than has that of the Book of Mormon.

This work has also a special message to the Lamanites, or Indians of to-day. It is a record of their ancestors, and many are beginning to believe it, and its testimony that Jesus is the Christ; and thus it is to-day convincing both these and others of God and his work, the gospel of his dear Son. There are living witnesses who earnestly affirm that the Book of Mormon has convinced them of the truth of the Bible and the saving message of the Lord Jesus Christ. This is its chief mission. To those who oppose it, the book may well ask, as did the Savior: "For which of these good works do ye stone me?" That which inspires faith, love, and fidelity to God and his Son, and ever leads to do good, as does the Book of Mormon, is not an evil work.

Missouri and Jackson County

BY EDWARD RANNIE

Some explanations of the geographical boundaries involved in the settlement of Jackson County and Missouri.

Missouri and her people have a peculiar and special interest to Latter Day Saints. It was and is now the place of many blessings to her faithful and pure-minded people. It is also the place of many sad scenes of persecution, some of them due to our own folly, and forgetfulness of God's commands, for which he reproved the church in a revelation given in December, 1833, as found in Doctrine and Covenants 98: 3. But partly it was due to the wickedness that was in the hearts of our enemies, and also to the age in which they lived, which was not as tolerant in religious and political matters as they are to-day.

The historical data which I shall give in this article is from the History of Missouri, by Eugene Morrow Violett, unless otherwise stated, a book that it would be well to have in our homes and in our branch libraries. It is a book of 466 pages, suitable for busy people, and the chapter concerning our people is very fair and free from the animus that many of the writers manifest who attempt to write about our people. The illustrations are taken from our Young People's History, written by Sister Vida E. Smith, and Mr. Violett gives her credit for the help she rendered him. The book can be purchased through our publishing houses for $1.60.

Saint Louis was founded as a village by the French on February 15, 1764. That was possibly the real beginning of the settlement of the country now forming the State of Missouri. Louisiana was purchased from France by the United States Government, in 1803, and the transfer was made at Saint Louis, March 9, 1804, Captain Amos Stoddard of the United States army acting for our Government. The territory comprised in the purchase was all the land west of the Mississippi River from New Orleans north to Canada, and west to the Rocky Mountains, and then southeast back to New Orleans.

The lower part was given the name of the Territory of Orleans, and by act of Congress on June 4, 1812, it was made into a State and called Louisiana. The remaining part of the territory was given the name of Missouri. In 1819, what is now the State of Arkansas was set apart as a territory. In 1817, in the month of December, petitions were circulated among the people to be presented to the Congress asking for a State to be organized, and they were presented in January, 1818, and another one was presented during the same year. By December, 1819, three bills had been presented to the Congress to form a State. The cause of the delay was the question of slavery. On March 6, 1820, a bill was approved which admitted Missouri as a State with slavery and excluding from it all territory north. By proclamation of President James Monroe it was admitted as the twenty-fourth State of the Union on August 16, 1821.

As a misunderstanding as to the boundary lines of Missouri and Jackson County sometimes is apparent when our brethren make it a matter of conversation, I will give the facts as given by Mr. Violett and other writers whom I have consulted. The first petition to the Congress in 1817 did not include the territory that now forms the two counties in the southeastern part of the State and the six in the northwestern part of the State, and the north line was about fifteen miles north of Saint Joseph. The memorial presented in 1818 included what is now two tiers of counties of eastern Kansas and three tiers of southern Iowa. Another petition, with only six hundred names, asked for the Missouri River to be the north line, and west to the boundary of the United States, and south to the north line of the Territory of Arkansas. The boundaries adopted in 1820, when the bill passed creating it a State, were as they are now, except the six counties in the northwestern corner of the State, known as the Platte Purchase, which were annexed in 1837.

In the Journal of History, volume 10, page 130, is an article, entitled "Lamoni." It tells of the controversy over the Iowa-Missouri boundary line. A strip of country approximately ten miles wide was in dispute from 1839 until 1849. Missouri claiming about that much of Iowa. The controversy became so bitter that both States called out the State Militia, but the cooler heads prevented a collision, and on February 13, 1849, the Supreme Court of the United States decided the controversy by fixing the line as it is at present.

Jackson County

Because of the persecutions of our people in Jackson County and what the revelations say of it, and its being the place for the beginning of the gathering, and the place for the headquarters of the church, it will always be a locality of special interest to us, and because of those and other important matters, it will be well to go into some of its early history.

"Jackson County, which at first embraced the counties of Cass and Bates, was organized by an act of the legislature approved December 15, 1826." (Political History of Jackson County published by Marshall and Morrison in 1902, page 9.)

"By an act of the General Assembly approved February 16, 1825, the county of Jackson was laid off. The act was entitled, 'An act defining the limits of several counties in this State.' In section 30 it reads as follows: 'Be it enacted, that all that portion of the county bounded as follows, to-wit: beginning at a point in the middle of the main channel of the Missouri River due north of the termination of the line running through the middle of range 29 west: thence due south with said line to the middle of the main channel of the Osage River, thence due west to the western boundary of this State; thence north with the said western boundary line to the middle of the main channel of the Missouri River; thence down said river in the middle of the main channel thereof to the beginning, shall comprise the county of Jackson.'" (History of Jackson County published by Birdsall, Williams, and Company, in 1881, page 117.)

From Campbell's Atlas of Missouri I have learned that range 29 west is the dividing line between Jackson County and Lafayette County and that the middle of the channel of the Osage River is at the southeast corner of Bates County, thus making Jackson County at that time to comprise the territory of what is now Jackson, Cass, and Bates Counties.

The boundaries of Jackson County as fixed by the legislature December 15, 1826, remained so until March 3, 1835, as the following will show: "Beginning at a point on the middle of range 29, where the same intersects the township line between townships forty-six and forty-seven, thence west with said township line to the State boundary. The northern boundary of Van Buren (now Cass) as constituted by the foregoing section, shall be the permanent southern boundary of Jackson County." (History of Jackson County Published by Birdsall, Williams, and Company, 1881, page 118.)

The present southern boundary of Jackson County is now as it was established by act of the legislature March 3, 1835, and Bates County was taken off later. A map dated 1841 shows it as at present constituted.

In 1830 what is now Clay, Clinton, Dekalb, Gentry, and Worth Counties was then Clay County, and what is now Ray, Caldwell, Daviess, and Harrison Counties was then Ray County, and what is now Lafayette, Johnson, and Henry Counties was then Lafayette County.

With the above knowledge of the early history of Jackson County and the counties round about it will help us to a better understanding of some of the revelations given to the church. In December, 1833, as found recorded in the Doctrine and Covenants, section 98, in the latter part of paragraph 9, the following instruction was given: "... observe the commandments which I have given concerning these things, which saith, or teacheth, to purchase all the lands by money, which can be purchased for money, in the region round about the land which I have appointed to be the land of Zion, for the beginning of the gathering of my Saints; all the land which can be purchased in Jackson County, and the counties round about, and leave the residue in mine hand." In section 128:5 the following is found, "It is well to understand that the term region round about must mean more than a small area of country round about the central spot."

Debate at Spearfish

Beginning September 20, Elder E. E. Long will debate church propositions and divinity of Book of Mormon with Robert R. Hull, of the Church of Christ (Campbellite). Invitation is extended to all scattered Saints of this vicinity to attend. A limited number can be accommodated in the homes of the local Saints, but all who have camping outfits should bring them, as there is an excellent camping park. Let us all boost for the cause. J. C. Mabbott, publicity agent, Spearfish, South Dakota.

One-Day Meeting

Yale, Michigan, September 12. Michigan Saints in the vicinity of Yale, please take notice, and everyone who can possibly come is urged to attend. Bring your picnic dinners and enjoy a day with the Saints. Fred W. Cadow.

Tentative drawing of the General Conference Auditorium

What Will Your Contribution Be?

In the cut as shown above, the church architect shows tentative plans for a beautiful building. It will be commodious, dignified, permanent in its material and workmanship: a place in which the great assemblies of the Saints may be held with comfort—a visible and enduring pledge in steel and stone of our people's faith in Zion and in its reality as a city of beauty and of progress.

Much money must be spent in realizing this plan because, neither inferior material, faulty labor, nor cramped dimensions may be allowed in a building such as this. The dignity of the church must be honored even in the erection of its buildings, and its future growth and needs must not be hedged in by a narrow vision. We must build for to-day and for a generation.

What a pride there will be however, when this building stands complete and the first General Conference assembles therein. The entire church will take pleasure in that great step forward, and everyone who has contributed liberally to the extent of his ability will feel that truly he has had part in a good work, and that his money has gone into an enduring and a worth-while treasury.

Sacrifices will be required of course. But what is worth while without sacrifice? Eighteen prosperous months are ahead in which to complete the pledge you will make. Surely you want that pledge to show that you are willing to justify your faith by your works.

Nor let your giving be conditioned on the gift of any other. Your pride and your satisfaction will grow out of what you do, and is not dependent on anyone else.

The time between now and October 15 is a time of preparation for the task. Examine your affairs carefully and see what is the maximum you can contribute. Then plan to help your brother see his duty too. Let's learn anew the meaning of the word Consecration.

Henry A. Stebbins Has Finished His Work on Earth

One more of the early stalwarts of the church passed to his reward with the death of Elder Henry A. Stebbins.

He had been in poor health for some months, but had not been seriously ill. A few days prior to his demise he was about town as usual. A general breakdown occurred on Sunday and he died on Wednesday, September 8. Brother Stebbins was baptized August 23, 1863, in his twentieth year, and was ordained an elder two years later. In 1868 he started missionary work, and apparently continued his traveling until he came to Lamoni in 1880.

February 8, 1868, he was chosen as secretary and recorder of the Northern Illinois and Southern Wisconsin Districts. In his autobiography in the Journal of History for April, 1920, (pages 161 to 198) he mentions incidentally that there was no railroad from Chicago to Saint Paul until 1870. In that year he was made president of the Northern Illinois and Southern Wisconsin District, succeeding President Joseph Smith. In 1874 he was chosen by the General Conference as church recorder and temporary church secretary. But in 1875 he was made permanent secretary, and so continued until 1896. As recorder he continued for thirty-two years, till the conference of 1906.

In April, 1876, he was chosen as assistant editor to Joseph Smith, and also a member of the Board of Publication, upon which he resigned as district president and continued his editorial work until October, 1880, at which time he left Plano, where he had made his home for the past ten or twelve years. He moved with his family to Lamoni, where he was secretary of the Order of Enoch, which had purchased land in Decatur County, where now is located the town of Lamoni and he has resided in Lamoni ever since.

For several years (1875-1882) he acted as counselor in the Presiding Bishopric to Israel L. Rogers, tendering his resignation with Brother Rogers to the conference of 1882. In 1879 he was ordained a high priest, and in 1882 was chosen as secretary of that quorum, in which office he continued for twenty-one years, until 1903. He had been previously secretary of the first quorum of elders. He was also for a short time president of the Sandwich, Illinois, Branch.

After moving to Lamoni he engaged in business for a time, still attending to his work as church secretary and church recorder. But a few years later he again devoted his time to missionary work and was chosen president of Decatur District, which office he held for eight years.

In April, 1901, he was chosen a member of the Lamoni Stake high council, and continued for six years, until increasing deafness caused him to tender his resignation. He had been deaf in one ear ever since the Civil War in which he engaged as soldier in the army. At this date the hearing of his other ear decreased to such an extent as seriously to inconvenience him.

His ministerial labors were principally in the States of Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, and Kansas, and briefly in the States of Texas, Colorado, California, and Utah. He continued his ministerial activity to the end of his life, baptizing more than five hundred church members.

His habits were studious and scholarly, and he has collected a valuable library of books of interest to the church. His contributions to the church publications were notable and prepared with extreme care and manifest desire for accuracy.

He was very solicitous concerning the unfortunate in life, invariably visiting the afflicted and discouraged in all stations of life. He was frequently called on to preach funeral sermons, having over five hundred such services to his credit.

HENRY A. STEBBINS

Elder Joseph Luff, his faithful friend for more than forty-five years, delivered his funeral sermon Sunday afternoon, September 12, at the Brick Church in Lamoni, Iowa, where Brother Stebbins has resided for the past forty years. Surely his reward is great, for his faithfulness, patience, and zeal under difficulties. He is survived by his wife, Sister Callie B. Stebbins, well-known as a devoted church worker, especially in the interests of the children.

More on the League of Nations

We have received two letters objecting to the editorial in the issue of September 1, on the League of Nations. Probably others have read into it, as have these two, statements which were not intended. We regret very much that any should have taken it as partisan in intent, for it was not such.

That Governor Cox has agreed to support the League of Nations with reservations, as embodied in the Treaty of Peace, is probably general knowledge. Before we published this editorial we had noted assurances that Senator Harding would, on Saturday, August 28, speak in favor of an international court sufficiently supported and involving a definite international agreement for peace. Before it was finally released, the newspapers contained reference to such statements upon his part.

So far as the partisan aspect is concerned, the platform of both of the leading parties had affirmed a league of nations, with reservations or modifications. This has been interpreted by candidates of one party to mean an acceptance of the League of Nations presented in the Peace Treaty of Versailles.

From the expression of the candidate of another leading party it means an international court, developed from The Hague, but with authority to enforce its decrees. Later report states that Attorney General Wickersham and the candidate of that party are preparing an affirmative declaration for a form of a league of nations. Their opposition is to the present conditions and clauses of the league as now presented and accepted by over thirty nations of the world.

The third largest party, though much smaller than either of these two, as strongly affirms the need of a league of nations as it rejects the league set forth in the Treaty of Versailles.

There are, of course, the practical aspects confronting the world and confronting the United States, since we can hardly withdraw from all contact with the world. An airplane can cross the Atlantic in sixteen hours, placing the United States as near Europe as New York was to Boston a hundred years ago.

There is much more that can be said in answering the various objections sometimes raised. Our boys who have been over are very anxious not to have to make the trip again. How we can best achieve that is worthy of serious consideration. But it can never be secured on a purely partisan basis.

It would seem that it should be clear to anyone familiar with modern conditions, that we cannot entirely withdraw as a nation, from the world, and not be affected by conditions existing in other parts of the world. The day when a splendid isolation was possible, even though it were now desirable, is past. The real issue would appear to be, Shall we endeavor to enter into an international agreement, providing for the settlement of international questions by disarmament for a judicial settlement of problems, instead of the arbitrament of war, or shall we attempt to maintain an isolation that will require preparedness in the sense of universal military training and a greatly increased navy? Self-interest would appear to indicate the answer, as well as a reasonable effort for cooperation and conditions in a broad way, for human brotherhood.

The work of the church is not confined to the world to come. Practical Christianity is definitely concerned with the industrial, social, and economic problems of the times. As such we are personally of the opinion that the League of Nations is a matter in which we should be interested, entirely aside from the action of political parties, considering primarily the principles involved.

The Assembly Hall

We have heard several inquiries, since General Conference, such as, What is the Bishopric doing with regard to the assembly hall for use at General Conference?

Those who were present at last General Conference will remember the special collections or donations which were then made, totaling some thirty to forty thousand dollars. A few donations have been received since, including the one President Smith received in Salt Lake City.

Instead of leaving it to run on indefinitely, and making a slow drive extending for one or more years, it is the present intention to make a concentrated effort the last half of October, and to try at one time, by an effort throughout the church to raise the amount needed.

Pursuant to this, the HERALD expects to get out a special magazine number for October 13, concerning Zion and Independence—what we have done there, and what we are doing, and why the church as a whole should support such a building as this.

To our mind this latter question seems self-answering: to have a place for General Conferences to meet. There being a place, it must have locality; it cannot be throughout the church. Being for the whole church, it must be supported by the whole church. It is true that the locality where it is erected will have the use of the building at other times, but that is incidental. The place has been selected, and is that which is considered the central place of Zion, and which the last General Conference made the headquarters of the church.

There are more church members in Independence than in any other one place, even though the proportion of the church there located is relatively small. There are many more church members in the two neighboring stakes, and it is also readily reached from Saint Joseph, Missouri, by interurban. All the general officers of the church and departments are either now located there, or soon will be. This includes the First Presidency, the Twelve, the Presiding Bishopric, headquarters for the Seventy, the church secretary, the church physician's office, the church auditor, the church architect, the presiding patriarch's office, general historian's office, headquarter of the Women's Department, Sunday school, Religion, and the Sanitarium. And it is probably only a short time until the General Sunday School Association and the Herald Publishing House will also be established there.

The need of the building is apparent at any General Conference, for the Sunday services, for the preaching services, for the business meetings of conference. Rooms are also needed for the various quorums and for several of the special programs during the conference. It will permit of all attending the one service instead of having to divide to some half dozen places for the various Sunday services, and will permit a greater unity of effort, and will result in some economy of time and effort during the conference.

We are also assured that the building can and will be used in the interim. In fact, though the percentage in Independence and its vicinity is relatively small compared with the membership of the church, even now there are five thousand members and more within easy riding distance of Independence, and very soon there will be as many more. This includes those in Kansas City and the neighboring towns.

Let us be thinking of it, and ready to make a great effort at the time appointed.

S. A. B.

The United States Department of Justice has accused the clothing manufacturers and jobbers of circulating propaganda to hold up prices. They call attention to the fact that there is a surplus of wool on hand, and consequently the public has the right to look for cheaper clothing.

Short Course of the Women's Department

By a series of short courses the women seek to reach in a small way every home in the church.

There has come to the editors' desk recently two short series of lessons, one of eight lessons on "Relief and service," and another of twelve lessons on "Child care," prepared for the Women's Department of the church. Copies may be secured by sending twenty-five cents per each course to the Women's Department, Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, Box 255, Independence, Missouri.

After reading this series over, we can heartily recommend them to the serious-minded women of the church. To the serious minded we say, because most likely to only such will this series have any appeal, and even from many of our serious-minded women, these lessons will receive nothing more than a casual glance. To a few of such there may come the feeling that they have kept house for twenty years and have raised several children, and that therefore they have nothing to learn.

We are reminded at this juncture of an experience with a farmer of some twenty years' experience in the profession. He was having some bad luck with brooder chickens just hatched. They were dying by the scores, all exhibiting the same symptoms previous to death. He was at a loss to know what was the matter or what to do. The writer innocently suggested that the farmer write to the Iowa State College of Agriculture at Ames, Iowa, describing the symptoms, to see if advice could be had as to the proper course to pursue. The suggestion seemed to irritate him considerably, as he remarked that he had been farming for twenty-five years, and did not think the "desk" farmers could tell him anything.

To many busy women there will come the feeling that they simply haven't the time to study these lessons; they have already as much as they can possibly do. Did you ever hear of the out-of-date banker, the out-of-date physician? A good many mothers are so out of date by the time their daughters reach young ladyhood that the daughters have a hard time to maintain their respect for their mothers. There's no profession in which you can get out of date so quickly in these days as the profession of motherhood. You cannot afford not to keep up with the times and the discoveries affecting the home.

After the physical cares which the young children need are over, there's nothing that the woman of the household can indulge in of any better merit than to spend a part of her time in helping out in the organized philanthropic effort of the community. Considerably more happiness will be experienced in such efforts than in all the whiling away of time by purposeless social visits that one can do.

The course on "Relief and service" is written up by Mrs. Henry C. Smith, of Independence, Missouri. Mrs. Smith has been a successful teacher in her day. Many will remember her as Miss Mabel Knipschild, of Graceland College. The course defines the scope of social work, speaks of the various agencies doing social work, gives the history of the development of motives, methods, and supervision of relief work, enumerates the essential characteristics of a good social worker, points out and describes the various fields for social workers, discusses the nature, types, and effects of poverty, and evaluates various methods of giving.

The course on "Child study" was prepared by Mrs. Lydia Thomas Wight, of Lamoni, Iowa. Mrs. Wight has been making a study of this work in the light of modern discoveries and improvements for some time. The course in the first four lessons gives the nature of prenatal care and the care of the baby at birth. The next four lessons give the daily care of the baby to its ninth month as to bath, clothing, sleep, food, exercise, daily schedule, and the expected results at the ninth month. The last four lessons discuss the care of the child from the ninth month to the fifth year as to weaning, proper developments, diet, daily care, and routine, habit formation, physical defects, and development expected at the end of the second year.

A Civic Duty Often Neglected

E. J. Davis, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League in the Chicago District, calls attention to some of the recent results there in the primaries because so many good church people did not vote. One of the ablest men, of a religious nature, and a Christian, was defeated for renomination by three votes, while nearly 21,000 registered voters did not vote, and in one church 52 men were found who were not registered. A politician under indictment for bribery was renominated by a total vote of 907 in a district of numerous churches, while over 24,000 voters failed to cast their ballots. A state's attorney who undertook to enforce the Sunday closing law was defeated by 1,089 votes, while nearly 227,000 registered voters stayed away. Seventy-five per cent of the church men neglected to vote in the primary, yet the total number of qualified voters in the churches exceeds by 35 per cent the largest vote ever cast for a county officer.

What can be done for the right if every man and woman will feel his or her duty to take every possible necessary step for the selection of fit men or women for public service! Our duty is clear in the light of the revelation given to the church. Study the situation and seek to secure honest men and wise men for public service. (Doctrine and Covenants 95: 2.)

The Public Nurse

The community nurse is one way of solving our problems, as she can visit and should visit the home of anyone and everyone, rich or poor, and give gratuitous advice, not only in the case of maternity, and care of the baby, but also to any other sickness, or where there is no sickness, in improving the sanitary conditions of the home.

We have seen a trained nurse, dressed in ordinary costume, sitting out on the front porch, having a quiet chat with the mother in a good residence district of one of our cities, where the residents owned their own homes, and good homes at that.

It seems to us there can scarcely be a better service than that where the mutual relationship is established, so that each one feels free to discuss her mutual experiences, and problems, and the trained nurse can give the results of her practical experience.

Of course this takes tact, and takes a special skill to handle in a way to be of real benefit to the community. But it is a very vital part of health work and as important as hospital work.

Careful students seem to be conclusively of the opinion that the same person cannot be the nurse for cases of serious sickness and at the same time act as the community nurse. In the former case the nurse would be in one place continuously, and in the other case she must be ready to be called upon for advice any time, and be ready to make regular calls. To care for a person for one or two weeks or longer, is a very vital work, but it is a different work than that of the community nurse. Her work is not so much to cure sickness as it is to prevent sickness. S. A. B.

MISCELLANEOUS

Enrollment of Nonresident Saints

In the interest of those who are living too far away from the common meeting place of an organized group of Saints known as a Branch with which association is rendered impracticable, we are herewith offering a plan which we hope will assist in the solution of one of the vexations problems in this department, i. e., "What shall we do with the names of our nonresident members?"

The names of members of the church living in organized districts too far from branch meeting places either to attend service or receive personal attention of branch officers may be enrolled in what shall be known as the N-R groups—meaning those living in districts but nonresident in branches. The method of transferring names to this N-R group is explained later. The district secretary, unless otherwise provided, will have charge of such record, and persons whose names are enrolled thereon will come under the immediate supervision of district officials.

Since in many instances these persons will be widely separated, much of the assistance rendered will necessarily be by correspondence. The district secretary or whoever may have charge of this list of names, must be ever on the alert to secure the new addresses of those who change location. Otherwise, his list of addresses will soon be of little value and many of the persons thus enrolled lost to the church. Each secretary, either branch or district, should take great pride in the fact that at no time during his term in office did he "lose" a single member and thus be under the necessity of asking for the name of that person to be transferred to the "unknown" in order to have a clean record. But his is only part of the work of the secretary. He should assist the other district officials in instituting and maintaining regular correspondence with those enrolled in his N-R group, encouraging them in every possible way by keeping them in touch with the various undertakings and achievements of the church. Such work would be of inestimable value to missionaries who should find his record to be a complete, up-to-date directory of nonresident Saints. This, together with the work of the secretary just suggested, would enable the missionaries to more easily determine opportunities for new openings by getting directly in touch with the isolated members in that field.

Method of Transfer

It is quite probable that during the clean-up which has been provided with a loose-leaf binder similar to those now in use in the branches. Transfer of names to this record will be made through the Department of Statistics only, following precisely the same method at present employed between branches with the following provisions:

In order to guard against hasty or unwarranted transfers when it is desired to transfer a name from a branch to the N-R group of the same district in which that branch is located the request for such transfer must be signed by the branch clerk or other branch official and countersigned by either the district president or secretary. This endorsement by the district official is an acknowledgment upon the part of the district of responsibility towards the person named in the request. A transfer request from a branch in a given district to the N-R group of another district need not be countersigned by an official of that district.

Transfers From N-R to Branch

Inasmuch as the church specially encourages branch enrollment, these N-R groups should be regarded as expedients and both district and branch officials should labor to keep the least number of names enrolled therein. For the present, requests for transfer from N-R to branch whether prepared by branch or district secretary will require no indorsement of other officials, but all transfer requests of whatever sort, when prepared by either district or branch secretary should be concurred in by the respective district or branch president.

Addresses on Transfer Requests

In preparing any transfer request the correct present address of the person named must be supplied. This rule is imperative and must be observed. If in doubt, address a letter to the place where the person is supposed to be living and secure a reply before sending a transfer request. Always bear in mind the fact that a name enrolled on your record imposes the responsibility of having knowledge of the whereabouts of that person. You would object to receiving a name without the correct address being given. This department provides transfer request forms, a supply of which should always be kept in the binder. Always use these blanks and save both time and money. Remember all transfer requests, unless especially provided otherwise, are to be sent to the Department of Statistics, Box 255, Independence, Missouri. No change is to be made in your record when sending in requests until authorized by transcript of information from this department.

According to the report of the church recorder, in 1918 one third of our entire membership was "out of touch with branches." The above outlined plan is an attempt to provide assistance and encouragement to at least some of that very large number of Saints, from among which the church continually sustains heavy losses. If all concerned use and do not abuse the provisions set out, if the district officials will undertake to function as real overseers of these isolated ones, then we sincerely believe good results must obtain.

Suggestions

Practically all branch clerks have discovered names enrolled with branches which should now be transferred to the N-R group; and, of course, you wish to be among the first to make the necessary adjustments. We wish to assist you and also ask that you assist us by exercising care in the preparation of your requests.

It is quite probably that during the clean-up which has been taking place during the past few months, branch clerks generally have discovered that they are carrying the names of people who live in other districts. When you are sure you have correct address, prepare transfer request at once. When you do not know the name of the district in which the person lives leave that space blank, but never send requests without proper address.

In transferring to N-R within your own district, prepare a list of the names you believe should be transferred. Consult with the branch president. After the list has thus been examined, arrange for a meeting with the president of the district and go over the names with him. Explain where the people live and why you wish to transfer to N-R group, and if agreed to by him, prepare your requests and send to us with his signature, as well as your own, attached. Our reason for being so particular is that we wish to avoid the labor and expense of putting requests through only to learn that conditions did not justify the same. In other words any disagreement between branch and district officers as to transfer from branch to N-R must be settled before sending in request.

Enrollment pages, transcripts of information, etc., are mailed to branch clerks the first of each month. Reports and requests should reach us by the 25th in order to insure returns the 1st of following month. All pages and certificates for branches are mailed to the branch clerks who are held responsible for prompt delivery of same.

As we attempt to work out along this line, remember it adds materially to the work in this department. For the sake of thousands who will be affected we seek your cooperation in a prompt and careful compliance with all the instructions proceeding from this department. Again we say: Be very certain you have the correct address for your transfer request. You cannot be too careful in spelling names, giving dates, street numbers, etc. Mistakes will occur at times, but those due to carelessness are inexcusable.

The success of this plan depends wholly upon your cooperation. We submit the rather pertinent inquiry, Why seek to add more names if we enroll only to lose such a large per-

The Proof of Life Is in the Living

BY J. E. VANDERWOOD

"I no longer desire for myself that which I am not also seeking for all else as well."

In the riper years of my experience, I have had reason to reflect and meditate; and were it not for the seriousness of the situation it would be quite amusing to behold the ideals, the ambition, and the frenzied moods of the average person. I wish I might be able to say the right thing. People of course are, in a measure at least, creatures of circumstance; not that God intended them to be such, but because they have chosen to be just that.

The thing that above all else causes me to have a profound sympathy for mankind is that they have such a vague idea of the Christian philosophy. It may seem almost harsh to thus express it, but I am unable to find words more fitting for the circumstance. I trust, however, that I may be understood in this matter, for it is my soul's most earnest desire to be able to be of assistance to my fellow men. Neither desire nor fear, in the sense in which they are generally understood, concerns me. That is to say, I no longer desire for myself that which I am not also seeking for all others as well. The theory of a place in a future heaven for my own insignificant little self has no more charm for me. Personally, I would not give a moment's consideration to such short-sighted ideas.

But I do desire to arouse the human mind, the intellectual faculties of man, to a sense of duty; and if possible inspire my fellow men with the sublime truth that it is our privilege to be workers together with God, and by this means we may be able to transform this earth into a veritable heaven. This will remove the spirit of cowardice, and I can therefore no longer entertain fear of a future punishment; for it occurs to me that only the cowardly can do this. I would, however, so far as it is possible for me to do, inspire all with whom I come in touch with the idea that it is a most excellent thing to become acquainted with our God, and to acquire an intelligent acquaintance and fellowship with our Lord Jesus Christ.

The Proof of Life

The idea is this: It has been said that the proof of the pudding is in the eating of it, and by applying this philosophy to life I would say that the proof of life is in the living of it. There can be no short cuts to success, no byways to the acquiring of character. It is impossible for us to get anything without paying the price. The law of compensation holds good throughout the entire universe. I am, therefore, grateful to know that I shall be justly compensated for all my doings.

Why should I desire something that I have not rightly earned? or why should I fear something that I do not justly deserve? It is absolutely useless for me to try to escape the law of compensation; therefore, mere desire or fear cannot help me; verily, no. I must learn to do that which shall bring a blessed compensation. Why should I, or for that matter anybody else, be either selfish or cowardly? We become selfish, or we become cowardly because we fail to understand the philosophy of life. We fail to vision correctly and we therefore entangle ourselves in the mists of the follies of life.

Did you ever think of the life of Christ as it is portrayed to us in the four gospels? Did you ever discover in it a selfish tendency? Verily, no! It was one consistent and persistent life of service. The altruistic tendencies of his being made life a pleasure to him, as well as a benediction to mankind. He could say, "It is my meat to do the will of him who sent me, and to finish his work." He could pray that our joy might be full, even as his joy in the Father was full. In a word, he took delight in doing things that would enrich and enlarge the lives of men. Did you ever discover in him the spirit of fear? No, indeed! He was absolutely fearless; he met courageously and manfully every issue in life. He knew, and he wishes us to know, that there is no power on the earth nor under the earth that can harm him whom God protects. He has bidden us to follow him, and to learn of him; why therefore should we be either selfish or cowardly?

Learning the Laws of Life

Why should I selfishly desire a place in a future heaven? Can you tell? Or why should I fear the punishment of a future hell? Life is too precious for me to waste profitable time in brooding over either. It is enough that I apply myself to learn the laws of life; and having learned them I should avail myself of every opportunity to demonstrate the excellence and virtue of those laws. I should use the precious moments therein to practice the art of living so that I may be able to reveal its feasibility to the children of men.

Some people who claim to be Saints go about with a forlorn appearance and a sad countenance; they complain of their hardships, their trials, and their perplexities, and then they wonder why other people are so slow in accepting their philosophy. Isn't it strange?

By their very lives they admit that they are yet in the world, and that they have no knowledge of Christ. Listen for a moment to the warning given by the divine Master to his followers: "In the world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world." The force of this argument is that, so long as we have those tribulations we tacitly admit that we are yet clinging to the world; but when we part company with those things and have found the Christ and have made of him a constant companion, our countenances will be cheerful, our hearts will be strong, and our spirits will be tranquil and perfectly poised. *Remember, my dear friend, that it was Jesus the anointed one who said: "In me ye shall have peace." The Psalmist too has said: "The Lord will bless his people with peace," and Isaiah, the silver-tongued prophet, has said: "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee: because he trusteth in thee."

Brother, sister, comrade, friend, isn't this sufficient to cause us to see that the cause of our gloomy lives and sad countenances is in our own failure to respond to the Christ life? If our minds were stayed on him, he would keep us in perfect peace, and our lives would become a fountain of perpetual youth, a source of joy and gladness, and our very presence would be a benediction to others.

We Make Our Own Future

It is not, therefore, future desire, that is, a desire for future reward, that should concern us. Nor is it fear of a future punishment that should disturb us. The future can and will be nothing more nor less than we make it, because the life that is to be is only the legitimate continuation of the life that now is. The thing then that should be, and is, of paramount importance is my application of the principle of life to the issues of the present time. How do I live now, what spirit do I now manifest, are the all-important questions. No amount of desire can give me a place in a future heaven if I neglect the golden opportunities now. No fear of future punishment can absolve me from the torments of hell if I fail to free myself from the entanglements of sin now.

Neither desire nor fear, then, can accomplish anything for me; but a persistent and untiring effort to-day can bring me to the feet of the Master; and when I have found him and have learned his way, I may have true and abiding peace.

Be sunny in your disposition; be cheerful; be courageous; and a joy unspeakable shall distill upon you; a fountain of life will well up within you and your words shall be as a cherishing fountain unto those who are saluted by them. Don't long for future rewards, nor tremble as cowards with a fear of future punishment; but be men of character, men of cheerful and sunny countenances, and acquire the art, the power, and the reality of life here and now that shall make you one with your Maker.

Learn that the life of a Saint means happiness and joy, both here and hereafter. "Can the children of the bridal chamber mourn while the Bridegroom is with them?" Verily, no! The inevitable conclusion, then, is that if we sorrow and grieve and get blue and melancholy, we are as yet separate and apart from the Bridegroom. It is high time then that we were awaking to our true condition and building while the day lasts.

The Law of Compensation.

Compensation is the law of God's universe; I cannot escape the result of my own doing. I may crave a blissful reward until the crack of doom, but if I do not plant the seeds and perform the acts that will produce a fruitage of bliss, I will only live to receive great disappointments.

How slow we mortals learn! It took thirty years for me to learn that effect must and will follow cause. It took me the greater part of my life to learn that a just compensation will be meted out to everyone, regardless of cult, class, or color. Yes, I have been guilty. I used to think that if a man had some kind of passive desire, God would in some vicarious manner give him a blissful reward in a future heaven; and that if he didn't believe passively certain theories God would punish him in a future hell. Strange as it may seem I did not somehow have sense enough to relate these things to our present, everyday life. Like Saul of Tarsus, I had to get out on the Damascus road, and I had to be bumped severely before I could see.

Have to Be Blinded in Order to See

There is a peculiarity about the most of us and that is, we have to be smitten blind before we can see. It required more than thirty years for me to learn that God would give me what I justly deserved—nothing more, nothing less. Desire for reward, therefore, will avail me nothing; fear of penalty only has a tendency to paralyze and disqualify me for the service of life. Let me, therefore, flee from both of these hindrances; but above all things let me learn that the secret of life consists in right action, noble anticipation, and Christlike service.

God is just, and his laws are just. If we are willing to respond to his invitation, and adapt ourselves to the working of his laws, if we are willing to drink from the fountain of life that is opened before us, then, and not until then, will we find life and joy and peace.

The thing that should have first place in our lives is the spirit of right doing. We should learn to love justice, to love mercy, to love virtue, and to love wisdom; and so surely as we come to love these things will they become a part of us, because we will appropriate them to ourselves and we will therefore unfold into their likeness. We cannot evolve that which has not first been involved. That is to say, we get out of life only what we put into life; herein lies the secret of our success, and herein is to be found the cause of our failure. The reason why so many men's lives are barren and waste, is because they have never put anything that is worth while into their lives.

We Get What We Put Into Life

He, therefore, who says, I have lost faith in my religion, I have become discouraged with life, tacitly admits that he has put nothing into his life that is true or abiding. He has been trying to get something for nothing, and of course he has failed; he could not help but fail under such circumstances. Such a one must get a new vision or he will ultimately perish.

Frequently people ask me, "What will I get out of this?" My answer is: You will get out of it just what you put into it, nothing more, nothing less. That is to say, if I plant the seeds of evil, of strife, and of discord, I will get nothing out of life but the fruitage of that planting, which will be disappointment, sorrow, pain, and anguish. But if I plant the seeds of love, joy, peace, kindness, etc., I will surely reap the fruitage of that planting, which is happiness, comfort of spirit, cheerfulness, tranquility of soul. If I plant the seeds of discord, then must my life resound with discords; but if I plant the seeds of harmony, my life must and will be harmonious.

Therefore, I say again that we get out of life only that which we put into it. That is to say, nothing but corn can come of corn, and nothing but thistles can come of thistles. If you want to get the best out of life, you must by all means, put the best into life. Never be so unwise as to sow one kind of seed and hope to reap a different kind of fruitage.

The Word of Wisdom Again

BY D. AMOS YATES

"The word of God is the word of wisdom, always. We may be foolish and turn aside from it, or we may be wise and obey it."

Many volumes have been written perhaps, pro and con, upon the subject of the Word of Wisdom. It is not the purpose of this article to give a long and laborious analysis of the subject. It is only desired to make a few observations which it is hoped will be understandable to all who may read.

The Word of Wisdom is exactly what the term itself implies. The Lord himself has given it, and if we would be wise we will heed its counsel. It is not an ironclad law that is intended to bind us to a given task, but the promise is simply made that if we live in harmony with its wisdom we shall be blessed abundantly.

We Have Our Agency to Use Wisdom

None of God's laws are to be forced upon us. Our agency is never taken from us. We need not be baptized unless we choose. It shows wisdom upon our part if we so choose, however. We do not have to pay tithing unless we want to, but if we are wise we will want to. We need not subscribe our allegiance to the stewardship plan unless we desire, but it shows that we are wise if we practice such a plan, and the promised blessings will surely come.

The word of God is truth. The word of God is the word of wisdom, always. We may be foolish and turn aside from it, or we may be wise and obey it. The divine plan is always an appeal to the will of man. Two ways are ever presented, the way of death and the way of life—the foolish way and the wise way. Sorrow is the goal of the former, happiness the goal of the latter.

Some teachers (preachers), in trying to get people to choose the way of life, tell of the awful things and the horrors that will come to them if they don't do right. Others prefer to point to the beautiful and to emphasize the blessings that will accrue if they do do right. The lesson in the Word of Wisdom is taught by the latter method.

A few things, at least, in the Word of Wisdom are very plain. It teaches that tobacco is not good for man except in case of bruises. Alcohol is not for the belly. Meat is to be used sparingly, especially in hot weather. Hot drinks are not to be taken into the stomach, etc.

What Are "Hot Drinks"?

Much contention has been had over just what is meant by the term hot drinks. As far as the writer is concerned, he has often expressed himself as being simple-minded enough to believe that when the Lord said "hot" he meant hot; that when he said "drinks" he meant drinks. Therefore "hot drinks" means "hot drinks," with or without the stimulating substance from tea, coffee, or cocoa. If a liquid taken into the stomach is hot enough to injure the lining tissues of that organ, it makes no difference, as far as the temperature is concerned, whether it be hot water, hot soup, or hot tea, the effect in that regard is the same. If anyone is inclined to question this fact, let him burn one hand with hot water and the other with hot tea of the same temperature and decide which burns the worse. The tissues of the stomach are more apt to be injured by a lower temperature than the hand, however.

Since tea, coffee, and cocoa are narcotics and stimulants, they are not good for the body even if taken cold. But greater injury is caused when they are taken hot.

We Should Live What We Teach

If we keep the Word of Wisdom, God will bless us physically and spiritually as he has promised. Many of our people are not keeping the Word of Wisdom as strictly as they should. Even among the elders we find some drinking tea and coffee or other hot drinks. This ought not to be. If we fail in this respect, we will have to shun the subject of the Word of Wisdom in our public teaching or be branded as inconsistent. We are admonished to teach all things "whatsoever I have commanded you." Are we doing it? If not, why not? If we cannot teach the word of God and live what we teach, we are not doing all that is expected of us from him who has commissioned us. Jesus was the ideal teacher. He always lived what he taught and was never afraid to teach what the Father commanded. He was master of himself. A man who cannot control himself cannot control others. Abstaining from hot drinks is merely exercising control over our appetite. If we cannot do that, then to that extent we are not masters of ourselves but are partially enslaved by our appetites.

We have heard the remark, "Brother B— uses hot drinks and he is a good man." Yes, that may be true. Brother B— may be a good man and may enjoy a degree of the Spirit, but if he would harken to the wisdom of God's word and obey it in regard to the use of hot drinks as well as in other things, he would be a better man and would be entitled to more of the Spirit in his ministry, or whatever he is doing. Very seldom do we find a Latter Day Saint, in the ministry or out of it, who does not make an excuse every time he drinks a cup of coffee in the presence of a missionary. If it is all right and the thing to do, then why the apology?

Making Progress

In a sermon at the Southern California district conference last February the writer remarked that he hoped the day would soon come that when Saints were serving meals at their various gatherings, we would not hear the waitresses' chorus of "Tea, coffee, or cocoa?" as soon as the blessing had been asked. It is quite the custom now-a-days at some of our gatherings for those who use hot drinks to get the preference in being served first and those who drink water have to wait till the last. Therefore it was quite gratifying to read in the Ensign for August 19 that at the Council Bluffs reunion this year they were not serving tea or coffee, and meat was being used sparingly. We are making progress. God speed the right.

For a closing paragraph it might not be out of order to mention the fact that the use of coca cola is injurious to the system, and we ought not to use it because it comes under the heading in the Word of Wisdom, of strong drinks. Coca cola is made from the refuse of a cocaine factory and contains a habit-forming drug. Few people seem to know this. It might be well to inform ourselves further along this line. This is but a suggestion, as we have not time to discuss the matter at length. Our bodies have been given us to care for and words of wisdom have been given to teach us how to care for them. Are we acting foolishly, or are we exercising wisdom?

Virgin Birth of Christ

BY A. H. PARSONS

A review of the evidences proving the consistency of this belief.

This is a vital question and one the Lord has extended to us the means by which it might be clearly understood.

"Thou shalt take the things which thou hast received, which have been given unto thee in my Scriptures for a law."—Doctrine and Covenants 42: 16.

"And again, the elders, priests, and teachers of this church shall teach the principles of my gospel which are in the Bible and the Book of Mormon, in the which is the fullness of the gospel; and they shall observe the covenants and church articles to do them, and these shall be their teachings."—Doctrine and Covenants 42: 5.

The books are very deficient on this point: "And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed: it [seed of the woman] shall bruise thy head." (Genesis 3: 15.) Whose seed? The woman's. Let this thought be fixed in your mind, that it was the seed of the woman and not the seed of the man, that would bruise the serpent's head. It was by woman the fall came; it is by woman redemption is pronounced.

"Therefore the Lord himself shall give you a sign; behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel."—Isaiah 7: 14.

"Mine Only Begotten Son, who is full of grace and truth, which is Jesus Christ, the only name which shall be given under heaven, whereby salvation shall come unto the children of men."—Genesis 6: 53, Inspired Translation.

"And the name of his Only Begotten is . . . Jesus Christ, a righteous judge, who shall come in the meridian of time."—Genesis 6: 60, Inspired Translation.

"This thing is a similitude of the sacrifice of the Only Begotten of the Father."—Genesis 4: 7, Inspired Translation.

The Only Begotten is significant; nothing like it before or ever shall be begotten by the Holy Ghost.

"The angel answered and said unto her, The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee; therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God."—Luke 1: 35.

"Behold, the angel of the Lord appeared in a dream, saying, Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife; for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost."—Matthew 1: 20.

"Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel, which, being interpreted, is, God with us."—Matthew 1: 23.

The vision that was given to Joseph was sufficient to remove all doubts that had lingered in his mind relative to this matter, and he moved forward and took Mary and knew her not till after the birth of her virgin son, Jesus.

The next witness is the Book of Mormon:

"Behold, the virgin whom thou seest is the mother of the Son of God, after the manner of the flesh. . . . And the angel said unto me, Behold the Lamb of God, yea, even the Son of the eternal Father!"—2 Nephi 3: 58, 62.

"And the Lamb of God went forth and was baptized of him; [John] and after he was baptized, I beheld the heavens open, and the Holy Ghost come down out of heaven and abode upon him in the form of a dove."—2 Nephi 3: 73, 74.

"And I, Nephi, saw that he was lifted up upon the cross, and slain for the sins of the world."—2 Nephi 3: 87.

I quote these last texts to prove that if one event presented by these different witnesses is true, they must all be true; if they have misrepresented the facts in one instance, could they be trusted on any other point or event that they say did occur? If their statement is true that Christ was baptized and crucified it would stand in evidence that he had a virgin birth as stated by them.

"And he shall be called Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Father of heaven and earth, the Creator of all things, from the beginning; and his mother shall be called Mary."—Mosesiah 1: 102.

"For behold, the kingdom of heaven is at hand, and the Son of God cometh upon the face of the earth. And behold, he shall be born of Mary at Jerusalem, which is the land of our forefathers, she being a virgin, [woman unacquainted with man] a precious and chosen vessel, who shall be overshadowed, and conceive by the power of the Holy Ghost, and bring forth a son, yea, even the Son of God."—Alma 5: 18, 19.

Is it necessary for the church to speak plainer than to say that we accept of the three books as the rule of our faith?

In confirmation of the above statements I present the following quotations from The Presbyterian for April 4, 1915, written by Professor J. Gresham Machen, Princeton Seminary:

"An ancient manuscript of the Gospels in Syriac [a Semitic language which was spoken in the country to the east of Antioch] renders Matthew 1:16 as follows: 'Jacob begat Joseph; Joseph, to whom was betrothed Mary the Virgin, begat Jesus that is called the Messiah.' This reading is attested by almost all of the many hundreds of Greek manuscripts [including the Codex Vaticanus and the Codex Sinaiticus, which are the two oldest and best] and by all the translations except the Old Latin and the Old Syriac. Such a consensus of testimony would show clearly that the reading is at least as early as the second century, and a quotation by Tertullian confirms that conclusion." (Pages 8, 9.)

"The reading of the Cusetonian Syriac is also very similar. Burkitt translates that reading as follows: 'Jacob begat Joseph, him to whom was betrothed Mary the Virgin, she who bare Jesus the Messiah.'"—Page 9.

November 2, 1916, same periodical, we have the second part of this subject presented by S. S. Laws, from which I quote the following:

"But the virgin birth properly understood is not a miracle, though a supernatural event. Hence a friend, Doctor Davidson, who was requested to examine Trench on Miracles for me, thus reports to me: 'I have looked over Trench on Miracles, and do not find a single word or any reference to the virgin birth.'"

I may add that Trench did not recognize the virgin birth as a miracle.

"But in dismissing the miraculous character of this question, we raise the much larger question as to whether our Savior's conception and birth were supernatural. Now it must be borne in mind, and it would seem sufficient to state, that the true and only critically authentic narratives 'which relate the events of our Lord's nativity, circumstantially testify that this was the supernatural mode of his earthly origin. There is no possibility of any fair and honest interpretation of this language of Matthew, deriving from it any other doctrine than that of the virgin birth of our Savior. . . . This denial of the virgin birth of our Savior has neither the attraction of novelty nor truthfulness. It was a malignant fling at Christianity by the infidel, Celsus, who was answered by Origen in the third century (185-254 A. D.) Christianity in all its distinctive features is supernatural. It is supernatural from A to Z. And if a distinction may be made among fundamentals, this doctrine of the virgin birth of Christ is primary, for Christianity sets forth a plan embracing the mind and work of God so transcendent of finite intelligence as to be absolutely unthinkable as having originated with man. The Deity of the Lord Jesus Christ as the virgin-born Son of God is the corner stone. . . . And finally, as dispelling a subtle skeptical misgiving experienced by some, the distinguished scientist and anthropologist, Professor Romanes, remarks as follows: 'Even if a virgin has ever conceived and borne a son, and even if such a fact in the human species has been unique, it would not betoken any breach of physiological continuity.'"

And as to the stories of heathenism, Doctor Orr remarks: "It is the fact that not one of these tales has to do with a virgin birth in the sense in which alone we are here concerned with it."—Pages 8, 9, 10.

In summing up what we have discovered: First, The seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, not the seed of the man.

Second. Christ begotten of the Father, by the Holy Ghost.

Third. That by reason of being begotten by the Holy Ghost he was the Son of God fleshly as well as spiritually—Only Begotten Son.

Fourth. Sciences sustain the doctrine of the virgin birth.

Fifth. Learned men of our own age declare the doctrine sustained by early manuscripts, which should have some weight in helping us to a final conclusion as to the right or wrong side of this proposition.

Sixth. Destroy this doctrine of the virgin birth of Jesus and we undermine the very foundation of the Christian hope.

Seventh. It was given as a sign, a virgin to bear a son as the fruitage of the Holy Ghost, as the mind of God manifested.

If it had been otherwise there would have been no sign and the people would have said that Jesus had a human father and would have had ground for such statement, but the sign was promised long before and the word of the Lord shall not return to him void, hence its literal fulfillment as stated by Matthew.

Former students in Graceland who return this year will be surprised to find the office of the president moved from its old quarters and occupying one of the four rooms into which the class room across the hall has been divided. And the extension of the library room into the old commercial class room with the librarian's desk in the center where the partition stood is a great improvement, affording not only more room for the books but a greater area for study. The typewriters have been moved down from the second floor and will have pleasing quarters on the first floor, in the northeast room. Four pianos have been purchased for the music department.

The outlook for a large attendance is very good. All the rooms in both Marietta Hall and Patroness Hall have been rented to girls, and it is planned to find room down town for the boys till the upper floor of the new building can be finished, when they will be given that space pending the time when a new dormitory can be erected for their needs.

THE FORUM

A Word From the Land of Zion

BY RALPH W. FARRELL

Elder Farrell has recently accepted an appointment as chaplain of the Independence Sanitarium.

I think that possibly what I have to say will be of interest to many of the Saints that I know—and I have personal acquaintance with several thousand. I intend to speak of things concerning Zion, of things which I know are of vital interest to many members of the church. From my earliest acquaintance with the church of Jesus Christ, I have always believed that the “promises and prophecies” given in the Word of God will all be fulfilled. I know that the Lord’s love is boundless as the ocean of eternity, and that his punishments are as terrible as it is necessary for them to be. I know that God is speaking to the members of the church, day and night, everywhere, and urging them to obey his law. There seems to be one word bigger than all others now burning into the lives of the Saints; it is the word obedience. Nothing else will save the day for us.

What is the use to trifle with Jehovah? Zion must be redeemed! We all know it, don’t we? Yes, unless we are spiritual idiots. Is there one so blind that he cannot read the “signs of the times”? Why is it necessary to din in the ears of each of us the recital of deeds “black as midnight” that are being done in all the world? Will we sleep in the day as do the drunken, or will we be children of the light, and work while the day lasts? True, the man who has a few dollars in the bank may feel that he is secured against the blight of that day. Poor, deluded one, your wealth will be cast to the bats and damn your soul at the last, if you have made the “mammon of unrighteousness” your friend. No man is secure who has not obeyed the law of God. Neither is the mere fact of being poor sufficient to give one a passport into the land of safety.

Zion must be redeemed, and it is not a question of whether I am at this moment poor or rich; it is a question of whether or not I am keeping the law of God. It is not only, am I sending up money to redeem physical Zion, but also am I fitting my life so I can help in a spiritual way to increase the spiritual assets of my church, which is the kingdom of Christ?

Obedience Required to Redeem Zion

Of course, it is not a question of merely moving to Independence or a stake of Zion. This mere change of location will not save us temporally or spiritually. But we are committed, as a church, to belief in the principle of gathering, and the thing that should occupy the attention of every Saint is, How can this great work of God be accomplished? And here again should be emphasized the word obedience. I am glad to say frankly and with deep seriousness that I know of nothing to do to bring about this great redemption of Zion other than to obey the law which God has given to us.

If you do not understand the law, I am sorry for you. But why do you not understand the law of your church? Do you think that God will keep you in doubt of his will concerning your advancement toward perfection any more than he did concerning the necessity of your obedience to the first principles of the gospel? It is true that the mere act of being immersed, of expressing faith and professing repentance, of receiving the laying on of hands, did not cost you very much; but I do not believe that you obeyed because of the cheapness of its cost to you; I have faith in you. It is just possible that you have not taken your duty seriously enough, or you may have thought that little further would be demanded of you than to live your own life in your own way in your own little town or big city. This question of building up Zion may not have remained long on your vision’s path. Whatever the reason for your negligence, if you are guilty, let it be your happy resolve to-day that nothing shall longer separate you from the performance of your full duty.

Independence is a wonderful place. On general principles I can not speak too warmly in its praise. But this fact is not sufficient to justify any man or woman in rushing here simply to be here. There is a mighty work to be done here, but as yet only the foundation is being laid, and, as in building any edifice, there is room for only a certain number of people to work on this foundation. But it will not take forever to lay a foundation, and the times cry to us to speed up. Still it would be worse than folly for people to think they can disregard the instruction of God and work in harmony with him. Do we give God credit for less intelligence than man? Man works according to plans; so does God. Divinity has arranged to gather his people, build a temple, prepare his church for the wedding of the Lamb; but in all this work He must work through human personality, for the benefits are for man, and man must in a sense earn them before he can enjoy them. It is worse than folly for us to even think that we can accomplish the redemption of Zion in any other way than God’s way. Hence, the necessity of hearkening to his word, obeying his law, and listening to and heeding the instruction given from time to time by those whom God has called to have special charge of the center spots and the stakes.

Cause for Disappointment

In the past it has been a common thing for Saints to pack up their goods and come to Independence only to be disappointed because “all things had not been prepared before them.” They do not succeed in getting located properly and then the evil one takes possession of them. They find fault with the Bishops, and oftentimes go back with anything in their hearts but a good word for the place which Christ intends to visit some day; and no human power can prevent it. All this might have been so different had the ones concerned only obeyed the law which emphasizes the fact that they should consult carefully and thoroughly with the officers concerned before moving up to Zion’s land.

I know all of this has been said many times in the papers and sermons; but that does not hinder me from saying it. I repeat it here because I want to do so, and I want to do so because I feel that it is instruction that needs to be repeated many times.

On last April I met a woman and her daughters walking anxiously about the streets of Independence, trying to find a home to purchase. She had shipped her furniture, which I believe had arrived, but she was without any home. Evidently all things had not been prepared before her, and she was somewhat frightened and ought to be. Under the circumstances I tried to comfort her by telling her that if she prayed in great faith as she searched, perhaps God would have mercy on her. It so happened (?) that in a few hours she had purchased a home. But this cannot always be the case, for there are only so many homes here for sale and if too many applicants should appear on the scene, some of them would have to leave town or sleep in the open. And chiggers in the summer and snow in the winter would not be pleasant things to contend with. Thus we see that even a pocketful of money is not a sufficient passport to this city. The Lord has spoken, and his word ought to be sufficient: “Let all things be prepared before you.”

Kansas City is wonderful in its future and its present possibilities. Its being a great railroad center has induced many firms to open up business in it. At this moment a move is under way to build a corn-product manufactory, taking $8,000,000 and seventy-five acres of land for the start, using daily 45,000 bushels of corn. Like other cities, help is scarce in it; the papers are filled with want ads. The water is poor, but the air is clear and wholesome. Compared to eastern cities foodstuff is much cheaper, its being so near the grain, meat, and other kinds of food centers. At present it is a den of thieves, so far as burglaries and hold-ups are concerned; but prospects are that a few more sentences of fifty years in prison, such as two thieves got the other day, will tend to clean up the city. The results of the last election will help. Still, would anyone on the strength of the good things I have written about this stake of Zion be so foolish as to move there immediately without consulting the men whom God has placed in authority to direct in such matters? I hope not. Moving around is a very serious matter, and especially is this so to-day.

On the other hand, some Saints are opposing the idea alone of gathering to Zion. Saints who cry down the principle—and the actual doing, when all things are prepared—are doing Satan's work; God never inspired any man to insinuate, attack, push out the lips of scorn, give vent to that knowing smile, to say nothing of teaching and preaching against the great work of gathering the people together. Well I remember that one of my first sermons was given in defense of Zion. It was a reply to an elder who had "sour" and was trying to "sour" the Saints. It may significantly be said, sub rosa, that at the time he was speaking slightly of the Zionic principle, he was selling worthless stock and cruelly deceiving the Saints.

The man who thought out the catch phrase for a breakfast drink, "There's a reason," sounded the depth of philosophy; for there is a reason for everything, a cause for every effect. Sometimes we do not have to go far to find that cause. Whenever you hear a man crying down a principle of the church economy, you may rest assured that something is the trouble with the objector. We know that God's way is perfect. We have long ago admitted that man's way may be imperfect. For this reason, why waste time in attempting to prove something that is conceded?

The Net Gathers All Manner of Fish

Here in the land of Zion there are good, bad, and indifferent, speaking of church members. Among the outsiders there are those who think much of us, others who dislike us, and a few, only, we trust, who hate us. We do not wish to commit any mistakes of the past; the time is too short; we must be up and doing. Many persons here who have been denied the experience of living with scattered members far off, have little comprehension of the needs—temporal needs—of the majority of the church membership. To some Independence people, this place is simply a pleasant little residence city where they can live in comfort and die in peace. But selfishness exists everywhere, and it is no worse here in that respect than it is elsewhere.

When walking home from the Sanitarium the other evening I noticed little groups of Saints gathered in prayer service. In one place they were under the trees. I saw them praying, and I said, Surely this is an act that God will not overlook; surely the prayers of sincere hearts will do much toward the redemption of Zion. On the other hand, I have heard unjust criticism which caused me to say, Surely this thing will do much to tear down the walls of Zion. We will make real progress only when we observe the law to practice it. It is only folly to find fault and exploit it in the wrong place. To find a fault and report the find to the proper parties will help redeem Zion. I do not believe in looking for faults unless I am called upon to do so; but I believe that we should not overlook faults if they are serious enough to need correction. Then they should be reported to the proper source, and immeasurable harm will be done until we learn this rule and obey it. If my conduct is bringing reproach upon the fair name of the church, how cruel it is to talk about this fault to people behind my back; if you must tell it to people, let the acid test be given before my face. Be decent. Give me a chance to be heard in my own defense. Even Pilate went to Jesus.

A New Assignment to Duty

I can say from personal observation that the bishops of the church in Zion, and the First Presidency, are working hard to perform the tasks imposed on them. I have no favors to win by thus speaking. I would have nothing to lose by speaking the reverse, if I needed to do so. I have no reasons for thinking that these men do not have the interests of the church as heart first, last, and all the time. And I trust that all the Saints who have faith in me will consider that the foregoing statement in behalf of the First Presidency and Presiding Bishopric is the expression of my sincere belief.

It may have been a surprise to some to learn of my assignment as chaplain at the Sanitarium. It will please them to learn that the nature of my work is to take charge of the spiritual interests of this institution. I am systematizing the administration to the sick. The work is growing in importance and many words of approval have come to my ears. In the early morning we hold chapel service. At stated intervals I make visits and perform such spiritual duties as the occasion demands. To one I talk of faith in God; to another I administer the sacred ordinance of the church; with another I pray, etc. In the evening another elder accompanies me. The results have been hopeful. The distance of the vision of this work of divine healing increases every day.

In my work here I have found a great deal of enjoyment and peace. It has its perplexities, but they are nothing compared to certain phases of past work. The great, strong arm of God which was shown me in vision when I entered my work at Providence has remained my continued support, and I have been enabled to praise his name daily because of his infinite kindness and mercy bestowed upon me and my home. And I pray that his favor may rest upon the homes of all Saints.

Without doubt there are very trying times ahead for the Saints, but the experiences will either press us closer to or farther away from God; it depends on how we perform our part. And if there is any one thing that I want to impress on the hearts of those who have faith in my judgment, it is for them to be obedient to the law of God. Heed the admonition which comes to you in the church papers, from those whom the Lord has chosen to lead Israel. Do not go heedlessly on. Have faith. Do not be a law unto yourself. Remember the lessons of the past war. Be wise.

A conference on the fundamentals of the Christian Faith is announced to be held at Ridgeland Bible College, Wimbledon, September 13-17, under the auspices of the Advent Testimony Movement. The preliminary notice says that "in view of the fact of the alarming development of destructive criticism in the pulpits and Theological and Missionary Colleges of our land, we feel the time has come when a definite standard must be raised against this false system of theology. Our object is to give helpful, scholarly lectures and addresses on the Fundamentals of the Christian Faith—the Full Inspiration of Scripture, the Atonement, the Miracles, Resurrection, Deity, and Second Coming of our Lord."—Christian Herald.

The Aaronic Priesthood

BY WILLIAM A. FRANCE

Should they administer the temporal and financial affairs of the church?

"There are, in the church, two priesthoods; namely: the Melchisedec and the Aaronic, including the Levitical priesthood."—Doctrine and Covenants 104:1.

"The second priesthood is called the priesthood of Aaron, because it was conferred upon Aaron and his seed, throughout all their generations. Why it is called the lesser priesthood is, because it is an appendage to the greater, or the Melchisedec priesthood, and has power in administering outward ordinances. The bishopric is the presidency of this priesthood, and holds the keys or authority to the same. No man has a legal right to this office, to hold the keys of this priesthood, except he be a literal descendant of Aaron."—Doctrine and Covenants 104:8.

Also in verse 32 of this same section, in speaking of the presiding high priest over the high priesthood of the church, we are told:

"Wherefore the office of a bishop is not equal unto it, for the office of a bishop is in administering all temporal things: nevertheless, a bishop must be chosen from the high priesthood, unless he is a literal descendant of Aaron: for unless he is a literal descendant of Aaron he cannot hold the keys of this priesthood."

And again in verse 34:

"But a literal descendant of Aaron has a legal right to the presidency of this priesthood, to the keys of this ministry, to act in the office of bishop independently, without counselors, except in a case where a president of the high priesthood, after the order of Melchisedec, is tried; to sit as a judge in Israel."

We learn from verse 40 that the priest's quorum should be presided over by a bishop.

From a careful study of these quotations and many others that might be cited, as far back as the time of Moses, we conclude that the Aaronic priesthood should do the temporal and financial business of the church, and yet they have neither voice nor vote in the conferences of the church; and even our bishops, if they had a legal right to the office, would be included in the Aaronic priesthood, and could not have part in the business of the conferences; while those who do the business of the church are those who are to minister in spiritual things, including the missionary force, who, by General Conference resolution, are not to engage in business affairs of the world, and are not supposed to be business men.

I want to cite one instance: During the conference of 1909, the Bishop called together the members of the Melchisedec priesthood and presented a matter of business to them which was of such importance that a day was appointed for fasting and prayer, and the President of the church was asked to inquire of the Lord for instruction. It was later announced to the conference that a revelation had been received, and the quorums of the high priesthood were given copies of the revelation and instructed to go to their places of meeting to consider and pass on the revelation, while the quorums of the Aaronic priesthood were told that it was not necessary for them to meet to consider the revelation; and yet this revelation was altogether regarding temporal or financial affairs.

It would seem that those who minister in the temporal and financial business of the church should have voice and vote in conference, as well as those who are to minister in spiritual things. If not, why not?

If I am in the dark, will some one please turn on the light?

A little girl wrote her grandmother about having attended a Christian and Devil meeting at the church. (Doubtless a Christian Endeavor.)

What Do You Say: Is It Fair?

BY J. W. PETERSON

Is it fair that the missionary department of the church should be on a different financial basis than every other department of the church, including the industrial and agricultural?

Why should one department be subject to one law and the others to a different one?

For more than a generation the missionary arm has been living according to "needs and just wants." (Doctrine and Covenants 51:1; 70:3; 81:4; 42:9.)

(Why not the reader take his Doctrine and Covenants and examine these and all other references as he reads? It will pay.)

How much better or how much different is the farmer, the laborer, or the man of business than the missionary? Why not they be as subject to the law of God as the other?

Some may say: The business man owns his business; also the farmer owns his farm. Does he? May not the missionary say the same of his talents? What does the Lord say about it? "Behold, all these properties are mine, or else your faith is vain, and ye are found hypocrites, and the covenants which ye have made unto me are broken; and if the properties are mine then are ye stewards."—Doctrine and Covenants 101:10.

Death will reveal the folly of property rights. Even the churches of men are waking to the fact that they are but stewards. How much more should the church of God recognize that fact.

Stewardship with us has a deeper meaning. Everything in God's church is controlled by law. And that of stewardship is no exception.

The law must be administered by authority as surely as baptism, and in just as correct a way. No other mode but that of immersion will fulfill the law. Neither can we control our property other than according to the divine law.

If the ministry are under that divine law, all others who are not under it, are a law unto themselves, and they must look to themselves in the next world for their rewards.

Why the distinction? As one of the former class, I am asking that all others come under the law and not only escape condemnation, but reap the benefits "for themselves and their fellow church members and the whole body of the church." (Doctrine and Covenants 128:2.)

Stewardships

There are two classes of stewards, spiritual and temporal. Both are equally amenable to the law.

In the temporal line there are those who are stewards over their own property or abilities. (Doctrine and Covenants 42:9; 101:11; 42:19.)

Stewards over properties belonging to the church, such as stores, factories, printing plants, mines, ranches, etc.

Stewards as workmen, where their affairs are managed by the Bishop or his agents. (Doctrine and Covenants 81:4.)

Stewardships Should Be Pooled

Pooled stewardships are nothing more than an organized company, teamwork instead of single horse, sometimes called "associations" (Doctrine and Covenants 128) and at other times called "orders." (Doctrine and Covenants 77, 81, 89, 93, 101.) The law seems to indicate that all stewardships should be pooled.

Just as every man should pool his spiritual interest with some branch, so should he pool his financial interest in some organization of divine order. The Order of Enoch is the divine pattern for all financial activities in the church.

Or, better yet, it may include all the financial interests of the church. "Ye shall organize yourselves, and appoint every man his stewardship."—Doctrine and Covenants 101:2. The Lord in this section then proceeds to direct the Order of Enoch.

I incline strongly to the idea that all terms, such as "companies, associations, and orders," are synonymous terms, referring to the one financial system in the church. At least I can see that the bylaws of the Order of Enoch could well be adopted by every financial organization in the church.

The Lord very plainly says that the rules of this order were to control "houses, lands, and cattle." (Doctrine and Covenants 101:12.)

Inheritances

The law seems to indicate that inheritance is our home, and stewardship our business, whether spiritual or temporal business.

Our inheritance may be in connection with our stewardship or not, just as our home may be in connection with our business or not. The two former expressions are but the ancient way of what, in modern words, we mean by home and business.

We cannot pool our homes, but it is greatly to our interest and the interest of the church that we pool our business.

How Will It Work?

The concrete way is to organize a company or companies in every branch—those of like callings, abilities, avocations, or pastoral pursuits each by themselves, with the Bishop as the head, but of course all under the law of the land as well as the law of God. Volunteers might be organized first, and others admitted by application as they learn to subdue their selfish interests. This supersedes socialism very greatly, and is what the world is looking for, and many are fighting for. But they will not find the pure article outside of the church of God. Will we be the head or will we be the tail? Why not do as we have been commanded, and prepare to receive and direct millions of people who are looking for just this thing, so that the weary and heavy laden may, with us, find rest. If we had properly organized financially, as we were commanded to do ten years ago, even now thousands might be coming our way.

Observe Results

If the entire church was working on the divine basis of "needs and just wants," there would soon be no rich and no poor.

There are three incentives to labor, under such divine plan: self, God, and fellow man.

With the Bishop (God's financial manager) as head of every company, and with all on an equal financial basis as the law directs, all would be entitled to the blessing of heaven on their work.

When observing the rules already given and laws of the land as well, there need be no fear of failure. Many of the details must be worked out by the local societies in real business meetings, the law providing that all their business be done with the united consent of the order.

When needs and just wants are provided by vote of the order, and, by the same means, the needs of the association, then the remainder is to be cast into the treasury. This would furnish ample means for all the needs of the church.

Benefits Under the Law of the Land

Every farm organization could buy at wholesale and sell to better advantage—collective bargaining in fact.

The commercial men in the church also being duly organized could buy from the farm organizations of the church and save money both ways to the church by cutting out the middle man. Factories could do the same thing. In fact, every organization in the church laboring for the benefit of the others would immediately stop the flow of money from going out of the church and turn the tide the other way.

It can be done right now to a very large extent, but of course to a fuller extent in a gathered condition.

Every farming community of Saints can, right now, be organized into a "pastoral association" on the basis of needs and just wants and do collective bargaining in the true sense. This trade could be done first with other organizations of the church and next with those outside.

With superior goods, fair profits, and honest dealing, we could be a benefit to all our neighbors, who would be glad to deal with us.

First of all we should have the farm organizations, as they are the foundation of all business and the foundation of the financial interests of the church. In a very short time other business can be arranged for as needed and funds warrant. But it would be a mistake to commence with business first. So far as needs and just wants are concerned, that could be applied at once all through the church.

It will not be difficult to accomplish, nor require much time to get started. The plan is as simple as any other part of the gospel. Why do we wait?

Is It Right?

Is it right that any man in the church should be under any other financial basis than the ministry? How do the others feel about it? No really consecrated and true Saint will desire otherwise.

The President says: Establish stewardships at once. What will our pastoral and industrial men answer?

A Million Dollars Tithing

The call for a million dollars tithing is small compared with the money going out of our hands into the hands of nonmembers. Why not stop that at once?

Supposing

Suppose we made our own clothing and bought from our own members our raw material, making it up in our own factories.

Suppose we made our own shoes in our own factory by our men, buying the raw material from our own people.

Suppose we had our own packing plant, buying our own stock and supplying our own members.

Suppose we had our own mills, making our own flour, supplying our own members.

Suppose we had our own canning factories, buying the products of our own farms and orchards.

Suppose we made our own farm machinery and supplied our own demands.

Suppose we made our own household furniture and utensils.

Our workmen are making all these things for others, why not for us?

We could also eliminate much freight and express charges by having a well-organized truck system within two hundred miles of the center place. Hauls could be made both ways.

Our wireless station is yet in its infant state, but one can see great possibilities of it in our future trade.

But all must be doing just as the missionaries are doing—laboring for Zion for needs and just wants.

A Lot of Money

Some may say: All this will require a lot of money. But we have a lot of money. If we can stop it going to enrich others, we will have sufficient for all purposes and still have the money left. Why not do it? One year with the farmers leading, and we are on our feet and ready for business of any kind. They can do it where they are, but much better

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

The Temple Builders

[Numerous inquiries regarding the Temple Builders' organization indicate that much interest is being aroused in this new work for the older girls of our church. The following paper, prepared for reunion purposes by Sister Marjorie Gunsolley Anway, explains the aims and ideals of the organization quite clearly. Sister Anway was chosen by the supervisor of our young women's bureau, Sister Zilpha Monroe, to have charge of the Temple Builders' branch of the work. Their manual, prepared and edited by Alice Mae Burgess, former supervisor, will soon be ready for distribution. Announcements will be made later in these columns.—A. A.]

Ideals:

Self-discovery.
Self-development.
Service.

Motto: "Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul!"

Symbol: The Nautilus. (See Holmes's "Chambered Nautilus.") (Also see the design on The Parthenon heading in the Autumn Leaves.)

Membership: Any girl fifteen years or older.

Organization: Every chapter (name of local organization) shall have at least two officers: leader and recorder. The leader is the executive and should be of mature judgment, able to command the respect of the girls, yet a girl with them in spirit at least. The recorder is a secretary and treasurer. Other officers may be elected by the local chapter as the need arises.

Two things are required by the general organization. First: As soon as organized send the following three items to the Supervisor of the Young Women's Bureau, Box 255, Independence, Missouri.

1. Name and address of the leader.
2. Name and address of the recorder.
3. Number of members in the chapter, with 10 cents per capita dues for the Women's Department, and keep the supervisor informed from time to time of any changes in these items.

Work: Only three things are required of every chapter in the way of work:

1. That once each month the girls have some social affair together as a chapter party, chat, or informal fun of some if all were gathered together as the law directs. These, and not the dependents, should gather first. The Jews are doing that way in Palestine. Will we not take a lesson from our brethren across the Jordan, most of us being Ephraimites?

Hard times and financial distress could not much affect us as we would still have our money among ourselves. There would be no need to strike, for one would be striking on his own proposition.

Let us take this simple, easy way, and not the strained, complex way one sees so often advanced. I know of no difficulty that cannot be met in this simple way, and I have traveled some. Nor have my eyes been closed to the business of the world.

Look at It

Look at it all summed up. Every man a steward. All stewards doing teamwork. All receiving their needs and just wants. All the money earned being kept in the church and all happy at work.

Does it look good to you? Then why do we wait? War clouds are gathering. Business in the world is uncertain. Strikes are frequent. Men are getting desperate. Why do we linger?

kind. (Write to Mrs. Bertha Hulmes, 4240 South Benton Street, Kansas City, Missouri, for suggestions for your parties.)

2. That each month the girls as a chapter have some outdoor stunt: hikes, picnics, sports, serenades, etc. These hikes may be combined with the social affairs.

3. That each month the chapter do some bit of service for the church, community, or Nation. Some chapters do Red Cross work; some sew for the Children's Home or Sanitarium; some undertake as a chapter some special work for the Sunday school or Religio; i. e., help in some special way to raise a Christmas offering fund, or give a program for the latter. Some use one month to boost especially for the choir, or for the preaching services, etc. Some of the chapters pledge themselves individually one month to hunt out some poor or disconsolate person in the church, or in their business or school world, and give her a helping hand. In the city the field is limitless, if the chapter wishes to help the less fortunate than they. It is well to have a variety of service—not to do the same thing, and that alone each month.

This service work might be done in connection with the local relief and service societies of older women. They could assign or suggest agreeable work for the girls. Also the local deacon or bishop might be glad to take the girls into his confidence and let them help with succoring the poor of the church.

Except for these three general requirements, each chapter is left free to outline its own program and follow its special interests. The department is ready to suggest, however, various lines of definite work important for our girls, which we will help you to take up. These are as follows:

Personal Hygiene. Talks and discussions on the care of the hair, teeth, nails, complexion, use of powder, bathing, proper dressing, good taste in dressing (colors, etc.), proper corseting, bearing or poise, exercise, diet, etc. Try a shampoo party; meet at a furnace-heated house, each bringing comb and brush, soap and towel, and ask somebody to lead the discussion who knows the proper care of the hair. Discuss, as you shampoo, the various points: how to shampoo, how often, the kinds of soap, use of the brush, etc. Another meeting could be devoted to coiffures; another to demonstrating the complete and proper method of manicuring; some evening each girl could bring her box of face powder, and the use of cosmetics could be discussed. All of this hygiene work should be made practical and should be demonstrated whenever possible. It is very important that if we are to build properly—morally, mentally, and spiritually—we have a decent respect and care for the physical temples which have to express our spiritual selves. It is the duty of each girl to be as beautiful as possible, that beauty which means wholesomeness of personality, and is based upon health. (For further information write to the supervisor of the young women's bureau, and read the articles in The Parthenon, our department in the Autumn Leaves.)

Vocational Study. Some series of talks or discussions are suggested in the vocational work open to young women, to help the girls to decide intelligently what line of work or profession they wish to prepare for. Every girl, it is recognized to-day, should be capable of supporting herself well with some kind of congenial work whenever the necessity arises. Secure locally a successful business woman from each profession or vocation who can give the girls facts concerning her line of work—hours, wages, preparation required, agreeable and disagreeable features, chance for advancement, development, and the meaning of the calling to the welfare of the community or the world. Begin with shop and factory girl and domestic service; then work up to teachers, doctors, professional nurses, lawyers, police women, etc. Visit the places where these professions are worked out if you can. This course should be taken only if the girls are interested in it. (For further information address Miss Alice M. Smith, 1816 Argyle Avenue, Hollywood, California, and read her articles in The Parthenon. The first of the series appeared in the December number on "The teacher.") poems, novels, or essays, when they come together, or make a special point of telling each other of some good things they have read during the week or the interval between the meetings, and discussing it, or they may take up special study in literature—regular courses. The new Temple Builder Manual contains a very suggestive outline for a study of this course, by Mrs. Olive Thomas Mortimore. For further information write Mrs. Olive Thomas Mortimore, 318 East Broadway, Cushing, Oklahoma.

Homemakers' Course. The New Temple Builder Manual, which will soon be ready to place in your hands, contains some excellent work along the line of home-building courses such as household decoration, sewing, and cooking. These courses are very completely and interestingly outlined and we are sure the girls will be interested in taking up any one or all of them as they are able to do.

General Conference, by vote this year, asked the Women's Department to select some course in mothercraft to be taught to the girls of the church until the time when the public schools should include such instruction in their curricula. The general executive has therefore selected Mary L. Read's The Mothercraft Manual as text, and they earnestly desire that every monitor and leader of Orioles and of Temple Builders see to it that the girls under their care shall include the study of this excellent and interesting book in their educational plans for the coming season. It is a book of nineteen chapters touching upon many phases of a woman's responsibility. The girls and young women of our church should be better prepared for intelligent motherhood than are many of the heedless and shallow-minded girls of the world. We feel sure they will gladly avail themselves of this opportunity to inform themselves upon this most tender and beautiful relationship—that of mother and child. The Mothercraft Manual may be obtained through the Herald Publishing House, present price $2.

The Parthenon was formerly called The Young Women's Department. It is the official organ of the bureau. There you will find suggestions and announcements in regard to the development of the organization. Also reports are printed there from the various chapters. Each chapter and each Oriole circle is requested to write to The Parthenon at least once a year, giving brief history of their activities, plans, etc. This is printed under the heading: "From Every Girl."

Bring Up a Child in the Way He Should Go

In these times, and especially in our own country, we hear more and more criticism concerning the lack of reverence in children, and disobedience and disrespect in the home. More and more are there complaints of the instability of the modern home. These criticisms come because, in a way, these things are true, and the evil seems to be spreading. Naturally this leads to the question, Why? Is it because of the training a child gets in the home, or because of the picture shows and other evils of modern times?

I have been thinking of this a great deal, and I believe that while evil results do come from things outside the home, yet the greatest harm is done in the home. A child's training should start, not at the age of two, three, or on up, but from the moment he is born. And who can say that it should not start before, even? Modern educators say that the greatest period of plasticity in a child, the time he is most susceptible to training, is in his first few years. A great man who has spent his life in studying children has said, "Show me the training a child gets in his first two years, and I'll tell you what kind of a man he'll be."

Have you ever known parents who had unruly little ones in their homes (little tots of two or three years) who say, "I can't do a thing with him"? I've known only too many! Now these babies are too young to get their unruliness from the outside, and so I say they get it from bad training in the home.

It is very easy to teach children habits of obedience and neatness. In every community there must be laws, and a family is a unit of society. And so—in every family there must of necessity be laws. Children can be taught from the time they are born to obey and respect these laws. The old pedagogical idea of writing all the laws and rules and tacking them on the wall, or reading them the first day of school, is, of course, erroneous, and laws in the home cannot be worked by continual don'ts and dos. But a child can easily be taught to obey, to be reverent to age and things to be revered, to be neat and orderly. I know that they can, because we teach those things in school, and the children soon learn those things are expected and they do them as a matter of course.

I know children who are unruly and disobedient in the home and yet are perfect in conduct in school. I was in the home of one of my pupils in the training school, and to my astonishment he was disobedient and saucy to his mother. He was always one of my best pupils, so I wondered greatly. His mother told me that neither she nor his father could make him obey. The next day I asked him why he was so naughty at home and so good at school. I wish his mother could have seen his astonishment and wonder as he connected the two in his mind, and then said, "Why, you're 'sposed to be good at school!" You see? His school and his home training were things apart, where they should be together. He obeyed the silent rules of the school and disciplined himself, because I expected it of him. That, to my notion, is the cause of so much trouble—enough is not expected of our children.

When a child is little, it is thought funny to watch him have "tantrums" or fits of temper; a good joke to see him throw food while at the table, and to disobey. But when he gets a little older, the humor ceases and trouble begins. A child can never be free, can never learn reverence and self-control, unless he learns to obey laws. There can never be freedom without laws, because freedom would soon develop into license. A child or an adult is free only in so far as he does not interfere with the rights of others. Therefore it is criminal for you to let your child become a spoiled despot. It is bad for you and a tragedy for him. In school we try to teach children these things, to obey the laws of the schoolroom and playground, and to consider the rights of their fellows, thus preparing them for citizenship. But too often, alas, this training ends at the close of the school day.

Another thing I'd like mothers to think about is the gulf that lies between the home and the school. These two institutions should be very close, because they are both working for the same end. And yet, there are mothers who never even think of visiting a school or taking an interest in their children's teacher. A teacher has more influence upon a child than anyone except the mother. Sometimes the teachers don't make the effort to meet the mothers, yet I do believe we are not so much to blame as the parents. In one town, where there are thirty-three teachers, we tried to start a parent-teachers association, and for several meetings we had an attendance of thirty-three teachers, the superintendent and his wife, and four or five mothers. We finally had to drop it. One of the jokes around the teachers' dormitories is the parents visiting the school and us—because they so rarely do it.

Sometimes I believe we worry more about your children and their welfare than you do. That doesn't sound good to you, does it? But when I find my pupils suffering from the lack of sleep and proper food, from drinking coffee and other harmful things, suffering from physical defects that could be remedied, it hurts me so much—I know it doesn't hurt the mother so much or she wouldn't permit it to happen.

Let's get together! Visit your child at school often. Learn to know his teacher. Be sure she's the right kind to mold his future life, and work with her for his benefit. When a teacher comes to you with a problem concerning your child, I plead with you, help her to correct it. I have gone to mothers with things that almost worried me sick—over her child—only to feel a barrier between us, even unspoken antagonism. Just because the teacher has no children of her own, give her the benefit of the doubt, and trust her to know a little of what is good for a child. A teacher cannot spend her time with little ones without learning their natures perhaps as well as a mother. For your own child, I make this plea for cooperation.

I've been asked if I thought the picture shows caused this growing spirit of disobedience and irreverence. I've already told you what I considered the chief cause. But I've found that in older boys and girls the picture shows do increase this spirit and make it more pronounced. I've decided that pictures are harmful in three ways. First and greatest: it is proving to be the undoing of family life. Nowadays families, from the babies up to grandfather, go to the movies night after night. I've noticed that children who have this habit are restless and dissatisfied when an evening is spent at home. They don't seem to be able to entertain themselves. Too often is the home, that most sacred of institutions, becoming only a place to keep your clothing, get your food, and to go to sleep when there's no place else to go. America is going to lose out because of this. There are too many full picture shows and too few homes.

The next evil which can be laid at the door of the moving picture is the implanting of wrong ideals in children's minds. A regular entertainment consists of an educational reel, which is very good. Then perhaps the next thing will be a play built on some sex problem—things that a child has no business to see or think about. One time I heard my little brothers calmly and innocently discussing a problem that caused my hair to stand on end at hearing it. When I asked them where they had heard about it, they replied that it was the plot of the show the night before! Then next, perhaps, will be a comedy, where vulgarity will be the keynote of humor. While the Charlie Chaplin craze was spreading over this place, I had to discontinue dramatization in my room because unconsciously the children began that clownishness, and it spread like wildfire.

And then, last of all the harm done, is the physical harm. Children who go night after night to the movies come to school the next day sleepy and dull. Every child should have a regular bedtime hour and a regular amount of sleep. And eyestrain, oh! When I happen to go to a show and see the front rows full of children I feel like screaming. Have you ever sat on the front row? If your adult eyes cannot stand the strain—why, oh, why do you permit your little ones with their undeveloped eyes to sit there? If parents were about their business, there would be laws making it a penal offense to let children sit up in front—I say even capital punishment isn't strong enough.

I sincerely hope this will help some one who needs it to awaken to the fact that they have had a wonderful plant given into their keeping, and it is largely due to them as to how it blossoms and what fruit it bears.

The Guest

There never was a guest more craved
By those who waited long;
And when they knew the joy to be
Their hearts burst into song—
A song of hope, a song of love,
A song of bliss and pride;
And as the days and weeks passed by,
They thought of naught beside.

They decked a chamber fair and white,
A bed of lawn and lace;
And everything that was prepared
Was set with dainty grace.
And when there came a rose-pink dawn,
One morning in the spring,
An angel floated down the wind,
The little guest to bring!

Farm Household Accounts

Farm household accounts are an important aid to economy in operating the household. "A dollar saved is a dollar made," and by keeping a careful record of expenses it may be determined where unnecessary expenses are incurred.

The farm household receives its major support from farm products consumed at home, but it purchases far more extensively than ever before from outside sources, and the keeping of farm household accounts has become very essential to economy.

Farm household accounts are valuable as supplements to the records of the farm business in general. Household expenses on the farm are very intimately associated with the business of the farm itself. The farm supplies much material which would otherwise become a household expense. The household, in turn, often furnishes board for farm labor and in other ways saves the farm expense. Keeping track of household expenses as related to the farm business makes household accounts desirable.

There are two methods of keeping accounts: One is to write down in one column everything that is bought with the cost beside it, without classifying the expenditures. The other is to classify when the record is made, which is just as easy when understood, and is much more satisfactory.

Household Budget

It is not so easy to make a budget for a family that lives in the country as for one that lives on a salary. However, the making of a budget for the farmer's family will be advantageous, even though the amount of money to be spent can only be estimated. It is only by making a spending plan that the income may be made to meet the needs of the family in the most satisfactory way, and still have enough left to provide for old age, for the home equipped with modern conveniences, for higher education and music lessons for the children, for unexpected emergencies, etc.

The household budget should be planned by all the members of the family, so that all will understand why certain economies are necessary. In each family, there should be "The man's personal account," "The woman's personal account," and "The family account." The older children should be so well trained in the art of spending that they may have their allowances placed in the bank in their own name.

Helping to keep the farm budget is a moral and intellectual training for the older children. In keeping a budget every item should be recorded. This is important.

What remains after the family budgets have been arranged should be used only by the consent of both father and mother. The woman should have as much to say as the man about their earnings. The basic principle of a true partnership should be established, thus preserving self-respect and happiness.

The towns of Cape Cod are holding a number of local celebrations the latter part of August in celebration of the third centenary of the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers. In fact, the Pilgrims probably did not land on Cape Cod until November 9, 1620, but August is a more favorable time for its celebration. Celebrations are held in Provincetown, where they first landed, and also at Truro, where it is claimed they found their first fresh water on this continent, and also a supply of Indian corn. It is expected in the celebration at Provincetown that United States war ships will lend a hand, and that there will also be ships of England, France, Spain, and Holland. At the same time celebrations are being held in England, since 300 years ago at this time the Pilgrims had not yet set out from Plymouth, England. It represented the opening of a new era, and so is being celebrated at many points, not least of which will be at Plymouth, Massachusetts, where they finally landed and made their winter home.

LETTERS

Investments

BY THE LAMONI STAKE BISHOPRIC

A circular letter approved by the Presiding Bishopric, sent to the Saints of the Lamoni Stake.

Some time ago the Presiding Bishopric sent broadcast their advice to the Saints on "Investments."

Herewith we are sending you a copy of this very excellent article with a few additions. We ask that you give this advice a very candid consideration. It may not only save you some of your hard-earned earnings, but what is of more importance, your faith in your brethren.

Our advice is frequently sought as to the wisdom of making investments in various enterprises. We would not feel warranted in trying to hinder the work of any person or company of men in any legitimate undertaking, and yet we do feel a certain amount of responsibility in aiding the Saints in making prudent investments. We, therefore, lay down certain general principles which will apply to all cases:

1. Every proposition looks good in the prospectus of the promoter.

2. Do not be persuaded to make investments on the promise of big returns; the larger the promised dividends, the greater the risk, usually.

3. If your resources are limited and you have no money to lose, better be satisfied with small returns on good security.

4. Don't be induced to buy stock on the argument that it is going up. It may "go up" to your sorrow.

5. As a people we are warned against the spirit of speculation. Don't think that you can cajole the Lord to break his word with the promise that you will observe the law of temporalities if you make a success in dabbling in some speculation. When the Lord speaks against any activities he cannot bless anyone engaging therein.

6. Management is one of the most important factors in any business, if not the most important. You should therefore thoroughly satisfy yourself as to the ability of those at the head of the business to make a success of it. Get their past history; if everything they have had to do with has come to naught, ten chances to one this one will also.

7. Many worth-while businesses fail because they are undercapitalized. In case this should happen, are you in a position to invest sufficient to protect your first investment? If not, exercise caution.

8. Because the promoter may be a member of the church should not influence you in placing the investment. He may be of excellent character, but his ability as a manager is quite a different thing; uprightness does not insure an infallible judgment.

9. Men of the ministry who dabble in stock jobbing are violating General Conference resolution number 594½: "That we disapprove of our ministry giving their attention to speculative mining or other ventures or their promotion; and that we advise all persons who may decide to invest in any enterprises of this kind to do so only after such investigation as shall be fully satisfactory to themselves as to the safety of their venture, the same as in other business enterprises, and not upon their confidence in the ministerial position of those who are seeking to interest them therein." The energies of the ministry should be directed toward the building up of the kingdom.

10. As a general rule those who have made a success in life and accumulated wealth will do well to continue to re-invest in the same business in which they have already made their money.

11. It is said, "Every proposition has a string." Be sure you find the string.

12. Never invest until you know the inside history of the company. What amount of capital stock has been authorized? What amount has been sold for cash? What part of the cash actually went into the business and what part went to the promoter? How much stock has been issued for patents or other assets, the value of which has not yet been established? Does the promoter or seller of stock have the legal right to sell the same? Some States require that a seller of stocks must be licensed so to do. Is the seller selling his personal shares and putting the money received into his own pocket instead of putting it into the business?

13. Beware of those who would try to get you to invest by or through what they call the manifestations of the Spirit. The Lord warns us as follows: "Branches and districts are to be conducted according to the rules given in the law as directed in a former revelation. They shall take the things which have been given unto them as my law to the church to be my law to govern my church. And these affairs are not to be conducted by manifestations of the Spirit unless these directions and manifestations come through the regularly authorized officers of branch or district."—Doctrine and Covenants 125: 14.

If this is good advice for the carrying on of the business of the church, surely it is also good advice for carrying on any business. The Lord can and may instruct us regarding our business ventures, but let us be sure that it is the Lord speaking.

The warning of the Savior: "Beware of men . . ." might be fittingly considered here. It takes courage to say no. "Be strong and of a good courage."

Far West Stake Reunion

Doubtless the people of the church entire are interested in developments in the various stakes of Zion. The fourth reunion of the Far West Stake, counting from its organization in 1917, was held on its leased grounds just north of Stewartsville, Missouri, August 20-29. The tract consists of twenty acres, an elevated spot, gently sloping, well wooded, surrounded by an additional forty acres not fenced from the place of gathering. The committee of workers consisting of stalwart men from various branches in the vicinity of Stewartsville and Cameron had performed much hard labor in clearing the grounds and making them ready for the assembly. Without the devoted work of these men and the accompanying steady determination to make the reunion a success, this meeting would not have been possible. Their very necessary help is to be remembered while we think of the preachers and department workers. Like the farmer who produces the crops, and the miner who mines the coal, that which is built upon their labor could not be realized without so substantial a foundation of productive effort. We commend these rugged men; the tribute is due them.

In 1917, when the grounds were first leased, the committee erected a commodious dining hall, about forty feet square, and sunk a well which proved to contain some of the best water in that region of country. In 1919 an electric lighting outfit, consisting of engine, dynamo, and wiring apparatus, was installed. In 1920 the large tabernacle tent was purchased, a modern toilet with septic tank installed, with other improvements. Were the grounds owned by our people, permanent buildings including a tabernacle would be duly erected.

The Saints of Far West take great pleasure in gathering at the reunion. Sixteen counties are included in the stake with nineteen branches and a number of missions. The people look forward to and make of the reunion a season of vacation and general outing, so the gathering is a large one. Men, women, and children all seem to participate in a spirit of happy social fellowship and spiritual uplift. The preaching was done by men appointed to labor in the stake, assisted by local workers and by Brethren Elbert A. Smith, of the First Presidency; James F. Keir, of the Presiding Bishopric; Frederick A. Smith, Presiding Patriarch; Orman Salisbury, president of the Pottawattamie District; and Heman Hale Smith, of the historical department. The comments of the people were to the effect that the preaching was unusually good, the ministry reaching a higher level in their presentations.

The prayer services were especially good. The manifestation of the spirit of prophecy was in evidence to the effect that the Saints should love God and love one another, and work for the general development of the cause under the direction of general and local authorities appointed to take charge according to calling. In the expressions of the people in the testimony meetings, there was a very increased percentage of the manifestation of development in spiritual understanding, in moral perception, and in self-control. The gifts of the Spirit are given for the purpose of producing the fruits of the Spirit, and it is very gratifying to note that in the statements of the people who gathered at this reunion there was evidence of substantial growth in the power to comprehend, to appreciate foundation principles, and to present evidence of an increasing conception of the truth. All this evidences their growing power to perceive and to act in intelligent compliance with the revelations of God given for the spiritual, moral, and general culture of his people. More and much more of this is needed, and through God it is intended that, as in the Nation, an intelligent democracy expressing a strong, clear-cut, public sentiment is essential to the preservation and development of the state, so in the kingdom of God, the spiritual life of Jesus Christ is to be expressed in comprehensive understanding, in clearly defined, intelligent participation in church activities. Such development of the people will result in a Zion that will arise and shine through the mental, moral, social, and economic activities of a people strong in love of the truth, strong in their ability to appreciate one another and to give glory to God in the expression of gifts and callings brought up to a high degree of efficiency by study, by thought, by prayer, by adjustment to the will of God in all things pertaining to life and godliness.

The conduct of the people in general, including the young people, was beyond reproach; indeed, it was very commendable. There was nothing unseemly, nothing regrettable, nothing requiring rebuke. Outsiders and our own people manifested a spirit of propriety, and on Thursday afternoon while many nonmembers were present at the exercises held in celebration of a long-established program for Children's Day, the ensemble seemed almost perfect. A short gospel sermon for the benefit of the nonmembers was followed by a well-rendered program by the children. All present partook of the spirit of joyous sociability, and with the large gathering self-disciplined and happy in spirit, everybody enjoyed the day very greatly.

The reunion entire was very gratifying in results. Brother H. O. Smith, patriarch appointed to this field, who has attended many reunions of the church in various parts of the country, said it was the best reunion he had ever attended. In any event, we are greatly pleased with the growth that is seen in the people of the stake. The writer was impressed that the people are ready for active participation in the advance work now lying before us in the development of higher spiritual efficiency, more satisfactory social activity, and greater mental development, all to be accompanied by an economic adjustment in agricultural, industrial, and general life now lying before the church. The basis has been laid in love for God and man, and the spirit of brotherhood in the gospel of our Lord insures steady, substantial growth along this line at a very early date. The people are expecting this and it is the will of God that it should be realized, as we understand. We are sure we state the general expectations of our people in so remarking.

Besides the main tent, one tent was used for children in kindergarten and related work in charge of Sister Edith Koehler. The junior tent was devoted to young people's prayer meetings, a series of lectures on the rise of the Reorganized Church, and institute work in charge of heads of departments: F. L. Hinderks, Sunday school; S. H. Simmons, Religio; Sister Anna Salyards, Women's Department. Sister D. E. Scott, stake chorister, was assisted by a corps of people of musical training, including the Stewartville orchestra, all of whom rendered acceptable service.

The committee on recreation had provided for swings, croquet, two ball games, other athletic features, and two camp fires, and various watermelon feasts were interspersed to the joy of all the young people. A committee on recreation has been appointed for the coming year and it is the intention to develop social study and recreational features combined in the various groups and branches throughout the stake, having in view the happifying of our young people, securing their increased interest, and by well-regulated programs calling out their active participation and increased efficiency.

The general movement now under way in the various departments of the church will be developed in the Far West Stake just as rapidly as local workers are prepared to take up and develop leadership among these various groups. There is a field for the exercise of the gifts and talents of every member; no one need lack an opportunity for action nor a career of usefulness.

The appointment of Bishop J. A. Koehler to the stake was timely and his service was highly appreciated in the preaching and general financial administration. The brethren of the Far West Stake mean business and are ready to move out under such policies of administration as are to be set into motion under the direction of the administrative officers of the church. We look for safe, sane procedure and sure results.

We must not omit representation of the Health Department. Sister Mary Wise Hoke, R. N., addressed the general assembly and also a gathering in the junior tent.

Altogether the reunion was educational, spiritually uplifting, and a general success. Other men have labored and the people of the Far West Stake have entered into their labors. The hard work of the pioneers of the days of the martyrs, many of whom lie in unnamed graves in the vicinity of Far West and Haun's Mill, and whose devotion is remembered and appreciated and has honorable mention, has been followed by others who we believe will work together to the consummation designed of the Lord.

It was gratifying to see Saints from California, Dakota, and many other places, all of whom rejoiced with the people here in the evidence that Zion is arising and shining out to God's glory and to the establishment of the pure in heart never more to be scattered abroad.

Onset, Kirtland, and Indian Reunions

Onset Reunion

The Onset reunion proved to be one of the largest and best ever held in that place. There were thirteen States represented which is an evidence of the interest taken by the Saints in those respective States. It was a continuous feast of good things, and those in attendance will not soon forget the good time they enjoyed in their two weeks' sojourn together.

The preaching was of a high order and the social meetings were the most spiritual that were ever had. There was not one meeting but what was graced by the power of God, and all were greatly enjoyed by the old and young. They were favored with splendid weather throughout. Many changes for the better have taken place on the Onset ground. They have fifty acres of their own, beautifully situated, and the ground is covered with pine trees and a few other kinds. They also have the salt water bordering the ground where one may go in bathing every day with the exception of Sunday. The young people behaved themselves nobly in observing the rules of the camp, and for such good conduct they should be congratulated.

The only thing that happened to bring sorrow to the camp was the sudden demise of Brother M. H. Bond, and one other incident that took place the last evening of the reunion that caused some of the Saints that remained till that time to feel somewhat sad and discouraged. I have no doubt but what all that attended will be anxious to return next year. And others who hear of the good report will make an effort to be present also.

The ground they have fitted out for games is up to date, and the young people surely enjoyed themselves playing ball and other games and they also amused themselves with the new raft out on the water. Onset is a good place for the New England Saints to gather to have their spiritual strength renewed annually, and to form new acquaintances. There is nothing like association to build up the Saints in this great warfare. One other grand feature of the reunion was the brotherly love that was expressed throughout the whole meeting, and that is no doubt the reason the Lord blessed them so greatly by his power.

The New England people are a good people to mingle with, as they know how to entertain each other and also the stranger that comes among them. If you wish to obtain self-evidence of this statement, meet with them next year and the pleasure will be yours. God bless the New England people.

Kirtland Reunion

The Kirtland reunion which I next attended surpassed all former such meetings in point of numbers, financially, and especially spiritually. Certainly the Kirtland reunion is becoming one of the most popular and successful in all the church. There were people present from twenty States and many from Canada. Those who had the pleasure of attending the social services in the historic Temple will ever remember them. There was a wonderful display of God's holy power in all the services, and especially in the social meetings in which the gifts were displayed in a marked degree.

The last Sunday's Saints' meeting lasted four hours, from eight to twelve, which proved to be a Pentecostal experience. One vision, the gift of tongues, and seventeen prophecies were given in said meeting; also eighty-three testimonies besides the prayers that were offered; and many spiritual songs were sung which helped to make it a grand success. I doubt whether Pentecost day surpassed it. The lower auditorium was packed with people, and between two and three hundred who could not obtain entrance were sent up to the apostles' room to be cared for. This will give an idea of the number of people who were present. It must be borne in mind that there are only about one hundred and fifty resident Saints in Kirtland, hence the rest came from elsewhere.

The priesthood, about one hundred and fifty in number, met a number of times in the apostles' room; the Holy Spirit met with us and we surely had a foretaste of the endowment promised. All went home rejoicing, decreeing that they would be back next year. It was an arduous task for the committee to provide for so many of the Saints and friends, but they did it and that to the satisfaction of all.

"O Kirtland, thou art a holy spot with thy sacred Temple, and it is no wonder the Saints love to gather to thee to receive of those rich blessings annually."

Indian Reunion

The Red Rock, Oklahoma, Indian reunion is now history, and will be remembered as one of the greatest events that have taken place in the history of the Reorganization. It was a great success in all respects, and far beyond our expectations. There were Saints here from nine States, and large numbers of Indians from several tribes, the bulk of which were Otoes on whose grounds the reunion was held.

They became intensely interested in the meetings, and some of the leading ones among them heartily cooperated with us in making the meeting a great success. Very many of them took part in the prayer and testimony meetings, which made us all rejoice as they testified with tears streaming down their faces to the goodness of God in sending them the gospel message. I wish the Saints throughout all the world could have witnessed the scenes we have beheld. They would no longer doubt that God is moving upon their hearts.

God's divine Spirit has been with us in a wonderful manner from the first meeting till the last benediction was pronounced.

On yesterday we baptized sixteen Indians, all adults but two. The first to go into the water was the head chief of the Otoe Tribe, Blue Hair, English name Hoke Dent. Other prominent members of the tribe were baptized also. As we led this aged Indian who is nearing the ninetieth milepost into the water, we felt that the act was accepted with God.

This aged brother is said to be one of the finest Indians in Oklahoma. He has such a beautiful countenance, he looks like an Israelite patriarch. He heard the gospel when he was a very young man, in the territory of Kansas in the last days of Joseph the Martyr. Therefore the efforts put forth by Joseph Smith back in those days were not in vain.

This brother would not identify himself with any church from that day till this, and the Indians said he would never shed blood at any time. I also had the pleasure of baptizing his aged wife and a son who will succeed him as chief.

President Smith will be pleased to learn that I also baptized John Koshiway and Charles Moore, two of the most prominent Indians in the tribe, and to whom the rest of the tribe look for much advice. These two brethren will soon be instruments in the hands of the Lord in taking the initiative of the work of the church in their tribe. Both speak good English and are able to handle themselves in any company.

Seventeen Indians have been baptized at this time and twelve white people—twenty-nine in all at this reunion, and many more of the Indians are preparing themselves. We anticipate organizing a branch here before we leave, there being about fifty Indian members here.

We have certainly had some wonderful experiences at this reunion, and it has removed mountains of prejudice. Invitations are coming from every direction to hold meetings, both among the Indian and white people. We are planning to erect a small church building at this place soon for the benefit of the Indian branch.

Last Friday was Indian day, and was the red-letter day so far as the Indians were concerned. They dressed in their native costumes and demonstrated to the white people what they could do in their Indian way. Their entertainment was very pleasing and also instructive to those who witnessed it. One of the old chiefs made an address of welcome in behalf of the Otoe Tribe, stating that they were greatly pleased that we had come to bring them the gospel of Jesus and to have our reunion with them. Also that they wished us God-speed in instructing the Indian in the way of the Lord. They formed a ring, and the five chiefs sat around a large bass drum and beat it while the old women of the tribe danced around it. At the close of this scene the head chief presented the writer with a pipe of peace which was highly decorated, as a token of their everlasting good will and friendship to the church. I was therefore made honorary chief in the tribe.

Later in the day, the younger men, to show what wonderful ability they have in the dancing line, gave us a great exhibition in skill and clean sport. There were six or seven of them each dressed in Indian costume which was very highly decorated with beads, silver ornaments, mirrors, and other things to make the suit attractive. Their dance is clean and healthy, and they dance by themselves and the women by themselves. The main object of the dance is physical exercise, and is innocent in its nature. The women's dancing is only walking around, swaying very little to the music and drawing the right foot after them, making it very nearly a walk in a side manner. And all the dancing is done to the music of the drum and singing of the drummers.

That night they had a peyote meeting in their tepee, but only a few of the Indians attended, as did a few of the white people. Through the day we had church services at which the Indians attended.

On yesterday we baptized and confirmed twenty-three, and blessed about twenty-five babies. So you see that the good work is onward. Since starting this letter, we have organized a branch here of the Indians with a full corps of officers. Sister David Pettit, an Indian sister, has donated an acre of land to build a church upon. This makes two branches of the Indians, the Otoes and Cheyennes respectively.

Next week Brethren Case, Syckle, and I are going to visit the Indians in the neighborhood of Calumet, where we have a number of members both of the Arapahoes and Cheyennes. Some of the Arapahoes are ready to be baptized, and many more of them have broken off from the Baptist Church. The possibility is that we will be able to get most of them into our church.

We are now beginning operations among the Pawnees, Iowas, Sioux, Fox, and Poncas, all of whom are in close proximity. Brother Case is operating among the Osages and Creeks with good prospects ahead. E. E. Long is working among the Sioux, Omahas, and Winnebagoes. W. E. Shakespeare is working with the Nez Perce and other tribes in Minnesota. James E. Yates is with the Navahoes in Arizona.

Let all the Saints pray for the success of the Indian brethren.

Yours in Christ,

GOMER T. GRIFFITHS.

RED ROCK, OKLAHOMA, September 6.

Dow City (Iowa) Reunion

The Little Sioux and Gallands Grove Districts met in joint reunion in the beautiful park, August 20 to 29. Although heavy rains prevented many from attending for the opening day, the first Sunday witnessed the large assembly tent well filled. The opening address of the reunion was by Elder C. E. Butterworth. Apostle U. W. Greene and Patriarch J. W. Wight were present during the first half of the reunion, and Elders J. E. Vanderwood and Samuel Pendleton for the remaining time. Other speakers who occupied were Elders J. M. Baker of Lincoln, Charles Putnam of Magnolia, and R. J. Lambert of Independence. Sister Maggie Macgregor was present in the interests of the Women's Department and rendered valuable assistance along other lines of work.

One evening was devoted to a Graceland program, including an address on "Higher education," by Elder J. E. Vanderwood. The Boy Scouts, under the leadership of Levi Rawlings, the Oriole girls, and the Temple Builders were all represented at a special hour on Friday afternoon. The Health Department of the church was in charge of Sister Faye Franklin of the Independence Sanitarium; the Publicity Department by R. J. Lambert of the Ensign office.

A universally good feeling prevailed throughout the entire sessions of the reunion. A very profitable hour was spent each morning at 7.30 at the "study period," under the efficient leadership of Sister Maggie Macgregor, Hazel Putnam, and Wave Cross. "The study of the child" was the text used. The ordinance of baptism was administered to ten persons.

The joint reunion committee voted to locate at Woodbine for reunion in 1921. The officers for the ensuing year are Elder Joseph Lane, president; F. R. Schafer, secretary; D. M. Vredenburg, treasurer.

F. R. SCHAFER, Secretary.

Eastern Colorado

The reunion of the Eastern Colorado District at Cope, Colorado, commenced Sunday, August 15, and continued over Sunday, August 22. The reunion was held in the beautiful Cope grove, one of the best wooded camping grounds in the eastern part of the State. Though the grounds were somewhat inconvenient to be reached by those coming by rail, being twenty-seven miles from the nearest railway point, yet the attendance was all that could be expected, especially at the evening services when large numbers of nonmembers from the surrounding country were in attendance.

Elder J. R. Sutton was selected to preside and with Elders A. E. Tabor and J. D. Curtis had supervision of all services. Brethren J. R. Graybill, C. O. Munter, and Fenner Bullard were given charge of the grounds. The order of the services was as follows: Study hour 8.30 a. m., prayer meeting 9.30 a. m., preaching 11 a. m. The afternoons were given over to recreation in charge of Elder Calvin H. Rich. Preaching service at 8 p. m., with camp-fire programs immediately following.

All evening services and Sunday services were largely attended. There were about forty tents on the grounds.

Those of the general ministry who preached were Elders Calvin H. Rich, J. D. Curtis, J. R. Sutton, J. Charles May, Swen Swenson, and Hale W. Smith. Elders Higgins of Nebraska City, Nebraska, and M. F. Ralston of Wiley, Colorado, also preached.

The study hour was in charge of Sisters Fishburn, Tabor, and Stevens. Sister Hildebrand of Fort Collins, who is head of the Health Department work for the district, delivered lectures in line with her work.

The last three days of the reunion were given over to convention work and district conference. The conference favored securing a permanent place for the reunion which will likely be in the vicinity of Colorado Springs or Denver.

During the reunion and conference, six were baptized by Elders J. D. Curtis, A. E. Tabor, and J. Charles May. Brother Ruthford Graybill of Kanorado, Kansas, was ordained to the office of priest.

We believe that much good was accomplished at this reunion and conference. The district conference adjourned to convene at Denver the last Saturday and Sunday of February, 1921.

Elders J. D. Curtis and J. Charles May are following up the reunion with a series of meetings in the tent at Cope grove.

Southwestern Texas Reunion

Several months ago, the Southwestern Texas District decided to hold a reunion at the South Branch in San Antonio. The officers of the district requested upon several occasions "that the Saints offer their united and separate prayers for the success of the reunion and that the Holy Spirit might be with us during the same.

At that time we had no knowledge or hope that any other than our local elders would be present. The weather had been and promised to continue unusually hot, we had no tent with which we might hold outdoor meetings, there was no money with which to purchase a suitable tent and all necessary requisites, and things looked rather gloomy as a result.

However, our faith was not lacking, prayers were offered in all sincerity, and almost immediately, through unexpected channels, the answer came. Brother Thomas Jett, jr., met and made the acquaintance of a carpenter by the name of Davis, a faithful member of the Baptist Church, who had felt a call to preach, and who had become possessed of a most excellent tent, with which he proposed to spread the doctrine of the Baptist Church abroad. However, he was not equipped with chairs or money with which to purchase the same and thus was compelled to defer his campaign indefinitely. Brother Jett being advised of the conditions, immediately took steps to obtain the use of the tent for ten days, and managed to rent it at a very nominal price. The securing of chairs was then an easy matter and we were assured of an excellent outdoor covering.

Following the arrangement for the tent, we were unexpectedly advised by Brother William M. Aylor that he would have an opportunity to visit us for a few days prior to his return home, where he expected to complete his arrangements for his exodus to South Africa. This was more joyful news and another assurance of an answer to our prayers.

August 20 saw our opening meeting under the voice of Brother Aylor. It was a stormy night and the weather actually prevented several of the Saints attending, nevertheless, we later learned that though it had rained in many parts of the city, scarcely a drop fell near our tent and our first meeting proved a success. For several days following, this same phenomenon occurred but the meetings were successfully continued and it is estimated that there was not a meeting with less than 150 to 225 persons in attendance, many occupying automobiles and improvised seats outside the tent. By far the majority in attendance were strangers, but the utmost harmony prevailed and we were afterwards told by Brother Aylor that it was the first time in his experience, that after a series of sermons a dissenting voice or remark had not been heard.

We have sat under the spell of Brother Aylor's voice many times before, but never have we listened with such rapture to the "angel message" as we did to the ten nightly sermons preached by Brother Aylor at this reunion. There can be no doubt that he was divinely inspired. His liberty of speech was most excellent, his ability to turn without hesitation or loss of time to any desired Biblical reference, his power of concentration, his pure logic, and his undoubted sincerity held his hearers spellbound and more than one sigh of regret was heard each time he closed.

Nor was the music and singing without its potency. It seemed that never before had the choirs of each branch excelled as they did during this occasion. Surely, the Holy Spirit permeated every being.

Yes, there were fruits! A number of baptisms were held last Sunday afternoon, nor is the end yet, for there are still others who at the last moment asked for baptism this coming Sunday, and we feel sure there are still others who will go down into the water as a result of this our most successful reunion in recent years.

MRS. CORA CHRONE,

Recorder, Second San Antonio Branch.

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS, September 3, 1920.

Northern California Reunion

The above reunion convened at the regular camp grounds at Irvington August 19. The district presidency, consisting of Elder C. W. Hawkins, president, and Elders H. J. Davison and A. J. Damron, vice presidents, presided. After his arrival, Apostle J. A. Gillen was associated with them. Sister Joy Chalmers acted as secretary. Later, when the district conference met, Brother John Lawn, the district secretary, acted in his capacity as secretary of the conference. Sister Chalmers and Brother A. C. Hawley acted as his assistants. Sister Saxe as superintendent of the district Sunday school association, and Sister Day as secretary did good service each in her office. Sister Simpson, the regular president, led in the work of the Women's Department, and Brother Bert Dawson worked efficiently as field worker for the Religion Department.

The weather was ideal all the way through although to some it was rather too cool at times. There was more chill in the air than last year yet to most people living in tents that is more enjoyable than intense heat. There were eighty tents on the grounds but two of these were assembly tents, one the book tent, another the ladies' rest tent, while a fifth was the missionary tent which was used also for administration to the sick; thus there were seventy-five tents as living abodes for the body of campers. In addition to these, thirty-two rooms were taken. Altogether it was the largest reunion ever held in the district; and this applies not only to regular attendants who stayed all the way through, but also to Saints who came and went and to the outside public. In other respects also it was better than in previous years with this exception: the gifts were not as much in evidence although there was a sweet, peaceful influence in the prayer meetings, which exceeded in number those of the past. The social spirit was beautiful. "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!" The harmony which obtained could not have been better. The Saints generally pronounced it a good reunion, and for further evidence ask Brother Gillen.

Besides the ministers already mentioned we had Evangelist F. G. Pitt, (Sister Pitt was with him), and Elders F. B. Farr, G. H. Wixom, W. A. Brooner, John Ely, and "ye scribe." Although there were the usual number of pastoral officials yet they did no preaching this year as they did last. With the exception noted below the itinerant force did all the preaching this year, although they were fewer in number than last year. This time Elder Wixom left us on the third day while last year he was with us from start to finish. The same applies to Brother Ely, who this year was absent on a visit to his home near Kansas City when the reunion began, and did not return until the last day. Sister Farr was present with her husband and did most of the work as chorister although Sister Christiana Waller, the district chorister, acted in her office when present. Sister Helen Rude presided at the piano as usual. Bishop Ingham was present several times and on one occasion delivered a splendid sermon along altruistic lines.

The outside public responded to the extent of three baptisms as well as giving great attention on all occasions. Elder Pitt officiated at the baptismal service which was performed in the font at the Christian Church, in which matter we were treated with every consideration by the church officials.

Elder Davison and I acted as press committee. Sixteen items were submitted to the press re the opening of the reunion and another sixteen concerning its close. A number of them were printed; as to exactly how many we have not been able to ascertain, for we had no opportunity of seeing all the papers.

Will we be able to make our quota toward the First Presidency's late slogan re converts? Brother Hawkins thinks we can but the question is—will we? In the past the number of baptisms per annum has varied greatly; the largest number is fifty and the smallest twenty. Since the slogan involves four times as many converts for the whole church as we have ever made before we should baptize either eighty or two hundred. Or splitting the difference between the extremes say one hundred and forty. The figures in the hands of the district secretary at this reunion indicate that for the half year since the February conference the highest standard has been reached.

ALMA C. BARMORE.

BOTHWELL, ONTARIO, September 3, 1920.

Editors Herald: A few words from Chatham District may not be amiss, now that one of the important gatherings of the year, Erie Beach reunion, has gone into history.

Our district we believe is moving along in a satisfactory way, but we feel the loss of missionaries. At the present time we haven't a missionary in our district.

We hope, however, when the slogan of the Bishopric, "A Million Dollars Tithing," has been realized that a number more missionaries may be added to the list, and that Chatham District will get three or four of them. We have some good men appointed to this district but for part time only.

Erie Beach reunion this year was considered by many if not all who attended as being the best yet. We believe that throughout an excellent spirit prevailed. The general prayer services were good. The young people's prayer services were excellent and well attended. The sight of two or three hundred young people marching away down the beach to hold their prayer service broadened our vision of future possibilities for the church. What power, we wondered, could defeat the purposes of so devoted a band of young people? And to-day we are rejoicing in the confidence that came to us on one of those occasions.

The Saints present who represented many districts beside our own were glad to meet and welcome President Elbert A. Smith. This visit has endeared him to the hearts of the Saints. Bishop Hunt also was present, and by his plain, humble way of counseling has left a lasting impression.

We cannot mention all who helped to make our reunion a success, but we appreciated the help of all whether little or much and trust that all will come again.

Our reunion president, Brother Lamont, surpassed himself this year in the erection of the camp.

Brother Mills, of the Musical Department, did excellent work. We hope that all interested will commence to get ready now for a greater and better Erie Beach reunion next year.

Yours in bonds,

JOHN C. DENT.

CHEROKEE, KANSAS, August 27, 1920.

Dear Brethren: This week I am assisting William Bath in tent meetings in this town, taking care of the singing, sometimes when needed the piano playing, and having general oversight of the meetings which includes rendering short talks, appropriate stories, invitations to come to Christ, personal testimonies, and other various and similar things, besides giving short addresses with stereopticon pictures. In visiting with the people, I assist in instructing and persuading, and do some writing for the local paper. I am leaving most of the preaching to Brother Bath as I left it to Brother Quick at Pittsburg.

In this work I am trying out some ideas I have had, though in a small way, and am studying results.

The interest here is very good, and a very friendly feeling exists among the people. Little or no prejudice is apparent, which condition we found also at Pittsburg. Some are earnestly investigating. The attendance last night was about one hundred, only sixteen of whom were members.

While here, I am also preparing texts and designs from which to make some lantern slides with which to illustrate the doctrine of tithing. Hope to acquire in time an effectual set of slides on this subject.

In bonds,

CHARLES FRY.

TULSA, OKLAHOMA, August 31, 1920.

Editors Herald: As we seldom see anything in the HERALD from Tulsa, I thought I would jot a few lines to apprise you of events here. While no epoch-making events have occurred, many little events that go to make up and fill in an epoch have transpired, some of which may be of interest to those who are watching over the field for signs of progress and development.

A marked feature in the growth of the church people here is an increasing interest in Zion questions, and a greater desire for Zion conditions to obtain. Weariness with the world struggle for existence, battling the high cost of living, and the influence of the ever-growing evil resulting from the fierce economic struggle, contribute to turn the faces of the people toward Zion. Sermons pertaining to Zion are listened to with an eagerness that shows the trend of feeling and sentiment for Zion.

The desire to more thoroughly prepare for the activities that are to obtain in Zion has led to the organization of an association for the study and practice of cooperation. We meet every Sunday at six o'clock. In these meetings we are getting to see more clearly on principles that were vague. We are endeavoring to come to an understanding of the proper methods of procedure for cooperating in both production and consumption in the light of what God has revealed on the subject. Our meetings have been marked so far with a fine spirit, with encouragement and hope for better things.

The young people of the Religio have stirred up quite a lot of enthusiasm in a contest for getting new members.

The Sunday school is flourishing and making progress toward the Christmas offering in a way that shows that all feel an interest in forwarding the cause of Zion.

The branch president, Brother Adamson, has been sick for several days. His son, Ellis, recently ordained to the Aaronic priesthood, is buckling in and rendering his father good assistance while he is incapacitated. Another young man, Brother Woodall, has recently been ordained to the office of teacher. We are expecting these young men to mark their experience with considerable activity in church work, for their interest in the work portends it.

My former South Sea Island colaborer, Brother Case, gives us an occasional visit and a rousing sermon as he darts in and out at his work among the Lamanite brethren. Brother Case and I were together in the Island Mission, and both were on the gospel ship Evanelia when it made its first missionary trip to the Islands. Whether we shall ever be called great or not, we served together our native brethren when we made pea soup and fed the whole boatload of wet, shivering natives on board that first, stormy trip of the gospel boat. If Brother Case and I are ever in the Islands again at the same time, I shall insist on cooking a pot of pea soup and again administering it to the natives as a memorial of our former service together. How strong are the ties of fellowship growing out of being associated together in the good work in a foreign land!

Yours for Zion,

J. W. GILBERT.

NEWS AND COMMENT

CHURCH NEWS

Elder Lester Wildermuth writes from Goreville, Illinois, that Sunday, 14 more were baptized, making 34, with those baptized last week. With the 14 baptized at Marion, they have a total of 48 new members for the Tunnel Hill Branch, as a result of the last month's meetings conducted by Brother Whiting and himself. The weather has been fine, and they have had good attendance, and feel that they have been greatly blessed in the work.

The Maryland Saints at Elk Mills and Elkton are moving onward, and feel determined to retain their places in the latter-day work. On July 24 they enjoyed a social good time when the members of the two branches took their picnic dinners to the river at Otts Park. Five of their number attended the Onset reunion, and returned home much encouraged. Elder Roberts of the First Philadelphia Branch has visited them, and attended an all-day meeting, preaching at both places. Four of their members representing the Women's Department have carried certificates from a class in "Home hygiene and care of the sick," organized by the chairman of the Red Cross at that place. A goodly number are preparing to attend the district conference at Bloomsburg, September 4, 5, and 6. They feel gratified indeed over the appointment of Elder A. M. Chase to labor in that district, and hope that a goodly part of his time may be spent with them.

Miss Grace Thompson, head of the Oriole girls, and James A. Thomas, son of O. B. Thomas, brother of Lydia Thomas Wight, and president of the Northeastern Kansas District, were married September 1, by W. E. Prall, at Lamoni. They plan to take a short trip to the West, attending the conference at Fanning, Kansas, and then on a brief honeymoon.

Elder W. P. Bootman would appreciate a copy of the HERALD for the dates of March 13, 1912, and January 25, 1890. He can use them to good advantage and is willing to reward the sender for the trouble. Address him at Minidoka, Idaho.

In looking over the First Chicago Special Bulletin we note that Miss Laura E. Mann delivered a lecture there on "The danger signals in the road of health," Sunday morning; and Miss June Whiting, of the Graceland faculty, spoke on "Graceland and the call of service," at 7.30 p. m.

Editor S. A. Burgess was in Independence over Sunday the 12th on business. E. D. Moore had previously spent a week in that city in the interests of a magazine number of the Herald.

Henry C. Smith, church architect, was in Lamoni recently looking after the construction of the new building for Graceland College. Building operations are developing favorably, considering the difficulty in securing material and labor.

Elder Hubert Case was in Lamoni recently a few days on church business. His wife and daughter Ardis will be in Lamoni this winter so the latter may attend high school.

Elder Joseph Luff was in Lamoni over Sunday, to preach the funeral sermon of the late Henry A. Stebbins. A very large crowd was in attendance.

On Sunday afternoon, of the 12th, Bishop A. Carmichael got word that his son Ronald in Independence, who sometime ago was seriously afflicted with diphtheria, but who was thought to be safely recovering, was considerably worse. They hurried to his bedside again, but we have heard of no later developments.

We have a letter from R. C. Russell, reporting most favorably concerning the Curtis-Jensen debate in Ottawa recently. "It surely was a victory for us," he says, and we will print his entire report next week.

Word from Elder H. A. Merchant informs us that he and wife and child expect to sail on the Maraona for the Society Islands on the 11th. They had spent a few days visiting in Lake County, California. En route they visited Denver, Salt Lake City, Los Angeles, and San Francisco.

A baby girl was born to President G. N. Briggs and wife on the 6th.

J. H. Yager writes from Lions Head, Ontario, under date of September 2, 1920: "Just closed a successful seven weeks' campaign at Colpoys Bay. This was our first service in our new tent. Six were baptized during the campaign, and the Saints were wonderfully schooled in the work, especially our noble band of young men there. The Warton Saints closed their regular services, and greatly assisted in making the meetings interesting and spiritual. Elder W. A. Smith was with us the last two weeks, and valuable assistance was given by Elder D. B. Perkins throughout the campaign; also by the local ministry. We have now moved to Lions Head, and the past two nights, show signs of some interest at least. Weather is getting pretty cool up here."

Elder Daniel Macgregor, minister in charge of the missionary work in Iowa, has just started a campaign at Council Bluffs with excellent interest, as the tent is full every evening. They are doing much advertising which is arousing the interest of the people. The announcement which has just come to this office is printed on very much better paper than is usually the case, and contains an excellent likeness of Elder Macgregor, together with a clear-cut challenge upon the religious issues of the day. Though so carefully prepared, it seems it is not one for the whole series of meetings, but merely one of the daily series. The effect of consistent work in advertising should be shown.

A recent letter from President F. M. Smith dated at Llanely, Wales, reports he and Apostle Williams were to hold Sunday services there in our church building. They had spoken at Nantyglo the previous Sunday and Williams in the Methodist Episcopal church on Monday. Both were well.

BRANCH NEWS

Wigan, England. The Wigan Branch is moving onward, with Brother Arthur Smith as president. Nine were baptized last night, August 12, three of them being adults and the others little ones from the Sunday school. Others are almost ready to obey. We have a nice branch with all officers in place and working well.

THE WORLD AT LARGE

President Wilson, in approving the anthracite coal report, supports the agreement that it should be retroactive to April 1, last. He further declares that the "award" offers no justification for the advance in the retail price of coal. But the wage award is quite consistent with a decline in prices. An examination of the elements entering into the price of anthracite coal would appear to fully confirm this.

A wireless telephone has been established now across the Atlantic Ocean, and one can carry on an ordinary telephone conversation.

Air mail service between New York and San Francisco was inaugurated by the post-office department on September 8. The service provides for making the trip in fifty-six and a half hours from New York to San Francisco, and sixty and a half hours from San Francisco to New York. It provides for twelve hours stay over each night. At present the fastest mail takes ninety-six and one hundred hours to make the trip.

Within the past few weeks the question of prohibition is coming more and more to the front, and if it is made an issue will no doubt overshadow all other issues in its practical effect upon the election.

The London Baptist World Alliance, held July 19 to 23,

Remember the Sick

As chaplain of the Sanitarium under the direction of the church physician, I am making the following request of the Saints. Will you send me word by letter if you are willing to cooperate with me in prayer for the recovery of the sick? I want the names and addresses of all the members of the church who are willing to observe special seasons of fasting and prayer, on request, in behalf of those members who are in especial need of healing. This is a most serious matter and I hope to receive an early response from those interested. The Sanitarium has a wonderful opportunity to be a blessing to the sick, but we know that it is only through the prayer of faith that the church can reach the throne of grace. The healing of our sick is a church affair; as the church arises in faith to meet the emergency the members of the body will be blessed. Here is offered the humblest member an opportunity to bless humanity. Mean business. Be serious. And let the name of God be glorified.

British Isles Mission

In the interests of the work of the church it is deemed wise to make the following changes in districts in the British Isles Mission:

Plymouth and Exeter Branches, formerly in unorganized territory, and Gloucester Branch, formerly in the Eastern Wales District, added to London District. Leeds Branch (including Bradford Mission), formerly in Manchester District, to be added to Sheffield District.

For the purpose of more definite details in administrative work, definite boundaries have been determined for the various districts. Taking into account the changes above noted, the districts will be comprised as per the following table:

	Branches	Counties
Manchester District	N. E. Manchester
	S. & E. Manchester
	Warrington	Lancashire
	Wigan	Cheshire
	Stockport
Sheffield District	Farnworth

Des Moines, coordinate conference, at Rhodes, Iowa, October 1, 2, 3. Bessy Laughlin, secretary, Rhodes, Iowa.

London, Ontario, with Stratford Branch, October 2 and 3. Branch clerks please send credentials to David Smith, 340 Albert Street, Stratford, Ontario. William M. Grice, president; Lucy Yerks, secretary.

New York, with the Buffalo Branch, October 2 and 3. A good program is being arranged, and it is urged that the Saints of the district make special effort to attend. Anna Brothers, secretary, 36 Tremont Avenue, Buffalo, New York. James E. Bishop, president.

Attention, Local Home Department Workers!

The time is at hand for ordering the Sunday school and Religio Quarterlies for the coming quarter. Please order direct from the Herald Publishing House, Lamoni, Iowa, inclosing cash with order.

If your former collections are insufficient, so state as you order, and the Herald Office will send what you need, charging the same to the Women's Department.

GENERAL EXECUTIVE, WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT.

Home-Coming Day

The Hiteman Branch will have a home-coming celebration on October 3 and 4. All former members, those still holding membership in Hiteman, and friends, are invited to attend. Good time guaranteed.

Rally Day in Denver

The first Sunday in October will be Rally Day for the Denver Saints, all day being given over to special services, and they extend a welcome to Saints from adjoining towns to be with them. Sacrament will be observed and special features provided. Basket dinner in basement.

Quarterlies Ready

Have you ordered your Sunday school Quarterlies? If not, do it now. A 46,000 edition for October-December, 1920, is off the press, and the first installment of orders went out on the second day of September, four full weeks before the time to use them. A second edition will not be printed unless the number needed is large enough to justify it. Don't wait till the supply is exhausted. Your school saves ten per cent by ordering by the year. Why not be thrifty?

G. R. WELLS, Superintendent.

District jurisdiction, like branch jurisdiction, is coextensive with membership; but the geographical boundaries are sometimes necessary to avoid conflict.

Local and missionary forces are expected to carry on their work without interference one with the other, but hearty cooperation is expected where necessary.

Other instructions will be issued as necessity indicates.

Respectfully submitted,

FREDERICK M. SMITH, for the Presidency.

T. W. WILLIAMS, for the Quorum of Twelve.

THIS IS A CHURCH-WIDE RESPONSIBILITY

The building of the General Conference Auditorium is a concern of the entire church. While it will be built in due time as the center place, yet it will belong to every district, branch, and member no matter where or who they may be, and at conference time, all will share it alike. The order to build it was issued by General Conference and in obeying that order the Presiding Bishop has laid plans whereby the funds can be raised—all the church—every district doing its fair share and every member being given opportunity to assume his just portion of the load.

The Bishop believes that every district will want to do its part. He believes that Massachusetts would not want California to carry its load, nor would Lamoni Stake let Far West pay her bills for her, and so with all the rest.

For that reason we have divided the sum to be raised into quotas and assigned each district its share. Each district president will soon be informed what his quota is, and a statement will be given him showing how much has already been pledged for his district. These quotas will be as fair as our office, with all its data from which to judge, can determine. The burden thus distributed will not be too heavy for any to succeed in raising. All will be placed on a like footing and will share equally in the honor of accomplishing a great work.

The Quota Method of Raising Funds

Some question has been raised with regard to the method to be used in collecting funds for the erection of the auditorium building. The plan to be used is an attempt to prorate the amount among the various districts and stakes of the church.

Of course, this method is largely adapted from that used in the Liberty Loan, Red Cross, and Salvation Army drives during the war. At that time the amounts were prorated between the different States, taking into consideration the population of the State, its wealth, and its fluid wealth, which includes both the amount of income and the condition in which this wealth is held. Population alone would hardly be a fair criterion.

So also with the church, membership alone will hardly be the method of division, though it should be taken into careful consideration. A second element would be the wealth of different districts and stakes, if this could be ascertained with reasonable accuracy. A third element would be the amount paid as tithes and offerings, and contributions to the church in this way, and also in special donations. This would indicate where the most active officers are located, and where the most active members are located, as well as the amount in an indirect way, of fluid capital. But of course it is not at all accurate and could by no means be taken safely as a sole means of ascertaining the prorata.

A fourth consideration would doubtless be locality. It is quite reasonable that we should expect those actually residing in Independence and its vicinity, to contribute more liberally than those remote from that place.

These elements are the ones which occur first to mind, as affecting the quota as a whole divided among the various districts and stakes. The first three elements are worthy of consideration in dividing the quota in the districts and stakes among the various branches.

The quota is not only to the church, but to each stake, district, and branch a definite goal to be achieved, and lets each one of us know what we should do, and what our group should do to achieve the results set before the church as a whole, and our district or stake in particular. We have gone over the top for Liberty Loan Bonds, for War Savings Stamps, for the Red Cross, for the Salvation Army, and for other drives. Now let us go over the top for an auditorium and General Conference building for the church.

President F. M. Smith and Apostle T. W. Williams are making a quiet survey of the work in the British Isles. A recent letter states that they are visiting the branches, not for the purpose of being entertained, but to ascertain the facts and how the work can best be helped.

The editors are also in receipt of some excellent photos taken by President Smith, of the probable headquarters of the mission in London, England, and will doubtless have occasion to use them later for the benefit of our readers.

Spiritual Gifts

 - a. Natural part of the gospel economy.
 - b. But spirit of prophet subject to prophet.
 - c. Gifts not to supersede law.
 - d. Calling men to office.
 - e. Propheying over the sick.
 2. Given as seems good to God.
 - a. Not as we will unless our wills are his.
 - b. Unwise strivings open doors to disaster.
 3. Spurious manifestations.
 - a. From the Devil.
 - b. Of man.
 4. Dangers as well as benefits of gifts mark our kinship with the New Testament church.

As I enter upon the subjects assigned to me, I feel that many of your men know as much about them as I do—you see, I am trying to establish points of agreement at the very start. And I might say further, that I am not a lecturer, I am a preacher. I know that I am not a lecturer, and you will know it in about ten minutes, so there will be another point of agreement.

I. Introduction

First, what is a gift? A gift, naturally, is something that is given. It is not something that is worked for or earned as a wage. That line of distinction may appear a little clearer as we proceed. Though they may be contingent on right living, and also on ability to use, spiritual gifts are not to be worked for or agonized for, but are to come along in a perfectly normal and natural way, as a concomitant to righteous living and as necessity arises in our gospel work. They are God's gifts to his children, and so are good. Jesus reminded us that if we being evil know how to give good gifts to our children, God, who is good, is much more able to bless those who love and serve him. (Matthew 7: 9-11.)

God must be the judge of what each shall receive, and we may assume that he will give to every man according to his needs and just wants. The rule that obtains in temporal matters ought to obtain in spiritual matters as well. Also ability to use enters in, and the Lord will not necessarily give a gift to any man merely because he may ask for or desire it. You would not give a set of very fine tools to a man who had no knowledge of mechanics, because he would ruin them and spoil the job he might try to do. The very highest manifestations of spiritual gifts are always accompanied by wisdom and are given those who are willing to be guided in wisdom's ways.

II. Considered Historically

The gifts of the gospel were an important part of the church economy in the New Testament church. Our "Christian" friends seem to hold that the Holy Ghost was not given until Pentecost; but we trace the operations of the Spirit almost from the opening chapter of the New Testament. Zaccheus had the gift of prophecy, and spoke concerning John; Mary was overshadowed by the Holy Spirit; and when Jesus was brought to Simeon to be blessed the record says distinctly that the Holy Ghost was upon him. (Luke 2: 25.)

In the New Testament Church

There are, however, two or three outstanding incidents in New Testament history that appeal more prominently to us than others; and chief among them, as a matter of course, is that memorable day of Pentecost. (Acts 2: 4-18.) You remember how the disciples were gathered together, and the Holy Spirit came upon them in power, being manifested outwardly in "cloven tongues like as of fire." Under this influence and power they preached the gospel to the men of various nationalities gathered there, each hearing it in his own tongue.

Some hold that the men assembled to hear the message were not men of different languages, but rather men of different dialects, only. But in any event they could not understand each other nor these Galilean apostles until the power of God was manifested so that all could understand the word preached. The miracle caused such wonder and consternation that there is little opportunity to attempt to detract from its dignity by explanations. This was a very notable chapter in the history of the New Testament church—the first preaching of the gospel to the Jews by the apostles under the endowment of power that had been promised, and many of the spiritual gifts were enjoyed at that time.

As a boy, when I heard this chapter preached about so often by the elders, the outstanding point that appealed to me was that these men spoke in tongues. But now it seems to me that several of the most important gifts that Paul mentions were there manifested, for instance the gift of wisdom. Consider the previous history of the Apostle Peter. He had always "balled up" every situation in which he ever found himself. He was the official blunderbus of the church up until the day of Pentecost; but notice the change, and the supreme wisdom with which he handled the critical mission there given him. He there for the first time, perhaps, was master of himself, and so of his audience, and hence master of the entire situation. Who can say that the gift of wisdom was not bestowed upon him in a very great measure, and also upon those other humble apostles that were associated with him?

Who shall say, too, that the gift of faith, was not poured out upon him, and upon them? Here were those who had been slinking, hiding, cowering fugitives now required to stand up and preach the gospel to the mob that had destroyed their Lord and Master, and it certainly took faith for them to face the situation and for Peter to say to those men, "You, with wicked hands, have taken and crucified the Lord of glory; now you must repent and be baptized, every one of you, in his name." It certainly took faith and courage to meet that situation.

The gift of prophecy also was manifested in all its functions. First, Peter expounded the scripture that was then on record—and that is about the only function of the prophetic office that the "sectarian" world will recognize as still being exercised. Second, he declared the will of God concerning them at that very hour. This is another function of the prophetic office. Third, he predicted coming events in the realm of future knowledge, which must have been known to God alone.

Then, too, of course, there was that wonderful outpouring of the gift of tongues which enabled them to preach so that they were understood by all those present who spake various languages or dialects.

The second important incident that I would notice was another crisis in the history of the church, when the gospel was first preached by the apostles to the Gentiles. You are familiar with the case of Cornelius and his household. Acts 10: 44-46 records that when the members of that household received the gospel the Holy Spirit came on them and they spake in tongues and prophesied. On that evidence of divine favor the Apostle Paul based his argument that they, having received the gift of the Holy Ghost the same as the Jews, ought to be baptized. He himself had been a creed-bound Jew, and it took a vision from the Lord to convince him that the Gentiles could receive the gospel and that God meant what he said when he said to Father Abraham that in him and in his seed should all the children of the earth be blessed.

These are outstanding incidents, but of course, the exercise of the gifts ran all the way through the New Testament church and continued until gradually the gifts disappeared in the time of the apostasy. One of the church fathers, Irenaeus, who wrote about the year 200 is quoted as saying that there were still numbers living in his day who occasionally spoke in tongues and exercised under the gift of prophecy; but gradually these blessings disappeared, and finally with the dawning of the period in which the Restoration took place the Christian church as a whole had reached the stage where it was not only willing to admit that these things had ceased, but to accept it as a matter of course and the will of God that they should cease.

I have a book here which gives us very vividly in contrast with our position the position of the churches in the early thirties, when our church was first sounding forth its message. It is the second volume of a work called, Theological Institutes. And by the way, this volume itself diverts me from the regular subject of my theme, because it is a very, very interesting historical relic. It belonged in the private library of Joseph Smith, the Martyr, and it has his autograph on the flyleaf, and this, with many similar books on many subjects, that have come down to us from Joseph, that were studied by him and his associates, shows how studious those men were, and how wide their range of reading. If it is true that the church to-day is "going to seed on education," the process began a long time ago—the church began to go to seed almost before it sprouted up from the ground.

I believe that a good deal of this argument on education is based on misunderstanding of what men want. Personally, I am not a college man and I do not want to take extreme ground on the question of education; I want to take a position that is safe and logical; but I have joined hands with those who say that we ought to have a better-read and better-informed ministry. The trouble is that immediately when we say that, some one answers that man's wisdom is not sufficient to obtain salvation. Now, who said it was? There is not a single man of prominence in the church that I ever heard make such a statement. I do not cite anybody to secular books with an idea that they are going to get salvation out of them. I did not read Fosdick on Immortality to get immortality, for immortality is brought to light through Jesus Christ, but I did get some ideas from Fosdick that helped me greatly when I attempted to preach on that subject.

I cannot subscribe to the thought that there is nothing outside of the realm of revelation that is true, because that makes the multiplication table a lie. Twice two is four. That is true and is a truth as old as God, and yet you don't get it out of a Bible, but out of secular textbooks that are carnal and worldly. And the same is true of a great many things we have in this life.

I was interested the other day, in a little discussion on why the common people accept the gospel of Jesus Christ. Some interesting answers were given; but we cannot give a correct answer until we consider all of the factors. It was suggested by one brother that the gospel of old came with power and with much assurance and with the Holy Ghost—and that was a good suggestion. We never want to lose sight of that, but that is not the only factor in the case, because if it is we put it all up to God, and make him to blame for every non-conversion—if there is a man found who does not become converted easily, all God has to do is to turn a little more power on J. J. Cornish and he can convert anybody. The fact is a man who presents a message ought not to be satisfied to let God do it all, but ought to be anxious to do his part. That is why J. J. Cornish was not satisfied to remain unable to read his texts—Cornish was not willing to remain a tool; he wanted to be a partner and do his share.

But I do not think that these citations to specific examples throw much light on the subject. We may say that J. J. Cornish did a great work, but it does not follow that he did it because he was illiterate. The Apostle Paul, who was one of the best-read men in his day, did a much greater work than did Brother Cornish but it does not follow that he did it solely because he was an educated man. The fact is that if an illiterate man is willing to serve God with all his heart, mind, and soul, God will use him, and so with an educated man. But take two men of equal fervor and equal consecration and equal piety, and the one of them who has the greater range of knowledge will do the greater work. I want to read a little extract from the writings of the late President Joseph Smith, found in the HERALD, volume 41, page 97: "Other things being equal, the educated man has the advantage in every vocation, that of a minister included." I wonder if we have found another point of agreement.

We will come back now to my theme. In this book on theology, published in 1834, by the Methodist Book Concern and called Theological Institutes, on page 575 there is this statement: "The gift of prophecy has passed away with the other miracles of the first age of Christianity." Now, that is a clear, brief, and concise and fairly accurate statement of what the various churches believed at that time, showing that, not only had they lost the gifts, but, worse than that, they had become reconciled to their loss. It is one thing to be poor and naked and another thing to be satisfied with that condition. In significant opposition to that thought came Joseph Smith and his followers with the thought that God is unchangeable and that he operates alike in all ages, and that the gospel is unchangeable, bringing the same blessings in 1830 that it did in the year 30.

That is the fundamental concept that marks our people as different from others. We believe in God in the present tense, I AM. In fact, God himself knows no other tense. With him, there is probably no past and no future. All the past and all the future coming within the range of his perception and understanding all the time, it is always now with him, always I AM. With us, we measure a day at a time, like measuring worms, but with him a thousand years is as a day. Thus our people came forth with the fundamental thought that God is unchangeable.

In the Restored Church

Let us pass on to the consideration of the gifts as manifested in our dispensation. At the baptism of Joseph and Oliver Cowdery, Joseph Smith said:

"Immediately upon our coming up out of the water, after we had been baptized, we experienced great and glorious blessings from our heavenly Father. No sooner had I baptized Oliver Cowdery than the Holy Ghost fell upon him and he stood up and prophesied many things which should shortly come to pass. And again, so soon as I had been baptized by him, I also had the spirit of prophecy, when, standing up, I prophesied concerning the rise of the church, and many other things connected with the church, and this generation of the children of men. We were filled with the Holy Ghost, and rejoiced in the God of our salvation."—Church History, vol. 1, p. 36.

At the dedication of the Kirtland Temple, there was also a great outpouring of the Spirit and the gifts were enjoyed, discourses being preached in tongues and interpreted. It is curious to note that the world explained it exactly as they did on the day of Pentecost, i. e., that the disciples were drunken with wine. Gunnison says:

"For some days wine flowed freely. . . . This with previous fastings. . . . produced unheard-of effects."—History of the Mormons, by Gunnison, p. 107.

The same blessings were manifested in the Reorganization as early as 1850, on the 7th day of April. Jason W. Briggs, in the Church History, volume 3, page 222, says:

"It was at this meeting that there was an exhibition of power, light, unity of spirit, above any ever before witnessed among us. Tongues were spoken and interpreted; hymns sung in tongues and the interpretation sung; prophecy and visions were exercised here for the first time to the writer. Many sang in tongues in perfect harmony at once as though they constituted a well-practiced choir."

Concerning the conference of 1860 when Young Joseph, as they called him, came to his place THE SAINTS' HERALD, volume 1, page 236 says:

"Prayer meetings were held every evening during the conference, and the Spirit of God was poured out upon the Saints in an extraordinary degree. The gift of tongues, interpretation of tongues, the gift of prophecy, and other gifts, were graciously bestowed."

In the Book of Mormon Church

In the Book of Mormon there are enumerated practically the same gifts that are found mentioned in the Bible. Alma recounts the gifts that the Nephites enjoyed. (Book of Alma 7:31.) Moroni makes mention of them much as Paul did. (Moroni 10:9-18.)

The last-named writer makes a clear and positive statement that the gifts are to continue in the church so long as faith and righteousness prevail. If they ever cease, he says, it will be "because of unbelief."

III. As Enumerated by Paul

We might now pass on to section three in the notes, to the gifts as they are enumerated by the Apostle Paul. (1 Corinthians 12:7-11.)

"But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal. For to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; to another faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing by the same Spirit; to another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to another discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues."

In the outline I have divided these gifts into groups, but the division is not arbitrary and perhaps some one else could give them better headings. The first three naturally fall into a group by themselves, and I have headed them, The Primary Gifts: wisdom, knowledge, faith.

Primary Gifts

First comes the gift of wisdom. I have noted that this is spoken of as a "gift," as a free gift. Of course, we may develop wisdom by experience, by study, by observation, and by hard knocks; but in a sense, that is something that we work for, that we earn and is not a gift. But as I would understand it, the gift of wisdom as mentioned here is something that God gives us and not something that comes to us as the result of study or labor.

For example, take the case of Solomon. He was given his choice, and he chose the gift of wisdom—that indicates that he already had a certain amount of it or he would not have made that choice. But God was pleased with his selection and freely gave him wisdom superior to anything that he could possibly have acquired in a long life of study. I am not speaking slightly of study, as I have already explained my position on that, but the gift of wisdom, as I understand it, is something that God gives us, and many historic examples come to mind.

The same general observations would apply to the gift of knowledge. Knowledge, of course, comes quicker and easier than wisdom. Tennyson says very truthfully that "knowledge comes, but wisdom lingers." You may fill a head full of facts, but it takes wisdom to use the facts that you have collected. I do not think the "gift of knowledge" contemplates the range of information we have accumulated by study or labor, but rather knowledge given by inspiration or intuition. As an example: Paul says that no man can say that Jesus is the Christ but by the Holy Ghost, and Jesus confirmed that when he said to Peter that flesh and blood did not reveal the Sonship to him but "our Father which art in heaven."

That is something that we cannot find out by study; it is something that every man must know for himself, and no man can tell it to another, or give him that knowledge. I well remember when I had been in the mission field for some years that I went into the little church at Burlington, Iowa, and knelt down alone and prayed for that knowledge, and the assurance came to me that Jesus was the Son of God, and I arose with that conviction in my heart.

The same thing can be said of the gift of faith. There are some people who have to agonize and struggle for faith and develop it carefully. Alma tells us in his sixteenth chapter that if a man so much as desires to have faith he has something to work on and he ought to cultivate it as he would a seed and it will grow. That seems to be about the only way some people get faith, but to others God gives it as a gift. Thomas could believe only when he put his hands into the prints of the nails and saw and knew, but Jesus said that some others would believe on his testimony, that is, the Spirit would give to them assurance and the gift of faith.

I believe that these three gifts are really the head of the arch, as we might say, among all the spiritual gifts; and certainly if that is true, wisdom is the very keystone of the arch with faith on one side and knowledge on the other. I was very much interested in that definition of wisdom that was given here the other day by a brother, who credits it to Joseph the Martyr: "Wisdom is the ability to use knowledge properly." Well, there is another point of agreement.

I wonder if we can agree a little further when I say that if we have wisdom, then the more knowledge we get the more we have to use, hence the wider will be the range of our usefulness. The man who comes to you and says that you ought to be careful how you accumulate knowledge must think that you haven't wisdom to use any more knowledge than you already have. That is a pretty bitter dose, and unless he is right you don't have to take it; but if he is right, it is probably the medicine you need. And the man—and there are many of us who attempt to do this; I am not speaking about any particular man—the man who feels that he is called upon to walk ahead of you and say, "This is good; you may take it. This is bad; you must leave it alone," is putting himself in the place of a better guide, because Jesus Christ said, "I will send you the Holy Ghost and he will guide you into all truth," and he is the only guide you are absolutely bound to follow, though good counsel, of course, is not to be rejected. Go out and in and find pastures for your souls and let the Spirit be your guide. That is why we said at the beginning of these lectures that we would set many things before you and you could take what you pleased and leave the rest alone.

Miraculous Gifts

In the second group or division falls the two mentioned as gifts extraordinary, the gift of healing and the gift of miracles, or the working of miracles. These open up the question of divine healing. We could not go into that at any great length, but you probably have noticed men who seemed to have the gift of healing more than some others do. Of course, all of us may go and administer and expect blessings, but there are some who seem to have a special endowment along that line.

At times I have felt myself in possession of that gift. I remember being called one night from the home of Brother Siegfried to administer to a little girl, a child in arms at the time, who was subject to recurring convulsions. When we went into the room, the little girl was in a horrible contortion; her face was drawn and rigid, and of a ghostly color; but the moment I saw her I felt that at that particular time I had the gift of healing and I knew that the child would be healed; and she was instantly healed under the administration; her form relaxed, her color returned, and her eyes opened while we were praying. She has never had a recurrence of that trouble and is now perhaps fourteen or fifteen years of age. Probably all of you have had these experiences and know that God on those occasions has given you something, not always enjoyed.

The ways by which people are healed under administration, and the rules governing, we do not understand very well as yet, and we do not get very uniform results; but when a gift like that is handed out to one, of course the matter is taken out of his hands; it is not anything that you have accomplished by any arrangement of thought or words, but God steps in and gives you that particular blessing.

Walter C. Hughes, Secretary of the National Confectioners' Association, places the candy industry as fifth among those benefited by prohibition. Those which he says are benefited more in their order are: savings banks, the soft drink industry, ice cream making, and moving picture theaters. It is of interest to note that in the first rank come savings banks. It cannot be doubted that all of the others are much better for the family than is the consumption of liquor.

The Missionary Spirit in Action

BY G. R. WELLS

This author believes that the missionary spirit is a basic factor in our lives as Saints, and begins at home.

We learned recently of one of our bright young members, a university student, who expressed a wish to enter a Book of Mormon class to study it systematically, but not to teach it. He admitted he was in the habit of thus studying selfishly church subjects, but had made a university preparation to teach in a public school. There may be others of the same mind. It brings up the question of motive in all our study.

We all know the value of the missionary spirit. When the church loses that, it will be a dead church.

What is the missionary spirit?

Supporting missions in foreign lands or merely going there is not the missionary spirit. This is but one form of the expression of the missionary spirit. A dominating desire to divide our supply (of anything) with others who have none—that is the missionary spirit. It is altruism, the watchword of which is: "others." It might take the form of any kind of material assistance, as food and shelter; it might look to giving others better environment, better civic conditions, better education; or it might be a burning desire to send to others the light and comfort of the restored gospel so freely given to us because of the functioning of the missionary spirit in some one else. "Freely ye have received; freely give," motivates us. It requires no persuasion or command.

There can be no more of the missionary spirit in the church than the percentage of members who are motivated by it. Does a person who acquires knowledge of any kind merely for selfish, intellectual delight possess any of the missionary spirit—how much altruism has he? We even have wealthy men of the world who are not that selfish but who regard themselves as stewards, holding their wealth for the good of their fellow men.

The missionary spirit is not confined to the elders who are willing to take the gospel to the nations. It must be in those at home who pay their tithing. It must also be in every teacher and officer who are anxious to prepare themselves to be better workmen for the Master who said, "Feed my lambs."

The superintendency of the Star of Bethlehem Sunday School of Lamoni, Iowa, is impressed that the time has come when their school should be doing something more formal to provide opportunity for their teachers to give a better expression to the missionary spirit at home. The following is taken from a letter which was recently handed to each teacher. It rings true. Not until our boys and girls discover that we are giving real attention to this work, making it a real school, will they respect it and take the interest we all love to see. We would like to see every one of our schools taking this matter up in the way here set forth. The Religio lesson hour is a good opportunity; and we are sure that Religio presidents will give the cooperation necessary to make it a success. It reads:

"The teachers' meetings in the afternoon on Sunday have met with considerable success, though varying. The attendance has been from 50 to 90 per cent of the teachers. The efficiency of that meeting can never be more than the percentage of teachers present, provided the work done at the meeting itself were all that could be expected. The special attempt made at these meetings is to discuss the teaching of the particular lessons in the light of pedagogical principles. Naturally, this kind of an attempt will be limited in its success by the extent to which the teacher is acquainted with the principles of pedagogy. The leader of these afternoon meetings has not the time to dwell upon the pedagogical principle which he is trying to apply. He must assume that you know something about it, else he could not cover the lessons. Evidently other training is needed. We hope each teacher will prayerfully and carefully take an inventory of his own capacities and needs and act accordingly.

"The general Sunday school department rates that Sunday school much higher which has an organized method of training its teachers. It has provided a course of study for teachers to follow. The course you will find outlined in Graceland College Bulletin of 1920-1921 on page 55. You will notice that it is divided into five sections, 'The pupil,' 'The teacher,' 'The Bible,' 'The Book of Mormon,' and 'The Sunday school.' The first two sections concern themselves with pedagogical principles, and the fifth with the organization and supervision of the Sunday school. The course provides for an examination to be taken in each section upon its completion.

"We have made provision for this work to be carried on in regular classes during the Religio hour, the coming school year. This is with the consent of the Religio officers. The teachers in charge of these classes will conduct the examinations when the section is finished, and when you have completed all sections, the college will award the diploma.

"For the first, second, and fifth sections we have secured Brother F. M. McDowell's consent to be the teacher. You will notice that from their nature he by his years of study is eminently fitted to teach.

"The Book of Mormon course will also be given at the Religio hour. We have asked Brother E. D. Moore to teach this course.

"We have not decided whether to give the course on the Bible or not. However, if a sufficient number of teachers will ask for it, we will provide it.

"You will understand that these courses will be given simultaneously, so that you can enroll in one only. We ask you to think this matter over seriously and plan to enroll in one of these courses, the one you think you need most now. No doubt many of you have taken work in pedagogy, but know that you lack a knowledge of the Book of Mormon. Enroll in the Book of Mormon course, then. Likewise many of you feel that you have studied the Book of Mormon all your life but lack a working knowledge of the principles of pedagogy and of the organization of a Sunday school. Plan to enroll in that class. We will plan so to organize the work that when you have finished one class, you can enter the other, so that you can finally obtain your diploma. Before deciding that you do not need the work, and before deciding that your children whom you teach cannot be benefited by this work, take a second thought. If you would prefer the course in Bible, express yourself.

"These children present themselves to us every Sunday morning. We have a better opportunity than any preacher. We can talk to them face to face, confidentially. Our power to influence them, what is it? Have we the power to influence? Can we increase that power? We are called to a holy office. Are we magnifying it? Shall these children be able to say when grown old, 'We asked for bread, but were given a stone'? Shall these pupils be able to say, 'Religion does not amount to much. My Sunday school teacher did not work at it very hard, judging by the way he taught our class.'

"The church and our general Sunday school authorities feel that our teachers need to work, else they would not have asked it of us. How much credence shall we give them? Shall we place the Star of Bethlehem Sunday School in the lead on this matter or in the rear?

"Indicate to the superintendent or to your departmental superintendent which class you intend to join. Enroll ahead of time. These classes will commence in a very few weeks. Would like to know ahead of time just how many there will be in each division."

Please note: The child that goes to the week-day school is the same that goes to God's school on the Sabbath. And the principles or laws of teaching are the very same on Sunday as on week days.

Shall we demand the best possible preparation for the world's school-teachers who impart knowledge that takes the student no farther than the dark river; while, at the same time, we are satisfied with little or no preparation for the teachers in God's school, there to arouse the pupil's interest and impart the knowledge that leads to eternal life? Is that the policy of true Latter Day Saints who are always ready to resent imputations that we are an ignorant lot who are more superstitious than educated? The person who thinks the teacher has only to open his mouth and God will fill it, lays himself open to such a charge. But I am sure we have few if any of that kind of members.

Religion is not merely a set of doctrines. Religion is more than praying, or preaching, or talking about the good Spirit. The motivating Spirit must find expression. Religion is life—it is the missionary spirit in action.

"Blessed are they that DO." No others can eat of the fruit of the tree of life.

The Church or the World—Which?

BY S. K. SORENSON

The first of a series of articles contrasting the joy of service with the emptiness of worldly pleasures.

The word church signifies the collective body of believers and followers of Christ called out from the world into association and holy communion with God the Father and Jesus Christ his Son, inspired by the Holy Spirit which leads and guides into all truth.

But as we pass along in the busy affairs of life, we forget or lose sight of the importance and significance of this high and holy calling unto which we are called. Would it not therefore be well to pause a moment and ask ourselves the question: What is the object of the church? Why make a distinction from the rest of the human family, known as the world?

When in the divine mind the plan was originated of establishing what to us is known as the church, there must have been at the same time also a reason for this and a purpose in view which it was to accomplish. Without such a purpose it would have been folly on the part of a divine, all-wise God to bring into existence an institution which had nothing more to it than any earthly organization, without any distinctive features from the rest of the world.

As this organic structure of divine origin was placed here on earth among humanity and for humanity, it is but natural to conclude that within its boundaries are found two natures, the divine and the human. The divine, because it was planned by the divine Architect of heaven and earth and brought into existence by his direction and leadership; his Spirit placed in it to guide into all truth. It is God's method of expressing himself to the world, his nature to be made manifest in the flesh—humanity. It is God with us and in us.

It is the reflection of the image and attributes of God in man. It is God's representative in the world to demonstrate to the world the divine nature dwelling in flesh, as it was demonstrated in Christ as an ensample or pattern for all humanity. It is the light of God reflected through the human nature, which by reason of its superior graces and virtues should commend itself to the world, and the world be attracted by it.

The human nature or the second nature found within the confines of this organic structure, the church, is that for which the church was established, but which by reason of terrestrial influences are naturally in opposition and in contrast to and not subject to the higher nature as represented in the divine; therefore there is a necessity that the two natures be brought together that a transformation of the human may take place and become more like the divine.

For that purpose the church was established, that through this channel, God's great melting pot, he might reconcile the world unto himself and the human nature be swallowed up in the divine, or in other words, become truly converted.

"But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them because they are spiritually discerned."—Paul.

The natural man is of the earth, with earthly inclinations and desires, and through his physical senses sees and hears and understands only those things which they experience; and as the Master said, they have ears and hear not, they have eyes and they see not, that is, they are deaf and blind to the things of a divine nature which their natural senses can neither see, hear, nor understand; hence a necessity for a broader vision and understanding that we may see and understand the things which our natural eyes have not seen, nor our ears heard, neither entered into the heart of man.

The church of the living God has within it the means which will bring about this transformation of the human nature to be made like unto the nature of the Son of God, and thus the godlike attributes may shine forth in all their splendor in the lives of men and women in this world. Having once partaken of and tasted the heavenly virtues and graces, we should continue to grow and develop the godlike attributes, until the human nature has become subservient to the divine; until God is manifest in us; until that light which is within us has become the light of the world, having subjugated the carnal nature within us and put on the spiritual. Knowing that this is our call and that this is our mission, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conduct and conversation?

If the divine nature must find its expression through the human tabernacle it stands to reason that it must have a beginning the same as the human nature, that is, being begotten and born. When Christ made use of the expression, "Ye must be born again," he did not refer to the physical man, but to the spirit-human nature which is carnal, which must undergo a change, a regeneration; a new birth must take place; a new nature be developed; a new hope founded; new aspirations sought; new ideals fixed; new desires established; new pleasures our joy; a new life our aim; all of which will supplant that which is of a carnal nature and bring us nearer to the godlike nature which was represented in Christ.

Therefore, the apostle Peter has very fittingly given expression to this same thought in the following language:

"Being born again not of corruptible seed [that is the birth of the natural man], but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever. . . . Wherefore laying aside all malice, and all guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and all evil speakings [which are results of the human nature], as newborn babes, desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby: if so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious."—1 Peter 1:23; 2: 1-3.

Theoretically, and in fact, a new life has through this method been brought into existence; but like all other forms of life in its incipient stage it is weak and needs nurture and great care that it may grow and develop so that the new seed of the divine nature may have full and abundant opportunity for expansion. This work is the work of the church, the spiritual body of Christ, that through its teachings, its toils, its labors, and example, may bring its spiritual children born into it, to reach such a degree of spiritual development that the carnal nature may be subdued and the spiritual grow and be made prominent, that the nature of God may shine out through the church collectively as well as individually, that the world may be attracted to it and partake of the light of its shining. This is the mission of the church and each individual member in particular. Therefore, the great apostle of the Gentiles has well said, "If any man be in Christ he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new."—2 Corinthians 5: 17.

But this transformation from the old to the new is not reached in a single bound nor without a battle between the two natures now resident within the individual. Not all physically born children live to reach maturity; so also with the spiritual children, they are born, and with some that is all that can be said; the spiritual nature is not nurtured and they die as to things spiritual. Others progress, some more and some less in the different stages of development, but never reach that degree of perfection in the divine nature intended for a full-grown man in Christ Jesus.

Now, there must be causes for this, otherwise the physically born child, as well as the spiritually born, would reach that perfection of development which was intended in its creation. The physically born child is often hindered in its growth to mature manhood or womanhood by reason of sickness and unfavorable physical surroundings. It is thus thrown out of correspondence with that which otherwise would have a tendency and be conducive to its growth and development to full maturity. In other words, it fails to partake of those elements of its own kind which would contribute to and perpetuate life; but instead it partakes of those things foreign to its nature which act as a poison to the system, prevent growth, cause stagnation of body and finally death.

What is true of the physically born is equally true of the spiritually born nature in man. That which is born of flesh is flesh and must be nourished and grow by those things pertaining to the flesh; that which is born of the Spirit is spirit, and must be nourished and grow by those things of a spiritual character. In other words, each must be nourished of its own kind; otherwise it would be contrary to nature and the result would be death.

Therefore, if we undertake to feed the spiritual nature in man, born of God, with worldly things, spiritual death is sure to follow; but "they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with its affections and lust." "For to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace."—Paul.

"The natural life owes all to environment, so must the spiritual. Now the environment of the spiritual life is God. As nature therefore forms the complement of the natural life, God is the complement of the spiritual."—Drummond.

"Love not the world, neither the things that are of the world. If any man love the world the love of the Father is not in him. For all in the world that is of the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof; but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever."—John, the Apostle.

The world and all that is in it, is the manifestation of the natural life upon which it is perpetuated, and it is perpetuated to the extent that it corresponds with the laws which brought it into existence.

If there is a cessation of correspondence with those laws, death is the result.

The plant owes its life to its correspondence with its natural environment, the soil, the air, and the moisture; and the more perfectly it corresponds with those environments the healthier and thriftier it looks; but take and place it in a condition foreign to its nature it would die, because it is placed out of reach of its own element and fails to partake of its natural environments; hence death.

What is true in one case is true of all in the natural world. Each form of life must partake of or correspond with the environment of its own element in order to perpetuate its life, and the better and more perfect that correspondence is, the greater and more perfect is the life produced by it—a perfect correspondence would be a perfect life.

The natural world, then, is the product of a correspondence with worldly environments, be those environments good or bad as the case may be.

The spiritual world is represented in Christ who is the express image of God, and he says: "This is life eternal that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent."

How can we know God and Jesus Christ? If the knowledge of these representatives of the spiritual world is essential to eternal life, which is a life with God, it is of the utmost importance that we know them. As the knowledge of any human personage cannot be obtained without an intimate acquaintance with them, by which we can learn their true character, and the more we live in their environment the better we know them, so also with God and Christ, whose characters and attributes are described in the written word. The more we correspond with or partake of those attributes reflected in his word, the more we know of God, because they are godlike, and will be the passport, by which we will be permitted to dwell with God and receive eternal life.

Eternal life, then, is the result of spiritual life in this world, and spiritual life emanates from God only; the higher we climb up the mountain of spiritual advancement, the nearer we approach the likeness of God. As we climb we look about and below us at the things of the world, and how small and insignificant they appear and not worth the great efforts made to secure them; yet men will spend their entire life to secure material things which must all be left behind when the immortal spirit takes its flight, rather than develop that spiritual life, that godlike character which entitles them to eternal life; a life with God and Christ.

The church is the spiritual body of Christ and as such should reflect the nature and character of Christ; but the church as a body does not reflect that nature and character to any greater extent than each individual reflects it. Yet the church is the light of Christ on earth to be a light to the world.

The world, knowing this, expects better things of those who have formally become members of that body, and to the extent that we fail to come up to that expectation, to that extent do we disgrace the body of Christ and become a laughingstock to the world; the salt is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out and to be trodden under foot of men. It is stated that God added daily to the church such as should be saved. Salvation, then, should be the only motive for joining the church, and as salvation cannot be obtained through any other channel than the God-ordained one, and further, as salvation cannot be obtained either without a subjugation of the carnal mind and a development of the Christ-nature in us, this work then must be performed within the church and there can be no compromise between the

OF GENERAL INTEREST

ENTER THE COOPERATIVE STORE

Can consumers really unite, benefiting themselves by joint action? In the United States there has been a tendency to answer such a question negatively. While the theoretical value of such things as consumers' leagues and middle class unions has been conceded, there has been a general inclination toward the notion that all such combinations are practically of only slight and temporary effect. Whether the overall clubs will encourage more optimistic thinking about things of this sort it is yet too early to say. They certainly show encouraging signs of doing so. Still, at best, overall clubs are transient. As an indication of the consumer's facility in organizing they are only superficial and temporary. A present movement in the United States, that is much more to the point, and therefore the better worth watching; is the quieter but more pervasive effort to establish cooperative stores.

Possibly this sort of activity has attracted less than its merited attention in this country, because cooperative movements are no novelty. Almost everybody has had some experience with a cooperative society. Many have counted such experience to their cost, rather than to their benefit. Cooperative societies, of a sort, are an old story, even in the United States. Yet there is, nevertheless, a new sort of cooperative activity in the country, a sort that is winning success. Out of the old failures it is building a way to new prosperity. It is beginning, apparently, to realize some, at least, of the cooperative ideals. Those who are active in this movement tell us that there are almost 4,000 cooperative stores in the country to-day where only 500 existed two years ago. They tell us, too, that new stores of this kind are being established at the rate of a hundred a month. They explain this almost incredible increase by telling us that the cooperative stores are the means of cutting down the cost of living for all who patronize them. Because the stores do this, they are attracting attention, winning patronage. People who find it none too easy, in these days, to gather the dimes that go to pay for loaves of bread, are becoming interested in stores that enable them to get loaves of bread for 9 cents instead of 10. Perhaps not every cooperative store goes so far as to save its customers 1 cent in every dime, but it is headed in that direction, and in times like the present many patrons are quick to appreciate even small savings.

But this cooperative movement is something much more than a union of consumers to cut the cost of necessary supplies. It is that; and so far as it does that with success, and in a fashion to win and keep new patrons, it is accomplishing much. Its main purpose, however, is gradually to establish the cooperative method for all activities in which the general run of people are directly interested. It aims at a cooperachurch and the world if we expect to graduate and enter celestial glory.

It is quite apparent, however, that all have not counted the cost, when they entered the race; but some like to be on the good side of the world as well as the church and cannot fully separate themselves. They still love the world and the lust of the flesh and the pride of life, but listen to what the Lord says:

"For ye are the temple of the living God; . . . wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord."—Paul.

tive commonwealth, the readjustment of the whole industrial system on a cooperative basis, to the end that all the necessities of life, including ordinary comforts and means to pleasure and recreation, shall be manufactured and distributed strictly for use, and not as a means to the enriching of their manufacturers and distributors. Thus the movement would make of the industrial system something that is "of the people, by the people, and for the people," just as the American system of government is supposed to be of, by, and for the people. But the cooperative movement is guilty of no political day dreaming. It has no intention of working through a political party, or seeking political ends. Its purpose is economic. The cooperative stores are its expression. The promoters of the movement propose to go on establishing cooperative stores by the thousands. "We mean to learn how to run them," they say, significantly. For in the past cooperative stores have failed chiefly because of ignorance of the management. When the movement shall have learned how to run its stores, and how to keep them successful in the face of competitive opposition, then it proposes to acquire land on which to produce its own raw materials and foodstuffs. Then, also, it plans to develop its cooperative banking system, in order, say its promoters, that "the savings of our members may be invested in cooperative enterprises, instead of being put into private savings banks to be invested in private industry." Thus the completed system.

The interesting things to consider in estimating the practicality of such an arrangement, are first, that it does not need to wait for acceptance by the whole people before it can take effect, and second, that it is already getting itself established by orderly process while such methods of industrial betterment as direct action, violent revolution, and political agitation are only tentative and chaotic in their achievements. The cooperative system does not require to be forced upon anybody. It lives by the voluntary support of its members, or not at all. And wherever it lives, its members do not need to wait for its complete success elsewhere, but begin to draw their benefits from so much of cooperation as they themselves have been able to make effective.

But is not the cooperative movement in other countries, indeed, handwriting on the wall for the United States? What a record of expansion and success there is afforded by the correspondence in this newspaper from Manchester, England, in the issues of March 17 and April 29 alone! In Great Britain itself the cooperators already own the biggest flour mills, shoe factories, and weaving plants. They grow a large part of their own wheat in Canada. One fourth of Great Britain's population is said to have joined the movement. Over the countries of Europe the cooperative idea is rolling like a huge snowball, gathering size and weight at every turn. In Russia, where five years ago the cooperative idea was about where it is in the United States to-day, the major portion of production and distribution is now carried on by cooperative methods, and 70 per cent of the population is believed to have joined the movement. The war gave a great impetus to the cooperative movement all over Europe, just as the after-war conditions are giving it a great impetus in the United States now. If the cooperative membership among European nations was increased from 8,000,000 to 25,000,000 in the years of war, one can only wonder what the result will be on the American side of the ocean. One thing is clear, that increasing thousands of people are hoping, with Professor Gide of the University of Paris, that as the war proved to be the deluge, so the cooperative movement may prove to be the ark.—The Christian Science Monitor, May 5, 1920.

TO CELEBRATE THE 300TH ANNIVERSARY OF AMERICA'S ORIGIN

The year 1920 is doubly significant, historically. It marks the 300th anniversary of two important events which led to the founding of the Republic of the United States of America. One is the signing of the Mayflower Compact and the landing of the Pilgrims; and the other is the meeting of the first American Legislative Assembly.

On November 11, 1620, in the cabin of the Mayflower, a tiny bark lying off the Massachusetts coast, a little band of liberty-loving men, from "Brittania," entered into what history has styled the Mayflower Compact. This agreement bound the 41 adult males in the ship's company into a civil body politic for the better ordering, preserving, and furthering of their mutual ends. And it provided for such just and equal laws and offices as should be necessary for the general good of the colony.

Ten days later, so records Doctor Charles W. Eliot's inscription on the Pilgrim Memorial Monument at Provincetown, Massachusetts, "the Mayflower, carrying 102 passengers, men and women and children, cast anchor in this harbor 67 days from Plymouth, England.

"This body politic, established and maintained on this bleak and barren edge of a vast wilderness, a state without a king or a noble, a church without a bishop or a priest, a democratic commonwealth, the members of which were straitly tied to all care of each other's good, and of the whole by every one.

"With long-suffering devotion and sober resolution they illustrated for the first time in history the principles of civil and religious liberty and the practice of a genuine democracy."

Meantime, uninformed of the Pilgrims, fellow colonists of Captain John Smith had met at "James City" (Jamestown), Virginia for the first American Legislative Assembly. On July 30, 1619, they had thus broken ground for the foundation of the present democratic form of government in the United States.

This year (in 1920) these events are being commemorated in the United States, in England, and in Holland. In August, the origin of the Pilgrim movement will be celebrated in England. And early in September, meetings will be held in Holland in memory of the Pilgrims' sojourn in that country.

In September, a "second Mayflower" will set sail from Southampton, England, to follow to the American shore the path taken by the original Mayflower. (But this second Mayflower will be modern, and therefore much more seaworthy than her smaller predecessor.)

This boat, carrying many prominent people of England, Holland, and the United States, will anchor in Provincetown Harbor in late September. Its arrival will perhaps mark the crowning dramatic episode of the entire Tercentenary celebrations.

These events will not be celebrated in the United States by the citizens of Massachusetts and Virginia alone, nor solely by the New England and South Atlantic States. Communities throughout America are planning to take this opportunity to review the "foundation upon which the United States rests,"—and to reemphasize those principles which these ancestors established—and which their sons, their followers, and their followers' sons have handed down to us through our form of representative government.

America is appropriating, from national and state treasures, hundreds of thousands of dollars to be used in plans for the commemoration. One plan is to erect, overlooking Plymouth harbor, a colossal statue of Massasoit, the Indian chief who befriended the Puritan pioneer. Another is to set the Plymouth Rock, which in 1741 was raised above the tide, in its original position.

Seventy American cities, including New York, Chicago, and Boston have started plans for their celebrations of the Tercentenary. The Sulgrave Institution and the American Mayflower Council have been active in coordinating these plans.

Community Service (Incorporated), One Madison Avenue, New York, has drawn up suggestions for the use of communities planning to celebrate. These have been distributed for the use of schools, churches, clubs, and general community groups throughout the United States, and her territories. By writing to Community Service at the above address, individuals can secure valuable information and counsel regarding suitable plays, pageants, tableaux, recitations, ceremonials, and music suitable for use in their communities.

THE REAL CAMPAIGN ISSUE

Each day it is becoming more and more apparent that in so far as American homes and American institutions are concerned, a great moral issue in the present political campaigns, national and state, is that of law enforcement. It was assumed, reasonably perhaps, by the national conventions of the two principal political parties, that in so far as prohibition of the liquor traffic in the United States was concerned, the ratification of the eighteenth amendment had, for all time, determined that issue. The inference may be, if one chooses so to draw it, that both parties and their presidential candidates are reasonably committed to a program of law enforcement. But it cannot be claimed, it would seem, that either party, by direct pronouncement or otherwise, is pledged unreservedly to continue the present enforcement code as a part of the law of the land, or to supplement it, if need be, by the enactment of more effective restrictive measures. It cannot be gainsaid, of course, that in the platforms of both the principal parties, the League of Nations issue, as that issue has been outlined and presented by opposing partisan and individual opinion, has been accepted, for the purposes of the campaign at least, as the paramount issue. There should be no effort, actuated either by sentiment or by individual conviction, to cloud this important issue, if by meeting it fairly and intelligently a step in the right direction may be taken in its final determination.

But recent disclosures have emphasized the importance, while taking care not to submerge the so-called paramount issue of the campaign, of maintaining unceasing vigilance to make certain that the issue of law enforcement, which has projected itself, uninvited, into the campaign, be not determined upon default. As has been pointed out in these columns more than once, there is, unquestionably, an organized effort being made by the representatives of the outlawed liquor interests in all sections of the United States to bring open reproach upon the prohibition enforcement code, and this by making it appear that the law is being openly violated, and that these violations are being winked at by Federal and State officials whose duty it is to see that the law is enforced. Coupled with this attempted "popular nullification" of the enforcement law is the more guarded and quiet effort on the part of the liquor interests to make sure the election of Representatives in Congress and in the State legislatures who will vote to repeal the Volstead Act, or at least to render it even less effective than some now seek to make it appear to be. This effort is being made, as even those responsible for it must realize, contrary to the evident sentiment of the masses of voters of the Nation. It is a determined, and possibly final, attempt of the saloon, the brewery, and the distillery, shorn of the last vestige of their once boasted power in politics, to reassert themselves. Denied a voice in open party councils, they have endeavored, underhandedly and surreptitiously, to inject the issue, in a disguised form, into a campaign in which they had failed to have their pretended claims seriously considered. But candidates secretly or openly committed to the cause of nullification are seeking election in many congressional and legislative districts, and many are aspiring to positions of administrative or judicial authority, although not always openly avowing their affiliations. To defeat these enemies of society and opponents of the established rule of law is the paramount duty of the electorate, the people of the American Union, no matter what may be declared to be the predominant issue of the campaign.—The Christian Science Monitor, September 6, 1920.

A PROBLEM IN DISTRIBUTION

It is one of the most unfortunate factors of modern society, that often it is to the interest of the middlemen, commercial men, wholesalers, and retailers, to permit such fruit as apples and other foods to go to waste, as the profit is greater in a small quantity at high prices.

There are undoubtedly many instances where the commission men or wholesalers have shipped food out and destroyed it. In other instances they have allowed it to rot in box cars, until exposure forced a more reasonable price.

Just now there is considerable discussion of the apple situation. The apple is universally approved, can be prepared in many ways, and is one of the most beneficial fruits for human consumption. Yet the price at which they are sold in the large cities is nearly prohibitive. New York State is one of the States of large apple production. Yet it is doubtful if the apples will be gathered this fall and shipped because the dealers are offering only one cent a pound, a dollar a hundredweight, and the farmers claim that this does not pay them to pack and ship. Yet these apples are sold at many times that price in the city.

Another difficulty is the price of securing barrels or other containers, and transportation.

The same thing has occurred around Saint Louis. Fifty to a hundred miles from the city whole orchards have been allowed to go to waste in years that are past, because of the small amount offered by commission men or wholesalers. At the same time, the price in Saint Louis was decidedly high.

This appears to be a problem that reaches farther than buyer, seller, and producer. It seems to be a case where society itself will have to take a hand. With the shortage of food, it certainly is an indictment of our civilization that we persist in a method that allows so much to go to waste. It is true there is the problem of undue profiteering by the middlemen and retailers. But that is only part of the story. Prosecution alone does not reach the difficulty. It is the preserving of the fruit that is the real point at issue, and its conveyance to the point where it is really needed for human consumption.

THE JEWS IN GERMANY

The Dearborn Independent for August 21 contains a remarkable article concerning the control of the Jews of the finances and industry of the world. The article claims that with the possible exception of the United States, Germany is the most Jew-controlled country in the world. It sets forth that certainly as early as 1905, and probably as early as 1896 they had concluded:

"It is indispensable for our purposes that as far as possible war should bring no territorial advantages. This will shift war to an economic footing. . . . Such a condition of affairs will place both sides under the control of our international agents with their million eyes, whose vision is unhampered by any frontiers. Then, our international rights will eliminate national rights in the narrow sense, and

The Rural Woman As a Factor in the Redemption of Zion

Educators, philosophers, in fact all public-spirited people, are awakened to the necessity of a better country life. The farmer and his business, at first, held the center of attention. However, the farmer's wife, who has hitherto been kept much in the background, has now found a voice also in this stirring field of interest. There is a chapter assigned to her in every book on rural conditions; there is a household and poultry department in most farm papers and journals; there are hundreds of bulletins printed by the United States Department of Agriculture of interest to farm women, most of which are free for the asking; and through the Smith-Lever Act, large funds are appropriated to the extension division of the State agricultural colleges, a large percentage of which is used to disseminate among farm women a knowledge of home economics.

Is all this attention given to farm women justifiable? If the following questions cannot be answered in the affirmative, then all the time and expense spent to elevate conditions of the farm home are worth while.

1. Are the rural women thoroughly prepared for their responsibility as homemakers on the farm?
2. Are they satisfied and contented and happy on the farm?
3. Have they the opportunity for personal development?
4. Are they appreciated?
5. Do they train their children to love the farm?

There needs to be a general elevation of rural life, and especially of conditions surrounding the home. There should be more consideration for the comfort and happiness of the country mother and the children. The ultimate end of the whole farm business should be the welfare and happiness of the family, the happiness which is found in mental and spiritual growth.

"Efficiency" should be the watchword of the home maker as it is of other endeavors. Scientific management is being carried out in every line of work except in the household workshop, which should be made the most efficient place. The home maker should be able to get the most possible out of her labor, with the greatest conservation of her strength, for that strength will be needed for future use. The farm woman needs a greater knowledge to perform her work efficiently than is needed in any other line of endeavor. It is hard to estimate the extent of knowledge which she needs in order to be able to carry on in the most effective manner her work as farm home administrator. She needs science, especially chemistry, physics, and mechanics. She should understand art in the arrangement and selection of pictures and other furnishings of the home; and also for the planning of the home itself; and also art in clothing herself and family. She needs a knowledge of plays and recreation for her community—pageantry, drama, and music. She should have a knowledge of the history of the family, law, records, and will govern the governments as they govern their subjects."

—Protocol 2.

It is stated emphatically that future steps advised in the Zionist Congress of that year of closer association with the Government of Great Britain, in a future world, the peace conference, with the help of England in freeing Jewish Palestine will be created. It states clearly that this was in mind at the sixth Zionist Congress held at Basel in August, 1903.

In addition to this there was laid down in the principles that there should be no annexation through war.

Much of the program then laid down has evidently been carried out, and their control over government and commerce is rather clearly shown.

eugenics. In literature, she should have read much poetry, stories, etc., especially those sacred books which are for spiritual guidance. Then there are philosophy, mathematics, and economics. There is, indeed, not a single part of education that may not be useful to the home maker on the farm; and as very few have had the opportunity of a higher education in their youth, and as almost none have any educational advantages except those brought directly into the home, our Government is rendering an invaluable service to rural women by providing expert home economists to visit their homes and assist them to learn to appreciate the most practical and scientific methods in domestic science.

A few years ago the secretary of agriculture addressed letters to 55,000 rural women asking them to suggest ways in which the United States Department of Agriculture could render more direct service to the farm women of the United States. The answers to these letters proved that there was much dissatisfaction and loneliness among farm women on account of poor educational and social advantages in country communities, and the lack of modern improvements which would free them from unnecessary drudgery and give them more time for study and recreation. Another source of discontent among most farm women is the lack of remuneration. The farm home is an absolutely essential part of the farm. The business of the home is a part of the business of the farm, and should be appreciated as such. The farm woman should be a partner in the farm business and not a subordinate.

There are very few modern rural homes. This is deplorable, for modern homes contribute much to the comfort, health, and happiness of the family and help to hold the young people on the farm. Rural homes should contain a complete water system, a furnace, a lighting system which generates current for washing machine, electric iron, vacuum cleaner, and churn. There should be a sleeping porch and a good waste disposal with septic tank.

A modern home is a necessity on the farm. Many farm women lose at an early age their joy of living, because of the long hours of drudgery in an inconvenient house. They do not have the time or strength to be good mothers to their children. Although there are many things that justify giving more thought to the care and comfort of country mothers, their close relation to the children in the homes warrants the devoting of much consideration to their interests. Farm women cannot in the best sense of the word be caretakers of their children so long as they are crushed into the earth with the overweight of the burdens placed upon them. They should be strong and active and buoyant enough after the work of the ordinary day to take a real interest in the children's affairs, to read to them or tell them a story, or to study for future preparation for their work as mothers. However, the end of each day finds most farm women suffering from such physical and mental exhaustion as to deprive them of the ability or inclination for either the children's or their own development. Their unpleasant and unsatisfying condition on the farm causes most farm women to discourage their children in farm life. Instead, would it not be well to train the sons to assist in the housework, and thus prepare them for more sympathetic care and protection of their future companions?

Do country children have equal educational advantages with the city children? No public-spirited person can ride through the country districts without noticing with dismay the inadequate schools to which the country children go. In these, inexperienced teachers instruct from six to twenty pupils from the first to the eighth grade, inclusive. The most serious difficulties in the rural school problem are to secure modern school buildings; to add agriculture, nature study, home economics, and music to the curriculum of the school; and to provide adequate high schools for the rural communities. These advantages and many others will be secured through the centralization of the district schools and the transportation of the pupils. Through consolidation of the district schools will come better rural education and better agricultural education.

Books, pictures, and music of the best kind should be found in every farm home. Through the rural free delivery of mails, standard magazines, agricultural, daily, and religious papers are carried regularly to thousands of farm homes.

Rural people are conservative and individualistic, not because they are a separate class, but because of their isolation. This isolation is being overcome by the rural telephone, better highways, and the automobile. Rural women are taking advantage of these improved means of communication, and seeing that there is strength in cooperation, they are organizing that they may further the development of better home life on the farm, of more perfect community conditions, and of more satisfactory agricultural opportunities. Our agricultural colleges, through their extension divisions, are glad to assist rural women in introducing into their communities the latest scientific and practical information in every phase of activity pertaining to rural life, by organizing home makers' societies. Organization is an educational force. It arouses discussion and exchange of ideas and stimulates social incentive.

Any rural woman who wishes to be a factor in the redemption of Zion should be quick to take advantage of all the opportunities to bring about this new era into which we are now entering, by studying new and scientific methods of home making and by promoting all advanced ideas in regard to farm life. She should encourage her children to study chemistry, physics, mechanics, and any other science which will help them to compel the forces of nature to become subject to the needs of mankind. Every country mother should encourage her children to take a four-year course in an agricultural college where they will learn the best methods of agriculture and domestic science. She herself should strive for a high degree of efficiency, for the improved and scientific ways of doing things will set her free for a better and higher service to the home and the community.

Our people living in the country should see that their neighbors be given an opportunity to hear the gospel of salvation, through preaching and distribution of literature and by living exemplary lives before them.

All property belonging to church members should be operated on the stewardship basis by men and women who will husband their lands rather than criminally exploit the land for monetary consideration only. Country people should remain on the farm and join a movement having for its purpose that of making the neighborhood a more desirable place in which to live, a place where happiness may reign supreme. Parents should do all they can to prevent their children from migrating to the cities.

Many of our greatest leaders were born and raised on the farm. There is found quietness and peace which permit great mental and spiritual growth. If country mothers do their duty, the church will be able to obtain future leaders from the rural districts.

Rural women who take advantage of the splendid courses offered by our Women's Department will gain much information which will be of inestimable value to them in their efforts to make country life so attractive and efficient that farm people will not be attracted by the allurements of towns and cities.

MINNIE HARRING.

In this great city thousands of people pass our door every day, but we pay no attention to them. They are nothing to us and we are nothing to them. We do not dream of detaining them as they hurry past our door bent on their own business. It is different with those who stand before the door and ask for admission. They have some claim on our attention which we must recognize, if only to get rid of them. But among these how many come only to weary us or to ask favors of us, or because society demands that they should occasionally drop into our parlors and say a few soft nothings, and depart thinking that they have done their duty by us for at least a year. And yet even this poor "calling," which has become one of the dismal forces that we play on one another, is the shadow of a great reality.—Elwood Worcester, in Religion and Life.

Curtis-Jensen Debate

The debate [J. F. Curtis, of the Reorganized Church, verses Nephi Jensen, Utah church] is now a matter of history, and the chief thing I am sorry for is that the whole city of Ottawa did not hear it. It surely was a victory for us. Brother Curtis has a very valuable collection of books, knows them from end to end, and is highly qualified to apply the contents to such men as Mr. Jensen.

The last evening the church was full and it is said there were as many on the outside as inside. There was a young lady who had heard Mr. Jensen preach one evening in a theater who came to the debate every night but one, so she could learn all there was to know about the real truth. She has been a court stenographer, well acquainted with the crooked twistings of some lawyers, and she told Mr. Jensen he should not use such in a religious debate. Just a few evenings before the debate closed she came to me—I was a moderator—to know if she could say a few words at the close of the debate. I gave consent, and to my surprise she had a most excellent address written up, which she read. Then Sister Nolan came forward with a beautiful bouquet and presented it to Brother Curtis on behalf of the audience. I knew the bouquet was coming, but not the address.

Mr. Jensen objected to listening to the address right on the start, for I am certain he knew it was in favor of Brother Curtis. I advised him to sit down, as he was referred to in it as well as Brother Curtis, and he did so. But when he saw the bouquet coming he jumped up and said he had to catch a train—he seemed to have a hard task to catch his breath about that time—so he shook hands with Brother Curtis and rushed out, as the people gave him the laugh, for they knew he had plenty of time. Some of his men waited until it was over and caught the same train, or at least bade him good-by at the station.

The general consensus of opinion is that had we had the Toronto tent we would have had over a thousand in constant attendance, for we had an excellent corner lot all ready for it. However, we are happy in the thought that in the neighborhood where our church is the people will all know we are not Mormons from Utah.

I received your letter relative to either sending or going to New Liskeard. Just at the present the three of us are holding meetings on the street corner where we have had as many as three hundred up to after eleven o'clock at night, with a splendid interest.

(Extract from letter of R. C. Russell, Ottawa, Ontario, to the First Presidency.)

Tent Work in Montana

On August 27 Elder Eli Bronson and myself packed the tent on the Ford and started north, our objective being Opheim, a little inland town just fifty miles north of Glasgow, Montana. The Chautauqua was in town, but would close the next night, so we concluded to wait until they broke camp so we could put our tent on the same place. That night it began raining and rained until Monday; then it cleared up a little so we put up the tent and advertised for meeting that night. When the time came for preaching not very many were present, but we opened by singing as loudly as we could, and Brother Bronson was introduced as the speaker. Just as he was getting warmed up to his subject, off went a very loud explosion just outside of the tent; in fact it was so close that it threw dirt all over it. It scared the people in the tent very much, but we did not stop our meeting. After meeting we found a big hole in the ground and the smell of dynamite was very strong; also with a closer inspection, two other-holes were found with dynamite in that did not go off.

I do not think the intent was to do us any bodily harm, but it was to try to scare us so we would leave town. Well, we have no ancestral heroes that we know of, nor do we claim much of that kind of material ourselves, but we do claim to have just enough Americanism to stand for what we think is right, so we just stayed until we got ready to quit.

The interest was not very good, so we held forth only a week. But I think one of the main reasons the people did not come out was that it was too cold in the tent. When people have to sit with fur coats on it is time to quit tent work. Our tent season in this country is very short. We are packed and will go back to Glasgow to-day, but we are not shaking the dust off our feet against Opheim, but hope to come back yet and convert some of the good people that live here. The Saints living here helped all they could in every way to make the meetings a success.

Your brother in Christ,
GEORGE W. THORBURN.

Central Nebraska Reunion

The reunion and conference of the Central Nebraska District have passed into history, and I think the Saints will all agree in saying we felt repaid for all of our efforts. The people of Meadow Grove attended our services beyond our expectation, and a good feeling prevailed throughout each session. Three brethren were ordained, one to the office of elder, Brother Fry; and Brethren Sodersten and Tuck to the office of priest. These men, if faithful, will do much good.

The preaching was done by Brethren Elliott, Huff, Self, and Gatenby, and all enjoyed a degree of the Spirit. Through the efforts of Brethren Neise, Hutchins, and others, they had the church wired, and had city lights, which made it far more pleasant, and we pray God to bless these brethren for the assistance rendered. It seemed all through that everyone worked to make things pleasant for the others.

We are firmly of the opinion that good was done, and that the people of Meadow Grove and vicinity have a more favorable understanding of our work. We were repeatedly requested to come back again.

The Saints were strengthened and were united in the thought that indeed 'twas good to be a Saint in latter days.

May God bless us as a district, and enable us to answer the ends of our creation, is my prayer.

F. S. GATENBY.

Another Report on the Indian Reunion

The Red Rock reunion was the best ever held in the State. Other meetings have been good and very spiritual, but this Indian reunion was marked with divine favor from first to last.

Apostle Gomer T. Griffiths was in charge. His work was very effectual and encouraging. Patriarch J. W. Wight was an inspiration and blessing to the Saints. Roy V. Hopkins and Brother Wight each were in line as the oracle of God, speaking in tongues and giving the interpretation. Brethren Griffiths, Case, and Chrestensen responded to the voice of the Spirit, and spoke in prophecy. It was a joyous experience. The stamp of divine approval was indeed upon this Indian reunion.

Twenty-nine were baptized, including the chief of the Otoe Tribe, Hoke Dent, his wife, and son, Ralph Dent; Edgar Moore, John Koshiway, Sam Black, Charlie Moore, John Whitahorn, and about seven Indian women, wives of these men. They are all prominent Indians of the tribe.

Twenty-three Indian children were blessed.

Friday was "Indian Day." Their services ended for the day with a dance, the women taking part first. The men in old-time costume, feathers, beads, and bells, danced the war dance.

At its close, Chief Hoke Dent arose and in dignified, solemn ceremony presented the white chief (Gomer T. Griffiths) with the pipe of peace. It was a thrilling scene, and brought forth an outburst of joy and applause. The sentiment and expression of "lasting friendship" thus given and received was gratifying, indeed.

It brought evidence to me of the unfolding of God's favor and the commencing of the hastening time, when the remnant of Laman should realize the blessings of God as promised in the Book of Mormon.

It was a joy to hear and see these leading Indians speak in the meetings, the Spirit of God working with them, and hear their words of appreciation and friendship for the Saints for bringing the message of Jesus Christ to them.

The influence and results of this reunion can hardly be measured at this time, so far as it may refer to the Indian work.

Much credit is due to Brother James E. Yates, as the pioneer among the Otoe Tribe. In their testimonies they often referred to him with much love and friendship.

In gospel bonds,

RICHARD M. MALONEY.

Portland Is Busy

Since our delegates, Brother and Sister Cook and Brother C. E. Jones, returned from General Conference the work here has been moving along rapidly and harmoniously. This city has been divided into three sections or groups with an elder, priest, teacher, and deacon to look after each group, these officers working in the group nearest their place of residence and reporting regularly to the branch president, Brother C. E. Jones.

The branch president now has a first and second assistant: Brethren P. G. Hager and W. H. Baker.

A number of the men, both old and young, have been working diligently to construct a concrete basement, or rather a lower auditorium, in the church building at East Seventy-sixth and Irving Streets, which is nearly completed. When it is finished the basement will be used for primary department Sunday school work, Religio, and midweek prayer meetings, as well as for social and Women's Department work.

Two young men have been ordained to the priesthood, Henry Livingston, priest, and Vincent R. Shultz, deacon.

A new spirit of consecration and love is creeping into the very hearts of the Saints, both young and old, in this place. At the young people's prayer meeting, which is held every Sunday morning at 8.30, we hear such statements as these:

"When I have completed my studies I am going to offer my services to the church and let the men in charge put me where they think I can accomplish the most good for the work," or "Pray for me that I may be able to consecrate my time and my substance entirely to the Master's cause." Sometimes a young man or perhaps a young lady will say: "Why should we work day in and day out to make money for some rich man who doesn't need it? I want to work for the upbuilding of Zion where the profits will go to those who are in need."

Isn't that the right spirit?

The last few days we have been going to church every night to listen to Brother E. L. Kelley, and we can assure you the time has been well spent. We have all caught at least a portion of that spirit of love that he carries with him. It must be contagious.

To-morrow evening Brother Garver, president of Lamoni Stake, will address us. He and Brother Holloway stopped here last week and at the request of Brother Kelley occupied part of the time last Thursday evening and promised to return soon.

Last Monday, Labor Day, the Sunday school gave a picnic at Columbia Park.

Yours in gospel bonds,

VINCENT R. SHULTZ.

The only failure a man ought to fear is failure in cleaving to the purpose he sees to be best.—George Eliot.

Northeastern Kansas

At Fanning, September 3, 4, and 5. James A. Thomas, Frank G. Hedrick, and J. W. Roberts chosen to preside: Mrs. Ethel Dittmore Johnson in charge of the music; and Misses Florence Wolfe and Bertha Dittmore, pianists. The Religio Department was in charge of Ira G. Whipple and Roy L. Tilden, and W. F. Bolinger directed the Sunday school work. The Women's Department held a general meeting at 3 p. m. Friday, in charge of Mrs. Emma Hedrick, district organizer. General superintendent, Mrs. Audentia Anderson, conducted a round table which was of much interest to the conference attendants. The evening session was devoted to the women's work, the leading feature of which was a very interesting lecture by Sister Anderson on women's part in the redemption of Zion. Mrs. Grace Thompson Thomas discussed work of the Orioles, and Ira G. Whipple and Cecil E. Schmid presented the work of the boy movement. Saturday sessions were devoted to conference business. At 8 p. m. a very inspirational musicale was given by the orchestra under the leadership of Orlando Nace of Independence, in which musicians from Saint Joseph and Independence participated. The soloists were Miss Florence Wolfe, piano; Mrs. Ethel Johnson, soprano; Clayton Wolfe, tenor; Brother J. G. Jurgens, baritone; and Brother Nace, violin. The Sunday services began with a young people's prayer meeting at 8.30 a. m. followed by Sunday school session at 9.30, sermon at 11 o'clock by J. W. Roberts. Baptismal services at 2.30 p. m., at which three candidates were baptized by Samuel Twombly, followed by confirmation and sacrament services at 3 p. m. The closing sermon of the conference was by J. W. A. Bailey at 8.30 p. m., preceded by a thirty-minute song service.

The attendance was the largest of any in the district for some years past, and all sessions were of a highly spiritual and intellectual order. Monday was devoted to recreational activities, the Fanning local ball team challenging the priesthood, and a very "hotly" contested game was held in which the preachers were defeated. J. W. A. Kansas City Stake

First Presidency: This is to convey to you information touching the Kansas City Stake and conditions as they appear. The work is progressing nicely in most all of the churches and their groups. In two places conditions are not good, but this is because of a number of Saints changing locations to better their environment and get into more favorable surroundings. As soon as it is possible we will get rid of the church buildings and build in more favorable places.

Our stake is steadily growing by letters of transfer and baptisms. Considerable activity is manifested in several places. In one locality three sisters with a few helpers distributed two thousand tracts last week and are endeavoring to duplicate it this week in another locality.

The Women's Department is extending their work and increasing their workers and classes under the advice and direction of the stake presidency.

The Stake Sunday school also is starting an educational propaganda under our direction which will reach into each school of the stake and help in making new teachers and workers, as well as develop a greater efficiency upon the part of those already in service.

We closed a very good conference held over last Sunday, also Monday night. Meetings largely attended and of a high order. The business session was very harmonious and conducted expeditiously. This conference was held in our new church nearing completion at Mount Washington. They have a neat, commodious building there and should feel proud of their new home.

Reports to the conference show activity on the part of many of the local ministry. We feel encouraged and look into the future with confidence and inspired hope. With personal regards, I am

Sincerely,
J. A. TANNER, Stake President.

Holden Stake

First Presidency: The condition of the work in this part of the vineyard is encouraging. So far as the church in Warrensburg is concerned, peace and unity prevail. We are trying to make the work all that the name or word implies, realizing that the day requires diligent and persistent work on the part of all in order that the objective may be reached.

We have quite a large advertising program and campaign on at the present time. It will include a systematic tracting of the town. We have free access to our local press, which we appreciate.

I baptized a fine young woman a week ago Sunday. We have some splendid young people here. I am trying to keep very near to them and I am trying to direct them in every way that will result in good to the church.

Ever praying for the progress of the great work, I remain,
Very sincerely,

FRED A. COOL.

WARRENSBURG, MISSOURI.

Southern California

It has been a long time since I have contributed anything to your columns. Many of our friends have wondered why we did not write more often. We have left this part of the work to abler pens, or typewriters, as the case may be.

We are glad to report that the work is going onward in this district. The recent reunion was a good one and the spirit of good will prevailed throughout. It was held at Convention Park, Hermosa Beach. The regular attendance was better through the week than before. The ministers taking part in the preaching were blessed with liberty in presentation and thought. Brother and Sister F. G. Pitt were a great help in their ministrations. The study hour at eight o'clock each morning proved a great benefit. Sisters Dora Glines and Ella Harris were valuable teachers, and we heard many a word of appreciation. Brethren Wixom, Pitt, and Simmons were in charge of the reunion and Brethren Wixom and R. T. Cooper presided at the district conference held August 7. The reports were encouraging, and some important matters were passed upon.

A new set of district rules was adopted which were more in harmony with the advanced orders in the church. A draft of these rules was ordered printed for use in the several branches. The recommendation of the district president that the district purchase a tent for missionary purposes was referred to the district presidency and branch presidents with power to act. Further recommendations suggesting the putting in of gas and electricity on the reunion grounds and securing of some family of Saints to reside in the cottage on the grounds were passed upon with favor.

The ordination of Brother Luther Parks of Santa Ana to the office of deacon was provided for. Bishop's agent Henry F. Backer showed that the work was being sustained in a financial way. The election of officers resulted in the choice of the following: district president, David E. Dowker; vice president, D. Amos Yates; secretary, Amy Turner Lewis; historian, Harold D. Motter; and member of auditing committee, D. Arthur Lewis. Brother H. F. Backer was sustained as Bishop's agent and treasurer. Sister Lois Aldridge was sustained as chorister. A reunion committee consisting of eleven members was provided for. Brother Frank B. Van Fleet, Frank W. Burton, Harold D. Motter, Abner Anthony, Frank Anthony, and Peter Kauffman were chosen to act on this committee. The appointment of the two sisters who are to act on this committee was left to the district presidency. The presidency forms a part of the committee. The conference adjourned to meet in Los Angeles in February.

We were able to get a good write-up of our reunion in all the leading papers of southern California. This assisted in advertising the gathering. Brother James A. Gillen was with the Los Angeles branch last Sunday. The church was filled to capacity and Brother Gillen gave us two splendid sermons. Much good was done by his visit.

Ever praying for the blessing of God to be with his people, I am,

Your brother,
DAVID E. DOWKER.

Des Moines District

First Presidency: The month of August has been one of progress and spiritual uplift in the Des Moines District. Our reunion was marked by the spirit of devotion and consecration and the Saints caught a vision of the possibilities of the work and their personal application to it. It was the most spiritual we have ever enjoyed and its effects will be far-reaching. The missionary zeal and enthusiasm is spreading.

After the reunion I came to Rhodes and am now in the first week of a two-weeks' series of meetings. This will take me up to my going to Graceland. Weather conditions, other attractions, etc., have interfered, but we feel that good is being accomplished. I have experienced a greater degree of inspiration than ever before. With this added inspiration, the necessity for preparation looms up larger than ever before. So I am looking forward with expectancy to my year at Graceland.

Fraternally yours,

ROY CHEVILLE.

RHODES, IOWA.

Southern Wisconsin Reunion

The general work of this district is moving forward for the most part. Since my return to this district since the late General Conference, I have visited all but one branch in the district, that of East Delavan. Meetings have been discontinued there for some months, but in the near future I hope to visit that place and see if there is a possibility of again getting the few scattered Saints to meeting in their neat little church where once there was a thriving branch, but many moved away and some failed to remember the injunction to meet together.

The district reunion met at Monona Park, Madison, Wisconsin, August 27 to September 5, and was well attended and proved to be a very spiritual gathering. The gift of prophecy was three times enjoyed and by it the Saints were directed to be earnest and that the gathering should be blessed. This was realized in the latter part of the reunion, after there had been three fasts observed, very willingly, by the Saints assembled.

Four were baptized during the reunion, and one called to the office of priest, Henry Woodstock of Madison, Wisconsin, and his ordination was provided for and will be attended to in due time. His services will be much appreciated by the Madison branch. The preaching during the reunion was of a very spiritual nature and much good, sound instruction was given to those of the church as well as to outsiders that attended at times. All the speakers advertised, as directed by the First Presidency, were present: Patriarch James Davis, C. E. Wight, M. A. McConley, B. C. Flint, and J. O. Dutton. Besides these, Elder E. J. Lenox, missionary of northern Wisconsin, now living in Evansville, Wisconsin, attended and acted as one of the committee, and gave very valuable service as well as assisting in preaching. Brother W. A. McDowell, whom we did not expect to attend, arrived the latter part, from the Northeastern Illinois reunion and as ever preached some good sermons. Elder C. H. Burr of Plano also attended for the most part of the reunion and preached several times, with a lot of his old-time energy and earnestness. Brother Davis was kept quite busy with giving blessings, preaching, and presiding over some prayer meetings. Brother Wight had charge of the institute work for the Sunday school, and also gave us one special sermon on Graceland College. Brother McConley did well his part, preaching some good missionary sermons and on the general outlook of the future of the church. Brethren Flint and Dutton were kept busy as committeemen and also presiding over the reunion with Brother McConley as its presidency, also preaching as best they could. There were present a number of the local men of the elders and also of the Aaronic priesthood; these all willingly assisted wherever there was an opportunity for them to do so.

Through the instruction of the Spirit, the eldership and Aaronic priesthood were admonished to move out and magnify their callings, as some in the past had failed to do their duty in this regard.

The committee started in with $99.05 and closed with $189.98 to the good. One thing that made this possible was some liberal donations of apples, corn, etc., by one Mr. Johnson not yet of the church, who we hope will be soon; also milk donated by Brother F. Carpenter, one of the committee who was hindered by his business, but who supplied the camp with good milk. Two liberal collections were also had that took care of the missionary expense.

Now I see that I have overlooked two very important matters. As advertised, Brother A. H. Mills representing the musical department of the church, was present four days and did much along his line of work, having one day known as "Music Day," closing with a musical entertainment, much enjoyed by all who attended. Sister Mary Woodstock, our district chorister, had much of the work in hand before Brother Mills arrived. We certainly want this special musical effort in the coming years. Remember, Brother Mills.

The Women's Department received proper attention under the direction of Sister Effie Hield, district organizer of southern Wisconsin. A special tent was provided and therein the women held many interesting sessions, beside one in the main auditorium tent.

Brother Norman Hield, president of the district Religio, being obliged to be away, excepting the last of the reunion, C. E. Wight was placed in charge of the activities of the young, and under his wise direction a good time was had, melons were eaten, wieners were roasted, buns disappeared, and marshmallows—you can guess the rest!

The district conference met the last Saturday of the reunion. J. O. Dutton was sustained for the remainder of the conference year as district president. By him N. E. Hield was nominated as vice president of the district and ratified by the conference. A reunion was provided for in 1921 at Madison, at Monona Park, exact time left to the district presidency. The conference adjourned to meet at Evansville at the call of the district presidency in December.

Monday following being Labor Day saw a lot of willing workers, busy clearing the grounds of tents and storing away the general belongings of the reunion. This was all done by night, and thus closed a very pleasant and profitable reunion and conference.

Your servant in Christ,
J. O. DUTTON.

EVANSVILLE, WISCONSIN.

In The Brisbane (Australia) Courier we note two items referring to Elder John W. Rushton. He spoke at a Strength of Empire Congress, and emphasized that those who would stir up bad blood between two great nations that had done so much for the benefit of mankind and democracy, did not represent the true feeling of the people of the United States and Great Britain. He emphasized, also, that every man owed it as a duty to himself to give his best in the service of the community, and that government, following Gladstone's theory, should make it easy to do good, and hard to do evil. Such a state would insure that sound health is guaranteed to every child born into the world. The most surprising feature is to note that in both items he is referred to as J. W. Rushton, of Canada. We are sure our Canadian brethren will be pleased to know this.

In the "Pine Tree" State

The writer was sent by the appointing powers from the State of the Apple Blossom (Michigan) to the Pine Tree State (Maine). We were reluctant to leave the dear Saints and friends in our home town and district, as we had learned to love them, as a result of their many acts of kindness and their cooperation in assisting us in discharging our duties while among them. But with faith in God we launched out into the sea of life to enter into our first missionary experiences, having promised God so many times that we would go where he wished us to go, "over mountain or plain or sea."

It was with trusting faith and implicit confidence in God that we came to Maine, not knowing what to expect concerning our future work, not being acquainted with conditions here. We knew not whether we were to enter uncultivated fields, or unblazed trails. However, we were comforted before leaving Michigan by the voice of the Spirit, when we were told that the angels of God were preparing the hearts of the people to greet us when we came.

We left home May 31, 1920, arriving in Detroit the following day. Here we lingered, visiting friends and loved ones, and started from the metropolis of Michigan June 3. Crossing the extreme southern part of Canada we entered the State of New York, thence into Massachusetts, crossing the State to the beautiful historic city of Boston. Here we were privileged to see many interesting scenes. Then pursuing our journey, starting norward and crossing the State of New Hampshire into the State of Maine, we wended our way eastward to the Eastern Maine District, arriving at our destination June 5. The scenery of the States we were privileged to enter was beautiful, and as we gazed upon the beautiful works of nature, the massive granite walls, the waterfalls, inland lakes, mountains, and verdant hills, many of which were covered with attractive forests of evergreen, then viewing for the first time the Atlantic Ocean, we were inclined to say, "My God, how wonderful thou art!"

An auto awaited us at the station and took us over the winding roads of Maine a distance of twelve miles to the little city of Jonesport, beautifully situated on the water front. We were taken at once to the hospitable and friendly home of Brother and Sister W. E. Rogers. Here all that kind hearts and loving hands could do was done to make the "little missionary" comfortable and contented. And after our long journey alone, seeing strange scenes and faces, weary and hungry, we were so tenderly cared for, our hearts were made to rejoice in the gospel and with moistening eyes we felt to say, "Blest be the tie that binds our hearts in Christian love." The following day was Sunday, and Brother Rogers took us about to visit some of the Saints of the village, and we were most happily surprised to meet many noble and devoted Saints. We went to the church, where we feasted our eyes upon what the diligent and consecrated labors of the Saints and the missionaries who had preceded us here had accomplished, a beautiful building, commendably tidy and clean, splendidly finished and furnished throughout. We learned of the faithful labors of the many missionaries who had been laboring here for years, some of whom are occupying the high councils of the church to-day, how they had braved the storms and hardships of the early days of the work, how they had built up a splendid thriving branch of near three hundred members at Jonesport and branches at Corea, South Addison, Kennebec, and Beals Island.

We felt our limitations and weaknesses, but also realized God had sent us here and feeling that what he had done for others he could do for us, we took our place behind the sacred desk for the first time in our new field.

A large number of people had met together to hear the "new minister," and under the spell of many eager eyes and listening ears and the Spirit of God we were blessed in presenting the word and preached an old gospel sermon.

After we had finished and all seemed satisfied with what the "little minister" had done, we breathed easy.

The Saints as a whole were very kind to us. We were privileged after a few days to visit the home of Brother and Sister David Joy at South Addison, and here we were made to feel right at home. We preached to fair audiences each evening for a week, then we went to the Island of Beals, and were again greeted by good-sized audiences.

We also visited Corea Branch for a week, preaching to them each night. Here the branch is patiently cared for by Elder James Clark. We met with the Saints in conference on Beals Island, becoming acquainted with many we had not previously seen, among them Elder A. B. Phillips, our missionary supervisor of Boston, Massachusetts. A splendid spirit prevailed throughout the conference and we all felt encouraged. After the conference the writer with the assistance of the local men of Jonesport held forth in the Union Church at West Jonesport, with fair interest. On August 5, we were privileged to lead one, a little girl, into the waters of baptism. We then went to a new opening, a place called Wyman, and held forth in a little schoolhouse for three weeks. Each night the building was more than filled. We had the privilege of baptizing three adults there. We expect to return there ere long. Last Saturday we had the privilege of leading two more into the waters of baptism, young girls who are to attend Graceland this year. On Sunday we again entered into the waters of baptism, baptizing six more, one of whom was baptized by Priest L. W. Hinkley. We feel God is blessing our labors. Maine is a very picturesque State, and we greatly enjoy the gentle ocean breezes and its succulent products.

Faithfully yours,
O. L. THOMPSON.

Echoes From Kirtland

The reunion of 1920 has passed into history, perhaps as one of the great events of this part of the world. It was a remarkable time, and all that were privileged to attend enjoyed a season of refreshing. Some were so wrought upon by what they heard and saw that they even rented rooms for the 1921 reunion before leaving for their homes. The news of the reunion will be left to more capable writers, while I turn my attention to current happenings.

The old historic building, the "House of the Lord," is growing in prominence every day and bids to be a great landmark and historic center of northern Ohio.

I thought that a great work was being done fifteen years ago, when during the entire year of 1905 I was privileged to meet and talk with twelve hundred people, inform them of our faith and belief and point out the glaring differences between the true church of Christ and the apostates in Utah; while now, fifteen years later, in the single month of August, I have met over fourteen hundred people of almost every shade of belief, hundreds of them perfect strangers to the work, and ignorant of our position as a church. Opportunities for preaching to them have been many, and every opportunity taken advantage of. Hundreds who were ignorant of our position as a church in regard to teachings and practices, when taught the simple truth of the matter are willing to concede that this church is unjustly discriminated against. Many friends are being made to the work and many are the friendly handshakes and words of appreciation as the people leave the place. It is surely gratifying to see how many people there are who despise misrepresentation.

When I was traveling as a missionary from place to place and preaching every night I surely thought that I was a busy man, and if I were permitted to meet five or six strangers at a meeting it was an encouraging sign and that not every day.

While now, located at the wonderful seat of inquiry, I am not only permitted to meet the fives and sixes but the hundreds; privileged to talk to crowds that fill the aisles and many of the seats in the Lord's house.

The minds of the people seem to be prepared for the teaching of the law of stewardships as a panacea for the world's ills, and also the law of tithing as the only just means of financing a religious institution.

The law of compensation as a law of final adjustment between God and man seems to appeal to them readily. The idea of a heaven for a few of the elect and eternal punishment for the masses is not so readily believed as it was a few years ago.

People are looking for the real to-day and not so much for the imaginary—which will finally place us as a church in the limelight. As this occurs our responsibilities increase.

Kirtland has been designated as the gateway to Zion. If this be true, then it holds a very responsible place in the making of the much-looked-for city of the Saints, Zion. The writer in accord with that which was given at the last reunion through Brother W. W. Smith realizes in a measure what is in the future for Kirtland. As the "House of the Lord."

A. E. STONE.

Observations on Zion From Australia

It is with much pleasure I note the growing zeal manifested since the late General Conference convened, toward the real redemption of Zion, and trust there will be no cessation of activities, either in word or deed, until we occupy the land designated by the Lord for this purpose. Years have come and gone with bright and cheerful hopes advanced in theory by many, but little or nothing has been done in a practical way toward the consummation of the purpose decreed by the Almighty. "For yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be; yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be. But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace."

This granting of stewardships and inheritances, as an abiding place in the time of distress and trouble which is fast slipping over the whole earth like an avalanche with an assurance of its continuation in the life which is to come, is certainly an inspiration in itself, that lifts one's heart in admiration and praise to the designer of such a wonderful scheme. But it can only be accomplished by being co-laborers together with Christ, whom God has given to be the head of all things to the church, and placed the burden of the government upon his shoulders, that he should not only lead, but direct in all this great work.

"Hope deferred maketh the heart sick," and we have delayed so long in making a real start to build up Zion that some have grown weary and heartsick in waiting, while others talk of making their own holdings their inheritances, in the midst of Babylon.

As all are admonished to be subject to the higher powers in the church, it is not only their privilege, as leading representatives, to point out the way, but it is their duty to set the example by moving forward and manifesting their faith by their works. "If you are to be called leading men, you must become leaders of men," is the late admonition of the Spirit, and like their master, must go before the flock sounding the invitation to follow on.

No doubt unlooked-for obstacles and difficulties of every description will be strewn in our pathway, that to the human eyes look insurmountable, but the power behind the throne will quickly banish them all when we take it to heart to move forward. I have seen big horses stuck fast with a moderate load which they could easily pull, because they would not all move forward together. The Lord is not only willing, but anxious that we buy up and occupy the land in the regions round about Zion, and the Saints have the wherewithal to do it, but until we make a long, strong pull, and pull all together, we will remain just where we are.

"Talk is cheap, but money buys land," and the land must be purchased, otherwise we shall receive no inheritance. It seems folly to wait for land to get cheaper from some unforeseen cause, such as plague, or famine, for every year it is getting dearer. A friend of mine here in Australia just sold his farm of forty acres of cornland at $750 per acre, which makes one wonder what the end will be. It had $7,000 worth of corn on it this year.

I am pleased to read the accounts given in the HERALD, where some of the missionaries have found people who were hungry for the bread of life. I have not found any of late like that, in my experience, for all seem to have their minds full of strikes, pleasure, and almost everything excepting religion. Our religion appeals to their reason, but they seem not to have the heart to accept of it. Perhaps when we demonstrate our belief in Zion, in a practical way, it will attract more attention.

Yours fraternally,
C. A. BUTTERWORTH.

Gems From the Northern California Reunion

The following are presented as golden thoughts gathered from the sermons preached at the Northern California reunion at Irvington, August 19 to 29.

Illustrating the need of the people becoming more intelligent in order to protect themselves against profiteers: Mules get rid of wolves by putting their heads together in a circle and kicking them away or to death. As another instance: An attendant in an asylum for the insane was once asked: "Are you not afraid these people will combine against you and kill you?" "No," he answered, for if they had had that much sense they would not have been sent here." So also if the people had enough intelligence to organize against the speculators, they would not have been in their present plight.

Don't throw sprags in the wheel of progress because you are not on the band wagon.

Faith is a substance, so Paul says, and so is electricity, the wind, and other things which we cannot see. We may not be able to fully understand their nature but we can discern their effects. The same is true of faith.

"God is," not merely was or will be, and "is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him"; not heretofore or hereafter alone, but now. Both of these affirmations are in the present tense as indicated by the word is.

We should not tie ourselves to what our parents knew about religion any more than we restrict ourselves to what they knew of other things. We would not refuse to travel in a steamship because our parents came to America in a sailing ship, nor refuse a train or auto because they came to California in a handcart or oxcart, or decline to live in a bungalow because their home was a log cabin, or reject an electric light because they had a tallow candle.

"Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel? May I not wash in them and be clean?" In other words: "Are not man's ways better than God's? Why not follow them?"

The act of Zaccheus illustrates the need of a forward vision. Details are immaterial. We often concern ourselves about incidentals rather than fundamentals. The tree he used does not matter. The main point is he got a vision of Jesus, and so should we, although we may differ as to the details in procedure.

What man can do is an insufficient means of illustrating what God can do. It helps but it is not entirely sufficient. We might almost as well attempt to illustrate the size of the California redwood trees to the people of the East by a toothpick, or the immensity of the ocean to the people of the Middle West by a cup of water.

Since the rich man knew Lazarus in the next world as the result of such association as was possible between an aristocrat and a beggar, it follows that all people must recognize their loved ones, and the saints each other, hereafter.

Man can repair and make again the machine he invented and built himself. What can God do? He, as the Great Architect and Builder of the universe, should be able to repair (heal) and reconstruct (resurrect) the machine, man, which he created. If he cannot or will not, or, rather, if we affirm that he cannot or will not, we are denying to him what we are willing to admit in regard to any other mechanic. Man, by means of the phonograph, has been able to reproduce the human voice. Can and will the Almighty reproduce the human voice by reconstructing the organs of speech and the being back of it?

We are told in the New Testament that baptism is "for the remission of sins." This is so because it celebrates the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ. Saint Paul says we are "baptized into the death of Christ." Christ shed his blood "for the remission of sins," hence baptism is in order to pardon. Further: The church is "the body of Christ." Therefore, his blood must circulate through his mystical body. Baptism initiates us into the church and thus brings us into contact with his blood. And this baptizing was, in New Testament times, attended to as soon as there was satisfactory evidence of conversion. There was no six months' probation.

The true solution of the world's troubles is in altruism rather than egoism. Swedenborg says: "There are three kinds of love, the love of God, the love of one's neighbor, and the love of self." The wealthy men should remember that it should not be a question of what they own but of what they owe, that is, their responsibility to others. In other words, they should think more of their duties than of their rights. The rich young man did not so much possess his wealth as it possessed him. The same is true of all others who accumulate riches for themselves and are not "rich toward God." If we think only of ourselves we shall be left to indulge ourselves in the consolations (?) of self love. If we love others we shall be loved by them. If we hate we shall be hated. "Whatsoever a man sows he shall also reap." The German trio was faith, hope, and hate instead of faith, hope, and love. She sowed the seeds of hate and has reaped and is still reaping a harvest of animosity.

Missionaries to Islands Report Their Trip

News from the islands of the sea! The S. S. Marama, after a calm, uneventful trip, landed us safely in the harbor of Papeete last Saturday evening, the 24th. We feel that it will be interesting to your readers to know something about our voyage and the manner in which Tahiti welcomed us.

Leaving Lamoni, July 4, with the heart prayers and kind wishes of the Saints there, we traveled toward the coast via Saint Joseph and Denver. We were fortunate enough to go from Denver to Salt Lake City by the Rio Grande route, passing through the Royal Gorge and Tennessee Pass. The Gorge resembles nothing so much as a monument to chaos, overwhelming one into silence by the immensity of its shapelessness.

Arriving in Salt Lake City, we were met at the depot by Brother L. G. Holloway, who, with his characteristic kindness, did everything he could to make our brief stop-over interesting and worth while. He took us to see the historical sites of the city, and we visited the scenes of Mormon activity. The tabernacle seems to us to be an overexaggerated topic of this city of the wilderness. It is merely a large, low building, with ordinary acoustics, nothing remarkable about it, except perhaps the organ, which is a very fine specimen of that instrument. We went to the pavilion of Saltair, bathing in the heavy waters of the lake, and providing ridiculous amusement for Brother Holloway and F. M. McDowell who seemed accustomed to the strange behavior of the waters. The impression of this city and of the Utah Mormon Church was commercial. There seems little religion about the place.

Leaving Salt Lake City the next day, we passed by the stupendous stretch of salt beds, and entered the great desert of America, where we passed through a very uncomfortable time, having to meet a small sand storm which filled the compartments with dust, and, incidentally, our mouths and ears. But the discomforts of this part of our journey were well repaid when we passed through the Feather River Pass, the beautiful winding canyon of California. There is little of the jagged immensity characteristic of the Colorado Grand Canyon, but the verdant hills and the varicolored rocks, in contrast with the ribbon of blue turquoise which runs at their feet, make a picture of beauty and grandeur which is both impressive and restful to the eye. We arrived at San Francisco Saturday evening, a tired and dusty party, and it was indeed a relief to see the smiling face of Brother Hartsough, the branch president, who was the very personification of kindliness and courtesy. He arranged our luggage, found us good sleeping and boarding accommodation, and during our last few days in America, made us completely at home with the Saints. Through his help all things were made ready for our voyage and on Tuesday, the 13th, we left the land of Zion, after a generous and loving farewell from the San Francisco and Oakland Saints.

As soon as we got beyond the Golden Gate, the sea became a little choppy, making us a little indisposed. However the trip was on the whole calm, although the boat was rather top-heavy and one or two days we had to meet severe head winds, which always mean a heavy rolling of the ship. None of us were seriously sick except Sister Elliott, who was ill when we went on board, though at the present moment she is much stronger and after a few days' rest will have completely recovered from the effects of the journey.

The passengers on board, with scarcely an exception, were very friendly and sympathetic, and we passed many a pleasurable hour of discussion and chat. On Sunday evening I had the privilege of preaching to an appreciative audience in the dining saloon. Two or three of the passengers were intensely interested in our religion, one lady saying she had been looking for the light for many years.

A very interesting bit of news is that we unexpectedly met three Utah Mormon missionaries on the second day out who were going to Papeete. I was introduced to one of them, and asked him point blank if he were a Latter Day Saint, but he denied it. He said he was going to some friends of that religion in Tahiti. He had, however, told others of the passengers that he and his two companions were Mormon missionaries, that they were going to Papeete for one year, that they believed in polygamy, but that they had no desire to get into any argument. These three missionaries were young men who seemed to know little concerning the issues, but I have no doubt they will try to cause trouble for us here.

I also met a Roman Catholic, Father Ryan, whom Sister Hanson happened to know since he used to live in Holden. He was a very broad-minded man, a rare type of Catholic, and one night we had an interesting discussion concerning his church. According to his statements, his faith in his church was based on the consistency of Christ in saying that his church should never fail. Here of course came a question of the definition of the term church. It was a very interesting argument and Father Ryan and I parted on very good terms.

And now I come to the best part of my narrative. The last day of the journey found us seventy-five miles from Tahiti at noon. Every eye was looking past the forward end of the ship towards land. About two o'clock the hitherto indistinct outline on the horizon assumed the form of a mountainous island. It was Tahiti, with its companion, Moorea. As we approached nearer and nearer, the barren, grayish appearance of the hillsides changed to the greens and browns and reds of moss and fern. The towering peak in the center of Tahiti reared its head high above the fleeting white clouds which formed a perfect ring around the middle of the hill. Now the smaller objects became more distinct; first, the lighthouse, then the wireless station, the ships in the harbor, the little houses on the shore, the plantations on the hillside, and the winding road along the sea front.

The ship now takes a turn and slowly approaches the harbor of Papeete. In between the break in the coral reef we passed, gliding gently into the calmest of calm water, coming to rest a few hundred yards from the shore. Never shall we forget that picture. No words can describe the wild simplicity of the scene as it appeared to us that summer evening. It was a perfect closing to a beautiful day. The glassy surface of the lagoon vied with the cloudless sky in reflecting the most beautiful blue that it is possible to conceive. The rapidly setting sun changed the color of the hillsides from green to gold, while the stately palms and flowering trees all along the shores of the bay lent a touch of native color which can only be appreciated by those who have once seen it. It was indeed the Paradise of the Pacific.

Our lips were awed to silence. The soothing splendor of it all left us speechless. And when we were able to say anything, it was the trite: "My! How beautiful!" repeated again and again to each other.

So we came to our new home. After the doctor's inspection the ship approached the wharf, and we disembarked amid a motley crowd of Frenchmen, Chinese, and the smiling Polynesians. We were afraid that, since we had left a month or so earlier than was expected, there would be no one to meet us at the wharf, but we were happily surprised to see all the white missionaries, Brethren Brown, Karlstrom, and Christensen. It was a meeting of rejoicing for us all. There was Paia, with his smile of welcome, his heart just overflowing with love and joy. There were others of the native brethren, and their welcome was sincere and happy. With their help our luggage was taken to the mission headquarters, a few blocks from the dock. We would that many of you could have been with us that night. We came to the mission house, unloaded our luggage, and then went in a body to the church. There, in the quiet silence of the house of God, waited the Saints of the isles of the sea for their missionaries from Zion. As we entered, the Spirit of God touched our hearts and we could not help but shed tears of joy at the simple, heartfelt welcome of our brothers and sisters. For, no sooner had we taken our seats than their voices were raised in glad hymns of praise and welcome. They sang the songs of Zion, and our hearts were taken to those in the center place who also sang these songs under the same influence of joy and peace which settled over us in this far-away mission. We wish we could describe for you the beauty and richness of their voices as they sang such songs as "Lead me, O my Savior, lead me," "Great and marvelous," and others like them.

After prayer and addresses of welcome and response, the meeting was closed and we spent an hour or two in getting acquainted with everyone, having a real happy time together. At a late hour we went to bed, tired and happy to be with those for whom we had planned to be of service.

We could tell of many more of the incidents which have colored for us the first days of our stay in the South Seas, but believe this letter is now too long. We can simply say that our hearts are glad to find that the Lord has thus far taken care of us, and has blessed us with a safe journey and a loving reception at the end. As we sit here our eyes are turned toward America, beyond the rolling of the surf, and our hearts go up to God in prayer that he will bless your efforts to redeem Zion, so that his promises to his people may be fulfilled and the work in the islands of the sea be sealed up before him.

FRANK B. ALMOND.

Social and Industrial Conditions in Britain

Apostle Williams describes some of the disturbed conditions which are testing the stability of the British Government.

The British Government is sore pressed. The ship of state is passing through troubled waters. A treacherous coast, a storm at sea, and a mutinous crew are a bad combination. Such is England's plight.

Lloyd George has a man's job. His test of statesmanship is future, not past. He will either win out and become the greatest prime minister in English history or pass into eclipse. His hour is near. It cannot be delayed.

The civil war in Ireland, the arrest and imprisonment of Mr. MacSwiney, lord mayor of Cork, the impending miners' strike, the newly formed council of action, the threat of revolution in England, are each and all symptoms of impending catastrophe. All these are internal.

Coupled with the above is the unsettled state of Europe, the Bolshevik menace, the revolution in Mesopotamia, the danger of revolt in India, the reaction on the part of the Arabs in Palestine against the Zionist invasion, the entire absence of a concert of action by the allied nations, with an ever-increasing danger of the entire collapse of the League of Nations, all of which reveal the chaotic condition of things this side the Atlantic.

England is between two extremes in her treatment of Ireland. To grant an Irish republic and still maintain a kingdom in the rest of Britain is unthinkable to the defenders of the realm. A "free Ireland" would be a perpetual menace to constitutional England.

On the other hand it would seem that England must resort to methods which she has decried in other nations if she would conserve any semblance of English Government in Ireland. England may well wish the Irish question settled. Ireland is England's nightmare. It is well to remark that Irish "martyrs" will sit at the peace table when the Irish question is settled.

The issue between the miners and the government is about as follows:

Miners' Case

1. That the increase in the cost of living justifies an increase of 2 shillings (forty-eight cents) a shift, (with corresponding increases for boys) in wages.

2. That there is no justification for the increase of 14 shillings, 2 pence (three dollars and forty cents) a ton in the cost of household coal, and that this should accordingly be reduced by that amount.

3. That the profits of 66,000,000 pounds on export coal provides the money requisite to meet both these charges.

4. That the mine owners in three prewar years took 150,000,000 pounds, which was 15,000,000 pounds more than their total capital.

5. That the government assures them to-day at least double their prewar profits.

Government's Case

1. That the surplus profit on export coal belongs to the nation and not to the miners or coal consumers, and ought to go to the reduction of the national debt.

2. That the coal consumer is already receiving coal at cost prices, and to reduce this price still further would be in effect a subsidy at a time when efforts are being made to abolish subsidies and get back to economic conditions.

3. That these profits are in any case temporary and exceptional, and to treat them as the miners propose would mean presenting the miners with 27,000,000 pounds of public money in order to secure a reduction in coal prices of 36,000,000 pounds; both of which sums would almost certainly have, in the near future, to be found, if the increased wage and the decreased price are to be maintained, out of the tax payer's pocket.

The real fly in the ointment is the nationalization of the mines. This was the mooted question a year ago when the miners threatened a "down tools" program. The diplomacy of Lloyd George averted the strike then. The Miners' Federation agreed to participate in the inquiry of the coal Industrial Commission and withdraw their strike threat pending a report by the commission. They believed that the government was not only pledged, but would regard this pledge as an obligation to carry out the recommendations of the commission.

The miners now charge that even before the commission finished its work that powerful influences were being brought to bear upon the government to prevent it from accepting any proposal which favored a nationalization of the mines. They charge that the government succumbed to these influences and after a period of evasion repudiated the majority report of the commission, which was signed by John Sankey, the chairman who had been appointed by the government itself. The miners accuse the government of a wanton trifling with the nation's interests and allowing its policies to be manipulated by the coal barons.

It is said that the Sankey Commission in its report condemned on the evidence before it, the present system of ownership and control. It found this system wasteful and inefficient. The majority reached the conclusion that public ownership with a system of control that would reduce bureaucracy to a minimum would offer the best solution of the question. It is on this report that the miners base their claim for nationalization. According to Mr. Smillie, president of the Miner's Federation, the nationalization of the mines is imperative.

This leaves a majority of 43,000 votes above the necessary two thirds to call a strike.

The Triple Alliance, composing the railway men, transport workers, and miners, yesterday passed the following resolution:

"That this conference of the constituent bodies of the Triple Alliance having heard the statement of the miners' case for the reduction in the price of domestic coal by 14 shillings 2 pence per ton, and for an advance of 2 shillings, 1 shilling, and 9 pence per shift for adults, youths, and boys respectively, is unanimously of opinion that the claims are both reasonable and just, and should be conceded forthwith."

At present writing the government is standing firm on its refusal to grant any concessions whatever. A strike is inevitable unless the government recedes from its position. The government may grant the raise in wages and refuse the reduction in cost of coal to consumers, and the miners may accept. In this way a strike would be averted.

If the strike is called it will prove a great, if not the greatest, industrial upheaval in British history. The National Union of Manufacturers have decided to close down their work immediately a strike is declared, as they feel it wiser to conserve what stocks of coal they have, rather than to work to the last moment and then have to wait for supplies before they can restart.

Within the month the whole of Britain will be in the grip of industrial paralysis or the evil day will be deferred. It is coming in the immediate future, and is inevitable. The government can and may beat the miners into submission and compel them to continue work at the point of the bayonet. Even then the government is powerless to secure other than a minimum production. Public sentiment may compel a compromise. Again the real conflict is only deferred. The government and the miners may get together and in a sensible way compose their difference. This failing, no one but a prophet can foresee the end.

The government is not giving out much information as to the actual conditions in Mesopotamia for obvious reasons. It is reported that fighting is general throughout the country. Sometimes it takes the form of raids on posts and villages; sometimes it becomes a pitched battle.

A few miles northeast of Bagdad the "rebels in arms" are estimated at some four thousand men. In the Euphrates two thousand tribesmen are investing Kufa, and some twelve thousand are attacking Hella. Reinforcements of four thousand are expected on the banks of the Euphrates. The War Office Communique said that four thousand five hundred are out and most of the available fighting men numbering some thirty-four thousand men have been in arms against the English Government.

Communication with Persia is cut off. Bagdad itself is half isolated. The civil administration has gone to pieces. Political officers have been murdered or captured or forced to take refuge in flight. British women and children are gathered for refuge in camps. The Arabs maintain that the British Government has imposed its authority upon them and they will not submit. There is an increasing clamor in England for the government to abdicate foreign benevolent protectorates.

It is reported that the various nationalities now occupying in Palestine led by the Arabs, have declared war on Zionism, and they will resist to the uttermost by every means at their command, the establishment of any form of Jewish domination or encroachment in that land.

Each day registers an increase in the mob spirit in Ireland. Murder and incendiarism is running wild. Thus far the government has been unable to cope with conditions. If the lord mayor of Cork dies it is difficult to predict to what limits his compatriots will go in retaliation towards the government.

The war has left its aftermath of chaos and disintegration. The future of Europe is black. Well may the statesmen fear and tremble and the common people cry out for some one to save them from the impending woe.

"He is the truly courageous man who never desponds."

HAMILTON, ONTARIO, August, 1920.

Editors Herald: As a result of Elder G. E. Harrington's efforts to hold a two-day meeting in the various branches throughout the district, Hamilton's turn came August 21 and 22. Saturday afternoon was devoted to recreation. Baseball and croquet were the principal games which afforded pleasure to the Hamilton Saints as well as Saints from Toronto and other places. The evening was devoted to a program of music and song and many short speeches on recreation. Elder Thompson also gave a 15-minute talk on mental culture.

Sunday morning from 9.30 to 10.30 was devoted to prayer service. A good spirit was present, giving encouragement to the Saints. At the close of the service two babies were blessed. The usual Sunday school and preaching services were dispensed with, and several speakers took part during the hours from 10.30 to 12.30. Elder Thompson's address was on Sunday school work, and those in the district who have difficulty in this line of work should write him. Elder Baldwin gave a few good points along the same line. Elder Seaton (the district chorister) next gave a short address on music, and Sister Eva Milligan then read a paper on music prepared by him, which we hope to see published later.

Elder Seaton then gave a practical demonstration of many of the valuable points contained in the paper, and he gave us a splendid insight into the power and influence of music. Elder Baldwin also related some splendid incidents in which music and song had great power over those within its reach.

At 2 p. m., Elder Seaton conducted a song service for half an hour, in which Elder Harrington played a splendid part with his clarinet. At 2.30 Sister Miller gave an address on woman's work in the church. She resumed this work the following Monday afternoon, going more fully into the work with the sisters themselves at the home of Sister Eckers. After Sister Miller's address Sunday afternoon, Elder Fred Long gave a splendid address. The remainder of the time was given to Bishop A. F. McLean, in which he took up the financial condition of the church, giving us much encouragement. He not only showed us our responsibility, but related how God had blessed those who helped to carry on and spread the angel's message by tithes and offerings. He said that he had set the objective at $10,000 for this conference year, and has almost reached that amount already, with over six weeks yet before us. We believe the Toronto District will go far beyond Brother McLean's objective.

At 7 p. m. Elder John Shields, patriarch, gave us a splendid discourse on missionary work, telling how God had blessed him and others in carrying forth the work. Elder Shields is loved by all, and those who were not present no doubt would have enjoyed being there.

Eatables were furnished Saturday and Sunday by the sisters of the branch. We can always look for a spiritual feast when the sisters are endeavoring to make the work a success. May they be blessed in all their labors, and go forth with greater zeal, is our prayer.

ANGUS KENNEDY.

Editors Herald: As one of the sisters in the church, it gives me great pleasure to write and express how thankful I am to God for so blessing me with parents who brought me into the church. I was baptized about four years ago, and have not regretted the step.

God has wonderfully blessed all in our home so far. Nothing gives me greater pleasure than when I am among the brothers and sisters, helping to press forward with this gospel. I ask myself, "What is expected of me as a Latter Day Saint?" Although only fifteen years of age, the oldest of seven, this question confronts me many a time, and I am only to ready to learn and take advice from my parents.

In the Sunday afternoon services we are reading the Book of Mormon, and it is very interesting. We have a splendid teacher. I do not know what our branch would do without her.

My greatest desire is to see our church reap a great harvest, and I, as one of the sisters, will do my best to sow the seed. My mother and father were at the London conference, and they felt quite blessed for it.

We still have a desire to press onward in this work. We need the prayers of every Latter Day Saint, and with God's help we will be successful.

I close hoping there is yet a brighter future.

Yours in gospel bonds,

ALICE SCHOFIELD.

WILBURTON, OKLAHOMA, August 31, 1920.

Editors Herald: This is the last of another summer, and when I look out on the world and see what a momentous day we are living in, and realize what wonderful things are happening, I do not wonder at all that the prophets both in the Old and New Testaments spoke of the age of the world in which we live: the marvelous work and wonder spoken of by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. While the world was crying peace and safety, the Lord revealed to Joseph Smith the conditions of the world ninety years ago, and also pointed out to him the war conditions that were coming on the nations of the earth.

Indeed we are passing through these conditions, and why the people won't accept the angel's message spoken of in Revelation 14: 6, 7, and why the people in this generation do not accept that message, is beyond human comprehension. But when I look back to the day when the angels of heaven spoke to the generation in which our Savior was born, and then read in the Word of God how that generation rejected our Savior, I see it is only history repeating itself. But I am thankful to the Lord that a few people everywhere are gladly receiving that message.

In all of my missionary work of twenty-five years, I think I have enjoyed a greater degree of the Lord's Spirit this year than ever before. I have conducted meetings where the people would come five and six miles every evening, and they would go away rejoicing because of the influence of the Spirit of God.

Brother Rowe and I held a meeting in the Eros Branch last February, and I have just closed a successful meeting at that place. Thirty-four have been baptized in that branch in the last five months, nearly all grown people; and I believe twenty or thirty more will be baptized by the close of the year. So a few people are gladly receiving the gospel, and if we, the ministers of the gospel, will become united in faith and love, and live a pure and good life, we will enjoy a greater endowment of the Lord's Spirit than we ever have since the restoration of the gospel.

So may the Lord bless his work everywhere, and Zion soon be built up, the Saints gathered home, and the Lord come and reign a thousand years with us, when we can meet our friends on the other side waiting for that great day. May God be with us all until we meet in Zion, is the prayer of your humble brother,

E. A. ERWIN.

Editors Herald: We are rejoicing because we have our little church completed and are practically out of debt. We have been holding services in it for some time. Brethren Joseph G. Smith and Hubert Case came the 16th but were enabled to stay only one night with us as they were on their way to Red Rock to make preparations for the reunion which begins the 26th. However Brother Case delivered a good sermon on Monday night which was very encouraging and instructive. They both complimented us greatly on our work done here, as we have bought a lot and built a church since February 8. Had it completed July 10 and are in debt only $27.50.

Brother R. C. Miller has been with us also and held a week's meetings with good crowds and much interest manifested. Three were baptized: our daughters, Mabel and Geneva, and Tamma, a daughter of Brother and Sister Lemons. Others admitted that they believed the work but were not baptized. We hope to see them come into the church in the near future. The Saints here like Brother Miller, and the outsiders praise him very highly also. We feel there is a great work yet to be done here in Yale.

This is the first series of meetings that has been held in our little church, and when we see the interest that is manifested we feel repaid for the efforts that we have put forth to get a house of worship.

Ever praying that this work may grow and that the honest in heart may be gathered in, I am

Yours in gospel bonds,

W. A. SLOVER.

TOLEDO, OHIO, September 1, 1920.

Editors Herald: I can not but tell you the good news. Just feel like getting out and telling to the world how the Lord is working in our local. We can see his hand before us opening the way, and paving the road before us that we may not fall.

Our slackers are coming to the front, and how much good it does to hear their voices in testimony and prayer. That alone is evidence that God is here. New members are moving in among us. Last Sunday we had fifty-five out, with fifteen strangers. Not only this, but financially we can see his hand. Our church has just recently been painted on the inside. The brethren are painting it on the outside. Frosted glass is being put in the windows, electric light fixtures bought as we have lights now, a baptismal font in the basement, new kitchen and cupboard in. Why shouldn't we rejoice when we can see all these things? But these are really minor things if you could only see the spirit manifest. Our prayer meetings are a blessing alone. No longer do we wait for one another, but all are zealous and anxious to do their part. A spirit of co-operation, of humility and brotherly love is made manifest. We can feel the Spirit with us as we go from our church to our work day by day. We are having meetings every night but Monday, and all are making a special effort to attend. The young people have social activities on Friday night, and enjoy themselves. Have a mission opening next week, I believe. Young people's prayer meeting on Tuesday night; educational class for the priesthood on Thursday night, under a very accomplished man. We are deprived of these meetings, but the brethren tell us they are very good. We will take their word for it.

We heartily invite any of the Saints to visit with us. We like to see new faces. You can always 'phone our branch president if you come to town, W. S. Hettrick.

Trusting God's Spirit may continue with us and with you, we close.

CORRESPONDENT.

A motor car has made the unofficial record time of four days, fourteen hours, and thirty-five minutes from San Francisco to New York. We are informed by the Christian Science Monitor that the first such trip was made in 1903, in sixty-three days. The time was cut into thirty-three days, then fifteen days, and finally to eleven days. This improvement of the further gain is the result of the marked trails, and the improvement made over such difficult portions as the sand trails of the great desert. Anyone who has tried to drive an auto through a desert knows what that means.

A new departure is that taken in Denmark by an arbitration court which fined three labor unions an amount of one million pounds, which is about two and three quarters million dollars. This was for bringing disorganizing strikes unjustly.

The most largely attended event in the history of Plymouth, England, within the memory of old residents, occurred on September 7, when 300 years of history were recounted in speeches, in songs, and by symbols. The ceremony was to celebrate the 300th anniversary of the sailing of the Pilgrim Fathers. The keynote of each address was Anglo-American friendship.

NEWS AND COMMENT

CHURCH NEWS

The New York District is advertising a coordinate institute for October 1-3. They have an extensive program arranged, with very many interesting details listed for discussion.

The Religio is getting the lion's share of attention, Doctor P. L. Weegar being field worker for the district. They are covering the ground admirably and should have the workers from all over the district present for such an occasion. It will be held at Buffalo, Midway and Hutchinson, Kensington. They are putting out some good advertising of the event.

It is interesting to note the especial work being done in the Lamoni Sunday school and Religio for the coming school season. Curtains have been provided to divide the gallery, and new classes have been formed. Vida E. Smith teaches a class of girls in church history, June Whiting one in Zionic problems from the girl's standpoint, C. E. Irwin one on church economics, Floyd M. McDowell one for young men on the problems of the church in the light of church history, C. E. Wight one on administrative problems of the church, for the priesthood, J. W. Wight and J. A. Gunsolley a class of girls each in first principles. In addition considerable special work is being done in the regular classes.

The Religio is forming two large normal classes of thirty-five to forty-five members each. F. M. McDowell is teaching the first section of the standard course and E. D. Moore one on teaching the Book of Mormon, using a new outline. Peter Muceus has a large class in church history problems, David Hopkins one in economic problems, one by Roy Cheville on administrative problems of the church. William Hartley has one on church history, for girls, Mrs. Ida Monroe one on mothercraft. A. E. Bullard and Eugene Closson have charge of the boys. The young girls are divided among a group of story-tellers.

On September 16 occurred a serious explosion in Wall Street, New York, killing thirty-five persons, and injuring about three hundred. The banking house of J. P. Morgan and Company, the subtreasury, and assay office were all partially wrecked and damage estimated in excess of one million dollars.

September 26 will be the rally day of the Zion's Hope Sunday School at Saint Louis. The Saint Louis Branch has a gymnasium, as well as an excellent church meeting place. They have official classes in public speaking, an organized health department, as well as many other progressive features, including Temple Builders, Boy Scouts, and Oriole Girls; also a live branch bulletin. They have lost quite a number of members, most of whom have moved towards Zion, and who are fully alive to the interest of the work. Arthur E. McKim, general publicity agent, was in Saint Louis August 13, and delivered an address to the young people on "Letting your light shine." They report the first baptism in their new church. Ten were baptized August 6, and one on August 22. Elder U. W. Greene was in Saint Louis August 8, and spoke twice to an appreciative audience.

FROM THE BRANCHES

First Chicago. The men's educational meeting on the 24th is to be an occasion of educational uplift. No boys under 14 are to attend unless accompanied by fathers. The Saints collected $150 for the German Saints. The branch is keeping in mind the 20,000-convert slogan, and preparing for Consecration Weeks, October 15-31, as well as College Day, October 3.

Bisbee, Arizona. The Bisbee Branch now has eight meetings a week, including normal class, Doctrine and Covenants class, prayer meeting, Women's Department meeting, etc. All departments are active. Brother Anderson and family, who have been with us for some time, have gone to Phoenix,

MISCELLANEOUS

The Bishopric

Eastern Iowa: You are no doubt aware that I have been appointed Bishop's agent for Eastern Iowa District to try and take the place of our worthy Brother John Heide of Fulton, Iowa, who has resigned after so many years of faithful service.

I trust I may have your confidence and support in my service to you and to our God.

I hope to meet each of you personally in the near future that we may become better acquainted. In the meantime, however, just pay your tithing to your branch solicitor or mail it direct to my address.

If you have not made out your property statement, write me at once and I will mail blanks for your convenience.

The law of the Lord is perfect converting the soul, the Psalmist says, and we all want to keep his perfect law. The law of tithes and offerings is a part of that law. Zion will be redeemed and we all want to assist in its redemption and be partakers of its beauty and blessings. Except we keep this law we will not be permitted to enjoy this privilege.

A number of the Saints have already paid tithing since the first of the month. We would like to see every member of Eastern Iowa a tithe payer.

Put oil in your lamps, keep them trimmed and burning so when the cry goes out the bridegroom cometh, we may go out to meet him with songs of joy on our lips.

If I can be of assistance to you in any way, do not hesitate to write me or see me personally.

May the blessings of our Father in heaven rest upon each of us, helping us to keep his whole law.

In bonds,

MIL0 BURNETT.

Christmas Offering

Here it is the middle of September; the year will be gone before we realize it. What does your Christmas offering report show at this time?

An Outstanding Example of Giving

"Without friends, influence, or money an obscure young man went to New York to make his way in the world. The captain of the steamer on which he traveled was a Christian and in talking to the young man said: 'Young man, what do you know how to do?' The boy answered: 'I can make soap.' The captain said: 'Well, somebody is going to be the greatest soap maker in New York and you had just as well try to be that man. When you begin making money give God part of it.' This the boy did. He began by giving ten per cent and then decided to give twenty. Orders and money just poured in. Then he thought he would give thirty per cent. Instead of getting poorer he became richer and then he began giving forty per cent and strange as the story of the 'widow and the cruse of oil,' the more he gave the more he had. Then he decided to give God half he made and his business just spread all over the earth. That boy where they expect to make their home for the time being. We are contemplating a fall and winter campaign in the nature of tent meetings, beginning at Douglas, if we can raise the necessary funds to pay the transportation charges on a tent from Wray, Colorado. Any church members living in Arizona who are willing to help us in a financial way to get this tent into the State and move it from place to place, can send their contributions to E. R. Davis, Box 453, Bisbee, Arizona.

Coldwater, Michigan. Four more have been baptized by S. W. L. Scott. At the annual Sunday school picnic about seventy were present. It is planned to have many more such meetings.

was William Colgate, the founder of Colgate and Company, the largest soap manufacturers in the world." (Taken from Spark Plug.)

We are going to have a special "DOLLAR" Sunday a little later on; watch the papers for announcements.

Our plan is that each one shall earn this dollar over and above his regular work, something special, and we hope you will enter into this with sincere purpose. Look about right now and keep on looking until you find a way to earn this dollar that you may give it as a special consecration for the offering cause. God will help you. You may think there is no way in which you can earn this extra dollar but you will find there are many ways.

Let us older ones help the little folks to find a way to earn their dollars. Give them little chores, errands, etc. There are so many things we can find to do that will help us.

I wish that every Sunday school would take this up in the school session and if there are some who do not know what to do let others help make suggestions. Above all let us have complete and united effort. We would like to see every school able to report that every scholar earned and gave this special dollar offering. We will publish a list of every school that can report 100 per cent perfect for this special effort.

In our effort to earn this special dollar God may bless us with opportunity to earn several more dollars (extra). If so let us add to this special offering.

You know we are aiming at $150,000 offering this year and we must make special efforts to raise this amount. If every one of us will do our part we will raise almost $100,000 on the special "Dollar Sunday." We can do this, so let us get right busy and work. Remember—you are asked to earn this dollar in some special way.

After the contest is over we shall want to hear from our good Sunday school scholars as to how they earned their "dollar." This will develop into one of the most interesting efforts we have ever taken part in if we will enter into the work sincerely and earnestly.

Let us start to-day and keep ever before us our aim: $150,000.

Do not let this effort interfere with the regular offering work, but let it be a special effort, an extra dollar earned especially for this gift. God will bless us according to our effort.

Will you see that your Sunday school has this brought to their attention? If you are isolated from the church will you enter into this effort with us? Our desire is that everyone will take a personal interest in this movement.

Watch for announcement as to date of "Dollar Sunday."

Very sincerely yours,

A. W. SMITH.

Clothing for German Saints

A number of inquiries have been received relative to sending clothing to Germany for the relief of our brothers and sisters there whose needy condition was so forcibly set forth in the recently published letter of Elder Harry Passman.

Money or clothing for this purpose should be sent to the undersigned. All clothing packages thus received will be repacked and shipped in the most desirable quantities. Owing to the cost of transportation to such distance care and wisdom must be exercised in selection of the clothing.

May "the tie that binds" reach across the sea and convey comfort and relief to the needy ones of the household of faith.

Conference Minutes

KEWANEE. At Rock Island, Illinois, June 18, 19, 20, 1920. Presided over by Elders C. I. Carpenter and George Sackfield. Following business was transacted: Bishop's agent, H. C. Ziegenhorn reported: Total receipts and total disbursements from October 9 to June 8, $2,925.36. As district treasurer, receipts, $25.81; paid out, $42; due treasurer $16.19. As treasurer reunion committee, receipts $249.69, paid out $206.61, balance $49.08. Coordination plan was adopted. Report of an elders' court allowing (at his request) the name of D. I. Bath to be taken from the record was adopted. Provision was made for the organization of the Saints at Savannah, Illinois, into a branch. Provision was made for Bert Sartwell, of Savannah, to be ordained an elder. Henry H. Martens was ordained an elder, Elmer C. Ohlert a priest, Charles A. Davis a teacher, and Sylvester J. O'Brien a deacon at this conference. A committee consisting of J. W. Bean, R. G. Huntley, and George Sackfield was chosen to "look for some property [house for the district president] that might be purchased for a reasonable sum, and see what place would be most suitable for such a "residence." The district president was authorized to purchase a duplicating machine costing around $75, the cost to be met by collections taken in the different branches. Annual election of district officers resulted in choosing or sustaining as the case required the following: President, C. I. Carpenter; vice president, George Sackfield; secretary, Mary E. Gillin; treasurer, H. C. Ziegenhorn; librarian to be appointed by the president; member auditing board, E. C. Dillon; chorister, J. G. Cole; historian, Mary E. Gillin; Bishop's agent, H. C. Ziegenhorn. Sunday school, W. V. Holmes, superintendent; Edd Jones, assistant; Elbert Holmes, secretary; treasurer, E. C. Dillon; Florence Holmes, librarian. Religio, in charge of Edd Jones. Time and place of holding next conference left to district presidency. Those appearing on the conference program were the heads of the various departments of work, together with sermons from Brethren Amos Berve and O. W. Okerlind. The music was very good. Rock Island showing great improvement as well as Matherville, and other individuals who assisted. Mary E. Gillin, secretary, 115 Clarke Avenue, Peoria, Illinois.

Our Departed Ones

MOORE.—David J. Moore was born July 16, 1888. Baptized May 29, 1899, by G. C. Tomlinson, sr. Ordained deacon April 9, 1911; ordained elder at London, Ontario, district conference, October 19, 1919, by W. I. Flegg and William Grice. Was killed instantly while operating a threshing machine, August 26, 1920. Leaves to mourn father, mother, 2 sisters, 2 brothers, and a wide circle of friends. Services conducted by G. C. Tomlinson, sr., assisted by J. L. Burger. Deceased was an active worker in the London District Sunday school Department, being first assistant superintendent. He had just completed short course number two in the Religio Training Department of Grace-land College. Brother Moore was a man of splendid character, and his death is a great loss to the church in this district.

When Kirtland Temple Was Built

The church was small in number, the Saints were poor in money, a new country made building tremendously hard, and a hostile community made life itself uncertain—yet those Saints at Kirtland set about to build a house to the Lord, and in spite of poverty and difficulty and enemies, they erected a temple that stands yet to-day as a tribute to a religion that produces such fidelity to its purpose, and as an enduring monument to the faith and sacrifice of Latter Day Saints.

The church is now large, and God has bestowed wonderful opportunity upon his people. They are abundantly able to do all, and more than is required of them. Ways of building are improved to-day, and no longer are we ringed about by enemies. Our neighbors are now our friends, and they, too, would help us succeed. If we have set ourselves a big task in the building of a General Conference Auditorium, it is because our needs are great, and because we still have the same spirit that moved our church forefathers to undertake great endeavors for the purpose of Zion.

EDITORIAL

The New Auditorium

For several weeks now the announcement of the Bishop has been before the church that a special drive will be made for funds, for building a General Conference auditorium at Independence. The time of the drive has been limited from October 15 to 31. The time of preparation is now, for each one to consider what he or she can do; so as to be ready to do it when the time comes. The plan will doubtless be one of subscription, so that it is not necessary to raise all of the money at once; but a small part will be called for in the near future, and the rest may be met by deferred payments. But it is necessary now to decide what we will do.

Last week we referred to the method of the quota system. Naturally in fixing a quota, membership of the district, its wealth, its ability as shown by tithing and freewill offerings in each locality should all be considered; that is, from the viewpoint of the officers arranging the quota, and from the viewpoint of the district officers, so far as it may devolve upon them to divide it among the branches in their district or stake.

But so far as the question concerns us, it is not limited by locality, nor by our tithing, nor by numbers, nor solely by wealth. It is a question, What am I able to do? and What am I willing to do? There are very many remote districts which are much better able to contribute than is the case with Independence and some others of the stakes.

In both Independence and Lamoni especially there are a number of families in which the breadwinner is devoting his time to the service of the church, receiving in return a living wage, which is not designed to furnish any considerable surplus, and which usually is barely sufficient to meet the necessities of life. There are also here the families of old missionaries, who have given their time to the service of the church, and there are those who have come to the various homes or the Sanitarium, who of course are able to contribute but little, if at all.

There are poor people who have come to the central place with the hope of bettering their condition. Those owning considerable property are not the first to move, as they have business interests where they are located. There are young people of ability who will devote full service to the cause, and many who have moved to secure employment, but are less able individually to contribute. We do not excuse such, for everyone should do all that he is able.

Tithing may not be a final criterion. If you have not paid your tithing, by all means do so. It is due to the Lord and his work. There then remains the question of this freewill offering. We sincerely hope the drive will cause many to consider the question of tithing, and of the obligations which are due upon that account. If more tithing is received, the Bishop will be able to do more in establishing Saints in Zion, and in the supporting of missionaries to go out to preach this gospel in all the world.

But the fact that we have paid our tithing is no excuse so far as this special offering is concerned. They are different in purpose. This donation is proposed as a free gift, or as a freewill offering.

It is not a question of what some other is doing, or will try to do, but what are you able to do, and what are you going to do yourself?

Finally, while those residing at Independence, or its immediate vicinity will have more use for the building right now than those who are located in some remote district, still this building is to be erected once for all. When your face is turned to Zion, do you want your share in it to be less than that of others? Are you less interested in doing what you can to house the General Conference properly?

We are much interested in a recent editorial in Zion's Ensign on improvidence. We do not want to run faster than we can, or than we have strength and means. But we do not want selfishly to withhold our means. We must not underestimate the strength of service and of means that we are able to give to the cause of God. It would be a big load for a few, but for all of us the load should not prove heavy for anyone. So those who dwell afar and on the isles of the sea should send up their treasures to establish Zion that Zion may become indeed a fit habitation for the pure in heart. It is not that upon them rests the special burden to build up Zion without us and our help or with little help. The work belongs to all. Yet upon them is laid the especial burden of wisely administering and wisely caring for treasures that are sent up to the land of Zion. In a special degree this burden is laid upon the Bishopric; but it also affects many others to show themselves wise stewards, wise servants, harmless as doves.

After all, regardless of where we live, our life rests in a great sense between ourselves and our heavenly Father, whether we are doing as much as we can and should, so with our hearts at peace, we can look all men in the face, and fear not that which confronts the world and church. As the Lord has prospered us so let us give. S. A. B.

Hot Drinks

We were privileged to attend the evening service in Independence, September 11, when Doctor G. L. Harrington spoke on the Word of Wisdom. He emphasized that hot drinks did not mean so much tea and coffee, as it meant hot. We did not understand he was attempting to speak historically, or to interpret this statement in the light of the time in which it was received, but he was speaking in the light of medical science to-day; that hot drinks of all kinds are injurious. This would include not only hot cocoa and chocolate, but also Postum, and substitutes, barley coffee, hot water, and hot soup. In fact, the objection would appear to apply to any hot food—taken into the stomach in that shape.

He also urged a health campaign, with the ideal before us, of the time we would not need to call upon the elders for administration, as we would live in accordance with the laws of health.

This sermon was reported, and no doubt will be published in some of the church papers, probably Zion's Ensign. It will repay careful consideration and thought.

The Presbyterian for September 2 continues a discussion whether women shall be ordained as elders and deacons. Several articles have been written presenting a negative viewpoint.

Participation in Politics

A national election almost invariably brings to the front in a striking manner the responsibility of a member in this church in his relation to civic conditions. It is generally conceded that as an organization the church should not attempt to take sides in party politics, yet the foundations of our religion rest upon sound government and the equality of opportunity arising from an observance of just laws. Then in order to carry out the spirit and letter of the revelations of the Almighty we must be keenly observant of current developments. To be discriminating and discerning in our conclusions is a duty that goes with our privilege.

In the first place, every Latter Day Saint should know the following quotations and their setting:

"Let no man think that he is ruler, but let God rule him that judgeth, according to the counsel of his own will; or, in other words, him that counseleth or sitteth upon the judgment seat. Let no man break the laws of the land, for he that keepeth the laws of God hath no need to break the laws of the land; wherefore be subject to the powers that be, until He reigns whose right it is to reign, and subdues all enemies under his feet. Behold, the laws which ye have received from my hand are the laws of the church, and in this light ye shall hold them forth. Behold, here is wisdom."—Doctrine and Covenants 58: 5.

"And now, verily I say unto you, concerning the laws of the land, It is my will that my people should observe to do all things whatsoever I command them, and that law of the land, which is constitutional, supporting that principle of freedom, in maintaining rights and privileges belongs to all mankind and is justifiable before me; therefore, I the Lord, justifieth you, and your brethren of my church, in befriending that law which is the constitutional law of the land; and as pertaining to law of man, whatsoever is more or less than these, cometh of evil. I, the Lord God, maketh you free; therefore, ye are free indeed: and the law also maketh you free; nevertheless when the wicked rule the people mourn; wherefore honest men and wise men should be sought for, diligently, and good men and wise men, ye should observe to uphold; otherwise whatsoever is less than these, cometh of evil."—Doctrine and Covenants 95: 2.

An excursion into the realm of civics, no matter how brief, always emphasizes the thought that laws ostensibly grow out of the demands of the people. We, ourselves, are responsible for the enactment of just laws, not only preserving the rights of all the people but bringing offenders to fair tribunals where justice is unflinchingly administered.

A proper balance in legislative enactments provides for constructive as well as corrective programs, and since the will of the people is to be carried out, unified effort must be made, sometimes through political channels, to express that will. The law of common consent requires that initiative be tempered by a majority element.

This year in the United States the vote is given to several million women who have hitherto been denied that right. Many of them have not hitherto given special consideration to what went with the privilege. It seemed a distant thing, vague and almost unreal to them. But they are interested and are beginning to ask some pointed questions that may embarrass the rest of us. It is well that they do this, for we take a good many things for granted, sometimes from necessity, but too often from habit. It will be good for us to be "put on the carpet" to give a reason for the political hopes within us.

Some of our sisters are already taking up an intense study of citizenship, learning at least the duties of the officers they expect to vote for and as much about their platforms, records, and probable tendencies as possible. There is a slight tendency toward protest but as a rule the response is gratifying. There is considerable sentiment prevalent that since the women must be specialists in home economics, know a little of chemistry, sanitation, hygiene, social relations, community affairs—all these and more in addition wrapped in the colossal task of home keeping and child rearing—they should not be expected to know much about politics. They think the requirements are severe and consequently are not sure as to their duty.

It is true that some of them have a great deal to learn all at once. Some have left the consideration of politics to the other sex, until now when an election is near at hand they must "cram" for the test. But it is not so serious as they may think. Neither is the task so impossible as might appear. As a matter of fact the intuition that women have so highly developed will serve them about as well in judging unknown candidates as any process the men may hit upon, outside of actual acquaintance. After the A B C's are learned, the field of political science is not any harder to survey than any other. The various points by which men and women are to be judged in a political way will become more familiar until the confidence attained by experience will greatly aid in evaluating any situation.

There may be a tendency at first to look around to find out what the leading men of the church and community are going to do. And while the survey may reveal nothing tangible, it will at least open the eyes of our sisters to the fact that there is no unity of thought regarding political views. Intelligent, careful, God-fearing men are found in all the political parties and have always been.

Away back in 1876 the old question was arising as it still does, and Joseph Smith wrote in the HERALD as follows:

"We are asked as to what course the 'church authorities' will pursue at the coming presidential election. We cannot say, for it is a matter of individual opinion or conscience. The man who may be thought as best able to succeed in executing justice and judgment is what we all want; although whether any man lives who can do so surrounded, not only at Washington but everywhere else, by such a dishonest, bribe-taking and place-hunting set of politicians, high and low, is a matter of doubt. Many of our brethren are Republican in their sentiments, we believe, and probably some favor the democratic ticket. Both the HERALD editors are Republican [Henry A. Stebbins was the other one], but we cannot answer for the politics of anyone else. Those who vote, as some do not, must decide for themselves as to the best man or men."

It is not an easy matter to decide the proper course. That is, it is not easy for everyone. There are some people so constituted that there can be only one side to such matters—their side—but they are in a gratifyingly small minority. There are bound to be some issues, even though vague, and in a government by party such as we have the outcome of those issues is of importance.

With modern news associations developed as they are, making what seems to be an honest effort to report political news from all angles, it is easier to make one's own deductions than it was in, say, 1876. Of course a newspaper's editors and special correspondents will see good in their own party and evil in all others, but if one understands these features of modern journalism and will try to read both sides (or all sides, as our Socialist, Prohibition, Nonpartisan, and Farmer-Labor friends would put it) he can be his own judge.

Politics, like fashion, is a fickle creature. We hear its gentle zephyrs or its distant rumblings, but know not whither it goeth nor whence it cometh. To-day a problem of national moment is not a political issue; to-morrow it has been adopted by one of the parties and is violently debated from Washington to Podunk Corners.

Some months ago the League of Nations was but an exalted ideal, born out of the travail of war. To-day it is in this country at least, either a panacea for all international ills, or else a creature of distorted idealism, according to the political preferment of the one discussing it. As we write this, there is a likelihood of strong efforts toward discrimination between the league and a league. Time was when the churches were discussing this question as a religious affair, but to-day to speak one's views brands him at once as partisan.

But no matter what the issues, a wise Saint will not fear to discuss them in a calm, judicial, logical manner, but he should always expect some others not so wise to take exceptions not only to his arguments, but to his motives.

One time an editor of the HERALD happened to put into its pages an apparently insignificant "filler." It was chosen as good logic and no thought given to any political sentiment hidden in it. But ere long a subscriber had found it, raised an objection, and demanded an apology—because he believed it might seem to color political belief.

"If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh," said Paul, and the editors of the HERALD have from the beginning observed the same sentiment regarding a public expression of political views. They have their convictions and are not afraid to express them, but to do so might offend, so they desist. But they will continue to plead for higher ideals, better government, more wholesome legislation, and the support of the best men to provide all these things.

The individuals of the church should have more than passive ideals. When by a proper use of the ballot they can bring about better local, state, and national conditions, it should be done.

But after all is said and done about politics as such, we must admit that the best any government can do is to bring its citizens into a condition where they can be worthy entrants into a theocracy ruled by an all-wise God. Earthly governments are not an end, but a means to an end, and we should so consider them. Otherwise we narrow our vision and lose sight of the goal.

College Day

By General Conference action the first Sunday in October of each year has been set aside for the purpose of enabling the friends and well-wishers of Graceland College to assist in a direct financial way in the work of that institution.

By special action of the conference the funds raised on that day are used for the purpose of providing scholarships for worthy young men and women who want a chance for an education.

The response of the young people of the church to the clarion call of President Smith to prepare for the work which is coming upon them soon as their contribution towards the building up of Zion is very gratifying. They are applying for admission to Graceland in ever-increasing numbers. None of them ask for a free scholarship. They all apply for the scholarship and accept it on condition that they repay the loan after graduation. All that they want is a chance—a chance to prepare for service with the church.

The scholarship in the college covers tuition which is $100 per year. A larger number than ever before is asking for this loan of $100. It is believed that the people of the church will respond to this increased demand for assistance and will make it possible for all these young people who desire to secure an education for larger service for the church to do so. In the past a number of individuals and a number of branches have raised the sum necessary for one scholarship and in some cases for several. It is hoped that this year there will be a much larger number than ever before. It must be so or our onward progress will be greatly handicapped.

As usual the College Day collection may be sent either to the Presiding Bishop or direct to the treasurer of the college.

The branch presidents are making a special effort this year to meet this situation so that none of the young people applying for admission and for a loan to assist them in preparation for this future work will have to be denied by the Bishop. It is hoped the membership will cooperate with the branch presidents and make this year's College Day collection the largest in the history of that institution. The year is opening under most favorable conditions with the largest attendance in Graceland's history and it is believed that this opportunity, coming as it does once a year, will be taken advantage of by the many friends of this department of the church work.

Lecture by Elbert A. Smith to the priesthood, at Independence, Missouri, March 25, 1920. Reported by Howard W. Harder.

In the Realm of Revelation

The last group of gifts is in the realm of revelation, by which information is extended to us or brought to us from God concerning various matters that we ought to know: prophecy, the discerning of Spirits, the gift of tongues, and the interpretation of tongues.

Prophecy, we understand, is the declaration of the word and will of God to man. It is exercised in the preaching of the gospel, and in expounding the word of God as we have it in the Scriptures. I believe that is about the only function of the prophetic voice that the so-called evangelical churches recognize to-day. And certainly when a man does preach the gospel under the office of his calling and is declaring the law of God to man with liberty, light, and power he is a prophet. We know, of course, that which goes much further, that under the prophetic gift individuals may declare the word of God at this moment to us as individuals. Prophecy may also include the foretelling of future events. The prophecy on the War of the Rebellion is a notable example in modern history along that line.

Most of us, too, have had individual experiences. I remember the conference when I was called to the Presidency. I sat at the desk of the press committee with Brother T. W. Williams, just a day or so before the revelation came calling me to that office. Brother Williams wrote something on a slip of paper, sealed it in an envelope, handed it to me and said that I might read it when he gave me permission. After the revelation had been read to the conference and I was leaving the room so that discussion might be had upon it, Brother Williams whispered to me, "You may read it now." I opened it and read. It stated clearly that the Spirit had told Brother Williams that the time was near at hand when I would be called to take my father's place. There was an instance, clearly, when a future event was foretold under the gift of prophecy.

It is said that the word prophet as we use it is derived from three old Hebrew words and the first two of these are one in meaning, and the meaning is that of one who has vision, one who sees the will of God; the veil is opened and he sees God's plans, he sees God's purposes, and comprehends God's law. The third one of these words means to "pour forth" or speak forth the word of God. It seems to me that the first two are much stronger, because the one who merely speaks forth or pours forth the words of God might be likened to a pipe that conveys water but is not affected by it, and does not comprehend it. But the individual who sees as a seer, who comprehends and understands, and then tells us, though he may be faltering in his account and statement, the fact that he sees is of primary importance.

Right along this line, I was certainly struck with the statement of President Frederick M. Smith in his "Views on revelation." He says, "I have felt that quickening of spiritual vision until my spiritual eyes were enabled to see almost as a panoramic view extending over the years yet to come, not in detail, but in one grand, general ensemble, the work to be accomplished by this people." Now does not that set forth the experiences of a seer? And God certainly knows that in this time of confusion we need a man to whose vision has been unfolded the steps that we ought as a church to take. The quotation concerning the origin of the word prophet to which I have referred reads as follows:

"The names given the prophet in the Bible are quite significant. In the Old Testament he is called roeh, hazeh, nabhi. The first two, almost synonymous, from roots ra'ah and hazah both 'to see,' suggest the man of vision. The prophet is thus as one whose sight pierces through the veil that hides the world of divine things, or one for whom this veil is lifted occasionally so that he obtains an inner knowledge of the realities beyond. The term nabhi' (from nabha, weaker form of nabha, 'to bubble up,' 'pour forth,' [a stream of words]) presents the prophet as a man of speech, one who gives forth words under strong excitement, or in an exalted state of feeling. The difference between the first two and the third of these terms lies in the fact that the first two point to the method of the prophet's receiving his information and the nature of that information, whereas the third points to the method of the delivery of his message."—From A Standard Bible Dictionary by M. W. Jacobus, p. 704, Funk & Wagnalls edition.

The discerning of spirits certainly is of value to a presiding officer. In Doctrine and Covenants 50:7 we are told that the men in charge of a meeting should proclaim against false spirits when manifested. But this should be done in such a way that the confidence and good faith of the audience may not be destroyed and that the individual may be reclaimed from error and that no injustice be done along that line. That certainly is where the gift of wisdom also enters in, as it does in connection with all the other gifts.

Tongues and interpretation of tongues: Evidently in some instances the gift of tongues was an exercise that was not understood by those who heard it and probably was not understood by the one who exercised the gift. In the fourteenth chapter of the Corinthian letter, Paul gives considerable detailed instruction on the subject and he says that the man who exercises the gift of tongues had best pray that he may have the interpretation, which would indicate that neither the hearers nor the speakers could understand what was said until the complement of the gift of tongues, namely, interpretation, was given; but certainly on the day of Pentecost those who heard the gift of tongues there given understood it, because it was then used to preach to them.

In our experiences as a church we have had some manifestations wherein this gift became an instrument in preaching. I have a copy of a letter that was received by our office, written by Brother Hubert Case, dated November 17, 1919, in which he says:

"I just got your letter about the question of men speaking, or preaching in tongues. You will find in the Journal of History of one year ago an article in which it says that Lyman Wight did preach to the Indians in their own language. "T. W. Smith preached to the natives on the island of Manihi in their own tongue just once.

"I preached to the natives on the island of Rarotonga, one of the Cook group, five consecutive nights in their own tongue. Each night, however, I would begin in the Tahitian tongue, but as soon as the spirit of liberty came, during the first five minutes of each sermon, I immediately spoke their language on to the close of the sermon. My wife knew the Tahitian language better than I, and she said the first night I began by using the Tonga words that she did not know, and she could not understand from that on; but I was made to know what I was saying. However, when the service was over, I could not talk the language."

Here also is a little note from the Journal of History, volume 11, number 4, page 449, from an editorial comment by Heman C. Smith:

"Lyman Wight addressed a large assembly of Cherokee Indians in their own tongue [though he had no previous knowledge of the language], and predicted that at some time there would be many in that vicinity [Oklahoma] who would embrace the gospel and rejoice in its blessings.

"Bishop George Miller claimed that he, as he subsequently passed through this same territory, also preached to the Indians in their own language."

So our experiences along that line are not dissimilar to those in the New Testament times; but of course, the rule seems to be that we are required to study and learn any language that we are to preach in; the gift is the exception. How general its use may be as the work draws to a close we can only surmise.

There is an interesting theory set forth in one of the commentaries that I have read on this subject. It is from the Standard Bible Dictionary. The theory is that the gift of tongues on the day of Pentecost was a special dispensation and had nothing to do in any way with the gift of tongues described by Paul, and that the gift of tongues as enjoyed on Pentecost never was repeated. According to this theory the gift described by Paul was not at all linguistic in any sense but was simply a succession of inarticulate sounds. The individual was so filled with the spirit of ecstasy that he poured forth this jabbering and gibberish because he could not find words with which to express what he wanted to say; but some individual in the audience more self-contained would tell the audience what the other fellow felt, and so would have the gift of interpretation. This is out of harmony with our idea of what the gift of tongues is, as we have always believed that it is articulate, the exercise of speech in some language; and certainly if the glory of God is intelligence the Spirit manifests itself in a very poor way if it does as set forth by that commentary.

IV. General Comments

As we have noted, the gifts are a natural part of the gospel economy and I believe that they always will continue in the Christian church until they have accomplished their purpose. I say that because some seem to have to a degree lost confidence in them, and it may be that they have lost confidence because of the terrible misuse that these gifts have been put to in some localities.

We should always remember the statement of the Apostle Paul that "the spirit of the prophet is subject to the prophet," that these things ought always to be dominated by the master gift of wisdom. Man does not have to tell everything that God tells him, or shows him, immediately when he gets it.

Gifts Not to Supersede the Law

In the first place, these gifts are not to supersede the law. (Doctrine and Covenants, 125:14.)

"Branches and districts are to be conducted according to the rules given in the law as directed in a former revelation: They shall take the things which have been given unto them as my law to the church to be my law to govern my church. And these affairs are not to be conducted by manifestations of the Spirit unless these directions and manifestations come through the regularly authorized officers of branch or district. If my people will respect these officers whom I have called and set in the church, I will respect these officers; and if they do not, they cannot expect the riches of gifts and the blessings of direction."

This has been lost sight of. I remember one branch where for years about the time election came one sister would exercise under the gift of prophecy and say that a certain man should be president of the branch, and the people would feel that he had to be elected because of that manifestation. You must remember that branch officers are put in place by election, and not by revelation. Also in the calling of men to be ordained to special office, irresponsible persons may get up in the audience and say that so and so shall be ordained to such and such an office, and in some places the branches feel that immediately they are bound to proceed to order the ordination of that man upon the strength of that recommendation. They are not bound to do that at all.

Now, you have probably noticed that I have been talking about irresponsible parties. But there are some of our very responsible men who do not follow uniform procedure along these lines, and perhaps a few words of caution may not be out of place, on the subject of going into branches and districts and calling people to various offices. I am going to read a little extract from a letter from one of our missionaries in the field:

"Another thing that is troubling my mind is the seemingly, at least, unwise and disorderly calling of men to the priesthood. It seems to me that in some places about ninety per cent of the men of the church have either been called, or told they would be just as soon as they quit tobacco, or something else, and much of this is done by what is called prophecy, and this at times by a seventy calling men when both branch and district presidents were present and seemingly knew nothing of it before."

Similar complaints have come to us from other sources and they are not all about the seventies. I do not know who this man was writing about, so have no one man in mind. Though I am a member of the Presidency if I went into a branch and felt the Spirit resting on me in power indicating that a certain man in that branch should be ordained to some specific office, I would not ordinarily arise in the meeting and deliver it as a "prophecy" but would first tell it to the branch or district president as the case might be and let him act on it. I wonder if that is a point of agreement.

I think this is quite in harmony with the views expressed by the late President Joseph Smith and found recorded in SAINTS' HERALD, volume 44, page 629, as follows:

"One source of safety to the branch lies in this, that no instruction requiring branch action, or action of the branch officers is to be accepted and acted upon unless such instruction comes to the branch through its properly constituted authorities, or such authorities have the testimony of the Spirit for themselves."

Then I would say that when irresponsible parties voice calls, the branches are not bound to act until their officers are ready to act; and when regular authorities of the church, who ought to be respected, have evidence of a call, it is ordinarily better for them to wait and convey the information to the regularly constituted authorities of the branch or district who should respect and heed their counsel. We do not want to bind the Spirit, but that, I believe, is the rule that ought to be followed.

Given as God Wills

We have noted that these gifts are given as seemeth good to God, not as we will, unless our wills are in harmony with his. I think it is a mistake to select a certain gift and agonize for it and pray for it too long, because we may thus open doors to disaster. Brother Peterson could tell you what happened in the islands when the natives made up their minds that they would not be satisfied without certain gifts. The Pupu people were led away by false gifts.

There are, of course, spurious manifestations. The Doctrine and Covenants, I believe, says that some revelations are of God, some are of man, and some from the Devil. Very seldom have I seen an exercise of a gift that I have felt was of the Devil. I have seen times when I thought individuals worked themselves up to a point where they exercised what they thought was a gift; and I remember one occasion where the man afterwards admitted it and asked to be forgiven.

Of course, though, there are manifestations of evil spirits. John says that many are gone abroad in the land. I believe that accounts for some of the things that are taking place in the realm of spiritualism. I do not believe that spiritists are getting messages from God, or necessarily from departed spirits, but more often apparently from a low grade of devils that are taking advantage of them. Ella Wheeler Wilcox is not writing the doggerel that is attributed to her name. Spiritualism never did give the world a noble thought or high ideal and never will.

Benefits as Well as Dangers

Exercise of the gifts brings perplexities and dangers. The sentiment expressed by Joseph Smith in SAINTS' HERALD, volume 32, page 620, is appropriate. He says:

"Similarity in these things is clear evidence of identity as Christ's church—the churches of both former-day and latter-day Saints are identical in their troubles and perplexities in respect to their spiritual things."

The gifts are fruitful sources of blessings if wisely used; if unwisely used, they are sources of disorder and perplexity, and they have ruined and wrecked many a branch where they have been allowed to run wild and uncontrolled.

Spiritual gifts may be a means of great blessing or they may be a means of great disaster, and that very fact identifies us with the New Testament church. The other churches say that these things open up the way to imposition, and will have nothing to do with them. We say, let us reject the false, but claim and enjoy the true, as they did of old, exercising wisdom and discernment as it was intended we should.

Individual Training

As we have indicated several times heretofore, education to accomplish its purpose must develop the capacity of the individual. There is naturally a tendency to ignore the odd child. The odd child may likely be a genius in some particular line, or may be deficient. Reasonable tests would determine this.

The American schools offer equal training and equal opportunity for all. That is an excellent thing. But it does not go far enough. We do not want to make all our children and all our coming men and women as nearly alike as possible, but we want to develop their individual powers and genius if they possess such.

There is no such a thing as an average child, requiring just so many years for grammar school, four years for high school, four years for college. There may be a number who come close to this average. Schools are needed to care for the delinquent boy or girl, especially those who are mentally deficient, for after all mental deficiency is a most potent cause of delinquency. There are needed also schools to meet the need of the child of unusual ability, or at least possibilities as great as schools.

The Prince of Wales recently stated in Canada that the dominions are no longer colonies. They are sister nations of the British nation. Such a statement may sound strange to some, but it is merely a manner of expression of the complete autonomy of different parts of the Britannic Commonwealth.

More of Social Service

At the quarterly meeting of the Board of Control of the State Institutions in Iowa, in January, an excellent paper was read concerning social service in connection with these institutions. It was emphasized that to treat a case properly it was necessary to know something of the past history and of the family. It is necessary also to see that the family is provided for during the residence of the individual in an institution; and third, upon the release of the individual from the institution, the case should not at once be dropped, and be thrown at once upon the community, but there should be a follow-up system, to see that his necessary wants are provided for.

Insanity is evidently a sickness, and it is found that a large part of crime is based upon mental deficiency. Delinquency belongs to a limited number of families. In fact, it has been pointed out that ninety per cent at least of crime, and ninety per cent of mental delinquency and of insanity, can be traced to five per cent of the families.

To turn a patient out of the hospital without due provision for his after care is all too often to return him to the same environment which produced the precipitation of his earlier condition, which means simply a return, and a necessary return to the state institution. It means also that by its neglect, the State is assisting in the breeding of incompetents.

It is a matter of social service, of Christianity, if you will, not of charity in a disagreeable sense, but of the broadest possible charity in the sense of the love of God and for our fellow man, that those who are released from institutions should be assisted to make good and helped to better their condition over the critical period after their return to ordinary civil life.

Subjects Being Discussed

Railway Revenues

The railway revenues are larger for the first six months of 1920 than is the case for the first six months of 1919, yet the net operating income was decidedly less for the six months of 1920. The same is true for the month of June, 1920, as compared with June, 1919. It is very clear that deficits are decreasing under private control. Nor is this accounted for either by taxes, income tax, or by additional wage charge. In addition to this, the income for the first six months of 1920 includes 50 million dollars back mail pay. The war taxes included in 1920 were $11,554,321. The increased wage accruals were $25,371,765. But these two items are scarcely one quarter of the difference in the net railway operating income, which in fact amounts to more than 141 million, in favor of the period of Government ownership; and this despite the 50 million dollars back mail pay above referred to, which in and of itself more than offsets the tax assessments and wage accruals.

Shopping Around

Those who live in large cities have an opportunity which is not offered to those in small country towns, and that is to shop around. A recent item in the Christian Science Monitor notes that for three reputable concerns, cleaning and pressing a suit of clothes, the first asked $3; the second $2; and the third $1.25 for the same identical service. This is also true in the purchase of goods.

There is a wide difference in price in large cities, and a wide difference in the price of the necessities of life, of food, fuel, and clothing. There is also an opportunity for

A Bid for Church Union

BY T. W. WILLIAMS

An important expression of opinion by the annual conference of Anglican bishops which met in London this summer.

Another attempt is being made to unite all the so-called Christian churches, regular and irregular, established and dis-established, conformed and nonconformed, orthodox and un-orthodox.

The overtures come from the bishops of the Episcopacy of England. There was held during July and August at Lambeth Palace, London, conference of two hundred and fifty-two bishops from all parts of the world—from the United States, Canada, Australia, India, China, Japan, and many parts of Africa. Every ten years since 1867 the Anglican bishops from all over the world have met at Lambeth to consider matters of moment in the life of Christian people. The recent conference was the sixth of the series.

As an outcome of this conference an appeal for a "re-union of Christians on broader lines than anything of the kind previously contemplated has been issued by the archbishops and bishops of the Anglican communion." The appeal is directed to the orthodox church of the east, the Roman communion of the west, and to all the free churches. Reunion plans which provided that all other churches might be absorbed by the Anglican church have now been abandoned. What is now envisaged is an entirely new structure "attractive enough to command assent and even enthusiasm, simple enough to begin at once, and large enough to include all."

The aim ostensibly is not to extend the power of the Anglican church, but to establish a truly Catholic church, to which every organized part may bring its own contribution of life and organization. It is also proposed that the episcopacy shall no longer be regarded as a purely Anglican institution. It is to be free from all trammels suggestive of prelacy and with its primitive notes and simplicity restored. It is proposed that what the League of Nations will be in the field of international politics, this new union may become in the field of Christian coordination and evangelization. Herewith text of the appeal:

"We, archbishops, bishops, metropolitan, and other bishops of the Holy Catholic Church in full communion with the Church of England, in conference assembled realizing the responsibility which rests upon us at this time, and sensible of the sympathy and the prayers of many, both within and without our communion, make this appeal to all Christian people.

"We acknowledge all those who believe in our Lord Jesus Christ, and have been baptized into the name of the Holy Trinity, as sharing with us membership in the universal church of Christ which is his body. We believe that the Holy Spirit has called us in a solemn and special manner to associate ourselves in penitence and prayer with all those who deplore the divisions of Christian people, and are inspired by the vision and hope of a visible unity of the whole church.

"1. We believe that God wills fellowship. By God's own act this fellowship was made in and through Jesus Christ, and its life is in his Spirit. We believe that it is God's pur-those less able to pay to secure bargains in various special sales of odds and ends. In small country towns, however, so far as we can observe, this is not the case, and prices are, as a rule, higher than those which can be secured in the large cities.

pose to manifest this fellowship so far as this world is concerned, in an outward, visible, and united society, holding one faith, having its own recognized officers, using God-given means of grace, and inspiring all its members to the world-wide service of the kingdom of God. This is what we mean by the Catholic church.

"2. This united fellowship is not visible in the world to-day. On the one hand there are other ancient episcopal communions in east and west, to whom ours is bound by many ties of common faith and tradition. On the other hand there are the great nonepiscopal communions standing for rich elements of truth, liberty, and life, which might otherwise have been obscured or neglected. With them we are closely linked by many affinities, racial, historical, and spiritual. We cherish the earnest hope that all these communions and our own may be led by the Spirit into the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God. But, in fact, we are all organized in different groups, each one keeping to itself gifts that rightly belong to the whole fellowship and tending to live its own life apart from the rest.

"3. The causes of division lie deep in the past, and are by no means simple or wholly blameworthy. Yet none can doubt that self-will, ambition, and lack of charity among Christians have been principal factors in the mingled process, and that these, together with blindness to the sin of disunion, are still mainly responsible for the breaches of Christendom. We acknowledge this condition of broken fellowship to be contrary to God's will, and we desire frankly to confess our share in the guilt of thus crippling the body of Christ and hindering the activity of his Spirit.

"4. The times call us to a new outlook and new measures. The faith cannot be adequately apprehended and the battle of the kingdom cannot be worthily fought while the body is divided; and is thus unable to grow up into the fullness of the life of Christ. The time has come, we believe, for all the separated groups of Christians to agree in forgetting the things which are behind, and reaching out towards the goal of a reunited Catholic church. The removal of the barriers which have arisen between them will only be brought about by a new comradeship of those whose faces are definitely set this way. The vision which rises before us is that of a church genuinely Catholic, loyal to all truth, and gathering into its fellowship 'all who profess and call themselves Christians,' within whose visible unity all the treasures of faith and order bequeathed as a heritage by the past to the present, shall be possessed in common, and made serviceable to the whole body of Christ. Within this unity Christian communions now separated from one another would retain much that has long been distinctive in their methods of worship and service. It is through a rich diversity of life and devotion that the unity of the whole fellowship will be fulfilled.

"5. This means an adventure of good will and still more of faith, for nothing less is required than a new discovery of the creative resources of God. To this adventure we are convinced that God is now calling all the members of his church.

"6. We believe that this visible unity of the church will be found to involve the whole-hearted acceptance of: The Holy Scriptures, as the record of God's revelation of himself to man, and as being the rule and ultimate standard of faith; and the creed commonly called Nicene, as the sufficient statement of the Christian faith, and either it or the Apostles' Creed as the baptismal confession of belief; the divinely instituted sacraments of baptism and the holy communion, as expressing for all the corporate life of the whole fellowship in and with Christ; a ministry acknowledged by every part of the church as possessing not only the inward call of the Spirit, but also the commission of Christ and the authority of the whole body.

"7. May we not reasonably claim that the episcopate is the one means of providing such a ministry? It is not that we call in question for a moment the spiritual reality of the ministries of those communions which do not possess the episcopate. On the contrary, we thankfully acknowledge that these ministries have been manifestly blessed and owned by the Holy Spirit as effective means of grace. But we submit that considerations alike of history and of present experience justify the claims which we make on behalf of the episcopate. Moreover, we would urge that it is now, and will prove to be in the future, the best instrument for maintaining the unity and continuity of the church. But we greatly desire that the office of a bishop should be everywhere exercised in a representative and a constitutional manner, and more truly express all that ought to be involved for the life of the Christian family in the title of Father-in-God. Nay, more, we eagerly look forward to the day when through its acceptance in a united church we may all share in that grace which is pledged to the members of the whole body in the apostolic rite of the laying on of hands, and in the joy and fellowship of a eucharist in which as one family we may together, without any doubtfulness of mind, offer to the one Lord our worship and service.

"8. We believe that for all, the truly equitable approach to union is by the way of mutual deference to one another's consciences. To this end we who send forth this appeal would say that if the authorities of other communions should so desire, we are persuaded that terms of union having been otherwise satisfactorily adjusted, bishops and clergy of our communion would willingly accept from these authorities a form of commission or recognition which would commend our ministry to their congregations, as having its place in the one family life. It is not in our power to know how far this suggestion may be acceptable to those to whom we offer it. We can only say that we offer it in all sincerity as a token of our longing that all ministries of grace, theirs and ours, shall be available for the service of our Lord in a united church. It is our hope that the same motive would lead ministers who have not received it to accept a commission through episcopal ordination as obtaining for them a ministry throughout the whole fellowship. In so acting no one of us could possibly be taken to repudiate his past ministry. God forbid that any man should repudiate a past experience rich in spiritual blessings for himself and others. Nor would any of us be dishonoring the Holy Spirit of God, whose call led us all to our several ministries and whose power enabled us to perform them. We shall be publicly and formally seeking additional recognition of a new call to wider service in a reunited church, and imploring for ourselves God's grace and strength to fulfill the same.

"9. The spiritual leadership of the Catholic Church in days to come, for which the world is manifestly waiting depends upon the readiness with which each group is prepared to make sacrifices for the sake of a common fellowship, a common ministry, and a common service to the world. We place this ideal first and foremost before ourselves, and our own people. We call upon them to make the effort to meet the demands of a new age with a new outlook. To all other Christian people whom our words may reach, we make the same appeal. We do not ask that any one communion should consent to be absorbed in another. We do ask that all should unite in a new and great endeavor to recover and to manifest to the world the unity of the body of Christ for which he prayed."

Commenting on the above, the Archbishop of Canterbury said:

"We have considered question of reunion with the Church of Rome, with the Swedish, Scandinavian, Moravian, and other creeds, but what we largely concentrated our efforts upon was our relation to the other reformed churches—that is outside Rome and the eastern churches. What we aimed at was to try afresh to get a united church. The points on which we agreed were:

"1. Belief in the Bible.

"2. In the Christian doctrine of the creeds (Apostles' and Nicene).

"3. In the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's supper.

"4. On a definite ministry.

"These were the matters on which all would have to be agreed as a basis of reunion.

"The difficulty arises when you come to organization. On the main subjects there was practically a unanimous conclusion. The unanimity was surprising, and I do not think that anybody could have expected so much unity. There never has been in the history of the church's life as large an endeavor to bring into harmony people who apparently differ from one another on other things, but who are at one on questions of faith and belief, and with the blessing of God it will be fruitful.

"As regards the Church of Rome, our position so far as we know is hopeless. They do not consent to waive anything they have ever said, but by the grace of God they may be softened. We should long to get them all, but we do not see our way at present."

This is a wonderful document. It commands respect. It must be accepted on its face. Let us believe that these men have acted in good faith. Let us impassionately consider their proposition and without prejudice.

For years I have felt that the episcopate, if you please, of the Church of Jesus Christ should outline a basis of Christian union and offer it to the world. We have been slow. Our Anglican friends have anticipated us. Then let us consider their proposition.

Admissions

The following striking admissions are made:

1. The causes of division lie deep in the past, and are by no means simple or wholly blameworthy.
2. Self-will, ambition, and lack of charity among Christians have been principal factors in the mingling processes.
3. These, together with blindness to the sin of disunion are still mainly responsible for the breaches of Christendom.
4. This condition of broken fellowship is contrary to God's will.
5. We desire frankly to confess our share in the guilt of thus crippling the body of Christ and hindering the activity of his Spirit.
6. A renunciation of exclusive authority.
7. Abrogation of the old claim of succession.
8. Recognition of the ministerial claims of others.
9. Willingness to accept ordination from churches which until now they claimed had no authority.
10. Willingness to confer authority on representatives of other communions.

Commendable Features

1. "God wills fellowship. By God's own act this fellowship was made in and through Jesus Christ, and its life is in the Holy Spirit.

2. "It is God's purpose to manifest this fellowship, as far as this world is concerned in an outward, visible, and united society, holding one faith, having its own recognized officers, using God-given means of grace, and inspiring all its members to the world-wide service of the kingdom of God.

3. "The times call us to a new outlook and new measures. The faith cannot be adequately apprehended and the battle of the kingdom cannot be worthily fought while the body is divided, and is thus unable to grow up into the fullness of the life of Christ.

4. "The vision which rises before us is that of a church genuinely Catholic, loyal to all truth, and gathering into its fellowship all 'who profess and call themselves Christians,' within whose visible unity all the treasures of faith and order, bequeathed as a heritage by the past to the present, shall be possessed in common and made serviceable to the whole body of Christ.

5. "Nothing less is required than a new discovery of the creative resources of God. To this adventure we are convinced that God is now calling all the members of his church.

6. "The episcopate is the only means of providing such a ministry (a ministry acknowledged by every part of the church as possessing not only the inward call of the Spirit, but also the commission of Christ and the authority of the whole body.)

7. "We eagerly look forward to the day, when through its acceptance [episcopate] in a united church we may all share in that grace which is pledged to the members of the whole body in the apostolic rite of the laying on of hands, and in the joy and fellowship of a eucharist in which as one family we may together, without any doubtfulness of mind, offer to the one Lord our worship and service.

8. "We shall be publicly and formally seeking additional recognition of a new call to wider service in a reunited church, and imploring for ourselves God's grace and strength to fulfill the same."

Untenable Positions

Herewith reasons why we as a church cannot accept the above invitation:

1. Authority. Authority comes from God; speaking of the episcopate, Paul says, "Let no man take this honor unto himself unless he be called of God." A desire, however sincere, to unite the various sects and churches does not warrant a wholesale conferment of the episcopate without legitimate call. It is not in the power of man or men to confer authority. God alone can do this.

2. Revelation. Inasmuch as direct revelation from God is the only means whereby men can be called to the episcopate or receive the priesthood, we must question the right to receive of our Anglican brethren and all others who deny present and direct revelation, to confer and their worthiness to receive ordination so long as they deny its source.

3. Doctrine. We can agree as a basis of union on the acceptance of "The Holy Scriptures, as the record of God's revelation of himself, to man, and as being the rule and ultimate standard of faith." We cannot in addition thereto tack on to this man-made creeds. With us the word of God is sufficient and the end of all dispute. We do believe in the "divinely instituted sacraments of baptism and the holy communion," but contend, and rightly too, that no one is entitled thereto until he has unreservedly consecrated himself to the service of God and has expressed a willingness to "live by every word which proceedeth from the mouth of God."

4. Basis of Union. It is our most sincere wish and devoted prayer that all the honest believers in the ministry and work of Jesus Christ should be, in fact, members of the one body. We cannot believe that God will be pleased with unity in diversity. The Scriptures verily say, "One Lord, one faith, one baptism," and "There is one body and one Spirit." Jesus gave promise that the Holy Ghost would guide "into all truth." It follows that there is but one priesthood, and one visible Body of Christ, and one gospel. John cautioned the church: "If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God-speed." The basis of union is laid down by Jesus Christ. This does not need elucidation, amplification, or amendment. All the teachings of Jesus Christ form the only basis of union—in both belief and practice.

5. Organization. The organization of the church is clearly portrayed in the New Testament. Paul in Ephesians 4:11-16 outlines the order of the priesthood, as also the purpose, duration, and realization of this ministry.

Order. "And he gave some apostles; and some prophets; and some evangelists; and some pastors and teachers."

Purpose. "For the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ."

Duration. "Till we all come in the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ."

Realization. "That we henceforth be no more children tossed to and fro and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness thereof whereby they lie in wait to deceive."

When this obtains there will be but one priesthood, one communion, one fellowship, one service, one united body of Christ, and not before.

We call upon the whole Christian world—Roman, Greek, Anglican, and Protestant to discard human innovations, and accumulated traditions and to unite with us in the reannunciation of the gospel as promulgated by Jesus Christ and the establishment of his church, the pattern of which is clearly outlined in the New Testament. In so doing we are entitled to the verification of the promise of Jesus: "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself. We shall also be entitled to receive the spiritual gifts enumerated by Paul in 1 Corinthians 12, and to enjoy the signs spoken of by Jesus in Mark 16.

We commend our Anglican brethren for taking the initial step looking to a review of the various church claims to the ministry and service of Jesus Christ. We, nevertheless, feel that the plan proposed will fail. If Christ be true, it must fail. Good will be accomplished in that men will be led to see the impotency of every scheme other than enunciated by Jesus himself.

We give assurance that this, the Church of Jesus Christ, will be ever ready to do its utmost to eliminate schism, to overcome division, and to achieve that consummation so eloquently voiced in the prayer of Jesus, "that they all may be one, even as thou and I are one."

The Church or the World—Which?

BY S. K. SORENSEN

The second of a series of articles contrasting the joy of service with the emptiness of worldly pleasures.

"But she that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth."—Paul.

"Do not suppose, because it has been spoken concerning restoration, that ye shall be restored from sin to happiness. Behold I say unto you; wickedness never was happiness. And now, my son, all men that are in a state of nature, or I would say in a carnal state, are in the gall of bitterness, and in the bonds of iniquity; they are without God in the world, and they have gone contrary to the nature of God; therefore they are in a state contrary to the nature of happiness. And now behold, is the meaning of the word restoration, to take a thing of a natural state, and place it in an unnatural state, or to place it in a state opposite to its nature? O, my son, this is not the case; but the meaning of the word restoration is to bring back again evil for evil, or carnal for carnal, or devilish for devilish; good for that which is good; righteous for that which is righteous; just for that which is just; merciful for that which is merciful; therefore, my son, see that ye are merciful unto your brethren; deal justly, judge righteously and do good continually; and if you do all these things then shall ye receive your reward; yea, ye shall have mercy restored unto you again; ye shall have justice restored unto you again; ye shall have a righteous judgment restored unto you again; and ye shall have good rewarded unto you again; for that which ye do send out, shall return unto you again, and be restored; therefore the word restoration, more fully condemneth the sinner, and justifieth him not at all."—Alma.

The two quotations cited above contain serious food for thought, and while the two men whose words are quoted were total strangers to each other and lived in two different hemispheres, yet the substance of their thoughts is the same. To be carnally minded is death, spiritual death; therefore, we may be alive in the flesh and yet be dead spiritually; hence the statement of Paul, "But she that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth." Alma so beautifully explains how when a man lives in a carnal state he is in a state foreign to the nature of God, hence spiritually dead, since all spiritual life comes from God. When man fails to partake of his nature, he is dead spiritually while he yet liveth, and the nature of his life which he lives is that which will be restored in the resurrection.

Now, the question arises, Can we afford to spend a life in conditions which are foreign to the nature of God, and have the effect of those conditions restored unto us in the eternal world?

We may congratulate ourselves upon being members of the church and observing certain rites and ceremonies belonging thereto, and also attend church quite regularly and pay our offerings, bear our testimonies, and offer our prayers; yet in our everyday life, display in our conduct and conversation that we have never partaken of the nature of God, that we are really leading a double life, so to speak.

Will this do us any good or will it more fully condemn us? If I am known to engage in telling smutty and vulgar stories or carrying on unchaste conversation, or things of that kind, do I reflect the mind of Christ? Would he do it? He is my example. In what direction does my influence lead, then, to Christ and his church or away from them? Am I in correspondence with and partaking of the nature of God which is eternal life?

If I am known to go to places of amusement of a questionable character and my soul desires to feed on such, and delights therein, is that not an index to the nature and character I am building? Would Christ, my example, go there? If so, I can safely follow.

Remember in our former articles the illustrations that every form of life must correspond with its environments in order to grow. If my soul finds food and delight in such places of amusement, it shows on the face of it what my nature is. The carnal nature within must have food to grow upon or it would die. If I am given to read useless fiction and silly love stories and blood-curdling banditti and detective stories, it proves my lack of desire for real and useful knowledge and spiritual development, if these things are all that my soul desires to feed upon. Would Christ do it? If so, I can.

If I should have a particular craving for the dance hall and the ballroom and my soul desires that, is that a desire of the spiritual nature which comes from God, or from a desire of the carnal mind of man? Would Christ go there and partake in the revelry incident to such places? If so, we can safely follow. We should be his followers always, and he must be the leader and set the example.

"He that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life."—Christ.

"And every man whose spirit receiveth not the light is under condemnation, for man is spirit. The elements are eternal, and spirit and element, inseparably connected, receiveth a fullness of joy; and when separated, man cannot receive a fullness of joy. The elements are the tabernacle of God; yea, man is the tabernacle of God, even temples; and whatsoever temple is defiled, God shall destroy that temple."—Doctrine and Covenants 90: 5.

"Ye are not your own, for ye are bought with a price; therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's."—Paul.

One of the signs of the last days would be that men would be lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God. The implication is that those who are "lovers of pleasure" would also be lovers of God, hence, likely, these might be church members, but their love for pleasure would be greater or more than the love for God. They would endeavor to blend the carnal and the spiritual nature in one, making a compromise between good and evil.

If my spirit and body are not my own, but are bought with a price, the precious blood of Christ, what right would I then have to compromise with evil or lend my influence to that which is carnal and of a questionable character? Would it even be permissible for me to associate myself with such an environment and not be in danger of being contaminated thereby, and thus hinder the growth of the godlike nature within me?

If my body is a temple for the indwelling of the Spirit of God, could I expect that Spirit to dwell there if the godlike nature has not been developed? If the desire of my spirit is after worldly things then upon these things it feeds and finds satisfaction and pleasure, but my body ceases to be a temple where God's Holy Spirit can dwell.

We are free agents to choose for ourselves which course we will pursue; but our final destiny will be decided by another.

If I have developed an abnormal desire for wealth and that has become the ideal of my life and get it I must, even through speculation and fraud, which God has forbidden, then also on this point am I out of harmony with God and Christ. Would Christ do this, take advantage of one of his brethren in a business deal and congratulate himself on his business ability and shrewdness? If not, can I do it and yet be true to my pattern? Christ would certainly not do it or he would not have given the following instruction to the church:

"The spirit of speculation, the exhibition of greed for gain is unseemly in the Saints and officers of the church, and should be avoided. It has the appearance of evil."

This is putting it very mildly, but the hint is there and should be sufficient. The great apostle of the Gentiles is perhaps more outspoken on this point, which is as follows:

"But they that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil; which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. But thou, O man of God, flee these things."

Why should we not also flee these things, if their tendency is to demoralize and destroy the spiritual nature within us and thus forfeit the greater of all riches, eternal life?

The carpenter often has to make patterns in his work, in order to cut other pieces by them, but unless he marked his pattern, it would get mixed with the others cut by it, as they always look so much alike that there is no distinction between them except for the mark. This should also be the case with us and our pattern, that there should be absolutely no distinction, so far as godlike character is concerned, and were it not for the mark he received upon the cross of Calvary, he would be just like his brethren and they as he. Therefore, also, the beloved Apostle John says:

"Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure."

That will make us exactly like our pattern.

The Lord has often reproved the church both in this dispensation and in former ones, and he has done it for the benefit of men; because he knew that unless their human nature was transformed and became attuned to the divine, that they must be shut out from his presence eternally. "For every man whose spirit receiveth not light is under condemna-

OF GENERAL INTEREST

THE HOLY PLACES

A Hebrew historian tells a story of a Roman conqueror who demanded to be taken to the temple and admitted to the Holy of Holies in order that he might behold the great Jehovah of the Israelites. He was allowed to enter, and lo! the place was empty.

This fable is capable of two interpretations: one cynical, the other idealistic. It can be taken to mean either that the holy place was indeed vacant; or it can be taken to mean that a true sanctuary contains nothing which can be seen with the eye of the flesh.

The holy places on Cape Cod Bay to which, from every shire's end, folk are wending on tercentenary pilgrimages, fit this description. Provincetown and Plymouth are quaint, interesting, and beautiful old towns. Each is unique. Both are amply worth seeing for their own sakes; but any relics proportionate to the magnitude of the events they commemorate are not to be found in either of them. People do not visit these places to see this or that monument. They are not attracted by what can be seen with the eye of the flesh. They are attracted by something immaterial. The real Pilgrim monument is an idea. It is the idea which has dominated the worthiest elements in our American experiment of popular government.

If it were a question of antiquity, plenty of spots on our coast antedate the Plymouth colony. If it were a question of external consequence, the Boston settlement soon permanently outranked the one at Plymouth. But it was the settlers of the Plymouth colony who first hoisted the banner of an ideal in this sea-girt, snow-beleaguered wilderness, and they kept it flying through fair weather and foul.

Just as there are two ways of looking at a sanctuary—with the eye of the spirit or with the eye of the flesh—there are two ways of keeping these solemn feasts.

We are prone to honor dead prophets not because they were prophets, but because they are dead. It is not difficult to lay a laurel wreath on ancestral tombs and pronounce rhetorical eulogies to the boom of saluting guns. It is not so easy to honor these strong souls, as they would prefer to be honored, by living our lives in the spirit which animated theirs.

There is a superb poem written by a son of New England, midway in the last century, which proclaims this truth with a trumpet tongue. James Russell Lowell was revolted at the spectacle of descendants of the Puritans, people of repute and position, piously prating of the stern and heroic love of liberty which had impelled the Pilgrims to these shores, whilst they themselves tamely tolerated or even defended a form of human servitude which the Pilgrims would have been the first to drench with scalding condemnation. Anyone who cares to know what Lowell thought of people who worship dead prophets, not because they were prophets, but because they are dead, can read it in The Present Crisis.

The people who came to Plymouth were virtually outcasts. They were politico-religious refugees. They represented an ideal of life and society so advanced that it scandalized and outraged the views of their reputable neighbors. In tion, for man is spirit," and we cannot continue to walk in darkness and yet receive the light of God.

"For if ye live after the flesh, unto sin, ye shall die; but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live unto Christ. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God."—Paul.

speech and in the drama of the period they were butts of ridicule. They were forsaking bodily comfort and personal security for the sake of an ideal. Judged by the standards according to which most of us live the larger portion of our lives, they were, one and all, visionaries.

Why couldn't they behave as their neighbors behaved, and maintain their loyalty to their king and to the ideas of their fathers?

People of the Puritan persuasion were under distinct social stigma. They were viewed by the authorities with open suspicion, dislike, or positive hatred.

We all acknowledge the grandeur of this heroic attitude toward life, in theory. But that is of little honor to the Pilgrims and of little value to ourselves unless it is translated into the conduct of our daily lives; unless we summon the intellectual courage and the moral hardihood to make pilgrimages into the lands of strange ideas on our own account, to locate and to espouse the enterprises in our own day which most nearly correspond to that of these liberty-loving folk who waded ashore on the icy sands of Plymouth.

They left an Old World for a New World. Their voyage was a physical one over bleak seas to a strange continent. In our physical geography there are no strange continents left. The pilgrimages which confront us are voyages to strange continents which must be created in our midst. It is by such pilgrimages, and such only, that the Pilgrims can be honored. And that is the spirit which dwells in the Holy Places.—Uncle Dudley.—Editorial in Boston Daily Globe.

HIGH PRICES NOT DETERMINED BY FREIGHT RATES

The Literary Digest for August 21 discusses the effect of the new freight rates on commodity prices. Much has been said of the effect of the increase of wages leading to the increase of freight rates, and there has been considerable threat that higher freight rates would mean decidedly higher commodity prices. Mr. George Dallas Dixon, traffic vice president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, points out that the amounts which can be fairly added to present prices are only a very small fraction. Thus on flour in carload lots, from Minneapolis to Philadelphia, the increase would amount to 33 cents a barrel; which means on the 24-pound sack, less than a cent. If shipped in less than carload lots, the increase on the 24 pounds would be but seven cents.

For a crate of eggs, the added freight charge amounts to about half a cent a dozen. On butter from Chicago to Philadelphia, four mills. In any case about a half a cent a pound. On oranges of a size to weigh eight pounds to the dozen, the increased freight charge would be but three to three and a half cents a dozen. On potatoes, about a cent a peck. On apples, sixteen to twenty-five cents a barrel, or about two cents on a peck. On bacon, lard, and canned meats, one sixth to one-quarter of a cent a pound.

The Southern Railway has also made estimates showing freight on shoes from Boston to Atlanta. It is now $1.64 a hundred; the new rate will be $2.18½. That is, the old rate amounts to about five cents on a three-pound pair of shoes. The new rate will be six and two thirds cents, a difference of less than two cents. On shirts, from New York to New Orleans, the old rate amounts to half a cent; the new one to two thirds of a cent. On clothing sent from Chicago to Jacksonville, Florida, the old rate amounts to less than eleven cents on a heavy suit, together with its packing. The new rate will be about fourteen cents. Thus on a suit that now is selling for about $60, the difference is three cents. The freight rate on sugar was about half a cent a pound from New Orleans to Greensboro, North Carolina. The new rate will be less than seven tenths of a cent per pound.

These and other illustrations show clearly that high prices are not determined by the freight rates.

FREIGHT CAR SHORTAGE

The Iron Age states that a railway car costs three times as much as it did before the war. Hence it should be good business to spend more to get service out of the car. The best freight car movement was in 1916, an average of 26.9 miles a day. Last year the average was 23.1 miles, but for the past three months an average rate of 20 miles a day would be high.

If we assume, however, that 20 miles is correct, it means it would take 900,000 cars more, at the present rate of movement, to do the work that could be done with the 2,300,000 cars actually available if the latter moved 26.9 miles a day.

There is need of extra terminals, need of more cars, and more engines. But what is needed most is efficient handling of present equipment. First, that cars should be filled more completely. Second, that car movement should be maintained.

The president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Co., who is also chairman of the advisory committee of executive officers, stated on July 8 that it should be and really is possibly to get an average of thirty miles a day for freight cars under normal circumstances. If this were done, it would be the equivalent of adding about 1,200,000 freight cars to service.

He points out that the average loading has been only 70 per cent of capacity, while the present loading is only 68 per cent of capacity. He argues that heavier loading should be done.

This article in the Iron Age is very strong in favor of the continuation of private ownership, and clearly shows the great falling off in efficiency the past three months. It would seem to indicate that an efficient handling of present equipment would add at least 75 per cent to the movement, while an average car movement of thirty miles a day, loaded with 91 per cent of capacity would easily double the present efficiency of freight handling.

ONE SAFE POSSESSION

Christ said: "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven. He also said: The kingdom of heaven is within you. In making that statement—Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, nor thieves break through and steal—I was trying to make the contrast between the standard of life of those who live in external, or objective, things, and of those who live in internal, or subjective, experiences.

Some of you will remember the story told in Plutarch of an Athenian gentleman who was sacking a city that he had captured. He remembered that in the city was a friend of his, a philosopher, a very dear friend; and he hastened to find this philosopher in order to assure himself that no harm came to him. The soldiers of the attacking general were burning and pillaging and taking possession of everything they could find. At last the general found the philosopher and said to him, "Have any of my soldiers taken anything from you?" "No," said the philosopher, "not even an Athenian soldier can take my knowledge." The only thing that he possessed that was worth keeping was his knowledge. The soldiers could not get that, no matter how they wanted it. If he had a house or goods or chattels of any kind, they might have those because those he did not value; but his knowledge he valued. He had laid up his treasures where moth and rust do not corrupt, and where thieves do not break through and steal.—Scott Nearing.

A Few Thoughts About Stewardships

BY EDWARD RANNIE

The law of stewardships provides a lawful method of associating the property interests of the church.

As there has been no official statement made by the First Presidency or Bishopric as to what a stewardship is, and in whom the title of the property will rest, it is an open question for discussion, so the writer will express a few thoughts on the question.

"Every man shall be made accountable unto me, a steward over his own property, or that which he has received by consecration."—Doctrine and Covenants 42: 9.

The instruction to Bishop Edward Partridge was that "when he shall appoint a man his portion, give unto him a writing that shall secure unto him his portion." (Doctrine and Covenants 51: 1.) In the latter part of the same verse we are informed that if he became a transgressor and was expelled from the church he could only retain that portion that had been deeded to him. From the tenor of the whole verse it was the intention of the law that a person should have a deed for the property that he held. It is very evident from Doctrine and Covenants 42: 9 that a member having a stewardship over his own property or that which the church helps him to get under the law of consecration is responsible to God for how he uses it. According to section 51: 1 he is protected in his property rights by a written contract, or deed, if that is a better term to use.

One of the very important things connected with receiving stewardships is the manner in which the church would help those who needed help. In the springtime of 1909 at the opening of the General Conference Bishop E. L. Kelley made a statement which was to the effect that the church had now come to a place in its development concerning the temporalities that it was necessary for our heavenly Father to give the church light so that the work could go on, and suggested that a time of fasting and prayer be appointed. The late President Joseph Smith appointed the following Sunday as such a day and all the priesthood met in the basement of the Lamoni church on that morning and held a prayer meeting. It was a wonderful meeting and about equal to the one we held last April in the Stone Church. On Monday following that prayer meeting revelations numbers 128 and 129 were given.

We had been told for quite a number of years by the best lawyers in the church, among that number being the Bishop of the church, that the church could not hold real estate, only that which was needed for church buildings, parsonages, sanitariums, and schools to be erected thereon. And the writer had been told of cases where courts would not permit certain churches receiving certain gifts of real estate that had been bequeathed to them.

We also remember according to reports in the daily papers about 1881 or 1882 of property held by the dominant church in Utah being taken by the Federal court and sold and the money given to the public schools. In section 128 the Lord gives the church instructions how it can escape those difficulties and in a lawful manner hold property and not violate the laws of Missouri or of the United States.

Paragraphs 1 and 6 inform us that we can have organizations or associations by which property can be held in a lawful manner. It seems from what is contemplated in those sections that the Bishopric should organize such societies and when money comes to the church to buy land, that it should be turned over to such associations to purchase the land and held by the association, instead of by some official of the church and reported as part of the assets of the church. In that way our people can be helped to get homes and the church not violate in any way the law of the States where we may purchase property.

As it seems to the writer our stewardships should be one and not two, and all the property we have is our stewardship, and not part held in fee simple and part in trust by some society, the church, or some other. After our tithing was paid, that portion of the surplus that we did not need should be an additional contribution to the church or to one of the associations that was holding property for the benefit of the members of the church. Those associations become "helps" to the church to help it do its work in a lawful and orderly way and not come in conflict with the law of the land but work in harmony with the law.

One safeguard that would be necessary to protect those associations and the church would be that in case the person who was helped to get a home wanted to leave the community, he should sell the property back to the association at the original cost with the value of the improvements added. That would stop speculation and prevent the community from being broken up. Still another important feature should go far with helping the people get their homes: on the money that is donated by the Saints to purchase land there should be no interest charged. It is a gift from the members for a noble purpose and the beneficiaries should not have to pay for what was intended as a gift. It not costing the association anything, they should not charge for its use.

Another important item in connection with stewardships and helping those of our people who need help, is, who shall be helped, that is, what kind of people shall they be? To give an illustration the following imaginary case will serve the purpose. "A" is a young boy in the public schools and is diligent and faithful in his studies. If he desires to take up some profession he enters a university and continues the same habits of faithfulness there. When he goes out into the busy world he continues in the same way to be faithful in his work. Because of his faithfulness, industrious habits, economical ways of living, and foregoing the pleasures of the world he accumulates sufficient to care for himself and his wife in their declining years, or he may go from the common school into a store and while he works for small wages learn the business, and in time become a prosperous merchant. Or he may start as a hired hand on the farm and he succeeds because he has followed those habits of economy and industry, which bring success. Or he may go into a machine shop or mill and become a skilled mechanic, and success crowns his efforts there because of the right kind of habits.

On the other side of the picture we have "B" who will not go to school, and will not take up with any of the professions, trades, or become a merchant. He is lazy, shiftless, wastes what little money he does earn in useless pleasure. He forms habits that take his time and money and impair his health. While his parents live they indulge him in those habits that make for poverty. When they are gone he is always standing on the poverty line.

Shall the wealth accumulated by such men as "A" be taken to care for such men as "B," and so encourage laziness and shiftless habits? The law of God condemns the idler. (Doctrine and Covenants 75: 5.) Any society, a church or any other, that takes the wealth of the industrious and economical and gives it to the lazy, shiftless, and pleasure-loving, will destroy itself. A society that is composed of industrious and lazy cannot perpetuate itself. It must die.

In order that a society can perpetuate itself the following four fundamental principles must be its foundation stones:

1. Honesty.
2. Industry.
3. Economy.
4. Efficiency.

Our heavenly Father wants us to be kind and generous to the poor and unfortunate, but the line must be drawn somewhere between the lazy and the industrious or the society that fosters both classes of people will destroy itself.

Prior to the Reformation in Europe the state and church was one and the land was largely controlled by the church, and it is still controlled in some countries in the same manner. There were a great many forms of religious persecution by the church that happened to be in power and one was in regard to the land held by the church. A club was held over the people to compel them to remain with the dominant church, and it is still used as a weapon for the same purpose in some of the countries of Europe. When the Pilgrim Fathers left the shores of Europe they sought for freedom to worship God. The principles that they brought with them found an expression in our National and State governments, and for wise and good reasons, because it was God's way, the church was prevented from having any control over the land. Laws are found in all the States prohibiting churches from holding land except for strictly church purposes.

When our Government got possession of the Philippine Islands the Catholic Church through a society of monks controlled most of the land and our Government purchased it from them at a cost of several million dollars. Our heavenly Father knew what kind of laws was best, that Zion might be built up on this land, and he put it into the hearts of men forming our Government to make such laws as would best serve his purpose. Now when he wants us to go on with the work he tells us to organize associations according to the law of the land so that we can buy and sell land in a lawful way and so help carry out the purposes of Zion.

Any going back to the things that our fathers left behind in Europe will not succeed. It means sure failure. The land must be controlled in a democratic way where the voice of the people can be heard and the associations as provided for in the law gives that opportunity. The work of the church is to teach the people righteousness and then in carrying out the laws it will be administered in a righteous manner. When those associations are organized and carried on as the law provides there will be no need for our people to join fraternal societies and take out life insurance policies to have assistance in time of sickness or death; they will meet every want.

The only knowledge that a man has is the knowledge he can use.—Macaulay.

Do you know, the more I look into life, the more things it seems to me I can successfully lack—and continue to grow happier. How many kinds of food I do not need, nor cooks to cook them, how much curious clothing nor tailors to make it, how many books that I never read, and pictures that are not worth while! The farther I run, the more I feel like casting aside all such impedimenta—lest I fail to arrive at the far goal of my endeavor.

I like to think of an old Japanese nobleman I once read about, who ornamented his house with a single vase at a time, living with it, absorbing its message of beauty, and when he tired of it, replacing it with another. I wonder if he had the right way, and we, with so many objects to hang on our walls, place on our shelves, drape on our chairs, and spread on our floors, have mistaken our course and placed our hearts upon the multiplicity rather than the quality of our possessions!—David Grayson, in Adventures in Friendship.

Physical Fitness for Children Who Work

The preliminary report of the permanent Committee on Standards of Physical Fitness for Children Entering Employment, appointed by the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor, is announced.

The report consists of two parts—General Recommendations and Minimum Standards of Physical Fitness for Children Entering and Working in Industry. The general recommendations advocate a minimum age of sixteen years for entrance into industry on the ground that the period of pubescence, not completed in the majority of cases until the sixteenth year, is a time of special strain for the child. No child, according to the recommendations, should be allowed to go to work until he has had a complete physical examination, and has been declared physically fit for the particular occupation which he is about to take up. A reexamination for children when changing occupations, and periodical examinations for all working children are deemed necessary. The need of special study by local administrative and medical officers of occupations in which children are likely to be employed is pointed out, and further scientific study of the effect of different kinds of work on the physique of boys and girls in their teens is declared to be essential. The fields which in the opinion of the committee are in need of special research are listed.

The necessity for further study, states the committee, is urgent. However, on the basis of scientific studies already made and the experience acquired in administering child labor laws prescribing physical requirements now in force in a few States, it is possible to formulate certain tentative standards. These it is expected will aid materially in safeguarding children from the evil results of premature and unsuitable work.

The suggested standards cover normal development, indicate what constitutes sound health and physical fitness for specific occupations, and emphasize points to be observed and methods to be employed in physical examinations. Defects for which children should be permanently refused certificates of employment and those for which temporary refusals should be made are listed. A record form for the use of physicians in examining children and careful instructions for filling in this form are appended to the report.

The report will be sent in mimeographed form for criticism before being printed to experts in industrial hygiene, State labor departments, local certificate-issuing officers, and interested persons throughout the country.

The committee consists of the following persons:

Doctor George P. Barth, Director of Hygiene, City Health Department, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Chairman; Doctor Emma M. Appel, Employment Certificate Department, Chicago Board of Education; Doctor S. Josephine Baker, Chief, Bureau of Child Hygiene, Department of Health, New York City; Doctor Taliaferro Clark, representing the United States Public Health Service; Doctor C. Ward Crampton, Dean, Normal School of Physical Education, Battle Creek, Michigan; Doctor D. L. Edsall, Dean, Harvard Medical School; Doctor George W. Goler, Health Officer, Rochester, New York; Doctor Harry Linenthal, Director of Industrial Clinic, Massachusetts General Hospital, Boston, Massachusetts; Doctor H. H. Mitchell, representing the National Child Labor Committee; Doctor Anna E. Rude, Director of Hygiene Division, United States Children's Bureau; Doctor Thomas D. Wood, Chairman on Health Problems and Education, Columbia University, New York City; Miss E. Nathalie Matthews, Director, Industrial Division, United States Children's Bureau, Secretary.—Children's Bureau.

Child Welfare Laws

A striking development in the movement to obtain better conditions for children is described in the pamphlet just issued by the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor, entitled "State commissions for the study and revision of child welfare laws."

It is nine years, according to this pamphlet, since Ohio appointed the first commission to study conditions surrounding children in the State and to codify and revise the laws relating to children. Since that time sixteen other States and the District of Columbia have officially recognized the importance of this work by appointing similar commissions, and altogether almost two thirds of the States have now taken some definite action towards studying legislation as it affects children.

In almost every State where such commissions have been appointed a careful study of conditions in the State and of remedies that have proved successful in other States has preceded suggestions for new legislation or for the revision of existing laws, thus avoiding the danger of hasty and ill-considered action. At the same time a carefully planned educational campaign has been carried on to explain the child-welfare needs of the State and the purpose and scope of the proposed legislation.

The subjects covered include the safeguarding of health, school attendance, regulation of employment, protection against exploitation, or corruption of morals, special provision and training of dependent and neglected children, methods of dealing with delinquent children, and State supervision of agencies and institutions.

The pamphlet gives a summary of organization and plans of work for each of the States in which commissions have been appointed, and an outline for an index of existing legislation affecting child welfare. It contains also a list of reports and articles relating to the work of the various commissions and a list of compilations and summaries of laws affecting children.—Children's Bureau.

A clipping from the London Daily Mail gives a short review of an expedition to Easter Island, in the southern Pacific, two thousand miles from the South American continent. The purpose was to investigate the origin of this people, whether they came from South America, or from the East. It was discovered that the cranial capacity of the island descendants of to-day is greater than that of the inhabitants of Whitechapel, and that they are the largest brained people yet found in the Pacific Ocean. They also have a number of graven images cut out of the volcanic rock. The conclusion reached by the explorers is that the makers of these images came from the West.

If I were the Devil, just at this juncture I would foster jealousies between the larger branches of the church. I would set each to watching the faults of the other, when according to their profession they should be cultivating good fellowship and mutual helpfulness.

These reflections are not pleasant, are they? But they show us our many vulnerable points. No fear that we shall give our adversary any valuable "pointers" by these cogitations, because he has used all these tactics and many others in times past.

Shall we take heed and repair the breach in the wall? Shall we strengthen our fortifications? Shall we guard the points of exposure? Shall we bury personal feelings and stand together? Shall we watch our acts? set a seal upon our lips? and purify our hearts?—Elbert A. Smith.

LETTERS

Curtis-Jensen Debate

This is a more complete account than the one we printed last week, having in addition the address by Miss Cole previously referred to.

In February, 1920, Elder Philemon Pement was looking after his missionary work in this city, when he noticed a long article in the newspaper, over the signature of Nephi Jensen, president of the Utah Mormon Church in Canada. Brother Pement visited him after having through the public press challenged him to public debate.

Different propositions were by each submitted to the other, with a view to arriving at something agreeable to both parties. For the benefit of those who in future may draw swords with this would-be Mormon champion, I narrate some of the—to say it mildly—meanderings of this self-boasted former prosecuting attorney of Salt Lake City.

Eventually the following propositions were agreed upon, though it took from February to July 12 to get our opponent's signature in a debatable way. Brother Pement and I submitted but two, which were:

No. 1. Resolved that Joseph Smith, the son of Joseph Smith, jr., was the legal successor to his father as president of the church, and that the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, with headquarters at Lamoni, Iowa, and Independence, Missouri, is the lawful continuation of the original church organized in 1830, and is in harmony therewith in doctrine, organization, and practice.

PHILEMON PEMENT affirms.

NEPHI JENSEN denies.

No. 2. Resolved that Brigham Young was the legal successor to Joseph Smith, jr., as president of the church which the said Joseph Smith, jr., founded in 1830; and that the church in Utah called the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is the lawful continuation of and successor to the said church, and is in harmony therewith in doctrine, organization, and practice.

NEPHI JENSEN affirms.

PHILEMON PEMENT denies.

Here I wish the reader to notice some of the proofs that Brigham Young told the truth when he boasted that his church could produce "the greatest and smoothest . . . in the world . . . and any other shade of character that you can mention." (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, p. 77.) For when we submitted to Mr. Jensen the propositions as they are written above, instead of signing them and returning them, he copied both propositions, signing the first one correctly, but switched the signatures on the latter, making the negative signature of Brother Pement come first; then Nephi Jensen signed his below the blank space where Brother Pement was to sign the negative. You will take notice that this was not a mistake, for I have before me the propositions that the same Mr. Jensen challenged Joseph Thompson, of Hamilton, Ontario, to debate, saying in his letter connected therewith that these were the same propositions that Philemon Pement of Ottawa had signed. They are signed the same, too.

There were two other glaring twists which for lack of space we pass by, but mention one more, so as not to leave you to doubt the veracity of Brigham Young.

When on the twelfth of July, by previous appointment, Mr. Jensen came to our meeting room where we finally signed up, after the papers were all signed he told us that he had been a very successful lawyer in Salt Lake for ten years and there was a law in the United States to the effect that, at least ten days before a court convened, the opposing attorneys submitted to each other a digest of the affirmative points and the authorities they would use in the lawsuit, and therefore he wished that ruling to be binding in this debate. He therefore asked me to hand him the documents just signed so that he might write that in the margin. I handed them to him, and he wrote in the margin of the documents signed: "The opponents shall, at least ten days before the debate, submit a typewritten copy of all the affirmative points and the authorities they will use in the discussion, to each other."

Brother Pement and I then questioned him if this were the law in courts of original jurisdiction or appellate courts? He declared it was the law in original jurisdiction courts as well as others. We then asked if there could not be any other evidence or authorities submitted during the discussion, to which he emphatically declared there could not. Being somewhat green in such practice of law, I suggested that as he had been a successful lawyer for ten years he no doubt was well practiced in submitting just such documents, and as Brother Pement was formerly a blacksmith he would not know just how to do it, and that therefore Mr. Jensen better write in the margin that he would submit his first and give Brother Pement a week to get his up in first-class condition to submit to him. He agreed to so write but procrastinated, so I said I chanced to know enough about the laws of both the United States and Canada to be aware that no such law ever did exist in either country, and I took my pen and drew it through his marginal writings. At this he became very indignant and abusive, and left the building. On the morning of the thirteenth he sent three of his men to say he would not debate the propositions as signed but would form others and debate them right away. We suggested that it had taken us three months to get his signature and we would not spend another such period getting fresh propositions signed. So we held fast, and though he had objected strenuously to signing rules to govern the debate, we insisted until finally we had him sign similar ones to those which governed in the Braden-Kelley debate, and besides we had a clause therein that allowed us to substitute any other debater, and knowing that Apostle J. F. Curtis had spent many years among those people in the West in missionary work and had debated them several times and besides had a trunk full of their own books wherewith to meet them, we communicated with the Presidency and Brother Curtis and when the sixteenth of August came around so did J. F. In our own church on the corner of Main Street and Echo Drive, in Ottawa, Ontario, we commenced the debate, an account of which I give for the benefit of those particularly who may have to meet the same issue as we have had to meet here and elsewhere.

The discussion was for twelve nights, six on each proposition. In Brother Curtis's first speech he set up his church as per resolution to which Mr. Jensen made but a few slighting remarks, and proceeded from a written document, previously prepared, to affirm that his was the true church in name, membership, and teachings, but in no sense did he attempt to follow the affirmative by refuting any of the points made by Brother Curtis.

In Brother Curtis's following speeches he had to take up the different false and malicious doctrines introduced by Brigham Young and others, showing their apostasy from the true faith, in which he showed that God told the church at Nauvoo that unless they taught as he commanded and did the work which he commanded them to do, they would be rejected with their dead, as a church.

The following are some of the many false teachings which Brigham Young and others of his apostate followers introduced which caused their rejection as a church. Polygamy, that Adam was their God and the only God with whom they had to do, and that Adam was the father of Jesus Christ, and thus Christ was not begotten by the Holy Ghost, also that there were certain sins which the atonement of Christ was insufficient to cover but by the shedding of the sinners' blood by his fellow men the atonement was made and thus his sins were pardoned, also that Christ was a polygamist. Here he presented the testimony of Orson Pratt, Orson Hyde, and J. M. Grant wherein they assert that Christ actually was a polygamist.

Mr. Jensen affirmed that when God said, "Come let us make man," etc., he addressed himself to a plurality of gods and not to his Only Begotten only. Brother Curtis read from the Inspired Translation that God said unto his Only Begotten: "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and it was so," and showed that this statement was also found in The Pearl of Great Price, which is one of the standard books of the Utah church. He further presented the following from Isaiah: "Before me there was no God formed, neither shall there be after me. I, even I, am the Lord; and beside me there is no Savior." (Isaiah 43: 10, 11.) "I am the first, and I am the last; and beside me there is no God." (Isaiah 44: 6.) "Is there a God beside me? Yea, there is no God; I know not any." (Isaiah 44: 8.) "I am the Lord and there is none else, there is no God beside me." (Isaiah 45: 5.) From the Book of Mormon he quoted: "Is there more than one God? And he answered, No. Now Zeezrom said unto him again, How knowest thou these things? And he said, An angel hath made them known unto me." (Book of Mormon, Alma 8: 9.)

Two quotations from the Book of Mormon were presented by Brother Curtis, showing that the blood atonement theory by the Utah Mormon Church was wrong, as follows: "For behold by me redemption cometh, and in me is the law of Moses fulfilled. I am the life and the light of the world. I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end. And ye shall offer up unto me no more the shedding of blood; yea, your sacrifices and your burnt offerings shall be done away, for I will accept none of your sacrifices and your burnt offerings; and ye shall offer for a sacrifice unto me a broken heart and a contrite spirit."—Book of Mormon, 3 Nephi 4: 8.

"Behold, I say unto you, that I do know that Christ shall come among the children of men, to take upon him the transgressions of his people, and that he shall atone for the sins of the world . . . for it is expedient that there should be a great and last sacrifice; yea, not a sacrifice of man, neither of beasts, neither of any manner of fowl; for it shall not be a human sacrifice; but it must be an infinite and eternal sacrifice, . . . and then shall there be, or it is expedient there should be, a stop to the shedding of blood; then shall the law of Moses be fulfilled; yea, it shall all be fulfilled."—Alma 16: 27, 28.

That Brigham was wrong wherein he claimed that Christ was not begotten by the Holy Ghost, was shown by the following: "Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: When as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the Holy Ghost."—Matthew 1: 18. With this the Book of Mormon agrees:

"And behold he shall be born of Mary at Jerusalem, which is the land of our forefathers, she being a virgin, a precious and chosen vessel, who shall be overshadowed, and conceive by the power of the Holy Ghost, and bring forth a son, yea even the Son of God."—Alma 5: 2. (Small edition).

Brother Curtis showed the law of succession to be as follows:

1. God was to do the appointing. (Doctrine and Covenants 27: 2; 34: 4.)

2. The appointment to be by revelation: "The president of the church, who is also the president of the council, is appointed by revelation, and acknowledged, in his administration, by the voice of the church . . . and it is his privilege to be assisted by two other presidents, appointed after the same manner that he himself was appointed."—Doctrine and Covenants 99: 6.

3. The revelation was to come through Joseph Smith, jr., as the following shows: "But verily, verily I say unto you, that none else shall be appointed unto this gift except it be through him, for if it be taken from him he shall not have power, except to appoint another in his stead; and this shall be a law unto you, that ye receive not the teachings of any that shall come before you as revelations, or commandments; and this I give unto you, that you may not be deceived, that you may know they are not of me."—Doctrine and Covenants 43: 2.

4. He should be ordained.

"For verily I say unto you, that he that is ordained of me, shall come in at the gate and be ordained as I have told you before."—Doctrine and Covenants 43: 2.

"Of the Melchisedec priesthood, three presiding high priests, chosen by the body, appointed and ordained to that office, and upheld by the confidence, faith, and prayer of the church, form a quorum of the presidency of the church."—Doctrine and Covenants 104: 11.

That Joseph Smith, jr., designated his son, young Joseph, as his successor, by revelation, is shown from the fact that he announced to the people that his son Joseph was to be his successor and he set him apart by blessing for that purpose. This was testified to by Lyman Wight, George J. Adams, James Whitehead, William Smith, and others.

One revelation showing right of lineage is as follows: "For this anointing have I put upon his head, that his blessing shall also be put upon the head of his posterity after him; and as I said unto Abraham, concerning the kindreds of the earth, even so I say unto my servant Joseph, In thee, and in thy seed, shall the kindred of the earth be blessed."

In the patriarchal blessing of Joseph Smith, jr., we find the following: "And in my turn, my father anointed my head, and sealed upon me the blessings of Moses, to lead Israel in the latter day, even as Moses led him in days of old; also the blessings of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob."—Millemial Star, vol. 15, p. 620. This blessing descended to young Joseph, and shows that he was to lead Israel in latter days, or in other words be his father's successor as president of the church.

Brother Curtis showed that Brigham Young absolutely failed to qualify as president of the church, according to the law, but that he became president of an apostate faction by motion and vote without revelation from God or appointment through Joseph Smith, neither was he ever ordained to the office of first presidency at any time.

He also showed that Brigham Young and his followers were rebaptized, reconfirmed, and the ministry reordained; thus were they baptized out of Christ's church into Brigham's church.

He showed that young Joseph was ordained to the office of president of the high priesthood at Amboy, Illinois, in 1860 by William Marks, Zenos H. Gurley, W. W. Blair, and Samuel Powers, in fulfillment of the law which says: "Every president of the high priesthood (or presiding elder), bishop, high counselor, and high priest, is to be ordained by the direction of a high council, or General Conference." (Doctrine and Covenants 17: 17.)

Brother Curtis certainly has a valuable selection of books with which to meet the Mormon issue, without which such men as Mr. Jensen could not be held in bounds, but with the splendid knowledge of what they contain, and where to find it instantly there was not an issue brought up by our opponent which was not successfully met and to the satisfaction of almost the entire non-Mormon listeners vanquished.

Mr. Jensen's misrepresentation of statistical facts was so glaring that when Brother Curtis exposed them, the few friends he had were quite open in their demonstration of lack of further confidence in anything he would present. Two points are worthy of mentioning as samples. Mr. Jensen boasted that in illiteracy the State of Utah had the lowest percentage of any country in the entire world, but when Brother Curtis read the facts it was seen that the United States stood seventh and the State of Utah was the seventh State in the Union. Again Mr. Jensen, to show what a pure-living people the citizens of Utah are, with a newspaper in his hand pretended to read therefrom that the State of Utah had the lowest death rate of any country in the world. He read just as though it were in there, but when the real facts were presented by Brother Curtis it was seen that Utah stands fourth State in the Union, and that which Mr. Jensen presumably read from the paper was not in it at all, but rather stated that for the month of December the city of Salt Lake was lower than certain other cities.

Utah Latter-day Saintism went very low in the estimation of the listeners about this time and it was quite evident he had lost the confidence of the people. He was very strong, however, in trying to elicit sympathy from the people, and in his opening remarks every evening offered a very wordy prayer for his opponent and the people, but Brother Curtis showed that the scriptures declare that the man who turneth away his ear from hearing the words of the law, even his prayers were an abomination to the Lord, and hypocritical prayers were always distasteful to the listener. No more prayers followed.

He drew the fire from the audience when he declared that the greatest statesman that was on the earth during his time was Theodore Roosevelt. The Canadian remembered such men as Sir John A. McDonald and Sir Wilfred Laurier and the great warrior prime minister, Sir Robert Borden.

He then read what was supposed to be a writing of Mr. Roosevelt in 1911 wherein he had traveled through Utah and found them to be such a wonderful people in so many ways. Mr. Jensen declared that this was not for the purpose of drawing votes—as one in the audience suggested—but because the people were worthy of praise and elections were all over, but Brother Curtis showed that in the following year Mr. Roosevelt's name was before the people on the progressive ticket and he ran last out of three contestants in Utah, therefore the Mormons did not seem to appreciate such a great statesman.

Seeing he had lost again by misrepresentation he tried his supreme bluff, for rising when his time came, with his hands extended toward heaven, he, with an effort at deep sorrow, bewailed the fact that any man would dare to even think, let alone hint, that such a grand and good man would stoop so low as ever to make a speech like Mr. Roosevelt did, for the purpose of winning votes or favor with the righteous people of Utah. Here we notice that it was no longer possible to keep the loud laughter subdued and the audience gave vent to their feelings of derision. From my vantage position as moderator, I was amused to read the different expressions that hurried over the countenance of one man in the audience, in particular. He is familiarly known to many of us as Brother "Ben" Anderson, of Omaha, who was in Ottawa buying several carloads of paper and came over for the evening. Not being acquainted with the tactics of Mr. Jensen, he seemed to, at first, give him credit for being honest and sincere as a minister, but as the laudation of the late Mr. Roosevelt went to such ridiculous extremes, the look of scrutiny gave way to one of disgust and contempt for a man who would use such tactics under a religious garb.

During the discussion Mr. Jensen became more and more unpopular with the general listener, one cause being that when either man or woman manifested their lack of confidence in what he was presenting, he would abuse them, and if any arose to leave the building he would pour a volley of abuse after them, for which I, as moderator, had several times to ask him to please try to be a gentleman.

I would not be doing justice to all concerned if I were to forget to mention the fact that Mr. Jensen's moderator, Doctor Cannon, won the favor of the people by his unbiased and Christian demeanor. Elder Riggs, who relieved him at times, was highly spoken of also.

Shortly before the last evening of the debate, a committee waited upon me to obtain the privilege of addressing the disputants at the conclusion of the discussion. I quite readily consented, so when Brother Curtis, who had the last speech, had driven the last nail in his opponent's coffin and said amen, I made the announcements for the services in the church for the following Sunday and then stated that the audience wished to be represented for a few moments by Miss Cole and Mrs. Nolan, the former being a lady of prominence in our capital city whom we had seen attending almost every evening, and whom we had upon more than one occasion, heard remonstrating with Mr. Jensen, ere he left the room on previous evenings, for his unministerial tactics. A more capable lady than whom I do not suppose could have been found in the city to step into the breach at this most tense moment to sound the welcome plaudits to the victor and the farewell dirge to Mr. Jensen, all of which were of her own composition and which we attach hereto, while the latter lady with cheeks of pinken rivalry with the roses she carried proudly presented to the champion a most exquisite bouquet, accompanied by a few words of appropriate setting.

When requested by the ladies for the privilege of making the address I was informed that reference would be made to both disputants, and just before announcing them I had asked Doctor Cannon's consent on their behalf, which he freely gave, but when Mr. Jensen caught the trend of it, he hurriedly arose to his feet and asked, "What does all this mean?" I however whispered to him to be seated as he was included in it, too. He rather reluctantly consented for a moment or two, and arising very emphatically expressed his disapproval, for it seems that the "reference" was not altogether to his liking, and remembering that the train for Toronto was due to leave in forty minutes and that the waiting auto at the door might not be able to make about ten blocks in such a short time he protested the shortness of time at his disposal to get out of town—and I don't think any of us blamed him—so he shook the hand of Brother Curtis and hurried to the auto. The crowd which was the full of the house as well as many on the outside continued their enthusiastic applause for some time, when the reading of the address was resumed, then the benediction was pronounced, and the many hearty handshakes for Brother Curtis and the two ladies of prominence was a fit ending for such a splendid victory for truth.

There were many happy countenances but none seemed to have more real genuine satisfaction than that of Elder Philemon Pement who has labored so earnestly in this city for almost six years and was the man who really brought the debate to the front.

When the hands of the clock were both about straight up and the day's busy activities were ended and Brethren Pement, A. C. Martin, G. P. Levitt, and the writer retired to the church parlors where we are sojourning while we labor in missionary work in the city, our individual and united prayers and praise ascended to God for such a happy ending on behalf of the truth triumphing over a counterfeit that fought hard to establish itself as the genuine.

We are holding street meetings in the city and several hundred people stand in our audience from soon after eight o'clock to eleven and often later.

As Mr. Jensen had sent signed propositions to Elder J. T. Thompson of Hamilton, Ontario, challenging him to debate in that city, Elder Curtis had received those papers and signed them and handed Mr. Jensen his acceptance of the challenge, and asked that he notify Brother Curtis before leaving this debate whether or not he would agree upon the time of holding the one in Hamilton. But a burned child dreads the fire, and anyhow forty minutes in an eight-cylinder is such a short time to make a distance of about ten blocks, and Miss Cole's voice was playing such pranks with his ear drums, that we will give the vanquished the benefit of the doubt and say his memory slipped a cog or missed fire, and as an evidence that his equilibrium was not yet recovered on the following Monday, he rushed into print in the Toronto Telegram and headed an advertisement—"Accepts challenge to debate," in which he says he "might" debate Frederick M. Smith, (whom he knows to be in Europe) but fails to tell what church he is hurling his mud at, nor does he tell what church he belongs to. Forgets the fact that he claims to be a minister, but calls himself a lawyer. No doubt the people of Toronto who chance to read the advertisement will think some new kind of faker is preparing for the great Toronto exhibition which was to open soon.

Sunday evening following the debate the church was full of very interested listeners and Brother Curtis gave us an excellent sermon. And so the good work goes on and the Saints are happy and working hard. Kirtland Reunion Association sent us a collection for our church fund amounting to eighty-two dollars and thirty-nine cents, which will, with the exchange, make over ninety dollars Canadian money. Many thanks for your liberality.

R. C. RUSSELL.

Address by Miss May A. Y. Cole.

Lord Fisher: "Some men grow great; others only swell."
Kind Moderators, Apostle Curtis, Elder Jensen, Ladies and Gentlemen:

Allow me to express my hearty thanks to both these moderators for permitting a member of the audience to make an expression at the close of this debate.

Apostle Curtis, I come up here for the purpose of addressing you, but I shall take the liberty of deferring my remarks for a few moments (and I think they will not spoil in the meantime) while I next thank the audience for having offered to me the privilege of being its representative on this occasion. I ask the indulgence of every person in the room while I refer to a very personal matter of my own, but which I use solely as a means of assuring this audience of how deeply I appreciate this privilege.

At this same hour, at our city court room there is occurring an affair which I, of almost all ladies in Ottawa, would naturally most wish to attend. It is an inquest into the death of a man who was this week killed by the engine which my brother was driving. Although I do not live with that brother, have not seen him since the accident, nor spoken to him, I am sufficiently acquainted with him as a conscientious, very careful man, to know, without having to hear it, that he did everything in his power to divert such an accident. I know that my brother will honorably acquit himself to-night of any blame whatsoever in the matter. But I esteem, higher than the opportunity of hearing my brother's statements, the privilege offered me to step up here and, on behalf of this audience, convey to you, Apostle Curtis, the fact that the majority of this people honorably acquit you of any and every false accusation to which you have been subjected since the opening of this debate.

I ask your permission to address you as "Brother" Curtis. Being an utter stranger to you, your church, your doctrines, and your faith (with the exception of what I have heard in this debate) the name apostle does not come as readily to my lips as the word brother, for I have come to recognize you as my true brother in the Lord Jesus Christ.

You, Brother Curtis, throughout this debate, have not only acted the part of a true man and a gentleman in every particular, but you have done some of this audience, and particularly myself, a great and noble service in revealing both truth and error so bravely and fearlessly in the face of such an opponent. You have stood throughout for the cause of God and righteousness.

Allow me to say, for the benefit of those who do not know me personally, that when I dropped in at the Fern Theater a week ago Sunday evening to hear the sermon advertised as the Mormon's conception of God, I was under the impression that I was going to hear the same body of people of whom I had heard in this city as holding forth under a man by the name of Pement. I was unaware of any division amongst Mormon followers. This will show all of you who belong to both churches what an utter stranger I was to this whole affair.

I have in my heart "A God bless you" for these young men [Utah elders—R. C. R.] more deep and sincere than I can express, and I am praying fervently that God will show them truth and error.

Further indulgence I crave while I make reference to another very personal matter, but which no doubt will appeal somewhat to both sides of this argument.

Last winter there came to my home the first Mormon tract I had ever seen. I was greatly struck with all it contained, and in it heard for the first time of baptism for the dead. Permit me to say right here that it pains me to have to take the stand I must against a citizen of the United States. I have always been an ardent admirer of Americans in almost every particular. I had all my life a strong desire to visit the United States. This summer, when I had the privilege of a trip across the border, I stood one day alone in my room before God to decide the question as to whether I would take a pleasure trip through some States, visiting friends, or go straight to the State of Utah, and there investigate the claims with which I had been so favorably struck in the tract I had read. Now, perhaps some of you will realize how much this debate has meant to one individual. There is, naturally, a great deal I would wish to say to both these people at this juncture, but I cannot take up enough time to do so.

Brother Curtis, you and your opponent have reiterated the statement that this audience would discover, before the close of the debate, just which of you was giving out the truth, just which of you was manifesting the right spirit. I am glad to tell you, brother, that we surely and certainly have made that discovery, and I speak it forth with no uncertain voice. The first night I saw enough inconsistency in your opponent to slightly remonstrate with him at the close of the meeting. The second night I saw more of the same thing, and tried again to gently and quietly bring the matter to his attention. I was still undecided as to your differences in doctrines and beliefs, and as to which was the nearest right in those matters. But I can emphatically state that from the third night onward I personally have been able to discover the line between the right and the wrong in this debate. I thank God I have sufficient intelligence for that. I lay no claim to any high degree of intellectuality, but no one would require an abundance of it to be able to discern right from wrong in doctrines, right tactics from wrong tactics, as exhibited here in the past twelve nights.

Brother Curtis, the laurels all go to you in this debate (a large and very beautiful bouquet of roses and other flowers here presented). This audience has requested me to present to you, in its behalf, this pretty token of the esteem and regard in which you are held, and the appreciation of these people for all you have said during these evenings, for the grand manner in which you have conducted yourself, and the honest and fair way in which you have dealt with them as a listening public.

Brother Curtis, were I, by some magic touch, able to turn each of these beautiful flowers into a laurel leaf, I would weave them into a laurel wreath with which to crown your head to-night.

I count it an honor heartily to shake your hand as a true man of God, who has not flinched to declare what was necessary to bring forth the truth between the two factions.

I would also like the privilege of shaking hands with two such kind and fair moderators, who have nobly conducted their part in what at times, to some of us in the audience, was an almost intolerable debate.

Thanking you all for the privilege of making these statements—
On behalf of the audience,

MISS MAY A. Y. COLE.

OTTAWA, ONTARIO, August 27, 1920.

P. S. The coroner's inquest honorably exonerated Miss Cole's brother from any responsibility resulting in the death of the young man above referred to.

The Nauvoo Reunion

The Nauvoo reunion, held at Montrose, Iowa, from August 20 to 30, was one of the largest in recent years, due partially to a considerable attendance from the Central Illinois District. There were approximately 150 in attendance on the grounds, and a number of transient visitors through the week.

Brethren U. W. Greene and J. W. Wight were the leading speakers, others of the local ministry of the district occupying occasionally. Bishop J. F. Keir was present with a party from Independence over a day, and occupied the morning hour on the theme, "The young people in the redemption of Zion," that being the theme of the day throughout.

On Friday, the 27th, the majority of those in camp went on an excursion to the historical points in Nauvoo. The sisters of that place served a fish-fry dinner for the interests of the work there.

Sister Vida E. Smith was present as field worker for the departments, and gave us much that was helpful.

The hygiene worker, a new departure for the district, was Miss Myrtle Radmall, a graduate from the Sanitarium training school, and she aroused considerable interest.

A Graceland program was planned hurriedly and carried through successfully under the direction of Sister Irene Layton, a member of the faculty last year.

Meetings were well attended, due perhaps in part to a "red and blue contest" under the auspices of the Religio and Nauvoo District Builders (an organization effected some two or three years ago for the promotion of recreational interests, etc.). The contest closed with a program and ice cream social following the preaching service Saturday night, serving as a climax for recreational features to which every afternoon was given.

The Camp Gleaner, the live daily paper under editorship of Brother J. F. MacIntire, was both amusing and profitable.

At the closing business session, an invitation was extended to the Central Illinois District to join with us for the reunion of 1921.

Kansas City Stake

Each year there is a season when vacations take many of the city dwellers elsewhere for a few weeks or months and then there follows a season of readjustment when they all get back. This season is beginning in this city and all departments are lining up for their winter's work.

The Women's Department is launching a new plan this year of holding study classes in different parts of the city, each group taking up some definite plan of study. The subject which concerns the minds of most thinking women at this time is citizenship and the Southside Study Club is having the pleasure of enjoying a series of ten lectures upon this subject delivered by Mrs. Thomas McBride who is well posted on her subject and drives home her points. Other classes meet at other places at different times studying different subjects, some taking up normal work, others child study, etc.

The children of Central Church will, beginning with October 1, have meetings all their own in the church parlors. Two capable sisters are in charge under the direction of the pastor and the children will be divided into two groups, those from one to five years in a kindergarten room and those from five to ten or eleven in another room, the pastor requesting that all children over eleven remain in the main auditorium for the eleven o'clock hour.

Indian Work in Oklahoma

A word about that Indian reunion: Last winter the thought occurred to me to mingle the white people with the Indian Saints and have them realize how well we could treat them and to feel the power of the Spirit of the Lord as we do many times in our meetings, believing it would do them a great amount of good.

I talked it over with Brother David Pettit and he was delighted with the idea, laying the matter before Brother Greene of the Twelve who thought as I did about it. Now the history of the affair has in part been told. The influence of that meeting was the most far-reaching of any meeting held for either the white people or Indians in the State of Oklahoma. Our prayer meetings were of a very high order. Brother Griffiths presided most of the time. The gifts of the gospel were abundant. The spirit of the meeting was on the order of the great prayer meetings held last spring at the General Conference.

The gifts of tongues, interpretation, and prophecy were just like Paul describes in 1 Corinthians 14. The red men felt the power and wept like children. They arose and talked weepingly, which is very uncommon as they are a very stoical race of people, not easily moved to tears or emotionally affected. Twenty-nine were baptized. The scene was wonderful. As Brother Griffiths led the leading chief into the water all were affected by it. I think nineteen Indians and ten white people were buried in the waters. More names have been given since and some of them the very ones we have sought for years.

We had floods; the rain fell in such copious torrents that we were nearly drowned out of the grove, and the roads were simply impassible.

Nine young Indian boys and girls applied for admission to Graceland this year. I went to see the Indian agent at Pawnee to get their funds transferred and he referred the matter to the subagent at Red Rock who turned the matter down. So we cannot get them this year. We regret this very much, as some of the boys went and enlisted in the navy rather than go back to the Indian school.

Brother Harvey Syckles is making a great opening among the Arapahoes. We have more good news for your readers soon of the work among the other tribes.

Your brother,

HUBERT CASE.

Report of Department of Statistics

This report was submitted by F. A. Russell to the First Presidency on July 30, 1920.

We are pleased to submit herewith a brief summary of the work accomplished or undertaken in this department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920. Our report to General Conference for 1920 shows a net membership of 92,746. From January 1, 1920 to June 30, 1920, the following changes have been made in this department: Gained by late baptisms 1,275, gained by baptisms discovered in checking up old branch records 852, gained from unknown 10, total 2,137; 351 deaths have been reported, 441 deaths were found in checking up branch records, 25 recent expulsions, 21 expulsions from old records, and 700 transferred to the unknown list, a total loss of 1,532, leaving a net gain of 605 which added to the above total of 92,746 shows the present church membership to be 93,351.

Since being placed in charge of the work in this department July 15, 1919, we have undertaken the work directed by General Conference about ten years ago of transferring names from the old church records to individual cards. This work was completed June 2. It will also be noted by you that on November 1, 1919, change in the system of branch and general church records was inaugurated in which the general office is made the place of original entry of all items for record, by reports coming direct to the Department of Statistics. This department in turn supplies the branches concerned with prepared pages and items for their records. While this has necessarily involved a large amount of extra work, yet we believe the system is working sufficiently well to justify the additional expense which has been incurred.

Up to the present time we have checked up the records from about 75 per cent of the branches in the church, there being in the neighborhood of 25 per cent of the branch records not yet in our hands. The various branch records together with the correspondence which we have had with the respective clerks reveal a state of things which might well be given very careful attention. Scores of members have been lost to the church because of persons moving out of the vicinity of branches and receiving no attention from any church officials. The large number of 700 above indicated as being carried to the unknown is due to the fact that these names were carried upon the various branches, the whereabouts of the persons for years having been unknown to branch officials. Owing to the fact that we have been so very busy in attempting to adjust the irregularities in enrollments we have made no attempt to analyze the various items reported to this department and have merely, as you see, submitted a brief summary. When once there has been a normal state of things reached by the various branches in their attempt to clear up branch enrollments we hope to be able to give much more attention to certain features in the work of this department which are pressing us for attention.

The priesthood record is very incomplete and we are hoping to be able to undertake something in that direction at a comparatively early date.

Beginning with the present fiscal year we have inaugurated another change in the stake records in which this department treats the entire state membership as one group, leaving it to the stake officials to attend to the enrollment in groups of members living within their stake. This will relieve the general office of giving attention to the individual branches in stakes.

Another feature which we expect to inaugurate about September 1 is to provide for the enrollment of names of members of the church who are nonresident in the vicinity of a branch. These names will be grouped according to the district in which the person resides, such group to be in the custody of the district secretary or other official as may be determined. By this arrangement in grouping it is hoped that responsibility for that particular class of people will be assumed by the district officials; also this list of names will be of special value to missionaries working in districts in their efforts to locate isolated members as possible nucleuses to missionary efforts.

We are pleased to advise you that the records in this department are now kept in such a way that in a few moments we will be able to give you information as to present membership at any time desired. Very sincerely,

DEPARTMENT OF STATISTICS,

F. A. Russell.

Christmas Offering News

Dear Coworkers: I am sure that you will be interested in reading a few items taken from various letters which I have received regarding the 1920 Christmas offering. When you read these letters, if they are interesting and help you, will you not kindly send us items of a like character that we may publish them for the good of others? We are all interested in each other and anxious to know how each school is getting along. Let us cooperate.

In a letter received from Sister Mary L. Damron, of the Tulare, California, school we have the following:

"We are sending Brother McGuire $406.91, which is our Christmas offering for the first six months of 1920. We hope to be able to raise as much offering during the latter half of the year as we did the first."

We are certainly pleased with the good work of this Sunday school and I am sure we all join with heartiest best wishes for their continued success.

From a letter received from Miss Lillian Tabor, of the Springfield, Missouri, school we quote:

"Our Sunday school is having a little contest (the Purples against the Greens) to see which side can get the most money for Christmas offering. We believe contests of this kind properly carried on will materially help us in our work."

We are very glad indeed to see this interest displayed and feel quite sure that these little contests are of great benefit to the school. We hope the Springfield school will reap a good harvest from their effort.

From Brother Berndt, of Pontiac, Michigan, we have the following interesting items:

"We are all doing fine here as you will know by the figures given below. Our aim for our Christmas offering for this year was $350. At the end of six months I find that we have $206 to turn over to Brother McGuire. It seems good to know that we would more than make up the amount that we aimed for in the beginning. I put this question before the school: 'How many are willing to raise our aim to $400?' Every hand went up and I could see that each heart was in this work, also that it was not a mere outward manifestation. May we all do our part in this great work."

I hope every Sunday school in our organization will read this letter, for I am sure each one will appreciate the very excellent spirit manifest in the work of this school. It is wonderful what we can do when we all work together and I feel to congratulate the Pontiac scholars for their splendid cooperation.

Sister T. O. Strand, of Moorhead, Iowa, reports as follows:

"You will see that our 1920 aim is not so very much more than we raised last year. We asked each class to state their aim and the total of these aims amounts to $515. We may do better and hope to at least. One class has already given over their aim. We are not a very large school and a great many of the members live a considerable distance from where we hold our meetings which makes our attendance somewhat irregular, but we are doing the best we can. I am sending the Bishop $321.26 for our first six months' offering."

This good school was quarantined for one month and they are rallying nobly to the support of this cause. It has been a source of pleasure to note the excellent work of this school each year and considerable of their work has been done under adverse conditions, but they are succeeding. I look for a large offering from them this year, for such noble efforts are bound to meet with success.

Probably few of us realize the severe handicaps encountered by our foreign members, those especially living in the far-off islands of the sea, and we are going to quote from some of the letters we receive from time to time for we know that you will be interested in hearing from these good workers.

Brother Stanley Ballard, of Agents Hill, Nambucca River, New South Wales, Australia, writes as follows:

"We are striving to do our part in connection with the offering (I mean the Mount Zion Sunday School located at this address). Possibly you have heard but little of us, but we have done and are doing very well considering our opportunities and circumstances.

"In 1919 our enrollment was 46 and we contributed 26 pounds, 5 shillings or approximately $130. The district superintendent as well as our local officers were much pleased to know that we went over the top. We take no praise or glory unto ourselves but are enthused with the idea of getting over the top for 1920."

We most heartily congratulate this good school for the excellent work they did and feel sure that they were abundantly blessed because of their efforts. We are looking forward to another good report this year.

Elder Robert T. Brown, Papeete, Tahiti, writes as follows concerning the many schools located in South Sea Islands Mission:

"It is with no little pride that I report the progress made by this mission so far as the Christmas offering is concerned. We encounter hindrances here that are peculiar to this mission and not met in the homeland. So I hope you in America will try to imagine if you can some of the sacrifices that have been made in the past years and by means of which our present report is made possible. Prominent among those who so sacrificed was our good Sister Devore. She was one who started the Sunday school work in this mission. Sometimes she and Brother Devore would be separated for six months at a time, she going one way and he another. Others have been untiring in their efforts, but space will not permit mentioning all individually, so I will have to leave it for the one who is acquainted with all our trials and triumphs to reward according to his infinite wisdom, but suffice it to say that we are glad that we have had such noble people to assist in this work.

"I am reporting to you the amounts of each school in French dollars as it is just as hard to earn a dollar here as it is in America."

We will not take space to list these schools for a record of their offering was reported in the Blue Stepping Stones, but we want to say that we are highly pleased and encouraged because of the very excellent showing made by these schools. We, like Brother Brown, feel very grateful for the very excellent work of the many missionaries who have labored in this field and whose work has made it possible for us to receive such good reports.

I am very grateful to those who have written me regarding the offering work and from now on throughout the balance of this year I hope to receive many excellent letters from our schools, for these letters when published are of very great assistance to our coworkers.

Sincerely hoping and trusting that all are entering into this work with heart and soul, I am,

Yours very sincerely,

A. W. SMITH.

Tent Work Flourishing in Iowa

Just a line to say that things are humming merrily out here at Council Bluffs. Now starting on my fourth week, occupying every evening from one and a half to two hours.

In all my experience I never was favored with such crowds. Full tent right at the start and increasing ever since. Almost as many outside as inside last night (19th).

We are occupying in one of our new Iowa tents. Comfortably seats about 350. Several have been baptized but have evidently only begun. We are handbiling the community in the shape of specially prepared sermons outlining the subject for the evening. I find it very effective, besides placing in the hands of those who cannot come certain references to texts that are bound to get them thinking. It is what I term a bill-tracto method of reaching the people.

The Bluffs people are responding splendidly in the distribution of our tracts. A little army is out on the job at five o'clock each evening we distribute. And they are happy, too. Indeed, everybody is smiling, including the "Red man" of Salisbury fame.

Don't know when this thing is going to end. My schedule calls for one more week, then on to fill other pressing engagements. Will have to postpone my prearranged meetings elsewhere if everybody agrees. Will be too bad to leave off in the midst of this great campaign.

Considerable credit is due Sister May Skinner and her splendid choir of singers for the success of our services. My meetings are preceded by a thirty-minute song service and many come an hour ahead of the service to make sure of a seat. Indeed, if our tent, which is 30 by 60, were twice as large, it would be none too big.

In this connection I must refer to the fine work being done by Putnam and Pendleton at Dunlap. They, too, have gotten a tentful. Recently they baptized twelve in one day.

J. A. Dowker is going it at Des Moines, occupying our third new tent. Last reports were very flattering.

Old Iowa is surely booming to the front. All we need is a little faith, then plant our tents most anywhere, unfurl our ensign, and sail on. Jubilantly yours,

DANIEL MACGREGOR.

To Follow the Savior

A Voice From Amboy

Joseph's words to the Saints at Amboy were, "In the name of bleeding Zion I call upon all who have been wandering to turn unto their true and delightful allegiance to the principles of the gospel of peace, to the paths of wisdom, to the homage of that God that brought the children of Israel out of bondage, . . . to remember that those who live to the Lord keep his commandments, and that the promises are unto the faithful, and the reward unto those that endure unto the end." We have no comment to make, only a prayer that the world might heed how to follow that voice, and "believe."

In order to follow the Savior, read his life. Luke's record of his visits to the towns of Galilee is very simple. He always attended church, and at one time, reading from Esaias the prophet, he read of the work of the Messiah. When Jesus spoke of the scarcity in general of believers, the Jews were full of anger, and attempted to kill him. But at Capernaum many had faith, and were rewarded through his gift of healing.

To a solitary place he oft repaired to pray, and still the people followed.

So we must work, seeking to help the needy.

And now that Saints are being more fully endowed with the enlivening Spirit, to do this becomes an easy task. Matthew, Mark, and John also make very plain the teachings of Christ, and the answer to the question, "What did Jesus preach?" is explicitly set forth not only in the "Angel message" tracts, but by all the elders of the church.

So we, rising from our morning prayer, seek first our most important work, and we might quote the words of the Christian" minister who said last Sunday, "Seek first the kingdom of heaven, and all these things shall be added unto you." "Preachers" now-a-days are certainly excellent in the pulpit. Very good; it's best for some to do that, but as Luke 12 records it, those of Christ's disciples are to seek first "to bring forth the kingdom of God," and that requires work.

Our work is intensive just now; to go to meeting, to sing, and pray, and bear testimony is a wonderful help to the brethren; but we now see by the Spirit's help that we, as members of society, as part of the Christian brotherhood, have not divorced ourselves altogether from all religious obligations, as pertaining to those outside of "the fold."

Comply as strictly as we may to the six principles of the gospel, yet we are to obey all the commandments of Jesus. Everybody seeks the easy way in life, and it's surprising to see how smoothly "the churches" get along without a prophet, without apostles, and a patriarch to confer blessings, and especially without the visible gifts of the gospel.

Methods

We know that the sectarian pulpits of this day furnish men of talent and education, who present historical events in an entertaining and instructive manner. They provide for their hearers food for thought, and many a "friendly visitor" has been edified by attending their services.

But there is a lack in their ministering to the creeds of the community, because of the absence of the Spirit. How happy is the man, who having sat under the preaching of our revered ex-president Joseph, has heeded his instruction and can say, as he did, "I have kept the commandments, and know the promises of God are true and faithful; and I am looking forward with bright hope to a reward sure and enduring, and for an abiding place in the mansions of the just."

Now, as the method of teaching the gospel, we as Saints will be more willing and friendly than of yore. We will not make so many references to the world's past mistakes. We will not so frequently take to ourselves so much of the glory of furnishing the cue of all the greatly increased light shed forth upon the world in the latter days.

They have been reading the Bible lo, these many years, so now they have come to see that Christ is coming, and when our Baptist friend preached a few Sundays ago on the second coming of Christ, the people on parting for their homes did as Jesus told them to do when they should "see the Son of Man coming in a cloud with power and great glory." They rejoiced over such a sermon and "lifted up their hands." Saint Luke again regales the soul with this account of the great event coming.

We all believe it, because the Bible tell us to. The old-fashioned method of soul-winning through "a change of heart" was good; but a change of one's viewpoint, a change of mind is far better.

Among the methods employed with success in these the last days is the perusal of tracts.

There are many who, by their pure logic, their appeal to the heart's hunger and thirst after righteousness, and their compelling power given to the prayerful reader, seem to possess the spirit of the gospel, infusing light into the soul that is seeking after truth.

ABBIE A. HORTON.

The Duty of Editors

In my way of looking at it, there is only one motto he need bother about, and that is to tell the truth. As news you can tell the truth only once, and then it is news no longer. But editorially you reshape, restate, and reemphasize, and repeat the truth forever. It has been said that a man in public office should speak the truth sparingly and with precision. That does not apply to the exalted office you hold. For a good newspaper man there is only one motto: "The truth shall make you free."—Mr. Meighen, Prime Minister of Canada.

MISCELLANEOUS

The Bishopric

Western Nebraska and Black Hills District: Owing to the condition of Brother W. A. Teagarden's health he is leaving the district and has submitted his resignation as Bishop's agent, and we have arranged with Brother George Newton of Spearfish, South Dakota, to act in this capacity.

I trust that the Saints of this district will give Brother Newton their undivided support. The needs of the Lord's work are constantly increasing, but with the increased membership there should come the means with which to continue to grow and expand. The Lord has indicated that there is enough and to spare when his people respond to the financial law.

We trust that God's people may be blessed in their temporal affairs, and that being blessed they may find pleasure in contributing the Lord's portion.

Portland District: We hereby appoint Brother A. E. Lasley, 254 East Seventy-sixth Street, Portland, Oregon, as Bishop's agent of the above district, to succeed Brother L. B. Shippy.

Brother Shippy has served as Bishop's agent very faithfully and energetically, and his work has been very satisfactory.

I trust that the Saints will loyally support Brother Lasley in his newly appointed duties, keeping in mind the slogan of the year—"A Million Dollars Tithing." If the above district will double its tithing this year and every other district will do likewise, we shall accomplish our end. I know that you will work for this accomplishment.

Brother Lasley will begin his work November 1.

Sincerely,

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE, Presiding Bishop.

Transfer of Missionaries

Notice is hereby given of the transfer of Elder John R. Grice from the Detroit District, Detroit objective, to the Toronto District, Toronto objective, missionary. Brother Grice will also act as missionary supervisor in the Toronto District.

Samuel T. Pendleton is transferred from the Freemont, Iowa, District, to the Gallands Grove District.

J. E. Vanderwood is transferred from the Pottawattamie and Little Sioux Districts to the Eastern Iowa District.

C. F. Putnam is transferred from the Eastern Iowa District to the Little Sioux District.

Department of Music

Notices of Appointment—District Choristers

To Whom Concerned: At the last conferences of their respective districts, all in northwestern Canada, the following were selected for recommendation to this department for appointments in charge of the music work of their districts. One recommendation was for appointment as "chorister" of the district, while two were for appointment as "supervisors of music" of their districts. As this department is now considering the readjustment of the work of district choristers over the church and the selection of a new title for their offices, it has been determined to appoint all of these nominees as district choristers until such time of readjustment can be had. These are as follows:

Mrs. Fred (Pearl) Irwin, Macklin, Saskatchewan, to be chorister of the Northern Saskatchewan District.

Mrs. J. R. Neill, Box 5, Weyburn, Saskatchewan, to be chorister of the Southern Saskatchewan District.

Mrs. William Osler, 10718 Eightieth Avenue, Edmonton, Alberta, to be chorister of the Alberta District.

We take pleasure in making these appointments and herein publishing them; and heartily commend them to the musical workers of the various districts, urging that cooperation be had that they may make the musical work of their districts a success.

Respectfully,

THE DEPARTMENT OF MUSIC,
ALBERT N. HOXIE, General Director.
ARTHUR H. MILLS, Secretary.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, September 15, 1920.

Approved by the First Presidency, ELBERT A. SMITH.

To Whom Concerned: At the last conference of the Gallands Grove District Brother J. Dean Talcott, of Arion, Iowa, was selected for recommendation to this department for appointment as chorister for this district, succeeding Brother James Pearsall, deceased.

We are gratified to be able to make this appointment and hereby publish same to the church. We are assured that Brother Talcott is well qualified for the work before him, and we therefore bespeak for him the earnest cooperation of all the musical forces of the district, that its musical interests may be well cared for, to the glory and honor of the church.

We also take this opportunity of expressing our sympathy to the family of Brother Pearsall in their bereavement, and our personal regrets that the cause of music in the church has lost one who has been faithful in its interests.

Respectfully,

THE DEPARTMENT OF MUSIC,
ALBERT N. HOXIE, General Director.
ARTHUR H. MILLS, Secretary.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, September 8, 1920.

Approved by the First Presidency, ELBERT A. SMITH.

To Whom Concerned: At the last conference of the New York District, Sister Anna Brothers, 36 Tremont Avenue, Buffalo, New York, was selected for recommendation to this department for appointment as chorister of that district, vice Sister Ethel Hageman, resigned.

We are gratified to be able to make and publish the appointment of Sister Brothers to this place, believing that she will endeavor to do what she can for the development of the musical interests of the district. We therefore bespeak for Sister Brothers the hearty cooperation of all the musical workers of the district, that the musical interests therein may be the more fully developed to the honor of the cause.

We also take this privilege of thanking Sister Ethel Hageman, who is retiring from the office, for her labors and interests in the same during the past.

Respectfully,

THE DEPARTMENT OF MUSIC,
ALBERT N. HOXIE, General Director.
ARTHUR H. MILLS, Secretary.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, September 8, 1920.

Approved by the First Presidency, ELBERT A. SMITH.

To Whom Concerned: The newly organized Arkansas District at its first conference, selected Brother W. J. Edwards, of Bald Knob, Arkansas, for recommendation to this department for appointment as chorister of said district.

We take pleasure in herewith making and publishing this appointment and heartily recommend Brother Edwards to the musical forces of that district for their support. We earnestly trust that he may have the faithful cooperation of all the musical workers of the district to the end that the musical interests of the district may be placed on a higher basis.

Respectfully,

THE DEPARTMENT OF MUSIC,
ALBERT N. HOXIE, General Director.
ARTHUR H. MILLS, Secretary.

Home-Coming at Bevier

The Bevier, Missouri, Branch will hold their "Home-Coming Day" October 10. Commencing October 3 and continuing for two weeks a series of evangelistic meetings will be held, conducted by Patriarch H. O. Smith. Arrangements will be made to take care of all visiting Saints on Home-Coming Day; scattered members are especially invited to spend the day with us. J. L. WILLIAMS, Clerk.

Requests for Prayers

We have a young man in our Indianapolis Branch who has been a cripple now several years and also has lost his sight. Through peculiar circumstances the Saints became acquainted with him and his mother and brother, and taught him the gospel. Apostles Griffiths and Curtis saw him while they were here a year ago. On September 5 he was baptized and has paid his tithing and desires to be useful in the service of his Master. Elder Metcalf, the missionary, is with us, and we have set October 3 as a day of fasting and prayer for him that the Lord may direct in the administration on that day. Therefore we ask the faith and prayers of the Saints that the Lord may bless this young man. His name is Charles E. Appelgate. IRA I. BENHAM, President.

Addresses

Elder A. C. Martin, 115 Echo Drive, Ottawa, Ontario.

Our Departed Ones

LARSEN.—Sister Minnie Larsen was born March 16, 1859, in Denmark. Died June 2, 1920, at Omaha, Nebraska. Married Christian Larsen January 8, 1881, who died September 6, 1893. Five children were born to them: William C., who died in infancy, Mattie and A. Edward Larsen, Mrs. Lena Justeen, and Mrs. Dora Marshall. This dear sister was a devoted mother, a true, loyal, consecrated Saint, faithful in the performance of duties. The Omaha Saints and others who knew her will miss her keenly. Services were held at the home. Sermon by Roland W. Scott.

MCDONALD.—Caroline Melissa Garner was born in Pottawattamie County, Iowa, December 30, 1857. Married Julius S. McDonald November 18, 1879. Died at McAllen, Texas, August 22, 1920. Leaves to mourn, husband, and 3 daughters: Mrs. J. A. Phillips, of Eros, Louisiana; Mrs. W. R. Adams, of Logan, Iowa; and Mrs. J. E. Reedy, of Chadron, Nebraska. Also 6 sisters, 4 brothers, 8 grandchildren, and numerous relatives and friends. Baptized October 18, 1874, by M. H. Forscutt; confirmed by M. H. Forscutt and Daniel Lambert. A noble mother, a true wife, and faithful Saint. Services at Missouri Valley, Iowa. Interment at Magnolia, Iowa.

GREEN.—Frances Green was born at Fall River, Massachusetts, January 26, 1900. Baptized at Onset reunion, August 3, 1913. Died July 31, 1920. Our young sister passed away peacefully in her mother's arms. Though young in years she was privileged to see the beauty and glory of the heavenly home. She was conscious to the last, and her spirit left this life in joyous anticipation of the rest and happiness awaiting the faithful. Funeral services at the home of her parents. Sermon by Horatio W. Howlett. Interment in Oak Grove Cemetery, August 3, 1920.

Conference Minutes

WHEELING.—With Wheeling Branch, September 4 and 5, O. J. Tary in charge. District presidency chosen to preside. Reports of district officers and elders read. All district officers sustained except the district treasurer, and it was voted that secretary act as treasurer. Missionaries present were James E. Bishop, Thomas Newton, and John Martin. Next conference with Steubenville Branch, last Saturday and Sunday preceding Labor Day, 1921. Jasper N. Dobbs, secretary.

THE HOMESTEAD

THE MANSION HOUSE

Eighty Years They Have Stood---

—those houses pictured above—and small though they are, and out of date, they are yet eloquent in history and testify of a time when Nauvoo was the first city in Illinois and the church was making wonderful strides toward converting the nations. Nauvoo is but a shell of her former self to-day, and the church, having gone through great tribulation is centering at another place; yet these two historic buildings look out upon the same Mississippi as delighted the sight of the early Saints, and stand as enduring landmarks of a remarkable pilgrimage.

The history of our church has been the history of building, and no sacrifice has been too great for our people to undertake. Kirtland, Nauvoo, Lamoni, Independence—wherever our people have gathered they have built testimonies in brick and stone of their faith and purpose in the gospel.

Once again the church is being asked to join in a great task. Everyone is called to assist in building the General Conference Auditorium. The very progress of the church hinges upon the response. We plan not alone for to-day and its needs.

The Fruits of the Spirit

Lecture to the Priesthood, March 26, 1920, by Elbert A. Smith. Reported by Howard
W. Harder.

Lecture Outline

I. Introduction

1. A figure of speech to denote those traits, graces, or attributes of the Christian character developed within us by the life of the Spirit.
2. Fruit must be grown, developed, matured. It must be nurtured and sustained by an inner life, as the apple is the result of the life within the apple tree—and cannot be manufactured, but by intelligent culture may be brought to a higher state of development. We are collaborators with God in the orchard and also in developing fruits of the Spirit.
3. While a gift is given, fruit must be worked for, and developed by intelligent effort. A line between gifts and fruits, though some attributes, like faith, may be at times found in both classes.

II. What Are the Fruits of the Spirit?

1. Paul's list in Galatians 5: 22, 23.
2. Peter's exhortation in 2 Peter 1: 5-7.
3. From Doctrine and Covenants 11: 4.
4. A summary of the above.
5. Christ's life and character the best exegesis: the word that became flesh, John 1: 14.

III. Outstanding Fruits of the Spirit. (Doctrine and Covenants 11: 4.)

1. Christian humility.
 - a. Humble—from humilis, on the ground, and humus, the ground, or earth. The quality that binds us to humanity.
2. Faith.
 - a. The trait that binds us to God.
3. Hope.
 - a. The source of courage and optimism.
4. Charity.
 - a. Defined in Book of Mormon as the pure love of God. The mainspring of all sacrifice either human or divine. The thing that moved Christ to come among men and that must actuate every successful mission. The crowning virtue that includes all others.

IV. What Place Have the Fruits in the Christian Economy?

1. In the individual life.
2. In the collective life.
3. In our ministry.

The subject that I have this morning is a very familiar theme. I might possibly safely follow the example of the eccentric Hindu philosopher. I suppose all Hindu philosophers are eccentric, from our standpoint. You know, the East says, "Let us sit down and meditate," while the West says, "Let us get up and go!" Sometime we may strike a balance and think before we act, and they act after they have thought. But this was an unusually eccentric philosopher.

He appeared in the market place one day and when a crowd had gathered around him he said to them, "Do you understand the theme that I am to talk about?" And they answered that they did not. "Then," said he, "if you don't understand what I am to talk to you about, there is no use of my talking." The next day he appeared in the market place again, and asked them the same question; and this time the people all answered that they understood what he was going to talk about. "If you already know what I am to talk about," said the philosopher, "there is no reason why I should talk." On the third day he appeared and asked the people if they understood what he was going to talk to them about. Some of them answered that they did and some of them said that they did not. "Then," said he, "those who understand it can tell those who do not!" And he went his way again.

I. Introduction

The theme that has been assigned to me is, "The fruits of the Spirit." This, of course, is a figure of speech borrowed from the natural world and taken over into the spiritual world to denote those traits or attributes of the Christian character that are developed within us by the life of the Spirit.

Fruit must be grown and developed and matured. It follows that conversion is not instantaneous as some people think it is—that is, complete conversion. Fruit must be cultivated in our lives. In this case, of course, these fruits are the result of the life of the Spirit, just as the apple on the tree is the result of the life within the apple tree. You cannot put these things on, just as you cannot manufacture an apple. Fruit cannot be manufactured, but by intelligent culture may be brought to a high state of perfection or development. We are collaborators with God in the orchard, and also in the development of the fruits of the Spirit.

Apparently in the natural world, it is the law of God that through cooperation men shall bring natural fruits to a state of perfection. The wild crab apple, I suppose, has all of the potentialities of a Jonathan apple, but it takes men working in conjunction with God to produce the Jonathan from the crab apple. The little wild, insignificant daisy which grows by the side of the brook has all the potentialities of the beautiful shasta daisy, but it took the patience of Burbank to develop it. Evidently that was God's intention from the very beginning, because the statement is made that God set a man in the garden to tend it and dress it. We sometimes think of labor as a curse, but evidently God intended from the very beginning that man should labor. It is excessive labor that is a curse. God didn't intend that man should sit around in the garden smelling the flowers and plugging big ripe watermelons and doing nothing else. And so it is in the development of the spiritual fruits, carrying over the natural laws into the spiritual realm.

While a gift is given, fruit must be worked for and earned and developed by intelligent effort. There is a certain line between gifts and fruits that perhaps is not always clearly marked, for some, like faith, may at times be found in both classes. Sometimes God gives people the gift of faith and sometimes they have to struggle for it very hard; as Alma says, if they can have even the "desire to believe," just the smallest desire, there is some hope for them. You hear men say sometimes, "I wish I could believe." Such a man has something to work on and he may gradually develop a Christian faith in his heart.

II. What Are the Fruits of the Spirit?

We go to Paul for a concise and clear statement of almost everything theological. When we want to tell the world what the principles of the doctrine of Christ are, we go to Paul; when we want to tell the world what the officers are that constitute the official force of the church, we go to Paul; when we want a list of the fruits of the Spirit, we find that Paul has catalogued them. He seems to have had a very methodical and systematic mind. "But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, meekness, faith: against such there is no law." (Galatians 5: 22.)

I am told that Brother Rushton uses a version which reads like this, "The fruit of the Spirit is love: joy, peace, long-suffering," etc. making them all subsidiary to love—all growing out of love. That is not a bad version if we consider charity as being what the Book of Mormon says it is, the pure love of God.

Peter gives us a fine statement about some of the spiritual fruits. These are texts with which you are all familiar and have often used: "And besides this, giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge."

I pause right here to say that Peter had the correct theory of education, to my mind, and if we proceed on his philosophy and have first faith and virtue, then we are spiritually safe to go on and add knowledge to the limit of our acquirements. But the trouble with many in the world is that they have utterly ignored faith and virtue and have been content to accumulate facts while remaining godless and corrupt.

"And besides this, giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge; and to knowledge temperance; and to temperance patience; and to patience godliness; and to godliness brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness charity."

I like this program of Peter's, because it is a constructive and progressive program of Christian development that will keep every man busy as long as he lives. He doesn't need to sit down in any stage of his career and think that there is nothing more for him to do. The cross of Christ is the mark of addition: "Add to your faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge," etc., even as Paul says until we reach perfection.

I can understand that perfection may mean one thing to one individual and another thing to another individual. Perfection comes with the full development of the potential powers of the individual. That will be perfection for him, when he reaches full manhood, not Godhood, in Christ Jesus. All this Brighamite talk about eternal progression does not amount to anything.

In the Book of Covenants, the 11th section and the 4th verse, there is a very significant statement that we will always do well to bear in mind. It seems to be a very radical statement, but perhaps we will see the philosophy of it before we get through: "No man can assist in this work except he be humble and full of love, having faith, hope, and charity."

From these various texts we gather a list of the fruits of the Spirit, which includes love (or charity), joy, peace, long-suffering, (or patience), gentleness (or brotherly kindness), goodness, faith, meekness, temperance, virtue, knowledge, godliness, hope.

As I have noted in this outline the finest exegesis of this subject is found in the life of Christ himself, in harmony with the statement found in John 1:14, that the "Word became flesh and dwelt among men, full of grace and truth." One of the finest statements, certainly, in all the Word of God. This may seem to be a little digression from the main theme, but is vitally connected with it.

In the life and in the character of Christ, I have of late years found my inspiration. That is the theme I like to talk about. There are many things in the Old Testament scriptures and in the writings of the apostles that appeal strongly to us, but they all fade into comparative insignificance in comparison with that supreme revelation of the Word of God that became flesh and dwelt among men; for the Inspired Bible tells us very plainly that the Word that became flesh and dwelt among men was the gospel.

I wonder why it was that Christ found it necessary to take on flesh, why it was necessary that the Word should become flesh; why it couldn't have been printed or written and sent to us for our consideration. I think that Jesus Christ wanted to appeal with all the force of divinity and humanity combined to both the heart and brain of man. You know there is a difference there. When a young man falls in love he doesn't stop to think very much about it or analyze his feelings, but he knows very well that something has happened to his heart. On the other hand, an individual may reason out a perfectly logical defense for the income tax law, but when he goes to the office to pay his tax and get his receipt, he doesn't have at all the same sensations that he does when he goes to the marriage license bureau.

Jesus wanted to make his appeal to the heart. I would not give a cent for a religion that doesn't appeal to the heart; but religion must, of course, be accompanied by the fruits of logic and reason. A cold, abstract statement of law does not appeal to the heart of man. It may be confirmed by his judgment, but it leaves his heart cold. Jesus, in order to reach the heart of man and the mind of man as well, determined to identify himself in all things with man. He came to this world and was born of woman and leaned upon her breast and sanctified all womanhood; he took on himself all the stages of development and, becoming a little child, he sanctified all childhood; he became a man and identified himself in every way with temptation and sorrow and privation, and thus sanctified all manhood. He was a man of sorrow and so brought to us a contribution we could not otherwise have had. If God had remained in heaven, though we might conceive with our minds that he could understand all things, our hearts would say, "He doesn't understand."

I do not want to encroach upon Brother Garver's theme, but I think that you will find in this the secret of the atonement. Jesus came as a little child. Why should he not? That is the way each of us came. We shall all die, too. Jesus died. He identified himself with us in all these things. I do not want to depreciate the atonement in any way. In fact, I cannot depreciate its value. It should be my business to give you a higher concept of it rather than a lower one. There were reasons for the atonement, but I look for those reasons in the effect that was had on man and not in any sense in the effect that was had on God. I do not believe that Christ died to propitiate God in any sense whatever, because long before Christ came into the world God so loved man that he gave his Only Begotten Son. The suffering on the cross did not change God, but does change man and bring man to God.

Jesus wanted also to appeal to the intelligence. The idea of God in the abstract, of course, is extremely hard to understand. It is the hardest kind of thinking to think about God in that way. The idea of God in the abstract is almost impossible for man to get hold of. Every idol that was ever formed out of stone or wood represented an effort of some man to form something that he could visualize that would give him an objective presentation that would enable him to lay hold in his mind of the abstract idea of God. And the creeds that came along a little bit later were an effort along the same line to comprehend God in the abstract. Though they were very faulty, they were man's effort along that line.

Man cannot find out God, cannot understand God, unaided. He may reason up to a certain point and may form conclusions concerning the existence of God and the personality of God, but when it comes to understanding the attributes of God, revelation must come in or he is helpless; he cannot grasp the subject alone. It is too big for him. Sam Jones in his rather crude way said: "Man can bite an apple, but he cannot bite a pumpkin—all he can do is to slobber over it."

It was the business of Christ to interpret God so that we could understand him. "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." The trouble, of course, is not with God or divinity; it is with man or humanity.

It seems sometimes, though of course this is not true, that God himself is at a loss as to how to reach humanity and make them understand, because he says in talking about the things of the heavens, "Unto what shall I liken these things that you may understand?" He understood them all right, but the trouble that he encountered was to explain them in terms that we could understand. And that was the situation Jesus confronted when he volunteered to save man.

I have sometimes thought of Jesus as pondering as to the best way to undertake his mission. Of course, we have been told that God cannot do this. Knowing instantly the best course he need not choose or deliberate as we do. Though Christ did not have to go through that process, I need to go through it in order to understand him. I picture Christ as saying: "How shall I reach man? Shall I send a multitude of angels to fly through the heavens proclaiming the message with trumpets? If I do, some men may look up and say, 'Your law may be a fine law for the angels, but I am not an angel. I am chained to earth and am bowed down with sin and temptation and care. I have nothing to do with your law.' Shall I cause it to be printed on innumerable pamphlets and tracts and shower them down on the earth? Some man will look up and say, 'What good is a tract to me while God remains in heaven and man remains on the earth?'" And so, I think I hear Jesus saying to himself, "I know how I must reach man. I will go and live with man and interpret the gospel to him in his own life and in his own flesh, and then he can understand." That is why the Word became flesh and dwelt among men. And that is the way you will reach your audiences if you ever reach them at all, by becoming one with them and by living your message.

Sometimes we encounter some preacher who is called a backwoods preacher and we don't hear much about him here in Independence or Lamoni; but if we go out into the field where he has been laboring we will find that he is held in the highest esteem. The secret of his success is this: In his person the Word became flesh in that locality and dwelt among men full of grace and truth. And unless we are willing to do that, any other interpretation of the gospel that we may give will be practically without value.

The reason that I have digressed along this line is that I feel that in the character of Christ and in his life we find the finest exegesis of the fruits of the Spirit that we can find anywhere. He came and lived those things and developed them while among us so that if we want to understand them let us look on him.

III. Outstanding Fruits of the Spirit

There are some outstanding fruits that I want to notice that are particularly interesting because they are set forth so plainly in the passage from the Book of Covenants that I have read: "No one can assist in this work except he shall be humble and full of love, haying faith, hope, and charity, being temperate in all things whatsoever is intrusted to his care."

We find five of the fruits of the Spirit named there. The first is humility. It is said that this is derived from the word humilis, which means close to the ground, and humus, which means the ground or the earth, and that the word humanity is derived from the same root. Humility, we may then say, is the trait that binds us to humanity. And I am sure there is nothing that will separate us from the people quicker than the "big head." If your congregation gets the idea that you have the "big head," that is the end of you. It not only separates you from them, but it sets everybody against you, because with the natural man when he sees anybody inflated it seems a great temptation to puncture him. We have some historic examples of that. The Kaiser is one of them; he became so insufferable the whole world united to drag him down.

The man who is not humble will preach himself, he will be the attraction; but with the man who is humble, the message is the thing.

I have a little poem here that is pretty good for preachers to remember. It is called, "The man and his message."

"He held the lamp of truth that day
So low that none could miss the way;
And yet so high, to bring in sight
That picture fair—'The world's great light,'
That, gazing up—the lamp between—
The hand that held it scarce was seen.

"He held the pitcher, stooping low,
To lips of little ones below;
Then raised it to the weary saint,
And bade him drink, when sick and faint;
They drank—the pitcher thus between—
The hand that held it scarce was seen.

"He blew the trumpet soft and clear,
That trembling sinners need not fear;
And then with louder notes and bold,
To raze the walls of Satan's hold!
The trumpet coming thus between—
The hand that held it scarce was seen.

"But when the Captain says, 'Well done,
Thou good and faithful servant, come!
Lay down the pitcher and the lamp,
Lay down the trumpet—leave the camp'—
The weary hands will then be seen,
Clasped in the pierced ones—naught between."

The man who goes out and makes himself the thing to which men are supposed to look up cannot assist in building up this work. The man who gets between men and his message will lose out. The message is the thing that must attract the attention of the people.

Humility does not mean that we shall get down and crawl and cringe, but it admits of a fair and just and accurate inventory of a man's own capabilities. That is what it contemplates. Some men never have been able to do the work that they could do because they are constantly depreciating themselves and do not understand themselves. I know that for many years as a young man I did not move out and occupy where I could have done, because I constantly thought I was not qualified.

The fruit of hope may be considered the source of optimism and courage. This church certainly has need of optimists. I had a letter from a brother a few days ago who was writing about Zion, and he said, "It is everlastingly too late; all is ruined and lost now." When a man gets down to where he feels like that, he cannot assist in building up this work. Hell is full of pessimists, and from all reports they have every reason to be pessimistic. But why should we qualify for membership? Heaven is full of optimists. They have reason to be optimistic. We are working with heavenly forces. Why should we be pessimistic? Sometimes we get discouraged, of course, but every one must have the conviction in his heart of ultimate victory, and that he is fighting for God, and no man can assist in this work unless he does have that feeling in his heart. A good live hope in the heart is of great assistance to the preacher.

I remember when I first started out to preach how profoundly discouraged I became. Many a night I thought I would never try it again, but always there was this hope springing up, "Well, perhaps sometime I will preach." I never did preach until I went out with Brother Carmichael and did tracting, leaving the tracts at the doors whenever they would open them. We had to fight for our work while doing tracting in this way. We met all kinds of people and ideas. We got down to "brass tacks," as they say, and the next time that I went into the stand to preach, I preached for the first time. For that reason I have said that these boys we send to Graceland College cannot learn to preach there. They can gather in a lot of material that will help them, but they cannot learn to preach there. We "learn to do by doing." They can only learn to preach in reality by actual contact with humanity and God, learning to stand between the two. Preaching is one of the most human processes, as it consists simply of reaching out and taking somebody by the hand and saying, "Brother, I have a message for you." If you have lost your handclasp with humanity, you haven't any right to be preaching, and you will not preach.

Now, passing on to the question of faith, if humility binds us to man, of course faith is the thing that binds us to God. You are here to-day because you have faith in certain things. If at any time your faith should begin to fail, the wall of your defense should begin to crumble away, and in a short time it would be only inevitable that you would be left without any defense and you would not be here or in the mission field. And the undermining begins by very subtle processes. When a man begins to repudiate one thing it is often followed by the repudiation of another until it may finally be said of him that he "ran well for a time"—but that doesn't get a man to the goal.

We can never get away from the point where we do not have to fight doubt. Most of us have to fight doubt. You will have to fight it on one side or the other. I would rather fight it on the affirmative side. Consider some of our preachers and brainiest men, Brother X for instance—one of the cleanest, ablest, most lovable of men. He quit the field and the last I knew of him he was asking to have his name taken from the church books, having apparently lost out entirely in the Christian warfare. Doubt overcame him. Where is he now? I am perfectly satisfied from some things that have come to my attention that he is still fighting doubt, but on the other side of the question. He is thinking, "Maybe I have thrown away the pearl of great price; maybe after all I have forsaken my call." You have got to fight doubt from one side or the other. Take the affirmative side.

All Christianity is affirmative. That is why we like it. God said, "Let us make!" "Let us create!" Jesus said, "I will build my church." All the Christian system is constructive and affirmative and progressive; while doubt at worst is destructive and at best leads to cessation of effort and to inaction, dry rot. When a man becomes a living negative, he is of no further use to this church; so it is truly said of doubt that it cannot assist in this work, because it is a constructive work and requires faith.

IV. What Place in the Christian Economy?

We might ask ourselves, "What place do these fruits have in the Christian economy?" First, in the individual life. The divine statement is made that by their fruits shall ye know them. We are not going to be known in the day of judgment—we are not going to be known here on earth by our professions. Some may fondly believe that they are to be judged because they preach faith and baptism. We are to be judged by our fruits and not by our professions. And the individual who is bearing these fruits naturally will command respect from the discerning.

Love is the motive back of all sacrifice. "God so loved the world that he gave his Only Begotten Son." We talk about going to some foreign field. Are we capable of loving the people when we get there? Suppose you go to Jerusalem and find yourself administering to the needs of the extremely ignorant and poverty stricken and diseased, can you love them? Did you ever love a Jew peddler? Can you love Mexicans, Poles, "Dagoes"? Well, you have got to learn to do it if you are ever going to take the gospel to them; and we can learn to do it if underneath all disease and dirt and ignorance we discern the human soul, for it is always lovable. No matter how rough or marred the exterior, if you can perceive under it the human soul, you can love that man. There is hardly a man on earth but what has something attractive about him, and if we learn to know him there is something for love to lay hold on.

They say that love is blind. Love is the only thing that sees. Hate is blind; suspicion is blind; misunderstanding is blind; but love is the only thing that sees. I have been caused to wonder many times when I have tried to make peace between two men. I will not refer to any particular two men; for I have tried the experiment many times. Often there comes for settlement a case in which two of our good ministers are at outs with each other. Often I have been led to speculate: Here are two men. They cannot get along together at all; they couldn't agree for a minute. Yet I can work with either of them. Why couldn't they work together? I can see that they are both good men. Cannot each one of them see that in the other? Something had come between them and they couldn't see each other correctly. That is the trouble. They were not the men they thought they were.

I am reminded of the story that the Irishman told. He said: "As I was crossin' London Bridge the mornin', I met Tim, and I said, 'Hello Tim!' And he said, 'Hello Mike!' And I said, 'I ain't Mike.' And he said, 'And I ain't Tim.' And so we took a good look at each other, and sure enough it was nayer of us at all."

Love must be the compelling force, the motive force in our missionary work, whether at home or abroad. And it must be the moving spirit in a man's pastoral work.

If you are a pastor and do not love your congregation, your congregation will soon find it out. You don't have to tell them from the pulpit, or put it in the paper. And when this happens, your influence with them will be nil. But if you have the spirit of love, you have the basis for your pastorate—you have the same basis that Jesus Christ had. That is why he reached the common people. I started to say something about why the gospel went to the common people. One reason is this: The gospel of Jesus Christ comes to those who are down and out, disinherited and poverty stricken and friendless, and it says, "Come up!" It comes to the high and mighty and haughty and says to them, "Come down!" And men would rather be called up than to be called down. It calls some down (from their standpoint) but really it calls them and all men to come up.

You may ask, "What place are these fruits to have in our collective life?" I think that we cannot build Zion without them. I think they are to have a most profound influence. Zion went to rack and ruin in 1833 because there were contentions, and divisions, and evil and covetous desires, and we can never rebuild it here again unless we shall have these qualities that are called the fruits of the Spirit.

Almost any little branch has its troubles, and frequently they blaze up and the branch is simply destroyed. That is the kind of a branch I got for my first pastorate. And for some years I had the experience of trying to mix oil and water. The only solution to be found for such conditions is the development and cultivation of Christian characteristics that will enable the people to work together. The spirit of fellowship is the only one that will accomplish it. Zion is only a small branch on a large scale and the same things that will make us consolidated and help us to hold our solidarity in Zion will be the same things that help us move together harmoniously in a small branch.

I remember some months ago when I was in the city of Des Moines I called upon my first school-teacher, the woman who taught me my A B C's. I was under a great debt of gratitude to her because she gave me the key to all English literature. There is nothing so profound, nothing so simple but what yields up its treasures to me when I use those few simple lessons that she taught me, when I learned the alphabet. Possibly we do not need so many more explicit revelations regarding Zion if we only use the A B C's of Christianity that Christ endeavored years ago to teach us. The same things that will preserve harmony and work out the success of Zion are the ones taught in Obscurity Branch: love of God and love of man.

The time is coming when we must get closer together, because the world is quite rapidly going to pieces. From our human standpoint, it seems like civilization is crumbling away; that the system that man has built up with all his intelligence is beginning to fall. There never will come any permanent help until Christ comes to set up his own government. The nations get together in their peace conferences and draft profound documents. Militarism we fought for four years and defeated. Now something arises that we do not know how to meet. The French are planning great forts, much greater than anything now known in the world, but the thing that confronts them now is the thing that will go between their forts like an infection that destroys the army—the spirit of anarchy. It bids fair, so far as we can judge, to consummate what God said it would, the full end of all nations.

When all nations fall, what is going to stand? The work of God. And if we are true and faithful and develop the Christian character we will be found standing. We have got to get together and stand together. You have perhaps noticed Russia. When nations begin to fall, each community is thrown upon its own resources; each little village is forced to depend on its own resources. Shall we be able to have a self-sufficient body providing for all its own needs when that time comes? We will if we develop sufficient wisdom and the Christian character as we should. I do not profess to solve these problems that arise, myself; I am but a preacher of righteousness, but the man who preaches these fundamental principles of righteousness strikes at the root of the whole matter and is rendering the first great service in building up Zion. So, too, is the man who puts the thought into operation and takes his religion home and lives it. He is indeed a greater man than the preacher.

The Children's Bureau is issuing a bulletin, "Every child in school." It shows what has been and what can be done against child labor and ignorance. Pastors in the churches throughout the country are the ones who are doing the principal work to make the Children's Bureau effective, as their wives send for literature on infant and child care. The pastors are interested also in community child welfare. These bulletins are sent free of charge upon request from the Children's Bureau.

Subjects Being Discussed

College Women in England

It appears that a controversy is taking place in England on whether women shall be admitted on full terms of equality to Cambridge University.

At Oxford woman is treated very sympathetically. The university has decided to grant women degrees, and the vice chancellor and proctor have selected a model of academic cap which the women undergraduates will wear. The plan in England is different than in America. The university is composed of a number of separate colleges. It is not proposed that the women shall enter the men's colleges, but shall reside in colleges of their own, but shall be granted membership and recognized as part of the university.

The opposition at Cambridge is partly on the question of accommodation, as present libraries, lecture rooms, and laboratories are heavily taxed to meet the needs of the men for whom they were originally intended. Still the basic objection is that they would prefer that women should have a separate university, rather than have the existing institution extended.

Ministry of Labor

The Methodist federation for social service, in a recent bulletin, publishes the statements of certain ministers and students, telling why they are devoting their time to the labor movement, rather than to the ministry. The fundamental reason given is that the opposition of the organized church to the position of labor has caused a lack of interest in the church, while the condition of the laboring man requires a real ministry. Above all else, the giving of alms for social uplift does not meet the situation. The whole plea is for fair play and social justice, and a sincere consideration of the matters at issue. Some say that here they have found their real ministry for Christ, and that Christianity requires a change in the social order, so that all men will have a better understanding of what labor means, and all working men receive adequate remuneration and protection for their labor.

What the Churches Think of the League of Nations

The Christian Work gives in a current number several pages to "What does the church think of the League of Nations?" and gives the resolutions passed by the various bodies of Protestant churches in favor of the league as follows: Northern Baptist Convention, International Congregational Council, National Congregational Council, the Lambeth Conference of the Anglican and Associated Churches, the Methodist Episcopal Church, United Presbyterian Assembly, Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, Reformed Church in the United States, the Central Conference of American Rabbis, the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Church of the United Brethren, and the Evangelical Lutheran Augustana Synod of North America. In addition to this the clergymen of various organizations, including the Southern Baptists, expressed very clearly an approval of the League of Nations.

It is noteworthy that most of these resolutions by national bodies speak in favor of the League of Nations, and urge that the President and the Senate agree in a practical way so as to secure peace, and to secure a proper league of nations.

However 15,309 clergymen signed the following petition: "We, the undersigned clergymen, urge the Senate of the United States to ratify the Paris Peace Treaty embodying the League of Nations Covenant at the earliest possible date, without amendments or such reservations as would require resubmission of the Treaty to the Peace Conference and Germany."

Of these clergymen the largest number of signers came from New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio, Massachusetts, California, and Iowa. The remaining half were scattered. They include Methodist, Congregational, Federated Churches, Presbyterian, Lutheran, Baptist, Christian, Roman Catholic, Jewish, Universalist, Unitarian, Episcopal, United Brethren, as well as over one thousand others.

The Zionist Conference

At the recent great Jewish conference in London Doctor Weizman declared that the British Government had already set up the necessary political machinery to assure the Jews a national home in Palestine, and that they were now free to make it a Jewish country as they were capable. No internal obstacles were big enough to prevent the aim of the Zionists: a national Jewish homeland, controlled by Jews with Zionist ideals.

The vice president of the Zionist Commission, Mr. Ussishkin, brought greetings from the Jews of Palestine, whom he represented as awaiting the moment when the great majority of the Jews would return to Palestine. He was of the opinion that at least 30,000 Jews must settle there each year for the next few years. In his opinion at least $20,000,000 would be required to carry out the work of reconstruction necessary in the first few years. The land must be purchased and public works established. The Palestinian Jews had already contributed $500,000 to this end, which should be an incentive to other Jews to make large sacrifices.

There were some eighty English-speaking Jews at the conference and a large number from European countries in spite of the difficulties of travel. Poland sent forty delegates, while others were present from various of the Baltic provinces, White Russia, the Ukraine, the Crimea, Bessarabia, and Czecho-Slovakia, to a total of about 270.

Extraordinary enthusiasm was manifested when Justice Brandeis of the United States was elected president of the conference and Max Nordau honorary president.

Summer Vacations for Churches

It is of interest to note in The Christian Life of England, a whole page given to a discussion of the closing of churches during the summer, either entirely, or for evening services.

It is noteworthy in this country that many of the Protestant churches do abolish their evening services, yet the church is supposed to have a definite relationship to the spiritual life of the community, and hence should be kept open for people at all times.

We are glad to say that we have never known of one of our churches being closed for the summer, or even for the Sunday evening service. It is no time for a let-up in the important work before us.

Child Labor Regulations

Nineteen States, up to the present year, have established compulsory part-time schools for minors in industry. Several other States, including Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, New York, and Massachusetts have enacted permissive mandatory laws, authorizing local school districts to establish such schools. But in few instances has this been done except in Boston. The highest age limit in any State law so far enacted, is eighteen years. The lowest, and most commonly designated at which compulsory part-time education may begin is fourteen years. The minimum number of hours is that provided by the Federal vocational act, one hundred and forty-four hours. As a rule the school work must be held during the usual working hours of the minor, and it usually must be some hours between 8 a. m., and 5 and 6 p. m.

Hard Coal Prices Too High

The Dearborn Independent publishes an article on the coal situation, showing that anthracite coal costing $3.90 mine cost, is now retailing for $14.50 in Boston, and will soon sell for $20 a ton. After all labor and machinery costs of mining the coal and delivering it out of the mine is completed, the cost for anthracite coal is $3.90. To this is added an operator's margin and a sales agent's margin of $3.94. They are combined because they represent practically the same interest.

This is also true of many of the railroads. It is true in many cases in regard to the freight, as the railroads directly or indirectly are concerned in the anthracite mines. That is, the same individuals control both. They have added a freight rate to Boston of $3.20; to this is then added a retailer's margin of $3.46.

From this it can be seen very clearly that the labor cost is not the reason for the high price of coal, as it has increased less than 71 per cent in six years; the mining cost less than 75 per cent. The cost to the consumer is practically doubled for the simple reason that the sales agents and retailers have each increased their margin between 172 and 177 per cent.

United States May Enter League

There is a growing opinion that the United States will enter into the League of Nations regardless of election results in November. Hungary has officially applied for admission to the league; Germany is not a member, but will submit treaties she has negotiated for registration; Great Britain is preparing copies of all her treaties for registration. The South and Central American Governments have notified the league that they will send three delegates each to the first meeting of the assembly, at Geneva in November. The South American and Central American delegation will number close to three hundred. They will also send as officially stated, on account of the importance of the work of the league, special diplomatic delegates to the permanent headquarters at Geneva.

Mexican Conditions Becoming Most Favorable

It is encouraging to learn from reliable sources that internal conditions in Mexico are becoming more settled and that much constructive work is being done. Many public improvements are being completed, industries, farms, and mines are being developed, with taxes canceled in many cases in frank recognition of the fact that bad governmental policies in the past have hindered progress. Revolutionary elements have nearly all subsided and work is given to all who are capable and willing. Judging from present outlook, the future of Mexico is assured.

The wonder of the possible persistence of personality is less great than the marvel of our origination. The irresistible force of that reasoning even Thomas Paine urgently insisted on, as did also Voltaire, who asserted that we have at least as many reasons for affirming immortality as for denying it. John Bigelow, the eminent lawyer, journalist, and diplomat, held a brief for the belief in immortality and argued it ably in the Court of Reason. To the question, "Is there existence after death?" his reply was, "As a lawyer I would naturally begin by saying that the burden of proof rests upon those who deny the continuity of life."—William V. Kelley, in A Pilgrim of the Infinite.

America a Choice Land

BY C. W. LAMB

Substantiation of the Book of Mormon statement that this land is "choice above all other lands."

The following from McClure's monthly magazine for September, 1919, written by Doctor Newell Dwight Hillis, might be of sufficient interest to the Saints to warrant its insertion in the SAINTS' HERALD.

The Book of Mormon says of America that it is "choice above all other lands of the earth" (Ether 1:18); that it is a "chosen land of the Lord" (Ether 6:2); that it is "the place of the New Jerusalem, which should come down out of heaven, and the holy sanctuary of the Lord" (Ether 6:3); "and that a New Jerusalem should be built up upon this land, unto the remnant of the seed of Joseph," as the prophet Ether foretold to the people of his day (Ether 6:6), which "remnants of the seed of Joseph" are the American Indians.

Doctor Hillis (who, we are proud to say, grew to manhood here at Magnolia), in this article in McClure's, points out some of the reasons why America is a choice land.

The Book of Mormon says that the people, who have of old inhabited this land of America and who built the ancient cities here whose remains in Mexico and Central and South America are the wonder of the world, were descendants of Joseph of Egypt. Moses, in his blessing of the tribes of Israel, in the 33d chapter of Deuteronomy, shows that the descendants of Joseph would inherit a very choice land, which could be none other than America:

"And of Joseph he said, Blessed of the Lord be his land, for the precious things of heaven, for the dew, and for the deep that coucheth beneath, and for the precious fruits brought forth by the sun, and for the precious things put forth by the moon, and for the chief things of the ancient mountains, and for the precious things of the lasting hills, and for the precious things of the earth and fullness thereof, and for the good will of him that dwelt in the bush: let the blessings come upon the head of Joseph, and upon the top of the head of him that was separated from his brethren. His glory is like the firstling of his bullock, and his horns are like the horns of unicorns; with them he shall push the people together to the ends of the earth: and they are the ten thousand of Ephraim, and they are the thousands of Manasseh."—Deuteronomy 33: 13-17.

In connection with these words of Moses about the blessings of Joseph's land, I wish to quote the following "statistics which tell where the United States stands in various fields of wealth. Although we have only six per cent of the people of the earth (and seven per cent of the world's land), natural resources have been piled into this section of the world with a lavish hand. Witness, we have: Eighty per cent of the world's automobiles, three fourths of the corn of the world, two thirds of the world's supply of oil, sixty per cent of the world's supply of copper, sixty per cent of the world's aluminum, sixty per cent of the cotton of the world, one half of the zinc of the world, fifty-two per cent of the world's stock of coal, forty per cent of the world's iron and steel, forty per cent of the world's lead, forty per cent of the world's silver, twenty-five per cent of the wheat, twenty per cent of the world's supply of gold."—Copied by the Omaha World-Herald for July 2, 1920, from the Milwaukee Journal.

The following is an extract from the article from McClure's:

"What Is the Matter With the United States?"

"The golden spot and the unique opportunity for wealth production upon this planet, lies in our north temperate zone, between the Atlantic and the Pacific. North of our Great Lakes the winters are too long and cold, south of our Gulf the summers are too long and hot for great wealth production. Our country lies in the best zone for productive foods, at the very best point of that zone for world trade and commerce, and in the very midst of the one continent of the five that was built for farming land and the production of enormous wealth. It is a singular fact that more than half of the good agricultural land of the globe lies between Alaska and Cape Horn, and since farming land determines population and wealth, that more than half of the human race and the world's wealth are soon to be in our continent. All civilization, its laws, liberty, art, science, invention, are rooted in farming land, and of the five continents, ours alone enjoys ideal conditions for food production. The planet turns from the west toward the east. The New York shore is low, and as the earth speeds forward, the clouds and rain of the Atlantic fall behind and the low eastern shore slips under the rain and fog that slides across the land, while in the extreme West, the Rockies, lifting up 15,000 feet high, chill the clouds, and the rains run back into the Mississippi, thus saving all moisture and making ours a farming land continent. Had the Rocky Mountains been on the New York shore, our land would have been one vast Sahara through to the Pacific. What is the matter with North Africa? Africa's Rocky Mountains are on the eastern coast, chilling the rains that run back into the Indian Ocean, thus leaving one half of Africa a burning desert. Why is there a desert in Central Asia, one thousand miles across? Because the mountains back of Peking precipitate the rain that returns to the Pacific, leaving no rain for the deserts of Asia. What is the matter with Australia? The mountains are on the eastern side of Australia, bringing the rains down and leaving no moisture for the lands behind them. The four continents, other than our own, Europe, Asia, Africa, and the Australian Isles, have ten million square miles of farming land, while North and South America alone have eleven millions. As population is determined by farming land, therefore, ultimately, our people on the Western Continent will outvote and control the civilization of the world."

Spiritual Life

Sermon by Clyde F. Ellis at Grand Rapids, Michigan, May 23, 1920. Reported by Hazel Dexter, Lansing, Michigan.

Dear Saints and friends, we can say this morning that we are thankful for the opportunity we have of meeting you here in the Grand Rapids Branch. We wanted to bear our testimony this morning, and, in fact, started to get up two or three times, but we were so wrapped up in what you had to say that we refrained from speaking, thinking that we would have an opportunity later. We appreciate greatly the opportunity we have of meeting with you again, you with whom we labored so long in this district and learned to love because of association one with another. There have been many times during our absence from you that we have longed to meet with you, shake your hands, and talk with you. We have longed many, many times to hear your prayers and testimonies. We have longed for just one handshake or just one word from some one we knew, but considering all we are thankful this morning that life is prolonged and that we have the privilege of meeting with you and speaking to you for a short time.

We do not know whether you will be able to understand us this morning or not. When we reached San Francisco the 20th day of March, we were informed that there were two appointments set for us the next day. We talked twice that day, and we want to tell you it was hard. It is with some difficulty yet that we express our thoughts in English, but we trust that in unity of mind we will be able to say something and say it in such a way that you will understand it, but if you do not understand, you may call upon Brother May to interpret for us.

The Privileges Afforded to Followers

We have been undecided to know just what thought will be most appropriate for our service this morning. It is somewhat customary to take a text—it used to be—and if we do not stick very closely to the text, you will pardon the diversion. One verse we are going to use as a starting point is in Matthew 13:11, the latter portion of the 11th verse, which reads as follows: "It is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given." With that we are going to associate a statement made by a very wise man, which reads thus, "In the organism lies the principle of life; in the environment are the conditions of life." The statement we have selected from the New Testament is one spoken by Christ himself to his disciples, who asked him why it was that he spoke continually to the scribes and Pharisees in parables, to which he said in reply, "It is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given." The statement we have taken from secular writings as an associate text we will refer to later and perhaps will weave it into that which we will have to say later.

It seems from this statement made by Christ that there were privileges granted unto those who were his followers that were not granted to those who did not know him, and this privilege that was granted unto them was of associating with God and corresponding with him, and because of this correspondence with him, they received from him that intelligence that made it possible for them to understand that which he was speaking without his speaking in parables. Those Pharisees were spoken to in parables or terms that were more easily understood by them, for had he spoken to them in spiritual terms they would not have understood him. When he spoke to the farmers and those in other walks in life, he spoke to them in terms that were more easily understood by them because they were in touch with the things mentioned. It is easier for us to understand now, in our day, the spiritual things if they are revealed to us in parables, or in terms that we understand. A great many of us understand those things better if they are told to us in that way.

We recognize that there is a force in man that is dynamic, that is a living, moving force in our lives. We are not going to attempt to analyze or tell what that force is or what it is composed of, but we recognize from what we know of our own bodies, and what we see in others, that there is a force in us that is dynamic in character, and that causes us to act, making it possible for us to talk, possible to hear, to see, to smell, and to taste. There is a force within us that makes it possible for us to understand. That force in us is recognized by everyone. We do not care whether he is a religious man or whether he is not, he must recognize that there is something within us that cannot be explained or analyzed, because it is unseen. That which it does, or that which it makes possible for us to do through our organisms in the flesh, is very plainly seen in us, and it is because of what our eyes see and what we experience ourselves that we know there is a force within us. Whatever it may be, it is true that it did not originate with us, nor did it have its birth with the flesh, because it does not depend upon the flesh for its existence. Men who understand the human organism and are able to dissect it, who are able to explain the function of each portion of it, recognize that there is something there unexplainable; something there that gives the organism life and power, gives it power to act in the different capacities which it does. We call that force a spirit; and that force, that influence that gives us action and makes us live, as we said before, did not originate with us, did not come into existence at the time the body was born, for the reason that it does not depend upon the body for its existence or life. Everything must seek its own environment in order to live. It must be left in its own environment in order for it to live.

There is a statement in the word of God made by one of old, wherein he says, "There is a spirit in man: and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding." The man who made that statement was in touch with the divine; he was in touch with the source of that dynamic force; he was in correspondence with that Spirit by which he was able to say, "There is a spirit in man: and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding."

We know how it is with the human body; it must be in touch with a physical environment, with that which will develop it and make it possible to exist. Divorce the human body from the environment around us and that body will cease to live because it has been divorced from that which it depends upon for its existence. The physical life which we enjoy in the flesh is determined and measured by our association or correspondence with the source of physical life. Divorce ourselves from the land where grow the necessary foods for the body; go to sea and be there a few days or a very short time without communication of any kind with a physical environment; the body will cease to live and it will die because it is no longer in touch with that environment that will give it life.

We think it is the same in the spiritual life, as we will recognize as we continue to consider what we have in mind this morning. We will leave that line of thought for just a moment. We are living in a day that is recognized by us as the greatest day of all ages, a day that was desired by those of old, a day that was prophesied of by the servants of God in days gone by and longed for by them. They desired to see the fulfillment of the things that we see now every day of our lives. They did not see it as we see it, they did not have the privilege of witnessing by physical sight what they prophesied of, but they saw, nevertheless, the development of the conditions that are now existing. They saw it through the spiritual sight, the spiritual eye that is developed in man when he is in touch with God, the source of the spiritual force that is within him.

Knowledge Shall Be Increased

It is a day (we are not going to dwell lengthily upon the developments of this age), but we know it is a day of great development and the things that have not been realized will be realized. We wonder when man will reach the zenith of his power. We wonder, when we think of what has taken place, if there is anything more to develop. We believe there is. There is a statement in the words of the Prophet Daniel, I think in the twelfth chapter. We are going to read a little in the fore part of that chapter before we read the fourth verse, so you will more readily understand what the prophet says in the fourth verse.

"And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: and at that time the people shall be delivered, everyone that shall be found written in the book. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament: and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever, and ever. But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words, and seal the book, even to the time of the end: many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased."

He is speaking here of a people whose names are written in a book. He is speaking of a time when there shall be brought forth those who have died, and some shall be raised to everlasting life and others to everlasting condemnation. He is speaking of the resurrection of two classes of people, one to life and one to death. The day to which he is referring, of which he is prophesying, is not the day that was known and on which many of the saints arose at the time Christ arose from the dead. It is not that day when those asleep in Christ arose with him and appeared unto many, but it is a day when not only the righteous but the unrighteous will awaken and live again in the environment that they sought for themselves while living in the flesh. Therefore it is a day that is before us. The prophet says it is to be a day or time when the righteous are going to be raised unto everlasting life and the unrighteous unto condemnation; when knowledge shall be increased and men shall run to and fro; when there shall be greater developments upon the earth than have ever been realized in the history of the world. The time of this development on the earth is in our day, that spoken of by him.

Darkness in the Midst of Light

We wish to branch out more fully upon the line of thought that we have in mind. It seems peculiar, strangely peculiar too, that in this day of great development and the consummation of all things—it is very, very strange that in this great day of enlightenment there should also be darkness, as well as ignorance, in the world among men concerning God and his plan of salvation. It is strange that in the day of great development and great understanding there should be that ignorance on the earth concerning God and his plan concerning man. How great would it be for man to realize the necessity of corresponding with God and also of that spiritual intelligence that leads man to that better way. But it is true, notwithstanding this day of enlightenment, there is also a spiritual darkness and ignorance concerning God and his plan.

There is a statement we are going to refer you to this morning in the 29th chapter of Isaiah and the 16th verse:

"Surely your turning of things upside down shall be esteemed as the potter's clay: for shall the work say of him that made it, He made me not? or shall the thing framed say of him that framed it, He had no understanding?"

This prophecy is concerning our day. He is referring to a day after the destruction of Jerusalem, after the dispersion of the Jews; a day after the spiritual darkness that was brought about by apostasy. It is a day after the light has been realized; after the light of heaven has again shone. It is a day when man shall say to him that made him, "He made me not," when man shall say of him that framed him, "He had no understanding." It is to be in that day when there is to be greater development than ever before—intelligence on one hand and gross ignorance on the other; but they should, instead of being so estranged from each other, go hand in hand—that development that we term physical development upon the earth with that spiritual intelligence that assists and directs the development of man. How is it that in this advanced day when there exists the intelligence that there does that there should exist that ignorance? Is it not because man has divorced himself from God and has failed to place himself in that condition that he might receive that intelligence from God? Even as the physical will die and will cease to have vitality that is necessary, through its divorcement from its environment, so will that living force of our beings fail to live and will die when divorced from God and the spiritual environment to which they belong. Why should we be from day to day so interested in the close relationship or correspondence with the physical environment and fail to recognize the necessity of that correspondence and association with God, the source of life, that we might also receive spiritual life and the comforts that we should receive as we do in the physical? They are alike in that if they are divorced they die.

Those who were saying of him that made them, "He made me not," were those who failed to correspond with the source of that dynamic force within them. They failed to recognize the laws by which they could attune themselves to him and to that intelligence that will direct the soul. Jesus says in John 14: 16, 17:

"And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever; even the spirit of truth; whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him; but ye know him; for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you."

Christ himself, who had been with God and who had been in the environment of spirituality, came into the environment of temporality. And because of Christ's realization of the necessity of it, he says, "I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever." He was in close correspondence with that source of life, with the Father of spirits, as Paul says, and he knew that if they should be divorced from that life, they would cease to live. That spirit of truth has not been received by those who said of him that made them, "He made me not." They are not in touch with him. They had been in touch with the physical and temporal so they were living and had health physically but they had failed to get in that close touch with God that is necessary for man in order that he receive enlightenment of the Spirit to the fullest extent, that which develops them and makes it possible for them to become acquainted with the learning that comes from correspondence with God.

Different Degrees of Intelligence

We do not wish you to understand us this morning to mean that all men who have not obeyed the gospel are in total darkness and have not received light, for all men have received some light. There are different degrees of intelligence or light in man; and as there is a spirit in man, it is evidence that that spirit does correspond with God, that great spiritual force. I say it is right that the spirit of man should receive some spiritual enlightenment, some spiritual light, that would bring him a little closer to the divine than he otherwise would be. It would be impossible for a spirit that was created by God, and that is immortal, incorruptible in nature—I say it would be impossible for that spirit to exist on the earth without having received some light. It must receive some intelligence, because it is an offspring of God, but that intelligence that evidences to us the existence of the eternal is not realized by all, notwithstanding some enlightenment has come to them.

Jesus says in John 1: 9: "That was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

He says that was the true light which enlightens every man who comes into the world. It makes no difference who he is, he receives some light.

I want to impress upon your minds this morning, young people, this thought: the necessity of not only receiving some spiritual vitality, or life, because of our spirits being the same as God's great Spirit, but I want to emphasize the necessity of that full correspondence and that full accord with God, and that spiritual environment that surrounds him, that we may live spiritually as completely as we do physically, and unless we do that, we fail to realize that which the Great Maker has in store for us and has made for us. Jesus says in the statement we have already referred to that the world cannot receive that knowledge of God, that he truly and really exists, and have that Spirit as an abiding comforter with it, because it knows him not, and it cannot know him with that intelligence couched within the philosophy of man. It is because they have not come in contact with that spirit of truth that attunes us to that spiritual source.

Jesus says in John 3:5 in speaking to Nicodemus: "Jesus answered, verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

Spiritual Birth

It is based upon a birth, a spiritual birth, and unless he experiences that spiritual birth, he cannot receive that spiritual truth and that intelligence by which he may say that God exists and "I know his plan is true." I am not going to tell you in detail what that birth is like this morning, but you know how it is with the physical birth; it is impossible for a child to see until it is born, and it is some time after its birth before it sees, and that sight gradually develops; and as he develops in body, he is able to know and notice what is around him. But before a realization of that physical birth, there must be a conception. That conception develops into a birth, and that which is born after a time sees and enjoys the physical life, according to the measure of its correspondence with its physical environment into which it has been born. It is very beautifully portrayed, as in the physical creation, that before we can see spiritually we must come in contact with God and be born spiritually. We wish we could drive it with such force into your minds and hearts that you would realize that we must be born again.

Spiritual birth comes in a very peculiar way to us. It comes to one in one way, and to another in another way, but, nevertheless, it comes to us and evidences to us the existence of God. We remember one time of baptizing a good sister in Indiana who was a good-living woman. She came to us after we had been there for some time and had been preaching for some weeks and asked for baptism. We baptized her on a beautiful Sunday, and when we assembled in the church for confirmation we told her that inasmuch as she would obey the law of God as she had started that day to obey him and his word, she would receive an unfoldment of that which was dark to her, that she would see as she had never before the truthfulness of God and the plan of his redemption. And she did receive a spiritual vision and she did see clearly as never before. We left there, thinking no more of what we had told her, and after an absence of some weeks we returned, and while talking with her, she said, "Do you know that that which was dark before seems plain? It is so good to be a Latter Day Saint." We said, "Sister, do you remember what we told you in your confirmation, that if you would keep yourself in touch with God there would come a time when there would be unfolded that which was dark to you?"

To us that was a spiritual birth. It may come to one in one way and to another in another way. It is like a flower: as it unfolds there comes a fragrance from it. The fragrance of that life that is in touch with the divine, which causes its unfoldment and reveals its beauty, is grand, and let me tell you when we place ourselves in touch with God, and when we realize it, we will never have the desire to retrace our steps. The joy and pleasure realized through correspondence with God in that spiritual environment is so grand and complete that those who experience it will not desire to go back to the physical environment only, and be divorced from the spiritual force that gives them that joy and eternal hope.

Spiritual Infanticide

Here is another thought—the possibility of our committing infanticide. We speak now of spiritual infanticide. While we may not recognize that we are committing spiritual infanticide, yet, it may be that in our lives some time or other we may be guilty of this. There are those in the world who have been guilty of infanticide physically, and because of it they have transgressed the laws of God as well as the laws of nature. We may be guilty of spiritual infanticide. There comes in the life of every man and woman a time when they feel the promptings of the Spirit of God; when that still small voice comes to them, to their spirits, to their souls, and discerned only by that individual to whom the Spirit speaketh, there comes that longing to get in closer correspondence with God. There is a conception made in their souls when God sends forth his Spirit to them.

Jesus says in John 6:4: "No man can come to me, except the Father which sent me draw him: and I will raise him up at the last day." When the Father stretches forth his hand, his Spirit, to the souls of individuals, and it is to draw, that is a conception in the souls of those individuals. When it knocks at the doors of our souls and we fail to realize the importance of it, and fail to nourish that which is conceived therein, and to develop it that it be born a new child, there closes that new life that is conceived in our souls and we are guilty of infanticide.

Let us emphasize that to you this morning, dear Saints. We may be guilty of it ourselves, we who are in the church, as well as those who are not; but let us, when that influence comes to us, try to develop that which is spiritually conceived that it be developed and in the course of time, as the spirit grows day by day, there be born a spiritual child, a new life, and that through that birth we may receive that which God has in store for us. Let us not be guilty of spiritual infanticide.

The Spiritual Condition of the Islanders

The associate text that we are going to use this morning says that "in the organism lies the principle of life; in the environment are the conditions of life." Just as there is in coal or wood or that which is used for fuel, the existence of the principles of life, and when they come in contact with fire they will ignite and cause heat; just as there exists in coal or fuel the principles that when brought in contact with fire will cause heat, so also we have in our lives the existence of the principles of life; and when there is established a spiritual environment to which they can unite themselves, they will bring forth development. We have in mind our brethren in the South Sea Islands. For years and years they have lived there. No one knows from whence they came. We have our ideas, we think this or think that. However, they have lived there for centuries. They did not know God. They worshiped idols made with their hands; they offered sacrifices of human flesh to appease the supposed hunger or wrath of their idols. They were ignorant of the plan whereby they could know God. Nevertheless, there were within them the principles of life. They were hidden from the view of others, but they were there, unrecognized by the natives themselves, and the only thing lacking was the proper environment that they might be unfolded into that life that is beautiful in ways and in nature. When the gospel went to them, they received it and obeyed it and established for themselves an environment that reflects the Spirit and is spreading to the other islands, so those who are not able to develop will have the privilege of this spiritual development. That which is lacking is the environment which will develop that which is hidden within the soul.

Let us endeavor to so develop within that that desire for correspondence with the divine may be felt, that in our community or precinct where we live, in the branch, or district in which we live, there may be, because of our righteous lives, an environment of spirituality that we may enjoy the fragrance of the spiritual life. If we come in contact with that force that is in the spiritual environment, we will be able to say that we know that God is true. It will not be as those who say of him that framed them, "He framed me not." We will be of that number and class, if we live so we come in correspondence with God, that we will be able to know the mysteries of God and be able to establish the environment in Zion, which we are all looking and longing for. To us it is given to know the mysteries of God. In the environment are the conditions of life.

We have stated that there is within us a dynamic force or power. Within us is a spiritual being which should be in correspondence with its source in order to enjoy life. We have tried to show you the great day in which we are living, in contrast with the spiritual intelligence that comes when we come in contact with that spiritual force. It is only in the unison of our lives with the divine that we can realize the spiritual as we do the physical.

So we trust that these thoughts may sink into our hearts, and wherever we go, whether it be near or far, that we will endeavor to establish spiritual environments, so the unfolding of that spiritual life may be made possible.

The Church or the World—Which?

BY S. K. SORENSEN

The third of a series of articles contrasting the joy of service with the emptiness of worldly pleasures.

"My brethren, ye cannot have the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, and yet have respect to persons. Now if there come unto your assembly a man with a gold ring, in goodly apparel, and there come in also a poor man in vile raiment, and ye have respect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and say unto him, Sit thou here in a good place; and say to the poor, Stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool; are ye not then in yourselves partial judges, and become evil in your thoughts? Hearken, my beloved brethren, Hath not God chosen the poor in this world rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him? But ye have despised the poor."—James.

It is evident from the foregoing that there were class distinctions at that time as well as there are now. The world is divided into cults and societies, from the high-brow down to the low-brow, in all avenues and conditions in life; but it is not the character value that forms the standard, but the golden dollar, regardless of character. Shall this be the standard in the church of the living God?

Shall we pattern after the world, or heed the foregoing teaching of the servant of the Lord? Shall we countenance and in honor prefer those who by speculation and questionable methods secure riches, rather than those who by hard but honest labor and toil secure the scant necessities of life?

Shall we draw a dividing line between those whom the Lord has favored with good foresight and business ability to secure wealth in an honest way and our poor brother who has not been so gifted in that particular line? Would that be just to our brother?

Shall we erect a barrier of social inequality between those who are able to wear good clothes and be well dressed and those who are not so able? Shall we? The Lord said: "One is your master, which is Christ; and all ye are brethren."

Would we erect such barriers and distinctions between brothers and sisters in the flesh? If not, how much less then, among those who are brothers and sisters in the Spirit of the living God, and heir and joint heir with Christ to celestial glory?

The Lord has repeatedly rebuked the church in all ages for such doing as recorded in Bible, Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants. Shall we continue along the same line and repeat the same mistakes as former generations and forfeit the favor and blessings of God?

James said as already quoted: "Ye cannot have the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, and yet have respect to persons." So our choice lies between the two, either not to enjoy the faith and the nature of the Lord Jesus Christ by the erection of those partition lines, or to refuse to erect such and to consider each other as brethren and sisters without rank or distinction, and to enjoy the sweet union of love through the one Spirit, by which also we were baptized into one body.

If we need an example to demonstrate the ungodliness of this, Nephi gives us one which shows us the disastrous result of such a procedure:

"And the people began to be distinguished by ranks, according to their riches, and their chances for learning; yea, some were ignorant because of their poverty, and others did receive great learning because of their riches; some were lifted up in pride, and others were exceeding humble; . . . and thus there became a great inequality in all the land, inasmuch that the church began to be broken up . . . in all the land, save it were among a few of the Lamanites, who were converted unto the true faith; . . . Now the cause of this iniquity of the people, was this: Satan had great power, unto the stirring up of the people to do all manner of iniquity, and to the puffing them up with pride, tempting them to seek for power, and authority, and riches, and the vain things of the world."—Nephi 3: 12-17.

Will history repeat itself? Will this condition ever be brought about in the true church of Christ in this dispensation? If not, let us beware of the condition which brought about the downfall of the church at that time.

I remember well the warnings of President Joseph Smith on different occasions, when he said that he did not fear that this people would ever fall for the same iniquity as the Utah people did; but he feared if they did fall that pride might be the cause. This is the substance if not the exact language.

"Hath not God chosen the poor in this world rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom?" If so, what about the rich and the proud? Would they not be willing to meet these poor on the other side on an equality? If so, why not here?

"Now therefore fear the Lord, and serve him in sincerity and in truth; . . . and if it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord, choose ye this day whom ye will serve; . . . but as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."—Joshua.

Having chosen to serve the Lord, Joshua said unto them:

"Now, therefore, put away said he the strange gods which are among you, and incline your heart unto the Lord God of Israel."

"Moreover, brethren, I would not that you should be ignorant, how that all our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea; and were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea; and did all eat the same spiritual meat; and did all drink of the same spiritual drink; for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them; and that Rock was Christ. But with many of them God was not well pleased; for they were overthrown in the wilderness. Now these things were our examples, to the intent we should not lust after evil things, as they also lusted. Neither be ye idolaters, as were some of them; as it is written. The people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play. Neither let us commit fornication, as some of them committed and fell in one day three and twenty thousand."—Paul.

The foregoing scripture is a brief outline of the condition of the church in the wilderness under Moses and Joshua. The Apostle Paul also informs us that the gospel was preached unto them, but the preaching did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it.

We thus learn that they had the gospel at that time as we have it now, and were baptized of the water and of the Spirit; they all drank the same spiritual drink. They received the ministration of the immediate presence of Christ who followed them, and yet they were rejected as a church and their bones left to bleach on the bleak and barren desert of the wilderness.

If this was an example to the church in the days of Paul ought it not also to be an example to the church now? God has not changed, he does not wink at and overlook sin any more now than he did then; why then should we risk our salvation in doing the things for which they were rejected?

The condition in the world at the present time is such that it requires the greatest degree of courage to draw the dividing line between the church and the world, so that while we of necessity must be in the world, yet we must not be contaminated by the sins thereof. This is especially true of the younger and coming generations, as things will evidently grow worse and worse in the world. The Lord has told the church by revelation that "the Devil shall have power over his own dominion: and also the Lord shall have power over his saints, and shall reign in their midst."

The time is now that we, like Israel of old, must make a choice, whom we will serve—Christ or the Devil, the church or the world. We cannot be serving Christ and be on the good side of the Devil at the same time. Our spiritual nature should have so developed under the tutorship of the spiritual forces in the church, that we shall have absolutely no desire to follow the world and its ways, which are evil; and we should also have developed that degree of discernment that we will know how to discriminate between that which is good in the world and the evil therein.

The Lord has said by his Prophet Jeremiah:

"I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and will be their God, and they shall be my people. And they shall teach no more every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying. Know ye the Lord: for they shall all know me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them."

That is to say that the nature of men shall have been so transformed under the influence of the gospel here that they will intuitively do the will of God without being told to do it; that they will then have just as much desire to do the will of God as they now have to do the will of the Devil. They will need no written code to go by, as that is for transgressors; when we live above the law, we have no need of the law. It is our duty as members of the body of Christ to work toward that condition, and until we reach it we are not what God wants us to be.

So long as I have a disposition to be dishonest in my work and do not perform faithful service for value received, I am stealing from my employer, and have need of the law, which says, "Thou shalt not steal"; but if I have no such disposition I have no need of the law. If I am inclined to refuse to pay my just debts, I am dishonest at heart, and need the law to correct me. If I am only honest when watched and for fear I am found out, I cannot be trusted and need the transforming influence of the divine nature to be implanted within me.

If I have immoral tendencies which are a part of my nature, my nature has not been changed, and I have need of the correcting influence of the law, which says: "Thou shalt not commit adultery," and, "Whosoever looketh upon a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her in his heart already. Behold, I give unto you a commandment, that ye suffer none of these things to enter into your heart, for it is better that ye should deny yourselves of these things, wherein ye will take up your cross, than that ye should be cast into hell." But if such inclination is not a part of my nature, I have no need for that law.

Whenever the time shall come that our natures shall have been so transformed in all things in which we now run counter to the law, then the law will have been fulfilled and served its purpose, and we will have no need for it; because a greater law is written in our inward parts and is a part of our being. God is reflected in our lives, his nature has become our nature, and Zion, the pure in heart, is redeemed from the curse of the carnal nature and the law.

"And Zion cannot be built up unless it is by the principles of the law of the celestial kingdom"; which law is the gospel law, the law of Christ, which must become ingrafted into our very souls and become a part of us; then we will have no need of anyone to teach us, "Know ye the Lord," for his nature will be a part of our nature, and this will be life eternal, as John the apostle says.

Now in conclusion let us ask ourselves the question, Which will I serve, the church or the world, God or the Devil? If our answer is anything like Israel's of old, we may then need to pay heed to the fatherly advice of Joshua:

"Now, therefore, put away the strange gods which are among you and incline your heart unto the Lord God of Israel."

(Concluded.)

Love's Cost

We hear much of the sweetness of love, of the joy of living, but it has another side also, and that is why it is forever the antithesis of selfishness—love costs. "Every love that enters the heart opens the door to sorrow." No pain can touch the one dear to us and we not suffer also; no danger can threaten and our heart not keep anxious watch. Every cloud that darkens that other sky throws its shadow across our sunlight. Every sin that stains the beloved soul, hurts and aches in ours as if it were our own—aye, worse! for our own sins may we cast aside and seek pardon, but who can repent for his brother?

Love's pain lies in its powerlessness. To long to bring relief and to be unable to suffer with, because we cannot suffer for, to watch from without the battle we cannot help to fight, and to share every heartache, disappointment, and loss—this is the cost of loving. But only so does our human life grow deep, and take on worth and dignity. Only so can we ever be akin to him who bore "our griefs, and carried our sorrows," who, "having loved his own which were in the world, loved them"—through all their blundering, their blindness, their sins—"unto the end."—The Wellspring.

The Iowa State Federation of Women's Clubs is selling a very convenient little booklet for the general information of women regarding civic officials and their duties, the school system, the court system, etc., of Iowa. All these are told briefly and in lesson form, and should be of great value to the woman who does not have the time to study the subject thoroughly. Especially with the coming election at hand and the necessity for an intelligent conception of the voting responsibility, this should be invaluable. Some of the women's classes in the Lamoni Sunday school are spending a few weeks on the subject. The booklet can be had for 35 cents by ordering of Mrs. W. H. McHenry, chairman, 2901 Rutland Avenue, Des Moines, Iowa. If interested, ask for such campaign literature as they have on hand, their supply usually including some from each of the two greater parties.

A SURVEY OF FARM LIFE

A survey conducted by Miss Florence E. Ward, for the United States Agricultural Department, in thirty-three States of the Union, among farmers' wives, would show that 32 per cent have running water; power machinery, 22 per cent; water in the kitchen, 48 per cent; sink and drain, 60 per cent; washing machines, 57 per cent; carpet sweepers, 47 per cent; sewing machines, 95 per cent; screened doors and windows, 96 per cent; outdoor toilet, 90 per cent; bathtub, 20 per cent.

The above would indicate a shortage of running water, indoor toilets, and bathtubs, and only about half had either washing machines or carpet sweepers, and water in the kitchen.

As to women having vacations, about 13 per cent have eleven and five tenths days on an average. Of work other than housework done by them, 25 per cent help with the live stock; 24 per cent help in the field on an average of six or seven weeks per year; 56 per cent care for the garden; 32 per cent help in keeping up the farm; 30 per cent keep the home accounts. Chickens average 90 to a farm. There are no flocks of children, as the average is only 1.18 children under ten years of age, and .89 from ten to sixteen. In other words, they average only two children under sixteen years of age. The average is about a sixth less in the East, and one sixth more in the West. The farms average 64.4 acres in the East; 175 acres in the central section, and in the West 227 acres. The average farm is one and a half miles from a school. Each farm has 6.77 cows. The average high school averages six miles away, the church a little less than three miles, but the hospitals average nearly fourteen miles away, and the family doctor about six miles. But this is helped by the fact that 62 per cent of the farms have automobiles. Iowa ranks highest with the largest percentage of cars.

THE CHURCHES AND INDUSTRY

As showing the trend of the times it is of interest to note that the Labor Sunday Message of the Commission of the Church and Social Service of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America is devoted principally to democracy and industry, the practical forms of collective bargaining, and the application of democratic principles to shop organization. They discuss the operation of industrial concerns such as the Leitch plan, the Filene plan, and the British scheme of shop councils, known as the Whitley plan.

It also notes the protest among a certain class of employers to the church attempting to consider the question of capital and labor. According to the view of some employers no one is competent to discuss or consider the relation between the workingman and his employer and society or the public, except the employer.

No one who studies the situation can be blind to the many unlawful acts committed in the name of labor, nor to the extreme selfishness which has at times dominated its interest. And the same is also true of that which has been done on behalf of capital. But back of it all there is the very real deep problem which neither side has as yet succeeded in solving.

The Labor Sunday Message for 1920 points out the cost of strikes to the workers and to the employers, and the need of cooperation. It is suggested that the methods so far used have been labor unions for collective bargaining and mutual shop organizations of the workers in individual plants or series of plants, for as in England, both are worked together as not being inconsistent. The church must stand for the right of organization and collective bargaining. In this it is supported by the Industrial Council, called by the president in his report of March 6, 1920, and also by the platforms of each of the two great political parties. The National Association of Manufacturers in the platform for American industry, adopted on May 18, 1920, also recognized it as a relative right ending where injury to the public begins. The church, according to this report, must be strong enough to attack the evils in the labor movement, and to resist the pressure from unprincipled employers, either of which should stop the church from moving forward.

Beyond this, it is urged that something deeper needs to be considered, namely, the moral principles upon which the church is to be conducted, in other words, a new economic code. There is needed education. There is needed the practical application of the Golden Rule, and the substitution of a better interrelation than that on which our industrial life has heretofore been founded, as this basis is declared to be both wrong and unchristian.

The workers must be considered first as human beings with families and children, and must be helped to self-expression. Instead of this they have been treated merely as parts of a huge machine.

The Golden Rule applied to a factory would mean, first, that the management and men shall work out some effective and sincere form of organization, mutually satisfactory, which will give the men recognition of their manhood, self-protection, and self-expression. It means, secondly, the largest and just possible return for the work done by the workers, and an adequate share in increased production. In the third place, it means new human relationship between the management and the workingman. The Golden Rule would require the same spirit and cooperation from the men.

The above is a brief summary of the report, which concludes as follows:

Profits or Service?

The Christian principle takes one step further, and leads to the primary motive of industry. Is the motive of profits, which is the primary motive of modern enterprise, a Christian motive, and ought it not to be supplanted by, or rigidly subordinated to, Christ's great motive of service? Here is a world of people, human beings with eternal destinies. They have great needs, material and spiritual; they have to feed, clothe, house, transport, educate, and recreate themselves and their families, and to develop the Godlike within them. That is the real meaning of agriculture, railroading, manufacturing, education, and religion. Everybody, therefore, who has any part in these processes has a sacred calling and ought to work with the same motive and spirit as the true minister and missionary who minister to the religious needs of men.

Now, working exclusively or mainly for profits corrupts men, as working for a salary corrupts a preacher. It tends to make them selfish and grasping. The temptation is irresistible, unless one has himself well in hand, to make quick profits and big profits, and, if possible, by manipulation or speculation rather than by production. In a western State there is a whirlwind of speculation in land which has driven up values and is forcing ambitious young farmers out of the State to regions where values are more reasonable. The virus of profiteering passes naturally into the employees of factories and they use the weapons of sabotage, the strike, and personal intimidation to get all they can.

The commercial spirit, so called, can be escaped only as men consciously work to produce from the motive of service. Once again the object of industry, if Christian, is to meet great human needs, to lift the level of the life of all, to make it possible for the largest number to have the best possible chance at life. All who work that way, work in a Christian atmosphere, which is elevating and inspiring and which brings out the best that is in them. It will have the same effect upon the total personnel of a factory.

Faith in Christian Principles

The problem the Nation is facing in the present industrial conflict is difficult and world-wide, but is susceptible of solution. What is needed is faith in God, in Christian principles, and in the fairness of employers and workers as a whole. Those extremists who turn to violence and those reactionaries who trust in force are the joint enemies of the public welfare, and of religion and of morality. But the men and women of faith and good will, who believe in the Golden Rule, who are determined to use whatever power they have to work out a better industrial organization, based upon the principles of the Sermon on the Mount—they are the hope of the Nation.

And here it is that the church comes into its own and has its opportunity. How great is that opportunity is shown by the following paragraphs of a letter from the labor manager of a large industry:

"I participated in a thorough attempt of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States to direct the industrial evolution through which we are now passing and discovered there how impossible it is for the employers themselves to meet the situation.

"I also had occasion to study thoroughly and participate somewhat in the work of the President's second industrial conference and to see how little could really be done by the Government in these matters. Indeed, the report of the conference reflects the difficulties and looks in the direction of voluntary arrangements in each industry.

"There seems to be left the power of the church as a means for educating men's minds, their motives, and interests to the necessities of the present situation. The change of viewpoint must be so great in most cases as to require the aid of some powerful influence outside of the business motives. Herein lies your opportunity, not only to supplement the work of organized business and the Government in the direction of an orderly evolution of industrial relations, but actually to propose new plans and policies based upon fundamental principles."

Here is a challenge to enter a newly opened door to service. The church cannot do less than to accept it, in all humility, but with the courage born of conscious obedience to its Lord.

PAUL'S PLAN FOR CHRISTIAN UNITY

A study of Paul's plan for Christian unity should be prefaced by a study of his teaching on Christian liberty and loyalty, because the three are closely associated and interdependent upon each other. A correct understanding and application of the loyalty and liberty of Christian worship is, therefore, essential to the unity of the same. These three must be studied and kept together, otherwise their scriptural use and meaning will be missed. The Catholic Church has unity without liberty, and the Protestant church has liberty without unity; but the apostolic church had unity with liberty, which is Christian unity.

Unity and liberty were inseparably connected in the New Testament church, and the connecting link between the two was loyalty. Liberty, loyalty, and unity constitute the scriptural trinity, the three in one, of the New Testament church; or, in other words, Christian unity cannot be without the broadest liberty that loyalty will permit; nor is any one of the three truly Christian without the other two. However, whenever it is necessary to choose between the three, loyalty to Christ must always be placed before unity and liberty.

Paul often had to choose between liberty and loyalty, and he always chose the latter. Luther was offered unity without liberty within the Catholic Church at the sacrifice of loyalty; and he chose the latter by nailing up his theses and burning the papal decree at the gates of Wittenberg, thereby laying the foundation of his great Reformation upon loyalty and liberty; however, in doing so, liberty was overemphasized and unity was lost. The overemphasis of liberty soon led to divisions, which have continued to multiply from that day to this. Luther solved the problem of loyalty and liberty, but was unable to solve the problem of unity, which has come down to us an unsolved problem. . . .

However, the pendulum has begun to swing back toward unity. The churches have at last realized the evils of division, and are seeking the way to unity. The denominations, which a few years ago were the pride and glory of Christians, have few apologists to-day, while many eloquent tongues and pens in every denomination are pleading for unity with all God's people, and the whole church seems to be possessed with a passion to return to "the one fold and one shepherd." This widespread desire for unity has found its way even into the seclusive and exclusive Roman Church, which for centuries has dwelt behind its high "wall of partition"; but to-day there has arisen the Modernist Movement in the Catholic Church, that seems to be trying to find its way into the great common fold of Christ. . . .

In fact, the prevailing feeling to-day toward unity is more than a desire; it is a necessity. In view of the greatness and the urgency of the world's need to-day, and the greatness of the task to supply this need, the church must unite, or fail in its mission to the world. The supplying of the world's temporal and spiritual needs to-day is too big a task for a divided church, just as it was too big a task during the great World War. When that great, world-wide conflagration of suffering and death broke out in the world, men and women turned to the church saying: "Where is the church? Cannot the church prevent this awful war?" And some began to ask: "Has the church failed?" Yes, the church did fail—failed because of its division. A united church could doubtless have prevented this war. Furthermore, as the war progressed, with its awful suffering and untold deaths, suffering and dying humanity again turned to the church, saying: "Can't you feed us? Can't you bind up our wounds? Can't you pour in the oil of consolation and salvation in the hour of our death?" And again, on account of division, the church had to sit helpless and unable to respond to this world call, while such institutions as the Y. M. C. A., the Red Cross, the Knights of Columbus, the Salvation Army, etc., did this work that the church of Christ was organized to do. If there have ever been tears shed in heaven, undoubtedly they were shed then, when Jesus Christ looked down upon this starving, bleeding, dying world crying for help, and his church, weakened and incapacitated through division, unable to respond to these needs. But you say: "The above institutions that did this work are Christian institutions." That is true; but they are not the church, and the church as an institution had to sit idly by, while the world suffered and died, because it was too big a task for a divided church. While the war has passed, the need for a united church is no less now than during the war, because the church to-day is confronted by other world tasks and problems that are too big for a divided church. The war brought the nations of the earth together in a common cause, and bound their welfare and destiny together in such a way that the world to-day is one, and the tasks and problems that confront us to-day are world problems and tasks. National seclusiveness is a thing of the past. Nothing short of a united League of Nations can meet and solve the governmental problems and tasks of the future, and nothing short of a united church can meet and solve the religious problems and tasks of the future. Wherefore, the time has come when the churches must unite. It is not a time to preach Christian unity, but to practice it.

But is Christian unity possible? Surely Christ would not have prayed for an impossibility, nor would he have declared, "There shall be one fold and one shepherd," if such were impossible; and Paul declares: "I can do all things in him that strengtheneth me." What people can do depends largely on the impelling motive behind the deed. With a sufficient motive, Christian unity is not only possible, but highly probable. The strongest motive power of which men and women are capable, says Paul, is love, which he sets forth as the only influence sufficient to effect and maintain Christian unity. "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or anguish, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Even as it is written:

"For thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are counted as sheep for the slaughter."—The Reverend John B. Cowden, Nashville, Tennessee, Christian Union Quarterly.

RAILROAD TO JERUSALEM

"In the tumult of the war the opening of a broadgauge railway which the British had built from Cairo to Jerusalem had passed almost unnoticed, but it was one of the great improvements which Allenby's army left behind it, in its way one of the greatest events which, next to the opening of the Suez Canal, the Near East had known in modern times. It was possible now to enter a sleeping car at Cairo any evening at dinner time and to reach a little hillside station below the Bethlehem road, which was the terminus of the Jerusalem line, at 4 o'clock the next afternoon. In former times the overland route from Ismalia to Jerusalem, via El Arish and Gaza, took three weeks and was not only expensive but dangerous. Starting from Kantara, on the Suez Canal, where the line connects with the road from Cairo, it skirts the sea to Gaza, the gateway to Palestine. South of Gaza it branches off, one line going to Jerusalem via Beersheba, the other hugging the coast.

"One could not contemplate this road and the difficulties which had beset its construction without acquiring a changed vision of what army organization means. In the historic wastes of the Sinai desert had been formed huge camps, covering miles and laid out in perfect order, with fine roads, thorough and complete sanitary arrangements, plentiful and good food, and all other necessities for a huge army. All this had been set up in a wilderness into which two years before only the most intrepid traveler ever ventured. Now an endless stream of motor lorries, Red Cross vans, equipment vans, camels, soldiers, Arabs, Bedouins, Egyptians, and motor cycles had moved across the land. Water, which two years before was nowhere to be had, was now to be had everywhere. Wet and dry canteens were so numerous that one could buy almost anything anywhere in the desert. At night a sky of stars, and a moon above fields of sand looked down on the wonders which the British army had wrought in that distant corner of the world. Under the Turk it had lain dormant for centuries and would have continued to lie dormant for centuries more."—History of the World War, vol. 8, pp. 234, 235.

ONE FORM OF COOPERATION

The California Fruit Growers Exchange took, twenty-five years ago, a vital step, in eliminating the local buyer, doing its own shipping, and selling directly to wholesale interests. The exchange handles all fruit on behalf of the California fruit growers, and acts for them as a united body.

Mr. G. H. Powell, the general manager, suggests as a requirement for cooperation, first, fundamental necessity. He says if there is no fundamental necessity, individuals will not keep in line. The necessity in this case, is distance from the market.

We might state that differently and say that for real cooperation there must be some service done by the cooperative body. It must not be simply a tying together. They must do that collectively which cannot be done so well singly.

For a second requirement he gives, participants who think along similar lines, and men above the usual ability. In other words, men of such intelligence that they possess the ability to curb their individuality for the common good, which in the end is their own good.

He suggests as a third requirement, that members should be in the same class, as all producers. If it consists of growers, buyers, and speculators, the interests are not identical. He defines a cooperative organization as, "One in which the members form an agency, through which they work out their common problems, at cost, and without profit to the agency, the benefits going to the members in proportion to the business transacted by each, receiving the same per unit per each, irrespective of the volume contributed."

He suggests as a fourth requirement, securing men to handle the business capable of doing so, and able in keen competition to compete with well-financed business interests. Such a man must have the confidence of the producer. Confidence is the very corner stone of a cooperative organization. Confidence in the integrity and fair dealing of the fellow members, but above all, the confidence of all members in the equitable operation of the management.

Mr. Powell continues that business efficiency is not enough. There must be added the ability to reach down and touch the spiritual side of the organization members. There must be something of a religion of cooperation. By that, he means an enthusiasm, that is not based alone on dollars and cents, but includes a deep pride in what the organization stands for including dealing with other associates; hence a desire to maintain quality. But deeper than that, confidence in the equitable operation of the management.

He adds to this, that the board of directors meeting is open to any member, who can see what is being done and how. Business efficiency in an organized way, however, must not be lost sight of.

Mr. Powell adds, "Cooperation is no royal road to quick profits and perfect marketing. It is a slow process. There is no short cut to that goal; nor can anybody presume to outline any but the most fundamental principles underlying the successful operation of the system. But it has its own special and peculiar problems which must be met by special measures."

In the case of this California Cooperative Movement, the members did a business of $55,000,000 last year. The cost which includes salaries in the home office, maintenance of sales agents all over the country, and in some foreign countries, daily market news, and all other details, amounted to 4.26 cents a box; national advertising and trade promotion 2.5 cents a box for oranges, 4 cents a box for lemons; operating of district exchanges, salaries, etc., however, amounted to 94 cents a box, or about 1.07 per cent of selling price.

A few years ago, the percentage beyond the local warehouse was 5.51 per cent. Last year it was 1.52 per cent.

Where a capital is necessary for the purchasing of supplies, etc., a borrowing fund is established. The stockholders pay a specified amount a box annually. When the contribution is made the same amount of the older stock issued is purchased. The grower therefore contributes annually on the basis of his previous year's shipment, and receives a return on the shipments of five or more years previously.

The Visit of the Magi

BY J. W. PETERSON

With what tenacity and persistency many people cling to their old traditions. How hard it seems for them to let go of their early training. Even when later discoveries impel us to do so, it is hard to adjust one's faith to new discoveries.

From youth we have believed that three wise men visited Jesus the night of his birth, being guided all the way from the east by a star. We have pictured the shepherds scarcely returned to their flocks, when the wise men arrive, and they scarcely gone, before Joseph starts the same night with Mary and Jesus for Egypt, Jesus being but a few hours old. Art, literature, and pulpit have encouraged that thought. Some borrowed art so pictured that first Christmas scene on our own magazine!

If I could believe as I pleased, I would prefer not to have my youthful ideas disturbed; but, alas, we must unlearn many things.

Ben Hur's story of the Christ, though beautiful and fascinating, is lacking in truth. The description of men and events he pictures are so real that the child mind at once believes the story, only to unlearn the lesson in later years.

Many works of fiction have this great fault. They are either not true to principle or not true to life, and disappointment must follow.

The names of the wise men were neither Gaspar, Melchior, or Belthasar. Neither is there any evidence that there were only three. When they visited Jesus he was more than forty days old, and perhaps near two years. It is also doubtful that they were guided by a star to Jerusalem, and quite certain they were not of different countries. Let us examine the proof.

Dismissing Ben Hur as a work of fiction, we turn to Matthew and Luke for the only authentic account, and more especially in the Inspired Version.

Jesus was born in a stable, and later laid in a manger, but when the wise men visited him, they found him in a house. (Matthew 2:11.) This at once weakens the thought that they visited him the night of his birth. Though he was born in a stable, they found him in a house.

It is altogether probable, under normal conditions, neither Mary nor Jesus were removed from the place of his birth for some days.

The Star in the East

It is generally believed that the star guided the wise men to Jerusalem. Why to Jerusalem? Jesus was not there. The text nowhere indicates that the star went before them only from Jerusalem to Bethlehem. Why should they inquire at Jerusalem: "Where is the child that is born the Messiah of the Jews?" if the star were guiding them? There would be no need to inquire at all. The only thing necessary was to follow the star. Their statement, "We have seen his star in the east," does not indicate that they saw it all the way, or that it was then shining. The further statement when they left Jerusalem: "And lo, the star which they saw in the east went before them," lends no aid to that theory either. In fact the statement still further in the account well-nigh wrecks that belief. "When they saw the star they rejoiced with exceeding great joy." Why should they so rejoice to see the star after departing from Jerusalem more than before, if it guided them all the way? The evident meaning is that they saw the star in the east, and now rejoiced to see it again.

Why Did the Star Appear in the East?

Why did the star appear at all? Was it not to indicate the birth of the Messiah? The wise men so understood it. Did it appear several days or months too soon, or at the exact time? Evidently the latter. The event of his birth no doubt occurred before they left their native land, else it was not a sign of his birth. Otherwise it was no more than a guide.

The age of Jesus must therefore be measured by the time it required them to journey from the east to Bethlehem. If they came from the far east, as seems probable, it may have required many months to make the journey. This is probable, for Matthew would doubtless have mentioned the name of any near-by country with which he was acquainted.

Of One Country

It is quite probable they, whether three or a dozen, were of one country. The text indicates that "they departed into their own country," not countries.

The Flight into Egypt

When the wise men departed for their own country, an angel appeared to Joseph and bade him "arise and take the young child and his mother and flee into Egypt." So he arose that night and departed into Egypt. (Verses 13, 14.)

From Bethlehem to Egypt was several hundred miles. To go and "remain" for some time, until the death of Herod, and then return, would require weeks and probably months. But Luke says: "When the days of her purification, according to the law of Moses, were accomplished, they brought him to Jerusalem, to present him to the Lord." (Luke 2:22.)

According to the law of Moses here cited (Leviticus 12), the days of purification were forty. It was at this time that Simeon and Anna prophesied concerning him. They could not have gone into Egypt and returned to Jerusalem within forty days, and besides Herod was not yet dead, nor did he die for some years after. Therefore, Jesus was yet in Egypt. The holy family must therefore have gone up to Jerusalem before their flight into Egypt. Jesus must have been more than forty days old when the wise men visited him, and possibly considerably older than that, for Jesus and his parents returned to Nazareth from the presentation in the temple before referred to. Luke says: "And when they had performed all things according to the law of the Lord, they returned into Galilee to their own city, Nazareth." That was the most natural thing in the world to do. They only came to Bethlehem to be taxed. Naturally they would remain there till the days of Mary's purification were accomplished, and, as Jesus must then be presented in the temple, it was natural that they should perform that duty before leaving that part of the country.

It was also natural that they should return home for their goods, and later come back to their new-found friends and perhaps a wider outlook for Joseph's trade. Here the wise men found them in a house. At that time the angel that appeared to Joseph called Jesus a young child, but the angels who appeared to the shepherds called him a babe. Why this difference unless he were some older at the time of the second angel visitation? By this time both Jesus and Mary were strong enough to endure the journey into Egypt. We doubt their being able to do so the night of his birth.

Two Years Old and Under

Why did Herod command children two years old to be slain, if Jesus was but two days old? And why did Herod gauge the time by the visit of the wise men, or what they had told him? The text says: "From two years old and under according to the time which he had diligently inquired of the wise men." (Matthew 2:16.)

One of two things is therefore apparent: Either two years

THE SEMINAR

True Aristocracy

Address by S. A. Burgess, opening day of Graceland College at Lamoni, Iowa, Friday, September 17, 1920.

Mr. President, Members of the Board of Trustees, and Members of the Graceland Faculty: I think that you are indeed to be congratulated upon this occasion. When we remember that Graceland College is starting her twenty-sixth year and that turning back the pages of time twenty-five years ago she was just opening her doors for the first time, and think what she was then, we can readily find cause for joy.

If memory serves me right this building was only in process of construction and the college was opened down town in a few rooms of the France Block, with few students, and naturally fewer faculty. In the last five years, if we speak only of material assets, Graceland has multiplied two or four times in financial worth, and I think that we are safe in saying that in that period she has at least doubled her influence. She has finished her course of probation, we trust, that she had to follow for some years through the danger of financial shoals and opposition, and has now reached the high seas of universal approval.

At this time in the church there is a recognition of the necessity of her work, a widespread desire for greater knowledge, not only on the part of our young people, but on the part of those older in years.

The college has taken a position that even a few years ago seemed almost beyond possibility. These who planned may deserve some credit, but certainly those of us who have served before can only rejoice with an exceeding great joy, that upon the former foundation so excellent an edifice is being constructed.

Congratulation is due to the town of Lamoni, to the church, and to Graceland College, because of the establishment of the junior college, and in the way it has been built up through the efforts of the dean of the college, Doctor F. M. McDowell, and its president, George N. Briggs. Also while in the past we had secured credit for work well done, to-day, thanks to the efforts of President Briggs, the work of Graceland College is recognized every place in the world.

We are thankful to know that the boys and girls who have been trained here have gone out and made good with hardly an exception. When they have gone to other institutions, the worth of what they have gained here was recognized, even when other colleges refused to recognize their credits. But to-day we do not have to go in an open window or back door to enter another college or university, for we can walk up straight to the front door with our Graceland credits, and be admitted the equal of any.

I think we ought to be congratulated on that and I think that you who have come here this morning should rejoice that you live in this age of the world. What, in this time of turmoil? Yes, because there never has been a period in all the the wise men were making their journey, or Herod did not learn that they had "mocked" him for two years after they had left. We have seen how soon Joseph was commanded to "flee" after the wise men left. There was no reason for haste if there was yet two years' time. The former apparent fact is probably therefore true. Jesus was about two years old when visited by the wise men.

This is only apparent, but that he was more than forty days old is certain. All texts harmonize with this theory.

history of the world when human progress was as rapid as it is to-day. Never a time when there was as great a need for thinkers, for the problems of humanity and the world, and to help the church to meet the crisis.

An Aristocracy of Service

It is a tremendous prospect that rests before you. An aristocracy you are called to be; not an aristocracy of money, not an aristocracy of power, not an aristocracy of ambition, but in the fundamental sense—the aristocracy of service.

Have you ever considered the word educate? It comes from the same Latin root as dux, a leader. Educate is to lead out or unfold our natural talents, but to the end that those who are educated may be leaders. Would you be kings and queens? The privilege is yours. What is a king after all, but the man who knows, from kennen, to know. The king is a man that knows. He may be surrounded with a number of leaders or dukes, but he is the man that knows the way in which the nation should walk.

Moses stated in the Bible the criterion more clearly than we will find it from any other source, when he informed Israel that they were called to be a nation of kings and of priests unto God. I know some will say, (you have heard it said,) that the true priest is the God-anointed king. It is true that the true priest is a leader, in the sense that the glory of God is intelligence and the man of God should know.

But we prefer, rather, the other way of stating it, and that is that the true king and leader is God's anointed priest. Because as the Master said, "Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister. And whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant; even as the Son of Man came, not to be ministered unto, but to minister; and to give his life a ransom for many." (Matthew 20: 26-28.) The true priest is the one who day and night is at the service of the people and there is the true leader or king. He knows, and knowing chooses that which is best, not only for himself, but for humanity, and especially for his neighbor and people. It is an obligation of service, to minister.

After all, we cannot make any more a real division between real leadership and real education and knowledge in the divine sense of the term than we can make a division between the natural knowledge and religion. All truth is one. Man, in his stupidity, has attempted to make a division but has made rather a poor job of it, which has resulted only in his own confusion. It is not enough that you can hear and open your eyes and ears to have that something, called a brain, filled. You must be able to digest and use what you receive.

Somebody has suggested that there are two classes of ignorant people. There are those who do not know, and there are those who know but do not think. You may think that there can hardly be the latter class, but we find them upon every hand. They take a book and memorize. They memorize their lessons line by line, word by word. They try to memorize the rules, then come up for examination. Six months after it is over, how much do they know? Given them to review, they can get up and deliver a lecture by simply giving back exactly what is found in some book. But they have not digested what they have read.

They can solve a problem in the book by using the arbitrary principles there set forth, but have not so thoroughly mastered their work here in school that they are able to go out and meeting any new problem solve it. We cannot expect to find our answers to all our present problems in books. Books must always be from one to five years behind our time. For we are living in an age of rapid development of knowledge. But we may find there and should the fundamental principles by which our present problems may be met and answered.

Animal Psychology—Trial and Error

Man differs from the animal creation in that he is able to reason. Thorndyke, Hamilton, Watson, and others have performed numerous experiments with animals and report that an animal will in time solve a puzzle, as, how to get out of a maze. Of course when he gets out once he may be able to get out again and more quickly. But if a dog happens to be standing on his head the first time he gets out, he will assume the same position every time he tries to get out. A bird, or a squirrel will do the same thing. However grotesque the position that happens to be assumed, they must get into that same position to solve it again.

Unfortunately there are some human beings whose minds work on exactly the same plane. They think they have to do all the same things again to get the answer.

Recently an instance came under our personal observation. A girl was in the habit of bringing home her algebra problems to solve. Those with whom she was staying at the time tried to teach her to think about the problems—to work out the reason for her procedure, and how they were solved, instead of simply trying to memorize the rule, and apply it without understanding it. One evening, using this method, a very simple method was discovered for solving all the problems assigned that evening. When she went to the class the next day, very few had managed to work out the assignment. She reported that she had. The teacher asked for her paper, and then exclaimed, "You haven't worked these problems. No one living could possibly do them that way." As a rule she was very backward, but for some reason on this occasion she had enough spunk to answer, "Well, I can, and I did. You give me another problem and I will show you." She was sent to the board, and he gave her problem after problem, difficult and more difficult, and as fast as he assigned them she solved them, until at last he replied, "Oh, well, that isn't the way to do them anyhow!"

That is one trying aspect sometimes in early school work. Not how to learn a lesson, or how to work a problem, but how to get it in the shape to satisfy a teacher, who insists that everyone shall stand upon his head for the reason that as he understands the book that is the method. Now as a rule the book is right, but not always. As a rule, the teacher is right, and is much more likely to be right than is any individual student. Of course, the teacher ought to know more than you do, or he wouldn't be placed where he is to teach you. But he may not. It would be a pity if there were not some things you knew better than anyone else. But don't get unduly conceited on that account. After all what the world wants, what the school wants, and what you want is to learn how to stand on your feet and think for yourself.

An animal always proceeds on what Galton first called the method of trial and error, but which doubtless is better designated as the method of trial and accidental success. Many human beings proceed on the same method, and keep trying and trying until they happen to hit on the solution. We have noted a high-school boy or girl attacking a problem in mathematics by that method. It is a very wearing and trying method we can assure you.

Reason

Of course, the higher method of reasoning, would be to sit down and study your problem. Know what you are going to do and why, before you move. Don't waste time trying anything and everything. Yet even college graduates will sometimes do that.

I remember a class in psychiatry, in other words insanity. It was held in an insane asylum. No, the class were not inmates, though you may have your suspicions about it before we get through. We were there for the purpose of observing the various abnormal types and their reactions.

Among other things the lecturer brought forward some puzzles by which they tested the intelligence of the inmates. These were passed down the line and several of the class looked at them, and passed them on, looking wise. But the young man right in front of me took one of the puzzles and started to try to fit it together. He picked up a round piece and tried to put it in a square hole, an elliptical hole, a crescent, a cross, and so forth. By the time he had been working around twenty minutes the class noticed and laughed. To be in the fifteen-year-old class he should have solved it in five minutes. Think of such lack of intelligence in a college graduate! Here is a round piece. Naturally it goes in a round hole; the square piece in the square hole; the new moon fits into the crescent, etc. When we left there he was still studying for his doctorate. Where he is now, I do not know.

It is this faculty which distinguishes man from the animals, that he can sit down and think and thus solve his problems. If he does not, how does he differ?

It is a fact that if you have the ability to do so, you can take your schoolbook and go through it and having its aim or purpose clearly in mind, you will be able to evaluate readily. The course may take you eighteen to twenty weeks to study, but the essentials, the underlying principles, that you want to remember may be quickly summarized and told in half an hour. Nor is that an easy way to learn it. It rather means that you have made the subject yours. To repeat the principles without understanding would be no gain.

Memory is a great thing. But if you try to remember the whole list of facts you may not have time in an examination or in practical life to find the one you want. But if you are able to get down to fundamentals, to the root of things, then if you don't remember you can soon work it out.

That is true of any subject. If you can remember the essential principles, you can write out the answer; and the essential principles can usually be stated in half an hour.

Even equity and real estate which are among the most difficult subjects in the study of law, as presenting the largest number of details, can be summarized in less than an hour so as to state all that is essential to remember to pass an examination. Of course the passing of an examination is of very minor importance itself, and the facts cannot be mastered in that time. But when the subject is mastered and thoroughly mastered the essentials can be thus summarized.

Far, far more important than the passing of an examination is the fact that having thus mastered and thoroughly assimilated the subject the student is then ready to apply it to any new problem which may arise. We do not want the law of the land applied without modification, in all of its details in the judiciary, the legislative, and executive work of the church, but we do want the essence of the law, the essential principles of justice fully there manifested. We do want in all of these studies to possess the roots from which they grow; the basic principles by which we can proceed to solve the problems of the world.

One young man who is here to-day has a splendid ambition. He wishes to complete his course here in the academy and junior college, and then go to one of the best universities in America to study law, with the idea of becoming an international lawyer. Many books have been written from Grotius down, but it would seem quite certain the international law of the future will not be fully determined by these texts. It is quite probable that only a very small part of his course of study will be given over to international law. But that will help him in his future work. It is true that the international law of the future will hardly be founded on either the common law of England, or the civil law of the Latin nations. But it will be based on the great underlying principles of law in all nations, and especially in what is called the law of nature—that out of which grew equity.

Yet if that young man simply undertakes to memorize a list of rules and cases, he will make a failure. But if he studies the law to get the essential principles, he will have made a good start, whether in the end he practices in the courts of his State, or in the international court of nations.

It is probable that all the objections made against education without exception are because of those who swallow what they learn without digesting it. In the lower grades the teachers spend most of their time trying to plant a lot of facts in the mind of the child; but in college and university our primary work is to consider the value of facts, and their relation to life.

As you go into the world you will be confronted with that supposed great difference between science and religion. But what is the difference? Both belong to the realm of truth. Concerning Darwin, we must distinguish as we must also with others between his facts and the theories that he founds on those facts. In his observation he was usually careful. His facts are usually correct, so far as they go. But we are not bound to accept his theories. Rather should we continue to learn, observe, and think, and formulate our own theories as we go along. And that theory of ours should be modified as we increase in knowledge.

It is said of Darwin that if a man came to him with a fact which would upset his theory, he was ready to reply, "That is just what I want," and he meant it. His aim was to learn the truth, and anyone who could show where he was wrong deserved and received his thanks. That should be our attitude to-day. He wrote over sixty years ago; the world has progressed since then. But the true scientific attitude is still that of the Apostle Paul, "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good."

Time prevents that we attempt to discuss further the theories of Darwin or other evolutionists. It is our attitude towards our problems, our orientation, which is now of most importance. But we will suggest this: Do not let anyone tell you that you have studied your Bible too much, or the Book of Mormon too much. We have not found anyone who has done that, though we have found some people who have studied other books too little. It is doubtful if five per cent of us have studied the Bible as carefully as we should. When we do, most of the adverse criticism will melt away, as not being founded on fact. It is not necessary that we believe everything we read or hear, for our heavenly Father has given us intelligence to the end that we should face our problems, consider them, and solve them.

But we must remember it isn't the steamboat with the biggest whistle necessarily, that will travel the farthest, or accomplish the most work. Nor is it the donkey that can sing the best, that is the most valuable. Like other animals he may like to hear his own voice. It is easy to make an argument; it is much more difficult to reason. It is easier to talk than think; that is why so many talk without thinking.

The Lord has invited us, "Come let us reason together." And I think we can safely speak for the faculty when we say, they would like nothing better than to have some one discuss intelligently the problems before the class. It is interesting to find a new viewpoint. It is interesting to watch and help one who is inclined to think. Those who a few years ago were students here are now on the faculty. These new students in a few years must take up at least a share of the burden in college and church.

The time is soon coming when you must be among those who give. But you cannot give what you do not get. And what you get depends on yourself. In a university the true teacher is not a dictator, but a leader. Each student has his or her special problems to consider by way of research.

The class under the leadership of the teacher discusses the results. But before you begin your research, it is necessary first to lay a sufficiently broad basis of facts, to have studied sufficiently to be prepared to evaluate what you may discover.

The Church Needs

In the church there is a crying need for those who can and will think. We talk of Zion, stewardships, inheritance, and of our economic plans, and we continue to talk. It may be that the problems now before us will be solved before your time comes. But do not let that disturb you, for if some of these problems now are solved, there are going to be plenty more for you after you have laid your foundation. It is true that they cannot be solved by referring to your book on sociology or textbook on psychology. But it is also true that they will be solved by those who have mastered the principles of sociology, of economics, of psychology, and the other subjects which you may study here.

Some will say, Well, as to Zion, we must wait until the Lord speaks. He will tell us what we must do. But you will find here in the Doctrine and Covenants, (9:3) that he bestowed a gift on Oliver Cowdery, and then took it from him because he did not use it. The Lord told him that he should have studied it out in his mind. "Then ye must ask me if it be right, and if it is right, I will cause your bosom to burn within you."

So should we to-day study out our problems in our own minds. We should learn by the mistakes of other men. We should lay a basis for our reading. We should use all the intelligence, reason, and knowledge that God has given us, and then lay the matter before the Lord, and he will help us. He will open our eyes to see, and our ears to hear, and our understanding, that we may solve the problems of Zion, and the kingdom of God may be established.

Let us reason together. The prospect is before you. What shall be its end? There is before you the prospect of monetary reward. Those who are trained exceed many times the untrained in remuneration. The probability of worldly success is greatly increased by the fact that you spend a few years here. You are repaid many fold for every hour spent here. But is your aim to be, What can I get out of it? or is to be the true aristocracy of service?

You have the privilege of learning. There is laid upon you then the duty of service, that the ablest may be called forth. That those who are strongest, those who have departed the farthest from the brute, those who have become most man, those who are the nearest to becoming the sons and daughters of God may give themselves to the help of suffering humanity.

To them belongs the responsibility for preparedness and leadership. To them God will speak for the solution of the problems before the church, and the world.

May then all the forces that evolution can possibly bring to bear be manifested in your growing intelligence. Be not content to stand at sixty or seventy per cent of your efficiency, but realize that conversion and religion are necessary for the fulfillment of your powers. You are below your possibilities until touched with the divine fire.

Then study, as strength and ability is given, but also on bended knee seek during this period of preparation, day by day, and night by night, divine wisdom to the end that you may be promoted among those who are called of God to minister to his people, mankind wherever found.

The year 1919 was one of peace, yet many small wars were going on throughout the world. This year should have found many of them settled and done; in fact, the present year is one of less war than 1919. Yet seventeen wars are in progress to-day, actually or officially.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

Self-Reliance

I began this subject with the question: "Can we have too much self-reliance?" Undoubtedly, yes. We are warned continually as Latter Day Saints to be humble, and continually to keep before us our dependence on God for all things.

Yet God will not do for us what we can do for ourselves, and it is through this desire to make the most of our talents that we shall develop ourselves physically, mentally, and spiritually. To make a success of this life for this world or the next, I believe we absolutely need self-reliance.

How we pity those parents who have to stand behind their children and shove them along all through life. With what contempt do we regard those who are contented to be thus assisted when they come to the years of what should be dependable self-reliance. Even in the animal world this characteristic is admired. The mother bird brings her fledgling to the edge of the nest, and flying to a little distance, tries to lure it into using its wings. Naturalists who have taken time to observe the feathered world and the animal world, have told us of this being almost universally practiced, and of the joy of the parents when they behold their young becoming able to help themselves. Even in our gardens or barnyards most of us have seen the mother hen lead forth her clucking brood and teach them to scratch, and the mother duck is frequently seen to push her flock one by one into the river when they were slow to make the venture themselves. By a close observer of the habits of ants, we are told that when the young ants reach a certain age, if they do not sally forth and look after themselves, they are allowed by the others to starve.

But to my mind the word self-reliance is a broad one, and covers more than merely getting a living out of this world by our own efforts. I like to think of it as being a state of mind which brings us more or less satisfaction in living from day to day. Self-reliance implies to me a certain amount of self-confidence, without which we cannot be contented or enjoy serenity of mind, neither do justice to our work, either at home or abroad.

If a great many people are hindered from arriving at the highest possible goal of achievement, by "thinking more highly of themselves than they ought to think," to use the words of Paul, undoubtedly there are many, many others who go to the other extreme and attempt nothing worthy of note because they esteem themselves of no account.

We need to ask ourselves, "What am I? Where did I come from? What am I here for? Whither am I going?"

When we test our value by the sacrifice that Christ thought it joy to make for us, and by the wonderful provision that he made on earth for man, and the blessings of Divine Providence poured out on us from day to day, we are wronging God and ourselves by placing too low an estimate on our powers.

Whoever forgets his relationship to God, employs his power on petty things, and ignoring eternity lives only for time, holds himself at too low a price, counting his worth at less than God holds him. When God treats us as immortal beings and we are contented to be reckoned as earthborn and a citizen of this world only, we are robbing ourselves and him. We may gain dollars yet lose life's greatest fortune. We may get a living yet fail to achieve true manhood and womanhood.

Deep in the human soul great things lie, craving utterance, and we crush them by our low aims, or by tampering with sinful pleasures. We can be great and good. Look at our bodies with their strength and flexibility, at our brains with memory, imagination, and reasoning faculties, at our souls with their yearning after noble things. Are we not well equipped by our heavenly Father for the voyage over the sea of life?

There are vacant places farther on and higher up, beckoning us to fill them if we will but prepare ourselves. If we degrade ourselves by forgetting that we are the sons and daughters of God, and that we shall live to all eternity, punishment must come to us sooner or later.

It has been said: "Determined adherence to a plan brings consciousness of power which makes manhood." It might be said that it also creates self-reliance. We must not give way helplessly to temperament, or to circumstances, and allow ourselves to drift wherever the mind bears us. It is thus we become victims at times to despondency which robs us of our reliance both upon God and ourselves. We must keep a goal before us in our own minds, and ever walk toward it with uplifted faces, with steadiness of purpose, as far as possible with serenity of mind. We shall find the latter only as we learn to look up from day to day to something which is far above and beyond the passing events of daily life.

The routine of our daily life, whatever our daily work may be, is not to be despised by us. Rather should we seek to master the smallest detail of it and by faithful performance of it make it a means to an end.

If we have reliance in God and reliance in ourselves developed sufficiently to achieve this coveted serenity of mind, we should not worry. We are told that worry is the greatest disease of the age. All worry is really fear, which becomes chronic, fear so well established that it becomes a habit. If we had the right state of mind as we are privileged to have it, we would steadily do our best and leave the problem of the future with God. A beautiful poem expresses this to my mind, called "Unto the desired haven":

"What matter how the winds may blow?
Or blow they east or blow they west?
What reck I how the tides may flow,
Since ebb or calm alike is best?
No summer calm, no winter gale
Impedes or drives me from my way.
While still I toward the haven sail
Which lies perhaps not far away.

"I mind the weary days of old
When motionless I seemed to lie
The nights awake when fierce billows rolled
And changed my course—I knew not why
I feared the calm—I feared the gale,
Foreboding danger and delay,
Forgetting I was thus to sail
To reach what seemed so far away.

"I measure not the loss and fret—
Which through those years of doubt I bore;
I hold their memory fresh, and yet
Would hold God's patient mercy more.
What wrecks have passed me in the gale,
What ships gone down on summer day,
While I with furled or spreading sail
Stood for the haven far away.

"What matter how the winds may blow?
Or blow they east or blow they west?
God holds me in his hand I know
And I may leave to him the rest,
Assured that neither calm nor gale
Can bring me danger or delay.
I steadfast toward the haven sail
Which lies, I know, not far away."

The Onset Reunion

Onset is a nice little town near Buzzards Bay, Cape Cod, Massachusetts. The reunion grounds are about fifteen minutes' walk from the town and are owned by the district. The Saints have erected about thirty cottages on the grounds. These are comfortably furnished and are occupied occasionally on holidays and of course at reunions, and some stay in them until school starts. There were about thirty tents also erected. Many said this was the best reunion in every way the district has ever had. It was good to see so many of the young people of the district present. They "all" seemed to be there.

Brother Griffiths was at his best and handled the reunion with skill and kept everybody in a good humor. I shall not go into a detailed account of who were present, etc., but shall mention some special stunts, etc., which helped to contribute to the success of the gathering.

The committee has discovered that athletics is a large feature in satisfying the requirements of the young. A couple of acres (so it looked to some of the batters when they tried to knock home runs) has been set aside for an athletic field. Bishop Fisher had it put in as good shape as possible for this year and it was appreciated by the campers.

There is a fine lake of salt water partially inclosed by the grounds and here bathing is a superdelight. A big new raft was in evidence, to the joy of everybody.

The children were looked after by Sister Ross and Mabel Harris. Institute work, Women's Department, etc., was under the supervision of Sister Lucie Sears. The boys were under the care of John Sheehy. Herbert Johnson and Arthur Koehler with assistants made the grounds ring with sweet music.

After the evening service we had games and the Graphic Arts Bureau was in evidence. Part of the time we had three cartoonists on the grounds, but the larger share of the work was done by Doctor Sinclair, of Boston, whose skilled pen and alert mind contributed much to the success of the evening's exercises.

These cartoons were drawn on glass slides with ink especially made for the purpose which can be obtained in any color from the Standard Slide Corporation, 209 West 48th Street, New York, at twenty-five cents a bottle.

In connection with the cartoons we had a number of the oldtime songs, "Nellie Gray," "Old Black Joe," etc., winding up with a hymn thrown upon the screen. Brother Griffiths also gave us his lectures on the Society Islands, Australia, and Palestine.

The Attleboro young people reproduced a play they gave in their branch, boosting the Christmas offering.

One evening we had the "Ten virgins" acted out in a beautiful manner by the young sisters from the camp. This was followed by the same sisters with tableaux of "Deborah's song of triumph" and "The fall of Babylon." Being given out in the open, red fire was used very effectively.

We had one evening "Visiting the branches in the district." Each branch emphasized something characteristic of the place. Verses were sung to some popular tunes. For instance, Boston had these verses, sung to the tune of "Smiles."

There are beans we get in Boston,
There are beans we get in camp,
There are beans we get in the store tent,
That are called by men, the old "Van Camp."
There are beans that give us indigestion
And from eating them we must refrain,
But the beans that you can get in Boston
Are the beans that have won the fame.

The prayer meetings were highly spiritual, the outward gifts were frequently exercised while the less noticeable gifts were there and a blessing to the meetings.

The 1920 Onset reunion was a large gathering of happy

Saints of latter days who are trying to serve the Lord in the beauty of holiness.

C. EDWARD MILLER,
For Press Committee.

Arkansas Reunion

The first reunion of the Arkansas District, at Bald Knob, Arkansas, has passed into history. Considering the disadvantages that had to be labored under we had a good reunion. The preaching was of high order, the prayer meetings all spiritual. The greatest blessing enjoyed was that Brother F. O. White, judge of White County, was ordained to the office of elder. We believe he will be of great use to the church as he is well known and well thought of by everybody who knows him.

We had with us Apostle W. M. Aylor and he indeed gave us some fine sermons which will never be forgotten by the citizens of Bald Knob. Other speakers who occupied were Elders J. T. Riley and E. A. Erwin of the missionary force, A. E. Ziegenhorn, president of the district, H. M. Daniels of Jonesboro, Arkansas, Charles Hardy of Fisher, Arkansas, and George Davis of Thayer, Missouri.

At the close of the reunion a vote was taken to hold another next year, the time and place being left to the president of district. Elder J. T. Riley is following up the reunion with a series of meetings in the grove where the reunion was held.

IDA EMDE.

DAVENPORT, IOWA, September 18, 1920.

Editors Herald: We peruse the pages of the HERALD, anxious to learn concerning other branches and the progress of the work in general, and the thought occurred to the writer that there may be some who would be interested to hear from this part of the vineyard for it has been some time since Davenport Branch contributed any news to your valuable paper.

The work is onward and the indications for success are bright and encouraging. During the past five years while your correspondent presided over the branch we saw the completion of the church edifice, and the growth of the branch to a good degree. This year the work is presided over by our able and worthy Brother Milo Burnett. Our branch numbers nearly a hundred members. Recently the branch president baptized four, and the writer also administered the rite of baptism to four in Davenport, and two in Muscatine, and we have reason to believe they have their "faces toward Zion."

We are now making preparations for a series of preaching services by our district president, Amos Berve. At the present time the priesthood is distributing tracts in the vicinity of the church, using the angel message series. From the observation and experience of the writer, he is inclined to believe that a number of outsiders will avail themselves of the opportunity to attend the services, as some of the homes that I have gone into to introduce our message have manifested a deep interest.

Because of the large number of Utah elders and their adherents in this city, combined with their active efforts, the writer has felt the necessity of a thorough study into the leading questions at issue between the two churches, and has had a number of opportunities to meet these elders and canvass the differences. The efforts that they have put forth to advertise their work challenges us to redouble our efforts for a greater publicity to "Let your light shine."

During the past three months I have been lecturing on different occasions on the differences between the two churches, and our attendance at the services and the interest in the subjects has been very encouraging. Commencing this month, the president of the Rock Island Branch has invited the writer to deliver a series of lectures, at least two lectures a month, on the subject, "Mormonism exposed," in their chapel in Rock Island, and we hope to be able to get a favorable hearing and clearly to set forth the difference between our church and the Utah church, which we have evidence persists in telling the various homes they visit that both churches are the same.

MISCELLANEOUS

Conference Notices

Eastern Iowa, at Clinton, October 22, 23, and 24. Committees will meet all incoming trains Friday and Saturday. Evening services will be "missionary" in their character, and a series of services will follow the conference. Don't forget our slogan, and come enthused with the missionary spirit. Amos Berve, president.

Nauvoo, at Nauvoo, Illinois, October 22, 23, and 24. W. H. Gunn, secretary, 3014 Seneca Street, Fort Madison, Illinois.

Utah District, with Malad, Idaho, Branch October 15, 16, and 17. An excellent program has been arranged, featuring education, health, and social work. Conferences have been provided for the priesthood, Sunday school, Religio, and Women's Department. We hope that the members of the district will not fail to avail themselves of this opportunity. M. A. Etzenhouser, president.

Northern Wisconsin, with Black River Falls Branch October 23 and 24. We hope to have a report from each branch, also a report from each one holding the priesthood. All come and have a good time. A. L. Witeaker, president.

Far West Stake, Cameron, October 9 and 10. A large attendance anticipated and a good program of preaching and other exercises. R. S. Salyards, president.

Northwestern Ohio, October 30 and 31, at Toledo. Large gathering and spiritual feast expected. Everyone come. All branches bring songbooks. Previous to conference a series of meetings will be held by District President Jessie Hardin. October 17 will be rally day. Bring lunch baskets and spend the day. Brother Hardin will be with us and begin his series of meetings at 2.30 p. m. Strangers take Dorr Street car and get off at Waverly Avenue. Church is half a block from Dorr Street. Local president is W. S. Hettrick, Bell phone Forest 1430.

Southeastern Illinois, at Tunnel Hill, October 29, 30, 31. All branches requested to send in statistical report to district clerk at least one week before conference. W. E. Presnell, clerk, Xenia, Illinois.

Little Sioux, at Logan, October 9 and 10. Mrs. C. S. Van Eaton, secretary, Pisgah, Iowa.

The Presidency

The appointment of Elder Thomas Newton has been changed from Missionary to the Virginias to Local and confined to the West Virginia District, of which he has been made president.

NEWS AND COMMENT

CHURCH NEWS

The local papers speak very highly of the Pisgah, Iowa, Fair, and of Brother C. B. Woodstock's work, bringing it to such a successful issue. It is also reported that the consolidated school at Pisgah is to be discussed as representing other schools in the Country Gentleman. It is of six schools in six different States so selected. Brother Woodstock is superintendent of the Pisgah consolidated schools.

The Women's Department of the Latter Day Saint Church will hold a school of instruction for women voters at the church Wednesday afternoon, September 29, at 2.30. All women voters are invited. Miss Dora Young will conduct the class. A lecture will be given followed by a regular demonstration.—Holden Progress.

The Des Moines District aims to be in the front ranks in education. There are eleven young people attending institutions of learning away from home. Seven are in Graceland College, two at the Sanitarium, and four attending other colleges because the special work they offer is not now offered by Graceland. Also in several branches, our people are leaders in education, on the school board, faculty, and parent-teacher associations.

A letter from President Frederick M. Smith intimates that he will probably be abroad longer than first intended. There is much requiring his attention, and it appears better to attend to it now, rather than to have to go again. The address and a dollar and a half to S. G. Russell, Lamoni, Iowa, care Graceland College, and they will send you every two weeks for the school year The Graceland College Bulletin, a school newspaper published by the students, depicting the scholastic, social, athletic, and church activities at Graceland.

Addresses

Elder J. B. Wildermuth, 2068 Forest Street, Denver, Colorado.

Elder C. W. Clark, formerly of 58 East Blake Avenue, has moved to 115 East Maynard Avenue, Columbus, Ohio.

TRAVELING PUBLICITY AGENT

It is quite as important that the Saints shall read the church papers and church books as that they shall go to church, and it is a good missionary work to awaken them to their duty in this regard. The Publicity Department in following out its policy of placing the church papers and church books in every church home, have employed a traveling publicity agent who will go from branch to branch stimulating the Saints to action along the lines mentioned.

Brother Charles E. Blair

well known to many in the church will have this work in charge and the branch officers are asked to facilitate his work by cooperation.

GENERAL PUBLICITY DEPARTMENT

Approved by First Presidency

whole question of foreign missionary work in Europe and the Near East is at issue. He expresses the hope, that as a result of the work done by Apostle T. W. Williams and himself, the work in South Wales and South England may receive a new impetus, and be energetically and successfully pushed. They are attending the Birmingham district conference the last of September, and the Manchester and Sheffield district conferences in October. After that the work on the continent will be taken up and considered, he expecting to visit Switzerland and Germany in November.

The following list of names constitutes the enrollment of the class in religious education at Graceland College this year. We are sure the Saints will be glad to get this information.

- Cheville, Roy, Rhodes, Iowa.

We note an unusually fine exhibition of willingness to do as well as say something for the cause of Christ in recent numbers of Zion's Ensign. Brother E. Stafford, who has in the past made similar offers, says he will send the Ensign free for a short time to nonmembers who will agree to read it, if the names and addresses are sent to him at Independence. Already a goodly number of names are coming in, and he hopes they will continue to arrive. Look around and see if there are nonmembers of your acquaintance who would appreciate the Ensign and help Brother Stafford with his commendable missionary plan.

Sister Audentia Anderson is in Lamoni on business connected with the publishing of the new Year Book of the Women's Department, to be issued from the Herald Office plant.

Doctor G. Leonard Harrington was in Lamoni between trains recently in connection with the serious illness of Ardis, daughter of Brother and Sister Hubert Case, who is suffering from a severe attack of typhoid fever.

Marlette, Michigan, reports an excellent all-day meeting on September 19. A good spirit prevailed and two gifts of prophecy were manifested. V. D. Schaar, S. G. St. John, and W. H. Sheffer were the speakers.

Elder E. E. Long intends to meet Apostle Gomer T. Griffiths in Omaha the first of October, and visit and organize the Indians in Nebraska. He will also labor with the Indians at Pine Ridge Reservation in Bennett County. Some of them already are desiring baptism.

In the debate with Elder E. E. Long on Book of Mormon propositions, Robert R. Hull of the church of Christ, Campbellite, spent the first two nights in repeating the argument of Clark Braden in the Braden-Kelley debate. Not satisfied with the result, he then shifted to the Solomon Spalding Romance, and talked for the remaining six nights on that proposition with no better success.

A twelve-pound son has arrived at the home of Brother and Sister G. R. Wells. Sunday school workers will understand any possible delay in answering of correspondence.

FROM THE BRANCHES

Lamoni, Iowa. An excellent sacrament meeting was held on the 3d, with very large attendance and a high attainment of spiritual intelligence manifested, with the gift of prophecy in evidence. The women of the community met in the afternoon at the church in charge of Mrs. I. A. Monroe, organizer in charge of the Women's Department in the stake, and were addressed by J. F. Garver, Audentia Anderson, and Max Carmichael on the problems before the women for immediate solution. As a result of the meeting, plans were matured for the organization of the town by wards, with a friendly visitor for each of four wards. This will be done progressively.

WILL HISTORY REPEAT ITSELF?

“And Moses spake unto all the congregation of the children of Israel, saying, This is the thing which the Lord commanded, saying, Take ye from among you an offering unto the Lord; whosoever is of a willing heart, let him bring it, an offering of the Lord. . . . And Moses called Bezaleel and Aholiab, and every wise-hearted man, in whose heart the Lord had put wisdom, even every one whose heart stirred him up to come unto the work to do it; and they received of Moses all the offerings which the children of Israel had brought for the service of the sanctuary, to make it withal. And they brought yet unto him free offerings every morning. And all the wise men, that wrought all the work of the sanctuary, came every man from his work, which they made; and they spake unto Moses, saying, The people bring much more than enough for the service of the work, which the Lord commanded to make. And Moses gave commandment and they caused it to be proclaimed throughout the camp, saying, Let neither man nor woman make any more work for the offering of the sanctuary. So the people were restrained from bringing, for the stuff they had was sufficient for all the work to make it, and too much.”—Exodus 35, 36.

While the building that we are called to erect is neither a temple nor a sanctuary, and the command for its building was issued by the vote of General Conference rather than by the voice of God, yet the essential principles of the offerings that must build it are the same. The voice of the church as expressed in the General Conference must be respected, and it is the carrying out of the wishes of the church that prompts this big effort to raise the funds with which to build. As in the days of Israel, the gifts must be free offerings and from willing hearts. It is not enough to read those stirring Bible accounts of great sacrifice and faith on the part of the people. If we would claim spiritual kinship, we must emulate their example in these good works. A fair standard has been set up. Will we measure up to it?

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 17TH, WILL BE CONSECRATION DAY

The sermons in every pulpit of our church will call your attention to your duty in the campaign just opening, and you will be asked to examine your affairs and to get ready to make some consecration for Zion.

The General Conference Auditorium

Before you read the contents of this number, look over these final suggestions.

WE HAVE BEEN preparing for the past month for the drive for the General Conference auditorium. Now with this week's issue, the time is at our very door—not only to think, but to do. How much can we do? How much are we willing to do?

The general church officers are all working for the success of this effort. The Presidency and Twelve are sending to the missionaries and to the local men a request that services be turned over for this two weeks for that special purpose; that local committees be appointed, and that the work be taken up in a systematized way. No doubt this has been done, and all these men appointed are working upon it. What are we willing to do?

The first consideration is doubtless our tithing. We should pay our debts before we are generous. Tithing is needed to send missionaries abroad, in this country, and beyond the seas; to carry on the regular work of the church.

As indicated by the President at the last General Conference, and as seen by all there present, a church auditorium is a special need. The Bishopric indicated it would have to be raised outside of regular receipts of tithes and offerings. Will we give what we can, or less? Or will we go a little farther and really deny ourselves and make a sacrifice, to make a success of this effort? The money need not all be paid at one time. Arrangements may be made for deferred payments. But we do not want in our generosity to sign for more than we can afford. Yet there is no use doing like many drives in other organizations—talking of sacrifice, when we are giving less than the cost of the upkeep of our automobile for a month, or perhaps only a week. Let us not talk of sacrifice unless it involves some real self-denial.

We know there are many who are denying themselves, and will deny themselves to make this effort a success. But the question is now up to each of us to cast a practical vote to show how much we think the General Conference needs such a building. If you have not attended General Conference, ask those who have gone as your delegates.

We must remember that a dollar apiece will not begin to do it; it will take much more than that. Also we must remember that a large part of the church membership is scattered and cannot be counted in the estimate.

There are some to whom the widow's mite will mean a self-denial; a very few to whom a dollar will mean a liberal donation. This means that the rest of us must think in terms of, How much more than a hundred dollars can I give, or how many times a hundred dollars can I give? A few should ask themselves how many thousand.

Do not put it off, but as you read this HERALD, face the issue squarely with yourself and decide what you are ready to do.

The Philosophy of the Gathering

By Elbert A. Smith

"Zion is a magnet. Its greatest appeal is righteousness and truth. Every heart that responds to that appeal is drawn."

The doctrine of the gathering (if we may call it a doctrine) has played an important part in our teachings and in our history. What is back of it? Why do the Saints wish to gather? One may answer that God has commanded it, and to some minds that is sufficient. But back of every commandment there are reasons. Moreover, the reasons for most of the Lord's commandments are to be found in human nature and human necessity. What then is there in human nature and human necessity that prompts the gathering?

I. The Desire for Safety and for Peace

There are several factors, some of which we will note, first of all being the perfectly normal and natural desire for safety and peace. When men are young, it is true they may adventure forth in search of danger and combat. But that passes. The normal adult mind craves safety and peace, for the very good reason that there can be no orderly, constructive development of either the individual or the community excepting under conditions of safety and peace.

Jesus very clearly outlined world conditions that should precede his coming; wars, rumors of wars, pestilence, famine, fear, violence, and, significant words, "distresses of nations with perplexity." (See Matthew 24; Luke 21.) And when he had finished, he said, "Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man."—Luke 21: 36.

Escape how? Escape where? These are significant questions. So far as we are aware no other church has attempted to answer them. Yet Jesus suggests them. In modern revelation we have the answer: Escape to Zion. And we are told that it shall be "a land of peace, a city of refuge, a place of safety for the Saints of the most high God."—Doctrine and Covenants 45: 12.

To be sure there is such a thing as ignoble fear, or cowardice, which is contemptible. If the Saints were to flee to Zion for no other reason than that they were frightened and wished physical safety, they would not be worthy of Zion. Even so, we contend that it is perfectly natural and normal for them to desire safety and peace for themselves, for their friends, and more particularly for their loved ones. That desire remains a factor to be considered with others perhaps more important. The Lord himself suggests the "city of refuge," the "land of peace," the place "of safety." He is responsible for the suggestion, and makes it knowing well human desires and needs.

When San Francisco was devastated by fire and earthquake, had it been known that a certain area would escape, in all probability every man, woman, and child in the city would have directed his or her footsteps toward that place of refuge. That would have been natural and not at all reprehensible. What more natural, then, that in the midst of the confusion, calamity, anarchy, and violence coming on the earth the minds and hearts of the Saints should turn toward the place of safety and peace appointed by the Lord for all who desire escape and are worthy of it?

There is another consideration. The escape may not be altogether physical. In all probability as time goes on there will occur more and more violent struggles in which the Saints of God cannot take part conscientiously for the reason that they cannot approve the cause or the methods of either side; nor can they remain and escape taking part, but must choose between taking up the sword on one side or the other or fleeing to Zion.

This has been illustrated in a small way in more than one conflict already occurring between capital and labor. A certain brother in the West was a member of a labor union. A strike was called. Some of the men continued work. Committees were appointed to wait upon them. The meetings occurred mostly in the dark in secluded places. Two men would hold the right arm of the recalcitrant member in a horizontal position. A third would break the arm with a piece of gas pipe. The man thus "labored" with would then consent to refrain from work until the strike was ended. The brother mentioned could not countenance such methods or have part in them.

On the other hand there is seldom a strike called that capital does not import hired thugs and assassins, professional strike-breakers, to assault and murder striking union men. It is war. Our sympathy may be with labor. Our sympathy is with labor. But can we have part on either side conscientiously as the struggle becomes more violent and ruthless and the methods more questionable?

Furthermore, the gathering contemplates escape from iniquity in various forms, as will be seen later; and under the term, safety and peace, many things are contemplated that are vital to an orderly development of righteousness, justice, equality—in a word, salvation.

II. The Desire for Fellowship

There is in the physical realm the law of attraction and affinity that draws particles of matter together. Drummond sought to trace natural law in the spiritual world—or its analogy. Jesus recognized the same principle. He says that light cleaveth unto light, darkness cleaveth unto darkness, intelligence unto intelligence. The rule of like to like is embodied in the old proverb, very homely and very true, "Birds of a feather will flock together."

The law of cohesion is a very powerful physical law, as it operates in certain substances. It binds together the atoms of matter in a steel bar so that they cannot be broken apart under the trip hammer. In the spiritual world the law of spiritual attraction and cohesion binds together the church of God so that it cannot be broken apart by external persecution or pressure, but only by internal dissension when foreign elements or forces enter in.

Man is naturally gregarious. He may find benefit in seclusion in mountain or desert for a brief period; but always his footsteps turn back to his fellows—the social instinct triumphs. Solitary confinement is the most terrible punishment ever devised. When one is so unfortunate as to be born blind, deaf, and dumb, like Helen Keller, she still finds a way to break through her prison bars and commune with her fellows.

This natural, normal desire for fellowship is vastly strengthened in any group where there is a community of ideals and ideas, especially if they are powerful and stimulating ideals. So we have the fellowship of patriots among men who are of one nation and serve one flag, that sometimes rouses a consuming flame of devotion to common interests. There is the fellowship of Masons and the fellowship of Odd Fellows. And there is the fellowship of Republicans, Democrats, Socialists. There is even the fellowship of thieves—not that we would class political parties with thieves even if all parties do number many of them. But the greatest fellowship is religious fellowship; for religion is the most ancient and powerful influence that has ever dominated the lives of men. It is the spiritual law that draws devoted men of one religious conviction together.

There is a most significant statement concerning the Saints at Pentecost: "They were all with one accord in one place." (Acts 1:1.) Pregnant words! All with one accord in one place! What was the power that drew them together? Did they come in obedience to a king's edict, as when they came up to pay taxes when Jesus was born? No; they obeyed a more powerful impulse that often made them disobedient to the king's edict, so that when they could not meet elsewhere they met in the tombs among the dead—that they might be together—in one place with one accord, like Enoch's band, "of one heart and one mind."

That powerful impulse is not dead. Because of it our fathers gave up home, lands, friends, popularity, life itself to follow the church. Their sons and grandsons and great-grandsons feel its thrill and will continue to do so as long as men and women are found here and there who love the pure gospel of Jesus Christ.

We have a community of ideas and ideals. These ideals and ideas may mean nothing to the world—to us they mean everything. Our fathers died for them. The very highest honor that we can hope for is to live for them. They are all gathered up under that word, surcharged with divine meaning and human enthusiasm, Zion. It is perfectly natural for the Saints to wish to be together.

III. The Desire to Render Our Program Effective

We have a program that cannot be carried out by isolated Saints; one here, one there. It is a program calling for co-operation as one of its basic principles. There must be unity, solidarity. Jesus makes this very plain: "Except ye are one, ye are not mine."

There is another very old and humble proverb: "In union there is strength." Abraham Lincoln knew that the States working each for itself could never carry out the ideals had in mind by the fathers when they drafted the Constitution. So he made the union his paramount issue and fought his war on that basis. Neither can the Saints carry out our age-old ideals, each working for himself, and all scattered abroad here and there as the gospel found them.

A single strand of wire is easily broken. One hundred or one thousand strands are as easily broken if taken one at a time. But a thousand strands of wire twisted into a cable cannot be broken. God wants a cable. A chain is only as strong as its weakest link—but a cable has all the strength of all its strands—and where one strand may be weak others may have an extra strength.

If it were possible to do so, you might take a bucket of water from Lake Erie and empty it into the Mississippi River, and another into the Missouri, one into the Saint Lawrence, one into the Pacific, and one into the Atlantic, until you had drained Lake Erie, and you would never develop any power. But when all the waters of Lake Erie are gathered up and poured through one channel over Niagara Falls, power is developed to turn the wheels of a thousand factories.

Standing by that great cataract very recently, we wondered if the time would ever come when all the resources of this people, in money and time and brains and spirituality, would be poured through one common channel toward the accomplishment of one purpose. Not till we get together and get organized—"get set," as a striking modern phrase has it.

IV. The Response to Righteousness and Truth

Zion is a magnet. Its greatest appeal is righteousness and truth. Every heart that responds to that appeal is drawn. Note this beautiful declaration:

"Righteousness and truth will I cause to sweep the earth like a flood, to gather out my elect from the four quarters of the earth unto a place that I shall prepare; a holy city, that my people may gird up their loins, and be looking for the time of my coming; for there shall be my tabernacle, and it shall be called Zion, a New Jerusalem."—Doctrine and Covenants 36:12.

Now we are getting to the most important phase of our subject, the response of the righteous heart to the appeal of righteousness and truth resident in Zion and all she stands for. Two appeals have gone out among the children of men. Satan is preaching his gospel as never before; and he is winning converts everywhere. Some may think that Latter Day Saints are prejudiced and inclined by tradition to believe that the times are always growing worse. So we quote from men who cannot be accused of religious prejudice.

Note carefully their diagnosis of world conditions. Dean Frederick S. Jones, of Yale University, says:

"It is a more subtle influence, I believe, that is bringing about the decay of the national conscience. It is the acquiescence of parents to the loosening standards of morality. In that fact we face a dangerous and terrifying progression. The children of to-day are the parents of to-morrow. Will they in turn acquiesce to continually lowering standards? What will then be the result? So-called modern 'liberty' is fast approaching license. It seems to me at times that the very core of our civilization is at stake.

"The crazy seeking after gayety, the rush of social activity, the liberty between man and woman, increase in dishonesty and in all forms of crime and nervous disease—these are not confined to our youth or our college towns, to our cities or to any one class of society. They are nation-wide and world-wide.

"About eight or nine years ago the popular vogue of the 'new' dances commenced. Right then was the beginning of the lowering standards. At first the more conservative parents were obdurate, but gradually they acquiesced until not only do we have the dance craze developed to its nth degree, but we have various other evils in its train. Chief among these are the appearance and actions of the modern girl and the growing popularity of the 'public dance hall.' . . .

"The morals of the college man have, I think, been in the past well above the average. I believe this still to be true. That does not argue well for the morals of the rest of the country. We are approaching a moral crisis, nor do I think we can avoid it by educating."

Doctor Hibben, President of Princeton University, says:

"About us is a world of confusion and turmoil, and under the spell of a general moral laxity we are groping in the dark for the ray of light which we have not yet discovered."

President Richmond, of Union College, says:

"We must not blind ourselves to the fact that the world over the mass of men and women are in the mood to barter their spiritual inheritance for a mess of pottage.

"If we think for a moment that the confusion into which this world has been thrown is to be straightened out by the devices of economists or by the manipulation of political experts we are making a hideous mistake. It will be done, if it is done at all, as it was done in the beginning when the Spirit of God brooded over the face of the deep and brought an ordered world out of chaos."

All of the foregoing quotations are from the Literary Digest of July 20, 1920.

Captain Albert E. Mowery, M. D., who served as surgeon with the United States army in the late war, and subsequently was attached to the Chicago Medical School, is quoted as saying:

"I sincerely believe that the masses have tired of morality, and deliberately and sincerely seek immorality. Just why this is so is a mystery, but there seems to be a tendency to tear down moral standards and usages and customs that the ages have built up."—The Light, January-February, 1920.

In a recent syndicated article entitled, "Is Europe dying," Sir Philip Gibbs concludes that there are evidences that the entire civilization of the old world is in imminent danger of dissolution. And he says, "The disease is quite as much spiritual as it is physical."

Yes, the appeal of evil is sweeping the earth like a flood. Men and women respond to it. Jesus said they would—that it should be in the day of his coming as it was in the days of Noah—eating, drinking, marrying, and the earth filled with violence.

But God says that he is to cause righteousness and truth to sweep the earth to gather out the elect from such scenes. Who are the elect? Beecher said, "The elect are those who will. The nonelect are those who won't." That is all there is to the doctrine of election.

The reason, then, that "one will be taken and the other left," even from the same bed, or from the same mill, is because one will have it in his or her heart to respond to the appeal of righteousness and truth, while the other will have no such response, but rather will respond to the things of the world. So Zion is not only to be a place of safety and peace, but a place of assembly for those who have it in their very souls to respond to the commandment:

"Get ye out from among the nations, even from Babylon, from the midst of wickedness, which is spiritual Babylon."—Doctrine and Covenants 108:4.

Conclusion

We have rather briefly summed up some of the vital reasons involved in the philosophy of the gathering. In conclusion a few words of caution may not be amiss.

When we write or preach upon this subject it is necessary immediately to sound a note of caution, for the reason that some who are quite unprepared to gather may at once and without preparation pick up and move to Zion.

INDEPENDENCE STOREHOUSE NO. 2

This is the leading retail store of three storehouses in Independence, located just across the street from the general office building. These storehouses are managed by Bert Peterson and do a business of around $23,000 a month.

The last instruction that we had from the Lord on that particular point was to the effect that our gathering should not be in haste. When the time for haste comes he will let us know. Also we were told to have all things prepared before us.

No one should move without having knowledge of certain things. He should know where he is to live—be sure of a home to move into. He should know how he is to live—the source of his income for subsistence. And he should know how he is to live, that is, what manner of life he is prepared to live in Zion.

The demand is not for speculators or for added burdens, but rather for men of ability and means who can help and will help to prepare for those less fortunate who may come after them and make it easy rather than hard for them to come to Zion and find means of honorable subsistence.

About November 1 there will be added to the office force of the Presiding Bishopric the services of Elders E. J. Smith and Chris Hartshorn, of Madison, Wisconsin, and Chicago, Illinois, respectively. Brother Smith is an expert accountant and Brother Hartshorn an experienced office man. They should be a source of much strength to the department.

Zion: In Prophecy and History

By S. A. Burgess

"The hope in establishing Zion is to prepare a people who may live and dwell with our Lord Jesus Christ during the millennium."

The earliest Zion of which we have any record is Enoch's city, which was translated.

"And the Lord called his people, Zion; because they were of one heart and one mind, and dwelt in righteousness; and there was no poor among them. And Enoch continued his preaching in righteousness unto the people of God. And it came to pass in his days, that he built a city that was called the city of Holiness, even Zion. . . . and lo! Zion in process of time was taken up into heaven."—Genesis 7: 23-25, 27, Inspired Version.

One heart and mind . . . in righteousness . . . no poor, and so they were Zion.

This 7th chapter of Genesis is repeated in the 36th section of Doctrine and Covenants. Through the tribulations of the earth Zion remained in the bosom of God, but when the day comes that the earth finds rest, in the last days (verse 67), of that time it is said:

"And righteousness and truth will I cause to sweep the earth as with a flood, to gather out mine own elect from the four quarters of the earth, unto a place which I shall prepare; a holy city, that my people may gird up their loins, and be looking forth for the time of my coming; for there shall be my tabernacle, and it shall be called Zion; a New Jerusalem. And the Lord said unto Enoch, Then shalt thou and all thy city meet them there; and we will receive them into our bosom; and they shall see us, and we will fall upon their necks, and they shall fall upon our necks, and we will kiss each other; and there shall be mine abode, and it shall be Zion, which shall come forth out of all the creations which I have made; and for the space of a thousand years shall the earth rest."—Genesis 7: 70-72, I. V. (Doctrine and Covenants 36: 12, 13.)

The King James Version of the Holy Scriptures, Genesis 5: 22, 24, makes the significant statement that Enoch walked with God, three hundred years after he begat Methuselah. Of his progenitors and descendants, it is merely stated that they lived so many years, but Enoch walked with God, and God took him. This is confirmed by Hebrews 11: 5: "By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death."

Other records tend to confirm this story of Enoch and his city; that Enoch was a friend of God; that he possessed tremendous powers, and was able to set at naught the armies of men; that he had great knowledge and great faith and that his people were pleasing to God. Outside of the Bible, traditions to that effect have been handed down among other nations, as in various esoteric writings.

In the Doctrine and Covenants we have several revelations which were given to Enoch and the church in his day, sections 36, 77, 81, 89, 93, and 101, and they explain how and why there were no poor among them; those revelations are repeated to us to-day.

Referring to later history, the word Zion is used in connection with the city of Jerusalem more than any other place in Palestine. Its etymology is given as being a hill, and it was the term applied to the hill in the southeastern part of Jerusalem. David, when he took it, made it his home, and there was the royal residence for many generations. The word Zion is used in connection with Jerusalem in 2 Samuel 5: 7; 1 Kings 8: 1; 1 Chronicles 11: 5; 2 Chronicles 5: 2; Isaiah 10: 32; 30: 19; Zechariah 8: 7; Job 2: 23; Matthew 21: 5; John 12: 15, as well as in other passages.

The name Zion was also applied to Mount Hermon on one or two occasions. (Deuteronomy 4: 48; Psalm 133: 3.)

The word is also used to include the theocracy, the church of God, and finally the heavenly church, the New Jerusalem. There are a multitude of passages in which Zion and Jerusalem are used in the same passage, but in such a way that it may be referring to two different places, and probably is. (Isaiah 2: 3; 24: 23; 31: 9; 40: 9; 52: 1, 2; 62: 1; 64: 10; Joel 3: 16; Amos 1: 2; Micah 4: 2; Zephaniah 3: 14-17; Zechariah 1: 17.)

Though Zion is used frequently to refer to the city of Jerusalem, it is quite evident that the word is used in the Old Testament many times to refer to a condition then long in the future. There are many beautiful passages, especially in the Psalms and in the prophecies of Isaiah. They are well worthy of our attention as showing the ideals of Zion, and what it has meant in prophecy in ages past.

"O that Zion were established out of heaven, the salvation of Israel. O Lord, when wilt thou establish Zion? When the Lord bringeth back the captivity of his people, Jacob shall rejoice, Israel shall be glad."—Psalm 14: 7.

"Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined. Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence; a fire shall devour before him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about him. He shall call to the heavens from above, and to the earth, that he may judge his people. Gather my saints together unto me; those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice. And the heavens shall declare his righteousness; for God is judge himself. Selah."—Psalm 50: 2-6.

"The Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob."—Psalm 87: 2.

"But thou, O Lord, shalt endure forever; and thy remembrance unto all generations. Thou shalt arise, and have mercy upon Zion; for the time to favor her, yea, the set time, is come. For thy servants take pleasure in her stones, and favor the dust thereof. So the heathen shall fear the name of the Lord, and all the kings of the earth thy glory. When the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory. He will regard the prayer of the destitute, and not despise their prayer. This shall be written for the generation to come; and the people which shall be gathered shall praise the Lord."—Psalm 102: 12-18.

"The Lord said unto my Lord, sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool. The Lord shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion; rule thou in the midst of thine enemies. Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power, in the beauties of holiness from the womb of the morning; thou hast the dew of thy youth. The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent. Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec."—Psalm 110: 1-4.

"They that trust in the Lord in mount Zion, cannot be removed, but abide forever. As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people from henceforth even forever."—Psalm 125: 1, 2.

"For the Lord hath chosen Zion; he hath desired it for his habitation."—Psalm 126: 1.

"And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths; for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem."—Isaiah 2: 3.

"For the law shall go forth of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem."—Micah 4: 2.

"Yea, it shall be unto them even as unto a hungry man who dreameth, and behold, he eateth, but he awaketh and his soul is empty; or like unto a thirsty man who dreameth, and behold, he drinketh, but he waketh, and behold, he is faint, and his soul hath appetite. Yea, even so shall the multitude of all the nations be that fight against mount Zion."—Isaiah 29: 8.

"Therefore the redeemed of the Lord shall return, and come with singing unto Zion; and everlasting joy and holiness shall be upon their heads; they shall obtain gladness and joy; and sorrow and mourning shall flee away. . . . And I have put my words in thy mouth, and I have covered thee in the shadow of mine hand, that I may plant the heavens, and lay the foundations of the earth, and say unto Zion, Behold, thou art my people."—Isaiah 51: 11, 16.

"And then shall they say, How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings unto them, that publisheth peace; that bringeth good tidings unto them of good, that publisheth salvation; that saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth! Thy watchman shall lift up the voice; with the voice together shall they sing; for they shall see eye to eye, when the Lord shall bring again Zion. Break forth into joy, sing together, ye waste places of Jerusalem; for the Lord hath comforted his people, he hath redeemed Jerusalem."—Isaiah 52: 7-9.

The 60th, 61st, 62d, and 63d chapters are all worthy a careful reading.

Now it is evident that it would be difficult for a prophet of Israel to refer to Zion on this land of America with anything like the clearness with which he refers to Jerusalem, Mount Hermon, or Jericho. Yet a close approach to this is made in Isaiah 18. The whole chapter should be read. We quote only the first and last verses:

"Woe to the land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the rivers of Ethiopia; that sendeth ambassadors by the sea, even in vessels of bulrushes upon the waters. . . . In that time shall the present be brought unto the Lord of hosts of a people scattered and peeled, and from a people terrible from their beginning hitherto, a nation meted out and trodden under foot, whose land the rivers have spoiled, to the place of the name of the Lord of hosts, the mount Zion."

It is a "land shadowing with wings." Though it is true that North and South America do not exactly represent wings, still they have been used many times thus in illustrating advertisements, and elsewhere, as though they were the wings of a bird. They possess more similarity to two wings than is the case with any other continent.

"Beyond the rivers of Ethiopia." America is the only land beyond the rivers of Ethiopia; part of Egypt and northern Africa is beyond the Nile; but beyond Ethiopia, or Cush as it is given in some versions, lies America.

"A people scattered and peeled," a people trodden down. It was because of oppression that the colonies came to America; it was in order to secure religious freedom. And yet from the beginning of the United States of North America, it was a nation strong or terrible. And finally—to it is referred the term Zion.

Isaiah 35 also refers to Zion, in connection with the time when there will be peace on the earth—no ravenous beasts, and a highway will be cast up for the righteous.

In the New Testament we learn that they held all things common; neither considered any man aught that he had his own. They met together frequently. (Acts 2: 44-47; 4: 34, 35.)

We learn from the history of the early Christian church that the saints engaged in many love feasts; they delighted to meet together to worship God and partake of the sacrament. Evidently they gathered together as much as they could, and gathered as nearly as they could, and carried on the economic plan of the Order of Enoch as well as their conditions permitted.

Also upon this continent, after the coming of the Savior, the church worked in harmony with all things common.

"And many of them saw and heard unspeakable things, which are not lawful to be written: and they taught, and did minister one to another; and they had all things common among them, every man dealing justly, one with another."—3 Nephi 12: 11.

"And they had all things common among them, therefore there were not rich nor poor, bond and free, but they were all made free, and partakers of the heavenly gift." (4 Nephi 1: 4) But pride arose. (4 Nephi 1: 27.) So they divided and established many churches, and no longer had things in common, nor were they any longer equal. Some were lifted up in pride because of their greater riches. Then contentions arose and they fell apart.

The future gathering of the Saints is referred to in Matthew 24: 28-31, and Revelation 20: 9. This is again an illustration that the camp of the saints is evidently not the city Jerusalem. This gathering is mentioned in Mark 13: 27 and John 11: 52. The Holy City, Zion, is named in Romans 11: 26, and Hebrews 11: 16 mentions that city in heaven for which the righteous of ancient times looked.

In Hebrews 12: 22, Mount Zion is again directly referred to as the heavenly Jerusalem.

Similar statements are made by the prophets in ancient America. (1 Nephi 3: 187; 2 Nephi 5: 33; 7: 118; and 12: 30.)

"He commandeth that there shall be no priestcrafts; for, behold, priestcrafts are that men preach and set themselves up for a light unto the world, that they may get gain, and praise of the world; but they seek not the welfare of Zion. Behold, the Lord hath forbidden this thing; wherefore, the Lord God hath given a commandment, that all men should have charity, which charity is love. And except they should have charity, they were nothing; wherefore, if they should have charity, they would not suffer the laborer in Zion to perish. But the laborer in Zion shall labor for Zion; for if they labor for money, they shall perish."—2 Nephi 11: 106-109.

Ether plainly declares that the New Jerusalem will be upon this land, for the rebuilding of the city of the Jews is not the New Jerusalem, but the Old Jerusalem. Ether saw the days of the coming of Christ, and announced that in the last days a New Jerusalem should be built upon this land unto the remnant of the seed of Joseph.

"For behold, they rejected all the words of Ether; for he truly told them of all things, from the beginning of man; and that after the waters had receded from off the face of this land, it became a choice land above all other lands, a chosen land of the Lord; wherefore the Lord would have that all men should serve him, who dwell upon the face thereof; and that it was the place of the New Jerusalem, which should come down out of heaven, and the holy sanctuary of the Lord. Behold, Ether saw the days of Christ, and he spake concerning a New Jerusalem upon this land; and he spake also concerning the house of Israel, and the Jerusalem from whence Lehi should come; after it should be destroyed, it should be built up again a holy city unto the Lord; wherefore it could not be a New Jerusalem, for it had been in a time of old, but it should be built up again, and become a holy city of the Lord: and it should be built up unto the house of Israel; and that a New Jerusalem should be built up upon this land, unto the remnant of the seed of Joseph, for which things there has been a type; for as Joseph brought his father down into the land of Egypt, even so he died there."—Ether 6: 2-6.

That the city New Jerusalem in upon this land of America is also stated in 3 Nephi 10: 1-3:

"But if they will repent, and hearken unto my words, and harden not their hearts, I will establish my church among them, and they shall come in unto the covenant, and be numbered among this the remnant of Jacob, unto whom I have given this land for their inheritance, and they shall assist my people, the remnant of Jacob; and also, as many of the house of Israel as shall come, that they may build a city, which shall be called the New Jerusalem; and then shall they assist my people that they may be gathered in, who are scattered upon all the face of the land, in unto the New Jerusalem."

"A LAND SHADOWING WITH WINGS"

The artist easily visions North and South America as an eagle with outspread wings.

It is not surprising that this ideal of a gathering place, the city Zion, should again be revealed in modern revelation. Its central place was established at Independence, Missouri. In 57: 1, it will be noted that Zion is referred to as the land of Missouri. Later Nauvoo, Illinois, was referred to as a corner stone of Zion. (107: 1.) Zion is the pure in heart. (94: 5.) It is more important that the people of God keep the commandments of God than that they locate in any one place. In keeping the commandments of God it is certain that they will also keep the laws of the land (58: 5), and will live in harmony with their neighbor.

Yet in accordance with the ancient ideals, and in order to carry out its purposes, Zion must also have locality. The law plainly directed that land should be purchased, and it provides for a rational gathering. The early settlers engaged in a few battles; in this they evidently erred, as they were directed to sue for peace, and lift an ensign of peace (102: 11), and were commanded to proclaim peace. (95: 3.) They were also admonished, "For, behold, I do not require at their hands to fight the battles of Zion; for, as I said in a former commandment, even so will I fulfill, I will fight your battles." (102: 3.) Nor does that involve any threat towards any honest man or woman, for Zion is to become a refuge of all nations. It is to be a place of safety for the oppressed of the earth, and the Gentiles are to assist in building up Zion. (128: 7.) "Behold, I say unto you that Zion shall flourish, and the glory of the Lord shall be upon her, and she shall be an ensign unto the people, and there shall come unto her out of every nation under heaven." (64: 8.)

"And it shall come to pass, among the wicked, that every man that will not take his sword against his neighbor, must needs flee unto Zion for safety. And there shall be gathered unto it out of every nation under heaven; and it shall be the only people that shall not be at war one with another. And it shall be said among the wicked, let us not go up to battle against Zion, for the inhabitants of Zion are terrible, wherefore we cannot stand. And it shall come to pass that the righteous shall be gathered out from among all nations, and shall come to Zion singing, with songs of everlasting joy."—Doctrine and Covenants 46: 13, 14.

"Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour. Let them, therefore, who are among the Gentiles, flee unto Zion. And let them who be of Judah, flee unto Jerusalem; unto the mountains of the Lord's house. Go ye out from among the nations, even from Babylon, from the midst of wickedness, which is spiritual Babylon. But verily thus saith the Lord, Let not your flight be in haste, but let all things be prepared before you; and he that goeth, let him not look back, lest sudden destruction shall come upon him."—108: 4.

"It has been prophesied that the Gentiles shall assist in rebuilding the waste places of Zion. This cannot refer to the inhabitants of Zion who are the pure in heart, but must refer to the places which have been occupied or which it may be contemplated to occupy in the regions round about. The Saints cannot occupy in any place on the land of Zion which is not under the domination of civil law, and as citizens of the State, holding their liberties under the law, there must be a proper recognition and observance of these laws. The Lord has said that this condition of obedience to law must continue until he comes whose right it is to come and assumes to reign over his people. Under the provisions of the laws these organizations or associations must be instituted and carried to completion if they shall be of benefit to those who shall be engaged in them."—128: 7.

"It is well to understand that the term regions round about must mean more than a small area of country round about the central spot, and that the necessities of the great majority of the church in gathering together can only be provided for by settling carefully together as many in one region as may be practicable and profitable and in accordance with the feelings of the people under the laws existing in the places where such settlements are to be made."—128: 5.

"Wherefore, I the Lord have said, gather ye out from the eastern lands, assemble ye yourselves together ye elders of my church; go ye forth unto the western countries, call upon the inhabitants to repent, and inasmuch as they do repent, build up churches unto me; and with one heart and with one mind, gather up your riches that ye may purchase an inheritance which shall hereafter be appointed unto you, and it shall be called the New Jerusalem, a land of peace, a city of refuge, a place of safety for the Saints of the most high God; and the glory of the Lord shall be there, and the terror of the Lord also shall be there, insomuch that the wicked will not come unto it; and it shall be called Zion."—45: 12.

The church had hardly been organized before a revelation was given in the summer of 1830, to go west, to locate the land of Zion, and in the fall of that year, those who should go were named. By December they had reached Saint Louis, and early in 1831, proceeded up the river to Independence, Missouri.

Sidney Rigdon was commanded to write a description of Zion, which he did. The place for the establishment of the temple was also pointed out, and Zion located, and arrangements made for a settlement almost at once.

But in a little over two years the Saints were all driven from Jackson County, and five years later from the land of Missouri. They were told that Zion would not be moved out of her place and that they should return there.

The causes for the expulsion were doubtless religious prejudice, and secondly, the question of slavery. The Saints had come mostly from the North, and many from New England families. They were therefore opposed to slavery. While Missouri owned but few slaves at that time, the State was favorable to slavery, and this formed a second issue, in addition to that of religious prejudice.

Unfortunately there were also contentions and divisions among them. There was unwillingness to consecrate, and a strong tendency to hold back and delay. (98:2; 102:2, 3.) These were some of the underlying reasons which resulted in the rejection by God of their work. But when we recognize human frailties, and the abilities of men to-day, in Zion and elsewhere, we cannot afford to be too critical of their failure, but rather should we search our own hearts to see how well are we fulfilling the laws of Christ.

But none of these things excused the mob, which assaulted and drove them forth in contradiction of the law. Their purpose was peaceful settlement, and they had a right to their opinions. The land was but sparsely settled, and it would seem that they should not have interfered greatly with their neighbors. But there were probably some who felt like one settler in the West—it was getting too crowded if a fence was run a hundred miles north of him.

The question of Zion is closely related to the gathering, in order that we may study together. Hence we find that a school was to be established there (94:5), and provision made for a school of the prophets (5:37; 87:5). The central place is also the headquarters of the general officers of the church, and the center of administration.

There also is to be erected a central temple. The plan of Zion, as laid down, is not that of a modern city, with many people crowded in a small space, but is rather that of a model city as presented by certain architects—a small city of a few thousand inhabitants, surrounded by agricultural lands, and then another small city; the whole of the organization of various towns or cities constituting the one place, each family being allowed one half acre, and thus free breathing space. (Church History, vol. 1, p. 297.)

As to the temple, it is very apparent that meeting places will be needed in each of these several divisions. In fact, in the original plan, it was intended that more than one should be erected in each plat of one mile square. But the principal temple will be erected at the central place, and will undoubtedly be far more magnificent than are the other meeting places. As to this temple, we note first, that it will be built by commandment of God, and that it will not be built until it is so commanded. (Doctrine and Covenants 107:12.) We may note that the action taken at Far West is to the same effect. (Church History, vol. 2, p. 117.)

Only one temple has been erected in accordance with the commandment of God, and completed in these latter days, and that is the one at Kirtland. According to the use to which it is put, we may rightly infer as to the character of the building to be erected at the central place. The temple is not given over to secret rites, nor is the public excluded. In fact the church is commanded not to exclude the public from general services, nor even from the sacrament services. (46:1-3.) All services of the church are open to the public. The exception is in case of offense, the trial shall not be before the world. (42:23.) The Kirtland Temple is open to visitors at proper hours, yet very few beheld the vision which took place at the dedication of that temple, and only those touched with the divine fire partook of the endowment. The visible formation could be perceived, but not the invisible outpouring of the Spirit of God, for the glory of his presence is only made known and can only be seen by the eye of faith. The temple is kept clean, and is not devoted to worldly purposes. But it is a building for general purposes.

At the Kirtland Temple there is a smaller auditorium on the second floor, and various study rooms on the third floor for the use of the priesthood, and for the establishment of a school of the prophets, or school of the elders. It is for purposes of study, so that here may be found those who see eye to eye, and who are all of one heart and mind.

While the Nauvoo Temple was not completed, and while changes were made in the plan after the death of Joseph Smith, still it is of interest to note his anxiety that it might be completed as soon as possible, for one reason so that the Saints would have a place to meet and not be exposed to the weather, as they were in the grove at Nauvoo. Evidently the Kirtland and Nauvoo Temples were to be used as places for the general church services, priesthood meetings, baptisms, and administration of the sacrament, as well as places of assembly for the people of God, devoted wholly to his service in which they might more nearly approach his presence and receive a greater endowment of his Holy Spirit.

The establishment of Zion will also make possible the carrying out of the financial law as given to Enoch, already referred to, so that there will be no poor among us.

These are some of the reasons lying back of the ideal of Zion; a place of preparation; a place for study; a place of worship in the temple of God; a place in the temple of God for study and preparation; a place for carrying out the financial law of mutual helpfulness; a city of refuge; a city of peace; a place where the righteous will delight to come; a place delightful for all the inhabitants thereof.

The hope in establishing Zion is to prepare a people who may live and dwell with our Lord Jesus Christ during the one thousand years of the millennium; a people who will be instructed so that they may go forth carrying healing to the nations of the earth, and minister to humanity. Zion is a place from which will go forth the law of God and will doubtless be taken by suitable ministers, in peace, for the blessing of suffering heirs of earth. The ideal is the one set by the city of Enoch—all of one mind, no poor among them, and of one mind because they desire that which is right; because they are Zion—the pure in heart.

The Office of the Presidency

The place where all the departments of church work center and from which they radiate to the specific departments which reach all of us.

The first general impression one gets upon entering the offices of the First Presidency is that there is every sort of office equipment in general use to-day for handling the work the church assigns this department. Of course they are crowded, but perhaps no more than the average city office, and besides, the removal of the Bishopric to the Battery Building may give them an extra room or so, but they are evidently not worrying over little things like that.

The general office building was formerly a residence, and in the private office of the Presidency, which includes Frederick M. Smith and Elbert A. Smith, is a homey fireplace and the usual appearance of a comfortable living room except that the desks are stacked pretty much with mail in process of being attended to, and one notes telephones and other equipment that distinguish it as an office.

There are dictating machines standing about in this department as well as in the others, with the reproducing machines for repeating the dictation into the ears of the stenographers. Sometimes when all is quiet and there are no callers to disturb, President Frederick M. Smith comes in and dictates a score or so of letters to these accommodating machines, which give the stenographers a merry time the next day. But nearly all the office men here prefer to talk to a human being back of a pencil and stenographer's tablet, so most of the letters we get are born after this manner.

It is not difficult to talk to the secretaries, and assistants, and stenographers in the next office because they use noiseless typewriters. We have heard the so-called "silent" machines, in fact get some of our daily exercise on one of them, but these noiseless machines are like a lullaby as compared with them.

In the office we noted telephones a-plenty radiating from an office switchboard, up-to-date self-locking steel filing cabinets for filing important mail, a file of drawer maps on which all district boundaries are definitely located, the location of branches shown, and in some instances the places where scattered members are located, though the latter is not strongly developed since the statistical department is preparing to give it special attention.

In one corner we noted a pile of nicely printed stationery which, with tasty envelopes, is furnished free to all who are under conference appointment.

They have a good library in the office and a very complete file of Government publications, such as the Congressional Record, industrial and vocational bulletins, soil surveys, and topographical maps. These may prove of great value some day, especially if indexed and catalogued.

Another file held matters of controversial nature, all cross-indexed and ready for quick reference. They have duplicating machines and a multigraph with printing attachment. They print all their report blanks and formerly printed their own letterheads.

Still another important feature that we did not see but only was informed of, was a file under lock and key in the fire-proof vault, the complete records of all church court cases and confessions. These are sacredly kept on file, and are used only in case of second offense in adultery cases and when court cases are appealed or otherwise come up again. These matters come in from all church courts and presiding ministry as a protection to everyone concerned.

The mail that comes to the office is delivered into the hands of Elder O. W. Newton, the secretary of the Presidency. Letters intended for the Quorum of Twelve or for special departments are distributed accordingly. All mail for the Presidency is opened and read by the secretary unless it is found to be strictly personal or is so marked on the envelope. Practically all letters are then read by one or both members of the Presidency. They are thus able to visualize the field and its needs. During the year an effort has been made to relieve President F. M. Smith of the burden of correspondence as much as possible; but where necessary important matters are at once forwarded to him even when he is abroad, and he replies by letter or cablegram.

Some letters of considerable length contain but a few items that would interest the Presidency, so these are marked by the clerks for quick finding. Some are really matters that should be handled by other departments, and are so referred; in fact if such fact is stated on the top of the letterhead they may be sent to these departments without reading.

The assistant church secretary, Elder Guy Fairbanks, is one of the clerks in the office. Howard W. Harder, secretary of the Religio Department, is another clerk who handles a division of the work coming to this office. A large amount of mail comes to this department for consideration each day, and these brethren, with the assistance of other stenographers, lighten the personal load of the two men in the Presi-

The Financial Headquarters of the Church

The department that collects and disburses all the general church funds and has a distinct and prominent place in our Zionie developments.

Of great relative importance in our Zionie development as a church and as individuals is the financial department of our work, known as the general Bishopric, and in its headquarters relation, the Presiding Bishopric, composed of Bishop Benjamin R. McGuire, Presiding Bishop, and Bishops James F. Keir and Israel A. Smith, counselors.

Last year they handled a half million dollars for the church, collecting from the entire membership and distributing far and wide to families of missionaries and general officers as well as providing for innumerable minor as well as major institutional interests. The church edifices of our organization all over the land and the general institutions, dency as much as possible. It is the right of every member to have the advice and assistance of the Presidency if required, but at the same time there are many things in the way of routine that can better be attended to by those who specialize in that work.

The office of the Presidency is an interesting place to visit, but they like to have us leave after our business is finished, lest others be deprived of their rights, so we would look for some other place to relax and enjoy a social call. A card hangs on the wall, reading: "Yes, we are glad to see you here—on business."

Twenty-five years ago the Independence Branch adopted resolutions of gratefulness to the street railway company for stopping the cars at the church on Sundays.

"The Commonwealers, or Coxieites, that have been camped on the Missouri River, between this and Kansas City, secured flatboats and left the fore part of the week for Saint Louis, where they hope to secure transportation to Washington."—Zion's Ensign, June 23, 1894.

such as the Saints' Homes, Children's Home, Graceland College, etc., come under the general care of this department as to their financial affairs, they dealing through the local authorities elected for that purpose.

The system of collections under which the church operates includes Bishop's agents in all organized territory, under the direction and supervision of the Presiding Bishopric. These men, either in person or through local subagents of their appointing, collect tithes, offerings, consecrations, from the members, giving receipts and reporting carefully the details to the central office in monthly reports. Eventually these items are printed in THE SAINTS' HERALD in an annual detailed report of the Presiding Bishop.

This department is made responsible in large part for the "gathering" ideals of the church. The law of the church specifically directs that all things be prepared before the members move into Zion or the regions round about, and this includes consultation with the Presiding Bishopric or some of their local representatives. Thoughtful members of the church at large are observing this rule to their own benefit and that of the church.

The department is gradually being enlarged and competent help being secured to meet the increasing demands made upon it. About October 1 they will move their offices to the newly purchased Battery Block in the business district of Independence where they will have ample space for their operations. We have no doubt the growth of the church will demand that more and more good men and women be employed to handle the vast amount of detail centering in this office.

Bishop Robert T. Cooper, a former California real estate dealer, is in charge of the real estate department in the Bishop's office. His assignment is an important one, and includes the keeping of a complete and up-to-date file of all deeds, contracts, mortgages, insurance items, etc., concerning each building owned by the church in all the world.

Bishop J. A. Becker represents the Presiding Bishopric in Zion, having charge of the local responsibilities pertaining to this office, caring for the many calls for advice and assistance from incoming Saints and collecting and distributing local funds.

Vernon A. Reese, chief clerk, handles the clerical details and efficiently manages the office force.

The provisions of the law for the establishment of stewardships and inheritances, the putting into effect of the law of equality, must be met in this department and they fully realize the importance of the responsibility. A strong central organization with able local lieutenants in all districts and stakes is required and being built up.

The Bishop, in charge of the present campaign for quickly raising five hundred thousand dollars for the erection of the auditorium which the recent General Conference decided on, confidently hopes for a loyal response so that it may result successfully and the other financial interests of the church each receive the attention it demands. These are days when we must think in large terms to attain a big ideal.

From an advertisement by I. N. White & Sons, cash grocery, in the Ensign during 1894, we extract the following prices:

2 3 lb can Tomatoes, New Stock	$ 15
6 lbs New Navy Beans (Choice)	25
21 lbs Granulated Sugar (Best)	1 00
24 lbs Brown Sugar	1 00
6 lbs Good Rice	25
1 lb Baker's Chocolate	40
Dry Salt Meat, per lb	08½
Breakfast Bacon	11½
6 lbs Soda Crackers	25
All Extracts, per bottle	05
14 lbs choice lard	1 00
All 3 lb California Canned Fruits, per can	15
Kansas Pearl Patent Flour, 300 lb lots per hundred	1 40

But those who remember those times will recall the very low wage scale and the difficulty of getting work at any price, hence few will care to go back to "the good old days."

Times change. In an old Ensign we note that a morning service at the church was "quite lengthy," closing a 12.45—and this feature was mentioned incidentally, Brother Arthur H. Mills, just recovering from a serious illness, was able to attend without serious fatigue.

"Independence is putting on city airs. She is to have a fire company. The tool house back of the city hall has been remodeled and fitted up for headquarters. This is something that has been too long neglected for a city of seven thousand inhabitants, hence, are glad to see this advance move."—Zion's Ensign, July 7, 1894.

Independence as Missionary Headquarters

By U. W. Greene

From an early day in the history of the Reorganization, the members of the Quorum of Twelve, and occasionally one of the seven presidents of the Quorum of Seventy, were assigned as missionaries in charge of sections of the United States, Canada, and various foreign countries where missionary work had been undertaken. As a general rule, mission headquarters was where the one in charge happened to hang his hat, or, at least within the precincts of his home. All correspondence and matters of importance—oftentimes of a historical character—were kept in widely separated parts of the world. While the brethren at the head of the missionary departments were full of zeal, God richly blessed their labors, and many thousands were baptized into the church, yet many important reports and documents were kept in private files.

With the passing years the bitter prejudice and hatred of the people in the regions round about Zion began to die out, and the Saints carefully moved in. God gave them favor in the eyes of the people; it became evident that the time was approaching when Zion should be established, and that headquarters should be moved to the center place. Steps were taken to that end.

APOSTLE U. W. GREENE

The present "office man" of the Quorum of Twelve.

The offices of the First Presidency and the Presiding Bishopric were among the first to be moved to Independence, and the members of the Quorum of Twelve were requested to move to headquarters, that they might be conveniently located for frequent counsel with the First Presidency, and because of their central location, more readily reach various mission fields as emergencies might arise. Steps were finally taken to locate the office of the Quorum of Twelve at Independence, and in order that the office might be in close touch with the missionaries scattered throughout the world, they were instructed to forward to the office a weekly letter, which would enable the authorities to learn where they were located, the conditions surrounding them, and the success attending the work they were doing. In addition to this, a monthly statistical report was required, from which the report of the Quorum of Twelve to the First Presidency is compiled. By our records we know the field to which men are assigned; whether they are actively engaged therein or at home attending to necessary duties. We are also able to meet emergencies as they arise, and send needed assistance to any point in any district of the church.

This year the work assigned the members of the Quorum of Twelve is as follows: The president of the Quorum, Gomer T. Griffiths, is in charge of the Indian work, and has a very efficient corps of assistants who are laboring among the Indians in different parts of the country. It is evident that the set time to favor the Lamanites has come, for many are manifesting deep interest in the history of their forefathers as contained in the Book of Mormon. They appear anxious to hear the word of God and quite a number have been baptized, and are rejoicing under the blessings of their heavenly Father. Several of them have been ordained and are developing into efficient workers for the church.

Apostle C. A. Butterworth is residing in Australia where he has been in charge of the work for many years and is being ably assisted by Apostles J. W. Rushton and P. M. Hanson, who have performed efficient work in the South Sea Islands, and New Zealand. They have been in Australia for nearly one year. Before returning to this country it is expected that they will visit other parts of the Australasian Mission.

Apostle T. W. Williams is in charge of the European and Asiatic Mission. He is now in Great Britain, associated with President Frederick M. Smith, and expects to visit France, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, and Palestine before returning to his native land.

Apostle W. M. Aylor has been appointed in charge of Africa. Some fine young men with their wives are to assist him in opening up that vast field to the fullness of the gospel.

Apostles U. W. Greene and M. A. McConley are in charge of the work at the office of the Quorum of Twelve, Independence, Missouri, and are directing the missionary propaganda in Independence and in the Holden and Kansas City Stakes.

Apostle R. C. Russell is in charge of the work in Quebec, and has several able ministers as his assistants there.

The "Minute Men" of the quorum this year are Apostles J. F. Curtis and J. A. Gillen.

The Historical Department

The department that helps us determine the meaning of the present by an interpretation of the past.

By the time this article appears in print, it is intended that the Historical Department shall have been moved to Independence from Lamoni where it has been located for many years.

This will involve the transfer of the historical library at that place and the editorship of the Journal of History, though it is expected to continue the publication of the latter at Lamoni till the consolidation of the publishing houses, in 1921. The Journal is a quarterly magazine and has been of late under the direct care of Heman Hale Smith, assistant editor and assistant historian.

WALTER W. SMITH

Church Historian; until recently, president of Independence Stake.

A conversation with Walter W. Smith, church historian, brought out his ideals for the department, which are to make it possible for the members of the church to view history as a unity rather than as a local manifestation. In other words, not to overemphasize the collation and recording of facts, but rather rightly to interpret history.

He hopes to be able to furnish the missionaries in the field correct information on controverted historical points and material for meeting unfair opposition from those who would pervert the meaning of historical events. To this end there is close cooperation with the Publicity Department so that when occasion demands, direct propaganda may be furnished to meet a situation of widespread interest.

It is hoped to help local communities to determine what was a success in the past and the reason therefor, and what was not, and why.

In the mail of the other general offices are always a number of inquiries which involve historical points, and these are often referred to the Historical Department for answer, either direct or indirect, as the case may demand.

Membership is maintained in nearly all the historical societies in the Mississippi Valley and the national societies, and in archaeological and other learned organizations. This brings not only the magazines of these societies to the department, but the privileges of the meetings held, etc.

In this connection it is interesting to note that in Independence is a local society of the American Institute of Archaeology, and as a result all national lecturers in that organization stop in Independence as a regular point in their itinerary.

Local historians under the appointment of this department, are active in almost every district in the church. These people are expected to record all current church events in thousands to rejoice. In many parts of the country, the people are lending a listening ear to the message presented by God's servants, and hundreds have been led into the waters of baptism. We are rejoicing in the evidences that accumulate from week to week of divine favor and blessing. Truly the set time to favor Zion has come.

their territory, changes in the personnel of the various departments of church work, special developments, etc. Their work is passed on to the general office and oftentimes made the basis of interesting material in the Journal of History.

The headquarters of the department is in the Library Building in Independence, though for some time, on account of the crowded condition among the offices, the department of publicity has occupied most of the space. However, the removal of the latter department to the general office building will relieve the situation and the splendid collection of church and other historical books as well as the nucleus for a good archæological museum find a convenient home.

Through this department, with its quarterly Journal, the church has been able to secure in printed and convenient form, many things that otherwise would not have been available. During the past year, for instance, an invaluable biographical index was published, listing all biographical and autobiographical articles that have appeared in the SAINTS' HERALD, Autumn Leaves, and Journal of History. Yet this is but one of the many ways they have been able to preserve in convenient form material otherwise unavailable to the average member.

"Fine blackberries at a dollar a crate, and peaches at eighty cents a bushel are in the market."—Independence news in Zion's Ensign, in 1896.

The Order of Evangelists

These men have a warm place in the hearts of the people.

Late in September Presiding Evangelist Frederick A. Smith moved his family and office from Lamoni to Independence, and at the time we visited him was expecting to have an office in the general office building when some changes were made by the removal of the Bishopric to the Battery Building.

As is generally well understood, the Order of Evangelists is not a large organization, there being but twenty-four members and but twelve of these in active work. Half of them are by age and infirmity able to do but a limited amount of church work, though they invariably do what they can for the cause they love so well, having given their earlier years of activity to the service of others.

Brother Frederick A. Smith travels extensively in the interests of his department, conferring many patriarchal blessings on the Saints, preaching and counseling in his capacity as father to the church. He attends as many reunions as possible during the season. In addition to this, he attends to the filing and correspondence concerning the copies of all the patriarchal blessings. A copy of every blessing given by one of these men is kept on file for the convenience of those who may lose the original.

One of the order is G. T. Gresty, whose field is Australia. J. W. Wight's field is Lamoni Stake, and he labors as his health will permit, traveling considerably, especially to reunions.

Some of the other active men of the order are John Shields, in Canada; James W. Davis, Western Michigan; W. A. McDowell, Northeastern Illinois; F. G. Pitt, California; Hyrum O. Smith, Far West District; Richard Baldwin, Boston; George W. Burt, Central and Eastern Michigan; A. D. Angus, New York; Ammon White, Idaho.

The work of these men as evangelists, being free from local responsibilities, is often the means of much general comfort to the Saints, and their presence is much appreciated.

The Pen and Ink Club

For about a year and a half there has been organized in Independence a club to develop the literary talent of the members in the community and to unify and crystallize their ideals in contributing that talent for the benefit of the church periodicals.

They meet once a month to compare notes. They bring their productions, where they are criticized by the chosen critic of the club, who at present is Richard J. Lambert, associate editor of Zion's Ensign. They do not as yet attempt any definite class work, and have no adopted text for study.

Mrs. Eva Short is the president, Mrs. M. T. Short vice president, and Mrs. Evan Davis secretary.

At last report they had written some sixty-seven articles, poems, and stories, some of which have been published in the church periodicals. The membership is about twenty, and anyone inclined toward literary work and who desires to help is welcomed into the club, with some minor entrance qualifications.

An interesting little corner in the Central Radio School, now managed in Independence by Lamoni boys who have moved there for the purpose, is a little corner room fixed up as a typical ship's cabin wireless station. In size and equipment it will give students an idea of what they may expect if they go to sea as operators, and they will no doubt feel entirely at home.

The Department of Statistics

The place to which all the ministry are reporting their official ordinances performed.

Under the direction of Elder Frank A. Russell, the office of church recorder has been changed to that of Department of Statistics and the entire system reorganized. In the upper rooms of the general office building he and his corps of assistants have been busy for months transferring the record of names and items of all living members from the eleven old sheepskin-covered books to various indexed card files.

The missionaries have all been supplied (and the local men who desired them) with a full set of blanks for reporting all such items as blessing of children, baptisms, ordinations, and marriages, direct to the general office at Box 255, Independence. After these are recorded properly, the items are supplied on pages specially prepared for the purpose to the branch clerks, ready to be filed in the local records. So, in brief, all ordained men are to report these items to the Statistical Department on blanks furnished for this purpose. In case a local man does not have the blanks, he is supplied from the office of the local branch clerk.

The system is simplified very materially and should be correct and up to date if each person will report promptly.

We encouraged Brother Russell again to set forth briefly the whole plan of operation for general publication and to give us frequent notices for our information so there would be no excuse except our own carelessness for not knowing the essential facts regarding this important work. He has promised to do so, yet we are not able to assure him that all who ought to will read and remember.

Time and again he has sent out information to the right people and had an inquiry come right back concerning the very items fully explained in the former instructions.

We are interested in noting that since November 1, 1919, there had been 2,924 baptisms reported, 5,182 transfers, and over 700 names transferred to the "Unknown" list.

Now that the transfers have been made—and none too early, for the old books were getting very badly worn—Brother Russell hopes to be able to enter more analytically into the statistics of the church.

He is now proposing a new plan for caring for the scattered members. His announcements concerning this will no doubt be in print ere this article appears but a reiteration of the general plan should be helpful.

It is planned to enroll on a nonresident list all members in a district whose exact location can be ascertained and who are not within attending distance of some branch in the district. By the consent of the district officials these names are placed on a list which by correspondence will come under their direct care. This will furnish a missionary in the district the best possible information as to location of members throughout the territory involved.

A recent development is the arrangement for having all reports from the Statistical Department go direct to the recorder in the stakes. The stake is hereafter to be the unit with whom the general office of the department will deal, rather than each branch in the stake. From the stake recorder the items are sent to the branch clerks after being recorded in the stake records. The system of reporting original items from the ordained men in the branches of the stakes continues as before.

Another item we all ought to know is that this department reports to the branch clerks once a month all new enrollments, baptismal certificates, enrollment cards, and notifications of losses. These reach the clerks about the first of each month. So if a transfer, for instance, is in process and the letter requesting it comes in on the 26th of September, it is held till the 25th of October and sent out by November 1 or before.

All branches are known in the Statistical Department by number, so correspondence is greatly expedited if each branch clerk will use that number continuously on his letterheads.

All correspondence is filed under branch numbers, and if a letter bears a branch number and no signature, it can easily be identified. A slogan of the office force is: "Always use your branch number."

The process of weeding out all names of people whose whereabouts are unknown and cannot be ascertained has begun, and will be continued. Every effort will be made to locate these people, but if they are lost entirely they will no doubt be finally dropped from the active membership list.

A visit to this office with its many-sided, human-interest features impresses one with the need for attention to the necessary clerical details concerning our individual work. Unless we are dutiful in this regard the records will be deficient.

A Chat With the Church Architect

A department that will help us to be far-seeing in our building ideals.

The church architect, Brother Henry C. Smith, is a young man of big ideals and long-distance vision, acquired from years of special training and experience in his chosen field. And all these years while studying in the best schools and listening to the premiers of the profession present in lecture form the latest developments in their special fields, he has been thinking of Zion and her building needs.

We interviewed him regarding the erection of the large new auditorium to carry out the expressed desire of the people. He was not thinking alone of the building we so insistently need, but its future service to us, and its relation to all the other general buildings we must have.

It is generally conceded that what we build to-day may easily be outgrown and useless to-morrow, unless we do it with much forethought. The future ideals of the church as well as its immediate demands, must carefully be considered and planned for.

So we plied him with the questions we thought you might ask. "If the church will lay before you a half million dollars within the next month, will you build us a building to seat the next General Conference?" we asked him.

Like any other professional man, he disliked being held down to such severe limitations. We discussed the matter rather thoroughly from a number of angles, and in the end came to know this:

The building material situation is very uncertain except in one respect, and that is prices. There has been a weakening in some prices, but they are still strong enough to stand alone. We are not producing building materials ourselves, therefore we must go out into the open market and pay the prevailing prices.

We order our materials subject to a line (sometimes a whole paragraph) of type printed right on the contract which reads like this: "All agreements are contingent on strikes, accidents, fires, floods, and other delays unavoidable or beyond our control." Some extend the list indefinitely, but it is not hard to understand the intent. So as a matter of fact we are sure of nothing except that we must pay high prices and wait indefinitely for the material. The structural steel for the new college building in Lamoni was ordered on Jan-but our church architect, who has made a special study of acoustics, had said all persons in the building could hear the speaker equally well. We are glad to believe it.

"The building is so planned that if in the future it is deemed necessary, it can be surrounded by suites of rooms to house other church activities.

"At present we may leave the exterior rough concrete and tile so there will be no material and labor lost in adding such wings.

"But among the many points that have to be considered is this: a clear span of roof over such a large area costs very much more accordingly than a smaller space, and as we increase the size, each added foot of area costs proportionately

THE BATTERY BLOCK

This extensive office and store building was purchased this year, and the office rooms on the second floor are to be occupied by the Presiding Bishopric and other church offices, some of them ere this is in print.

uary 31, delivery promised for April 1, and it arrived late in July.

But of course the sooner we begin our work on the new auditorium the sooner we shall succeed, in spite of the adverse conditions prevailing, and they are growing no better.

"Where will the building be located?" we inquired.

"Well, there are a number of good places it can be built, but this has not been definitely settled as yet." He pointed out several spots that have been considered, and we agreed that the Presidency and Presiding Bishopric, in charge of that part of the program, might well be intrusted with it without worry on our part. So we hunted up something else to worry about.

"What will be the seating capacity of the new building?" You see we were thinking of the many deserving people who travel each year many, many miles from home to attend the General Conference of the church, only to fail even in securing admission to the building during the business sessions.

"While that matter is still subject to change, we hope to build large enough to seat eight thousand people. We plan an elliptical interior, with the roof one great segmented vault. [We looked in a dictionary and found all those words.] There will be no interior supports to obstruct the view of the people, and we can provide acoustic properties so every person in the building can hear the speaker. That is a big audience—eight thousand people—and it is worthy the consideration of our public speakers. They might even be justified in training themselves for the task of filling with their voice such an immense space."

There is a famous building out West where from a certain spot one can hear the full length of the building the drop of a carefully selected pin. We wondered if it were possible to have such excellent qualities better distributed, more. It is a simple matter of mathematics, but not always understood.

"Ample entrances and exits are planned for all four sides.

"If we do not rush the process of building and do not arbitrarily set too many restrictions on ourselves as to time, we may be able to save some large amounts of money."

"Will it be fireproof?" we further inquired.

"Absolutely."

"And well heated and ventilated?"

"With the very latest systems, so there will be no drafts and bad-air pockets."

"And you won't assure us it will be all ready for use by April 6, 1922, if we want it on that date?"

"We shall do our best," he replied calmly, "but we have explained the building-material situation. If we had the money to pay a premium and outbid others, we could secure priority shipments in some instances, but we don't want to do that. We cannot afford to be prodigal with our resources in view of our many needs as a church."

There is a very satisfying element in the architect's side of the building program—satisfying to us. We are content to leave it to him and those who help him decide. We could only wish that we as church members were organized into groups and making brick, quarrying building stone, turning out steel products and metal castings, manufacturing cement, marketing gravel, putting out finishing material, etc., so we could build this and other buildings satisfactorily.

Then we might be nearer the solution of the big housing problem hanging like a specter over our heads to-day.

Anyone with creative ability and an artistic bent will find much to interest him in the work of an architect. It is a wonderful profession.

The Publicity Department

The new program of the church calls for favorable publicity through press and mails.

This is a day of advertising. The messages of business, of politics, of religion, all are impressed on the public by means of publicity. The organization that fails to take that great factor of modern progress into account, fails to employ one of the most potent means toward success.

Our church has always believed in publicity. Our printing press has always been a part of our missionary equipment. Few churches are so aggressive in direct advertising as are we; but heretofore this work has been more or less local in its nature. Last year President Smith recommended to the joint council that a central publicity bureau be set up and that the work be placed on a systematic footing. Ours was the second church to thus establish a general publicity organization.

Arthur E. McKim, a professional advertising man of Kansas City, was called to organize this new department, and on January 1 of this year he took charge as general publicity agent for the church. A budget was allowed for the department thus created, and a broad field allowed for its development:

Briefly stated the Publicity Department has undertaken to direct the general advertising of the church. This not only includes the general organization, but reaches the individual branches as well, and by means of local publicity agents in each branch, an advertising organization is being built up that assures the work a thorough and competent publicity.

The gospel literature work has been made a part of the publicity program, and the local agents have been charged with that important responsibility.

The Publicity Department has charge of the sales and subscription problems of the church publications, and a careful system has been worked out whereby a follow-up can be maintained on all subscribers, and effective campaigns instituted in all branches for new readers. Great importance attaches to this work, and much attention is paid it by the department.

Inquiries from nonmembers are sought and carefully answered. They are filed and worked from time to time, and the list is steadily growing. All missionary tract requirements are filled by this department, and a careful revision and amplifying of the tract list is being studied out.

The scope of the publicity work is widening out very rapidly, and the general response of the church is most gratifying. Many ambitious advertising programs are under way at various branches now, and before the winter is over it is planned to put on a church-wide campaign.

In times past our church has had much publicity that it did not seek. The new program calls for favorable publicity in the press and through the mails, and to accomplish that, the general publicity agent is working through his local agents to acquaint the press everywhere with our history, and to induce the branches to make publicity a part of the branch program. The work promises much success.

The Church Auditor

The department that checks accounts of all kinds and seeks to establish more and more efficiency.

Though his work goes on quietly and unassumingly, Brother R. B. Trowbridge's work as church auditor has many aspects and requires much application of effort.

His department succeeded the old system of appointing some three men each year to spend several weeks going over the accounts of the financial department and the church institutions. The idea was to have the services of an expert auditor constantly available, not only to go over accounts and correct errors, but to assist in the general correlation and efficiency of each department.

To this end Brother Trowbridge has labored for some two years, preparing data, developing plans, and trying to be generally helpful to all. In some instances he has been able by the inauguration of new systems in bookkeeping in some of the church institutions, to minister greatly to their increased efficiency, and he hopes to continue in this line.

In fact the department is not, as is too often supposed, a sort of secret service system to discover dishonesty or to pry into the private affairs of the departments, but aims to be helpful in developing the best systems and promoting special efficiency in all the church institutions. If errors are found, naturally they should be pointed out.

Altogether, we should say the job of an auditor is rather a thankless one, but since consecration and devotion must lead somewhere in order to make it mean anything, we can see that some one must do this work and are impressed with the size of the task as well as its importance to the church and the individuals concerned. No doubt it will grow with the other departments and be a source of much strength to them as their activities widen and increase.

The Department of Music

One of the youngest but most enthusiastic of our church departments.

The church has from the beginning given much attention to its musical needs, especially vocal. Recognizing the fact that the "song of the righteous is a prayer" unto God, those affiliated with the great Restoration have not been content to utter song-prayers unless they were expressive of the sincere desires of the heart. We have our own peculiar beliefs that demand thoughtful expression in song. Some of the great songs of the age have been given a warm place in the hearts of the Saints, but in addition many other beautiful composition have been indited by the inspiration of God.

In following the injunction of the Lord to cultivate the gifts of music and of song, the Saints have been gradually coming to the place we occupy to-day, with a full-fledged and well-recognized department of the church devoting its energies to the fullest development of musical interests in the church.

In the HERALD of May 12, The Staff department carried an important announcement to the effect that the choir movement of the church had at last broken its chrysalistic bonds and emerged as the Department of Music of the church, with a general director, assistant director, and secretary, with plans for the appointment of a managing director. Since then the latter-mentioned plan has developed, as we shall note later.

Arthur H. Mills, editor of the The Staff, announced at that time some of the aims of the department, from which we quote:

"The great general aim of the Department of Music is to promote and encourage the spirit of music in the church in every possible way. This is quite an extensive undertaking, but the church needs this big thing accomplished and we are willing to bend our efforts to do it. And when we say that the new department proposes to foster the spirit and work of music in all possible ways, we mean exactly that thing. The former general choir movement aimed at the promotion of choir interests but the Department of Music aims at fostering and developing every musical interest in the church. Our church choirs, whether near or remote, are subjects of its care and entitled to its aid; the budding young orchestra, whether in Maine or Australia, anxious to give its service to the church or Sunday school, is an object of its interest and concern; even the individual student who is earnestly striving, perhaps far remote from advantages of musical surroundings, to cultivate his gift of music or of song, is dear to the heart of the department, for it wants him to succeed and stands ready to help him. Wherever God's people are striving to cultivate the gifts he has endowed them with, that they may use them in his service and to his glory, this department is anxious to render help and encouragement. Is not this desire a holy one, and do you not find your hearts responding with a determination to cooperate with us?"

"There are so many things that we need to do for the church's good that we can scarcely begin to enumerate them. For instance, the development of the missionary spirit among our singers and musicians, whereby they may help the missionaries of the church present the gospel message more attractively by a proper accompaniment of music and singing with their services, is one of the things needed. The development of the power of original composition, whereby our own people may produce more of the music we play and sing, is another. But why try to enumerate them? One eminence mounted, another rises to view and the horizon ever widens before us. . . .

"In the course of time (and we trust it may not be too far off) and as our work shall develop and experience shall show us just what is needed and how to secure it, the Department of Music expects to launch a campaign of education in music and music work. This campaign is intended to embody educational work to meet the needs of many in the church; that will aid the struggling choir in the isolated branch—the ambitious vocal or instrumental student away from the centers of culture. In many ways this may be made to function, and in such work we feel that the music work of the church may be more thoroughly accomplished.

"Another thing the Department of Music proposes to do: You have all doubtless learned of the plans established at the last General Conference for the erection of a large auditorium at Independence. For the music work of this auditorium there will be needed a large pipe organ—a very large one in fact. This department proposes, in cooperation with the Bishopric of the church, to work energetically for the promotion of 'The Pipe Organ Fund' for this auditorium. Cannot the musical workers of the church furnish the means for this large organ, and would it not be peculiarly fitting that this magnificent instrument should stand as a testimonial to their zeal and devotion? More about these plans later."

There is a difficult pioneer stage to most all enterprises—a period of slow growth and a feeling of uncertainty. The choir movement has experienced it, and even yet may not make a meteoric rise, but it is becoming more and more articulate as the days go by, and we expect much of it, though anent that phase of the subject we quote from Brother Mills:

"It cannot be expected that the new Department of Music shall spring, Minerva-like, into the full realization of its work and powers at once. Like all movements that men make for their betterment, it must grow, becoming each day in its development, more proficient. Evolution is always a matter of comparatively slow growth, but true evolution is always upward. Therefore, while we expect the Department of Music to evolve into that which is higher and better, we shall also expect you to be patient, trusting that we may reach the goals we are seeking in due time. As we grow and as experience shall give us proficiency and wisdom, we shall some day be able to do better things for the church than we now can do."

The personnel of those now in charge of the work of the Department of Music is: Albert N. Hoxie, former general church chorister, 3119 North Sixteenth Street, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, general director; Paul N. Craig, director of the School of Music at Graceland, Lamoni, Iowa, assistant director; Arthur H. Mills, former secretary of the general choir movement, 1514 West Short Street, Independence, Missouri, secretary. Harold C. Burgess, now in charge of the Lamoni Electric Co., at Lamoni, Iowa, and a vigorous and popular leader in choir work in Lamoni Branch and Lamoni Stake, is managing director, expecting as soon as possible to secure release from his present work and devote all his time to musical work for the church at large. As the work grows, doubtless others will be called to help us with the burdens, either in an official capacity or in assistance in various ways.

Brother Hoxie has had to carry on most of his work for this department at long range, except at conference time, though he has given considerable attention to the general direction of the choir work and chosen the oratorios and anthems for the conference choirs. He was engaged in community song work in connection with the League Island Navy Yard in Philadelphia, during the war, and gave his whole time to that important and eminently successful work. But following the conclusion of that work he has felt it possible to give more attention to the needs of the church, and hopes eventually to move into the big task before the department with the same enthusiasm and personal attention that characterized his work for the Government.

Paul N. Craig, director of the school of music at Graceland College, is on leave of absence to further pursue musical studies in New York City. He is not only a great lover of music but has the ability to interest in a definite way the young people with whom he associates, with the possibilities of the song as a method of spreading the gospel message.

Arthur H. Mills, of Independence, Missouri, as secretary of the department, is giving his whole time to its development. During the summer he visited ten reunions, in Canada and the eastern part of the United States, specially in the interests of music. This has given him an intimate touch with local conditions. For a number of years he has edited The Staff, the music department's official column in the HERALD, appearing monthly, seeking to enthuse the Saints over this important opportunity as well as educate them in various important details.

The department necessarily depends on local and district workers for the results that indicate church-wide development. District choristers are appointed by the executives of the general department, with the concurrence of the First Presidency. These people in the districts are expected to organize the local interests so they may function with the utmost unity. In many instances this has resulted in a unified choir at conferences and reunions in the districts who because of this direction were able to do very effective work for the church.

Orchestral work is given due attention and encouragement. A special orchestral number of Autumn Leaves is now in process of development and will likely appear at an early date, under the direction and efforts of the Department of Music. No doubt more time will be given to this feature as the force of workers increases.

The Women's Department

The work which reaches and affects the vitals of our social structure: the home.

In an upper room of the Women's Building we found the office of the Women's Department: the headquarters from which emanates the office detail which should unify the activities of the womenfolk throughout the church.

They have the ideals, the ability, the plan, but they are right up against the adolescent period of their development, as it were. In other words, they have been for years getting along, making good progress by the devoted efforts of various of the sisters here and there who with a little help in their household expenses at most, perhaps, could keep the work of their departments in good condition.

But they have now reached the next period in their growth, when they are just a little too big for that kind of work to suffice, and have not yet been able to get assimilated into the church machine sufficiently to secure the financial support they need.

So they feel they are in a way marking time. There is a recognition of their condition by the financial department of the church, but they, too, must meet many demands and see that everything goes on as it should in the branches of the church work for which they are already responsible.

But the sisters are going on, doing all they can, confident that the day will soon come when they will have the services of sufficient office help to carry on the voluminous correspondence necessary, made especially heavy by the acceptance of two new departments and the development of other features in their program.

The day we visited this department Sister Audentia Anderson, superintendent of the department, had just arrived to spend a week or more at the office helping develop plans and meet the ever-changing new situations arising. With Sister William Madison, assistant superintendent, she would go over a great many phases of their mutual problem in the women's work.

In this little room was the desk of the general executives, one for the home department, and one for the cradle roll work. These latter are new acquisitions for the women, and they are laboring hard to see that the proper assimilation is effected.

The Women's Department in Zion is a definite factor to be reckoned with, and should be duplicated in many other places. It is functioning in every one of the thirty-six groups, each having a leader and a friendly visitor. These women promote sociability, spread the spirit of good-fellowship, collect used clothing for the poor, seeing to mending and altering. Class work is held in various groups, and a mothercraft course is offered by the Independence Institute of Arts and Sciences, which offers a 20-hour-a-week course to train leaders for the women. In fact, it is a definite normal course to help supply the great demand for trained workers for the Women's Department. Calls come in from all over the church for women who will come into the communities and help them get started, tell them personally what to do, and in general put the work on its feet. But at present there are few with the ability who can respond. Hence this effort as a beginning in preparing for the future.

The ideals of the department are most wholesome, and no one who converses with these general leaders on the ground, or with Sister Frederick M. Smith, director general of the work, now in California, has any misgivings about the final outcome. We can only hope and help them get into their rightful places soon and attain their ideal of raising the standards of the home, bettering environments, perfecting character, for the Zionic condition. They recognize the home as the vital unit in our whole structure. It must be reached to carry on any local program; it must be reached in a propaganda program by the missionaries.

Earnestly they are bending all their energies to this end, and as they see the magnitude of the task might well be discouraged, but they are not, and only wish for more consecrated help to consummate their plans and help Zion to flourish indeed.

On River Boulevard about a block from the Stone Church. Houses the headquarters office of the Women's Department.

The weekly department in the HERALD, edited by Audentia Anderson, of Omaha, in the interests of the department is one of the chief educational factors in the women's work. The general aspects of the work, with announcements of current developments, are presented promptly.

"Independence offers the advantages of living in a small city and at the same time has the privileges of those who live in the larger cities," said one of the brethren recently who resides there. "The fare to Kansas City is eleven cents, and the car service good."

Elder Frank A. Russell was in Lamoni on the 8th and 9th, getting stake recording work established on the new basis suggested in the article in this issue on the Statistical Department.

The Religio Department

The part of the church work giving special attention to the social and recreational needs of the church.

The central office of the Religio Department is in the Quorum of Twelve Building, just north of the general office building, in Independence. They have a stenographer who devotes part of her time to this work and the rest to the Quorum of Twelve. All mail, however, is addressed to Box 255, and goes first through the hands of the secretary of the department, Howard W. Harder.

Following the big changes made in this department at the recent General Conference, considerable correspondence has been carried on with district presidents in church work and with the local pastors. Information has been widely disseminated so everyone might know the exact status of Religio activities. They intend to continue this educational propaganda.

THOMAS W. WILLIAMS

Superintendent of the Religio Department.

All missionaries have received letters concerning the new aspects of Religio work, and in a majority of cases they have replied as to their willingness to conform to the new plan and further the interests of the Religio.

On the new basis the districts and stake Religio Departments have no administrative functions. They have no occasion to hold district or stake Religio business meetings, and at conferences in districts hold only institutes and workers' conferences. The field worker may call such meetings as the occasion demands, but the old usages are all changed in the newer aspects and methods of this department.

The end is not yet. The officers are at work on a manual which eventually will supersede the present constitution by furnishing in another form the necessary information for each separate department of the organization, yet not embarrass them with a multiplicity of detailed requirements and regulations.

It is an interesting period in the history of the Religio, and we like to watch the outcome, expecting many interesting developments while it is finding its ultimate place as a young people's department. It cannot effect its changes in a day, nor a week, nor even a year, but it is making rapid and satisfactory progress under its new centralized management. Though Superintendent Williams is giving most of his time to missionary work in foreign lands, he is vitally interested in the department and is constantly in touch with developments here.

Management of the Local Churches in Zion

The local organization is the point of contact with the individual member and largely determines the efficiency and value of the church in general.

Following the dissolution of the Independence Stake at the recent General Conference, it having been presided over for a number of years by Elder Walter W. Smith, the Presidency took charge of pastoral work and the management was by the First Presidency given into the hands of Elder Roy V. Hopkins.

In his work he represents the Presidency of the church in a local way, being directly responsible for the spiritual interests of the four thousand or more members of the city of Independence and the suburb of Englewood. He sees to the appointment of speakers at the Stone Church, is responsible for the other meetings, receives reports from and directs in a general way the activities of the local ministry.

Elder Arthur Allen, in charge of the Second Independence church, is acting as office assistant for Brother Hopkins, and has been of late developing a complete survey of the membership in the city and bringing all the records up to date. The fast-increasing size of the group has made it difficult to keep the records properly, so he is giving considerable attention to this feature.

THE STONE CHURCH

The largest public building owned by the Saints in Independence.

The place is divided into 36 groups of from 25 to 40 families each. These groups are divided into 9 districts. Over each group is an elder, a priest, a teacher, and a deacon, whose duty it is to look after the welfare of the Saints in the same manner as branch officers do. They visit the homes of the Saints, look after the needs of the poor and the stricken, counsel and advise as to spiritual matters, have charge of the local group prayer meetings held each Wednesday evening, and in general act in the place of the pastor.

Over the districts are mostly high priests, with some elders. In each case the pastor of a church is also a district supervisor. There are five churches.

A system of reports is in effect whereby the deacons report financial matters each month, with details as to calls made, number pledging help on local expenses, number of wage earners in the group, amount collected for local expense, and amount collected for tithes and offerings, etc.

Each elder in charge of a group reports weekly to his su-supervisor various matters of importance regarding the work in his group, including services held, number of priests, teachers, and deacons present, with total number present, etc.

The district supervisor collates these reports and sends the result to the office man who files it for reference. Once a month a meeting is held at which all these supervisors meet with the First Presidency and Brother R. V. Hopkins, discuss their mutual problems, and seek to establish greater efficiency.

ROY V. HOPKINS
Acting for the Presidency in charge of the pastoral work in Zion.

The order of services at the Stone Church is as follows: On Sunday, young people's prayer meeting at 8 a. m.; Sunday school at 9.30 (with attendance of over one thousand); preaching at 11 a. m.; prayer meeting at 2.30 p. m., and preaching at 7.30. Religion is held on Friday evening, and during the summer they have been having a brief program of motion pictures.

On the first Sunday of the month sacrament service is held at 11 a. m., instead of preaching, and at 2.30 a problems meeting for all the members of the community.

This has come to mean a discourse by one of the leading authorities, with no general discussion.

The local quorums meet on the fourth Monday evening of each month, assembling en masse and later dividing into quorum work. There is a high priests' section, and a quorum each of elders, priests, teachers, and deacons.

Once a month there is a general business meeting at the Stone Church, but there is a possibility this will be changed to quarterly.

During the summer season the church has given a motion picture program on the lawn near the church on Saturday evenings, at which thousands of people attend regularly. The expenses are kept up by semi-monthly collections, and it is hoped to raise a sufficient fund for a free lyceum course.

The pastors in charge of the local churches other than the Stone Church, which is the largest general assembly building the church owns, are:

- Second Independence, Arthur Allen.
- Walnut Park, B. J. Scott.
- Enoch Hill, W. D. Bullard.
- Liberty Street, J. M. Cockerton.
- Englewood, W. P. Warren.

In charge of the Sunday school work for all the churches is A. L. Sanford, and J. M. Lloyd is field worker for the Religion work.

The Presiding Bishopric are represented in Zion by Bishop J. A. Becker. His duties include the handling of all finances, collection of local funds and tithes and offerings. In this he is aided by the deacons in each group, who report all details and turn over money collected. A monthly summarized report comes to him, a copy going to the pastors or supervisors, so they may if necessary help him in his work.

Not the least of the duties of this office is to advise and help the Saints get located. All too heartbreaking frequently Saints will move unannounced into Independence, without previous plans or arrangements, and hope to locate satisfactorily. The housing situation is perhaps no worse there than in any other place, but as is well known, it is serious all over the country, and no person should hope by faith to get settled happily and comfortably without due preparation unless he has an excess of funds—and these should not be used unwisely.

The street car service between Independence and Kansas City is very good, and on special occasions Saints from Kansas City and Saint Joseph often attend in considerable number. In fact, in normal times there are always a number of visitors present from outside the city. One Sunday in September we attended the Sunday school at the Stone Church and there were reported on that day twenty-seven visitors from out of town.

The increasing number gathering into Independence and the regions round about makes the demand insistent for more room for a meeting place, and because of this the Independence Saints have already and will in the future, subscribe very liberally to the fund for building a new auditorium.

At conference time President F. M. Smith assured an inquirer that he would see that good use was made of such an auditorium between conference sessions. He will find plenty of support for this idea from local people.

The work in Independence is growing in magnitude day by day and will continue to grow; not only in numbers involved, but in the problem of educating every member to appreciate to the fullest extent the responsibility of being a Saint.

SECOND INDEPENDENCE CHURCH

The people who meet here have an enviable reputation for progressiveness in church activities.

The church at large looks anxiously to the central place to see it take the lead.

The farms around Independence are well improved and fertile. A representative number of the Saints live in the country and on small tracts in the edge of the city. Market conditions are excellent and the growing season conveniently long. The winters are not severe and snowfall, though occasionally heavy, does not remain on the ground very long at a time.

The Ensign Publishing House

The home of one of the best-circulated periodicals in the church.

The Ensign Publishing House in Independence, in the same manner as the Herald Publishing House in Lamoni, has in the course of its existence so extended its interests that the name is not entirely descriptive of its place in the church.

It is the home of Zion's Ensign, the missionary newspaper of the church, but in addition does a large book and tract business, as well as doing a great deal of job printing for the various church officials. It also publishes One, the spondence columns contain letters weekly from Saints all over the church.

It began its existence in Independence as a private venture in 1891. Later it was purchased by the church and placed in charge of the Board of Publication. This board of five members, including the Presiding Bishop as chairman, controls the general policy of all the church publishing interests, choosing the editors and business managers. A recent action contemplates the appointment of an editor in chief of all the periodicals, by the First Presidency, the choice by this person of a staff of editors to come before the board for ratification.

The present Board of Publication is Benjamin R. McGuire, A. Carmichael, Frederick B. Blair, Arthur E. McKim, and Richard J. Lambert.

Elder Richard J. Lambert is associate editor of the Ensign and business manager of the Ensign Publishing House. Elder Walter W. Smith resigned as editor when over a year ago he assumed the responsibilities of church historian, and since that time Elder Lambert has carried the editorial responsibility alone.

Several pieces of mechanical equipment have been added to the plant the past year and still more is due any time. The building has been enlarged in recent years and the interior tastefully decorated so that it is a pleasant place though too small for their extensive business.

The consolidation of the Ensign Publishing House with the Herald Publishing House is likely to be consummated early in 1921 in accordance with the action of the General Conference of this year. The new organization will function in The Battery, a large building across the street to the east of the Ensign Office, purchased by the church this year for that purpose. The Herald Publishing House will bring approximately twice as much equipment as the Ensign has, with the addition of an up-to-date bookbindery for all kinds of high-class work.

There may be a reorganization of the entire personnel, managerial, editorial, mechanical, and clerical. The definite date of the change has not as yet been decided, nor the details all worked out, but these will be developed rapidly, and monthly priesthood periodical edited by President Frederick M. Smith and Bishop Benjamin R. McGuire.

The Ensign has a wide circulation in the church and goes to the homes of a considerable number outside, carrying intimate news of church developments in Zion and the regions round about, as well as many sermons and special articles of interest to member and nonmember. Its corre-

the Saints may reasonably expect some beneficial changes.

The proposed new arrangement will make possible a better-defined and more efficient policy among all the editors and allow a more intimate, mutual understanding of the internal processes by which the church is making its progress. It may in some ways reduce the cost of production by allowing more quantity buying.

The use of the present Herald building, a very good, modern structure built after the fire in 1907, is being given due consideration by the church authorities concerned. We may well be assured that it will not be allowed to stand idle and unused. The upper floor is largely used for church offices now, the stake presidency and bishopric of the Lamoni Stake, and the superintendent of the General Sunday School Department, G. R. Wells, being found there. As early as June, 1919, the executive council of the General Sunday School Association took action to move Sunday school headquarters to Independence, but conditions affecting the publishing interests made it unwise to make the change as yet.

The publishing interests of the church are a vital factor in all our church activities, furnishing a means of education in religious affairs for members and nonmembers, a medium for the general dissemination of internal policies—in fact the big, wide field the printer's art has come to fill in these days of improved methods is before them.

From its earliest history, this church has appreciated and utilized the value of the press in molding opinion and in furthering educational ideals.

To-day the same appreciation exists in large measure, accentuated by a heritage that requires those who have been warned to warn their neighbors concerning God's wonderful plan for the redemption of man. Every Saint owes it to himself and the church to read and study its literature and keep up with its current history that he may be an efficient servant in the hands of God.

Tracts and books in foreign languages as well as in English, are published and in stock for distribution, but this work has only begun. There is a vast field to be covered in this one regard, furnishing an invaluable means for the spread of the gospel to the nations of the world.

Our literary concerns must be in a position to keep pace with the onward march of God's army to a victorious triumph.

Independence Sanitarium

The institution from which the work of the Health Department will spread till it affects the whole church.

At the recent General Conference an important step was taken in the reorganization of the board of trustees of the Independence Sanitarium so that it now includes (when the First Presidency has its full personnel) seven members, composed of the First Presidency, the Presiding Bishopric, and the church physician, G. Leonard Harrington.

Doctor Harrington is the director of the Sanitarium which is but one of the institutions involved in the Health Department, but naturally the center of them all.

It is intended that the work of the Health Department shall ultimately exert a direct and helpful influence over the mental and physical interests of the Children's Home and the various homes for aged, and even extend into Graceland College and finally into every private home in the church.

Already plans are made to place a nurse each in Independence, Lamoni, and Holden by November 1 of this year, not only to look after the health work in the church institutions at these places but to establish classes in nursing. Three sets of equipment for fitting out a typical sick room have been ordered and will be installed at these places for practical demonstrations in nursing.

Sister Laura N. Mann, director of nursing in the Health Department, will continue in general charge of this work, and the nurses are very enthusiastic over the possibilities for extended service. Many of these graduate nurses are gladly withdrawing from a field in which there is an insistent demand for their professional services and are placing their budgets before the Bishop, indicating their willingness to forego the $35 to $50 a week they might receive and work on a definite stewardship basis, on the basis of needs and just wants.

Fourteen reunions throughout the church were visited this year by representatives of the Health Department, giving lectures and demonstrations, and disseminating information to the public. This feature will be enlarged upon from year to year. Those in charge of this extension work hope to educate the whole church as to the ideals of the Health Department, so it may be of practical benefit to every member.

Occasionally some one expresses a reservation concerning this department on the grounds that it is destructive of faith, yet no one who comes to know these noble leaders in this work will long continue in that belief. There is the finest kind of cooperation between the spiritual and medical aspects in all cases that reach the Sanitarium, while the big thing we must all remember is that the primary object of the whole movement is disease prevention. If the entire church could be saturated with this prophylactic doctrine, we should be a favored people indeed. And all of them are working to that end, from Doctor Harrington, with his wholesome attitude toward administration under the hands of the elders of the church and who believes the Word of Wisdom a vital plank in our religious platform, to the youngest nurse who carries a glass of water.

In fact, a recent development is the installing of Elder Ralph W. Farrell, who has had nursing training, as chaplain of the Sanitarium. He studies the spiritual needs of the patients and ministers to them from that side of the problem as carefully and conscientiously as do those skilled in the medical aspects of the case. He calls to his assistance various of the local elders and is able to secure some most gratifying results from faith and prayers.

Another newly added feature is the addition of Doctor W. E. Stoff to the staff as specialist in dentistry. He gave up a fine practice in Omaha where he has been specializing in the orthodontic branch of dentistry, in order to be of direct service to the church through this department. At the time of our visit he was planning to devote most of his time to the

to thirty years of age may enroll in the first-year nursing work if they have the equivalent of two years high-school work to their credit.

The day we visited the institution in September, Sister Rodgers had perfected arrangements whereby eight of the nurses in the first-year work were to take one semester's work, five days a week, at the Kansas City Junior College in the following subjects: Dietetics, anatomy and physiology, history of nursing, materia medica, bacteriology, practical nursing and ethics, hospital housekeeping, chemistry, and hygiene.

To supply information to all inquirers about the training of nurses, a complete circular has been provided and may be secured on application to Miss Sarah M. Rodgers, R. N., Independence Sanitarium, Independence, Missouri.

The nurses' home is a pleasant place about a block from the institution, where the nurses, under the care of a competent matron, have home privileges and cheerful environment. They must work hard and conscientiously to become competent in their profession, but the conditions under which they do this are very satisfactory indeed.

The capacity of the Sanitarium is already outgrown, and new buildings have been authorized by the General Conference. The first to be erected will be a psychiatric building to the west, for the treatment of mental cases. Likely the second will be a building still farther west and south for tuberculous patients.

The plans formulated by the church architect include other buildings as the needs of the institution demand, until some day the main building now occupied may be used exclusively as executive and medical office building. But that is in the future—yet a dream.

We were struck with the thoughtful care manifested in utilizing to the best advantage the space and equipment now had. The X ray department is well equipped and is an absolute necessity these days, though it was not so many years ago that the Sanitarium was struggling along without one. We are not only glad to see the institution keeping up with the march of progress mechanically, but above all we appreciate the spirit which pervades the place and the entire Health Department, even including the specialists who have no affiliation with the church but respect its ideals and often are glad to contribute their part in cases of genuine need. Doctor Harrington has had considerable surgical and other experience in war work. He is a specialist in diagnosis. As the services of specialists in other branches of the profession are required for certain cases, they are called in from Independence, Kansas City, and other points for that purpose. In this way the finest combinations possible in medical and surgical skill are made possible.

If our space permitted, it would be a pleasure to elaborate on a number of these points, but we shall conclude with one instance, typical of the spirit of service that is engendered, especially by those stricken and unfortunate.

Two evenings a week J. A. Gardner, an Independence brother, visits the Sanitarium and cares for all the barber work of the patients. To many of these it is a Godsend, and a great deal of his service is gratis. It might seem a little thing, yet it means that much time given over absolutely to others that might selfishly be employed otherwise. It is on a par with the visits of the elders who administer to the sick, a service greatly appreciated and bringing its own reward.

The Independence Library

By Vida T. Short, Librarian

An important institution in the education of Zion's inhabitants. This is from October Autumn Leaves.

The Independence Latter Day Saint Library consists, at present, of upwards of five thousand two hundred volumes. These are arranged on steel shelving in two stack rooms, one containing the books of reference, which are not taken from the building, and the other the circulating department, which is open to the public.

THE LIBRARY BUILDING

Located next door to the Stone Church, this is becoming an increasingly popular place in Independence. Here are housed some 5,800 books and more coming in constantly.

To this are added fifty books from the State Circulating Library at Jefferson City, every three months, the only cost being the freight charges each way.

In this department is a section of books for the use of the Sunday school officers and teachers; another for the text and reference books used in the institute work; another is reserved for a private collection of books on music, loaned for the use of the members of the new musical club; still another reservation is for reference books along the line of the work outlined by the Women's Department.

The books in the library on religion outnumber any other one class, yet the other general classes, philosophy, history, natural science, useful and fine arts, literature, sociology, and general works are all represented in some measure.

There are primary books for the little folks, books for the boys and girls, for the young people, for all others—a constantly increasing variety.

Very many of these—hundreds of them—have been donated. President Smith sent in so many that Sister Smith said if she missed any of hers, she felt sure that she would know where to find them.

There is an unusually fine collection of books on ethnology—most of these from the Presidency's office—and, by the way, the other day Brother William Madison showed us a full-page picture of his grandfather in one of these, the aged Chippewa chief, Meja-kigi-jig. These books, along with those on archæology and kindred subjects, are soon to occupy a separate department along with the beginning of an archæological museum.

The Dewey system of classification of the books is being installed, and when present plans are perfected, the Cutter author numbers added, and a complete card index of all the books is available to the public, the library will be in good working order.

The Newark system of charging out the books is used, and the librarian's hours are from eleven o'clock to five, though the reading room is open from eight to five, also on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday, and Friday evenings.

Both stack rooms open into the reading room, a pleasant, well-lighted room, and the librarian's chief joy. There are pictures on the walls, and bookcases in every available space, the largest one filled with church publications, old and new, others containing special reference books suited to the place.

There are two encyclopedias in this room, the Britannica and the New International, the latter with yearbooks up to date.

The chief feature of the room is the long reading table, and the tempting array of many of the late magazines and periodicals.

Some of these are given to the reading room by subscription, and other friends of the library donate their own magazines as soon as read. After they have been here a certain time, a number of these are sent to the Sanitarium.

Brought in as they are from various sources, we note at present the following: American Review of Reviews, The Red Cross Magazine, Collier's, The Woman Citizen, Illustrated Review, California, Radio News, Literary Digest, HERALD, Ensign, Autumn Leaves, The Outlook, Farm Journal, Missouri Ruralist, Youth's Companion, The Musical Monitor, Boy's Life, The Geographic Magazine, The Watchman, Musical American, Popular Mechanics, Munsey's, Poultry Topics, Judge, and Life.

On Thursday mornings the long table is set to one side, and chairs are placed in rows for the little ones, for this is their hour, the story hour. There are two classes, one in an adjoining room. One is entertained by Sister Daniel Macgregor, and the other by Sister Nellie Sampson, of Denver, who is spending the summer in Independence. These pleasant hours are popular with the children.

While we are quite sure that the library has not as yet fully come into its own, we are just as sure that it is coming, and are very hopeful. On the conscious need of its help, depends the usefulness of a library.

The studious boys who ask, "Has the latest Radio come yet?" or the boy who is finding here helps in his geometry or trigonometry, "Just what I wanted," he says, the little lads who slip shyly in to look at the pictures, the student who comes eagerly searching for knowledge in the encyclopedias or other reference books, the elderly ones who often drop in to spend a pleasant, quiet hour, the missionary who wishes access to the old periodicals, or it may be a helpful book he is after, all these presage the coming of the day when the library will be recognized for what it should be, a source of available information along all lines.

Independence Institute of Arts and Sciences

A school for those unable to attend regular institutional classes.

One of the unique and most appreciated institutions of Independence is the Independence Institute of Arts and Sciences, under the direction of Walter W. Smith, as its president. This year begins its fifth season of successful work, registering during the opening week, beginning September 14, 242 pupils.

The keynote of this institution of learning, is classes in the day and evening "for those who must work but are willing to study." It thus occupies a special field and fills a need not otherwise provided for in the church.

Its instructors donate their services entirely without remuneration, except the joy of service rendered to others. They are a fine corps of men and women, duly qualified by previous training in their special fields, so that the work they do is subject to full credit. The school is as yet not a fully accredited institution, for lack of buildings and equipment; yet the work done is given individual consideration and the graduates invariably given full credit on examination, on the basis of junior college work.

Two new departments have been added this year, engineering and mothercraft. In addition to these, courses are offered in kindergarten-primary training, religious education, social service, and high-school and commercial subjects. The radio work hitherto done by the institute will be carried on in the future by the recently organized Central Radio School. The school work is done in the library, the Stone Church annex, the general church offices, and other rooms. To date eleven have graduated from the kindergarten-primary training department, and have been enabled by this means to enter the teaching profession in the public schools.

The board of directors of the institute consists of the members of the First Presidency, Frederick M. Smith, and Elbert A. Smith; the members of the Presiding Bishopric, Benjamin R. McGuire, James F. Keir, and Israel A. Smith; Bishop John A. Becker, and George N. Briggs, president of Graceland College. The faculty is the chief asset of the institute, and the personnel is as follows:

Walter Wayne Smith, Ph. B., B. D., M. A., President, Director of Religious Education Department.

Eunice Winn Smith, A. B., Registrar, Director of Kindergarten-Primary Training Department.

Mable Knipschild Smith, B. S., A. B., M. A., Director of Social Service Department.

New Radio School in Independence

During this season a new radio school has been established at 513 Lexington Street, called the Central Radio School. It is the successor of the Independence Radio Institute, formed earlier in the summer by Arthur B. Church and Paul E. Anway.

An organization has been formed with a capitalization of $10,000, all but $3,000 of which has been subscribed, and the directors selected Arthur B. Church to act as president of the Central Radio Company for the first year, and Paul E. Anway to be the secretary-treasurer, these two acting as managing directors of the company and school. They are working on a stewardship basis and glad to help the church in this way.

THE HOME OF THE CENTRAL RADIO SCHOOL

Fitted up this year and beginning auspiciously its career as the largest and only exclusive radio school in the Middle West.

The boys have had to remodel the building throughout, one which was moved on to the spot this year, but as a result of much hard work they have succeeded in providing space for fifty students in the classrooms and fourteen roomers in the dormitory rooms.

They will have wireless antennae on the pole on the tower of the building, a radio phone sending area of from three to four hundred miles and a radio telegraph sending distance of up to fifteen hundred miles, with receiving power much higher than that. In addition to this, they have quick connection with the big tower at the Saints' church by telephone, and will no doubt have all the latest equipment in wireless telephone service with that station which will continue its service with Lamoni and other points where it is expected stations will be established.

This school is the successor of the radio department at Graceland College and of the instruction department in the Independence Radio Institute.

We predict that the work of the organization will rapidly broaden in its interests, even though it is now doing an extensive mail order business in handling supplies. Only recently a day's orders called for material to be sent to both Alaska and Mississippi. Most of the trade is with schools and college and experimenters in radio work, known as "radio experimenters."

Brother Church is at the head of the department of communication of the new industrial commission formulated by President F. M. Smith at the late General Conference, and the work of that department must eventually include all forms of communication, including the telephone. With a proper appreciation of the value of this department to the church as an organization and as individuals, the systems of communication possible will all be developed until at all times all parts of the regions round about will be within easy communicating distance of the central place.

The City of Independence

This old place had an important part in the early history of Missouri.

Ten miles to the east of Kansas City, and about a mile and a half south of the Missouri River where it takes a big turn and starts east across Missouri, lies Independence. It is a historic old town of some twelve thousand inhabitants, its earlier citizens being largely of the aristocratic type for which the South is famous. Their descendants have remained, and the city has grown continually though not rapidly until to-day its charm lies in the fact that it is almost purely a residential place, but with all the advantages of city life, being closely connected with Kansas City in all its affairs, especially the industrial aspects. Good street car service is maintained and thousands of men and women are carried to the city each day to help supply the enormous demands of the southwestern metropolis for help.

The city was incorporated in 1827, and old gazetteers mention Kansas City as a suburb of Independence. For many years it played an important part in the settlement of the great Southwest, being at the eastern terminus of the old Santa Fe Trail, now a memory but cherished by a long line of granite monuments which show its original course over the plains.

The tide of emigration toward the Southwest followed the Missouri River from the East to this part of the country, where it was the custom to land just north of Independence and come to the little place for outfitting with clothing, food, guns, horses, wagons, and the typical equipment of the plains pioneer. Not only did this place contribute strictly outfitting materials, but up till about 1840 was the point from which a large amount of general trade was dispatched to the newer country to the west.

But to-day the old trail is traversed by a constant stream of modern traffic, following the meandering course probably first made by the buffalo and the Indians that hunted them.

An excellent system of rock roads extends from this place as a center, perhaps thirty or forty miles, tapping a rich agricultural section, dotted with fine modern farm homes. The section has its own road-building material in abundance, and it is used to good advantage in blending farm life into that of the city.

While Independence remains the county seat of Jackson County, and has a large courthouse commensurate with the vast amount of official routine necessary, the old log building that once housed the county officials is still preserved on a spot to which it has been moved, a society being organized for that purpose. But there is no jail in the city. Furthermore, prohibition was put into operation some two years before the national amendment went into effect, though the State itself was still "wet" up to that time. No Sunday amusements are allowed.

The city has a complete school system, the William Chrisman High School being among the largest in the State, fully accredited, and offering the advantages of normal training. It is a member of the Northwestern Association.

A fine public library offers excellent literary advantages to its citizens, while Kansas City's immense collection of publications is also easily accessible. Recent reports are that more books have been read this summer than any previous summer season.

The Jackson Examiner is a local newspaper with weekly and daily editions, edited by W. M. Southern, and is universally known as one of the cleanest and most liberal papers in the State. Its editor has been a leading spirit in the development of good journalism in Missouri.

The community owes the local electric light plant, which provides excellent service in heating and lighting, at a very low cost. The gas plant is a private enterprise but furnishes good service at usually prevailing rates.

Most of the Saints live in two wards of the west end of the city, though there are large groups here and there elsewhere in the place, some of them making up what were formerly rather large branches in such communities as the South Side, Walnut Park, Enoch Hill, etc. The Saints invariably take an active part in all movements for civic betterment, one of the latest developments being that Bishop M. H. Siegfried has been elected vice president of a chamber of commerce committee in process of organization for public betterment.

The Independence Sanitarium is considered as a civic asset, furnishing convenient hospital service and the best medical skill to all patrons, of whatever religious belief.

While Independence has its own civic boundaries and local government as a city, there is no apparent dividing line between its limits and Kansas City, the entire territory being built up in residential and small business sections.

The new band is making wonderful progress and on Thursday evening of last week favored the public with a very creditable concert. The band has adopted the title of "Knapp's Military Band," in honor of their leader, Mr. W. M. Knapp, who has proven himself to be an excellent instructor, and in time will bring the band up to a high state of proficiency. Brethren Orville James, Will Mills, and Alma McCallum, clarinets; J. W. Luff, piccolo; Ola White, Ammon White, and Burr Loar, altos; Frank Barbee and Charles Austin, tenors; L. R. Wells, baritone; John Barbee, tuba (bass); Will Bartholomew, Charles Mills, Mr. E. F. Grinter, and Mr. Robert Moore, cornets; Alma Chatburn, bass drum, and John Robinson, snare drum, compose the membership at present, from which it will be seen that the Saints are well represented and have more than an ordinary interest in its success. They play in good time and measure, and do remarkably well for the short time they have been practicing. We are already beginning to feel proud of them.—Independence item, Zion's Ensign, August 1, 1896.

Strange as it may sound, some of the older books on statistics and geographical data list Kansas City as a suburb of Independence. As a matter of fact that was the case in the earlier days, and even to-day Independence has the courthouse of Jackson County, in which Kansas City, Missouri, is located. Independence is a city of some ten thousand people, and Kansas City, the business district proper of which is ten miles to the west, is a place of around a half million people.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

A Country Church

Showing what can be done in an agricultural community, by what has been done.

[In connection with the work of Zion, it is interesting to see what has already been done in the agricultural communities. There are many prepared to say, "You can't do this, and you can't do that," and others have gone ahead and have done many of the things which have been said to be too difficult. Our readers are already aware of what has been done in the Colonies. The laws of Iowa are much more favorable to such an organization than are the laws of other States. Now we note in the Country Gentleman an account from which the following extracts are taken, and what has been done for and by a country church, and in what appears to be distinctly a farming community. This article shows what can be done, because it has been done and is being maintained.—EDITORS.]

"In Orange Township, Iowa, are 142 of the best farms in that State; 142 of the largest, whitest, most comfortable farmhouses; 142 of the biggest, reddest barns; 142 of the tallest, stoutest silos; 142 herds of fine cows; 142 families of farmers—a total population of 802 of the most prosperous, contented, and happy souls to be found anywhere.

"This township has been settled since 1850, but there has never been in it a saloon, a drunkard, a pauper, a Bolshevik, a dance hall, a justice of the peace, a constable, a crime, a lawyer, a lawsuit, or a quarrel of any consequence.

"Orange Township is six miles square; and in the exact center of it is its only church, which is said to be the largest and costliest church in the open country in America; with the biggest rural Sunday school in Iowa. Of the 802 persons in the township, 375, nearly one half, are members of this church. One to every one and one half persons of the farmers' families attend this Sunday school.

"From this church have gone forth in recent years ten preachers, two college professors, and seven missionaries, all of them from the farm families to which this church ministers. Three of those missionaries are supported by this church.

"From this farmers' church has gone out, too, a mission church to the people of the near-by city of Waterloo; it has a membership of 200. There are many city churches that have planted branch churches in the country, but this is said to be the only country church that maintains a branch in a city.

"All but four of the 142 farms in Orange Township are owned by native-born Americans; and of the fifty-six tenants in the township all but four are native-born Americans. All of those Americans, both owners and tenants, are of German ancestry. They came from Pennsylvania to Iowa and are members of the Church of the Brethren, commonly known as Dunkards.

"The first man to take up a homestead in Orange Township was a Dunkard from Somerset County, Pennsylvania. This sect was known then as German Baptist Brethren. A few years ago the name was changed to Church of the Brethren. The nickname, Dunkard, comes from the German word tunker, meaning to dip, and was given because they baptize by dipping the convert under the water three times in succession.

"The first settler wrote back to his relatives and former neighbors in Pennsylvania and told them of the richness of the soil; and other settlers came and have been coming ever since.

"The church of this township has a committee the business of which is to see that no undesirable person comes to live in the township. If a man wants to sell his farm this committee undertakes to find a buyer, and this buyer is always a member of the Church of the Brethren. There are always many more applicants for farms than there are farms for sale. . . .

"The Iowa State College of Agriculture made a rural social survey of Orange Township three years ago, the first township survey made in the State by that college, and it found fifty-seven homes equipped with running water; forty-seven with bathtubs; thirty-four with indoor toilets; sixty-three with gas or electric lights; sixty-eight with power washers; thirty-six with electric or gas irons; seventy-six with carpet sweepers; seventy-six with vacuum cleaners; seventy-two with furnace, hot water, or steam heat; 132 with telephones; fifty-five with refrigerators; forty-five with sleeping porches; eighty with pianos; seventy-five with motor cars. The 142 farm homes in the township had an average of 8.6 rooms each.

"In 132 of the 142 homes a total of 170 daily papers were taken; in 126 homes a total of 393 weekly papers and magazines were taken; in 105 of the homes a total of 168 monthly papers or magazines were taken; sixty-nine owners of homes had an average of 106 volumes in their libraries, and fifty-six tenant homes had an average of ninety-five volumes each.

"The eleven school districts of this township were consolidated into one district four years ago, the eleven small school buildings were sold to farmers, and the one big central school was built close to the church. It has 245 pupils this winter who are carried to and from the school in twelve omnibuses when the ground is bare, and in twelve sleds when there is snow on the ground. The majority of the young men and women of the township, all of whom are sons and daughters of farmers, take the full high-school course, which includes agriculture and domestic science. Many of them go away for a college course too. A large percentage of those college graduates come back to the farms. The state-college survey showed that twenty-seven owners of farms and eighteen of their wives, and eighteen tenants and fifteen of their wives, had been in college. Of the eighty-three hired men in the township twelve had been in college. In the majority of cases the college to which they went was one of the denominational colleges of the Church of the Brethren.

"Professor O. W. Hamer, principal of the consolidated school, is a graduate of the University of Chicago. In summing up the results of its survey, the college professors said:

"The stranger coming into Orange Township is at once impressed with the high standards that seem to prevail generally. Parents seem to be very solicitous of their children's actions, welfare, and happiness. The children seem to have a deep regard for their parents, and all without the parents being in the least severe with them. Corporal punishment of children by parents is almost unheard of in the township. The school records show, and this is confirmed by the secretary of the school board, who has been secretary for years, that for many years no pupil has been expelled from school for misconduct."

"The survey says that the religious situation is unique, especially in that the church plays such a large role in the life of the community in general."

A. B. Macdonald, the author of this article continues:

"I rode through Orange Township with the Reverend Albert P. Blough, who has been the religious guide of the people for more than a quarter of a century. As we went over the freshly graded road that is to be a wide graveled highway straight through the center of the township, he told who lived in the big farmhouses along the way.

"These folks have solved the problem of how to make a living," he said. "They have all they need of this world's goods. Their lands are rich; every acre of land in this township is good tillable soil, except where the two creeks wind their ways, and where two or three groves cover an acre or two. These farmers know how to keep their land rich and how to make it produce to the utmost. They are good farmers. They read and study the science of farming. They know the value of pure-bred flocks and herds. The State Agricultural College at Ames has made of this township an experiment station for years. They come here to try out their experiments, because they know that here is an intelligent class of farmers to welcome and encourage them."

"The farmers of this township own their telephone system. The line runs into Waterloo, and there the association pays a switching fee to connect with other lines. Enough non-members of the association rent telephones to pay for the upkeep of the lines.

"We have a cooperative egg-selling association, the first in the State, its object being to produce more and better eggs. The eggs are guaranteed to be fresh and each egg is stamped. The association sells 15,000 dozen eggs a year to one firm in Waterloo and gets four cents a dozen above the regular market price.

"We have cooperative threshing and silo-filling outfits, a cow-testing association, and a cooperative creamery that has been in existence thirty-one years. Its butter sells for from two to three cents a pound premium. Its income is about $100,000 a year.

"So, you see, in the things of this world we are well supplied in this township. The great concern of the people now is to live right and to get the most joy out of life. They have solved the problem of how to get a living, and now their problem is how to get the most satisfaction out of that living; they are doing that through the influence and activities of their church. The church forms the community tie that knits us all together in bonds of friendship and love."

"One corner of Orange Township touches the boundary of Waterloo, a city of about 35,000 people, with theaters, moving picture shows, dance halls, and other allurements of a modern city. I asked Mr. Blough if the folks of the younger generation were enticed away by the city, or were they loyal to the church of their fathers. He said:

"In my opinion the young folks are more attached to the church than even their fathers and mothers were. The church membership is growing. We added fifty last year without a revival, although I believe in revivals and aim to have one in my church at least once a year. But our church is revivalistic and evangelistic all the time; we never forget for one instant that the greatest end of the church is to preach Christ, and that all other things are secondary in importance to that."

It will be noted that this is relatively a small community. The church is located in the center of the township, six miles square. The church finances are met by assessing each member under eighteen, a dollar a year; those from eighteen to twenty-one, five dollars a year; those above twenty-one are assessed according to the property they own, and a yearly budget is provided of the church, and also of the city mission.

"Of course we plan to keep our young folk interested in the church and in the farm too. We crowd into our church work and into our farm work all the fun we can. We are a happy, cheerful people. You'd soon discover that if you came to one of our picnics. They are love feasts indeed. Take our harvest picnic, for example. It is held every summer between harvest and threshing, on the banks of Blackhawk Creek. A committee is appointed to decide what the "eats" shall be, and every family is notified to bring so and so. We have as many as one thousand at that picnic. The stranger is made to feel at home, and treated as one of us.

"Then, there is the Fourth of July celebration, distinctly a Sunday school affair, designed to keep the boys and girls away from the city on that day. In the forenoon we have a program at the church, with the patriotic feature at the front. We have a dinner for all in the grove near the church, and in the afternoon basket ball and baseball and other games.

"Another big event is the annual banquet to our young people when they come home from college for the holidays. This is held in the basement of the church, where we have the most modern kitchen and a large dining room. Only unmarried persons and those who have been married less than one year are eligible for it.

"Thanksgiving Day and Christmas and Easter are big community days, with a sermon always in the forenoon and a basket dinner in the church.

"Many of our farmers and their wives are college graduates and they have an annual banquet in the church. Every summer we have a community picnic especially to make newcomers to the township feel at home. All hired men and women and any who have recently moved into the township to live are invited and welcomed. We call this our get-together picnic. We have another way of making our hired men feel that we look upon them as of us and equal to us in every respect. Some Sunday morning in summer our Sunday school superintendent will announce that on a certain afternoon all hired men and grown-up boys are to be let off early in the afternoon to meet at the church. They come that afternoon and people are there with motor cars to take them on a tour of the township, with a big picnic dinner at the end of the trip."

"Carefully Selected Tenants"

"Then we have a Golden Rule Sunday school class of unmarried girls, and a young men's class of unmarried men. Those two classes are always entertaining each other with some kind of a surprise party. They have great fun out of it and, here the pastor turned to me and winked, 'it solves the problem of getting the young folks married off.' And he laughed. . . .

"When a farm is to be sold we older heads get together and decide upon one of our promising young men whom we wish to keep here, and we often go on his notes and help him to get started. Some who do not live among us say that is a narrow way. But in the cities they have restricted neighborhoods; why shouldn't we combine to keep the springs of our neighborhood life pure, and where the church has been so supreme in doing good, why shouldn't we combine to keep out the anarchists and infidels and Bolsheviks? We don't want them among us."

The Best Soil in America

This article helps us appreciate the natural advantages of the Zionia region.

In the Country Gentleman for April 3, John R. McMahon discusses relative fertility of various soil areas in the United States.

Leaving out all considerations of market, improvements, population or lack of population, labor conditions, freight rates, mosquitoes, or rainfall, the richest soil is the black belt, including the corn belt country of the north central States, extending in rather a narrow strip from north to south.

"According to the latest data of science the bonanza territory of the Central West is divided into three parts. . . .

"There is first the dark or blackish earth that you begin to see in Ohio in spots and patches. This increases in Indiana until it becomes an unbroken belt that sweeps over the whole of Northern Illinois and into the southeast corner of Iowa. It is wet or moist loam soil which often needs artificial drainage.

"Next there is the larger area of dark, well-drained soils with more or less lime content. This takes in the rest of Iowa, Northern Missouri, the western three-fourths of Minnesota, easterly parts of the Dakotas, Nebraska, Kansas, and Oklahoma, and a strip through Texas to the Gulf of Mexico. Though it is all the same ground, it grows lemons and cotton at one end, wheat at the other end, and corn in between.

"Like a Toe Dancer's Foot"

"The last member of the black triumvirate adjoins the last described on the westerly side, extends similarly from the Canada border to the Gulf Coast region, cuts a little deeper than its eastern neighbor into the Dakotas, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas. It constitutes a strip of fairly uniform width although the extreme range between about seventy-five miles in Texas and Oklahoma up to a maximum width toward 300 miles in North Dakota at the Canada border. Taken altogether, the shape of this trio of soils on the map is like that of a toe dancer's foot, the ankle up north composed of Minnesota and the Dakotas, the heel projecting east into Indiana, the straightened and narrowing instep pointing south and the toes sort of wiggling in the waters of the Mexican Gulf."

This is of particular interest to us, for the reason that northern Illinois, practically the whole of Iowa, and northern Missouri, reaching down to and including Jackson County, is included in this belt, of what is called America's champion soil; even Jackson County is near the eastern end of one strip.

This discussion of the valuable soil continues:

"How about the Mississippi alluvial belt, for instance? Well, we took off our hat to the alluvial in a previous article and gave a medal ranking it only second to the black zone. As for the West beyond the present indicated lines, there is a medal of the third class awarded to the western part of the Dakotas, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas, included in which guerdon are eastern sections of Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, also northern parts of New Mexico and Arizona.

The article continues by awarding a fourth-class medal to the serpentine strip farther west. It notes that the question of irrigation does not enter into this, but only the quality of the land. Also that the far western soils have not yet been as thoroughly analyzed as has been the case with the rest of the United States. It states that the South Atlantic soil ranks far below all of these. Of course there is no comparison with the desert soil. These three or four are the premium soils of America, but first rank is given to the black belt.

So far as Jackson County is concerned, we have added to this accessibility in the early days, to the Missouri River at the north, with the possibility of watering or irrigation if necessary, and a rainfall at least twice that which is considered necessary for irrigation purposes. This holds true of much of this strip of territory running north into Iowa.

FROM THE BRANCHES

Stockton, California. The district conference was held at Irvington and 25 were in attendance from this place. All enjoyed it greatly. J. A. Gillen was present and the Saints were glad to get acquainted with him. Brother and Sister Fred Farr were present at the reunion and welcomed back to the State by all who knew them. One baptism recently.

Hagerman, Idaho. R. C. Chambers just closed a very interesting series of meetings which proved very beneficial. Four were baptized. The Women's Department has been organized with Deborah Sherman as president. Arlie Abercrombie has charge of the Oriole girls. Plans are being made for the organization of the Boy Scouts soon. Several of the Saints attended the Boise reunion and report a very enjoyable time.

In the October number of The National Geographic Magazine is a profusely illustrated article on "Tahiti: a playground of nature," by Paul Gooding. It contains perhaps no more information than our missionaries have contributed to the pages of the church periodicals, but the pictures are certainly works of art, some of them by a local photographer and some others by the author.

There has been considerable discussion concerning the adoption of a prohibition amendment during the war, while many young men were still in Europe. A resolution was made recently at the meeting of war veterans criticizing this action. But it was voted down overwhelmingly. Even those who voted for it took pains to have it understood that they were not opposed to prohibition, but only to the vote being taken during their absence. It would appear to be clear that prohibition has popular approval, even though, as with other statutes a minority continues to oppose.

News from Council Bluffs is to the effect that the interest continues strong and thirty baptisms have been performed. The combination of good advertising, good singing, and

Correspondence Course in Religious Education

There has been a widespread demand on the part of many not in a position to enter Graceland College as regular students for a correspondence course in religious education. It is recognized that such a course could not be of so great benefit as the classroom work, because of inability to participate in the classroom discussion. At the same time it should be of great assistance to those who are desirous of better qualifying themselves for either local or missionary service.

We take pleasure in announcing that we are now in a position to offer the doctrinal features of the religious education course for correspondence study. The study will include lessons based upon the Book of Mormon, Bible, Doctrine and Covenants, Church History, and the doctrinal lectures delivered before the class by representative men of the church.

At the present time the Book of Mormon course is ready and the other courses will be ready in the near future. The study of the Book of Mormon is divided into 36 lessons. These lessons will be sent to the student as rapidly as he is able to handle them. Usually this will be at the rate of one a week. It is urged that those who enroll do so with the idea in mind of making a systematic effort to return the completed lessons on time.

The cost of the Book of Mormon course, to cover merely the expense connected therewith, will be $15. Those desiring to enroll should write at once to The President, Grace-land College, Lamoni Iowa. Announcement as to the balance of the course will appear at a later date.

Pastoral Notices

To the Saints of Central Nebraska District, Greeting: Having been elected president of the district at the last conference, I should like to get in touch with all the Saints; also to hear from all the priesthood and branch presidents, relative to your needs and the opportunities for labor. We shall put forth every effort possible to keep the work moving onward, and I earnestly ask the cooperation of the Saints and priesthood of the district. Write me. Let us get acquainted. It may help some. Your brother and colaborer, CLEARWATER, NEBRASKA. F. S. GATENBY.

To the Saints of Western Michigan District, Greeting: Having been chosen at the late district conference to preside over our district for the coming year (F. W. Hastings and J. E. Bennett, associates), we use this means of expressing our appreciations of the confidence thus indicated, and earnestly request the cooperation of everyone concerned.

In accepting the new duties and broader responsibilities connected with district work, we sincerely seek the concurrence of every member and friend in our territory, to the end that this year may be one of marked progress in every department of church activity, so far as our district is concerned.

“Help one another,” a grain of sand
Said to another grain, just at hand;
“The wind may carry me over the sea,
And then, O! what would become of me?
But come, my brother, give me your hand,
We'll build a mountain and then we'll stand.”

The sentiment expressed above is fine. Put it into action and we may justly hope for satisfactory results.

Our district has adopted coordination. A very few of the branches have, as yet, given the matter much consideration.

We hope to be of assistance to branch presidents in systematizing the work of their organization and departments.

Every officer and department head is expected to study and qualify for more consecrated work and efficient service.

God's work requires, and the hour demands our best! That is what the Master gave for us. Will we be satisfied with giving less in return?

“Duties are ours. Events belong to God.” We would value a letter from branches and scattered Saints at any time when we might render assistance.

Your problems, joys, sorrows, and trials become ours. Let us help you.

Yes, our tasks will be many and duties arduous, but we must meet them and conquer. Hopefully your brother,
H. A. DOTY, President.

The Bishopric

To the Saints of the Old Southwestern Oregon District: Having been appointed traveling solicitor for this part of the district (now included in the Portland District), I am prepared to receive and receipt for all tithes, offerings, and consecrations. The scattered Saints (or any) that we may not have the opportunity to meet very often, if at all, can mail same to me at Myrtle Point, Box 246, and I will return receipt for same. Let us make every effort possible to reach the million dollar mark, and the Lord will bless us. Do not wait for big things, but when you have a little that you can spare, send it in. The Lord only asks us to do what we can.

Also let us prepare for the consecration weeks, that in the great improvement drive we may be able to go over the top with our portion.

We are also laboring as missionary under district appointment, so if anyone knows or feels that good can be done at any place, or in any way, if they will let me know, I will do my best to reach them and do what I can to strengthen the Saints, and build up the work.

Yours for the million dollars tithing, and the advancement of this great cause.

Our Building Program

Never before has our church had before it a definite building program. Now there has been developed that which insures steady progress toward accomplishment in building with the needs of the future clearly in view.

The General Conference building is, as yet, our largest undertaking in the line of edifices. The campaign for the necessary funds must be quickly successful. Those who have long seen the steady progress of spiritual development towards Zion conditions, have rejoiced, and their joy cannot but be enhanced by the evidences multiplying apace that the physical or material realization of our Zion dreams and visions is near at hand. A glorious Center Place, of deep interest to all the church, supported by the curtains of Zion, thronged with a happy, devout people, moving and living in conditions ideal with warm spiritual atmosphere, is the goal toward which we move.

Success to the campaign for funds for the great and much-needed building!

Yours faithfully,

Frederick M. Smith

Music as the Handmaiden of Religion

Address by Elbert A. Smith, delivered at the Stone Church, Independence, Missouri, June 27, 1920, during the Musical Festival, held under the auspices of the Department of Music.

The theme that I have selected for the morning's address is, "Music the handmaiden of religion." It might be well for us briefly to review the historic connection of music with religion.

One writer on the subject that I have read after, says that "among all people music first originated in religious service." If that be true, it means, in other words, that among all people music first originated in man's effort to express his religious emotions and convictions, and would justify the theme I have selected, music as the handmaiden of religion.

Filmore, in his Lessons on Musical History says, "In all ancient nations music was believed to be of divine origin," and Tapper in his Essentials of Musical History says, concerning the Hebrews, "Both Hebrew poetry and music seem to have served from the beginning no other purpose whatever than to extol Jehovah and proclaim and emphasize divine ideals and ideas."

We are particularly interested in Hebrew history because, as Christians, we inherit from Judah; and it is equally true, probably, that in the early Christian church music served no other purpose whatever than to extol the name of Jehovah, and to proclaim divine ideals and ideas.

Of course in modern Christianity music has come to serve many social functions; also military functions, and it is probably true that a great many modern Christians are more familiar with the music of the dance hall and theater than the music of the church; but among our people, whose ideal is that religion covers everything in the way of activity, the same statement ought to be made concerning us that was made concerning the Hebrews.

Origin of Musical Instruments

The origin of musical instruments is found away back prior to authentic history. We do not know whether Adam and Eve had any music in the home. It is hard to think of them raising their children without at least a jew's-harp, or its equivalent. But it is a fact that as far back as the fourth chapter of Genesis the statement is made of Jubal Cain that he was the "father" or teacher of all those who played upon the harp and organ. He was about the seventh or eighth from Adam, so thus early in their history they had developed two very distinct types of musical instruments.

It is thought that instruments of percussion were first invented, beginning, perhaps, with the effort of some ambitious drum major, who pounded on a hollow log with a club, and from this evolved the great family of drums, bells, cymbals, and other instruments of percussion.

The wind instruments were next invented, beginning with very simple forms, a flute with a single note, or a whistle, or something of that kind, and from that humble beginning was evolved the many wind instruments that we have, up to the great pipe organ, king of them all. So that the shepherd lad who played upon a pipe of oat straw, or the pandean pipes, had a potential cathedral pipe organ in his hand. Of course, he didn't know it. He was a pioneer experimenter, and many had to follow after him.

Then came the stringed instruments, beginning, perhaps, with an instrument of a single string, and suggested by the twanging of a bowstring. That would be my guess, and the theory of evolution being a series of guesses, I guess that my guess is as good as anybody's guess. From that beginning was evolved all the various stringed instruments, including that prince of all, the violin, whose beautiful music we have just listened to. Finally in our day we have invented the most singular instrument of all, the mechanical mocking bird of the musical world—the phonograph. I sometimes think it must have been a severe jolt to Father Time when the phonograph was invented. Singers sometimes sing to kill time, and time then kills the singer, and that used to end it. When Father Time got tired of the croaking of any particular musician, he could finish him off and that was the end of the story; but now we can wind up a man's voice on a spool and unwind it long after he is dead.

Caruso, I suppose, will sing just as sweetly twenty years after he is dead. Harry Lauder will laugh just as infectionously the day after his funeral as he does to-day. But, of course, if that were the only kind of immortality, consisting of a series of indentations in wax, it would be a poor kind of immortality.

The point I am working up to is this, that all these instruments have been used in religious services: and all of them, moreover, have been used in conjunction with the human voice, which is the first great musical instrument, in the service of God. So we are justified in concluding that music is indeed the handmaiden of religion.

The Devil Stole Music

It is true that the Devil took over to his own use musical service, to a large extent. We ought not to hold that against music, however, because we must remember that he took over the whole thing, monasteries, churches, ministers, ritual—the whole business—not simply the music. Yet there was in Christendom a rather natural reaction on that account, and the early Christians would not tolerate any kind of a musical instrument, because they had seen how in Greece, where they had a large following, all these instruments were prostituted to the service of Bacchus and Venus in all kinds of immoral rites. They went to the extreme of rebellion against that prostitution, and it was a long time before they would tolerate any kind of a musical instrument.

We have seen the same reaction in our own day. The organ had a hard struggle to get into the church. There is one denomination to-day that will not have the organ in its service. The violin was long considered to be of the Devil, and would not be tolerated in the musical service. And it is said of one of the early pioneers in our church, Lyman Wight, that he would not allow the congregation in his charge to sing the different parts. They could sing soprano, but they must not sing anything else—lest they pander to the world. So the young people congregated out in the woods, moonlight nights, while Lyman was asleep, and sang the different parts.

Sphere Music

There have been in the past a number of great musical festivals. Job tells us that when the foundations of the earth were laid, "The morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." That may be the origin of the idea that we so frequently note in literature. I refer to the idea of sphere music. The idea that the stars, as they roll upon their wings, in the midst of the glory of God, as the Book of Covenants says, gave forth a melody too deep and grand for mortal ears to hear, but always ascending to God on high in praise and adoration.

Be that as it may, if Job was right, when the corner stone of the earth was laid they had a musical festival.

On the occasion when the Israelites had crossed the Red Sea, and while they were yet looking upon the dead bodies of the Egyptians cast upon the shore, and while their hearts were filled with the terror and the wonder of the miracle that they had witnessed, they got together and held a musical festival, and the record says, "Then sang Moses and the children of Israel this song unto the Lord, and spake, saying, I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." The song continues through the greater part of the fifteenth chapter of Exodus; and at its close all of the women, led by Miriam, came forth with their timbrels or tambourines, and danced and repeated the song that the men had just finished.

In the School of the Prophets

The Israelites are said to have carried with them the musical culture of Egypt, which was more or less well developed and then they proceeded to develop a musical program of their own, particularly in the temple service. The leaders in this movement were the prophets, and especially David. Luther said, "Music is the art of the prophets." And Smith's Bible Dictionary is authority for the statement that music was one of the chief things taught in the school of the prophets. Speaking of David, you will remember the occasion when he went into the tent of Saul, who was possessed of a devil, and with the aid of his harp, cast out the evil spirit. Rather a significant incident. David seemed to have been efficient in casting out devils; he cast one out of Goliath and one out of Saul, using two different instruments, but both of them very effectively.

I might digress here to say that I have heard different men on different occasions argue that the experience of David was an evidence that we ought not to make preparation. We ought simply to trust God. Now that's a good argument if it is properly applied, but it may be carried too far. We may have a mental picture of David waving aside the armor and sword offered to him and going out with his sling, firing at random, God taking charge of the missile and planting it, ping! right in the center of the giant's forehead, thus ending the story; but, probably the facts are that David had passed many years practicing with the instrument used against the giant. He had been a shepherd boy, and I presume he had practiced and practiced on animate and inanimate targets until nine times out of ten he could put a pebble just where he wanted to, so while he went out with faith, trusting God and giving him glory, he was ready. If there is anything in his experience, it is an argument in favor of practice and preparation.

So when he went into the tent of Saul I do not think he went unprepared. Saul was a fearsome man to face, at best, and when he was possessed of a devil it must have been a trying experience to go into his tent and confront him. I do not think that David went in and practiced some wild incantation like an Indian medicine man that exorcised the evil spirit through some magic rite. David was a master of the harp, and I imagine that he played melodies, and sang songs redolent with sacred memories that appealed to Saul, and created a religious, harmonious atmosphere in which the Devil did not feel at home so he got up and left. That was all. The Devil doesn't like harmony. He likes discord. David brought in a quieting, soothing, religious atmosphere of music, and the result was that the evil spirit left Saul. But it takes practice to do that. I wouldn't try to play on the harp. I am afraid it would have exactly the opposite effect and the Devil enter into my hearers.

After They Had Sung a Hymn

When Jesus came into the world it is recorded that the heavenly host appeared over Judea singing and praising God, and wishing humanity well. When Jesus was about to leave this old earth he called his disciples into an upper room where they observed the Passover. He served them the sacrament, and finally when they were about to disband, never to meet again in the flesh, this very brief but very significant statement is made, "And after they had sung an hymn they went out unto the Mount of Olives."

Who do you think suggested singing that hymn? Who do you suppose selected that hymn? Jesus Christ had been Master of ceremonies all during the evening. He was president of the meeting, and without doubt he chose, at the last moment of his last meeting with his disciples, to engage in song service with them.

The Objective of Musical Culture

But perhaps we better pass on to another phase of the subject that I want to consider, and that is, Music as a means and not an end, in itself. A critic I have recently read after, said that too often church music is regarded as an end in itself, when it always should be a means to an end. In other words, our musicians should not be satisfied with obtaining perfection of expression.

They ought not to think of it as being their function to entertain or to show off, but it is theirs to engage in religious service, and their profession is not an end in itself, but a means to an end. We may discover what that end is when we ask ourselves, What is the end of all religion? The answer comes back immediately, it is the development and salvation of man: First to win sinners to Christ, and second to help Christians live the Christian religion.

The gospel of Jesus Christ has a twofold task. The first is by argumentation and logic to convince the mind of man; and the second is to break the stubborn and wicked heart of man; and I conclude that you cannot get very far convincing man until you break the heart of man, and make him truly repentant. Here is where music enters in, because it appeals, not logically but directly, through emotion. It is the language that speaks to the heart. After the preacher has reasoned and the sinner sits unconvinced, the people sing "Nearer, my God, to thee," and something comes into his heart that completes the work.

If this, then, is the objective of music, there ought to be in the church the closest cooperation between the musical department and the department of preaching—the work of the preacher being primarily the mission of preaching to save the world.

Is Music Performing Its Mission?

We may ask ourselves two questions, and the first of these is this: Is music performing its full mission in the work of developing and saving man in connection with the work of preaching the word? I mean throughout the church, in all the branches and districts. Not so many years ago I attended a reunion. The prayer services were splendid; preaching was fine—I thought so; I did part of it myself—but the music was simply atrocious. It was a tragedy. There was one time when the musical department was not performing its full function in the work of reaching sinners and comforting Saints.

Music has its work among Saints in the preaching meeting, in the prayer meeting, and in revival services, to create an atmosphere religious in character, so that the hearts of the people will be ready for the word of instruction or admonition, as the case may be, and in missionary work in tent meetings and street meetings, and missionary meetings of all kinds, the musical department must rally to the support of the preachers. I am glad to say that in the organized tent meetings that we are putting on in Iowa and other places this summer, there are teams of singers going to help the missionaries in their work.

The chorister comes into close connection in his work with the preacher, and has it within his power in his selection of hymns either to make or mar the service, to a very great extent.

You have all heard many anecdotes about the hymns that have been unwisely selected. Brother Greene likes to tell about one time when he and Brother Phillips were holding meetings in a city in the East. Brother Phillips preached on the subject "Hell" and his sermon was immediately preceded by a solo, "Tell mother I'll be there."

Strickland W. Gillilan said when he finished his first sermon the choir sang "Hallelujah, 'tis done."

I remember—perhaps I ought not to tell this, but when Brother Richard Lambert, Brother Carpenter, and myself were leaving Lamoni with our families they gave us a little farewell meeting and sang, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow." One might have thought them glad to get rid of Brethren Lambert and Carpenter.

In contradistinction to these experiences, I recall many times when the opening hymn, without any previous arrangement or understanding, has fitted in with the theme so completely that it was perfectly evident that there had been a spiritual cooperation between the preacher and the chorister, or whoever selected the hymn.

I recall one time going into the pulpit in Lamoni to preach on the mission of Jesus Christ. No one knew what I was going to preach about, but Brother Burgess announced the anthem, "From glory down to Calvary," which fitted in with my theme so perfectly that I felt that the Spirit of God which had directed me in my subject had directed him in his selection of the anthem.

I may as well confess that, as a rule, I do not feel very much interest in many modern anthems. It is probably a lack of education on my part, but I have heard a great many that I have sometimes said, if they were selling for ten cents a dozen I wouldn't take home more than six of them. But sometimes I hear one that is so perfect in its text, music, and rendition that I feel well repaid for listening to those I did not enjoy. Probably, as Mark Twain said, they were better than they sounded. I am more interested in congregational singing.

Does Music Ever Exceed Its Function?

Now we must ask the question, does music at any time exceed its proper function? In the sectarian churches, as we sometimes call them, the sermon has been gradually crowded into a very secondary place. The average sermon is not only short but thin. The modern sermon is a sermonet from a preacheret. A little sugar-coated pellet in a teaspoonful of musical jelly—and the preacher devoutly hopes the audience will swallow the jelly without discovering the presence of the pill.

I hope our church will always have upstanding preachers who give a man's dose of gospel truth; and that their efforts will always be accompanied by a beautiful and powerful musical program, of proper length, that will prepare the hearts of the people and carry home to their emotions the gospel of Jesus Christ.

Therefore I say, God speed the musical work, and especially congregational singing. I do not want to depreciate anthems, but to me more interest attaches to congregational singing. You may have noticed that the Catholic Church to-day is trying to revive congregational singing, which with them for centuries has been absolutely dead. They are trying to revive the old chants. We also want to revive the spirit of song service among people, so that they may sing with the choir. We will need the trained singers to lead us, but we ought to try to follow as we have been instructed by the chairman at the beginning of this service. We must be a singing people to sound forth our songs of everlasting joy in Zion.

I hope that God will bless the musical work of our consecrated and devoted musicians and that he will help them to measure up to the needs of the church in prayer meetings, preaching services, and out on the firing line of missionary work, and that music may indeed be the handmaiden of religion.

Blue Pencil Notes

Cold cream will not cure a cancer. Talcum powder is no good for leprosy.

Systems of ethics, philosophies, "new thought," and other superficial remedies will not cure the thing that ails humanity.

It is a very splendid thing for our men to study philosophy, science, art, literature, all of those things, that their range of knowledge may be increased. But those things are to help them in the declaration of their message; they do not constitute the message.

Some men make a mistake right there. The thing that they are studying is the thing that they preach. If they happen to be studying sociology—that becomes their message. They may not know it, perhaps, but it is so, for the time being at least. Or if they study economics, or psychology, it is the same.

Working that way, a man may preach a sermon as long as Mayor MacSwiney's fast and feed no one. The lecture room is the place for such dissertations. They are very profitable in their place. The pulpit is for the declaration of the gospel of Jesus Christ. These studies may furnish the preacher arguments, illustrations, helps, collateral evidences, but they do not furnish him his message. If they did there had been no need for an ordained ministry or for a restoration; because there are thousands of lecturers, unordained, who can do better work in their special lines before the people than the average elder can hope to do.

We were sent to preach a rather definite message to the world. It is simple, yet by no means narrow. And it is the very thing that the world needs to-day. The essence of it is faith in God, and repentance from dead works, and personal regeneration, or rebirth, or spiritual cleansing, of which baptism in water is a very splendid symbol that signifies everything when the man is truly repentant and desirous to be clean, and signifies nothing when he is not. Community regeneration follows individual regeneration.

The more we study the principles of the gospel the more beautiful and sufficient they seem. Faith in God—that is fundamental in all our preaching, and is needed to be taught more than ever before. The man whose ministry does not increase faith among his hearers stands in jeopardy. Repentance—with men and women becoming ever more reckless, lawless, and Godless, the world over, every minister needs as never before to cry repentance, that he may move sinners toward God. Regeneration, cleansing, personal rebirth—that is getting down to the very base of every Christian experience and of social regeneration as well.

The early elders were told that they were sent out to teach and not to be taught. That was very true concerning the principles of truth that go to make up the gospel of Jesus Christ. No one has ever taught us a new, essential principle; to the contrary, many truths that we first taught have been taken up by the world. In other realms there is much for us to learn. But the man who goes to other realms for his message, surrenders at the point where we are strong and

Spaldings and the Book of Mormon

By Ralph W. Farrell

"Neither the Bible nor the Book of Mormon can be destroyed, for they are the written messages of Almighty God."

The remarkable thing about the two Spaldings of which I write is, neither is the man that some persons, very ignorant of facts, claim wrote the Book of Mormon. The first hero of this sketch is the originator of Spalding's Plasters. It was some fifteen years ago that I advertised a lecture on the Book of Mormon, to be given in a large New England city. I started early in the day to "bill the town," and as I pushed my notice under the doors, I observed that some one had preceded me and had left at every door a circular advertising "Spalding's Celebrated Plasters." It is quite probable that this coincidence resulted in reviving in the minds of certain persons who came to the door, the old line of false teaching connecting Solomon Spalding with the authorship of the Book of Mormon.

The second hero of my sketch is Franklin Spencer Spalding. And I write of him to show how a man can be broad or narrow in his judgment. Mr. Spalding was bishop of the Episcopal Church in Utah. He was a remarkable character and in many respects a splendid gentleman. In his biography, published in 1917, is a letter he wrote to his mother. It reads: "September 10, 1914. Professor Clay is much interested in the 'Book of Abraham.' He suggests that we draw up a set of questions on the Mormon literature and submit it to scholars of the world. He says he knows lots of them at home and abroad and that he will help. He thinks he can get seventy-five opinions himself. I don't know whether it is a good plan or not. Would my mother believe that Moses did not write the Pentateuch if seventy-five scholars said he did not?"

Mr. Spalding did get out the work examining the "Book of Abraham." He sent me a copy with his compliments. I read it. I have read several replies to it. Mr. Spalding proves nothing. In one sense, his position is neither for nor against the Reorganized Church. Nor do the statements of the scholars he submits prove or disprove the interpretation of the prophet Joseph Smith.

Admitting that the statements of the learned men are correct in that several Egyptian pictures and figures, as produced in the Millennial Star, represent the different gods of Egypt, this fact—if such—does not destroy the further possible fact that originally those figures represented just what Mr. Smith claimed for them. The Utah church is bound to take the latter position, for the Salt Lake people have committed themselves to the belief that the "Book of Abraham" was translated by special inspiration.

The true Latter Day Saint Church has never so committed itself. We have built up no house of cards out of false theories, which must fall when the hand of truth shakes it. We do not deny that Joseph Smith thought he received light in his solution of the characters on the parchment which was found on the mummies in his possession. Mr. Smith so states in his diary. We do not deny, neither do we affirm. (By "we" I mean the Reorganized Church.)

The Utah church claims that it believes the "Book of Abraham" to be the word of God. Their elders preach from it on the streets and in their churches. Let the Utah people defend their claim, successfully if they can. We have no such claim to defend. We take no special interest in the Spalding-Abraham theory. I touch on it here, however, to use it as a text for the thoughts of this sketch.

Now recall Mr. Spalding's statement to his mother, a woman remarkable for her clear intellect: "Would my mother believe that Moses did not write the Pentateuch if seventy-five scholars said he didn't?" That's the point, in a nutshell. Scholars in the past have made glaring mistakes. We must accept their statements with caution. Scholars, so-called, are saying that Moses did not write the Pentateuch; that the flood statement, Garden of Eden statement, etc., are but myths. So-called scholars are radically disagreeing in their opinions of Bible teachings. If we believe every claim made by every "scholar" we believe too much and therefore believe error.

Some time ago the transcript of certain characters taken from the plates of the Book of Mormon was submitted to "scholars." It is somewhat humiliating (to them) to state that they did not agree in their conclusions. Mr. Bays defeated his own position when he published in his book these contradictory decisions of these scholars.

Mr. Riley, another scholar, decided to try his hand at explaining away the "mystery" of "Mormonism." He took for his theme Joseph Smith. Completing his work he submitted it to his alma mater, and received his degree. Shades of Phoenicia or Egypt or whatever country that invented letters (degrees)! Mr. Riley advocated the theory that Mr. Smith was a physical weakling; and that his inspiration was the result of ecstasy or "fits" or what not! Some scholar, this! A Daniel, in the form of Woodbridge Riley, come to judgment! We may applaud Mr. Riley for his desire, though sickly desire, to be original. He had waded through the monotonous writings of other writers on Mormonism. He must have read with deep disgust the oft-repeated stories about walking on water, killing hens and sheep, and fortune telling.

Surely the public, thought he, would not tolerate another book dealing with such trash. So fresh from the field of abnormal psychology, our scholar comes, and with his abnormal brain, evidently, makes up a case against Joseph Smith. Joseph Smith, a man weighing between two and three hundred pounds of solid flesh, in perfect health, as his tremendous exertion alone testifies, with a mental power far above the ordinary mind, as his writings witness, this man, pronounced a weakling and a mental pervert, by the scholar Riley. We do not envy him his scholarship. And we do not say a word against true scholarship. We warn against false claims only.

But I want to show you that Joseph Smith has not been the only prophet to suffer at the hands of the "wise."

I quote from the Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, volume 10, article "Prophecy": "It is said, e.g., that Ezekiel suffered from temporary dumbness and hemiplegia (A Klostermann, S K 1 [1877] 391 ff., 417 f. 422). . . . A fairly common theory is that the prophets were subject to ecstasy, and a recent scholar of some eminence, F. Geesebrecht . . . comes to the conclusion that their prophetic consciousness was in part due to the estatic state. . . . The Hebrew prophets have also been charged with ignorance in matters of psychology."

Isn't this wonderful? What these scholars, with their long and unpronounceable names, say must be so. The slander of hysterics is leveled not only against Joseph Smith (by Riley) but also against Isaiah, Jeremiah, and other of God's inspired servants, who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. About the same thing was cried on the day of Pentecost. "These men are drunk." But others, using their common sense, replied: "This cannot be, for it is but the ninth hour of the day, and not possible for men to be drunken, under the circumstances."

To return to Spalding. In his diary entry written while waiting in the Union Pacific Railroad station, Mr. Spalding made this comment: "I am reading the Book of Mormon and am going to read nothing else until I finish it, or at least that is my intention." Again he notes, under date of August 6, 1905, "I am patiently reading the Book of Mormon. It is terrible rot, but I suppose I ought to know it, if I am to represent the district adequately. I shall be expected to be an authority on Mormonism."

Here we might well be much surprised, to find a man of Spalding's culture (and he was educated above the ordinary stage) calling the Book of Mormon "rot." The Book of Mormon is not "rot," and no man who reads it carefully and reads free from prejudice, will call it such. The fact is that Spalding's statement is "terrible rot." The works of agnostics are filled with such statements when referring to the Bible. President Faunce of Brown University thought he was sanely putting the Book of Mormon forever from his mind by making a statement similar, though more modified, to that of Bishop Spalding's.

Just a moment's reading of the Book of Mormon will reveal, to the unprejudiced mind, that such criticisms as those introduced by Riley, Spalding, Faunce, and others, are exaggerated distortion of facts; even less than that, for they do not even squint at fact.

Neither does John Hay squint at fact when he writes this line against the Book of Mormon (as published in the Edinburgh Review, April, 1854): "Not a spark of imagination or invention enlivens the weary sameness of the annalist." Yet other critics tell us that it was Smith's invention; that he invented names, criticisms against secret orders, tirades against sectarianism, etc., and that the entire book deals with gross imaginations. It is surprising how shockingly these renowned scholars disagree. But Mr. Hay lets us into the secret of his misunderstanding of the book—he was half asleep when he read it:

"It seems inconceivable how any man could patiently sit down, day after day, to weary himself with writing sheet after sheet of such sleep-compelling nonsense. . . . We do not remember, among all the ponderous folios which human dullness had produced, any other book of such unmitigated stupidity."

I have stated that no man's education is complete if he fails to learn to play chess and fails to study carefully the Book of Mormon. Messrs. Faunce, Spalding, Hay, et al., may have understood the art of chess playing, but they evidently failed to give the Book of Mormon even a decent reading. Yet they attempt to explain it. They use the Tom Paine method of Bible attack. Paine wrote:

"I have now gone through the Bible as a man would go through the wood with an ax on his shoulder and fell trees. Here they lie; and the priests, if they can, may replant them. They may perhaps stick them in the ground; but they will never make them grow."

Do adverse critics of the Book of Mormon think that they have done a similar work? Perhaps they have, and their efforts will meet the same fate that met Paine's attack. They with their futile efforts will cease to ripple the surface of respectable thought.

Hysteria made its record rise in the latter days of Francis Willard. In an introduction to Women of Mormonism, Miss Willard writes: "Who will lead us along the path of high endeavor which this thoughtful volume indicates, until the Book of Mormon is burned in the blaze of Christian manhood's indignation and woman's righteous wrath?"

I wonder what this writer wanted the Book of Mormon to teach? Did she not know that it upholds the highest type of Christian virtues? Did she not know, what comparatively everyone knows, that the Book of Mormon is more strongly and clearly opposed to the doctrine and practice of polygamy than the Bible itself? Why burn the book? I speak with no disrespect of womankind when I say that Miss Willard did not know what she was talking about. She expressed ignorance that is unpardonable in one that poses as an enlightener of the darkened mind. Yet the whole world seems to be shadowed by a cloud of prejudice that moves the pen to write things absolutely false about "Mormonism."

The prejudice and ignorance that exist are woeful. I take up the higher critic's Bible or God's Bible, written by William Henry Burns, M. A., D. D., (omit one D) and I read: "Is there a judge in this Republic but 'Judge Lynch' that would hang a worthless negro tramp on simply 'probable evidence'?" "Ah," whisper I to myself, "here is a writer who will give us facts, weighed well, pressed down, and running over." But, alas! After reading to page 298, I notice a word that quickens my interest. It is the word Mormon. And I repeat, "Here is a writer that will give us facts." I read one—"The fires of criticism may destroy the fables of the Shasters or the lies of the Book of Mormon; but not the Bible." The lies of the Book of Mormon! What lies? Another promising historian gone over to the great majority. His degrees did not save him. They rather unsaved him; he tripped over the conceit of them. "Alas, poor Yorick." We know them well. And somehow, stop my ears as I may, I can't entirely shut out the whisper of the Psalmist: "And I said in my heart, All men are liars."

But the Book of Mormon is not alone suffering from the thrusts of ignorance. The Bible is sharing a like fate. S. M. Merrill does not overstate the facts when, referring to this phase of the question, he says: "A large number of young men come out of the schools inclined to discredit the authority of much that is in the Bible. They speak lightly, if not sneeringly, of what experienced Christians hold sacred." Our late Senator Hoar wisely though perhaps not correctly stated that higher criticism has eliminated from the Bible all that is of any importance except the Lord's Prayer; but that being left untouched, is sufficient for the wants of Christendom. Wellhausen, famed for his scholarship, claims that "Abraham is not an historical person. A whole series of stories about the patriarchs are cultus myths." (See his Prolegomena to the History of Israel.) "Is it (the Deluge) literal history?" asks Doctor Harper. "No," he answers; "nor is the book of Job, nor the book of Chronicles, nor the book of Kings, nor the book of Samuel." (Biblical World, vol. 4, p. 120.)

"The primitive sources of Biblical history," says Doctor Briggs, "are mythologies, legends, poems, laws, whether inscribed, written, or traditional historical documents and the use of the historical imagination." (Study of the Holy Scriptures, page 555.)

We read in the stenographic report of Mr. Burns's Yale Lecture, published in Zion's Herald, this language:

"One of the most conservative of critics, George Adam Smith, says, 'In the pre-Abrahamic account we are not dealing with history. Some of these Old Testament characters were not real individuals, but as fabulous as Prometheus. The first nine chapters of Genesis to a large extent were taken from the raw material of Babylonian myths and legends.'"

Thus do these higher (spare the mark: they are so high in the air of delusion that they cannot discern the solid foundation of truth) critics level their wisdom against the Bible (as others do against the Book of Mormon). They transform the book of Jonah into an allegory; the book of Ruth into an idyl; the book of Daniel into fiction, and the writer into a forger; the book of Chronicles into manufactured history; and other books of the Bible in a similar way; and give us all kinds of reasons—tentative suggestions, conjectures, suppositions, a priori assumptions, tendencies, theories and possibilities, but no facts; nothing stronger than supposed probabilities. And they ask us to take their ipsi dixits as "law and gospel," whethel their thunderings and vaporings are hurled against the Bible or the Book of Mormon.

"All truth is safe," says Max Mueller, "and nothing else is safe; and he who keeps back the truth or withholds it from men, from motives of expediency, is either a coward or a criminal, or both." To this we say amen—and think of the attacks on the Book of Mormon. We listen to Gladstone speak of the "impregnable Bible," and we add, Book of Mormon. We read four words into Doctor Munhall's statement: "Destroy the Bible [or Book of Mormon]; one might as well think of puny man blotting the sun out of the sky." They stand to-day like the peaks of the Rocky Mountains, facing the mysteries of time and eternity. Neither the Bible nor the Book of Mormon can be destroyed, for they are the written messages of Almighty God, dictated to the souls of men and recorded for the salvation or condemnation of the world. So let it be!

May it please God that in the near future men like Lyttleton and West will arise, and approach the Book of Mormon only to find it solid gold. The Reverend T. T. Biddolph tells us, in the Evangelical Family Library, volume 14, page 102, that Lord Lyttleton and his friends, Gilbert West, both men of acknowledged talents, had imbibed the principles of infidelity from a superficial view of the Scriptures. Fully persuaded that the Bible was an imposture, they were determined to expose the cheat. Lord Lyttleton chose the conversion of Paul, and Mr. West the resurrection of Christ for the subject of hostile criticism. Both sat down to their respective tasks full of prejudice; but the result of their separate attempts was, that they were both converted by their efforts to overthrow the truth of Christianity. They came together, not as they had expected, to exult over an imposture exposed to ridicule, but to lament over their own folly, and to felicitate each other on their joint conviction that the Bible was the word of God. Their able inquiries have furnished two of the most valuable treatises in favor of revelation. So may it be with the Book of Mormon.

Learn to Be Still

By Fred Gregory

"Absolutely silent are all of God's operations—no friction or unrest."

Stillness is heavenly and essential to all growth. All nature responds to it gladly. To the human it is a powerful asset in life. It is the precursor of that peace which passeth all understanding and no life is complete without it. It is the soul of contentment, the secret of mental control. To think deeply, speak calmly, and act peacefully are important factors. This stillness is not the silence of the diplomat, not the foxiness of the crafty, not the indolence of the sluggard, nor the covert policy of the deceiver. Genuine stillness is an eternal verity, founded in truth and love, its heavenly concomitants.

The universe is alive with invisible forces. Every atom, or ion, is impregnated with the power of God and gently contributes its share of peace to the great noiseless whole. The great cosmos is in constant motion. God's omnipotence fills all space and is everywhere in evidence.

The Spirit of God is the greatest of all cosmic forces. Paul declares the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God, and that no man knoweth the things of God but by the Spirit of God. Granting this scripture and much more that might be quoted, note how silently, how quietly this Omnipotent force operates. Absolutely silent in all of his operations. Universally operating in perfect peace, without the slightest indication of friction or its consequent unrest. All noise is lost in eternal stillness. This is God moving in his majesty. What a magnificent example of harmony. This is surely the peace of God that passeth all understanding. Real peace, the gift of God's love.

God's presence in the universe is not merely passive. To the contrary, it is intensely active. Not boisterous, but peaceful, quietly permeating and vitalizing the whole. The way of grace is the way of peace. Silence reigns supreme throughout the great cosmos. Even in ourselves the stillness of the spirit as an active, intelligent entity may be observed. Who among us is aware of the indwelling of the spirit—our real self—from any perceptible movement of the spirit itself? Stop and think long enough to determine the truth of the matter. You will better appreciate stillness. Just think, we possess and operate the body in absolute silence. That is the law. Silently we enter the body at birth and silently we take our leave at death. Were it not for the outward manifestations of life we would have no conscious knowledge of the spirit's presence. And just as our spirit silently functions in our fleshy body so does the Holy Spirit function in silence as the life of the body of the universe. What a wonderful lesson in stillness.

To crucify the lusts of the flesh, put off the old man with his deeds, die to the world, walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit, etc., man must control his conscious mind. He must learn to be still by turning his thought inward where all is still, and quietly holding it there long enough to sanctify the outer consciousness. Then will intelligence cleave unto intelligence, and in a very pleasing manner the divine stillness of the soul will gradually impress its superior intelligence upon the outer man.

The way to peace and happiness is through the mentality.

The mind must therefore free itself from all confusing and boisterous thought and hold itself calm and undisturbed regardless of environment. It can be done.

Don't antagonize, but banish fear and set to work if you would obtain so priceless a jewel. Simply line up with the universal law. Quiet the mind to the stillness of Divinity. Practice daily and you will be rewarded richly. Know that all is quiet and serene within for so it is. Bathe the mind regularly in this heavenly calm and life will take on a new aspect. Old things will surely pass away and all things become new. Be master of yourself and quell every disturbing element. You would not walk around in torture if a pebble should get in your shoe. You would immediately remove it. Use the same judgment and free the mind from all its torturing worries. Learn to be still. It is the secret of self-control and will bring you up to full strength. It is the seed bed of faith, the womb of truth, the key to success. Learn to be still and give the sweet, gentle spirit of truth the opportunity to bless you in spiritual things.

Brother H. M. Aebli writes from Loxley, Alabama, concerning the many activities in which he is engaged, and assures those who have had to do with his conversion and baptism that he is appreciative of all they have done for him. He is holding the office of elder and seeks to magnify the office and calling.

Brother Fred W. Cadow writes from Port Huron, Michigan, that five have been baptized at Yale where some twenty adult members have been located. They have been revived and interested and he believes there is a bright future before them. He believes Brother William Fligg should not be tied down anywhere, as he is an excellent minute man.

FREQUENCY OF EARTHQUAKES PUZZLE MEN OF SCIENCE

"And there shall be earthquakes in divers places, and there shall be famines and troubles."—Mark 13:8.

Frequent earthquakes in North and South America and Europe during the last few months have puzzled Government scientists. They regard the disturbances as a geological anomaly, for they say that the greatest seismic disturbance is known definitely to be in February, March, and April. Their opinion coincides with that of Father Tondorf, director of the Georgetown university seismic observatory.

The Government scientists have no particular scientific reason to suggest for the frequency of the recent earth disturbances. They are making no special study of the earthquakes, and their opinion is that geology is too young a science and too little is known of it for anyone to attempt an explanation of the cause of the anomaly.

Geologists recognize that the earth's surface is in a state of continual unrest, and they explain that whenever the accumulated force passes the "breaking point" earthquakes follow. The disturbances which recently have occurred in three continents are regarded by scientists as movements of the earth's crust and yet they say that some of the shocks may have extended to a depth of 200 miles.

Fault lines or weak places in the earth are well known to the geologists, according to G. P. Morrell, curator of the National Museum, who explained that because of this knowledge a general prediction regarding the area of a disturbance can be made by the scientists. But, he adds, "no sane man" would attempt to say exactly where or when, for a fault may extend for several hundred miles.—Des Moines Register, October 11, 1920.

A NOBLE SACRIFICE FOR THE RED CROSS

On November 11 the annual call for membership in the American Red Cross will be sent out all over the country, and it is hoped that by Thanksgiving Day the people of this country will have again rallied to the standard of this wonderful organization by a nominal support in the way of dollar membership.

The chief use to which the money is to be put this year is home health service, and a perusal of the detailed plans is most productive of enthusiasm over what should be done and can be done only through organized effort. This non-partisan effort to raise our health standards at home and save the vast loss we sustain annually from preventable disease, is certainly worthy the help of the Saints.

The appended item from the Holden (Missouri) Progress shows what one aged sister has done. We could cite many other instances, but our readers know of many in their respective localities.

The following item was handed to us this week: "Mrs. Rachel Mason, who has been living in Kirtland, Ohio, the last few years has joined the Latter Day Saints Home family; she is 81 years of age, but is active and desirous of doing her part." Rather a commonplace item, isn't it? But not when you know who she is. She was an ardent patriot during the war. Two years ago last May she was housekeeper for two brothers on a farm near Kirtland, and made them this proposition: They to donate to the Red Cross the price of the coal it would take to heat the house the following winter, and she to personally cut enough wood to take the place of the coal. She kept her part of the bargain, cutting many cords of wood for use on the farm, in addition to wood donated to poor families in the neighborhood. She did this along with her other farm work, which during harvest time meant the preparation of food for seventeen harvesters. She was born in Halifax, Nova Scotia, married young, and when only nineteen her husband lost both hands in a circular saw. Since that time, she has made her own living and educated her two boys, sending them through an architectural school at Boston. When asked how she could do this hard man's work, she said: "I won't boast about my work, because if it were not for God's help, I could not do it. The people to-day do not follow God's teaching as they ought. I kneel every morning when I get ready for the day's work and ask God to give me the strength to do this work." Mrs. Mason has a very practical religion. Not blessed with an abundance of this world's goods, she is nevertheless always ready to help the "poor" as she is able. Her philosophy of life is summed up in this: "I could not think of coming to this home and doing nothing. One must be useful in this world, and the more you do for others the happier and healthier you will be. Never hold a grudge against anyone. If some one is working against you and he is in the wrong, treat him kindly and pray to God to make him see things in the right way. Believe in God and ask his help and the whole world will be better." And somehow we can not help wondering in these days of billions and war fortunes, if she hasn't really made a magnificent success of life.

FIRST JEWISH ASSEMBLY OPENS IN JERUSALEM

NEW YORK, October 9.—The first Jewish constituent assembly of Palestine convened in Jerusalem Thursday according to advices received at the headquarters here of the Zionist Organization of America.

Although the labor element in the assembly has a majority, no ultraradical legislation is expected, the advices stated, the national radical party being moderate and the "capitalist" group favoring modern social innovations. Women delegates took the seats notwithstanding orthodox protests, is the advice added. The assembly has the sanction of Sir Herbert Samuel, British high commissioner to Palestine.

In the elections held last April not only did many women vote but several were elected as delegates, including two from Petach Tikvah, oldest Jewish agricultural settlement in Palestine.

The national radical party, according to the Zionist organization, favors development of cooperative societies as well as encouragement of private initiative. The "Ezra," or capitalist group, favors profit sharing and other modern social innovations. All parties recognize the sovereignty of the Zionist organization, it is said, some even proposing that it shall have veto power over all legislation adopted by the assembly.—Des Moines Register, October 10, 1920.

COLLEGES CROWDED

Collegiate work in the United States is clearly appreciated, as shown by the following item from the Christian Science Monitor. There is a real demand for more college facilities everywhere.

"Colleges in the eastern part of the United States have been overrun with applicants this fall. It is quite probable that anticipation of such a situation is the main reason for the particularly difficult entrance examinations presented to prospective students. Pending the erection of new buildings, for which there seems to be a general demand in all eastern

PASTORAL

Why Some Priesthood Visits Are Failures

By Edward D. Moore

There are times when a social call, if allowed to take the place of a genuine pastoral visit, is a grave mistake.

"That visit was a failure, and I find myself holding it against that young man to this day. I was in trouble and needed spiritual sympathy. I had a right to it, but I didn't get it."

It was in a Sunday school class where we were discussing the privileges of citizenship, which branched out into the religious responsibilities we bear to each other.

The methods by which the sisters of the church could operate to best advantage, through visiting the homes of the Saints, suggesting kindly little things here and there which would greatly benefit the family and ultimately the entire community, were up for discussion. We had suggested that no tactful member of the Women's Department would knock on a door of a home, be it ever so dirty, and announce that she had come to give it a cleaning up.

No! Neither would a member of the priesthood who used the sense that God gave him and expected he would develop still further, go into a home with the openly announced intention of shaking it up and clearing it out—even though such renovation might be thought advisable.

"But, Brother Moore, why is it that so many times the priesthood come into our homes and chatter about everything under the sun but the vital issues of our soul's welfare—often leaving us untouched and unmoved by divine impulses and incentives?"

What could we say? What would you have said? It is all too sadly and commonly true that such results are apparent.

Then she continued: "I remember once when two of the brethren called at our home. One was an old man and the other a young man. They 'visited' a while, but it was really only a social call, devoid of what one might well expect of men of God. At the time I was in deep trouble and needed just the sort of consolation they could have given, but when I tried to introduce the subject so vital to me the young man pulled out his watch and said they must hurry on, while the older brother continued on with his commonplaces, while his young companion impatiently examined that miserable watch and kept saying they must go.

"That visit was a failure, and I find myself holding it against that young man to this day. I was in trouble and needed spiritual sympathy. I had a right to it, but I didn't get it."

Can you blame her? We could not.

It is true, as we explained to her, that there are people and occasions when it seems humanly impossible tactfully to break over the barrier and broach the intimately personal phases of religious discussion that every pastor has a right to discuss with his members. Sometimes it seems best to adjourn the visit sine die and return at a more opportune time. Yet to our way of thinking, a pastoral visit has as a basic objective such opportunities as she afforded. What if there are a few bores in every community who think only of their woes? They perhaps did not so consider this sister, and even if they had, we raise the question: Was it not their duty to reach her best motives through this channel? Isn't it a principle of good pedagogy that we must proceed from the known to the unknown? Do we go into homes of the Saints to dominate them with our personal ideas, when we may reach their hearts by other methods?

There are always possible extenuating circumstances that may alter such cases. These brethren (whoever they were, and names do not matter) may have made previous engagements that should not have been broken, but granting that, the most important engagement for a succeeding visit would have been to return to the home of this sister in order to discuss with her the biggest thing in her life at that time.

Personal evangelization is one of the most satisfactory branches of service to God. The preacher who goes into the pulpit saturated with the human interest experiences that come to him only by intimate contact with the members of his flock has a message that will unlock the hearts of his hearers, for he has found the key.

Yet those experiences do not come to the man who is afraid to converse with the members of his branch concerning their personal habits and ideals. A friendly call has a definite value, it is true, if it is not allowed to stand in the way of a genuine pastoral visit at which minister and member exchange frank views as to what it means to follow Christ.

It is surprising what revelations of the soul struggles that make up life one gets when he is fearless yet humble. Few people really resent straight-from-the-shoulder suggestions from one whom they recognize as their true friend and representative of Christ.

It has been our lot to visit all sorts of people, from high presiding officials in the church to members whose names were a blot on the records of the organization, yet the occasions when they have been discourteous have been so few and far between that we cannot recall them. We have discussed ethics and morals and religion with them all, including half-demented ones, ex-inebriates, and those whose "Golden Rule" was to do the other fellow first, yet none of these have sought deliberately to avoid the issues we put squarely up to them.

And this is not boasting. Any man who has gone into the homes of the Saints as a minister for Christ and had the courage of his convictions will testify with us that God has truly opened the eyes of the spiritually blind, unstopped the ears of the spiritually deaf, and made the spiritually maimed to leap and walk.

On the other hand, we are hoping some of those to whom we have gone in the past may not read this, for to them we may have seemed as sounding brass and tinkling cymbal. We trust they will forgive us and forget those occasions when we were getting our bearings.

It is a double tragedy when we go empty-hearted and timorously to God's people. Sometimes we leave impressions of genuine dissatisfaction such as the sister quoted suggests, but more often the Saints must conclude that either the system is faulty or the servants are inefficient, they are not sure which. We may have a serious charge to answer for at the great judgment bar of God for not having said the straightforward things necessary to set a soul aright. (We are presuming that one's previous record for consistent action will not cast a shadow of aspersion on his teachings by precept.)

We were glad to hear a young priest observe some time ago that he was dissatisfied with his own methods and some institutions of learning, there is likely to be a continuance of a rigid entrance examination policy. Even such a distant college as the University of Maine, in Orono, is feeling the pressure for admittance, and the large enrollment this year is acquired only by 'boarding out' scores of students, in the private homes of not only the university town but adjacent cities and towns."

AT THE FRONT

APOSTLE GRIFFITHS TOURS MISSOURI

I have just made a short tour of my old stamping grounds of forty-two years ago, in the old Northeastern District of Missouri and the Far West Stake. I had the pleasure of being with my aged sister, Mariah Suridag, of Bevier, Missouri, on her seventy-ninth birthday. I had not seen her for several years previous and certainly enjoyed the visit. Notwithstanding her extreme age she is able to keep house, does her own cooking, and cared for me while there. I also visited with the Saints there, most of whom I have known for very many years. It was at this place that I was ordained forty-four years ago this summer. Of course it seemed like being at home to be there, and very encouraging to meet some of the old Saints; only a few of them are left, most having passed over the great divide to their eternal reward. We have a number of bright, intellectual young men who seem very much interested in the work and who, if faithful, will make competent ministers for the Lord. I also met with my nephew, Iver Suridag, who seems to take great interest in the church work—one of two nephews known to me to be interested in the Lord's work.

My next point was Brookfield where I spent a few days with my only brother and his two daughters, one a Catholic, the other affiliated with the Presbyterian Church, and he, seemingly not concerned about religious matters at all. This was discouraging and caused me to feel very sad to think that I am out trying to save others and don't have time to devote to my own relatives, as I very seldom have the pleasure of meeting with them.

I next called at Hamilton where I spent about a week with Brother Coleman Snider and family, old-time friends—at least his father and mother were special friends of mine in the days of my youth, when I needed a friend indeed. I performed missionary work in these parts, namely: Kingston, old Far West, Crooked River, Wakenda, and in Daviess County close to old Haun's Mill. I preached at Kingston in their commodious chapel to a good-sized audience, and likewise in the old Far West church across from the old Far West Temple Lot where Uncle William B. Smith, brother of the martyred Joseph, J. M. Terry, and I preached on the corner stone forty-two years ago this summer. The Saints from all over the country in those days gathered at this sacred spot and held a mass meeting. There were a great many of the sons and daughters of the old mobocrats present on this occasion who seemed very bitter in their feelings against the Saints. Many wonderful changes have taken place in that part of the country within the last forty-two years. The houses in those days were nothing but shacks, and rude sheds housed the stock. The fences were in a dilapidated condition, and everything indicated that the people inhabiting that part of the country were not very industrious. Most of the houses had only one room with a half window and a door; the whole family slept in the one room. Prejudice was very strong against us, and almost everywhere we went to preach we received notices to leave forthwith, and if we didn't obey the command we were threatened with death, to be sent, we were told, "where old Joe Smith is—in hell." Brother William B. Smith took for his theme, "The temple," and I have never heard anyone from that day to this deliver such a grand, edifying discourse on that topic. He must have been a very powerful and eloquent preacher in his young days. I was never associated with a brother in the ministry others he had observed. Moved with divine discontent, he will progress, and with him will be led the Saints who come under his charge. All of us might well check up on ourselves sharply. The times demand much of us as bearers of the priesthood of God.

As leaders of the flock, our sheep must know our voices, and God grant that we shall be known favorably for our qualities of genuine spiritual leadership.

who displayed such patience and who was more content with his lot than this old brother. He would get up early in the morning, singing like a lark. His favorite hymn was, "There are mansions prepared for me above." He related to me many interesting incidents of the early history of the church. He surely acted the part of a father toward me in those days when I needed a friend, when instruction by reason of my inexperience and lack of education was so much needed. I have always had a warm spot in my heart for the good old brother notwithstanding he has gone to his reward many years since.

The face of the country throughout Caldwell County has undergone so many changes that I hardly recognized it as being the same territory in which I traveled in those days. Up-to-date, modern houses, fine barns, good fences, new roads—Caldwell is one of the most beautiful counties, in my opinion, in the whole world, and I have been in a good many countries. The Lord surely made no mistake in selecting this part of Missouri for a stake. Where we had no church buildings forty-two years ago, we now have a number of houses of worship dotting the country here and there, and our people are happily situated, blessed with good farms and modern homes in which to live. If I were a farmer and was going to change my location, I would most surely go to Caldwell or DeKalb Counties. It seems the locations the Lord has selected for the Saints for a gathering place are the most beautiful spots in all the world.

I preached four times in the Oakdale Branch over which Brother Snider presides, and I wish to state that I received a grand reception from the Saints in all these places and that I certainly enjoyed my short visit among them, and I live in hopes that I may have the privilege of visiting that part of the Lord's vineyard again sometime in the future.

In the old days, Brother William B. Smith left me in these parts, after which I was associated with the patriarch, Alexander H. Smith, with whom I then traveled throughout this country right through to Iowa. He, like Brother William, showed me every kindness and consideration and bore with me in my weakness and assisted me greatly with his advice and counsel. He, too, acted the part of a father toward an ignorant boy who had no father to counsel him. The interest he thus took in me has always been highly appreciated. That was a period in my life when I required sympathy, wholesome counsel, and instruction, not only in the things pertaining to the gospel but in matters of common school education, never having had such advantages, being an uninformed Welsh boy. Hence it is that I try in all my travels to sympathize with the boys of our time and take an interest in them, as it is impossible for us to tell from looking at an ordinary boy what he will be in the future. God makes wonderful changes in the boys as well as the older ones, so my advice to parents is to be patient with their boys and to leave them in the hands of the Lord who doeth all things well.

I also visited Haun's Mill, where eighty-two years ago this coming October seventeen men and boys were massacred by a bloodthirsty mob and buried in a well. The old blacksmith shop where the two innocent boys that escaped from the mob were murdered in cold blood is no more. The mill has disappeared, also the well in which those bodies were thrown has been filled up and plowed over. Notwithstanding that these landmarks have disappeared, the memory of the terrible, horrible event remains with us and those who committed those awful acts no doubt have suffered and are suffering the penalty of their crimes.

In Daviess County, across the river, not far from this point Brother Emsley Curtis, father of our present Apostle Curtis, and the writer opened up the work, and all the while we were thus engaged we were threatened with death by sons and daughters of those who were the persecutors of the Saints back in 1838. I well remember that one day a son of one of those, who boasted that his father had helped mob the Saints, did all within his power to kill me with his knife, and a Missouri woman, large of stature, stood between me and him with an old-fashioned cane chair in her hand. It looked as though he would accomplish his evil design for a time, but the Lord protected my life through the woman mentioned.

From there I went to Crooked River, beyond Far West. This is the place where the mob horsewhipped old Brother Harvey Green, and I had quite an experience at this place, threatened with mobs, but stood by the work with the result that I baptized fifteen and organized a branch, and one of the number I was instrumental in gathering in in this seemingly God-forsaken place was our late, worthy Charles Duncan, who was a missionary for many years and died in the harness in Colorado. He was well known throughout the Central and Western States, one of our most active missionaries.

All these scenes and many others were brought vividly to mind during my short sojourn in this part of Missouri. I might say in this connection that Brother Curtis was one of the bravest men I have ever seen in the church. He didn't know what fear was and he was instrumental in removing much prejudice in that part of the world and brought many into the church. He was a powerful preacher and always at work. It is no wonder that he has four sons who are actively engaged in the ministry. God does not overlook the seed of men who rendered such noble service to him at times and in places where every time they went out they carried their lives in their hands.

I delivered four discourses at Stewartville, where we have four branches, to large congregations and with special liberty. It was thirty-six years ago that I preached there last. I met many of the old-time Saints at this place and enjoyed my visit among the people there. We have a young army of men coming up who will make their mark in the church if they continue humble and faithful before the Lord.

I am now in Saint Joseph for a couple of days, from which place I will go to Omaha, thence to Decatur, Nebraska, to attend the district conference which will convene the coming Saturday and Sunday. Will be accompanied by Brother E. E. Long for a time in said district operating among the Indians. I am told that we have a number of Indians there who belong to the church, and our intention is to organize them into a branch so they can be cared for like the white people and be properly fed.

Wishing all success in the Lord's grand and glorious work, I remain,
Your brother,
GOMER T. GRIFFITHS.

ADDRESSES HISTORY CLUB

On Monday evening of this week I spoke before the History Club at the college (by invitation) on "The History of the Mormons and Latter Day Saints in Missouri." You will note that the subject as stated gave me a rare opportunity to set forth the difference between us and the church in Utah and to straighten out in the minds of the hearers the history of the whole movement. I also covered our present status telling of our institutions, etc. A number of the faculty were present, including the head of the history department.

At the close of my remarks quite a number of questions were asked. I have never received a better response to our message than at that time. I very much appreciate such opportunities for the work's sake.

(From letter of F. A. Cool, Warrensburg, Missouri, October 6, 1920.)

OPPOSITION IN KANSAS

I have been in this section for three weeks trying to start something. I went to the Baptist church just across the Nebraska line about six miles from Oketo. This is a place that has been used a few times by our missionaries. There were times in the past when a few would come out. But nothing came from it but the reviving of the Saints in that section. I tried again and the same result followed. I believe if the empty chairs could talk they would say that they believed the gospel. But we will not count them as converts.

Investigation was made and we were able to obtain the use of the hall in Marietta about seven miles away, and a nice place to hold meetings it is. It will seat about three hundred and fifty, and it was free to us and the lights also.

Meetings started here and we were hoping that we would be able to arouse an interest. We had some good meetings here, about ten all together. Those who came were here almost every night and seemed eager for the message.

We were unable to secure the hall last Friday and Saturday. So I went to visit a family of Saints sixteen miles from here. I thought I would have a nice visit and a little rest. I had not been there but a little while when the phone rang and we learned that two Utah elders were to have a meeting about four miles from there. They had told others that they would be glad to meet me and I wanted to see how glad they were.

The first man preached on "authority." He was a boy. He told his story in a faltering manner and he was not well enough acquainted with the Bible to quote it properly. He did not try to read it. He occupied thirty minutes; then the other elder took his turn. It seemed that he had been out a little longer than the first speaker. He spoke on the apostasy, the restoration, the Book of Mormon, and on the mission of Joseph Smith. The meeting came to a conclusion and the benediction was given. I then took my turn. I was a perfect stranger to both of them, and they had been told that I was holding meetings in Marietta, so they were not expecting me.

I asked them if they thought that it was necessary for a man to have authority from God to properly represent him. They stated that it was and quoted some scriptures to prove it. I asked them if they believed that there was a time when the authority was taken from the New Testament church and they said, Yes. I asked them how long they thought it remained in the church and they replied about four centuries. I asked them the reason why it was taken away and they said because they departed from God's law. I asked them if that would work out that way in all ages of the world, and they replied, Yes.

I asked them if the Book of Mormon taught polygamy and they said, No, sir. But they had said previously that they were in harmony with each other, the Bible, and the Book of Mormon. Then I said, "Judging from what you have said, we conclude that the Bible does not teach that doctrine." He denied that and stated that it taught polygamy. He read the passage about Nathan giving Saul's wives to David. He gave me the opportunity and I explained that. He was going to use some other passages and I turned to the Inspired Version and then he denied there being such a thing as an Inspired Version. Then he said it was not finished. I told him then we learn from Andrew Jensen's Chronology that it was finished. (That is one of their publications.)

Then I thought I might reveal myself a little more. I told him that Brigham Young was condemned by his words, that Brigham Young had taught polygamy, which was contrary to God's laws. He had taught that Adam was God, and blood atonement, and since he had taught such doctrine he could not represent God; his arm was flesh. He was worked up then and said it was no use to continue longer. From his point of view, it was not. I invited them to Marietta, told them I would divide the time with them and that I would be glad to have an opportunity to discuss this matter in a public way and that we could get the hall for that purpose. They had the one reply to make, that they were not to debate.

There is pity in my heart for them; sleeping in schoolhouses and strawstacks is the way they are received in this section. They walk and carry heavy suit cases filled with their Utah teachings, but they will not take instruction. May God help them to see the light.

As soon as the discussion was ended with those elders a Dunkard minister approached me in an anxious manner and said he was glad I was there that night. He wanted to know who I was. I told him. He said, "I must have a talk with you." I went to his house the next afternoon.

I found the minister to be a fine man. Our visit lasted from 1.45 until 5.45 and this was called forth by many questions from him and gave me the opportunity to tell him about the restoration of the gospel, the Inspired Version, and the Book of Mormon. The only objection that he urged was found in the last chapter of Revelation, "Man shall not add." I quoted from Deuteronomy the same thought and then his opposition melted. He seemed to appreciate the visit and took me home in the car.

I had three services yesterday. I preached in a Campbellite church three miles east of Marietta at eleven a. m., in the hall at Marietta at three p. m., and also at 8.15. Good attendance and fine interest in each place. I leave this place with many friends and the hope is that at a later date I may do them more good and have the honor of baptizing some of them when they are ready.

I am ever praying for God's work and want to do my part.

In gospel bonds,

EIGHT BAPTIZED

I came here September 15, and have held meetings almost every night since, and from two to three times on Sunday. Have enjoyed a goodly degree of the Spirit, and the interest has been fine.

I baptized eight yesterday; others are interested. One of those that were baptized was a school-teacher. This is the second teacher I have been permitted to baptize this conference year.

There is rather a peculiar circumstance about two sisters baptized yesterday (Mary and Clara Carpenter). There is just one year difference in their ages, and their birthdays are on the same date, and both baptized on their birthday.

I am, Ever your brother in the one faith,
F. S. BRACKENBURY.

AMONG THE INDIANS OF WYOMING

Entering our field this year sometime after our General Conference, via Cheyenne, we have visited Albin, Lingle, Chugwater, Rock River, Casper, Lander, and finally this point on the reservation of the Shoshone Indians. The Arapahoe Reservation lies adjoining.

Last winter while at Casper in my close contact with Chief Lonebear of the Sioux I fortunately became acquainted with some of the Indians from here, particularly Bat Enos and Frank Pogue who came to Casper either to visit Mr. Lonebear or to get work.

So after rendering what was to my mind a service of reasonable length at Lander within the past two months I determined to improve the said acquaintance thus formed and come on to the reservation. Just previous to carrying out our plan the Lander fair took place, which was attended by a goodly share of both tribes. There I formed some new Indian acquaintances and also met Bat Enos who was friendly and eager for my visit.

And thankful we are that we made the visit. For some weeks have we, wife, Lorne, and I been camped on the bank of the Little Wind River, beside our big Stanley steamer, where almost daily we have received Indian callers who have continued to come from the very time of our landing. To them we have unfolded and enlarged upon and repeated the story of the Book of Mormon, the accounts of their forefathers. I have stayed up all night with them in their peyote meeting and talked to them at length. I have visited the Indian school but a couple of miles from our tent and told some fifty children, some near grown up, the story of their forefathers. Some whites were present. The superintendent thought my theme would be very suitable.

They have left their drum and gourd at our tent, so that it is on hand for a song whenever they visit, and I am gratified to observe that I have the confidence of not a few of the redskins.

And last night, which will be more interesting to you, dear reader, I had the unbounded satisfaction of baptizing no less than four of their noble forms in the crystal clear of the Little Wind. We had a good fire on the shore which afforded both light and heat; for the nights are very cool and snow is in sight not far from us, little flurries of which have already reached us in the valley.

Repairing to our tent, we confirmed the brave and confiding four. They were Roy S. Blade and Mary Blade, his wife; Elouise Sonnicant, Sister Blade's daughter by former marriage; Laura Blade, Brother Blade's daughter by former

THE STAFF

Edited by Arthur H. Mills, 1514 West Short St., Independence, Mo.

The Staff Is Late

This number of the Staff is about five weeks late and while we don't feel like making apologies we do feel like explaining. The reunion trip upon which we started late last June kept us "on the road" constantly until four weeks ago. The first part of this trip was taken at a pace that was comfortable enough and we were enabled to get out our portion of "copy" for the Staff; but the latter part of this trip was really strenuous, involving frequent changes and short stays at each place. We soon discovered that such a life was incompatible with literary production; we made several attempts to get our work out, but finally gave it up. Then the Magazine HERALD came along last week, putting us behind another week. So this is why the Staff is late this time: we had to wait until we got home, rested a bit, and caught up with our work.

Further Musical Meanderings

In the last number of the Staff we described experiences and music work at the northwestern Canada conferences, which were in reality four-day reunions. In this number, even though long delayed, we shall try to recount experiences and work at the two eastern Canada reunions and the four American reunions visited, trusting that the narrative will still be of interest.

It was a big jump from the conference of the Southern Saskatchewan District at Radville, to the reunion of the Chatham, Ontario, District at Erie Beach, on the shores of historic old Lake Erie. We were on the train from Sunday night at six o'clock (with the exception of a short day at Chicago) until Wednesday morning, when we landed at Detroit, Michigan. Then a boat ride of three hours over Lake Saint Clair and up the Thames River in Canada to Chatham, and a trolley ride to the beach landed us on Wednesday afternoon at the reunion grounds, after a journey of about seventy hours.

We found a cheerful welcome awaiting us at this reunion. We had heard much of the Saints of this district and the excellence of its reunions and were anticipating pleasant times and associations. Well, we were not disappointed; we had the pleasant times in large measure, and the associations with these devoted Saints will long be cherished in memory. Further, the spiritual atmosphere found at this reunion was truly marriage. Sister Sonnicant is a student in the Indian school of Genoa, Nebraska, to which she presently repairs. Grace-land may await her.

Brother Blade is an Arapahoe and his wife is a Shoshone. More still, she is granddaughter of the well-known Chief Washakie, the friend of the white man, who was buried by our soldiers and who sleeps beneath his imposing monument not far from our camp.

This is a positive new opening among these people and I intend to watch it loud and long. Others have in a conditional way signified their intention to embrace our message.

When I talked to the Mormons it was all Doctrine and Covenants. To the Gentiles it was always all Bible. To the Indians it is all Book of Mormon. Surely the "work of the Father" is commencing among them.

This makes fifteen I have baptized since conference and the prospects are that more will be added to this number ere we motor to Zion soon to deliver wife and Lorne there for the winter, which we do via Rawlins, Laramie, Denver, and Pueblo, then the Santa Fe trail.

Albin, Wyoming, remains my field address.

invigorating and the spiritual food partaken of greatly refreshed and strengthened us.

Much had been done in the way of preparation for the musical work of this reunion and we therefore found little trouble in entering into the full swing of our labors there. The people were hungry for the work we had in hand and they are eager for the development of the spirit and work of music among them. Brother G. Orlow Coburn, who was director of the music work of the auxiliaries, was in charge of the work of the reunion in the place of Brother J. H. Tyrrell, the district chorister, who could not be present. Brother Coburn had the work well in hand, with definite program outlined and special features planned, which contributed alike to the facility of our work and the musical success of the reunion. A number of the talented ones present furnished individual musical offerings, both instrumental and vocal, which contributed both to the development of the individual workers and the enjoyment of those who were but auditors.

The conduct of the general musical work at this reunion was very pleasing to us. A sufficient number of the Songs of the Legion had been secured and a proper supply of the church songbooks was on hand, so that both choir and congregation were well equipped. The evening "sings" before the services were enthusiastically rendered and heartily enjoyed. Here, as everywhere else, was demonstrated the certainty that song is taking hold of the masses and becoming an actual part of our worship. Not only were the church hymns sung as is usually done, but other things were demanded. The "Holy City" was as much a favorite here as elsewhere; "The sunshine of your smile," "Mother Machree," "Dear old pal of mine," "A perfect day" were all sung and enjoyed, as well as Brother Hoxie's "Pray, men, pray." And we must not forget to mention that "The Maple Leaf," the national song of Canada, was as heartily enjoyed here as at any of the Canada reunions. It is the "Star Spangled Banner" of Canada. How the people did enjoy these "sings" and how the spirit of song engendered in them induced a deeper spiritual atmosphere for the presentation of the spoken message of the sermon afterwards!

Towards the close of this reunion a number of those belonging to the Windsor, Ontario, church orchestra, assisted by those present who played upon orchestral instruments, assembled themselves together under the direction of Brother Arthur Cartier, their leader, and rendered some substantial service, both in accompanying the congregational singing and in individual work, which feature was greatly appreciated by all. We felt a deep interest in this orchestra, for we discerned a spirit with it that betokened consecration and a desire to progress, and we shall anxiously watch its future development.

There is much in the way of talent in the Chatham District and we feel very hopeful for the future of musical work therein. The Saints there are very devoted and fervently desire to be fully alive in the church's scheme of progress. We parted from them with the conviction that our hope is justified and they may be expected to do good things in the future.

Five hours ride on the Grand Trunk Railway brought us to our next reunion at Lowbanks, Ontario, again on the shores of Lake Erie. Here we found ourselves expected the day before, but were welcomed just the same, and we felt it was good to be among the people of God.

This reunion is peculiar in that it is not a function of the Toronto District, wherein it is situated, but of the Toronto Branch. This branch, it will be remembered, was the center of operations of one who once was in places of trust and honor in the church but who chose to betray the trust imposed in him and in dishonor repudiated all that he once held sacred. And how cruelly he betrayed the trust of those under his care and how he had in ways that are devious held these confiding ones in a form of bondage they knew not of! And bondage it truly was; individual incentive and development were discouraged that he might alone appear radiant. The growth of intelligence and culture were alike as odious to him as the growth of true spirituality. Why should music, the handmaid of true religion, be fostered by one who rules because he represses the finer instincts of his fellow men? Consequently we found that in this populous and important section the musical atmosphere and equipment were regretably less than they should have been. But we have much hope; there is talent among those goodly Saints in full abundance and they long to advance themselves in the cultivation of all the finer graces and sentiments. In Brother Thomas R. Seaton, the district chorister, they have an able champion who will strive to foster and develop the musical spirit everywhere among them and who, by nature and training, is exceptionally capable for his work.

Several pleasant little incidents happened at this reunion, one of which we remember because of its enjoyable character. Around a camp fire on the beach of the lake, every night after the evening service, the young people (and many who were still young in spirit) would gather, and usually a part of their pastime was singing: sometimes the folk songs of the day, sometimes the beautiful hymns of the church. Somehow nature and song seemed to get nearer each other at such times.

No one who has ever seen Kirtland and the cherished old temple will ever forget the experience. It was almost noon of a bright, beautiful day when we alighted from an auto in front of the sacred building, whose time-honored walls are as a monument to the faithful labors of early church days. We felt as we drew near this holy edifice that truly here was "The house of the Lord" and here we might meet him. We felt an additional reverence for this venerable structure, a sentiment that keenly related itself to our musical work; for be it fully known and ever remembered that within the walls of this grand old fane, at the conference of 1887, God gave to the church that wondrous revelation enjoining upon them the cultivation of "the gifts of music and of song."

There was much to make the music work of the Kirtland reunion enjoyable and interesting. The first, and a very important, thing, was organization. Brother John Martin, who had been placed in charge of the reunion music had a well-defined program with arrangements well perfected. He had chosen a Mr. William Householder, of Kirtland, as director of the special work of getting together and training a choir. Mr. Householder and his sister also sang some miscellaneous musical numbers that were greatly enjoyed. Brother Charles Romig, of Barberton, Ohio, was placed in charge of organizing the material present into a working orchestra. As for John himself, he was one of the most useful men, musically, we ever saw for a reunion. He found and engaged the pianists; secured some one to play the organ in harmony with the piano at the services; he hunted up the soloists for the various occasions; did any soloist want an accompanist, John was on hand to do the task with eminent satisfaction; was no one else at hand to lead the singing for a service, John could be relied on. His gifted musical nature and his excellent attainments enabled him to do these things so efficaciously. Oh, for a lot more Johns in the musical work of the church.

We well remember the "sings" held in the temple each night before the preaching services and the enjoyment the people had in them. How the radiantly enameled walls would resound when the grand old hymns of the church were sung by those who gathered to sing them. At times it seemed like the spirit of song in its fullness had descended upon the assembled multitude, and we could not help but imagine that even then the angelic hosts of heaven might be joining their praises with those of like faith within the building. In such a sacred place and at such a time we did not feel like taking up the lighter things in our collection, but we used and the people enjoyed "The Holy City," "The lost chord," "Mother Machree," besides the "Prayer of thanksgiving" and Brother Hoxie's "Pray, men, pray."

"Music Day" at Kirtland was a very enjoyable one, filled with educational features and ending with a program that was a distinctive credit to the ones participating and a very marked treat to those who were present. It was on an unusual order of merit and many were the expressions of approval that were given.

We must not leave this reunion without paying a passing tribute to the orchestral forces who assembled themselves and rendered some real help in the congregational sings. Let them be mindful of the good they did and let them continue to advance and develop themselves for greater work.

The next point of our journey was the reunion of the Kewanee District, at Mathersville, Illinois; and arriving here we found "Music Day" already on, the Saints assembled in prayer service, at which the central theme was prayers for the musical work of the church and testimonies of the good that music had done for the church. Then followed our address and after dinner institute work was held; and on a succeeding afternoon classes were conducted on several subjects. The same evening a program of enjoyable things was given, illustrative of the better things of music, which was enjoyed by everyone present.

One of the greatly pleasing features of this reunion to us was the large number of young people present and the hearty way in which they took to the music work. The older portion of them were in the choir and enriched it with the timbre of their sweet voices. There was a younger portion of them that served in a "junior choir" most effectively and their singing was both pure and true. Many beautiful voices were distinguished among them, and in this regard will say that over the church there is many a gem of a young voice that would be a distinct asset to us if it were properly cared for and cultivated. Brother Joseph G. Cole, of Peoria, Illinois, who is chorister of the district, produced some excellent service with his choir, which almost filled to the exclusion of the preacher the platform space in front. (We wish more choirs were large enough to exclude preachers, especially some preachers.) Brother Cole is anxious to extend the choir work of his district and talked with us at some length regarding such work.

We esteem our visit with the Saints of this district very highly and are indeed grateful to them for the many kindnesses shown to us in our work. They were found to be very intelligent; have fully as many talented ones among them as any other district and are eager to advance themselves. Unfortunately, living so remote from centers of cultural possibilities, their opportunities in this regard are limited, but perhaps they may be better situated some day, and it is for them to hope for that day.

To the shore of beautiful Lake Monona, at Madison, Wisconsin, was our next step, where the Saints were holding the reunion of the Southern Wisconsin District. The site for this reunion is as beautiful as one could imagine. Monona Park is adjacent to the capital city of Wisconsin and is a large tract of majestic forest trees sloping gently to the waters of this beautiful inland lake, which is a veritable gem of turquoise set in a cluster of radiant emerald hills. It was a vision that artists might try in vain to reproduce and poets rave over. In the evening as the sun would sink behind the western horizon and the classic outlines of the capitol building would stand silhouetted against the sky, the lights and shadows would descend upon these placid waters and chase each other in elusive pursuit. Then I loved to go down to the boat landing and gaze until my love for the beautiful was sated and my poetic fancies stirred. Afterwards I would go up to the evening service and lead the singing with more zest because I had been in such close association with the beautiful, and it would seem like the people sang better also.

Sister Mary Woodstock, chorister of the district, had much of the music work of the reunion mapped out before we arrived, which helped greatly to render the work more successful. A number of the talented ones of the district were on hand and prepared with vocal and instrumental offerings which enriched the services and formed part of the material for the special program on Music Day. This program was enjoyable and richly repaid the efforts of its production as well as furnished a measure of profitable enjoyment to all who heard it. Of Music Day we can but largely repeat what we have expressed concerning the music days of other reunions, in that it was filled with educational and institutional work. The interest was vivid, showing that these people desired progress in education and culture.

Last but not least comes the reunion of the Northeastern Illinois District, held at Elmhurst, Illinois. Here the Saints have purchased a very pretty tract of land about a mile outside of this homelike town and on it have erected the buildings that will constitute the nucleus of a future excellent reunion equipment. Much of the burden of this work has undoubtedly been upon the shoulders of Brother Ward L. Christy, who, by the way, is the district chorister, but who found his duties of management of the reunion so burdensome that much of his work as chorister of the reunion had to be delegated to others. In this regard, Sister Margaret Wickes, who holds a chair in the Chicago Musical College, rendered valuable assistance, especially in the matter of training the song forces present into a very creditable choir, whose individual offerings gave great pleasure as well as definite spiritual settings to the services.

Music Day here was largely the same as at other reunions. We particularly remember the interest manifested by the people in it and the liberty we felt in the conduct of the work. The evening program at its close was particularly notable in the extreme excellence of its numbers and we must especially commend the work of those who rendered vocal numbers. This is unquestionably due to the number of singers living at or near Chicago, where the best of instruction can be had. Our talented ones living away from the centers of culture and art are, of course, denied some of the advantages that many have in this line.

Our reunion trip, which covered an itinerary of ten reunions and extended over two months in length, was successful in many ways and we would not have missed it for anything. We feel that much good was done at the points we visited in getting the Saints to realize the importance of music in their lives and religion, of the call for them to employ it in their labors and worship and the necessity for them to develop the powers and talents that were divinely intrusted to them. We believe that the seeds of future development were sown in many hearts, in time to bear a proper harvest. We further feel that the real spiritual meaning of our music is better understood by the people.

But the benefit from this trip was not to those visited alone, but a rich harvest was reaped personally. We got close to the hearts of the people and learned their aims and ideals, their longings and aspirations. We know more than ever before what their desires and needs are and can serve them more effectually in consequence.

We must, ere we close, pay humble tribute to the sustaining power and guidance of the Holy Spirit, which we enjoyed throughout all our pilgrimage. At no time were we left alone but at all times were we blessed by its direction and guidance. Nor was this confined to the silent subtle forces, unseen in their operations. Thrice did the Spirit manifest itself directly, in prophecy and in tongues, giving instruction and cheer, telling of the pleasure of God in the work of the Saints in music; of the magnitude and importance of it; that it would be a very potent factor in the accomplishment of the redemption of Zion. In one particular instance a brother came to the prayer service devoted to the interests of the music work, in a skeptical mood. He didn't see why the precious time of one whole day of a reunion should be taken up just for music. But he was converted in a very peculiar way: God chose him that morning as the bearer of a wonderful message to the people, expressive of God's delight in the efforts of his people to advance themselves in this his chosen art.

The work of music in the church is a wonderful one, filled with infinite possibilities for God's people. They cannot yet sense the multitude of its possibilities or the infinitude of good that shall come to them from a proper development of its spirit within their ranks. But we know that everywhere the hearts of the Saints are being turned towards this wonderful feature of God's work, in longing desire that it may have its proper place with them; become part of their lives and work in them its blest fruition. And it will.

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

Anent the New Yearbook

This announcement is written from Lamoni, where the writer has been for the past fortnight in discharge of duties connected with the work of the department. It is a pleasure to inform the women at last that the yearbook is on the press, and within another week or two will be nicely bound, and ready for mailing from our office in Independence.

We call it a yearbook out of habit, presumably. It is, however, very little like the usual yearbook of the usual women's club. Being representative of the work of a large organization which reaches into far corners of the world, this book could not take on the definite and detailed nature of a yearbook, which usually contains all the dates, committees, special plans, etc., of a single club, or local organization.

However, we hope we have been able to convey to the reader of our book a fairly comprehensive idea of the scope and purposes of our Women's Department of church work, its prescribed field of expression, and the ultimate place such activities shall find in Zion's endeavor.

We have not attempted to outline detailed work for local groups, believing that each one will be better able to meet its own individual conditions and opportunities. We have tried, however, to include suggestions of a general nature, that may be applied with local success.

The clear call of the President of the church in his message to us, followed by the splendid vision and inspirational confidence in our work, expressed by our director general in her contribution to the book, will be appreciated by its readers, creating in them a desire to fall in line, get in step, and move forward with the progressive sisters of our organization.

Our department historian has given us a concise but comprehensive glance over the paths by which we have come. She recalls the workers of the past, points out the many advance movements made from time to time, and leaves with the reader the impression that while the women's work has come up at times "through much tribulation" it is a cause blessed of God, and one which is destined to play its full part in his economy of redemption.

A quaint but attractive picture of Emma Hale Smith, wife of the first president of the church, serves as frontispiece in the book, which item will be highly appreciated by those who know of her work in the early days of struggle. A dedicatory poem by a granddaughter who was privileged to know and love her, also adds to the attraction of the book.

Orders for copies of this book, addressed to our general office, (Women's Department, Box 255, Independence, Missouri,) will receive prompt attention. The price is but sixty cents, which, we feel, will place it within the reach of every woman in the church. A. A.

Some Changes in Our Official Personnel

The editor of your column has again been in Independence in session with the general executive of our department. The absence in California of our director general, Mrs. Fredrick M. Smith, was partly compensated for by the frequent telegrams, special delivery and other letters which passed between us and our senior officer.

At this session some vacancies occurring since our General Conference have been filled by appointment from the director general.

Sister May Mather, hitherto acting as second assistant superintendent, has removed from Independence, her family being now located in Los Angeles, California. Not wishing to hold an office in which distance would prevent her from functioning advantageously, Sister Mather tendered her resignation in order that some other one might be called to take up the work she felt she should relinquish. That "some one" proved to be our well-known Sister Dora Glines, who accepts this position with a full knowledge of the contribution of service required. For years she has been in touch with the developing stages of our women's work, having rendered splendid service in the educational work which has marked our progress. Sister Glines took up her duties actively and with characteristic energy and thoroughness, and her associates fully appreciate the impetus and insight she is giving to the cause.

The resignation of Sister Marie Morgan as secretary, made necessary by a burden of home duties which prevented her giving as large a contribution of time as the growing work demands, was regretfully accepted. Her services had been deeply appreciated. The appointment of Sister Goldie Brooks to succeed Sister Morgan, is one in which the executive heartily concurs, for it brings to our department official force a woman trained in secretarial and accounting work, who will be able to help place our department on a business efficiency basis comparable with any other department in the church.

In this she will be ably assisted by Sister Rogene B. Smith, who has accepted appointment to the position of assistant secretary, succeeding Sister Vivian Barto, whom circumstances prevented from giving to our work the service anticipated. Sister Smith has had years of office experience and brings to this association a well-qualified and wholly consecrated contribution.

The supervisor of our Young Women's Bureau, having been called by the leading authorities of the church to another position of great responsibility, felt it imperative that she should give up her connection with our young women. She is now superintending the Children's Home, and has a family of thirty-two upon her hands, which as all the sisters will agree, is quite enough for one young woman. We regretted to lose Sister Monroe as she had entered into our work with great enthusiasm and a clear vision of its possibilities. However, we are rejoicing that another has been found whose qualifications are equally fine, whose consecration is equally great, and whose desires are equally deep and sincere for the welfare of the girlhood of the church. We refer to Sister Mary Steele, of Independence, who accepted appointment to the position of Young Women's Supervisor with the humility and heart devotion which promises a valuable contribution in this direction. Another appointment which has brought us happiness was that of Sister Laura B. Mann, R. N., as head of the health division of our work. Sister Mann holds the position of general nursing director to the church, conferred by the church Health Department, so we feel sure our women will appreciate the value of her instructions to us, as they shall appear from time to time in our publications, or by correspondence with our general office. Sister Mann is deeply interested in the work of the cradle roll, having helped to prepare the letters and blanks which have gone out to the workers in that line. She examines carefully the blanks which have been sent in, and immediately gets into correspondence with the mothers of those infants whose records show need for professional counsel or attention.

Another addition to our official family was that of Sister Pearl Gardner, perhaps one of the best-known women of the department. She is coming into our historical section, joining Sister Madge Siegfried most enthusiastically in the enlarging work outlined there. A museum feature is to be emphasized, believing the women of the church will be greatly pleased to make a collection of those articles which would be of historical interest to our church people. The library interests, too, will also hold the attention of these sisters, and from time to time you will be made aware of the needs and desires along these lines. Nothing could be of more real value to any group of women than to have access to a library of well-chosen books, and to have a taste and desire to use it for personal culture and development as well as for the good thus made possible for others.

Sister D. J. Krahl has perhaps not formally been introduced to our readers as heading the social purity work of our department. She is peculiarly qualified for this contribution, for her natural refinement and wide reading gives a combination of the attributes most needed in recognizing the field of work and intelligently planning for its cultivation. Unwise attempts at teaching the principles of sex knowledge have in the past hindered the proper understanding of the plain duty which is before the parents and educators of the young to-day. It is to the instructors themselves that the department will direct its most earnest efforts, in order that a better conception of the task and a better equipment for it, shall prevail. Sister Krahl has conducted a careful research among the literature offered on the many phases of this subject, and has, counseling with others, made a critical selection of the best to be found, classifying it according to the purposes to be served. Those who have waited so long for instruction along this line, may write our office at once, stating their desires, and helpful suggestions will be forwarded promptly as possible.

We feel sure our readers will be glad to know of these appointments, and that their consecrated services will enable our department to enter and occupy wider fields of usefulness.

A. A.

Parent-Teacher Associations

In case any of our sisters live in a community or city where there is no mothers' circle or parent-teacher association, and desire to make an effort to start one, we are told that the following address will reach a woman who will assist them in so doing, Mrs. H. B. Lee, 19 Robie Street, Bath, New York.

We do not need to suggest that our women of the church have a great responsibility not only at home in rearing their own children, but in helping the mother who has not the influence of the gospel in her life in her effort to bring up her children in a right and proper manner. Does not the Good Book tell us to do good to all men, especially those of the household of faith? Is there any greater field for doing good than the one to which we just referred?

A large percentage of the children of this generation are not attending Sunday school of any kind. They are not getting religious training at home. What is to be the result? We can see the results every day.

A large percentage of the children of this generation are not being taught the truths essential to life and happiness. Our children must to a greater or less extent be associated with such children, and influenced by them. Just how strong a hold on the confidence of the child we have will determine how much damage may be done by the uninformed child.

If we can manage to become associated with the mothers of our neighborhood and talk matters over, we can let our light shine, if we have any, and if we are true mothers of Israel, we should be full of light, shedding it abroad to those less fortunate. Instead of being the last in the neighborhood to become identified with a mothers' circle or any such organization, we should be first, and help to organize if necessary.

Control of Child Through Play

Parents seldom realize how often the child's imagination and the play instinct can be utilized in securing obedience.

Little Dick, age four, had been ill and was just recovering, so his mother was alarmed one cold winter day to discover that he had become thoroughly chilled and that his little hands were icy. In her effort to warm him up quickly she tried to induce him to drink some warm milk. But Dick, who had grown somewhat irritable of late, absolutely refused. He threw himself on the floor and screamed at the idea of drinking warm milk. To try to discipline a sick child and handle such a fit of temper was a real problem, and even more than securing obedience she was interested in getting him warm. Nothing but alternate commands and coaxing had occurred to her when Uncle came to the rescue. Dick had the profound interest in automobiles which even a tiny boy of this generation seems to have and his uncle took advantage of this fact to calm and interest him.

"Dick," he said, taking the cup of milk in one hand and Dickie's small cold hand in the other, "I want to try a new kind of gas in my automobile and see if it will go better."

Dick's screams ceased suddenly as his rage changed to interest. He allowed himself to be led into another room and seated on the couch close to a register. To be asked to drink the milk had a moment before filled him with unaccountable wrath, but if he was an automobile and was being given gasoline, that was entirely different, and he sipped the milk and listened with absorbed interest to Uncle's excited comments about the improvement in the running of the "car" on its new fuel.

Suddenly Uncle picked up a blanket and threw it across the small boy's knees. "Why, Dick," he said, "you ought to have a radiator cover for this sort of weather! Your engine will be too cold to start." Not a murmur of protest followed, and a moment later Uncle exclaimed in pretended distress, "This battery is frozen. We'll have to thaw it out," and Dick obediently held out his cold fingers to the register until Uncle was satisfied that the "battery" was properly warmed.

Dick was an entirely appeased, interested, and comfortable child at the end of a half hour of this appeal to his imagination, whereas the ordinary treatment—orders, entreaties, and perhaps even punishment—would probably have left him exhausted from nervousness and tears.

Of course ordinarily parents should require prompt, direct obedience. But there are also many difficult situations such as the one described above when the use of tact and an introduction of the imaginative play element will work wonders and secure the result the mother desires with the least amount of wear and tear on both herself and the child.

The only point we should be inclined to question of the above is that "ordinarily parents' should require prompt, direct obedience." The child is an individual, and why should he not be treated as such? If an appeal is made to the intelligence, in a proper way, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred obedience is secured. The child is not a machine or an animal, simply to yield arbitrarily to our wills. There are things that are good for a child, things that are not good. But with reasonable care a child can be trained to defer to the parents' judgment, the reasons being given from time to time, so the child can see that it is not simply an arbitrary order, as unfortunately it is in the case of some parents.

Still we will concede there are times when the parent must act for the good of the child, as forcibly picking up a child from in front of an automobile, and to prevent a child from falling in deep water. But even that can be done in most cases in a way to leave the child laughing instead of crying.

When one considers the importance for the development of a child, such a method is at least worthy of trial.—Frances A. Gray.

Brother Joseph Arber writes that on Sunday evening (3d) he and Brother Keith Rogers closed a most wonderful series of meetings at the Armourdale mission on the Kansas City, Kansas, side of the river. The local pastor is quoted as believing that no series of meetings has been more beneficial to the Saints and nonmembers. Two heads of families were baptized and six children blessed and many others specially interested. He is sure Brother Rogers will develop into a capable missionary. They are counting on doing their part in the twenty thousand converts with faces turned Zionward, the emphasis on the latter phase.

Brother J. W. Wight tells of attending a funeral in Utah, over the remains of a member of the dominant church there. The elder making the discourse waxed enthusiastic: "I feel good this morning, brothers and sisters; the Spirit is here and hope we may have another such occasion soon." The audience gasped. He realized what he had said, and wilted. He concluded in about five minutes.

"The winds of God are always blowing, but if you wish to go forward, you must keep your sails unfurled."

Christmas Offering News

The good reports coming from the various schools and some of the members and missionaries give us much encouragement. These reports tell us of very excellent work being done by the members and schools as a whole.

November 14.....DOLLAR DAY.....November 14

We are asking the schools to set aside Sunday, November 14, as "Dollar Day." On this day we hope to receive in the various schools an amount equal to $1 for each member of that school, and more than this if we can. Attention is called to the fact that we are asking everyone to earn this dollar in some special manner. Do not just dig down in your pocket and give the dollar, but earn it in some special way aside from your regular work. Oh, yes, you can, for there are any number of ways we can earn this dollar and several others with it. If we can earn more let us do so and swell the offering. God will bless us for the effort.

Some of our missionaries have been very faithful toward this good cause and we have here two very good letters telling of work being done.

Brother Edward Rannie of the missionary force writes: "I have earned my dollar [he has reference to the "Dollar Sunday"] by turning a washing machine and wringer for a sister and by helping a brother build a garage. I have stowed this away in my leather bag that holds all my offering which is growing bigger and bigger every day."

Brother Joseph Arber, another of our good missionaries, gives us the following good news: "I not alone wish you success but want to tell you that I have taken advantage of every opportunity in Sunday schools and in my missionary efforts to present the merits of the offering cause. In addition to my efforts to encourage others I have not been behind in sending in my own offering which I have made from the sale of church books. We are allowed ten per cent on books sold, and this discount goes to make up my offering. It is possibly not much the missionary can do himself, but he can help others."

These are good letters and should encourage others in the field to do their part to help us gain our goal and I am sure we will receive the cooperation of all our field workers.

Brother Floyd Pottorf, Paonia, Colorado, gives us the following good news: "I am glad to report that our Christmas offering is swelling continually. We always start our offering the first of the year. I do hope we can raise a large amount this year. Some of our members save a certain amount from all sales made." This good school has now approximately $4 per member ready for the offering.

From Bert Kilmer of Winnebago, Nebraska, (I do not know that he is a member) we have the following good word and a check for $5: "I am sending this as a freewill offering to your church work." We thank this good brother—he is surely a brother whether he is a member or not.

We were very glad to receive the following letter from a dear old sister who surely is making a splendid effort to help in our good cause. Sister M. Scott, Maple City, Michigan, writes: "I have not been able to do as much as I would like as I am alone in this work in our home. I have earned my offering by picking wild berries and it is quite a sacrifice, as I am now fifty-six years old and not strong. I was sick nearly seven years and had to be carried into the water to be baptized and it took two to hold and baptize me. I owe everything to the gospel."

Sister C. I. Carpenter, Rock Island, Illinois, Sunday school, writes very interestingly regarding a card and stamp system they are following in their effort to raise their offering. The cards are arranged on the order of "thrifty stamp" cards and have places for affixing the stamps. The stamps range in denominations of from 1 cent to 25 cents, etc., and are sold to the pupils, and the money credited to their offering fund. The cards cost one half cent each and the stamps five cents for each sheet of 100 stamps. Sister Carpenter writes: "Needless to state that each one is anxious to get his or her card filled and many a penny and nickel have gone to the offering that otherwise would have gone for other things. We tried them here with great success and told others about them. At Joy they have almost doubled their offering since they began using the cards."

We believe this plan will help many of our schools and I am to-day writing to secure information regarding these cards and stamps. Those interested may write me regarding them or write direct to Hammond Publishing Co., Milwaukee, Wisconsin, for the information.

We hope each member will be sufficiently interested in the "Dollar Sunday" movement to see that their school has this brought to their attention for we hope to have the entire cooperation of all members in this movement. If we can our $150,000 offering is assured.

Let us hear from you, for we are interested in what you are accomplishing and don't forget that your scholars are very anxious to see articles in this paper from your school—they look for them and when others appear and their school is not represented they become discouraged. Let us hear from all of you—just a short letter telling of your progress.

Yours for $150,000,

A. W. SMITH.

SAINT LOUIS, MISSOURI, 2903 Sullivan Avenue.

Des Moines, Iowa

Speech is silver, silence is golden. We in Des Moines have been in the golden silence, but we are not asleep, nor have we been inactive. During the season when some branches are taking vacations we have girded up our strength and staged one of the most strenuous campaigns along many lines. Since General Conference we have felt a new impulse. We have sensed our stewardship. We have not felt free to use our means and our faculties of mind and body for selfish motives nor personal aggrandizement. Thinking in terms of the group, and realizing that nothing is more potent in creating and perpetuating solidarity that a common purpose, a goal, or objective, we have moved forward to one goal, only to establish another and again move on.

Financially we have established a record. During the past three or four months the Des Moines Branch has raised over seventeen hundred dollars exclusive of tithes and regular contributions to branch expenses. More than half of this amount was raised in a cooperative effort in conducting a dining tent and refreshment stand at the State Fair. The remainder was raised by popular subscription. This money has been used for Christmas offering, payment of a seven-hundred-dollar parsonage debt, to assist in the purchase and equipment of a missionary tent for the district, and finance a missionary campaign, and we still have a neat sum on hand for the financing of another missionary effort beginning on our annual home-coming, November 14. We have further pledged ourselves to raise one hundred and eighty dollars as our share of a four-hundred-dollar fund for the installation of a radio station in Des Moines within the next few days.

We have done more than raise funds. Besides the usual branch activities, Brother J. A. Dowker, of the missionary force, and Roy A. Cheville have conducted tent meetings in the city for the major portion of the summer. The effort closed last night in the church. Thirteen were baptized. These with the eight previously baptized make twenty-one additions for Des Moines Branch since General Conference. Many others are interested and investigating. We look for them to come in when our next campaign is staged. It is hoped that Brother Dowker, who has proved himself a tireless worker may be kept in the city this winter in order that the good work accomplished may be followed up.

With the coming of the fall months renewed activity is manifested in all departments. There is no place to stop. Beginning Sunday, October 10, we will begin an intensive visiting campaign. Our slogan is, "Every member visited." The priesthood and Women's Department will cooperate in this. Simultaneously group prayer meetings will be held in preparation for the annual home-coming and missionary campaign following.

Of course the above items are only the "high spots." We apologize for our failure to tell you of these good things sooner, but really we've been so busy we hardly had time to write. You will hear from us through our publicity agent, Brother L. E. Anderson, more often than heretofore.

Two Letters From Sweden

STOCKHOLM, SWEDEN, September 14, 1920.

First Presidency: I, together with my family, arrived in Christiania, Norway, Sunday, September 5.

After having tried hard in vain to secure a room for one day, we went to a family, members of the church, who received us gladly and where we had opportunity to meet with a few of the Saints in the evening.

All were glad to hear about the church and its work in America. Although the said family had very little room for themselves, and nothing to spare, they willingly divided the little room they had so we could stay over night. The next day we went to a place named Bon about two hours' journey on the railroad. There we met a little band of faithful Saints who received us gladly, and who desire to do their share to help in the good work. We had the privilege of meeting with those people and some of their friends three times, and if conditions on our side had been such that we could, we would have stayed longer. We left Norway on the evening of September 10 and arrived in Stockholm, Sweden, at eight o'clock the next morning. I have been busy visiting members and friends since our arrival. We are glad to say that we have a few that have remained faithful during the time they have been left without a missionary, but also are sorry to say that some have become indifferent, and some that once were interested are now enemies to the work of God. We did meet with a few of our faithful ones Sunday and we had a very good meeting.

The only way we can meet is in the homes of the Saints and even that will sometimes be difficult to do as there is the same trouble here as in other places. Houses are so scarce that people are compelled to dwell many in one room. We will have a hard time to find a place to dwell in, but if there is room in the heart it will be possible and as we have some friends I hope we will be able to get along some way. After we have been to see the American consul and visited others of our members outside this city I will take my family out in the country to my parents till we get time to arrange for something else. In gospel bonds, OSCAR JOHNSON.

STOCKHOLM, SWEDEN, September 27, 1920.

First Presidency: It is now two weeks since I wrote you. Last week I was in a place where there was no connection with a post office. I have, since writing you last time, visited some of our members out in the country and also my parents and other relatives. I am glad to say that we have some members that like to know the law of Christ.

A family that at one time belonged to the Utah church, but who about four years ago joined our church, are very interested in the law of tithing and expressed a desire to comply with the same.

A young man, son to this family, promises to be a great help to the church if he will continue faithful. I have been trying to do what I can to encourage the Saints and to work with them before moving out much among the people of the world.

I am yours in gospel bonds, OSCAR JOHNSON.

The branch at Dallas, Texas, reports progress, with many baptisms and Saints moving in. Brethren Rowe and Chrestensen, missionaries, have been present and doing good work, including selling of books and tracts while the State Fair is in progress. The Christmas offering goal was $300 but over $400 has already been raised, with tithing over $800.

Northeastern Illinois Remembers Former Missionary

This has certainly been a busy year thus far for me, and I sometimes wonder how the time goes by so fast; but I assure one and all who may read these lines, this year has been an interesting one. I have before me a copy of a manifestation of the Spirit through an unknown tongue, given in Chicago, January 23, 1915, through Patriarch J. W. Wight, and from it I quote the following:

"To-day, while you occupy in this peaceful way, the Spirit making itself manifest in your midst, in foreign lands, as you know, there is misery and woe, strife on every hand. And amidst the cannons' roar and the bursting shells, men are being killed, very many wounded for life, while widows and orphans are being left, and as a consequence, desolation and woe are in the midst of the land. Yea, by the voice of earthquakes, by the voice of pestilence and famine, will the people of earth feel the chastening hand of Almighty God, until they repent and turn unto me and become humble, and contrite in spirit. And from the midst of the nations, I will in mine own due time, raise up men, who in their own language can proclaim my truth unto their own people. And so, when the strife and toil shall be over, then my work will increase, move forward with a rapidity never known before in its existence in this day and generation, until the times of the Gentiles shall come in, when my work shall turn unto my chosen people, Israel, and they will come from the north, from the south, from the east, and the west and sit down in the kingdom of God, into the complete occupancy that I have long since promised unto the faithful in Christ."

Truly the church is moving forward as never before, and it makes every one who senses it, feel like putting forth the greatest effort possible, that it shall keep on, and even increase in rapidity, that hungry souls everywhere may be sought out and brought to a knowledge of the truth. I am convinced that there are plenty of those who desire the truth; and the reason they have not come our way faster in the past is that as individuals, branches, districts, and the church collectively, our righteousness has not been sufficient that the Lord could intrust more of them to our care. The thing I now fear most is that the world at the present time is attracting too many of the church to follow those things that are displeasing to God, and that which the church has advised as not good. For instance, some are disposed to think that the church can mother and father most anything, and that the Lord will accept of it, because of that fact; but to my mind this is a mistake.

Cards played in my home are the same cards that others use for gambling, and should I allow it to be done I am fostering that which has brought many to ruin. The same is true of dancing and many others things that some are disposed to do under cover of church or home!

Should a branch or district look with favor on theater going, shows, or condoning the fact that now and then some of our young men are becoming members of secret orders, we are lowering the standard, even lower than some of the churches around about us. I hope as fathers and mothers, we will see to it that we early in life impress the true standards of the church upon the minds of the young, and not weaken, and then wonder why more are not converted to the restored gospel.

I am thankful to see souls coming into the church from time to time, but with them comes the great responsibility of seeing that they are cared for, that they may grow as Saints should.

Last Sunday I had the pleasure of baptizing Carrie Vanderhoof, of Milwaukee, daughter of Mr. and Sister Thomas Vanderhoof. To-day I had the satisfaction of leading Harry and Millicent Collins and son Robert into the waters of baptism, while the rolling waves of Lake Michigan dashed high upon the shore. Thank God for these precious souls.

While in Milwaukee last week with W. A. McDowell, we held a very satisfactory series of meetings in the Saints' hall at the corner of Mineral Street and Sixth Avenue, and we feel that the work in that city is gaining. We hope to see several more come into the fold there in the near future.

I wish to say to the Saints of the Northeastern Illinois

District that last Saturday I received by mail a very pleasant but unexpected surprise; a nice gold watch, "Illinois" by make, with this neatly carved on the back: "J. O. Dutton, N. E. Ill. Dist., June, 1912; June, 1920." I assure you that I should never have forgotten you without this very useful and needed present, but now many times a day I shall think of you all. I now wish to call to your minds the purse you presented to Sister Dutton, a year ago this last reunion, and we both appreciate your kindness to us, and desire the richest of God's blessings to ever attend you one and all. This is the second watch I have ever had and I hope this one will serve me to the end of my days, though they may be many. The other one, my Sister Julia presented to me when I was going to Milton College, when about eighteen years old, so you see it has lasted twenty-nine years, and nine seasons of that around a threshing engine. There now, I have told my age! Well, who cares if I have? I shall keep the old watch for the good it has done and may do yet.

Sincerely your brother and servant in Christ,
 J. O. DUTTON.
 KENOSHA, WISCONSIN, September 29, 1920.

Making Out a Financial Statement

Continuing the series of letters to the Saints of Lamoni Stake.

In our last letter to you we stated that the second step was to comply with the law of consecration of temporal things.

That the first step to take to comply with the law of temporalities was to "lay all things before the Bishop in Zion."

That this meant to make out a statement showing our assets (what we are worth) and our liabilities (what we owe) and hand or send this to your Presiding Bishop or if you live in a stake to hand it or send it to your stake bishopric.

We also noted that doing this did not mean that you were to give all that you possessed to the Bishopric or church.

You may not just understand fully how to make out this financial statement. So we herewith show you how it is done. After we have shown you how to make out the statement we will then tell you how much or what amount or part of your possessions the Lord tells you to give and always remember that what you do give should be given because you are willing, because you want to give and never by being forced to give.

We will now suppose that you have never made an inventory or financial statement (called in Doctrine and Covenants "testimony") and wish to do so. Here is the way to do it. We will suppose that your name is Samuel Doe.

FINANCIAL OR PROPERTY STATEMENT

By Samuel Doe, 216 North East Street, Lamoni, Iowa.

Resources		Liabilities
Residence	$ 2,500.00	Note	$ 2,000.00
80 acres @ $200....	16,000.00	Note	1,500.00
Furniture	600.00	Accounts	500.00
Clothing	200.00
Poultry	50.00	Total	$ 4,000.00
Cow	100.00
Cash	500.00
War stamps, U. S.	50.00
Bonds, U. S.	200.00
Total	$20,200.00
Deduct liabilities ..	4,000.00
Present worth	$16,200.00
Tithe one tenth	1,620.00

Samuel Doe owes the Lord $1,620 or one tenth of his net worth, or stating it in another way, Samuel Doe owes the Lord one tenth of all he has after allowing for his debts.

Remember also that Samuel Doe, up to the time he has made out this statement, had had his living supplied. He had had his needs and just wants supplied, but being saving and frugal he had accumulated $16,200.

The Lord says that one tenth of this is his.

Samuel Doe now places this property statement in the hands of the Bishopric and pays the Lord's share (one tenth of the net worth or $1,620) to the Lord's representative, the Bishopric.

In our next letter we will tell what Samuel Doe should next do.

Yours very truly,
 LAMONI STAKE BISHOPRIC.

Society of American Indians to Meet

I wish to call your attention to the annual conference of the Society of American Indians to be held at Saint Louis, Missouri, November 16 to 20.

The conference is composed of the leading Indians of the United States who meet together to consider the present problems confronting the Indian race of America. Here is an excellent opportunity to become acquainted with these matters. And I would urge every Latter Day Saint who can possibly attend, especially our missionaries among the Indians, to do so as there they will gain an insight into Indian character and the needs of his race.

Sincerely,
 WILLIAM MADISON.

British Isles Mission Conference Reunion

Held August 8, 1920, at Amhurst Park, Stamford Hill, London, N. 16. The reunion executive committee, Elders R. May, Thomas Jones, and J. A. Judd, were by previous resolution empowered to take charge, but as President F. M. Smith and T. W. Williams were present they were asked to form the presidency of the reunion, and the executive committee was associated with them.

Prior to the official convention of the conference, a reception was held to welcome President F. M. Smith and Apostle T. W. Williams, who arrived a few days previously on their first visit to this land. Each of the Saints present was introduced to the two brethren, and then passed on into the reception room, where light refreshments were provided. Our mission patriarch, Elder Henry Greenwood, made the opening address, and Elder S. F. Mather gave the official address of welcome, being replied to by the guests of the evening in turn. A very pleasant time was spent, and the favorable impressions then received were only intensified on further acquaintance.

Preaching during the conference was done by Elders F. M. Smith, T. W. Williams, and Thomas Jones; and a very successful open-air service was held in the park near by, Elders Leggott, Armstrong, Mather, and Williams taking part in the speaking.

Reports were received from the mission officials, the various districts, etc. The principal business done was the reduction of the board of publication of the mission to three members, with instructions to proceed with the publication of a mission paper as soon as possible, the committee chosen being Elders T. W. Williams, R. May, and Joseph Dewsnup. Secretary was instructed to prepare a directory showing the name, office, position of responsibility, and address of the members of the priesthood in the mission, to be furnished all members of the priesthood desiring it. Gloucester was chosen as the place of the 1921 reunion.

Officers elected: Executive committee 1921 reunion: R. May, T. Jones, E. J. Trapp, G. W. Leggott, S. F. Mather. Mission secretaries: F. Henry Edwards, and Isaac Jones; historian, F. Henry Edwards; librarian, E. J. Trapp; financial secretary, Bishop R. May; auditors, J. E. Meredith, J. W. Worth, and J. A. Judd.

In conjunction with the reunion, a convention of the British Isles District of the Sunday school association was held, Superintendent John A. Judd being in charge. Elder T. W. Williams did much to dispel misconception in a short talk to the Sunday school workers present. Sister Blanche Edwards gave a splendid address on the art and purpose of story-telling, illustrating it with one or two stories. Officers chosen for the year were, superintendent, Sister Blanche Edwards; assistant, John A. Judd; secretary, Isaac Jones; normal superintendent, E. Henry Edwards; librarian, Sister L. Harris; treasurer, Bishop R. May.

Women's Department also held sessions. A talk by Elder T. W. Williams was very much appreciated. Officers elected were, president, Pearl Crick; vice president, Blanche Edwards; secretary, Gertrude Edwards; treasurer, Beatrice Young.

The members of the elder's quorum present, and later the whole of the priesthood present, were addressed and encouraged by Brethren Smith and Williams. We believe that a more clear conception of our mission and responsibility has already been gained by our intercourse with these brethren, and there is a clearly manifested desire to go forward.

The musical side of the gathering was admirably looked after by Sister Pearl Crick, who was ably assisted by a choir of the members of the London District. Solos were rendered by Sisters W. B. Arrowsmith, Gertrude Edwards, and Brother Mather, while Brethren W. T. Goulee and Isaac Jones assisted with their violins.

At intervals parties were conducted round this historic city, and shown the sights by some of those "in the know." The Parliament Houses, Westminster Abbey, Saint Paul's Cathedral, the Tower, Westminster and London Bridges, the Zoo, the National Art Galleries, and the haunts of Dickens (including the original of "the old curiosity shop") were all included in their itinerary.

The final day of our association came at last, and we said good-by to one party after another with the hope that such pleasant meetings would long continue to be a feature of the work in this land.

F. HENRY EDWARDS,
ISAAC L. JONES,
Secretaries.

LONDON, N 16, ENGLAND, September 30, 1920.

Editors Herald: Will all Saints having friends in or near London, England, to whom they would like to have the restored message taken, please send names and addresses of these friends to the undersigned, and we will try to reach them.

Particulars regarding friends or relatives anywhere in the British Isles will also be appreciated, as it is hoped to have this information to hand for the use of our local Saints, and for missionaries who may be appointed in the near future.

F. HENRY EDWARDS,
Missionary, London and Birmingham District.
19 Amherst Park, Stamford Hill.

PORT ARTHUR, ONTARIO, September 16, 1920.

Editors Herald: Just a short letter to let you know how the little flock has been revived here at Port Arthur. For some months the work here has been at a standstill, no interest whatsoever, no outsiders attending the services, and many of the Saints were discouraged and remained away. We have been pleading for an elder to be sent here, so on the 14th of last month our hearts were made glad when through Elder D. I. Perkins, our old Elder S. W. Tomlinson, who first opened up the work here, dropped into our city. The way looked dark and no doubt discouraging to the elder when there were but five adults and some children attended his first preaching service on the 15th. He remarked to me that the way looked dark for proselyting, and so it did to us all. But by his wise, judicious way of carrying on missionary work, his numbers increased, and two brothers that had grievances one with the other for over a year, and who were not even on speaking terms, were reconciled.

Our hearts were made glad when two precious souls were added to our number on September 5—both heads of families, one a fine gentleman whom we look forward to being of much use to the church.

Elder Tomlinson has indeed done a great work here for the short time he has been with us, and this time he left us carrying with him the best wishes of us all. We were sorry to part with this faithful and spiritual father, and trust the blessings of God will attend his pathway through life, and that he will be spared and permitted to visit us again, for truly the need of spiritual help here is great. He left here for the Canadian Soo, and we have no doubt but what he will there be a power for good.

I still want to continue faithful to my covenant at the water's edge, and hope and trust that in the very near future some one will come to assist us here.

Your sister in the gospel,
MARGUERITE MACLEAN.

DEIRKS, ARKANSAS, September 28, 1920.

First Presidency and Twelve: This past week I have preached six times; baptized one on Sunday at Winthrop, Arkansas; blessed two children. I had a splendid meeting at Winthrop, good crowds. They need more work. I came to this place yesterday in order to get here to meet the arrangement that was made for meetings. I had to leave Winthrop, Arkansas, after Sunday night meeting, and come most of the way in the night.

I will stay here over Sunday, then go to Haileyville, Oklahoma, to hold meetings. There is no question, brethren, that the chances never were better for preaching, in the parts I have been in, at least. We need more help. I am trying to do two jobs—preaching to the world and looking after district work.

I think in this district, we should do most of our work where we have Saints and build up our branches by getting new members.

Your brother in bonds,
J. ARTHUR DAVIS.

OTTUMWA, IOWA, September 27, 1920.

Editors Herald: I cannot allow the opportunity to pass and not write a letter of appreciation, and a testimony to the young Saints. I arrived here from Wigan, England, on September 3. I came via Quebec, Canada. It took me just five and a half days to cross the ocean. I soon found the fine change in the weather. After being back in England from the war ten months, the weather was bad—cold and wet, most of the time, so I certainly appreciate your weather on this side.

It was with deepest regret that I left the good band of Saints at Wigan, which branch is in a fine condition. I am pleased to say that I always appreciate the company of Saints. I am pleased, too, that there is a branch here, and I surely felt the good spirit in the good handshake of introduction to the Saints here.

The work in this part of the Lord's vineyard seems to me to be in a fairly good spiritual condition at present, and the Saints here have a good, strong desire that the work here will go forward. In this branch we have one elder, two priests, two teachers, and the sisters are working hard in the Sunday school.

I thank God I have been permitted to live to see the country I always had a desire to see. As I mentioned in some of my previous letters, I had four years in the army, and I was in France, Italy, Greece, Bulgaria, and Turkey, and now I am here. I strongly advise the young people of this church to work with their might, always waiting and ready to relieve our older brothers and sisters when age overcomes them, because I realize it is the young who will have to carry on this work. So always be ready.

Blessed be the tie which binds us together as brothers and sisters in deeds.

Yours in bonds,
F. C. BEVAN.

Apostles J. W. Rushton and Paul M. Hanson sailed from Australia on October 21. They will spend some time in New Zealand in the interests of church work there, and arrive in San Francisco about December 10.

Give Us Room That We May Dwell

A special message to Sunday school workers

A year and a half ago the executive council of the Sunday School Department informed the First Presidency and the joint council of the church that they were ready to move the superintendent's office and the printing of the Gospel Quarterlies from Lamoni to Independence. We were informed that after considering the change they advised that they did not think it wisdom to do so at that time. Lack of room for Sunday school office was probably one reason. Within another twelve months or so the printing offices will all be assembled at headquarters under one roof, where then will be published our Quarterlies. Room for superintendent's office will also be available.

But it is not this alone that we are thinking of as we write. For years our workers have been cramped for proper facilities to hold conventions, and make the necessary demonstrations and exhibits in our institutes at General Conferences. The opportunity is now at hand to provide ourselves room by helping build the new auditorium.

Over 25 per cent of the increase of our church comes through the Sunday schools. We expect to continue to be a factor in building Zion and will want a place at headquarters. Perhaps the Sunday school is taken for granted, something like the divine institution from which it is named. It may be thought it is so well established it needs no write-up in advertising the factors functioning at headquarters. Granted. So long as we have a Sabbath we shall have a Sunday school.

Now we are bold enough to take something else for granted. We are all going to help provide ourselves a place in the sun. We want the building big enough, with rooms enough to hold an ideal convention. The Bishop is taking it for granted that our department is going to do its bit. He counts on us and we are not going to fail.

Every Sunday school member, officer, and teacher is called upon to sacrifice something during this drive for the half million. Let it represent some form of self-denial. Lop off the luxuries and also some of the necessities—let it hurt; it's for a good purpose. When you go to future General Conferences it will be a pleasure to look on a commodious assembly hall and say, "I helped put that there."

Superintendents will please bring it to the attention of their schools and show the children they will all be able in the years to come to share in this great convenience. They all expect to attend General Conferences in the future. And yet, not for themselves alone but for the benefit of the church they love should they help provide for its general purpose buildings.

"Give us room that we may dwell, Zion's children cry aloud."

For success,

GOMER R. WELLS,

Superintendent Sunday School Department.

LAMONI, IOWA.

The reports on the results of the campaign for a half-million dollars for the new church auditorium in Independence indicate satisfactory responses from all quarters. The announcements of the Bishop in this issue, the letter from President F. M. Smith, all teem with encouraging news. The Lamoni forces are well organized and will no doubt report good results.

The Des Moines District has appropriated four hundred dollars for a radio station to be erected immediately in Des Moines. This station will not only handle church work, but also Iowa radio news for the Des Moines Register, which agrees to give the church due credit and publicity each day. And the Register editors give one of our church men the credit for the suggestion of developing a wireless news service.

MISCELLANEOUS

The Bishopric

Western Montana District: On account of the removal of Brother Thomas Reese from the Western Montana District he has resigned, and we hereby appoint Brother D. L. Allen, Deer Lodge, Montana, as Bishop's agent of the above district.

This district is not a large one from the standpoint of membership. The Saints have been very loyal to the Lord's work in the past, and I solicit for Brother Allen the same cooperation that has been extended to Brother Reese. The needs of the Lord's work are increasing year by year, and it becomes our duty to faithfully discharge the obligations which the Lord has placed upon us in a financial way. One tenth of our increase belongs to God, and I am sure that none would knowingly and willingly withhold the Lord's portion from flowing in the channel in which he has directed it.

Our prayer is that the Saints in this district may be blessed, as well as to receive of that Spirit which brings peace and comfort. BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE, Presiding Bishop.

Pastoral Notices

To the Saints of the Eastern Iowa District; Greeting: It having pleased the powers that be to transfer me from the western part of the State to this district that I might take up my labors with you, I take this means of communicating with you.

I am exceedingly anxious to see the work of the church triumph in this district, and to the end that it may flourish, we must learn to unite and concentrate our efforts in a common cause. This I feel assured we are all willing and anxious to do. We have before us very bright prospects. The good Lord has blessed us with a bountiful harvest, and the opulence of nature is in evidence everywhere.

Not only should we be interested in the upbuilding of our branches in the district, and the stimulating of the membership to spirituality, but we should be active in supporting the general church in a material as well as a spiritual way. Our obligations to the church in the way of tithes and offerings should be discharged. We should also remember the special request for funds for a general conference building, and contribute liberally to that fund. All this comes as a part of our work and a duty we owe ourselves as well as God.

We should also make a vigorous effort to push forward the missionary work. Let each member in the district, whether he be isolated or in the precincts of a branch, consider himself a committee of one to assist in evangelizing the world. You can set an example of Christlikeness; you can drop a timely word; you can distribute tracts and church papers amongst your friends and neighbors; you can cooperate with the missionary in the district, and thus be a source of strength to him. Let us remember that our slogan is "Twenty thousand converts, with their faces turned Zionward." Let each one ask himself, "What part shall I have in this matter, and in what way can I render the best possible assistance?" Then having determined the best course to pursue, let us go

An Enthusiastic Campaign

The big campaign has gained wonderful momentum in the few days that it has been under way. Reports are pouring in from all parts of the field, indicating that our people are awake and on the job in every branch from Georgia Bay to the Gulf and from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We have no doubt but that the foreign fields are at work too, for we are giving all an equal responsibility in this matter and have called on the Saints in all the world.

The campaign has ten days yet to go. We hope that every branch and district team will keep up their work until the time limit is up, and that every member in their respective localities shall have a chance to contribute liberally to this great work.

We anticipate that when this great sum of money is raised and the beautiful conference building is erected, every Latter Day Saint will want to feel that he has had a part in the erecting of that building, so we ask that the solicitors overlook not a single one.

Thoroughness and consecration are the two words that count big in this campaign. To let every man know his duty, and to give him a chance to contribute his part, will bring the big success and nothing else will.

Even though you are far over your quota, keep up the good work, and if more cloth is furnished, the bigger we can cut the garment. We are going to build according to the material furnished us. Zion will go forward with just the impetus that the people will give her. We have no doubt but that that impulse will be tremendous in its force.

The Saints are doing wonderfully. It is more than we had hoped could be true. There is only one more word to give: Keep it up until the last hour of the consecration weeks is over. We can then sit back for a bit and enjoy the thought of our success. Until that time let everyone be at work. We need every cooperation.

Sincerely and happily yours,

to with our might and make the gospel message resound to the uttermost bounds of our district.

I shall be glad to have your assistance in the work, and I will be glad to assist you. Let me hear from those who are anxious for meetings in their respective localities, and I will do my very best to assist you. For the present, at least, I will make 719 East Fifteenth Street, Davenport, Iowa, my mission address. Mail sent there will always reach me. Let us then bestir ourselves and see how much good we can do in the work of the church. I am sure we are all interested in it; and I am satisfied we all want to do our part. May we then labor together in love, and make our work inviting, and the name of our God honorable.

Yours very sincerely,

J. E. VANDERWOOD,

Senior Quarterly Exhausted

We regret to announce so early in the quarter that a twenty-thousand edition of the Senior Gospel Quarterly is exhausted, and that the number of orders in hand will not justify the printing of another edition.

We take this opportunity of advising our patrons who order by the quarter only that if they wish to make sure of delivery they can easily do so by getting on to the permanent, yearly list. Ordering by the year will save ten per cent for the Christmas offering, or other worthy object.

The superintendent has been trying for six years to find a basis by which he could safely estimate the number to print and has kept records for future reference and comparison.

These records show that we have lost enough in left-over Quarterlies to make a very substantial subscription to the new auditorium at headquarters.

There was nothing in our records this time to guide in estimating the edition. Our oldest office man could give us no help. For we can never tell how many orders are going to come in for the single quarter—those sold over the counter. For July-September we counted 1,100 Senior Quarterlies left over—quite a cut out of the profits on those sold. Therefore we felt justified in cutting the next quarter. Now we find the demand exceeds the supply because we could not forecast the demand.

Now that the new year is approaching, we once more urge schools to look ahead and place an order for the year. It is payable in advance but it will pay to borrow the money, if necessary. (A friend of the school would surely loan it.) If the school grows during the year, you can easily add to the order, at the quarterly rate, of course. Do this and we can guarantee you will be served, for we always print enough for our regular subscribers whose orders are filled a month before the quarter begins.

We can only guess at the number of "short orders" and cannot guarantee that such orders will be filled.

impregnable, and makes his stand on ground where he may be very weak.

Do not be narrow, or churlish, or ignorant; but in preaching let us stay rather close to our message. Under the simple statement of the terms of the gospel is a rich and profitable field for instruction to saint or sinner, beginning with the first lessons of faith and running on to the most profound consideration of Zion's problems.

Our strength and our safety, our originality and our glory, lie in the message committed to us in the revelations contained in the three books: "The elders, priests, and teachers of this church shall teach the principles of my gospel which are in the Bible and the Book of Mormon, in the which is the fullness of the gospel; and they shall observe the covenants and church articles to do them, and these shall be their teachings, as they shall be directed by the Spirit."—Doctrine and Covenants 42: 5.

This is not an argument against education. It is an argument in favor of a proper use of the things education gives us, namely helps in the presentation of our message, but no substitute for it. A man well learned in all philosophies but ignorant of the contents of the three books is ignorant indeed. We believe most profoundly in the Book of Mormon statement: "To be learned is good, if they hearken unto the counsels of God."
ELBERT A. SMITH.

As a result of the assistance given by Sister Audentia Anderson, superintendent of the Women's Department, the women of Lamoni have been organized into four groups. In charge of these are Mrs. Callie B. Stebbins, Mrs. Gustav Platz, Mrs. Oscar Anderson, and Mrs. Grant Stephenson. Until election time, these classes are addressed at their weekly meetings by various brethren on the problems of citizenship. After that time other work will likely be taken up.

While attending the conference at Sandusky, Michigan, Apostle J. A. Gillen was in an auto that ran into a ditch, bruising some of the occupants, but no one was hurt.

Sister Laura Mann, R. N., is in Lamoni in the interests of the Health Department of the church and will proceed immediately to establish a health center in conformity with the plan to have such centers in each stake. Classes in home hygiene and care of the sick will be organized for church members, and so far as possible a survey made of family health problems. The chief aim of the present movement is educational, to impart a better understanding of the laws of health and disease prevention. The classes will be in charge of Sister Myrtle Radmall, R. N., who is now teaching a class in hygiene at Graceland College. Sister Mann, as nursing director of the Health Department, will return to Independence after getting the work well organized at this place. There will be a basis of cooperation established with the Children's Home at this place, and we have no doubt the scope of the work will spread gratifyingly as it becomes better known and appreciated.

Price of Yearbook

On page 1023 of this issue, price of Yearbook is given as 60 cents. Notice has been received from the Women's Department that this has been changed to 75 cents.

A Most Generous Offer

In a letter to the Ensign, Brother E. Stafford, who in the past has done a great deal for the cause in like manner, says:

"If anyone is receiving the Ensign unexpectedly, remember you have a friend who is sending it to you free of charge, that you may become more acquainted with this great latter-day work, restored from heaven by the hand of an angel in 1830.

"Remember that I am only sending Ensigns to those whom the ministry recommend. Members must send for themselves to nonmembers."

As we have mentioned before, Brother Stafford hopes this will become a big thing. He is willing to send the Ensign free to nonmembers if the names and addresses are sent to him by missionaries who will recommend them as likely readers. The exact length of time may vary, but at least our investigating friends will have opportunity to become acquainted with our literature. Help the missionaries become acquainted with the nonmembers who ought to be getting the benefit of this generous offer. Address E. Stafford, Box 54, Independence, Missouri.

We Have Made a Great Start!

Dozens of letters and telegrams are pouring into our office from branches and districts who are "going over the top"

Eighty men before starting out to solicit Independence for $50,000 first solicited themselves. In eight minutes they raised $8,000, just a hundred dollars to the man.

One brother, intending to give $50 to the building fund, had a dream wherein he was shown that his share was $500. He gave it.

Southern California, with only 1,000 members, men, women, and children, has shouldered a quota of $21,000. They intend to raise it too.

Boston with a quota of $3,500 wires Saturday morning: "Held meeting last night on plan of local committee, considering incomes and suggested amount each individual should pay. Plans a success. Asked one member for $100 and he gave $500. Nearly all pledged more than committee asked. Subscribed $7,500 to-night. More than doubled our quota."

A faithful missionary writes from the field: "I have earned over $60 toward the $75 which I pledged. This I have earned by embroidery work, mostly in my sleepless hours, when insomnia prohibits my dreaming. So I turn on the light and work with the colors, which does not affect my sight. I will make my pledge $100 and maybe more, and the pleasure is mine."

George E. Harrington from Toronto writes: "During the Sunday afternoon meeting of conference, we raised over $3,000 for the new auditorium, making the subscriptions for the Toronto District about half of the allotment asked by the Bishop and the drive not yet on."

Charles Fry writes that his district had already subscribed 90 per cent before the drive opened.

M. C. Fisher wires that Massachusetts with a quota of $15,000 will go over the top easily.

One missionary's wife sends in $500 unsolicited. Another writes: "My companion and I have decided that we want to help boost the $500,000 drive. So we will give $100 to help turn the wheel of fortune for the Lord."

Keep the Good Work Going!

Our Duty as Citizens

We are reminded of a story told by a prominent attorney, who had been active politically in one of the two great parties in this country.

He stated that on one occasion within recent years his party convention nominated a man in whom he had no confidence, a man to whom he would not have considered intrusting any of his private, legal business. The opposition party nominated a good man for the position, which was that of probate judge. Although the party to which this attorney belonged normally had a good majority it soon became apparent that in the position of probate judge there was a strong undercurrent for the opposition candidate.

In this situation the county committee called upon him and other well-known reputable citizens to go out on the stump and in public addresses, and privately, urge votes for the party candidate as probate judge. He finally agreed to do so and did. The result of this canvass was that the party candidate was elected.

Shortly thereafter his brother-in-law died, and his estate naturally came into the probate court. Thanks to the mal-

To uphold the prohibition law, it is important that we note carefully the character of the candidates for the United States Senate and House of Representatives in Congress, for the enforcement of the law now on the statute books, or any law that may be put on the statute books in the future, we have to look primarily to the President.

When it comes to State and local officers, there appears but little sound reason for voting at all by the usual party designation of Republican and Democratic. The governor or a member of the State legislature has nothing to do with national policies like the tariff, or international policies like the League of Nations, or even with national prohibition, with the single exception of those occasional times when amendment to the Federal Constitution is proposed. And since there have been but four such amendments in the last fifty-five years, national policy is hardly a sound basis on which to elect State officers; especially since none of the constitutional amendments have been made on a purely party basis, except possibly the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments.

If there exists practically no reason for electing State officers on a national party basis, there exists still less reason in the case of municipal and township officers, for never under any conceivable circumstances are they connected with the national policies, as the tariff, League of Nations, for-

Independence Reports Very Encouraging Results

With a quota raised above the average and set at $50,000, the Saints at Independence raised during the first week of the two Consecration Weeks for the auditorium fund a total of $65,000 and as we go to press are confident of raising $75,000. A late report from Northeastern Missouri indicated their quota would about be tripled.

administration of the probate judge whom he had assisted to elect, the estate was dissipated, and his sister left without support, not because her husband had not made due provision, but simply through maladministration. This attorney is now providing from his own purse for his sister, and he is keenly aware of the fact that it is his own wrongful act which made her destitute.

It is probably true with our readers, as it is with the editors of the paper, that they have considered themselves associated with and members of one of the national political parties. Yet if we are to obey Doctrine and Covenants 95: 2, "to seek honest men, wise men, and good men diligently to uphold," we cannot consistently vote year in and year out, simply on the basis of party designation.

In electing a man to a public office, character is of the first importance. Close after it would come the platform of principles. Principles are in some ways more important than individuals. But since the political parties so often use a platform, as the colored man expressed it, just like the platform of a railroad coach, "Something to get in on with," the character of the man is of the greatest importance.

In national politics party designation has significance as representing national and international policy, though a close student of history is often struck with sudden reversals of position of party leaders and representatives, often because of purely personal reasons, of spite, or otherwise.

eign treaties, interstate laws, the free coinage of silver, the freedom of the Philippines, or any other of the questions which have divided the great parties in the past. For city and town administration men having practical ability in the administration of such affairs should be chosen. The importance of this may readily be seen by an examination of our tax receipts. Indirect taxes, and income tax of the Federal Government to-day do not equal for most of us our municipal taxes, while the State tax is, as a rule, trivial in comparison with town and city taxes. Whether a man is a Republican or a Democrat, or a good party worker has next to nothing to do with his fitness for municipal office. His practical qualifications, however, can be and should be investigated and considered.

Some cities to-day elect a commission, who choose from their number one to be mayor, and appoint to the other members the various departments of municipal work. Some cities in other countries elect a council, which employs or hires a business manager as mayor, trained for such work.

To some of our readers, politics may seem to be of but little importance. It is undoubtedly true that an unorganized majority has often been defeated by an organized minority, and sometimes by a small minority. But that does not furnish a justification for a failure or neglect to do what lies in our power for good government. It is a problem both for the men and the women of the church. It is idle for us to talk of social and economic reform, unless we work for it. It is idle to talk of social and economic reform and the building up of Zion, and then either fail to take any part in the primaries and elections, or else always vote solely by party designation. To do the latter comprises rather a malicious case of not letting your right hand know what your left hand is doing, but to have them fighting against each other.

We are convinced that there are enough who want good government; who want all the laws strictly enforced, including those on prohibition; who want in an abstract way, good men in office, who want economy of administration; who could unite and work for that which is right, and thus secure the best interests of the community. We are convinced that a majority desire that which is good. S. A. B.

The Meaning of Citizenship

Because of the imminency of the general election in the United States, one's dominant impression of the meaning of citizenship may be his privilege at the ballot box. In fact we are inclined to think that is the case in a majority of instances.

Having of late discussed intimately the subject with various groups of representative women, we were loath to admit that the word citizenship was directly associated with a vision of a mystical something called a ballot. And the fear that they could not rightly attend to the simple task of marking a sheet of paper and thus registering their votes correctly loomed large in their minds.

Now to those of the more favored sex who have gotten past that stage this seems trivial and not worthy the time to discuss it. Nevertheless, one who would impart instruction must recognize situations as they are and be disposed to proceed from the known to the unknown. In ten minutes one can draw a sample ballot and demonstrate it, or explain the simplicity of a voting machine if such is in use in the community.

Then the next big question that arises is, For whom shall we vote? As one sister put it: "It's fine to get generalities about citizenship; it is good to know the structure of our Government and the methods by which we select our officials, but we want to know who to vote for and why!"

We wish it were as simple as that. It would be most gratifying to feel that some one could assemble enough wisdom into one cranium to allow him to sift out all the information involved in that proposition. But very frankly we told the sister we were afraid she was wanting a university course when she was with the rest of us in the primary grade. She wanted a year's work in about four forty-five-minute periods. Which is human nature. We like short cuts and ready-to-wear methods.

She knew she couldn't get what she asked for handed to her all ready to swallow, yet we cannot blame her for wanting it. We all want it.

Why all this period of national struggle over politics, this disturbance of business, the general feeling of insecurity over the future unless we can from it elicit sufficient information to allow us to cast a ballot that represents our wishes?

But after all the process is like eugenics, to insure being born right one should begin his process of selection with his grandparents. So the choosing the right candidates should begin a long time before the date of the election.

Citizenship, rightly considered, is the warp upon which the woof of our social fabric is woven. It is broad enough to include our best religious and moral ideals, and intimate enough to affect our whole social life.

Ostensibly, any sort of government is but the outgrowth of the highest ideals of the individuals who make up the nation. In reality it often affords a means whereby designing men so direct the machinery of government that it serves their own interests first.

Not until the rank and file are sufficiently interested in the principles and methods by which government is effected are we to expect any material reforms where our rights have been violated.

So those women who for the first time have seriously considered the relative merits of various candidates, from local to national, may well say in some instances, "But party means nothing to me; I want to know why it is I must in this instance or that either refrain from voting or else support men who seem utterly incompetent for the trust they wish us to impose in them."

They must realize that true citizenship implies as careful selection in the primary, the caucus, and the convention, as in the final vote at the ballot box.

Real citizenship begins at home, extends into the community, reaches out to cover the county and State, and finally indicates a definite choice for its national officials.

How can a person in public office serve the interests of his constituents if he is not acquainted with their wishes? How are the people at home to develop clear ideas as to policies concerning government except by a process of education which will enable them to judge the larger issues by an intimate knowledge of the lesser ones?

To our way of thinking, there is even more to the right of franchise than to "use your brains and vote." It may be necessary to institute campaigns, to clarify and express issues, to develop sentiment; then choose a candidate who because of his ability and sympathy can do his part in putting those ideals into effect. Otherwise citizenship becomes an endless experiment, a groping for an undefined something, and frequent disappointment.

In spite of the abhorrence many good people have for politics, there must be a sane consideration of the fundamentals of citizenship which allow religion to function, the home to flourish, and communities to be safe, clean, and healthful. If it is politics to do these things, even to the selection of candidates and their election, the making of it possible for them to serve in the best possible manner, then we must enter politics as individuals and local groups to solve our local problems.

Since our church is not a local affair, not even a national organization, but international in its ideals, the church will likely never enter politics as a church, but no matter of which sex, regardless of location, we must recognize citizenship as a sacred right not lightly to be disregarded, and something which affects our attitude toward the church as an organization and toward our fellow citizens as such. It is deep and wide, always worthy of our careful study.

Please Mark Your Papers

Often the Saints send us copies of papers from their respective communities, sometimes with a letter or card accompanying, often with nothing.

Now we always appreciate this kindness and hope it will be continued, even though we may not use everything sent us. But if the Saints would kindly mark the pages and items which we should read, it would greatly facilitate our work. Often we search patiently through page after page and find nothing at all of special nature, which is a disappointment to us and to the sender. Go this one step further and we shall greatly appreciate it. HERALD EDITORS.

Last-minute conditions crowd from this issue a number of newsy letters from all quarters. We shall print them next week.

Blue Pencil Notes

Not long ago I stood on the summit of Mount Manitou. About me were giant granite boulders and great pine trees; before me were the eastern plains out over which I could look for more than a hundred miles and watch the play of sunlight and Titanic shadows; about me were the rush and roar of the elements, for it was storming where I stood.

And there I had a new vision of the awful majesty and power of God. But the bigger he seemed to grow to my vision the smaller I became. There was nothing there in all that I saw to indicate to me that the God who made Manitou had the slightest interest in an insignificant creature like me.

But then there came to me something else, a clearer perception than I had ever before enjoyed of the great necessity that Jesus Christ should come in the flesh teaching men that God does care. The mountains declare a God of majesty and power; but Jesus came to reveal a personal God of sympathy and understanding.

The law of Moses came down from Sinai with thunder and terror, so that the people trembled in their shoes and hid their eyes and said, Surely our God is a terrible God of power and dominion. But Jesus Christ came walking along the shores of Galilee, saying, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Through him ye may dare to presume to make friends with God, for he said to his followers, "Henceforth I call you not servants; but I have called you friends." We don't get that idea from elemental evidences. We must have a spiritual revelation, a revelation of God's personality. That thought is tremendously important.

In all the infinitely varied, multiform manifestations of intelligent life in the animal world, there is ever a struggle upward toward a more well-marked, clearly defined, positive, and enduring personality, reaching its climax in this world in man. Passing from man to God is there any reason to presume that the process will be reversed? Rather may we assume that in him is ever resident the most complex, yet clearly defined personality, eternal, omnipotent, omniscient, beyond our power in and of ourselves ever to understand or find out. What is that personality? What are its moral attributes?

Thomas Carlyle declared that light was ahead for him and his feet had found firm standing only when finally he was able to believe that God and not a fiend had made the universe. Browning rejoiced when he could write: "So, the All-Great were the All-Loving too."

Very many scientists admit the existence of God—a God—something unaccountable, unapproachable. But what sort of God is it? Exactly the God that is revealed by the heart of a granite boulder, the roar of the mountain winds, the sweep of the far-flung plain, the arch of the skies—an elemental force, awful, magnificent—that may care or may not care, that may feel or may not feel—who knows? Man cannot commune with Saturn, or have fellowship with the tides, or be friends with gravitation.

Yet the idea of the personality of God is infinitely important to us. On that idea hinges our destiny, our very conception of our own personality. As Snowden says:

"The question of the personality of God is one of fundamental importance. Our answer to it will frame our conception of God, of his character and worth and relation to the world; shape our view of the universe; determine the reality and worth of our own personality; measure all our values; decide character and destiny; and underlie all our psychology, ethics, economics, sociology, politics, science, philosophy, and religion. As this central, sovereign Personality of the universe stands or falls will all finite personalities and worths abide or wither."

We are dependent upon revelation through faith to bring us any true concept whatever of the character and personality of God. And the most vital and all important revelation of all time was in the person of Jesus Christ. In him "the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us, full of grace and truth." For that revelation I was most profoundly thankful as I listened to the roar of the elements upon Manitou. It lightened the whole vast universe like a candle in the window at home at night. It put a life and a soul and a purpose into all things that I saw and heard and felt.

A TYPICAL LETTER

(This letter is typical of dozens being received by Bishop McGuire.)

BROCKTON, MASSACHUSETTS, October 20, 1920.

Dear Brother McGuire: Last night was one long to be remembered in the history of the Brocton Branch.

Bishop M. C. Fisher was with us Sunday, and met with our committee, giving council.

Monday, at 7.30 p. m., we requested fasting and prayer at the very hour our committee at the church were kneeling for wisdom and light; and words are inadequate to express our experience.

Our city is at a business standstill and has been so for some four months, and we must confess there were heavy responsibilities resting with us as we wended our way to the committee.

As we stepped from the car, a great light seemed to flood our very being and we knew God would direct, as we specified the amount against the members' names, starting with the priesthood.

Tuesday evening we called the Saints together, making no announcement of the nature of the meeting. Congregational singing, prayer, reading, and a duet, then we told of our experience, and introduced Brother Edward Travers of Boston, and our grand, "little big man," C. Edward Miller, who gave a splendid talk which was a spiritual uplift in consecrated service.

We then handed Brother Miller our list and in three minutes one thousand dollars was pledged. In twenty minutes, sixteen hundred, and not all present.

Yours in bonds,

FRANK S. DOBBINS.

The two-day meeting at Prescott recently was a successful gathering, with the following present and taking part: Elders G. W. Burt, G. E. Burt, Matthew Umphrey, and Brother Alexander Weiderholdt. The officers of the Women's Department were present and held an enjoyable meeting. The Saints are much encouraged by the meetings.

Any Saints who intend to sail from England to America in the near future are requested to write to Sister M. Fawcett, 250 Scott Lane, Newton, Wigan, as she desires to have company for the trip. State name of ship and date of sailing.

The Value of a Good Example

Reports coming to us from Massachusetts District explain in part how that district went over the top. Massachusetts has been paying more than their pro rata share of tithing the past year or two. They are alive there to the needs and importance of the church work. Because of this they were assessed over double the average amount of the church per membership. But they held a meeting before the drive, which possibly started off, as such meetings do, when Harold Gunsolley, a Lamoni boy, son of Professor J. A. Gunsolley, of Graceland College, opened the meeting by placing his own subscription at $500. Other men better able to pay than he could not be outdone, so the result is that Boston raised their pledges to two and three times the amount pro rated to the Massachusetts District.

Then Providence, Rhode Island, held their branch meeting. This is the largest and one of the oldest branches in the district. They had before them the example of Boston, and so proceeded to more than double their own allotment, and raised $10,000 with $12,000 in sight.

The result is that with an assessment of $15,000, about $15 per member, Boston and Providence have raised $17,000, and expect to raise $19,000, and this represents just about half of the membership of the district. It is for this reason that Massachusetts, asked to give double the average for the church, has doubled her quota and given twice as much as they are asked for.

Tithing Summary

Recently, in connection with the drive for the General Conference auditorium, for our own information we went over the list of church districts, and attempted to make some approximation of a quota on the basis of membership. We then went over the same list and made an approximation on the basis of tithing paid. The results were rather startling in several instances, as we discover that certain districts are paying much more than a pro rata share of tithing, per

REAL SACRIFICE

Consecration has been emphasized in this campaign—Here is real Consecration:

"We have begun our drive for the one half million appropriation for the General Conference Auditorium. While going through the Holden Home for the aged with Brother McWethy this afternoon we found that our aged people are anxious to give all they possibly can, and in some instances more than I think they should have given. One sister pledged $80 out of the pension she gets from the Government; another sister having less than $40 of this world's finances pledged $20, and to hear her talk makes me think I have not yet known what sacrifice for this work means, or possibly I am not willing to sacrifice to the degree I should. However, I am hopeful of raising the amount needed, and think we will go beyond the $500,000, which is undoubtedly the beginning for the buildings of the redemption of Zion."

(From letter of I. M. Ross, Holden, Missouri, October 19, 1920.)

year, according to the last published report, that for the year 1918, published in the back of the HERALD for 1919.

The membership reported to the conference of 1919 was used also as a basis. From this estimate we find that the following districts and stakes paid between two and three times the average tithing paid by members of the church: Northern California, Southern California, Eastern Colorado, Gallands Grove District, Little Sioux District, Lamoni Stake, Massachusetts District, Eastern Iowa District, Far West Stake, North Dakota District, Kansas City Stake, Holden Stake, Western New York; Kirtland, Ohio; Portland, Oregon; Seattle, Washington.

As we review this list and compare with some other districts and stakes we can hardly come to the conclusion that the difference is covered by a difference in wealth. It is true that some districts are much poorer than others; allowance should be made for that fact. No criticism is offered of those who are doing the best they can. Also in some instances in the smaller districts, the results may be partly accounted for by a large donation from one individual who has not previously paid tithing. But on the whole we think it will be found that it is because in these districts the Saints are more alive to the interests of the work, and that their officers are more alive to their duty. Northern California District, which appeared to have the highest average, is still only about $15 per member.

Surely there is a large field of service yet open to us in that capacity—the debt we owe to the Lord of one tenth of our increase year by year, after giving one tenth of what we possess.

What Man Is

"When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained; what is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him? For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honor. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands."—Psalm 8: 3-6.

The great question in all ages has been, What is man? whence does he come? and whither does he go? The answer to the first question incidentally throws some light at least upon the second and third.

Man has eyes to see. Yet there are many animals that can see much farther and better than he, so far as the natural eye is concerned. But there is something in man which causes him to see beyond the seeing of the eye; hence he manufactures a microscope, to make that which is infinitely small appear larger so that he can see it; and that which is remote, to bring it near in the telescope, so that he can study the sun, the moon, and the stars. He can study those things that are small and those afar off. But beyond his power of seeing even with the most powerful microscope he forms various other images in his mind, and calls them atoms, electrones, monads, biophores, ids, and by a variety of other titles.

Sound travels at a very slow rate compared with sight. Ordinarily a human voice can be heard and understood only over a limited space of a few hundred feet. It is reported that when a mountain blew up in the South Sea Islands that it was heard for many miles around. Some have stated as far as a hundred miles away, and it took the sound several minutes to travel that distance, and for sound to travel one thousand miles would take over an hour.

Yet man has extended the limit of his ear so that he can hear an ordinary conversation from New York to San Francisco. He has proceeded so far that he is now able to elimi-

Eulogy of the Late Peter Anderson

An extract from the funeral sermon preached by Doctor Joseph Luff at the Stone Church, Independence, Missouri, June 4, 1920. For obituary see Zion's Ensign of June 3.

Turning to the Good Book towards which it has become natural for Saints to turn and have reference to in times of necessity, of whatever character they may be, mental, moral, spiritual, physical, or otherwise, I read just a portion of a sentence which I select from the seventh chapter of the book of Nehemiah, the closing words of the second verse: "He was a faithful man, and feared God above many."

Turning to the New Testament record I select from the eleventh chapter of the Hebrew letter these words, from the closing portion of the fourth verse: "He, being dead, yet speaketh."

I do not know what to say to you this afternoon. I am lonesome, grief-stricken, and had the service been imposed upon me to officiate in this way at the obsequies of a member of my own individual household, my heartstrings could not have been torn more than they are to-day; and as I look upon this bank of flowers, and upon the face of the man whose mortal remains lie in the casket before me, I join, so far as the sentiment intended to be expressed is concerned, in the expression that is here indicated, but I cannot help feeling, and expressing it as the thought in my heart, that while I admire all this and appreciate what it represents or is intended to express, I wish it could all have been expressed and lavished upon him at a time when he could have shared the joy of the experience, for if ever a man known to me in the church of Christ deserved well of his brethren, and of the church, this man surely ranked among them.

Very, very few people were acquainted with Peter Anderson. Even one of the older members of his family said to me, "I have never been acquainted with my father until the last two or three years"; and I have heard it expressed in the last five years by individuals who had opportunity during that time to get into closer association with him than they had been permitted to be prior to that time, "I never knew that Peter Anderson was the man he is." I have heard them frequently say at General Conferences, "He has made an exhibition that I never thought, from his outward appearance, I was justified in expecting."

Peter Anderson was one of those men who developed under pressure, and you never saw him to get acquainted with him, until the pressure was applied, but when the exigency arose, and that pressure was brought to bear, making a demand upon the man for the exhibition of the candor, fidelity, and conscientiousness that were characteristic of him, then all his intellectual force, and that volume of virtue in various forms that was wrapped up within him, answered the requirement and to the front it rose in defense of what he believed to be right, in contest against that to which he believed to be wrong and the church to-day owes him the best tribute that it would be in its power to pay to any man.

Never has a man entered into the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ and passed away after having served his time there, that deserved better at the hands of this church. I speak without any reservation. As indicated in his obituary incidentally, upon his entrance into the church, he seemed to have gathered somehow instinctively, and by the aid of the education then being furnished him under the crude opportunities that environed him, that this church was worth all that a man had, and he sized himself up, and took his inventory as nearly as he could, and with all there was in him and to him of intellectual, moral, physical, or any other power, faculty or facility, he approached its altar, and with a prayer to God upon his lips, laid it there, and until death silenced those lips he never gave exhibition of the remotest inclination, in the faintest way, to recall it, and never has an instance arisen in the course of his life, as a representative minister of this church that a suggestion was made of a necessity for some man to occupy in some place of responsibility that was fraught with demand for sacrifice or where it was indicated that danger lay that did not find this man ready voluntarily to respond to that suggestion and answer the call of his church.

On five different occasions, I believe, he accepted and filled missionary appointments to Scandinavia, and to my knowledge, as I learned it from inner circles, (he might not like it to be told, for he was a man of great reserve—did not like ostentation, and did not want his personal matters to become conspicuous, if he had anything to say in regard to it) but when he was over there engaged in the work of translating into his native language one of our sacred books, he was compelled to live on less than ten cents a day for his support; but even that was a joy to him, and everything that was within him that he laid upon the altar included within it all the increase, mentally and otherwise, with which God in his kindness later favored him. As fast as it grew, it was handed over.

That child of his mind, the Sandhedens Banner—projected and maintained under trying conditions, as some of you know—was an evidence in this line. The scheme was formed by him, and you are aware with what earnestness he threw what energy he had at his command into the work of making it a success, and applied himself, as the obituary states under conditions that were torturing to the mind, torturing to the body, and that would demand sacrifice on every hand; but the supreme thought, the prominent consideration in this man's mind was the people of his native land who had not yet been favored with opportunities for gospel education that we had, and inasmuch as they had not, we must convey to them what was necessary for that education; and so he applied himself in this consecrated manner, and the great thought with him was, How much can I do?

I have thought of this man at times when I have heard people figuring out how much was required of them as tithing; how much was demanded that they might escape condemnation or criticism for not doing their full portion. I have thought of these people and the action of this man who simply consulted himself, and said, How much is there to give, and felt sadness because there wasn't more at his command to turn over, after he had already given his all. That was the thought, and let me tell you that mental offspring of his—if I may call it such—the Sandhedens Banner, was his thought until his lips were silenced in death, so far as I have reason to believe.

Shortly after having been notified of his removal from the active duties demanded of the members of the Quorum of Twelve he said to me, "I hope the privilege will be given me to resume my work more continuously on the Sandhedens Banner. I want my people—the Scandinavian people—to have a better show than they have been given; and if the church gives me an opportunity, as I am hoping they will, to give my energies over to that, I want to apply the balance of my days in reaching towards what seemed first in my mind to be a possibility, through that medium."

[Note.—Some weeks before his death Brother Anderson had a conference with the First Presidency at which time he expressed his wishes and unfolded his program. Everything that he asked for was granted. It was arranged for him to edit Sandhedens Banner and to travel as extensively as he might wish or feel able to do in its interests. Notice to this effect dated May 12 was published in the HERALD for May 26, page 509.—HERALD EDITORS.]

Now, there are some things in connection with him in his work that perhaps it would not be wise for me to refer to, but as I thought of the man, my thoughts led me to a selection of the language that I have called your attention to in these texts. The one, the declaration of Nehemiah, "He was a faithful man, and he feared God above many." The other, that "He, being dead, yet speaketh." I instinctively think about those illustrious characters whose names have figured prominently from the beginning unto this time. They are all dead, and they are yet speaking. If death terminated all, we would have nothing to-day, or very little, upon which to build our hope, but it is the living, the afterspeaking of dead men who have served in their day as this man served, that is furnishing us with much of the blessedness of experience that we are enjoying, and to which we are bearing witness from time to time.

As I said, I am sure my brother would not want me to dwell long in eulogy of him. He would rather I would set before the people the nature of the obligations imposed upon them justly by the Almighty, and to make an impression upon their minds, drawn from lessons in his life before this accident of death occurred, that it would be wisdom for them to take advantage of while the strength and vigor of mental and physical energy were at their command, so that similar circumstance could not take them by surprise or find them unprepared. I apprehend that when the moment came for this man to make surrender of his physical self, for the time being, to the enemy death, it was to him but an incident in the long-studied program and had only glad experiences connected with it; no apologies to make by reason of conditions that obtained; the course of life that had been pursued; but he had just simply to acknowledge the notification that the time had arrived when that service should terminate, so far as it was concerned here, and be transferred to a field of equal if not greater necessity; so I look upon him as one who has entered upon conditions of more restful activity, where peace pervades the atmosphere, for we know that the Psalmist said—I think you will find it in the closing part of the thirty-seventh Psalm—"Mark the perfect man and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace."

I do not, in the sense that some would apply the word, speak of this man as a perfect man, but there is a command of the Savior himself, that "We shall be perfect even as our Father which is in heaven is perfect." And in the sense intended by that expression of the Savior, I count this man as such, as much as any who have come within the range of my acquaintance. Perfection, you know, is absolute, so far as it relates to God. Perfection is relative so far as it relates to man, and if the estate of a person reach or approximate that point of relative perfection that has been made possible then we can speak of the man obtaining that condition, exercising his forces in that sphere, as being perfect; and we are asked by the Psalmist to mark that man and to behold the upright, and here I find a sample. I mean just what I say. You could not blind that man by shallow sentiment; you couldn't make him yield to anything that you had not first convinced him ought to be yielded to; you couldn't by virtue of any force that had in it a threat or bribe or lure disturb the tenor of his regular method of procedure. If he saw a service gap to be filled he was willing anybody else should fill it, if he thought they would do it better than himself; he was willing they should occupy, and had no disposition or spirit to make himself conspicuous, nor did jealousy poison his soul; but if he thought he saw an opening that was not being better filled, even where the work was arduous or dangerous, instantly he was to the front offering himself. . . .

I know somebody is measuring the grief that is having its expression here because of this sudden inroad unexpectedly made upon a family's life's happiness. He knows the foundation and source from whence these tears are issuing. He knows how deep in the souls are these emotions that are finding this form of expression, but he knows more. He knows not only that; the Scriptures tell me that when the grain is ripe he putteth in the sickle, and it is a fact that some grain ripens before others, and some reaches that maturity without making any wonderful spectacular display before the eyes of men. Within the depths of soul there is going on, hidden from the average human eye, those processes which are developing the conditions that reach out towards a perfection such as God designed, and when that point of ripeness is reached, the sickle is permitted, the transfer is made, and that which had the essential training under conditions that were educative in lessons of patience, toil, endurance, sacrifice, meekness, and charity reaches its graduation quietly and when that point has been reached the transfer is made. God knows all that and deals accordingly.

Hence my vision to-day includes our brother, with his passport thus secured, taking up a work perhaps grander and greater, broader and more elaborate in the revelation of the obligations it imposes, and amid more satisfying and delightful surroundings; so, while I note the expressions of sorrow here, and see the tears, instinctively my mind passes out to another condition. I hear the hallelujah song. I see the radiance of smiles upon the faces of angels, and upon the face of him who is forming acquaintance for the first time with the occupants of the new realm, and as I see the one and hear the other, I stretch my hand out to those who remain, saying, "You have my condolences and deepest sympathy," yet to the other, I would cry out, if my voice could reach him, "Peter, you have my congratulations. There's no hope within the realm that I occupy to-day greater or grander than that which, if indulged, would permit me, some day, sooner or later, to stand where you stand and radiate the glory reflected from the countenance of Him whose presence is your present delight, and to hear that blessed, 'You have done well! Come unto higher ground, and assume greater responsibilities, with a view of the infinite triumph that lies out in the eternal beyond, when you shall finally reach the ultimate of faithful service. Henceforth the things that have offended you or that have perplexingly strewn your way cannot come, but you shall see things as I do; you shall stand in the position where you will understand what part all these anomalies have had in the thing I designed and just why my providence allowed their contact with the elements that will figure in the building up of this greater structure.'

"Peter, my brother, the lesson you have learned in advance of some of us, we would not for a moment seek to withdraw from you. Be yours forever the enjoyment of the good so well earned and to which you are entitled, because of the truthfulness of this text as applied to you. 'You have been a faithful man, and you feared God above many.' Many were shaken and faltered, here and there, because surrounding conditions did not favor. Many were afraid to stand where you stood because of the considerations that were involved. They yielded to the world, or were lured aside, but you were upright. Upright; unbending; and faithful and true under the conditions that were presented in your experiences. Many were influenced otherwise, but you, by divine grace, were enabled to occupy well until the tribute that the church lays at your feet or by the casket in which your mortal remains are inclosed, was more than earned." I say to-day that if the same thing can be truthfully written as an epitaph, upon the tombstone placed over my grave, should there be one, I should be satisfied to take my chances at the throne or bar of God, or the gates of the celestial city.

The Curriculum of Junior Colleges

By F. M. McDowell

Editorial Introduction

As far back as May, 1912, the Board of Trustees of Graceland College resolved that they would not attempt to offer more than two years of collegiate work. Still, it was not until the return of Professor Floyd M. McDowell, from Clark University, that they saw their way definitely to appoint a Dean of the Junior College. Professor McDowell had made that—the small college—the subject of his thesis for his master's degree at Clark University and had come to the same conclusion as had the members of the Board. Since that date the development of Graceland as a junior college has been under his immediate direction.

In the meantime, others throughout the country were feeling the same necessity, so there had arisen a number of small junior colleges by various names, and high-school courses and normal courses had been extended to cover the first two years of college work, while some universities like that of Chicago, divided their work into junior and senior college, in addition to the usual graduate school of the larger universities.

The school year 1917-18 was spent by Brother McDowell at the State University of Iowa, where he took as the theme for his doctor's dissertation, "The junior college." This dissertation was published by the United States Bureau of Education, and June 30 and July 1, last, a national conference of representatives from junior colleges was held in Saint Louis, Missouri. This conference was attended by thirty-three persons from fourteen different States. Doctor McDowell was apparently the only representative from Iowa. He was very liberally complimented on his work, and informed that his doctor's dissertation on junior colleges was responsible for the early calling of this, the first national meeting of junior colleges.

Four sessions were held, and twelve different speakers read papers, including Doctor P. P. Claxton, United States Commissioner of Education; Doctor A. Ross Hill, president of the University of Missouri; and James M. Wood, president of Stephen's College, Columbia, Missouri. We are publishing Doctor McDowell's paper read on that occasion, on the curriculum of the junior colleges. As a result of this paper he was appointed a member of the National Committee on Curriculum of Junior Colleges. Graceland becomes a charter member of the National Association of Junior Colleges, or whatever the organization will finally be called, when the meeting is held for permanent plans, at Chicago, in February, 1921.

Doctor McDowell has previously been appointed by the State Teachers' Association of Iowa, as chairman of their Committee on Junior Colleges.

The junior college very clearly has a place in our educational system in America. The change is too great for the ordinary high school to the freedom of university life. The junior college permits the closer association at a time when it is most needed in the educational life, and at the same time more intensive teaching than is possible in a larger institution. It prepares its students to continue their work in the senior college, with a greater economy both to the students and to the community.

The Christian Science Monitor reprints extracts from Doctor Claxton's address at Saint Louis. He states, among other things, that the conditions confronting us in this country, the increased cost of education, increased demand and necessity for education, the great increase in the number of high-school students (now more than two million), and a higher standard of high school, require more colleges in order to prepare a greater number of young men and women to cope with the questions of to-day; that this additional preparation can best be extended through the junior college, and this at a reduction of at least twenty-five per cent, if not more. On account of general increase in the cost of living, the cost of education is necessarily also greatly increased.

He divides the 508 colleges of America into nine groups. The first includes but eight colleges, with an income in 1915-16 of between $2,600,000 and $4,000,000 a year, and enrollment between 4,800 and 8,500 students.

The second group includes West Point and the University of Michigan, with incomes between $1,000,000 and $2,000,000 a year, and an enrollment between 630 and 6,462. This includes fourteen colleges. In these two classes the average income per student is between $450 and $500.

Third, thirty colleges, with income $500,000 to $1,000,000; enrollment, 290 to 3,850; average income per student, $375.

Fourth, fifty-six colleges; $250,000 to $500,000; enrollment 105 to 4,138; average income $335.

Fifth, ninety-two colleges; $100,000 to $250,000; students 111 to 3,692; average income $250.

Sixth, one hundred and two colleges; income $50,000 to $100,000; students 72 to 1,557; average income $185.

Seventh, one hundred and twenty-two colleges; income $25,000 to $50,000; students 20 to 861; average income $145.

Eighth, fifty-four colleges; income $15,000 to $25,000; students 49 to 388; average income $120.

Ninth, twenty-nine colleges; income $3,000 to $15,000; students 66 to 345; average income $75.

Practically all of these colleges attempt to do full four years of college work and confer degrees, while they cannot justly do so, or supply the sufficient teachers for the upper grades, and while in the larger universities the freshmen and sophomore classes are taught all too often by young teachers with little or no experience, at the very time when with release from the close supervision of high school they are in the most need of skillful and wise guidance. Work at these ages is best handled in smaller colleges, while the equipment necessary for specialized work in the junior and senior years of college can easily be supplied by those having an adequate endowment, and hence sufficient library and laboratory equipment and means necessary to retain the services of teachers of the best ability.

Positively all colleges having an income of less than $50,000 and the larger part at least of those having an annual income of between $50,000 and $100,000 should cease to try to do more than two years of college work; and concentrate all their means of men and money on doing well the work of the junior college. In doing so, better teachers are thus made possible for the lower classes, and the amount of work accomplished should readily be increased from 25 to 50 per cent over that which is now done in these first two years of college.

This would doubtless result in reducing the excessive number on the waiting list of the large universities, and permit of more effective work in the first two years of college. At the same time these many small schools could greatly strengthen the third and fourth year work of the large universities by supplying so many additional trained young people for advanced work.

THE CURRICULUM OF JUNIOR COLLEGES

(Read by Doctor F. M. McDowell at the meeting of representatives from junior colleges, Saint Louis, Missouri, July 1, 1920. The basis of this paper is his doctor's dissertation.)

Before we can answer the question: What should be taught in the junior college, we must answer four other questions:

1. Why do we have junior colleges?
2. What do students who enter junior colleges expect to receive while there?
3. What is the consensus of opinion as to what should be taught as measured by what is being taught?
4. What is the probable future of the junior college?

Why Do We Have Junior Colleges?

The reasons for the existence of the junior college may be discussed under four heads:

- a. Administrative difficulties within the university.
- b. Administrative difficulties within normal schools.
- c. The demand for the upward extension of the high school.
- d. The problem of the small college.

a. Administrative difficulties within the university have arisen out of the rapid increase in attendance during the last quarter century. During this time Columbia University has increased 11 times in attendance, Illinois 9 times, Michigan and Wisconsin 4 times. The attendance at 30 leading institutions has increased 4 times as fast as the population during this period.

This situation has made it increasingly difficult to handle the large freshman classes in anything like a satisfactory manner. This situation also has served to emphasize the fact that the real end of secondary education is at the close of the regular sophomore year in college and not at the end of the traditional four-year high-school course. Consequently, to make our story short, a number of prominent university authorities have openly advocated the junior college in some form. In some States, notably California, Missouri, and Illinois, the university has taken the lead in this new movement. From our point of view there is just one item that we need to notice here. The junior college has come into existence to take care of the ever-increasing number who are demanding the first two years at least of college education. Let us bear this in mind until our conclusion is reached.

b. The administrative difficulties of normal schools have arisen out of the ever-rising standards demanded of teachers in our public schools and the frequent request of normal-school graduates for college credit for their work. This has led the normal schools not only to increase the number and variety of college courses offered, but also to ask that this work be accredited by the State institutions. As a result a large number of such institutions were soon fully accredited as four-year colleges, many of them actually assuming the name "college." Others were compelled for various reasons to limit their collegiate work to one or two years. When an institution of this type becomes accredited for two years of standard college work, what we really have is a junior college. This blending of the junior-college movement with that of the upward extension of the normal school is nicely illustrated in Wisconsin. This tendency also may have some interesting suggestions for the curriculum which we will discuss later.

c. Much time might well be spent in discussing the upward extension of the high school but such is not our purpose only as it bears upon the problem of the course of study of the junior college. The writer received detailed replies from 21 public junior colleges in answer to the question: "Why did you organize a junior college?" Ranked in the order of frequency of mention the reasons given were:

1. Desire of parents to keep children at home.
2. To provide a completion school for those who cannot go further.
3. Desire of pupils to secure college work near home.
4. To meet certain specific local needs.
5. Geographical remoteness of standard college or university.
6. To provide vocational training in advance of high school.

Ninety per cent of the replies to our questionnaire mentioned the demand for college work near home, at less expense, and under close supervision, as the real reason for organizing a junior-college course above and beyond the usual four-year high-school course. This conclusion should likewise prove suggestive in solution of our course of study problem.

d. There is still a fourth type of junior college which has appeared as an answer to a specific need of the traditionally American institution; the small college. Stating the problems as briefly as possible we have the following: Under the freedom of American life colleges have sprung up like mushrooms all over the country. One writer says that as many as 300 educational institutions have been attempted in Ohio alone. Pritchett in the report of the Carnegie foundation found nearly 1,000 institutions calling themselves colleges and universities but offering work all the way from that of a poor grade high school up to a four-year standard-college course. This situation led to an insistence for standardization with which we are all familiar. The effect was inevitable. Only a comparatively few of these institutions could qualify as four-year colleges. Another group had to be satisfied with academy work of a high-school grade. The larger group, probably fifty per cent, came between these two groups. What should be done with these? Their contribution to American life and ideals was known to all. Their value for the future was equally certain. Educators all over the country arose in their defense. They must be saved. They must find a place in our educational system. But how? The answer to the problem is found in the present day so-called private junior college of which there are now in the country more than 100, Texas and Missouri having the largest number.

The writer received replies from 54 private junior colleges as to their reasons for becoming junior colleges. Ranked in order of frequency of mention these were:

1. To provide opportunities for higher education under church control.
2. To furnish a completion school for those who cannot go further.
3. Financial difficulty of maintaining a four-year course.
4. Desire of students for college work near home.
5. To meet entrance requirements for professional schools.
6. To provide vocational training in advance of high school.
7. To provide additional opportunities for teacher training.

In a word the private junior college is an outgrowth of the demand that the traditional small denominational college be given a place in our educational system; a place at which American boys and girls just completing high school can secure at least two years of higher education in small groups under close supervision. We believe that this type of junior college is here to stay.

Summing up our discussion of the problem: Why do we have junior colleges, we may say then that this new type of institution has come into existence not so much to furnish entirely new content material for instruction as to meet certain administrative needs in high school, college, normal school, and university. There seems to have been little demand for new subjects but rather for an extension of the opportunities for securing that which was already being taught together with a closer supervision by either home or church of such instruction.

If this be true then the curriculum of the junior college might well be expected to be quite similar to that of the first two years of any standard-college course, the important question being the increased availability of such courses and the closer supervision of the immature youth while pursuing them.

We should not overlook however the demand that for some, the junior college should be a sort of completion or vocational school, furnishing instruction in vocational subjects in advance of anything offered in the high school. These points will also have an important bearing upon our curriculum.

What Do Students Who Enter the Junior College Expect to Receive While There?

The second problem which may have a bearing upon the course of study is: What do students who enter the junior college expect to receive while there? For purposes of this paper I have divided such students into four groups:

a. Those who expect to continue their liberal arts work in some standard college or university upon graduation from the junior college.

b. Those who expect to enter certain professional schools such as law, medicine, engineering, dentistry, etc.

c. Those who expect to enter some definite vocational line such as teaching.

d. Those who consider the junior colleges as a finishing school and thus the end of their education.

Let us consider the effect of such a classification upon the probable course of study of the junior college.

a. Clearly those who expect to continue their work as liberal arts students in some standard college or university will want to find in the junior college those subjects usually taught in the freshmen and sophomore courses of the standard college, so that they may enter the junior year without loss. What these courses are is pretty well agreed upon. They include English, foreign language, natural sciences, social sciences, and mathematics, with English usually required and a certain minimum and maximum amount permitted from the other departments.

Although no definite statistics are available the indications are that a large percentage of junior college students fall in this class. In replies to a questionnaire 41 per cent of the graduates of 53 private junior colleges in the years 1915 to 1917 inclusive continued work in some higher institution while 73 per cent of the graduates of 12 public junior colleges for the same years enrolled in higher institutions. It is not clear whether all of these took the regular liberal arts work however.

At any rate we may say that from this point of view we are safe in assuming that a large per cent of the curriculum of the junior college will be a duplication of the courses usually given in the first two years of the standard college or university.

b. A second group of students found in the junior colleges are those who expect to enter some professional school after completing two years of college work. If the subjects which they demand differ at all from those demanded by the first group it will be due to the entrance requirements of the particular professional schools which they expect to enter.

An examination of the entrance requirements specified by typical professional schools reveals very little variation from those required for admission to the junior year of the liberal arts course. In other words professional schools seem to be of the opinion that the first two years of standard college work consisting of general cultural courses constitutes the best preparation for professional work. There is however some variation to this rule. Medical schools emphasize the science courses in the first two years. Law schools ask more than the normal amount of social sciences. Engineering schools likewise ask more mathematics. All of these subjects are however standard liberal arts subjects, and to meet these various demands the junior college must offer a variety of such courses with opportunity for choice on the part of the student, this choice to be determined by future needs. For this group we shall need then a junior college curriculum which differs very little from that demanded by the regular college students.

c. Next we have to consider those students who expect to find in the junior colleges definite vocational courses adequate to assure to them a position upon graduation. Perhaps the best example of this group is the teacher training group.

In regard to the first two groups considered above we have raised no question as to their desirability. Such is admitted. But what about the justification of attempting to furnish in the junior college completion courses of a vocational nature. Some will argue that choice of vocations should not be made until the junior year hence we should do no great amount of definite vocational work in the junior college. Perhaps there is much merit in this argument.

On the other hand it is not true that an individual who has completed a four-year high-school course and has had two years of college work including a large amount of definite vocational training would be far above the average teacher for the country as a whole. Will not the teacher training in the junior college be far above the average in education of the teachers of the country as a whole? The Bureau of Education in fact reports that the average for all public-school teachers in America is about the 11th grade or third year of high school. In face of such facts may it not be well argued that the junior college may offer courses in professional training for teachers? May the same not be true also for other vocations?

There is a point of importance here however. Would it not be a mistake to encourage the student to take vocational courses which were of very little value in themselves or were in no way likely to prepare him for advanced work in the same line, or in similar lines? Could not courses be so arranged and taught as to furnish at one and the same time certain vocational training, cultural training, as well as preparation for advanced fields? For example in my own institution [Graceland College.—EDITORS.] we offer 15 hours of professional training for teachers. Upon completing this work the student is given a third grade State certificate. These same courses are so taught however as to have a general educational value and will also be counted as standard liberal arts courses should the student decide to enter the university at a later date.

In a word, the so-called vocational courses of the junior college might well have a dual value; first to raise the average for the amount of training usually had in the several vocations and second to furnish preparation for advanced work in various fields. At present this has been worked out best in the field of teacher training as pointed out above. Might it not also be worked out for such courses as domestic science and business training or commercial branches. A large number of the junior colleges for young women are giving courses in domestic science for college credit. A little later we shall refer to other attempts along this line.

d. There is still a fourth group of students in the junior college, namely, those who consider it as a finishing school, a place where they complete their general cultural education.

Results of my investigation mentioned above shows about 60 per cent of the graduates of the private junior colleges and 27 per cent of those of the public junior colleges failed to continue in higher institutions for the years 1915 to 1917. This would indicate that a large number of students look upon the junior college as a finishing school. Just what courses such students should have is an open question. Perhaps those of a vocational nature such as suggested above. We note a change of attitude however in regard to the so-called finishing schools that may have a definite bearing upon the curriculum. We quote from the recent catalogues of two of the leading junior colleges of Missouri.

One says: "Students were often embarrassed upon entering other institutions in finding that their degrees were complete misnomers. Private schools for women, of the so-called finishing type, were particularly at fault in this regard." To remedy this situation has been the object of this particular institution. The solution was found in the junior college fully accredited by the State university for two full years of college work.

Another says: "College has been in the forefront of modern women's schools in breaking away from the traditional lines of the old-fashioned finishing school."

This tendency would seem to indicate a decreasing number of students who regard the junior college as a "finishing school," of the old sort. On the other hand suppose a large number of students do leave school after completing the junior-college course, is not such a marked improvement for a "nation of sixth graders"? Would that thousands more of our citizens could complete a junior college course. At present only 10 per cent ever complete high school.

What Subjects Are Now Being Taught in the Junior Colleges?

In determining what the junior college curriculum should be it may be of value to find out what it actually is.

A summary of subjects offered by 19 public and 28 private junior colleges for the academic year 1917 and 1918 shows:

1. The traditional freshman and sophomore college subjects rank highest in frequency of mention. The 11 highest subjects in the private junior colleges are: English, history, mathematics, German, chemistry, physics, botany, Bible, psychology and education. The 10 highest in the public institutions are: English, history, mathematics, chemistry, French, German, economics, Spanish, physics, Latin. From this it is easy to see that English, history, mathematics, science, and foreign language constitute the bulk of the curriculum in both types of institutions.

2. Another feature worthy of note is the extent to which these institutions have introduced vocational courses. From a list of vocational subjects offered by 19 public junior colleges, it will be noted that such subjects constitute 17.5 per cent of the entire curriculum of these schools. In 28 private junior colleges the vocational subjects constitute only 9 per cent of the total curriculum. Of the vocational subjects in the public junior colleges the five highest are: mechanical drawing, machine shop, home economics, commerce, and surveying. Of those offered in the private schools the three highest are education, home economics, and agriculture. Of the 28 private junior colleges mentioned, 17 offered courses in education.

3. It may be of interest to mention the fact that although 59 per cent of the graduates of these private junior colleges did not go on to higher institutions only 9 per cent of their curriculum was vocational; on the other hand only 27 per cent of the graduates of the public junior colleges failed to enter higher institutions, yet 17.5 per cent of their curriculums was vocational in nature. Of course the question may well be raised at this point: What courses should the student who never expects to go beyond the junior college be encouraged to pursue—cultural or vocational?

What Is the Probable Fate of the Junior College?

A fourth question that may be a determining factor in the planning of a curriculum for the junior college is: What is the probable future of the junior college? After some study of this problem I am ready to state that in my opinion the junior college is here to stay as a definite factor in our educational system, provided, however, it finds its place and keeps it. What is its place? To save time we shall be somewhat dogmatic in our answer.

The chief justification of the junior college in my opinion is that it extends to American youth increased opportunities for securing a higher education nearer home or under closer supervision, at less expense. The junior college is bringing to the very door of thousands of our high-school graduates the opportunity to secure at least the first two years of a college education and meanwhile to find themselves and their chosen field. So long as our universities are overcrowded, so long as only 2 per cent of our citizens even enter college, so long as we remain only a nation of sixth graders, surely there is a place for such an institution as the junior college. To keep its important place the junior college should insist upon high standards for admission and for graduation. It should offer work which is clearly of college grade. It should permit nothing to interfere with its ideals; close supervision on the part of a well trained faculty with students in small groups. If it attempts vocational training it should be with the same high standards. Under such control the future of the junior college is assured.

Conclusions

At the outset of this discussion we stated four problems the solution of which we hoped would shed some light upon the probable curriculum of the junior college. These were:

1. Why do we have junior colleges?
2. What do students who enter junior colleges expect?
3. What is now being taught in junior colleges?
4. What is the probable future of the junior college?

In an attempt to answer these questions we have arrived at the following conclusions:

1. The junior college as an institution came into existence not so much to furnish new content material for the college curriculum as to increase the availability and improve the supervision of such courses as were already being taught.

2. Students entering the junior colleges for the most part belong in one of three groups: a large number expect to continue regular college work in some university; another group perhaps equally large expects to enter some professional school, and still a third group expects some definite vocational training.

4. The junior college is assured a place in the future if it is composed of the standard freshmen and sophomore college subjects with a small per cent devoted to definite vocational training.

4. The junior college is assured a place in the future if it finds its place and keeps it. This place seems to be that of an institution which offers two years of standard college work under strict control, high ideals, and close supervision. If vocational work is attempted it should be under the same regulations.

How These Conclusions Affect the Curriculum of the Junior College.

As a result of this study we may conclude:

1. That the bulk of the curriculum of the junior college should be composed of those subjects generally recognized as suitable for the first two years of standard college work. These include: English, natural science, social science, mathematics, and foreign language.

2. That in order to meet the needs of the preprofessional group sufficient opportunity should be given for choice among these departments to meet the entrance requirements of particular professional schools. For example a premedical student should have plenty of opportunity to take courses in the natural science. A student contemplating law would want several courses in the social science, and a student contemplating engineering would want all the mathematics he could get. All of these subjects would of course be pursued under strictly standard college conditions.

3. That some vocational courses should be offered, but that these should be of a high grade, offering not only vocational training, but having general cultural value as well as acting as a stepping-stone to something higher. Teacher training work is now being offered in a number of schools on this basis. Courses in commerce, home economics, agriculture, and even various lines of engineering might well be worked out upon this basis.

4. That in all this work junior colleges should maintain high standards such as those specified by the North Central Association of Secondary Schools and Colleges.

5. That no junior college should attempt to offer more than it is qualified to do with maximum efficiency. Such a plan would seem to the writer to have the following advantages:

1. It would assure the confidence and continued support on the part of the State universities in the various States. Experience seems to justify the conclusion that universities would be very slow to accept any variation from the above standard.

2. It would justify public taxes for the support of higher education of this type.

3. It would merit on the part of private junior colleges continued financial support from their respective constituents.

4. It would, in a word, assure the junior college a definite and permanent place in the educational system of the future.

The 1920 census figures are released for publication and show that Lamoni had on January 1, 1920, a population of 1,787, a gain of 246 over the figures of 1910. It made the largest gain of any town in the county. The entire county made a net gain of only 219 over the 1910 census.

The Christian Science Monitor of October 5 states that strikes are becoming less numerous, and assigns as a reason, business curtailment and increasing employment. They forecast a wage reduction. Naturally it is clear if prices come down substantially they will affect wages. It is also clear that one cause of our heavy costs to-day is the middleman, in getting the goods from the manufacturer to the consumer. There is no reason for wage reduction until the price of living is reduced.

Letters from Brethren J. W. Rushton and P. M. Hanson indicate that they would sail from Australia on the 21st of October and expect to reach San Francisco about the 18th of December. They have secured from the Home and Territories Department of Australia permission to send in additional missionaries from America to the number of three. They report general conditions good and copious rains throughout Australia, and state that everywhere prospects for an abundant harvest are hopeful, indicating that the drouth in Australia is broken and the danger of famine averted.

A new national park has been dedicated this year, off the beaten track in Utah. It is said that no camera or brush, much less words, can picture the beauty of Zion National Park. In its coloring, depth, height, and magnificence it rivals the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. It has only recently been made accessible.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

AMERICA AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

There have appeared during the past few years several editorials concerning the League of Nations. The following which we publish in full, is from a handbill sent us by Elder Daniel Macgregor, as presenting his views and accompanied by an announcement that he would preach on the subject at Council Bluffs meetings:

America and the League of Nations

Thirty-six hundred years ago America was revealed unto the people of God.

It was portrayed in the promises expressed thru Patriarch and Prophet.

It was described as "a PLEASANT PLACE" in the "WEST" "OVER THE SEA," being a "LAND shadowing with wings," producing "THE PRECIOUS THINGS OF THE EARTH AND THE FULLNESS THEREOF." Hos. 9: 13; 11: 10; Isa. 16: 8; 18: 1-2; Jer. 48: 32; Deut. 33: 13-17.

It was predicted that it would sustain a "WEALTHY NATION THAT DWELLETH WITHOUT A CARE WHICH HAVE NEITHER GATES NOR BARS WHICH DWELL ALONE." Jer. 49: 30-32.

Up to the Discovery of America the manacled millions of the Eastern Hemisphere existed in a Twilight of Intelligence and a Stupor of Spirituality.

It was a World of Political and Religious intolerance.

But God designed the discovery of America.

The purpose of that discovery was to uncover an asylum of rest to the oppressed of all lands.

It was intended as a Nursery to the Principles of Liberty and Democracy.

For myriad years the Free People of the Western World, unknown to the Nations of the East, were preserved by the Shield of Isolation and Separation. IT WAS A LIBERTY UNLEAGUED WITH THE CONTENTIOUS CONTINENTS ABROAD.

There was a time when that Liberty was threatened. The Imperialism of the Old World sought to enforce a League of subordination upon the freeborn colonists of the West.

But that attempted League of Nations was defeated.

It was annihilated in the Wars of Washington.

Citizens of Council Bluffs, the liberty of America is again threatened. The enemy comes not with a declaration of intent to destroy our liberties, but he poses as an Angel of light with a treacherous "League of Nations" that will IMPAIR OUR LIBERTIES.

Let the Freedom of America, unfettered and full, be preserved. The Growing Giant of the Western World must not be wedlocked with the jaded nations of the disordered East.

"CHEAP TALK" ABOUT SACRIFICE

There has been much "cheap talk" about sacrifice in giving, says The Christian Herald, and "people in churches and other places use the word as if they really knew what it meant when in reality they have never made a sacrificial gift in their lives." One denomination in the United States numbers 808,000 members, we are told, and its missionary boards have asked for a special sum of three million dollars for missionary and educational purposes. The amount seemed large, and a member objected that it could never be raised, that it would require a "raw-bone sacrifice." A friend asked him to consider this "carefully worked out" tabulation:

"If ten per cent of the membership of the church contributed the price of a pair of shoes, ten per cent the price of a very ordinary umbrella, ten per cent the price of a pound of candy (not the best), ten per cent the price of a box of tobacco (not the best), ten per cent the price of a pair of silk hose (not guaranteed), ten per cent the price of a two-cent postage stamp (very ordinary), ten per cent the price of a pair of gloves (not very good ones), ten per cent the price of a novel (not a very good one), ten per cent the price of a theater ticket (balcony), ten per cent the price of a movie (any kind), the total would more than equal the entire three million dollars asked for.

"How much sacrifice is involved in the giving of the average citizen who goes to church in a three-thousand-dollar automobile, for which he pays one hundred dollars a month for up-keep, when he puts one dollar into the collection and then criticizes the appeal of his two-thousand-five-hundred-dollar-salary minister because he asks for more money to keep the starving people in Europe from dying?

"How much sacrifice does the man know who gives ten dollars a year to his local Y. M. C. A. and fifty dollars for his favorite baseball team?

"How much sacrifice does the man know who is planning a trip to Europe this summer at a cost of two thousand or more, when he gives twenty-five dollars a year to support medical missions abroad and is looked upon as a generous man because he gave fifty dollars last year out of a large business to support an orphan overseas?

"How much sacrifice does the man know who makes a clear profit in a year's time of twenty-five thousand dollars and gives one hundredth of that to benevolence and religion?

"Heaven help some of us in the final judgment, when the real accounts of men will be made up by the eternal book-keeper who is an expert who can not be deceived by our juggling of the ledger which we have tried to keep with a balance for 'sacrifices' to our credit."—Literary Digest, September 11, 1920.

WOMEN IN THE MINISTRY

Resolution formally adopted at the Lambeth Conference of Bishops of the Anglican Church.

The following is an extract from resolutions formally adopted by the conference of 1920 of the archbishops and bishops of the Anglican Church. It sets forth verbatim their position with regard to women in the ministry of the church.

The Position of Women in the Councils and Ministrations of the Church

46. Women should be admitted to those councils of the church to which laymen are admitted, and on equal terms. Diocesan, Provincial, or National Synods may decide when or how this principle is to be brought into effect.
47. The time has come when, in the interests of the church at large, and in particular of the development of the Ministry of Women, the Diaconate of Women should be restored formally and canonically, and should be recognized throughout the Anglican communion.
48. The Order of Deaconesses is for women the one and only Order of the ministry which has the stamp of Apostolic approval, and is for women the only Order of the ministry which we can recommend that our branch of the Catholic Church should recognize and use.
49. The office of a deaconess is primarily a ministry of succour, bodily and spiritual, especially to women, and should follow the lines of the primitive rather than of the modern diaconate of men. It should be understood that the deaconess dedicates herself to a lifelong service, but that no vow or implied promise of celibacy should be required as necessary for admission to the Order. Nevertheless, deaconesses who desire to do so may legitimately pledge themselves either as members of a community, or as individuals, to a celibate life.

50. In every branch of the Anglican communion there should be adopted a form and manner of making of deaconesses such as might fitly find a place in the Book of Common Prayer, containing in all cases provision for:—

(a) Prayer by the bishop and the laying on of his hands;

(b) A formula giving authority to execute the Office of a Deaconess in the Church of God;

(c) The delivery of the New Testament by the bishop to each candidate.

51. The forms for the making and ordering of deaconesses should be of the same general character, and as far as possible similar in their most significant parts, though varying in less important details in accordance with local needs.

52. The following functions may be entrusted to the deaconess, in addition to the ordinary duties which would naturally fall to her:—

(a) To prepare candidates for Baptism and Confirmation;

(b) To assist at the administration of Holy Baptism; and to be the administrant in cases of necessity in virtue of her office;

(c) To pray with and to give counsel to such women as desire help in difficulties and perplexities.

(d) With the approval of the bishop and of the parish priest, and under such conditions as shall from time to time be laid down by the bishop: (i) in church to read Morning and Evening Prayer and the Litany, except such portions as are assigned to the priest only; (ii) in church also to lead in prayer and, under license of the bishop, to instruct and exhort the congregation.

53. Opportunity should be given to women as to men (duly qualified and approved by the bishop) to speak in consecrated or unconsecrated buildings, and to lead in prayer at other than the regular and appointed services of the Church. Such diocesan arrangements, both for men and for women, should, wherever possible, be subject to provincial control and co-ordination.

54. The Conference recommends that careful inquiry should be made in the several branches of the Anglican communion as to the position and recognition of women workers in the Church, the conditions of their employment, and the remuneration of those who receive salaries.—Church Times, August 20, 1920.

Recent comment in the Literary Digest on prices, gives several instances of the different prices for the same goods in different parts in some of our large cities, and mentions such incidents as: woolen stockings which cost the manufacturer $7 a dozen are sold to the wholesalers at $14 a dozen, then to the retailers at $24 a dozen; the retailer then sells them to the public at from $36 to $66 a dozen—from $3 to $5.50 a pair, according to the part of the city in which his shop is located. That means that the public pays more than five to nine times the cost of manufacture. The trouble is not alone reduced production, but is most emphatically too much middleman.

The Literary Digest calls attention to the results of the recent religious census, showing nearly 42 million church members, over two hundred thousand church edifices, with a value of $1,676,000,000, and parsonages valued at over $200,000,000, while the Sunday school registration is nearly twenty million. Yet after all, as it pointed out, this tells but part of the story, for this is essentially a Christian country, and those who do not hold church membership in any particular denomination are still affected by that fact.

PASTORAL

How I Prepare My Sermons

Some most wholesome suggestions from an article on the above subject by Doctor C. F. Aked, D. D., LL. D.

[The Christian Work has recently begun a series of articles on the subject at the head of this article, the first one being by a man famous for his eloquence and power in the popular churches. If our readers who are still anxious to learn the best methods from whatever source will study this article, we believe good will result. He says: "Let no man make my method his own if he is ever guilty of the blasphemy of thinking he may be wrong," which is a good warning concerning adoption of the methods of any man.—EDITORS.]

It is not easy for me to tell "how I prepare my sermons." I am under great obligation to The Christian Work: I am in debt to Doctor Lynch for a thousand acts of kindness. If it were not so I should ignore or decline the request to explain myself to myself. I have so little hope of making clear through written speech my method of working. I wish with all my heart that I knew how to make my own experience helpful to younger men in the ministry. I have been preparing sermons for nearly forty years, and certainly for more than thirty of them I have not thought for a moment about the "how" of it.

As I write, the trouble seems to be that I have not one method or system or process. I should think that the proper answer to the question of The Christian Work, How do you prepare your sermons? ought to be, That depends on the sermon. There are some sermons that make themselves—and then preach themselves. Spurgeon, in a lecture to his students, told of an occasion when a preacher announced his text, "By grace are ye saved," and could go no further. Whether sickness or stage fright silenced him I do not remember; but Spurgeon went into the pulpit and preached from the text. And the great preacher commented: "I should be ashamed of any man amongst you who could not have done the same." Yes; with his theology and outlook upon life a sermon on that text would make itself. I know that it has happened to me more than a hundred times that a text has presented itself to my mind and the leading idea of a sermon—and in a flash the entire sermon from beginning to end has been present to my consciousness. I have written down as rapidly as possible—I cannot write shorthand—point after point with the illustrations that crowded in upon my memory; and the only difficulty was that of selection: how much to leave out. For a sermon must end before midnight.

These notes of a sermon which thus made itself may cover a sheet of typewriting paper, or even two. They may be written on Friday—probably are; if not, then on Saturday. They are brought out an hour or two before service time on Sunday. Then I sit and think. But of this more in a minute or two, for I seem to be getting to the essential matter and to the unvarying element in the process of sermon building.

Other sermons have to be worked for, read for, thought for, digged for, produced by sweat of the brain if not by sweat of the brow. Let me try to describe the making of what I may call an expository or hortatory sermon, nontopical, nonsensational—a sermon, not an address upon some social or political movement and not a lecture upon an era, a book, or a man, a sermon such as would represent my average morning sermons for the last thirty years.

A text adopted, for reason or for none, just adopted because it is adopted and with no conscious reason for the choice, then I sit down to learn all that can be known about it. Yes, I recognize that I have just said something big, but I will not modify it because I happen to mean it in all its bigness: I set myself to learn all that can be learned about the text. I read it in the Hebrew or Greek, as the case may be. That goes without saying. If it is an Old Testament text I read it also in the Septuagint, and, of course, in the three great English versions, the King James, the Revised, and the American Standard. If it is a New Testament text I read it in half a dozen modern versions, Weymouth, the Twentieth Century, Moffatt, and in two different French versions. I read every comment upon it and every exposition of it in every commentary I possess. I turn to the works of some eight or ten of the world's greatest preachers to see if any of them have preached on this text. If they have, I read their sermons. Perhaps some question of Hebrew history or biography arises, perhaps some matter of New Testament biography or geography. Then I read everything related to it on which I can lay my hands, every relevant page in Hastings, in the Encyclopædia Biblica, in the Schaff-Herzog, in Kent, and the others. Probably I spend some hours over this work—and with me it is work, not pretense. But it pays.

During these hours I do not make a note. At the end I sit and think. For forty years I have schooled myself to form independent judgments. I proceed now with an absolutely unfettered immodesty. Let no man make my method his own if he is ever guilty of the blasphemy of thinking he may be wrong. Names and authorities, when I have reached this stage of the sermon building, are nothing to me. It is I who am going to preach next Sunday, not one of the great scholars whose works I have been consulting. I am grateful, a thousand times a thousand times grateful, for their help. But the conclusions are my own; and when the time comes they are going to be stated with a pontifical authority to which in these degenerate days the Vatican has grown unaccustomed. For what I have to say to my people I must answer to God. And I will take the responsibility.

Well, I am now ready to begin to write. And I set down, but not in order, everything I have thought or am thinking on the text and the theme which has grown out of it. I try to keep the ideas separate from each other. I use half sheets of paper, and write each separate idea on a separate slip. When I have written everything with which my mind is teeming I never in any circumstance try to think of more. I know that I have enough, and more than enough. In what has spontaneously rushed to my mind there is a certain reality, an inevitability. Material that had to be sought might "smell of the lamp."

Then the business is to arrange. The old rule, adopted thirty-seven years ago, is instinctively followed to-day. I must ask myself—

1. What is the Fact?
2. Why is it a Fact?
3. What comes of the Fact?

And then I must present one single clear idea, moving on from introduction to application or appeal, in natural, orderly, logical sequence.

So I number these slips, fitting each idea into its proper place in the development, the unfolding of the theme; some are not wanted, and they go into the wastebasket; some are mere duplications of things already written and numbered, and they are destroyed, or, if they look like amplifications, they may serve as illustrative matter or by way of reinforcing the argument or even as frank repetition in another form for the sake of the appeal to other minds.

The slips numbered, there should be an orderliness and a totality of thought and statement revealed, an orderliness and a completeness which will make the actual preaching of the sermon easy and which, by the blessing of God, may carry conviction. If there is not, then my mind has bungled its own proper business either through carelessness or through fatigue. To make sure, and to have the work as ready to hand and intelligible twenty years hence as next Sunday, I rewrite the whole of the matter on full sheets and in proper order. There may be enough now to fill two or at times three sheets of typewriting paper. And this is the sermon. If there is not, after all this labor, one single great idea in it, and if it does not unfold attractively from introduction to application, and if it is not, in these notes, stated with pellucid clearness, vividly, powerfully, there is only one reason for it. It is the reason why I do not write like Shakespeare. I have not the brains for it. But, with the sermon, I have done my best.

But the question of The Christian Work is by no means fully answered: How do you gather your material? I do not gather it. The material has been gathering itself through a lifetime of reading, observation, travel, experience. I never seek material, never, except as the preliminary study of authorities may be regarded as search for material. Not once in thirty years have I consciously sought an illustration, a quotation, or even a fact to work into a sermon. All that comes of itself. I have to reject much that asks for a place. The one sin of which I accuse myself most persistently is that my sermons are too long. I have always too much to say. Weary and disillusioned as I am in these years, I still find it difficult to realize that the people are not as deeply interested, as enthusiastically interested, as I am. And so every Sunday for thirty years I have tried, like the veriest simpleton, to "say it all," and every Sunday night for thirty years I have promised my conscience that I would preach a shorter sermon next Sunday morning.

I do not write my sermons, not usually, not before preaching them. I possess many written sermons, some hundreds I suppose, and a hundred or so of printed sermons; and many of these I can still preach. But with few exceptions they were preached first and written afterwards.

Then what of preparation for the actual speaking of the sermon, as distinct from the making of the sermon? This is what I have called the essential matter, the one unvarying piece of work, the indispensable thing without which I could no more preach than I could fly. This is the effort to which all else has been leading: I must have an hour and a half before service time; an hour will do at a pinch, but I do not like to be pinched. And two hours may be used to good purpose. I am in my study, and in my hands the notes so laboriously prepared. And I think the sermon through. I see myself in the pulpit; I see the congregation; I preach—without uttering a word. I go through the whole sermon, from the opening words to the last phrase of the appeal or "peroration." I miss nothing. I never move out of my chair, unless some illustration or quotation has come to me and I need to verify the reference and the book is not within reach as I sit. And when I have done all this the sermon is on my mind and in my soul. I still make it a practice to push my notes out of sight and write from memory the entire argument. But this is a luxury, not a necessity, and is more of a habit than anything else. It gives—or used to give when I was more in need of it than I am now—a solid sense of safety. There should be no trick played on me by memory, treacherous jade! If I could go through the sermon in all its fullness in the quiet of my study, with a pen in my hand, and without my notes, why, to be sure I could do it in the pulpit, with all the intellectual, emotional, and spiritual stimulus which comes from the impact of the soul of the congregation upon my own.

Hard work? Yes, I admit it; but the freedom of it, the independence, the joy of it! All the work has been done before I enter the pulpit. I have now nothing to do—and nothing to do with the sermon! I have no anxiety. And there is no effort. Is it the "subliminal consciousness" that does the preaching? I prefer to say that it is the honest work done beforehand. Now I can enjoy myself. I hope to heaven the people may!

The 1910 census shows 53.7 per cent of the population of the United States was rural, and 46.3 per cent urban. It would seem that the figures this year were nearly reverse for the country as a whole. It is of interest to note that in the black belt of the West the majority of the people are still rural, and that 68.2 per cent of the entire population in 1910 was rural. The exact figures are not yet worked out, but it is probable that where the land is richest it will be found that the majority of the people still dwell in the country, and that where the land is poorest, three fourths dwell in the city.

We note the Lambeth Conference Resolutions are quite freely discussed, not only in the Christian Times, an Anglican publication, but also in the Methodist and other religious periodicals of Great Britain. There is a decided tendency to weigh carefully the proposal for church union. It is of great importance because the Episcopal Church is the Anglican Church, or the state church of Great Britain, hence any movement looking towards union in Great Britain naturally must come from the Anglican conference of bishops. The appeal for church union is considered as a tremendous event in Great Britain, and is considered to be the outgrowth of very earnest and continual prayers. It can doubtless be used much more than it is by Christian people. It seems that regular prayers are offered in other places than at the conference, for divine intercession, and that several times a day special meetings were held for that purpose, in addition to the prayers actually offered by the various bishops.

When the Australian Constitution Act was signed by Queen Victoria, in July, 1900, it provided for a capital of the government located in New South Wales, and distance not less than one hundred miles from Sidney. In 1910 a site was located at Canberra. In a contest engaged in for architectural plans for the new city, there was one by Walter B. Griffiths, of Chicago. Before the late war, between one and two billion pounds had actually been spent making roads, taking care of the water supply, and laying out the land. But little has been done since. There appears to be some possibility of the work being again undertaken in the near future.

Production of candy has increased from 110 million pounds in 1880, to 1,400,000,000 pounds in 1919; and in that period population doubled, while the production of candy has multiplied about thirteenfold and its value has increased nearly forty times. The amount of candy consumed per capita, in 1914, was 5.6 pounds, at an average value of a little over 30 cents a pound. In 1919 it was 13.1 pounds at an average value nearly three times as great, or about 85 cents a pound. The consumption of soft drinks has also greatly increased, and amount to over 700 million dollars.

The Literary Digest refers to the fact that but a small percentage of coal is used for domestic purposes, a matter of fifty-seven billion tons, out of five hundred and fifty-four billion, four hundred thousand tons of bituminous coal; of anthracite coal, close to fifty billion is used, out of eighty-two and a half billion tons. Of all coal, out of six hundred and thirty-seven billion tons, at least 30.8 per cent are used for industrial purposes; 25.2 per cent by the railroads; 16.8 per cent domestic; 13.1 per cent for coke; 5 per cent for electrical utilities; 4.7 per cent export. Coal mines, steamships, and gas use the remaining 4.4 per cent.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

Is Cooperation Only a Word?

We are struck by the contrast between two letters which came to our desk within the week. One was from a missionary who writes: "One of the most enjoyable features of our work here has been assisting to stimulate the interest in the women's work of the church. Everywhere the need for such work is in evidence and this locality is not behind in recognizing the duty owed to the social conscience. . . . Success in all human endeavors depends upon the sympathetic cooperation of those who are intelligent and earnest in their work, both men and women. Our hope of the future lies not so much in the men and women of to-day but is wrapped up in the budding life of the children. Home and church, school and citizenship must be united forces in the revolutionary course of that future. There must be no antagonism, not even the separateness nor insulation, but the most real and vital identity of all, in the common task of creating the ideal humanity. . . . I would like to add a word of encouragement to many which you may receive. May divine grace attend the efforts to create a spiritual idealism in the womanhood of the church and small communities where we have influence."

This brother also inclosed a newspaper clipping upon the great importance of home influence, recognizing that the women of our department are struggling to raise the standards of home life, trying to help the women of the church to see in their homes their greatest opportunity as well as their greatest happiness.

In contrast with the sympathetic cooperation and friendly helpfulness of the brother who wrote the above, is the attitude of another of our missionaries whose lack of appreciation and vision concerning our work led to the discouragement of one of our consecrated workers, as expressed in the following: "To say that I was disappointed at our recent district conference was putting it mildly! I was so discouraged that I was almost persuaded to resign, and I don't believe you will very much blame me when I explain matters. We had arranged a very good program to be given during the conference, but there seemed to be time for everything else but the Women's Department work. . . . The prominent brother associated with the district presidency had charge, but would not for one minute entertain the idea of our request for the Saturday evening hour. . . . After some persuasion we were promised the hour from 3.30 to 4.30 on Sunday afternoon. . . . It was nearly four o'clock when they closed the preceding service . . . and to make matters worse they planned to have a picture taken of the assembly during the hour announced for us! You can imagine how we felt, as they all went out for the picture, and by the time they returned and got seated for our service it was too late! . . . We tried to get permission to use the church while there was preaching at the opera house, but the brother would not consider it, and they had preaching both places. . . . Brother _____ seemed to think the preaching was far more important than the women's work, and it was difficult for us to even get an announcement made. . . . We were told that the reunion was the proper place for our meetings. . . . I have all due respect for Brother _____ but can plainly see he has no idea of what our work is, or at such times surely he would feel that it was proper to get it before the people. He is not alone among the priesthood in not understanding this department of the church, but we trust the day will soon dawn when they will all awaken to the importance and necessity of this work in the redeeming of Zion, for without the proper teaching in the homes of the Saints, how can it be done?"

With a report such as this coming to our notice, do you wonder that we ask, "Is cooperation only a word?" A. A.

Lamoni Women Organize

It was our pleasure on the occasion of our recent visit to Lamoni to be with our Lamoni Stake Organizer, Sister I. A. Monroe, as she organized the women of that town into four groups corresponding to their already existent "prayer-meeting ward" boundaries.

It was peculiarly gratifying to note the real heart interest taken by these women in the movement to unite for individual study and for civic and community welfare work, as well. They seem to have been anxiously eager to do things together, the spirit of service engendered by the great war still being alive and active in their hearts. Their work for the Red Cross had been noteworthy, one and all giving of their very best and most consecrated effort, in a spirit of unity which bids fair for the success of future plans for community welfare.

The four wards as organized have for leaders Sisters Callie B. Stebbins, Belle Anderson, Nellie Platz, and Anna Stephenson. These women are of the wide-awake, progressive type, and well qualified to lead their groups from one earnest and worthy objective to another.

Their first effort takes on the form of better understanding of our new citizenship. Four of Lamoni's qualified men consented to meet these groups weekly, instructing them on the use of the ballot, the propositions before the Nation, and the character and public records of the leading political candidates, as well as making them acquainted with the machinery of State and county government. These women will be better prepared to exercise their new suffrage at the coming election than will many "old-timers" who, in their self-sufficiency scorn to avail themselves of the many opportunities for information along these lines.

The "Food and the Body" course, prepared by Mabel Knipschild Smith for our department, will succeed this course in citizenship. The women of Lamoni have been stirred by the recent Government disclosures concerning the multitudes of undernourished children. They sense it a duty to acquaint themselves more thoroughly with the essentials of food, and the laws which govern its adaptation to the body.

Along with these study plans, others concerning community welfare are being laid and perfected. When they get into full working order, we may expect to hear of many fine things undertaken and carried to a successful conclusion by these women who have never been known to record "failure" upon any venture to which they have lent their full-hearted and enthusiastic support. May God guide them into fields of useful activity, which shall find its direct reflection in homes of increased purity, loyalty, and enlightenment—true, Zion homes!

A Very Interesting Letter

HONOLULU, TERRITORY OF HAWAII, October 5, 1920.

MRS. AUDENTIA ANDERSON,
5020 California Street,
Omaha, Nebraska.

Dear Sister Anderson: Your letter was received some time ago and I was so pleased to hear from you. There is a note of strength and encouragement in the words you wrote. I have also enjoyed reading your articles from time to time in the HERALD. They surely inspire one to do all in their power to help in this grand work.

We are receiving the lessons but I am sorry to say we are not progressing with them as I would like. While these people have become very dear to us yet we realize we cannot appeal to them from the same standpoint we would to those of our own nationality.

At our district conference one afternoon was devoted to talks and papers. Sister Reeves gave a talk on social purity and I gave one on motherhood and the meaning of a real home. In this I tried to interest them in the courses which are offered. The majority of them seem indifferent. Then realizing that they have an imperfect understanding of the English language makes it hard. It is difficult to enthrust them along any line and if they do rouse it does not last long. You know how people of warm climates are. But, oh, the need of this work being taught. The home conditions are anything but what they should be. It takes years of labor among them before one can go into their homes and tell them how things should be done. And that is the only way they can be taught. Take Brother Waller, who has been here for years. He can say anything to them and they do not take offense, but let one who has not been with them so long and they resent it very much. Will give you an example:

One day Brother Waller and I were out visiting. We came to a house where the mother has to go out and make the living because the father is blind. He takes care of the children while the mother is away. The little tots were playing in front of the house in the dusty road. Of course we stopped to talk to them and I noticed that one of the little girls had a very ugly sore on the back of her hand—inflamed and full of dirt. It was a burn and you may imagine the condition of it not being bandaged. I took the child in and asked the father if I could clean the place and bandage it and he would not let me do it and he is a church member, too. All we could do was tell him the danger of neglecting it in such a manner. If they survive they grow up and if they do not they just die, that is all.

We have a few families in which the parents are careful of their children but as a rule they just grow up like Topsy did.

The work is slow and sometimes it seems there are no results to show for the energy spent, but we are not discouraged.

I truly agree with you that the women's work is a wonderful work and as Latter Day Saint women we must give the best there is in us to the accomplishment of the standards and ideals set by our leaders.

Will appreciate hearing from you at any time.

Very sincerely,

MRS. V. B. ETZENHOUSER.

From a Tireless Worker

Since receiving my appointment as organizer for this district I have not accomplished much in visible results, though almost my entire time has been given to preparation for the work and study of the needs of the women of this district.

At our district reunion where I had anticipated getting in touch with the real needs of each branch, I was not able to accomplish much. Two other sisters with myself were a subcommittee to provide for the children and young people's work, but the other sisters were unable to help because of illness, and though I tried, I seemed unable to enlist others, so the entire preparation fell on me.

We had a tent for this work, and I took charge of two services a day there, and was present every morning at the social service for the children. This was at nine o'clock; at 10.30 we had a story hour. One Bible story was told and then another story with good clean ideals embodied in it. At this hour the last thing was to memorize one of the ten commandments. I had cards numbered from one to ten in large numbers, the corresponding commandment being written in the number. The command was written on the board, and the next morning all who had it memorized received the colored card. It proved to be quite an attraction, and several at the end of the reunion had the complete set.

In the afternoon we had sewing, weaving, chain pasting, paper and straw stringing, and peg boards. The older girls were enlisted to help by taking charge of classes in each line of work. In this way we held the attention and secured the help of most of the girls of Oriole age, though we felt disappointed at not being able to do more definite work with them. We had muslin blocks with outlines to be stitched; these the older ones, from nine to fourteen, worked in outline stitch, to be used as a quilt for the Children's Home. The older girls also pricked cards, cut butterflies and birds, and helped the smaller ones in many ways. Though it was not the work we had planned for them, we did appreciate their willingness to help and I am satisfied they gained experience in their little classes that will be of benefit to them in other places.

Our one meeting with the women was a disappointment to me. It seems difficult to do much because of lack of leaders. It is a fact to be deplored that in these small branches, too, relationship often determines who shall lead, and much of the time the leaders so chosen are least fitted for work. If you step in and advise a change, instantly that person and all the relatives (and often they form the majority) will do nothing, and not enough are left to go ahead alone, and so little can be done. I found among the women who met that afternoon some bright and capable women who are looking ahead, and I feel sure that in time these will gradually take their rightful places, but it will take time and patience, and, as Brother Heman Smith once said, "several first-class funerals," before much can be done.

Another thing that makes it difficult is the dislike so many have for anything new. This, too, is among the older women, and I am convinced that we must look to the younger mothers and the coming mothers for our real progress. Among other things we talked of at the women's meeting was telling children the truth in regard to the "story of life." I find that the older women do not want it talked of, while the younger ones are anxious to prepare their children and give them the proper information before they learn it in improper and obscene ways. They often do not know how to give this information, however. I had a number of books that I had purchased in an effort to place before the women the best helps along this line, and these were gratefully received.

I tried to get the women to take some definite study, suggesting to one branch group A Study of Child Nature, by Harrison, and First Lessons in Child Training, by Zelia M. Walters, which last I think especially fine. I suggested the idea that another branch group take other studies, each buying the necessary books and, as they finished their study, exchanging with the others, thus cutting down the expense. This seemed to settle it! . . . Anything that costs money is out of the question for some people. They seem to have the idea that all the benefits of church membership should be absolutely free, that "the district" should provide everything, forgetting that they, themselves, make up the district!

As I said before, it will take time and patience to work out plans. This district is like an old field—all worked out! As I see it, our task is to work it and put it into shape to receive the seed that will later bring forth fruit. We are handicapped for means to visit and properly do this work. Oh, if we only had the means at hand so we could put before the people what we want them to do, put in their hands what we want them to study, and then help them to study it! I feel convinced that if we once could get them started right, later on they will lose this terrible lethargy and really make progress!

One thing more. Now that we have woman suffrage it seems to me we should be studying how to vote intelligently, but what shall we use? Is there a handbook of instructions for voters, or anything that could be used to intelligently put the system of voting before us?

Such information as the sister asks for may be secured from several sources. We cite two. The women's clubs of various States have already prepared literature and made it available at small cost. Those in Iowa should send 35 cents to Mrs. W. H. McHenry, chairman, 2901 Rutland Avenue, Des Moines, Iowa, for Iowa Hand Book for Study of Citizenship. It treats briefly of the Constitution, counties, cities, and towns, schools, courts, elections, State institutions, laws relating to women and children, and some recent legislation.

The Citizenship Department of the National League of Women Voters is offering a correspondence course arranged by Marie B. Ames, consisting of twelve lessons on nominating and electing our President, powers and duties of our President, our President and his Cabinet, the judicial department, Congress at work, how laws are made, the governor and other executive officers, State boards and commissions, relation of State courts to Federal courts, county and township forms

Indians in the United States

We have the following table of Indian reservations in the United States. Very few people realize that there are so many Indians in this country. I herewith give the names of the reservations:

In Arizona

1. Camp McDowell.
2. Colorado River.
3. Fort Apache.
4. Gilla Bend.
5. Gilla River.
6. Havasupai.
7. Hopi.
8. Navaho.
9. Papago.
10. Salt River.
11. San Catlos.
12. Walapal.

In California

1. Digger.
2. Hupa Valley.
3. Mission (28 reserves).
4. Round Valley.
5. Tule River.
6. Yuma.

In Colorado

1. Ute.

In Idaho

1. Coeur d' Alene.
2. Fort Hall.
3. Lapwai.
4. Lemhi.

In Iowa

1. Sauk Fox.

In Kansas

1. Chippewa and Muneses.
2. Iowa.
3. Kickapoo.
4. Pottawatomie.
5. Sauk Fox.

In Michigan

1. Isabella.
2. L' Anse.
3. Ontonagon.

In Minnesota

1. Bois Fort.
2. Deer Creek.
3. Fond du Lac.
4. Grand Portage.
5. Leech Lake.
6. Mdewakanton.
7. Mille Lac.
8. Red Lake.
9. Vermillion Lake.
10. White Earth.
11. White Oak Point and Chippewa.

In Montana

1. Blackfeet.
2. Crow.

3. Fort Belknap.
4. Fort Peck.
5. Jocko.
6. Northern Cheyenne.

Nebraska

1. Niobrara.
2. Omaha.
3. Ponca.
4. Sioux (Additional).
5. Winnebago.

In Nevada

1. Duck Velle.
2. Moapa River.
3. Pyramid Lake.
4. Walker River.

In Mexico

1. Jicarilla Apache.
2. Mescalero Apache.
3. Puebpos (20 reserves).

In New York

1. Alleghany (Cattaraugus County).
2. Cattaraugus (Cattaraugus County).
3. Oil Spring.
4. Oneida.
5. Onondaga (Onondaga County).
6. Saint Regis (Franklin County).
7. Tonawanda (Niagara County).
8. Tuscarora.
9. Shennecock (Suffolk County).
10. Poospatuck (Suffolk County).

In North Dakota

1. Devil's Lake.
2. Fort Berthold.
3. Standing Rock.
4. Turtle Mountain.

In North Carolina

1. Qualla Boundary (Cherokee).

In Oklahoma

1. Cherokee.
2. Cheyenne.

7. Stockbridge.

In Wyoming

1. Wind River.

If any of the reservations named above are located in or near any of the branches it is to be hoped that some of the local ministry will try and reach them with the gospel. Your first duty will be to get their good will. And remember that the Indians do not like long sermons. Your talk to them must be short and sweet, or they will not come back to your meetings. Neither are the Indians emotional, hence weeping and telling them pathetic stories does not have good effect on them, but turns them against you.

The white man must not take too many liberties with them on first acquaintance. They watch a white man very closely. In other words, they are suspicious of him. Therefore, the white man is under the necessity of keeping a watch on himself, while in their company. However, when the Indian reaches the point that he can trust you, he becomes your loyal and true friend, and will do anything in reason for you. The only time that I have seen them weep or display emotional feelings was when they were under the influence of the Holy Ghost. One large chief told me one day at the close of a spiritual social service that he felt a burning in his breast, and felt like getting on his feet to tell us how good he felt, but stated that a big lump came up in his throat. Tears were in his eyes. God's Holy Spirit is the only power that can move the Indian to accept the gospel and the Book of Mormon.

We have two branches among them, and about forty or fifty among the Omahas, but they have been neglected in a way, and it will require some labor among them before we can organize them into a branch. And, moreover, it is a waste of time and money to undertake to do missionary work among the Indians unless the church takes care of them after they have been baptized. A white man should be placed in charge of the branch, and he ought to have a wife to accompany him. Both should devote their entire time among them, visiting them in their homes, and praying with them; also teaching them very many useful things. The Indian is willing to be taught. The brother and sister who work among them must have an interest in them, and love to work with them. It does not take the Indian long to find out whether you love him or not. Once they do find it out, they will love you and pay attention to what you teach them. Let us pray to our heavenly Father to raise up men and women who will have a desire to labor among the poor Indians, and sacrifice in their interest.

There are some Indians in the State of Maine. Altogether there are over one hundred and forty reservations in the United States.

The following items may be of more than a passing interest to our people. It should be remembered that the Lamanites are of Israel (chosen seed), and the Lord has decreed that they are to "blossom as the rose." There are in the United States alone between four and five hundred thousand Indians. And just think of the many thousands of Indians in Mexico and South America. The great majority are pure Lamanite blood.

It is said that there are fifty thousand engaged in the live stock business, valued at $40,000,000.

In the forestry and lumbering business, owned by them, there are six and a half million acres of fine timberland, valued at $84,000,000. They have seventy-three sawmills.

Menominee Reservation, Wisconsin, has one billion feet of standing timber.

The Osage Tribe in Oklahoma, last year received $8,000,000 from oil and gas, and five other tribes received $4,000,000.

There are forty thousand Indians engaged in farming. Last year's crops sold for twelve millions.

Education, average attendance, 64,000.

There are in the United States eighty hospitals, and two hundred physicians to care for them in sickness, and very many colleges.

I meet with a great many young Indians who are highly educated, and a great many who are wonderful musicians, also lovely singers. The rising generation speak excellent English. One of the drawbacks to our work among them is the fact that they have no printed language, and hence, each tribe have a language of their own, which makes it very difficult for us to perform missionary work among them. A great many of the tribes can understand and speak the Spanish language. Therefore, those of our young people who contemplate devoting their life's work in the interest of these people should by all means acquaint themselves with the Spanish language. It is said by those who have traveled in South America that all the Indians speak Spanish. In the opinion of the writer the time is not far away when the church will send missionaries to labor among the Lamanites in South America. Young man and young woman, prepare yourself for whatever kind of work the church and the Lord will call you to perform in his kingdom.

Dear Saints, pray earnestly for the success of the welfare of the Lamanites.

Your brother in gospel bonds,

GOMER T. GRIFFITHS.

Graceland College is appearing in the news items more frequently than in years past. The Des Moines Register has noted one or two items a week concerning our football team. Now in The Outlook for October 20 we find Graceland College, Lamoni, Iowa, President George N. Briggs quoted in a review of the political situation. A straw vote of college presidents on the election.

In a recent number of the Sunday Des Moines Register, the photogravure section contained a fine picture of the descendants of Joseph Smith by Brother Charles Brackenbury, of this place, it having been given first prize in the curious pictures contest.

Mrs. Ivy Fisher, 1221 Akermant Street, Waterloo, Iowa, would like to hear from Saints living in La Grande, Oregon. Should there be none there, will the president of the district please write.

A Letter to the Twelve From the Islands

Quorum of Twelve: Since my letter to you the new missionaries, Brother and Sister Elliott and ourselves, have moved to new quarters at Heberona, a pretty little spot on the mountain side about three miles from Papeete. We have been kept busy cleaning house, learning the language, accustoming ourselves to the strange ways of the natives, and preaching in the little church at Tarona.

We have reached the state in our language study where it is now too old to us to be incited to follow strange paths, and too new for us to stop in self-complacency. It is a little tiresome at times to find oneself saying, "Eaha?" instead of "What?" to the wife, or "Aita peapea" for "Never mind." I am struggling hard with my vocabulary, making a dictionary of English-Tahitian, and translating a few English thoughts.

Brother and Sister Karlstrom and Sister Ethel Hanson have taken a trip to Tubuai, and from there to Hikueru. Brother Brown and his wife and babies have also gone to Hikueru. There seems to be a splendid opening there for missionary work, and we have heard that some of the Mormons are ready and anxious to enter the true fold. At the moving picture show here the other night a film was shown portraying the early life in Utah under Brigham Young. It was far from complimentary to the Mormons, and the interpreter was very careful to say, "This was when the Mormons left the Kamitos (the Saints)." It was a veritable bombshell in the enemy's camp.

The church has a high reputation here. It is far more difficult for a native to be a true Saint than it is for him to be a good Catholic. The result is that the Catholic Church gets most of those who have been cut off from the church, since their code of morals is much lower than ours. By this process of weeding, the ingathering of the honest in heart among other denominations, and the sifting inside the church, we hope thus to have in these islands of the sea a polished jewel fit for the Master's service.

There are many discouraging features to the work, and I presume you are well acquainted with these through reports from other brethren. There are, however, encouragements peculiar to these islands, such as the faith and generosity of the natives and their esteem of the church, and it is worth the most strenuous and tiring effort on our part.

In our last mail, we learned of the buying of the Battery Block in Independence. I consider this a forward step in the right direction, and will materially help in the consolidation and close cooperation of the forces of the church. We felt happy also to note the return to the field of such veterans as Amos Chase, and the augmentation of our forces with more young men. Such things as these encourage us to move forward as part of the army of the Lord, and assure us that God is with his people. Praying for Zion, I am

Sincerely, your brother,

FRANK B. ALMOND.

Rally Day in South Omaha

Editors Saints' Herald: The Rally Day held at the South Side Hall on Sunday, October 17, will be a day long remembered and cherished by the Saints of Omaha. The North Side Branch dispensed with their services for the day in order to unite with the South Side in a general rally day. The sisters made ample provision for our physical needs, so we could remain the entire day. As usual the brethren proved equal to the occasion. The services were well attended; the morning program displayed the excellent talent possessed by our young people in the gift of song and public speaking. We were particularly favored with the presence of our venerable Apostle Gomer T. Griffiths, who has been laboring recently with the Indians sixty miles north of Omaha.

In the afternoon a joint meeting of both North and South Side priesthood was called and addressed by Brother Griffiths. At the conclusion of this service a motion was unanimously sustained that as a joint priesthood we ratify the appointment of Elder T. J. Elliott as pastor of Omaha, and so recommend same to our respective branches.

Prayer service followed the priesthood meeting and we were permitted to dwell under the calm, peaceful influence of the Spirit, many bearing witness to the divinity of the gospel. The choir rendered two beautiful anthems prior to the evening sermon which was delivered by Apostle Griffiths. A very large and attentive audience was present. With his usual sense of humor he kept the congregation in a laughing mood, at the same time sending the message right home. The general sentiment at the close of the services was, Oh, if we could only have these rally days oftener. The family of our pastor, Brother Elliott, are now permanently located in their cozy little cottage. We welcome these talented folks into our midst. Now that all are nicely situated we shall work with more zeal.

Recreational Course at Graceland

There has been organized at Graceland College a Recreational Leadership Course. One of the objects of the course will be to furnish the young people of Graceland a list of a large number of outdoor and indoor games which they will learn thoroughly and be able to direct when they return to the various branches throughout the church.

It has occurred to me that there are in the church a number of people who know of some good games and recreational devices who would be willing to send us such suggestions by mail if they knew we wanted them. I would be glad to put a notice of this in your paper if you care to do so. We should like to have not only the name of the game, but directions for carrying it out in detail. These will eventually be collected in a large manual for Religio workers.

Respectfully yours,

F. M. McDOWELL.

Council Bluffs and Vicinity

The missionary effort that began following the reunion by Elder Daniel Macgregor is continuing with interest. More than thirty have so far been baptized. Forenoon services are being held at the church, but all evening services are held at the hall where the mission work is being done.

Public speaking class began their work for the winter at the church to be held each Monday evening. Elder O. Salisbury is in charge and near forty students are enrolled.

Brethren Henry and Cleo Hoover have been called to the office of priest.

Several of the local brethren have been assigned to different points in the district for a two-weeks' effort in the near future.

Mrs. Guy F. Mintun spent about ten days visiting relatives here and in the vicinity. She started to California last Thursday to spend the winter. Elder J. F. Mintun spent the first Saturday and Sunday of this month attending the conference held at Decatur, Nebraska. It was in this district that he did his first missionary work in 1881 to 1885. At the same date the conference of this district was held at the Boomer Branch. It is reported that an excellent conference was held in both places.

Ruth I. Mintun, who is teaching at Rockwell City, spent the week end at the home of her parents.

Last Sunday Elder J. F. Mintun spent the day ministering to the Saints of the Hazel Dell Branch.

It is reported that the Council Bluffs and Crescent Branches have subscribed more than their quota for the auditorium.

Omer L. Weaver was baptized by Elder G. J. Harding. He is the first of his father's family to enter the church. The Spirit was present in great measure, manifesting his acceptance with God.

CORRESPONDENT.

From the Port Huron Times-Herald we learn that the Eastern Michigan conference was attended by about a thousand members at Sandusky on the 9th and 10th. The membership is reported as 1,925, a gain of 175 in a year. Tithes have been collected totalling $18,519, double the amount given last year. Apostle Gillen was present and preached.

Long-Hull Debate

Now that the war clouds have rolled away and the thunder of the big guns is silenced, and calm and quiet again reign over our city of Spearfish, South Dakota, it may be of interest to some to hear about the battle between Elder E. E. Long and Robert R. Hull, of the Campbellite persuasion, which began here September 20, and continued sixteen nights.

It took several days for the smoke to clear up enough so we could see just what the results of the conflict were; but as days pass and the effects of the "gas" that the enemy employed works off the minds of the people, and as the atmosphere becomes more pure from the stench of the putrid matter that he shed abroad, we are having more and more to rejoice about because of the friendly sentiments that are being expressed by the more intelligent class that heard part or all of the discussion.

Elder Long's affirmation of the divinity of the Book of Mormon was strong, concise, and clear, and almost nowhere during the eight nights on that proposition did Hull attempt to refute his argument but tenaciously stuck to a counter line of rehash of Braden, Shook, and others of like ilk, into which he injected his own personality with all the calumny, vituperation, and filth that he could collect. It was evident that he became a little too enthusiastic over his Spalding Romance rot, for by the time he got through telling about when and where it was stolen there were no less than five different manuscripts in existence.

Brother Long patiently waited until he got all done with his tirade and then in about a fifteen-minute speech touched off a bomb that exploded the whole mess.

The eight nights following were on the church propositions, the first four Brother Long affirming. Hull's denial was of the same stock in trade as was employed during the first proposition: a tirade of abuse and derision. Unfortunately we lost our presiding officer after the first proposition, and were unable to secure another only for two nights, and consequently Hull took advantage of the situation and violated many of the rules of honorable controversy, thus forcing Brother Prettyman, Brother Long's moderator, to call him to order. The last night before Hull's church proposition came up, his moderator, the Reverend Mr. Hull, sr., proposed that the contestants modify their attitudes toward one another. The ruse was plain and several outsiders commented on it.

Hull's affirmation of his church proposition was along the same line they usually use: That the Word is the seed and that wherever it is planted in good and honest hearts it will produce fruit, and the persons in whom the seed is planted, no matter what church organization they may belong to, provided they have been baptized by immersion, compose the "mystical" church of Christ. He contended that it originated at Pentecost, that there is no organization whatever, nor ever was in the true church, and that the apostasy was the building up of organizations.

Brother Long's task was easy. And when he got through, the wonder to me is how Hull will ever be able to gather up the fragments.

One night during the first proposition the presiding officer led in the applause of one of Brother Long's statements. At another time he became so enraptured in Brother Long's argument that he forgot to notice the time and let him run over a few minutes.

One prominent auto dealer stated that he quit attending the debate because it took so much of Long's time to answer Hull's harangue that it was a waste of time to go.

A prominent member of the Methodist Church, and who would probably give more to see "Mormonism" downed than any other man in Spearfish, told the writer that Hull was too abusive, but that he made some good arguments. We thanked him for the qualification.

Another gentleman whose family is prominent in one of the secular churches stated that he wished he was qualified to act as chairman of the debate so he could have a chance to call Hull down. He is attending our services, since, when in town.

After the debate Brother Long gave a series of four sermons on the "Second coming of Christ" to small but appreciative audiences. The next day two were inducted into the kingdom by baptism, Brother Prettyman officiating. And the day following that (Monday), Brother Prettyman took his departure for eastern Nebraska, and Brother Long for Omaha. We are thus left somewhat lonely, but stronger than ever in the faith.

Brother Thomas Reese and estimable wife and niece, Sister Alice Henderson, gave us a pleasant surprise by dropping in for the Sunday morning preaching service and stayed over till Tuesday afternoon, when they again took up their long auto journey from their former home, Bozeman, Montana, to Zion. It made some of us wish that we might hear the whisper of the Spirit to move thitherward ourselves.

"The Church as a Power House"

The inclosed short, but pointed article by Doctor James I. Vance, being full of suggestive helpfulness, as well as being a word picture of the very spirit and genius of the manner in which our own beautiful latter-day gospel message is preached in lands near and far by men from every station of life, is herewith offered for the HERALD.

The church that really serves as a spiritual power house; develops the true worth of each individual life coming in contact with such power, and enhances the value of collective and unified life and purpose as nothing else in this old world may do.

And after all, what is life for anyway, if it is not that we may be the very best in all our being, that it is possible to be? The self-consciousness of such being, or of a real unfolding of the life into such being, is in itself the essence of joy ascending like a fragrant incense of holy gratitude and praise unto God, the great center of all life; and from whose excellency of being, the whole life of man is given. All praise to Him, the highest and Holy One, whose offspring we are. May we ever rejoice in the exaltation of labor that enables us to become like him.

Yours truly,
JAMES E. YATES.

"I like to hear that man preach, because he gives me something to live by during the week." That is what a busy business man said about his pastor. It was high praise.

Why should people go to church, if it is not for something like this? There is no particular merit in being bored, even when the process is labeled "pious," and there is no resistless fascination in listening to a pulpiter perform, even when he does it well. Then what is the merit of church attendance?

If one goes back to his work Monday as lean and spent, as listless and inspirationless, as empty of courage, and as void of hope as when he closed shop Saturday night, the church has not met his need.

There should be something in the hour in God's house to lift us out of the sordid and selfish, and set us anew on our quest for the Holy Grail. There should be something in the minister's message that makes tired souls look up and take hold afresh, and wavering feet straighten and steady. A man should go out of that sanctuary with a shining vision, and a cleansed conscience, and a singing heart, and a will that is charged afresh with the power that overcomes the world.

Then the church must be a power house. It is a mistake to try to make it a playhouse. People do not go to church for what they can get at the theater. The theater can beat the church when it comes to entertainment. The preacher who has dropped down into nothing but an entertainer has forgotten his commission.

It is not enough for the church to be a schoolhouse. It must instruct, but it must do more. Men need more than information; they need inspiration. They need motive power strong enough to drive life up hill.

The church has missed its mission when the switch is thrown on Sunday morning, and no power leaps out from that central dynamo to recharge the spent wires of human life that are there to be made alive again.

INCIDENTS OF THE CAMPAIGN

Amos, Berve, president of the Eastern Iowa District, after naming over the branches that have oversubscribed their quotas, writes:

"The Spirit of the Lord is making this 'drive,' and to me it is a marvelous response of the Saints here. Of course we got busy as soon as we got your literature, and have continued without a let-up, and have done much corresponding besides your work. We were also careful whom we sent to the various branches. We want especially to compliment you and your assistants for the splendid way in which you have conducted this campaign thus far. I see your enthusiasm has not lessened since conference, neither have the Saints lost any."

RIVALRY IN A GOOD CAUSE

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, October 18, 1920.

"We wired you Saturday night from Malad, 'Utah District over the top, still going ahead.' Our quota was $1,500, and Saturday night we had $1,647. Of course we feel proud, and we hope that we may have the distinction of being the first to go over. This might be an incentive to Independence and Lamoni, and some of the other near-by, highly organized stakes.

"We have now decided to make it $3,000, and when we go over the top again we will wire you.

"Yours sincerely,
(Signed) "M. A. ETZENHOUSER."

Humber Bay, Ontario, raised $1,420; North Toronto $820, and Toronto $4,200—all in the first week. Wonderful spirit reported.

DETROIT DISTRICT IS OVER THE TOP

"I just had a letter from Flint, which taken with Detroit alone shows that we have more than our quota already subscribed. This leaves four smaller branches to hear from, and I am satisfied that Detroit City alone will raise all that has been assigned to the entire district. We will keep up the good work and make our final report by the 1st of November.

"Trusting the balance of the country will do equally as well, I am

"Yours very truly,
(Signed) "W. A. BLAIR."

Kansas City Stake

Kansas City Stake has given a goodly portion of the appropriation for the General Conference auditorium to raise, our quota being $25,000. Members in other localities, outside of cities, probably do not realize what a large amount of money must be paid in each year to maintain the running expenses of the churches and missions located in the city as well as tithes and offerings, not failing to mention $10,000 to be raised this year for new churches. Yet these same people who already give liberally of their means are going to work a little harder, and sacrifice a little more to meet the obligation which has been placed upon us.

The men of the priesthood, inviting all other men to meet with them, met in the church yesterday afternoon to listen to talks by Bishops McGuire, Keir, and others, and at this meeting over $5,000 or more than twenty per cent of our quota was pledged.

We may not be first over the top, because of the scattered condition of the membership in all parts of the city and the time which will be required to visit all, but our place will be down the line among the rest of you and maybe not so far down either.

"Great Times in Massachusetts District"

We are having great times in the Massachusetts District since the Auditorium Drive commenced. I have never seen anything like it in the church. I believe every branch in this district is going over. The larger branches, such as Providence, Boston, Brockton, have doubled their quota. Boston had a great experience. I hope some one from there will write it up for you. It has not been so very long ago that they cleared a thousand dollars off from the church which is now free from debt, and they have another thousand on the way for improving the seats of the building. Their quota was $3,500 but they wiped it off with over $7,000. I think Brother J. A. Gunsolley will be pleased to learn the way his boy in Boston touched off a big bomb of enthusiasm by his example.

Boston was the first in line, then Attleboro, a dainty little city where tons of jewelry is manufactured, went over the top. No wonder! Peter Whalley, a young veteran of the war, serving four years on almost all the battle fronts, is pastor there.

Brockton, the shoe city, has a lot of idle workmen just now, and some of the best paying members of the branch have been out of employment for three months, but did that prevent them from moving toward Zion? They swept over twice! They gave until they felt so good everybody was shaking hands with everybody else and then some.

And what did New Bedford do? Not a thing but make their quota look as if it was some relation to the widow's mite. How? What they gave covered over what they were asked to give so completely their quota was buried out of sight.

Fall River, the city of magnificent stone spinning mills, where a branch has been in existence for over half a century, is lining up for the big time in the old town to-night.

We had a wonderful experience last night here at Providence. This is the largest branch in the district, with a membership of over three hundred. Brother D. Joy was chairman of the committee: associated with him was Otis Tombs and Elder Gleazer. This branch has adopted the slogan, "Providence never fails." Did they have to acknowledge failure last night? The larger the branch generally the harder it is to meet the per capita of a smaller congregation, so far as raising money is concerned. Providence was assessed $4,860, but she sailed up and up until the tellers called out $10,000, and there is $12,000 almost in sight.

Some of the members of little Cranston Branch were present, so they started the ball rolling for their allotment. Brother Whalley is going to Dennisport, Bishop Fisher to Plymouth, Baldwin and Traver to Haverhill, Miller to Little Compton, and that will end our drive. I think we will have almost twice as much as what the Bishop has asked for this district. I trust many of the branches will do as well and I have no doubt many will do more, but I think here we have gone to the very limit of what wisdom would require. To see the enthusiasm in this drive was a grand and glorious feeling!

Book Reviews

THE AMERICAN RED CROSS IN THE GREAT WAR, By Henry P. Davidson, published by the Macmillan Company, New York, in 1920. Price $2. 302 pages. Mr. Davison was chairman of the War Council of the American Red Cross. The book is in no sense a personal one, nor does it relate personal incidents, but it is a review of the work done by the American Red Cross in the war. It sets forth the organization, the work done for the soldier at home, and in the navy, mobilization of the children, supply and transportation, and what was done for the disabled soldiers. Several chapters are also given to the work on the battle front, with the French, and the children of France, in Switzerland, Belgium, Italy, Great Britain, Rumania, the Near East, Russia, and finally the organization of the League of Red Cross Societies. The last half dozen pages are given to a financial summary of the amounts collected and how, and how distributed. The wide work of the American Red Cross is described with a great mass of detail. It shows the work at large as it was seen by the chairman of the War Council. All of the profits on the sale of the books go for the benefit of the Red Cross. The book is well and clearly written, and well illustrated, and is of especial interest at this time, as the American Red Cross continues its work in many fields.

nate the copper wire as a connection, and through the wireless telephone can hear across the sea. Nor does he have to wait the time it would take for sound to travel such a distance. When the voice speaks it is heard thousands of miles away.

This factor of his ability to see and to hear, is so far beyond the ability of the physical eye and ear, that it presents considerable evidence that there dwells within man an ability to see, not limited by the wave lengths of light, and an ability to hear not limited by the wave lengths of sound. That man is something more than a brain within a body. It would take more than a brain within a body, a thing possessed by all animals, for him to imagine, let alone to construct the possibility of such instruments as the microscope, telescope, telegraph, and telephone.

Again, there are men and women who can read music—enjoy the finest music, who can neither sing nor play. The external equipment seems to be in some way lacking. But the fact that they can appreciate and understand, can picture music to themselves, and describe it, is strong evidence that their power of knowing is not limited by the external physical instrument.

Another man assures us of an ability far beyond the normal to appreciate good painting, yet he is not an artist and cannot paint.

Examples could be multiplied of where there is an inner ability to understand, to differentiate and appreciate, but where there is lacking the external physical equipment to produce.

This does not absolutely prove the immortality of the soul. It does at least infer that there is a separate entity or existence apart from this bodily life. Borrowing the argument of Plato, there is something in man, which is after all himself, having an imagination, a desire, and power that reaches beyond life that needs must be more durable than the physical instrumentality of his body.

MISCELLANEOUS

The Presidency

Notice is hereby given of the transfer of Elder J. W. Paxton from Utah to Holden Stake, missionary, for the balance of the conference year.

The appointment of Elder James Pycoc has been changed from London and Chatham Districts as missionary to Chatham District, local, to enable him to take up his duties as president of the Chatham District.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY.

The Bishopric

Switzerland and Germany. In order to make it convenient for the Saints in Switzerland and Germany to pay their tithing we are hereby appointing Brother Jacob Halb as agent for the above territory.

While we appreciate the conditions in these countries are not of the best because of the recent war, yet we feel that the Saints should be privileged to assist in the Lord's work to the extent of their ability.

Our prayer is that God may bless them in basket and in store, and that they in part may be inclined to contribute as circumstances may permit to the forwarding of the gospel message.

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE, Presiding Bishop.

Notice to the Special Praying Groups for the Sick

I want to state to the many Saints who have so willingly responded to my call for workers along the very important line of praying and fasting for the sick at the Sanitarium, that I am grouping them according to States, and they will note their number and respond accordingly when special request is made. As a rule these requests will be published in the HERALD and Ensign, and I shall ask you to pray only once, fasting, for each case submitted to your group. It will be a case of life or death.

I mean that we are having come to us, from time to time, members of the church whose cases are beyond the skill of man, and if God does not reach forth his hand, death will ensue. Believers in the Word of God will not underestimate the virtue of prayer, and for it to be of value it must be fervent and offered by hearts of faith. We are commanded to "pray one for another that we may be healed." Anna spent her life in the temple fasting and praying, and many a person to-day will find a holy mission in entering into this spiritual service for the good of the suffering of our church.

Letters have come to me from the Saints who know the meaning of suffering; their hearts have been touched and living sympathy burns forever on the altars of their souls. This is not a praying age, it is a careless, forgetting, ungodly age. People prayed during the war. Why? We all know why? "Let us pray for one another, for the day is fading fast!"

- Group 1 includes Missouri.
- Group 3. Iowa, Illinois, Arkansas.
- Group 4. Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Indiana, Mississippi, Louisiana.
- Group 5. South Dakota, Minnesota, Wisconsin.
- Group 8. Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, Texas, North Dakota.
- Group 9. Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, Indian Territory.
- Group 10. Georgia, Florida, Alabama.
- Group 11. Ontario.
- Group 12. Idaho, Utah, New Mexico.
- Group 13. Washington, Oregon, California, Nevada, Arizona.

- Group 25. Europe.
- Group 26. Asia.
- Group 27. South America, including Mexico and Central America.

- Group 29. The whole church.

This dividing the world into praying groups may sound a bit visionary, but there is "method in the madness." What is everybody's business is nobody's business. Sick patients at the Sanitarium may not be related to members of the groups by the ties of blood, but they are related by stronger tie, that of the Spirit.

May we ask of groups 3, 4, 8, one fervent prayer in fasting for the blessing of Sister W—— who has suffered much, yet has many years of blessing to come if God will, or can, shower his divine grace upon her.

Group 15 is asked to remember H—— that nothing may stand between him and the execution of God's will.

Will Groups 9, 22, hold up before the throne of grace the suffering body of Sister S—— that God may speedily come to her rescue and be able to do what is best for her.

Group 5 will remember Sister S—— who desires to receive her hearing, if it be God's will.

Groups 10, 11, 12, 13 are requested to remember the elders who administer.

Group 14 pray for the nurses.

With much faith in God's power, I am,

Leaves to mourn 2 sons, one daughter, and one niece. Her husband and 2 daughters preceded her in death. Baptized in April, 1894, and lived a consistent Saint to the end. Services at Elmwood, July 4. Sermon by J. L. Parker, of Lincoln, Nebraska.

RINGLAND.—Lucy Ringland was born August 9, 1873, at Kitley, Ontario. Died at Winnipeg, August 25, 1920. Baptized July 13, 1887. Married William Ringland, December 26, 1894. Eight children were born to them, two having preceded her in death. Leaves husband and six children to mourn. A devoted wife, loving mother, and faithful Saint. Services from the home. Sermon by W. B. Richards.

CHAPMAN.—Martha I., wife of John Chapman, of Persia, Iowa, died September 10, at the old homestead, where she had lived for many years, after a brief illness, at the age of 69 years, 5 months, and 28 days. She leaves husband, 6 children, 20 grandchildren, and 6 great-grandchildren of the immediate family. Baptized July, 1874, and retained her confidence in the gospel. Funeral services conducted at the home by J. F. Mintun, September 12, at which time about 500 paid their respects to her memory. Burial at Valley View Cemetery.

TAYLOR.—Hester Annie Taylor was born January 28, 1906, at Chicago, Illinois. With parents moved to Grandview, Missouri, in 1919. Baptized September 12, 1915, by O. R. Miller, at Hibbard, Indiana, and was a faithful, energetic worker. She was the first out of 32 to give her name for baptism thus emphasizing the statement: "A little child shall lead them." Died September 16, 1920, having only been confined to bed one day and night. Leaves to mourn, parents and a host of relatives and friends. Funeral services in Baptist church at Grandview, James F. Keir preaching the sermon.

Progress of the Campaign

There Is Every Indication of Complete Success. Every District Is Reaching Its Quota and More

S. N. Gray writes from Spokane that his branch subscribed $1,170 on one dozen cards. Will raise $1,500 or $1,800. Says, "I want to see the drive go to a million dollars. Let us go forward and build up Zion. This has been my dream ever since my boyhood days."

Colorado Springs, with only a handful of Saints, raised over $2,000 in 30 minutes—an average of over $100 apiece.

Joy, Illinois, chose to raise its quota in cash.

Kansas City started its campaign by subscribing $5,500 among 50 of its solicitors.

East Saint Louis subscribed $3,435 the first Sunday and is after $5,000. Saint Louis District will triple its quota at that rate.

Flint, Michigan, raised $5,820 in first day of campaign.

Wheeling, West Virginia, raised $1,000 in 30 minutes. Branch committee says it will raise entire district quota.

Niagara Falls, a very small branch, reports $2,100 and more to come.

Fort Madison, with only 20 families, subscribed $2,000—a third in cash.

Bishop Fisher wires, "Providence Branch with quota of $4,800 pledged $10,500. Massachusetts pledged up to to-day, $23,000, with six branches yet to hear from. Never saw anything like it. The redemption of Zion is only to-morrow."

Northeastern Missouri over subscribed entire district quota at Bevier. Will double district allotment.

J. A. Hansen writes: "Campaign is on in earnest in Pottawattamie District and glorious results are following. You can depend on this district to raise its full quota. Council Bluffs raised $5,000 Sunday."

Grand Rapids, Michigan, with a quota of $900 started out to raise it in 9 minutes. They raised $1,050 in six minutes.

Government

With the greatly increased electorate, through the adoption of woman's suffrage, now is an excellent time to revalue our institutions, and consider both how they are supposed to function, and how they actually do function.

As a church we are strongly for the American Government. Its Constitution, we are told, was prepared by men raised up of God for this purpose. (Doctrine and Covenants 98: 10.) It represented a tremendous advance over the age in which it was presented, and was the first attempt at democratic government to prove successful.

Even then there was a certain hesitancy, as is shown in the indirect method of electing the president, and the equal representation of the States in the Senate, neither of which is truly democratic, though they are republican in form. The theory was that the people were not sufficiently acquainted with the leading men to choose wisely a president. The French Republic, formed as late as 1871, delegated to the chambers the choosing of the president.

The upper house, the Senate, was organized to represent the various States. While amendments may be made to the Constitution by the vote of two thirds of Congress, ratified by three fourths of the States in convention or legislature, this particular clause can only be amended by unanimous consent of the States, since it is provided that no State shall be deprived of equal representation in the Senate without its consent. (United States Constitution, Article V.)

Following somewhat the plan of that day, to this body was granted a measure of executive power concerning appointments and ratification of treaties. The term of office was also made longer, to cover six years, while the House of Representatives was elected only for two years.

It was originally designed that the House of Representatives should be closer to the people, hence copying the House of Commons; to it was delegated the power of originating the money bills. But in fact, because of its shorter term of office, the Senate has taken the actual control of the money bills as well as other legislation, and because of its continuity and control of patronage, it is able to exercise indirect control over the members of the House, and is able to tear up House bills, and substitute bills of its own. Sometimes its bill is better; many times it is worse, and made to protect a small group, rather than the people as a whole. But in fact the power is vested there, while in England the House of Commons is the governing body.

We have the situation to-day of an issue between the Senate and the Presidency before the people. Yet, at the most, only one third of the Senate can be changed at this time, even by the most concentrated effort.

Some have suggested that the Senate should be abolished, but the bicameral legislature is well established now in jurisprudence. Also there is the factor that it would require the approval of every State to change the Senate. Some suggest that the plan of representation be changed. This would also require the approval of every State. Again it has been suggested that the time of Senators should be reduced, and that body made more immediately responsive to the people, and that above all, that the approval of postmasters and other Federal officers, and of treaties should be given rather to that House, which is nearest to the people.

As matters stand at present, the political conventions are practically controlled by a small handful of men in the United States Senate. This is true of both conventions. At the birth of the Republic, the objection was made that too great publicity would be given if treaties were presented to the House. But the size of the Senate now makes secrecy impossible, even though it were advisable. For it would appear that all treaties should be frankly public, and the League of Nations covenant provides for full publicity for all treaties or international agreements.

We want a strong, central government, wisely administered, and we want it also duly responsive to the will of the people.

It is a curious fact that the Constitution does not determine the actual form and nature of the government. In America, the position of the Presidency has become strong, so that the President actually exercises more authority than many kings, for he has the power of veto over all legislation, and a bill only becomes a law, either upon his signature, or upon his failure to disapprove, or by being passed by two thirds of both houses, over his veto.

In Great Britain the king has no power of veto, but this grows in part out of the fact that his cabinet naturally formulates the law, and sits in the House of Commons, where they answer questions and represent the government. All bills are proposed in his name, and in theory by his authority. This leaves no room for his veto. All laws adopted are designated by the name of the reigning king, the year of his reign, and the number of the law according to the order in the calendar year. Hence the House of Commons is in fact the government, and has power to pass bills either with or without the House of Lords, and leaves to the king practically only the social duties of his office. The sitting of the cabinet in the Parliament in forming of a national budget, is certainly a valuable factor in government which in the end it may be well for other governments to copy.

France copied largely from the English plan, and made her president largely a figurehead. This is not because of the constitution, but has been simply a development of practice. The cabinet and prime minister sit in the French chamber, and the premier becomes in fact the highest government officer. It is stated that President Millerand is determined to change this and become a strong president. Lack of leadership in the presidency is an element that has proven a detriment, and left him very much in the position of the vice president in America, so far as active responsibility is concerned.

Switzerland has a strong central government of the various cantonments, and it is from Switzerland that the initiative, referendum, and recall have been introduced into modern democratic government.

The American Government is a strongly centralized one. The President, because of his veto and other reasons is in the true sense the leader of the country. The Cabinet, perhaps too much so, are simply a body of secretaries to the President, and probably are not sufficiently in touch with the legislative body. Because of this division at times between the Executive and the Legislature, there has failed so far to be established an adequate budget system, while in the past ten years it has been universally agreed that there is need of a house cleaning and setting in order of the government offices, for an effective and economical administration.

England has no written constitution, but has an unwritten constitution, the laws being made by Parliament, the House of Lords, being also the highest appellate court. Her courts have never assumed or been granted, by written or unwritten law, the right to declare any law unconstitutional. Parliament determines what is the law of the land.

In America in early days, the United States Supreme Court assumed the right to determine whether a law was in accordance with the Federal Constitution or not. This right is not set forth in the Constitution, but has now become well established. A peculiar aspect of its development has been the attempt recently to have the United States Supreme Court to declare the Eighteenth Amendment unconstitutional. When we note that this amendment was first approved by two thirds of both bodies of the highest legislative and parliamentary body of the nation: and it then had received the approval of the legislative bodies of three fourths of the States, representing the people at large, it is an interesting development of democratic government for a court to consider whether a constitutional amendment so adopted is part of the constitution or not. But it appears now to be well established in the unwritten law of the land, and certainly makes for careful consideration of all legislation.

Miracles

The past century has been marked with some very free discussions of the subject of the miracles of the Bible. Many books have been written concerning the miracles of Jesus, in an attempt to explain them in accordance with known physical laws. Most of the explanation is made in an effort to avoid the idea of any supernatural agency, and infer an element of deceit. Thus in the story of Jesus walking on the water, such explanations are offered as that the whole incident was managed by a secret order, which placed a platform under the surface of the lake. It was on this that Jesus walked out. That Peter knowing of this plan asked permission to come to meet him; when the permission was given he stepped out boldly, but not knowing exactly where the planks were laid, stepped over the edge, and then in fear cried out for help, as he was sinking.

The explanations of some other miracles are just as extreme.

Now it is quite true that it makes no difference whether any of the miracles in the Bible are true or not so far as our moral duty to our fellow man is concerned. It makes no great practical difference so far as the solution of economic, social, and political problems are concerned, except in so far that our philosophy of life may necessarily affect our conduct; and our hopes of a hereafter may affect our manner of living in this world. But "thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," remains as much the law whether there is any instance of an authentic miracle or not.

It may also be asserted concerning any particular miracle that our belief in that one miracle need not affect our belief in God, or in our religion as a whole. But this cannot be asserted of all miracles. But we are using the word miracle here, only as an approximation, to designate those stories in the Bible which are beyond our full comprehension at present.

Webster states a miracle as: "1. A wonder or wonderful thing. 2. Specifically: An event or effect contrary to the established constitution and course of things, or a deviation from the known laws of nature; a supernatural event or one transcending the ordinary laws by which the universe is governed."

That it is a wonderful thing, we would agree; that it is an event contrary to the known laws of nature may also be true but not that it is contrary to the established constitution of nature, a violation of natural laws.

For some of the so-called miracles it is possible an explanation can now be found. Man's knowledge of the laws of nature has greatly increased in the past two thousand years, and especially in the last one hundred years. All these mechanical developments of the past century, or even the past fifty years are quite in accordance with the laws of nature, still would have been miraculous and against the known laws of nature to a people even a hundred or a hundred and fifty years ago, but a flying machine or electric light is not contrary to the laws of nature, simply because not then understood.

Can we afford to take the position we will reject everything that we do not ourselves know? If so, we must reject a great deal of scientific knowledge, as well as religious knowledge. Is our capacity to understand to be the sole criterion for the truthfulness of a fact?

We are reminded of a preacher who spoke on the gifts of the Holy Spirit, and said that there is no such a thing to-day, and no possibility of such a thing to-day. After his sermon a good old colored brother went up, and objected. He said, "Why, what was wrong with that? Did I say too much?" "No, sir! But you didn't say enough." "What should I have said?" "You should have added the words, 'Not as I know of.'" When attempting to determine the truth of an event, 'not as I know of,' is not a sufficient test.

We can remember sometime ago hearing a good elder say, in reply to a question, that we did not know anything about how the sick are healed by administration, and he was glad that we did not, for if men knew it, they would take it and sell it for money.

Personally we are of the opinion that the human mechanism which is acted upon in healing the sick, faith, the influence of mind over matter, is understood by designing men and women to-day, and that they do attempt to use it and sell it for money, to the deception and injury of many. There is, however, a significant difference between the healing of the sick by the Lord, and the healing of the sick by human agency. When a man lays his hands upon another man to heal him by his own power, or exercises his influence or force to bring about a so-called divine healing, he places upon the patient something of his own spirit, whether it be clean or unclean. But when the elders lay their hands upon any individual to administer in the ordinance as the Lord has provided for the healing of the sick, they do not attempt to exercise their own spirit, or place their own spirit upon the individual; all their prayer and thought is for divine guidance, and for the influence of the Spirit of God. That Spirit brings only good and cleansing with its healing power, for as it is written, "the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him." That signifies an affirmation of law, a cleansing reaction, and a spiritual blessing as well as a physical healing.

So we may take up other so-called miracles, and when they are understood we will find they are all in accordance with natural law—the law of intelligence, and that they make for the good of humanity, as much in the spiritual realm as in the physical world.

As man's knowledge of nature grows, so does his capacity to understand what was once beyond his ken. What he thought impossible becomes possible. So does his greater intellectual development permit of greater control in the use of powers of nature according to the laws of nature, for the benefit of humanity. It has been so in the past; it will doubtless be so in increasing measure in the future.

The miracles of the Bible then bring simply this one question in issue: Is God limited to our knowledge, or does he know more of the laws of nature than we know even now? If he knows more of the laws of nature than we do, then he is able to do things that will still appear to us to be miraculous. If he does not know more of the laws of nature than we do, then he is not God, and there is no God.

We submit this fact to the consideration of those who think they assume a superior attitude, when they express doubt or attempt some seeming explanation of some of the miracles of the Bible. Of none of them can it be said "Impossible." It can still safely be said of many that we cannot fully explain; or if we can offer an explanation we cannot be sure that our explanation defines the actual mode of procedure. Still that fact does not call in question the truthfulness of the event.

For God does live, and is all knowing, as well as all wise and all powerful. Therefore it follows of necessity his ways are past finding out; as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are his ways beyond our ways, and he can and will still empower his servants to perform miracles, acts beyond the present limited human understanding of nature's laws, set forth as science.

International Church Conferences

We have already discussed in these columns the three meetings which were held last August in Switzerland. Fuller reports now come to us in the Christian Union Quarterly. It appears that the first meeting had to do with the life and work of the church. With this it would seem that the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America is related for the purpose of doing what is considered practical work for the church, for Christian brotherhood, and international relations; the creation of a Christian disposition of mind in the commonwealth of nations; for the Christian conception of a system of law as a gift of God; Christian principles in social life, and in the social and economic construction of society. This includes the relation to the labor movement, and will include a discussion of Christian education, liberty of conscience, protection of religious minorities, the white slave traffic, bad business morals, exploitation of natives, intemperance, gambling, protection of family life, recreation, and recruiting.

This meeting included members from the Greek Church, as well as from the Western Protestant Church. Its purpose is cooperation and carrying on the practical social work of the church.

The second meeting was a preliminary conference on faith and order. At this conference eighty churches were represented, from forty different countries. Its purpose was to devise plans for the world conference to be held at a time and place not yet decided. There was no public program.

The first topic discussed informally was the church and the nature of the united church. Must there be an authoritative creed, an authoritative sacrament, and an authoritative ministry? Or is freedom incompatible with such conditions? The discussion of this subject brought forth the difficulties of adjustment. But progress is reported.

The second topic discussed was the place of the Bible and a creed in relation to union. It was stated affirmatively that the permanent place of the Bible must be recognized and that there is a necessity to revise creedal statements. This latter point was one of considerable dispute, as many held for the Apostle's Creed and the Nicene Creed, and strict continuity with the past.

The subject was deferred for further discussion on these questions in the Continuation Committee:

1. What degree of unity in faith will be necessary in a reunited church?
2. Is the statement of this one faith in the form of a creed necessary or desirable?
3. If so, what creed should be used, or what other formula would be desirable?
4. What are the proper uses of a creed, and of a confession of faith?

These questions will be deferred to the world conference for final decision.

The Christian Union Quarterly urges, however, very strongly another factor even more important, and that is, love one for another. This very vital factor is urged as follows:

"It is expressed in the words of Jesus: 'By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye have love one to another.' There may be historic validity in the creeds, sacraments, ministry, and the Bible, but no one of these, nor all of these combined are the real evidences of discipleship. Love is that divine insignia. Society has not accepted it. Political governments know nothing about it. The church is largely ignorant of it and the best evidence of its lack of knowledge is its complacency in the midst of its multiplicity of divisions and its patronage of the inequitable conditions around us. Love is so revolutionary that its practice would upset the present social order. The way to its understanding is not easy. The other subjects may be worked out satisfactorily in the library and around the conference table, but the meaning of love can only be found as Jesus revealed it in his life and death. Well might he say to the various Christian communions, as he said to his disciples of old, 'Are ye able to drink the cup that I drink of and be baptized with the baptism which I am baptized with?' It is a costly pathway, but it is the way to the unity of the church of Christ. The adjusting of other things will help, only love will clothe the church with divine power and we look for it."

The third conference was the International Committee of the World Alliance for promoting international friendship through the churches. It met in the midst of the mountains in Switzerland at Saint Beatenberg, and reports twenty-two nations having national councils which are auxiliaries to the World Alliance, and represented on the national committee. Its purpose is international reconciliation by a better understanding among the nations, cultivation of good will and tolerance, and that the ethical principles that should control individuals must also control nations.

Cooperation in service naturally meets with approval. We know no reason why churches may not cooperate in social work, and in community service and service to humanity, whether the word community is taken to represent the town, the nation, or is used in a wider field.

It certainly is the place of the church, as separate organizations or as a whole, to do all that is possible to promote better international relations, and better understanding, and consideration; in a word, the brotherhood of man.

On the other hand there exists a tendency to-day to emphasize the necessity of getting together and ignoring differences, and to compromise to an extent which often ignores essentials. Is agreement greater than truth? Is compromise greater than right? Is it more important that we lay aside everything that everyone else does not like, than that we preach Christ Jesus and him crucified, and attempt more earnestly to carry out his teachings? Our position is one of willingness to assist and cooperate in all good works—to recognize good wherever it is found, and also honesty of intention. Still we do not want to becloud our greater light, received through the inspiration of Almighty God. We cannot afford to deny that which we have received and know. For we have the duty under Christ to let our light shine to the blessing and teaching of others.

The Temple

In the Independence special number of the SAINTS' HERALD we pointed out that the Kirtland Temple had been used for public services and general purposes from the first. Also as was pointed out this was the purpose of the Nauvoo Temple, that it be used for general meetings of the church.

It is well known that visitors are taken regularly through the Kirtland Temple, and several thousand visit it each year. Also that regular public services are held therein.

We note in this connection, from the Millennial Star, volume 15, page 583, the following extract from rules adopted for the government of the Kirtland Temple:

"No man shall be interrupted who is appointed to speak by the Presidency of the church, by any disorderly person or persons in the congregation, . . . by any display of ill manners, or ill breeding, from old or young, rich or poor, male or female, bond or free, black or white, believer or unbeliever. . . .

"All persons, whether believers or unbelievers, shall be treated with due respect by the authorities of the church."

From this we note that believers or unbelievers were permitted to attend the Kirtland Temple services.

In the Times and Seasons, volume 5, page 472, is found the reference to the statement of Joseph Smith:

"We have frequently heard him of late, in a very plaintive manner speak of the difficulties that he labors under in speaking to a congregation thus situated, . . . (outdoor preaching by Joseph Smith here referred to) which can be fully obviated by the completion of the temple."

In Times and Seasons, volume 6, pages 1017-19, the record is found of the first meeting in the Nauvoo Temple, on October 5, 1845. The extract follows:

"On Sunday, the 5th day of October, (1845), . . . about five thousand Saints had the inexpressible joy and great satisfaction to meet for the first time in the house of the Lord in the city of Joseph. From mites and tithings, millions had risen up to the glory of God, as a temple where the children of the last kingdom could come together and praise the Lord.

"It certainly afforded a holy satisfaction to think that since the 6th of April, 1841, when the first stone was laid, amidst the most straitened circumstances, the church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints had witnessed their 'bread cast upon the waters,' or more properly, their obedience to the commandments of the Lord, appear in the tangible form of a temple, entirely inclosed, windows in, with temporary floors, pulpits, and seats to accommodate so many persons preparatory to a general conference; no general conference having been held for three years past, according to the declaration of our martyred prophet. 'There shall be no more baptisms for the dead, until the ordinance can be attended to in the font of the Lord's house; and the church shall not hold another general conference, until they can meet in said house. For thus saith the Lord.' . . .

"The day was occupied most agreeably in hearing instructions and teachings, and offering up the gratitude of honest hearts, for so great a privilege, as worshiping God, within instead of without an edifice, whose beauty and workmanship will compare with any house of worship in America, and whose motto is 'Holiness to the Lord.'"

From this we note a General Conference was held in that building.

In the temple at Jerusalem, while it is true the Holy of Holies was entered once a year, and then by the high priest alone, and while the holy place was open only to the priests and special visitors, still the sight of this latter place was not shut out from Israel. The temple was used as a place of assembling, and was open to both Jews and Gentiles. In Matthew 21:12-17, Jesus cleanses the temple, and the blind and lame come to him there and are healed. In the 45th and 46th verses, the chief priests and Pharisees fear to lay hands on him as he taught in the temple, because they feared the multitude. In the 26th chapter and 55th verse he states that he daily taught in the temple, and no one laid hold on him.

In John 18:19-21, we note the following:

"The high priest then asked Jesus of his disciple, and of his doctrine. Jesus answered him, I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing. Why asketh thou me? ask them which heard me, what I have said unto them; behold, they know that I said."

Also we find that the disciples were daily in the temple. (Acts 2:46; 3:1; 5:20.) We find the same condition upon this continent in the early days, according to Jacob 1 and 2. Jacob went to the temple to preach to the people on this continent.

A Great Fish

Elder Hale W. Smith has kindly sent us a page from the Saint Louis Times, of May 14, 1920, in which appears an account of a large fish which was found off the coast of Miami, Florida. This fish is stated to be 45 feet long, 25 feet in circumference, and to weigh about 30,000 pounds. It is very symmetrical in appearance, though called a monster; it possesses fine lines. The special interest in this fish is that when it was cut open an octopus of 1,500 pounds in weight was found in its stomach, and had apparently been swallowed whole, and had lived for some time in the stomach.

It has long been contended that there is no known fish that could have swallowed Jonah; that while the mouth of the whale is large enough, it has not the apparatus for swallowing alive a man, and then again returning him. This fish has a liver weighing 1,700 pounds, and there was found in addition to the octopus, a large fish weighing several hundred pounds, and 500 pounds of coral. If such a fish could be swallowed alive, it is quite apparent that a man would be an easy matter.

Scientific authorities are quoted as saying that the fish must have inhabited a depth of more than 1,500 feet below the surface, and it must have been blown up by some subterranean upheaval, and was injured in some way so that it could not return. Its hide is three inches thick, and would have enabled it to withstand the enormous water pressure of great sea depth. It is the largest fish ever captured, but is considered to be only a baby of its kind, because of the condition of its bones. It is believed that if it had lived to have attained full growth that it would have been two and a half times as large. It is not classified as the genus and species are both unknown. Hence another so-called miracle becomes an easy possibility. For this fish, though immature, alone is amply large to fully support the story of Jonah and the great fish.

There is much that man does not know about the great fishes of the sea depths. This is only one of them. Such a fish, as the writer suggests, could have swallowed twenty men without inconvenience. How many then would a full-grown fish be able to handle?

The Denver Post of June 30, states that Elder Hale W. Smith officiated in the marriage of two deaf mutes at Denver, Colorado.

The results of prohibition are seen in the closing of prisons. In Massachusetts there has been a decrease of prison population of 34 per cent. One workhouse costing $17,000 a year to maintain, has been closed and turned into a shoe factory. Four county prisons have been closed in Massachusetts.

Any man may commit a mistake, but none but a fool will continue in it.—Cicero.

America and the League of Nations

By Daniel Macgregor

Herewith Elder Macgregor has further elucidated the subject above, we having printed the opening paragraphs in our issue of last week.

Thirty-six hundred years ago America was revealed unto the people of God.

It was portrayed in the promises expressed through patriarch and prophet.

It was described as "a pleasant place" in the "West" "over the sea," being a "land shadowing with wings," producing "the precious things of the earth and the fullness thereof." (Hosea 9: 13; 11: 10; Isaiah 16: 8; 18: 1, 2; Jeremiah 48: 32; Deuteronomy 33: 12-17.)

It was predicted that it would sustain a "wealthy nation that dwelleth without care which have neither gates nor bars, which dwell alone." (Jeremiah 49: 30-32.)

Up to the discovery of America the manacled millions of the Eastern Hemisphere existed in a twilight of intelligence and a stupor of spirituality.

It was a world of political and religious intolerance.

But God designed the discovery of America.

The purpose of that discovery was to uncover an asylum of rest to the oppressed of all lands.

It was intended as a nursery to the principles of liberty and democracy.

For myriad years the free people of the western world, unknown to the nations of the East, were preserved by the shield of isolation and separation. It was a liberty unleagued with the contentious continents abroad.

There was a time when that liberty was threatened. The imperialism of the Old World sought to enforce a league of subordination upon the free-born colonists of the West.

But that attempted league of nations was defeated.

It was annihilated in the wars of Washington.

The liberty of America is again threatened. The enemy comes not with a declaration of intent to destroy our liberties, but he poses as an angel of light with a treacherous "League of Nations" that will impair our liberties.

Let the freedom of America, unfettered and full, be preserved. The growing giant of the Western World must not be wedlocked with the jaded nations of the disordered East.

The Nation of the United States occupies under God as the foster father of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

It is the Joseph of honored fame who watched over the infant interests of our Lord. Indeed it is that nation of whom it is said that its "Constitution" was ordered by "wise men raised up by Almighty God for that purpose."

It is more than that. It is the very mountain (nation) of the house of the Lord, predicted of old to be set up in the latter days. (See Isaiah 2: 2, 3; Micah 4: 1, 2.)

And shall a people dowered with such an heritage, and favored with such an Heir, undignifiedly and compromisingly league up the nation of heavenly origin with the quarreling councils of the East? Might as well advocate the federation of the Church of Latter Day Saints with the mother of harlots and abomination of the earth. Such a course would be quite as honorable as the other.

Let the reader bear in mind the murderous history of Euroasiatic Powers. From time immemorial they have been cutting each others' throats, and the recent World War reveals no change of heart. The only change has been in the engines of assassination, more murderous than ever.

"Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers," said God; and why should a people, democratic in principle, whose ways of conquest have been, predominantly, through the art of arbitration or by purchase, rather than by blood, join itself to conscienceless marauders, whose principles have ever been "Might is right."

Nor is there any evidence of a change of sentiment, and the saddest feature is that the older they grow, the more warlike they become. Every year, every day, in the so-called Christian nineteenth century, was creped in black, as the war spirit, dominating with irresistible force, took possession of the emaciated empires of the East.

And this "time of trouble" will continue. It is the unerring voice of prophecy. League or no league, war will never cease. No power or combination of powers can stop it, and the world will terminate in the deadliest war of all history.

Well did Isaiah speak, "And your covenant with death shall be disannulled and your agreement with hell shall not stand; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through then ye shall be trodden down by it." (28: 29.)

What is the League of Nations but a covenant with "death" and "hell"? It is an attempt to prevent war, justly termed death and hell. But however worthy the aim of that league it will not succeed.

It is true that Great Britain and her colonies have affixed their signature to that league. A masterful political stroke on the part of that wily Welshman, Lloyd George. The far-flung British Empire, exposed in some quarters to the jealous attacks of neighboring nations, is now better able to resist such an intrusion. And I presume that so long as she holds six votes against one of any other power she will be satisfied.

As a Canadian, I am loyal to British institutions, and proud of them. But Canada geographically and prophetically belongs to the continent of America, and as such is heir to those rare patriarchal promises reserved for the Israel of God. Moreover, as a Latter Day Saint enlightened with the message emanating from the "land shadowing with wings," and adopted into the family of Israel whose latter-day restoration commenced in America, I will be permitted to indulge in sentiments of loftiest patriotism when shouting the praises of Joseph's land. "My country 'tis of thee, sweet land of liberty" may be sung of Canada as well as all America.

Some may be disposed to regard the course of America as selfish, if peradventure, she refuses to join the League of Nations. It will be interpreted as refusing to help the war-burdened millions shackled with the sorrows of national unrest. But does her record of unparalleled deeds of human kindness sustain such a charge?

For four hundred years America has thrown wide its gates to the impoverished of every land. They have come as paupers and have been enriched as princes; they came as slaves and have become masters of industry and science. Better than all, the Statue of Liberty and Franchise with its torch full high has sent its genial rays into all lands, ameliorating the condition of the downtrodden and oppressed. Not only has it conferred a fullness of franchise to the fettered foreigner migrating to our shores, but it has presented him with one hundred and sixty acres of virgin soil when disposed to accept. When, if ever, in the annals of other lands has this been done? And the foreign oppressed are still coming, millions of them, congesting traffic itself in our charitable struggle to take care of them.

What America has done, she is still willing to do. Limitless regions of ungathered wealth concealed in mine, in forest, and in soil, are awaiting the toilers' tools. And this is the part, the prophetic part, that America was destined to play in the deliverance of the world from its unceasing sorrows, rather than go abroad and mix up in the interminable troubles of a war-mad world, where her sons would be sacrificed on the altars of international hate.

Let the nations of the other hemisphere, hoary with vice of bloodcurdling exploits, take a leaf from the book of American diplomacy and extend to their suffering citizens "equality and liberty," and then they may have peace if they wish it. Judging, however, from the news of battle from many fronts it is a question if they really want it. At all events five years in a holocaust of hell has not satisfied their blood lust as yet.

But war, after all, is not the worst thing that has happened to humans. The domestic, political, and religious rottenness that has invariably created and promoted war, is infinitely worse. America's mission is to send forth her "swift messenger of Gospel peace" unfurling its "Ensign upon the mountain" inviting all to "Hear ye when He bloweth a trumpet." In this way, striking at the very seat of the disorders abroad, may she hope to promote the arts of peace.

Refusing to accept the gospel as Europe has largely done, and festering in the filth of social corruption, there is no remedy for the malaria of unrighteousness but to let it run its course in the fever of war. And out of that fever there will arise, let us hope, a stronger and a better people.

At all events the lessons of all great wars, leaving their everlasting impress on future generations, has taught us that out of the maelstrom of internecine strifes the survival of the fittest has invariably prevailed.

It may be profitable to recall that there have been several leagues of nations and all of them up to date have failed in their purpose. The world went on warring just the same. And it also might be interesting to recollect, that had there been a league of nations at the time America sought her independence, she never could have acquired it. The world powers would have turned upon France as one interfering with English rule, leaving Britain free to hurl the fullness of her strength against the struggling colonists of the West.

For the sake of the war-weary in many lands, let one lonely perching place be preserved for the Dove of Peace, who over the billows of the world's tribulations has flown for the last time, searching for a hill crest of rest, for the prisoners of hope in the dungeoned arks of many lands.

Oh, America, entangle not thyself with the policies and strifes of restless foreign lands, lest their prejudices be aroused, and hopeless they turn away from that beckoning star of American salvation so munificently extended in Freedom, Franchise, and Gospel.

Looking over some Autumn Leaves of a few years ago, we are very much surprised and interested to note that "A little humor now and then" was invariably placed before the Department of the Woman's Auxiliary of the church. What this was expected to portend we are not informed. The Women's Department has progressed since then, and is no longer the next thing to a joke.

Morris F. Laughlin, late of Albin, Wyoming, writes that he is now principal of the high school at Betterton, Maryland. He announced to the school that he would teach a normal training and Bible class. Some Methodist ladies called on him and asked him to teach the class at the Methodist church on prayer meeting evenings. But the Methodist minister said it would not be proper for his members to hear the interpretation of the Bible by a Latter Day Saint. Brother Laughlin requests the Saints in Maryland, Delaware, and District of Columbia, each to write him a card.

The League of Nations Covenant

By J. W. Wight

Arguments in favor of such a plan, by an ardent supporter of the League of Nations.

This covenant might appropriately be called "The Covenant of Peace," as its entire aim is to this end. That it will obliterate war and bring into existence a never-ending peace would be an extravagant claim and beyond the fondest hope of its most ardent admirers. But that it will be a means to bring to an end petty strifes and the revolutions that have been so frequent in the experience of lesser nations is most likely, besides at least the possibility of hindering what might be an upheaval of nations in numerous instances.

Of course it may be argued that prophecy has forecasted war and we should therefore do nothing to try to avert it and thus "fly in the face of scripture," but such statement or thought is but a negative affirmation that since the Bible has so proclaimed and it is right to stand by Bible statement therefore we are justified in preparing for rather than against war! Such would seem to be the logic of such an argument, if it can be thus dignified. Carrying this to its logical sequence would be but to argue that Israel was justified in preparing for the captivity that had been predicted concerning them by continuing in their wrongdoing! and that Brigham Young and others were justified in their evil doings that produced their evident apostasy! The real fact is that all prophetic statement is conditionally based and the evils or dire results proclaimed therein may be averted by all the wicked doing in harmony with Ezekiel 18: 21, 22. It follows then, that all should do all in harmony with their power to avert war rather than to aid by inactivity its oncoming and terribleness.

But it is argued that the league will produce rather than avert war and that Article 10 especially so provides. Perhaps as good an answer to that as may be found was made by ex-President Taft, April 30, 1919, as recorded in Philadelphia Public Ledger, as follows:

"How much will it involve us in war? Little, if any. In the first place, the universal boycott, first to be applied, will impose upon most nations such a withering isolation and starvation that in most cases it will be effective. In the second place, we'll not be drawn into any war in which it will be reasonable and convenient for us to render efficient aid, because the plan of the council must be approved by our representatives, as already explained. In the third place, the threat of the universal boycott, and the union of overwhelming forces of the members of the League, if need be, will hold every nation from violating Article X and Articles XII, XIII, and XV, unless there is a world conspiracy."

For the reader's consideration and analysis the articles cited are hereby submitted in full:

"Article 12

"The members of the league agree that if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration, or to inquiry by the council, and they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the council.

"In any case under this article the award of the arbitrators shall be made within a reasonable time, and the report of the council shall be made within six months after the submission of the dispute.

"Article 13

"The members of the league agree that whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration and which cannot be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole subject matter to arbitration.

"Disputes as to the interpretation of a treaty, as to any question of international law, as to the existence of any fact which if established would constitute a breach of any international obligation, or as to the extent and nature of the reparation to be made for any such breach, are declared to be among those which are generally suitable for submission to arbitration.

"For the consideration of any such dispute the court of arbitration to which the case is referred shall be the court agreed on by the parties to the dispute or stipulated in any convention existing between them.

"The members of the league agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award that may be rendered, and that they will not resort to war against a member of the league which complies therewith. In the event of any failure to carry out such an award, the council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto.

"Article 15

"If there should arise between members of the league any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration in accordance with Article 13, the members of the league agree that they will submit the matter to the council. Any party to the dispute may effect such submission by giving notice of the existence of the dispute to the secretary general, who will make all necessary arrangements for a full investigation and consideration thereof.

"For this purpose the parties to the dispute will communicate to the secretary general, as promptly as possible, statements of their case with all the relevant facts and papers, and the council may forthwith direct the publication thereof.

"The council shall endeavor to effect a settlement of the dispute, and if such efforts are successful, a statement shall be made public giving such facts and explanations regarding the dispute and the terms of settlement thereof as the council may deem appropriate.

"If the dispute is not thus settled, the council either unanimously or by a majority vote shall make and publish a report containing a statement of the facts of the dispute and the recommendations which are deemed just and proper in regard thereto.

"Any member of the league represented on the council may make public a statement of the facts of the dispute and of its conclusions regarding the same.

"If a report by the council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the members of the league agree that they will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendations of the report.

"If the council fails to reach a report which is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof, other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the members of the league reserve to themselves the right to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice.

"If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and is found by the council, to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report, and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

"The council may in any case under this article refer the dispute to the assembly. The dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute, provided that such request be made within fourteen days after the submission of the dispute to the council.

"In any case referred to the assembly, all the provisions of this article and of Article 12 relating to the action and powers of the council shall apply to the action and powers of the assembly, provided that a report made by the assembly, if concurred in by the representatives of those members of the league represented on the council and of a majority of the other members of the league, exclusive in each case of the representatives of the parties to the dispute, shall have the same force as a report by the council concurred in by all the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute."

As these articles so clearly and pointedly provide for arbitration rather than war in the settlement of disputes they should at once appeal to all lovers of peace.

As early as October 19, 1914, and as written by him to the New York Times, Theodore Roosevelt favored a league: "The great civilized nations of the world which do possess force, actual or immediately potential, should combine by solemn agreement in a great world league for the peace of righteousness."

Your especial attention is called to Article 23, as here incorporated, which should be carefully read and analyzed and fault found with it if you can. It would be well if the entire document could be carefully read, but space will not permit its inclusion. I would most certainly feel that it is but to "kick against the pricks" to fight this covenant.

"Article 23

"Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon, the members of the league

- "(a) will endeavor to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labor for men, women and children, both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and for that purpose will establish and maintain the necessary international organizations;
- "(b) undertake to secure just treatment of the native inhabitants of territories under their control;
- "(c) will intrust the league with the general supervision over the execution of agreements with regard to the traffic in women and children, and the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs;
- "(d) will intrust the league with the general supervision of the trade in arms and ammunition with the countries in which the control of this traffic is necessary in the common interest;
- "(e) will make provision to secure and maintain freedom of communications and of transit and equitable treatment for the commerce of all members of the league. In this connection, the special necessities of the regions devastated during the war of 1914-1918 shall be borne in mind;
- "(f) will endeavor to take steps in matters of international concern for the prevention and control of disease."

Since e pluribus unum works so well with us as a nation, becoming really one of many lesser nations, states, or governments, will it not work just as well in grouping world nations or governments? And might not Daniel have been permitted to glimpse this very fact in a unified government, whether physical or spiritual, it matters not, as visioned in 2:44? And who shall say that this is not an initial step in the incipency of the work to be accomplished looking to the time when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more? (Isaiah 2:4; Micah 4:3, or Zechariah 2:11.) Many nations joined to the Lord, or 8:22, strong nations shall come to seek the Lord; 14:19 where "all nations" are to come once a year to worship? Please get the distinction clear in the mind that the writer makes no attempt to confuse this covenant with the culminating point of a covenant of nations in the millennium, but he does feel that as it required the Reformation to culminate a Restoration, so this covenant is but the prelude to a final covenant that shall fulfill the above and other scriptural declarations.

The writer does not believe that this covenant will avert the great war that is to precede the coming of Christ, neither the great war after the thousand years and little season, but he does feel that it will avert much war and bloodshed that will otherwise come and is enthusiastic in

THE HORSE IN AMERICA

A few years ago nearly all writers asserted that there were no horses in America prior to the discovery by Columbus. Hence the statements in the Book of Mormon concerning the horse as a domestic animal were scorned.

Nowadays it is commonly conceded by students of American archæology that the horse was among the many animals here in centuries past. In a recent number of the San Francisco Examiner (September 26) E. V. Weller writes of an asphalt bed in Southern California that seems to have been a trap for all manner of animals in former times. The University of California began a series of excavations in 1906, and since then other institutions have joined in the work. In the county museum—

"There are a mammoth and saber-toothed tiger, skeletons of wolves and lions, and even some ancient horses. One of the oddest of the collection is a camel, which seems to have been almost all neck, at least its upper story has considerably more altitude than those of its modern descendants. Then, most interesting of all, is the skull of a man. This was found seven feet below the surface, and the owner is supposed to have enjoyed life in the latest Pleistocene period, perhaps 7,500 years ago. . . .

"Dogs, rabbits, and cats have been found in these pools, caught in the same trap into which their ancestors had fallen. The complete skeletons of seventeen elephants have been taken from a single pit, and the list of bones includes the ancient ox, the giant sloth, and the cave bear.

"One of the oddities of nature is discovered through these preserved skeletons in that the camel, as well as the horse, originated in North America, but became extinct after the species had spread to other countries.

"The fossil remains of the ancient horse found in the La Brea fields traces its origin back to the Eocene period, to a five-toed animal of the size of the fox.

"There is a skull of a wide-fronted bison, that must have had a wild appearance in life. The skull measures six feet between its horns, and in life it is estimated it must have measured fully seven feet.

"Birds in great numbers are represented in the Southern California collection, particularly those which feed on carrion. Eagles, hawks, owls, condors, and buzzards are there in great quantities, and an extinct peacock, unknown except through this single specimen."

It is supposed that in ancient times, as to-day, these spots had the appearance of springs of water and thus led these animals too near, resulting in their miring to their death in the sticky asphaltum from which oil oozes to-day, the excavators being required to pump the oil out as they work.

INCREASED BIBLE SALES

Recently when the Gideons were in Saint Louis and we were told that they had placed 500,000 copies of the Bible in hotel rooms throughout the United States and needed 1,500,000 copies more to complete the job, we got some idea of the number of volumes of that great book there are in the world, but it was only a hint. Year after year the Bible the thought that it will help labor, secure to the native inhabitants of colonial possessions a better condition, largely stamp out the traffic in women and children to the honor and glory of the world, help to bring into existence better commercial conditions and go a very long way in the control and prevention of disease, hence is an ardent supporter of the league, with some possible mild reservations, but does not fear it in its present form.

continues to be the best seller and as well the best gift book. Gifts are of two kinds, the present, which usually calls for a fine volume of rice paper and flexible leather, and the mission gift, the handing of the Word to some one who needs it.

The latter is of much cheaper production. Besides being the most in numbers to be printed year after year, the Bible is also produced in the greatest varieties of form, size, type, and binding, from the edition small enough to go into the pocket to the huge tome which rests on the family table or on the church pulpit.

The family Bible has been an institution "since the memory of man runneth not to the contrary," which really means since Wyckliffe gave the Scriptures to the common people. Old English common law recognized the records contained in family Bibles as the highest form of evidence, just as it did gravestone inscriptions. Those are two places where lies are not told as to names and dates. Family record Bibles are not so common now as they were even a generation ago, perhaps because the old style of family home and homestead is not so common. But there is no evidence that the Bible itself is not read so much as it used to be. It is certain that many more millions of people have Bibles to read than a generation ago and millions are better able to read than then.

The Bible has been published in every known language and in a multitude of dialects, yet more are printed in English than in all other tongues combined. Because of ability to do the work more cheaply, England was formerly the leading Bible publisher, but the United States may now be in the lead. At least this country is its greatest distributor to others and the greatest purchaser for itself. The increase in the demand for Bibles has been ascribed in a measure to the experiences of the soldiers in the war, to many of whom Bibles or Testaments were given and who learned to read and prize it in the dangers and stress of army life. Greater mission activity among the churches is another reason. But the chief reason is the recognition of the people of Christian lands that it is the one great Book for all time.—Globe Democrat.

THE CHURCHES AND INDUSTRY

National Council of Congregational Churches, October, 1919
The National Council desires to put on record the following resolutions:

No solution can be obtained apart from application of unbiased justice by and to all classes, and a spirit of service in fact and not in name.

The heart of struggle of labor is not for higher wages and shorter hours alone, but has as its objective attainment of a new status which must not only be conceded to it but universally acknowledged if industrial democracy is to be established.

The principle of organized representation of interests of Labor is the just counterpart of corporate interests of capital.

While we recognize right of individual wage earner to contract with employer if he so prefers, we believe that general interest of wage earners is best promoted by collective bargaining.

We acknowledge right of wage earners to organize without discrimination, to bargain collectively, to be represented by representatives of their own choosing in negotiations and adjustments with employers in respect to wages, hours of labor, and relations and conditions of employment.

There are three methods of collective bargaining: First, by Craft Union method, in which workers are organized in great national organizations like American Federation of Labor. Second, by organization of employees in industries. Third, by group method, in which great body of unorganized workers express themselves collectively. Capital should recognize in each the expression of Labor's solidarity, and its right to determine by which method it will work out its relation to Capital.

Labor on basis of these conceded rights must, by a process of self-discipline, address itself to the acceptance of larger obligation and responsibilities for carrying through to successful issue the process of industry, particularly insisting on imperative obligation to fulfill contracts and to obey the laws of land.

The industrial democracy toward which we are striving requires on part of all classes involved and on part of general public, unflinching insistence upon freedom of speech and assembly, so long as use of this freedom is without disloyalty to republic; openness of mind; stern self-discipline; resulting in a church, a government, and an industrial order that shall in very truth serve common good of all.

Rights of public are a paramount consideration in all disputes between Capital and Labor, and neither Capital nor Labor should permanently sacrifice these for any selfish ends.

Recognition of rights to self-determination on the part of Labor and Capital is preliminary to, and useless without, an effective cooperation in common duties which will reveal that industry is, in its essential nature, a public service to which these parties contribute.

The Massachusetts Federation of Churches, April, 1920

Principles that underlie permanent industrial reconstruction:

There are certain principles basic in all human relations that apply to industrial relations. Among these are: Fair dealing; mutual consideration; willingness to keep peace, and to cooperate for protection and furtherance of general welfare; sacrifice of personal independence when necessary for welfare of other individuals, and for sake of whole community.

In addition to general principles upon which association rests, there are specific principles for industry:

Industry is primarily for service of society, and only secondarily a means of personal or corporate gain.

The several parties in industry have certain inalienable rights and these rights imply corresponding obligations.

Rights of persons take precedence of property.

Industry should be so conducted as to introduce all possible elements of satisfaction in creative effort; reduce to a minimum fatigue and monotony; and adopt a working day and week that will not overtax vital forces of workers and that will offer opportunity for such leisure as is necessary both for workers' efficiency and for happiness of himself and family.

Society has rightful claim upon individual in industry to give best that is in him. This calls for provision for vocational training both before and during industrial process, and a right use of leisure, not merely for enjoyment, but also for health, education, religion, and the claims of home life.

Industry is a partnership, and all parties to production should participate in direction of industry in proportion to training, ability, and interests.

A fair wage should be first charge on industry. A fair wage is support in reasonable comfort, for emergencies and old age, and a share in a continually improving standard of living.

Capital is entitled to fair return, and for depreciation on risk and investment; and management is entitled to return commensurate with skilled intelligence.

Primary needs of public have first claim over interests of any one class, and it is incumbent upon other parties in industry to devise means for peaceful settlement of all industrial disputes.

Workers should not be deprived of the following charter of liberties: (1) Every human being has a right to an opportunity for self-maintenance, and to safeguard against unemployment, overwork, accident, and disease. (2) Every worker has a right to leisure and an opportunity for self-improvement. (3) Workers have the right long enjoyed by employers to organize freely, and to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing. (4) Workers have a right to a voice in determining conditions of their labor, including wages, hours, and shop regulations.

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, May, 1920

We hold that our Church ought to declare:

For the Christian social obligation resting upon every man, for family, community, nation, and the world.

For Christian obligation to use wealth and power as trusts from God for fellow men.

For application of Christian principles to conduct of industrial, agricultural, and commercial organizations and relationship. Among these Christian principles are:

A. Sacredness of life and supreme worth of personality, so that a man must always be treated as an end and never as a means.

B. Brotherhood of man, demanding for every worker a democratic status in industry, and mutual understanding, good will, cooperation, and a common incentive among all engaged in it.

For the right and duty to work, since human society cannot endure unless each of its members has opportunity and feels obligation to serve common good to extent of his ability.

For a worthy and just return to every man according to his contribution to common welfare, and for a social order in which no man shall live on fruits of another man's labor and no man shall be denied fruits of his own labor. Worthiness or return for honest work is measured to-day first of all by standard of "a living wage," by which is meant a wage adequate to maintain worker and family in health and honor and to enable him to dispense with subsidiary earnings of his children up to age of sixteen.

For abatement of poverty, some of which is due to vice, idleness, or improvidence, but much also to low wages, preventable disease, uncompensated accidents, insufficient education, and other conditions for which society is responsible; and the spirit of Christ requires that society shall make provision for adequate education for all, public health, and relief of those in want.

For protection of children from exploitation in industry, agriculture, or trade and from work that is dwarfing, degrading, or morally unwholesome.

For such regulation of conditions of occupation of women as shall secure an adequate living wage, and at the same time safeguard their physical and moral health, and that of community and of future generations.

For safeguarding of working people from harmful conditions of labor, dangerous machinery, and occupational disease, and for education of workers in avoiding hazards in connection with their employment.

For assumption by industry of burdens entailed by industrial accidents, disease, and death, and for training of injured workers for continued production and self-support.

For release of every worker for rest one day in seven, which, wherever possible, should be the Lord's day.

For ordering of hours of labor to secure at once sufficient production and sufficient leisure for physical, mental, and moral well being of workers.

For employment of methods of investigation, conference, conciliation, and arbitration in industrial disputes.

For inviolability of agreements, both in letter and in spirit, since good faith is foundation of social and industrial stability and progress.

For right of wage earners to organize and to deal through their chosen representatives with management of industries in which they work, because an adequate representation of all parties (Labor, Capital, Management, and Public) in industry is needed for production and to secure attention for human factors involved.

LIQUIDATION OF LIQUOR INTERESTS

Prohibition has caused no great loss to the owners of breweries or saloons.

"The operation of prohibition in the United States is presenting some surprises, even to those who led in the movement for its establishment as a part of the fundamental law of the land. Not the least among these is the rapidity with which the tremendous amount of capital invested in the liquor traffic and the industries dependent upon it has been diverted to other channels. Apparently without the slightest jar to industrial conditions generally, vast capital and physical properties have been absorbed by essential industrial and business activities which are giving employment to more persons than before and at higher wages. Although less than a year has passed since the Federal prohibition amendment went into effect, the transition of the brewery, the distillery, and the saloon from destructive forces in American life to constructive activities is already practically accomplished, and without a single one of the dire effects predicted by the liquor interests."

GETTING IN TOUCH WITH THE BEST

Edward Everett Hale used to counsel young people to converse every day with some one older, better, and wiser than themselves. We cannot all do that, but we can do the next best thing: we can get in touch with them through the printed page and enjoy the fruits of their wisdom and experience. Probably no publication contains so much from the writings of men and women distinguished in many ways as The Youth's Companion. A constant reading of the paper is a liberal education of mind and heart.

The Companion has no age limit. Professional men, business men, and busy women prize it as highly as the young folks.

"How and why prohibition came to America," by Harry S. Warner of the Intercollegiate Prohibition Association, has been translated into Japanese and a copy given to every member in both houses of the Imperial Diet, which is now in session. This same little pamphlet has been translated into Spanish and is being widely distributed in South American countries. Temperance organizations are using it to good advantage in South Africa, and there have been numerous calls for it in large quantities in India.

HYMNS AND POEMS

Zion

(Song composed for Consecration Weeks, by J. L. Williams, Bevier, Missouri, for tune "Tripoli.")

Sing me the songs that I love to hear;
Sweet songs of Zion so dear.
Songs filled with praises and melody;
They bring me comfort and cheer.

Chorus (Tenderly with feeling):

Zion, how I love to sing of you,
Beautiful and grand.
Zion, I am trying to be true;
Working heart and hand.
Zion, lovely Zion,
Ever for you I'm striving;
While our God above
Looks on in love
Building up his Zion's land.

Freely I make consecration,
For the cause dearest to me,
So when there comes desolation,
I may have some place to flee.

Let us all make preparation
Ev'ryone do what he can;
So that each kindred and nation,
May hear this great gospel plan.

More of the King's Business

(Used at Kirtland reunion when Bishop McGuire spoke. Words fit the song, "The king's business," published by E. O. Excell in Joy to the World.)

Come! bring your tithes to me!
As evening draws nigh;
My storehouse must be filled,
Bring in your full supply;
Count all that you have gained,
And as a servant trained,
Be ever faithful to your Lord!

Chorus:

Continue in the good old path,
Whoso obeys escapes my wrath.
This is my promise still,
To all who will fulfill—
Prosperity must follow you.

Contribute of your gain,
That none may want for bread;
Relieve the helpless poor,
Let children all be fed;
And while your bins grow full,
Obey the "Golden Rule,"
Do as you would have others do!

The orphans shall be clothed,
Both youth and age may feed,
If all impart their tithes,
Then none should suffer need.

Zion shall live in peace,
Why should it ever cease?
All hail! millennium with thee!

Affinities

By J. E. Vanderwood

Memories of youth awaken
In me, as I see your face,
And I pause in meditation
For some more familiar trace.

Yes, I search my inner vision,
That I there may find the truth,
That has lingered through the ages,
Found alone in priceless youth.

Yes, I say, there is a something,
Call it what you will, or may,
That to me seems quite familiar
As I view your face to-day.

As I ponder o'er the matter
More profound the thoughts appear,
And I wonder, did I meet you
Somewhere else, ere coming here?

Then I seem to solve the problem
With some occult gift, or merit;
That in you which seems familiar
Is your own familiar spirit.

Kindred minds, as one, can mingle—
Thoughts unite, increase, and spread—
Virtue lifts the noble upward—
Wisdom crowns the victor's head.

So we walk with common visions
Rising day by day to sight;
And I trust where'er we journey
We may learn and live the right.

Herein comes our inspiration,
Comes our hope, our joy, our life;
When we catch the larger vision
We abandon mortal strife.

In our nobler life of service
We forget both caste and clan;
But we make a mighty effort
To enrich the life of man.

Thus in life we meet and mingle—
Worship at a common shrine—
Yes, we live to bless all others
With the light of truth divine.

A SMILE OR TWO

Elder Krahl likes to tell a joke on himself. Among the activities of the young people of his church is a shorthand class, announcement of a meeting of which he had been asked to make from the pulpit. But it chanced that shortly before service he was talking with Fred McWethy about a subject dear to Fred's heart—his pure-bred cattle, so Elder Krahl in his matter-of-fact way announced a meeting of the "shorthorn class."—Holden Progress.

THE FORUM

Stewardships

By W. A. France

"When a man makes his consecration he turns everything over to the church or some one who holds property for the church, with a deed."

We have heard a great deal about stewardships, but it seems to me a little more might be said.

"If thou lovest me, thou shalt serve me and keep all my commandments. And behold, thou wilt remember the poor, and consecrate of thy properties for their support, that which thou hast to impart unto them, with a covenant and a deed which cannot be broken; and inasmuch as ye impart of your substance unto the poor, ye will do it unto me, and they shall be laid before the bishop of my church and his counselors, two of the elders, or high priests, such as he shall or has appointed and set apart for that purpose. And it shall come to pass that after they are laid before the bishop of my church, and after he has received these testimonies concerning the consecration of the properties of my church, that they cannot be taken from the church, agreeable to my commandments; every man shall be made accountable unto me, a steward over his own property, or that which he has received by consecration, inasmuch as is sufficient for himself and family."—Doctrine and Covenants 42: 8, 9.

This shows that consecration is made by a covenant and deed, and they (the covenants and deeds) shall be laid before the bishop and his counselors; and after he has received these testimonies (covenants and deeds), then every man is made a steward over property that was his own before he made his consecration, or that he received by consecration, it does not matter which, every man is made a steward.

"And again, a commandment I give unto you concerning your stewardships which I have appointed unto you; behold all these properties are mine, or else your faith is vain, and ye are found hypocrites, and the covenants which ye have made unto me are broken; and if the properties are mine then are ye stewards, otherwise ye are no stewards."—Doctrine and Covenants 101: 10.

We must recognize that we are all stewards unto God, for all things belong to him, likewise if we are stewards unto the church, the properties belong to the church, otherwise we are no stewards. If I hold a deed to property I am not a steward, but it is mine so far as the laws of this world are concerned; a steward is not an owner, and an owner is not a steward. The dictionary says, a steward is the manager of another's affairs.

"Hearken unto me, saith the Lord your God, and I will speak unto my servant Edward Partridge, and give unto him directions; for it must needs be that he receive directions how to organize this people, for it must needs be that they are organized according to my laws, if otherwise, they will be cut off; wherefore let my servant Edward Partridge, and those whom he has chosen, in whom I am well pleased, appoint unto this people their portion, every man equal according to their families, according to their circumstances, and their wants and needs; and let my servant Edward Partridge, when he shall appoint a man his portion, give unto him a writing that shall secure unto him his portion, that he shall hold it, even this right and this inheritance in the church, until he transgresses and is not accounted worthy by the voice of the church, according to the laws and covenants of the church, to belong to the church; and if he shall transgress, and is not accounted worthy to belong to the church, he shall not have power to claim that portion which he has consecrated unto the bishop for the poor and needy of my

Education Is Experience

True education is experience. Schooling is a study of the experience of other persons.

The aim of the school-teacher who understands the fundamentals of his profession is to develop actual experience in the schoolroom wherever possible. "Thus," he reasons, "I shall truly educate." A child might read six textbooks explaining that fire burns, and yet not know it. Let him stick his finger in the fire and he learns instantly that fire burns. Reading the textbooks is schooling. Sticking his finger in the fire is education.

The more education we can inject into the schools, the better it is for the student. There is a private school in New York City where a number of children of the wealthiest families go from the time they are little children until they grow up and are ready to marry. It is a good school and it is patronized by persons of means and intelligence because the educators who conduct it understand what education is.

It is essential that the scion of a wealthy family destined to assume the responsibility of administering his family's money should be taught how to handle money. The school he goes to, therefore, teaches him how to handle money. It does not teach the subject from a textbook. It teaches by letting the student actually handle the money.

For ten years the children in this school have been made to budget their expenses. They receive stated incomes and they balance their expenditures against these incomes by means of a budget sheet showing itemized outlay. They bank their money in a school bank, check against it, and go through all the forms of the business world in actual cash. Other private schools in the East are beginning to take up the budget idea, realizing that one of the essentials of education is a knowledge of the value of money and how to use it.

The Government Loan Organization of the Second Federal Reserve District is now advocating budget making of their summer vacation earnings by the students in all public schools, rich and poor alike, no matter whether the child has twenty-five cents or $25 a week. This organization is providing these sheets free and they may be obtained from any postmaster.

Moreover, the Government Loan Organization is striving to induce housewives to run their households on a budget basis. To do this the organization has had printed household budget sheets, which it is distributing through the women's clubs of the Second Federal Reserve District. The Government wants the support of the parents in educating the child.—The Christian Work.

church; therefore he shall not retain the gift, but shall only have claim on that portion that is deeded unto him."—Doctrine and Covenants 51:1.

There are two kinds of documents mentioned here, one, a writing securing a man a portion enough for his family, and their wants and needs, so long as he is a member of the church; in other words, his stewardship. Another is a deed to other property which he can hold whether in the church or out; his inheritance or home.

To sum the matter up, when a man makes his consecration he turns everything over to the church or some one who holds property for the church, with a deed; then the bishop deeds unto him his inheritance or home. This deed will be legal according to the laws of the land, and also shows that he has received his inheritance by consecration; then if he is able to handle a stewardship he is given a stewardship with writing securing it unto him until he transgress, and is not worthy to belong to the church. This writing is not a deed, or he could hold it in spite of the church, whether he belonged to the church or not. There might be some difficulty in carrying out this plan at the present time, but if the city is to be established according to the plan adopted in 1833 (see Church History, volume 1, page 297) where every lot was of equal size, and every man lived in the city, and had a home or inheritance, and all the farm land laid outside the city, and together with all the stores, factories, and business houses belonged to the church, each man could have his stewardship, and work where he could work to the best advantage.

I cannot think of any better way to bring about equality than the Lord's way. If one man has a stewardship worth $100 and another has a stewardship worth $100,000, and they each hold a deed to the same, they can hold it whether they are members of the church or not, and cannot possibly be equal.

The Lord says, "Let those commandments which I have given concerning Zion and her law, be executed and fulfilled, after her redemption." (Doctrine and Covenants 102:10.) Now if Zion has been redeemed it may be time to execute and fulfill those commandments; if Zion has not yet been redeemed, may it not be too soon to attempt fully to put in practice the law of consecration?

The greatest flood of immigrants this country has ever known is pouring into Ellis Island from Europe at the present time. Since early last summer aliens have been coming to America's friendly shores in great numbers.

Unused land which it is expected will not be in use in the immediate future, may now be requisitioned in Austria by national, provincial, or municipal authorities and used as public playgrounds, reports the Children's Bureau at Washington. It will be available for school children and young people above school age.

Campbell tells of a preacher who was consulted by a friend having a mind to publish, "Whether he thought it befitting a writer on religion to attend to such little matters as grammatical correctness," and he answered, "By all means. It is much better to write so as to make a critic turn Christian, than so as to make a Christian turn critic."—Preparation and Delivery of Sermons, by Broadus.

The students of Glasgow College have formed a Society for the Study of the Temperance Act, and for temperance propaganda. Practically every student in the college has joined, owing to the acute sentiment in Scotland over the coming dry election.

During the past week, the council of the League of Nations has ended the war between Poland and Lithuania, the matters at issue being left to the Council for settlement at the consent of both parties. They have also prevented war between Sweden and Finland, the matters at issue there, which were very threatening, also being left to the council for settlement. Sweden has made an expression of complete confidence in the league as a means of preventing future war.

Recently sitting in a small boat upon a mountain lake, with the sheer face of the mountains arising from the very edge of the lake for thousands of feet above us, we thought of that passage of those who at the coming of our Lord will call upon the mountains to fall upon them. How terrible indeed must be the sense of guilt in the presence of that glory, when the souls of men will cry out for so dire a destruction.

AT THE FRONT

FULK-NUTTING DEBATE

Last night was the close of the debate between Brother R. L. Fulk and the Reverend John D. Nutting of the Utah Gospel Mission with headquarters at Cleveland, Ohio, held at Malad City, Idaho, October 9, 10, 11, and 12.

Judging from reports that we have heard from the outside, it was another victory added to the cause of the "Restoration."

The Reverend Nutting with others, who style themselves as the "Wagon missionaries," came to Malad some two weeks ago and opened a series of meetings on the street. It was not long until he began to attack the "Restoration," using the usual weapons of defaming the character of Joseph Smith the Prophet and lavishly plastering "mud" on the whole of the "Restoration."

At first he claimed merely to be presenting some of the great truths of the Bible, but it was not long before his real purpose became apparent. The result of his attack on the "Restoration" was a four-night debate. The Reverend Nutting only wanted to sign up propositions for a one-night debate on the Book of Mormon and Inspired Translation. Brother Fulk tried to get him to sign up propositions for at least ten nights. We finally were able to sign propositions for a four-night debate.

The propositions were the regular church propositions, as follows:

"1. Resolved: That the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints is in harmony with the Bible in origin, organization, doctrine, and practice.

"2. Resolved: That the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational, and similar churches are in harmony with the Bible in origin, organization, doctrine, and practice.

"3. Resolved: That the Book of Mormon is of divine origin and is worthy of the respect and belief of all Christian people.

"4. Resolved: That the Bible is the final, complete, and correct volume of God's revelation to man."

Brother Fulk very ably defended the cause of the "Reorganization" and came off with flying colors. One of the Reverend Nutting's strongest points against the "Restoration" was a big play on Joseph's first vision. His first objection to that was that Joseph saw God. He claimed that it was impossible that any man should see God and live, evidently forgetting the many accounts in the Scriptures where man has seen God face to face as was very forcibly brought out by Brother Fulk in showing where Moses, Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel saw God, as also did the whole camp of Israel. His second objection was that Joseph was alone, so we have no proof that he had a vision. He also defamed the character of Joseph, saying that God would not appear to such a wicked boy. Brother Fulk very nicely answered this objection by showing that God appeared to Moses while he was alone, although Moses had been forced to flee from Egypt for killing a man. His next objection was that God told Joseph that the creeds were all wrong and he insisted on inserting that "their professors" (meaning by that all who professed Christianity) were corrupt. This was also very nicely answered by first correcting him on the word their and showing that it was "those professors," the ones who were quarreling over the converts, and also showing that the creeds were wrong inasmuch as it had been necessary for them to change their beliefs. Another objection was that God would have been foolish in sending the angel to Joseph four times in one night as once would have been sufficient. Brother Fulk answered this by saying according to Mr. Nutting's argument, God would have been very foolish in letting the sheet down for Peter three times in succession to convince him that the gospel should be taken to the Gentiles "as once would have been sufficient."

Brother Fulk brought out many strong points in favor of the "Restoration" which were impossible for the Reverend Nutting to touch.

Sunday evening the debate was held in the opera house, that being the only night we were able to obtain it. The others nights we had the privilege of using the Utah church meeting house. At the opera house we had a record attendance, there being between five and seven hundred present.

Mr. Nutting was supposed to affirm his position, which he failed to do until forced to it. He simply preached a sermon on the teachings of Christ as he interprets them. We were afraid at times that the audience would break into open ridicule at the many times he asserted that he "knew" what he was talking about without producing any evidence. He also asserted that Frederick M. Smith received revelation after revelation on trifling matters and when asked to produce the evidence he stated that it was "two thousand miles away." Brother Fulk denied his assertion by stating that President Smith had received only one official revelation which was published in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants. Finally he affirmed that the sectarian churches or evangelical churches as he called them were in harmony with the Bible in all their teachings, etc., but Brother Fulk showed plainly from the Bible that they were not in harmony in organization, origin, doctrine, and practice, and also showed that they did not know, after two thousand years, what to call their churches, what to teach, or who to admit into the church and above all, admitted that they had lost the Bible and were wanting to get back to Christ as the only means of salvation.

From those who heard the debate Monday evening on the divinity of the Book of Mormon, it was stated by a number, who have heard the defense of the Book of Mormon before, that Brother Fulk made the most able defense that has ever been heard in this part of the country. In his denial, the Reverend Nutting came out very strong in his denunciation of the character of Joseph the Prophet and also his father and mother, using as proof sworn statements of their enemies. This also was nicely refuted by showing that if it were possible for the Devil to enlist false witnesses against Christ that brought about his death, it could also be done in the case of Joseph. He also tried to leave the impression with the people that there was a statement in the Book of Mormon that the whole nation of Lamanites drove all of their cattle every day to one certain lake for water. When asked for the reference, he cited us to page 287 of the Utah edition and when it was sought out, it was proven that it was only the king's cattle and not the cattle of the whole nation. Brother Fulk said that the king might only have had two or three cows for all we know. The Reverend Nutting has not as yet discovered the fact that the theory of the "Spalding Romance" has long since been overthrown.

In the opinion of the congregation the opposition fell flat on every point of his affirmation of the last proposition and also plainly showed his defeat by allowing his anger to get the best of his better judgment. Brother Fulk brought out very clearly that the Bible could not be the final volume of God's revelation to man because it made provisions for the coming forth of another book in the last days. He also showed conclusively that it was not complete nor correct. In spite of the fact that Mr. Nutting stated Sunday evening before the largest congregation we had, that this was his first debate, he stated in his final speech last evening that in all of his debates in the past he had never received such shameful treatment as he had received in this.

Mr. Nutting and his associates during their stay here have endeavored to place in every home a number of tracts among which is one that bitterly attacks "Josephitism." He refused to give Brother Fulk one of these tracts before the debate, but through some of the Saints who had received them, we were able to obtain one or two copies. During the debate Brother Fulk proved the unreliability of the tract time after time by showing clear-cut statements where it falsified and misrepresented the "Reorganization." Brother Fulk also offered to give the Reverend Nutting a chance to prove his statements in this tract for as many nights as he wished to discuss it, but the Reverend Nutting said never a word. We think the exposure of this tract was well worth the debate.

Inasmuch as the Reverend Nutting is of nation-wide fame and has the backing of the leading sectarian churches, we consider the victory more than an ordinary one and believe that good has been accomplished. He is out here for the express purpose of fighting the "Restoration" as is shown by his own writings which were presented during the debate, one of which was published in the Ensign of June 17, 1920. We hear many favorable comments from nonmembers, so we believe we have presented the church to them in a favorable light. Brother Fulk was very ably assisted by Brother Roscoe E. Davey, who acted as his moderator. Ever praying that truth may prevail, I remain, Yours in gospel bonds, FRANCIS W. HOLM.

FORTY-THREE BAPTIZED AT COUNCIL BLUFFS

We have had a glorious time, one that will never fade from memory.

Campaign closed to-night [24th] at 10.45 p. m., there being three baptisms following the closing sermon.

The Club Hall where we have been holding forth was simply thronged. Indeed, take it all in all we have had the biggest attendance from start to finish of the campaign that I have ever experienced.

As for results—well the baptism of forty-three candidates only begins to measure the work really wrought.

Thousands of specially-written tracts setting forth our faith were distributed from house to house which will not fail to continue the good work in their unseen, unostentatious way. Toward the close of campaign, C. E. Blair, the book man, was on hand unloading his gospel goods in a land-office way that must have brought courage to his heart. This is what counts—the placing of our literature in the homes of the people which ever and anon with the passing of the years will reveal its charm and effect its purpose.

In addition to this, it was gratifying to note the spiritual development among the Saints. After all there is nothing so interesting or refreshing as the gospel—the plain unvarnished, untarnished story of the long ago.

An incident of unusual interest may be noted. The campaign had pushed along for the seventh week, and I was thinking seriously of closing up. Asking for instruction from Him who knoweth all things, I came downstairs in a quandary as to what I should do. In a few minutes one of the neighboring Saints—Sister May Skinner—dropped in. She, without knowing of the prayer or my serious intention of closing, proceeded to relate a dream one of her little girls had received in the early days of the campaign. It was to the effect that the campaign would be conducted in two localities of the city, and that each would be successful unto the ingathering of souls.

True to the inspiration we had indeed conducted our services in two places, since upon taking down the gospel tent we engaged the Club Hall, some eight or ten blocks distant from the tent grounds. Now we had baptized some thirty as a result of the tent meetings, and at the time of Sister Skinner's relation of the dream, we had obtained no results from our efforts at Club Hall, although we had occupied some little time.

The sister, therefore, urged that I tarry longer. The dream and visitation coming so directly in answer to prayer, I accordingly complied with its instruction to be rewarded by some thirteen baptisms the following week.

Well, we're all happy, and why not? You should see the way our Saints worked. Distribution of literature and personal visitations, together with daily prayers, was the order of the day.

The financial contributions were splendid, answering every call that was made. To show you an instance of the generosity of this people, let me relate: A delegation waited upon the branch authorities asking that we surrender the hall for an evening that a charity dance might be held for the benefit of an old lady. Instead of treating them indignantly, as was their deserving for such disrespectful insolence, the branch took up a collection amounting to more than $20, passing it on to the old lady.

Things are working beautifully here in the Bluffs. The gospel leaven is at work, and God willing, I am coming back in January to resume my efforts.

And now for a little rest before opening up a big campaign in Des Moines. Strenuous life this, but awfully interesting.
Sincerely,
DANIEL MACGREGOR.

AT WORK IN WESTERN IOWA

Having been appointed this year to labor in Pottawattamie District, in Western Iowa, I accordingly made preparation to enter my field at once.

I left Flint, Michigan, on the night of June 27, there being about fifty young people of our faith assembled at the depot. Brother M. W. Liston, the city missionary, was there and led the singing, in which all joined. The train pulled in, and I bade them all good-by and started for my field of labor. I was accompanied as far as Chicago by Brother Raleigh Hutchins, formerly of Flint, Michigan, but now residing in Independence, Missouri.

I arrived in Council Bluffs, went to the home of Brother Orman Salisbury, had a short visit with him and family, then I took the train for McClelland, where Brother J. E. Vanderwood was holding tent meetings. The second night after I arrived here it was my night to preach, and it was the second time for me to talk in a tent, but God blessed my effort. Brother Vanderwood and I labored with the tent about six weeks and had the pleasure of leading six precious souls into the kingdom.

August 13 to 23 had the privilege of attending the Council Bluffs reunion after which I went to Carson and held meetings for one month, baptizing four.

By request of Saints I came back to McClelland where I am now laboring. Last Sunday I again had the pleasure of adding four more to our number, others being interested. Sunday the 17th Brother and Sister William Scott and daughter, and myself autoed to Underwood, at which place Elder Daniel Macgregor delivered a special talk on the need of a General Conference auditorium, which could not help but appeal to all who have a desire to assist in the cause of Christ.

Since coming to this State God has wonderfully blessed me in my efforts, and my only desire is to advance the gospel of Christ.

Sincerely, your brother,

C. W. MORGAN.

BISHOP BULLARD RETURNS TO STATES

After four months of work in the great northwest of Canada I have crossed the line and am again under the Stars and Stripes of the United States.

I have visited the three provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba, comprising this vast territory. I found it a country of strenuous life; of wheat, barley, oats, flax, mosquitoes, prairie chickens, gophers, and cattle, hay and Russian thistle.

The topography of the country is varied: there are miles and miles of flat country. Much of this abounds in marshy ponds, and many lakes. There are also thousands of hills, which make travel by auto very rough, and numerous are the sore spots after one of these long rides, for this is a land of long distances.

Those who have traveled with Brethren T. J. Jordan and "Bud" Bergersen can testify to speed and bumps, but an ever willingness to convey ye missionary to wherever he may be called to labor, within a hundred or two hundred miles from their homes.

I have received every needed kindness from the Saints among whom I have labored, and all necessary wants and needs have been generously supplied.

Conditions in many branches are not as satisfactory as we wished to find them; some division has resulted in a lack of spiritual life, and unwise statements of some who have labored among the Saints have not contributed to spiritual healthfulness. We hope this will be discontinued and a more constructive work accomplished. There are, however, many true and loyal Saints there; these are anxiously looking for the time when they will be privileged to gather in the places organized for their reception.

Many of the farmers among our people have passed through years of crop shortage and are "up against it," and some will require financial help. It is almost heartbreaking to the toiler who has plowed, planted, cultivated, and waited, year after year, and the returns not sufficient to pay for the seed. Others have been successful and have done well.

This may be the means of turning the attention and desires of the Saints Zionward, with a greater effort to sanctify their lives for this purpose.

I take this opportunity to express my thanks to the Saints who have manifested unstinted hospitality and kindness to me, and may our heavenly Father reward them for this. May our united efforts in righteousness bring to us speedily, Zion's redemption.

Your brother in Christ,

RICHARD BULLARD.

DOOLEY, MONTANA.

SIX BAPTIZED

The first week of September I started a series of services at Providence Bay and continued for about twenty-five days with an excellent interest and attendance.

I feel that the Saints were strengthened, much prejudice broken down, and many of the nonmembers started to thinking and reading the Bible. Many favorable comments were heard in behalf of the work. One fine young man was baptized.

Upon closing the services in the village I went out in the country about five miles and held forth for a week in the Kay Schoolhouse.

While there an entire family of six were baptized. All were formerly Baptists. They will develop into fine Saints. It made my heart glad to see a family so united.

Surely the Lord is working with the honest in heart.

I closed up missionary work with a view to entering into the special campaign but have not been notified of what I should do or where I should work so I will just start at missionary work again and after two weeks will return to the Kay Schoolhouse.

In bonds,

J. H. YAGER.

There is no two-cent postal rate between the United States and Continental Europe and when a person in this country writes a letter to anyone overseas (except the British Isles) there must be put on the envelope a five-cent stamp if it is desired that the missive be delivered promptly and without great inconvenience to the person to whom it is addressed.

"The Mail Department of the American Red Cross Headquarters in Paris has been greatly embarrassed recently," says an official communication just received in Washington, "by the large number of letters which come from the United States bearing insufficient postage. The French postal authorities collect double the amount of unpaid postage, but the worst of it is the long delay in delivery. Frequently these letters come to us, via Coblenz, whither they are sent in the American army mails. This often means a delay of four to six weeks in the arrival of personal letters intended for American Red Cross workers in outlying commissions."

Brother Albert Sackfield, Coal Valley, Illinois, is seeking a position as manager, superintendent, or examiner, of a coal mine and would like to locate among Saints. Is a married man and holds office of teacher.

The students of Graceland College, according to a recent announcement in Graceland Record, are planning to issue a better Acacia this year than ever before. Enough subscriptions were taken to insure its success.

The motion pictures shown in the church park at Lamoni during the summer season are being continued now at the chapel in Graceland College on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon. There are no charges, and so far voluntary contributions have been sufficient to maintain a good program once a week.

Some Pertinent Questions From Jerusalem

What Would You Do If—

You were in a country where factories were reduced to a minimum, where more than half of the people were out of work, and would take jobs for almost any kind of pay, and you were a member of one of the sectarian churches, and that church owned some stores, and you were a clerk in one of these stores, and you believed the gospel as taught by Latter Day Saints, and you knew if you obeyed you would lose your job and be out of work? What would you do if you were placed in this peculiar predicament?

What would you do if you were a Latter Day Saint missionary, and an intelligent man sixty-five years of age investigated the gospel and after he had studied it considerably, and prayed about it much, and came to the conclusion that it was his duty to obey, and he came to you and told you just exactly how he was situated, which means "it's up to you"? What would you do?

The gentleman mentioned above is of Jewish descent, a preacher in one of the churches at Jerusalem. He speaks German, Jargon, Arabic, Hebrew, and Turkish, is a very humble man, and would be a credit to the church. When he submitted our literature to several preachers in Jerusalem, they canvassed it carefully and approved many things we taught, but decided that they would not believe that an angel appeared to Joseph Smith in these latter days. Some of these gentlemen with the long black coats tried hard to poison the mind of our investigator; they told him that each of us had seven wives, and if he joined us he would be compelled to establish a harem. All these wonderful tales did not affect him. The seed had been sown, the ground was good, and it did germinate. If we accept this gentleman it will mean that he will be discharged at once, and be without income. Then it would be our duty to give this man work so that he may support himself. At present we are not in a position to do this, but if we intend to do successful missionary work in Jerusalem we must sooner or later open a manufacturing establishment of some kind so as to give work to the people that are as unfortunate as this gentleman.

To refuse to baptize a man that believes our work with all his heart, because he is poor, and will be thrown into a position of need, seems to me is something like the priest and Levite who took the other side, when they saw the unfortunate man lying by the wayside. To help him meant to assume responsibility, to take the other side meant to evade it. If we are compelled to evade doing our duty, it will be because the church is not able to finance a project like the above, and if the church does not finance it, it is because some of the members are not doing their duty financially, and these will be held accountable in the day of judgment, because men like the above were not able to join God's church and bask in the sunlight of the restored gospel. The above-mentioned gentleman has been a student of both the Old and New Testament for the past twenty years and is well versed in the Bible.

Nearly all the missions here furnish material aid to the poor among their members, and in some instances all are poor. Some missions donate rooms for their members to live in, some give them a monthly allowance, and some give them work. I believe this is the best way to help people, "Help them to help themselves." Some people call this buying your converts, but I don't agree with this accusation. The material aid given to the poor, is the most essential thing done by the various churches. When Jesus said, "The poor you have always with you," it is very evident that he was in Palestine, for we certainly have the poor with us.

Another gentleman of Jewish descent, about fifty years old, has asked for baptism, also a young man about nineteen. Our plan is to have President F. M. Smith baptize these people in the Jordan when he arrives in Jerusalem.

The gentleman sixty-five years old spent considerable time studying our literature, praying to God for light. God has answered his prayer, and he writes me the following letter:

"My Dear Brother: I will let you know that the Lord has opened for me an open door. Praised be his name. We read in the Proverbs of Solomon that the Lord will make the upright man happy. When Saint Peter was in prison, there was an angel who took him out and gave him freedom. So must Peter notice that the Lord had given him his freedom again and eyes to see. And I too see with opened eyes that the Lord has also me saved from Satan's kingdom, and he has given me an open door for the kingdom of God. Hitherto I have been walking in the darkness without to know anything better. I have spent all my years in the darkness. But I cannot get these years any more; they are already gone away. But still it is not too late to fight a good fight.

"The God be praised forever, and I have a strong conviction that I can trust the Lord, that he will lead me on the right way. I am full of gladness. I cannot express my words I am so glad, and I wait with a glad heart that my other brothers shall come and take me to them. I wait with all my heart every second, minute, hour, and day that it will soon happen. The Lord will help that it will soon be fulfilled. [I asked him to wait until Frederick M. Smith and T. W. Williams come, and then he can be baptized. This is what he refers to. H. Passman.] I send you my greetings and I kiss you with the holy kiss."

Now in the multitude of counsel there is wisdom, so I am going to ask you who are interested to sit down and write me a letter telling me what you would do, under the present conditions. Be sure to put a five-cent stamp on your letter, and address it to Elder Harry Passman, Box 417, Jerusalem, Palestine. We solicit your prayers in the interest of God's work here in Palestine.

Your brother of like faith,

HARRY PASSMAN.

Echoes From Maine

The conference of the Eastern Maine District convened at Jonesport October 16 and 17, with Elder W. C. Smith, vice president of the district, in charge. Elder Orval L. Thompson was chosen to preside, a place that he had never occupied, but he proved himself equal to the task with the assistance of Elder Newman Wilson, secretary of the district. The business was promptly attended to in peace and harmony.

We were disappointed (especially our two missionaries) in not having Elders A. B. Phillips and R. D. Baldwin of Boston with us, but the saying, "Man's extremity is God's opportunity," proved true in this case. The two young elders arose to the occasion of the hour. God abundantly blessed them with his Spirit, and they proved themselves "workmen that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth, and giving to every man his portion of meat in due season." The church was packed from Saturday night until the close, with earnest and interested audiences.

The district was well represented, it being the largest conference and in some respects the best, ever held in the district. The music was inspiring under the leadership of our district chorister, Brother Herbert Rogers, and district organist, Sister Cora Rogers, who have faithfully served in this capacity for several years.

On Sunday afternoon a large throng repaired to our usual place of baptism where Elder Orval Thompson baptized six precious souls, all heads of families except one. Three are residents of Millbridge where he has opened up the work with good success. Since June there have been thirty-three added to the church in this district. The missionaries of the past have labored in the district sowing the gospel seed and some has fallen on good ground, and is bringing forth fruit. As it is written, "Paul may plant, Apollus water, but God giveth the increase." The time is here when the honest in heart are being gathered into the fold.

From March until the arrival of our present missionary, in June, Elder Newman Wilson filled the vacancy in our district which resulted in edification and spiritual uplift to the Saints, and an awakening of nonmembers which resulted in his baptizing of seven of the thirty-three. We would have been satisfied to have had him continue in this mission but "the powers that be" saw fit to appoint him to Western Maine District and we had to submit.

During the interval we were anxiously and earnestly pleading with God to send us a laborer of his appointment, and we have every reason to believe he answered our petitions in sending from far-away Michigan, Elder Orval L. Thompson, a young man who is fully consecrated and devoted to the Master's service. Since coming here he has not ceased to labor among us, and we are all striving to the best of our ability to have Eastern Maine do its part in filling the quota of the twenty thousand converts called for, with their faces Zionward. But Maine is an extensive territory, and it does seem that with only two missionaries and but little local help, that it will be slow work to reach the many places where the gospel has not been heard.

In accordance with the request of the church, regarding the need of an auditorium and the duty of the Saints, a discourse was duly set forth Sunday at eleven o'clock in strong terms, by Elder Thompson. The pledge cards were distributed, but it is not my mission to report, yet the Bishop may be surprised later on.

We were somewhat saddened through the conference in the thought that a familiar face and tenor voice were being seen and heard in our choir for the last time in our branch and district, in the person of Elder William C. Smith who with his family are about to depart for Independence, Missouri. He and Sister Smith have been earnest, faithful workers in church and Sunday school work for a number of years. He has been superintendent of our large Sunday school where he will be greatly missed. However, knowing their object in going, we feel to say that our loss will be their gain, and we bid them Godspeed and wish them success in all of their undertakings.

During the month of September we were much pleased with a visit from Brother Ernest Wilson who left us thirteen years ago settling in Kirtland, Ohio. He was a young boy when he came into the church, but with his physical growth he has also grown spiritually, and is a member of the priesthood, well established in the faith, and a worker in the church. While here he had the privilege of baptizing his aunt, Mrs. Emma Hinkley, who is now rejoicing in the hope that the gospel affords to all who obey it in sincerity.

In closing, let me say to the Saints of this district, Be diligent and faithful in the Master's service. We have been called into this work by the Spirit of the living God, and he calls for our united efforts in helping to get the restored gospel before the people, therefore, "Let us work while the day lasts, for the night cometh when no man can work."

"If you have not gold nor silver,
Ever ready to command,
If you cannot toward the needy
Reach an ever open hand,
You can visit the afflicted,
O'er the weeping you can weep,
You can be a true disciple
Sitting at your Master's feet.

"Do not then stand idly waiting,
For some greater work to do,
Fortune is a lazy goddess,
She will never come to you.
Go and toil in any vineyard,
Do not fear to do or dare,
If you want a field of labor
You can find it anywhere."

MRS. E. M. WALKER,
Chairman Press Committee.

JONESPORT, MAINE.

Any Saint living in Peekskill, New York, or thereabouts, is requested to write to or call on Brother J. A. Jack and family, 710 Loomis Avenue, Peekskill, New York.

Eastern Iowa

Just a few lines to let you know that we are still engaged in God's work, in this portion of his moral vineyard.

In the past few weeks God has wonderfully blessed his Saints here with the spirit of consecration. There seems to be that spirit of willingness to do, that has been lacking before, and many have proven that when the opportunity was granted them, they were earnestly in the work, and that their consecration was with a willingness to help make the work better and greater.

It is good to know that we all can have a part in the building and establishing of Zion.

Sunday the 24th was the closing day of the Eastern Iowa district conference at this place, and surely God blessed his children with the outpouring of his Spirit and also the spirit of prophecy was made manifest through Elder Amos Berve.

Tears of joy and gratitude were seen on the faces of most all present, and even those not of the faith felt the hallowed influence of God's divine Spirit and confessed that surely this was God's work in these the latter days.

The different departments of the church in this district are all working under the coordinating plan, which seems to be the best method of working out our problems, and to unite us together while working for that one high standard.

Surely we all have been offered a wonderful opportunity, to help and sacrifice, therefore even as God has given unto us we should show our appreciation, and render unto God justice for the justice we have received of him.

We have often talked, sung, and prayed about Zion, and now surely it is a reality. When we can give financially to help build that which we have hoped for so long, we might think of it as a dream that has really come to pass, although in its infancy yet.

May God bless all those that have that desire to build and to rally to the standard until we shall reap the fruits of our labors and be blessed with an inheritance in Zion.

In gospel bonds,

C. A. BEIL, Local Pastor.

Eastern Michigan

The conference of the Eastern Michigan District convened at Sandusky, October 9. Apostle J. A. Gillen presided. Reports showed that the district was rapidly progressing.

Brother W. H. Sheffer was sustained for another year as president of the district. After the Sunday morning prayer service Brother M. W. Liston of Flint was the speaker in the theater and Brother William Grice spoke at the church to a full house at the same hour.

At 2:30 Apostle Gillen was the speaker, his inspiring talk being enjoyed by all.

Brother William Fligg was the speaker on Saturday and Sunday evenings in the theater. When the conference closed we all realized more fully the importance of the wonderful work in which we were engaged.

Good News From Toronto

(Letter of G. E. Harrington, Toronto, Ontario, to First Presidency, October 11, 1920.)

At the Toronto district conference, a budget was made and approved of: $730 for district officers' expenses, $100 of which was placed at the disposal of the district presidency for the expenses of local ministers called upon to travel and help the branches of the district.

The district musical director was allowed $75 for use in his work, the secretary, $40; $35 was added for expense of winter institute.

The Bishop's report for the last year shows a gain in tithes and offerings of about $5,000 over the previous year. Added to this there was raised (during the Sunday afternoon meeting of conference) over $3,000 for the new auditorium, making the subscription of the Toronto District about one half of the allotment asked for by the Bishop, and the drive not on.

A fine spiritual prayer meeting was held in the morning. Elders J. F. Curtis, J. R. Grice, and the writer were the speakers on Sunday, Bishop McLean making the appeal for the auditorium assisted by J. F. Curtis who did a good work.

We held two priesthood meetings, Brethren Curtis, Grice, and myself making addresses. At the last meeting I presented the system of reporting that I had developed for record and use. A large number were present and good interest shown.

Utah and Southern Idaho District Conference

The three-day session of the semiannual conference of the Utah and Southern Idaho District closed Sunday, October 17. Though the weather was very unfavorable there was a good attendance at all the services.

The theme of the conference was "Preparation for Zion," and all responded to their part of the program.

The conference opened Friday afternoon with a health talk by M. A. Etzenhouser, and a paper on the "Need of more sociability," by Mrs. R. E. Davey, followed by a priesthood meeting and a conference of the Women's Department. In the evening we were favored with a lecture by Mrs. M. A. Etzenhouser on, "Jesus, the ideal teacher," followed by an illustrated lecture on church history and scenes from Nauvoo, by R. L. Fulk.

Saturday was given over to business of the district. Some over sixteen hundred dollars was raised toward the erection of the new auditorium, which speaks very well for this district. An address on, "Education for Zion," by R. E. Davey; a talk by L. G. Holloway about our "Church publications," and a reading by Mrs. E. E. Richards constituted the evening program.

The Sunday services began with a young people's prayer meeting, followed by Sunday school, and then a general prayer service. In the afternoon L. G. Holloway spoke on, "Building up Zion." At the same time baptismal services were conducted by R. L. Fulk, four new members being brought into the fold. At seven o'clock a confirmation and ordination meeting was held, followed by a sermon by F. A. Russell.

We were favored throughout the conference with numerous musical selections by our local talent, Brother Russell helping by acting as chorister.

Ever praying for the onward progress of Zion,

Your brother,

ROSCOE E. DAVEY.

Conference at Old Nauvoo

The first conference held at Nauvoo in the history of the Reorganization closed last Sunday night, October 24, and such a grand time in this old historical spot. It was truly a feast for the Saints of the district. A good Spirit was present from the beginning, and everyone went home with a greater determination to do more for the Master than ever before. The Lord is building up Zion and her stakes, and he has again set his hand to establish the work here. It causes the Saints of this district to rejoice to see the advancement that is being made here, for they have looked forward to this for many years. Brother G. T. Griffiths, that kind and wise man—sometimes I think he should be called Gomer the Beloved, for his ways make me think of that good Apostle John who walked with Christ and learned the lessons of love and wisdom—was in charge, associated with the district presidency.

The first service, Friday evening, was in the nature of an entertainment and departmental institute work, in charge of Sister Ethel Lacey. The Boy Scout orchestra of Fort Madison, under the direction of D. J. Williams, furnished the music. A paper was read by Sister Williams, talk by Sister Lacey, the closing remarks were made by Brother Griffiths in which he gave some wise advice. He said the Lord was using the youth of the church for his work just as fast as they would qualify themselves for such work. And that he is in need of young people now for his work. So we should qualify ourselves to be ready for such services. This is the purpose of the departments of the church, to thus train our young.

Saturday morning there was prayer meeting at 9.30, after which the day was devoted to the regular church and departmental business of the district. At the evening service Brother Griffiths was the speaker, and was blessed with good liberty and fine attention; quite a number of outsiders were present. Sunday morning Sunday school in charge of district officers assisted by our local superintendent; Brother McKeirnan was the morning speaker.

At 2.30 p. m. the Saints gathered at the church and such a grand prayer meeting! The Spirit was present in mighty power and gave words of comfort and admonition. This was the best meeting of the conference. If only those who have passed on to their reward could know about the work taking on new life at this place! I am glad that I have been permitted to see the work being again established here. And I am glad that the Saints of the whole church are so interested in the future of this place.

We have a very beautiful church in which to meet, all our own, and we have six families of good, faithful Saints who are devoted to the work and always ready to do their part. And such good spiritual prayer meeting and preaching services as they have, for the Father above remembers his work that was done here so long ago by those faithful Saints who are sleeping over there by the "Homestead" on the green hillside, and many more on the slope of the hill at Chandler Creek. The prayers that they offered then are now being answered, for the Lord is remembering Zion and he is building up the waste places in his own time and manner.

There is always a good spirit here that is restful to the body and soul; even those not of our faith remark, "What a sweet, peaceful place," "I would love to live here always for it is so quiet and peaceful," and many remarks of like nature. It is the Spirit of the Master, but they that are of the world do not recognize it as such.

We have had many visitors here this summer, coming from all parts of the country. They desire to know what we teach and the main difference between us and the Utah church. We also have many visitors from the Utah people and we always treat them kindly, and we hope some day they will see the error of their ways and return to the true church.

Our district in general is taking on new life and the Saints are living better than they did years ago. This is very encouraging. We are just closing our district General Conference auditorium drive and we went over the top before the first Sunday was past, with more to come.

Our next reunion will be held at Nauvoo for ten days closing the last Sunday in August. Come and spend your vacation with us, and enjoy a visit to this lovely spot that is so dear to the hearts of all Latter Day Saints the world over.

One feature of our conference which I failed to mention was that we took our meals all at the Nauvoo House. We were as one family at mealtime and such good times we had visiting with each other. Many of us thought of Sister Vida Smith and wished she were here to enjoy this home gathering of old friends and loved ones.

Brother Griffiths was the Sunday evening speaker and was again blessed in his efforts to a marked degree. He rested with us over Monday and this (Tuesday) morning went on his way to Ohio to be of comfort and encouragement to others who may need it. So closed the first conference in Nauvoo in her own church house in the history of Nauvoo.

P. R. BURTON.

The girls rooming at the three dormitories at Graceland have organized a house organization this year, under the direct sponsorship of Vida E. Smith, dean of women. The officers are: President, Bessie Soderstein, Patroness; vice president, Ruth Juergens, Marietta; secretary, Addie Belle Chapelle, Patroness; treasurer, Ava Quitmeyer, Arbor Villa.

Good Results in Far West Stake

(From letter of R. S. Budd, Cameron, Missouri, October 12, 1920.)

Our late conference [of Far West Stake] was well attended and caused the town people [of Cameron] to take notice. Sunday morning Apostle Greene spoke in the theater, and our afternoon and evening services were in the Christian church. There were about six hundred present in the morning and more in the afternoon, Brother Greene preached a wonderful sermon which caused much comment even among the outsiders. One outsider told me yesterday he had been to the theater many times but the feeling when he stepped in Sunday morning was different from anything he had ever witnessed before. He said it was just like coming into a nice warm room from outside on a cold winter day, and continued that he had been told by others that they had witnessed the same while attending Latter Day Saint meetings and asked me to explain why it was. Of course I explained it in the usual way. His explanation was that our ministers are really sincere and concerned with the message they are delivering and also are really expecting it to do the good we claim for it. The Christian Church Board would not accept pay for their building.

Providence, Rhode Island

The work in this branch is moving along. Elder Edmund J. Gleazer is now located here, and the missionary work is receiving considerable attention.

The big event engaging our attention in the immediate past was a series of theater meetings in Danielson, Connecticut, about twenty-five miles from Providence.

During the past several months Herbert Johnson and others of the local priesthood have been holding services in East Killingly, adjacent to Danielson, where we have about twenty members.

Through the efforts of Brother George Gates we secured the use of the principal theater in Danielson for every Sunday in October at only a nominal cost.

The widest possible publicity was given to our work and in our advertising it is safe to say that the name and claims of our church were placed before thousands of people.

Opposition was not absent. As a result of some opposition, Brother Gleazer had the opportunity of calling twice (once with Elder C. Edward Miller) at the home of one of the leading clergymen of the town, and presenting him with a Book of Mormon, upon his request.

The meetings were well supported by the Saints of Providence, New London, and East Killingly. The Providence choir attended all the services in a body, making the trip in trucks and private machines of the Providence Saints.

As a part of our advertising campaign, the automobiles paraded through the streets of the town bearing large oil-cloth signs with phrases relating to the distinctive features of our work.

The first two Sundays Brother Miller gave illustrated lectures on his missionary travels in Australia and Society Islands, and was followed by Brother Gleazer with a forceful gospel sermon. The third Sunday only Brother Gleazer spoke.

Pursuant to the requests of the general church, the remaining engagements have been canceled but we hope to resume meetings there possibly in a hall and become established on a permanent basis.

Nearly one hundred nonmembers were present the first Sunday; fewer the other two weeks.

Brother Gleazer is also directing meetings in New London, Connecticut, and Westerly, Rhode Island, and reports a splendid interest, with several investigating the gospel in both places.

The reputation of the Massachusetts District was well sustained last Wednesday when the team representing the auditorium fund came here. With an assigned quota of $4,900, the pledges in one evening were $10,877 and still going strong.

May our treasures follow our hearts in this big latter-day work.
H. A. CHELLINE.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINNESOTA, October 20, 1920.

Editors Herald: The Minneapolis Branch ushered in the drive for the auditorium fund with a reception and surprise party Monday evening, (October 18, at the church) on Brother and Sister Henry Sparling, as a token of love and appreciation to them for their ministrations to us while here.

Sister Frederick Green was the moving spirit in planning and executing the reception, being ably assisted by such other sisters as in her opinion could devote the time to the work.

Brother James Spargo, our choir master, made a very splendid presentation speech, presenting Brother Sparling an overcoat, and a purse of $60, after which all present listened to a very nice talk from Brother Sparling, followed by a profusion of refreshments served in the basement.

After refreshments everyone joined in an hour or more of social visiting, during which time the auditorium committee of four were busy signing up pledges.

The social spirit was at very high pitch, and we feel assured of the results of the drive. All present, we are sure, thoroughly enjoyed themselves, and Sister Green and the ladies assisting her are deserving of a vote of thanks for the splendid manner in which all details were cared for.

MONTGOMERY CREEK, CALIFORNIA, October 11, 1920.

Editors Herald: During the month of September I held a series of services in the Saints' church of Anderson. I herewith inclose copies of the bills issued in advertising them. The Anderson meetings continued a week longer than the bill indicates. The Baptists of that place have tendered me the use of their church for a future series. There was a good response at both places considering the very busy season.

Began a series of services here (which is a new place) yesterday. Will continue until Sunday the 17th. Came here with Brother Ed. Hinton. He and Sister Hinton and their excellent family were my backers at Anderson where they have their residence, and are exerting an influence for good.

Am on my way to Modoc County to pay a long intended and promised visit. Will spend more than a month among and near the Saints who formerly constituted the Lookout Mountain or Mountain Home Branch. Will reach Adin the 18th and Merrill, Oregon, (where some of these Saints now reside) about November 1.

With kindest regards, I am

Your brother in Christ,

ALMA C. BARMORE.

OMAHA, NEBRASKA, October 12, 1920.

Editors Herald: I wonder if many of the letters in HERALD and Ensign interest others as they so often interest me. It gives us an opportunity to become acquainted with the joys and sorrows of our brothers and sisters, for as a great family of a heavenly Parent, we should have a feeling of fellowship, of sisterly and brotherly love, for if one member suffers, does not the body also suffer, and vice versa; if they are made glad, we too should be happy in the thought that joy has come to others. I believe as brothers and sisters we should try to be interested in each other's welfare.

The past five weeks it has been my privilege to be with Sister Rose Adams who has been operated on for cataract, at Saint Kathryn's Hospital. Many of the Saints have been and are interested in Sister Adams's affliction. She is doing nicely, but it has been a very slow process of healing, inflammation having caused us a great deal of concern; but through the entire ordeal Sister Rose has always shown a patient, smiling countenance.

Having been a daily visitor at her bedside, it has afforded me opportunity to see much suffering, some bearing it patiently, while others grow fretful. It makes us feel very grateful that we are blessed with a goodly portion of health and strength, and helps us to appreciate more the blessings of God.

Through all our afflictions, we have much to be thankful for. Of all people we are most blessed. We have that food which thousands are starving for—the gospel.

After returning home the other evening, and thinking over the many things I had both seen and heard in the past few weeks, I felt impressed to write a few lines of verse:

Down the quivering pathway, weary toilers tread,
Burdens heavy, steps will falter, lower bows the head.

Sorrows come, not one, but many,

Trials everywhere,

Heartaches, throbbings, ev'ry pulse beat

Brings agony, despair.

Will the path ne'er have an ending? Can there be no rest?
Is there no home, place of shelter to abide a guest?

Now the path leads up a hillside,

The toilsome climb ahead;

What will meet us at the hill crest?

Our souls are filled with dread.

Is it more pain, woe, and sorrow? No, a light is seen afar,
'Tis glimmering, growing brighter, brighter, a glorious beac'- ning star.

With outstretched arms, and faces happier,

Follow we this heavenly guide;

'Tis the star, the glorious emblem

Of him who bled and died

On Calvary's cross, that we might live, and thus salvation find.

'Twas he our heavy burdens bore; 'tis he who leads the blind.

Ah! though our sufferings may be many,

To bear them we must try,

Instead of groaning, there be singing,

And smiles, without a sigh.

Oh, yes, 'tis trials that make us pure,

Keep valiantly ahead,

And praise thy God, Jehovah, bless him,

Glad tidings ever spread.

OLLIE DERRY.

FLINT, MICHIGAN, October 5, 1920.

Editors Herald: The work here is growing steadily, not only in numbers but in spirituality. Almost every Sunday sees one or more added to the fold. We are trying to do our part towards the goal set by our leaders and we must make it our duty to see that the faces of our converts are Zionward. We have a membership in the city of over six hundred but what is that in a city of 100,000? The priests and the teachers of the three branches have combined their forces, each under the guidance of a director. The visiting work of the city is pooled, and each priest is given a list of names which he is to visit within the month in company with another priest designated by the director. By this means each priest will not only visit those of his own branch but also those of the other two branches. This cannot help but result in a unification of the three branches and is a long step towards the time when we will have one church in Flint. The lives of the Saints now as never before are more powerful factors than the spoken word can ever be, although we in Flint do not suffer for the want of powerful preaching.

Only last night we had with us Apostle James A. Gillen who illustrated to us the functions of the principles and ordinances of the gospel by likening them to a bridge. We do not build a bridge for an ornament, but we use it when it is finished to cross over to the other side, in other words it is merely a means to an end. So, the principles and ordinances of the gospel are not by any means the gospel itself, but only a means to an end, and that end the salvation of the human family. He also spoke of the changes which are going on in the church, showing that they are changes in methods only, that the principles of the gospel cannot be changed but the methods of applying those principles must necessarily undergo a change. He likened the changes in methods to the changes which have taken place in agriculture. There was a time when men prepared the ground with a spade, then came the plow, and now the tractor, yet the principles necessary to the growing of corn have not and cannot be changed. The only change is in the method.

When will we Saints come to the realization that the work of God can progress without us and that we must keep pace with it if we would not be like the "foolish virgins" who had to go and buy oil for their lamps after the Master came? Let us then apply to our lives not only the first principles but also the secondary virtues, that we may appreciate the blessings which come from a close walk with our heavenly Father.

A. H. DU ROSE, Branch Correspondent.

2716 South Saginaw Street.

ATTLEBORO, MASSACHUSETTS, October 5, 1920.

Editors Herald: Not having seen anything in the HERALD regarding the work in Attleboro I feel it would be well to tell of some of the doings of the Saints here and to show that Attleboro is "on the map."

We are a branch of one hundred and sixteen members, but, like other branches, not all are active. But we not only have a good percentage of live, active, and earnest Saints, but we have an exceptional band of devoted young people. A choir of about twenty voices (all young people) sing every Sunday under the leadership of Brother John P. Pilling and their singing would do justice to any of the large churches in the city. From the first of the year they have been rehearsing the operetta, "The merry milkmaids," and on September 16 and 17 it was successfully given. On the 19th Brother Richard Baldwin opened a two weeks' series of evangelical services, and in spite of the hard work done, the choir was out every night in the week and their singing was a wonderful help, which Brother Baldwin appreciated.

Much advertising was done before the services and each night during the two weeks articles regarding the meetings were printed in the paper. To say the meetings were a success is putting it mildly, and anyone who has heard our patriarch, Brother Richard Baldwin, speak knows they were a success.

His sermons were powerful and inspiring and each night the audience grew larger and larger until the church was full. I believe if he could have stayed longer we would have had to bring in more seats. One brother who has known the work for many years but who never felt inclined to be baptized, could not resist the invincible arguments and the strong appeals which were made, and he asked for baptism. Several others are ready for baptism and many others are investigating the work. All this has happened in two weeks. And more than this, a wonderful influence has gone out all over the city through these services and a great many people know us better than they ever did before.

Brother Baldwin has won a place in our hearts that is lasting, and as Saints we have been built up, and our souls have been fed by the words he has spoken to us. We long for the time when he can come again, for we feel sure that he will reap the fruit of his labors when he returns. The effect has been far-reaching and we wonder what the end will be. We often wish that the church had seen it clear to send a man such as he to remain here instead of leaving us to ourselves. Not that we complain as we know the laborers are few, but our spirits are burdened when we see so many who are honest in heart and what can be accomplished here, as these meetings have shown. But we are powerless to reach them to any extent without the necessary help, and as the Lord has told us, let us pray that he may send more laborers into the vineyard. The Saints stood loyally by Brother Baldwin every night and were sorry when the series was over.

Attleboro is growing both spiritually and numerically. There is a spirit of unity which everyone who comes here admires and which has been our greatest asset. We have never had any friction in the branch since it was organized in 1904. God has blessed us wonderfully not only in spiritual blessings but temporally and physically. All our "boys" who went to war were returned to us, one being nearly five years in the service with the British army in Macedonia, France, Belgium, and Italy. We were spared from the death-dealing influenza, only one being afflicted unto death, the others being blessed through administration. We have no poor among us, which is another evidence of God's blessing. Why should we not rejoice as we do? Why should we not strive to be loyal to One who is so mindful of us? Our hearts are glad to see the gospel spreading and the Spirit of God leading the honest in heart toward the truth.

May the same Spirit lead his children to a more consecrated life; may it create within us new interest in his work, new desires to be of service, and as an inevitable result there will come greater faith, greater hope, and more abundant joy.

There is no greater joy than in service, no greater happiness than in communion with God and in the association of his Saints. Let us watch, fight, and pray, and with our eyes Zionward let us seek to build up the kingdom of God and to establish his righteousness in our own hearts and in the hearts of our friends and associates.

Yours in the faith, EARLE R. BRADSHAW.

CALGARY, ALBERTA, October 3, 1920.

Editors Herald: All Saints in the Alberta District are asked to center their thoughts on December 3, 4, and 5, which are the dates of our winter conference to be held at Edmonton. A feast of good things is promised, one outstanding feature being the district choir now being organized by our choir leader, Sister Ruth Osler. Now come, and bring with you the spirit of love, that we all can consecrate those few days with one central idea—that of service and sacrifice for the Master; that we may receive from his hands those things we so stand in need of, to withstand all the worldly influences which tend to draw us from God.

We have just been blessed with a visit from Bishop R. Bullard, of Independence. With what joy we listened to the gentle admonition and words of counsel and advice given through him by the Holy Spirit. He came to us at a time when we were feeling most downcast and weary, and gave unto us hope, inspired us all with a determination to go on with the good work, and filled our hearts full of love for one another; set before us the holy city of Zion, and bade us to so live that when the call should come, we would be in a position spiritually to respond, and act, as our President receives the word from God for all Saints to "Come to Zion," take up their stewardship, and consecrate their lives to God and his people.

Oh, how we listened, how our hearts leaped out to God, as our brother unfolded to our view God's plan of gathering his people. Though we had, in our weekly Religio gatherings, discussed those questions amongst ourselves, yet when they were presented to us by our brother, our spiritual eyes were opened as it were, and we could see and understand things which before were not clear to our vision.

Whilst here, Brother Bullard called the following to the priesthood: Brother William Atkinson, as priest; Brother Garnet King, as teacher; and Brother William H. Chandler, as deacon.

That his words remain with us, that we may continue to grow stronger in the faith, is the earnest wish of your brother,

W. H. CHANDLER, Secretary.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINNESOTA, October 20, 1920.

Editors Herald: The drive for our new auditorium started out here with splendid prospects. There was a very optimistic view of the matter, and a large congregation turned out to hear the splendid presentation of the matter, by their pastor, William Sparling, and also the night service by the writer. Both sermons were well received, judging by the united response in the way of contributions, and the good will in which it was done.

The work here under the leadership of Brother William and the splendid cooperation of his assistants has produced splendid results. The spirit of unity prevails. The meetings are better attended. The Sunday school grows, and the Religio has taken on new life, under a new arrangement. The choir under the able leadership of James Spargo with the talented array of parts equally and harmoniously arranged is producing some splendid selections of music.

It has been my good pleasure to be associated with this noble band of Saints for the last two months as supply pastor for Brother William, while he attended to district work. And I must say they have fully complied with the test given in Doctrine and Covenants, in behalf of the ministry, "They [the Saints] will feed you and clothe you and give you money."

The following is an account of a surprise gotten up and carried out most successfully under the leadership of Sister Green.

Monday night after our opening of drive, the Saints gathered at the church with well-loaded boxes of lunch, and after all arrangements were complete, Brother William, Sister Sparling, and the writer were invited to the stand, when Brother James Spargo in a very nice little speech, handed the writer a real good warm overcoat, and sixty-one dollars and twenty-five cents, to buy me a new suit.

Of course I was expected to make a speech. I did the best I could, but found it very difficult to find words equal to such an emergency.

And I must confess it was far the largest and amongst the best gifts I have received in the whole of my thirty-one years of ministerial work. Besides that given to the writer, Mrs. Sparling also received a real good, warm, serviceable coat, for which we feel to thank God that our lot was cast amongst such a good and kind band of noble-hearted Saints. And I am sure we regret very much that the cold weather soon will compel Mrs. Sparling to seek a warmer clime, and I am sure nothing would please us better than to be able to return with the ducks in the spring.

We wish to thank all the Saints in both Minnesota and Dakota for their hospitality and kindness, also the appointing powers for granting this change, which has been beneficial to the general health of Mrs. Sparling. I have done what little I was able in my ministerial line under the circumstances, and the actions of the Saints towards us is encouraging to us at least, in believing that our services were both received and appreciated. May the Lord bless them is the prayer of your humble servant,

HENRY SPARLING.

NIAGARA FALLS, NEW YORK, October 20, 1920.

Editors Herald: Just a few lines which may be of interest to some of the HERALD readers. On Friday evening, October 15, the church at Niagara Falls, Ontario, was crowded with attentive listeners to hear Doctor Weager discourse on the Religio Department of the church. He is a field worker in the New York District, and by request came over to help us boost the work along, and the $500,000 drive as well. He took charge of the Religio Department by request of the president of the local.

Elder J. F. Curtis also was with us by invitation, always willing and ready to help a good cause, and did, with his forceful and effective way of making clear the necessity of digging deep for the requirements to build the great auditorium. He also told us of the subscription of $5,300 taken in Toronto during the district conference, or at the close thereof.

After Elder Curtis had concluded, we were invited to the basement where refreshments of no small variety awaited those who were flush of money. And the great drive was started in this part of the vineyard.

Many of our brethren and sisters from Buffalo and Niagara Falls, New York, were with us and donated very liberally to the program of the evening. All seemed to enjoy the coming together, and seemingly this is the beginning of such gatherings.

May the good work move on.

Mount Vernon was named by Lawrence Washington, the oldest brother of George Washington, after Edward Vernon, a British seaman, who captured Porto Bello in 1739.

Waterloo, Iowa

Brethren Berve and Vanderwood were with us October 19, giving us glimpses of the joys and possibilities of Zion. Incidentally Waterloo went "over the top" with a wide margin in this first great call to consecration. The Lord is blessing us in many ways and we are able to meet all the obligations of purchasing our church property which is no small thing considering our small number and the lack of this world's goods.

The potato patch back of our little chapel brought forth a goodly yield without much effort. We planted and God sent the increase as he always does whether it be temporally or spiritually if we are faithful.

Sister Mabel Hall gave the circle talk at the last Oriole meeting, on the girl's relation to mother, church, home, and companions. It was excellent and greatly appreciated by the girls.

Our social committee is right on the job. A Religio social is given every month. The last one was held at the home of Brother and Sister A. J. Fisher. A Halloween affair is on foot now and from the rumors we hear it is going to be "spooky."

Work is tied up here, but none of our people are really suffering on this account. Nearly all the shops are turning off the majority of their workmen.

CORRESPONDENT.

RHODES, IOWA, October 20, 1920.

Editors Herald: The Des Moines district conference was held at this place October 1 to 3. The district was well represented, there being visitors from Boone, Perry, Des Moines, Nevada, Runnells, Newton, Montour, Baxter, and Ames. There were besides the local ministers, District President H. C. Castings, A. E. Warr, C. E. McDonald, J. A. Dowker, Roy A. Cheville, and A. Carmichael; also Charles Blair, the latter in the interest of the Herald Publishing House.

We considered ourselves fortunate in having Bishop Carmichael with us. His instruction concerning the preparation for Zion and Zion conditions was timely, and listened to with much interest by the Saints.

At the sacrament service Sunday afternoon our little chapel was filled to its capacity and every minute of the time occupied.

Warm meals were served in the basement of the church all three days, both dinner and supper.

Most of the visiting Saints went home after the afternoon service, and we were thinking how lonesome we would feel at the evening service, but the town people came in and filled up the vacancy, so we were not so lonesome as we anticipated.

Elder C. E. McDonald preached the closing sermon of the conference. It was voted to hold the next conference in Des Moines, in February. The work in the branch seems to be in a fairly good condition. Twelve have been added to the branch by baptism since last May.

We have a good, live Sunday school and Religio. The Religio has an enrollment of fifty-five, and last quarter the average attendance was fifty-two. But while we feel gratified that the work is in as good condition as it is, we do not feel to boast for there is still much room for improvement. And we realize that it has arrived at its present condition through much tribulation, and only by the help of the Master working through a few faithful souls, who would not let go, that it is alive to-day.

As it was voted at our late district conference to discontinue the Des Moines District Dispatch, we may seek admittance to the columns of the HERALD, occasionally.

MATTIE HUGHES.

A story told in "The autobiography of Margot Asquith," that the writer says was liked by General Booth, is worth thinking about. In discussing religion with the former head of the Salvation Army, she said to him, "I cannot argue on theology. I feel like the child who was flying his kite on a misty day, when they said, 'Do you enjoy flying your kite when you cannot see it?' The child said, 'I always feel it tugging at me.'"—Christian Science Monitor.

Department of Music

Notice of Appointment—District Chorister

To Whom Concerned: At a recent conference of the Clinton, Missouri, District, Sister Oscar Masterson, of Rich Hill, Missouri, was selected by vote of the district for recommendation to this department for appointment as chorister of that district.

We take pleasure in now making and publishing this appointment, tendering to Sister Masterson the sincere wishes of the department for her success, praying that she may advance the music work of this district in a large measure to the good and honor of the church. We also urge all the musical workers of this district to enlist themselves in a hearty cooperation with Sister Masterson, that she may be able the more effectually to accomplish this desired result.

We further take this opportunity to thank Sister A. C. Dempsey, the retiring district chorister, for her past services in behalf of the music work of the district.

To Whom Concerned: The Southeastern Illinois District at its conference last February selected Sister Ruth Lewis Holman, of Xenia, Illinois, for recommendation for appointment as chorister of that district. The notification of this action failed to reach us until recently.

We therefore now make and publish this appointment, and we take pleasure in recommending Sister Holman to the musical workers of this district, urging that they will enlist themselves in a hearty cooperation with her, that the musical work of this district may be advanced for the good and honor of the Master's cause. We feel sure that Sister Holman, with her experience in this work in the past, will in that way be able to accomplish much towards the advancement of the cause of music in this district, and we pray that this may be her achievement.

To Whom Concerned: At a conference of the Wheeling District Sister Annie E. Smith, 39 Marshall Street, Wheeling, West Virginia, was selected for recommendation to this department for appointment as chorister of that district.

We take pleasure in making and now publishing this appointment with the concurrence of the First Presidency. We further commend Sister Smith to the musical forces of the Wheeling District, urging them to support her and cooperate with her in every way, that the spirit and cause of music in that district may be built up to the honor and glory of God's name.

Respectfully,

ALBERT N. HOXIE, General Director,
ARTHUR H. MILLS, Secretary.

Approved by the First Presidency: E. A. SMITH.

Addresses

William Patterson, Bulladelah, New South Wales, Australia.

Requests for Prayers

Mrs. T. D. Collins, of Mapleton, Iowa, requests the prayers of the Saints in her behalf as she is suffering from a complication of diseases.

Conference Minutes

CHATHAM.—At Glen Rae, Ontario, September 25 and 26, 1920, in charge of J. A. Gillen, and John C. Dent, Stewart Lamont, and J. L. Brown, of the district presidency. Business session Saturday afternoon. Officers elected: president, James Pycock, Humber Bay, Ontario, lately missionary in charge of Chatham and London Districts; first vice president, Elder Isaac Andrews, Windsor; second vice president, Elder Stewart Lamont, Chatham; secretary, Elder A. R. Hewitt, Chatham; bishop, John C. Dent was sustained, and upon the resignation of chorister Tyrrell, the name of Elder G. O. Colburne, Blenheim, was presented as chorister, which was confirmed by the conference. Chatham selected as place of next conference, which will consist of a joint session of church, Sunday school, and Religio, to be held the last Friday, Saturday, and Sunday of September, 1921. Jay L. Fryer.

NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA.—At Bloomsburg, Pennsylvania, September 4, 5, and 6, in charge of Herbert A. Cunningham, Henry Carr, and Arthur B. Phillips. Ralph Jackson presided over the Sunday School Department, Walter H. Lewis over Religio Department, and Barbara Milligan over the Women's Department. The report of the secretary showed the membership of the district to be 1,144 as of June 30, 1920, a net loss of 11 since January 1, 1920. This loss is largely due to the fact that many names have been transferred to the scattered list. The report of the bishop, John Zimmermann, showed that 20 per cent of the members of the district had paid tithing during the six months ending June 30 and that there had been collected in the district during that period a total of $5,208.64 in tithes, offerings, and consecrations. Provision was made for a reunion to be held during 1921 at the close of the Onset reunion, and the following were elected to serve as a reunion committee and given power to solicit funds from the Saints: E. B. Hull, Daniel T. Shaw, Walter H. Lewis, Frank H. Dippel, Earl V. Wagner, Alma Angus, and William B. Nichols. Brother H. A. Cunningham, who was appointed some time ago by the First Presidency to act as district president until the conference of the district, was sustained in that office. He chose as his counselors Henry Carr and Richard J. Hawkins. This was the first time the district had met in conference at Bloomsburg, but the Saints and their friends of that place proved that they could well care for visitors. The next conference will be held at Scranton, Pennsylvania, at the call of district president. Elizabeth Teal, secretary.

LONDON.—At Stratford, Ontario, October 2 and 3. District president Wm. M. Grice, John Shields, and J. L. Burger, presided. The bishop's books showed receipts of tithes and offerings for the past eleven months to be $10,238.63. Missionaries present were J. Shields, J. Pycock, and C. Clifford. Officers chosen: J. L. Burger, president; Percy Yerks, vice president; David Smith, second vice president; Lucy Yerks, secretary; J. L. Burger, bishop and treasurer; D. A. Withrow, for chorister; and Caro Withrow, organist. A. W. Borbridge was ordained as first counsellor to bishop. The time and place of 1921 conference left to district presidency. Lucy Yerks, secretary.

JACKSON.—Lela Jackson was born January 2, 1913. Died at the home of her parents in Spearfish, South Dakota, September 17, 1920. Leaves father, mother, 4 brothers and sisters to mourn her unexpected and very sudden departure. Funeral services in charge of E. E. Long. Sermon by C. W. Prettyman.

SEATTLE AND BRITISH COLUMBIA.—At Bellingham, Washington,

August 10. J. A. Gillen, E. L. Kelley, and District President J. M. Terry, were placed to preside and district secretary F. W. Holman at the desk, with I. S. McMullen assisting. Treasurer reported $70.95 on hand June 30, resulting from a receipt of $75.95 and an expenditure of $4.90. Bishop's agent reported $458.09 on hand June 30, resulting from a receipt in tithes and offerings of $3,982.82 and an expenditure of $3,553.23. Branch statistical reports showed for Seattle a membership of 344, net gain 16; Roslyn 37; New Westminster 91, net loss 8; Chilliwack 51; Centralia, 181, loss 2; and Bellingham 54, gain 2, total 768, net gain 8. This total having a membership of 47 added to it, who are enrolled upon the records of disorganized branches, makes a grand total of 815. Gospel literature commission financial report showed a balance of $7.53 resulting from a debit of $61.33 and a credit of $53.41. Officers elected: J. M. Terry, president; S. S. Smith, vice president, and F. W. Holman, secretary-treasurer; John Hartnell sustained Bishop's agent; Harold Premo, elected member, library board; Orville L. Oppelt, chorister and Sarah Barney, assistant; Morley I. Williams, member auditing board for three-year term. Everett, Washington designated as the place for holding next reunion. District presidency authorized to locate reunion at most practical point, subject to the ratification of the February conference, and instructed to make speedy investigation and publish result in Herald and Ensign. Matter of establishing and conducting a dining tent at our reunions, left to discretion of district presidency, said matter having been highly favored by the assembly. Presidency also placed as reunion committee, with power to select necessary assistants. Reunion financial report showed indebtedness of $21.59, resulting from a receipt of $260.69 and an expenditure of $282.28. Samuel Stearns, of Everett, Washington, was ordained to office of priest in response to a recommendation from Seattle Branch. Seattle designated as the place for holding February conference, dates to be fixed by the district presidency. Tent fund was reported to have increased to $123.65. Frederick W. Holman, secretary, 3633 Whitman Avenue, Seattle, Washington.

Our Departed Ones

STENRUD.—Martin Stenrud died at Council Bluffs, Iowa, September 8, as a result of a cancer. He was born in Norway, March 12, 1866. Baptized September 8, 1897, by J. F. Mintun, at Woodbine, Iowa, and remained faithful to his covenant. Was the father of 9 children. Leaves wife and 7 children, and 2 sisters, one of whom is in Norway. Services at Council Bluffs, Iowa, conducted by J. F. Mintun.

LLOYD.—Edith Lloyd was born at Wolverhampton, England, May 22, 1907. Baptized May 27, 1917, at Buffalo, New York, by Albert Wouters. Departed this life August 30, 1920, at the home of her parents, 17 Custer Street, Buffalo, New York. She leaves to mourn her parents, 4 sisters, and one brother. Services in charge of P. L. Weegar. Interment in Forest Lawn Cemetery, Buffalo.

BOGUE.—Mary Cordelia Parish, daughter of Elder Ira Parish, was born in Canada, November 17, 1845, near the town of Farmerville. Later the family located on String Prairie, now Argyle, Iowa, where she united with the church, and married N. B. Bogue, in February, 1866, on his return from the Civil War. To them six children were born, Mrs. William Morris, of New York City, Mrs. Charles Hobbs, of Keokuk, Iowa, Charlie and Frank Bogue, both of Davenport, Iowa. Two children died in infancy. The father died October 10, 1919. Three sisters survive, Laura Robinson, of Keokuk, Iowa; Malissa Lovelle, of Lavona, Iowa; and Mrs. Cornelia Reed, of Percival, Iowa. Sister Bogue died at her home in Keokuk, Iowa, June 14, 1920. She was a true and liberal supporter of the church, and will be greatly missed, and deeply mourned by the Saints. Funeral from the home, June 16, 1920. Sermon by James McKiernan, of Farmington, Iowa. Interment in Oakland Cemetery.

REXFORD.—Roy F. Rexford, son-in-law of Elder William Grice, was born at Lapeer, Michigan, April 24, 1883. Baptized May 15, 1907, by William Davis. Married July 28, 1909, to Jennie May Grice. Died August 27, at his home in Crosswell. Leaves wife and 2 sons, father, mother, 4 brothers, and 3 sisters. His suffering was endured with great patience and testified he was prepared to go. A host of sorrowing relatives and friends were in attendance at the funeral services, held in the Crosswell Church, conducted by William Fligg.

KERR.—Alice E. Kerr was born in Arenac County, Michigan, August 21, 1899. Baptized October 24, 1915, at Moores Junction, Michigan, by S. T. Pendleton and confirmed by S. T. Pendleton. Died August 21, 1920. Was a patient sufferer for four years and passed away at her home.

TAYLOR.—Georgina Bethia Taylor departed this life at Toronto, September 14, 1920. Had been a great sufferer for many years, which was an exceedingly great trial to herself and loved ones. She loved the gospel and in the years when she was able did what she could to demonstrate that love. Was taken to her old home at Shelbourne for burial beside her companion who preceded her in 1901. Leaves 3 children with other relatives and friends to mourn. Service at both Toronto and Shelbourne, G. E. Harrington officiating.

ROSS.—Isabell Cato Ross was born in Alabama, January 10, 1849. Married J. A. Ross in 1870. To this union were born 5 sons, all living, and 2 daughters, now dead. Her husband also preceded her in death in 1896. Moved from Ray County, Missouri, to Weiser, Idaho, about 1894. Died suddenly in Weiser, August 25, 1920. She had been a consistent member for many years. Funeral at the home the next day. Sermon by Ammon White. Interment in Weiser, Idaho, Cemetery, August 26, 1920.

NITCHER.—Thomas Nitcher was born January 13, 1835, at Sandusky, Ohio. Died in Boise Soldiers' Home, September 16, 1920. Leaves aged wife and 3 sons. Served 3 years in the Civil War. Was a member and minister of the Baptist Church for many years, but was found to be a lover of truth from any source, and a short time before his death wrote a letter to his son signifying his intention of joining the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ at his next visit home, which opportunity was never granted him. Funeral in Boise, Idaho, September 18, 1920, at the undertaking parlors. Sermon by Ammon White. Interment in Boise Cemetery under the direction of the G. A. R.

A WONDERFUL RECORD HAS BEEN MADE

It is too early to give a complete account of the amount pledged for the General Conference Auditorium. Advance reports assure success however, and at the earliest date we will give a complete report

David Boyd writes from Ouray, Colorado: "Our district is 'over the top.' However, I wish to add that we are still going and hope to have quite a margin over the quota. It is indeed gratifying to know that the Saints have the interest of the church at heart even though they are far remote from the heart of Zion and her Stakes."

J. A. Dowker writes from the Des Moines District where he has been helping in the big campaign and where he has done much missionary work: "Our quota was $4,500 and we have over $9,000 solicited and a goodly number yet to hear from. It is meat and drink to labor in this department of church work, as it is here that we see the results of the sacrifice we have made to bring people into the church."

D. J. Krahl writes from Holden: "The aged Saints at Holden Home gave an offering for the auditorium amounting to two hundred and thirty dollars. Marshall raised over double their quota. All committees report a willing response."

M. H. Ahlstrom writes from Sharon, Pennsylvania: "Reports received until last night show a total for our district of $3,500, or $1,050 over our quota, and we still have the week before us. We will double it."

J. B. Barrett reports from Denison, Iowa: "It is a pleasure for me to be able to report to your office this morning that Gallands Grove District has gone over the top. We have already pledged the amount asked of this district and others are to be canvassed before we are through. The Saints have responded nobly."

J. W. Davis writes from Ohio: "Three branches have pledged more than three fourths of our quota and there are fourteen places to be heard from in this district. I have had wonderful inspiration in representing this movement among the people. All seem to have caught the spirit of it and things are going with a boom."

Orman Salisbury wired from Council Bluffs: "Pottawattamie District quota is pledged. Two branches yet to see."

Milo Burnett wires from C'inton, Iowa: "Eastern Iowa District over the top strong and still going."

J. C. Dent wires from Bothwell, Ontario: "Chatham District has passed its objective in auditorium drive."

D. Amos Yates writes from the little branch of San Bernardino, California, that in one day the Saints there subscribed $2,500. They are after $4,000.

Eastern Maine with a quota of $600, subscribed $800 at one conference session—over half cash.

M. J. Crowley, president of the Toronto Branch, writes: "The auditorium drive in the Toronto Branch got away to a good start. We raised $3,000 at conference the Sunday before the drive started, and I believe that we have added another thousand since. We'll never say die, and will fight our way 'over the top.'"

H. C. Ziegenhorn of Illinois writes: "Have not heard from all branches of Kewanee District but all we have heard from went over the top."

O. J. Tary, Wheeling, West Virginia: "There are six branches in our district with a quota of $2,000 to raise. I think by the end of the week the Wheeling Branch alone will have reached nearly, if not altogether, that amount."

Middletown, Ohio, with only fifteen names on its list, raised $1,300.

F. O. White of Arkansas writes: "Bald Knob and Fisher Branches have given the quota for the entire State. I feel sure that Arkansas will double her quota."

P. R. Burton of Nauvoo writes: "We are sure going strong with the building fund. Fort Madison went over $700 over her share in the district. Nauvoo is going strong also. This is the best thing that ever happened to the church."

Richard Baldwin writes from Massachusetts: "We are busy in different places in the district boosting the auditorium fund. Our quota for the district was $15,000 and we have doubled it. I never witnessed such a spirit of sacrifice among the people as we did in the past week in their ready response to give money to erect the auditorium."

W. A. Smith, who is laboring in the Owen Sound, Ontario, District, writes: "We are just doing fine in this district in our drive. At the close of our talk in the little branch of Grand Valley yesterday morning we took up nearly $2,300 in subscriptions and they promise to raise it to $2,500. The little Redickville Branch gave $1,200 and oh, what a good feeling we are having in our campaign!"

A. M. Fyrando, of Little Sioux, writes: "Little Sioux District prospects are $5,000 or more above quota—possibly $35,000 in all, which would be $10,000 over."

F. B. Stade of Harrison, Ontario, writes: "The Saints of our district are doing remarkably well. We have practically $6,000 in pledges and about eight branches not yet heard from. We expect to go away over the top."

William Osler of Philadelphia writes: "We are busy here with the business that has put all others in the shade for the time being—namely the auditorium campaign. We are rolling along in fine shape here. Expect to raise our quota thrice over."

These reports were all written before October 25. Half the story has not yet been told.

Roberts, Brockman, Et Al

W. G. Roberts has been reading Zion's Ensign. A very wholesome thing for him to do. But alas, in his reading he found something that caused him to break forth in loud grief and indignation—or at least a very good imitation of grief and indignation—some men never sound very convincing, even at their worst. A regular, old-fashioned "Mormon eater" is at his best when he is at his worst.

We quote from the so-called Apostolic Review, for August 10, 1920:

"President Smith's Views on Democracy in Church Government"

"Under the above heading, in Zion's Ensign (Mormon paper) for March 4, I find some foolishness on first page which I meant to notice some time ago, but have not had the time, or did not take the time to do so. But here it is:

"Not even the President of the Church, functioning as your prophet, seer, and revelator, can present to you a thing for your acceptance that you do not have a right to examine; and you can reject it, even though there comes a 'thus saith the Lord.' You have the right to examine it and you can reject it if you so desire. You may reject the word of God, himself, in doing it; but you have that right."

"Who gave them (Mormons) 'that right'? Chapter and verse, please? Where, please, is authority for one man to be 'president,' 'prophet,' 'seer,' and 'revelator' in and for the Church? Where is authority for a plurality of men being such? Jesus Christ said, 'it shall not be so among you.' (Matthew 20: 26.)

"But what do these Mormons care for what the Lord Jesus Christ says! They have but little regard for his word. But some people like to be bossed, and these Mormons surely have the bosses! This yearly conference can reject or accept any old thing, if they wish to do so. Their 'president,' 'prophet,' 'seer,' and 'revelator' tells them they have the right to 'reject it' even though it be a 'thus saith the Lord.' What do you think of that, friends? Even though it be the word of the Lord, and they know it, yet they can reject it. So they have more power than God himself! They say to God and his word, 'Stand back, we Mormons are in authority over you! Keep your mouth shut, God; we are talking! We are the higher authority!"

"Shame on these wicked Mormons! Put such 'stuff' as that right out in print, and on first page of their paper, too. They may have stomach trouble, but their nerve is all right!"

"It may be a 'thus saith the Lord,' but 'you have the right to examine it and can reject it if you so desire,' says their 'president,' 'prophet,' 'seer,' and 'revelator.' That 'desire' of theirs is what moves and stays things. It is the desire for a thing that brings the 'revelation from God' to them! First the desire, then the 'revelation'; and the rest of the church has to accept whether it wants to do so or not. These bosses have the desire, and that settles it. Their 'president,' 'prophet,' 'seer,' and 'revelator' tells them: 'You may reject the word of God, himself, in doing it; but you have that right.' Who gave them that right? Joseph Smith, founder of the miserable thing! Joseph Smith, the sheep thief, liar, drunkard, and who even stole lumber to make a coffin (so we are informed in history), gave them that 'right'! It was never given to them by God, but by a servant of the Devil, if you please. Rather, it was given by the Devil through his servant. God never gave anyone the right to reject his word and to reject even himself.

"Again: 'We are not allowed to appeal to a court or to ask a reason, but simply have to yield to the voice of the body.' Isn't that 'a sight!' 'Not allowed to ask a reason, but simply have to yield to the voice of the body,' referring to this 'conference' of bosses in this ungodly Mormon church. It is, therefore, a matter of compulsion to 'yield' to their 'desires,' whatever they may be. They even have the right to reject God and his word. Danger! Danger!! These Mormons are a very dangerous people, friends.

"But hear this 'president,' 'prophet,' 'seer,' and 'revelator' again: 'Now, Zion is to be established first by law and order, as God set it down, and it must have a strongly centralized and local powerful government to administer its affairs, from the head down.' Yes, it must have a strong and powerful government to administer its affairs, 'from the head down.' This Frederick Smith is the head of the thing. He is not simply the head of a local organization, but is head of their church. God is excluded, so far as earthly head is concerned. They say to God, 'Stand back, sir; we are running this thing!' Smith is head of the Mormon church on earth just as the pope is head of the Roman Catholic church on earth. God is not in it with either of them.

"Zion is to be established 'as God set it down,' you notice this 'seer' says. How did God 'set it down'? Let us see:

"God will come out of his hiding place and vex this nation with a sore vexation; yea, the consuming wrath of an offended God shall smoke through the Nation with as much distress and woe as independence has ever blazed through with pleasure and delight. I or my posterity will plead the cause of injured innocence, until Missouri makes atonement for all her sins, or sinks disgraced, degraded, and damned to hell, "where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched."—Mormon Church History, vol. 2, pp. 710, 711.

"I might, had I the time, quote some from their Doctrine and Covenants, but will not. You can see how 'God has set it down' for their 'Zion to be established.' It is not only Missouri to be cursed, but the 'whole nation'! So the Mormons will establish (?) their Zion by killing the rest of us, will they? Down with Mormonism, and hoist the Bible and the Lord's church!—W. G. Roberts, Yale, Illinois."

Why This Pause?

Just at this point Roberts comes to a temporary close. Probably he is like the little boy whose mother shut him in the library for punishment. A little later she came to the door and said, "Robert, what are you doing?" He replied, "I spit on the bookcase; I spit on the mirror; I spit on your new hat; I spit on the Bible; and now I am waiting for more spit to come."

More will come. It always does. But, they spat on Jesus too, and the servant is not greater than the master, and has no exemption.

All this talk about our people killing folks off is plain rant. Roberts knows that members of the Reorganized Church in Missouri and elsewhere are respected and law-abiding citizens. But his object is to stir up persecution against us again—and to this purpose the un-Apostolic Review is quite willing to lend itself.

Who Did the Dirty Work?

Probably no member of Roberts's church was ever killed or maltreated by our people. The killing and abuse have gone the other way. Note the following interesting items of history:

www.LatterDayTruth.org

"The Columbian Encyclopedia says: '1832, March 22d, a mob of Methodists, Baptists, Disciples, and miscellaneous zealots broke into the prophet's house, tore him from his wife's arms, . . . and tarred and feathered him.'

"While the historian, Hubert H. Bancroft, says: 'On the night of the 25th of March, Smith and Rigdon were seized by a mob, composed partly of the Campbellites, Methodists, and Baptists of Hiram. . . . The captives were roughly treated, and expected to be killed; but after they had been stripped, beaten, and well covered with tar and feathers, they were released.'—History of Utah, p. 90.

The "Rev." Bogart led in murdering and pillaging the Saints in Missouri. And the Rev. T. S. Brockman was the leader of the posse of men like himself who robbed and killed the Saints in Nauvoo. Of him Governor Ford wrote in his History of Illinois:

"This Brockman was a Campbellite preacher, nominally belonging to the Democratic Party. He was a large, awkward, uncouth, ignorant semibarbarian, ambitious of office, and bent upon acquiring notoriety. He had been county commissioner of Brown County, and in that capacity had let out a contract for building the courthouse, and it was afterwards ascertained had let the contract out to himself. He managed to get paid in advance, and then built such an inferior building, that the county had not received it up to December, 1846. He had also been a collector of taxes, for which he was a defaulter, and his lands were sold whilst I was governor, to pay a judgment obtained against him for moneys collected by him. . . . Such was the man who was now at the head of the anti-Mormons, who were about as numerous in camp as ever."—History of Illinois, pp. 416-418.

"The Times Aren't What They Used to Be"

These early "disciples" hated the Latter Day Saints; but, oh, how they loved the homes and farms that the Saints vacated under pressure! We may say that such was the ardor of their devotion they loved the very ground the Saints trod upon.

We have fallen upon tame times. Then it was perfectly proper to carve Latter Day Saints with corn knives and bury them in old wells, as at Haun's Mill. But now there is no open season on Latter Day Saints. They are protected by law just like they were human beings. And fortunately there has come a very decided change of sentiment among our religious contemporaries and they would by no means sanction old methods. Only an occasional man like Roberts arises, who being restrained by law can only have recourse to print; and casting aside all impedimenta of Christian graces and good manners, he "does what he can." But, not being allowed to do his worst, he cannot appear at his best.

Much more representative of Christian sentiment to-day, we fondly believe, is the following incident: The conference of the Far West Stake was held recently at Cameron, Missouri. This conference covers much of the territory where the early Saints had difficulty. One meeting of the conference (on Sunday) was held in the Christian church. The church board refused pay for the use of the building and treated our people with truly Christian courtesy. That was but one of numerous refreshing incidents that might be mentioned. But perhaps they had never heard this awful warning from Yale (Illinois). Or perhaps they knew Roberts. In any event no one was killed.

Who Set Prophets in the Church?

It is asked, Where is the authority for one man or a number of men to act as presidents, prophets, revelators, in the church?

"God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healing, helps, governments, diversities of tongues."—1 Corinthians 12: 28.

God set men in various offices in the church. It is very true that Jesus said, "It shall not be so among you," i. e., that these men shall not exercise lordship, as princes did among the Gentiles—and that was what President Smith was arguing, that at any time by a majority vote of one in the General Conference he could be retired from office. That is democracy in church government as opposed to the autocracy that Jesus had noted among the Gentiles.

Free Agency

Who gave men the privilege to reject the word of God himself? Well, Joshua said, "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve." Surely we have as much right of choice under the Christian dispensation as they had under the Mosaic. God gave the first man, Adam, the right of choice, free agency, and he exercised it and rejected the counsel of God. Jesus gave the Jews the right of choice and they rejected his word. All men have that choice. Roberts daily rejects the word of God. President Smith stated no new idea. The old orthodox song says that God will persuade "but never force the human mind." As a matter of course the man who rejects the word of God must stand ready to bear the consequences.

No, we do not say to God, Stand back and keep still. That is done by those who say there can be no more revelation.

Roberts assumed that this was a "conference of bosses" to whom the people must yield obedience—whereas it was a conference of the people in which any "lay" delegate, man or woman, could cast a vote equal to the vote of the president of the church—and on a "yea and nay" or "delegate" vote might outvote him twenty to one.

Roberts assumes that the president was telling them that they had to obey his will and had no right to ask a reason or take an appeal. In fact he was saying that if they should choose to vote him out of office even by a majority of one vote he would have no appeal and could not even ask the reason—quite unlike the Pope of Rome. Roberts could not have made this misrepresentation by mistake. He carefully failed to quote that part showing what President Smith was talking about at that juncture.

Law and Order

If the readers of the Apostolic Review are logical they will discover his misrepresentation even by reading the very brief quotations that he makes—but then, some one may say, If they were logical they would not read the Apostolic Review. Far be it from us to dispute that point.

But if there be one logical, fair-minded subscriber to the Review he will note, even in Roberts's quotations, that President Smith says that Zion must be established by "law and order." And he will note that Roberts infers that to mean "by killing the rest of us"—which must reflect his idea of "law and order"—a truly Bogartian-Brockmanian theory.

A Prediction Fulfilled

The rather strenuous denunciations quoted by Roberts from the pen of Joseph Smith (History, vol. 2, pp. 710, 711) may have been superinduced by the awful sufferings and injustices endured; yet it is a fact that less than twenty years after the prediction quoted was penned the great Civil War "smoked through the Nation" with as much "distress and woe" as there was "pleasure and delight" when independence first blazed through the land. And one of the greatest, most pious of the public men of that time said that the Nation was suffering for her sins "under the lash of God."

Not that we believe that the Nation suffered solely because of injustice to the Saints, as Roberts would have his readers understand us to hold. There were other things. Hannis Taylor said that African slavery was the "deadly original sin of the Constitution." That sin had to be atoned for. And on this very point some years later, Joseph Smith warned the Government in the following words: "Petition also, ye goodly inhabitants of the slave States, your legislators to abolish slavery by 1850, or now. . . . Pray Congress to pay every man a reasonable price for his slaves. . . . Break off the shackles from the poor black man, and hire them to labor like other human beings; for an hour of virtuous liberty on earth, is worth an eternity of bondage."

We have quoted from a pamphlet published by Joseph Smith in February of 1844, an original copy of which is in our possession. Had his warning been heeded and slavery abolished by purchase much grief might have been avoided. But it was not done and the earlier prediction was fulfilled and distress and woe were the lot of the Nation.

So far as the past is concerned, regarding that which the church suffered, there is no rancor left in the hearts of the Saints to-day. The past is past. Mistakes were made on both sides. Let the dead past bury its dead. We never raise these issues excepting in self-defense, and seldom then.

Our Idea of Law and Order, Again

It is true that Roberts might have "quoted some" from our Doctrine and Covenants. Very profitably, too. Indeed, had he confined himself to such quotations his article would have been much better. He might for instance have quoted our idea of "law and order" according to which Zion must be redeemed:

"Let no man break the laws of the land, for he that keepeth the laws of God hath no need to break the laws of the land."—Doctrine and Covenants 58: 5.

That is a part of the constitutional law of the church and a fixed principle in our philosophy. Our people have lived in harmony with it, and that fact is known wherever they are known. So this cry that we "are a very dangerous people" is not likely to scare many people into their cyclone cellars.

We do not often give attention to these vicious attacks. But it may do the Saints good at times to read the sort of stuff that is written against them. Men are known by the enemies they make. Our faith is strengthened by such attacks. God is not the author of hatred, malice, villification—he is more often with those who fall victim to the abuse of men actuated by such things.

Auditorium Results Encouraging

At this writing the two weeks' drive is a thing of the past, yet full reports are not in and hardly will be in for some weeks yet.

The quota method gave to each district, branch, and individual a definite goal to be reached, and many individuals, branches, and districts have rejoiced that they were able to exceed their quota, and do better than they were asked for. Some branches report that they have raised two and three times the amount requested, if not more. Some have shown distinctly a spirit of sacrifice, and a desire to help to the limit; while others have sat down conservatively and have subscribed for only what they could spare now, without inconvenience.

To those who have tried hard, this produces a feeling naturally of dissatisfaction. But after all, in this as in every other work, the work itself brings in the aftermath its own reward. To him who has given much shall much be given, for he loveth much.

Should we feel disappointed that our love of the work is greater than others? We may feel regret that others are willing to do less; are not so fully converted to the needs of the work. We may also regret and feel sorrow for those who are not able to give so liberally. This may come from a poverty of means, poverty of assets, a poverty of income, or it may come from a poverty of soul. A man may possess many things, and yet be very poor, for a man's life does not consist in the abundance of things which he possesses. (Luke 12: 15.)

So those who are rich in means and willing givers, shall rejoice. To those who have subscribed so liberally, we can with full accord say, "Well done," and can extend that vote of thanks to one another throughout the church.

On the other hand there are those who have felt discouraged because they have been asked to give more than they felt they sincerely could. They have tried to help every good work, paid their tithing, and have already placed themselves on a basis of sacrifice and they fail to see how more than a limited number of dollars can possibly be given now. To some it would mean, they would have to neglect their regular work in the church, in order to work at something else for a time to earn it.

But those who have been faithful all along should not feel discouraged. The quota was not intended in the nature of a tax levy, but only as a suggestion. It would seem that provision was made for a percentage of loss.

As one solicitor wrote, "I merely presented it as a privilege and an opportunity to give all that they felt they could. I did not let any feel belittled if they did not feel they could give at all, or could give only a small amount."

Or as one of the bishopric expressed it, "It was only a suggestion in our estimate. We want the offering wholly voluntary and of free will." So when we have done what we could, giving the matter careful, prayerful consideration, we should feel content, and only feel glad that we can do so well, and that as a church we are able for the work before us.

Still it would be a catastrophe if the result of the drive would cause any to feel discouraged and less like doing all he can with the regular tithes and offerings.

Some have raised a question because of the many favorable reports, that there would be a great excess. We have not the figures to determine what the total will be. But it is certain that some places will not be able to make their quota. The result is yet to be determined.

But if there should be an excess, it is very rare indeed that a building completed with all of its accessories does not exceed the first estimate of cost. Certainly some extra could be used to add necessary conveniences. If there is still an excess, I think we can all agree that it should be left in the hands of the Bishop and its use determined by General Conference.

But we must remember first that we have not as yet a complete report. Some districts may not be able to make their quota. Furthermore, this is only a subscription, and not the money actually donated. There will doubtless be a percentage of loss on that account.

Finally, the building is yet to be erected. It is necessary before the building be started that assurances be in the hands of the Presiding Bishop warranting him in authorizing the church architect to proceed.

This work has been well done by all of us, and we are entitled to a rest, so far as this drive is concerned, until the date of our first payment arrives. This subscription has been completed, yet the work of the church is not completed, and much yet remains to be done. Nephi warns us (2 Nephi 12: 19-34) against those who would lure the way into carnal security, saying, "All is well in Zion; yea, Zion prospers." He is even more specific and says: "Woe be unto him who is at ease in Zion."

Much yet remains to be done. This work is done. What is next?

Better Criminal Courts

The Journal of the American Judicature Society states that Detroit is the first American city to acquire adequate machinery for fighting crime; that it possesses the first complete and adequate criminal court ever set up in this country. This seems a broad statement. It is based upon the grave disadvantages which have been found in the police courts of the country. Also the advantage which is given to a criminal in allowing his appeal in misdemeanor cases from one court to another.

Detroit has long recognized the inefficiency of the system of police courts and justice of the peace courts. The municipal court has met the problem in several cases, so far as the inferior justice of the peace court is concerned. Detroit is the first to establish one local criminal court, with seven judges, which hears and tries all cases.

It is curious that opposition to the reform has come many times from the judges of the higher courts. The suggestion is made that hierarchy of courts rather appeals, perhaps unconsciously, to the pride of the superior judges. But simplification of courts and qualified judges is the order of the day.

This plan does not do away with the regular appellate courts, but the tendency is doubtless towards a fuller number of distinct courts and more judges of equal rank in each court. That would have the added advantage of having the proper trial of a case, and less expensive to the litigant.

It is interesting to note that the church judicature provides, when fully organized, that the bishop's court shall be the court of original jurisdiction, and provides for an appeal to the high council. Reason would certainly favor the securing of prepared and trained men as the bishops for this work, and preferable to excluding of elders having very little or no experience in court procedure.

Reason would also suggest that only in a very few cases could an appeal be taken from a stake high council to the general high council, or to the First Presidency.

It is important that justice be secured. It is also important that it shall be promptly administered.

Introduction of Democracy

It is of interest to note how much the Puritan Church had to do with the introduction of democracy into the world. The Puritans, in the revolution under Cromwell, did not represent the democratic state. Cromwell was by nature an autocrat—ruled in by the power of the sword, and stayed in by the power of the sword. The Pilgrims, in coming to America denied the authority of bishops and presbyters, as well as of popes, and set forth an ideal of the human soul, giving to each individual to make his own peace with God. Individual Christians gathered into different churches and formed the only religious authority which they would recognize. There were, however, instances of persecutions of others, as has been the case through the middle ages, and was still the case in Europe. It was the first recognition of individual rights.

Then in New England they established the town meeting as an ideal form of local government. Hence the seed of democracy, as America grew, spread not only to the north and west, into Canada, but influenced the whole country. It became the basis for colonies in Central and South America, and finally came back as the inspiration of liberal thought in Europe. It is true that there was not yet a democratic style of government in a large organization, nor had they that immediate need. They still continued the interrelation of church and state, but as one of a union of God-fearing men. It took a century and a half to fully develop partly as compromise, the independence of church and state, and the full liberty of each individual to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience.

The New Centennial Yearbook

A most attractive yearbook has just been printed by the Women's Department, and is now being distributed to their members at 75 cents a copy.

It is tastily gotten up in ripple brown cover, beautiful india paper, and printed with brown ink.

But they would not have us think only of the dress. The contents are what count: seventy-seven pages of information that our sisters have been demanding for lo, these many months. It covers the entire field of the women's activities, imparting information about the various bureaus, departments, ideals, etc. The bibliography is replete with good books one can secure to become proficient in any special line of endeavor.

In fact we no longer can have the excuse that "we do not know what the plans of the Women's Department are," for they are all here, conveniently arranged, inviting us to become acquainted with the details of the women's work. Of course everyone knows the address to which remittances may be mailed: Women's Department, Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ, Independence, Missouri.

Our Program

The Des Moines Branch, whose pastor is A. E. Warr, is publishing a little bulletin each week entitled The Messenger. They do not attempt any elaborate printing, but give the program of the week on one page, and devote the opposite page to a short, and very-much-to-the-point editorial. On the back page they carry a standing announcement called "Our program." The author of that program is Apostle John W. Rushton, and it is so beautifully stated, and it so aptly phrases the essentials of our faith that it should be given wide publicity. The program follows:

Social reform by individual regeneration.

Every man having equal opportunity to be his best; to do his best for the good of all.

Love the dynamic.

Righteousness the principle.

Justice the basis of social relationship.

To organize such men and women into the kingdom of God.

To provide all with suitable means which with their talents become their stewardships.

Each one being brought to the task he is able best to perform, the product to be distributed so that none has less than is needed, and no one has more than he can use.

The students at Graceland College have become enthused over the auditorium fund and as a result have set out to raise $10,000 among themselves. While they have not concluded the effort, we hear the members of the class in religious education, about thirty in number, have pledged $2,000 of that amount.

In furthering the campaign for auditorium funds in his district, Elder H. J. Davison, of Stockton, California, painted a reproduction of the new auditorium building on a canvas strip eight feet long. He also furnished a stirring editorial for the local Religio paper, The Religio Digest. Stockton exceeded its quota by some $600.

Brother Quincy Anderson writes from Springfield, Missouri, that because of the observance of the law of tithing the Lord is blessing him more than ever in following his occupation.

The Arrest of Insanity

By Ralph W. Farrell

"In the gospel of Jesus Christ is found the guide to a sane, peaceful, happy life."

Let the slogan be, How am I to keep well? rather than to get well. It is far easier to keep a pillow of feathers from tearing open and spilling its contents on the floor than it is to gather those scattered feathers up. This is true of our physical and mental condition. Just now the Sanitarium can do little else than care for the sick, but the time will come when it will spend as much energy in preventing disease as in curing it. And why should not this be the case?

Abnormal Psychology

We hear much to-day about abnormal psychology. The one word insanity has received its proper and rightful term, mental illness. And men have learned that many of our ills are founded in mental conflicts; therefore, it would be one-sided treatment indeed which paid attention only to distinct bodily complaints. Why should not the great thought machine get tired, and need rest as much as the body? This is the case, and men who cannot sleep for long periods of time break down physically and mentally. But till late years little attention has been given to mind study, and it may be that for this reason our mental asylums are to-day crowded with inmates. The semihumorous part is (if we wish to look at the matter humorously) that hundreds of persons walking our city streets are more "crazy" than many inmates of asylums are. It is a strange thing to think of, but true.

Therefore, let us have more education on how to keep sanity than on how to cure insanity or mental sickness. Likewise this holds true of our physical life.

I do not know that this article will be of interest or value to many readers, but its object is to help those who need it. In preparing it I quote much from Hart's Psychology of Insanity, a work which we have reviewed here in our clinic study at the Sanitarium.

A Complex

"Dissociation of consciousness" is a small term, yet it defines insanity, according to Hart. And he adds that "a vast number of abnormal phenomena, roughly from hallucination and delusion to . . . complicated phantasy production . . . are to be regarded as examples of dissociation." In this dissociation of consciousness, the mind has lost that homogeneity which is the ideal of the normal personality, and has become disintegrated into more or less independent portions, each pursuing its own course and development without reference to the welfare of the whole. The cause of this abnormal state of the mind is some mental conflict. The conflict is a civil war in the kingdom of the mind. And the parties to this conflict, internally carried on, are, on the one hand, the personality as a whole; on the other, what is known to psychologists as a complex.

Bernard Hart tells us that a complex is "a system of connected ideas with a strong emotional tone and tendency to produce action of a definite character." They have been poetically described as the "subcenters of the soul life."

Doctor Maurice Micoli, in Dream Psychology, says that "when a mass of ideas and emotions collect round a nucleus in the mind, a system is formed which will react in a peculiar way to incoming stimuli," and adds, "this system is called a complex."

We would be hardly human if we did not have complexes, and many of them. As subcenters of soul life they are analagous (within limits) to a nerve center in the body. We might compare them to centers of local government in a well organized state government.

We often hear a man speak of his hobby. This thing is his particular complex. If he is deeply interested in the study of any subject, a corresponding complex is formed in his mind. And as he puts his energy into his work, along some particular line, he accumulates a mass of ideas and emotions which collect around this center of interest and a complex is formed. We might say that he has fixed his mind; he has made acquainted thoughts in common; the favorite children of his mind have collected together into one room.

How a Complex Induces Insanity

But the query arises, how does a complex cause insanity? And the answer is vitally interesting and important—important to everyone, for thereby hangs the tale. Mental sickness is the result of allowing any pursuit of life to have more than its share of thoughts and emotions. We are sick when we are unbalanced; when we are out of harmony. This undesired result often follows the brooding over things which have no rightful place in our life; such as, harboring a wrong or unwisely lamenting over past sins. Let a man put to himself the test. He need not depend on the testimony of others to tell him whether or not he is on the way to the life of disharmony. It may be said that all disharmony is mental disorder. And it may be further said that we possess the record of only one perfectly sane man—he was Jesus Christ. The loss of inward harmony need not amount to insanity in the full sense, but unless we check up often and see where we are and what we are, there is danger of becoming more and more out of joint with that life of serenity which Christ so clearly exemplified before us.

Hypertrophy of a complex is a very common thing. What appears to be harmless hobbies have been ridden to death. Even devotion to a worthy cause may become fanaticism. Overdoing economy results in stinginess. And I might add here, by way of awfully vital application, that whoever loves money so much that no tithing is paid on it, is feeding a morbid complex that is on the borderland of insanity. And it is no wonder that in the end a miser sees only pictures of starvation before him. His soul is warped. The real reason why these "tightwads" do not become utterly bereft of mental balance, is because they exercise constantly the assurance to themselves that some day they will square up—that some day they will "pay their tithing"—that some day, perhaps when another ship comes in, they will "remember God." Their conscience on this matter not being wholly dead is the thing which makes a subcenter of their complex and holds insanity in check; but let this passion of money-saving, book-collecting, lust indulgence, injury brooding, etc., once break loose from its chain of "honor," and it takes the center of the stage and is the only thing that occupies the man's waking and semisleeping moments. The man's personality is disintegrated. In other words, Mr. Hyde has won, or the Devil has taken possession.

We are not to overlook this very important moral phase of our subject. If physical degeneracy is the cause of much of our mental sickness, such as the transmission of syphilitic effects to the third and fourth generation, then it may be that the child or even the adult is not responsible for its abnormal mental condition. And it seems that at times "breakdowns" come to persons who have been victims of overwork, who have not outraged their conscience but have collapsed in the march of duty. Of these and similar cases we do not speak when we refer to a man who has bound his conscience in order to let his baser self lift the trapdoor that admits a subcenter to become the leading spirit of his life.

Classification of Complexes

It is interesting to the student to know that the complexes may be classified, for convenience sake, into essential, desirable, useful, harmless, and morbid. A morbid complex, if not duly controlled, may easily become malignant; that is, the person affected may become insane. But it is also true that any kind of complex may become morbid and then malignant. And Hart says that insanity is the result of a conflict between "primitive instinct" and "herd instinct." While I cannot develop this thought here, yet it is interesting to know that Doctor Freud, the founder of psychoanalysis, resolves all primitive instincts into sex instincts; but few of his followers go as far as this.

To write in common terms it may be said that a conflict in the mind precedes a mental breakdown. The normal self, that should rule our actions at times may be called upon to fight the usurpation of some emotion or thought that should not control us. If the invader wins, mental illness, temporary or permanent, results.

We have concrete cases illustrative of this condition in the moral or religious world. Without doubt Carrie Nation, who attempted to put saloons out of existence with a hatchet, had so long brooded over the fate of her son that she became obsessed and morbid. In this light, omitting the religious glamour, we may suppose that Napoleon and William of Germany were partially crazy. A man may become a fanatic is his so-called devotion to God. Still I think that when we pass judgment on man's religious conduct, we had better move slowly, for the thing has been carried so far that the prophets of the Bible have been by certain German psychologists pronounced insane.

Changes in the Insane

Mr. Hart speaks of the insane as follows:

"The patients have lost the gregarious instincts of the normal man, and the sanctions of the traditional conduct have no longer any significance for them. In the milder cases this shows itself as a loss of interest in the affairs of their fellows, a tendency to be solitary and unsociable, an atrophy of their affection for friends and relations, and an indifference to the ordinary conventions of society. In the advanced cases the change is much more marked, and the mind is completely withdrawn from participation in the life of the head. The code of conduct imposed by convention and tradition no longer regulates the patient's behavior, and he becomes slovenly, filthy, and shameless."

One who is familiar with the disease of which we write, notes how strikingly true are the words of Mr. Hart; but we should move carefully in our judgment of others who we may think fill to the letter the mold so skillfully made by this writer. It is only when these tendencies and characteristics become malignant that real mental unbalance takes place. Not everyone who is filthy or secluded or disregards the conventionalities of life is "crazy." Many a great man of the past has had peculiarities and eccentricities. For one I do not believe that Shakespeare's immortal Hamlet was "mad"; yet we hear him say that he had lost interest in the common affairs of men. We know of a missionary who always, when possible, slept with his head toward the north. It was only yesterday, as it were, that the papers shouted out the fact that Woodrow Wilson while in Europe wore, on one occasion, one leg of his trousers turned up. Even Jesus went off alone, stood silent before Pilate, wept, and did other nonconventional things.

A Ruling Self in Man

There is in man a ruling self. Many names could be given this power. When it is no longer strong enough to enforce its authority, chaos has entered the life. Confusion, whether it be in the mind or in the home or in the world at large, is a form of unbalance. Discipline is the greatest thing in the world.

The antidote to soul strife is the removal of real grievances (change the environment if possible) and the strengthening of the central authority. That somewhat militant song we hear so often nowadays, sung by the male voice, gives us a key in the words, "I am captain of my soul!" Paul had acquired this command, and was great. Hear him on his departure for that wicked city which would try the very strength of Jesus himself—hear him say: "But none of these things move me." What is this wonderful thing called "me"—"I"?

Restoring the Balance

It is right here that I am giving you the most valuable part of my paper. How can we restore this balance? What can be done to remove the stain from Lady Macbeth's hand, take from Macbeth's sight the ghost of Banquo, wipe away the tears of Ophelia? What will restore normal reaction? The answer is—alter one or another of the antagonists so that incompatibility no longer exists. And you may say that such a thing is easily said but not easily done. I answer that Christ did it, and that his disciples did it, and that through his latter-day prophet God has said that "the days have come when according to men's faith it shall be done unto them." Why then should we think it a thing impossible for God to restore health to the mentally sick? Why should we think it impossible or improbable for him to perform to-day, through his disciples, the same kind of wonders he performed in like manner in former days? So far as this church is concerned, it is committed to the belief that God is unchangeable and that Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.

"An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." Then why not slow down when, running with full steam over the precipice, we see the danger hand or hear the voice of warning? Nature puts out her red lights all along the way. The trouble is we pass them unheeded and only stop when we are stopped. Those sleepless nights, weird dreams, dull headaches, mental aberrations, etc., are so many voices pleading with us to change the course, take in sail, put on the brakes, or in some way alter the mode of living. In the physical world the same thing takes place, by way of warnings. The fluttering hand and heart cries to the coffee or tea fiend, "Quit, or suffer." Often that tired, limpy feeling is the voice of nature saying, "Retire to sleep early or collapse."

Environment Cure

The subject of environment has never received the attention it should receive in the cure of diseases. We read of Christ going to hell and think that because he was not adversely influenced by his environment that we can endure all sorts of strains and not succumb to them. This theory does not work out in fact. So one of the first treatments given to a mental case is to change his environment externally and internally. I cannot present here the details of this move.

To quote Hart again: "The primitive instincts cannot presumably be altered, and the attack would therefore have to be directed against the traditions and codes which obtain their forces from the operation of herd instinct." Therefore, strengthen the central authority, for "unless this is done the policy of indulging primitive instinct by relaxing the pressure to which tradition and codes have subjected it, can lead to nothing but general demoralization."

Perfect Mental Men Scarce

I question whether it is any more possible to find a perfect mental man than it is to find a perfect physical man. It seems to me that the manner in which the generations of the past have come up utterly precludes even the hope of discovering perfection this side the grave. And it is because of these intervening stages between actual insanity and perfect sanity, and no known remedy for these shortcomings, that we find so many cases of breaking and entering from the abnormal life into the normal.

No normal man can study abnormal psychology with his Bible in mind and fail to marvel at the wonderful manner in which one is sustained by the other. It is well said that Jesus is the Savior of the world, especially of them that believe. And of course the word Jesus here refers to his system of philosophy, or teachings. Many an unfortunate person has become obsessed with the thought that he has committed the unpardonable sin. Of course if this thought is a true one, that is the end of controversy. But it is not a true thought. The Lord said that every sin except one shall be forgiven either in this world or the world to come—provided the proper repentance is forthcoming. When these weeping, pitiable creatures can be made to see this fact, they are healed. Take the warning of Paul—"Let not the sun go down upon your wrath." Here is prevention. A road which leads to the madhouse is the continuous nourishing of anger. Forgiveness, as taught in the Lord's prayer, is a prevention of many a mental collapse. Purity of living, as urged upon all followers of Christ, is a bolt against many forms of mental diseases. Meanings of startling significance speak to us in such statements as these: "Let your moderation be known unto all men." "Keep thyself pure." "Saints should be cheerful in their warfare." "Have faith in God." "Perfect love casteth out fear." "Though your sins be as scarlet they shall be as white as snow." "In me ye might have peace." "Rejoice evermore." "Pray without ceasing." These and hundreds of other teachings of Jesus and his disciples might be called the panacea of all mental ills, if observed in time.

We should not pass heedlessly over the cry of the sick man, of Christ's day—"Lord, if I have wronged any man I will restore to him fourfold." And in this restoring we see the removing of mental pressure. This thing had been wearing on his mind; his conscience had been suffering. He felt that he was only half a man because of his dishonesty. When he cleaned up he became his true self; in other words, his central authority was strengthened. The principle of repentance has a tremendous bearing on the prevention of both physical and mental diseases. The redress of grievances, by removing injurious pressure, is a first step in treatment of mental illness. For the cause of growth of morbid complexes is, as a rule, either illegitimate pressure, or legitimate pressure carried too far.

Undue Regard for Convention

Undue regard for tradition and convention, becoming a slave to customs, as so many do, is a source of pressure that pushes, oftentimes, a subcenter to the surface and results in mania, one or many. A woman worries so much about keeping her house up to the so-called proper standard of cleanliness that she loses her reason over the matter, and we see her spending hours of the day sweeping her front steps lest a germ might be brought into her home. The Pharisees who were always straining gnats out of their drink were in part crazy. Right here it may be somewhat vaguely said that the old reformers who clung so tenaciously to the thought that God would never again reveal his will to the children of men; Luther, Wesley, Calvin, and others, who were so influenced by the traditions of the past that they advocated teachings out of harmony with the Word of God, such as sprinkling, Calvinistic predestination, silent God theory, etc., were in a sense as fanatical (and fanaticism is a form of insanity (as the man who leaps so far away from tradition as to swing the pendulum completely from sight on the other side of grave questions. The person who is coming to us every day with dreams which she claims are direct from God to her, or the man who is always having visions which to him appear divine, arouses in the thinking mind a suspicion that something is wrong somewhere. And this is not said to discredit the belief in spiritual dreams and visions.

Another has spoken so much more cleverly than I can speak, I want to reproduce his language here:

"The source of an abnormal pressure is the weakness of the ruling self, which, led astray by the desire for finality, leans exclusively on tradition and convention, instead of trying to walk, in part at least, by its own inward light. And the effect of the pressure which it exerts is to increase its own weakness for repression, when carried too far, starves and stunts natural tendency, with the result that, if the pressure is evenly distributed, growth is arrested, and if it is unevenly distributed, certain tendencies only being selected for repression, growth becomes inharmonious and one-sided, and balance and symmetry are lost. But whatever tends to arrest or distort the growth of the soul must weaken the central authority; for the ruling self is the whole personality, just as in a well-ordered commonwealth the whole community, acting through a hierarchy of administrative nerve centres, is the state."

The Secret of Prevention

Foster mental and spiritual growth. This is the secret of the prevention and the cure of mental illness.

To quote again:

"The potentialities of the soul are limitless, and the process of realizing them is a veritable adventure in the infinite. If we would attain to sanity, the sanity of spiritual health, we must pursue that adventure to its limitless limit. We must always, and at all costs, resist the lure of finality. Devotion to an unattainable ideal alone can make us sane. If we forswear the service of the ideal and try to content ourselves with finite ends, the worst type of dissociation, dissociation of the actual from the ideal self, may be our doom."

"Self-integration, which is the true antidote to insanity, in every sense of that word, is to be achieved only by realizing the limitless possibilities that are wrapped up in the human embryo; by growing into oneness with that soul of all things which is the true self of each of us."

"The goal is unattainable, yet to pause in the pursuit of it is to bring disharmony, or the menace of disharmony, into one's life."

This God in us, this conscience, which inaptly perhaps may be called the voice of God speaking to himself within us, is the lawful ruler of our whole life. When we rebel against him, or it, we sow the first seed of disharmony. In other words, we transgress law, we sin; for sin is transgression of law, says Paul, and he adds, "and the wages of sin is death," and we add, death to perfect sanity.

We come back to the starting point, as it were, with proof of the premise which has been laid in the mind of every real Latter Day Saint; it is, that in the gospel of Jesus Christ is found the guide to a sane, peaceful, happy life. The soul, the inner man, the ego, must assert its supremacy over each of the subordinate centers and so prevent any one of them from absorbing the attention to the detriment of other demands on us. So long as legitimate subcenters are energizing themselves under the direction of the Holy Spirit, working for the good of the whole body, mind and spirit, morbidity and malignant conclusions will not obtain. A world of meaning is locked up in the instruction of that master mind, Paul the Apostle: "let us go on unto perfection."

If we do not stop in the way; if we go on to find the "end of an endless quest," if we continue to grow Godward, live in the Infinite, we need not fear that any power will unseat our reason. In other words, we shall know ourselves and be master of ourselves.

In Order to Know, We Must Do

By J. E. Vanderwood

The church should be a very prominent factor in the adjusting of the social and economic problems of the world.

To-day we are confronted with many problems that will require the very best there is in us. Shall we meet them manfully? Without question we will be called upon to declare ourselves either for or against the methods that are being employed in the solution of these august problems. Are we in the proper frame of mind to deal wisely, manfully, and successfully with the issues that at present confront, not only the church, but the world? If we are not, what preparation are we making that will enable us to meet successfully the emergencies that will and must arise? We need not try to beg the question, because the consequences of our own action in this matter cannot be escaped. The hour has struck when our standard of efficiency must be raised. Are we conscious of the needs of the present hour? and are we wisely preparing and planning our work? We cannot longer afford to lean upon our oars and drift with the tide, nor yet, can we afford to be self-satisfied and at the same time be unable to give a logical and sound reason for the hope that is in us. The present hour demands that we shall be men and women of courage, of faith, and of integrity. The time is now when we must meet every issue fairly, squarely, courageously, and manfully.

The Handwriting on the Wall

Personally, I do not wish to be an alarmist; I would much rather be a pacifist, but if I am able to read the handwriting on the wall of the temple of time at all correctly, the world is confronting a crisis such as history has never chronicled. To me, the question that above all else should concern us is: What part shall we, as a people, have in averting the dire consequences that must eventually accompany or follow, such a crisis? Are we alert to the conditions that confront us? And are we moving as the children of light, or are we in the profound sleep of self-satisfaction and thus unconsciously drifting toward the bowlders? It is of great importance that we awaken to the real situation, and it may at least be well for us to bestir ourselves and view the matter sincerely and thoughtfully.

No One Can Assist Except—

While I am fully convinced that the church is probably in the best condition it has been in since the Restoration of 1830, yet I am strongly convinced that it is far beneath the condition it might have attained to if its ministry and membership had availed themselves of their most sacred privilege. The church should be a very prominent factor in the adjusting of the social and economic problems of the world, but we will fail of our purpose if we do not reach the standard of efficiency that is set for us. How easily we forget the most important things in life! As a reminder, however, it is well to observe that in the eleventh section of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants the good Lord has really given us a program for the processes of qualification on our part, and for the unfoldment of the church at large. He says that "no one can assist in this work unless he is humble and full of love, having faith, hope, and charity, being temperate in all things, whatsoever shall be intrusted unto his care."

Now we may try to assist, yes, more than that, we may think we are assisting, but if we lack the qualification specified in the revelation just quoted, we are unable to assist in the work. There are, let it be understood, helps that hinder. And when we essay to move along lines other than the Lord appoints, we hinder rather than help. But when we move in keeping with the spirit of his precept and example, we can be of assistance and exceedingly helpful in the work before us.

Now, to what degree are we to be of assistance to the world in solving the problems that at the present time are vexing the nations? It is evident that the church of Christ, (who is the Prince of Peace,) should be of especial assistance in the solving of the world problems. How lamentable it is that in the past we have not always reached the maximum of efficiency. We have in too many instances been content to move along in the common or ordinary way, and have thus neglected, in part at least, not only the command to be humble and full of love, but also the command to study all good books, and to make ourselves acquainted with the histories, laws, and languages of nations; to understand the people and their needs, and thus become qualified for the emergencies that at the present time are of paramount importance. The most lamentable thing connected with this matter is, that by reason of our failure to study as the Lord directed, we have, in a measure at least, disqualified ourselves for the work before us.

It is, of course, never too late to do better, and it is the earnest expectation of the writer that we will redouble our efforts, and thus spare no energy that is necessary to enable us to redeem, so far as it is possible, the time that we have permitted to pass by unused. It should ever be remembered by us that a knowledge of the issues confronting us is vastly important, but it is of far greater importance that this knowledge be supplemented by the divine nature. For according to the beatitudes, it is the pure in heart who shall be privileged to see God, and to enjoy his benedictions.

We Must Demonstrate the Law of Stewardships

It remains, therefore, for us to demonstrate the law of stewardships. It remains for us to put into effect the social and economic aspects of our religion, so that our neighbors may be able to see the feasibility of our philosophy and be able to discern therein a remedy for the social and economic ills of the world about us. We must demonstrate our religion or fail of our purpose. You see it matters but little how beautiful the philosophy or theory may be, if it is not fully demonstrated it will fail to attract mankind, and convince them that we have been sent of God. We must learn not only to say, but to do according to that which is written. Nor should we do simply because it is a duty, an obligation that is thrust upon us; no, indeed, we should do the thing because we actually believe in it, and because we take a delight in doing that which our blessed Lord has said will enable us to triumph and thereby become a factor in blessing the race of man—that will make us an agency in establishing his kingdom upon earth.

We should then make every effort possible to qualify for the work that is before us. There is much to be done if we would realize the redeemed Zion. We can therefore no longer afford to be contented with the mediocre or commonplace attainments in life. If we are to be of assistance to our fellow men in solving the problems that at the present time so perplex the nations, we must continue to raise our standards of efficiency. We must also apply our philosophy by doing the things that are taught therein, and thus establish a Zion out of which the "perfection of beauty" may justly shine. How slow of comprehension we mortals be! Daniel the prophet has said that "many shall be purified and made white, and tried; but the wicked shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand." If we are wise we will prepare ourselves for service, and then, because we are able to understand the signs of these times, we will do the things that will make our fondest dreams a reality.

It is a very common thing for us, while trying to convert the worldly man to the outward principles and ordinances of the gospel to quote John 7:17, which says: "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself." We use it, too, with telling effect. We insist that if men and women will believe the message from the depths of their hearts, if they will properly amend their ways and their doings, and will follow Christ through the waters of regeneration, they will receive the seal of the Spirit, which will confirm them in the truthfulness of the gospel. And many are the testimonies that we hear that justify us in this course of procedure. But there is a much larger application of the text; are we ready to hear it? And herein is the crux of the whole matter.

The good Lord has said it is his will that the land in Jackson County, and surrounding counties, be purchased, and that the law of stewardships be executed. Are we ready to do his will in this matter? Occasionally we hear some one say, "Well, I don't know whether that is required or not. I really don't know much about it." Bless your soul, you never will know the blessedness that shall attend the children of Zion until you have learned to do, and have done the will of the Father in this matter. We shall know the blessedness of Zion when we have done the things that make for Zion, and not until then.

Yes, it will require sacrifice, but he that is not willing to make sacrifice for the good of his fellow men shall never be permitted to find a place in the Zion of God. The Psalmist recorded the words of inspiration thus: "Gather my saints together unto me, who have made a covenant with me by sacrifice." It is quite needful that we learn that there is a joy that comes of service that is nowhere else to be found. There is also a joy that comes of work that surpasses all the pleasures of earth, and when we come to do right because we love it above all else in the world, we will find therein a joy unspeakable.

We Must Be Able to Perform

The problem then resolves itself to this: The world is confronted with a great crisis; we should be of assistance in solving that problem and in averting an impending calamity in that crisis. In order to do this we must become possessors of knowledge, hence the need of preparation and study. We must be able to perform, hence the need of action. We must acquaint ourselves with histories, laws, governments, etc., that we may be able to deal wisely and successfully with every matter. The glory of God is intelligence; we must therefore become intelligent if we would reflect the glory of God. But this intelligence must be coupled with humility, love, faith, hope, charity, and temperance, if we are to be fully qualified for the important work that lies immediately before us. It is our privilege, aye more than that, it is our duty, to assist the world of mankind in solving the problems that confront them by enabling them to substitute the higher for the lower, the true for the false, and help them to acquire the nature of the Son of God.

We can make Zion a reality by learning first how to do the will of God, and then doing it. There can be no short cuts, no byways to the establishment of Zion. The law must be fulfilled in our lives. When I have fully partaken of the nature of Christ, when I have drunk deeply from the fountain of living truth, when I have thoroughly bathed in the stream of love, then, and not until then will I be able to impart unto my fellow men the real life of the Master.

Zion proper is the pure in heart. The city of Zion is the habitation of the pure in heart. Where the pure in heart dwell there will God dwell also; and where God dwells there can be no curse; and where there is no curse blessedness must reign supreme. Zion, therefore, is the solution of the social and economic problems that confront us; but let it be remembered that Zion will never be a reality until we have learned to do the will of God. With the doing there will come a knowledge, a power, a blessedness, that will enrich our experiences and qualify us for noble service in life. In order to know, we must do; it is the doing of God's will that will give us a knowledge of God. No one will ever know God until he has learned to do the things that the gospel of Christ enjoins upon us.

The Power of the Devil

By A. W. Kelley

We must take great care lest we be deceived by evil powers.

John the Revelator says he saw three unclean spirits like frogs, and he says they were spirits of devils, working miracles, and they are going to deceive the kings of the earth and the whole world. Why were they like frogs? Well, frogs can live in the water or out of the water, and devils can live in a church or out of a church so long as it is not the Church of Jesus Christ.

Now if these devils can get a man or woman to work through, they will call up father or mother, or any friend you want them to, and say it is surely father's voice or mother's voice, and thereby deceive. They will tell that when they die their spirits are right here among us, and perfectly happy; that there will not be any resurrection, but always live right here and have big times.

These devils are great imitators of any man's or woman's voice, and thereby deceive the people. Some of them are writing mediums; they will imitate any man's or woman's handwriting.

Christ said the Devil was a liar from the beginning, and so he is. He is a cunning old rascal, and he will do all the damage he can. He has had about all nations into war. He knows that all who are killed in battle cannot take any hand in his overthrow.

My brothers and sisters, if we are faithful and put forth every effort to carry on God's work, pay our tithing, and make freewill offerings, and help build up Zion so the Saints can gather home where they will have a place of safety, when Satan makes up his mind to do mighty miracles, even to bringing fire down from heaven in the sight of men to deceive them, then men will say, it is the great power of God, and they will decree that all must have a mark in the hand and forehead; if they don't submit to that they cannot buy or sell.

So you see the great need of Zion where we can get our own living without the help of the dragon, and when Zion is all ready for the Saints there will be a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night; then the nations will say, Let us not go up to fight Zion, for they are terrible.

After Christ was baptized and had fasted forty days and nights, Satan appeared to him and he knew Christ was hungry. He said, You are hungry; you command these stones to be made bread. But Christ would not gratify him, so he said, "It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Then he was with the Devil on top of the pinnacle of the temple. "Now," he said, "if you are the Son of God, cast yourself down, for it is written God will give his angels charge concerning you, lest you cast your foot against a stone." Christ said, "It is also written, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God."

No doubt the Devil thought if he could get Christ to jump off, it might kill him, and there would be no Christ to bother them. He could not do anything with Christ that way, so he tried on another track. He took him up on an exceedingly high mountain, and showed him all the kingdoms of the world. "Now," he said, "if you will fall down and worship me, I will give you all the kingdoms of this world." That was a big offer, wasn't it?

Christ did not tell the Devil he did not have them to give, but Christ knew he would have these kingdoms until a certain time, then the Devil would be cast into prison for one thousand years. Then we will have peace on earth and good will to men.

Christ told him: "Get thee behind me, Satan."

Christ had power over them. He went to the tombs one time and there he found a crazy man or lunatic, and the people had bound him with chains, but he would break them, and they could do nothing with him. When Christ met him, he asked the man who he was; he said, "Legion," and "all the devils besought him saying, Send us into the swine, that we may enter into them. And forthwith Jesus gave them leave." After the devils got possession of the swine they ran down over the bank into the sea and were drowned. But the devils were not drowned. No doubt they are around about us now looking for some one through whom they can work.

Where did these devils come from? How came they to be there?

I think John the Revelator makes it plain. He says:

"There was war in heaven; Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon and his angels fought against Michael; and the dragon prevailed not against Michael. . . . Neither was there place found in heaven for the great red dragon, who was cast out; that old serpent called the Devil, and also called Satan, which deceiveth the whole world; he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him. . . . Woe to the inhabitants of the earth, yea, and they who dwell upon the islands of the sea, for the Devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time."—Revelation 12: 6, 7, 8, 12.

Now we see where the Devil came from and he got right after the church of Christ, and he will continue to get after her until Christ binds him.

Now God made man a free moral agent. That is how Adam and Eve went out of the Garden of Eden. They listened to the evil power and they had to leave the garden and die.

If we use our agency right we will get back to God, but if we don't we lose our salvation, and when the Lord comes we will cry for the rocks and mountains to fall on us to hide us from his sight. Why? Because we would be ashamed to see him—the good, loving Savior who gave his life for us that we might have everlasting life in his kingdom.

Elder Amos M. Chase left Lamoni November 3, for his mission field in Maryland. He expects to make a brief call at Buffalo, and perhaps one or two other points en route.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

DO CHRIST'S TEACHINGS INDUCE SOCIAL PROGRESS?

[Recently in the Appeal to Reason, a Socialist publication, there appeared a debate between Scott Nearing and Percy Ward. Scott Nearing took the position that the social ethics of Jesus make for human progress. Percy Ward denied this. In the course of the debate, Mr. Ward attacked the teachings of Christianity on the grounds that it refers to the kingdom of heaven, with God as a king, and his whole concept is monarchical, rather than social or democratic. To this argument Professor Nearing replied as follows]:

I was rather surprised at his interest in the politics of heaven; in his emphasis upon God as a king; in his question as to whether heaven was a Soviet Republic; as to whether it had a house of representatives and a senate. While I am a member of a political party, I should hope at some stage of the game to shake off political machinery. I assume that the theological issues which he raises there are really not the legitimate subjects for the debate, because the debate is about the practice of Christ's teachings.

Now, the phraseology, "the kingdom of heaven," was the only kind of a phraseology that you would expect at a time when they had nothing but kingdoms. If the angel was stationed at the gate of paradise with a flaming sword to-day, I suppose he would be given some kind of a machine gun, and the poisonous gas of modern warfare. But, when you are speaking or writing of predemocratic social life, naturally you do not use the phraseology of democracy.

Frank Crane has made the same objection to God and democracy that my opponent makes in regard to these phrases. However, the character of the phrases, it seems to me, is of less moment than the meaning of the phrases. Take the reference that Christ makes to God. I think, without a single exception—if I am wrong I will be corrected by my opponent—he refers to "my father," or the "heavenly father" and not to the king of heaven. The phrases "king of kings" and "lord of lords" are Old Testament phrases, like a good part of the very theology that Mr. Ward uses. The phraseology of the New Testament is quite a different phraseology, with regard to the relation of God to his children.

"Would the practice of Christ's teaching make for social progress?" Says my opponent, on the same theory you might say that the teachings of Mohammed, or of Joseph Smith, would make for social progress, because, said he, you have picked out a few of the teachings of Jesus, and ignored the rest. After that, he said, here are a few awkward teachings of Christ which my opponent has overlooked. Then he proceeded to pick out a few of the teachings of Jesus himself and ignored the rest.

Now, I want to meet the questions that he has raised, first, by saying to him—by the way, I cannot answer specifically because I do not know the teachings of Mohammed nor the teachings of Joseph Smith—but I want to say to him that the practice of the teachings of Buddha would make for social progress. The practice of the teachings of Loa-tze would make for social progress. The practice of the teachings of Brahma would make for social progress. And I suppose if I knew what these other chaps taught, I could say the same thing about them. Unfortunately, I cannot speak with any authority about them. But in general, if you take the teachings of any of the great, ethical leaders of the world, and put them in practice, they would make for social progress.

But surely, he is not justified in saying that the practice of Christ's teachings has produced social damnation in the past, including the present war, because the teachings of Christ have never been put into practice, nor anything remotely approaching the teachings of Christ!

Now, the question that we ought to debate is: Would the practice of Christ's teaching make for social progress? I presented what I thought were three of the most salient features of Christ's teachings—his teaching with regard to material things; his teaching with regard to our fellow man; and his teaching with regard to what my opponent calls non-resistance, which I speak of as overcoming evil with good. I thought I made it clear that that was what I was talking about. "I say unto you, That you resist not evil"—my opponent stopped the quotation there—"but that you overcome evil with good."

I want simply to reiterate for a moment what I said in my first talk, that I believe that the attempt which we are making at the present time to meet evil with evil, to meet force with force, to meet barbarity with barbarity, and conquest with conquest, will simply result in the complete destruction of the contending parties. I believe we can never have progress until one of the parties is willing to advance to a higher standard. I am perfectly willing to listen to the contention, listen to the objection, that our present society cannot progress, but that it must slough off into a period of negation—into a slough of social desolation. I am perfectly willing to listen to that argument. But it is not possible, it seems to me, to be blind to the fact that you would either meet evil with evil, or you must meet evil with good. That is, you must either meet a man with his own weapons, or you must present some new weapons which in your judgment are more effective than his. Jesus said: If a man smite you on one cheek, turn to him also the other. Yes, better than smiting him back is to turn to him also the other cheek, because the chances that he will strike you again are extremely remote.

Now, as to the question: "If a man hate not his mother, his father, or his own life." That really is not fair, because the word hate there means not hate, but means that if a man does not value my service more than these things. It is not an adjuration to hate. It is an adjuration to choose between one form of service and another form of service. I contend, in reply to my friend, that he has picked out certain passages which are not typical; that the statements that I made are more typical of what Christ taught—of the spirit of his teaching.

... Now, I want to take him up on another point upon which he laid a great deal of stress—this question about "Our Father which art in heaven. Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven"; about the effectiveness of prayer; and so on. That is the subject we should debate. I have only four minutes left, and that is one of the most important issues that have been raised. It is not particularly pertinent to this debate, by the way, but it is the most important issue that has been raised. I want to contend—and it will give my opponent an interesting twenty minutes—I want to contend, in the first place—of course I believe in the survival of personality and he does not—I want to contend, in the first place, that what happens to us in this particular life, is a detail compared with what will happen to us in the entire period of our existence.

In the second place, I want to contend that the thing which he calls prayer; which the American Indian calls "understanding the Great Spirit"; and which I prefer to call understanding life—I want to contend that that is the most important single activity of man. The most important single activity of man is the time that he spends in the contemplation of the cosmos, whatever form that contemplation may take. . . . You will find that in the attempts that man, himself, makes to get into contact with that life force, are the most important attempts of his life. They are more important than the attempts to make money, to feed his stomach, or to do any other single thing. And, if a man has to choose between serving that force and making money; going to the mill or doing any other thing; his choice should be made that way, because that is the eternal thing, and that is the important thing.

JEWES AND PALESTINE

Catholic opinion about the rehabilitation of the Jewish homeland.

We all take a deep interest in the Holy Land and therefore are anxious to know how the project for planting the Jews in Palestine, announced to the Zionist organization by Mr. Balfour in 1917, and made a feature of British policy, will work. His Eminence Cardinal Bourne informed the public, in a vigorous address in Liverpool, that it worked very badly, and he strongly opposed it. In the current issue of the Nineteenth Century and After the Honorable Ormsby Gore, M. P., writing in a calm spirit, enters into the question of "Great Britain, Palestine, and the Jews." He claims that for a non-Jew he has had almost unique opportunities for examining the Jewish problem in its relation to Palestine, and he certainly knows a great deal about the Jews. The present population of Palestine, which is about the size of Wales, is, he says, some six hundred thousand, the majority of whom are Arabic-speaking.

Not Active Proselytizers

Since they were driven out of Palestine by the Romans the Jews have not been active proselytizers. They are subjects of many states, change their domiciles frequently, and are in some lands outcasts, with no abiding home or center. But they are bound together by an all-dominating tradition that "Israel is one" and that they will one day become a true nation with a national home, a national center of thought, activity, and culture. They are not all Zionists, but a good number of them in every country are.

The "Promised Land"

They are taught that they are now in exile, and that Israel will some day be united spiritually and intellectually with a common Jewish home in their "promised land." The Zionist movement is an organization of Jews in every country in the world for the re-creation of a Jewish center in Palestine, with a view to the ultimate evolution of a definite Jewish polity and civilization in that country. To a great many people it is a surprise that the Jews, who seem to be traditionally unfit for agricultural life and who for the most part make their living by trade and commerce, should wish to settle down amidst rural conditions in the Holy Land, but, according to Mr. Ormsby Gore, Zionism in practice means two essential things—an agricultural revival and also a linguistic revival. The Zionists believe that these revivals will develop a type of Jew full of creative energy. Fears have been entertained of a Jewish ascendancy in Palestine, and it is thought that this feeling would accentuate the antagonism of the Arabs. In his address in Liverpool Cardinal Bourne seemed to indicate, from information he had received, that the Jews were buying up the best land, the terms on which they obtained loans being favorable, but Mr. Ormsby Gore says that no sales of real property have been allowed since the British occupation in 1917, and that the Jews possess no more land now than they did before the war. But they cultivate well the land which they hold.

The Jews as Agriculturalists

It is upon the success of the Jew as a peasant cultivator, Mr. Gore says, that the success of the Zionist movement will depend. He appears to think that in this respect the efforts of the Jews will not fail. He believes that the Jew who only wants to make money will go to New York, London, or Paris, but asserts that there are plenty of Jews for whom the Zionist sentiment transcends everything else and who look to it not only for the definite realization of the prophecies of their national religious literature, but as the only means of solving a "Jewish problem" which they know as well as non-Jews exists.

Jewish Belief in Prophecy

The Zionists are convinced that the return to Palestine is a realization of the prophecy contained in the words (Ezekiel 36): "For I will take you from among the Gentiles and will gather you together out of all the countries, and will bring you into your own land . . . and I will give you a new heart, and put a new spirit within you, and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh and will give you a heart of flesh. And I will put my spirit in the midst of you and I will cause you to walk in my commandments, and to keep my judgments and do them. And you shall dwell in the land which I gave to your fathers; and you shall be my people and I will be your God. . . . And I will multiply the fruit of the tree, and the increase of the field, that you bear no more the reproach of famine among the nations." Mr. Gore is evidently of opinion that the Jews will flourish in Palestine. He is sympathetic with them and says nothing of the difficulties that beset them. Yet there can be no doubt that the position they occupy creates difficulties for them and for the British Government. The Arab population do not understand why the British authorities should differentiate to their advantage, and are in a war-like mood, whilst the Christians cannot, of course, expect the Jews to have the desired reverence for the places once sanctified by the presence of the Savior.—Catholic Times and Catholic Opinion, (London, England) October 9, 1920.

BABY MORTALITY

Frank C. Lockwood, dean of the University of Arizona, is quoted in The Literary Digest as stating that it is more dangerous for a baby to be born in America, than it was for our boys in France to enter the first-line trenches. In the army, the machine-gun squads were spoken of as "suicide clubs," but he states the only really eligible person to join such a club is the American baby. He says that no other civilized country has as poor a showing as has the United States, where fourteen babies out of every one hundred die in their first year. Yet this can be prevented, and has been prevented where a sufficient effort has been made. One town having an average of fifteen deaths a year among infants under six years of age, from digestive illness in the summer-time, reduced it by welfare work in 1919, so that only one child was lost. Similar results have been secured elsewhere, but much work and education yet remains to be done.

We are very sorry to learn of the death of Sister Zimmermann, the wife of Bishop John Zimmermann, of Philadelphia, on October 12. We are not informed at this writing, of the cause of her passing away. Her sons are young men from whom we expect to hear in the service of the church. Of her daughters, one is the wife of Albert N Hoxie, the church chorister; the other is the wife of Richard C. Kelley, son of Bishop E. L. Kelley. Her home was always open to the ministry of the church.

THE SEMINAR

Suggestions for Debaters

By J. F. Curtis

Some pertinent suggestions formulated at our request by one of our foremost debaters.

Just when the first debate was held might be interesting to know, but the subject under discussion would be more interesting. In religion as well as in politics debating has had its place. It has been said that there are two sides to every proposition and some propositions may have six or more sides. Preaching is one thing, debating is another; yet in one sense preaching is debating. The preacher is supposed to select a subject and present evidence to sustain his proposition. Where no reply is offered to what is said, that which is presented may look very good and the casual thinker may think that there is only one side to the proposition, but in debate a critical examination is had of that which is presented, and unless what is presented is based on facts, it may be made to look ridiculous indeed.

It frequently happens in debating that one's proposition may be all right, but the one presenting it may not have the evidence in hand with which to sustain it, or with the evidence in hand he may not know how to present it so that it will be clear to others. It is well to know both sides of a proposition before entering into a discussion. However correct your position may be on the subject under consideration, your opponent may offer objections to it, which if not answered properly may mislead the hearers.

Experience in debating is just as necessary as experience in selling, buying, or any line of work. I heard of a mother who said to her son: "Johnnie, don't you go near the water until you learn to swim." We learn as we go along. All men are not preachers, neither are all men debaters, but some have splendid talent which, if properly cultivated, may develop them into good debaters. Not only should one have the facts well in hand but should study well how to present them. A point may be sustained by two or three facts. It seldom happens in debate that it is necessary to tell all one knows about a point in order to sustain it. If too much time is spent on a point, several other points may be neglected. Generally in public discussions the speakers are limited to thirty-minute speeches. It may be necessary to consider several points in one speech. One half of the time should be spent in replying to one's opponent, but the other half should be used in presenting new matter.

A very effective way in answering a speech is to refute the last point made by an opponent while it is fresh in the minds of the audience. If you are successful in this, it will tend to weaken his whole speech. Then consider the rest of the speech.

Our opponents frequently make assertions without offering any proof to sustain their position. In such cases generally about all that is necessary, is to ask for the proof of the statement. It frequently happens, however, that it is necessary to answer an assertion whether any evidence has been presented to sustain it or not, for if you do not answer it, the audience may think that you cannot. Never assert what you cannot prove. If you are in the right you will find facts to sustain you. Be sure of your ground, then take your stand.

Propositions

We are sometimes asked to debate propositions that are one-sided or unfair. Because we have the truth on our side, it does not follow that we are under obligation to debate unfair propositions.

When debating with a minister of another faith, the propositions should cover the differences between the two churches represented. Frequently we have been asked to affirm two propositions to our opponent's one. This is unfair, as the negative of a proposition has the advantage of the closing speech and may present arguments to which you will not have a chance to reply. Equal time should be given to the consideration of each proposition. Much depends on the wording of propositions. The form I use generally is as follows:

Discussion to be held at

First proposition, Resolved, that the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints is in harmony with the Scriptures in origin, organization, doctrine, and practice.

.....affirms.

.....denies.

Second proposition, Resolved, that the (name of church) is in harmony with the Scriptures, in origin, organization, doctrine, and practice.

.....affirms.

.....denies.

Rules to govern in debate.

Each speaker shall choose a moderator and the two selected shall choose a third who shall preside and keep order.

The King James Translation of the Scriptures shall be the standard of evidence in the discussion, but other books and periodicals may be used, but to stand on their merit.

Six sessions of two hours each shall be given to each proposition. Speeches shall be limited to thirty minutes each, alternating. The affirmative to lead and the negative to close. The discussion shall last twelve consecutive days, one session a day beginning (give date) at 8 p. m.

Each person signing these propositions may, if he so chooses, substitute a representative speaker in his stead.

Signed:

(Date.)

It is not always wise to enter into debates. Debates should be held only when circumstances justify. Where possible, it is best to consult with the First Presidency or some member of the Twelve before agreeing to a discussion.

There is a story that Ruskin, after a very long contemplation of one of the first successful flower photographs, exhibited in a shop window, at last tore himself away, asking, "Where is the use of my painting if photography can do things like that?"—a question which, being of course fuel for controversy, is not safe even to quote in the company of artists. But if Ruskin so wondered at a simple photograph of a white clematis, what would he have said to this year's exhibition of the Royal Photographic Society, with its wide range of successes, from X-ray thumb prints to colored transparencies showing the iridescence on a soap bubble? Truly this was a good year to recount the history of photography, the general use of the airplane camera especially marking a new phase.—Christian Science Monitor.

At recent elections, Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan have voted against the importation of liquor. The result will be that the sale, manufacture, and importation of liquor in these four provinces will be prevented for all other purposes than medicinal, sacramental, or scientific. In British Columbia a new act will be passed providing for sale under strict governmental control, and imported only for such governmental sale. In Quebec beer and wine will be for sale, but the sale of stronger liquor will be permitted only on a doctor's prescription. Ontario will vote on the question in April.

AT THE FRONT

A LETTER FROM PAPEETE

[The following from a personal letter by Brother Frank B. Almond contains a number of interesting personal reflections concerning the situation in the Society Islands. —EDITORS.]

This little island is nothing like America. There are no fields, no waving corn, no winding, sweeping rivers, no boundless prairie. One cannot get all this on an island mountain of only thirty-five square miles. But do not imagine it is completely behind the times. Papeete is quite modern—for the South Seas—having electric lights, brick and cement buildings, automobiles, buggies, and a good road. The road goes all round the island, the French Government employing prisoners, and enforcing the natives to build it. The other week I stood on the spot—or thereabouts—where there had been some native Saints murdered many years ago, for refusing to submit to this impressed labor.

Another incident which particularly impressed me was when I visited the cemetery. One quiet Sunday afternoon we went to the cemetery with Brother Karlstrom and others of the missionary force. It is a beautiful cemetery for this island. In one corner rest those of the early missionaries of the English church, who gave their lives willingly that these people might receive the light which was theirs. Here and there rises some monument to a governor, soldier, judge, or other notability. Two large mounds cover the remains of many of the natives who died in the terrible epidemic, two years ago, when it was impossible to bury them in separate graves, and they had to be burned.

But we stood in silent grief before a simple, white gravestone, with the name "Ellis" on it. As we looked down upon that grave, and thought of the work she had done, of the hearts in the island who had learned to love her, of the companion bereft by this affliction, our hearts went up to God in a prayer that the work she had done might not have been done in vain, that peace and strength might be given to Brother Ellis, and—do you blame me?—I prayed God that such a calamity might not befall any of those who had come or who would come. Sacrifice must be made if this work shall go on, but the heart palls before this, the supreme sacrifice.

There are the sites of three branches here: Taronā, Tiona, and Heberona; but Tiona and Heberona are abandoned. Their hillsides no longer echo the singing of the Saints in their little churches. The ruthless hand of the epidemic made terrible inroads into the ranks of our members in Tahiti, and the survivors went away to different islands in the Tuamotu group, leaving the houses with the hope that some day they might return and build up the waste places again. Our house belongs to Taimetua of Tikahau, and it is a comfortable frame house, with a wide porch almost all around. The houses around us are empty, while in the front gardens are the graves of the loved ones who used to play and laugh among the happy homes. In front of our house are four graves, marked by an upturned bottle and a tree.

Taronā, where the mission house stands, lies on the eastern side of Papeete, on ground reclaimed from the sea. If rain falls heavily the land becomes a marsh; if there is an unusually heavy sea, it means possible danger. Heberona is about three miles west of Papeete, and Tiona about the same distance from Heberona.

It has been my happy privilege to meet some splendid Saints among these island people. The wife and the new baby of Paia's have become very dear friends to Mary. Haapae, the sister of Paia, is very much like him, and is a real Latter Day Saint. Tevaete and Pataha are two young people who desire very much to come to Graceland and make themselves of greater value to the work. Tevaete is especially consecrated to the work, going out of the way to do kindnesses to the missionaries and to her own people.

Pataha is a young man, good, clean, and manly, and has been planning for some time to come to America. Both are fit samples of good Latter Day Saint youth, and would win the hearts of all the Saints in Zion.

One of the most irritating customs of the natives—or rather, many of them—and of the French Government officials, is the habit of saying to any request, "Ananahi paha,"—"To-morrow, perhaps." It takes days to get something done that could be done in efficient America in one hour. Efficiency may have been run to the ground in America, but I wish there were more of it in Tahiti.

A FOOT IN THE ISLE OF PINES

First Presidency and Twelve: Have spent a very interesting week, visiting and trying to break down the prejudice that is being shown toward us. It would be a much easier mission for us had we had at least a few Saints living here previous to our coming. It simply means fighting, from the very bottom, tradition and a terribly prejudiced people. Brother McConley will realize what it means to travel on foot in the tropics. Have done my visiting this week on foot. It is very uncomfortable, however, as one looks like the veritable tramp after sweating and plodding on in the dust. But I was amply repaid, and am very glad to say my Santa Barbara audience increased, a few more nonmembers being present.

I (as I usually do) sang a solo before the sermon, and a gentleman from New York, who is here for the winter, who was passing by (a Christian Scientist), came in. He told our neighbor here he heard the best sermon that afternoon that he had ever heard. He seemed to enjoy it and told me he was coming to see me. I relate this to you because of the fact that when he entered the hall, I felt something come over me, the presence of the Spirit, so after all, it is to God we owe the praise.

I only have a few hours left after afternoon service before I must leave for Nueva Gerona. It is sixteen miles to the house I hold services in, and I was surely glad to see about twenty persons present, which as I have often written you is a splendid congregation for the island—on special occasions, such as Decoration Day, when special speakers are in vogue, thirty to fifty people being a good crowd. My congregation at Gerona was from (that is originated from) the Caman island, an island governed by the British; a humble, splendid class of people, though poor, so I am certainly glad that another of the nations, or peoples, has the privilege of hearing the restored gospel. They are mostly "Church of God," and Presbyterian people. May they be guided to accept the "light" is our prayer.

Our Adventist friends, who have been holding meetings for about thirteen years, had about six at their meetings, so we have great cause to thank God, and desire your prayers in our behalf.

In gospel bonds,

WILFRED D. TORDOFF.

SANTA BARBARA, ISLE OF PINES.

It is the proud boast of many business firms that they have served the public for over a hundred years, or more, some even two or three hundred years, but the cake is taken easily by the Brandon Flint-Working Industry in Suffolk, England, which has been carried on continuously for several thousand years, and the workmen claim that they are the lineal descendants of the flint workers of the neolithic age. The picks which they use to excavate the flints from the beds of chalk are of precisely the same pattern as the neolithic implements formed from the antlers of the red deer. At the present day the flint workers are employed in making gunflints, of which they can turn out 16,000 to 18,000 a week. They also get the credit of making palæolithic and neolithic flint weapons, to satisfy the demand for "pre-historic weapons," which are said to puzzle the very elect.—Christian Science Monitor.

Our Cradle Roll a Child Welfare Activity

We feel our church people will be taking an increasing interest in the work of our cradle roll as they understand more clearly its relation to the welfare of our children. They will be glad to assist our cradle roll workers in every possible way, in order that the records and reports sent in by the latter may be complete enough to accomplish the good intended.

In the first place the cradle roll visitor who is imbued with the spirit of her special work, will find it a pleasure to be a friend to the expectant mother. The many good things which may be brought to the attention of such a woman at such a time may form the basis for a knowledge of her special needs, the care which she should give her body in order that she might bring forth a healthy child in safety to herself, the spiritual exaltation which has its direct reaction not only upon her own happiness but the heritage of her child, and the establishments of high and lofty ideals towards which she and her companion should ever move in their sacred privilege of parenthood. The Government pamphlet on "Prenatal care," by Mrs. Max West, which may be obtained free of cost by writing to the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor, Washington, District of Columbia, is most desirable. Another one which may be obtained similarly is "Maternal mortality from all conditions connected with childbirth in the United States and certain other countries," by Grace L. Meigs, M. D. It will contain information which will help the prospective mother to avoid the things which threaten her life and health. The reading of such books as George E. Dawson's The Right of the Child to Be Well Born (Funk), M. J. Guyer's Being Well Born (Bobbs-Merrill), Frances G. Jewett's The Next Generation (Ginn), Norah H. March's Towards Racial Health (Routledge), or David S. Jordan's Heredity of Richard Roe, (a story which shows forth the principles and facts of heredity and eugenics) will give the mother a broad and intelligent outlook upon maternity and its responsibilities.

As the cradle roll worker calls upon the newly made mother and leaves with her the little "leaflet" prepared by our department, as well as the "message" from the health department, the mother begins to understand the deep interest taken in her and her child by her sisters in the church, as well as by the church itself. She begins to understand that there are forces at work about her which will help her to care for her child in a way that will bring about its best development, and she responds gladly to the opportunity to put herself and the child in correspondence with those forces.

The birth record is made out in duplicate, one copy lodging with the church recorder, and the other with the church health department. A specially commissioned representative from the latter department looks over the records carefully and wherever a need is indicated, immediate correspondence is established, counsel and advice given, instructions inclosed, and everything that is possible to be done from a distance is done for the child so recorded and reported. The health records are to be made out at later periods—when the child is six months, again when it is one year old, again at two years, and at three. Thus the health department is able to keep a close and intimate watchcare over the child from its birth up through its developing years, and to join with the Women's Department in striving to bring to bear upon it all possible influences for good.

At the age of three years, the child is reported to the nearest Sunday school, the cradle roll visitor making a special effort to see that it is properly enrolled as a member of the beginner department. Its religious education and training is recognized to be a very vital and essential element in its development, and the Women's Department is deeply interested in seeing that it has every advantage the church has to offer along this line.

In connection with what is done for the child and mother by the church health department, the visitor recommends to the mother the course in "Child care" put out by our department. The readiness with which these mothers respond has been a source of gratification to our leaders, for it shows that women are eager to avail themselves of study material and opportunity to develop along the lines of their life work?

Besides the course above mentioned, there are the pamphlets "Infant care," and "Child care," both by Mrs. Max West, of which single copies may be obtained free by addressing the Children's Bureau, Washington, District of Columbia. It is to be regretted that copies of these valuable pamphlets cannot be obtained in quantities, so that our cradle roll visitors may carry them with them into the homes of the mothers. However it costs but a stamp for the visitor or the mother to obtain the needed copy in each individual case, and the pamphlets are well worth the time and the expenditure.

Then there is always available the very wide bibliography which added to the home library will furnish the mother with information about her developing family, its feeding and nutrition, its mental unfoldment, and its spiritual training. The titles of many helpful books of special value to mothers will be found in the lists printed in the back of our new Year-book, which is just off the press. Cradle roll workers, who are in truth and reality interested in the welfare of the children under their care and observation, will try to encourage the mothers to read a few of these books every year. Nothing will do so much to give the desired attitude towards children as to study the best books written upon the subjects of their training and care.

Before closing we wish to call the attention of the cradle roll visitors to a few mistakes which have been made in some of the reports which have been turned in. In the first place we deeply regret that the words "and health" are upon the first, or "birth" record. It has proven to be the cause of some confusion. We have instructed those in charge of sending out these record blanks in the future, to cross out the words "and health" from the "birth" record, and thus we will have just the two different records—the "birth" record to be filled out upon the first visit to the new baby, and the "health" records, which may be filled out at any and all later visits. Now please bear in mind, that all records are to be made out in duplicate. Some workers seem not to understand what "duplicate" means, for they fill out a "birth" record and then copy the same items on the "health" record. For duplicate reporting, please fill out two records exactly alike, and mail to our office.

Some seem to find trouble in obtaining the State registry numbers as we have asked them to do, in order to support the nation-wide effort of our Government to have more attention paid to this important item. It is manifestly impossible for us at headquarters to look up for each individual cradle roll worker just where and to whom she should apply to get a certificate of the registry of the baby's birth with the State. The procedure differs in different States and counties. If you live in a small town, the town clerk should be able to give you the information needed. A letter written to your State Board of Health, addressed to your State capital should reach the proper person or office. Once informed on this, you will have no future trouble, and as new babies come into the homes you visit, you will find little difficulty in getting the State certificate of birth to present to the mother. She should keep it carefully as she does her marriage certificate, in order that the fact of her child's birth and heritage may be fully established at all times.

In the "birth" record blank sent out by our department the seventh and eighth lines were transposed by the printer, and the error was not caught by the proof readers. This has led to some misunderstanding. The sixth line reads: "Anything unusual about the baby's shape?..... Eyes?....." The next line should be the one going right on with the questions: "Organs?..... Otherwise?....." all being placed there by the health department in an effort to have recorded anything and everything that was of an abnormal nature about the baby at birth. The unfortunate insertion at the wrong place of the line about the measurements of the head has led to some cradle roll visitors not understanding what was meant by "Organs?..... Otherwise?....." And one visitor records "blue" as being the "unusual" thing about the eyes!

Another error was disclosed in one report which had the measurements of the head "from top of forehead to nape of neck" of such proportions that it was evident the measurement had been taken down the face!

In a few reports the worker did not fill out the space in which an effort is made to ascertain whether or not the mother had been working at some trade or profession outside of her home before the baby came. It is well known that in many places women are employed at tasks which bring remuneration, and that often these duties are kept up until within a short time of their delivery. Physicians often find that these labors have a marked influence upon the health and normality of the child and our health department felt that it would appreciate the information revealed by properly filling out the line referred to, as it might have significant bearing upon the conditions of the child indicated by other items. So, if you know that the mother of the babe has had occupation of a nature to take her outside home, do not forget to mention the fact. If she has taken work into her home, such as laundry, sewing, etc., at which she has toiled professionally, that fact, too, is vital. If her housework has occupied her attention, that, too, may be mentioned. Suppose a record shows that a mother has done the housework for a large family of children, and her new babe shows decided malnutrition, surely one could safely conclude that some of the strength which should have been conserved for the coming child had gone to the performance of overburdensome household tasks. Our health department basing its conclusions on the well-filled-out record blank can do much to overcome the handicaps indicated, so we are urging the cradle roll visitors to do all they can to secure the interested cooperation of the mother in making full and complete reports.

The concern we are taking in the physical welfare of the children of the church, is only a reflection of the awakening public conscience in regard to the child life of the community. Strange as it may seem, we have had for long years, a public supervision of the mental development of the children of the State, and little or no care taken of their physical well-being, and less of their moral or spiritual. The moral care is largely only expressed by laws against offenders.

Concerning a systematic building up of stable characters founded upon the broad and basic principles which underlie the lives of our greatest and best men and women, there has been gross neglect. The time has come, however, when greater recognition is being taken of the need for more careful supervision of the health and morals of the young and growing generation in order that a better service may be expected in later years.

The church is reflecting this awakening recognition, if, indeed, it is not leading in some of its forms of expression. Our church health department is getting at the root of the matter when it undertakes to instruct and educate our membership in the principles of correct physical living, and especially when it begins its oversight at birth. Preventive methods are of more value than curative, and that we cannot begin too early in teaching and practicing physical hygiene, is proclaimed through this effort of the health department to get in touch and stay in touch with every infant born within its domain.

So let our people, everywhere, try to encourage our cradle roll workers, and help to mold the thought and attitudes of our parents throughout the church that a hearty cooperation and understanding may be secured. We feel sure that in a few years, the better physical condition of our people will be a witness to the splendid welfare work of our church health department, one phase of which is being carried on through the present cradle roll work. Can You Prove Your Right to Vote?

The right to vote is only one of many important rights which may be difficult to prove without legal evidence. Because a birth record is the best evidence of age, parentage, and citizenship; and because of the importance to the individual and to society of careful birth records, the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor in a pamphlet recently issued recommends better birth registration as the first measure in a Children's Year follow-up program.

Only twenty-three States and the District of Columbia now keep birth records with sufficient accuracy and completeness to admit them to the United States birth registration area. These States are California, Connecticut, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, New Hampshire, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, and Wisconsin. They represented, in 1919, 58.4 per cent of the population of the country.

Children now being born in the remaining twenty-five States representing almost half of the population may be seriously embarrassed in not possessing a birth certificate when the time comes to prove that they are old enough to go to school, to leave school, to go to work, to vote, to marry. They may have trouble in proving their title to inherited property in the absence of proof of parentage, and their right to hold public office or receive passports for foreign travel may be questioned if evidence of citizenship furnished by a birth certificate is lacking.

The community also is handicapped in undertaking measures for the protection of life and health if it does not have vital statistics based on satisfactory birth and death records. Important welfare work for mothers and babies is impossible without careful birth registration. The phenomenal growth in "health visiting" of babies in England during the last five years is attributed to the Notification of Births Act of 1915, which made notification within three days compulsory throughout the kingdom.

Vigorous effort for one year, declares the Children's Bureau pamphlet, would place every State in the United States in the birth registration area. In communities in which there is a good law, not sufficiently enforced, a birth registration test is recommended. In States where there is no adequate law, campaigns for better legislation should be waged.—Children's Bureau Bulletin.

Value of Pictures in Forming a Child's Taste

Many parents are far from appreciating the extent to which pictures may be used in educating and training our children. They do not take the pains to see that pictures of the very best type are in the home, silently molding the tastes and ideals of the young people there.

Children are always fascinated by pictures, and take in every detail. This is because pictures tell a story which is easily grasped, and can be understood long before the child can read with intelligence. The pictures in a child's home, and especially in his bedroom are of deep significance, for their influence is directly brought to bear upon his character. Pictures of faith, of beautiful landscapes, of helpful suggestion, of national heroes, of leaders in religion, science, art—all these help to develop the mind and ideals of a child along desired paths.

It is not necessary to spend large sums of money for the pictures in a home. Good prints of some of the best productions in art may be obtained reasonably. It might even be that money saved from some cheap or vulgar movies could be converted into pictures for the home that would have permanent place and value in the spiritual training of the children there.

Pictures should be cheerful. Those which tell of tragedy, death, or disaster are not good selections for the home. Bleeding game, fish hung by the gills, hunting scenes showing panting small animals put to bay by combined power of men and dogs—these are not desirable in homes where parents try to teach children to love animals and to exercise mercy and pity towards them. One has only to look about to see the many mistakes that are made in choosing pictures for the home. Let us each look at our own.

The Organizer

We are happy to present this week a list of our district organizers, as nearly complete as it is possible to give it at the present time. In a few instances the addresses are incomplete, and we would appreciate any corrections to same.

The general department depends upon its organizers to a very great extent. It is the organizer who stands between the general officers and the locals, passing on to the latter whatever of stimulus or inspiration has been received. It is the organizer who, seeking ever to develop the women's work in her district, goes from branch to branch where possible, organizing and arousing to active work along the lines of our department. She brings to her locals whatever of advantage she can find in government or community welfare movements. She holds up to them constantly the very high ideals and objectives of our work, those that have for foundation better homes, better wives and mothers, and better children. She lifts high the standards set for Zion's redemption, urging the sisters everywhere to understand that the success of this latter-day movement depends upon the purifying of every unit, the solidifying of their interests, and their ability to eliminate the spirit of selfishness and greed which is destroying the foundations of society and of the world.

The organizer is able to render a very marked service to her district in touching the hearts of the women therein, to a new perception of their duties and their opportunities. District presidents and officials will do well to recognize the fact that the sisterhood of the church is not organized to hinder, but to materially help the priesthood in accomplishing that which is the commission of all—the spiritual salvation of the membership. To raise the standards and the efficiency of the home and the woman who presides therein, is surely a thing worthy the attention and the zealous cooperation of every church authority. That the most progressive men of the church do sense the need for our women's work and gladly give it their hearty support and encouragement is a thing for which we are grateful, and which bids fair to assist in the accomplishment of that for which we are striving. That there are others who do not yet see this need and are not yet giving their support, is a thing to be deplored, and upon them may yet be fixed the responsibility for the lack of progress made along these lines where such men have influence.

We are finding many districts that are putting aside a generous budget for the use of our organizer. This makes it possible for her to go from branch to branch with her inspirational messages and suggestive encouragement. We have no doubt but that ultimately the wisdom of this course will be seen and recognized by all the districts in the church, and no longer will we find our women's work hindered by lack of means. One consecrated and diligent worker in our field writes that it takes over thirty dollars just in railroad fare for her to visit once each branch in her district. In some of our western States, the distances are so much greater that much more would be required. The value of the "personal touch" has always been recognized as a great factor in conveying stimulation to others. This is what was meant when the New Testament writer said, "How shall they believe . . . if they have not heard? And how shall they hear without a preacher? And how shall they preach except they be sent?" Our organizers can do something by faithful correspondence, but if they are enabled to personally visit the branches, with permission and encouragement from the local priesthood calling the women together for instruction and enlightenment, how much greater shall be their contribution to the general good?

We hope to complete our list of organizers before long. District presidents have been appealed to in our effort to select those women who will make a consecrated offering in the women's work of the church.

LETTERS

Northern Wisconsin

The conference and conventions of the Northern Wisconsin District were inspiring to all. We can see that the church is moving with rapidity. There was a good representation from this place. The Saints at Black River Falls are surely a spiritual group, having come up through much toil and sacrifice to get such a nice little church building erected and all paid for.

On Sunday morning their church was dedicated, Patriarch W. A. McDowell preaching the dedicatory sermon, Brother Leroy Colbert offering the prayer.

In the afternoon Brother McDowell preached on consecration, and called our attention to the campaign now on for the General Conference auditorium. This district is willing to do its share and go over the top with our quota of $2,500.

The work at Chetek is progressing very nicely. Our Sunday school enrollment is 116 and the main floor getting too small so we are getting the basement ready to use for smaller classes during the winter months.

We plan on a two-day meeting here in December and want to get the church ready for dedication by that time.

We were sorry to lose from our midst Brother Leonard Houghton and family. They were always willing to help wherever they could. They moved to Madison but we hope to see Brother Houghton occasionally as he is one of the missionaries in this district.

I visited Lamoni at the beginning of the school year, going there to get our son in college. We have four young people from this district at Graceland. I was there a week and surely enjoyed myself. I thought they were the most clean and intelligent group of people I had ever seen. I attended two prayer meetings while there and no matter from whence the students came, their testimonies had the same ring. I wish all the young people of the church could get their education at Graceland. One can feel the Spirit of the Master within her walls. I did not realize this until I found it out for myself. Those inclined to criticize the college should go there and see and hear for themselves. I shall always boost for Graceland as a place for our young people. There is much for them there if they will but improve the opportunities.

Ever working for the upbuilding of Zion,
Your sister in the gospel,
CHETEK, WISCONSIN. MRS. LEROY COLBERT.

Concerning the Word of Wisdom

From some statements we have heard, some of the Saints do not understand what is said or meant in the mention of the sermon on the Word of Wisdom, in editorial of HERALD of September 29. We believe many of the Saints fail to sense or keep in mind what the Lord says in the first three lines of paragraph one, in consequence of the evils and designs which do and will exist in the hearts of conspiring men in the last day, thus we should keep this statement in mind, as we read the rest of the section. According to the above statement the first or primary reason the Lord gave us this word of warning was to keep his Saints from using the food and drink products coming through the hand of the kind of men mentioned therein, namely, tea, coffee, and all other preparations put on the market for sale in foodstuffs, canned goods, meats, fruits, vegetables, herbs, etc.

Now who does or will affirm, if we raise or buy those things in their natural state and prepare them ourselves, we violate the intent, or purpose of said revelation? If we can fruit, vegetables, meats, or keep them in a natural state out of growing season for use, are we violating the essence of this revelation? We believe not.

Another subject we wish to mention is the stand taken by some of the brethren is regard to right of franchise or vote. The Lord has told us to seek the best men for office, not party, as we are told in last HERALD and Ensign about prohibition. Yet we must believe from the statements of some who are members of the church, they stand for party.

Brethren, let us heed the Lord's advice, and stand for the right always, regardless of any party.

Your brother,
COLUMBUS, KANSAS. C. C. RANDALL.

Editorial Statement

The sermon referred to in the letter above was reported on behalf of the Ensign. At the time that we printed it we thought that it would be published exclusively in the Ensign. But shortly after, the editor of the Ensign, Richard J. Lambert, kindly offered to let us have the use of it for the HERALD, when it was returned to him. It was left to his judgment whether it will be published exclusively, or in conjunction in the two papers. As to what Doctor Harrington said, it is much better to wait until the sermon is published.

The point we wish to drive home in that editorial is that hot drinks are not good for man. We have heard this several times. Doctor Mayo is reported to have stated that hot drinks are the cause of cancer of the stomach. Many other physicians have criticized severely the use of hot drinks. That means temperature, and applies to hot water, and hot milk, as well as any other hot beverage. We are wondering if it might not also apply to cakes piping hot.

Now we may note that at a conference held at Far West, Missouri, November 7, 1837, the congregation, after a few remarks by Sidney Rigdon, unanimously voted not to support stores and shops selling spirituous liquors, tea, coffee, or tobacco. (Church History, volume 2, page 120.) The fact that all hot drinks are injurious does not remove any of the objections that exist to the use of tea or coffee. We see from the above passage that the early church considered tea and coffee objectionable. To the harm of tea and coffee themselves is added the factor that they are often taken hot.

We remember when we were attending high school, a series of lectures to young men on health, in which the speaker denounced in unmeasured terms the use of tobacco in any form. Yet he stated, before he concluded his series of lectures, that if one must choose between smoking a cigar after dinner, or turning from dinner immediately to work, especially at a desk, it were better to smoke the cigar. That did not make smoking at all excusable, nor change the fact that the use of tobacco is uncleanly. It merely emphasized the stress we place upon our nervous and digestive systems in attempting to go back to work, and especially mental work, immediately after a hearty meal.

We hope that Doctor Harrington's sermon will soon be printed, in which he will speak for himself. In the meantime we suggest the above to our readers.

Since the brother invites further comments, we would respectfully add that hot water is just as injurious if we boil it ourselves. Of course there is the difficulty of adulteration, which appears in many goods purchased on the market. This has affected the coffee bean, and especially ground coffee. But in our humble judgment, if we raised coffee ourselves, and roasted it ourselves, the objectionable factor of coffee, being the caffeine, would still be found therein.

The first part of the section gives an additional reason. But if we raised grapes ourselves and made fermented wine ourselves, or raised the corn and made moonshine whisky ourselves (of course before the prohibition law went into effect) the use of alcohol would still be injurious.

That so-called whisky often was composed of even more injurious chemicals artificially put together so it was not fermented whisky at all, is an added reason for not buying it or using it. But that does not change the fact that the best whisky we can secure still contains alcohol, and is injurious to the system.

As we are situated at present, we are bound many of us to buy our foodstuffs on the market from others. This is true of meats, fruits, vegetables, and herbs. There are some instances in which we have to be careful of adulteration, but the pure food law has tended to reduce the number of such instances though not entirely to eliminate them. Injurious substances are used, in some instances in canning, and especially in the cheaper grades of canned goods. Even the so-called high grade peas are discolored by chemicals to give them a bright green instead of the native shade.

In times that are past, which many of us can remember, both tea and coffee were badly adulterated, but all these factors of adulteration did not change the basic fact that the caffeine in coffee and theine in tea are injurious.
—EDITORS.

A Letter From President F. M. Smith

We reached London yesterday the 14th from Manchester, in motor car. Brethren G. W. and C. Leggott were driving through so we came.

From October 2 to 9 we had a rather busy and interesting week at Manchester. District conference 2d and 3d, and Sunday the 3d was a crowded day. The meetings were at the chapel of the Northeast Manchester Branch, and the building was taxed to accommodate the audiences. Brother Williams and I were the speakers and the efforts we made seemed well received. Each night during the week services were held at various places in the city or near by. On the whole the conference was quite a success and we trust the work has gathered a new impetus there. The officers seem alert and are devoted to the work. We hope to see several of the younger men and women of Manchester District in Graceland preparing for church work.

Friday, the 8th, Brother Williams went to Clay Cross and I followed him Saturday for the reunion of the Sheffield District. The meetings Saturday night and Sunday were well attended and once more our efforts seemed well received.

We have now visited all the districts in British Isles, and have, we feel, gathered information as to conditions here which will be of service to us in formulating plans for the work here. In about two or three weeks we hope to be ready to start towards Switzerland.

In Birmingham, the last Saturday and Sunday in September, we enjoyed meeting with the Saints of the Birmingham District. We found them earnest and the officers anxious to do their duty. We quite enjoyed our associations there, and trust that a more united effort will push the work forward in Birmingham.

At Birmingham meals were served in the room in the rear of the church and there we saw a pretty custom which might well be copied. When ready to partake of the meal, "grace" was sung by those at tables arising and singing to the tune of the doxology, the following verse:

"Be present at our table, Lord,
Be here and everywhere adored.
Thy creatures bless, and grant that we May feast in paradise with thee."

Our plans may of necessity be changed by the strike which now seems inevitable. Yours,
LONDON, ENGLAND, October 15, 1920. F. M. S.

Impressions of Zion

As you have not heard from this section for some weeks I write to explain that the branch correspondent has been away—exploring in the land of Zion. Possibly my adventures while looking over the "land of promise" may be of interest to others who look forward to the same experience. However, I hope their adventures may not be confined to such small territory as mine were.

We left home early in September and went first to Lamoni, where our ward, a lad of seventeen, entered Graceland College. We liked our college and eagerly anticipate spending next year there taking the religious education course.

After visiting in Iowa a couple of weeks, the next move was toward Independence. It was a privilege to attend the young people's Sunday morning prayer service at the Stone Church; we felt there the same good Spirit that we enjoy with the Saints at home. The morning service took the form of a program dealing with the institute work which had just started. What a privilege to be enrolled in some of those classes! Truly, dawn is breaking in Zion and those who are eager for service are preparing for the great new day.

As my principal reason for being in Independence was to undergo a slight operation, Monday evening found me at the Sanitarium under the care of Doctor John R. Green and Doctor Harrington, as I supposed for only a few days.

Now our Sanitarium, I thought, was strictly a doctors' institution. So you may judge my surprise when I learned that one might enjoy the privilege of any spiritual service necessary at the hands of Brother Ralph W. Farrell, the Sanitarium chaplain. Doctrine and Covenants 127: 1, 2 was called to mind, "It is the will of the Lord that a Sanitarium, a place of refuge and help for the sick and afflicted, be established by the church, where they may be removed from the influence and environments unfavorable to the exercise of proper faith unto the healing of the sick." We are glad to note the steps being taken to fulfill the command, for when the Sanitarium is brought up to the standard intended there will not be another institution in the world that will compare with it.

After my operations, when the pain seemed more than could be borne, administration was asked for and the loving Father saw fit to bless to that degree that the operation in the throat caused no pain thereafter. After our experience in such matters with doctors not of the faith, what a pleasure it was to see our doctor's, attitude toward administration. One could but thank God for men with souls big enough that they welcome aid from the greater Physician.

Later, when the unexpected happened and my stay at the Sanitarium was lengthened to more than three weeks, I was thankful for every spiritual help that was provided. Thankful, too, that I was in the care of physicians in whom one could have every confidence, not only because they are of the faith but because of their efficiency, recognized by those in a position to know.

I cannot stop before saying a word for the nurses—our own girls, nearly all of them, and a rosy, healthy, busy lot they are. No effort goes undone for the comfort or welfare of a patient in their care. Surely, the stigma against nurses that exists in the minds of some would be removed if they could but know "our girls." And how we do hope they will live so close to the source of all strength and virtue that no stain shall ever blot the name of a single one of them.

Finally, I was able to go home and how good it is to meet the dear folks I have missed so much. And how proud I am to report that our little branch of only one hundred and thirty-five has so nearly raised $5,000 toward the auditorium that we are sure we can make it.

A few weeks ago, Wiley celebrated her first Sugar Beet Day and our Sunday school superintendent was quick to see the opportunity for swelling our Christmas offering fund. The school had a stand that netted us $120.

Twelve have been added to the church by baptism recently and Brother May has helped to stir up considerable interest in several places near Wiley. Brother Ralston, our branch president, is making strenuous efforts to keep the good work going in these places. We rejoice in the degree of unity that now exists in the branch and look forward to a winter of good work.

VIDA M. FLETCHER,
Correspondent.

The popular Evangelist "Gipsy Smith" is to conduct a series of mission services in various American cities. At Louisville, in Kentucky, there is being built, for the three or four weeks which he will spend there, a spacious "Tabernacle" that will seat five thousand people, and will measure 200 feet by 136. In consequence of its vast dimensions there is to be fixed over the pulpit an "augophone," which will carry the speaker's utterances throughout every part of the edifice. After nonconformist congregations began, some ninety years ago, to erect Gothic chapels with high-pitched roofs, so many were built (like our own chapel at Leeds) in defiance of acoustic laws, that an augophone would be to them an invaluable present!—The Christian Life.

Holden Stake Conference

A number of Saints who attended the Holden Stake conference at Marshall traveled across the country to attend the conference Friday the 15th continuing over Sunday. In this way they had a view of the farming district of the country traversed. LaFayette and Saline Counties have splendid crops—Saline County can well be termed the "banner county" of the State.

The conference opened Friday evening with a splendid discourse by Elder W. S. Macrae. On Saturday morning at 8.30 a very spiritual prayer meeting was held in charge of Brethren F. A. McWethy and Gomer Macrae. Business session of the conference convened at ten in charge of stake presidency, Sister Blanche Christenson, secretary. After the disposal of reports, etc., the suggestion of reorganizing the stake high council was considered and a motion unanimously adopted requesting the First Presidency to act in the matter.

All business pertaining to the holding of a reunion in 1921 was deferred until next conference. The afternoon session was turned over to the three departments, Sunday school, Religio, and Women's Department. Brethren F. A. Cool, I. M. Ross, Sister I. M. Ross, and Sister D. J. Krahl occupied. Brother E. A. Davis gave a most inspiring sermon on Saturday evening.

Sunday services began with a very spiritual prayer meeting in charge of Brethren C. V. Hopkins and W. S. Macrae. Sunday school at 9.30 in charge of Brother T. L. McCormick, superintendent of Marshall Sunday School, and F. A. Cool, Stake Sunday school superintendent. Services at eleven o'clock by the stake bishop and president in the interest of the drive for General Conference auditorium building. Brethren C. V. Hopkins and F. A. McWethy occupied in the afternoon. Brethren D. J. Krahl and C. J. Hunt remained for the Sunday evening services and also Monday to assist the Marshall Saints in the drive for building of auditorium.

All appreciated the hospitable way the Marshall Saints entertained the conference, and feel to congratulate the little band of Saints there in their splendid spirit of good fellowship and progression. Next conference will be held at Holden, time for same left to stake presidency.

A Letter From Germany

[The following is a copy of letter received from August Fluke, of Einbeck, Germany. He is expressing thanks to the Saints in Zion for goods sent to help the German Saints in his vicinity. We confess that we were deeply touched when we read his statement that the Saints in Germany had set apart a day for fasting and prayer for the Saints in Zion, as an expression of thanks. If those people after their long period of privation and in some instances semistarvation, could afford to observe a day of fasting for Saints in Zion, certainly the Saints in Zion ought to take the matter to heart and themselves be even more diligent in their service to the church.—EDITORS.]

To the Presidency: Brother Passman, missionary, on the 23d and 24th of May, 1920, visited at Hanover, and wrote a letter, telling of conditions at Hanover, to the Saints in Zion, of need of food and clothing. That which was sent us we have truly received, through the help of God, through Brother Huvendick, local elder in Hanover Branch which he has divided through the branches in Germany.

The branch of Einbeck let brethren know that they were thankful for attention of the Saints. We see here the blessing of God, and the leading of his Son. We send thanks by this letter. Because this letter is not enough thanks, we fasted for the Saints in Zion, because they remembered us, that blessing may come on Saints of Zion. Everything came on in good condition to the Saints in Germany, and all have received goods in good order.

We live now in hopes that sometime we may, in person, give our thanks for the good things you have done for us.

We wish that when this letter reaches you, that all may be in good health, as it leaves all of us.

We give again great thanks to the brethren in Zion, and now will bear persecution, which may come, and be willing to keep more the commandments of God, and more to fulfill the commandments.

Now we show you by this list how the goods were divided in Einbeck.

The Saints here send greetings to the brethren in Zion through the brethren in Einbeck. The Aaronic priesthood in the name of the Saints, Arno Grahlsler, teacher; August Fluke, priest; Frederick Stecher, deacon.

We got the goods through the local elder in Hanover, September 18, 1920, to the branch of Einbeck.

We received 180 pounds of flour, 15 pounds of bacon, 58 pounds of soap (143 pieces), 15 cans of corned beef, 53 cans of milk.

The responsibility of the dividing of the goods was by August Fluke, priest.

Experience at Graceland Satisfactory

The First Presidency: Am inclosing my report for the past month. It is way overdue, which is due to my being now at Graceland. The matter had been overlooked.

My coming to school has not brought a sudden stop to ministerial work. At our recent district conference—of the Des Moines District—I endeavored to be released from district responsibilities. For the present it was deemed wise that I continue them, though it seems that it is more in theory than in fact. So I am endeavoring to do what I can in that work by correspondence.

There is also ample room for service here in Lamoni and vicinity. I do not understand how anyone can say there's nothing to do in the central places. Last Sunday night I occupied at the Brick Church. I must confess I had the same anticipation that so many experience—the thought that anyone who speaks in Independence or Lamoni must be in some exalted position, that the people are hypercritical. We have heard such reports. I did not find it so.

To-morrow we go to one of the neighboring branches for an all-day service.

To me the work of the religious education class is very satisfactory. The work is more established and better organized than last year, of course. The class is a fine group of consecrated young people.

Fraternally yours,

LAMONI, IOWA.

ROY CHEVILLE.

Rally Day at Chico, California

The local ministry and members of the branch at Chico, California, lead by Elder E. A. Opsal, the branch president, decided to have a branch rally, and selected Sunday, October 24, as rally day. Some of the members live at Oroville and some at Nord, both of which are towns in this, Butte County, of which Oroville is the county seat, while others live in the country immediately adjacent to Chico but not near enough to come to church regularly, considering their means of conveyance, not having autos, while still others live still further away and although notified by letter, were not, in some cases, able to respond.

Soon after this decision was arrived at the writer was invited by the branch president to attend and participate. At first I concluded not to do so because my missionary work would naturally take me in another direction on the date which had been selected. When, however, the auditorium campaign came on it became practicable for me to be present for that campaign brought me this way again. I am glad I came, for I have seldom witnessed a more enthusiastic response on the part of our people in regard to anything. Three services were planned, at all of which the writer occupied as speaker. The Saints remained after the forenoon service and had dinner which was served in the basement of the church by the sisters of the branch.

It will be seen that while this rally was not planned in the interests of the auditorium campaign, yet it served it for there was an excellent opportunity to canvass the Saints in its behalf which the local committee was not slow in doing. The result is the Chico Branch is making good at a rapid pace regarding the auditorium fund. Following the lead of these Sunday services the writer is preaching each night this week up to Thursday. Friday night there is to be a masquerade Halloween party, and I seldom preach anywhere on Saturday night.

In the work of this rally the branch president was well supported by Elders York, Hintz, and Hommes, Priest Ralph White, Teacher Lytle White, and Deacon John White, while Sister Bodyston as chorister and Sister Opsal as pianist, rendered acceptable service. Those who have autos did yeoman service in gathering up the Saints and bringing them to and returning them from the services. Brother Opsal's car registered almost fifty miles for the day in this kind of work.

In gospel bonds,
CHICO, CALIFORNIA.

ALMA C. BARMORE.

Council Bluffs and Vicinity

Sister May Skinner has organized a junior choir, and since then the missionary efforts have revived its activity.

The local ministry are occupying in various points every Lord's Day. The Orchard Heights Mission are expecting to hold prayer meeting in the future.

I am informed that forty-three baptisms occurred during the missionary efforts of Elder Daniel Macgregor.

A loss of interest occurring during the missionary efforts in some of the departments of church work is being revived, and we trust greater interest will develop.

The League of Nations issue is more, much more, than partisan. It bespeaks just what Jesus Christ is expected to accomplish when the kingdoms of this world will become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ. The spirit of the gospel is to lead men and women of every nation to seek the kingdom of God. To make an effort to unite all nations is a righteous one, even though a perfect plan has not as yet been proposed. This Nation is to be a blessing to all nations.

This will not result from this Nation trying to seclude herself nationally from all other nations. How much more readily will our missionaries find access to other nations with the gospel message when our Nation takes her place with an agreement into which all nations are willing to enter for their protection and development. The place this Nation has been invited to take by other nations is first place, and with wisdom and power we should occupy.

No one can say this is written for political effect, as it will appear too late for that, but it is written as an expression of many of the Saints toward the consummation of God's purposes.

Order in God's house suggests "tithes and offerings." Since such a spirited effort for offerings has resulted so effectually, whether all has been given freely or not, we will now try to do the work of inspiring faith to obey the law. I am informed that some have given as an offering from $50 to $500, whose names are not found on the tithing list. We trust such giving will do them so much good they will now pay their tithes and surplus.

An action is begun to visit all the families of the Saints in the Council Bluffs Branch before the first of the year.

We hear of others who are looking toward Council Bluffs with a view to locating here. All are welcome.

Eastern Iowa Conference

Conference held at Clinton, Iowa, October 22, 23, and 24, has proved to us all what can be done in the way of educational features. Conference opened with Brother Amos Berve, district president, in charge. After a very spiritual prayer service each department in its turn took up institute work. Here were advanced some timely instruction, which, if heeded, will broaden our scope of activities, and eventually be the means of making each department more effective in its duties in the church.

The priesthood meetings impressed each officer with the need of a closer communion with God and a more consecrated effort in study and labor if we are to succeed. The outline for priesthood meetings by President Smith was ably presented and explained by Brother Amos Berve. An early adoption was urged upon each branch.

A blackboard was placed on the platform and each branch shown, with its subscription to date. We would hear the cry, "Watch the blackboard," when some one would raise the amount. The totals grew from a small sum to over $5,000. The spirit of giving in this great drive was manifest by all.

The evening service was given over to singing and preaching, Elders Berve and Vanderwood speakers. There were a goodly number present and the best of attention during the meetings.

The closing hours came too soon for all of us. In all we had a splendid conference. May the blessed Spirit never cease to move among us.

Your coloborer,

J. E. BENSON.

COLDWATER, MICHIGAN.

Coldwater Branch went "over the top" in the big auditorium drive.

"Our quota was $932, but Sunday, October 31, the amount subscribed was $1,466, and several isolated Saints not heard from yet. It is hoped to reach the $1,500 mark. Our committee have been very active and have been in communication with nearly every member of the branch.

BRANCH CORRESPONDENT.

SAINT CLAIR, MICHIGAN, November 3, 1920.

Editors Herald's Our quota of the district's share of $10,000 on auditorium was $400. When Elders Fligg and Fetting came for our subscription $925 was pledged the first night. We have since raised that to about $1,300.

Five new members have been added to our branch this year, all in July, the writer being one of the number.

Apostle J. A. Gillen visited us on October 13, greatly strengthening the Saints in their desire to press onward and upward in the great work. The work in this portion of the vineyard is not progressing very rapidly but we are planning and striving for greater efforts along mission lines.

Yours in bonds,

MELVIN WARWICK.

(From letter of D. J. Williams, Burlington, Iowa, October 27, 1920.)

The experiences of the first conference that has been held at Nauvoo since the reorganization of the church is now material for history. Had it not been for threatening bad weather Friday afternoon and Saturday we believe that every session would have been overcrowded, for many who were not there had contemplated on being present to enjoy the first conference at that place. As it was the building was none too large for our preaching and social services. You will remember that this building was formerly a schoolhouse and built originally for that purpose, but from the outside it has the appearance of a church building. It is now the best edifice in the district.

We appreciate very much the presence of Apostle G. T. Griffiths who until just a few days before we had not expected. His advice and counsel will be of lasting benefit and his sermons were very uplifting. The social meeting on Sunday afternoon was accompanied with a special degree of the good spirit. The gifts were manifested to the strengthening and encouragement of the saints, and one brother was called to the office of priest through Brother Griffiths. All present were agreed in that it was a very profitable conference.

SUPERIOR, WISCONSIN, October 25, 1920.

Editors Herald: If there are any Saints in Superior or Duluth with whom we are not in touch will they please write to Brother C. A. Kress, at Two Harbors, Minnesota, or look me up? Brother Kress is very much interested in getting the work before the honest in heart here.

I had the pleasure of having Brother Kress and Brother Owens look me up, and it certainly was good to meet these brethren of the faith. I have been isolated from the Saints for some time, and I am truly willing to do my part to arouse an interest here. We know of four sisters here at the present time. I would be pleased to have any Saints call at my house. I am, Your sister in Christ, MRS. H. S. OLSON.

HANDSWORTH, BIRMINGHAM, ENGLAND, October 20, 1920.

Editors Herald: The semiannual conference of the Birmingham District, England, is now a matter of history, being held on September 25 and 26. It was marked by the presence of President F. M. Smith and Apostle T. W. Williams. We opened at 4 p. m. the 25th with the reception of our esteemed brethren, and at 4.30 we commenced the business of conference, in charge of the district president, J. Schofield. One hour was given to this business, and then at 5.30 we adjourned to a nicely laid tea, which all seemed to appreciate.

At 6.30 we gathered again to hear an address from the British Isles District Sunday school superintendent, Sister Blanche Edwards, on Sunday school work, which was very ably given. Brethren F. M. Smith and T. W. Williams also gave a few remarks on the same topic, backing up the address of the sister. At 7.30 we adjourned to hear a musical program, given by the brethren and sisters of the branches in the district, which proved very enjoyable to all, and was well appreciated by all who were present.

At 10.30 Sunday morning, the 26th, we again met for a preaching service, in charge of Elder J. E. Meredith, the preacher being Apostle T. W. Williams. A priesthood meeting followed, when the priesthood of the district sat to hear an address to the priesthood by President F. M. Smith.

At 3 p. m. we met together for a prayer and testimony meeting, in charge of the district presidency. The meeting was of a good spiritual nature, and quite a number of testimonies were given by the Saints. At 5.30 Apostle T. W. Williams gave an address to the Women's Department, urging the sisters to aim for higher things than the ordinary household duties.

The evening service commenced at 6.30 with Apostle T. W. Williams in charge. An anthem was given by the choir, "God is our refuge." Also a solo was rendered by Sister Edwards, "When the mists have rolled away." President F. M. Smith was the speaker and took for his subject, "Zion," which proved to be very educational and encouraging to all who were present.

The time we had been looking forward to with so much enthusiasm has now come to a close, but it will ever be in our memory, and we are glad that the church has such fine men, and we wish them "Godspeed" during their remaining tour through Europe.

Yours in gospel bonds,
WALTER B. ARROWSMITH, Secretary.

MUSKEGON, MICHIGAN, October 26, 1920.

Editors Herald: There have been about twenty baptized here this summer while Elder Whitehead has been a number of surrounding places and baptized many more. At present he is holding meetings at Grant.

Elder H. E. Moler, district president, and W. F. Shaub, our Bishop's agent, were here recently in the interests of the auditorium. Our quota was $635 and we just smiled. After Brother Moler preached to us cards were passed out, and in just four and a half minutes we had raised $1,675 and more to come.

Anyone of the opinion that we are not alive, should visit us at 1010 Ottawa Street. FLOYD G. SMITH.

Information Wanted

The Saints of the Centralia, Washington, Branch, desire to locate the following: Guy Arthur Price and family, and Jesse D. Leabo. Send any information to Mrs. Lula Premo, Box 644, Centralia, Washington.

The Patronesses of Graceland College held a bazaar in Lamoni on election day, serving dinner and supper at the same time. As a result of a call sent out in the HERALD some time ago, articles were sent in from all over the country for the bazaar, from Alabama on the south to Washington on the north, from Maine on the east to California on the west, and over $260 was realized from the bazaar and around $160 from the meals. They express appreciation for the kindness of the sisters in contributing articles for sale and to those who so liberally patronized the sale and meal tables.

Brother R. L. Hays writes from Henryetta, Oklahoma, that he is filling all the calls for preaching that his time will allow, but is unable to keep up with the demand. He wishes there were many more missionaries to go to the people with the gospel. A number have been baptized and they feel they are almost ready for a branch at that place, having thirty-six members. Elder J. S. Meyer, of Holdenville, was with them; also had a visit from Apostle W. M. Aylor. Brother Hays lives at Central Camp, and may be addressed at box 242.

Bisbee, Arizona: Up to November 1, the Bisbee Branch had pledged $1,361 to the auditorium fund. This is approximately $25 per member including women and children, and $361 more than the entire quota assigned to the State of Arizona, which includes three branches, making $962 more than the branch quota or nearly four times the branch quota. Cash received up to November 1, was $401, making $2 above our quota in cash paid down. The pastor has returned after spending most of the time during October in Douglas, assisting in a special series of meetings, resulting in the baptism of four.

Our Departed Ones

DEVORE.—Rebecca E. Sheldon, daughter of David and Saloma (Stonebreaker) Sheldon was born February 7, 1849, in Smith Township, Belmont County, Ohio. December 28, 1867, was married to Luther R. Devore. Before marriage she was a member of the Christian Church. Baptized into the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints June 29, 1874, in Washington Township, Monroe County, Ohio, by James Craig. In company with husband, Elder L. R. Devore, traveled extensively in the interest of the gospel for a number of years in Southern Ohio and West Virginia, assisting to lay the foundation for what is now Southern Ohio, West Virginia, Pittsburgh, Kirtland, and Youngstown Districts. In 1891 with her husband she landed in the South Sea Island Mission and continued there for five and one half years. Her work of sacrifice and devotion there is known to the church. It was she who placed the Sunday school work there on its feet. After returning to her native land her health was so broken by reason of exposures suffered on the seas that she was incapacitated for travel. For nearly twenty years her home has been in Holden, Missouri. On account of failing health and increasing affliction she was on September 25, 1918, admitted to the Holden Home. Died November 3, 1920, while sitting in her chair in her room in the home, her head dropping forward as if going to sleep. Thus passed quietly and sweetly to rest a noble character and wonderful example of faith, devotion, consecration, and courage. Her memory will long live with the many Saints who knew and loved her. Aged 71 years, 8 months and 27 days. Funeral services at Holden Home and the Saints' church in charge of D. J. Krahl and F. A. McWethy, the sermon by H. E. Moler. This by her written request. She was laid to rest by the side of her lamented husband in Fairview Cemetery, he having passed over on February 12, 1912. Thus having well finished their work the mortal remains of the two rest side by side until the resurrection of the just.

ABBOTT.—John J. Abbott, born November 13, 1847, in London, England. Died September 11, 1920, at Shawnee, Ohio, at the home of his daughter, Sister Charles Cooper. Leaves to mourn his son Thomas, of Kirtland, Ohio, 2 daughters, Mrs. Charles Cooper of Shawnee, Ohio, and Mrs. D. L. Allen of Deer Lodge, Montana, also eleven grandchildren and four great-grandchildren, together with a host of friends. Was preceded in death by his wife, Jane Abbott, five years ago. United with church in 1887 and continued firm in the faith to the last. Buried from the Saints' church in Shawnee, sermon by J. W. Davis.

WEST.—Hepsie Davidson, daughter of John and Amanda Davidson, was born January 1, 1866, in Highland County, Ohio. Married James West, and together they united with the church in 1887. Died March 6, 1920, in Middletown, Ohio. Survived by 3 daughters, Mrs. William Hoover of Middletown, Ohio, Mrs. Lowell Stetham of Marshall, Ohio, and Goldie West. Was preceded in death by husband and infant daughter. Funeral conducted from the Saints' church near Marshall, Ohio, sermon by J. W. Davis.

IZATT.—Mary Mowe was born in England, November 24, 1853, and came to this country at age of eight. Married Frank Izatt, December 25, 1870, at Caseyville, Illinois, where they made their first home. Eleven children were born, 6 sons and 5 daughters, all surviving. Also leaves 20 grandchildren and 3 great-grandchildren. Husband died some 2 years ago. She died after illness of 6 days, October 22, 1920. Was faithful member of the church. Funeral sermon by C. E. Harpe, to large audience. Remains laid to rest in beautiful cemetery at Taylorville, Illinois.

JOHNSON.—John A. Johnson was born on March 12, 1854, near Toronto, Ontario. Married Molisa Boyce on January 20, 1875. Went to Michigan 36 years ago. Baptized several years ago by John Shippy. Died May 14, 1920. Leaves wife, 4 children, 3 granddaughters, 6 brothers, 2 sisters, and many other relatives and friends. Funeral at Saints' church, Lansing, Michigan; sermon by S. A. Barss. Interment in Mount Hope Cemetery.

HUGHES.—Laura M. Hughes was born March 7, 1836, in Dallas County, Alabama. Died October 9, 1920. Leaves to mourn a host of friends and relatives, among them 7 children, 29 grandchildren, and 29 great-grandchildren. Her husband, 2 children, and 15 other descendants preceded her death. Baptized November 26, 1911, by J. W. Duboise. The hope of the gospel cheered all the latter years of her life, and comforted her in death.

LARSON.—Edward L., son of Brother and Sister Lewis Larson, was born at Independence, Missouri, January 26, 1887. Died at Panama, October 8, 1920, of malaria. Leaves father, mother, brothers, and sisters to mourn. Services by J. C. Foss at Mr. Ott's Undertaking Rooms. Interment in Woodland Cemetery.

RICHARDS.—Fanny Chick, was born in Chinnock, Somersetshire, England, January 29, 1861. Married William E. Richards February 9, 1877. Died at her home in Kewanee, Illinois, October 3, 1920, from cancer and various complications. Left a record of good works and loving deeds. She leaves husband, 3 sons, 6 daughters, 23 grandchildren, and one great-grandchild. Funeral was held from the home, James Norris delivering the funeral sermon. Interment in the Pleasant View Cemetery.

STROH.—Samuel Stroh was born August 20, 1856, in Osceola Township, Crawford County, Ohio. Located with the family in Steuben County, Indiana, and later in Quincy Township, Branch County, Michigan. Attended district and select schools, and was married to Sister Alta L. Corless, January 1, 1878. Three children blessed the sanctuary of home, one dying in infancy. Brother Stroh came to Coldwater and made this city his home since 1887. He became identified with the church May 22, 1881, under the ministrations of William H. Kelley, and honored that relation by a life of earnestness and integrity. Ordained priest October 28, 1895, and was ordained elder, June 10, 1900. October 28, 1895, he was appointed Bishop's agent. He performed all duties, spiritual and temporal, for 25 years with an eye single to the glory of God. His work for the church was rendered more sacred by reason of affliction, but his life and work seemed lengthened out by prayer and administration. Died October 3, 1920. Funeral conducted from Saints' chapel October 6. E. L. Kelley officiated, assisted by S. W. L. Scott. Brother Stroh is survived by wife and 2 children: William Y., Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and Ethel L. Gallagher; 3 brothers and 4 sisters, John W., of Crawfordsville Indiana; Ellen Kiles, Flint, Indiana; George F. Fremont, Indiana; Joseph, Montpelier, Ohio; Elizabeth Goodrich, Angola, Indiana; Katharine Ferrie, Angola, Indiana; and Mrs. Starr Corless, Coldwater, Michigan. Burial in beautiful Lake View Cemetery, Quincy, Michigan.

Cheering Reports Pour In

District after district is reporting its quota reached and exceeded. Final reports will be published as soon as they can be received and compiled.

W. O. Robertson reports: "Glad to report that the Southern Indiana District went over the top. Our quota was $2,000. $2,975 has already been pledged and all reports not in yet. Safe to say that we went over our quota at least 50 per cent."

L. F. P. Curry writes from Pittsburgh: "The quota assigned to the Pittsburgh District was $1,800. It is very gratifying to note that the Pittsburgh Branch alone exceeded that sum, subscribing as it did, $2,176. I strongly suspect that the totals from the other branches will enable Pittsburgh District to turn in a total of about $5,000. We have made no fuss about this effort, but speaking for the Pittsburgh Branch, everyone approached has been willing to do all possible without urging. It seems to me that such a spirit is particularly fine, and an indication that the church will determinedly accomplish any reasonable task set for it."

H. R. Eaton sends word from Western Maine: "We are pleased to report to you that the Saints of Western Maine have pledged $6,000 with two branches yet to report. We expect to raise yet another thousand. Our quota was $2,000."

T. U. Thomas reports from Ohio: "Our drive was a success, even beyond our most sanguine expectations. The quota for this district is $2,500, but we have almost doubled that amount already, and no doubt it will be doubled when we see those who failed to attend the meetings when we visited the branches."

Amos T. Higdon writes: "I am pleased to be able to state, in connection with this letter, that according to the latest figures I have, this district, the Western Colorado, has gone over the top by about 25 per cent, and it is quite likely that I do not know of a number of subscriptions. I surely rejoice to know there has been such a wonderful response to this call for funds. It proves to us that the membership of the church has faith in Zion."

J. T. Riley writes: "I am happy to tell you that Arkansas is going to raise double her quota if not a little more."

O. J. Hawn writes: "I am glad to say Northwestern Ohio District has gone over the top in fine shape, and at our conference yesterday they voted to send you word that if you wish any more from this district just to let them know."

W. W. Fordham wires from Washington:

"Spokane District over the top and still going, with five or six hundred ahead of the mark."

C. J. Hunt writes: "The pendulum has swung past the $14,000 quota mark, and about all that is left for the Holden Stake is to join with the general chorus in shouting 'Victory.'"

M. Ahlstrom writes: "Your committee for the Youngstown-Sharon District are agreed that the work of the past month has been one of the most pleasant experiences in their church work. The responses of the Saints in the auditorium fund drive shows that they are ready for and willing to undertake any move the church desires to bring forward; in fact, they are ready to undertake the redemption of Zion. We now have reports to a total of $4,708 against our district quota of $2,500 and more to come."

Charles Fry writes: "I truly felt that this move to build the auditorium was one of the steps toward the redemption of Zion and that it had the divine approval. As far as my observations have gone in our district the response has been liberal and accompanied by a glad willingness to do all that is possible. I have not heard a murmur of complaint nor a doubt expressed as to the expediency or wisdom of the move, nor any adverse criticism of the size or character of building."

David E. Dowker wires: "Subscriptions to date, nineteen thousand dollars. More coming in. Every indication that we will go over the top. Great meeting in Los Angeles yesterday; many are just awaiting the great opportunity."

C. E. Jones wires from Portland: "Portland Branch to date has four thousand and sixty-two dollars. Not all in yet. Hope to make it five thousand."

A. E. Warr writes: "In the financial campaign the Des Moines Branch will go over $4,000. The district will go $10,000 or more. This more than doubles our quota."

Charles F. Cummings wires from Jonesport, Maine: "Eastern Maine District has raised over six times its quota."

Daniel F. Joy wires from Providence: "Drive ending to-night. Providence over the top with twelve thousand, two hundred and forty dollars out of quota of $4,800. Our motto: 'Providence never fails to live up.' You can depend upon Providence in the great work ahead of the church."

Thanksgiving Day

On the bleak New England coast (it is bleak in the winter time, though it is beautiful in the glory with which it is decorated), a small band gathered to offer thanks to God for what was then a meager harvest. They gathered of the fruits about them—the pumpkin and cranberry, the wild turkey and fish, and so prepared a great feast. But beforehand, they went up to the house of the Lord to offer thanks to him, and to pray for his protection through the coming winter.

This festival has long been celebrated in New England, and from there has become the harvest home of the American people.

Other peoples have had their harvest homes—the Jews their feast of tabernacles. It is for us both a harvest home and a day of thanksgiving.

For what have we to be thankful? As a harvest home, the fear of earlier in the year has been dispelled, as the crops this year are far greater than was the case in 1919, and in several instances are the heaviest crops the United States has ever known. At the same time, the crop conditions have improved in other parts of the world over the conditions existing during the World War and since. Surely the world has cause to be thankful for the bounties of the Lord as manifested to us in the fruits of the land, and in the fruits of the beasts of the field. And especially has America cause to be thankful for bountiful crops.

It is true at present the farmers in some instances are scarcely remunerated at present prices for their labor. It is true that in other instances, as of coal, the prices appear to be much too high. But our thanks to God for his bounty should not be tempered by the shortcomings of our fellow men, who create fictitious prices, though we can and should still hope for and work for justice for ourselves and our fellow men.

We have cause to be thankful, as we look back over the century, that progress has been made in living conditions; for the progress which has been made in human knowledge; the gain in the power of man over nature which has made possible a higher standard of living.

We should also be thankful for the passing from power, within the past few years, of some forty monarchs, small and great, and in the wonderful spread of human rights of democracy in government within the past 100 years, and especially in the past five and twenty-five years.

We are thankful for religious liberty—the right to worship God according to the dictates of our own conscience—that we may assemble in our various meeting places as we do, to worship God in righteousness.

And to many, as they turn their thoughts back over the year that is past, there is found to-day a vacant place. The heart is made very sad because of those who are not with us, to sit down to worship, to return thanks to our heavenly Father, and partake of his bounty. But oh, how grateful should we be for the wonderful promise through the love of God in his word to us, that death is not an end. "He is not dead, but liveth." And because he, our elder Brother, is alive forevermore, so are our beloved alive in him.

For ourselves, our thoughts turn to one of our loved ones much afflicted, who yet suggested the thought, at this season, that we should count our blessings o'er. It is a time to count our blessings. We can easily count the things that try us, but now is the time to sit down and count our blessings—the blessings of life, of loved ones, of intelligence, and faculties which enable us to see and hear and know.

Again we are reminded of a Thanksgiving three years ago, when the word of grace over the bounties the Lord had provided was very earnest for the blessing of those near and dear whom he was about to leave. And even if anything more earnest, was the prayer that before that day would again be celebrated peace would be sent to the world. That faithful, earnest prayer was answered.

As a church we should be thankful to see how the work of God is moving forward in the preparation for Zion, and pray for greater wisdom that we may do our part. We are thankful that the funds are subscribed for our General Conference auditorium; and thankful for the spirit noted by our last General Conference; we are thankful for all that Zion means and for all that has been planned and done to bring it nearer. We are thankful for all the gospel means to us.

While some have been taken from us, many have cause to be thankful for the healing power of God, which has been manifested over their loved ones. And still others, for precious lives which have been given into their care.

Surely the Lord is good; surely we shall serve him all the days of our life. Surely we should turn to him now with thanksgiving for his goodness in days that are past, and with a deep prayer for greater power, greater means, greater understanding for his service in the days to come.

The Auditorium and the Land Problem

One objection with regard to the General Conference auditorium has been that there is more need for the securing of land for settlement of the Saints, especially if 20,000, or 10,000, or even 1,000 more are to move into the vicinity of Zion.

It is doubtless true that there is more need of bread and butter, and of homes for living than there is for a place of assembly, much as is needed such a place of assembly. Yet even that may be called into question because the opportunity to get together, to meet frequently, and to be instructed makes for the intellectual and spiritual welfare of the race and is as necessary as the bread that perishes.

Further, it would be difficult to put on a drive for raising funds for the immediate purchase of land. The Bishopric are willing to do all they can to help, when the funds are placed in their hands, in tithes, in offerings, or especial offerings for that purpose, or when they are approached by individuals, or collections of individuals.

But the Lord directed the early church to gather together their means, and to send a few trusted men to buy the land for all. (Doctrine and Covenants 98: 9, 10.)

Then section 128, given quite recently, provides for the formation of companies for colonization purposes. Zion is not limited to one city alone. There are already four stakes, and already other territories within the limits of Zion as first defined. But it is decidedly unwise to compete one with another, whether it be for the purchase of books, a house, or for the purchase of land.

Again we have to consider that the donations for the erection of the auditorium building will come almost solely from income, and from the surplus from income. A few will give from that which they have saved up, but that will not be the general rule, nor the purpose.

But the purchase of land, while it may be secured in part by tithing which is one tenth of surplus income as usually defined, the real purchase should be accomplished from our capital. If the membership of the church in the United States possess the average wealth, this would roll up into a sum amounting to many millions.

So long as we attempt to purchase land only from income, or from our tithing, we will not succeed as the Lord desires. But when we organize, and gather together our means, all that we possess, and then a few men on behalf of many, consult with the Bishop, we will be able to move forward to the redemption of Zion. Then the meeting places, or the temple itself, will not prevent or hinder in the least that work, but should rather help and encourage us.

Neither tithing nor surplus income is sufficient to the purchase of lands; that requires our capital.

Are You Converted?

Twenty thousand converts before next General Conference.

The following extract from a personal letter gives food for thought. The writer, after rejoicing over the success of the drive for the church auditorium, that so many districts have gone over the top, and so many places have oversubscribed, continues:

"Why not turn more energy and advertising towards getting the twenty thousand converts, instead of all the church papers having big advertisements of consecration weeks and auditorium drive on the front page, and with leading religious articles? Print gospel truths, such as 'do unto others as you would have them do unto you.' 'Whereas I was blind.' 'Charity thinketh no evil.'—How few Christians think no evil. 'Forgive our sins as we forgive others.' 'Charity envieth not,' and dozens of others, to call attention to our leading shortcomings, and insert or add a few words of exhortation along those lines. Are you living up to that law? Convert from the heart, and the money part will come as easily as water flows from a vessel tipped to the right angle."

This gives much food for thought. Why not put the same energy in this far-more-important drive for converts that we have put into the drive for a material conference building? Truly when we have a converted membership the money part will come as easily as water flows, and there will be full confidence one in another.

We have as an ideal before us, 20,000 new converts with the face of each turned towards Zion. But are we ourselves fully converted?

Peter was one of the first quorum of twelve. He was in personal contact with the Master himself, and held a prominent place in the church, both during the days of Jesus, and after his death. So prominent was his place that opinion is divided whether he was president of the quorum of twelve or president of the church. And yet Jesus, at the last supper, turned to Peter and told him, "Simon, Simon, behold Satan hath desired to have you, that he might sift the children of the kingdom as wheat; but I have prayed for you that your faith fail not; and when you are converted, strengthen your brethren." (Luke 22: 31, 32, Inspired Version.)

Peter thought he was willing to go with the Lord, even unto death itself, or to prison, but failed. Yet the Lord used him, and placed on him the burden of feeding the church of God (John 21: 15-17), both his sheep and his lambs. Full conversion evidently did not precede baptism, but that was rather because of the limit of understanding, as he was willing to follow.

The above letter indicates some of the things we will do when we are fully converted. And another thing we will do will be to love one another; where there is love there is confidence; where there is love and confidence, there is loyalty. Loyalty not only of the membership, to the leaders, and those on whom is placed the grave responsibility, but loyalty also of one to another as brethren and sisters of Christ; and loyalty of those on whom is placed the burden expressed in their confidence in the membership. Upon the church is laid a great responsibility of living according to the commandments of Jesus; letting their light shine before the world, so that others seeing their good works may glorify their Father which is in heaven.

Are you converted? When you are converted strengthen your brethren.

Success Assured in the Drive

We hear good reports from the auditorium drive, though there are a few individuals, branches, and districts, which have not completed their report. Yet on the 10th Bishop McGuire was able to cable President F. M. Smith that it is reasonably sure the sum necessary has been pledged and an oversubscription is indicated. We should be, and are greatly encouraged with this evidence of unity—this willingness to sacrifice and get together for the sake of the work of God.

It means real devotion when so many at a distance are willing to do so much to erect a building which will be of primary benefit to those residing in the vicinity of Independence. It will be of use at General Conference, in order that visitors from a distance, as well as those of Independence, may attend the principal services.

As we have intimated before, the work done there during the year will be felt throughout the church. Those who gather there for instruction will later make their influence felt when they labor in our midst.

Again, when it comes our time to move towards Zion, we will feel that we have a vital share in that "Well done."

It is a beginning for that which lies before us as a church. Elsewhere is given a particular statement, and extracts from the reports that are coming in.

Recent reports state that the corn crop is the largest in the history of the United States. The same is true of rice, pears, and sweet potatoes; while the apple crop is reported very much larger than last years, and the same is true of the potato crop. Oats, rye, and wheat are all large crops this year, although not the largest. Generally speaking the crops of this year are reported considerably in excess for the United States over that for 1919.

Brother F. M. Sheehy preached the funeral sermon of Kate Blood Smith, the wife of Elder John Smith, at the Lamoni Brick Church, on Sunday, November 7. He accompanied Brother Smith and the remains from Independence to Lamoni, and also went with Brother Smith on Monday evening to Rhode Island, as it was the wish of Sister Smith that she be laid to rest in the East where she had spent all the earlier years of her life.

Joseph Smith, Jr., as a Translator

In this issue there appears an article by Elder Nephi Jensen, of the Utah church, reprinted from Liahona, October 12, 1920, as it contains matter that may prove of interest to some of our readers.

The Utah church lists the Book of Abraham as one of its sacred books. Hence an attack was made upon that book by Bishop Spaulding, and through that book he attempted to attack Joseph Smith's work as the translator of the Book of Mormon.

But the work on those two books was decidedly different. The first, a young, practically uneducated boy, he translated by inspiration alone. It is doubtful if there were anyone living at that time who could have translated it without divine help. Spaulding himself says there was no scholar living whose opinion would have been of real value [as to the correctness of the translation of the Book of Mormon], even had all the plates been submitted to him for his inspection.

As to the Book of Abraham, Joseph Smith had studied Hebrew and other languages, and oriental literature in the meantime. When he secured the parchment from around the mummies, he informs us in his diary, that he first attempted to prepare an alphabet and grammar for that work. Nowhere, so far as we know, does he claim divine inspiration for that translation. His work as a scholar may be an issue, but when he is judged in that capacity, we should judge him entirely according to the knowledge of men of his day, as much has been learned concerning oriental literature in the past eighty or ninety years.

The grammar of Champollion, setting forth the decipherment of the Egyptian hieroglyphics, was not completed and published until 1841. The Book of Abraham was undertaken in 1835, and was published in 1842.

The church in the days of Joseph Smith the Martyr did not accept the Book of Abraham as one of the sacred books, or attempt to place it in the same class with the Book of Mormon and Doctrine and Covenants. Nor has the Reorganized Church at any time so considered it. Our position is quite clearly stated in our Church History, volume 2, page 569. The word "church," however, includes the whole church from its first organization in 1830 until the present day. (We note in passing, the fact that the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints has twice been held before the courts of the land to be the successor of the original church, teaching the same doctrine; namely, in Lake County, Ohio, Court of Common Pleas, and in the United States Circuit Court for the Western District of Missouri.) The extract from the Church History follows:

"The church has never to our knowledge taken any action on this work, either to indorse or condemn; so it cannot be said to be a church publication; nor can the church be held to answer for the correctness of its teachings. Joseph Smith, as the translator, is committed of course to the correctness of the translation, but not necessarily to the indorsement of its historical or doctrinal contents."

That a man is a prophet of God does not make all of his writings inspired. His life may rightly be judged by his acts as a whole, and by each part of his life. As such, the prophets of modern times were at all times good moral men, and when acting under the inspiration of Almighty God they spoke and do speak as his representatives. They may, and all of them have written according to their own wisdom, many times as much as has ever been presented to the church as given by direct revelation.

The fact that Joseph Smith translated this writing on the papyrus, of the Book of Abraham, and attempted to interpret the various pictures and pictograms and hieroglyphs, in no way commits us as a church to the accuracy of his translation, let alone to an indorsement of its doctrinal contents. It did commit him as a man to the accuracy of the translation, but not necessarily to the indorsement of the historical or doctrinal contents.

We have a recent illustration in the fact that President Frederick M. Smith translated certain German books into English, and published a summary of them in a doctor's dissertation. (Higher Powers of Man.) Some have claimed to be confused thereby; but it should be clear to all that such a writing in no sense commits the church, either to the accuracy of the translation, nor to the ideas put forth; nor does it in our judgment commit Frederick M. Smith personally to the accuracy of the ideas thus translated, though it does commit him personally to the accuracy of the translation and the synopsis he has given of these various writings, but as a man and a scholar only. It does not imply in any sense that that which he has written presents even his own views on the higher powers of man, as represented in the possibility of humanity communing with God, or as to the mode and value of revelation. The book is presented as a scholarly piece of work, summing up the literature existing at the time on that important subject. It is not a book on doctrine; nor does it even purport to set forth even the author's views and experience with regard to the importance of revelation.

Considering the Book of Abraham as a scholarly piece of work of the man, we are ready to note with much interest what Mr. Jensen says. We have already noted in the HERALD the seeming contradiction of these various learned men. (SAINTS' HERALD, vol. 60, p. 541-545.) And more has been stated concerning the Book of Abraham and the position of the church, as early as volume 46, page 18.

Further than this, those who have studied oriental literature are well aware of the tremendous progress made within the past century, and especially in the last fifty years. They are also well aware of the seeming diversities of the interpretation given of the various hieroglyphics and hieratic writings of the Egyptians. Different names are often given to the same personage; the same words are differently spelled; the same names are differently spelled. As to the pictographs, it is by no means surprising that a number of seemingly diverse but more or less similar interpretations should be given.

Viewed entirely as a matter of scholarship, even of today, let alone as early as 1840, it does not appear that Joseph Smith has failed.

Twenty Thousand Converts

The auditorium drive is over, and from all reports we have it has been fully successful. Now comes that other drive, or slogan, "Twenty thousand converts before next General Conference, with the eyes of each turned towards Zion." That is not quite as simple a matter. We cannot pursue as conveniently the quota method, and assign just so many to each district and branch, or to each missionary.

We can go to with our might to do all that lies in our power. But we must remember that baptism alone is not enough. They must be converted to the cause of Christ, and him crucified. They must be with their eyes turned towards the establishment of Zion. It is not a question simply of numbers—of people who are willing to see their names go on the church record. Though of course there must be that willingness. But these must be converts, willing to do all for the cause of Jesus.

When we speak about a consecration week, how about that kind of a week? Preparation by earnest prayer, individually and as a body in each place, securing of the assistance of an able speaker, and making ready of all things needful in a material way; and in addition thereto preparing our own selves to support the services, to warn our neighbors, help to make the meetings a success with our presence, and with our voice in song (provided that be our talent); or utilizing whatever talent we have.

We should do our part to see that our minute men are kept busy and on the job, and support them when they are in our vicinity with our presence, our faith, and our prayers. If with this we keep all of our church activities going, and do not permit them to suffer, we surely will be kept busy in the cause of the Master. Nor should we sit down and wait for a minute man to come. There is much good we can do of ourselves in the warning of our neighbors, by our lives bearing a living testimony—by our voice spreading the truth of God, that the whole world may be warned.

Some Temple Lot Affairs

Report has been spread from some source that there are mortgages or liens upon the Temple Lot, which plot of ground is now in possession of the small body of Saints known as the Church of Christ. The source of this persistent error is unknown, but the report always places the holding of the mortgage by members of the Utah church. In order to set the matter at rest we here reproduce a paper sent to Elder D. Amos Yates, at San Bernardino, California, March 21, 1920, for which information he had asked. Should this report of the existence of a mortgage have bothered or perplexed any of our members, here is the final word on the matter, over the signatures of the existing officers of the Temple Lot Branch, who are not seeking to do anything except disclose the truth:

"INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, March 21, 1920.

"To Whom This May Concern: This is to say that there is no mortgage on the Temple Lots here in Independence, Missouri, and that we do not owe a dollar to any phase of so-called Mormonism.

"C. L. WHEATON, President of Church.

"J. J. TEETER, President of Branch.

"Church of Christ, Independence, Missouri, E. Stafford, financial agent."

A recent letter from Brother Yates to one of the men having signed this statement, states that some who had circulated the report had been forced publicly to retract their misstatements and acknowledge that they had been misinformed. These reports could not do any person a good service who is interested in the triumph of truth, but they may have caused some astonishment and possibly heartaches to those who are advocates of the faith of Joseph Smith and the Restoration.—Zion's Ensign, November 11, 1920.

Subjects Being Discussed

Incomes

The New York Times is quoted to the effect that the income returns show two men with incomes of three million dollars annually; 28 incomes are above two million; 13 above one million; and 90 possess incomes of more than 750 thousand; 16,000 have incomes between 50 thousand and 750 thousand. It is also stated that there are about 20,000 who have incomes of over 50 thousand a year, though that figure would appear to be excessive, if the above is correct, as the above figures would show scarcely more than 16,000 who have such an income. $50,000 would be the income at 5 per cent on one million dollars, but not all have any such capital, and in many cases these figures represent either largely or principally salaries. The figures indicate four million who have incomes in excess of two thousand dollars, two million of whom are in the two thousand dollar class. This would mean approximately 25 million wage earners receive less than two thousand dollars a year.

Autos Promote Efficiency

Current Opinion for October states that only one in ten automobiles is used for recreation alone. According to the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce 6,800,000 men have added 57 per cent to their productive efficiency, and 2,300,000 families have found it possible to live in the suburbs because of autos the past year while 1,600,000 have used the auto for transportation in an effective way.

However, these figures are based upon the replies to a questionnaire sent to ten thousand passenger automobile owners, picked at random in ten different States. The cards asked occupation, annual mileage, amount mileage for business and for recreation, the amount used to supplement or in lieu of rail or trolley connections; also to what extent the passenger car increased the owner's business, and whether it affected his housing problem or living conditions.

Reports show that it increased efficiency in every walk of life, the heaviest users being farmers, with physicians and salesmen next in line. The use of motor vehicles instead of rail and electric lines represents one third of the total mileage.

Where the Government Money Is Paid Out

It is stated that according to the United States Bureau of Standards, 93 cents on every dollar collected by the United States Government goes for war, past, present, or to come. One cent out of every dollar goes for education and public health combined.

The cities spend on an average of $6 per capita on education. The States and various private institutions spend about $3 per capita for education. The United States spends about 6 cents per capita, and some of that to the "land grant" colleges for military drill.

The National Government is collecting an average of $50 for each man, woman, and child in the country, this year, of which 93 per cent goes for war, and military purposes. Universal military training will add, it is estimated, another billion dollars to that already stated.

Copies of this analysis of our national budget may be secured from Doctor E. B. Rosa, United States Bureau of Standards, Washington, District of Columbia.

Coal Strike in Great Britain

Great Britain is suffering from a great coal strike, which has been threatening for some time, and has finally been precipitated right at the opening of winter. What the outcome will be remains to be seen. A strong point of the strike is the decision by a government commission of Mr. Justice Jeffries, which favored the nationalization of mines. It seems the purpose of the strike is to secure higher wages. At first this was coupled with a demand for a lower price of coal, thus leaving a smaller margin of profit. That was objected to on the basis that it left less profit to be assessed for income. Whatever the reasons may be, the facts are that back of it all the suffering is really placed upon the poor in Great Britain, while labor seems to have a reasonable objection to the course of procedure heretofore, after submitting all grievances to the government commission. The findings of the majority of that commission have not been carried out.

Missionary Work Among the Young

By George E. Harrington

A paper read at an institute at Hamilton, Ontario, January 24, 1920.

In 389 families of the church in this [Toronto] district we have about 548 persons who are not members of the church. This raises the question as to whether we are attending to the needs of the souls who are not members. Upon whom rests the responsibility? To whom may we justly look for a change in the condition?

With such a large percentage of the families of the Saints not members, there can be no question that we need missionary work among the young. So we pass to the responsibility. Our idea of missionary work is that it should bring souls to Christ. The first missionaries in this regard are the parents, for none can have a deeper interest in the salvation of the young than their parents. The law of the church places the responsibility there—where it belongs.

"Behold, I say unto you, that little children are redeemed from the foundation of the world, through mine Only Begotten; wherefore they cannot sin, for power is not given unto Satan to tempt little children, until they become accountable before me; for it is given unto them as I will, . . . that great things may be required of the hands of their fathers."—Doctrine and Covenants 28: 13.

Responsibility of Parents

This very forcibly impresses us with the fact that there exists a period in the child's life when it is in its most plastic stage, where it is free from the dominion of Satanic power and wholly under the control of those whose love is the deepest and whose interest the greatest for their welfare, and for whom they would rather suffer and die than let their offspring perish. So by this the child has surrounding it the possibilities for the best care and an opportunity for a start in the world that will allow it to conquer material as well as spiritual problems. Parents are the primary missionaries to the young.

Again let us listen to the voice of inspiration:

"Inasmuch as parents have children in Zion, or in any of her stakes which are organized, that teach them not to understand the doctrine of repentance, faith in Christ, the Son of the living God; and of baptism and the gift of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of the hands when eight years old, the sin be upon the head of the parents; for this shall be a law unto the inhabitants of Zion, or any of her stakes which are organized; and their children shall be baptized for the remission of their sins when eight years old, and receive the laying on of the hands."—Doctrine and Covenants 68: 4.

While this is specifically made to apply to those dwelling in Zion or any of her stakes, it appears to me it should be taken in a way to impress the inhabitants of Zion that their location or environment would not serve as an excuse for their not teaching what had been previously given.

In Doctrine and Covenants 16, paragraph 6, we are informed that "all men must repent and be baptized, and not only men but women and children who have arrived at the age of accountability."

Parents are to teach the children to be baptized when arriving at the age of accountability, and the revelation to those in Zion declares the age of accountability to be eight years. No one should be baptized except capable of repentance, therefore, whether they are in Zion or out of it the person to be baptized must be mentally qualified.

In Doctrine and Covenants 17: 20 we have confirmation of that thought in the following language: "Again no one can be received into the church of Christ unless he has arrived unto the years of accountability and is capable of repentance."

Others Responsible

Leaving the parental responsibility, let us see who else is responsible. Jesus admonished Peter to feed the sheep and the lambs. The Apostle Paul tells us that God set in the church certain officers, giving some pastors among the rest. In another place they are called overseers to feed the flock, to feed the church of God, etc. In Jeremiah 3: 15 we find that pastors are to feed. There the Lord says: "I will give you pastors according to mine heart, which shall feed you with knowledge and understanding."

Doctrine and Covenants 120: 1 gives us the following: "Branches and their officers, and districts and their officers are to be considered as provided for by my law to carry on the work of the ministry in caring for the membership of the church."

The Place of the Priesthood

Section 17, paragraph 10, gives us to understand that it is the duty of the elder (presiding) to visit the membership. After enumerating the duties of the priest among which is mentioned that of visiting the home of each member and exhorting them to pray vocally and in secret, he says: "In all these duties the priest is to assist the elder, if occasion requires."

This involves the necessity of the pastor knowing the condition of the flock and being ready to supply such needs as occur.

From the responsibility of the pastor we now look for others who are to share the burden. To the pastor we have added by law one whose special duties are to visit the homes of the membership, exhorting them to pray vocally and in secret and attend to all family duties. The priest is to preach, to teach, expound, exhort. His calling clearly implies his association with the families of the Saints, in order to know intimately their needs.

In addition there is another official associated with the pastor designated as a teacher. Upon him rests the responsibility of seeing that the members do their duty, and he is at liberty to warn, exhort, expound, and teach and invite all to come to Christ.

In association therewith are deacons, with the same official privileges, and under the necessity of caring for the membership.

The Church Departments

Another factor, the Sunday school, wields considerable influence among the young. Though not established by revelation it is regarded as a very useful and possibly indispensable means for instructing the young, and can be viewed as one of the helps and governments referred to by Paul. It can very properly be considered as among the organizations for good that the Lord has said should be blessed if they will continue in righteousness. (Doctrine and Covenants 117: 12.) It can become, and doubtless is, a missionary factor that must perform its share of service in developing and leading the young to Christ.

To the list may be added the Women's Department, whose chief concern is the home and child welfare. It stands as a qualifying factor in home activities, in all that contributes to the welfare of the child and the education of the mother. Its work can play a part in leading the child to Christ.

Then there are influential friends whose lives give assurance of their ability to counsel, and who under some circumstances give very helpful assistance. They should respond to assist some tired parent or officer who has confidence in them in helping win the young to God.

The chief concern of the Religio is recreational and entertainment features, but the more that can be made to feel they are of assistance in winning souls, the surer we can be of saving our young.

With a proper alignment of all these forces and the right kind of cooperation, we can look for great success.

Having found the responsible agencies, we need to give attention to some of the factors that contribute to the development of influence necessary to lead souls to Christ. First, we regard in the category of needs the power of love, the development of a proper disposition. Added to this is knowledge; the next, instruction, then facilities, prayer, example.

All these agencies must observe these factors: love, knowledge, instruction, facilities, prayer, example.

Indications of Love

If we love the child we will study him, have an interest in all his movements, a proper estimate of the value of the soul, keenly watching for the making of opportunities to impart some helpful information, preparing the heart by prayer, the mind by study, acquiring knowledge from all available sources to qualify for instruction. We will have possession of the sacred records, secure select readings, valuable books, publications adaptable, meet with others and talk over matters of interest pertaining to child welfare, especially the pastor, Sunday school superintendent, leaders in women's work, teachers in Sunday school, keep a problem record, make note of problems and seek their solution with determination and patience; provide favorable associations for the child; entertainment, good stories to tell or read, if unable to get others to do so; think of the child's health, care for him, and of the child's mind and culture. We will pray with and for them, living by the rules made for them, playing with them, being their companions, requiring obedience, honesty, and truthfulness.

The Pastor's Love

The pastor's love will show itself in his interest for the welfare of the children. He will visit the homes and inquire about them, being always ready to respond to calls for assistance, and endeavor to help others render assistance.

He will study child life and its needs; will pray for the children and qualify to instruct, entertain and help in every way possible. He will make special efforts to interest the child and seek to understand his home surroundings, indicating ways in which the parents can help. It will be his pleasure to learn if any steps have been taken to induce the child to affiliate with the church. A Children's Day yearly will be urged, and special sermons developed for them; agencies will be employed to lead them into the fold. Department workers will be met and recommendations and suggestions offered on betterment of the work. Associate officers will be counseled concerning the welfare of the children, and in every way friendship for the children developed and manifested.

We are reminded that no one can assist in this work except he be humble and full of love, having faith, hope, and charity.

Equipment and Program

Among the items of equipment required are the sacred records, in home and church. There must be well-stored minds and willing hearts for instructors; maps, charts, libraries, quarterlies, and blackboards. There must be qualified storytellers, and musicians with instruments. Sand tables and means for illustrations are necessary. Preaching services, prayer meetings, and provision for recreation are essentials.

Knowledge

All must know what it is we wish others to know, and try to obtain the same. In the education of a soul for entrance into the church there must be a knowledge of the process leading to that end. Special attention is called to the information of prime importance as given in the revelation already quoted.

How are you going to get a satisfactory understanding by the child of the principle of faith?

Do you understand the principle of repentance? How do you know when a child has the right disposition for entrance into the church? How can the disposition be developed? Should you know if the child is in an acceptable condition for baptism? How can you tell? Here is where consultation with the pastor would be of advantage, for parents may not know what to expect of a child.

However, repentance cannot be taught if it be not understood, and the responsibility of teaching this principle is placed upon the parents.

Baptism calls for an understanding of its necessity, of the right of those who can perform the rite, its manner, and who may rightly be baptized.

The laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost is a principle that should be understood to make an intelligent presentation to a child. How can it be done? Does a child have the right to receive this gift? Should we instruct it as to what it may expect, its object, etc.?

These are all principles of the gospel that parents are asked to teach their children before entrance into the church. But the priesthood have need to add something, as we find in Doctrine and Covenants 17:18. We are informed that elders and priests are to have sufficient time to expound all things concerning the church of Christ previous to their partaking of the sacrament and being confirmed by the laying on of the hands of the elders.

We might ask, Does this paragraph apply to children? or may we baptize them without their understanding something about the sacrament? It will be seen, however, that parents are required to become informed especially upon these principles.

Let the children be fully informed and mentally qualified or we are not justified in baptizing them. What else, if anything, is necessary? Should parents persuade children to join the church? Should they insist on them doing so? Will parents be condemned if when they have taught their children as required by the law their children refuse to join the church? The parent must know how to teach and attend to it or be condemned. Officers will be condemned if they do not do their part to inform the parents who are failing in this regard.

Instruction

How to instruct is another big problem. The capacity of the child must be considered. Parents are made the primary instructors, therefore they must learn how. Children are interested in story-telling, in pictures, in actions. True stories can be found about almost any good quality a child needs to learn about. Pictures about good people and what they have done are abundant. Note good deeds of others and tell of them. Simplify for their understanding, strive to understand ways and means to that end.

Have Bible readings in the homes, planning ahead so it will be done effectively. There is a book published in Toronto which takes up the Scriptures systematically, giving suggestions for daily reading. Perhaps with something like that it would make the work more interesting and successful. The Catholics and Episcopalians and some other religionists have their catechisms, bringing out the information through questions and answers. Should we provide something of this kind? Would it be wrong?

Prayer

We cannot hope for success if this important service is neglected. Pray how, when, where, long, short, with them, for them? Shall we have others do so? etc.

Sincere prayer brings about humility of heart, has a softening influence, a sobering as well as a cheering effect, and makes possible the doing of things that otherwise would fail. We may possess the mental equipment but the persuasive and appealing and directing influences come through communion with God. We can never lead our children aright until the heart is right with God. Our children must know we pray; we must pray before them, with them, but mostly for them in the secret chamber. We must take them to prayer meetings and get them into the atmosphere of devotion. We may be incapable as instructors, deficient in ability, but with the blessing of the holy power from on high we can lead better where we allow our deficiencies to be supplied. This guide to all truth is of inestimable value, and it will come with true devotion.

Family prayers should not be long, except as specially inspired, because the object is defeated by wearying the children. But they should be as regular as possible. The children should be asked to pray, and taught to pray on their own account by themselves. If the disposition is developed for sincere devotion you need have no fear but they will gladly come forward to enter the church. Get the heart right with God and other problems will be solved without doubt.

Example

Accepting the statement that children are great imitators, we can readily understand our responsibility for what we do, and how we do, before the young. We cannot evade responsibility for what we say and how we say it in their presence. They study us as well as we study them, and they plan to get what they want as well as we. It is not advisable to presume too much on their ignorance. Lose their confidence and you are a failure ever after. Children believe their parents in all things until they prove them untrue. They believe to be right whatever they see you do and may by themselves be done. If the parent practices deception the child believes it can. If the parent steals, the child thinks it may. If grown-up people use profane language the children do the same. They are not moralists; they do what they feel like doing and take what they want if they can get it. If we are careless we ought not to be surprised if our children are careless. If we are unclean, our children will be unclean. So if we wish them to be good, we must set the pattern. If we don't go to church they are not inclined to do so, as a rule. If we are lazy, they are apt to be; if we are selfish, they will likely be the same.

Then we must, as parents, pastors, priests, Sunday school workers, Religians, Women's Department workers, and others who expect to wield an influence for good over the young with the hope of leading them to Christ do only that which will inspire confidence, nobleness of aspiration, unselfishness, honesty, truthfulness, sympathy, friendliness, purity, earnestness, and energy. With such efforts and such a life we can feel ourselves justified and encouraged to believe our labors for their salvation have not been in vain.

In the measure in which love increases in any social organism, it will hold together without coercion.—Rauschenbusch.

Once upon a time, not very long ago, we used to hear so much about the "evils of the automobile." Preachers preached about it, writers wrote about it, Sunday school teachers talked about it, and old folks shook their heads because of it. To-day we do not hear so much comment on the subject, but it is just as wrong to-day to forsake the worship of God to go riding as it ever was. And God will not listen to our excuses about "the duty of our going to see our friends" any more than our own consciences will.—F. C. Blore.

Hiawatha

By J. L. James

[The following is from a letter to President Elbert A. Smith. It presents a view probably new to our readers as it is to us, but not so different from some theories now advanced in interpretation of the Indian legends and their symbolism. The theory here presented is that in Hiawatha and the Indian legends on which it is based is to be found the story of Christ and his mission and thus proof of the Book of Mormon.—EDITORS.]

The scene of these legends is laid, as you know, in Albany County, of the same State wherein was found the Book of Mormon. A god of love, a god of pity, a god not of one tribe only, but of all creation, such a God as the Saints love is plainly depicted in the "Peace Pipe." Here also we find a prophecy of the coming of Christ, or as here called Hiawatha, divinely conceived by the West Wind and born of a virgin, daughter of Nokomis—the daughter of the Moon.

Of course in reading this it must be remembered that these stories were brought over from Jerusalem by the descendants of Joseph, and from the time the people went into iniquity and became cursed and known as the Lamanites, they were handed down generation after generation by word of mouth. We must also consider the fact that (2 Nephi 4:31-32) God withdrew his presence from them, so these old gospel truths became to the Lamanites mere legends, and finally were so interwoven with their fanciful ideas that it is marvelous that even as much of them are left as we find in the collection above named.

This understanding of Hiawatha may be known to the church but I have never heard of it.

We herewith give the interpretation of one chapter which is strictly confined to the Inspired Version, and being a story told by Iagoo, the story-teller of Hiawatha's Wedding, is complete in itself. The rest is so connected that to get the complete meaning the whole must be interpreted chapter by chapter as a connected story or line of study.

CHAPTER XII

The Son of the Evening Star

"Once in days no more remembered,
Ages nearer the beginning,
When the heavens were closer to us,
And the gods were more familiar."

This represents the early morning hours. The fact that Indians believe that at some far remote time there has been a closer intimacy between them and God, shows that they feel that God has withdrawn himself from them, which the Book of Mormon states as a fact in 2 Nephi 4:31, 32.

"In the northland lived a hunter [Adam]
With ten young and comely daughters,
Tall and lithe as wands of willow."

These ten daughters represent the tribes and cities descended from Adam, as in Genesis 4:2, 3.

"Only Oweenee, the youngest,
She the willful and the wayward,
She the silent, dreamy maiden
Was the fairest of the sisters."

Here we find one daughter that was different from the others, was the fairest, the best.

"All these women married warriors, [Genesis 6:13.]
Married brave and haughty husbands, [Genesis 7:11.]
Only Oweenee, the youngest,
Laughed and flouted all her lovers,
All her young and handsome suitors, [All worldly suitors.]

And then married old Osseo,
Old Osseo, poor and ugly,
Broken with age and weak with coughing." [Genesis 7:
14.]

Old Osseo bowed down with the burden of the sin of the world.

Coughing here could not mean literal coughing because a squirrel does not cough, but chatters or barks. So old Osseo was continually harping at the people to whom it seemed as the mere chattering of a squirrel. (Genesis 8: 8.)

"Ah! but beautiful within him
Was the spirit of Osseo,
From the Evening Star descended,
Star of tenderness and passion,
All its fire was in his bosom,
All its beauty in his spirit,
All its splendor in his language."

Here it is plainly shown that it was not a consumptive cough as some might infer, but that what was to the world at large "idle chatter," was to those who understood, words possessing all the beauty and splendor of the Evening Star.

"And her lovers, the rejected,
Handsome men with belts of wampum,
Handsome men with paint and feathers,
Pointed at her in derision,
Followed her with jest and laughter."

This shows the ridicule of the world toward the followers of Osseo, or as was revealed to us, the scorn of the world for the followers of Enoch.

"But she said: 'I care not for you,
Care not for your paint and feathers,
Care not for your jests and laughter;
I am happy with Osseo!'"

But Oweenee, or the church, cared not for the wealth and show of the world, neither did she mind the scorn; she was happy with Osseo.

"Once to some great feast invited,
Walked together the ten sisters,
Walked together with their husbands."

Whether this great feast has any special significance or is mere Indian fancy is not plain to us.

"Slowly followed old Osseo
With fair Oweenee beside him;
All the others chatted gayly,
These two only walked in silence."

Here we find that as always the faithful in Christ's church are separate from the world, as shown in Luke 6: 22, John 17: 14-16.

"At the western sky Osseo
Gazed intent as if imploring,
At the trembling Star of Evening,
At the tender Star of Woman.
And they heard him murmur softly,
'Pity, pity me, my father.'"

This exemplifies Enoch's prayers and supplications for his brethren as in Genesis 7: 51.

"'Listen!' said the eldest sister,
'He is praying to his father.
What a pity that the old man
Does not stumble in the pathway,
Does not break his neck by falling!'
And they laughed till all the forest
Rang with their unseemly laughter."

Here we plainly see that although the world mocked, sneered, and wished him ill will, they yet admitted that he was bowing his head in reverence and supplication to the deity.

"On their pathway through the woodland
Lay an oak, by storms uprooted.
Lay the great trunk of an oak tree,
Buried half in leaves and mosses,
Mouldering, crumbling, huge and hollow.
And Osseo, when he saw it,
Gave a shout, a cry of anguish,
Leaped into its yawning cavern,

Wasted, wrinkled, old and ugly;
From the other came a young man,
Tall and straight and strong and handsome."

Here as far as we can see, we have perfect evidence that Osseo was not in fact a wasted, ugly old man, but that these words merely show the attitude of the world toward him, his doctrine, and teachings.

"Thus Osseo was transfigured,
Thus restored to youth and beauty;
But alas for good Osseo
And for Oweenee, the faithful.
Strangely, too, was she disfigured,
Changed into a weak old woman.
With a staff she tottered onward,
Wasted, wrinkled, old and ugly.
And the sisters and their husbands
Laughed until the echoing forest
Rang with their unseemly laughter."

Osseo being transformed into a handsome young man could no more be the butt of their sneers and jibes and ridicule, but his bride, the church of Enoch being transformed into an old, wasted, wrinkled woman, they immediately turned their jeers and taunts upon her. This shows that not only did the weight of the sins of the world lay heavily upon the soul of Enoch, but upon the whole city of God, also that not only did the people ridicule the teachings of Enoch, but the whole church was the object of their scorn.

"But Osseo turned not from her,
Walked with slower step beside her,
Took her hand, as brown and withered
As an oak leaf is in winter,
Called her sweetheart, Nenemoosha,
Soothed her with soft words of kindness,
Till they reached the lodge of feasting
Till they sat down in the wigwam
Sacred to the Star of Evening,
To the tender Star of Woman."

Previously it was shown that Oweenee was true to her husband through all the jeers and jibes of the world and in spite of his wasted, wrinkled appearance. So here we have the case reversed—Osseo faithful to Oweenee although he had become a handsome young man, she a tottering old woman, laughed at, mocked at by her sisters, thus proving that Enoch and his bride walked in perfect faith and harmony, making true Genesis 7: 77.

"Wrapt in visions, lost in dreaming,
At the banquet sat Osseo;
All were merry, all were happy,
All were joyous but Osseo.
Neither food nor drink he tasted,
Neither did he speak nor listen,
But as one bewildered sat he,
Looking dreamily and sadly,
First at Oweenee, then upward
At the gleaming sky above them."

In the pleasure, the merrymaking of the world, Osseo took no part. His thoughts, his very spirit was afar off, with his bride, the church on earth, with his Father in heaven.

"Then a voice was heard, a whisper,
Coming from the starry distance,
Coming from the empty vastness,
Low and musical and tender;
And the voice said: 'O Osseo!
O my Son, my best beloved!
Broken are the spells that bound you,
All the charms of the magician,
All the magic powers of evil;
Come to me; ascend, Osseo!
Taste the food that stands before you.
It is blessed and enchanted,
It has magic virtues in it;
It will change you to a spirit.'"

This is the Lamanite version of God speaking to Enoch, telling him of his translation.

"All your bowls and all your kettles
Shall be wood and clay no longer;
But the bowls be changed to wampum
And the kettles shall be silver;
They shall shine like shells of scarlet,
Like the fires shall gleam and glimmer."

Not only was Enoch to be changed but his material possessions were to accord with his changed condition.

"And the women shall no longer
Bear the dreary doom of labor
But be changed to birds, and glisten
With the beauty of the starlight.
Painted with the dusky splendors
Of the skies and clouds of evening!"

Here we find that the worldly sisters were to undergo a change also. But let us remember they were not merely called to ascend, but were to be deprived of their natural bodies, were to be given plumage of different colors.

"What Osseo heard as whispers,
What as words he comprehended,
Was but music to the others,
Music as of birds afar off,
Of the whippoorwill afar off,
Of the lonely Wawonaissa
Singing in the darksome forest."

Here we have an excellent illustration of what the real harmony with God brings to us. Because Osseo was in harmony with God he could comprehend the meaning of what to others, not in accord with God, was the lonely wailing of the whippoorwill.

"Then the lodge began to tremble,
Straight began to shake and tremble;
And they felt it rising, rising,
Slowly through the air ascending,
From the darkness of the tree tops
Forth into the dewy starlight.
Till it passed the topmost branches,
And behold! the wooden dishes
All were changed to shells of scarlet;
And behold the earthen kettles
All were changed to bowls of silver.
And the roof-poles of the wigwam
Were as glittering rods of silver,
And the roof of bark upon them
As the shining shards of beetles."

Here is pictured the literal fulfillment of the prophecy of the translation of Enoch, of course in the Indian vernacular (Genesis 8: 77-78).

"Then Osseo gazed around him
And he saw the nine fair sisters,
All the sisters and their husbands
Changed to birds of various plumage.
Some were jays and some were magpies,
Others thrushes, others blackbirds,
And they hopped and sang and twittered,
Perked and fluttered all their feathers,
Strutted in their shining plumage
And their tails like fans unfolded."

This is an actual fulfillment of God's word to Enoch in Genesis 7: 26. The chief ambition of these sisters in life had been worldly pomp and show, and what better illustrates worldly display than the strutting of birds?

"Only Oweenee, the youngest,
Was not changed, but sat in silence,
Wasted, wrinkled, old and ugly,
Looking sadly at the others,
Till Osseo, gazing upward,
Gave another cry of anguish,
Such a cry as he had uttered
By the oak tree in the forest.
Then returned her youth and beauty,
And her soiled and tattered garments
Were transformed to robes of ermine,
And her staff became a feather,
Yes, a shining silver feather."

We find here, as is written in Genesis 8: 77, 78, that not only was Enoch translated but the whole city of Zion or the church was taken unto God, and Indian fancy here beautifully depicts the church as clothed upon with royal, celestial splendor.

"And again the wigwam trembled,
Swayed and rushed through airy currents,
Through transparent cloud and vapor,
And amid celestial splendors
On the Evening Star alighted,
As a snowflake falls on snowflake,
As a leaf drops on a river,
As a thistle-down on water."

Thus Enoch and Zion arrived at home.

"Forth with cheerful words of welcome
Came the father of Osseo,
He with radiant locks of silver,
He with eyes serene and tender."

A father loving and kind greeted Osseo and his bride; a father with radiant locks of silver; a father of ages.

"And he said, 'My son, Osseo,
Hang the cage of birds you bring there,
Hang the cage with rods of silver,
And the birds with glistening feathers,
At the doorway of my wigwam.'"

Thus fulfilling Genesis 7: 44: "Behold I will shut them up, a prison have I prepared for them." This also shows the wicked without the gates.

"At the door he hung the bird cage,
And they entered in—"

Here we find that after hanging the cage of birds outside the door, Osseo and Oweenee entered in. As all but these had been changed to birds and that the birds were left outside in the cage we have a beautiful picture of Enoch and the Holy City received into the Father's bosom while the wicked were outside, shut up in a prison which had been prepared for them.

"—and gladly
Listened to Osseo's father,

Ruler of the Star of Evening,
As he said: 'O my Osseo,
I have had compassion on you,
Given you back your youth and beauty,
Into birds of various plumage
Changed your sisters and their husbands;
Changed them thus because they mocked you
In the figure of the old man.'

Here is given the reason for the punishment of these people; it was because they mocked Osseo, because they hooted, jeered, and laughed at him.

"In that aspect, sad and wrinkled,
Could not see your heart of passion
Could not see your youth immortal;
Only Oweenee, the faithful,
Saw your naked heart and loved you."

Only the faithful truly saw and understood and therefore loved Osseo. Words that to the world were but idle chatter, the coughing of a squirrel, were to her words filled with the splendor of the Evening Star. That Oweenee, being faithful could thus see and understand the naked heart of Osseo would plainly indicate that if her sisters had been likewise faithful they too would have seen, understood, and loved. Was this not true of the world at the time of Enoch's ministry?

"In the lodge that glimmers yonder,
In the little star that twinkles
Through the vapors on the left hand,
Lives the envious Evil Spirit,
The Wabeno, the Magician,
Who transformed you to an old man.
Take heed lest his beams fall on you
For the rays he darts around him
Are the powers of his enchantment,
Are the arrows that he uses."

Wabeno, the Evil Spirit, darting his beams up on the world, caused the wickedness of the people, with the burdens of which Enoch was weighed down.

"Many years in peace and quiet,
On the peaceful Star of Evening,
Dwelt Osseo with his father, [Genesis 7: 38.]
Many years in song and flutter,
At the doorway of the wigwam
Hung the cage with rods of silver, [Genesis 7:
44, 45.]
And fair Oweenee, the faithful,
Bore a son unto Osseo,
With the beauty of his mother,
With the courage of his father."

This son who was born to Osseo was in fulfillment of the prophecy in Genesis 7: 58, 59, that Christ should come from the seed of Enoch.

"And the boy grew up, and prospered,
And Osseo to delight him,
Made him little bows and arrows,
Opened the great cage of silver,
And let loose his aunts and uncles,
All those birds with glossy feathers,
For his little son to shoot at."

Thus we have plainly depicted the mission of Christ as related in Isaiah 61: 1.

"Round and round they wheeled and darted,
Filled the Evening Star with music,
With their songs of joy and freedom;
Filled the Evening Star with splendor,
With the fluttering of their plumage,
Till the boy, the little hunter,

Bent his bow and shot an arrow,
Shot a swift and fatal arrow,
And a bird, with shining feathers,
At his feet fell wounded sorely.
But, O wondrous transformation,
'Twas no bird he saw before him,
'Twas a beautiful young woman,
With the arrow in her bosom.
When her blood fell on the planet,
On the sacred Star of Evening,
Broken was the spell of magic,
Powerless was the strange enchantment."

Here in beautiful fantasy we have Christ overcoming "death" that man might live again. Not only were the prison bars opened and the captives set free, but their punishment being complete they were changed back to their natural bodies.

"And the youth, the fearless bowman,
Suddenly felt himself descending,
Held by unseen hands, but sinking
Downward through the empty spaces.
Downward through the clouds and vapors
Till he rested on an island,
On an island green and grassy,
Yonder in the Big Sea Water.

Here we see the second coming of Christ as shown to Enoch in Genesis 7: 67 and Genesis 7: 73.

"After him he saw descending
All the birds with shining feathers,
Fluttering, falling, wafted downward
Like the painted leaves in autumn.
And the lodge with poles of silver
With its roof like wings of beetles,
Like the shining shards of beetles,
By the winds of heaven uplifted,
Slowly sank upon the island,
Bringing back the good Osseo,
Bringing Oweenee, the faithful."

These lines tell us plainly of the return of Zion, of Enoch with his church of the first born, back to earth again. Here we find the time of two different events confused, that of the resurrection of the wicked and the return of Christ with Enoch and Zion.

"Then the birds, again transfigured,
Reassumed the shape of mortals,
Took their shape, but not their stature,
They remained as little people,
Like the pygmies, the Puk-Wudjies."

Here we see the wicked sharing in the resurrection, though they had been freed from the prison, though they had paid the penalty of their evil deeds, they yet never could attain the fullness of the stature of Christ.

"And on pleasant nights of summer,
When the Evening Star was shining,
On the island's craggy headlands,
On the sand-beach low and level.
Still their glittering lodge is seen there
On the tranquil summer evenings,
And upon the shore the fisher
Sometimes hears their happy voices,
Sees them dancing in the starlight."

And yet, even though they attained not the perfect stature, though they gained not the highest reward, they yet had received a "fullness of Glory."

"Adversity should strengthen, not weaken, faith in God."

OF GENERAL INTEREST

JOSEPH SMITH, JR., AS A TRANSLATOR

By Elder Nephi Jensen, of the Utah Church, in The Liahona, October 12, 1920.

In the bishop's introductory paragraphs he, of course, points out that if Joseph Smith's translations of these Egyptian characters and pictures should turn out to be incorrect, his claim as a prophet would fall to the ground. In this contention he, of course, is partially right.

But does the testimony of the bishop's expert Egyptologists prove Joseph Smith's translations incorrect! Let us see:

In the first place it should be observed that Bishop Spalding's experts did not agree among themselves regarding these translations. And what is even more fatal to their standing as experts, they did not meet the Prophet on his own ground. Where Joseph Smith made extensive explanations the experts say little. And where the Prophet says much the experts say nothing. In fact, they seem to be strong on the weak points and weak on the strong points.

Only one of these experts, Doctor A. H. Sayce, of Oxford, England, says anything specific and definite about any of the figures. In plate No. 3 he refers in a rather vague way to figure 1 in this plate, which the Prophet said "represents Abraham sitting upon Pharaoh's throne by the politeness of the King, with a crown upon his head representing the priesthood as emblematical of the grand presidency in heaven." Doctor Sayce flippantly remarks, "Smith has turned the God Osiris into a King and Osiris into Abraham." Even if the Prophet had done what Doctor Sayce says he did he could not be guilty of any very great offense. For Osiris was the Egyptian god of immortality. Every good Egyptian, who by virtue of his righteousness attained to immortality became an Osiris. But the singular thing about Doctor Sayce's short letter, which consists of only fifty-three words, is the fact that he says nothing at all about the crown worn by figure 1 in plate No. 3. This is a very serious delinquency on the part of Doctor Sayce, for the reason that the Prophet's extensive explanations of this figure pertain to the crown worn by the figure.

Symbolism of the Feather

It will be observed that there is a large feather on each side of this crown. The statement I have just made carries no particular significance to a layman pertaining to Egyptology. But it has an important meaning to students of Egyptian. Of the significance of the feather to Egyptians, Doctor Budge in volume 1 of his translation of the Book of the Dead, page 4, says: The feather is the emblem of "absolute regularity, order, and moral rectitude and right and truth." When it is remembered that the Prophet looked at this crown with the large feathers on each side of it and determined that they represent "the priesthood as emblematical of the grand presidency in heaven," we will have no difficulty in understanding why Doctor Sayce did not here meet the Prophet on his own ground. Take the qualities and principles of "absolute regularity, order, moral rectitude, right and truth," and you manifestly have all the principles and qualities that go to make up perfect government or the "grand presidency in heaven." It is true that the Prophet's language differs from that of Doctor Budge. But it is equally true that his words carry exactly the same meaning.

Is it possible for an intelligent, unbiased person to compare Doctor Budge's statement concerning the symbolism of the feather with the Prophet's explanation of the crown and escape the conclusion that Joseph Smith, at a time when Egyptian was unknown, actually translated Egyptian!

The Sacred Boat

About all the experts say about plate No. 2 is that it is copied "from a hypocephalus of the ancient Egyptians." The long word here used among other things means round. It is barely possible that some of the members of the church had discovered that this plate was "round" before these experts mentioned the fact. Doctor Von Bissing is the only one of the eight experts who says anything specific about any of the figures in this plate. He speaks of figure 4 as the "God Sokar in the sacred boat." The Prophet Joseph Smith referred to this boat as "a numerical figure signifying a thousand" answering to the measure of time "Obilish," which is equal with Kolob in its revolutions and in its measure of time. On the face of the Prophet's statement it seems to clash with that of the doctor. At first blush one would be inclined to ask who is right, the Prophet or the professor? But as a matter of fact both are right. The professor states what the boat-like figure represents. The Prophet states what is typified to the Egyptian mind. Is the Prophet's explanation correct? Doctor Budge in his translation of the Book of the Dead, volume 1, page 43, says, "The Henu (or sacred) boat was placed upon its sledge and drawn around the sanctuary at dawn properly in imitation of the sun's course." Over a half century before Doctor Budge discovered that the sacred boat was "drawn around the sanctuary in imitation of the sun's course," the Prophet had correctly ascertained that this boat represented the "measure of time" required by one planet to make its course around another. It would be very interesting to know how an unlearned man made this discovery.

The Four Quarters of the Earth

Doctor Von Bissing refers to figure 6 in plate No. 2 as the "four children of Horus." The Prophet states that these figures "represent the earth in its four quarters." Whose statement is correct? Doctor Von Bissing evidently wanted his statement to be accepted as a disproof of the Prophet's translation. For this reason he tells who the figures are instead of telling what they symbolize as the Prophet does. If Doctor Von Bissing had been frank he would have stated as Doctor Budge says in volume 1 of his translation of the Book of the Dead, page 29, that these figures are "the gods of the cardinal points." Of course, if Doctor Von Bissing had said that, his explanation of the figures would have agreed with the Prophet's translation.

Doctor Mercer, another one of the experts, in his first letter to Doctor Spaulding, says nothing in particular about any of the figures in any of the plates. However, after Doctor Webb had written a lengthy article in which he refers specifically to a number of the figures in this plate, he wrote a second article in which he says that "figure 6 in plate No. 2 represents the four cardinal points." His statement is so nearly identical with the Prophet's words, "They represent the earth and its four quarters," that he hastens an attempt to discredit the Prophet. He says, "Quarters are not cardinal points." You are quite right, Doctor Mercer, quarters of a box are not cardinal points. Quarters of a table are not cardinal points. The Prophet said, "They represent the earth in its four quarters." It is no wonder that the doctor, finding that he is here very technical, hastens to say, "However, credit must be given for a certain similarity."

How did the Prophet find out that these figures represented directions or points upon the earth? We once asked a learned critic of "Mormonism" the question, "Is there anything about these figures that looks like the earth or a planet?" The critic frankly replied, "I certainly do not see anything that does." How did the Prophet get the idea that they represented "the earth in its four quarters"? we asked our friend, who replied, "I do not know."

A Representation of Deity

Doctor Mercer speaks of figure 3 in plate No. 2 as "Horus Ra," and adds that the Prophet says, "It is God sitting upon his throne." Then by way of praise of the Prophet he says, "The Prophet here comes nearer the truth than anywhere else." The doctor had scarcely concluded this confession before he attempts to take the confession out of the confession by asking, "But who would not guess that a person apparently sitting upon a throne would most likely be possessed of power and authority?" But when you look at the dog-like figure 3 "apparently" seated upon a box you will then know why Doctor Mercer did not ask, "How did the Prophet guess that this man-like figure with a dog-like head represented God, sitting upon his throne?" We frankly ask Doctor Mercer this question. We also ask him the question, Why did you not tell us who "Horus Ra" was?

Since the doctor has not given us this information we will turn to the Book of the Dead, page 10, volume 1, for answer. We have here a prayer to "Horus Ra": "Homage to thee, Horus Ra, thou art crowned king of all the gods." It will be seen that "Horus Ra" was the chief god of the Egyptians. It was possibly this very fact that led Doctor Mercer to speak of this figure as "Horus Ra" instead of telling what the figure symbolized. The same fact evidently caused him to ask the irrelevant question, "But who would not guess that a person sitting upon a throne would be possessed of power and authority?" instead of asking the question, "How did Joseph Smith guess at all that this figure was God?"

In reference to figure 4 in plate No. 2 Doctor Mercer says, "Nevertheless the Prophet made a good guess." If it was a guess, it certainly was a "good guess." But we shall see it was more than a guess.

Did Joseph Smith Just Guess Correctly, or Was He Divinely Inspired?

We have now shown from the authority of a reputable Egyptologist that the Prophet's explanations of these figures are absolutely correct in five important particulars. If he is correct in all these explanations the conclusion is irresistible that he is correct in all. We are now confronted with the vital question: How could this unlearned man in the year 1844 correctly ascertain the meanings of these figures? There are only three possible answers to this question. He found out either from (1) some known authoritative source; (2) or he guessed the meanings; (3) or the meanings were given to him by inspiration.

Did the Prophet just guess what these figures meant? Did he just look at the crown on figure 1 in plate No. 2 and just guess, and guess correctly, that it represented "the priesthood as emblematical of the grand presidency in heaven"? Did he just guess, and guess correctly, that the crude dog-like figure 3 in plate No. 2 represented "God sitting upon his throne clothed with power and authority"? Did he just look at the crudely drawn boat, figure 4, plate No. 2, and just guess, and guess correctly, that it represented "the measure of time" required by one planet to make its course around another? Did he look at the four crudely drawn man-like figures with dog-like heads, in figure 6, plate No. 2, and just guess, and guess correctly, that they "represent the earth in its four quarters"? Is there anything in the shape, form, and appearance of these figures that gives a clue to their meaning? Does Abraham's crown in any way signify to a layman in things Egyptian the "grand presidency in heaven"? Does the crude dog-like figure 3 in plate No. 2 look more like a dog than a divinity? Could the wildest imagination by any natural process lead one to surmise that the four crude, man-like figures with dog-like heads, figure 6, plate No. 2, "represent the earth in its four quarters"? Is there anything about these four figures that resembles a planet,

WHAT WE BELIEVE

Baptism of the Spirit

By Paul M. Hanson

One of our series of articles on the fundamentals of our church doctrine. The subjects covered have been, faith, repentance, baptism in water. Other articles will follow.

BORN OF THE SPIRIT

The Necessity

"Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."—John 3: 5.

The Promise

"And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever; even the Spirit of truth.—John 14: 16, 17.

Then Peter said unto them, Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call."—Acts 2: 38, 39.

The Procedure

"When they heard this, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them; and they spake with tongues, and prophesied."—Acts 19: 5, 6.

The Office Work

"Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth: for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will show you things to come."—John 16: 13.

The Manifestations

"But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal. For to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; to another faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing by the same Spirit; to another the working of miracles, to another prophecy; to another discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues. But all these worketh that one earth, or stars, or any points or directions upon a planet?

Neither logic, sense, nor reason will warrant the conclusion that the Prophet just guessed what these figures represent. Did some man tell him? Or did he ascertain from some book the significance of these figures? The state of Egyptian learning at the time of the translation of the Book of Abraham completely rebuts such a supposition. Indeed, Doctor Mercer, one of Bishop Spaulding's own experts, in a signed statement said, "If Joseph Smith's translations were shown to be scientifically correct, then he must be conceded, as far as can be judged by literary criticism, to have been inspired. This would be especially true when it is remembered that no correct translation of Egyptian had been made by Egyptologists till some time after the date of the Prophet's work."

No, the Prophet did not guess at the meaning of these figures. No man told him what they meant. He did not learn their significance from some book. The conclusion is irresistible that he accomplished this remarkable work of translation by inspiration. In the accomplishment of this wonderful task alone he set the broad seal of divinity upon his calling.

and the selfsame Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will."—1 Corinthians 12: 7-11.

The Fruits

"But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance: against such there is no law."—Galatians 5: 22, 23.

"If ye love me, keep my commandments. And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever; even the Spirit of truth; whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him: but ye know him; for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you. I will not leave you comfortless: I will come to you.

"But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you.

"Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth; for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak; and he will show you things to come."—John 14: 15-18, 26; 16: 13.

These words were spoken by the living Christ, who said: "I am he that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore." (Revelation 1: 18.)

"Another Comforter" was promised, inasmuch as the time was at hand for Jesus to depart from earth life. Until this time vexatious problems were brought to him for solution; compassionate words were heard spoken in a voice containing heaven's harmony; the mind of God was made known when necessary—now the time was near for his departure from the church! And he said: "I will not leave you comfortless: I will come to you."

This promise of the baptism of the Holy Spirit reveals how precious is man in the sight of God. The realization of God in the lives of men was to be the object of the communion promised. Did not Christ come into the world to bring man and God into close relationship? God's work was to continue to be the bringing to pass of eternal life to man.

Law Governs Spiritual Blessings

The words of Christ indicate clearly that the "Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost," was to be given not indiscriminately to mankind; but was to "dwell with" and "be in" those living in accordance with heaven's will.

An intelligent agency and power was promised that was to be known by the children of God, "abide" with them forever, administer comfort, "teach" them all things, bring all things to their remembrance, "guide" into all truth, and show them "things to come." A heavenly blessing from the throne of God with far-reaching effects!

The disclosing of the way by which one may come into possession of this invisible, yet real heavenly power, that bears witness of God to the souls of men, is possible to all who will humbly investigate and place a high valuation upon the things of God.

The world, for reasons that must appear evident to all, were not to be recipients of this holy power—violators of law are not in accord with God. Even as law governs the operation of electricity (this invisible power will not run along a wooden wire), so in the spiritual realm well-defined laws govern the operation of the Holy Ghost. To be influenced by the Spirit of God, one must be sensitized by obedience to divine law. It is even possible to sincerely partake of the "wine of the wrath" of Babylon, be made drunk by her false doctrines, and in such a stupid state pass through life without perceiving or recognizing the presence of the Holy Ghost. The imbibing of false doctrines is as destructive to spiritual insight and communion with God as the partaking of alcohol is destructive to one's physical powers of discrimination.

Baptism of the Spirit Essential

Jesus said to Nicodemus: "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." (John 3: 5.)

From these words the pendulum of interpretation has swung to extremes. They have been interpreted by some to mean water baptism alone is sufficient—no such thing as a baptism of the Spirit in addition to the water; while others have said the baptism of the Spirit is all that is necessary, and have spoken slightly of water baptism. What saith the Lord? Both the baptism of water and of the Spirit are by the language made essential to entrance into the kingdom of God. The same authority is found for the baptism of the Spirit as for the baptism of water.

Paul, in enumerating the principles of the doctrine of Christ, refers to "baptisms":

"Therefore leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection; not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God, of the doctrine of baptisms [of "water and of the Spirit"], and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment."—Hebrews 6: 1, 2.

When prosecuting the work of building up the kingdom of God, he asked certain disciples near Ephesus:

"Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? And they said unto him, We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost."—Acts 19: 2.

After instructing them more fully concerning Christ they were "baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them; and they spake with tongues, and prophesied." (Acts 19: 5, 6.)

Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ, on the day of Pentecost publicly preached:

"Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call.—Acts 2: 38, 39.

John the Baptist taught his disciples:

"I indeed have baptized you with water; but he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost."—Mark 1: 8.

The belief of the church was:

"But ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his."—Romans 8: 9.

"And be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess; but be filled with the Spirit."—Ephesians 5: 18.

"For our gospel came not unto you in word only; but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance; as ye know what manner of men we were among you for your sake."—1 Thessalonians 1: 5.

The Holy Ghost is God's seal placed upon his children. Note the following:

"In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation; in whom also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory."—Ephesians 1: 13, 14.

The entrance requirements of the kingdom of God as set forth by Jesus to Nicodemus have not changed—Jesus Christ is the "same yesterday, and to-day, and forever." (Hebrews 13: 8.)

Follows the Baptism of Water

The order of the "baptisms" spoken of by Paul to the Hebrews (6: 1, 2) was given by Peter in his words on the day of Pentecost, when the multitude asked, "What shall we do?" He answered:

"Repent, and he baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost."—Acts 2: 38.

Of the baptism of Jesus we read:

"And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water: and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him."—Matthew 3: 16.

After the Samaritans were baptized, the apostles sent Peter and John unto them:

"Who, when they were come down, prayed for them, that they might receive the Holy Ghost: (for as yet he was fallen upon none of them: only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus). Then laid they their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost."—Acts 8: 15-17.

In explaining the new birth to Nicodemus the Savior placed the baptism of water in order before the baptism of the Spirit. (John 3: 5.)

The rule of procedure is established in these passages from the scriptures—the baptism of the Holy Spirit follows the baptism of water for the "remission of sins." How orderly is the divine arrangement!

In the case of Cornelius and those with him, Gentiles upon whom fell the Holy Ghost before baptism, while they were giving audience to Peter's preaching, it is clear that this was done to confirm the fact that the gospel was not designed exclusively for the Jews, and to open up the pathway of the church to the Gentiles. It was considered not lawful by the Jews to keep company with those of the uncircumcision (Acts 10: 28) so God showed open favor to the Gentiles before their initiation into the church. But Peter, who knew the true order, as it had been announced by him under inspiration of God on the day of Pentecost, at once said concerning Cornelius and those with him:

"Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we? And he commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord."—Acts 10: 47, 48.

As we move in harmony with God, we move safely—false doctrines intoxicate and lead into the broad way.

Baptisms Not Sprinkling

The reception of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost indicates that the baptism of the Holy Ghost was an overwhelming, not a sprinkling of the presence of the Holy Ghost—literally an immersion:

"And when the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one place. And suddenly there came a sound from heaven, as a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues, like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance."—Acts 2: 1-4.

Promise Without Time Limitations

The promises and commandments of our Lord are in force throughout the gospel dispensation. God has not limited his work through Jesus Christ. We are now living in the light of that glorious dispensation.

Peter's words may well be proclaimed to the ends of the earth: to all who are ignorant of or who have not received the Holy Ghost:

"Repent, and he baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call."—Acts 2: 38, 39.

If an entrance into the kingdom of God is possible to-day, the baptism of the Spirit is possible, for: "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."—Jesus.

The same kind of reasoning that establishes baptism of water as a part of the gospel of Christ, establishes the baptism of the Holy Spirit as essential to salvation.

Peter said in reference to the pouring out of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost:

"For these are not drunken, as ye suppose, seeing it is but the third hour of the day. But this is that [Spirit] which was spoken by the Prophet Joel; and it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh: and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams: and on my servants and on my handmaidens I will pour out in those days of my Spirit; and they shall prophesy: and I will show wonders in heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath; blood, and fire, and vapor of smoke: the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come: and it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved."—Acts 2: 15-21.

In no sense did Peter say the fulfillment of the prophecy of Joel was limited to the day of Pentecost; but what was manifested was "that which was spoken by the Prophet Joel." The record does not show that on that day the Spirit of God was poured out "upon all flesh," that "sons and daughters" prophesied, that young men saw "visions," or that old men dreamed "dreams"; in no sense is it suggested that after that day there was to be no further manifestation of the power of God by means of the Holy Ghost.

The marvelous doctrine of the unchangeability of God should enable one to understand that the promises in the will of God sealed by the blood of Christ are sure, and their realization is dependent alone upon us. The following is conclusive that the promise of the Holy Ghost by Christ and Peter, et al, has not expired or become of none effect:

"Brethren, I speak after the manner of men; Though it be but a man's covenant, yet if it be confirmed, no man disannulleth, or addeth thereto."—Galatians 3: 15.

Received Through the Laying on of Hands

It must appear to all readers of the Scriptures that many of the choice blessings of heaven were enjoyed after the imposition of hands by God's ministry. God has not departed from the order he instituted in the beginning. This practice does not mean that Christ is supplanted, but that Christ's ambassadors are acting authoritatively in his name. Thus the ministry of Christ become a medium of blessing to the people.

The laying on of hands was practiced by the church for the reception of the Holy Ghost:

"Now when the apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John: who, when they were come down, prayed for them, that they might receive the Holy Ghost: (for as yet he was fallen upon none of them: only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.) Then laid they their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost."—Acts 8: 14-17.

"And Ananias went his way, and entered into the house; and putting his hands on him said, Brother Saul, the Lord, even Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, hath sent me, that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost."—Acts 9: 17.

"When they heard this, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them; and they spake with tongues, and prophesied."—Acts 19: 5, 6.

The church was not at this time in apostasy; and as it did not practice an ordinance of human appointment in so sacred a relation, it is clear that the ordinance of the laying on of hands for the purpose practiced was given by commandment of God.

Christ in his commission to the apostles, commanded: "Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you."—Matthew 28: 20. Then was not this an ordinance that was observed by the church commanded of the Lord?

Paul in making known the cardinal principles of the doctrine of Christ, immediately after mentioning "baptisms" makes specific mention of the "laying on of hands." (Hebrews 6: 1, 2.)

The account of Ananias laying his hands on Saul that he might be "filled with the Holy Ghost" establishes the fact that the practice of the laying on of hands for the bestowal of the Holy Ghost was not confined to the apostles.

The same church that practiced the baptism of water for the "remission of sins," practiced the laying on of hands for the bestowal of the Holy Ghost.

Ministry Called by Revelation

By the Holy Ghost men were called to the ministry:

"As they ministered to the Lord, and fasted, the Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them."—Acts 13: 2.

"Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers [their position was made known by the Holy Ghost revealing the mind of God], to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood."—Acts 20: 28.

If there is no revelation from God to-day by the power of the Holy Spirit, how are uninspired men to know who should be "overseers" in the church? Will guesses by men denying revelation from God place men approved of God in offices in the church? Such procedure had no place in the church under the administration of Christ.

Timothy and all others of the ministry were ordained in harmony with the mind of God made known by the Holy Ghost:

"Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy [in accordance with prophecy], with the laying on of hands of the presbytery."—1 Timothy 4: 14.

"And no man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron."—Hebrews 5: 4.

Operations of the Holy Spirit

The Holy Ghost was to "dwell with" and "be in" the children of God, and "abide" with them forever. A definite work therefore was to be accomplished by the presence of this holy power of God in the lives of his people. Its operation was to be not only through the word of God, but also independent of the word, in which the mind and heart would be touched by the Lord, and the man thus brought into close fellowship with God. On the day of Pentecost the Holy Ghost so wrought; direct from heaven, not merely through the medium of the written or spoken word.

If there is only the word, no Holy Ghost to operate on the minds and hearts of men, it must appear evident to all that uninspired teachers will involve the world in interminable confusion in giving interpretations to what was given through inspired men.

The Samaritans experienced great joy in hearing the gospel and being baptized; but the Holy Ghost was "fallen upon none of them; only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus." Then Peter and John laid their hands on them, and they "received the Holy Ghost." Of a very elementary character, indeed, would have been their religious experience without the reception of the Holy Ghost—if they had only been baptized.

Again Paul in addressing the church, writes:

"But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man [in the church] to profit withal. For to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; to another faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing by the same Spirit; to another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to another discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues; but all these worketh that one and the selfsame Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will."—1 Corinthians 12: 7-11.

These gifts bestowed by the Spirit, were to find expression as the faculties of men were wrought upon directly by the Lord. God blesses both directly by his Spirit and through the word.

Some religionists would have us believe that the only way one can come in contact with God now is to read what was given through his servants ages ago. They might as well teach that the only way the world can come in contact with the Devil to-day is to read what was given through his emissaries ages ago! Who doubts that the power of the Devil will operate now, in harmony with, yet independent of any record of his past display of power? Such teaching as the above is dangerous, for it represents God as being less active and more changeable than the Devil. God has ever represented himself as being particularly accessible to his church and covenant people. The following are the words of the Son of God:

"Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you: for every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened. Or what man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone? Or if he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent? If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him!"—Matthew 7: 7-11.

Jesus said to his apostles:

"Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned. And these signs shall follow them that believe: In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover."—Mark 16: 15-18.

An analysis of these words reveals that the Holy Ghost in its operations was not confined within a period of a few decades after Christ made known the will of the Father. Nor were the "signs" confined to the apostles. Since the apostles are the antecedent of "ye," they cannot be the antecedent of "them," for "ye" is a personal pronoun of the second person, while "them" is a personal pronoun of the third person. Is it a true course to pursue to plead for the belief, or the baptism of water, as set forth by Christ in these words, and reject the signs which he said would manifest the existence of the Holy Ghost in the church and the faith of men in God's word? Truly, no.

We may further learn of the wonderful and helpful work of the Holy Spirit:

"But ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God: and if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together. Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities: for we know not what we should pray for as we ought: but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered. And he that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because he maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God."—Romans 8: 9, 11, 14, 16, 17, 26, 27.

"And grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption."—Ephesians 4: 30.

Hearken! God works to-day in association with his ordinances, his law, and his promises, according to the faith of men: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away."—Matthew 24: 35.

What the compass is to the mariner traversing the deep, the Holy Spirit is to the children of God on life's turbulent sea. The Holy Spirit oftentimes leads from the popular throng, leads one as Saul and Moses and Abraham were led, to God, Christ, and the keeping of the commandments that enables one to live a life approved of God.

The art galleries contain wonderful specimens of sculpture; cold, inanimate marble seems to pulsate with life, and in the stone various emotions are portrayed. Such being the product of chisel and mallet and the directing power of the human mind, think what beautiful statuary is possible through the operation of the Holy Spirit under the direction of God, upon living, pulsating creatures! Statuary fit for celestial environments! Faces on which sorrow has deeply stamped its line soon reflect the glorious image of Christ. Under God's power character is transformed. One is made a "new creature"—old things have passed away.

"Brother, is life's morning clouded?
Has its sunlight ceased to shine?
Is the earth in darkness shrouded?
Dost thou at thy lot repine?
Cheer up, brother, let thy vision
Look above; see light is near;
Soon will come the next transition,
Trust in God and persevere."

W. Jett Lauck points out that there is no reason for any increase in the price of anthracite coal, but that the operators last April advanced the cost of the consumers sufficient to cover an additional labor cost of $1 a ton, while in fact the wage increase adds only 50 cents to the labor cost of producing a ton of coal. He states there should instead be a reduction in the price of anthracite coal of at least $1.85. Figures from other sources show that an increase of labor cost of $1.41 in the past six years has been covered by an increase in retail price of $3.33 to $4.48.

THE SEMINAR

Conversion and Miracles

The following statement on the subject of religion and conversion appears in the letters of William James now being published in the Atlantic Monthly. This theme he develops more fully in his book, The Variety of Religious Experiences. The statement as given in 1897 is shown in this extract:

"You have written me at different times about conversion, and about miracles, getting as usual no reply, but not because I failed to heed your words, which come from a deep life experience of your own evidently, and from a deep acquaintance with the experience of others. In the matter of conversion, I am quite willing to believe that a new truth may be supernaturally revealed to a subject when he really asks. But I am sure that in many cases of conversion it is less a new truth than a new power gained over life by a truth always known. It is a case of the conflict of two self-systems in a personality up to that time heterogeneously divided, but in which, after the conversion-crisis, the higher loves and powers come definitely to gain the upper hand and expel the forces which up to that time had kept them down in the position of mere grumblers and protesters and agents of remorse and discontent. This broader view will cover an enormous number of cases psychologically, and leaves all the religious importance to the result which it has on any other theory.

"As to true and false miracles, I don't know that I can follow you so well, for in any case the notion of a miracle as a mere attestation of superior power is one that I cannot espouse. A miracle must in any case be an expression of personal purpose, but the demon purpose of antagonizing God and winning away his adherents has never yet taken hold of my imagination. I prefer an open mind of inquiry, first about the facts, in all these matters; and I believe that the S. P. R. methods, if pertinaciously stuck to, will eventually do much to clear things up. You see that, although religion is the great interest in my life, I am rather hopelessly nonevangelical, and take the whole thing too impersonally."

Tests of an Educated Man

Doctor Nicholas Murray Butler, who says so many wise and sane things, speaking recently at Columbia University, gave six tests of an educated man, which, as reported by The Churchman, are as follows:

"Correctness and precision in the use of the mother tongue, gained only by association with good English; refined and gentle manners, which are the expression of fixed habits of thought and conduct; sound standards of feeling and appreciation; the power of reflection; the power of growth, and lastly, the ability to do efficiently without nervous agitation."

Education is the development of the man. One's idea of education is determined by his convictions concerning man. The materialists will magnify the physical man, a practice which has been evident in this materialistic age. The idealist will magnify the man's power, vision, and inventiveness of scheme. This also has appeared in our times as a reaction against the materialistic view. The Christian will see the highest development of man's education in faith and love toward God and in sympathy and helpfulness toward man. Doctor Butler's conception of an educated man contains many important and desirable elements, but it omits wholly the great Christian essentials. His test would meet the highest requirements of cultured heathenism, but it falls far short of the Christian standard. The whole tendency of

Musical Problems in Zion

Not yet half a dozen months ago, what was then known as the Independence Stake underwent a transition that had been the fond dream of many who had not been permitted to live to see it. This stake ceased to exist as an independent unit, merging into the actual establishment of Zion.

Of course it was only expected that in the materially enlarged scope of the new order of things there should arise problems, and the musical work in Zion soon became confronted with its share of them. First, it became evident to our musical workers that in the added spiritual life that should obtain in the new condition of Zion the music of Zion should be more spiritual, which means that our musicians should lead more consecrated lives, think holier thoughts. It also became more apparent that they who would serve Zion, even musically, must serve more faithfully, more intelligently, and that their service should, even in song, reflect the greater purity and spirituality that should characterize those who had assembled to Zion.

As a natural accompaniment there came with these greater spiritual problems those of a more material, mechanical nature, for even so ethereal (as some esteem it) a thing as music carries with it elements of a material character. It was apparent that the development that had hitherto served the Independence Stake and its separate branches was no longer adequate for the larger adjustment of things; that interests which were hitherto individual and largely separate were now common and collective and as such were largely altered.

For some time before this transition each branch of the Independence Stake had in a very large measure the determination of its own policies and it also, in a considerable measure, provided for its own needs. Naturally, under such conditions, the branch that had the most resources and ingenuity in meeting its wants fared the best. The largest branch had the biggest and best-trained choir, the best singers, and the best piano or organ; the other branches being denied these things in just the proportion that their resources and ingenuity were lacking.

But under the new regime of Zion it is realized that the prosperity of every part is equally important, and the growth of the small choir is as necessary for the good of the musical whole as that of the large choir, and that a system of development must be had that will bring all parts into equal efficiency.

There is one problem that inevitably comes with the closer association of these branches in the now merged state of Zion. It is the problem of caring for the assembly of the whole.

All of the church is now fully aware of the project for building the "General Conference auditorium," and the assurance of success had in the magnificent response from all quarters of the church. This building has been styled the conference auditorium, but it is evident that a building of such capacity and resource would hardly justify its existence were it to be opened and used only for the sessions of the General Conferences of the church. It will have other and important uses, and there are many functions of the stake of Zion as well as of the general church, that will have their proper expression in this building.

Now, the particular problem that confronts Zion's musical forces is to provide the proper musical complement and equipment for not only this building but the enlarged scope of things as embodied in Zion and her development.

This is "some problem," you can easily understand, and right now the Independence forces are in the midst of formulating plans for its solution. But to detail these plans now, before their perfecting, would be "telling." Soon we will have them outlined and then we are going to tell you about them.

Their Ministry to Study Music

In the "music and musicians" department of the Kansas City Star for Sunday, October 31, is a short article entitled, "Teaches ministers music." It describes the efforts of William Jewel College, at Liberty, Missouri, a school under the direction of the Baptist Church, to teach its theological students the practical elements of music work, especially that part of it that concerns the music of the church. Mr. Harry E. Cooper, a Kansas City organist, has been engaged to revive this work in the school.

Students of the ministry are to be taught a knowledge of the history of music and its place in the church work. The twenty or more students taking the course will have intensive study in several lines of music work including the study of hymn poetry and hymns.

It is the contention of these college men that even good hymns may be disastrous to the effect of a sermon if they are not in harmony with its idea and that one cheap musical number may ruin the effect of an entire service.

William Jewel is one of the very few universities in this country that is making an attempt to equip graduating ministers in the work of practical church music.

This is a good thought and in time we, as a church, must see to it that our ministry are trained in the practical application of music to their church work.

Choir Organization

[This excellent, though brief, article on this much-discussed question, is from the pen of Sister Christine Waller, of San Francisco, the daughter of Brother G. J. Waller of that place. Sister Waller at one time occupied the chair of piano instruction in Graceland. She now occupies the double post of being the director of the choir of the San Francisco Branch and the chorister of the Northern California District. Sister Waller is active in the musical circles of the church and we anticipate that her activities in the church's musical work will increase.—A. H. M.]

In the following I desire to give a short, condensed outline on choir organization, hoping it may prove of benefit to some of the choir leaders in the church on whom the responsibility of the choirs in the various branches is placed. I hope that the suggestions will at least give aid or stimulus to workers in this important branch of the Lord's vineyard.

The choirs of our church are usually designed to lead the congregation in song as well as to render special musical numbers.

In branches where there are not sufficient voices to blend and balance for a large choir, a mixed quartet consisting of soprano, contralto, tenor, and bass is perhaps, the most satisfactory but care must be taken that the voices blend. The following is a suggestion for two quartets drawn up with reference to balance of voices:

1. A light, high soprano, a mezzo-contralto, a lyric tenor, a baritone.
2. A full mezzo or dramatic soprano, a contralto, a robust tenor, a full, low base.

A choir numbering more than eight voices, the double quartet, is usually called a chorus choir and this is most satisfactory as, with the addition of a solo quartet, it is capable of rendering some of the finest compositions to be found in the literature of church music and there is an extensive list of good compositions for use by such a choir.

Besides a choir director, a secretary and librarian may be chosen. The secretary should keep a register of membership and of attendance at rehearsals and services and collect and keep choir dues if there are any. The secretary can also be of assistance in welcoming members and inquiring after delinquents. The duties of the librarian are to keep the music in order and distribute and collect the same at rehearsals. These two officers, together with the director, are all that are necessary in carrying on the work on an average-size choir, as a multiplicity of offices only complicates matters.

As the work of the choir director is to choose the music to be sung as well as to arrange the rehearsals and manner of performance, he should do all in his power to become qualified for the work. The study of harmony, counterpoint, musical form, composition and literature of vocal music will all be found valuable in assisting to make one an efficient leader. We need to adopt certain methods so as to make our musical work a success, and work with a view to bringing about definite results, such as:

An increase of membership.

Regularity and punctuality in attendance.

An advance in the grade of music performed.

Improvement in quality and volume of tone.

Added expressiveness in performance.

As leaders we must have love and enthusiasm for our work to such an extent that the members of the choirs will imbibe the same spirit, and awakened interest and renewed effort will be our reward.

CHRISTINE WALLER.

Musical Activities in Western Michigan District

Brother Waldo W. Kapnick, the newly selected chorister of the Western Michigan District, is getting into his work with commendable enthusiasm. He proposes to get into active touch with the choristers of the various branches of his district, exercise more than a mere passing interest in their work, and in a personal intelligent supervision of their work, advance the choir interests of the district. He contemplates writing them a letter each month, and has sent us a copy of the first one. We herewith produce this letter, that others of our district choristers may by reading it obtain some possibly valuable ideas for the more efficient conduct of their work:

"Dear Coworker: It is with a great deal of pleasure that we view the prospects of the coming year in the musical department of our district. We are hoping that those who have this work in charge in the various branches will take a renewed interest in their local activities, and the musical department of their branches will then take on a brighter and livelier outlook, which will result in a development that will be an honor and a bright spot in each branch, in the district, and in the department as a whole. The musical part of the services in most branches has not been advancing in line with the other lines of work and it is our hope that we can bring this very important feature of our work up to a commendable place.

"You have been given this responsibility in your local branch because you have, it is supposed, some qualifications as a musician and a leader. We are relying upon you to develop the material available. You may have only a few who can give service in this line; you may feel handicapped because of this, but bear in mind this thought: you cannot work with what you have not, but with what you have. Use whatever material you have at hand, never losing sight of the possibility that there may be those in your branch who, if given training and encouragement, might develop into valuable material for your musical department.

"The most essential thing for you to have as director is interest in your work and the first lesson to teach your choir is interest. Teach them to see the good they can do by giving their best to this work. Teach them to know that the church is in need of the service they can give.

"You will receive a letter from me each month outlining your work in a suggestive way. I want you to write me, but don't write your discouragements; forget them. If possible, I will visit you during the year.

"We are sure of success if we can get everybody to working.

"Take your work to God in prayer; he will aid you.

"Yours for a live, growing department,
"WALDO W. KAPNICK."

Indian Spiritual Life Is Expressed in Song

Indian songs are exerting an increasing fascination over the American people. This interest has led to the discovery of many curious facts about the art which most deeply expresses the desires and aspirations of the only genuinely native American.

It has been found that song is a spiritual part of the Indian's life, and he uses this means of expressing himself in ceremonial and dance, in life and in play. And yet, odd as it may seem, with the exception of their love songs, Indian songs rarely have words; they generally contain meaningless monosyllables much like our nonsense rhymes. But whatever their faults, they are always spontaneous and natural.

Many singers have recognized the possibilities of using Indian melodies as part of their program and these have met with marked success. During the last year Sousa has been giving this music a great deal of attention and on a great many occasions has had as one of the numbers of his programs Orem's Indian Rhapsody.

Well-known composers like MacDowell, Cadman, Nevin, Carl Busch, and others have aided in bringing forward many of the remarkable melodies of this ancient people and to-day the weird tunes of the Red Man have come to be considered a treasure house of song from which may be drawn the truly great American music of the future.

Trend of Fashion in Popular Songs

Verdict of the public on the value of musical compositions is infallible.

To the passerby in any of our cities the shop window full of garish music covers with the inevitable sign, "The latest popular music," is very familiar.

There are "fashions" in music, as well as in dress, and both are changing continually. Some of us can remember the day of the "Pop goes the weasel" type, followed by the tearful songs of Civil War days, like "One vacant chair." Then came a livelier strain with "Champagne Charlie" and "Captain Jinks" to the fore, followed by the unique Harri-gan songs. "Rag" was succeeded by "jazz," the present "craze."

It has unfortunately come to pass that everything published during one of these "crazes" is dubbed "popular." This is not very flattering to the taste of the public. As a matter of fact the verdict of the public regarding the musical value of a composition is well-nigh infallible, and it is probably safe to say that only about one in a thousand of "jazz" publications has any chance of becoming really popular. In other words, the "plain people" will not accept poor music even in "jazz."

Again, "popular" is a misnomer as applied to a musical composition, which is with us to-day and forgotten to-morrow. The real "popular" music is that usually of simple construction which has a quality that endears it to the public, and makes it practically everlasting. "Hiawatha," "Tipperary," "Over there" had their day and are gone forever, but "Traumerei," "The lost chord," "Swanee River," and the like are just as new and appealing as they were the day they were written, and they are typical of the real popular music.

Patti thrilled her audiences with her glorious tones and her brilliant roudades, but after all no Patti concert program was complete till she sang "Home, sweet home."

The dissolving of doubts is attained, not so much through clearer thinking as through deeper living. The way of the Scriptures, the way of light, is not the road of abstract reasoning, but the road of the cross.—Nash.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

The Centennial Yearbook

Have you ordered your copy of our new book? If not, you will want to get your order in early, as the edition was not overlarge, and you may be disappointed later.

An effort has been made to present the ideals and objectives of the Women's Department in a clear and definite manner, emphasizing at all times the fact that our field is in the home, with the women and the children. To the broad minded, however, it is plainly evident that the pursuit of this ideal leads us far afield, entering the domains of community and political life, the departments of public welfare and social reconstruction, and all progressive, cooperative movements of church and state.

In our yearbook we have attempted to touch upon the various and developing phases of our women's work in the church. Our privileges in regard to educational efforts along lines of home and child welfare, of the work of young women, of relief and service, of citizenship, of social purity, and other lines of our endeavor, have been touched upon in broad, general terms which will bear adaptation to local needs and conditions.

A message from the President of the church, and another from Mrs. F. M. Smith, the general director of our department, will be of deep interest. A dedicatory poem written by Sister Vida Smith to the president of the first woman's organization in the church, Emma Hale Smith, is full of fine feeling and appreciation. A quaint portrait of the latter, taken from an old oil painting, is used for frontispiece, and is something which adds much to the value of the book. A glance at our church development is given by our church historian, Brother Walter W. Smith, and another at the growth of our own department by Sister Madge Siegfried.

A bibliography, both useful and timely, for the use of those who wish to pursue with enthusiasm their studies along various channels, has been included. In it is a list of the publications put out by our department, as well as an initial list of "loan papers" which are available for the use of locals everywhere. This latter list will be augmented from time to time, as opportunity and wisdom dictate.

Orders for the Centennial Yearbook may be placed with our general office, and will be filled promptly. The price is 75 cents per copy.

Keep Your Children Busy

[We asked a busy mother to send us a few suggestions regarding the question of keeping children busy in pleasant and happy ways, and received in response the following little article. We note that the underlying spirit in the heart of this mother is to make her home so pleasant for her children that they will joy to be there, and will have no desire to wander away from the direct influence of her maternal and solicitous care. The mother heart which is great enough to include in its thought the neglected children of mothers who do not sense fully the sacredness of the charge that has been given them, urges her also to make her home attractive to them also in order that she may be able to bring into their lives some influence for good. Would that that spirit and that heart-impulse were everywhere visible among our Latter Day Saint mothers!—A. A.]

If your back yard will not grow vegetables, why not plant a child there?

If you have no children of your own, make a play place for some other person's child.

Prepare and fill a sand box and add two or three small buckets, old spoons, etc.

Build a low platform, from which they may jump to the soft grass beneath. Construct a short ladder to climb, as well as steps for the tiniest ones.

Fasten up a swing. Have a single rope swing for the older boys.

Nail a box to a shade tree, and provide with an oilcloth curtain. Fill it with children's books—old ones preferred—or children's magazines. Solicit some from your neighbor, if necessary. Build a seat around that tree, and just let the boys of the neighborhood know that if they are quiet and orderly, they can drop down to read any time they wish.

Institute any interesting thing you can think of, the idea being to keep the children off the street. Too little attention is paid to the play part of a child's life. Do you remember the big things of your childhood, or is it not the time when Mrs. So and So let you make a little loaf of bread all your own, or gave you a wonderful nice fat cookie! Pass it on, and let some other child look back through the years and remember you the same way.

Once, on a cold winter day, a number of boys went out with my own to skate. A real blizzard came up and the boys became bitterly cold and wet, and they all trooped back to our house to dry and warm. I happened to have on hand a big kettle of pea soup, and some very nice fresh bread. I fed those boys soup and bread and butter to their hearts' content. That was several years ago, and yet those little fellows never fail to take off their caps to me when they see me, for they remember the small kindness. By the way, one of the boys confessed at the time that it was the first home-made bread he had ever tasted! What a criticism of that boy's mother!

One does not have to put oneself out much for children. It is the small act done in the passing that lives in their memories and gives happiness. If you have kept a child from the streets for one day, or part of a day, you may have kept him from unknown danger or temptation.

Do not be afraid of a little noise. I have had other people's children in my yard for seventeen years, and I find them without exception careful of their language, their noise, or anything that might be disagreeable to the lady of the house, if they feel they are welcome and that she is in sympathy with them. If they commence to get noisy or use the wrong kind of language, I go out and tell them they can't do that and stay in my yard. If they behave they may stay, if not, out they go. They will laugh it off and behave, for they feel you love them and it is all right for you to control them.

Think up things for them to do, and things for you to do for them. If you don't love them hard enough when you commence to do for them, you will before you get through. Perhaps you can teach a girl to love sewing by showing her how to make a doll dress. Perhaps she will undertake a piece of fancywork with which to surprise her mother. Perhaps you can show a boy how to build some small thing of wood. If you haven't time for this, just prepare some little special goody in the house for them alone, and they will do the rest, and your reward is sure, and is one that cannot be measured in dollars and cents!

Home Influence

Under ordinary conditions the child is under the exclusive control of his parents for the first five or six years of his life. The influence exerted upon him during that period usually determines much in his character, for his home is his world. His education begins in his home; not the education gained by book learning, but the self-education gained by observation. He naturally sets up his home as a model to copy; he looks upon the judgment of his parents as the only right judgment, and upon their method of life as the perfect method. What parent would wish it otherwise? It is as natural for a child to set his home upon a pedestal of perfection as it is for him to run to his mother when he is in trouble.

When he is five or six years of age, the child is sent to school, and is placed under the care of an infant mistress. Now begins his school influence, controlling him for four or five hours of the twenty-four. Whether the influence of the home and the influence of the school are in accord, or whether they are at variance, is the purpose of this article to discuss.

Among the first lessons the child has to learn at school are those of strict obedience and of strict honor. If he has not acquired the habit of obedience and the virtue of honor during the determinative period of his life before he enters the school, if the home and the school influences are antagonistic, then his troubles begin. He leads a double life, just as many older children, from illiterate homes, speak two languages—that of the home when at home, and that of the school when at school.

Happily the child is unaware of the struggle between the two influences, but the struggle nevertheless takes place. Either his home and his parents are right, and his teacher an ogre, or his teacher is right and his home is wrong. Why should he obey a stranger when at school, and disobey his parents when at home? Why should he be severely chided for his evasions of the truth at school, and simply told "not to do it again" when he tells a lie at home, the command being given so weakly that he knows it need not be obeyed?

When the influences of home and of school blend, so that unity of aim and honesty of purpose control the child at all times, then is produced the foundation upon which the ideals of true citizenship may be based. When the influences do not blend, but diverge into different channels, then is produced that pitiful paradox, the cunning child, whose one aim usually is to please himself, and no one else. The divergence is seldom of set purpose; it is, in the home, usually the result of that unreasoning and cruel indulgence which is miscalled "love." The "dew of love" is a pretty and poetical idea, but more than dew is needed to grow a healthy plant, and more than love, as that emotion is popularly understood, is needed to rear a morally healthy child. Real love steels the heart when necessary. Sympathy, though of course a fundamental in home government, is too often so misguided and so misplaced that it breeds contempt of authority and scorn for the right. A father may sympathize with the inherent love of risk that prompts his boy to rob an orchard, though apples in plenty are available at home, but, if wise, he sinks his sympathy in his desire to show, either by admonition or punishment, that in order to preserve equity, a strict line between mine and thine must be drawn, and that we cannot break the commandments, nor sin against society with impunity. Children are reasonable beings, and in all our dealings with them the greatest care should be observed in avoiding all semblance of injustice, for few things sour the mind more quickly than the idea, right or wrong, that unfair treatment has been received. A child is perhaps in the habit of uttering falsehoods, and receives scolding and unfulfilled threats from an unthinking parent. This child will at some time lie to his teacher, who probably exposes the disgrace to his classmates, points out the cowardice and meanness of lying, and warns him that a repetition of the offense will bring certain punishment.

To the sufferer, all this is unfair, and sets up a line of separation between home and school, and develops an inclination to look upon the vice of lying as a refuge in time of trouble. The vice of lying is, perhaps, the most noticeable of any of untrained childhood's faults. But it is by no means the only trouble directly traceable to the upbringing of a faulty home, of a home where laxity of purpose and uncertainty of aim result from the absence of steady discipline and firm, yet sympathetic, authority. If weak or overindulgent parents only realized to what extent their folly influences school life, to the detriment of progress, both educational and moral, reforms would surely result.

Harmony between teacher and parents acts like oil on troubled waters, and without doubt spreads its influence upon the whole bearing of a school, and, in a great measure, assists in surmounting the thousand and one difficulties which beset the teacher's path, which difficulties, by the way, usually remain unknown to the laymen.

In order to prompt conscientious consideration of the home influence, it may not be out of place to suggest a few questions to those parents to whom a little heart-searching might be of benefit, though perhaps the benefit would be derived not so much by themselves as by the citizens of the future. Parenthetically, it is not claimed that the influence of the school is by any means perfect, but it is usually consistent, and its aims are high. Moreover, it is not claimed that the school has any right to interfere with home matters, but it will be admitted that where the school and the home are at cross purposes as far as the ideals of citizenship are concerned, then the school is justified in suggesting on broad lines that the home should yield its just measure of assistance towards a common end.

It will be apparent that from a purely secular point of view, the following questions bear directly upon the character of a child's home training. Fortunately for the state, the schools recognize that in the great majority of cases, as far as can be judged from the bearing, behavior, and character of the children, the questions need not be asked, but in too many cases it is doubtful whether an unqualified "Yes" could be given to many or any of them:

1. Is the child taught, and does he see for himself in his own home, that temperate habits include the vanquishing of bad temper, moderation in eating and drinking, the checking of exaggeration and the suppression of hasty or unconsidered action?
2. Has he pure air, fresh water, good, simple food, and suitable clothing?
3. Are all things, moral as well as material, in order?
4. Are trivial matters subordinated to those of importance?
5. Is prompt and unquestioning obedience insisted upon, and are regulations adhered to by all and never tampered with by any of the household?
6. Does he live in an atmosphere of intelligence, where conversation is not confined to matters of home or of personal interest? Are extravagant adjectives and absolute terms avoided, and is every form of scandal shunned?
7. Are work and study treated as duties, and do amusement and "having a good time" take second place?
8. Does he understand that his home aims at a model of unselfishness, and an emblem of all that is sound in principle, so that in his school life, and in his future life, he can look back upon childhood and youth as periods to which he may turn for moral guidance in affairs of the world?

Maybe some of these questions are worth considering.—Exchange.

A mother had need one evening to pass between the light and her little son. With sweet, grave courtesy, she said: "Will you excuse me, dear, if I pass between you and the light?"

He looked up and said: "What made you ask me that, mother?"

"Because, dear," she answered, "it would be rude to do it without speaking. I would not think of not speaking if it had been Mr. F——, the minister, and surely I would not be ruder to my own boy."

The boy thought a moment and then asked: "Mother, what ought I to say back?"

"What do you think would be nice?"

He studied over it a while, for he was such a wee laddie, and then said: "Wou'd it be nice to say, 'Sure you can'?"

This was mother's time to say: "That would be nice, but would you like to say, just as Mr. F—— would, 'Certainly'?" It means the same thing, you know."

That little lad, now a young man in college, is remarked for his never-failing courtesy. A friend said of him recently: "It's the second nature of W—— to be polite."

The mother smiled as she thanked God in her heart for the grace which helped her to be unfailingly courteous to her boy.—Selected.

Elder Joseph F. Burton's Vision of the Seven Prophets of the Last Days

Since more than one have written me of late relative to the above-named vision, each making the mistake in accepting the term of presidents instead of prophets, I think it will be well to refresh the memory of all who may be making that mistake. The term may mean presidents, and it may not. According to Joseph's words, and as he wrote it, the voice said prophets.

The vision was given him in answer to prayer, as to there being prophets in our day. It was early after he came into the church and he had not at that time accepted that part of the latter-day message. Remember he had not so much as heard of such a people, or their teachings until the gospel came to us at San Benito in 1873, and he was baptized in about two weeks after hearing it, so all the doctrine was very new to him.

I do not think it necessary to reproduce the whole vision; only the part that speaks of the prophets.

In his dream or vision he thought he was sitting up in the bed. He says, "I found myself holding my hands together, and opening them—as one would open a book—found I was holding a spearhead. It dropped into seven pieces lengthwise—the first piece off one side, the second piece was the full length from the tip of the spearhead to the end of the staff. The other side fell into five pieces.

"As I sat examining these, the man who had spoken before said, 'These are the seven prophets of the last days, two have been; i. e., one was, and one is.' I then thought this, Joseph was, and Joseph is. It is forty years since Joseph came; if the other five have forty years each, it will be two hundred years yet before Christ comes, and that is too far off. The man answered my thoughts by saying, 'Why do you murmur, and wonder in your thoughts? Behold, the other five come quickly.'

"I awoke; the day was just dawning. . . ."

The reader will see that there is nothing to indicate the duration of any of these five, nor that they would be succeeding presidents of the church. We read that there are to be two prophets in Jerusalem just prior to the end, who shall be slain, and also read that a prophet shall lead the lost tribes down from the north country. These may be included,

But it does indicate the length of time that the five will cover, or nearly so, which would be a little less time than from 1830 to the death of the second Joseph, since we see that "the prophet that was and the prophet that is—at that time—took the spearhead from the base to top, and the other five were all from the other side, but did not change the dimensions of the spearhead. Therefore the five would cover about the same time that the first two did, which would be eighty-four years.

The terrible war that he beheld in the vision given him in Sacramento, May 26, 1878—whose smoke darkened all Europe, and rolled to America, was doubtless the recent "World War." It was so unparalleled in its dreadfulness he may have thought that it was the last war; but in the vision it does not say so.

The war was followed by famine, plagues, floods, fires, and all evils ever spoken of; but through it all, the servant of God passed unharmed, and calm as a child shouting his message of "bind up the law, and seal up the testimony."

This evidently referred to all the true servants of God. Could not have been personal because he passed away before the great war, and is a word of encouragement truly to the missionaries.

E. B. BURTON.

We regret to learn that Elder S. B. Kibler, an old-time resident of Woodbine, Iowa, who has been in California for some time, died November 7 and the body was to be interred at Woodbine on the 14th.

Leadership

We find that our people as a whole are a very responsive and lovable body. If we were to answer this question, "What is the greatest need of our people to-day?" my answer would be, Leadership. A leadership among our locals that could constantly radiate into the hearts of our membership the fact that God is love. A leadership that would constantly manifest the true shepherd or pastoral-like spirit, the sweet and noncoercive, and yet ever-affirming spirit of Jesus.

(From a letter of John L. Cooper, DeKalb, Illinois, November 2, 1920.)

Leaders and Teachers

In church, home, and community life, efficient and consecrated men and women are being qualified and trained in child welfare, relief and service work, and in the education of both old and young.

At the council meeting of the Women's Department, yesterday, Pastor Roy V. Hopkins spoke of the fine opportunities presented to the Saints on these lines of service, urging all to be diligent at this special time of need for earnest workers.

Also at the annual convention of Jackson County Sunday school delegates, there were several enthusiastic speakers on this line of work.

Professor C. H. Nowlin, of the Northeast High School, Kansas City, in addressing them on the subject of "efficient teachers" said: "We need leaders as well as teachers," and Mr. Sterling L. Williams, after "treating" in a royal manner the subject of "the vim, and enthusiasm and go-ahead" of the Latter Day Saints of Independence, gladly listened to an appreciative thank-you speech from a humble visitor of that persuasion, who happened to be present, and whom they decorated with a badge. Mr. William's subject was "leaders of boys and girls," as in the printed program.

We must have leaders and teachers right away, while the presidency and hundreds of the priesthood and laity, in turning their thoughts to a Zion redeemed are engaged, heart and mind, might and strength, toward education in its various phases, and as President Elbert terms it, "the development and cultivation of Christian characteristics that will enable the people to work together."

News From Philadelphia

On Monday evening we have our Oriole circles. We have quite a number of circles, and one night they will cook, another play, and sometimes have a prayer meeting. Altogether they have very good times.

Tuesday night is Religio night and here is where we receive knowledge. On the Tuesday night before Halloween we had a masquerade party and it was lots of fun helping Brother Osler duck for apples.

Wednesday evening belongs to Temple Builders, and Thursday is our prayer meeting night. Here is where we receive many wonderful blessings and also at the young people's prayer meeting, which is held at eight o'clock Sunday morning. One Sunday it is at the First Church and the next at the Second Branch.

Friday night is for the Boy Scouts, and we now have a full organized and registered troop.

On Sunday the 14th we are to have Consecration Day. At 4 p. m. we are to have a prayer meeting, which is for consecration of self for the success of the campaign now being held for the building of the auditorium. At the close of the meeting, which is for the entire Philadelphia District, lunch will be served by the First Branch, after which we will have a rousing song service.

At the evening service we shall have the pleasure of hearing Brother C. Ed. Miller address us. At this meeting the amount pledged for the building of the auditorium will be announced. Philadelphia pledges up to date amount to $11,000 which exceeds the entire district quota by $1,000 and they expect to reach the $12,000 mark.

Brother C. Ed. Miller will remain with us for two weeks commencing with the 14th, during which time he will give illustrated lectures on the Book of Mormon alternately at the First and Second Church. Brother Miller will also be the speaker on the Sundays he is with us. CORRESPONDENT.

Council Bluffs

Teacher training class meets Tuesday night every two weeks, Sister J. F. Peterson teacher.

The Women's Department are taking up active work. They are active in educational relief and service, and home and child welfare features.

Home-coming day for this branch next Sunday. We are expecting an overflowing house.

Two Church History classes have been organized in the Sunday school.

The marriage of Miss Alice E. Mintun occurred last Saturday eve.

A more spiritual view of conditions are experienced here, and we are in hopes much will be realized in the redemptive work in the near future.

SEATTLE, WASHINGTON, November 5, 1920.

Editors Herald: The apportionment for our Seattle and British Columbia District was $5,500 but we are pleased to report to date the sum pledged of $8,529.55.

Another Letter From President F. M. Smith

E. A. S.: Last Saturday, leaving Brother Williams in London, in company with Brethren G. W. and J. C. Leggott, we motored from London here, and Sunday I visited two of the Manchester branches, quite unannounced and unexpected, and had a chance to see them at work. Monday, Tuesday, and part of Wednesday I worked steadily at the accumulated mail, but Wednesday afternoon with Brother G. W. Leggott, I visited a large cotton-spinning mill which has been in operation on its present site for over one hundred years. The manager, Mr. Rose, a neighbor of Brother Leggott's, conducted us through the great plant and carefully explained every process through which they put the cotton from ball to final spindle. We found the visit replete with interest. Wednesday evening we spent with Brother John Taylor and family. Brother Taylor is an expert in steel working and wire weaving, and we found much more of interest there along industrial lines.

Thursday afternoon, with Brethren Leggott, father and son, Sister Thomas Taylor, of Leeds, Sister Flora Holden, of Manchester, we left Manchester for Leeds, passing over the "backbone" of England. We didn't see much of the country, for a heavy fog settled down and "visibility" was of very short range. We stopped at the home of Brother Thomas Taylor, Hill End, Upperbumby, Leeds, and in the evening went to the chapel used by the Leeds Branch. I had written Brother John Taylor on Monday morning that I expected to be in Leeds Thursday evening, and even though the notice was so short, I was greeted by an audience which comfortably filled the building, and I enjoyed talking to them. Brother Leggott and I returned to Manchester this evening, but before doing so, with Brother Thomas Taylor as guide, we visited some interesting ruins and church buildings, going many miles to do so.

To-morrow afternoon I meet the English quorum of elders and to-morrow evening address an open meeting of the priesthood. Sunday I expect to be in Liverpool for a visit with Brother Ernest Dewsnup, formerly president of Graceland College, and Tuesday or Wednesday return to London, if strike conditions do not prevent.

MANCHESTER, ENGLAND.

Portland Passes Quota

We were delighted to read the reports from various parts of the land, relative to the auditorium fund. The quota for the Portland, Oregon, District was $5,000. The Portland Branch alone raised considerably over $4,000. The other branches have not all reported yet, but our district is already well above the mark set.

We are handicapped by the scattered condition of both branches and membership, some of the branches being located about two hundred and fifty miles southwest of Portland, and the others an equal distance east. Members are in many different parts of the State. And in addition to this we were unable to receive help from outside. But in spite of handicaps we have passed our quota.

Knowing that good use will be made of any funds now needed for the new auditorium and hoping the building may be completed in time for the next General Conference we are,

More Missionaries Arrive at Tahiti

We arrived here September 25 after a long uneventful voyage, which together with considerable travel by train from our home in Omaha to the coast and the incidental side trips in visiting relatives, tired us out and made us very glad to land on the beautiful Island of Tahiti which will afford us a home for some time we expect.

While en route to San Francisco, the port of embarkation, I preached in Denver, Los Angeles, Oakland, and San Francisco, and enjoyed the association of the Saints in those places very much.

We arrived in Papeete on Saturday and were warmly greeted by Brother Fred Elliott and several of the native brethren who met us at the boat.

The natives gave us a very cheerful welcome at the church that evening.

They are indeed a very wonderful people and though primitive in many ways, are warm-hearted and very devotional and will do almost anything for the missionaries and the work.

Have preached to them three times by the aid of Sister Christensen as interpreter, who is also teaching us the Tahitian language.

One cannot imagine the beauty and grandeur of this island with its surrounding reef of coral and majestic coconut palms, its beautiful, rich-colored flowers, and wonderfully sweet, luscious fruit growing upon the sides of the towering mountains, and last but not least its gentle, kind-hearted people until they have been eleven days out of sight of land where the invitation to dine was an insult rather than a token of friendship.

The possibilities for service here are unlimited and though the force of workers has been materially increased in this mission yet we see the crying need for twice the number already here, if this people are to be properly warned and prepared for their place in Zion.

Praying for the onward progress of this work and full consecration of God's people everywhere, I am,

Your humble servant,

H. A. MERCHANT.

PAPEETE, TAHITI, October 17, 1920.

Sister Mollie Cross, of Washington, Oklahoma, writes to confirm the statements in a letter from her sister, Bertha M. Converse, in the Ensign for October 21, in which a distressful condition was explained. Sister Converse lost her home and everything in it by fire, and she desired the sympathy of the Saints in her loss.

Elder J. F. Garver, president of Lamoni Stake, was at Council Bluffs as a speaker at the home-coming day exercises of that branch on the 14th.

A. Conan Doyle in Australia

President F. M. Smith: We have at present in our city, Sir A. Conan Doyle, who is touring Australia in the interests of spiritism.

Vast crowds are attending his meetings in the Adelaide Town Hall. He is a shrewd gentleman. Instead of advocating that spiritism is the very thing as most spiritists do, he states that there is no conflict between spiritism and religion, and that "there is no creed that could not have this tacked on to it without disturbing its fundamentals, and should be regarded as a reenforcement rather than a substitute."

His main aim as reported in the press, is to comfort those who have lost dear ones in the late war, by bringing them into contact with the dead, and while offering communication, he admits it is liable to mutilation and extortion.

It must be very comforting to think that those loved ones are on the way to extinction, after passing seven planes, or stages, ending in complete extinction of personality, the person finally dissolved into the ocean of being, as a drop of water falling into the sea.

But how different are the teachings of Him who declared, "I am the way, the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me." Instead of extinction, the aim of the Master is to bring about perfection.

However, notwithstanding the crowds attending his lectures, and photographs of the dead which he screens, he is meeting with a lively bombardment in the press from nearly all sections of the community, and possibly he is not finding Australians as gullible as he anticipated.

The work here moves slowly; however, we are giving effect to the epistle published in the Gospel Standard by Apostles Hanson and Rushton, and trust that eventually every officer will be actively engaged.

Sincerely yours,

EDWIN H. DAVIES.

Good Prospects at Duluth

The Lord is opening the way for his work in this city of Duluth, Minnesota. I have located three sisters across the river in Superior, Wisconsin, also a brother and sister who have just moved into Duluth from Wisconsin (Brother F. A. Stredronsky, a priest). We have a sister here and her three daughters.

I have just taken over a hotel in Duluth so we will have a good place for the elders to stop. We held services Sunday evening in the dining room and had a nice attendance. We will have meetings on Sunday from now on: Sunday school 2.30 p. m. and preaching at 8. If there are any Saints close, we would like to get in touch with them, as we want all their help. We have the work going at Two Harbors, Minnesota, Brother Sloan is an elder and he preached his first sermon Sunday. He will keep the meetings going from now on, with a little help. There is quite an interest here in the work and we expect some conversions. If there are any other Saints in Duluth, please let me know. If any elders come this way be sure to stop. We will be sure to use their services. My address is 31 South Fifty-third Avenue, West Duluth, Minnesota. Phone Calumet 2398 W.

STOCKTON, CALIFORNIA, October 28, 1920.

Editors Herald: Since last writing, our district president, Brother Hawkins, has been to Stockton, and gave a talk on the new auditorium. He took away with him a beautiful painting of the building, the work of Brother Davison, and intends to use it throughout Northern California in his lectures. We are very proud of the fact that the picture goes from here. Brother Davison has also painted one for this branch and it is in front, before us all the time. We are sure Stockton is doing her share in the pledging.

We have some new workers from San Diego and are always glad to welcome real Saints. We also have some from the East, Sisters Maud and Inez Newcomb.

Several movements for the betterment of Sunday school, Religio, and church are on foot. They have organized a song club, not as yet named, an orchestra, and have started work to purchase a piano. The Sunday school now has two organized classes and, taking it all in all, Stockton is going ahead.

Brother Russell was with us Sunday evening and preached a fine sermon. The debt that the branch owed for fixing the basement of our church, namely $150, has been paid.

The Lord is prospering this branch as he has every other that tries. May he bless us all and may we all have our faces turned Zionward.

Bishop Carmichael has been in Independence the past few days in session with the Board of Publication, of which he is a member, working out details concerning the contemplated consolidation of the publishing interests of the church.

Vida E. Smith, dean of women at Patroness Hall, Grace-land College, was in Des Moines over Sunday, the 14th, one of the invited speakers of the occasion. The branch celebrated their annual home-coming day.

Elder J. A. Bronson reports successful meetings at Sandpoint, Idaho. We note on one of the handbills: "A full house last night. We will make room for more to-night." The usual subjects are being discussed.

All Religians will please note that Sister Mary Steele of Independence has been appointed superintendent of the girls' department of the Religio, to succeed Sister Zilpha Monroe, who found it necessary to resign because of other work. Sister Steele's address will be Miss Mary Steele, Superintendent Girls' Department, Box 255, Independence, Missouri.

Religians should also note that report blanks for the quarter ending September 30 have been sent from our office to all locals. If you have not received yours, a card to us will bring them. If you have received yours, please fill in and return to us at once.

HOWARD W. HARDER,
General Secretary.

Convention Minutes

NORTHERN WISCONSIN.—At Black River Falls, October 22, I. H. Bowen, superintendent, presiding. Officers elected: I. H. Bowen, superintendent; Fred Atwood, assistant superintendent; Mrs. Leroy Colbert, secretary; George Clark, treasurer. A new standard of excellence was adopted. A good talk was given by W. A. McDowell on more efficient teachers. A very good Spirit was enjoyed and the hospitality of the Saints at Black River Falls appreciated. Mrs. Leroy Colbert, secretary.

Conference Minutes

POTTAWATTAMIE.—At Boomer, Iowa, October 2 and 3, David A. Carlile was ordained an elder. The next conference will be at Council Bluffs, February 4, 5, and 6, 1921. The weather was ideal and the attendance large on Sunday. Speakers were O. Salisbury, H. H. Hand, and J. A. Hanson. Elsie Lapworth, secretary.

CLINTON.—At Eldorado Springs, Missouri, October 15 to 17, 1920, E. E. Rannie in charge. Conference appointees in attendance were E. E. Rannie, Lee Quick, R. T. Walters and A. C. Silvers. A splendid spirit prevailed throughout. Next conference will be at Nevada, at call of the district president, he and the president of Nevada Branch to confer and set the time. Mrs. A. C. Silvers, secretary.

Our Departed Ones

LAND.—Rosina S. Fisher Land, Pike Lake, Saskatchewan, wife of William Leroy Land, died September 21, 1920, aged 27 years and 23 days. Deceased was born August 29, 1893, at Cavalier, Pembina County, North Dakota. Baptized at Vanscoy, Saskatchewan, by Frederick Gregory, April 9, 1916. Married March 29, 1916.

HAYES.—Catherine Ellis was born at Janesville, Ohio, February 25, 1840, and died at her home in Cherokee, Iowa, October 9, 1920. Married Irim H. Sheldon June 17, 1858, and to this union 6 sons and 2 daughters were born. The two eldest, Emma and Samuel, died in infancy. Mr. Sheldon died in June, 1871. November 22, 1875, married Nathan H. Hayes, and to this union one daughter was born, Lulu E., who is now Mrs. G. D. Banister. The greater part of her life was spent in eastern Iowa, in Clinton County. She and her family came with Brother Hayes to Cherokee County, Iowa, and settled on a farm 7 miles south of Cherokee, where they resided until 1896, when they moved to Cherokee. Baptized at Gallands Grove, Iowa, September 22, 1877, and has been a worthy member of the church ever since. She was a loving wife, and affectionate mother, good neighbor, and a true Christian. Leaves an aged husband, and the following children: William Sheldon of Emmet, Idaho, Frank M. Sheldon, and James O. Sheldon of Cherokee, Iowa, and Joseph O. and Mrs. Adell S. Carr of Hartly, Iowa; N. V. Sheldon of Independence, Missouri; and Mrs. G. D. Banister of near Cherokee, 19 grandchildren, and 9 great-grandchildren, and many other relatives and friends. She was a mother in Israel indeed. Funeral service conducted at the home, which was largely attended, C. E. Butterworth preaching the sermon. The remains were laid to rest in Oak Hill Cemetery.

ROBERTS.—Eleanor La Porte was born in Harrison County, Ohio, January, 20, 1833. Married January 12, 1851, to James V. Roberts, in Logan County, Ohio. As was the case with many another young couple they early in their married life migrated farther west, becoming pioneers in the most literal meaning of that word. They reached Fremont County, Iowa, in 1855, and dwelt in this county almost continuously until death claimed first the husband August 28, 1881, and now the widow who joined the ranks of the immortals the evening of October 9, 1920. They were the parents of fifteen children, two of whom died in infancy. Two more, Mrs. Verlinda Moore and Joseph, died after reaching maturity. The remaining eleven, 6 sons and 5 daughters, are William and James V., of Independence, Missouri; Walter S. of Sebastopol, California; Charles M. of Tabor, Samuel J. of Council Bluffs; Paul, of Cedar Rapids, Nebraska; Mrs. J. C. Moore of Thurman; Mrs. M. Grove of Sidney; Mrs. George Greenlee of Oakland; Mrs. Edward Roberts of Lamoni; and Miss Coda of Tabor. These with the exception of Walter S., who visited his mother during her illness, and could not return for the funeral, were present at the last sad rites as was also Mrs. Joseph Roberts of Lamoni. One sister of the deceased, Mrs. Finley Walker of Oakland, remains to mourn, as also do the 27 grandchildren, 15 great-grandchildren, and one great-great-grandson, little Deane Omens, son of George and Leila Claiborn Omens of Shenandoah. Early in life, Mrs. Roberts united with the Christian Church, but later decided to accept the gospel as preached by the Reorganized Church, of which church she remained a faithful and consistent member until her death. Funeral services at the home by Columbus Scott of Lamoni, an old-time friend of the family. Interment in Gaylord Cemetery. To write of this woman as her life deserves would be to write the entire history of our Middle West, for it was such women as she who were a part of the warp and woof of what is our present day progress and prosperity.

STEVENS.—Hubbard D. Stevens was born July 10, 1844, at Shelby, Ohio. Died at his home in Fair Oaks, Madison, Wisconsin, October 10, 1920. Served as a soldier in the Civil War, and was always at his post of duty. March 10, 1870, married Harriet J. See; to this union were born 9 children, 4 sons and 5 daughters. Baptized August 8, 1897, by M. T. Short. Was a faithful member of the church. Held the office of priest; later, elder, and was pastor of Madison Branch at the time of death. Leaves to mourn a faithful wife, one son, 4 daughters, 19 grandchildren, one brother, 4 sisters, and many friends who will long remember his kindness to them. Funeral in Saints' chapel. Sermon by W. A. McDowell.

KAESTNER.—Henry Kaestner was born in Wittenburg, Prussia, Germany, January 17, 1845. Came with his parents to Burlington, Iowa, when he was 24 years old. Married Augusta Mueller in October, 1871. She passed to her reward several years ago. To this union were born 6 sons and one daughter, Henry, Frank B., Charles, and John of Lamoni, Iowa; Joseph, of Burlington, William of Des Moines, Mrs. Emma Zirkelbaugh, of Scalesmount, Illinois. There are 21 grandchildren and one great-grandson, one sister in Los Angeles, California. Baptized April 23, 1872, at Burlington, Iowa. Ordained teacher. Lived a true Christian life. Died at Liberty Home, Lamoni, Iowa, October 26, 1920. Funeral sermon by J. S. Roth, assisted by C. Scott. Remains taken to his old home, Burlington, Iowa, for interment.

Discipline and Reform

Under the title "Prison democracy," Frank Tannenbaum presents an article of considerable interest in the Atlantic Monthly, and shows what is being done in New York in putting the State institutions on that basis.

He divides criminals into five different classes. First, the casual criminal—one who having once committed a crime, and being discovered, is never going to repeat the offense. The man that is weak, rather than bad; whose family and sense of shame will prevent a repetition.

Second, the very large class of economic criminals—a definite group of men who get into jail when conditions fall below a certain level, and stay out of jail when the level is exceeded.

Third, the large group of derelicts—those who commit no great crimes, but who get into jail; they get out in the spring and spend the summer in the country, and then in the winter go back to the city and jail.

Fourth, the accidental criminal—the man who runs counter to the law by accident, as in a fight, his blow would prove harder than was intended, or the arrest of a well-intentioned man who, incidentally, had helped a criminal, concealed him, or received goods which proved to be stolen.

The fifth class is the definitely sick; those who by native capacity and content are not able to live a normal life. They are often diseased, physically and mentally. They belong in a hospital, not in a jail. Tannenbaum thinks they are not as important a part of the prison population as some psychiatrists tend to indicate.

Sixth and last is the professional criminal, the center of the prison problem. He says that such is not necessarily proof either of mental inferiority, or physical deformity. They are simply men who have accepted crime as a profession, and are at war with the community, and have the psychology of the warrior and are intensely emotional. His conduct is primarily defensive. It is for defense that he builds up the psychology of boldness, bravado, and self-justification. He is not conscience stricken because his warring psychology justifies his depredations. To him dishonesty is the best policy. It is the policy of other men. The difference between him and others is that he has been in the rest are yet to be in jail. That is at least the way that he views it.

Where does he come from? Mr. Tannerbaum answers, that he begins often as a mere child of some poor family, in an overcrowded room, where he receives little care and attention. Home is a place to sleep, and eat poor meals. He lives in the street and forms gangs. What makes him a criminal is not his gang life, despite the things that he learns there, but rather the fact that his gang life is his only important outlet. School life is found rather monotonous, and uninteresting. The boy needs sympathy, love, and understanding, and some occupation will give bent to his energy, which he does not get. The truant officer, the policeman, the society for prevention of cruelty to children, and other institutionalized elements in the community see that he gets everything but what he needs. He needs sympathy and understanding, and these two things are rare among institutionalized people and concerns.

Hence he gets into trouble. It may be in fact trivial, but he lands in an institution. But an institution for incorrigible boys is the last place for an incorrigible boy to be sent, for they proceed on the basis of discipline, while the boy needs growth. Suppression does not suppress, but only distorts. Hence in the name of discipline there results a series of real cruelties without that necessarily being the intention of the men and women in charge. They become concerned with their personal affairs and think system and method essential. These imply regularity, which with children means deviation, difference, and an attempt at suppression, which deforms.

Such a life may not continue long, but it continues long enough to institutionalize the boy, in the sense that he becomes unfit for normal occupation. There has been nothing to better fit him for life, but quite the contrary. The result is that when released he is likely to return; for the reformatory has added nothing but bad habits. One hardened criminal said: "I was sent to a juvenile institution at the age of eleven, and returned at about fifteen as a good pickpocket. I went to a reformatory at seventeen as a pickpocket, and returned as a burglar, with all that implies in one's life and habits. As a burglar, I went to a state institution, where I acquired all the professional characteristics of the criminal."

At Sing Sing and other institutions the situation is met by trying to secure a real democracy and self-government by the inmates. They elect their own officers, who maintain order, and are responsible. They go out without guards, and return because their defection injures their fellows. They learn sociability; they are granted also opportunities for play in the fresh air as baseball in season. They hold their own courts, and try the cases before them. Every effort is made to fit them for the return to normal life.

A volume could be written on what has been done and is being done at such institutions, both for boys and girls, and men and women. In Kansas there is a farm organized for delinquent women, which helps them to self-respect and self-reliance. The effort is to make the institution a school, as well as a practical demonstration in social life.

A volume might be written on the subject, and volumes have been written. In what way does it concern us?

First it concerns us as citizens, in our political, social, and economic life. The manner in which the criminal is handled determines his after life and the number of criminals with which society is confronted. Also if sympathy and intelligence work reform, a citizen is gained. The former criminal when released is no longer a criminal, but a useful member of society, prepared to take his or her place in the community life. It is a bigger thing in some ways than that, for he or she has been treated as a human being. That is a moral and spiritual gain both for the inmates and for the guards.

In the second place, it concerns us in our work as a church. There is on one hand the boy and girl movement—an effort to supply understanding and a safe outlet for the "gang spirit," so that it may become a true social spirit. Affection and understanding is essential to the young, as well as to those older in years. The right direction of social instinct helps to supply the one thing needed, sympathy and understanding, based on real affection in the fullest sense of that term.

On the other hand, at the late General Conference some provision was made looking toward the care of delinquent children. Often this is because of physical or mental illness, which can be corrected. Often there may be simply weakness and lack of understanding in the moral fiber. Children in the church institutions should undoubtedly receive care in the line of food and clothing, and that should be administered with intelligent economy. But far more important than the feeding of the body, is the saving of the soul. To further that, affection, understanding, sympathy are needed.

It is unfortunate that so much of our ideas of discipline in schools and other institutions is based on an effort to suppress and to force a child to our will, instead of considering how the good of the child will best be secured and real reformation brought about. It is true that by a process of suppression or abuse we may for a time secure a seeming obedience. And since the child who has been doing wrong, now does right, in our sight, we think a point has been gained. In fact, all that has been gained is fear; and there is no preparation at all for the time when youth must assume personal responsibility.

This is seen repeatedly in our larger institutions, when young people, from the suppression of the high school, are turned free in the university. The change is too great. The fault lies in so-called discipline of the young. For men and for women to do their part in the world to-day, self-respect and self-control are essential.

Brutal discipline may secure immediate obedience. It does not and cannot secure self-control, and utterly destroys self-respect.

As another writer in the Atlantic Monthly for August expresses it concerning the immodesty of women's dress:

"Take the little matter of immodest dress to which we have alluded. You can tell a girl that she is appealing crudely to the physical nature of men; she may admit it, and at the same time justify herself with something out of Freud or Theodore Dreiser. But if you remind her (and if, again, she admits it) that her body is the temple of the Holy Ghost, she has no retort coming."

The same reasoning applies to boys. Their wrongdoing injures first of all, themselves. It is true that it takes pains, it takes effort and much thought to proceed in this method of winning young people to the right, and helping them to gain self-reliance and control. But is that a good reason for following the easy method of so-called discipline?

There may be under our human methods the necessity at times to protect ourselves from an epidemic, from an insane person, of society from the criminal. But there is decidedly a need to emphasize the principles of Jesus in dealing with this great question. Especially is this so when it comes to dealing with children, either in the home, or much more in an institution, for it is in the institution that we so often fail to-day.

After all, our care of the young must be tested on its logical outcome in life—how far is it an ample preparation for the conditions of life. For a short time children are under our personal control, in the home, the school, and the Sunday school. But the time soon comes when they must take their place in society as self-acting agents. No matter how great has been our care, no matter how protected their life, sooner or later, from some unexpected quarter there comes a great temptation. It cannot be successfully met on a basis of fear—either fear of punishment, or fear of being found out. It can only be met securely through individual development—through a knowledge and choice of that which is right. When it comes short of that, when it comes short of knowledge and development of choice—a right choice, it fails in self-development, and is a complete failure, even though it brings temporary peace to the house, and a seeming obedience.

It seems strange how ready we are, and how ready even men called of God are, to depart from the divine plan. Christ gave man his free agency. Satan would have compelled, forced, and threatened him into that which is right, but that was not the divine plan. His plan is to develop sons and daughters of God, with powers for righteousness, to know and choose the good.

Twenty Thousand Converts Before Next General Conference

We wonder how many of us have sat down to figure what this means. If this number are to be baptized by those on the firing line—those doing distinctly missionary work, it would mean practically 100 baptisms for each one. Should two years be allowed before next General Conference, and allowance is made for time lost, it would require more than one baptism a week by each one.

For the church, in two years there are 104 weeks. It would mean that over 200 should be baptized each week. It would mean that each four members should see that one additional member is brought into the church. A branch of 200 should become 250; 400, should have 500 members. A district having a thousand should report next conference, 1,250. You can figure out your ratio for yourself. And this gain should not come simply from members moving into our vicinity, but through baptisms. If any district falls short of its proportion, some other district will have to make it up.

We want converts, and not simply names. We want men and women with their faces turned to the cross of Jesus; men and women who love their fellow man; men and women with their faces set to establish Zion—the pure in heart—the city of our God. But the mere matter of numbers makes it a big task.

As a check we picked up one of our church papers and counted the baptisms there reported. They total 60, and were stated to cover a period of two weeks. At the same time it included only a small part of the ministry. One man had baptized one, but this made a total of 20 in that series of meetings. He evidently is maintaining his average, but it causes us to wonder what is the grand total. Are we proceeding with sufficient earnestness to accomplish our goal? It cannot be done in the last few weeks. It can only be done by constant, steady work to-day, to-morrow, and the day after, still using all the extra energy and inspiration we receive for special efforts. But it is the training and preparation in the work now which shall make this work possible, and secure permanent results.

Watch Your Address Label

Every publishing house has some overlapping of effort in notification of expirations of subscriptions. A reader may allow his subscription to lapse, send in a renewal later, and then get a notice that the records show he has not sent in his renewal.

Now it takes some time to make all the necessary entries and changes, and though the letters sent say that if you have sent your subscription in, to disregard the present communication, many people become unduly exercised.

If the reader will examine the label on the wrapper of his periodical, he will be able to discover from that whether or not the remittance was received and properly credited, the changed date invariably denoting that fact. It may take a few weeks for this change to appear, but if after waiting a month the label is not changed, write about it. This applies to all our periodicals. The change of label is your receipt.

The Christmas Offering

The work on the Christmas offering is going forward quietly throughout the church in the various Sunday schools. The result of the careful organization of the past two years is making itself felt. We have not had much to say in the church papers concerning it this past year, but it is a splendid opportunity for us to make an offering to the Lord on his holy day, the anniversary of the birth of our Lord.

While we are making presents to each other, do not let us forget our gift for Him. Many of us have done our duty in paying our tithing. Some for the first time will face the beginning of the New Year with their tithing all paid up; there are others who yet have that joy before them. Only those who have been in debt realize how good it feels to be out, and we are all in debt to Him for all we have; but He asks for that recognition one tenth of our increase annually. This naturally involves a payment of our increase in the years that are past when we have not paid tithing.

Now we have just completed a big drive for the General Conference auditorium, and have successfully raised a much larger sum than many people thought we could raise at one time.

Some have also moved forward and remembered the College Day collection the first Sunday in October.

We have also been busy in meeting branch expenses, and the upkeep of our own homes.

But as we sit down to count over the year, and to consider our gifts, what can we give for Him in return for all He has given for us. It is a special donation; a free-will offering. It cannot take the place, of course, of our tithing, but is an added measure of our love.

A Work Well Done

Within the past few weeks the church has lost three steadfast workers, Sister John Zimmermann, Sister L. R. Devore, and Sister John Smith.

We read in the 9th chapter of Acts concerning a certain disciple named Tabitha or Dorcas, a woman full of good works and almsdeeds. We read of other women whose names the Apostle Paul records as having been able workers in the ancient church. Though the part of woman in the church has not been as spectacular as a rule, as has been the part taken by their brethren, yet their service has been as important for the work of God.

When the news appeared in Zion's Ensign for October 14, that Sister Zimmermann, the wife of Bishop John Zimmermann, had passed away on the evening of October 12, many throughout the church had cause to mourn. The traveling ministry especially have enjoyed and appreciated the liberal hospitality of herself and husband. The visitor was always made to feel his welcome, and was in fact made to feel as one of the family. There was no flurry or fuss—there was homelike peace.

Like those of old she raised her family in the fear of the Lord; was faithful in her attendance at church, and saw that they were faithful through their earlier years. One daughter, Clara, is the wife of Albert N. Hoxie, the church chorister. Her second daughter, Anna, was one of the editors of the primary Sunday school Quarterly for several years, and is the wife of Richard C. Kelley, son of Bishop E. L. Kelley. Her sons, in fact all of the children, have been raised with devotion for the work of the church. Though their lives have apparently been in easy places, their hope is ever for the establishment of Zion, with justice and equality to all.

Then on November 3, Sister Rebecca E. Devore passed away at the Saints' Home at Holden, Missouri. She had traveled extensively with her husband, Elder L. R. Devore, assisting in laying the foundation of the work in southern Ohio, West Virginia, Pittsburgh, Kirtland, and Youngstown Districts. In 1891 she went with her husband to the South Sea Island Mission, where they continued for five and a half years. She placed the Sunday school work there on its feet. Her devotion and sacrifice to the church was noteworthy, but unfortunately resulted, upon her return to her native land, in broken health. Her home for the past twenty years has been in Holden, Missouri, where many loved her for her noble character, faith, devotion, and courage.

Just a day later, at the Independence Sanitarium, Kate E. Smith, the wife of Elder John Smith, the first president of the Lamoni Stake, and before that manager of the Herald Publishing House, passed away, after nearly a year and a half of continual sickness, during which year she was bed-ridden most of the time.

In her early years in New England she was earnest in work of auxiliaries of the church, especially in the Sunday school work. Her home was always an open one for the visiting missionaries, at a time that such homes were rare. The traveling elder was at liberty to stay as long as he chose, for a year if need be, and make himself at home. She was always ready to defend the cause when attacked.

In Lamoni she continued the quiet service of a housewife. Her home was still open, and her hospitality genuine, even though in that place many others were there to receive the visiting guests. She was ready to support all the work of the church and its various departments.

With the death of these three sisters, the church loses those who have been valiant in the testimony of Jesus, as shown by their lives, and those who were ready to serve wherever opportunity offered.

Christmas Carols

In Old England and in New England the Christmas carol is an exquisite way of ushering in our Lord's birthday. The church choir or other choral groups go from house to house to sing.

Those upon whom they have called, light Christmas candles and set them in the windows. In many cases they are invited in for light refreshments, but of course they cannot spend a very long time at any one place. In the end some small contribution is made to the choir, permitting them to buy necessary music.

It possesses some splendid possibilities, depending upon the locality, and how widely scattered are the homes, and the character of the neighborhood. In some cases a group of young people could very agreeably go and serenade gratuitously, of course, the old folks, and others who would appreciate such a visit.

In earlier times, the traveling was on foot or in tallyhoes; to-day many visits can be made with autos from one point to another, and the homes visited are many and the choral groups large. Of course it would be possible to send out more than one party. It forms one of the most beautiful customs around the celebration of Christmas Day.

In this issue is the story of a quartet in one family who sang in the early hours of Christmas morning. In other cases we have known it to be conducted between ten or eleven p. m., and one a. m. of Christmas morning. In still other cases a modification has been made. Instead of the clamor of ushering in the New Year, prayer service is held New Year's Eve, and then about ten or eleven o'clock they called at the various homes for Christmas carols. In this case it was an established custom that those desiring to be visited place candles in the window.

R. C. Evans Loses Decision

Bishop Benjamin R. McGuire received a telegram from his attorneys in Toronto, Canada, Friday, stating that the supreme court of Ontario had rendered a decision in favor of the church in the matter of the building fund and the Ladies' Auxiliary fund, on which the church was suing Evans for an accounting. Details of the case will be given later.

Wireless Service Through Church Station in Des Moines

The Sunday Register, of Des Moines, Iowa, for November 21, carried an extensive account under the heading, "Ames alumni have time of their lives," with the following explanation accompanying. We are glad to note that the Des Moines people have not only completed their radio station but put it to good use at once. The item follows:

"The following story of the great home-coming day at Iowa State college was received by The Sunday Register by wireless from the Iowa State college wireless station. This wireless service was made possible by the cooperation of the new high power radio station at the Latter Day Saints' church, Des Moines, and of the Central Radio Company of Independence, Missouri. The story was sent by A. N. Converse of the Iowa State college, department of journalism."

In another column the following was displayed:

By Wireless

"This edition of The Sunday Register contains a story on the big 'home-coming' at Iowa State college received by wireless from the state college radio station at Ames.

"An interesting forecast story on the big day, also by wireless, was printed in The Register Saturday morning.

"The Register is prepared to receive and print wireless news from any part of Iowa and amateur wireless operators are cordially invited to get in touch with the powerful receiving and sending station in Des Moines that is cooperating with The Register in this.

"News items received by Chief Operator Ralph Knouf at the station of the Latter Day Saint Church will be transmitted immediately to The Register and Tribune office. They will be printed with full credit to the sending station.

"The Register is glad to serve its readers with this new class of news and is glad also to encourage the development of amateur wireless telegraphy in Iowa.

"Wireless operators, get busy!"

"The best time for receiving radio messages at the Des Moines station is in the early evening or in the late afternoon on Saturdays."

Subjects Being Discussed

A Challenge to Henry Ford

From time to time various articles have appeared in this country, or in the countries of Europe, and especially abroad, attacking the Hebrew people. Recently such an article it seems appears in the Dearborne Independent, and the American Hebrew of New York City has issued directly a challenge to Henry Ford as the owner. The article follows:

"The American Hebrew makes this offer to you:

"We will raise and place at your disposal a fund, adequate in size, to defray the costs of engaging the services of the world's leading detectives, to unearth this conspiracy and bring to light the conspirators. The detectives you select, however, must be approved by the chief of the secret service of the United States Government.

"We agree to publish the findings of this investigation in 100 leading daily newspapers of the large cities of the United States, provided, however, that true copies of the original report be furnished The American Hebrew.

"Should the investigation fail to substantiate your charges:

"1. That a Jewish world-imperialism exists (locating its center);

"2. That certain individuals have cognizance of it (giving their names);

"3. That certain individuals are actively supporting it (specifying their acts); and

"4. That there is somewhere an official head of this world-imperialism (exposing him), you agree that you will publicly admit that you are mistaken and will reveal the influence brought to bear on you to publish the articles in your paper.

"The Jews of America demand that you either prove your assertion, concretely, or admit your error.

"We hope you will accept this challenge.

"THE AMERICAN HEBREW,
"ISAAC LANDMAN, Editor."

Probably more than half of the 14 million Hebrews in the world are in dire distress in eastern Europe. To assume that this whole body or part of it has laid a mighty plot to subjugate the whole world requires rather a vivid imagination. We await with interest the outcome of the challenge.

Women in Chamber of Commerce

Recently at a largely attended meeting of the commercial club, at Lamoni, an address was delivered by Carrie N. Bell, of Des Moines, in which she presented the department of women's affairs in the Chamber of Commerce in Des Moines, which was organized on May 5, 1920, with 325 members and soon increased to 345, but without any active campaign for new members. It is probably the first department of women's affairs of any Chamber of Commerce in the United States.

The board meets weekly, and each member is assigned to a committee. The committees meet monthly. The chairman of this department is a director of the Des Moines Chamber of Commerce. The open forum of the chamber is open to women, together with its program. The women have full rights as members of the Des Moines Chamber of Commerce. The purpose of the department of women's affairs is to improve the condition of employment for women in Des Moines.

At the same meeting Doctor Bertha A. Greer spoke in behalf of the local women. She urged that in her work for the community and humanity woman should not lose her individuality as a woman.

During the past year the commercial club of Lamoni has frequently invited the women of the town to attend the commercial club banquet. A year ago we urged in an address of greeting that the women should be full-fledged members of the commercial club, with full right of voice and vote.

This should be generally done, as the women have a broad interest in community welfare, and in those matters which are of especial interest to a town or small city commercial club, just as the business women are directly interested in the Chamber of Commerce or Board of Trade, and should be therein represented.

Loss From Strikes

The Labor Sunday Message from the Commission on the Church of Christ and Social Service of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America states that a careful estimate gives in statistics for August and September, 1919, that the workers lost through strikes $41,272,000 in wages, and the employers $4,127,000 in profit. The comment is made that if this continued through the year, it would mean a quarter of a billion dollars lost in wages, and 25 million lost in profit. Of course, as it stands the amount of profit goes to a relatively small number of people compared to the number who receive the wages. It appears to be equally true that there is a very narrow margin of possible increase in wages in the industries thus affected without an increase in price to the consumer.

Industrial Cooperation—Its Value and Meaning

By John W. Rushton

In three parts—part one. Reprinted from Autumn Leaves for June 1915.

Introduction

As a people we are much interested in the questions of social idealism; and our literature affords ample evidence as to the conspicuous place given to the establishment of a society in which equality and justice would be characteristic. While we have not at any time given indorsement to the various socialistic programs, yet there has been and is a deep sympathy existing between the church's dream of Zion and the establishment of the "golden age" or the Utopia of modern socialism. And while we do not indorse the conclusions of the socialistic diagnosticians nor approve of their therapeutics, still we do agree with them that things as at present constituted and managed are not satisfactory, nor productive of universal happiness, not only to the greatest number, but to any in general. We also agree that the present order is not permanent but that the change is destined to come in which there will be equality of opportunity to all, a juster share in the produce of labor and a happier conditioning of the human race.

On Trial

To criticise the several schools of socialism may be satisfactory to the critics, but it has not solved nor can it solve the problems which we confess are very concretely, and in many cases, tragically real. We ourselves are on trial; and must prove the worth of our claim to public acceptance by presenting some method of solving the same problems and disentangling the perplexing intricacies which impede the progress of the race to the ideal which lies beyond our present fuliginous horizons.

God With Man

Our Bible opens with a description of the God-appointed home of humanity which we have designated paradise. It closes with the apocalyptic vision of the Seer of Patmos, who describes the destiny of the race as the union of God with man on terms of affectionate intimacy; the tabernacle of God in the midst of the new city, where there is neither darkness, sorrow, nor death and therefore neither sighing or tears. Isaiah visions the details and promises that houses shall be built and inhabited by the builders, harvests shall be reaped by the sowers, and fruit gathered by the planters; every man reaping the results of his own labor in perfect enjoyment. Oppression and poverty will not be known; there cannot be the agony of want where there is not the congestion of wealth.

The New City in the New World

The modern revelations through Joseph Smith in homespun English minus the hyperbolism of the orientalist, present the selfsame vision, and tapped the sources of human energy in the multitudes of poor who accepted him, because he made his appeal to the real needs of the ones who listened. It may be a question which some of our young men and women in the future who may have the training and interest will be able to discuss, as to how much the promise of a new city in the New World at least opened the ears of the people, if it was not the dynamic which generated the activities of those people (whom the historians of the future will no doubt recognize as among the most valuable assets America ever had) and so give to the Mormon movement an honest credit which has been denied up to the present.

The Cooperative Movement

Among the bewildering number of attempts which have been made to usher in this "golden age," none has such a fascinating history, none such a wonderful and arresting success; and certain it is that none has gripped the world with its desiccated interests and produced such a wonderful association, which has leaped over barriers of every kind and established its aegis in every clime among every nation, kindred, tongue, and people, as a practical and working thing; without the fire or sword or tragedy of revolution as the industrial cooperative movement has done.

It is because of the many striking similarities between our church movement and cooperation in point of history, the class of people who originated it, and ideals which it indorsed, that we offer this sketch as a subject worthy of our deepest and most careful study, believing that there is much we can appreciate and may use to the accomplishment of our own purpose. If ever the day shall come, and for this we work and pray most earnestly, that Zion shall be brought out of dreamland and fancy and made a reality in fact and experience, it can only be by the adoption of the same principles and similar methods which have produced the most wonderful commonwealth the world has ever seen, by and among our own people. For in Zion there will be just as much need of the commodities by which we shall be fed, clothed, housed, and conditioned, as there is to-day, and one of the first things we shall have to do before ever we get within measurable distance of this condition will be for the people of Zion to control the agencies of production and manufacturing and distributing those necessities for the consumption of the people.

Establishment of Zion a Bread and Butter Question

It is all very well to have ambitions and seek to found a new nation or state, or even to develop a new city, but it is certain that we cannot successfully deal with political or civic economy until we have mastered domestic economy. We must put our own house in order.

Karl Marx and his school may have conclusions which can be disproved by the academic dilettantes, but one thing is sure in the so-called doctrine of "economic determinism," viz: the ways, and means, and circumstances under which people have to earn their wages (mark it we are not speaking now of the amount or nature of the wages) and the places and conditions of their subsistence do have all but everything to do with the amount of mental, moral, and spiritual service we can render to the common good. This is just as true, if not more so, of Independence as it is of any other town or city in the world.

Who Shall Deliver Me?

In this, the most powerful republic, history has noted, with its vast and multifarious resources, what is the workingman but an economic slave? Is it not a fact which is evident on every side that "the thing I would do is the thing I cannot do and the thing I would not do is the thing I must do"? Hence the despairing question surges through the brain with monotonous insistence, "Who shall deliver me?"

Our experience has proved that politics cannot; modern commercialism will not, and in the face of present condition the church is very nearly inept. Can we vindicate the church (I speak generally) whose only work so far has been demonstrated in charity and benevolence and saying with reiteration, "Cheer up, you will soon be dead and then you will go to heaven," to the thousands of sweating, bleeding, and smelly toilers? I have a profound admiration of all that the church has done and is doing but let us be candid with ourselves.

Can anything which has been done up to the present be described by any other word than eleemosynary?

At the best these are but palliatives and anæsthetics; therapeutic but not prophylactic.

The two principal activities which are in evidence so far as the church is concerned appear in themselves to be beneficial and desirable; and regrettable as it is, we have allowed ourselves to be deluded by appearances to such an extent that the mere suggestion of possible error meets with summary denial and even contemptuous dismissal.

Charity and Ritualism

One of these powers or influences is charity, by which we mean that the ones who have more than they need shall give of their superabundance to meet the deficit of those who have not as much as they need.

But the question does not seem to occur as to the why and how of the surplus on the one hand and the deficit on the other. And the real problem has not been even touched by raking off from the protuberance on the one side and filling up the depression on the other. We have heard and read much criticism of this crude method of balancing up as suggested by the uneducated socialists, but does the method become truer or more desirable because indorsed and practiced by an ecclesiastical body instead of a body political?

The second is the unfortunate disposition which is in evidence for church people to become the docile servants of church rule and officialism, and the devotees of platitudes and ritualism.

This may be rather unpleasant but all I ask is, Is it true?

One produces a community of two classes: the getters and the givers.

Is there any difference between the principle at the back of this condition and the one which was at the back of the French Revolution?

The other produces a condition which in some ways is worse than the slavery under which the negroid races suffered for years, but this is the slavery of the mental and moral powers.

Readjusting Life's Opportunities

As one of the bodies claiming to be the church, the problem before us is not the supplies of charity but the readjustment of life's opportunities in which the need of charity is obliterated by the dispensation of justice. And the big, broad vision we are needing is that of the best and strongest communities which are built up of units trusted both to dare, and to do, and to bear great things without official supervision and permits of a uniformed ministry. A community based upon brotherhood, enjoying a liberty which is the very essence of anarchy, because its virtue and righteousness are not the outcome of external law and force, but the natural and spontaneous growth of inward love of pure things and right ways. The New Testament plainly shows this to be the attitude of those people who shall be worthy to sing the song of the redeemed, and even though we might develop a community rigidly adhering to the literal translations and interpretations of moral codes, it will only be a sorry spectacle of mirthless automatism and become the stilted expression of a pathetic and monumental failure.

The Democratic Principle Expressed

We turn to the study of cooperation because it is the most lively and buoyant expression of the democratic principle which is in existence, and its success is not so much in the device for making communal storekeeping a dividend-producing affair as it is the instrument for the producing of a new character of manhood in which the glory of free and intelligent action is at once its secret and its fruit. To quote Professor Peabody:

"Cooperation is not merely an economic device, but much more fundamentally a moral movement. Cooperation depends for its success, not only upon its commercial principles of cash payments and deferred benefit, but in moral qualities of patience, thrift, and loyalty, which make the character known as the 'cooperative man.' Professor Marshall at the Cooperative Congress in 1889 at Ipswich said: 'The cardinal doctrines of its faith are, first the production of fine human beings, and not the production of rich goods, of all worthy endeavor. Secondly he who lives and works only for himself and his family, leads an incomplete life; to complete it he needs to work with others for some broad and high aim.' The achievements of the cooperative system in Great Britain are moral victories. This ethical quality of the cooperative system is at the same time its limitation."

Where the Cooperative Man Is Lacking, The Scheme Fails.

Similarly, the Christianity of Jesus finds its dynamic in the heart of his followers; and our modern revelations discover the same principle in the almost hackneyed phrase, "Zion is the pure in heart." This principle is still more pointedly used in the Pauline philosophy when he says: "All the law is fulfilled in one word even this; thou shalt love." Individual character is the prime necessity of all reform movements, but the individualistic regeneration is not a qualification for salvation, until the individual qualities of character have become socialized, and thereby the community is glorified. Zion or the kingdom of God is not a mutual self-admiration society, but an assemblage of highly specialized units brought into symmetrical correlation with truth as the illumination; then will it be said in the language of David: "Out of Zion the beauty of the Lord our God hath shined."

Manhood

There can be no humanity fit for earth, to say nothing of heaven, until we have manhood.

Manhood is not developed in existence upon unearned increment or parasitism. Whether it shall be the butterflies of unproductive opulence or the ragged and unwashed communities of Lazarus who feed upon the crumbs from the sumptuous tables of the rich makes no difference to the effect of this principle; paradise can only be regained in the sweat of toil. We cannot record success of a society whose powers are paralyzed or whose individuality wilts in the frown of a man or under the opposition of the crowd. "Quit you like men!" is an unknown tongue to the camp followers of charity; and to the invertebrate mass surrendering individual convictions to win the smile of panoplied tyranny.

Aspiring to the Ultimate

The day has dawned, indeed is well advanced when the church, I mean "our church," must win the confidence and support of intelligent and honorable people not by "strategic retreats" before the invading forces of the world's selfishness, but by heroic faith in and superb endeavor to actualize the race's most cherished ideals. We are in danger of being classified with the great list of quackeries or "Morrisonian pills," unless we shall deal with causes and aspire to the ultimate. We must not be contented to treat the symptoms, but must deal with causes.

At the present what we call socialism is a symptom—a symptom revealing possibilities of a revolution or a regeneration; everything will depend on how it is treated.

Cooperation is a remedy which with wonderful prescience has utilized the causes of the symptoms and disease and produced a state of healthy and virile humanity which is the indisputable evidence of the correctness of its diagnosis and also the efficiency of the methods employed to deal with the matter.

Humanity Cries Out; Divinity Responds

We repeat, as a church we cannot afford to ignore the socialistic agitation, but we must try to understand and interpret strident voices of the multitude's discontent, try to understand its agonizing cries and find out what is wanted; then we can the more intelligently correct its errors, utilize the good in it, and direct it on the pathway of right and truth, if we are able.

Let us read the primary lesson of all history with reverence, and that is: When humanity cries out in the agony of its sense of wrong the powers of heaven are pledged to help and deliverance; and when man beseeches the guidance of the Divine, God is pledged to lead.

Humanity cries out against the wrongs and oppression under which it is groaning to-day; its cry was hoarse and inarticulate, its mighty spasms were more violent than intelligent, and the sense of culture was shocked by the rough ways in which this sense of wrong was uttered, but those who read with the times, can clearly detect a change in the inflection and articulation of its most commanding voices; the roar and snarl have given place to intelligent statements of the grievances, and the common people are able to understand that with them the real power of control is resident. Cooperation proves that when the people are allowed to they can solve their own problems and lift themselves out of the viscid depths of poverty and its consequent misery.

* As a church we must remember, God made the church to be the agent of revealing his purposes and of carrying out his will, and only in so far as these things are done perfectly or as much so as in us lies, are we worthy of our name. So our first business is to be patient with men and have the dignity of the assurance of our power and also the abiding and inexhaustible sympathy without which we cannot reach our fellows. To be arrogant or peevish will be fatal to us as a community and to the purposes God has in view with us.

Cooperation in Accord With the Books

Speaking with careful restraint, and after due reading of our church books, I say deliberately there is nothing which can be cited to show that the cooperative method and even the economic ways and means of its working is out of harmony with those books and most decidedly not opposed to the spirit and morale therein enshrined.

Cooperation in those countries where it is at work has taken the venom out of the social unrest and converted a dangerous "free" force into a disciplined and harnessed power for prosperity and uplift, for in it the necessities of the people are provided—"of the people, for the people, and by the people" themselves. It is indeed a splendid and concrete example of our Lord's great and noble belief in the power of the people themselves as revealed in his own saying, "Behold the kingdom of God is within you." And we remember all about the persons and the circumstances to whom and under which it was said—and it is still marvelous in our eyes.

In cooperation the potential possibilities have been converted into kinetic facts, and therefore speak with authority—the authority of demonstration.

The Romance of Its History

The history of the cooperative movement reads like romance; the study of its remarkable development and its universal conquest constitutes one of the most fascinating chapters in the science of economics. The rapidity of its growth is not more striking than the universality of its strength. It was not born until the founder of our church was dead; its origin was so humble and the men who cradled it were so insignificant that it was treated as a joke, and as the extreme in the ridiculous and the grotesque. But now in this year of grace (1915), it is admittedly the biggest combination of human beings for mutual purposes which the history of the race records. It is not an exaggeration to say that cooperation has done more economically to reduce from the abstract to the concrete, the ideal of universal brotherhood than any other movement which has been attempted.

Capital, Politics, and Religion

While the movement refuses to recognize the domination of capital, politics, or religion, at least in the sense of partisanship or sectarianism, yet in no other movement is capital a more willing and useful servant, the welfare of the state better conserved in the prosperity and happiness of the masses, and religion more practically and effectively related to the economic and social departments of life.

Literature and Morale

It has developed a literature and even a morale of a distinctive type, and can trace a new element of character in its commonwealth which even economics has recognized and classified as the "cooperative man."

In 1906 there was a cooperative bibliography comprising 5,761 entries in twelve languages, published by the cooperative alliance. That number has been augmented since that date, and at least three British universities have included industrial cooperation not only as part of their academic curriculum, but also practice the principle in supplying the needs of the residents of the universities.

International Alliance

The International Alliance, holding triennial congress, represents organized cooperation in Germany, Denmark, Switzerland, France, Belgium, Italy, Scandinavia, Holland, Finland, Austria-Hungary, Rumania, Russia, including Siberia, Argentina, Bulgaria, Spain, Japan, United States, and Great Britain including her colonies. The cooperative principle has found its way into all of the five continents.

The last International Congress held at Glasgow, Scotland, in August, 1913, under the presidency of Earl Grey, reported eighteen countries representing 120,238 societies of all kinds and membership of 19,153,700. There are over 50,000,000 cooperators represented by the alliance and those not identified with the alliance.

The Growth in Great Britain

As marking the wonderful influence which cooperation is exerting upon the nation it will be instructive to note the growth of the movement in Britain, its birthplace. Though as already noted, cooperation is not exclusively indigenous to that country.

It was on a dark, December night in the year 1844 that the shutters were taken down from the "Auld Weyvur's Shop" in Toad Street, Rochdale, Lancashire; and we should not omit the historical detail—"the shutters were taken down by a woman." Not only has woman been the instrument of exhibiting the movement to the public but woman was always a great factor of the success attending the cooperative store. There were twenty-eight workmen, with an accumulated capital of one hundred and forty dollars and they did business which amounted to ten dollars weekly, only opening the store Monday and Saturday evenings. The several duties were all discharged by themselves, one acting as salesman, another as secretary, and another as cashier, while others were directors, trustees, and customers. Contrast this with the splendid record for the six months ending 1913, reported by the Central Board of Progress to the forty-sixth annual cooperative congress held in Dublin, Ireland, May, 1914.

The British societies, 3,011,390 members.

Share capital, $205,596,865.

Amount of trade done, $650,055,330.

Producing a profit of $71,302,070.

The above is the record for the retail stores.

The two wholesale societies, the Wholesale Cooperative Society with headquarters at Manchester and London; and the Scottish Wholesale Cooperative Society with headquarters in Glasgow presenting the following summary:

Number of persons employed, 34,520.

Amount of capital, $26,699,855.

Amount of trade for 1913, $71,778,660.

Producing a net profit of $1,511,385.

Eighty-one societies furnished particulars of cooperative farming operations; they own conjointly 8,729 acres and rent a further 5,670 acres and aggregated profits amounting to $44,315. Losses of $29,325, leaving a net profit of $14,990.

Field of Operations

Cooperators are now the largest millers of flour in Great Britain; they manufacture everything demanded by the working classes for their consumption; they own and operate coal mines, banks, insurance of life and property, transportation by land and water, employing a large number of men and women under better conditions, pay better wages, have a minimum number of hours labor and have more satisfaction among their employees than any other institution in the land.

There are no exorbitant wages paid to leading officials, Mr. William Maxwell, the manager of the S. C. W. Society, receiving but $38 per week for conducting a business valued at $50,000,000. (To be continued.)

Education, Saving, and Revelation

An editorial by R. J. Lambert, in Zion's Ensign, November 11, 1920.

Education has been spoken of and generally regarded as a science, and as a science of course it means the training of individuals according to a prescribed course of study; or, the following of the requirements of a curriculum by candidates. For the length of time over which the average man can remember with ease and some degree of certainty, there has been contention raised that education as it is to-day is not a science; and that it is impractical. And these statements have been just as vigorously denied.

For the reason that this contention has been so strenuous, the circular sent out by J. M. Worley, director of sales and publicity in the department of War Savings, is particularly interesting, and from it we quote:

"For the first time in American history educators have admitted that their previous plans of education have been all wrong; that hitherto education did not educate but merely half educated the youth of the land. It fitted youth to 'make money,' but taught nothing about how to save a part of what was made, a matter of even greater importance than making money. The year 1920 marks the turning point in real teaching in the United States. A committee of seven state superintendents of public instruction, appointed last summer at a meeting of the National Educational Association, will meet with treasury officials at Washington before Thanksgiving to confer on teaching saving in schools. The results of the conference will be unified plans for putting American children on a thrifty foundation and swell the tide rapidly turning towards school saving."

If this letter is exact in its statements, is it not amazing that the awakening has been retarded until this late date? If the statement that education in the past has equipped with ability to gather wealth, but has neglected to train in the saving, or the distribution of wealth, it may be that the new system will aid America in overcoming her unsavory reputation among the enlightened nations of the world—that we are a people who spend lavishly and foolishly. Possibly the fact that the list of wealthy men contains such a low percentage of highly educated men may also be accounted for by this past neglect.

What we feel to be a sure thing in this letter is the statement that the year 1920 marks the turning point in real teaching in the United States, and our reasons for believing this are several. We may mention some of them:

1. It will be noted that the magazines of the past few months have featured articles giving prominence to men who have learned the art or science of conservation, saving, and economy; and to measures on the subject.

2. A period of reconstruction has opened the minds of the people to the reception of new thoughts and new systems; has jarred us loose from our self-complacency, and made it apparent that we are deep in some grooves, or ruts, which fact is distasteful to the average American.

3. We are seemingly facing a falling market, and therefore the present is a time for retrenchment, and all procedure whereby we may avoid the rocks of business failure, and economic want; and the tendency of Americans will be, as it has ever been, to incorporate into their educational system the study of those things which will help in such times.

As a religious people Latter Day Saints should welcome this alteration of the present course of our schools. The principle of saving is a religious principle among this people. We expect by gathering together the fragments of wealth which might otherwise be lost, to be enabled to build and expand church institutions and enterprises, and finally to erect the material portion of the city of Zion. This is such a great work, such a stupendous undertaking for a small body of people not above the average in possession of wealth at the present time, that saving, economy, conservation must be carefully studied and made a real science.

In this we shall be making possible the intelligent following of the instruction of the Lord given in direct revelation to us, and a comprehensive rather than a parrot-like following of the example of the Son of God and of godly men. It is religious to save; it is irreligious to permit needless waste.

In 1913 the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints was found to be in debt to a considerable extent. As a method to get out of debt, rather than the human and American way of unearthing or creating some means for making more money, the following instruction was given:

"In order that the temporal affairs of the church may be successfully carried on and the accumulated debt of the church . . . may be properly met and in due time discharged, the church is instructed, both as members, and as the body at large, to avoid the unnecessary building of houses of worship or places of entertainment or otherwise expending the tithes and offerings of the church in that which may not be essential unto the continued onward progress of the general work; and both in private and public expenditure carry into active exercise the principle of sacrifice and repression of unnecessary wants; and thus permit the accumulation of tithes and offerings in such amounts as may be needed to properly discharge the existing indebtedness of the church as a body."

From this it will be seen that the education and training of the church in economy of expenditure was the Lord's system—using the means already produced in a wise way, rather than by supreme effort producing more wealth in order that carelessness in expenditure might be pursued.

The question now comes squarely before us, Does this people know how to save? If not, the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and twenty should mark the beginning of their training in every community and school where they have influence or power. If the principle of the revelation of God's will to us is to be of profit, and there is no other excuse for our belief in it or for its existence, then our people should lead in the work of training to save and expend.

The Christmas Gift of Song

By Lois Beryl Aldridge

Sometimes we overlook the finer privileges of life because they are so intimately close at hand.

The Christmas tree had been decked out until it sparkled like one great jewel. The last present had been brought from its hiding place; the stocking had been stuffed to overflowing. With one comprehensive glance about the room, and a happy smile, after another reading of Dickens's "Christmas carol," we tucked ourselves safely in bed, when into our dreams there stole the sound of music.

It seemed as though we had been slumbering for hours, lulled by the most exquisite tones, when gradually the consciousness began to dawn on us that we were awake and listening to human voices singing Christmas carols. Never did any tones reach our ears with the beauty of those sounds that came floating up in the darkness of Christmas morning.

All of us crept from our beds to gather at the head of the stairs. We dared not utter even a whisper for fear of breaking the spell, yet we could not let the choristers leave without a word of recognition; so when we felt sure that the last carol had been sung we called out to them a "Merry Christmas and God bless you" that ought to have repaid them, in part.

What was it we heard? One family in our neighborhood who loved music still kept up the good old habit of visiting the houses of near-by friends to sing carols on Christmas morning to usher in the day. What a kindly thought lay back of it, and how easily done, yet with a charm to it, as the voices gently roused us from sleep, no words can tell.

These people used to select different homes each year, that the music might come as a new thing to each, and that in course of time as many families as possible should be made partakers of the fine old custom. They went about it in the most careful manner, making up a list of the number of houses they should visit between five o'clock in the morning and daylight.

Afterward we found they had planned a visit to us the previous year, making all arrangements, including the key to the back door, obtained from the maid; but it so happened that our maid was to spend Christmas Eve at some special celebration so we had locked the inside door; and when the choristers came they were barred from the house. For a few minutes they debated as to whether they should try it from where they were, but finally decided that it could not be satisfactory, so they would postpone it all for another year. So careful were they to keep the secret that we knew nothing about it; and when the following Christmas came the singing of their Christmas carols was an absolute surprise.

There were four of them—a brother, a sister, her husband, and a cousin; and it was not a difficult thing to do; thousands of others could be found all over the land as fully qualified, but these had the energy and inclination actually to do it.

For the charm of these Christmas carols there is no need of "grand-opera" voices, all that is required being the power to "carry a tune" and a little activity of the Christmas spirit, so why should such a fine old custom be permitted to die out so completely that once to be awakened in this manner was a unique event?

That early morning singing will color all our days for us with a sense of Christmas good will, with a recollection as a time of special beauty, remembering always as though Tiny Tim himself had been present with his crutch, to say, "God bless us, every one."

For those who did the singing, the pleasure must have been greater yet; since, if we know anything, it is that the doing of a kindly deed brings a greater warmth of satisfaction to the doer than to him who receives.

Let the young people take thought about this matter for the coming Christmas, gathering together for the holiday a few simple carols, and do something which will give that day a richer meaning than any gifts that can be bought with money. It is personal service that gives value, and anyone who can carry a tune has all the art needed for the singing of a Christmas carol if he also has the wish in his heart. Get up at half-past four on Christmas morning; you used to do as much to make the old-fashioned Fourth of July a day of terror, so why not use some of the same zeal to give a deeper meaning to the most beautiful festival of all the year?

People have the wish to do the helpful thing, but they sometimes lack direction, or overlook the obvious because it is so near at hand; and this singing of Christmas carols could be so easily done, while the pleasure it can give, as we know from experience, is incalculable.

Then Christmas would mean something more than the straining of the pocketbook in what is often compulsory giving with no true Christmas spirit back of the gift; for the meaning of Christmas is something which should never come to us in terms of money value.

Let it be in the personal service which enriches both him who gives and him who receives, which makes the spirit of Christmas live in our hearts with a vigor that will send the glow all through us and last even into the week after the holiday has vanished.

The students of Graceland College have completed their self-designated quota of $10,000 for the auditorium fund. This is certainly a commendable record for this group of people, most of whom are without present means. Yet hope looms large on the horizon of youth. We are thankful for this manifestation of their faith, as it portends the success of greater undertakings by them in the future.

Elder Joseph Luff, who went east with Elder John Smith, and with the remains of Sister Kate E. Smith, was, at the last report, preaching in Providence.

Plano, Illinois, reports pleasure over having W. A. McDowell with them on sacrament Sunday. The juniors gave a very pleasing entertainment on the 5th, also a cake sale to earn their Christmas offering, which was successful. L. O. Wildermuth, missionary to Southeastern Illinois, was at home recently.

The Richmond Guardian, published in Melbourne, Australia, announces the closing services of Apostles John W. Rushton and Paul M. Hanson, giving a full list of their subjects for a week. Later advice informs us that Apostles Rushton and Hanson have booked passage on the Tofua, leaving Auckland, New Zealand, November 12. They will stop at Papeete, Tahiti, on the way, and hope to reach San Francisco by December 5.

A recent letter advises us that Elder J. F. Curtis is in the East, and was at Philadelphia on the 14th. He expected to visit other points in the New York and Philadelphia District while there.

Doctor G. Leonard Harrington is announced in the Holden Progress for November 11, to deliver three lectures at the church in Holden: At 11 o'clock a general address; at 2 o'clock the men and boys over 14 years of age; at 3.30 the women and girls over 18 years of age. The meetings are in the interest of the health department of the church, but are open to the general public.

Elder A. M. Chase, after a week at Elk Mills, Maryland, with A. B. Phillips, left on November 15, for Bloomsburg, Pennsylvania, where he expects to make a new opening. He has taken with him a young man from Elk Mills, Thomas Carr, who hopes to be in the missionary class at Graceland next year. He is voluntarily going out on the firing line first to gain practical experience.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

EFFECT OF PROHIBITION ON CRIME

The old-time dictum that "prohibition does not prohibit" is sometimes still heard as an argument. It is true that bootlegging, illicit manufacture of liquors, importation from Canada, and so on, have minimized the good effects of prohibition in the United States. Even so a tremendous amount of good seems to have been accomplished and when the same enthusiasm to enforce the law is manifested as was manifested in instituting the law, and when an adequate force of officials is provided to see that it is enforced, still greater benefits may be expected. The Survey for November 6 has a very interesting article entitled, "Prohibition," by Winthrop D. Lane, giving the benefits of prohibition in Grand Rapids, Michigan, this city having been selected by the Survey for such a study. The following is a selection from his article under the sub-heading "Crime" and should be of interest to readers of the HERALD.

Crime

The effect of prohibition upon the bulk of crime committed in Grand Rapids is pronounced. The best index to the amount of crime committed is to be found in the number of cases disposed of in the police court. Not only are far more cases handled here than in any other court, but these are of a more varied nature, running all the way from violations of ordinances to murder. Through the courtesy of Gerald De Boer, clerk of court, I was furnished copies of the official report sheets, showing the number of all offenses disposed of each month for four consecutive years, two before prohibition and two after. The years begin with May 1 and end with April 30, so that the end of the second year exactly coincides with the closing of the saloons. The following tables were prepared directly from these reports; their accuracy, therefore, is not open to question. Here are the yearly totals of all cases appearing in court.

1916-17, Saloons open, 3,827. 1918-19, Prohibition, 1,705.
1917-18, Saloons open, 3,666. 1919-20, Prohibition, 2,055.

Here, then, is a reduction of 54 per cent in the first year of prohibition from the average of the two years immediately preceding, and of 45 per cent in the second year. The average reduction for the two years of prohibition is 49.8 per cent. In other words, the number of cases was cut almost exactly in two.

This does not show the specific crimes in which the reduction was greatest. For that purpose a more detailed table is necessary. In making the table on this page I did not include every offense listed, since there are over a hundred of these. Many are mere violations of minor ordinances and others did not occur more than a few times throughout the whole four years. An effort was made to include all offenses that might be regarded as having a casual relation with drink, as well as all the more serious ones. That those chosen comprise the bulk of all crimes committed is evident from a comparison of the totals with the totals just given.

It is evident from the tale that the greater part of the reduction of crime in Grand Rapids, following prohibition, occurred in those offenses in which intoxication is itself a part of the definition of the offense. These are intoxication, where the reduction the first year of prohibition is to one eighth of what it was; intoxication and disorderly; and habitual drunkard.

There are other groups of offenses, however, in which the reduction is marked. One of these is composed of offenses involving fighting the general rowdyism, where the influence of liquor may or may not have been responsible for the act; note, for example, the reductions in felonious assaults, assault and battery, breaches of the peace and disorderly conduct. Vagrancy, again, is reduced to almost nothing. Crimes of theft show a general reduction, especially larceny. With respect to several of the offenses, the numbers are too small to have significance either way.

Two of the crimes listed above are of special interest to social workers. These are desertion, which here means desertion of the wife, and nonsupport. Desertion shows a reduction from 33 during the two years before prohibition to 14 during the two years after; nonsupport from 92 to 53. The same tendency is borne out by figures in the district attorney's office, where similar cases are handled. The testimony of judges and of Grand Rapids social workers was that this was in part due to prohibition and in part to higher incomes.

The almost dramatic effect of closing the saloons is shown in the monthly figures for some of these crimes. In April, 1918—the month before prohibition—there were 138 cases of intoxication in the police court; in May—the first month thereafter—9. During the first eight months of prohibition there was not a single case of "intoxication and disorderly," though not a month had gone by during the two years before that at least several cases had not been disposed of. Vagrants had been frequent visitors to the court room before, but during the first six months of prohibition exactly one vagrant was prosecuted.

An interesting comment in regard to prohibition and crime, made by Judge Creswell, acting judge of the police court, is borne out in part by these and other figures:

For six months or thereabouts following prohibition, (said Judge Creswell) the number of cases before the police court dropped enormously. The casual relation between alcohol and crime was clearly shown. Indeed, the number of cases became so few that there was talk of consolidating the police and justices' courts. There hardly seemed enough business to keep both courts going.

That was while the city was almost bone dry. Then something happened. People began to learn how to make substitutes. Whiskey was imported in larger quantities from Canada. The Supreme Court held the state enforcement act unconstitutional and advantage was taken of this to bring liquor in from Ohio. The result was to cause an increase in crime; you could see the figures in the police court mount up again. The number of cases never got anywhere near what it had been when the saloons were wide open, but the court had more to do than during the early months of prohibition.

A large reduction in offenders is shown by the county jail. Mr. Hurley, the turnkey, placed the books at my disposal and together we compiled the following figures:

Year.	No. of Prisoners.
May 1, 1916, to April 30, 1917.....	1,657
May 1, 1917, to April 30, 1918.....	1,633
May 1, 1918, to April 30, 1919 (first year of prohibition) ..	622
May 1, 1919, to April 30, 1920.....	599

Here, there is a reduction of 63 per cent in the population of the jail, comparing the averages of the two years.

The jail had been all but empty a number of times since prohibition went into effect—a condition unique in its history. Mr. Hurley has a mind for figures and he said that from 1909 to 1913, when he served four years as sheriff, the smallest number of prisoners in the jail at any one time was 66, the largest 106. The records for 1919 and the first six months of 1920 show that the smallest number during that period was 9, the largest 38. For weeks there were never more than 20. Some forty of the 100 cells in the jail have not been occupied since prohibition went into effect. "It is the alcohol bums whom we get now," said Sheriff Viergever. Since the yearly figures just given include repeaters, it is not possible to give the actual number of persons confined in the jail before and after prohibition went into effect; Mr. Hurley, however, was confident that there are more repeaters now than formerly, so that it is probable that the difference between the actual number confined now is greater than the figures indicate. In other words, there is a greater reduction in the number of persons for whom the jail exists than these figures show.

Three years ago Kent County established a work farm for short-term prisoners; drunks, men convicted of petty larceny and others with ninety-day sentences or less were sent there. The prisoners were used in cultivating the farm. Shortly after prohibition went into effect the superintendent's wife called the police judge on the telephone and said, "Have you got any prisoners for me this morning, judge?" "No," said the judge. "Well, you better send me some pretty quick," she said. "The farm's running down; we don't get enough prisoners to work it." Six months later the farm was abandoned; and is now a Government aviation field. Mismanagement is said to have played a part in its abandonment, but it is doubtful, said Sheriff Vieregger, who told me this story, whether the farm could have survived the reduced number of prisoners due to prohibition. Sheriff Vieregger is enthusiastic about the results of prohibition. He thinks that it has not only reduced the number of offenders, but that it has benefited family life as well. And he told me that several sheriffs in Michigan, in counties less populous than Kent, had suffered such reductions in their jail populations that, dependent upon the fee system for their incomes, they could not make money in their positions and had intimated to him that they would resign.

IN TWO SHORT YEARS

Recently we noted the effort made in England to secure relief for German children, because of malnutrition. We publish herewith a short editorial from the Des Moines Register of November 11, showing the efforts already made by men of science at Oxford to establish a new relation and its results:

One of the reassuring signs is the friendly greeting extended by the professors and scholars of Oxford University to the professors and scholars of the German universities and the friendly response of the latter. If scholarship is to stand for anything worth while in the world it must be for a plane of association not too much disturbed by the contentions of ambitious rulers.

In view of all that has happened it would be hard to think of anything more gracious than the following letter signed by every one of the notables of Oxford, some thirty-nine in all:

"To the Professors of the Arts and Sciences and to Members of the Universities and Learned Societies in Germany and Austria:

"Since there will be many of you who fully share our heartfelt sorrow and regret for the breach that the war has occasioned in our friendly intercourse, and since you cannot doubt the sincerity of the feeling which engendered and cherished that old friendliness, you must, we believe, be sharing our hope for its speedy reestablishment.

"We therefore, the undersigned doctors, heads of houses, professors, and other officers and teachers in the University of Oxford, now personally approach you with the desire to dispel the bitterness of animosities that under the impulse of loyal patriotism may have passed between us.

"In the field where our aims are one, our enthusiasms the same, our rivalry and ambition generous, we can surely look to be reconciled, and the fellowship of learning offers a road which may—and if our spiritual ideals be alive, must—lead to a wider sympathy and better understanding between our kindred nations.

"While political dissensions are threatening to extinguish the honorable comity of the great European states, we pray that we may help to hasten that amicable reunion which civilization demands."

In their reply the German scholars say in part:

"Science knows only one aim—the search after truth—and it requires for the performance of this task the common labor of all, regardless of national boundaries. The World War interrupted this joint labor and dissolved many personal ties. We are ready to resume these connections and by common labor to relegate to oblivion everything offensive spoken or written in both camps."

Probably in no other age but ours could such a greeting have been extended so soon after such a colossal war. Certainly in no other age but ours would the learned men of the defeated nations have met the greeting half way.

In the restoration of friendly relations among the scholars of Europe will come a serious consideration of what the war has wrought and an intelligent understanding will be formed of what may be done to put the world in the way of rebuilding on a securer foundation.

The Labor Problem and a Solution

By J. A. Koehler

This vigorous treatment of an important subject to every Saint is by Bishop J. A. Koehler, bishop of Far West Stake, and at the head of the labor commission of the church.

No person who does not have a bird's-eye view of society is competent to elucidate the problems of society and their solution, because all the problems of society are interwoven and interdependent.

He who thinks about the problem of wages out of its relation to the problem of production and all other vital problems of society has not yet reached the place in his development where he can discuss the solution to world problems. Neither is it possible, except in a very general way, to set forth the facts of the labor problem and its solution in a short article. Some general facts of interest and great import, however, may be presented.

Labor's Problem

Labor's problem, in substance, is to secure and maintain desirable working conditions, a high standard of living, and adequate guarantees against want. And unless men fall into different classes of beings, some of which are by nature superior beings to others, labor is clearly within its rights in seeking to bring about these conditions.

The methods by which labor seeks its ends have nothing to do with the righteousness of its purpose. Men seek to worship God, which all will agree is a very holy purpose; but the methods by which they do it may be altogether debasing. This principle should be kept clearly in mind when judging the cause of labor.

In its struggles to achieve its purposes, labor has been insisting everlastingly on higher wages. This has been done partly because labor believes that an increase in the amount of the pay check is fundamental to a higher standard of living, and partly because industrial society is so constituted that men are virtually compelled to fight and to use the tactics of warfare to defend themselves against the aggressions of opposing interests.

No one is to be blamed for protecting or securing his rights by resorting to "the rules of the game" that society is playing. So long as industrial society is founded in the principles of competitive bargaining that long we may be assured that the several factors of industry will seek their own and not another's gain.

If the tactics that the game calls for as a means of self-protection are repugnant, the thing to do is to play some other game.

The Demand for Shorter Hours

Again. Labor has been demanding shorter hours as a means of self-protection and as a natural right arising from its increased productivity; it has slowed up production; it has decreased the per hour production as a means of insuring continuous employment.

As is well known, we are playing a game that requires each individual or factor to employ its resources for its own ends; and since capital employs labor only because employed labor yields a profit, labor must "come back" with some sort of play calculated to insure steady employment. To secure continuous employment is one of labor's problems; and curtailing production is one of the methods employed for this end.

The continual necessity that exists for a readjustment of hours of labor and the rate of pay is, however, a sure sign that these methods are not fundamental to the problem.

Industrial Democracy

Failing to achieve its ends by revising the wage scale and the hours of employment and by curtailing production, labor is now insisting upon participation in the management of the shop in the hope that this will bring it nearer to the coveted goal.

In Italy labor has even taken over by force the whole task of operating the tools of production.

But who can blame labor for playing the game? When the enemy cuts off your food supply, something must be done. The methods employed arise from the character of the game that is being played.

But we shall see as we proceed with our investigation that this method also is not fundamental to labor's problem. A number of things occur from time to time to upset labor's calculations; but the most persistent, disconcerting, and uncontrollable factor is fluctuation in the prices of commodities and services. Labor never received so lavish a pay check as it receives to-day, and yet it cannot buy what it needs because the prices of goods have increased in a greater ratio than the amount of the pay check. No one seems to be able to say what power a pay check of a given size will have to-morrow to command goods in exchange for itself.

But ours is a game at which more than one is playing, and the very moves which are intended to secure larger returns to labor are used by other factors to derive a larger share of profits than before. The very acts by which labor seeks to bring about an equality furnishes the opportunity for other factors to play the game in such a way that the inequality becomes not less but greater.

To say that the tactics of labor are not justified in the face of the fact that it wears better clothes, lives in better houses, and has greater cultural advantages than were enjoyed by the elite of the past is only to seek to escape the issue. The question with labor is not whether or not it lives better than it did in the past, but it is whether it is receiving its proper share of the increased rewards made available to society as a whole by the tremendous advances in its civilization. Poverty is a matter of contrast. The claims and the acts of labor cannot be judged without taking into account all of the facts of production and distribution.

The things that labor seeks and the methods it employs to secure them, all indicate that in man there is a native aversion to discriminations or class distinctions which give rise to unequal rewards or special property advantages. Somehow each man feels that he should have an equal right with other men to use the natural creations to provide for self, and that the benefits arising from the use of machinery made available and valuable by the combined activities of men should be shared somewhere nearly equally by those whose efforts are joined together to put them to a good use.

But now we ask what grounds are there for hoping to realize such an ideal by the methods which labor employs? Labor organizations have become more general and powerful, and yet there is a more general feeling of dissatisfaction than we ever knew before. Labor never felt so keenly or protested so loudly its rights to a greater share and voice in the rewards and management of industry. Evidently the solution of labor's problems is not to be found in such plans as the revision of hours of labor and rates of wages. These plans are not fundamental and cannot remedy the situation.

The Solution

No amount of juggling of wage scales or regulating of hours of production or prices or participation by labor in shop management can remedy existing evils. The cause is more remote, and a cure may be effected only by correcting the source of the evil. This will take us back to the principles upon which society is organized or constituted.

Briefly stated, the solution of labor's problems is to be found only in—

- (1) A society with a purposive constitution,
- (2) A society which reserves to itself all proprietary rights in the natural creations and in the surplus products of social activity,
- (3) A society which fixes upon capable men individually the sole right and responsibility for the management of its concerns with limitations fixed only by the general scheme of society,
- (4) A society which furnishes not only incentive but also equal opportunity for enterprise or labor,
- (5) A society which holds each member to the obligation to be employed continuously at some useful activity, and finally—
- (6) A society which controls and regulates distribution so that every worthy person may receive according to his needs and just wants.

A Purposive Constitution

All students of social and economic problems are aware of the tremendous burden imposed upon society by the needless duplications arising from unregulated private enterprise. As an example, let us take one of the outstanding characteristics of modern industrial society, namely, its superabundance of mercantile agencies. No one can contemplate this phase of industrial life without wonderment at the prodigal waste of man power and physical resources it entails.

Such facts as these have a direct relation to or bearing upon the problems of the costs of production, the securing and maintenance of desirable working conditions and a higher standard of living. If the number, kind, and location of mercantile agencies were limited to the needs of society in some such way as are schools and post offices, two immediate and highly beneficial results would inevitably follow.

First, there would be an enormous saving (a) in the materials that enter into the construction and equipment of the buildings not needed for such purposes, (b) in the light, power, fuel, advertising space, and other shop and office materials now needlessly consumed, and (c) in the upkeep of these concerns.

Second, a vast army of workmen would be released and made available to other necessary and more highly profitable enterprises—profitable, of course, from the standpoint of society or the people as a whole.

The relation of such social regulation to labor's problem are apparent. This would lessen the burden of the laborer by distributing the labor of production to a greater number of workmen; or the increased number of workmen engaged in the creation of form utilities (that is, in changing the shape of materials so that they will be ready for use or consumption) would greatly increase the sum total of goods available for distribution as wages or rewards for labor and thereby make possible a much higher standard of living.

This is but an instance of the kind of regulation that presupposes a purposive social constitution. Such regulation and savings require that society (the group, the people as a whole) shall contemplate its needs and its resources and determine the kind, number, and location of agencies required to supply that need and then distribute its resources in accordance with that plan.

A purposive constitution, a society which purposively establishes and maintains harmonious and reciprocal relations between its concerns, a society in which the functions are coordinated, is fundamental to labor's problems because permanent, desirable working conditions and a higher standard of living for men generally cannot be hoped for without such group action.

All of this is contemplated and comprehended briefly in the provision of the divine plan which says "organize yourselves and appoint every man his stewardship," and as there is land available "let there be workmen sent forth, of all kinds, . . . to labor" according to the needs of society as society itself sees them.

We cannot take the space in this short article to answer the objections that are urged against the plan God has given. The facts of human experience, the wonderful achievements of the agricultural department, the discoveries made under governmental direction and the devices invented for the utilization of such waste products of the farm as oat straw—such achievements under social direction and employment furnish all the answers needed (e. g.) to the groundless claim that group action destroys initiative and retards social progress. All such objections are answered by the facts of human experience.

Property Rights in Natural Creations

A purposive constitution has for its corollary the ownership by the group of the properties devoted to further production. (This does not imply that political invention to further the exploitation of social resources, namely, governmental management of individual farms, or factories, or railroads, or the like. The question of management will be discussed under the next heading.)

Public ownership has a direct relationship to the question of opportunity to labor. At present, under private ownership of lands, other than those that may be classed as consumptive, because they are in a sense consumed when used for a place of residence merely, extensive acreages are held out of use by private land owners, and thousands who would gladly till the soil are denied that privilege.

Moreover private ownership of productive lands bears directly upon the question of wages. As it is, under private ownership, one man must pay to another the half of the products of his toil for the mere "privilege" of laboring. Under this scheme the tenant farmer is everlastingly impoverished while others who do little or nothing but grant privileges to use land are increasingly enriched. Land should be held individually under a social grant for productive purposes and not as a weapon of exploitation.

In accordance with these facts, our proposed plan provides for group ownership and regulation of lands devoted to productive enterprise. "It is my will that my people should claim and hold claim upon that which I have appointed unto them. . . ." And, "Let workmen be sent forth . . . unto this land to labor for" (the whole body of people). And "let the privileges of the land be made known. . . ." "And it pleaseth God that he hath given all these things unto man [not men undividedly] . . . to be used with judgment" but not by "extortion," or in other words "the subjection of another to some necessity" such as the payment of a rent to a private owner of the land that God gave for the welfare of all.

We turn now to the question of group ownership of all capital, or, in other words, to the products of past labor set apart to further production. This includes all concerns that represent the result of the labors of many men joined together. This is a big subject and is the occasion for much economic discussion. Moreover it lies at the bottom of labor's problems.

Under private ownership business is conducted for "profit." And "profit" here means merely an increased control over the products of industry; it has no relation to public welfare. Here also we find the incentive for the juggling of prices which upsets all of labor's calculations. But under group ownership business would be conducted for the sake of the utilities that would be created; and the incentive to market manipulations as a means of private gain would be almost entirely destroyed.

The aim of social control is social betterment, and social betterment demands that the welfare of each member of society shall be promoted. As matters stand now, a minimum only of goods can be purchased by the laborer with his pay check; his real wage is kept down to the lowest possible point. Production is measured and limited, not by social needs but by the prospect of increased profits. But under group ownership business would be carried on for profit to society; and profit to society means only one thing, namely: that more goods are made available for and used up by private and public use.

Is this not precisely labor's problem, to realize a higher standard of living? to receive an increased wage? And to the end that labor may realize its hope, the divine plan provides that men shall be "stewards," and that such properties shall "belong to the order" (that is, the group), and that the earnings of these stewardships shall become "the common property" of the whole body of people, and that distribution shall be made according to "the needs and just wants" of each and every man who does his part in society.

There is no end to the discussion. Under this plan there can be no closed factories in answer to labor's cry for a square deal.

Individual Management and Responsibility

Lately labor has been insisting upon a voice in the management of the shop. But why? Not because labor wishes to increase its burdens or make more efficient the whole operation as a productive enterprise, but because it hopes thereby to secure more desirable working conditions and a square deal from the management in its treatment of the individual workman. This late move, however, is contrary to all experience which teaches that individual responsibility in the conduct of such enterprises is one of the guarantees of success.

In all factories there are many functions to be coordinated. The ability to coordinate is conditioned in part in the envisagement of factory processes as a whole. But factory production requires specialization in operations, and this limits (with few exceptions) the workman's knowledge of factory requirements and unfits him for the duty of judging them.

And even if the employees in each factory participated in the management of its affairs, the general problem of labor would still be untouched. The conflict between the several interests in industry would still persist. No local adjustment can effect the outcome to laborers as a whole. To increase the pay of the railroad employee is only to add increased burdens to laborers generally by increasing the price of the finished product. All charges or costs in factory production are always passed on to the consumer as a liability justly incurred by the demand made for the goods.

Our proposed solution to labor's problem seems much more sensible. It provides that capable men individually shall be made solely responsible for the proper management of the concerns intrusted to their care, and this includes the maintenance of working conditions against which the individual laborer has no just cause for complaint, as well as the success of the concern as a productive enterprise. And so we read:

"Appoint every man his stewardship that every man may give an account of the stewardship." And the unfaithful or unwise steward shall be subject to removal and another shall be appointed in his stead. This insures all that labor asks for in this connection.

Equal Opportunity

All most men ask in the world is an equal opportunity with other men to use the powers with which nature has endowed them for the purposes and toward the objects that nature has ordained and supplied. This much they surely have a right to demand: "If each is given such an opportunity all the necessary protection against unemployment will have been provided."

But it is no one's business to look after others to-day. Each man is for himself, decides for himself how he shall secure his opportunities and interests. But under group ownership and control of individually managed industrial concerns, it is the duty of society to see that the individual laborer whose interests are in society's care shall be guaranteed an opportunity to do his full duty in society. A general supervisory control of industry is essential for this purpose.

And so the proposed solution provides opportunity for "every man to improve upon his talent," his peculiar aptitude for some particular kind of work. But to furnish such guarantees society must, as already stated, reserve the right of ownership and the consequent power of control to organize industrial concerns for the good of the group.

The Obligation to Labor

The word labor means to be engaged in some useful activity. Private ownership and certain other well established customs have made possible and have given rise to—

(1) A very large class of people who do nothing but consume the products of industrial enterprise on the one hand, and—

(2) Another large class of people whose business activities produce things that are either useless or actually detrimental to public and private welfare, while at the same time they also draw upon the common store of things produced by useful toil.

And in these facts we find some of the chief causes for the heavy burden that those engaged in useful toil are obliged to carry. If this ever-increasing company of people were obliged to find some field of useful activity as the price of the right of association with men engaged in useful effort, the supply of goods upon which a higher standard of living depends, would soon be made available.

The divine solution is the verdict of the rational mind. "The idler shall not eat the bread nor wear the garments of the laborer." And again: "The idler shall not have place in the company of godly men."

This, with the other provisions of the law, would secure to labor all it asks in reason and much more than it has any grounds to hope for.

Equitable Distribution

Rewards in industry as at present constituted are governed largely by one or more of the following factors:

- (1) The accidents of exchange.
- (2) Monopoly.
- (3) Advantages of situation.
- (4) Surplus or shortage of labor or goods.

It is almost proverbial that "if you want to get rich, by all means don't work"; which means that the more useful the activity the less likelihood there is of acquiring a competency.

But useful effort should be properly rewarded. And inasmuch (1) as it is impossible to compute the ratio in which the several factors of industry contribute to the total effort, and inasmuch (2) as industry is a joint affair and neither one of the several essential factors is independent of the others, it seems reasonable that rewards to all who contribute a proper share to the common effort should be based upon needs and just wants.

This would give the laborer full returns for his productive efforts and would break down the class distinctions based upon personal possessions that now exist. Labor would be satisfied. Its problem would be solved.

This is the divine solution: To all shall be given that which "is needful for their necessities and their wants." Whatever is over and above that shall be kept in the common storehouse to be used as group interests may require.

Conclusion

Labor has problems which arise from fundamental errors in the relations that now exist between men and between men and properties. The solution must consist in correcting these relations, i. e., in the establishment of right relations. The divine plan of industrial society is the true solution to labor's problems because—

- (1) It destroys that form of competition which aims only to "get" without regard to what is "given";
- (2) It promotes competition in production or service;
- (3) It brings honor to the "servant of all" and marks him as "the greatest among you";
- (4) It guarantees the faithful against want, and thereby relieves all of the depressing strain arising from the fear of poverty;
- (5) It conduces to morality by taking away certain temptations to do wrong and emphasizing the benefits of doing right;
- (6) It raises the standard of living for all;
- (7) And finally by solving all the problems that do not naturally attach to the necessity for productive effort, and by harmonizing the elements in society, it sets men free to engage in higher cultural pursuits, it binds them together in the bonds of Christian fellowships, and it brings man to evaluate his own experience and to honor the God who has surrounded him with the conditions essential to the perfection of his manhood, and puts him in a way to realize the happiness which all men so much seek because they so much desire.

We have just forwarded our report to the Bishop for Eastern Michigan District on the auditorium fund, and while our quota was $10,000 we have now pledged $16,452.13 which, with $335 that was previously pledged at the General Conference, makes a total of $16,787.13. We appreciate the way the Saints of this district have answered the call and can only say may God bless them for their willingness to help in such a worthy cause.—Otto Fetting, Bishop's Agent.

Elder Daniel Macgregor commenced a series of meetings at the church in Des Moines, Iowa, on Sunday, November 14. They have made due preparation, and are using daily handbills to announce the meetings, giving a short synopsis of the evening subject. The general theme appears to be the coming of Christ and the signs of the times.

Elder E. E. Long was in Saint Louis on the 14th, and spoke at the Saints' church. He was there to attend the meeting of the Association of American Indians. The association is very strongly opposed to the methods pursued by the Indian Bureau, and are seeking full citizenship and personal independence for the Indians—the right to take their place as citizens of the country, to vote, to own their own property, and administer their affairs as do other citizens.

The American Issue states that national prohibition received emphatic approval at the recent election. The dry vote was tremendously increased by the ballots of the women. The result is that both Congress and the Senate are safely dry; 220 members who voted dry, and many new candidates who stand to retain it being elected. Also the Ohio enforcement referendum was carried by a 100,000 majority, and the driest legislature, perhaps in its history, elected. Judge Miller who ran on a dry platform was elected in New York. (However, his plurality was very much smaller than that of Harding's.)

Sir John Fraser Foster, of England, is reported as stating that the physique of the English people is not to be compared to that of the general mass in America. Because of the universal practice of athletics, the large use of fruit, better food, and better cooking, the citizens of the United States have improved. The draft in the late war showed a considerable preventable deficiency in the physical power among the young men of the United States.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

Was Paul Right or Are We Moderns Wrong?

In 1 Timothy 2: 15 we find the Apostle Paul saying, "Notwithstanding, she shall be saved in childbearing, if they [meaning the parents,—EDITOR] continued in faith and charity and holiness with sobriety."

In the light of the fearful revelations made by the various surveys throughout the country, we are wondering if Paul was right, or whether the parents of to-day have so far wandered from the necessary "faith and charity and holiness with sobriety," that mothers go down into the "dark valley of the shadow" to bring forth life at such a terrible risk to their own and to that of the offspring for whom they suffer so much.

We constantly hear the urging for the people to get back on to the land and cease crowding into the unnatural condition of the cities. We hear that God intended that mankind should "till the earth," and that in a life of that kind truest happiness and contentment are to be found. This may be true, in the abstract and to the idealist, but where in the light of existing facts can a young couple find encouragement in settling in rural places when they can have no assurance that proper care and proper attendance will be available in the hour of a mother's trial?

Read the accompanying bulletins sent out from the Children's Bureau, and thoughtfully ponder upon the conditions revealed therein, and be prepared to do your full duty as citizens in urging your senators and representatives in Congress to vote for the Sheppard-Towner bill which should be brought before them at their next sitting. Representatives are supposedly anxious to please their constituents. Let their constituents make their desires concerning this bill very plainly known to those representatives, thus securing for mothers and children the appropriations which will place proper care and protection about maternity and the infant life of this Nation!

Do not put off writing your congressional representatives. Every woman and every man in this church has a duty in this regard, and none should hesitate to use what influence he possesses in a good cause. We are commanded to be zealously engaged in good works. Let us flood our Congress with letters bespeaking favorable action on this most important bill.

The Dark Valley

How the other half is born challenges attention. Inaccessibility of medical and nursing aid, according to studies of maternity care in 6 rural areas of 4 States made by the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor, is responsible for much suffering and even death.

In a northwestern county and in a southeastern county there were nearly twice as many persons per physician as the average for the United States; in a southern mountain county there were four times as many. A vast area in the far northwest, larger than the State of Connecticut, was served by three registered doctors. Moreover, most of the doctors in every rural county were located at the county seat, while the remoter parts of the county were entirely without medical service.

More than one third of the families in the far northwestern county studied were twenty miles or more from the nearest doctor, ten being from fifty to one hundred miles away. In a southern county more than one fourth of the families were ten miles or more from a doctor, and in another county twenty-five miles was not an uncommon distance.

Actual miles were not the sole obstacle to obtaining medical help at confinement. Rough roads, crossed by rivers; slippery mountain trails, almost impassable at best, become totally so under bad weather conditions. As a result doctors arrive from several minutes to twenty-four hours too late to deliver their patients. Many families, discouraged by repeated failures to get a doctor in time, are tempted to do without one altogether; to others the thought of a doctor does not occur unless the patient's condition becomes critical.

In a southern county only 68 out of 160 mothers had a doctor at their last confinement; in only 8 out of 66 confinement cases in a northern county was a physician secured; and in still another more than two thirds of the women did not have a physician when their babies were born. Three were entirely alone, and 46 had only their husbands in attendance.

Women would in many cases leave home for confinement if hospitals were within reach. But one 5,500 mile area had no hospital; neither had the southern mountain county. Reaching a hospital meant a journey of several days by wagon trail, or one by stage across the roughest of mountain roads.

In a large number of cases the mother has no nursing care except that given by an untrained hired girl, a relative, or a neighbor. Figures gathered from five rural counties are small in number but appalling in significance: 45 out of 89 babies; 22 out of 28; 12 out of 15; 10 out of 16; 10 out of 14 babies died before they were a month old.

These figures are further corroborated by the Bureau of the Census which gives the increase in infant mortality rates from premature birth and injuries at birth. The first has increased from 17.5 in 1910 to 21.1 in 1917, and the other from 3.2 in 1910 to 4.6 in 1917. These excessive rates are due to the condition of the mother and indicate plainly that motherhood is not receiving the protection it needs. As the census report itself says: these increases "should serve as food for thought."

Let Us Not Lag Behind in Good Works

That both England and France, as well as the United States, have learned through war experiences the value of motherhood can be seen in recent measures for the protection of maternity and infancy, according to the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor. In addition to maternity benefits which have been in use in England for some years that country passed in 1918 a maternity and child welfare act with provisions somewhat similar to those of the Sheppard-Towner bill now in Congress.

France, according to recent information, now has a bill in parliament which provides assistance to expectant mothers, married or unmarried, during the whole period of pregnancy. The bill also provides for free shelter if necessary, for at least thirty days. Pregnancy and nursing benefits are to be paid, one half the cost of these coming from the national treasury. Consultation centers and milk stations are to be established by local authorities.

Certain American cities have made a good beginning by appointing visiting nurses, establishing prenatal clinics, child health centers, and increased hospital facilities for maternity cases. In one large city a two-year experiment in prenatal work among 1,375 women brought highly satisfactory results. Of the babies born to these women the proportion dying before the end of the first month was nearly one-third less than in the city as a whole, and the number of stillbirths was greatly reduced. At the end of the first month 92 per cent of the babies were breast fed, a result of the utmost importance. Only two of the 1,375 women died.

Studies of maternal and infant mortality in city and country carried on by the Federal Children's Bureau have indicated clearly the need for the public protection of motherhood and babyhood on a basis which would make proper care available to every mother throughout the entire United States.

Wellsprings

I

Marriage

When hearts as counterparts in unison
Beat but for each, and they the day await.
When public vows their fate shall consummate—
When Life's new journey will have but begun,
When they Life's pathway tread henceforth as one,
They will have reached Life's second great estate—
Aye, three events of life we must call great:
Birth, marriage, death, when earthly life is done.
How great Life's second great estate shall be
Must rest on how we've spent the years before.
And if Love's compass guide us more and more,
That marriage venture fail not utterly.
Vex not Love's bonds! The double standard wrecks;
The moral law can ne'er allow for sex.

II

Motherhood

Long ere the crisis of a natal hour—
Long ere the advent of a new-born soul,
A worthy mother pays maternal toll;
She broods with wonder o'er maternal power;
Her privilege, her unborn babe to dower
With steadfast purpose toward Life's noblest goal;
She scorns spasmodic Virtue's spineless dole.
'Tis with God's aid she cultivates Life's fower.
Alas, when woman's deaf to high ideals,
When she no longer listens to their call
When naught but wealth alone to her appeals!
Ah, then on evil days is come our fall!
What wondrous power, what privilege, what joy
When women God's maternal laws employ!

III

Fatherhood

The sages of a thousand years have said
That children's children, like a bulletin,
Must bear the burden of a parent's sin—
A sin that clings when cycling years are sped,
And clings when generations long are fled.
Tho' surgeon's skill and skill of medicine
Would from the records its expungement win,
It clings like mortmain—clenched hand of the dead.
If thou wert never drunken with Life's lees,
If thou from sin hast held thyself apart,
And thus hast kept thyself from foul disease,
Fit for paternal authorship thou art.
Wouldst such an author be? Then like a saint Keep all thy years, young and mature, from taint.

—A. D. Smith, Brooklyn Daily Eagle.

As Granville S. Trowbrige, formerly Religio president, of Saint Louis, was going to our Sunday school recently with his wife, three children, a nephew, and two other young people, his auto was struck by another machine coming with great speed at right angles. The result was the death of one child, Milton Keungle, and the injury of everyone else in the machine except Brother Trowbridge and his wife. The injuries proved minor, except in the case of Miss Ruth Ortleb, who suffered internal injuries, and whose condition is still in doubt. The machine that struck him was going so fast that it could not be stopped within two hundred feet after the collision.

Politics and Parenthood

"More powerful than the vote is the rearing of children," said a learned rabbi in one of our great cities, as he addressed a woman's club on the social side of the education and development of women for citizenship.

"The social side of woman's political education is that most ancient and fundamental thing—the home. Home is the wife; home is the mother; home is the women; and 'the hand that rocks the cradle' is still 'the hand that rules the world.' It would be a pity indeed if we had to sacrifice the home for something more remote, although there is no reason why a woman cannot wield the ballot successfully and at the same time do duty as wife and mother.

"Women sought the vote that they might remedy, in a direct way, the evils they saw about them. It is but just that they should have this right. Along with that right, they still have the greater rights of the home. There should be taught all religion? There should the mother inculcate into the minds of her children the fear and love of God, and thus erect the very foundation of this Nation!"

In harmony with the latter thought is one expressed by a prominent general when he said, "No Nation, however great its success, can command the real confidence of the world unless it has character for its foundation, and that foundation is laid in the quality of its citizens." The same man, speaking of the advent of women into practical politics said: "I feel confident that the entrance of women into the field of American politics is going to have a helpful and good influence. I think they are going to bring a healthy influence, one which will make our politics cleaner and introduce a better spirit into the political field. I believe women are going to do another thing: They are going to make the men go to the polls, and if they do that they will have done a good piece of work. . . . We want all our people interested in their civic duties—both men and women. You cannot have a successful representative government unless all classes of people discharge their citizenship duties loyally and well.

"Women have been dreaming for years of bringing about certain results, of establishing better conditions of public and private morality. They will now have an opportunity to give expression to those dreams. . . . We need not worry about the fighting spirit of women. They pushed the war forward vigorously; they did everything they could to send their men to war filled with the spirit of service and sacrifice, and I am confident that American women are going to assume their political duties in the same spirit of helpfulness and determination for better things. . . . They will assist in teaching the children the broad moral principles without which their characters are unstable. We want to teach in our homes and schools at all times a spirit of truth, of fair play, the square deal, honesty, and loyalty—good citizenship! . . . We must have national solidarity built upon the Golden Rule. Frank talking on the part of leaders would be a good thing. Labor should give an honest day's work for a day's wage, and employers should see that workers receive an honest day's wage. You cannot legislate fairness into the hearts of men—you need strength of character to accomplish this. Ninety-five per cent of the people want to do what is right, and the greatest danger in this country is indifference to morals and right among the people who should be exemplars. We should teach in the home a greater respect for authority and urge all Americans to hold fast to the simple, homely things that have made this country what it is."

Everywhere we turn we see evidences of the dire need of proper home attitudes towards every problem which affects the well-being of the country and its inhabitants. Parents have lost sight of many of the fundamental essentials to good training. In the study of their citizenship and their maternal privileges, our women can bring to bear an immeasurable influence for good.

Hurry not only spoils work, but spoils life also.—Lubbock.

The Home Atmosphere

To-night I want to talk on something that is not, as yet, I must admit an accomplished fact in my own life, nor in my own home; but it is to me a vision of that which is greatly to be desired and striven for by all of us, for we are urged in this momentous time in the world's history to look to our homes, for there begins the mighty work that is to be done for the development of Zion and Zionite conditions in the next few years.

This year I was appointed superintendent of the local home department. We find that the word "home" covers an extensive field. We have studied from time to time about the temporal things relating to our homes and the temporal comfort of those therein; but I would speak to-night of something more enduring than the material things of everyday life such as "what is best for us to eat" and "where-withal shall we be suitably clothed." As mothers of growing children we have these questions to meet each day, yet the most important things of all, to my mind, are those which pertain to the spirit or "atmosphere" of the home.

It is the atmosphere that makes the home. Many times I have occasion to remind my own children that it is not the house which makes the home. The grandest house with every facility found therein for enjoyment may chill the hearts of all who enter, instead of warming them. In some of the richest homes in country, town, or city, the flame of love has long since died down, leaving only cold, dead ashes, in some of the humblest places of abode it still burns brightly and there is found the real and happy home.

Almost the whole world to-day is chasing shining, empty bubbles. Never before was there a generation to equal this one, (before the hour of trouble fell upon the world) for the pursuit of pleasure of all kinds, of wealth, of fame and power. Even now we read that in the nations where actual suffering has not prevailed since the war ended a mad era of extravagance and pleasure seeking has set in. We of the church must guard lest we, too, be led into bubble-chasing.

I sometimes think it takes the majority of people a lifetime to get ready to live, or, in other words, to find what is really worth while following up in life. Often it seems we must learn by pain, by sickness, by loss, by vain regret, and sometimes bitter remorse, which things are worth pursuing and which are empty bubbles.

According as we are, so will be the atmosphere of our homes, that atmosphere in which our children live and their souls thrive or are starved. Sweet as are the hours in our memory in after years in which we have gathered them around us and instructed them, and satisfying as the memory may be to us when we have warned, exhorted, and urged precepts of right living upon them, it is doubtful if in time to come these moments shall leave upon our children an impression half so deep and lasting as that made by the unconscious atmosphere of their childhood's home. The most influential power in their lives, the most convincing as to what is worth while and what is foolish will be that which they now see and hear and feel in our homes.

Affection is the first necessity in the atmosphere of a Christian home. A desire on the part of the parents to please each other, a consideration for each other's feelings influences the atmosphere of the entire family. If the father and mother do not practice consideration for each other, it is of little use to exhort their children to practice it towards each other or towards their parents. Well has it been said:

"We have careful thought for the stranger
And smiles for the sometime guest;
But oft for our own, the bitter tone,
Though we love our own the best."

This suggests another virtue without which the home atmosphere is sadly lacking. Self-control, or self-restraint, is a noble virtue, and very necessary on the part of the parents if they would have their children practice it. Children will never learn it by any other means than seeing and admiring it in those they love. A parent might keep a child in fear of him or of her, so that the child would conceal its real feelings but this would bear absolutely no relationship to the true self-control which our heavenly Father desires each of us to cultivate in our character, and which is such an aid to every human being, physically, mentally, and morally in the course of a lifetime. A parent wins from the child, if he be a normal one, just as much respect as that parent deserves. A subdued attitude may be enforced upon a child by making it afraid, but never true respect. That will be according to what they see we are!

I would include with self-control, serenity, another necessary adjunct to happy home life. It is something to be constantly striven for, even though at times we all make grievous failures in obtaining it. A pleasant, calm exterior, without undue fussing about trifles, is to the child life an influence as beneficial as is the sunshine and pure air to the growing plant. Confusion, irritability, and anger are as air choked with dust and impurities. Many of the little failings and lapses of memory of our children which irritate us exist only because they are children, and time will correct and cure.

It has been said that each child is as one traveling through a trackless forest. No human being who ever lived—not even the parent—ever trod that path before, nor ever will. He has an individuality all his own, his own destiny to work out. Let us tremble lest we confuse him with too many “don’ts” and let us be satisfied to ever hold up before him by precept and home example the wonderful and beautiful things to “do,”—the virtues we wish him to emulate.

Companionship of parents and children has long been quoted as one of the essentials to a happy home. To be companionable and keep our children’s confidence we must constantly put ourselves in our children’s places. I believe then we shall not only be able to enter into their joys and sorrows more completely, but we will be less severe with their mistakes as we more truly see their motives. Very, very few children intend to be bad; most of them, like ourselves, intend well, but are often forgetful. And some are greatly misunderstood and misjudged.

Oh, the pleasures of childhood when parents and children are companionable! What sacred memories in after years linger around the half day that father quit working to go fishing with us, or mother recklessly left the house to take care of itself and packed a lunch, and went with us to the woods to gather flowers, or beechnuts, or to bring home ferns for the home garden! How memory gilds each hour with glory as we look backward, especially if we were allowed to be “partners” in the home gardening, the fruit canning, the caring for little chickens or other small animals, the haying or the fruit picking in the fall! And forever present as the golden background to all those interesting joys, the protecting, companionable, understanding love of mother and father!

Now I would mention another essential to a happy home environment, and that is the important one of contentment. I have known mothers who in the presence of their children apologized to visitors for their poor home, their old house, their shabby furniture, or called the visitors’ attention to defects which would otherwise never have been seen. This is a great mistake. In the eyes of a child its home is the most beautiful place in the world, unless its attention is called to the fact of ugliness or poverty. Of themselves, very few children think of comparing their homes or furniture with those of richer people to the disadvantage of their own, unless they have heard mother doing so. If the poorest and most humble dwelling fall to our lot, let us beautify it to the best of our ability, and then never let our children hear us speak of it with anything but affection and pride as “our home.” Indoors and outdoors we may have the beauty of flowering plants and trees. Let us have simplicity, and things about us for use or beauty, but never kept simply for display. Let us use all our houses—for our children, too. I am glad the times have changed in this regard, for once the pleasantest room in the house was kept dark and closed only when guests came. What guests can be as important to us as are our own children, whom we have with us but a few short years at best?

As Latter Day Saint parents, let us never allow in the atmosphere of our homes the blighting spirit of criticism, either of each other or those in authority in school, church, or community. I have heard in homes of members of secular churches, father, mother, and children sit down to Sunday meals, and a caustic criticism begin to take place between the parents, or mayhap a monologue indulged in by one parent, discouraging, faultfinding, or holding up to ridicule, the superintendent of the Sunday school, or the child’s teacher, or maybe the pastor, or some well-intentioned member, some good brother or sister who perchance in that very service had said something in prayer or testimony which had been helpful to some one, and influenced perhaps the very children of the faultfinder for good. Yes, I have been in Latter Day Saint homes which were not entirely free from this blasting influence of criticism. If we are guilty of this, oh, mothers, let us never wonder in years to come why our children do not respect the authority of those placed over them, not wonder why they drift away from the sacred influence of church and Sunday school. We are but reaping that which we so thoughtlessly sowed! Let us try to keep in mind at all times our very great influence upon the young minds about us. Let us try to purify and exalt the spiritual atmosphere of our homes, that peace and love may abound and abide therein.

“A partnership with God is ‘parenthood.’

What strength, what purity, what self-control,
What love, what wisdom should their portion be
Who help God fashion an immortal soul!”

MRS. E. M. DAVIS.

(Written for an open meeting of the Women’s Department, Stratford, Ontario, June 5, 1920.)

The Sunday school and Religio at Lamoni are flourishing, with good attendance and fine interest in the many classes. The specially organized classes to study modern church problems are very popular. The series of motion pictures begun in the summer, are shown weekly at the college and repeated on Saturday afternoon for the children and any others.

Along with the Boy Scout and Boy Movement, and the other activities for boys, it is interesting to learn that the magazine, The American Boy, is going to start in the Christmas Number, a series of stories of the great adventures of a missionary. This is in answer to the question, How can we heroize for boys the life of Christian service? These stories are founded upon actual experiences and they appear to be entirely true—that these things actually happened in the everyday life of the author.

Despite the movement of population away from the country, the country districts are by no means as yet in the decline. As an illustration, it is pointed out that between 1900 and 1910 the male farm population of Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri fell 3 per cent, from 1,261,401 to 1,225,368, yet the production of corn, wheat, and oats in a five-year period, rose from 4,889,000,000 to 5,941,000,000, a gain of 21 per cent.

We note The Presbyterian states that the plan for organic church union means not an approval simply for organic union as a general principle, but that instead it means adoption of a specific plan involving doctrine, administration, and property rights, and binds the church in all these particulars.

An English critic has written a book entitled The First World War. It concerns the recent war just closed. The inference is clear that it is but the first of a series, and it is quite certain that so long as we continue to talk of America first, and British people to continue to talk of Britain first, the French people of France first, just as the Prussians sang “Deutschland uber alles,” the result will be a militarism that prepares for and will bring war.

LETTERS

For What Are We Waiting?

This has been called a materialistic age, for wherever one goes the tendency seems to be to trust in science, invention, and education as the means by which the world might be made better and saved. Often have I heard it said since being on this mission, and by professors of religion, that to preach the personal coming of Christ is to obstruct the grand march of civilization to success and a lasting peace and good will among men. If the road we as Saints have been traveling for nearly a century is the road to happiness and being with Christ then the laity of the church must combine their effort with that of the ministry, thus minimizing to a great extent, the prejudice of the peoples with whom missionaries have to meet. This can be done by living the gospel, or the teachings of it, rather than by waiting for the missionary to come into our respective districts. For what are we waiting?

We as a church have seen that by waiting, others have and are doing those things which we should have done. When the call came to build an "auditorium," it looked stupendous to say the least, and some criticized, but the wisdom of it will be made manifest at our General Conference.

With many wars now going on, and even the issues of the great war yet in a very unsettled condition, carrying with it the very grave danger of another world crisis, general unrest among all the nations, we fail to see much progress being made to save the world. Education of the head alone cannot do it. Germany tried it and failed. We can testify to this when we see the mighty struggle going on between the classes. The acceptance of the teaching of the Bible in its entirety, and working out in our everyday lives those same principles, can only prepare the way for the coming of the Prince of life, who will return as King of kings. We still meet a few people who dare to say the world is growing better. This cannot be true, "for all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever." (1 John 2:16, 17.) The world then, as such, cannot grow better, and no remedy of man's can make it better. Then rather than wait for others to step in, let us have the initiative to step in and tell of God's way to put right these trying conditions. After the passing of the glorious days of apostolic power, when the church of Jesus laid off her beautiful mantle, and began clothing herself in kingly robes, men began to say that the kingdom of God could and would be established on earth by the church gaining ascendancy over civil power. They reasoned that if the church had power, she could make the world better, put down sin, and establish righteousness by force. As we know, this experiment was a very costly one, for the inhabitants of that regime. Enforced religion is impossible.

It is argued that humanity has never had a good chance to work out its own destiny. Let us see. The Israelitish people were guided, instructed, yes, prepared to perform a great mission in the world. Jesus came to his own, but they received him not. In the end they utterly failed the purpose of their existence as a nation. Priest and prophet lived with and among them age after age. Still with all their privileges, what a failure they were in the end.

As Israel of latter days, well may the question be asked, "For what are we waiting?"

There is a general feeling, or impression, that we are face to face with some great event. Millions believe that Jesus is about to return in some form or other. Some are looking for the soon return of their prophet, or some of their gods. This very expectancy is evidence of Christ's soon coming. It was thus in the world before he came the first time, as is noted by accepted historians. The world perplexity to-day meets fully the Savior's own prophecy in Luke 21:25-27. The struggle between capital and labor also strikingly fulfills the prophecy of James 5:1-10. The gospel is here with healing in its wings; the world is crying for it, but does not know which to accept out of the many gospels now in vogue. This then is our great opportunity. With millions of people hungry for something real, do not let us be afraid to give of our surplus in everything we have.

A lady came to me a few weeks ago and said, with tears rolling down her cheeks, she would be glad to have me preach in her home, if I did not mind a few colored people attending. These people are very poor, yet splendid people, and possibly may never be able to help along financially the gospel work. Brother McGuire says these people need the gospel as richer people do. Do the Saints agree with the Bishopric on this point? If so, then we must, who are blessed with this world's goods, help send missionaries to these people. May God help us to see the necessity of consecrating our lives to his service. This can only be accomplished by placing ourselves entirely in God's hands. Whether ministry or laity, clerk or laborer, chief or errand boy, we must become one with God. Well may the question be asked then, "For what are we waiting?"

Australia Prospering

During the last week of September, the Victorian Saints had quite an interesting, active, and educational season. Our district conference convened on the 25th, and continued over the 26th, and this was followed by a five days' mission, four in the church, and one on the street by Brethren Rushton and Hanson. These services were followed on the first Sunday in October by the interesting ceremony of the dedication of the Richmond church, so recently freed from debt.

The conference was a peaceful and profitable time, being attended by many from other districts. Brethren Rushton and Hanson, also Brother Butterworth of the Twelve, Brother W. J. Haworth of the seventy, and several elders from other states were present, and these supplemented by a fairly large local staff, made a very strong and imposing official force. The apostles associated with the district presidency presided over the conference.

During the conference the apostles organized quorums of elders, priests, and teachers, embracing the southern and western half of Australia, including Victoria, South Australia, and Western Australia.

The principal speakers were W. J. Haworth, Saturday night; C. A. Butterworth, Sunday morning; J. W. Rushton, Sunday night. At the last service the church was filled and packed to the very utmost of its capacity.

During the week following, Brethren Paul M. Hanson and J. W. Rushton spoke alternately to good and appreciative audiences. Their subjects were as follows: "Is the latter-day work divine or a delusion?" (J. W. R.) "Modern revelation: its necessity and feasibility," (P. M. H.) "Latter Day Saints and the social question," (J. W. R.) "The Zionite solution of world problems." (P. M. H.) On Friday night both spoke in open air at a meeting under the auspices of protestant churches. Then on Sunday followed the dedication services, which consisted of sacrament meeting in the afternoon, and preaching at night. There were many Saints present from all parts of the district, particularly from Footsray (who discontinued their services,) and Geelong.

At both services the church was well filled, but particularly in the evening, when Brethren Hanson and Rushton divided time, giving us very fine speeches. The branch and district president, J. H. N. Jones, then offered the dedicatory prayer, and in a few appropriate words handed the deeds and keys to Bishop A. W. Cray, who in turn handed the keys to Deacon W. Thorpe, with a few well-chosen remarks. Thus the general church acquires in fee simple a very nice little church and property which we trust is only one of many yet to be secured in this far-off mission.

The mission has greatly benefited from the visit of Brethren

Rushton and Hanson, and I am sure all Australian Saints wish them a safe return to their loved ones and many days of happy service to the church and humanity in the coming years.

Many things which distracted and divided us have been placed in the way of adjustment, and we sincerely trust that this and all parts of the church may survive the troublous times induced by world war and aftermath conditions.

According to present indications, Australia is facing one of the most prosperous and prolific seasons in history, yet notwithstanding, prospects of dear food loom before us.

The Saints of Australia will share in the general prosperity and the church should receive a great financial uplift and the Bishop get his Australian quota of the million dollars tithing. We trust also that our share in the Presidency's slogan, of 20,000 converts will be forthcoming. To accomplish this we hope to work and we shall ever pray for the triumph of the cause we love.

RICHMOND, VICTORIA.

Faithfully yours,
J. H. N. JONES.

Three Feet of Sunshine

"In one of the laboratories in Washington they have a great sun-glass that measures three feet across. It's like the 'burning glasses' we used to treasure when we were boys, only much larger.

"This great glass gathers the rays of the sun that strike its flat surface and focuses them on a single point in space a few feet below. That single spot is hotter than a blowtorch. It will melt through a steel plate as easily as a red-hot needle burns through paper.

"This terrific heat—it can't be measured for it melts all instruments—is just three feet of ordinary sunshine concentrated on a single point. Scattered, these rays are hardly felt, perhaps just pleasantly warm—concentrated, they melt adamant."

Reading the above brought to my mind how very applicable it is to the effort which we, as a church, are making to raise money for our new auditorium—that auditorium is the "single point" in question, while we, the scattered Saints—are the "three feet of sunshine."

This same principle applies to human endeavor. "In unity there is strength." Scattered we can do nothing, but united with our efforts focused on the work before us the seemingly tremendous task will melt like snow on a summer day, and our sacrifice will prove a success. By concentrating our efforts, and with "a long pull and a pull all together," we will more than "go over the top" in this grand and glorious work and when it is completed what a joy and satisfaction it will be to each one to feel that he did his little part. "Three feet of ordinary sunshine will burn through anything"—just so 90,000 Saints united with the one great object in view, an auditorium that will give pleasure to thousands of people, will see their efforts more than crowned with success.

Work Prosperous in Boston

The First Presidency: We are having glorious experiences in Boston. Surely we are enjoying a foretaste of the endowment. God is working wonderfully with his people and all are rejoicing in the gospel.

When I first came to Boston, two years ago, all prayer services were held in the basement, but those days are past. The basement is too small for our services now. All meetings are held in the upper auditorium. If you could drop in to one of our weekly prayer services you would think we were going to have preaching. The room is nearly filled at the prayer meetings.

Last Sunday sacrament service was the largest attendance ever known in the Boston Branch—the meeting continued for over two hours and was a spiritual feast.

Last Saturday I was called down to the Cape to preach the funeral sermon of Brother Albert Hoxie's mother. The large room, facing the water, was beautifully decorated with autumn leaves and flowers. We were impressed with the thought, as we looked upon the family, of the love they had for "mother." Sister Hoxie loved her home and children and the beautiful things God had created. Music and song were two of her favorites. We were wonderfully impressed with the service. At the close, a lady from Boston sang, "When we come to the end of a perfect day."

Sister Hoxie was laid away beside her husband in a beautiful cemetery of pines facing the ocean.

Sincerely yours,

RICHARD BALDWIN.

Successful Services at Montrose

Last Wednesday evening Elder P. R. Burton closed his 10 days' meeting at the chapel here in Montrose, Iowa. The town was billed by the local Saints for this series of meetings. Two of the other churches in town started revivals about as soon as they knew that he was going to start. This did not detract from the meetings however, but rather added a little competition in which Burton seemed easily to be the winner.

Brother Burton is specially loved by the Saints here, as well as the town people, on account of his very democratic spirit. He was blessed by a very marked degree of the Spirit in his discourses, which even the outsiders were able to perceive. The little chapel was nearly full every night, in spite of the fact that it rained nearly the entire week. The main thing which encouraged us was to see that two were baptized during the meetings, and that there were large numbers who came every night, sitting in the same seat to listen to what he had to say, and often to take notes. Such people are there only because they are interested. Brother Burton is a thorough student of the Bible, and is gifted with the ability to tell the gospel story in its fullness in a remarkably clear manner, and in such a plain, common way that everybody can understand.

The fact that he had the largest attendance the last night that he was here, and the many earnest requests that he return to us again upon the completion of his trip to the West, by large numbers of outsiders, show the amount of interest he has stirred up.

We are specially anxious to do all that we can for the work in Montrose, to boost the Nauvoo District. We are glad to see our sister city of Nauvoo across the river again being blessed of God, through the ingathering of the Saints at that place. We all look forward to the reunion to be held there next year, as the largest one in the church.

Dollar Day at Windsor

In accordance with the request of A. W. Smith, in charge of the Christmas offering work, our Sunday school observed a Dollar Day on the 14th, which resulted successfully, our seventy-five members giving seventy-five dollars to our Christmas offering fund.

The local orchestra had charge of the program, which was much appreciated by all. The program was extensive and varied, including congregational singing, talks, orchestral music, vocal quartet, whistling selections, vocal duet, violin duet, recitation, etc.

Elder Leslie Brown, pastor, told of the success of the auditorium drive, nearly $4,000 being pledged. The morning preaching hour had been given over to the Sunday school.

The personnel of the orchestra is: Miss Jessie Gilbert, pianist; Nellie Andrew, Audrey Moe, Harold Connor, Will Andrew, violins; Mildred Bandy, song bells; Richard Rae, trumpet; Meaford Gilbert, trombone; Art J. Cartier, drums and traps, musical director.

For a greater Christmas offering,

ART J. CARTIER.

During the summer months, motion pictures have been shown on the lawn near the Stone Church in Independence each Saturday evening, and in addition the Religio has used this feature for the program part of their work.

GENERAL CONFERENCE AUDITORIUM PLEDGES

As soon as the work of securing these pledges in your branch is completed please forward the cards to your local bishop or Bishop's agent, who may make such record of them for his own use as he desires and forward the cards to this office. These will be filed here according to district and then alphabetically.

Where to Pay

Pay your pledge to the local solicitor in your branch or to the local bishop or Bishop's agent in your district or stake. Make the checks payable to them.

If it is more convenient to send it direct to this office, you may do so, but be sure and give us the name of the district where your pledge was credited; otherwise, it will be difficult for us to locate your card.

When to Pay

The sooner the better. We will not begin construction of this building until we have sufficient money in our hands to insure its completion. We therefore urge that no delay be made in the payment of your pledge.

A great additional expense will be thrust upon us if we are put to the necessity of writing to you urging the payment of your pledge. We, therefore, ask that as soon as each payment on your pledge becomes due that you take care of it promptly. The sooner you pay the quicker will our hopes be realized.

Sincerely,

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE,
Presiding Bishop,

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, BOX 256.

Religious Education Correspondence Courses

Some little confusion has arisen in regard to the correspondence courses being offered by Graceland College, having to do specifically with religious subjects. It is hoped that this notice will make the matter clear.

By action of the conference of 1919, the Religious Normal Training Department which had formerly been under the direction of the Sunday school and Religio, was turned over to Graceland College. This course was completely reorganized and has been offered for some time. Its specific object is the training of teachers. This should be specifically noted, so that if your object is to prepare yourself to teach, the above course is particularly suited to your needs.

A little over a year ago, a department was organized in Graceland known as the Department of Religious Education. The course was designed to assist those preparing for missionary service in the church to a better understanding of the church doctrines, with a view to devising the best methods of presenting our gospel to the world.

Within the past few weeks, announcement has been made to the effect that a part of this course in church doctrine is now ready for those desiring to take up the work by correspondence. The course as it is now offered at Graceland includes study of the three standard books of the church. The course is apologetic in nature, dealing with the best methods of presenting our work to the world, considering the problem from the standpoint of the missionary. So far, lessons on the Book of Mormon are ready.

Please note, then, that if you desire to prepare yourself as a teacher, you should write for information to the Religious Normal Training Department.

If you desire to better prepare yourself for missionary or ministerial work, you should write to the Religious Education Correspondence Department.

Address all correspondence to one of the above departments, care of Graceland College, Lamoni, Iowa.

Council Bluffs Items

Home-coming Day, November 14, was observed in a very effectual way. The program was fully carried out, and more. Brother J. F. Garver gave some meaty statements, some of which were quite effectual.

Several Saints from Omaha were present at social service. A few baptisms in the afternoon, some of them from Omaha.

One brother who was baptized about three weeks ago testified that after being a slave to the tobacco habit for fifty-two years, was so far relieved from it that he forgot all about it for nearly four days, and he has no desire for the use of tobacco in any form. This came as an answer to prayer for a witness of the divinity of the work he had accepted.

The testimony of the Spirit came in an instructive and reproving manner; reproving the Saints because they would not properly pay heed to those over them in the Lord; instructing them that the set time to favor Zion had come, and that the Lord had reserved a residue of both people and means to redeem Zion; also that all should set their homes in order.

The Women's Department continue their activity. The choir consists of both the senior and junior departments. The latter show considerable improvement. Orchestra is taking on new life. For Thanksgiving the church has been decorated with pumpkins, squashes, cornstalks, and leaves.

Wonderful healing in case of Mrs. Clara Peter, daughter of Sister A. J. Davidson, last week.

League of Nations in Session

The assembly of the League of Nations has been in session since November 15. The anxiety beforehand of the absence of the United States, has been passed, and there exists confidence that the United States will join later, while those present feel that the success of the league is now assured. There are present representative members of forty-two countries. Nine other countries are represented by observers, and representatives to plead for their admission, and three other nations on the outside are waiting to get in. The league assembly therefore finds itself the center of interest to fifty-four nations, excluding America.

The assembly has declined for the present to take up the issues between Peru and Chile, and Bolivia, because of the status of the United States and Monroe Doctrine. However, European powers have been chosen heretofore to adjudicate difficulties in South America. The Monroe Doctrine only covers the attempt to take territory. Out of courtesy, however, this matter has been deferred for the present.

The program is to move out earnestly and profitably with the work before the league—provide for a court, following as near as possible that recently adopted by The Hague Commission; to admit at least one of the central powers. Amendments will be made to the covenant to adjust difficulties. The attitude towards the United States is a friendly one, though not subservient.

CENTENNIAL YEARBOOK

60 Cents

Through a combination of misunderstandings the price of the new Yearbook put out by the Women's Department has been listed at various prices. Sixty cents is the correct price. Send orders to Women's Department, Box 255, Independence, Missouri.

HUGHEY.—Anibel Hughey was born in Harrison County, Indiana, in 1873. Died September 12, 1920. Married Harrison A. Carr in 1889. To this union two children were born. Husband and daughter were called home in 1898 and 1901 respectively. Married John Hughey, jr., in 1913, who preceded her in death about two years. Survived by her son, Davis H. Carr; father, J. W. Davis, 3 sisters, and a brother. Was a devout member of the church. Services in charge of Leonard Glenn. Interment near Derby, Indiana.

MORRIS.—Katie M. Dick was born near Delane, Minnesota, November 19, 1859. Married Thomas Morris October 15, 1882. To this union were born 3 sons and 3 daughters, all of whom survive, except the youngest. She and her husband baptized at the same time, somewhere in Minnesota. Was a noble Saint, faithful wife, and kind mother. Died September 19, 1920, at Minneapolis, Minnesota, after three years of illness and much suffering, and was taken to her old home in Iowa for burial. Services held at the residence in Minneapolis, in charge of Henry Sparling.

HAWKINS.—In sad and loving memory of our baby, Audrey Elizabeth Hawkins, who died November 11, 1919, aged 4 months and 11 days. Fare thee well, our darling Audrey; little angel, fare thee well; for thou wert too pure and lovely, in a world like this to dwell.

CLUM.—Reuben G. Clum was born March 22, 1835, at Delhi, New York. Died October 2, 1920, at Pomona, Kansas. Married Julia A. Robinson in Van Buren County, Michigan, in 1859. To this union 5 children were born. One daughter died in her fourth year, the others survive, and are: Mrs. Fred G. Bailey and Mrs. W. A. Hopkins, of Lamoni, Mendal W., of Independence, Missouri, and William H., of Pomona, Kansas. With these children left to mourn are their families, 16 grandchildren and 5 great-grandchildren. Funeral remarks by C. Scott, prayer by J. W. Wight, at Lamoni, Iowa.

WALTERS.—George W. Walters departed this life at the age of 67 years, 9 months, and 28 days without any special notice of his departure although he had been ailing for several months with heart trouble. He attended his sister's funeral services on Thursday and fell dead on Sunday. He had been a member of the church about 42 years. Funeral service from home in Tekamah, Nebraska, conducted by J. F. Mintun, October 26, 1920.

WALTERS.—Maria Walters, at Decatur, Nebraska, died October 20, 1920, at the age of about 83 years after a brief affliction of a cancerous nature. She was baptized by James Caffall over 40 years ago, and remained true to her trust in God. Funeral service conducted by J. F. Mintun at Saints' church.

Into Mexico With General Scott

By Edwin L. Sabin. Illustrated in color and black and white. Portrait and map. (The American Trail Blazers Series.) J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, $1.75 net.

Seldom has history been so accurately and vividly presented as in this thrilling narrative of the Mexican War in which young Jerry Cameron marched and fought beside Second Lieutenant U. S. Grant, all the way from Vera Cruz to the City of Mexico, where 6,000 American soldiers planted the Stars and Stripes in the midst of 150,000 amazed people.

Jerry, stranded in Vera Cruz in March, 1847, views the successful capture of that port by the American fleet, and joins the American army. Befriended by the then Second Lieutenant U. S. Grant, Jerry becomes a drummer boy in his regiment. He has his fill of hard marching and the stiffest kind of fighting, hairbreadth escapes and the fun and horse-play of the camps. He participates in the capture of the Heights of Cerro Gordo, the storming of the Citadel of Churubusco, the bloody battle of Molino del Rey, the storming of Chapultepec, and the triumphant entry into the City of Mexico.

Mr. Sabin has drawn a true picture of the Mexican campaign. In the foreword he gives the causes of the war and outlines the various campaigns. This is a historical romance that every American man and boy will read with deep pleasure and profit.

Cloudy Jewel

By Grace Livingston Hill (Mrs. Lutz). Frontispiece in color. Price $1.90. J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

As the family drudge, Julia Cloud's life had been one of hard work and sacrifice. Now, at her mother's death, she feels that there will be a change—will it be for better or worse? Julia has a habit of looking away from the shabby home into each evening's glowing sunset with a happy trust that a share of rose color will illumine her gray life before she is too old to enjoy it. Years of serving and watching other people's happiness have not embittered the spirit of spring which keeps her heart youthful in spite of her graying hair.

Her sister Ellen is disappointed and much upset in her plans when Julia quietly refuses her self-termed "generous" offer to "take care of her." For years Ellen had counted on this time, as Julia's labor would save a servant's wages, and give the selfish sister more time to enjoy her husband and children and car. Julia realizes it would be slavery for her with neither love nor money as reward, but the scene leaves her hurt at Ellen's sharp words and doubtful as to what she should do.

Then comes the unexpected visit from the children of her dead brother, opening up a rosy vista for the future. They love her from memory of a childhood visit. Though orphans, they are well provided for and their guardian has brought them East to get settled into college and they beg Julia to go along to mother them. It is good to see her faithfulness rewarded at last. Gladly would she serve these dear children, Allison and Leslie Cloud, for the rich reward of their love, but they shower her with gifts too, and the guardian plans to pay her generously to look after them.

A college is selected, a cottage rented, and through following beautiful days, furnishings are selected and the young people enter school in a riotous beginning, studies, and sports, but Julia has many hours of doubt and distress. Her nephew and niece are worldly and thoughtless with no regard for the things of religion which to her are so precious. She cannot approve of some of Leslie's friends and the gay round of parties and dances with their Sabbath desecration. It taxes her diplomacy to show them these things in their true light, but wisely and prayerfully she leads them to higher aspirations. When Jane Bristol and Howard Letchworth come into their lives, Allison and Leslie need no urging to cultivate these worth-while friends and are led to activities in the young people's work of the village church with many interesting developments.

It is a sort of endless chain—this inspiring story of how Julia's pure life permeates like a sweet incense their home life and works a lasting impression on their youthful souls, while they, in turn, become influences for good in the college and town. The story, too, has plenty of excitement, and unexpected twists, with a pretty romance to complete the climax.

Highacres

By Jane D. Abbott. Illustrated in color and halftone by Harriet Roosevelt Richards. Published by J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; $1.75 net.

The popular author of Happy House, Keineth, and Larkspur, has written another splendid story which will further delight her growing host of youthful readers. Highacres is a school story, full of the enthusiasm and joyous spirit of youth. Its pages detail how Jerry Travis, a fourteen-year-old girl, is transplanted through the generous impulse of John Westley. He is a man who loves and understands girls.

Jerry goes from her one-room village school to a big city institution. During the year many pleasant and exciting events occur apart from Caesar and geometry. There is another attractive girl, Gyp Westley, Jerry's own age, who becomes her beloved chum.

Jerry finds happiness but also discovers some unpleasantness in the Westley home where she lives. With Gyp, she has unusual times and adventures, especially through the discovery of a secret stairway in the school which leads to a locked room. This becomes the meeting place of their secret society. Here, also, a wonderful letter is found which affects Jerry's whole future.

A thread of romance, a mystery in Jerry's life concerning her mother, and that mother's struggle to keep her child "in the garden she has made for her," hold the interest of the reader and pleasantly color the story until the very happy ending. The pleased reader will find herself moving in an atmosphere of inspiration and delightful expectancy which the author fully satisfies in the beautiful climax.

Gulliver's Travels

A voyage to Lilliput. By Doctor Jonathan Swift. Illustrated in color, with colored jacket. J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia, price 75 cents.

The child mind requires imaginative stories, and this new edition of an old book is of the cleanly, wholesome type that has been welcomed into juvenile libraries lo, these many years. Most adults know the story:

In the island of Lilliput, upon which Gulliver was cast by shipwreck, dwelt a people so small that the most of them did not exceed six inches in height, indeed were beneath this stature. "Fifteen hundred of the emperor's largest horses, each about four inches and a half high, were employed to draw me towards the metropolis," wrote Captain Gulliver. In this land, "like a garden," in which the fields resembled so many beds of flowers, Gulliver had many strange adventures, not the least of which was his prowess in carrying off about fifty men-of-war of the enemy nation of Blefusco, and thus saving Lilliput from great danger. It cannot be thought that any child's education is complete until he has mastered this most diverting history.

Blue Pencil Notes

The chronic speculator is out of place in the pulpit. Preaching calls for a very definite statement of very definite truths and certain positive convictions. At least it must have that groundwork and foundation.

Some men argue that they at least stir up thought by rambling through the unknown. A preacher could promote thought by standing on his head in the aisle. He could promote thought by preaching that Jesus was an impostor.

It is desirable to promote thought. But it is the preacher's duty to encourage thought along right lines and toward correct conclusions. Otherwise he has no partnership with the Holy Ghost, for it is to guide into all truth.

The man who always states both sides of every proposition, undermines Biblical truths, and leads his hearers over many dim trails in the unknown, may at any time subject himself to a very severe accusation.

A good brother went to a certain elder after the close of his sermon and said, "I tried to follow you in your discourse. You led me out into the wilderness, then took my compass and my guidebook away and left me without food or water to find my way home as best I could. I will never follow you anywhere again as long as I live."

A good shepherd does not lead his sheep off into a bramble patch and leave them there just to develop their sense of location.

The Lord has committed to us certain very definite fundamental truths to preach to the world. They are summed up under the gospel of repentance. They find flower and fruition in the Zionie program.

Never before was there so great a need for the old plain gospel of repentance from dead works, of personal spiritual regeneration, of faith in God and in his Son and in the gospel. The world wallows in filth and needs to be told to arise and repent and get clean before the judgments of God are poured out.

When we have covered the mission field of the world with the proclamation of our fundamental truths we may perhaps take a day off to speculate before we enter upon our thousand years of millennial schooling. Our experience convinces us that one day of unguided speculation will raise enough questions to keep us studying the rest of the millennium.

We do not mean that our men should not be of an inquiring mind. They should constantly reflect and study, always with a view to discover the relationship of all truths observed by them to the principles that constitute their message. This is work for their study—wherever they study.

But the work of the study room and the pulpit are different. The pulpit is for the declaration of truth—not for the presentation of the guesses and errors and half truths, the tangled paths of cogitation, out of which the mind came to the truth.

E. A. S.

Thrift

Elder R. J. Lambert, editor of Zion's Ensign, has been writing some excellent editorials on the subject of "Thrift." We reprinted one of them in last week's number.

We had prepared some editorials on thrift for use in the HERALD, but noting these excellent ones by Brother Lambert, have deferred. But it is a subject deserving our most earnest consideration. Doctrine and Covenants 130:7 undoubtedly still applies, even though the public debt of the church has been paid. It is not a question of denying necessities, nor is it a question of undue limitation. It is a command to avoid undue waste, extravagance, and a profitless luxury.

On the question of thrift we have first to consider waste. This includes food from the table. It takes skill to see that there is no waste in this department. The French woman has progressed far beyond what we have done in America in utilizing each scrap. Some have said that a French woman could keep her family on what an American family throws away. This is probably exaggerated. It certainly was exaggerated for conditions during the war period. Still there is much undue waste in that department. It is so much easier to throw out grease, even though it clogs up the waste pipe, and throw away bits of food, rather than to utilize every particle. There is also waste in the consumption of excessive quantities.

Next comes the question of clothing. It is not simply a matter of being well dressed, for one can be well dressed and still exercise due care to see that all of the clothing is utilized. Difficulty very often arises because good cloth outwears the style, and it is thought too much trouble to make over. We have seen some truly remarkable results achieved in making over an old suit of clothing and cleaning it up, at a very small expense, so that everyone was complimenting the husband on being able to buy so good a new suit, and congratulating him on being flush. It was not that he had a full pocketbook, however, but that he had a good wife.

Then comes the care of the clothing and of household utensils. It is true that a man's life consists not in the multitude of things he possesses. It is true we do not want to be subject to things. But so long as we surround ourselves with things, with carpets, with furniture, with dishes, with clothing, and with systems to keep the house warm, it is only common sense, and is only what we should expect of a child of God to take care of that which we have, so as to secure from it at least reasonable usefulness. We have been astonished many times at the extreme carelessness and waste shown by some families of presumably good Latter Day Saints.

Then we come to the denial of unnecessary wants, carrying into active exercise the principle of sacrifice and repression of unnecessary wants. That opens quite a field for thoughtful consideration. Brother Lambert has suggested that most of us will save more than our contribution to the church auditorium by putting this principle into practice. There are some mighty good people who go practically without for long periods, but spend freely whenever they have a little money, often buying special foods out of the season, though financially short. The buying of goods when at the highest price—without foresight—is quite an element in waste. We have sometimes wondered if some are capable of that due care which will lead to a proper saving. We know of some people considered rich who live better and on less than their poorer neighbors. This is because they know how to buy and exercise reasonable foresight.

We are urged as one method to establish a family budget. But when it is established we should not necessarily live up to it, but rather take pride in working as far inside of the budget as possible. It is probable that the American people are the most wasteful anywhere, among civilized people. This is reflected in the National Government. We talk of budgets, but the National Government has not yet a budget. We talk of a budget, yet the general church has not as yet a real budget. We talk of family budgets, yet only comparatively few have attempted, and many do not even know how to prepare a budget.

In an effort to secure thrift, there has been instituted a national thrift week, to be held annually in January. This winter it will be observed January 17 to 23, 1921. The program of economic education is to help the people to think straight about money matters. For each day a special phase of thrift is emphasized.

Thus Monday, January 17, is Benjamin Franklin's birthday, and is "national thrift day or bank day." Tuesday, the 18th, is "budget day." Wednesday, the 19th, "national life insurance day." Thursday, the 20th, "Own your own home day." Friday, the 21st, "Make a will day." Saturday, the 22d, "Pay your bills promptly day." Sunday, the 23d, "Share with others day."

Brother Lambert points out that a greater effort is to be made to teach thrift in the schools—how to save is a very necessary part of our education.

As a church, our duty is plain. In the past, missionary families have worked on such a basis that thrift has been impossible. The only possible method left for the family has been to do without. This has naturally and necessarily produced a reaction of enjoying a little luxury when they have the means. Having nothing worth preserving, it tended towards extreme carelessness in the care of anything they may have. We do not feel that they are to blame for this. It rather is the result of methods pursued. But we do not want to be held to the past.

If Zion is to be redeemed, it must be because we learn both how to produce wealth, and how to use it, and how to preserve and save it, and deny ourselves unnecessary physical wants and desires, to the end that we may more fully function in the spiritual realm, and so receive the greater joy of the happiness which perishes not.

Sister Martha Fifield, R. F. D. 3, Alto, Michigan, says she has a number of back copies of Ensign, HERALD, Quarterly, both Sunday school and Religio, which she is willing to give anyone who wants them.

A letter from Sister Henrietta M. Booker, of Barth, Florida, asks that the Saints pray for her mother, who is blind, not only that she receive her sight, but that her heart may be lightened.

William James on Insanity

A year or so ago, the question was raised as to the treatment of the insane. It was agreed at that time that their proper medical and psychic care was the thing to be achieved in most cases. This does not contradict the cases of demoniacal possession. The question was raised, When shall we attempt by the power of God, to cast out the Devil? The answer is very clear and simple, When the Spirit of God so directs. We are directed to pray over those who are sick, anointing them with oil. This would include neuroses and psychoses, as well as other forms of sickness. Wisdom should be exercised as to the length of the prayer. We are distinctly told that we should not promise, unless directed by the Spirit of God to do so, nor should we attempt to declare mighty works. If the Spirit of God directs, we are then safe in moving forward, under its direction.

It is true that some remarkable results have been secured in psychiatry, and others are in process of being evolved. It is also true that even a nomenclature is not as yet fully agreed upon, and there are many cases which resist analysis and cure, according to present scientific knowledge.

Remarkable progress has been achieved, in that the insane are treated as the sick, and are not abused as they formerly were—locked up in dungeons, and in places of darkness and chained. The idea now held forth is of proper food and medical treatment to build up the physique, with music, and other things of interest to help. It is doubtless quite true that there are failures in their care, and there is not an equality of kindness. But there is indeed progress, and decided progress, and an effort should be made for rational kindly treatment, even if some keepers hold to the worn-out ideas of the past age.

To some it may seem that the question is fully covered by a study of psychology, of medicine, and their application to mental disease. In this connection it is interesting to note a letter from William James to the Reverend Henry W. Rankin, over twenty years ago (February 1, 1897). He states that he is about to give a lecture on demoniacal possession. William James, as is well known, ranks well among modern psychologists, and though his work was done in America, he is still an international character. What he has to say is therefore of great interest. The letter is one published in the Atlantic Monthly for August, 1920, on pages 174, 175. The extract from this letter concerning this particular question follows:

"One of my lectures in New York is at the Academy of Medicine before the Neurological Society, the subject being 'Demoniacal possession.' I shall of course duly advertise the Nevius book. I am not as positive as you are in the belief that the obsessing agency is really demoniac individuals. I am perfectly willing to adopt the theory if the facts lend themselves best to it, for who can trace limits to the hierarchies of personal existence in the world? But the lower stages of mere automatism shade off so continually into the highest supernormal manifestations, through the intermediary ones of imitative hysteria and 'suggestibility,' that I feel as if no general theory as yet would cover all the facts. So that the most I shall plead for before the neurologists is the recognition of demon-possession as a regular 'morbid-entity' whose commonest homologue to-day is the 'spirit-control' observed in test-mediumship, and which tends to become the more benignant and less alarming, the less pessimistically it is regarded. This last remark seems certainly to be true. Of course I shall not ignore the sporadic cases of old-fashioned malignant possession which still occur to-day.

"I am convinced that we stand with all these things at the threshold of a long inquiry, of which the end appears as yet to no one, least of all to myself. And I believe that the best theoretic work yet done in the subject is the beginning made by F. W. H. Myers in his papers in the S. P. R. Proceedings.

The first thing is to start the medical profession out of its idiotically conceited ignorance of all such matters—matters which have everywhere and at all times played a vital part in human history.”

What Doctors Are For

Under this heading appears an interesting article in the Literary Digest for August 28, summing up an opinion by Doctor S. S. Goldwater of New York City. He emphasizes the wrong education of doctors, since they are trained only to cure specified diseases. He sets forth his ideas as follows:

“What are the most important services that physicians can render?

“Answer. They are four: the first is to conserve the health of the well; the second, to detect and, when possible, to arrest incipient disease; the third, to restore the sick to health; and the fourth, to ease the sufferings of those who are sick, injured, old, or feeble.

“Question. Is the relative importance of these important functions generally recognized?

“Answer. It is not. In the medical schools the attention of instructors is fixed mainly on diseases having a definite pathology; it is to the diagnosis and treatment of these diseases that most time and thought are given. . . . The brief courses that are given in preventive medicine and personal hygiene do not begin to do justice to these subjects.”

He then continues what has been done with preventive medicine has partly been done outside the medical schools. Sanitary engineers and social workers have done a large part, but even at that not nearly enough has been done. Virulent and pandemic diseases still continue to baffle science; other diseases which are preventable, and others susceptible to arrest and control are still far from satisfactory in actual treatment, because of lack of personal cooperation.

The reason for this lack of cooperation is lack of instruction, and the reason for this is that the doctors do not give the instruction, as they have not sufficiently trained men and do not realize their splendid opportunity.

The closest approach made to health conservation is the old-fashioned practitioner who watches over whole families.

In this field our health department shows real leadership, for its purpose is to conserve health. It is preventive in purpose. Its further purpose is to detect and correct incipient disease. In fact it fills the whole field instead of being confined to restoring the sick to health.

Subjects Being Discussed

Evidently Profiteering

In one of our large cities, a man called up a grocer for the purpose of purchasing some walnuts. He knew that there was a very big crop in the vicinity of the city, so expected to receive a low price. The price quoted, however, was eight cents per pound. He asked how much they would be per bushel, and was informed that there are 48 pounds to the bushel. The price would be eight times forty-eight, or $3.84.

After hanging up, he wondered what the price would be if he were selling, so after waiting a short time, he called up again and asked what they would pay him for walnuts, and was informed that they would pay him $1 per bushel. He tried to get a better price, but was told that owing to the large crop the price would likely be lower in the future, rather than higher. This is one cause of the high prices.

Ordination of Prophets

The question of prophet ordination has been challenged. It is interesting in this connection to note in a recent number of The Presbyterian, attention is called to the fact that the Lord directed that Elisha should be anointed to be a prophet. (1 Kings 19:16.) The editor continues, that “while we have not a record of just when this ordination took place, still it is true that not all details of sacred history are recorded. But the divine recognition of prophet ordination is too important to be ignored, and the fact that the prophets spoke with authority would require that they were sacredly set apart and authorized.”

It is quite true that the real prophet is appointed from above, and the Spirit of God manifests his calling. But it is also true that the Lord has directed the ordination of prophets, both in ancient and modern times, and as the editor of The Presbyterian suggests, the fact that the prophets spoke with authority would require that they were sacredly set apart and authorized.

The Consumption of Tobacco

The United States Revenue Department has published figures concerning the consumption of tobacco. In 1870 the population was 39,358,371. To-day it is three times as great, but in that time the consumption of cigars has increased to nine times as great, while the consumption of cigarettes has increased 400 times. The manufacture of tobacco has increased from 62,652,576 pounds to 414,877,746 pounds. In other words, it has increased more than twice as fast as the increase in population.

An interesting factor is that the consumption of cigarettes was less than that of cigars up until 1910; however at that time it was just about even. Since then there has been a slight increase in the use of cigars, but in the past ten years, during which time so many States have legislated against cigarettes, the consumption has increased between six and seven times.

Protection of Maternity and Infancy

The British Ministry of Health made grants the past year, totaling over two and a half million dollars, for the protection of maternity and infancy. It was six years ago when first medical and nursing care was provided. The first year only a small appropriation was granted, but the results were so good the appropriation has been greatly increased each year. The funds are directly administered by local authorities, who appropriate a sum equal to that granted by the government. The service includes instruction in hygiene, midwifery, nursing, and maternity home care. The result has been that infant mortality has been reduced from 151 to 78. If this lower figure of 78 had been in force for even the last ten years, it would have meant the saving of the lives of 250,000 children.

Which Race Controls United States?

William S. Rossiter, former chief clerk of the census bureau and now chairman of the joint advisory committee to the director of the census of the American statistical and economic associations, writes in the August number of the Atlantic Monthly of an exhaustive study of American census returns, to discover which race, if any, controls the United States. He discovered that 55 million persons are of British ancestry, or are descendants of German, Irish, or other immigrants who came to America more than sixty years ago and have adopted the Anglo-Saxon ideals of liberty. Further, that it is this group which manages and controls the United States with the Anglo-Saxon thought and ideals. The Anglo-Saxon, even in those sections where he is greatly in the minority, still is in the position of management, authority, and prestige. This is a stabilizing influence and makes for order.

Industrial Cooperation—Its Value and Meaning

By John W. Rushton

In three parts—part two. Reprinted from Autumn Leaves for July, 1915.

For reasons which are very easily seen, cooperation in America has had a sporadic career and its journey to its present position has been unsteady, costing much effort; and there are not a few wrecks and ruins on the way. The movement however, as reported in 1913, justifies the conclusion that cooperation has become fairly established in American economic life. The report to the Alliance Congress already referred to shows five hundred stores and a membership of sixty thousand. The movement is particularly strong in the States of Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut. The spirit of the movement is also taking hold of the middle western and western farmers and it is not at all unlikely that cooperation may be a great power in the redemption of the American agrarians from the truculent grip of the middlemen and transportation firms who have evidently considered the producers as their legitimate prey. Such an expectation is encouraged by a casual glance at the State of Wisconsin, where very largely owing to the influence of Sir Horace Plunkett of Ireland, the State legislature has adopted the cooperative principle, the movement extending into Minnesota and the Dakotas; having a membership in 1913 of 11,200, and invested capital of $1,500,000, and a trade with annual sales amounting to $6,000,000. Cooperation there includes fruit growing, butter and cheese making, grain elevators, potato and tobacco warehouses, cow testing, fire insurance, and telephones.

Virginia and Alaska

Fifteen years ago the farmers in Virginia were in despair; "flatbroke, disgusted, and discouraged," is the language used by themselves and quoted by the writer in Current Opinion for October, 1914. But the adoption of the cooperative principle has dispelled the paralysis of despair and in 1913 the sales of potatoes amounted to over $5,000,000, over $1,000,000 more than in 1912.

Then there is the remarkable case of Alaska to which I call attention because it is reported in the Government bulletin of 1914, from which I quote as follows:

"Cooperative stores, owned and managed by natives, are fostered wherever possible in Alaska by the United States Bureau of Education, which has charge of education for the natives of Alaska. In this way the bureau helps the natives protect themselves from those traders who charge exorbitant prices for food and clothing and pay as little as possible for native products. In small villages even legitimate marketing expenses are a heavy burden unless there is some form of cooperation.

"These cooperative attempts have been a decided success. At Hydaburg, in southeastern Alaska, where the United States school-teacher has general oversight of the cooperative stores, the natives were able, after twelve months of business, to declare a cash dividend of fifty per cent and still have funds available for the erection of a larger store building. The Klawock Commercial Company, also under native management was able after nine months of existence to erect a new store building from its surplus. At Klukwan also the natives have organized a cooperative store.

"Native stores have for several years been in successful operation at Cape Prince of Wales and on Saint Lawrence Island, where the natives buy food at reasonable prices and are assured of an equitable exchange for their furs and other products.

"A more recent example of cooperation is at Atka, a remote island in the Aleutian chain. Formerly rough lumber cost fifty dollars a thousand and shingles eight dollars a thousand on this island and clothing and food supplies were correspondingly high. On the other hand, the natives were poorly paid for their labor. For each of the blue fox skins the natives could catch they received from traders goods averaging eight dollars in value. Sold at public auction in Seattle, these skins brought from $17.10 to $66.50 each, according to quality. In April of this year, with the help of Seattle merchants and officers of the revenue cutter service, a cooperative company was organized under the direction of United States public-school teacher, and now the natives are doing their own buying and selling with considerable advantage to themselves.

"Eskimos on the shore of Bering Sea and the Arctic Ocean have until recently had to market through local traders. Now many of them send by mail packages of fox, lynx, mink, and hair seal to the Alaska division of the Bureau of Education at Seattle, and the Government officials sell the furs for the natives at public auction to the highest bidders.

"Natives at Tatitlek cooperated in salting and exporting salmon the past season, under the instruction of the local Government teacher, with the result that they have not only netted one thousand dollars in cash but have also put away seventy-six thousand pounds of salmon for winter use.

"Cooperation in Alaska has been aided by the policy of reserving tracts of land for the exclusive use of the natives. On this land the natives build up their own industries, safe from the evil influence of unprincipled white men. Hydaburg is a reservation settlement; Klukwan has recently obtained a similar reservation upon which to conduct its cooperative enterprises, and Klawock hopes to secure reservation land in the near future."

Cooperation and Its Message to the Church

In the face of such a remarkable victory may we not dare to believe that this idea which yesterday was among the impossibilities, but to-day is the commonplace will in the tomorrow produce still brighter and more robust results? The American Government would not experiment under such conditions and among such people with anything but that which was likely to get results. Truly in the economic world cooperation is the biggest thing ever experienced, and as a body facing communal problems which are not any worse or more intricate than those of the Rochdale pioneers or the United States Government in Alaska, we shall be wise if we consider the phenomenon and seek to find and apply the dynamic and machinery of its activities. The very raison d'être of our existence is the advertised intent of producing the kingdom of God; failing in this we lose everything and become but one of the relics of an antiquated past, possessing crystalline beauty but as dead as a petrified fossil.

Is there within this movement we are considering, that which in principle, method, or purpose is essentially opposed to the spirit, law, or idealism of the church? If so what is it in nature and extent? Surely that which economically is casting out the Devil, healing the multitudes of paralysis, making the lame to walk, the blind to see, and the masses to "mount up with wings as eagles" to grasp the realities of which the ages have dreamed, and by intelligence and common sense is giving to the people the means of working out their own salvation, will give a stimulus to our own membership, many of whom are weary and despondent with longing and watching for the day of economic deliverance which is still unheralded; and also give to the world a reason that will vindicate our cause that does not depend upon theological brilliancy or forensic prowess.

To frown upon it or to spitefully call it bad names or to treat it superciliously or with nonchalance is neither a manifestation of our intelligence nor a tribute to the cause we believe to be divine. Most surely such a course will not defeat the object of our antipathy.

Meaning of the Cooperative Movement

In the use of the term cooperation we must be careful not to confuse the general meaning with the particular meaning; which while it includes the general, yet gives it a special content and distinctive value; both of which will be lost if we try to make it a synonym for another movement or association. We have in mind several ventures which have been advertised and the people encouraged to support them financially, because it was claimed they were cooperative. They have not been cooperative at all, but joint stock corporations; possessing aristocratical, bureaucratic, oligarchical, and anything else but the democratic principle, which is the distinctive feature of cooperation and without which cooperation cannot exist.

Difference Between Cooperation and Corporations

"The cooperative society is a union of persons; the joint stock company a union of capitals. The members of a cooperative society unite by reason of the personal confidence they feel in each other; and since the cooperative society is a union of persons and not of capitals, the number of members and, in consequence, the amount of capital are variable. The capital of a joint stock company, on the other hand, can only be altered after formal notification, because it is the presence of the material things, capital, which gives a guarantee to intending investors or to outside bodies having commercial relations with it. The cooperative share, because it is in the nature of an entrance fee to a personal union, is allowed to be as small as the members desire, or at any rate to be very small. This corresponds to an element in cooperative societies which the legislature without express mention has especially in mind—the element of the commercially weak: either weak absolutely, or weak for the special end pursued by the society. The law offers to the small man the accommodations which he could not so readily obtain under any other form of commercial association, be he the humble toiler in the city, the petty consumer with his halfpence of custom, or the small proprietor on the land. The ordinary joint stock company would seldom be lamed by a moderately severe downward limit to the size of its shares. The ordinary cooperative society would be killed by such a limit. It may be desirable that the joint stock company should be compelled to fix a minimum or to subscribe a whole or a part of that minimum. But it is equally desirable that the cooperative society should be allowed to place that limit as low as it pleases; for the cooperative society works among poor and weak people to make them strong by association.

"Again, the cooperative society saves the small man from the dilemma of having a large portion of his capital idle or of suffering loss by its withdrawal at times of stringency. Because the capital is variable he can utilize his savings as they occur—and this the more effectively, the smaller the size of shares—and at the same time he can, within the time limit set by the society, withdraw them when he has need, without severing his membership in the society. He has not to sell out at any price; and perhaps lose heavily in the transaction. He preserves, as he obtains, his membership by holding the statutory minimum; and he has the remainder of his capital free for his immediate wants.

"Finally, because the number of members is variable, the cooperative society can stand upon the democratic basis. It can be popular and open to all. None need be rejected on the ground that all the shares are taken up."—Cooperation at Home and Abroad, by Professor Fay, pp. 363, 364.

Cooperation is not to be confused with Friendly Societies, Trades Unionism, or Socialism, though it may be harmonious with all. In some countries, and particularly in Belgium, cooperation is associated with the Catholic Church, but cooperation is not thereby made a Catholic institution. Cooperation declines the limitations of politics, ecclesiasticism, or nationality.

To associate joint stock companies, Unionism, Socialism, or Friendly Societies (secret orders as some of our people term them), is either crass ignorance or because of ulterior motives.

Cooperation is a union of persons who work together for the attainment of some common purpose in which all are to be mutually benefited in the results of the effort to the extent of their usage of the common instrument of their union.

To use the world-famous definition of Louis Blanc it is that form of conducting business in which "Each is for all and all is for each" is the principle of their transactions.

In political economy cooperation is defined as follows:

"Joint operation; the association of a number of persons for the cheaper purchasing of goods, or for carrying on some branch of industry.

"Cooperation is a word used for that mode of industrialism under which laborers try to dispense with the employing class. Instead of waiting to be hired, they borrow or provide the necessary capital for starting a business, and after paying interest on any borrowed capital, divide the profits among themselves in some way previously agreed upon."—Elements of Political Economy, Professor J. E. Symes.

"The cooperative movement is one form of democratic association as one aspect of that larger movement towards the industrial democracy which has characterized the British working class of the nineteenth century."—The Cooperative Movement in Great Britain, Miss Beatrice Potter (Mrs. Sydney Webb).

"As an aspect of business life, cooperation is concerned with free men in self-regulated action."

"We have as our final definition of the cooperative society an association for the purposes of joint trading originating among the weak and conducted always in an unselfish spirit on such terms that all who are prepared to assume the duties of membership may share in its rewards in proportion to the degree in which they make use of their association."

The legal definition of cooperative societies is (England, The Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893):

"A society which may be registered under this act (herein called an industrial and provident society), is a society for carrying on any industries, businesses, or trades specified in or authorized by its rules, whether wholesale or retail, and including the dealings of any description with land. Provided that (a) no member other than a registered society shall have or claim any interest in the shares of the society exceeding two hundred pounds, and (b) in regard to the business of banking, the society shall be subject to the provisions hereinafter contained."

"The object of cooperation must be commercial." (Quoted from Cooperation at Home and Abroad.)

The codes of Germany, Switzerland, Belgium, and Italy have all with Britain this common element, viz, the commercial element.

Ethical Aspect of Cooperation

The main difference between cooperation and other forms of commercial organization is in this: that cooperation is a union of men; and the other a union of capital. The one is a combining of units in themselves weak, in order that in their unity the weak might become strong; the joint stock company on the other hand is a combining of strength to become stronger.

Miss Beatrice Potter gives in contrasting the competitive system with the cooperative system the following analysis:

"Now I think we shall best understand the radical distinction between the creed of 'universal competition' and the 'cooperative idea,' if we reduce these two rival theories to their biological equivalents. The economist of the market place, in his advocacy of universal competition, was groping after the law of the survival of the fittest through the struggle for existence. This struggle for existence was the sole factor of economic progress. The social reformer, on the other hand, was expressing in colloquial language the equally true and important biological fact; the modification of the structure brought about by the modification of function, or in other words the law of functional adaptation."

In this struggle for existence through competition the weaker are doomed to cruel suppression until they are crowded into the oblivion of death; but in the other, by the combining of the units cooperatively, the mass is able to perform a function insuring the survival of the weak and that by their own self-help.

So that what the unit could not do because of weakness, the same individuals can do in association.

Cooperation Altruistic

If altruism is the voluntary surrender of individual claims in a generous effort to secure collective benefit, then there can be no question of the absoluteness of cooperative altruism. It is not antagonistic, it is not iconoclastic, it is decidedly not self-interested. Though it may have its origin in the appeal to the improvement of the condition and being of the individual, yet in the nature of its essential qualities, it moves one to interest in others' well-being and reaches its highest expression in the uplift and efficiency of the collective body. The little that the individual possesses is given up in the communal effort, and by the exercise of thrift, economy, and self-help the masses are led out of the valleys of poverty and oppression to the uplands of self-control and industrial dominion. This aspect of cooperation was stated very effectively and in the terms of statesmanship by Earl Grey, who is the present president of the alliance, and is well known in the realm of British and colonial politics as one of the wisest and most diplomatic administrators Great Britain has.

Earl Grey on Cooperation

"Just as the British Empire stands for imperial unity and local autonomy, so the International Cooperative Commonwealth, which we are endeavoring to create, stands for community of principles and for unrestricted liberty in the way in which these common principles shall be applied by the people primarily concerned. What are these essential principles which are common to cooperators all over the world? First: that the cooperative movement shall not be a class movement, nor a political movement, nor a sectarian movement; on the contrary it is a movement of a purely social and voluntary character, not imposed by the compulsion of the state on any reluctant community, but one which finds its origin and strength in the natural and spontaneous promptings of the individual heart. This movement is not in the nature of a trust or a combine, or of any other exclusive organization. On the contrary, the cooperative movement, in its free and natural operation, unfettered by any state control, and open to all, offers the most practical and effective safeguard that can be obtained against the possible tyranny of trusts and other organized minorities.

"It is a movement open to anyone and everyone, of whatever sect or political persuasion he may be, who seeks to ameliorate his position by his own exertions, and in such a way that the whole community will benefit."—Inaugural Address, August 30, 1913.

Instead of the necessities of the consumers being made the means of the enrichment of a class, in cooperation these necessities are made the means to elevation and freedom.

Field of Operation

There is no other limit to cooperative activity than the limit of man's ability to produce whatever he may need for his well-being and comfort, as remarked by Professor Fay:

"Being not only concerned with business, but actually one way of conducting business, cooperation has a range of potential activity that is as wide as the business of life itself. It is only limited in the sense that in some departments a form of organization, which is not cooperative, is at present from a business point of view superior."

The four main departments of cooperative efforts are as follows:

- First. Credit societies. (Cooperative banks.)
- Second. Cooperative agricultural societies.
- Third. Cooperative workers' societies.
- Fourth. Cooperative stores.

The first is for the supply of money, the second for the supply of raw materials, the third for manufacturing, and the fourth for distribution. Banks and agricultural and manufacturing societies represent cooperative production; and the stores, distributive agencies. Besides there are successful cooperative insurance, building, and friendly societies, which not only protect the cooperators from loss in case of accident, sickness, and death, also losses by fire, etc., use their own labor for erecting their own homes and so forth, but the profits accruing from these activities go back to the people.

Cooperative Banks

The banking system originated in Germany and includes three classes, viz, Herr Schulze of Delitsch, who founded the industrial or town banks, Herr F. W. Raiffeisen of Neuwied who founded the agricultural or rural banks, and the Doctor Haas Banks originated after the Raiffeisen model.

The Schulze-Delitsch banks are formed with share capital and have limited liability; the others are without shares and unlimited liability.

The functions are about as follows: To assist first, that class of people who would be driven to money lenders, otherwise it competes also for custom of the small man whether townsman or farmer.

The distinctive features of cooperative banking are:

- First. The bank is controlled by the members who use it.
- Second. The credit given is of a personal kind.

This system of banking is very popular and successful not only in Germany, but also in France, Italy, Austria, and also in Great Britain. In 1909 in Germany there were about 11,760 credit banks, having a membership of about two millions, and having business transactions amounting to over $750,000,000.

Agricultural Cooperation

This department shows an extensive field of well-organized and successful endeavor and forms an illustration of the remarkable adaptability and elasticity of principle; besides at the same time demonstrating the way in which it can be employed through a variety of methods. As to the need of this mode of business and the success which is possible I call attention to the condition of the farmers in the United States who are the victims of unscrupulous middlemen of every kind. The New York State Commission recently showed that the American farmer only receives forty per cent of the retail prices of his commodities, and he should have seventy per cent.

In Germany, Denmark, Switzerland, France, Belgium, Italy, and Great Britain, particularly in Ireland, almost every kind of agricultural work is being done under the cooperative principle.

Cooperative dairies, vintries, corn shelling, including of course other cereals, elevators, flour milling, bread baking, spirit distilling, and beer brewing, and reaching down to market gardening, hops, fruit, tobacco, eggs, and poultry raising, are all in a flourishing condition in the countries named.

Then there are cooperative cattle societies, concerned with breeding, selling, and slaughtering and the sale of the dead meat and the curing of bacon; horse breeding, the conducting of studs; beekeeping and home industries, besides cattle insurance societies. Italy has brought the silk growing business into the realm of cooperation and has a traveling school of technical education which also conducts a cooperative propaganda.

In Ireland there is one feature of the cooperative agricultural organization which is unique and unlike all other voluntary organizations, and that is, it receives the support of Protestant and Catholic, Orangeman and Nationalist. This at least is suggestive of a way in which the centuries-old feud can be solved and so relieve Great Britain of one of the most serious tasks in her politics.

To indulge even in a cursory description of this movement would be tedious but we will be contented to quote Professor Fay again on this section of the subject:

"No country shows a slackening of this cooperative movement, much less an absolute cessation of growth. It is clear, therefore, that cooperation is no occasional phenomenon, but one aspect of a general movement affecting profoundly the agriculture of Europe.

"It is cooperation alone which has enabled the small farmer to accommodate himself successfully to the changes forced alike upon all agriculturists."

The success and possibilities of the movement have been recognized by the British Government and the British Cooperative Association is being used by the government as a channel for effecting agricultural reform, especially in developing the small holdings. This means the breaking up of large estates into small sections for the use of the small farmers; a condition of affairs which this country of America will have to consider probably much sooner than is generally expected, and of which event the efforts of the agricultural colleges are a definite augury. The prevailing waste, slovenliness, and paucity of the crops all show the folly of one man trying to farm even one hundred and sixty acres. It is good for neither the man himself nor the country at large nor the people.

We may agree with authoritative economists who assert their belief that in fifty years' time "The Cooperative Supply Society will become the normal means of purchase for many of the large and most of the small farmers. Cooperative sale will follow in its train, and under congenial legislation the small holder will recover the position from which (in Europe) he was crowded out last century, and retain it by the attractive atmosphere of possessing the means of supplying the necessities of themselves and neighbors."

Three Influences of Agricultural Cooperation

Professor Fay points out very clearly and instructively the influence of cooperation upon the development of agriculture in

First, The treatment of the soil in the use of chemicals for fertilizing; second, the use of improved machinery; third, the specialization of both the product and men to raise the product.

He says: "It is the whole network of cooperation which has educated the small farmer up to the use of these new things and helped to make him what he is now, a scientific and specialized producer."

In the second instance. The transformation of the produce of the soil. In this the farmer has been taught and assisted to reduce large bulks of little value to smaller dimensions of larger value, as for illustration, sugar from beets, alcohol from potatoes. It has made practicable the methods of centralization, with the resultant economies of the raw materials of the farm and the means of producing the desired results. In the third place the establishing of more just and profitable relations between the farmers and purchasing public through its cooperative markets.

As a people concerned with the development of communal interests and having so many of the agricultural class, can we afford to ignore the splendid achievement of the cooperation which in these three evidences alone attest its value?

Surely the conclusion of Doctor Steinbruck in his "Wirtschaftskunde Deutschlands," volume 2, page 5, "Cooperation is the corner stone of the development of agriculture," is more than sustained.

Wholesale and Productive Cooperation

The success of cooperation in the wholesale and manufacturing departments is established in the remarkable showing which has been already referred to. In dealing, however, with this aspect of the movement we must note the two divisions into which wholesale cooperation is grouped, namely: the workers' societies, in Great Britain called, "Labor Copartnership Associations"; and the Wholesale Cooperative Societies." There is a difference in the method employed by these two bodies but yet they work harmoniously and in many cases side by side.

The main difference between the two organizations is in the division of profits. The former dividing the profits of the business among the workers themselves, while the latter shares the profits among the consumers.

This amounts fundamentally to a difference of ideals. The Workers' Society is standing for the interests of the workers primarily, while the Cooperative Wholesale Society stands for the well-being of the consumers primarily, and the workers only as consumers.

Still, as already stated, the two work together and with each other, the annual cooperative exhibition always being a union of the exhibits of both.

History of the Workers' Associations

The years 1847-49 were critical because of trade depression, bad harvests, potato famine, and the revolutionary nature of the prevailing discontent in Great Britain which seemed to reach its head in what is known as the Chartist agitation. The influence of agitators, as Owen, Cobbett, Cartwright, Place, and Burdett manifested itself in the efforts made by a small band of eminent scholars and ministers, among whom were Frederick Denison Maurice, a clergyman of the Church of England, who also held fellowships on both Oxford and Cambridge Universities; the Reverend Charles Kingsley, of the Church of England, who was also the author of some striking works, several of which dealt with the economic and social condition of the country; and also men like Hughes, LaChavalier, Ludlow, and Vansittart Neale.

Mr. Ludlow was sent over to France to make a study of the movement which had been commenced by Louis Blanc, based upon the idealist teachings of Buchez and others. He returned full of enthusiasm, and these French associations were made the model of the Christian Socialist movement.

It was in autumn of 1849 that the "Society for Promoting the Workingmen's Associations" was founded; twelve associations being in the organization, of which three were tailors, three shoemakers, two builders, the other four being piano makers, printers, smiths, and bakers. At the first they were molded after the French pattern, but owing to discord within and external rivalry a central board was formed consisting of a manager and one delegate from each association, and the Council of Promoters.

After three or four years of devoted effort the Christian Socialists gave up the task in despair. But out of this effort there developed a number of working class limiteds and copartnership societies, most of which, however, shortly afterwards collapsed. In 1883 only fifteen of the genuine societies remained out of several hundreds which began. However, in 1884 the Labor Copartnership Association was formed at the Cooperative Congress, composed of private sympathizers and cooperative societies. In 1893 there were seventy-seven workers' societies as labor copartnerships; and in 1906 there were one hundred and thirty-two.

Object of the Association

The object of these associations is defined: "To bring about an organization of industry based on the principle of labor copartnership, that is to say, a system in which all who are engaged shall share in the profit, capital, control, and responsibility. With this view it seeks (1) in the cooperative movement to aid by its propaganda and advice all forms of production based on the above principle; (2) in other businesses to induce employers to adopt schemes of profit-sharing and investment tending in the same direction."

Membership and Methods

The requisites of recognition by the association are three:

(1) That in virtue of their position as workers, the workers shall receive a share in profits in addition to their trade union or standard wage. It is not claimed that they shall receive the whole profit. (2) That in virtue of their position as working shareholders, the workers shall have a share in the management: It is not claimed that they shall have the whole management. (3) That this arrangement shall be a matter of fixed rules so that the privileges of the workers shall be definitely secured, and not left to the caprice of individuals, to be given or withheld as a matter of favor.

It is a rule of nearly all such societies that one member has only one vote whatever the size of his holding—with a slight exception in favor of the society members, who are usually allowed several votes if their investment is large.

Benefits and Results

Investigations made in 1900 of twenty-four societies gave the following results: (1) That where there was an effective trades union in the district the copartnership workers were nearly always members; (2) that the wages of the copartnership workers were higher on the whole by nine per cent than the trades union rates in the district, while the average number of hours worked per week was 51 as against 53 in outside shops. Strikes on the part of the employees in a workers' society have been almost nonexistent.

In France and Italy this form of cooperative production continues successfully.

Cooperative Wholesale Society

It is obvious that cooperation would not be as beneficial to a community as desired unless the principle could be applied to the production and manufacture of goods as well as the distribution. Manufacturers and producers could always menace the success of the distributive agencies; so from the first the cooperators had in mind a wholesale society which would strengthen the stores in their power of purchase. We are only quoting a truism to say, the primary and most effective business is done in purchasing; if a business man cannot buy to advantage, he cannot make good the deficiency in selling, which he incurred by injudicious buying.

Three failures were recorded against the effort to establish wholesale cooperation before success finally came. In 1831 a scheme collapsed in Liverpool; the Christian Socialists established the Central Cooperative Agency in London in 1850, which soon collapsed; then in 1852 the Rochdale Pioneers tried to operate a wholesale department for themselves, but jealousy and indifference ruined the scheme.

In 1863 the North of England Cooperative Wholesale Industrial and Provident Society Limited was established; which ten years later (1873) took the name of the Cooperative Wholesale Society. In 1868 the Scottish Wholesale Society was formed. In these two eminently successful societies the cooperative store has reached its crowning point.

The membership of these wholesale societies is composed of shareholding stores; the directors are elected by the members en masse and are paid a salary.

The business of the wholesale societies in the first place is that of wholesale merchants with warehouses at Glasgow and Manchester, and depots in the provinces; they also have purchasing depots and resident buyers in North America, Spain, Denmark, and Germany.

In the second place, they are wholesale producers, industrially and agriculturally. Confectionery, leather, textile goods, soap, cocoa, tobacco represent the principal industrial departments. Production is represented in the Crumpsall biscuit works, the Glasgow tailoring factory, the boot and shoe works at Leicester, bacon factory in Denmark, oil and tallow works in Sydney, Australia, creameries in Ireland.

Thirdly, they are their own shipping and transport agents.

Fourthly, they do their own banking and insuring.

Fifthly, they are landowners.

The increasing success has been noted in an earlier paragraph.

In the 1914 Congress there was a strong plea made for the increasing of the field of cooperative production and the resolution which was finally adopted will show the spirit and enterprise of cooperation in these great fields of industrial activities.

"This congress recognizing the importance of economy and efficiency in its administrative work, and having a strong conviction that the progress of the movement might be greatly accelerated, calls for a general survey of the whole field of cooperative activities from its three main features, viz, education, production, and distribution; and having due regard to their relative value, assign to each one its special sphere of action, and thereby give to the movement generally that solidarity and flexibility so obviously lacking at present, and therefore instructs the central board to appoint a special committee to consider and report in terms of this resolution."

This is not pessimistic but a symptom of the dissatisfaction with the rate of progress and an ambition to "speed up" the movement.

While the strength of cooperation is in its democratic spirit, this democratic power is also its weakness. Democracy needs intelligence diffused throughout the body in order that democratic rule should be effective.

An unintelligent democracy is always a menace to real progress and sooner or later comes to an inglorious if not a tragic end. Democracy to be effective must be controlled by intelligence, cohesion, solidarity. Therefore a democracy does not abolish the aristocrat but is based upon aristocracy of character instead of blood or money or position. Cooperation is not able to secure success merely because of its methods and devices, but must have intelligence, loyalty, and altruism.

The Distributing Stores

Whatever developments have been reached in the cooperative world, and however alluring the prospect of its commonwealth may be it must not be forgotten that the power of the movement is in the ability of the weak and financially limited to take what was within the reach of all and make themselves masters of that before they could progress to the condition of developing "a state within a state," as described in this article. It began in the effort of the consumers to supply to themselves the commodities which they needed first by having their own counter and scale, and then proceeding to have their own warehouses, then their own factory, then to have their own means of production, and then to take care of their own accumulations of resultant increment. The development of the movement is quite sequential and rational—hence scientific.

The retail store was the germ, and was organized for the benefit of the consumer. We are all consumers first, and as such pay all of the intervening expenses entailed in the bringing of what we need or want from nature's laboratory to our tables.

The problem of the pioneers of cooperation was the same which is confronting us to-day:

First, how can we get our necessities to our homes at better rates and in better quality?

Second, can we not use our mutual necessities as a means for cultivating and developing mutual interests?

It is suggestive, that cooperators in those early days were pragmatic rather than Utopian in their ideals and efforts; instead of generating revolutions or sighing for the golden age, they used their native common sense and took the means they had at hand, attacked the immediate problem through constructive policy of self-help, which history has vindicated as the wisest and most effective. While the socialist aspires to the control of the machinery of government and the churchman sings and prays for heaven or Zion, the cooperator went to work and mastered the government and controlled legislation to its own purposes; and realized that Zion and heaven had an economic foundation, so they tried to establish the methods by which labor and enterprise could be devoted to better ends, through a better system, and the larger number enjoy the fruits.

Doctor G. Leonard Harrington, physician in charge of the Independence Sanitarium, gave three lectures at the Latter Day Saint church Sunday. The first lecture was at 11 a. m. to a general audience. His theme was mental hygiene, a subject to which he had given much study and research in the United States, and foreign countries. Doctor Emery Thompson assisted him in the service. At 2 p. m. he lectured to men and young men over fourteen years.

This lecture was illustrated with lantern slides. Every man and boy in Holden should have heard this. It called for better manhood, clean lives, and a strong, untainted citizenship.

The lecture at 3.30 was also illustrated. This was for women and young ladies over sixteen years of age. A fine audience of Holden women heard this lecture. He emphasized the importance of knowing the great things of life, of educating the young people properly in reference to these essentials; that "right form is better than reform"; that this information should be disseminated by those qualified and who have the right viewpoint; by the home makers, rather than the home breakers and people of the street. It was a splendid effort.

Doctor Harrington leaves for Washington, District of Columbia, this week to attend the national convention of social workers who will hold a two weeks' session there.—Holden Progress, November 18, 1920.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

IF PAUL HAD USED METHODS POPULAR TO-DAY

The following is printed in The Pentecost, of Los Angeles, California, but is credited to an exchange. We think it will especially appeal to some of our ministry. They, perhaps more than any other, have attacked this disposition in the sectarian church to ask just such questions as are here ascribed to the Apostle Paul:

Suppose Paul had written thus:

"Dear Sir and Brother:

"Doubtless you recall the invitation you extended me to come over to Macedonia and help the people of that section. You will pardon me for saying that I am somewhat surprised that you should expect a man of my standing in the church to seriously consider a call on such meager information. There are a number of things I would like to learn before giving you my decision, and I would appreciate your dropping me a line, addressing me at Troas.

"First of all, I would like to know if Macedonia is a circuit or a station. This is important as I have been told that once a man begins on a circuit, it is well-nigh impossible to secure employment in station work. If Macedonia embraces more than one preaching place I may as well tell you frankly that I cannot think of accepting the call.

"There is another important item that you overlooked in your brief and somewhat sudden invitation. No mention was made of the salary I should receive. While it is true that I am not preaching for money, there are certain things that need to be taken into account. I have been through a long and expensive training; in fact, I may say with pardonable pride, that I am a Sanhedrin man—the only one in the ministry to-day.

"The day is past when you may expect a man to rush into a new field without some idea of the support he is to receive. I have worked myself up to a good position in the Asiatic field, and to take a drop and lose my grade would be a serious matter. Nor can I afford to swap 'dollar for dollar,' as the saying is among the apostles.

"Kindly get the good Macedonian brethren together, and see what you can do in the way of support. You have told me nothing beyond the implication that the place needs help. What are the social advantages? Is the church well organized?

"I recently had a fine offer to return to Damascus at an increase of salary, and am told that I made a very favorable impression on the church at Jerusalem. If it will help the board at Macedonia, you might mention these facts in Macedonia, and also that some of the brethren in Judea have been heard to say that if I keep on, in a few years I may have anything in the gift of the church.

"For recommendations, write to Reverend Simon Peter, D. D., Jerusalem. I will say that I am a first-class mixer, and especially strong on argumentative preaching.

"PAUL, the Apostle."

STRAWS IN THE WIND

While we are busy denouncing radicalism, it is well to have our ears open to what many of our conservative leaders are saying.

For instance, at the recently celebrated fortieth anniversary of the founding of the Society of Mechanical Engineers, William R. Dickson, vice president of the Midvale Steel and Ordnance Company, denounce the "autocratic" United States Steel Corporation, saying:

"The autocratic policy of the United States Steel Corporation is diametrically opposed to American ideals and if it and similar organizations in other industries continue to grow and maintain their autocratic attitude then there can be only one result—industrial feudalism; feudalism with a high degree of comfort for the workers, but none the less feudalism."

But this is incidental as an outburst of radicalism when put beside the seriously declared purpose of Senator Calder of New York and Senator Edge of New Jersey to move for the nationalization of coal. In their formal statement they said:

"We are both opposed to government regulation as a policy, but the Government must assume responsibility for its people, and we will recommend a bill for entire control of the industry, just as far as possible under the constitution, unless prices are materially reduced to the public by December 6. We are deadly in earnest about this. We are both conservatives on the matter of government ownership, but we are absolutely disgusted with this situation. The country has been justified in the past in thinking that an investigation of the kind conducted by this committee, never amounts to a hill of beans. Our work would be of no value if it merely resulted in a report of two or three thousand pages to be filed and not read. The coal industry stands self-convicted. The wrongdoing has been admitted by D. B. Wentz, representing the National Coal Association; by Commissioner Clyde B. Aitchison of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and Daniel E. Willard representing the railroads. There is a general confession on the part of the industry, even though guilty individuals have not been identified. The reformation of these evils is their own concern primarily. Most of the leading coal operators realize that and are seeking to-day to clean up their business from within. That is their only salvation. If they can't solve their own problem, we will have to use drastic means to solve it."

When men who speak for conservative business declare themselves so unreservedly, it is easy to discover in what direction popular thought is moving.

It is idle to spend much time denouncing men who suggest that conditions can be improved. A far more important service for the friends of the existing order is to be alive to the grievances that develop inevitably as social relations become more complex and be prompt in the removal of the causes.

We shall only escape what Europe is going through if we take things as they come up, and remedy abuses one by one before they have grown great. Our American system will work if we keep it American. But we must be very sure that we keep it American.—Des Moines Register, November 10, 1920.

Temple Builders Manual

The manual the Temple Builders have had under consideration for the past year has at last been put into final shape, and is set up ready to go on the presses. We expect this book to be ready for the holiday trade. It will be well printed, and artistically arranged, and is above the average for such manuals. It would make a delightful Christmas gift for some of our young women who are Temple Builders, or who should be. We hope to be able to announce the price next week.

The address of Paul M. Hanson, published in the HERALD recently, was misprinted. Mail should be sent to 6149 Florence Boulevard, Omaha, Nebraska, for him.

It is all right for you to use a measure of discretion in giving, but it is impossible for you to follow to its final destination every dollar you may give. That is God's part.—C. O. Dodge.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

Concerning Social Purity

In considering the field of social purity work in the church, our department recognizes that certain phases come under their direction in an immediate way, since their work lies with the woman and mother in the home. They are primarily interested in helping her to fill the whole measure of her responsibility there, one part of which is her preparation to teach her children the fundamentals of pure living.

We are attempting to impress upon parents this solemn duty to their offspring which includes the task of properly educating them in the vital principles of life, and training them in the habits of purity and safe thinking. A number of most carefully-selected books and pamphlets are listed in our new yearbook. Some of these are for the study and use of parents, and others are of a nature to be placed directly in the hands of our boys and girls. Sister D. J. Krahl, former auxiliary president, has brought to bear upon the matter of choice and selection her highest powers of discrimination, and those to whom her natural taste and refinement are well known, will not hesitate to trust her judgment in this selection and classification.

We recognize that there is an angle of the question, however, which can best be handled by the health department of the church. There is a close connection between health of mind, health of body, and health of morals. Given a wholesome respect for physical welfare, moral standards are likely to be elevated correspondingly. Vice versa, little headway is made towards spirituality when physical standards are low.

We are glad to note that the head of our health department is already placing before the members of Independence and near-by cities, a series of lectures and films which present in strong and unmistakable terms the plain moral and spiritual duty of keeping physically fit and sexually pure. No one has a moral right to do that which will impair his bodily fitness to do the full measure of that portion of the world's work which falls to him. No one has a moral right to pervert the sacred stream of life from its pure and God-blessed channels into unwholesome, dark, or dirty avenues, reaping therefrom but dwarfed powers and a shriveled soul. One cannot believe that Latter Day Saints will knowingly follow noisome paths when once their minds have been opened to the dangers and frightful consequences of such a course.

Nothing should be closer to the hearts of parents than the spiritual and physical well-being of their children, and their duties along the lines mentioned should be brought plainly and clearly before them, and impressed in all solemnity. As the health department moves out in its work, and the sisters in theirs, we trust both shall receive the intelligent and whole-hearted support and sympathetic understanding such educational attempts deserve. Further, we hope every father and mother who are interested in the proper teaching and training of their children, and who feel that in the books and pamphlets which have been so carefully selected they may find the help which they may need in order to guide them, will promptly write to our department office. We expect to keep some of these pamphlets in sufficient quantities to supply the demand without the delay and annoyance of your re-ordering.

Go over our yearbook bibliography carefully, and avail yourselves of the suggestions made in regard to this too-long obscured "light of truth," for the lack of which so many of our young people have stumbled. Arouse to your duty, ye parents! Acquaint yourselves first, and then acquaint your children with those sacred truths which will assure their safety, when coupled with proper training in habits of right thinking, of courtesy, and self-control.

AUDENTIA ANDERSON.

"Like as a Father—"

"Father." The word should be as dear as the term "mother." But I have lived among your boys and girls long enough to learn that it is a very rare occasion when it is. Out of the forty-two or more with whom I have associated this year only two or three have seemed to love father as much as mother. Can you explain?

There are many reasons. Mother is interested in their lives; their little interests are not too childish for her even in their babyhood. I deal with children at an age when they are hero worshipers, and if I find one who loves and admires "daddy," then I know that in that father there is something worth the while.

There once came into our town a young lad who loved his family and talked much of them. We were glad to tell him after their arrival that we were not disappointed.

"I'm glad," he said, "because I'm proud of them, especially of mother."

"But you mustn't forget dad," said some one, "for we are too apt to leave him in the background, you know."

"Why, why—" stammered the boy, "dad was the one who taught us to be proud of mother!"

Can't you see that father? Don't you know that home? There are so many fathers who place themselves in the background because of their love for mother, and so many mothers who accept this as their right and forget to help the children to be proud of father. It won't hurt any mother to do so; her children will love her more, I know.

I remember so well last year as I passed by the desk of a darling girl whose eyes were glistening with happiness but her work was all unfinished. When I told her to remain after school, all the happy light died out of her face and I shall not soon forget her cry of pain: "Oh, Miss Marcella, I can't stay after school. Daddy's coming home on the five o'clock. I'm to wear my new dress, and mamma and all of us are going down to the train to meet him."

Her father is a missionary and his home-coming is always a joyous occasion. There is a mother who is teaching her children to be proud of daddy.

But did I keep the child after school? Only long enough to make other arrangements as to when the work was to be finished. Then I stood at the window and watched her care-free feet dance down the walk while I thought—well, I thought of another father who will not come home any more. I saw again the wrinkled overalls and the hat and shoes sprinkled with lime as daddy came home from his work. And the laugh wrinkles round daddy's eyes. He was tired—yes, but seldom too tired to listen to the woes and joys of his children.

A few days ago I had occasion to talk to my boys about what I expected of them after they were dismissed. I said to them: "Think of the best man you know, the man you want to be like when you are grown. Does he do as you have done?" I can't say which men in this audience were thought of at that moment, but there was a general headshaking, and one little fellow beaming with pride answered me: "My papa's the best man I know. When I'm a man I want to be just like him."

I breathed a prayer for that man, wondering if he realized his responsibility and the wonderful possibilities wrapped up in his young son.

Then there was that day when we talked at school of tobacco and so many could say triumphantly, "My father doesn't smoke." And one little boy, with tears that dripped over the brim, choked out, "My papa does and I'm so sorry. Mamma asks him to quit but he won't."

But we are forgetting that sort of men to-day and thinking of real fathers. The kind that takes your hand on a Sunday afternoon and goes walking with you. The kind that plays bear with the baby and swims with the big brother and dines on the broken dishes at the make-believe tea party with his daughter. He loses his dignity, perhaps, but he gains the love of his children. There's a companionship to remember.

God gives us a concrete example of fathers on earth to teach us the Father in heaven. He asks us to place our hand in His for leading and for strength. If you have felt it in father here it helps you to understand when you have need to stretch your hand upward.

Do you know the strength of your father's hand? I have one special occasion to remember. Father and I sat studying our Sunday school lesson together one Saturday afternoon when a shot was fired in the bedroom where the boys were playing with an old gun. I darted down the hall and tried to open the door. My strength failed me. I could not turn the knob. I cannot easily forget the strength of father's hand as it closed over mine and opened the door.

So, as I said before, God gives us these concrete examples of companionship and strength. It was because I missed it so much that I once wrote:

June time—again it is June time,

It was always glad June time before;

But laughter has died into heartaches—

No song for the lips as of yore,

Since the world is so empty of daddy,

And heart throbs are so yearning and sore.

Ah, Nature, God told you to soothe me,

And your flower petals drift where he lies,

While the birds murmur sweetly of comfort

There's a tender smile in the skies.

I see it, I feel it, I know it,

In spite of these tear-blinded eyes.

I try to yield to your comfort,

I try to hear what you say,

But that phrase murmured over and over,

"World is empty of daddy to-day,"

Stills my heart and leaves it so weary

That the blue skies of June are but gray.

His eyes were like skies of glad June time,

His heart was full of your song,

His face was the home of smiles cheery,

To June time he surely belonged.

So you took him away—took our daddy,

And the days they are empty and long.

I am always glad there was father—not alone for the past happiness, but also because I can look into the future and up there he helps me to better understand the Fatherhood of God.

How Many Can You Sell?

To Our District Organizers: How many of our yearbooks can you sell in your district? We feel that you are interested in getting the information these books contain over to every sister within your territory, for you appreciate the fact that the better our work is understood, the easier your work becomes in your district.

You may take orders, receiving and receipting the money, and send to our office, assuring the sisters that the books will be in your hands for distribution at an early date. Or, you may send us the names and addresses of the sisters who give you money for the books, and the same will be mailed to each one separately and promptly.

The price is but sixty cents per copy. We are aware of the fact that in three issues of this paper the price has been stated to be otherwise, but may we explain that those statements were made without direction from or the knowledge of the editor of these columns? Sometimes a sprite of mischief seems to be turned loose which works peculiar entanglements for some people, and an editor seems to be a "bright and shining mark" for its pranks. Often the most innocent and well-meaning people are unwittingly drawn into the net

Apostle Russell Challenges

How R. C. Russell is meeting organized opposition in Cornwall, Ontario.

(The following advertisements, evidently paid for at regular space rates in issues of The Freeholder, for November 7 and 11, at Cornwall, Ontario, show how one of our front-line men is using the press to induce people to see both sides of our proposition.—EDITORS.)

CORNWALL, November 7, 1920.

To the Ministers and Citizens of the Town of Cornwall: Inasmuch as I have been personally informed by one of the clergymen of this town that he advised his congregation to refrain from attending my religious services, because I was preaching dangerous doctrines, and moreover I have been creditably informed that other congregations have received like warning from their pastors, I hereby offer the following:

I will affirm in public discussion, for twenty or more evenings, that the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, with headquarters at Lamoni, Iowa, and Independence, Missouri, is the church of Jesus Christ, and is in harmony and identical with the Holy Scriptures in faith, organization, doctrines, and practice.

2. That Joseph Smith, junior, was a prophet of God, and that the Book of Mormon is a divine record, worthy the respect and acceptance of all people.

I will request that my opponents, singly or collectively, both Roman Catholic and Protestant, affirm that:

3. The church or churches which they represent is the church of Jesus Christ, and is in harmony and identical with the Holy Scriptures in faith, organization, doctrines, and practice, and that

4. The creeds and disciplines of their churches are of divine origin, worthy the respect and acceptance of all people.

The debate to be for two hours each evening (Sunday excluded) each of the affirmative and negative to occupy two alternate half hours each evening.

Each party to choose a moderator, they two to choose a third, who shall be the chairman of the debate.

The time to be mutually agreed upon, but preferably to close before Christmas.

The place of debate to be any of the churches occupied by the disputants that will accommodate the audience that might attend, or the town hall, each one to pay half the expenses.

The King James and Douay translations of the Holy Scriptures to be the standards of evidence. All other books and documents to be taken for what they may be considered worth.

Hedge's Rules of Logic to govern the debate.

Respectfully,
(Signed) R. C. RUSSELL.

To the Clergy Who Cried, "Don't Go to Hear Him":

Please read 1 Thessalonians 5: 21, and then go before your of circumstances woven by such a sprite, and become the medium through which confusion and mistakes are brought about.

However, we can congratulate ourselves that this time the error is on "the safe side," and it will embarrass or annoy none, perhaps, to have some money refunded when they order their yearbooks at the price as erroneously advertised. We have desired to keep the cost of these books to our sisters as low as may be consistent with the expense to which our department is put in publishing and handling them.

So, roll up your surprise orders, dear organizers, and show us by their size and promptitude how progressive and "up-to-the-minute" are the sisters of your district. Address all orders to our general office, Box 255, Women's Department, Independence, Missouri.

AUDENTIA ANDERSON.

congregations as well as write to The Freeholder and apologize for your temerity, then read Acts 19: 9 and compare your timidity with Paul's courage in the school of Tyrannus. Many of the honorable citizens of Cornwall are asking that you do such.

It will not do to climb the pinnacle of abovetiveness and cry "He is beneath my notice," for should your debating mercury reach above 32F, I will return, though a thousand miles distant at the time, and present credentials as worthy the respect of the audience as any by my opponents.

I presume, however, that until such time as you either accept or apologize, the Bible student will be conversing with his neighbor on the meaning of John 10: 12, 13, and Acts 19: 23-27.

Respectfully awaiting the fullest public investigation,
(Signed) R. C. RUSSELL.

Graceland College Notes

The following items are from the Graceland Record, a biweekly periodical issued by the Graceland student body.

Armistice Day was fittingly observed at Graceland. The ex-service men, about thirty in number, prepared a program that was given Thursday morning. At eleven o'clock, in accord with the general custom of the day, the whistle blew for one minute, during which time the student body stood with bowed heads.

The following program was then given:

Song, America	-	-	-	James Houghton
Vocal Solo	-	-	-	Bishop A. Carmichael
Address	-	-	-	Ex-service Men
Stunts	-	-	-

The address of Bishop Carmichael had as its keynote the statement that nothing comes by chance, but that the present development of the Nation is the result of all that has gone before, and that over all is a divine power guiding the affairs of the Nation to bring about His purposes.

At the conclusion of the address, William Hartley introduced seven of the ex-service men, who styled themselves "The Discord Seven." They proceeded to give a demonstration of their army stunts in singing a series of "ditties," heightened in effect by pantomime and gesture.

A half holiday was enjoyed in the afternoon.

Last Wednesday Elder Macgregor addressed the student body on the subject, "The union of United States and Canada," showing the many advantages that would come to the two nations by their union. Elder Macgregor is a Canadian by birth, but at present is a resident of the United States. His effort was without biased opinion, and brought a stimulation of thought to the students.

Last Friday night the people of Lamoni were privileged to enjoy one of the classics in moving pictures—Evangeline. In the near future two other masterpieces will be shown from the screen here: Victor Hugo's Les Miserables, and Dickens's Tale of Two Cities. The Religio is furnishing these pictures.

A debating club has been formed with Wallace Smith as chairman. Four teams are organized thus far, being paired off as follows: Roland Travis and David Lewis; Leonard Lea and Percy Travis; Ronald Smith and Wallace Smith; Elbert Dempsy and Stanley Russell. The first two mentioned teams will debate Saturday evening; the last two will clash later. Then a big final will be staged between the two winners. This should give an opportunity for several to participate in this branch of literary work and we believe its results will be satisfactory.

Woman and Her Place in Society

Considering the question of women's rights and men's rights, there are it is true certain fundamental differences which must be taken into consideration. Men can never be mothers, even though some men make the best housekeepers, the best of cooks, and the best of dressmakers, and can do much else of what is considered home or housework, as well or better than a woman.

Recent tests have demonstrated that there is no sex difference as to intellect, or at least seem so to indicate, but individual differences of motor response, largely as a result of training; individual differences of quick learning. But the average percentage made by men and women in each test were practically identical.

There appears from psychological and other considerations to be no reason for believing that the soul of a woman, the spirit of a woman is other than human, or that there are two classes of spirits—a male spirit, and a female spirit. There is the divine Spirit of God, and there is its human manifestation. There is the individual existence here and hereafter. There are individual differences, but it may seriously be questioned if in reason, in spirits there are basic differences. There are it is true differences as a result of education and environment, and age long differentiation of function but it may seriously be questioned whether these differences are so basic as to be ineradicable.

There long have been social differences; there have also existed age old differences of training, yet there exist no sound reasons why both should not join in the franchise and in the work of society. The reason is basic—both are human beings. Woman is not simply an auxiliary or an adjunct to the human race. She is a human being and has a right to represent herself individually.

We cannot join in the assumption that economic independence for woman—the right to earn and maintain her own independence will mean a limitation or modification of marriage. It should result in better marriages and a better race of children, through independent motherhood and independent fatherhood of free choice to both. It is certain also that any solution which may be offered must take into consideration the physical differences, both of the average strength and also of function. If in any forward movement it happens that she fails to regard the basic facts, of course it will in that far prove her failure.

Men and women, husband and wife, should work together in the unit of the family to accomplish the work of the family. That does not mean simply that the man should be it, and that the woman should be a sort of auxiliary, her sole function being to stir him up or to slow him down, and see that he keeps proper time; though each should prove an inspiration, a help and strength to the other.

We are glad to note the passing of the Woman's Auxiliary, as the word auxiliary is scarcely a fair one. We have now a Women's Department, but no Men's Department in the church. We hope for the day when there will be that fuller cooperation; when men and women will be equally recognized as members of the body of Christ; when neither one or the other will be taken as an auxiliary or a separate department. In the meantime, the work of the different departments is of great and basic importance. In the meantime women having the vote has done more than any other element to increase our knowledge of political affairs and political methods. That so many adults at one time should gain the franchise has meant a new view, and a review of political methods, not only as set forth in the foundations of government, in the constitution and statutes, but also in the actual practice in which politics are carried out. It should, and we hope will result in a needed reform.

In the church there is still a tendency too overemphasize, even by the Women's Department, the fact that they are women rather than human beings—a girl rather than a child—a young woman rather than one of the young people. The Women's Department is certainly doing a splendid work, not only in instructing their own members, which are as yet unfortunately few, but also in an effort to reach out and help all the women in the church. Then we sincerely hope it will result indirectly in stirring up the men to greater endeavor, to a realization of their needs for better, broader preparation for their service.

It is doubtless true that we must pass through a preliminary stage before it will be possible for us to unite as one body, as members of the one divine family, as sons and as daughters of God, equal before him, and operating fully on a par in his service.

There has been a growing activity of women in the church in the past several years, and growing numbers have been appointed, especially the wives of missionaries, as colaborers in the field, recognizing the splendid strength they can and do bring to that work. Also some sisters go out into the field to represent the church in their special departments of nursing or in connection with department work. This is part of the broad platform of better service by all for the whole body, and is good so long as other vital duties are not neglected.

Duties of Branch Officers

An important series of articles to be re-published in early issues.

A series of articles was published in the HERALD some years ago with the above title, and later issued in tract form. The changes in the Book of Rules of Order and Debate have made necessary a revision, which has been done, and the series, by President Elbert A. Smith, will begin in the Pastoral Department of the HERALD in an early issue.

Every ordained man should have these for reference as well as the privilege of reading them as they appear. The subject is treated rather exhaustively in its various aspects.

On the 4th, Elder G. S. Kuykendall, former missionary, who has recently graduated from the chiropractic school at Davenport, Iowa, addressed the students at Graceland on "The science of chiropractic."

Are You Converted?

We are hearing much discussion in recent months concerning our economic platform, but we have not heard so much as we might concerning spiritual and moral reformation. It is not enough to have a few good articles well written, but permanent results will depend upon true conversion to that which is best.

Peter was closely associated with the Master through all of his service on earth. Yet Jesus raised the question of his conversion. He told his disciples—the Twelve—that there were many things he had to say to them, but they could not bear them yet. He said to Peter after his resurrection, "When thou art converted strengthen thy brethren."

We have heard the question raised to-day, If the twelve of that age were not fully converted, how is it to-day? The bishopric talk of consecration and of Zion. But how many are really converted? Are the high priests and seventy fully converted? Are the men of business, who have the means, as we think? But we should note that the Master did not ask us to ask ourselves whether anyone else was converted or whether our brother is doing his part. He did not ask Peter whether James or John was converted. But the question was to Peter, "Satan has desired to have thee that he might sift the children of the kingdom as wheat. When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren."

Peter held a position of great prominence. Much of the burden of the church rested upon him. Yet the principle applies to all of us—a personal question. We should see first that our own heart is right. Even the humblest can then do much to strengthen the brethren through faithful service, as well as through prayer.

It is not a question of who else is converted. But are you and I? Do we do unto others as we would have them do unto us? Do we think no evil? Do we think on those things that are lovely concerning our brothers and sisters, or do we seek out their faults and dwell thereon? Our first duty is to get right ourselves. Our second duty is to help others. The faith of no one else will ever save us. We must answer only for our own conduct before God. If we are right with him, it will be our joy to carry out his commandments. As he prayed, so will we pray, that the faith of our brethren fail not, and that they may be converted.

We are living in the hastening time. It is time to set our own house in order, and then with broad sympathy, charity, or the love of God for one another to help one another, and strengthen them for the work for which they are called.

The National Wealth

We have noted many times various discussions of who owns the wealth of the country, and as has been suggested before we should keep in mind the fact that the accumulated wealth or capital is composed of two elements, first, income; and second, the amount of savings. It is quite certain that annual income is not concentrated in a few hands, but is very widely distributed. This is seen in the continued improvement in the manner of living, in the owning of eight million automobiles by the American people, six million of which are of the type of passenger cars.

We are very strong for an equitable division of wealth and a better type of living by all, and for cooperative methods which will bring about the greatest efficiency of production, and that will give adequate returns for services rendered.

There is the difficulty that with many, saving is difficult, and the owner of a small number of shares of stock, as a rule, takes very little interest in the management. There are many who surrender their holdings very readily, whether it be a small amount of Government bonds, or whether it be in some industrial interest. The difficulty comes in the lack of self-denial, the lack of steady habits of economy and real thrift, and the lack of saving.

Still at the same time it appears to be undoubted that the standard of living in America is higher than anywhere else in the world, for the people as a whole, and that the standard of living is now much better than it was in America or anywhere else in ages past.

But when it comes to talk of wealth we must keep in mind the fact that we have no authentic figures on the distribution of wealth. The best to be had are in the form of approximation or estimates. There is nothing authoritatively known sufficient upon which to base a final argument, even though we at times refer to some published estimate.

As one illustration, every once in awhile figures are published from the probate court, tending to show that only a very small percentage leave a significant estate.

But anyone really familiar with the situation knows that such statements as these are nearly useless, and only in cases where a man dies without near relatives can the probate record be counted upon to show even with reasonable accuracy his wealth at time of death. Many further elements must be taken into consideration before we can properly evaluate probate figures. First: the habit of men in making advancement to their families. Many men have a horror of the difficulty of probate and make provision for their family aside from their estate, so that they will not lack funds during the period of probate. The property is put in the name of the spouse, or in the name of one or more of the children for this purpose, or deeded to a trustee.

Second: there are advancements made to the children to start them in business, to help them to purchase a home. So many fathers in this way distribute a part of their estate that the figures are significant.

Third: Many men place their property in the name of the wife, so that the probate records do not show the actual wealth of the man.

Fourth: Many men attempt to dispose of their property by deed. In fact, this is so common in expectation of death that it has been included in the Federal estate law, and in the inheritance tax law of many States. A deed given to the family within two years of death shall be counted as part of the inheritance.

Fifth: In English common law, which is in effect in many States in America, property held by the husband and wife jointly is held as tenants of the entirety. Such property does not come into probate.

Sixth: It is a common practice, where the estate consists of personal property, such as bonds, stocks, and the like, or jewelry, or money, for the estate to dispense with administration, and permit the heirs at law to make distribution among themselves.

Seventh: Even in the case of real estate land has gone for twenty and even thirty years without administration. Formerly this caused difficulty at time of sale, and some delayed administration was undertaken, but only sufficient to clear necessary title. However in many States, and the number is increasing, ten years bars all debts and clears the title without administration. We know of large estates of real property, in which there has been absolutely no administration.

Eighth: Others dispose of their property by trust deed, so as both to provide for their family, and also to protect them as well as themselves.

Finally, although it is not a separate class, many have deeded away all of their property before death for the sake of an annuity, or to provide for their children.

These are only some of the exceptions, but they mean that the probate figures are by no means a safe criterion, either of wealth, ability to earn, or ability to save. The figures are worth some passing consideration, but only when we give them their proper value, and take into consideration all of the other elements.

The income tax returns give a partial survey, fairly accurate as to income but not so much so as to wealth.

The Government has published other approximations, at various times, but we must recognize them as that—approximations.

The social problem is clear cut and vital and the place of certain economic measures is quite apparent, but the case is not strengthened by an attempt to proceed from erroneous premises with regard to gross wealth.

Was Paul a Misogynist?

Paul has been called a woman hater and opposer of marriage by different people, and many times has been so referred to by women and others who have read somewhat superficially.

The seventh chapter of 1 Corinthians is often referred to as proof, but if we take it in the Inspired Version, we are forced to rather a different conclusion than that ordinarily held.

The first verse there reads: "Now concerning the things whereof ye wrote unto me, saying, It is good for a man not to touch a woman. Nevertheless, I say, let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband." He continues: "Depart ye not one from the other, except it be with consent for a time." The whole chapter is well worth reading. It certainly does not sustain the view that he was either a woman hater or opposed to marriage, but quite the contrary. In fact this chapter shows a great deal of wisdom and of insight.

In the 6th verse he says distinctly, "Now what I speak is by permission, and not by commandment." He continues that he would that all men were even as he is; but every man has his proper gift. He says to the unmarried, "It is good for them if they abide even as I." But he continues at once, "But if they cannot abide, let them marry."

Then on the divorce question, beginning with the 10th verse, he speaks plainly, and says that it is of the Lord: "And unto the married I command, yet not I, but the Lord, Let not the wife depart from her husband; but and if she depart, let her remain unmarried, or be reconciled to her husband; but let not the husband put away his wife."

Then he continues:

"But to the rest speak I, not the Lord: If any brother hath a wife that believeth not, and she be pleased to dwell with him, let him not put her away. And the woman which hath a husband that believeth not, and if he be pleased to dwell with her, let her not leave him. For the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified by the husband; else were your children unclean; but now are they holy. But if the unbelieving depart, let him depart. A brother or a sister is not under bondage in such cases; but God hath called us to peace. For what knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband? or how knowest thou, O man, whether thou shalt save thy wife? But as God hath distributed to every man, as the Lord hath called every one, so let him walk. And so ordain I in all churches."

It is seen in this that he is speaking his own opinion. He urges strongly that husband and wife should remain faithful to each other. For he adds that they know not but that the faithful husband may save the wife, or vice versa, and by virtue of his authority as an apostle he so directs.

Then beginning with the twenty-fifth verse, he again says that he has no commandments of the Lord, but he gives his judgment as one who hath obtained mercy of God in order to meet the present distress (present at that time).

"Art thou bound unto a wife? seek not to be loosed. Art thou loosed from a wife? seek not a wife. But if thou marry, thou hast not sinned; and if a virgin marry, she hath not sinned. Nevertheless, such shall have trouble in the flesh. For I spare you not. But I speak unto you who are called unto the ministry. For this I say, brethren, the time that remaineth is but short, that ye shall be sent forth unto the ministry. Even they who have wives, shall be as though they had none; for ye are called and chosen to do the Lord's work. And it shall be with them who weep, as though they wept not; and them who rejoice, as though they rejoiced not, and them who buy, as though they possessed not; and them who use this world, as not using it; for the fashion of this world passeth away. But I would, brethren, that ye magnify your calling. I would have you without carefulness. For he who is unmarried, careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord; therefore he prevaileth. But he who is married, careth for the things that are of the world; how he may please his wife; therefore there is a difference, for he is hindered. There is a difference also, between a wife and a virgin. The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in spirit; but she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband. And this I speak for your own profit; not that I may cast a snare upon you, but for that which is comely, and that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction."

It is a plain statement showing considerable wisdom. It shows a desire upon his part for greater devotion to the work of the Master. He ignores, it is true, the distraction that the unmarried may have for those unmarried, and the claim young people have upon one another. Such distraction often far exceeds that which may be caused by a husband or wife, and especially is this true where the companion is devoted to the like cause, and desires to assist in like manner in forwarding the work of God.

The rest of the chapter continues in a similar strain, though it evidently is discussing a special condition, concerning which there are some traditions, yet the record is not entirely clear—but the principle underlying is clear. If young men and women can work for the sake of the Master and remain true to that cause, devoting their whole time and all their energies to God, Paul says it is well. But if they feel the need for marriage they also do well.

Of course some argument may be attached to the thirty-eighth verse, "So then he that giveth himself in marriage doeth well; but he that giveth himself not in marriage doeth better." Yet the whole argument shows that it is the opinion of Paul to meet some immediate problem then before the church. He has given it as his opinion and not as the revelation of the Lord. And he says for the ministry, that those who devote their time to its service, if they can do so, will in his view, choose the better course, for he hopes thereby they can accomplish more for the Master. He certainly was able to accomplish much, as most of the books of the present New Testament are ascribed to him. He evidently gave devoted service.

There is tradition or story to the effect that he was once married. The argument is based on the fact that he apparently sat in the Sanhedrin, since it says he was one of those who gave consent to the death of Stephen, and it is argued that none except married men or heads of families could sit in the Sanhedrin, and that his wife died young, and as a widower, or one bereaved, he devoted his time to the service of God, and we note in the close of the chapter that he returns to this theme, that widows are free to marry, but he thinks they would do better if they would remain faithful to their first love.

A careful reading of this chapter convinces us, not that Paul is a woman hater, but that instead he was a church official acting within his office, to decide a particular problem before him, on which he gave his judgment clearly, based on conditions then existing.

Working Conditions Better in America

Whiting Williams, an employer and a capitalist of large means, determined to make a personal investigation of conditions existing in labor in America, in steel mills, coal mines, and railroads. He spent seven months in that capacity under a nom de plume. The results of his investigation showed him very clearly the need for a readjustment of relations and of better treatment for the man who labors.

He has now just completed three months of the same kind of work in Great Britain. He made a living there without any introduction, but did not find it easy. In a recent issue of Collier's he gives six reasons why he prefers to work in America. The first reason is that it is easier to get a job in America than in Great Britain. In England he was told that it was necessary to have a union card, and have worked for several years with proof of having done so at the government employment offices. He found it as difficult to get past the gate.

The second reason is that on the whole there are better working conditions in America. There are some plants that are far from model in America, and some model plants in Great Britain, but on the whole the working conditions are better in America.

Third, the American job pays more money.

Fourth, the worker is expected by his neighbors to maintain a higher standard of living, so that he not only secures more money, but gets a better living out of it. Less goes for gambling and over the bar, and more for shoes and clothing and bettering of family conditions. This means better homes, trees on the streets and in the yard, porches, bathtubs, and autos, telephones, pianos, and phonographs. This is stated in a general way, but does not change the fact that many groups of foreigners who have come to this country were very much below the average; also that mining camps are often in miserable conditions.

Fifth, because there is better opportunity to get on, and to advance in the world, more of what we call ambition.

Sixth, the opportunity to give children education is better in America.

Wisdom of the Age

There is all too often the tendency to-day to infer that the ideas of the past are necessarily wrong. It is true that we are living in an age of most remarkable progress and development. There probably are more who have reached a certain degree of knowledge than has been the case in the past. But because we have progressed is no sign that all conclusions of the past are without validity.

It is well to prove all things, and hold fast to that which is good, and that which is true. But the very terms of our progress depend upon a proper amount of confidence in the research and conclusions of others. And when it comes to the customs of the race and the opinions of prominent men and reasoners of the past and present, we are confronted with the conclusions not of a few, but the results of the observations of mankind in general.

It is true that many of these conclusions are reached apparently without thought, and are subject to amendment. But it takes a considerable degree of conceit to place our own judgment at once as superior to that of all others. In law, ancient documents are presumed to be valid. In the realm of reason the conclusions reached by man, and handed down from age to age are presumably correct. The burden is upon those who would contradict, to show the contrary. The following extract by E. H. Hough, in Saturday Evening Post for October 9, 1920, is of interest:

"Millions of men have lived thousands of years and tried everything. The result of this experience has passed down from the first to the last generation. Anyone who bets on his judgment against the judgment of the world will be punished for folly. Look at the next fool you meet; even you can tell him how to avoid some of his troubles. Nature knows, and tells; everywhere there is an undercurrent of truth anyone may take advantage of—simple, but sufficient. No one ever thought a colt big enough to work when six months old, so we do agree on some things. When we do not know the truth we are carefully looking for it with further experiments. Philosophers are only bold men who write what others, being well trained in idealistic conventions, dare not write. The greatest philosopher is a mere man who records conditions he has long observed; much of his wisdom comes from the people with whom he is surrounded. . . .

"After a woman has studied life from bride to grandmother and been successful in all her roles, she has an amount of information that would do credit to an elderly judge, bishop, or doctor. . . .

"When a father gives his son good advice he is probably as wise as the sages of old; indeed, he is probably quoting them. Few children go astray as a result of taking the advice of a father or mother."

The Episcopalian minister in Independence recently advertised that he would speak on Mormonism Sunday morning and evening. At the morning service he had six of his own people present and five of our people; at the evening meeting there were eight of his people and about twelve of our own people. He stated that after nine years' experience in Independence he had concluded that the town is spiritually dead. He seems to have done little to help sustain or restore life. A man who can attract only a half dozen of his own congregation to hear a sermon is in a bad way as a critic of other churches. But those who heard the discourses aver that the majority of the worthy gentleman's followers showed excellent judgment in absenting themselves.

Subjects Being Discussed

A Problem of Civilization

The Manchester Guardian is quoted as stating a month ago that the English-speaking peoples either will go forward in a working unity or will go forward as rivals. And if they go forward as rivals, there can be no future to our civilization. It would seem to be equally clear, in this one instance alone, unless they can go forward in unity, there must be war, in which this country is directly involved.

The issue has been and is, if we insist on coming to a purely selfish basis, Is it better to have a few police in an effort to keep peace in the world, or to send ten million young men forth in a world war?

But as a church, that is not the test. The test is the spirit of right and of justice—an ensign lifted to the nations from

Review of Conditions in Britain When Cooperation Began

To anyone acquainted with the history of Britain from the reign of George I to the death of William IV it will not seem an exaggeration to say that this period was the worst which can be found in the entire history of the country.

The strength of the nation had been sapped by the continental wars, the American campaign, resulting in the loss of thirteen colonies, then the Napoleonic wars of which Professor Thorold Rogers says:

"Other wars have been as long as that which this country waged with France between 1793 and 1815 but none have been so costly, more desperate, none in which all the maxims of financial justice and financial wisdom were more thoroughly cast aside. . . . During this period, as indeed before and after English statesmen freely lavished the money and blood of the people, for it was a notable fact that the greater part of the taxes and loans raised were contributed by the workers and that the landed interests steadily refused to make equivalent sacrifices from their own resources."

Rent was trebled during the period, a forced and depreciated paper currency inflicted additional injury upon the people, and whatever Pitt's ability as a statesman may have been, as a financier he was the worst.

In 1815 the population of the United Kingdom was between nineteen and twenty millions; the taxation of the country was seventy-four and a half millions of pounds; the national debt was eight hundred and sixty millions of pounds; the annual charge was thirty-four millions. To raise this amount everything conceivable was taxed, and above all wheat, the people's food, owing to the prohibition of foreign corn, was almost at famine prices.

This was the outlook in 1815. In 1820 the Edinburgh Review wrote: "It is universally admitted that a falling off in the foreign demand for British manufactures is the immediate cause of the present want of employment. . . . In Lancashire the weavers are nearly destitute of fuel and clothing."

In 1829 Spencer Walpole's History recites, "Labor was so cheap men were employed to do the work of horses and oxen."

In Sussex men were employed at fourpence and threepence per day. (Eight and six cents.)

Of 1841 Lord Macaulay says, "So visible was the misery of the manufacturing towns that a man of sensibility could hardly bear to pass through them. Everywhere he found filth, nakedness, plaintive voices, wasted forms, and haggard faces."

Of 1844 Mrs. John Mills wrote: "The hardly earned flour was often so bad, so rotten, that when it was put in the oven to bake it soon came thick and warm trickling on to the hearth, was grabbed by little hands, and eaten in a trice, with father and mother standing by hungry and helpless and heartbroken."

Robert Peel, the prime minister of the day, said in 1843, "We are on the brink of a convulsion."

In 1846 Peel's ministry presented a bill for the repeal of the corn laws, which was passed by the Government. This proved to be the downfall of the Tory ministry, and in 1852 the Whig ministry with Lord John Russell as prime minister carried the free trade policy into every department of the British commerce. The change in the condition of the working people from this time, when the protective tariff was abolished and free trade was instituted can readily be seen by a brief glance at the statistics of exports signifying the amount of work done in Great Britain to supply the foreign markets.

In 1816 the exports were valued at forty-two millions of pounds.

In 1826 they had dropped to thirty-one million pounds.

In 1836 they had risen to fifty-one million pounds.

In 1847 they were valued at fifty-eight millions.

In 1857 they had risen to over one hundred and twenty-two millions.

Such, very briefly, was the condition of the social, economic, and industrial environments of the people when the twenty-eight Lancashire weavers in December of 1844 opened their famous store.

The following is an outline of the principles and purpose which these men had in view:

"The establishment of a store for the sale of provisions, clothing, etc.

"The building, purchasing, or erecting of a number of houses in which those members desiring to assist each other in improving their domestic and social condition may reside.

"The manufacture of such articles as the society may determine upon, to provide employment of such members as may be without employment or who may be suffering in consequence of repeated reductions in their wages.

"The purchasing or renting of an estate or estates of land, which shall be cultivated by members who may be out of employment or whose labor may be badly remunerated.

"And further, that as soon as practicable this society shall proceed to arrange the powers of production, distribution, education, and government; or in other words to establish a self-supporting home colony of united interests, or assist other societies in establishing such colonies."

What is curiously interesting to Latter Day Saints is the fact that this was the very purpose which they had in view in those days, and to which end the documents claiming to be of divine suggestion, at least, were directing the activities of the people. The several attempts at such ends had been frustrated, and at this very date, 1844, seemed to be within measurable distance of being realized, when the tragedy of that June morning—27th—shattered the dreams and scattered the people; but the ruling passion was strong even in the darkest hour of the church's degeneracy, and whatever the faults and sins of which "Mormonism" is guilty, it is at least a tribute to the sanity and efficiency of the cooperative methods which they employed and which they got from the teachings of Joseph Smith, that they have placed the United States under a perpetual obligation to them, for they have "tickled the barren wastes until they have laughed with greenery, and made the wilderness to blossom as the rose."

To-day the Order of Enoch cannot show a nobler or more altruistic program than this which has just been tabulated, born out of the cruel tribulations of the working people of northern Britain. Surely there is a striking evidence sustaining the philosophy of Doctor G. Stanley Hall, "History is the vindication of the ways of God to man." And it seems that in a careful study of the economic condition of the world at the time Smith gave his work would produce a rich harvest of irrefragable proofs sustaining his prophetic claims.

The system according to which these pioneers conducted their business was "sale at market price with cash payments and distribution of profits among members in proportion to the amount of their purchases."

There were obstacles in the way of progress but with increasing success from time to time the relief was secured in the enactment of Parliament. In 1846 legal recognition was given to Friendly societies, formed for frugal investment of the savings of their members, for better enabling them to purchase food, firing, clothes, or other necessities; or the tools or other implements of their trade or calling, or to provide for the education of their children or kindred.

In 1852 the industrial and provident act passed, which gave the cooperative societies the right to trade with others as well as their own members.

Finally, the act of 1862, called the magna charta of cooperation, permitted limited liability, and allowed registered societies to invest in other societies up to any amount, and so made possible the cooperative wholesale societies.

Then came the act of 1893 which has been quoted in a previous paragraph providing for the controlling of the cooperative societies by the registrar of Friendly societies.

The value of this registration is described by Professor Fay as follows:

"It acquires a legal personality with certain attendant advantages which are more or less the same in all countries, viz: the right of representation by officials, the right to sue and recover debts. The main obligation of registration is the keeping of proper books and the presentation annually of a correct balance sheet to the governmental authority."

Then there is the act of 1914 regulating transfer of shares. (Particulars not yet at hand.)

The philosophy of the legal history of the movement is this: that a body of people, few in numbers, poor in possessions, and insignificant in social standing, by honest, persistent devotion to practical idealism can move upon the national conscience and make even "the mother of Parliaments" accommodate herself to the new spirit and methods. It encourages the belief that all real and true democracies can stand in the presence of all the panoplied oppositions unafraid, if the people have a true vision of their purpose and will go to work with a faith and courage worthy of their cause. Prejudice, ignorance, heredity, money, and governments yield to the imperious demand of the people's will when the people know what they want and faithfully endeavor to secure their wants in righteous ways of self-help. It is axiomatic not only of the gospel of Christ but the history of philosophy, "There can be no mortal progress unless the people have unswerving faith in this—that the eternal powers are always on the side of right."

Construction of the Store

We give a brief outline of the construction and by-laws of the cooperative stores, using the Leeds Industrial Cooperative Society as the example:

The officers consist of a president, secretary, cashier, and a board of twelve directors. There is also an auditor and subcommittees.

All officers except subcommittees are elected by vote of the members at the annual meetings.

The general assembly is the democratic element and is made up of members holding at least two paid up shares having but one vote each.

Members of the general executive committee or the board of directors are the legal representatives of the society. They conduct the business and are responsible to the general assembly for their actions.

The balance sheet must be made out and audited by a professional auditor annually and a copy sent to the governmental authority.

The board of directors appoints subcommittees to attend to various departments of the business.

Membership in the society is obtained by the candidate making application at one of the stores and paying an entrance fee of one shilling or twenty-five cents. The name is then considered by the board of directors who approving of the name, authorize the issuance of a share book and a copy of the rules. However, the board have the right to reject an applicant and are not obliged to give reasons for rejection.

The value of each share is one pound or approximately $4.87. Full membership requires five such shares; two shares give such a member the right to attend the general meetings and exercise the right of franchise but he is not eligible to office. However, a person can join and upon the payment of the entrance fee can trade and secure all the advantages of dividend upon purchases.

If the applicant cannot pay his share capital in cash he can allow his dividend to accumulate and become share capital.

A member has the right to withdraw shares at any time upon notice being given, a graduated notice required according to the amount desired. However, the board have the right to withhold payment if in their judgment such withdrawal would jeopardize the welfare of the society.

The property of the society consists of two parts; to one of which the member has no claim whatever. This is the reserve fund or funds, however constituted; entrance fees, private donations or appropriations from the annual net profits. Only in the event of dissolution can individuals receive any share of these reserve funds. But if it is provided in the statutes in case of dissolution the funds are to be devoted to some object in the district the funds cannot be shared. It is the other part of the society's funds to which the retiring member has claim.

The interest paid on the share capital is always small for the obvious reason that those who needed their money least would in case of large interest make their gain at the expense of their fellow members who were not able to be so fortunate, and reduce as a consequence the amount which would be applicable to the dividend on purchases.

Usually, the profits of the society are apportioned as follows:

A percentage to the reserve fund; a percentage to the depreciation fund; a percentage to the education fund.

About four per cent interest on share capital is paid. The balance is divided as dividend on the amount purchased; by which is insured the greatest benefit to those who need and use the store most. Unearned increment is thus reduced to a minimum.

All trading is for cash, except in cases which may be approved by the board, and these are permitted to have credit to the amount of their investment in the society.

This is what is sometimes spoken of as the Rochdale system. It is the result of years and years of painful struggles, humiliating, and sometimes costly failures; but it stands to-day as the established principle of industrial cooperation and authorized by the unqualified success which witnesses to the scientific value it possesses.

Wherever this principle and method is put into operation, and given a fair opportunity by the community, and has the loyal support of its members, whether in Japan, India, Alaska, America, or Great Britain, it has succeeded and is succeeding. To be sure cooperation cannot succeed if the community acts as a refrigerator, or practices guerrilla warfare against it. Nor can it survive ignorance or incompetency; there must be persons in the management who are competent as well as enthusiastic. No system can escape the bankruptcy court unless there shall be brain as well as heart in the regulation of its affairs. We are even beginning to realize that this is true in our church matters, spiritual, politic, and fiscal.

The fact that all societies have a rule which provides that each member shall purchase a given amount of goods from the store in order to retain membership proves that stringent methods must be adopted to educate the people to loyalty to principle.

Economic, Industrial, and Social Value of Cooperation

In concluding we call attention to the value of the cooperative principle to us as a church in the economic, industrial, and social aspects of our communal activities, and especially in view of the fact we must never lose sight of, viz: we are pledged to the organization of a community in which the whole life shall be developed under the ethics of Christ. That life must be considered in its economic, industrial, and social aspects as well as what we call the spiritual. To specialize on the latter and cultivate a taste for prayer meetings and even produce connoisseurs of sermons may be all very well, but while we do not live by bread alone, we cannot live without it; and as already intimated, the ways and means of producing bread together with the purposes to which the result of that bread shall be directed will, if I am not mistaken in the meaning of the Bible, be the foundation of our spiritual and eternal destiny.

When we speak of the economical aspect of life—according to Ruskin—we mean at least these three things:

The application of labor.

The utilization of the results of that labor.

The distribution of the benefits of labor.

Among the chief causes of life's misery is the uncertainty of work, the misfits of the economic world, and the general inequalities of the labor world. Some who want work and could do it are denied; others are square pegs in round holes, and vice versa. Again others work hard and long and do not get a competency; others do nothing and get much; and there is a long list of every shading in between these two extremes.

Then so much is produced which is not useful, therefore unnecessary; and too little of what is really needed is produced.

This is the most bewildering problem of the social reformer as Professor Chapman, late of Oxford University, said: "An ideal social system should secure that each person shall be brought to the task most appropriate to his powers."

This particular problem is dealt with in a highly successful manner by the Cooperative Union which has charge of the educational and political interests. This union reporting to the Dublin Congress of 1914, through the chairman of the central education committee, Mr. W. R. Rae, outlined the program of that committee which met with the indorsement of the board. This program included the following items:

First: Training of junior employees, assisting in promoting classes for salesmen and managers.

Second: Promoting classes, lectures, and other means for increasing the knowledge of aims and objects of cooperation among the members.

This is the only way to minimize the evil of economic misfits; and to obtain the best results of cooperative trading.

As remarked by Professor Fay: "The store is at once an efficient method of conducting business, a school for social virtues for the working class, and a movement which is silently reshaping one part of our industrial life."

In so far as the cooperative employee is under the criticism of a democracy, who through the expert boards and committees watch the results, it follows that cooperation produces the employees "most appropriate to the task," in the same manner as the municipal ownership of Great Britain and the commission form of government here does in civic affairs. Further, it is a decided gain to the economic life of the community to have the workers contented, and so abolish the expensive and vexatious labor disputes; the fact also that cooperative workers are paid the highest wages and work the fewest hours under the best conditions, proves that such a method is economical to all parties concerned, for the best of labor is applied to the most useful tasks in a way producing the maximum amount of satisfaction with a minimum of friction.

Economy is also realized in that through cooperation there is more accurate knowledge of the goods demanded for consumption, so that little uncalled-for stock is carried; there is no need for expensive and elaborate advertisement, because members voluntarily patronize their own store. A tremendous saving is thus realized through these features of economy.

Then there is the abolition of unnecessary rents, taxes, light, and other regular accounts of a similar kind, the reduction of accessories and equipment, wages, etc., which in the competitive method of doing business are multiplied and the consumers have to pay to that extent increased retail prices.

It is clear that the increase in the cost of living is not because of nature's decreasing generosity, for all statistics show that our facilities for the increase in production of raw materials, and our equipment for manufacturing have all wonderfully improved, and the output therefore increased with less labor. The trouble is in our methods of distribution and the rivalries and competition associated therewith. The greatest economic leakage is between the manufacturer and the consumer, in other words the middleman—the conveyancers take most of the price paid by the consumer. Cooperation has eliminated many of these expenses, and proved that at least the consumer can be supplied with more efficiency and at less expense than by means of the competitive systems.

Then, the cash trading instead of the credit trading, the supplying of the best quality of goods at honest prices, and the sharing of the profits in the way of dividend on purchases, all encourage thrift, demand for quality in preference to mere cheapness, (in which some one is sure to suffer, cheapness being the result of some one's misfortune or some one's imposition): finally, the one who needs the most, under the cooperation scheme secures the greatest benefit as a result of cooperative trading.

This system of deferred benefit is much more economical than to adopt the method advocated by Owen and some others even to-day, namely, "price without profit." Under the dividend system all the advantages of the "price without profit" system offers are secured without any of the inevitable disadvantages. Selling at market prices provides the necessary margin to cover all concomitant expenses, which under any circumstance would exist; then it does not arouse antagonisms among the competing merchants, and finally whatever savings accrue are "bulked," which means a great deal. For a gain of five or ten cents on an individual purchase is negligible, but at the end of the half year the five or ten dollars accumulated is worth while.

Industrially, cooperation has alleviated many of the hardships under which the workers suffered and at the same time has converted many dependents into self-sustaining and directing agents. We all understand that the more a worker has to depend upon others to direct him in his work the less he is worth to the community; and, as he shall become capable of self-control industrially, the greater his value to the community. With the widening and extending of the store as the base of cooperative activities the superstructure has grown stronger and widened the field of its operations. The consumers who had only their labor to depend upon for the powers to purchase, through cooperation have been enabled to employ themselves, instead of selling their labor to others for the production of those commodities which were for their own consumption and so enrich those who thus exploited their labors they organized themselves and produced what they needed and distributed it to themselves.

By this means the industrial class has been raised to a higher standard, and within the limits of cooperation has been converted into a self-governing, thrifty, and responsible commonwealth; and so produced a social value the importance of which it is impossible to overestimate.

The following results are of the utmost value to society at large, and through cooperation they are in concrete evidence:

1. It has introduced and educated the working class to the task of self-government.

2. It has made him a cash trader.
3. It has induced thrift and investment.

4. It has made altruism a real working basis of industrial and economic activities, and produced a glory of sacrifice in which the education and improvement of others and themselves for others' good are the directed aims.

A movement which can relieve the community of the task and expense of governing others either unable or unwilling to govern themselves, by teaching and assisting the "governed" to govern themselves is a decided gain in every way. A casual glance at the enormous expense society is put to for the protection of the public from crime, disease, and pauperism, to say nothing of the amount of waste which is incurred by taking care of these classes, together with the diseased and imbecile, will give one some idea of what could be saved and employed to constructive purposes, if men and women were made equal to the task of governing themselves.

We all know of the insidious power of debt and how through its influence the unfortunate are victimized and the rapacious are brutalized. Debt is always the enemy of honesty and refinement. Freedom and dignity are impossible where debt rules. Credit destroys the sense of responsibility and thrift. Many purchases are made and contracts made because of the irresponsibility of credit which under a cash system would not be made. It is not an exaggeration to say that the irresponsibility of credit and the prevalence of debt is one of the acutest problems of American social life. Cooperation solves the problem to a very large extent, and saves the ignominy and burden of debt which some one has to carry and withal pay in default of the contracting party; how, it is not germane to my subject to inquire.

Cooperation encourages the saving and investment of the accumulated dividends where it may not be needed for other purchases. It is the custom with many cooperators to reinforce their wardrobes out of the periodical receipts of dividend, or improve their homes or furnish them, some providing the annual holiday out of the dividends accumulating, and in not a few cases tithing to the church has been paid out of these dividends. The establishment of cooperative building societies and the increase of the numbers who either own or are purchasing their homes is cumulative testimony to the social value of the cooperative movement. It is also a positive fact that the working classes have to-day more money invested to their credit and profit in countries where cooperation flourishes than at any other time.

Finally, the development of the altruistic spirit and the improved morale of the people as expressed in the public life of the people all the way from village "mutual improvement societies" to the universities; the lecture courses and the cultivation of choral and instrumental music, the establishment of libraries, recreation and reading rooms, educational advantages, clubs and excursions all conspiring to make the distinguished record of British cooperation. The end is not yet in sight, as each year brings some new problems, witnesses some new triumph, unlocks the door to some new enterprises, and with perennial freshness is adapting itself to minister to the increasing needs of its devotees.

It is impossible to foreshadow its end, "For the synthesis of cooperation centers about a common and original impulse of man, which inspires him, whatever be his environment, to make his weakness strength by the simple plan of joining with others who are similarly conditioned, in pursuit of a goal, which can be attained in proportion as he is prepared to coordinate his own interests with those of his fellows."

Such a movement with such a spirit and such an ideal has unlimited capabilities.

Taking into consideration these features which cooperation has used so splendidly and victoriously against all opposing influences, we as a church, confronting the same tasks economically, industrially, and socially, can take heart of grace and attack our problem with this same weapon and lay down the foundations of Zion by adopting this principle and method.

Think of the numbers in the church who are farming and their produce is acquired by the commission agents, and then a multitude of our church members are in the retail business and have to purchase that selfsame produce, sold by the commission agent, and in turn these church retailers bring those same goods to our church consumers. Church farmers, manufacturers, retailers, and consumers are putting money into the pockets of the nonchurch (mostly) exploiters.

Think of the enormous amount of money which is spent annually in life, stock, and property insurance against sickness, accident, fire, tornado, and death; all of this money need not be poured into the coffers of the great organizations of the world.

Think of the numbers of skilled workingmen in the church who are working to enrich some individuals and are employed to produce the very things which we are needing as a community, and think also of the numbers of our brethren who are unemployed or working for distressingly small wages. A sorrowful procession early in the morning is carried out of Independence to Kansas City, not properly rested, nor properly fed, nor properly clothed; they work hard and long for a wage which is admittedly too small, and then the same wearisome procession returns, worn out and broken, at night.

What do we need to change this abject spectacle of the church's failure into a glowing picture of united, self-governing, and prosperous endeavor? Not money—we have more than enough. Not talent—we have more than the average. Not will—our people are straining and begging to be allowed to do something. What is needed is intelligent organization and the application of this cooperative principle and method to the everyday concerns of life.

Give them a lead, show them how to commence, and give them the opportunity, and they have money, wit, common sense, and will galore.

When we all see eye to eye, and labor together under the inspiration of the Great Ideal of Zion we shall then sing with heartening fervor:

"Then the towers of Zion glittered
Like the sun in yonder sky."

Not as history of what has been or prophecy of what will be but of experience—what is.

President G. N. Briggs has offered a silver cup to the society at Graceland which at the end of the school year has the highest number of points in the following: Debate, academy declamatory contest, college declamatory contest, extemporaneous speaking, short story writing. Any of the three societies may enter as many contestants as they wish, and the points won by the individual members will be counted. The ownership of the cup is retained for one year except when one society retains it for three successive years, when it is to become its permanent property and will be suitably engraved. The three societies which have succeeded the Athenian Literary Society, are, alphabetically listed: Alpha Pi Sigmas, Niketes, Victorians.

Elder W. I. Newman, of 30 Clinton Avenue, Stratford, Connecticut, is preparing a stereopticon lecture on the Restoration and its subsequent history. He would like to have the Saints loan him anything in the way of pictures that would allow him to develop this material. Same will be reproduced and returned without injury. He wants some good photographs of church buildings.

Who Will Have Part in the First Resurrection?

By Peter M. Hinds

"All who aspire to a higher plane of existence and are willing to obey the laws necessary to attain that condition."

There is quite a variety of opinions among the people of the world as to who will come forth in the first resurrection, which will take place when the Savior comes to set up his kingdom. This is a question in which we all should be interested, because of the importance of whether or not we will have a part therein.

We are informed by the Scriptures that at the Savior's appearing an angel will sound his trumpet both long and loud, and all nations will hear it together. Then will those who heard and obeyed the gospel in this life come forth from their graves. (Doctrine and Covenants 85:27.) Then at the second sounding of the trumpet, those who did not hear, or having heard did not obey in this life, but later heard and obeyed the gospel in the prison house, will also be resurrected. (Doctrine and Covenants 85:28.)

And the heathen nations who knew no divine law here will also share in the first resurrection. (Doctrine and Covenants 45:10.) I understand this to apply to those who have good impulses and are inclined to do right. Those who are evilly disposed and prefer wickedness will not be included, for even the heathen have a conscious sense of right and wrong to a limited extent, their conscience approving or condemning them according to the nature of their actions. (Romans 2:14, 15.)

And all little children who died before reaching the years of accountability will also share in this resurrection, for they are without sin, and are held up before us as a standard of purity for us to attain to. (Matthew 18:3.) There will be little children in the millennium, at least in the earlier part of it. (Isaiah 11:6-8; 65:20-23; Doctrine and Covenants 45:10; 63:13.)

Then they can grow up and develop both intellectually and physically. Then they will have the opportunity to hear the gospel and obey it the same as if they had lived to old age in this life. And those who refuse obedience to God's laws and become wicked will suffer loss. (Isaiah 65:20.)

To briefly summarize, I understand that all those who aspire to a higher plane of existence, and are willing to obey the laws necessary to attain that condition, will arise from the dead and live during this golden age. Because through the binding of the powers of darkness, and the improved environments that will prevail on the earth then, will make it favorable for all to become pure and free from the effects of sin, and there will be nothing to hinder the progress of each individual unless it is his own backwardness.

The Independence Examiner states that Missouri ranks second in the shoe manufacturing States, Massachusetts being first. It has 55 manufacturers of footwear, who turned out 38,667,253 pair of boots, shoes, and slippers last year, valued at over $140,000,000. The Holden Progress comments that Missouri probably also raised most of the hides for these shoes.

One result of the election was that Judge Ben B. Lindsey of Denver was reelected juvenile judge. He received a majority of 23,000 over his opponents. Judge Lindsey ran on the democratic ticket, and polled a total vote of 46,000, which would mean 23,000 for his opponent. In the same precinct the republican presidential and vice presidential candidates received about 44,000. That is a personal tribute of 21,000 votes, and shows that the people of Denver appreciate the work that Judge Lindsey has been doing.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

AN EXPERIMENT IN CAFFEINE

[The following article, written by George S. Snoddy, Ph. D., Professor of Psychology, University of Utah, reports the results of late experiments in that department. It appears in the Improvement Era for November, 1920. We are reprinting it here by permission.]

Caffeine which is found in tea, coffee, coca cola, and other stimulants has been considered to be in fact a stimulant. The result of these experiments, however, show that while it is called a stimulant it so acts only on the lower mental faculties; and its effect upon the higher mental faculties is as a depressant, and may in some instances eliminate the higher. These experiments show that the use of caffeine does not help clear thinking, and that it does not increase, but rather decreases spiritual power.

We think this article should be of interest in connection with some recent discussions concerning the Word of Wisdom and hot drinks. The promise of the Lord is great indeed to us if we refrain from the use of wines, nicotines, and hot drinks, that we shall find wisdom and great treasures of knowledge, even to hidden treasures. It means greater spiritual and mental power if we keep the Word of Wisdom in this particular.—EDITORS.]

During the spring of 1920, the department of psychology in the University of Utah devised a set of experiments to show the effect of caffeine upon mental activity. It is a matter of common knowledge that tea, coffee, coca cola, and many other stimulants and beverages contain caffeine. A number of experiments have been conducted in the United States and in Germany upon the effect of caffeine on mental activity, but in the main these experiments have been of little value, largely due to the failure of the experimenters to properly isolate the mental activities concerned.

Our own experiment was carefully planned so as to reveal the effect upon two sorts of mental activity—(1) those functions carried out by the high brain centers, and (2) those involved in the functioning of the low brain centers. It will be of value to the layman to know that the mental activities dependent upon the functioning of the high brain centers are those that function in sustained and deliberate thought, such as is characteristic of one's mental activity during the solution of a difficult problem; while those functions dependent upon the activity of the low brain centers are of the automatic character, such as the simple addition of numbers in the case of an individual highly skilled in adding numbers, or the carrying out of any muscular act involving no mental discrimination or deliberation.

Our results showed conclusively that the effect of the caffeine was to retard or inhibit the functioning of the high brain centers and thus retard or interfere with concentrated or deliberate thought; while the effect upon the low brain centers was clearly that of stimulation or exaltation of functioning. This means that any activity which is of the much practiced or automatic sort would be stimulated and consequently much speeded up by the effect of the caffeine, while that mental activity involving deliberation or analysis would be very greatly interfered with if not completely eliminated.

It is of great interest to observe that during the experiment the subjects who participated expected to find all of their mental functions greatly stimulated, while the results of the experiment clearly indicate that many of the important functions are almost wholly suppressed. The fact of stimulation, however, with the consequent false opinion of the subject, is interesting because it clearly shows why many of the users of caffeine continue its use. Another point along this line is also of interest. One phase of our experiment introduced a considerable amount of excitement. The results showed that this excitement had the same effect, although to a lesser extent, as the caffeine itself. From this one can see that the effect of the caffeine is to produce a kind of excitement—the very sort of thing which common experience shows us not to be desirable when it is necessary to do an important piece of mental work.

The results also indicate that those who had had a considerable amount of adaptation to the use of caffeine were not so much affected as those who had not been in the habit of using the drug in any form; although it is worth while to note that these habituated people were always very much more affected than they thought they would be. The experiment indicates that a certain amount of adaptation takes place through the repeated use of the drug over a long period of time, yet this adaptation is considerably less than the average person is likely to believe, and in some cases is scarcely discernible.—Improvement Era, November, 1920.

PREHISTORIC CORN IN SOUTHWESTERN COLORADO

Archæologist's discoveries most important in decades. Jean Allard Jeancon of United States Bureau of Ethnology tells of unearthing remains of ancient extensive irrigation works and stone towers.

A prehistoric granary filled with ears of corn on which the kernels are still intact; cleverly-built stone towers, square, oblong, and round; vast communal houses; remains of extensive irrigation works; one ruin that covers nine and a half acres of ground and is still three stories in height; ruins with one large circular room in the center, with rooms radiating from this like the spokes of a wheel, something entirely unknown to archæologists.

Those are a few of the discoveries made in the southwestern corner of Colorado by Jean Allard Jeancon, field representative of the United States Bureau of Ethnology, Washington. Word of this, the most important find in the records of archæology in decades, has just been brought to Denver by Mr. Jeancon.

The eye of science the past summer and early autumn lighted on mystery-wrapped signposts that have been passed by in ignorance in the great stretch extending from below Grand Junction to Pagosa Springs. Much of this territory has never felt the foot of the white man. The archæologist, on fire with the bigness of his discoveries, believes that Colorado now holds the key to the secrets of this vanished people. At an open meeting of the State Historical and Natural History Society, to which the public is urged, Monday at 8 p. m., in the house of representatives chamber in the State capitol, Mr. Jeancon will relate what he has seen in a recital that is fascinating in its weird mystery.

Has Been in Game for Twenty Years

The man who is the first to bring to the world word of the newly-found treasures of antiquity has been an archæologist for twenty years; has lived with and been adopted by the Petewa Indians in Santa Clara, New Mexico, and has devoted his explorations to many sections of New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, and southwestern Colorado. His success has been largely due, he says, to the kindness of his Indian friends, who know of these regions by traditions and have place names in their own language for the archæological treasures. He has studied the Utes, Pueblos, Arapahoe and Navaho Indians, has been the assistant to Doctor J. Walter Fewkes on the Mesa Verde work, now protected by the United States Government as a national park, and in his own work has made excavations at Taos, New Mexico, and explored the La Jara canyon in New Mexico, and the Montezuma valley in Colorado. In 1911 he excavated the ruins in the Rio Oso, a branch of the Chama River in New Mexico. That collection was obtained by the El Paso County Pioneers' Association and is in the county courthouse at Colorado Springs.

"We have no authentic knowledge of where these prehistoric peoples came from," says Mr. Jeancon. "It is generally conceded by scientists that all our North American Indians are of Asiatic origin. To assist in the study two things are necessary—the mapping of southwestern Colorado and a determining to what era the different types of ruins belong.

"The making of a good archæological map should be followed by excavation under scientific direction, and then the study not alone of the articles taken from the ruins, but the buildings themselves. Scientific research so far has brought out that when these people first came into the southwest they were more or less nomadic. They carried corn with them, or perhaps discovered it in southwestern Colorado, and this was the most important element that induced them to become a sedentary people. The necessity for procuring food for winter was obviated.

Removed to Caves for the Winter

"When they first came they lived in semisubterranean houses of one, two, or three rooms with plastered walls and roofs composed of logs similar to those used by the Navaho as a winter hogan, or house. Probably this type of dwelling was not sufficient to protect them in the winter so they removed to the caves. Here by slow growth the wall building process was evolved and southwestern Colorado affords us the highest type of architecture along these lines. This type is distinctly individual and unique. Cliff dwellings are found in many parts of the world—France, Italy, China, and many other places.

"All these have distinctive features and many of them are still inhabited, but in southwestern Colorado we have houses built within the sheltering caverns of the cliffs, on the mesa tops, and in the valleys which cannot be duplicated in any other portion of the globe. With the exception of Mesa Verde National Park these places are unexplored and a scientific survey will undoubtedly disclose many features that are at present unknown, the excavations giving abundant material which will tend toward solving the mystery of these vanished people.

"Are the people of Colorado going to permit outside universities, museums, and the Federal Government to develop all this work and to carry the material away from their own State, or are they going to make a serious effort to preserve these priceless, irreplaceable things for themselves? Aside from the scientific part, Colorado is going to become a mecca for students, tourists, all classes, and one of the big show places of the United States.

Wild Country Will Be Opened Up

"Should the present plans of the State Historical and Natural History Society mature and be put into effect the now wild and unknown country will be thoroughly opened up to the student and sightseer. It is vitally important that the people of the State should support this society in its endeavors, or we will see this vast mine of scientific data appropriated by persons who are only interested in Colorado for what they can take out of it without giving anything in return.

"Take the McElmo Canyon, for instance. Here there are many natural formations, beside which the Garden of the Gods dwarfs into insignificance. High up on the benches and tops of the mesas and in the canyons leading from the main McElmo are ruins of many types. Ruin Canyon is spectacular beyond words, with its variety of towers, square, oblong, and round; vast communal houses, and its wild scenery.

"In Sand Creek I found a granary in which the corncobs still remain to a depth of seven feet. The lower layers still have the grains of corn on the cobs, the upper ones having been eaten off by squirrels and mountain rats. In Rock Creek are remains of extensive irrigation works; ditches leading in many directions can be traced for a long distance. At the foot of Sleeping Ute Mountain is a ruin nine and one half acres in extent, and it is still three stories in height in places. In the northern portions of Montezuma Valley are circular ruins with one large circular room in the center with rooms radiating from this as the spokes of a wheel radiate from the hub. The use of this type of ruins is entirely unknown; possibly it may have been a purely ceremonial building, such as the Sun Temple on Mesa Verde. There are only a very few buildings of this type known.

Many Sites Chosen for Defenses

"Many of the sites chosen in the canyons were undoubtedly for purely defensive purposes; others were agricultural sites. It is still the custom among many of the Pueblo people who are, in part, the descendants of the pre-Spanish people of southwestern Colorado, to leave their villages and build shelters close to fields where they are working during the summer. There is no doubt that the ancients did the same, as the stone buildings we found in connection with irrigating works and the fields are of inferior workmanship and show only a temporary occupation.

"These prehistoric people raised beans, squashes, gourds, short staple cotton, and possibly potatoes. Although no remains of potatoes have ever been found, the Hopis have a plant with small tubers which is native to the southwest and which corresponds to the wild potato found in Peru. Isn't it, therefore, possible and probable that these people in southwestern Colorado had the same plant?

"It would take more space than you would give me in this interview to describe the wonderful pottery, baskets, and other things that these people made. The museums of Berlin, Paris, and Stockholm have better collections of the pre-Spanish people than we have in this country, and they are from southwestern Colorado. The foreign scientists swooped down on the Mesa Verde before the Government took it over and had the first and best pick of the relics. In this new and greater find in a territory heavy with more wonderful antiquities, Colorado has the opportunity of keeping in her borders, if she only will act, material for unrivaled collections that will make this State for all time the authority as well as the mecca for scientists and all interested."—Joseph Emerson Smith, in The Denver Post, October 31, 1920.

CLIFF DWELLER RUINS FOUND

DENVER, COLORADO, November 25.—Discovery of what is said to be prehistoric ruins of two cliff dwelling settlements in a canyon west of the junction of the Yamo and Green Rivers, in a remote section of the southwestern corner of Colorado, has been reported by Professor Jean A. Jeancon, agent of the United States Bureau of Ethnology.

James Loftus, ranchman, of Youghai, Colorado, brought word of the findings together with a description of the ruins here to-day.

Discoveries of incalculable value to science and history have been made in the ruins, according to Professor Jeancon.

Homesteaders' curiosity aroused by the ancient and peculiar canyon walls and overhanging ledges, partially eclipsed by "the long deep opening, resembling a great pair of lips with flat, stone-colored teeth," led Loftus to make an investigation of the ruins, he said to-day.

In the rooms he declared he found wicker baskets filled with what appeared to be grain. Two skeletons were found in one of the rooms. Pieces of pottery and baked clay were littered about the floor of the houses.

Professor Jeancon is in Colorado for the purpose of investigating the antiquities of the State. These discoveries, together with similar ones of the western slope recently, have been reported to Washington.—Des Moines Register, November 26, 1920.

HYMNS AND POEMS

Consecration

By F. A. W. Kettlewell

(Tune: Zion's Praises No. 201.)

Have you helped to build up Zion
By donating all your might?
God has ordered; you have sanctioned;
So you surely have a right.
'Tis a dominating feature
Of the Saints of latter days.
Let us build the auditorium
And to Heaven we'll give the praise.

Chorus:

Tell me, brother, have you pledged it
Till you know your duty's done?
Then we'll start to build up Zion
With an auditorium.

In a vision of the future
That was given unto me
'Tis a glorious commencement
Of the commonwealth to be;
Filled with wonder and amazement
As I gazed upon the scene,
In a panoramic picture,
Zion thrown upon the screen.

Workshops, factories, stores, and houses,
To supply our earthly need.
When we gather home to Zion
From pollution, want, and greed,
We shall worship in the temple
And convene with one accord
In the auditorium building
We've erected to the Lord.

The Lilies of Salvation

By Lettie F. Bartlett

Touched by the lilies pure
Of wondrous love untold,
Wakened as from troubled dreams,
Lord, thee I now behold.

Chorus:

Now I feel that thou wilt save
In thy mercy wide;
If I will but follow thee,
As a little child.

Now I feel the sacredness
Of thy presence, Lord.
Oh, forgive me for the years,
That thee, I have ignored.

Once my wayward heart was filled
By worldly thoughts alone;
Now my soul thy love has thrilled;
O Lord, may I atone!

Educate men without religion, and you make them but clever devils.—Duke of Wellington.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

Field of Birth Registration Enlarged

It has been gratifying to note how, as our cradle roll work is becoming better understood and its value to the child is made plain to the mothers and cradle roll visitors, the desire has grown to have its advantages extended to the other small children in the homes. We undertook, at first, to register only the new babies, not knowing how quickly the membership at large would "take" to the changes introduced in this department. Now, however, in response to urgent appeal, the general executive has recently voted to enlarge the area of this birth registration to include all children under three years of age, in order that they, too, may thus be placed directly under the care of the church through its health department.

Will the cradle roll visitors please take notice of this action, and feel that they are thus privileged to register such children? In doing so, please note that you are to use the "Birth Record" for the first recording of any child, no matter what its age may be. There are certain items of information asked for in that record which are not upon the "Health Record," which latter is to be used for all later reports of the same child.

Always fill out two exactly alike and mail to our office. What items asked for in the blank are impossible to obtain at the time you examine and report the child, just pass over, filling out carefully, however, with all the information obtainable.

There has been some delay in obtaining the certificates of registration with the church recorder. We regret this, but feel sure that the near future will see this department in good working order. Sister Rogene B. Smith, who is to care for these records, has but lately returned from a sojourn in the West, and is entering into this cradle roll work with characteristic enthusiasm and efficiency. She sees a practically unlimited field of welfare work to be carried on in this department, and we may hope for much of a constructive nature from her devotion to the work.

The cradle roll work in Zion has been placed under the care of Sister Halley, a kindergartner, and one who loves children well enough to work zealously for their welfare. She and Sister Hunt, the organizer, are planning and effecting a complete organization along this line, which gives promise of some very constructive work in the future. Supervision of play, and the caring for small children that the mothers may be permitted to study with the classes in mothercraft or child care, are two features under consideration.

The cradle roll work in the Kansas City Stake has had a little impetus given to it in the little party, account of which is presented elsewhere. It was sent in by Sister Nel Scott, the energetic superintendent of this division for the stake. The enthusiasm of these sisters may well be emulated by others, and we may look for frequent "live-wire" activities from this source.

In Lamoni Stake, Sister Callie, B. Stebbins had her corps of cradle roll visitors get together to listen to an address by Sister Laura Mann, R. N., who is not only nursing director to the church, but the head of the health division of our Women's Department, and the one in direct charge of the cradle roll records from the health standpoint.

In connection with this item we are pleased to receive note that steps are being taken in Lamoni towards the opening of a "nursery," where babies may be cared for during the Sunday school hour. Lamoni mothers have some interesting classes in both Sunday school and Religio, and this move is to permit all who would to enjoy those opportunities. The combined consecration of the mothers and the cradle roll visitors should assure this venture the highest degree of success. In the organization of our Women's Department in Lamoni this fall a sister was chosen in each group to plan for similar work in connection with the group study hour. Often mothers of young children recognize their need for study along the lines of child training, and yet cannot take advantage of the opportunities offered, because of the necessity of caring for their families. Cooperation plays a great part in such cases, and, with kindly thought and care for each other, brings the mother and the opportunity together happily. This is the typical latter-day spirit—a reflection of that "glory" of old, when, as is recorded of Enoch's band, "each one sought the good of his neighbor."

Address to Cradle Roll Workers, Cradle Roll Babies, and Their Mothers

Since the supervision of the cradle roll department has been transferred to the Women's Department we wish to bid our cradle roll babies a hearty welcome into our department of church work and trust that, under the guidance of their mothers and of these cradle roll workers, who stand as sponsors and as godmothers to these children, they will always retain their membership with us.

They have joined us at an early age, earlier than is usual, for formerly children must be eleven years of age, (Oriole age,) before they could enter the Women's Department. But we are always glad to have new blood in the women's organization and are accepting our responsibilities joyfully. Just how well we will fulfill them will depend on the efforts of each individual worker in the department.

These children represent the beginning of life. When they came into the world they found that loving hearts had planned for them, a mother's breast awaited them, and a father's care protected them. That's how we all came into the world—somebody dreamed, and longed, and loved, and so we came.

Every mother here should realize that mothers are the most important persons in the world. One writer said that "the Lord could not be everywhere so he made mothers"—evidently to help him rear the human race. Another writer says, "A precious gift God gave when he smiled, and sent into the home nest a beautiful child." Look where you will, the most wonderful and beautiful sight in the world is the look in the face of a mother, as she welcomes her child.

I presume that every mother here realizes that the first six years of her child's life are the most important years for its training.

One reason for our cradle roll department is that our children can be brought in touch with the Sunday school and the influences of the church in the early and impressionable years of their lives.

To make the most of our children we must know them well, learn their weaknesses and their strength, and be able to teach them the best possible use of both weakness and strength. It has been said that the secret of child training is to put yourself in the child's place. If you have ever had a disobedient child, it will help you to understand the situation, if for just a moment you can put yourself in the child's place, in the same environment, at the same time. You will then be able to see just why he acted as he did.

Behind the vicious temper that we find in some children, there is usually strong will power, originality, and emotional energy. There is great energy, great determination, great thoroughness, and great destructiveness. It could not be expected of such a child to act like one of a mild disposition.

Behind the restlessness and nervousness of the high-strung child there may be an original mind, great initiative, and a lively imagination struggling for expression. These should not be crushed, but should be encouraged and developed in right directions.

The quiet child that pleases us so much, our "goody-goody" child, may turn out a serious problem, for we must not forget the old adage, "Still water runs deep." Such a child may be gentle and yielding; he may let you make his decisions for him; he may never oppose your will; but in the years to come, you may have cause to blame him for having no will of his own. You may find him lacking in initiative, in originality, and in self-dependency. So carefully study your child if you would know him and be able to train him aright.

These problems that confront mothers need not discourage you. The whole history of human greatness is the history of mothers who have done what they could. Some of these were neglected in life, and perhaps forgotten after death when the names of their great sons and daughters have been written high on the scroll of fame. It is the mother who bears the children, and thus she bears the world's load, but finds her recompense in thus sharing in the creation of human greatness and genius, often in spite of unfavorable heritages through the father of her children.

We need only to turn back the pages of history to verify this. The mother of Shakespeare married a feeble-willed, incompetent sort of a man. In spite of his weakness she gave to the world that great writer, Shakespeare. Beethoven's father was a drunken tenor singer, and history tells us that his name appeared more often on the police court records than on concert programs. Napoleon's father was another interesting weakling, whose wife bore children before she was fifteen years of age, coming back from a battlefield to give birth to Napoleon. It was the mother who gave him his power and his genius, saved his money for him, and stuck to him when he was a prisoner at Saint Helena abandoned by others. The mother of Lincoln, Nancy Hanks, was a giantess of American pioneer days, married to a feeble, shilly-shally, weak, little man. She gave to Lincoln the strength of will that enabled him to hold on forever, saying when others were discouraged that he would fight it out, though it might be necessary to pay for every drop of blood drawn by the lash, with another drop drawn by the sword.

The world needs the children of the sturdy poor, for among these are found ninety-nine per cent of our great men and women.

We mothers of to-day need calm and leisure in which to ponder and grow wise. We need also light and wisdom for the doing of our great tasks, and we need constantly a fresh vision of our great responsibilities. That is one reason we are holding this meeting to-day.

Mothers of to-day are building a future of sunshine, happiness, and justice for all the human race. We may not all see it, but we may find comfort in the realization that the great work we are doing is for the integrity and spirituality of the future civilization.

I wonder if I can tell you the feeling that came to me as I entered this room and saw all of these babies to-day. I had not been quite reconciled before to the change of this cradle roll work into the Women's Department, but there came to me to-day a great vision of what is to be accomplished by having the children identified with us at this early age. I was deeply impressed with the possibilities, and I am going to ask each one of our cradle roll workers to give this department your loyalty, your very best effort, and see if, at the end of the year, we cannot have made most wonderful progress. We do not expect to accomplish everything this year, for we must work patiently all through the years to come, enrolling all our babies, bringing them into the Sunday school, into the church, and in touch with every possible uplift and benefit that we may produce and train a righteous race of men and women worthy of the devotion of motherhood.

We are trying to make of our Women's Department a school for mothers, where mothercraft is taught, and where its highest ideals are held before us.

Our cradle roll department is essential in our church, and none of us should feel discouraged or think our work is unimportant or small just because we are working with littlest people, but rather we should be impressed with and look to its real worth. We should be encouraged as we consider its great value, for the greatest Man that ever lived left us this little statement, "A little child shall lead them."

A Cradle Roll Party

The cradle roll workers of the Kansas City Stake gave the cradle roll babies a party on Wednesday, November 3, in the parlors of the Central Church at Ninth and Lydia.

Each mother registered as she entered and each babe was weighed and tagged, one half cent per pound being charged, which was turned into the Christmas offering fund of the different branches. Prizes were given to the heaviest and lightest weight babies under six months, one, two, and three years.

A short program was given, Miss Martha Criley offering two readings and Mrs. Lula Sandy, stake organizer, giving an address which was timely, inspiring, and well-received.

The decorations for the occasion were autumn leaves, berries, cornstalks, pumpkins, asparagus, and chrysanthemums. Refreshments of a suitable nature were served from tables representing spring, summer, fall, and winter. Ninety-four were in attendance.

Another Little Cradle Roll Occasion

Sister Susie B. Benbow, one of our district organizers, reports a pleasant little exercise in honor of the cradle roll babies. A group of twenty-one small children, from two to six years of age, were placed upon a prettily decorated stage, and the following original poem recited to them, to which they replied by singing the "Sunbeam" song, also given below:

Cradle Roll Babies

Babies are God's precious gifts
Be they large or small,
With eyes of blue, or eyes of brown
We dearly love them all.

Dainty, dimpled, chubby hands,
Pink and white their feet;
Ears that list to mother's songs;
Two rows of pearls for teeth!

Some have hair of chestnut brown;
Some have locks of gold;
Two have curls of auburn hue
Like the Master's of long ago!

Gladly do we greet you,
Babes so dear and sweet and fair,
Ever will we cherish you
And guard with tender care.

Sunbeams Bright

(Tune, No. 13, in Zion's Praises)

We are little sunbeams bright,
Sent from heaven above,
Sent to fill your earthly homes
Full of light and love.

Chorus:

Shining, shining in your homes,
Giving peace and joy,
We are precious little gifts
Whether girl or boy.

We will little helpers be
To you, parents dear,
Bringing sunshine to your souls,
Wipe away your tears.

Fathers, mothers, friends, and all,
Here's a kiss for you.
We will try to love you well,
And to God be true.

Choose Carefully Your Gifts for Children

Do not choose such gifts as whips, swords, or guns.

We do not wish to encourage our children to play at games of whipping, fighting, or any cruel sport.

Do not give a live animal, kitten or puppy, to a small child who will not know better than to hurt it.

Do not give to children a caged bird—since Liberty is our watchword we should not allow our children to keep any creature in confinement.

Avoid giving books on hunting, robbery, murder, or war. We do not wish to accustom the child mind to thoughts of agony and death.

Choose toys that are interesting and instructive, which will be enjoyed by the average child and leave no destructive impression on the mind. A child's mind receives and holds early impressions—those transmitted in play—this has been proven by the kindergarten method of child training.—M. L. H., Humane Education Press Bureau, Box 144, Copley Square, Boston, Massachusetts.

Some Christmas Cakes and Candies

Measurements: c—cup, t—teaspoon, T—tablespoon. All measurements are level.

Coconut Drop Cookies: $\frac{1}{4}$ c fat, 1 c corn syrup, $\frac{1}{4}$ c sour milk, $\frac{1}{4}$ t soda, 1 t baking powder, $\frac{1}{2}$ t salt, 1 c buckwheat flour, $\frac{1}{2}$ c corn meal, $\frac{1}{2}$ c coconut, 1 t vanilla. Cream the fat; add the syrup, the milk, and the sifted dry ingredients. Add the coconut and vanilla last. Let the mixture stand for twenty minutes before baking, since it thickens on standing. Drop by spoonfuls on a greased tin. Bake in quick oven until light brown. These cookies, when fresh, taste somewhat like macaroons.

Fairy Cakes: 3 eggs, 1 pound sugar, $\frac{1}{4}$ t almond or $\frac{1}{4}$ t annis oil. Mix unbeaten eggs and sugar. Stir (do not beat) one half hour or until very light. Flour enough to make a stiff mixture. Drop from spoon on oiled tins. Let stand over night in a cool place. In the morning bake in medium oven. The sugar should come out and look like frosting which is said to be the work of the fairies. Remove from pans while hot.

Victory Crisps: $\frac{3}{8}$ c fat, 3 eggs (one white reserved for glazing), 4 c flour to roll, 2 c sugar, 1 lemon, grated rind and juice. Cream fat, add sugar gradually, then well-beaten whole eggs, and finally flour. Chill, roll thin, cut in desired shapes. Brush top with egg white, decorate with floral designs. Bake in moderate oven.

Suggestions for decorations:

Poinsettias: Candied cherries or candied cranberries for petals. Pistachio nuts for leaves. Angelica for stems. Candied orange rind for center of flower.

Edelweiss: Blanched almonds for leaves. Candied orange for center. Angelica for stems.

Eggless Plum Pudding: 1 c bread crumbs, 2 c rye flour, 4 t baking powder, 1 t cloves, $\frac{1}{2}$ T salt, 1 t cinnamon, 1 c chopped suet, 1 chopped apple, 1 c sorghum, 1 c milk, 1 c seeded raisins. Mix dry ingredients; add suet and prepared fruit, and mix well. Add gradually sorghum and milk, stirring constantly. Steam $2\frac{1}{2}$ hours. Serve with hot vanilla sauce.

Vanilla Sauce: $\frac{1}{2}$ c sugar, 1 c boiling water, 1 T cornstarch or $1\frac{1}{2}$ T flour, 2 T fat (oleomargarine), 1 t vanilla, a few grain of salt. Mix sugar and cornstarch; add water gradually, stirring constantly. Boil five minutes, remove from fire, and add fat and flavoring.

Fruit Delight: $\frac{1}{2}$ pound marshmallows, 1 small package figs, $\frac{1}{2}$ package dates, $\frac{1}{2}$ c almonds (blanched), $\frac{1}{2}$ c nuts (pecans, or English walnuts), 1 c coconut, 1 small bottle maraschino cherries or 1 c candied cranberries. Melt marshmallows until very soft. Grind figs, dates, nuts, and coconut. Chop and drain cherries; grind almonds to a fine paste or with the fruit. Mix all together. Pat out on slightly buttered platter to $\frac{1}{2}$ inch in thickness, cut in squares, roll lightly in granulated sugar, and wrap in waxed paper. These will keep a long time.

Fruit and Nut Bars: 2 c raisins, figs, or dates, used separately or in combination, 1 c nut meats, $\frac{1}{2}$ c honey or syrup. Put fruit and nuts through a food chopper. Add syrup and combine thoroughly. Pat out flat and put under pressure for 24 hours.

Hunky Dory: 2 c popped corn, 1 c nut meats, 2 cakes sweet chocolate, 2 T rich cream. Melt the chocolate over hot water. As soon as it is melted add the cream, corn, and nuts. Stir quickly with silver fork, and lift out in small balls, placing on waxed paper to dry.

Calico Fudge: $1\frac{1}{2}$ c sugar, $\frac{3}{4}$ c brown sugar, $\frac{3}{8}$ c milk, 2 T butter, 4 T peanut butter, 12 marshmallows. Cook milk, sugar, and salt to soft ball stage; add butter and peanut butter. Beat at once till creamy. Pour over marshmallows on buttered pan. Cut when cold. For puffed-rice candy use crisp puffed rice instead of marshmallows.

Notice to Organizers

The following request is submitted to all district organizers by those in charge of the historical division of our department:

Please send us as soon as possible the names and addresses of the secretaries of all local in your district or stake.

Also please urge such secretaries to gather details of their activities, past and present, and send to us from time to time as news and historical items. And oblige,

Yours sincerely,

MADGE M. SIEGFRIED.

Temple Builders Manual

After so long a delay, we joyfully receive the news from the publishers that our manual for Temple Builders is nearing completion and will be ready for mailing in a couple of weeks.

This will be good news to our girls, and girl leaders, for they have been patiently waiting for the appearance of this guide to their activities. We hope their delight over the little book will compensate them for the many disappointments that have preceded their getting it.

The cover is of blue, the Builders color. The various chapters are headed by clever designs, drawn by some of our talented young women. Some illustrations of uniform, emblem, etc., are included as also is "The Temple Builders song," both words and music of which were written especially for this publication.

Watch these columns, and our general church publication for announcements of price. Plan to include this Manual in your gifts to girls this Christmas.

Late reports indicate that the Interchurch World Movement has referred its activities to a special committee, to be organized as part of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.

LETTERS

Observations by the President of Lamoni Stake

(A letter from John F. Garver, president of Lamoni Stake, to President Elbert A. Smith, referring to his attendance at the home-coming exercises at Council Bluffs, Iowa, November 14, where on request and appointment he occupied as the speaker of the day.)

You will, I am sure, be pleased to learn that we enjoyed at Council Bluffs, Iowa, on Sunday, at the occasion of the home-coming, a most delightful and profitable time. An excellent spirit of fellowship characterized the whole day, and the Saints seemed anxious for the spirit and inspiration to be received from the day.

If I may be personal I would like to say it has been a long time since I myself have enjoyed in service the same degree of spiritual uplift and vision. And I am quite sure that never before have I been so divinely impressed with the great mission of this church to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ in all the world.

I have for many months in Lamoni been earnestly endeavoring to the end that our people may come to realize that there is something more to the redemption of Zion than the making of a place of security and development for our people. Indeed this function of our Zion is quite necessary; but is it not the charge of Almighty God to this church, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature"? So it is that I have earnestly sought that our Lamoni people might catch some vision of the magnitude of our appointment in this work. It remained for my visit and effort at Council Bluffs to open to my own mind this divine appointment in a significance new to me.

I have for many days as a consequence of burdens of my own, as well as the burden incident to my appointment, been very greatly depressed in spirit; and there have been times when my heart has all but cried out to say, I would no longer endeavor. I am very glad therefore for an experience which returns to me the spiritual vitality which enables me to-day to say, Let the cost be what it may be to both myself and my house, as for me and mine, we will serve God; and as never before to the end that other men and women less fortunate than we, may know the gospel deliverance from sin and suffering and despair.

The brethren of the Presidency and leading church quorums certainly have my sympathy, as well as my hearty support, sharing as they do in the burdens incident to our church development a responsibility, and hence a concern far beyond anything which I may have experienced. May the good Lord strengthen us all, that through us all, the people may have the leadership and inspiration to triumph and carry to the distressed of earth the gospel of deliverance.

Sincerely,

J. F. GARVER.

Sixteen Baptized in Idaho

Have just closed a very successful series of meetings at Sandpoint, Idaho. Baptized sixteen in all and there are others who will surely join our number when I resume the meetings, which will be in the near future. I preached forty-one sermons; handed out about two hundred tracts; and placed more than two thousand handbills at the doors of homes of Sandpoint. Of course I visited daily with those whom we succeeded in interesting. I did not go to bed early, neither did I arise early in the morning. As a result of the whole thing I am in need of a good rest in the mountains.

I also baptized four Bronsons. They are not of our family, however. Two of them were Bickertonites; the other two were Baptists. One family of them not only obeyed the principles of faith, repentance, and baptism so as to come into the church, but started to "go on to perfection" by paying fifty dollars tithing. The other family have been paying fifteen dollars monthly to the Baptist Church. They now are happy to place that where it belongs.

With all the wonderful blessings coming to us, it is needless to tell you that we are happy in our work.

Most sincerely yours,

J. A. BRONSON.

Meeting Catholicism

Elder G. E. Harrington writes to the First Presidency of some of his recent experiences in meeting and hearing representatives of the Roman Catholic faith.

The last week has been devoted to a study of Catholicism. Have read three books and some in others, and sought to get a line on their positions. The reason was that I was to meet the Catholic priest, and did so on Thursday evening. Brother A. Kenedy and the young man who joined the Catholic Church were with us.

The question considered was the need of the confessional. He proceeded to tell why it should be. His chief text was, "Whosoever sins ye remit they are remitted, whosoever sins ye retain they are retained." Upon that basis he erected his arguments, adding the traditions of the holy fathers, assuming the Scriptures were insufficient to establish the methods of procedure or a proper interpretation of themselves.

He claimed the church was infallible in her teachings of the doctrine of Christ; that she had the presence of the Holy Spirit with her as promised by Jesus; that she was to be perpetuated to the end of time; consequently her teaching must necessarily be correct, something dependable, that men may not be tossed to and fro with every wind of doctrine, etc.

I submitted that the law limited the right of forgiving sins, so far as the ministry of Christ was concerned, calling attention to the commission Christ gave to the apostles to go into all the world preaching the gospel and baptizing for the remission of sins; that forgiveness was to be extended to those entering the church through the services of Christ's ministry; that their binding power on earth and in heaven was controlled by law. Cited Matthew 18:18, showing in what they bound, or what they bound. Called attention to the Lord's Prayer; that they had been taught to pray; "Our Father in heaven . . . forgive us our sins." Why go to others if he is to forgive? But our conversation was cut short by a request for another interview with the priest, so we left with an invitation from the priest to come again.

Sunday afternoon I was fortunate in having the privilege of hearing Father Conway, the distinguished Catholic, who developed the Question Box, a recognized work on Catholicism, from which Brother Parsons quotes in his Text Book.

He possesses extraordinary enthusiasm. His purpose was the arousing of the Catholic laity to missionary efforts. He plead for the cooperation of the ministry, with the laity; told of the experiences had with some of the laity and the priesthood of the church, how difficult it was for the movement that he was laboring for to get a start. He told of the efforts of one man who felt that the lay members should have some privileges to spread the gospel; though turned down by the American priesthood, and denied the right to go to Rome and had sent word to the Vatican of the excommunication of this man in advance, that when in Rome he was informed of his excommunication but told the one informing him of the fact that he was not done yet, he was going to see the pope, which he did, and the pope granted him a hearing and afterwards told him to go ahead and organize a new society, and proceed. This society I think he called the Paulists. The name would indicate the missionary spirit.

He gave an elaborate account of the methods to be employed in the carrying out of their plans, particularly New York City. They had to convert priests and bishops before they could do anything, but they got going. They spent $1,000 and more in advertising in Protestant papers, getting the money from the laity. Knights of Columbus aided. Their organization was used to distribute literature and furnish the money for its purchase and advertising. Could not get the money from the bishops as they did not have it.

Sometimes $25,000 was raised to carry out a missionary effort. The priests would announce from their pulpits, and Catholic schools were used to further announce. All the means available were employed, and he said there was not a hall in New York but what they could fill to its capacity, and about sixty per cent were Protestants.

He urged the association to work, priesthood and laity. It was a masterful address, and could not help but inspire their membership with a determination to get busy to convert Protestantism. He urged kind treatment, consideration, submission to abuse, told of personal instances of converts that were bitter in the attitude toward Catholics. One man in particular who was an A. P. A., and would not have a Catholic work for him, but had married a careless Catholic woman, who never attended church; went anywhere. But when he was about to die, some Catholic sisters (not nuns) offered their services to assist in the sickness. He said he was called in and talked with him a few times, when at last the man said he had despised them, fought against them but now was sorry for what he had done, and wanted to acknowledge his sins, and be a member. This he was permitted to do. But before doing so, Mr. Conway called a physician and some one or two Protestants to witness the statement of the man so that it could not be said that the Catholics had lied about his change of faith, which he said was liable to occur.

I do not remember ever hearing a man speak so direct, say so much, comprehend so much, in the same space of time. Has a splendid voice, fine delivery, and a very pleasing manner. He said where holding meetings regularly he had a question box placed handy for everybody to put in any question they wished on the subject of religion, and they would be answered before the sermon was preached. Usually he took about fifteen minutes for that work.

Well, I came to the conclusion that Catholicism is a mighty power and not going to die without a tremendous struggle and its increase is not going to diminish unless opposed by a confident and intelligent ministry, backed by a faithful body of people.

It seems to me that issues between Catholicism and ourselves can be made definite, and clear; and without a disposition to denounce, take what they stand for from their own authorities and meet them with what we have.

Their ministry have to do years of studying, and added to that is the advantage of the single life, consecrated and devoted to their faith. Both education and inspiration must be called into requisition to meet this successfully.

It seems to me that our priesthood should be examining into the faiths of men as Brother F. M. said at the last conference. That thought was expressed too by Mr. Conway, that the ministry should be familiar with the religious thought of the world and the developing thought of the present times, philosophic and religious.

The study of comparative religions, ours with others, ought to make clear the distinction between us and all others. We should be able to show that the distinguishing characteristics of our faith make us superior to all other religious bodies.

Sandhedens Banner

I want to say a few words in behalf of our Scandinavian mission paper, Sandhedens Banner, as it apparently is not meeting with the encouragement and support that we think it ought to. All who can read the language, or who have friends or neighbors who can, should feel an interest in its publication, and subscribe for one or more copies, and thus help to spread the truth. The price is only fifty cents a year.

Furthermore it is earnestly desired that the Saints familiar with the Scandinavian languages should write for the paper, relating experiences in connection with the work of the Lord, and also articles on doctrinal themes such as might be of interest and for instruction to both Saints and those not acquainted with the work. A variety of themes, from different authors, will be of greater interest than when only one or two are heard from.

We have reason to expect that our brethren, now laboring in Sweden and Denmark, will write and relate experiences which cannot fail to be enjoyed by all who are interested in the spread of the truth, but our brethren here, in Joseph's land, should also lend a helping hand and contribute to make our little paper what it ought to be. None should hesitate, even if they do not consider themselves competent to put their writing in such a shape as they might wish, as Brother Muceus, who is doing the editorial work, will be glad to make needful correction and arrange the articles for publication.

Some of our brethren may content themselves with the thought that they are at home with the English language, hence need not concern themselves with the Scandinavian language or the Scandinavian paper, but when it is remembered that we have been admonished to study and make ourselves acquainted with other languages; are we not making a mistake when we fail to cultivate the use of the language that we are already acquainted with? Especially is this true as we might do it to the honor of God, for the sake of his cause, and for the benefit of our fellow man.

I feel an interest in the work, and only wish that we might put forth a united effort to help spread the truth, both far and near. Let not this opportunity pass us by unimproved, but while the powers of darkness are mustering their forces to the detriment of God's work, let us esteem it a privilege to be enlisted on the side of right, and to be laborers with God and with Christ.

Remember that subscriptions should be sent to Herald Publishing House, Lamoni, Iowa; letters and articles for publication to Peter Muceus, Lamoni, Iowa.

Paia Sends Greetings

I have just received a letter from Elder Paia a Metuaaro, our native brother who was with us at the last General Conference. At the time of writing he was upon the island of Hikuero, where a great many of the Saints had gathered to dive for pearl shell. This is the island that was swept by the terrific high tide several years ago when Brother and Sister Gilbert were there.

Elder Paia sends his greetings to the Saints in America, stating that he shall never forget the kind treatment received from them from the time he landed at San Francisco in March until he left there in the month of June. The wonderful impressions of the late conference, and the many things both seen and heard by him in this country are intensely interesting to all who meet him.

A large gathering of Saints and nonmembers assembled on the island of Hikuero to hear our brother relate his experience "in the land shadowing with wings." "Emea rahi te oaoa," Paia said concerning this gathering, "A thing great the rejoicing." They surely did rejoice and weep for joy at the words of our brother.

Paia wishes to thank the Saints in all places where he was permitted to meet them.

He will never forget our visit to the Kirtland Temple, and the Hill Cumorah, also the visit at Nauvoo, at which place while standing on the old temple site overlooking the river he exclaimed, "Aue, te nehenehe!" "How beautiful!"

In his letter Elder Paia stated that he would be "mawururu roa" (very much pleased) if he could be here and rejoice with the Saints of America at the dedication of the new auditorium.

Several of the Saints have been successful in obtaining valuable pearls this season. One brother got one that brought five thousand five hundred dollars, and several other valuable pearls were secured by our native brethren.

Paia sends his "Ia ora na" (his greetings) to all the Saints in America.

Good Conference in Kewanee District

I note by your columns that they have been having some good fall conferences in our neighboring districts. I was much interested in reading about these meetings held in Nauvoo and in the Eastern Iowa District. I feel that Kewanee should be heard from and so come to tell you that we had a "good" conference, too, over at Millersburg, October 22-24.

I really think Millersburg might well boast of having the most beautiful trees, and some of the most hospitable Saints to be found anywhere. And, too, they have no railroad, another advantage if you will only consider it in the right light. They seem to have retained the spirit of neighborly kindness that actuated the fathers who built these little villages nestled among the grand old oaks, elms, and maples. At least, they all acted that way while we were there. And our stay there was as refreshing as a draught of cold water on a warm day or as a warm fire is to the benumbed traveler on a cold night.

And the church, how I envied them that church! Not very large, but standing back from the road (not street) in a great big yard and shaded by these same grand old forest trees, it did look so much like the spirit of peace might rest there. Seemed to me that one might more easily get in attune with his Maker while sitting within those walls, so white without, so clean and pleasing within. Yes, the church is something the Saints over there would be more than grateful for, if for awhile they were forced to meet in a little hired hall, on a noisy street in a big city. But I must tell about the conference!

I said it was a good conference, and it was, if judged by what I heard the Saints say about it and by the way I have felt since being there. Not any great amount of legislation was effected. But the Saints just talked things over in some of the meetings. "Problem meetings," they were called. And the crying need seemed everywhere to be for men and women to enter in, and labor as teachers, both in the priesthood and the department, men and women who were able to do the work.

How shall we obtain these workers? How may one become efficient? There seemed to be, here, as in the church everywhere, advocates of two ways: develop by educating in Graceland, and develop by study of the books and by seeking God direct. Much was said in support of either view. But Brother Carpenter summed it up (and we felt that way, too): "Perhaps we are not so far apart as we appear to be upon the surface." It would seem that we can hardly fail to come to an understanding of the truth, if we always maintain the spirit of earnestness in desiring to know, that was exhibited in these discussions.

Sister Carpenter, in charge of the women's work, gave an interesting talk, outlining what might be done by the women of the district to further advance the work at large. A course of reading was suggested, which alone would make any woman better qualified for home duties. Write her relative to this course. She gave some very interesting suggestions regarding what may be done with pictures, in primary Sunday school work.

Preaching was good. Three sermons preached by Elders C. E. Willey, B. Sartwell, and O. W. Okerlind. More or less was said about Zion in each.

The prayer meetings were very good. Here we noted a peculiar incident, in that in the testimonies, one, old in years and experiences, testified to what he had proven about God's work in the past, and was followed by a young Saint, expressing his hope and desire for future service and future blessings. I think the time was well-nigh equally divided between both the "old" and the "young." And if there was any difference in the spirit manifested by either, I was not able to discern it. And I felt then, and I feel now, God bless our old Saints, old in years, old in service, rich in experiences. And may God bless with choicest blessings this army of eager, valiant young men and women being raised up, with hearts fired by the same holy fire that caused their fathers to cross these prairies when they trudged weary and footsore from house to house with the angel's message of a restored gospel.

May these go forth, and by the aid of the same God, and with the same message, help to complete what has been so nobly begun. Ah, yes! Let us divide our forces. God has need of all. And in conclusion of this letter, which really hasn't told you what we felt, nor what we enjoyed at the Millersburg conference, let me quote the words of the two who presided. Each contains something of the heart of the meetings.

Brother S— said: "I have tested God's promises in the Book of Mormon, in the Bible, and in the Doctrine and Covenants. I know they are true. In all my difficulties, I have gone to God and he has never failed me yet. I believe that if I can make my life correspond with my testimony, I can find a place to occupy. God can use me."

Brother C— said, "If we will train ourselves to see with our eyes, to hear with our ears, observe, meditate, and pray, we will all grow and develop, and all will become more useful in this work."

They gave us fried chicken everywhere we went and they gave me one to bring home with me. What do you think of that?

Yes, Kewanee did have a "good conference"! I was there.

News From the Northwest

Thanksgiving Day finds me under pleasant and comfortable circumstances, domiciled at the hotel and rooming house of Brother and Sister C. A. Kress, Duluth, Minnesota, where as I look out of the window I can view the wide stretch of Lake Superior, dotted with steamers plying their usual traffic of iron ore and grain from here to Cleveland and Buffalo, returning with immense amounts of coal.

We have a few families of scattered Saints, numbering about thirty, who up to a few weeks ago were only favored with occasional visits of missionaries until Brother Kress moved here a month ago. They are encouraged not only by that but by the addition of three by baptism last Sunday and more in prospect. If acquiesced in by the proper authorities, we contemplate branch organization in the near future, having already an elder and priest. Membership is scattered all the way from here to Two Harbors, a city of about seven thousand.

We held service there last Sunday in the afternoon, returning in time for evening service, both of which were well attended, and are continuing every night until we have to leave for North Dakota district conference, December 4 and 5, which is to be held at Fargo. The last summer has seemed to me very brief. Coming home from General Conference enthused with the splendid spirit which prevailed at that time I looked forward with bright hope to a very successful year's work. To-day, while not exactly depressed, I am conscious of meager attainments, much weakness and unworthiness, so much so that were it not that this great Northwest is so short of missionaries I could give place to a younger and better qualified representative. By advice of authorities and vote of the members I accepted the presidency of Minneapolis Branch in addition to Minnesota District. In the former I had the assistance of Brother Charles Lundeen and Brother Henry Sparling most of the summer, and at present we are glad to report that while the attendance at prayer meeting is not what it ought to be in proportion to enrollment, the Religion, Sunday school, ladies' aid, Boy Scout, and other activities are fair to good; and fine unity prevails, which gives us hope of improvement during the winter months.

Brother Shakespeare, who labored under severe hindrances in getting the work before the Indians, has left us for the South, and Brother Wildermuth has entirely too large a field for one missionary. We are determined by the help of the Lord to continue our efforts to spread the gospel message. We know nothing that brings to us the degree of satisfaction and comfort it affords, and when I was called upon to part by the stern decree of death and separation with my long companion in wedlock, who passed peacefully away from her long years of suffering September 25, during my temporary absence from home, I was strengthened by the thought that there was that in the gospel of Christ which could sustain her through a quarter of a century of almost continued pain and lameness so that she could be cheerful and resigned to the decree of the Almighty to the extent that up to the very last she could always bid me a cheerful good-by and Godspeed. The only restriction was that towards the last she would add: "Go, but do not go so far away," having formerly been in the Eastern Iowa District for three years.

I take this opportunity to thank many Saints, some of whom I have not answered, for the many comforting letters received. My Dakota home is now permanently evacuated, and my present permanent address is as below.

Far West Stake

Night has stolen down from the hills and covered the earth with its mantle of darkness and hidden the rough places, bringing rest to all nature. It reminds me of the mantle of God's love that covers us all and hides the weak places in our lives and makes us all look beautiful in his sight. It has rained much of late and we are not able to go to service to-night so I am sitting here thinking—thinking of the experiences of the last eighteen months and the events which have crowded upon us in that time.

Eighteen months ago I was in Canada. Canada; what a flood of tender memories is awakened by that word. Canada; where I spent six of the best years of my life. Canada; where I found some of the best friends I have ever had—friends who were loyal and true. Friends who were always ready to lend a helping hand. Friends whose acts of kindness and words of sympathy and love will be cherished while memory functions. Even yet I see evidences of their love. The typewriter I am using to write this letter, the big, fur-lined coat that protects me from Missouri's awful north winds, and other things that need not be mentioned here, are silent witnesses of the generosity and real Christlike spirit of the Canadian Saints. God bless them. This will assure them that they are not forgotten and that we love them still.

Before the General Conference of 1919 I asked the powers that be to change our appointment. Not that I was tired of Canada. Far from it; but I had been there six years and I really felt that it would be best to go so that other and better qualified men could be sent there. I thought that possibly some of the Saints would like a change. I stated to President Smith at the time that I expected never to find a place I would like better than Canada or Saints that would be more kind to me than the Canadian Saints had been.

Having asked for the change I was not surprised to get it but I did not expect to be sent quite so far away. I confess I was just a little surprised to read "Far West Stake" on my letter of appointment when it came. That seemed a long way off, but many times I had said: "I will go where you want me to go," and I was ready to prove it now.

About that time I was called home by the death of my father who had passed away on May 10, 1919, after a long and painful illness. He died firm in the faith of the restored gospel and we have a beautiful hope to cheer us; the hope that we will meet him again. As I stood beside his casket and looked for the last time upon his face, to me beautiful even in death, I felt to say, "Good-by, father, till the resurrection." Oh, blessed hope! Glorious thought! Death is swallowed up in victory!

After the funeral I returned to Canada and spent some little time at Kimball. I had baptized many of the Saints there and I wished to remain with them as long as possible. From there I went to Chatham, Sarnia, and Windsor just to see the Saints and say "good-by." In all those places I left friends who were very dear to me and when they clasped my hand in parting and the big tears stood in their eyes and in mine as well, we realized that the gospel tie is indeed stronger than the tie of nature. If the Saints will let the gospel have its perfect work in their lives it will make us the most wonderful people on earth.

My first stop in my new field was in Saint Joseph, where I spent a few days getting acquainted with the president of the stake and receiving some good counsel from him. Brother Salyards has been most kind to me during my stay here and has always been willing to assist me in every possible way. Brother Salyards, together with his counselors, Brethren Roberts and Robertson (but mark you, Brother Robertson is not Brother Roberts's son), are doing much to build up the work in the stake and we trust that the blessings of God will attend their efforts.

From there I went to Trenton, where I preached my first sermon in my new field, Sunday, June 29, 1919. While there I was royally entertained in the beautiful home of Brother J. D. Proffit. Brother Proffit is president of the branch and is always willing and ready to do all in his power for the work of the Lord. We stayed there for some little time but we could not get a hearing so finally Brother Salyards wrote me that I was wanted in Cameron to hold a tent meeting.

Sunday, July 20, found us in Cameron and that night we preached to a nice crowd on the school grounds as the tent had been erected there. We continued there three weeks and the crowd keep getting larger all the time. The last Sunday night we had over three hundred and fifty people there. Much of the success of this series was due to the earnest efforts of the president of the Cameron Branch, Elder Roy S. Budd. Brother Budd was on the job early and late and his write-ups in the daily papers each day were wonderful help. By his zeal for the work and his untiring efforts he has won the confidence and love, not only of the Saints but of the outsiders as well. Everyone speaks in the highest terms of Brother Budd. Under his administration the Cameron Branch is doing splendidly, and I am told by some that it is the best branch in the stake.

After the reunion of the Far West Stake in 1919 we went to Mirable and preached a few times in a hall but as we could get no crowds there we started in at our little white church on the old historic ground where the city of Far West once stood. I was there for several weeks and we had splendid crowds and a good interest. I baptized some there and others were caused to see the beauty of the restored gospel. I enjoyed some wonderful blessings there as well as some trials.

I suppose they go together but I am glad that I have learned that the most bitter trial that can come to a Saint of God is a blessing in disguise.

There have been times when I have thought that even God had forsaken me and my faith was all but destroyed. I have then been unable to see where I could ever receive any good from such an ordeal, but in God's time it was all made plain. I remember one very severe trial that came to me not very long ago. I was simply heartbroken. I packed my suit case fully intending to leave the field and never preach again. I could not see one ray of light in the dark cloud that had come down all around me. However God was just as near me then as at any other time and he led me to a church where only a few of his people had met in a prayer service one very rainy night. The president of the branch was in charge and I noticed that he seemed strangely moved upon. Ere long he arose and delivered a message to me in prophecy and in it I was told some very comforting things. Among others, that in time my trial would be made plain to me and I would understand it fully and it would be a blessing to me. That has been fulfilled and I am glad for the trials.

Thank God for spiritual gifts. Some may make light of them, but without the signs of life in the body of Christ this church would be absolutely dead. I have heard people say that it was unwise to pray much for such blessings for it would give Satan a chance to deceive. To me, that is the height of nonsense. If I thought that God would permit his humble, faithful child who desired to know his will to be deceived by the Devil I would have but little faith in God. I do believe that Saints can be overanxious and believe that they have received the mind of the Lord when it is only their own minds, but I do not believe that God would allow Satan to deceive them.

That reminds me of a promise made me once in prophecy through a very spiritual patriarch to the effect that if I continued humble and faithful that I would never be deceived by the power of the Devil in delivering the word of the Lord. That promise is an anchor to my soul. I tell these things hoping they will bring comfort to others, for God is no respecter of persons.

While at Far West I made my home with Elder and Mrs. B. G. Koger who were kindness personified to me. May God bless them. 'Tis true I left some good friends in Canada but I have surely found some good true friends in old Missouri. In this connection I must mention Elder and Mrs. J. C. Elvert of Cameron, who have been like a father and mother to me. They are growing old but the sunset of their lives is made glorious by the beautiful tints of golden deeds and loving words. Their home is a haven where I often go when discouraged and sad and find rest and help. May they live yet many years to enjoy the fruit of their well-spent past and when the time comes for them to be called higher I know that they will find the reward that awaits the faithful in Christ. Just here I wish to also mention the kindness of G. Scott Daniel and his noble wife in whose home I have spent many happy hours. They have treated us always in the same kindly way and till lately we have always made our home with them in Cameron. Brother Daniel is now attending Graceland that he may be more fully prepared for the work that awaits him. There are many other kind friends we would like to mention, but space forbids.

In October, 1919, I held a series of services in the Delano Branch, north of Cameron, and stayed in the beautiful farm home of Brother Ben Constance. While there Mrs. Weaver came from Michigan and we had a happy reunion after several months of separation.

In November we again held a series in Cameron, this time in the church. Others have written of this meeting so I will only say that we were told by the Saints there that we had the largest crowds ever seen in the church. However I do not think that the success of a service is to be measured by the size of the crowd.

My address is still Cameron, Missouri, Box 35.

In bonds, RICHARD D. WEAVER.

Disposition of the Nine Tenths

Continuation of the series of circular letters being sent out by the Lamoni Stake Bishopric.

Up to the present time we have shown that the following steps are to be taken to enter into an active stewardship:

First: A full compliance with the laws governing the initiatory rites leading into the church, these being:

- a. Having a proper faith.
- b. True repentance.
- c. Baptism by immersion.
- d. Laying on of hands for the reception of the Holy Ghost and a belief in the other two fundamental principles of the gospel which are: The judgment and the resurrection.

Second: A full compliance with the laws governing the proper use of the temporal things in our possession. These steps being:

- a. Laying all before the bishop in Zion or if in a stake, before the stake bishop.
- b. That this is done by making an inventory of all our assets and liabilities.
- c. And placing this inventory with the bishopric.
- d. Then, if this inventory shows a net gain or increase, to pay the Lord the tenth.

The remaining nine tenths of the net gain may or may not be surplus. If any part of this nine tenths is needed immediately, the amount needed should be taken out of the nine tenths and whatever is left of the nine tenths is called surplus. Surplus has officially been defined as follows:

"That part of a man's possessions, whether of moneys or properties, of which he has no present or immediate need; the word need being determined by the man's position, sphere of action, his business and his dependencies."

We shall now continue with Samuel Doe, telling why he should pay one tenth to the Lord and what to do with what is left, the nine tenths.

The net gain was $16,200. Now remember that Samuel Doe, according to the law of God, has not the right to retain all of this $16,200. He should pay his senior partner, God, his share. The senior partner furnished everything with which to make this $16,200 except the labor. God demands as his share of the net proceeds, immediate possession of one tenth. It is not left to any man or set of men to say how much of the net gain should be placed in the possession of the Lord. The Lord himself has forever settled that by definitely stating that it is one tenth.

Samuel Doe pays this one tenth leaving him still in possession of $14,580 or nine tenths. ($16,200 minus $1,620 leaves $14,580.) Remember that Samuel Doe has had all of his present or immediate needs and just wants supplied and still has $14,580 in his possession. Now, what does the Lord wish him to do with this $14,580?

Fully to understand our explanation to this very important question we must remember the following facts:

1. That Samuel Doe does not own anything. God is the real owner.
2. That Samuel Doe holds possession of all his property, including this net gain of $16,200, as a steward for God.
3. That God, the landlord, and real owner, has the right to state the terms on which Samuel Doe may hold possession of any property.
4. That these terms are:
 - a. Possession by Samuel Doe of enough property to, at least, supply his needs and just wants.
 - b. To be wise, industrious, and frugal in his management of said property.
 - c. To keep an account of all his receipts and expenditures.
 - d. At least each year to balance his account.
 - e. To give the bishop a copy of his balance sheet showing his net gain.
 - f. To pay one tenth of his net gain as shown by the balance, to the bishop.

We are now ready to state what should be done with the remaining nine tenths of his gain.

In the above case of Samuel Doe this nine tenths amounted to $14,580. How much of this $14,580 is surplus?

If, after due consideration, Samuel Doe finds that he has an immediate need of say $5,000 for repairs and upkeep or enlargement of stewardship, if deemed advisable, then $9,580, the amount left of the net gain, is surplus.

This surplus should be paid to the bishop and Samuel Doe receive a receipt for $9,580. He has now made a consecration of his surplus property.

Yours very truly,
LAMONI STAKE BISHOPRIC.

On the 4th and 5th Bishop J. A. Koehler addressed the students in the religious education class at Graceland on the general subjects of "Agency," and "Conduct." He sets out to show how self-consciousness is related to agency and the elements of moral standards, also discussing the levels of conduct and the trend of ethical evolution.

Elder S. A. Burgess is delivering a series of five lectures to the class in religious education at Graceland College, on the subject of "Comparative religion." He assures the class that the subject is not susceptible to easy condensation, but he is attempting such a brief survey in lieu of a better and more comprehensive presentation.

CORNUCOPIA, OREGON, November 15, 1920.

Editors Herald: Brethren W. P. Bootman and L. G. Hoisington have been laboring here with success. God was with them, but the Satanic powers were against them. Six honest souls were baptized, my husband among them.

God spoke through Sister Terry three years ago, telling me my companion would come into the church on condition of my faithfulness. Many others are interested. God was with us in spirit and power during confirmation and sacrament. Brother Hoisington spoke in an unknown tongue and gave an interpretation; Brother Bootman gave two prophecies admonishing us to be faithful.

They organized our Sunday school and Religio and we shall try not to disappoint any in the conduct of these organizations.

Brother Bootman spoke in great power Sunday morning. God's hand is over us, even though we are isolated.

Your sister in Christ,

MRS. FRED L. MILLS.

CAMERON, MISSOURI, November 17, 1920.

Editors Herald: We are very optimistic regarding the work in this place as we note the advancement being made. It is encouraging to see the good attendance at all services and especially to see the number of interested nonmembers attending the Sunday evening services.

Since the stake conference, our pastor, Roy S. Budd, has continued his tireless efforts to instill in the Saints the spirit of consecration and right living, and we are pleased to see the fruits of his efforts. At the beginning of the drive, Apostle U. W. Greene visited Cameron. He gave us an especially interesting talk in which he vividly pictured to us the awful condition existing in the world and the need for consecration of our lives as well as property that Zion may be established as a place of safety for God's people. Following this talk our committee spent a few moments with paper and pencil adding up the amount subscribed and announced with much satisfaction that we had gone "over the top." Later subscriptions have brought our amount up to 42 per cent more than the quota assigned us, with some reports to come yet.

On the 7th Brother J. W. Roberts of the stake presidency was with us, delivering an excellent sermon. The 16th Brother E. F. Robertson, a member of the stake presidency, came and preached his first two sermons in Cameron, although he had made us several visits previously. Brother Robertson is a forceful speaker and his sermons as well as the lectures on his trip around the world which were delivered on Tuesday and Wednesday evening were greatly appreciated by all.

The reports for baptism have been coming so frequently that it has made the installation of a baptismal font very necessary, so one was recently completed in the basement of the church. On last Sunday it was used for the first time, when four young people were baptized. There are other candidates who have given their names to be baptized next Sunday.

The various departments are practically all organized and actively engaged in some definite work that is essential in the establishment of Zion. The Sunday school, under the leadership of Brother S. J. Sloan, is doing good work in the religious education of the people, with a membership of 127, the average attendance for the past six months being 110.

The Religio, with Brother D. C. Fiddick as superintendent, is functioning along proper lines, trying to furnish recreational activities for the young people, the orchestra rendering excellent assistance in the program work.

The choir is alive and is doing good work in supplying excellent musical numbers which have an inspiring and uplifting effect upon the services.

The Temple Builders chapter has recently been organized and the girls are looking forward to making these meetings pleasant as well as instructive.

The writer has had the privilege of attending Graceland College as a member of the class in religious education since its opening on September 16, till recently when on account of sickness I was forced to return home for a short period of rest. While it is impossible to express in words our appreciation of the work that is being done, yet we might say that our experience has been that the work being given to those in the religious education class is such, that if given the proper consideration will increase our faith in God and in the gospel, as well as giving us a more definite idea of what is possible and necessary for the church to accomplish.

For the benefit of any who might be doubtful as to whether or not such a course is essential and will be the means of producing more spirituality among the Saints, I will say that as far as I am individually concerned it has been the means of greatly increasing my faith and broadening my vision of what is expected of a follower of Christ. If it were possible that every member of the church could personally witness the spirit of devotion and consecration as it is manifested by the instructors in the different departments of the college, I feel confident we would be more appreciative of what is being accomplished.

Your brother and coworker,

G. SCOTT DANIEL.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA, November 17, 1920.

Editors Herald: No doubt there are many who are under the impression that Cedar Rapids does not have an organized branch of the church and that there are no Saints living here. At least this was the impression I had previous to my coming here and the thought of being isolated from church privileges almost caused me to refuse a good position offered me here in Cedar Rapids.

Arriving here from Burlington last spring I found that the church did have a branch and that the Saints, though few, were holding their services in private homes, this due to the fact that those who have been here have never been financially able to purchase or build a church building. Seeing the work here was greatly in need of laborers, we at once set to work doing all we could to help build up this part of God's vineyard.

During the summer months, July and August, Brethren Charles Putnam of Magnolia and Daniel Macgregor were here holding a series of tent meetings on Ellis Boulevard, which at the time seemed without success, but we are sure the seed has been sown in good soil and will some day take root and grow. After the close of these meetings the branch held a business meeting under the direction of Brother Macgregor, at which time several changes were made, among which was the changing of the Sunday school hour from Sunday evening at seven o'clock to Sunday morning at ten. This change has made a wonderful improvement in the Sunday school work and we are glad to report a steady increase in attendance.

Because of having no church building, we are holding our services at the present time at the home of Brother and Sister Ralph Welday, 712 South Sixth Street West, and find their home a very convenient place to meet, being rather centrally located for all the Saints.

We take this opportunity to invite those attending the State University at Iowa City and also any who may be going through Cedar Rapids, stopping off for just a few hours or days, as the case might be, to phone 2551 and ask for Mr. Ralph Welday and thus get in touch with him, which perhaps will enable you to meet with us and enjoy the association of the Saints here.

The work as a whole is moving on nicely and we pray that the Spirit of God may rest upon others, encouraging them to move here and help assist in building up his work in this locality.

Faithfully yours,

ESTHER GEORGIAN ORTLEB.

712 South Sixth Street West.

Philosophy is a bully that talks very loud when danger is at a distance, but the moment she is hard pressed by the enemy she is not to be found at her post, but leaves the brunt of the battle to be done by her humbler, but steadier comrade, religion, whom on most other occasions, she effects to despise.—Colton.

A Good Plan for Tract Distribution

The changeable weather, and the depression in business seem to militate against missionary work. The last two weeks I have been able to accomplish but little. That is if we are to measure the work done by the number of sermons preached. I have however been busy and all the spare moments have been taken up in study. I only wish I had more time to devote to study.

This week we have been making an effort to begin a systematic tract distribution campaign here in Marion, Iowa. Brother Elmer K. Patterson is going to keep it moving. The plan is something like this: He calls a number of people on the phone, all in a certain street, and makes arrangements to leave some of our literature with them. He in this talk assures them that we have no connection with the Utah people. A card is made out for these names, and the first number of the Angel Message Series is delivered with the understanding that in a few days this one will be called for and the other left. This method will be followed until the whole series of ten tracts have been read. When the first tracts have been returned they will be passed on to the next number of homes, and thus the tracts may be kept in use continuously.

The card system that is kept will enable the distributor to know just who is reading and who is not. It seems that this plan might be used to profit in any branch.

I am trying to convince the Saints that there is a goodly amount of missionary work that may be done by other than those of the ministry. If the membership quite universally would prosecute a vigorous and systematic tract distribution campaign we could easily double our converts in the same length of time. We are laborers together with God. Why not organize and get the printed word before the people? In this way we would be sure that the tracts we were putting out would be doing good. I am satisfied that if any person will read the ten tracts included in the Angel Message Series, that person will be deeply interested in our message. This work, too, can be done by the membership so that the ministry may devote their time more exclusively to preaching and writing.

May we not have a hearty response from the membership in this matter? Most of us are able to spare a few minutes each day, or a day each week for the Lord's work. Why not be real missionary people and carry the gospel message to our neighbors?

Yours very truly,

J. E. VANDERWOOD.

Thanksgiving Among the Indians

Elder Hubert Case who was preaching at Yale on Thanksgiving Day proposed that we meet with the Indian brethren in their thanksgiving dinner at Red Rock. Accordingly Thursday morning three auto loads of Saints and friends started on the fifty-five mile drive and arrived there in time for the dinner. We found quite a number had erected their tepees and prepared to enjoy themselves according to their custom. A long matting was spread upon the ground and everybody sat down. The food was passed, consisting of turkey, chicken, and fresh pork, also bread and fruit.

The things that were very noticeable were the absolute stillness when prayers were offered and that every one remained in their places until all had stopped eating even the children; then came the signal of dismissal by the master of ceremonies. It was an object lesson to me.

After dinner at the camp the Saints and friends from Yale went to the home of Brother Dave Pettit where nearly all the Indian Saints were gathered. Hymns were sung and soon announcement was made that dinner was ready and we surrounded the festive boards where a much more elaborate feast was had than the one at the camp, after which Brother Case led three into the waters of baptism, two adults and a boy.

We could not help but notice the spirit of humility and resignation that prevailed during the ceremony of baptism and confirmation. Brother Case also blessed two children. It then being late in the evening and Brother Case having an appointment at Yale, we started on our return trip feeling amply repaid for the long drive and the meeting with the brethren, feeling that good would result from the fact that while we were not expected yet we showed them that we thought of them, and were interested in their spiritual welfare.

On the next day Brother Case, Sister Serrf, Sister Hager and the writer cranked up the Ford and drove to Cushing and met a sister there that has been isolated and not heard a sermon in twenty-one years, yet one who loves the work. From there we drove to the home of a number of the Sac and Fox Tribes that Brother F. M. Smith and Brother Case had called on last spring. Then called on the chief of the tribe and were invited to meet with them at their Christmas meeting when a number of the Sacs and Foxes will meet, and made a tentative promise to do so.

Thence to Oilton and called on a Sister Hawkins and the family of Brother Daugherty who used to live in Holdenville, and gave them words of encouragement and intend to meet with them at least once a month in prayer and testimony meeting and thus help and encourage the isolated ones. Then back to Yale for evening preaching.

On Sunday Brother Case baptized three young people into the kingdom, one the granddaughter of Sister Adair and two children of a neighbor of Sister Adair's. Brother Case closed his meetings at Yale on Sunday night, but because the Indian work is uppermost in his mind, on Monday morning, accompanied by Brother Slover and myself he drove to the camp of the Pawnees, just north of the city of Pawnee where they have what Brother Case pronounced the largest roundhouse he has ever seen. Then we met the principal chief of the Pawnees who gave a warm invitation to us to meet with them in their Christmas festivities when a large number of the Pawnees would be present. They are the people that Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery preached to in the early thirties and they still remember it in their traditions. They have a very warm regard for Brother J. E. Yates who preached for them and would surely appreciate a visit from him and have long wondered where he was. The seed that has been long sown is beginning to germinate. The Pawnees are dissatisfied with the treatment accorded them by the churches that have been serving them, and we believe that now is the time to strike and do a great work with them because God is feeling after them as he has promised to do in these the last days. But one who labors among them must know that they are a very peculiar people and never forget what they might believe to be a slight or a deed of kindness. While the writer is not engaged in missionary work, yet the past week has been spent in such and we think that it has been a long time since we put in such a profitable week's work. The work in Yale is gradually going forward and new friends being made continually. When I came here six years ago and our first prayer meeting was held at the house of Brother George Vansickle there were only three afar. That does not mean that those who lift the ensign must be like the Levite priests—continually passing on the other side. It does mean a recognition of the broad brotherhood of humanity, in an effort to demonstrate the command of the Master, "Love your neighbor as yourself."

Boat With a Hole in the Bottom

The following item from the Sunday World Herald, Omaha, November 21, 1920, furnishes another story of a lifeboat with a hole in the bottom. Our readers will remember the statements which have been made previously concerning the lifeboats used in the United States Life Saving Service. The issue is the story in the Book of Mormon, of the boats made by the brother of Jared.

An unusual type of lifeboat, which operates by sucking water up from the ocean and blowing it back again, and so obtaining a speed of nine miles an hour, has been adopted by the lifesaving crew which works in stormy waters along the Dutch coast at the Hook of Holland.

The boat has a hole in the bottom through which the water is drawn by an intake pipe which leads to a powerful centrifugal pump operated by a 140-horse-power steam engine. The water is then forced backward into the sea through two outlet pipes opening at the bottom of the craft.

The boat is controlled by shutting off, either wholly or in part, one or the other of these outlet pipes. If one is shut off it goes to starboard, if the other, it goes to port. If both are shut off and the water diverted harmlessly over the sides while the suction goes on at the intake, it is claimed the boat rests almost still in the stormiest of seas, the suction holding it firmly on the water.

The Dutch lifesavers have found that this craft keeps steadier than any boat propelled with oars or by screws. It is fifty-eight feet long and has a capacity for from forty to one hundred passengers, depending upon the state of the sea. It has been in use for some time and has saved many lives.

Passing of a Monument to Militarism

One of the recent papers states that the famous Brandenburger Thor, so long the center of German militarism, has been diverted to quite different purposes. Formerly no one but the emperor was allowed to drive through the central arch. However, soldiers were always present to salute any military man passing. Civilians had to leave the walk to pass the arch. Soldiers were present to salute any high military functionary, and especially the emperor. It was made the very center symbol of German militarism. Now everyone passes through the central arch. There are no soldiers, and no drums. And to emphasize the change, the arch itself is plastered with signs and such letters as "Deliver up your weapons," stating that the government must turn over to the entente the rifles that the soldiers took home with them after the armistice. This is indeed directly a reversal of the original purpose and intention.

Saints present. Now we have about twenty-six members of the church that meet in our "little church around the corner," including two priests. Thus we can see that God is remembering his people. Firmly believing in the ultimate triumph of Zion, I am your brother,
A. J. HAGER.

E. A. S.

KIBLER.—Sylvester B. Kibler was born July 22, 1846, in Portage County, Ohio. Moved with parents to Six-Mile Grove, Harrison County, Iowa, in May, 1854. Married Caroline Ellison in 1868. Moved to Woodbine in 1873, and was president of the branch there for some thirty years. Was a member of the Quorum of High Priests for about twenty years. A year ago moved with his family to Whittier, California, and some weeks ago became ill of malaria and enlargement of the spleen, developing pneumonia later and passed away November 7, 1920. Leaves wife, one daughter, one son, one brother, and four grandchildren of immediate relatives. Funeral services were held in Woodbine, Fred A. Fry in charge. An extensive obituary and memorial was prepared by A. M. Fyrando and read on the occasion.

VAN BEEK.—Mary Virginia Swain was born November 16, 1842, at Washington, District of Columbia. Died October 25 at Kansas City, Missouri. In 1866 married George B. Van Beek. Was member of the church, uniting with the faith about 35 years ago. Six children were born, 4 of whom are living and remain to mourn. They are: George V. Van Beek, of Saint Paul, Minnesota; Mrs. Gertrude Grimes, Arlington, Nebraska; E. O. Van Beek, Kansas City, Missouri; and Mrs. Emma Black, of Davis City, Iowa. Funeral sermon by D. T. Williams at the Saints' chapel in Davis City, Iowa. Interment in Davis City cemetery.

HOLCOMB.—At her home in Independence, Missouri, October 29, 1920, Sister Elizabeth H. Holcomb. Was born in New Orleans, Louisiana, January 18, 1854. Baptized when about 10 years of age. In 1888 married Phillip Taylor. Several years subsequent to his death she married O. E. Holcomb, who also was taken from her about 6 years ago. Two children, Ernest Taylor and Mrs. Hazel Feldmuth, by her first marriage, survive her. Also 2 sisters and one brother. Her faith in the gospel continued to the end, and in the hope it inspired she passed away. Funeral services at Carson's Undertaking Chapel, October 31. Sermon by Joseph Luff, assisted by W. D. Bullard.

IVIE.—Mary Anderson Ivie was born in Denmark, October 13, 1857. Died at her home in Stewartsville, Missouri, October 20, 1920. At 13 years of age she came to America with her parents, locating in Nodaway County, Missouri. Married W. H. Ivie January 3, 1875. To this union 4 children were born, 3 of whom survive her. She leaves one brother, 3 sisters, and 3 grandchildren. Baptized in early life. Was devoted to her home and family and patient in her affliction of cancer, undergoing an operation in February, but receiving no relief. Funeral at the Union Church near Bedison, Missouri, conducted by Samuel Twombly, of Fanning, Kansas.

Mrs. Edith Carr, matron of the Holden Home, accompanied by Mrs. S. C. Thomas, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, recently visited Lamoni and made a tour of the church institutions.

NUMBER 50

CENTENNIAL NUMBER

A Hundred Years Ago in Missouri

The Missouri Historical Review for October, 1920, states that one hundred years ago Missouri was divided into seven counties. In fact the whole number is a centennial number including articles on "The Travail of Missouri for statehood," Missouri in 1820, journalism, literature, transportation, labor and industry, social customs and usages, and social reforms in Missouri for the past century.

From this we glean in 1820 Missouri was the extreme western outpost and essentially a frontier community. Its population of 66,586 lived along the narrow strip of waterways of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers. The capital was at Saint Charles; later at Saint Louis. Saint Genevieve was the oldest settlement. Saint Louis was a fur trading post and has continued as a great fur center, as it is to-day the greatest market in the world for raw furs.

The churches were few in number, small in membership, and widely scattered. Educational opportunities were also very limited. There were some private schools which the missionaries provided. The idea that it was the duty of the state to furnish education was not fully accepted even by the convention of 1820. At a price, every boy in the towns could get the rudiments of an education. A few of the larger centers offered slightly more. Interest was great, able men were living there, but it was too near the frontier for adequate facilities.

There were four newspapers in the coming state, including the Gazette, which as the Saint Louis Republic closed its continuous existence last year.

The Lewis and Clark expedition of 1804 and the Pike expeditions somewhat later had opened up the wealth of furs of the western territory. Transportation followed closely the rivers. Missouri became the real colonizer of the West. The Santa Fe trail was to connect Saint Louis and the quaint Southwest, especially Mexico through Santa Fe. The trail proper, however, started from Old Franklin through Independence; that is prior to 1827 it started from Old Franklin. After Independence was laid out in 1827 it became the basis for western travel till 1833, when the water destroyed the landing there and the trade shifted to Westport Landing (now Kansas City). The Santa Fe trail reached seven hundred and seventy-five miles to the southwest. The Oregon trail, also from Independence, reached two thousand and twenty miles to the northwest to the mouth of the Columbia River at Fort Vancouver. Both roads were used first by fur traders and trappers, by mule trains, later by wagon trains of traders, homeseekers, scientists, and others; and finally they have become the right of way for the Santa Fe and Union Pacific Railroads. It is estimated that between 1853 and 1861 more than fifty thousand "prairie schooners" were engaged in transporting commerce from Missouri to the Southwest over the Santa Fe trail.

In the meantime the bull boat and mackinaw had given way to the steamboat, which made its first appearance about 1817.

Still the flatboats were much used prior to the Civil War, floating down the river, selling as they went; when sold out the boat was sold and the owner came home by steamboat.

The Missouri and Mississippi were the great arteries of commerce. Steamboating began regularly on the Missouri in 1829. In 1850 there were 2,899 steamboat arrivals at Saint Louis; in 1857, 729 at Kansas City.

About 1836 and 1837 there began agitation for railroads. In two weeks seventeen charters for railroads were granted by the legislature. But no railroads were actually started until 1851. In 1850 Saint Louis had a population of 58,081. Chicago had several railroads. One extending from Springfield to Alton made it necessary to put on an extra packet. By 1853 about forty miles was completed on the Pacific Railroad. Railroads were started to the Iron Mountain country for minerals, to the southwest from Saint Louis for the same reason; across from Hannibal towards Saint Joseph, and what was to be the Wabash was building in 1855 to Saint Charles. By that year (1855) about 139 miles had been completed; by 1860 there were 817 miles. By 1865 the Pacific Railroad was completed into Kansas City, and in the fall one could leave Kansas City at 3 a. m. and reach Saint Louis the same day. About the same time the Hannibal and Saint Joseph was completed across the State.

By 1870 Saint Louis was connected by rail with New Orleans, Mobile, Nashville, Atlanta, Charleston, Des Moines, and Omaha. There were 2,000 miles of railroads in the State as compared with 8,529 miles in 1918. This shows how very recent has been the railroad development of the State.

It may be interesting to call attention to an editorial by our late President, Joseph Smith, in the HERALD in the late fall of 1870. He stated that when he went to the fall conference at Gallands Grove in 1864 it took thirteen days to cross from the Mississippi River, but that in the fall of 1870 he had gone to Council Bluffs in thirteen hours by rail.

Street cars first used in New York in 1832, by 1875 were in use in Saint Louis, Kansas City, and a few years later in other cities of the State.

The primitive conditions existing in Missouri one hundred years ago are hard to realize to-day. Independence was the city of west Missouri in 1827 to 1833, but in the latter year its dock was washed away by a flood. Then in 1837 followed the panic and a decided slump in the trade to Santa Fe and the Southwest. This led to the development of the railroads out of Saint Louis, but not till about fifteen years later. By 1870 Kansas City was also becoming a rail center, and steamboating had suffered a great decline.

In 1851 the foundation of a university was laid in Saint Louis and in the following years other institutions of higher learning were established. Standardization has, however, been very recent.

A recent church service in Lamoni was devoted to the Boy Scouts. An address was given by Elder Oscar Anderson, mayor of Lamoni, on "The boy as seen by a father, a citizen, and an official." Nine boys were given second-class scout badges and two the tenderfoot. Floyd M. McDowell was in charge of the meeting and addressed the audience briefly as well as dispensed the decorations. The following brethren are in charge and directly assisting in boy scout work in Lamoni: A. E. Bullard, Lloyd Gregory, Harry Lorance, Eugene Closson, A. E. Winegar.

Our Third Centennial Number

On December 23, 1805, in the town of Sharon, Vermont, was born a boy, destined to introduce and develop a remarkable work. A little over fourteen years later in the spring of 1820 in western New York, he went out to pray to learn which church to join, believing that God would answer, as is promised in James 1: 5. As a result he received that wonderful first vision. That marked the first recognition in modern times that God is indeed a God of the living, and is as ready to talk to his children, mankind, as in ages past.

A boy with so clear vision, with a faith so large in that age of little faith, deserves much credit, hence we are offering this Centennial Number a few days before the anniversary of his birth one hundred and fifteen years ago.

As was pointed out by President Elbert A. Smith in the first Centennial Number last April, the work done by and through Joseph Smith in his few short years of service represented the following great ideas:

1. Renewed revelation.
2. Book of Mormon, which involves the idea of God as the father of all, revealing his will to his children.
3. The restoration of the God-appointed officers of the New Testament church.
4. A return to the New Testament church and its teaching.
5. The church to-day should enjoy the blessings of old, as set forth in Mark 16, 1 Corinthians 12, and elsewhere.
6. Priesthood restored, called of God, not simply elected by men.
7. A Bible corrected by inspiration, in which the major errors are eliminated.
8. Zion, a gathering place, the pure in heart. In this is included the plan of economic justice, stewardships and consecration, inheritance, tithes and offerings—a complete plan for social and economic cooperative service.

The light then revealed from God has marked the beginning of a period of great intellectual and material advancement. The light shining in the world has enlightened every man. The spiritual truths set forth above are of the greatest importance, yet for man's comfort here the material gains are not to be ignored. It is difficult to-day to realize how great are the changes the few years of the century have wrought. Even the few years since the World War have wrought great changes, but that should not blind us to the progress made in the years before. Also if we are to have a right focus on our problem, be what it may, we must have perspective, and an appreciation of the past.

He who lives in the past will be sad of heart. He who views the future is filled with hope. Our work requires our attention for the "eternal now." But he who meets the present without due consideration of the past, lacks perspective. He tries to sail without a rudder. He does not know where he is going, nor why, nor where are the rocks to avoid. We therefore pause for a brief space to consider a few of the things the recently past years have meant and now mean for us.

The speaker at the church in Lamoni on Thanksgiving Day was J. Vincent Gray, pastor of the local Methodist Episcopal Church. There was a good attendance.

The Branch Bulletin, published monthly at Saint Louis, Missouri, lists in the official roster of the branch Elder Clyde F. Ellis, pastor, 3211 Hebert Street. Phone Tyler 3147-J. Passing Saints are requested to call at the church at Grand and Carter Avenues, 4300 North. Sunday school at 9.30, preaching at 11 and at 8.

The Return of the New Testament Church

By Myron A. McConley

[To-day many churches of the sectarian world are preaching a return to the New Testament church and seeking for a unity of the churches of the various sects. There is also a growing demand for a return to the New Testament teaching and work. It has not gone so far as yet, as to demand a return to the God-ordained organization as given in the New Testament. All of this movement was discounted a hundred years ago by the young man, Joseph Smith, who not only taught but introduced a return to the teachings of the church in the New Testament, and to the organization of the priesthood as there given.—EDITORS.]

The history of the development, disintegration, and decay of the apostolic church reveals clearly God's power and love. It discloses both success and failure and emphasizes the truth of Christ's statement, "As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me." (John 15: 4.)

As long as the church was true to the gospel law, the Spirit of God was present in its sanctuaries, power attended its ministrations, and the fruits of the Spirit, love, joy, and peace, were enjoyed by its members. But as man's ideas were gradually introduced and the doctrine of Christ discarded, spiritual power waned, the gifts of the gospel ceased, and darkness ensued, which lasted for centuries and is known in history as "the Dark Ages."

The rise from this pitiful condition of the medieval church was gradual and was only accomplished after a prolonged struggle between truth and error. The forerunners in this work of sacrifice, courage, and perseverance are commonly known as the Reformers. While they were unable to re-establish the church as it was in Christ's day, yet the hand of God is manifest in their efforts, and that which they did prepared the way and was a stepping stone to its final accomplishment.

God knew the disposition of the hearts of men, and in the weaknesses of their nature he discerned the spirit of intolerance which would still prevail in Europe, even after the Reformation. He therefore designed that the scenes of the final restoration of the church should be in a more favorable clime. And he accordingly prepared the stage for its enactment on the Western Hemisphere.

About the same year that Martin Luther, the great reformer, was born, God moved upon the mind of Christopher Columbus to think that the world was round which resulted in the discovery of America. Following this the Pilgrim Fathers finally effected a permanent settlement at Plymouth. Others followed and several colonies were formed, which, while they differed somewhat in their religious conceptions, had been drawn to the land of America, that they might enjoy religious freedom.

In time men were raised up by the Almighty for the preparation of that wonderful document, the Constitution of the United States. In this, civil and religious liberty was guaranteed to all men. Under this guarantee, those thirteen insignificant colonies became one. Their adopted motto was, "In God we trust." And under his care they have developed into the United States of America, one of the most influential nations of the world.

As might be expected, various churches have arisen under this spirit of religious liberty. Prominent among them is the Christian or Campbellite Church. This was the result of various modifications of doctrine and belief introduced by the Reverend Alexander Campbell. His slogan was, "Where the Bible speaks, we speak. Where the Bible is silent, we are silent." After some twenty years of evolution an organization was effected, but only part of the New Testament officers and doctrine were incorporated in its belief. About 1833 the Advent movement began emphasizing the near approach of the Savior's return and later incorporated into its belief the Saturday Sabbath. But important officers mentioned in the New Testament church and parts of the doctrine of Christ were omitted.

The early reformers as well as those above mentioned were prominent in the church, usually possessing the best education of their day and time. It is therefore remarkable that after all the attempts of centuries an unlearned country boy should be able to launch a movement which restored to the world the New Testament church. It was most certainly not the work of man, but the work of God.

This country boy was Joseph Smith. In the year 1820, he had prayed for spiritual direction, basing his faith upon the promise contained in James 1: 5: "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him." God answered this prayer, offered in childlike faith, and revealed that the church according to the New Testament pattern was not upon the earth. Spiritual light and angelic ministrations were enjoyed by this young man to a remarkable degree during the next ten years. On May 15, 1829, he was ordained by an angel from heaven to go forth to preach the gospel and baptize for the remission of sins as in days of old.

From among those converted, by commandment of God, the church was duly organized on April 6, 1830, at Fayette, Seneca County, New York. As their numbers increased, the Spirit of God directed who should be chosen for the various offices of the priesthood and the apostolic church with apostles, prophets, sevens, high priests, evangelists, bishops, elders, priests, teachers, and deacons, was again found among the children of men.

God's servants, chosen and set apart for the work, went forth preaching the Old Jerusalem Gospel as in days of old. The Spirit of God accompanied their message and men were constrained to have faith in God. His Spirit moved them to repent of their sins and the waters of the creeks, lakes, and rivers throughout the land were disturbed, as the servants of God baptized by immersion for the remission of sins. And as the elders laid their hands on the baptized candidates, in the services which followed, and prayed in faith for the baptism of the Holy Ghost, their prayers were answered to the joy and satisfaction of those baptized.

Through the laying on of hands and the prayer of faith the sick were healed. The spiritual gifts were manifested and that peace which passeth all understanding was received. The promise of Acts 2: 17 was literally fulfilled.

Since that day the church has had its ups and downs. But it is now represented by many congregations of faithful Saints in different lands and on the islands of the sea. Of recent years other religious movements have arisen, the most prominent in numbers being what is generally termed "The New Thought Movement." This commonly includes "Christian Science," "Higher Thought," "Unity," "Occultists," "Theosophists," "Rosacruzians," etc. During the last twenty-five years their numbers have increased very rapidly until they now claim to number about one twelfth of our population, in the United States.

While some principles of truth are to be found in all of these movements, yet the gospel of Jesus Christ as restored by God to his church is superior to them all. God has not changed. The ancient prophet says, "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets." And as we review the development of the last one hundred years we note many things which were foreshadowed in the direction which God gave to the church through the latter-day prophet. The industrial complications of our day were foreseen. The need of an adjustment of our economic law to conform to the law of the gospel was clearly explained and emphasized. And its wisdom and necessity is daily becoming more apparent.

As the servants of God are going into different lands and inviting all men to come to Christ, the Spirit of God is giving power to their message. A great program of activity lies ahead of the church. Everyone should be up and doing. Preparation is being made for the return of the Master.

Are you diligently preparing for that time?

The Development of Communication

By Arthur B. Church

Brother Church, at the head of the Department of Communication of the church Industrial Commission, reviews the wonderful progress of the past century in the matter of communication.

"The world is becoming smaller." Of course the earth is not contracting physically, but to the inhabitants of the earth it is not a fact that friends far away can now be summoned quickly, that foreign governments may hold intercourse practically instantaneously, that commercial interests at Chicago and at London can make a transaction one day and ship the goods the day following? The world is becoming smaller.

The progress of communication determines the progress of civilization. The period of every nation's most rapid strides has been that during which one or more phases of communication and transportation have been developed.

What is communication? One writer puts it thus, "That is communicated which is made of common knowledge or of common enjoyment; what is imparted is given to or shared with another and is usually of interest or importance to both parties." Closely allied with communication and inseparable from it is transportation. In fact, so closely associated are the factors of the two that they may be classified under the one heading, communication, and as such will be discussed in this paper.

Here, it may be well to enumerate or outline the phases that communication includes.

Transportation may be effected on land, on water, and in air. The instruments for the former are man, beast, and mechanically propelled vehicles; for the second, vessels propelled by man, wind, or mechanical power—usually steam; and for the latter, aircraft lighter than air (balloons) and aircraft heavier than air (airplanes). Intelligent communication is effected by means of postal systems, printed matter, telegraph and cable, telephone, and radio (wireless) telegraph and telephone.

In considering the various phases of communication and its development, a discussion of the history of these phases is logical.

Transportation

Transportation is at all times a true criterion of material progress, and its history is interwoven with that of commerce and civilization. Livingstone expressed the opinion that if civilization were ever to penetrate the dark continent of Africa, it must be the result, not of the unaided missionary, but of new trade routes. Cut off the means of transport and communication from any place, however rich in natural wealth, and ruin and stagnation will quickly follow.

Land Transportation

The first of the three stages of transportation on land—the primitive stage—was indeed one of primitive conditions. Human strength was the sole instrument, and in commerce it was usually supplied by slaves or serfs. The second stage is the employment of pack animals, the kind of animal used depending upon the country; this stage began earliest in the Eastern Hemisphere where pack animals were most abundant, and was not developed among the inhabitants of America until after its discovery by Europeans. The third or modern stage is characterized by the employment of new natural forces, which enabled man to overcome all physical obstacles, or bend them at his will. In this stage it is interesting to note a few dates, which at the time of the events, were said to mark "new eras."

In 1766 a line of stage wagons was run between Philadelphia and New York, "with the seats set on springs." These comparatively speedy wagons were known as "flying machines." Dating from this time the number of wheeled vehicles speedily increased and great improvements were constantly made, "culminating in the buggy, an American invention, which amazed English coach builders by its lightness, ease, and durability." The Victoria, until a few years ago the most popular of carriages, first came into favor in 1869. It is superfluous here to trace the development of the automobile and other motor-driven vehicles, since it has been so prominently displayed to this generation. The highways on which modern vehicles travel, however, call for some mention. The construction of roads has a very important bearing on civilization and on commerce; and, though many of the historic roads were designed to further the cause of war, they permanently fostered the pursuits of peace, and laid the foundations of social progress. Although Rome is famed for its excellent roads, constructed particularly for military purposes, a commercial people—the Carthaginians—are given the credit for the invention of paved roads. In this country permanent highways have not developed as rapidly as other advancements seem to indicate they should. This is largely due to the vastness of territory, and partially to the network of railways. Recent legislation provides for a vast amount of new road building and improvement, so it seems reasonable to believe that in a few years motor freight transportation will be entirely practicable.

A whole volume might easily be written concerning the progress of the steam railways, but only a brief space can be given here. To the Cornishman, Richard Trevithick, is probably due the credit of making the first practical steam coach, which carried passengers at Camborne, Cornwall, on Christmas Eve, 1801. Trevithick continued his experiments, and in 1804 he made several trials on the Merthyr Tidal line in Wales. An enthusiastic witness has recorded that this train traveled "five miles an hour with ease"; and, further, that it "carried ten long tons of bar iron from Penydarren Iron Works, nine miles to the Glamorganshire Canal, also 70 persons." The success of the locomotive was assured when George Stephenson, "The father of the locomotive," brought out the famous "Rocket" in 1829, which on its first trial attained a speed of 29 miles an hour. The "iron steed" may now be seen in almost every country in the world, but it is the United States that ranks foremost in the design and production of locomotives.

Electric railways, in a few years, have become indispensable to cities. Their cleanliness, flexibility of operation, and comparative low expense have caused them to practically replace the local steam railways.

Water Transportation

Water transport has always been the most important in the history of the world's commerce. The river was the highway of trade long before roads were dreamed of. The great waterways became the first seats of population and empire. They were the links with the outer world, and were naturally the first channels of transport to be developed. Water transport has ever been cheaper than transport by land, and was one of the earliest means of international trade. Trade invariably seeks the lines of least resistance; hence the routes of ancient commerce followed the world's waterways, and were only checked or cut asunder by barriers of transport. These breaks in transportation, necessitating the transfer of commodities, determined the location of industrial centers—the great commercial cities.

The Phœnicians were the first navigators and maritime carriers of whom we read. With their oared barks, steered close in shore, they established a route between Egypt and Syria, the corn and ivory of the Nile, and the silk, oil, and spices of western Asia passing through their hands. Then, becoming bolder in navigation, they hoisted sails, and in the days of Solomon penetrated the Red Sea and searched the inlets of the Mediterranean. To them belongs the honor of the empire city Carthage, whose sole strength was in her ships. Sailing ships were a great improvement over the man-propelled type, and they were built larger and larger as time went on, and as greater seas were navigated. In this country, nearly all ships were produced in New England. The high-water mark in shipbuilding was reached in 1769 when the new colonies launched 389 vessels—113 square-rigged and 276 sloops and schooners. The first practicable steamboat was the Clermont, built by Robert Fulton in 1807. Steam-propelled vessels gradually replaced sailing ships, but not until after a great struggle for supremacy between steam and sail had conclusively proved the greater practicability of the former. In recent years, many small ships have been equipped with gasoline motors, and the number of large electrically propelled vessels is rapidly increasing.

Ship canals, waterways built by man, should not escape mention. Their value as connecting links in our great systems of transportation is inestimable.

Air Transportation

Among the truly startling advancements in transportation that have taken place during the last few years none are greater than those made in air transportation. It seems impossible, yet it is true, that air transport has progressed from a state of ridicule to one of relative practicability, almost overnight. The press of war has been largely responsible for this remarkable condition.

Aircraft may be divided into two classes—lighter than air machines (balloons) and heavier than air machines (airplanes). Of the former class dirigible balloons filled with helium gas (non-explosive) are considered best, but the airplane promises to be the most important air machine, since it is much speedier, and can be quickly and accurately controlled. To Orville and Wilbur Wright, brothers, of Dayton, Ohio, probably belongs the credit of the first successful airplane. A considerable number of companies are now organized for the manufacture of aircraft, and quantities are being sold for military and commercial purposes.

Already several aerial transportation companies have begun operation on a small scale. Passenger machines are becoming more and more common, and doubtless in a few years hence, regular routes will have been established between all principal cities. The aerial mail service has demonstrated its practicability and is being extended as rapidly as consistent.

The Communication of Intelligence

Up to this point we have considered almost exclusively the various phases of transportation which is considered as one branch of communication. We will now consider the means by which communication is transported, and their development.

The Post Office

The transport of messages originated in the Orient. The dakrunners and mounted messengers, who speeded from post to post in ancient days, foreshadowed a general postal service. Cyrus the Elder, King of Persia, is credited with having established a relay system in 559 B. C.; while China is known to have had such messengers from earliest historical times. In England, during the reign of Henry VIII, the government established a regular service of messengers; and under Edward III, a system of posts was instituted at which the Royal Nuncios could change horses. Gradually the system became more efficient, and was greatly extended.

In this country a "post to go monthly from New York to Boston" was established in 1672 by the colony of New York. In 1756 the first mail coach ran between Philadelphia and New York. Two years later, newspapers, which up to that time had been carried free, were charged with postage. Postage stamps came into general use in this country about 1847. The United States was slow in adopting the parcels post system used by other countries, but finally adopted the system which we would not now dispense with.

Telegraph and Cable

From earliest times methods of conveying intelligence swiftly to a distance have been universally known and utilized. Most important among these are the optical or visual methods, which include fires, semaphore (arm motions), heliograph (reflection of sun's rays), and torchlights superseded to-day by flash-lights.

The application of electricity to signaling has revolutionized all previous methods. In this country the first successful telegraph was devised by Samuel Morse. In May, 1844, the first telegraph line in the United States was successfully opened between Washington and Baltimore. Since Morse's first message—"What hath God wrought?"—was flashed across the wire, and the practicability of the invention was assured, the electric telegraph has truly put a girdle around the earth, and distance has become annihilated.

The so-called Morse alphabet of dots and dashes was worked out by an associate of Morse, named Vail. This alphabet, somewhat modified, is used in other countries and by all wireless telegraph systems, being known as the Continental Morse or International code.

Further steps in the advancement of telegraphy were the duplex and multiplex systems which permitted a number of messages to be transmitted and received simultaneously using the same wire. Prominent among the inventors of these systems are Stearns, Edison, Gray, and Bell. During recent years methods of transmitting handwriting and photographs have been devised, and several are in commercial use.

Amongst the wonders of a wonder-working century, none are more stupendous than that triumph of genius and perseverance—the submarine telegraph or cable. Ridiculed at their attempts and failures, F. N. Gisborne, Cyrus Field, and several others renewed their efforts in establishing the system in which they had so much faith, and their perseverance was amply rewarded in 1856 when cable communication was established between Saint Johns, Newfoundland, and Canada. Two years later, the first transatlantic message voiced the sentiment of Christendom: "Europe and America are united by telegraphy. Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good will toward men." Great disappointments and difficulties followed, but the persistent and untiring effort of men surmounted them, so that to-day there are about twenty cables across the Atlantic alone. In 1905 there were approximately 250,000 nautical miles of submarine cable in working order throughout the globe—a length sufficient to engirdle the earth over ten times.

The Telephone

When we look around the world, and see the telephone in use in every office and almost every home, it is hardly conceivable that four decades ago the invention was commercially unknown. Yet it was not until 1876 that Alexander Graham Bell patented the first practicable telephone. Almost simultaneously Elisha Gray announced similar discoveries to those of Bell. Both pointed out that by means of a device called a microphone the modulations of the voice could be made to produce similar variations of electric current which could be reproduced as intelligible sounds. The first practical telephone line was built in Boston in 1879; and in the same year the Bell Telephone Association was formed. This concern has since been absorbed by the American Telegraph and Telephone Company, formed in 1899. To-day, in this country alone, there are over ten million telephones, connected by some twenty-five million miles of wire.

It is told that in 1876, the emperor of Brazil, visiting the first telephone exhibition at our first great national show, the Philadelphia Centennial, picked up the receiver, listened as Professor Bell talked at the other end of the room, and, amazed at the wonder of the thing, cried out: "My God! It speaks!" Had Dom Pedro (the emperor) lived to see the Panama-Pacific Exposition he could have heard Professor Bell talking to him, not merely from the other end of a room, but from the other side of a continent.

Radio Communication

And now we come to the strictly modern method of communication—that of transmitting intelligence without wires—radio!

The possibility of transmitting electric signals without conducting wires is not a new discovery, but the practicable operation of a wireless system dates back only twenty years. Morse experimented on quite a large scale in 1842, as did many others, the principle of each experiment being the use of land or water to conduct the current from point to point. John Trowbridge, of Harvard, advocated a method of etheric telegraphy in 1880. Joseph Henry, Michael Faraday, Maxwell, Hertz, Lodge, Kelvin, Tesla, and Edison made basic discoveries and developments which paved the way for Marconi, a young Italian electrical engineer, to whom is attributed the honor of launching the first commercially practicable method of telegraphy, based on electric waves. Marconi patented his system in 1896, and only five years later sent the first wireless signals across the Atlantic.

American inventors were not slow to take up the development of radio communication, and a number of leading engineers and scientists, notably DeForest, Edison, and Fessenden shortly evolved systems which in some ways were superior to Marconi's.

The early radio installations were not entirely reliable, by any means. Great difficulties were met and are still encountered in the problems of atmospheric electricity which at times, in some localities renders the transmission of radio signals impossible. Another great problem has been that of interference caused by several stations sending at the same time. The early installations were arranged with the spark gap placed directly in the antenna system creating a maximum displacement of ether but emitting waves termed by radio engineers "highly damped," the tuning of which at the receiving station was extremely broad; so that getting rid of undesirable signals was almost an impossibility. Great advancements have taken place, and it is now possible to pick out the signals of a single station while hundreds of others are transmitting simultaneously. "Static" or atmospheric interference is being gradually conquered. In fact, so great have been the improvements in the last ten years, that radio communication is now just as dependable, the year around, as the telegraph and telephone.

Of all the contributions to radio progress none are so great as that little evacuated glass bulb—the “audion”—evolved by Doctor Lee-DeForest. Incidentally, this same device has also made possible transcontinental telephony, and multiplex telephony. The uses of the vacuum tube furnish material for a most interesting article by itself, and can only be enumerated here. In the latest types of transmitting equipment, vacuum tubes are used as oscillation generators, rectifiers, and modulators of the human voice (in radio telephony). In receiving set these “mystery bottles” are employed as detectors, oscillators, and amplifiers. Is it not wonderful that a single device should have so many properties of greatly diversified character, and perform all of its functions reliably?

Radio may never take the place of wire telegraphy and telephony, but it fills a wide gap which no other system has satisfied. It is the sole means of communication between ships at sea, between ships and land, between aircraft, and between aircraft and land. It is already replacing communication by cable, as is proved by the fact that no submarine cables have been laid recently while the number of transoceanic radio stations are rapidly increasing in number. And finally, it promises to replace long distance telephony, and become the most important method of intercity communication. Why? Simply because of comparatively small expense of installation and maintenance, and as great or greater dependability than wire systems.

At a recent gathering together of the radio experts of five great nations, E. F. W. Alexanderson, chief engineer of the Radio Corporation of America, delivered an address which began thus:

“Wireless achievements are often referred to as belonging in the realm of mystery. Whenever knowledge conquers a new force of nature for the use of humanity, it ceases to be a mystery; but the pursuit of this knowledge makes an even greater appeal to the imagination.

“The telephone and cables have introduced a new era in human affairs. They have, to a degree, conquered space and time, but only with certain serious limitations.

“An ocean cable runs only from one landing place to another, and it can be cut in times of war; its use can be censored by its owners and controlled by military and naval power. When, on the other hand, you send a radio message it reaches all parts of the world. Depending upon whether it has been sent in code or in plain language, it may be a confidential private message or a press message intended for the world at large; but nobody can prevent the electromagnetic waves that carry the message from reaching their destination. It is thus not exaggeration to say that the emancipation of the human spirit, begun by the printing press, has found its fulfillment in radio communication. Radio makes the transmission of ideas from man to man and from nation to nation independent of any frail material carrier such as a wire; but above all it renders such communication independent of brute force that might be used to isolate one part of the world from another.”

The party of international experts was entertained by the American Telegraph and Telephone Company in New York, and witnessed an epochal achievement in one of the demonstrations given. Communication by wires and wireless between the Catalina Islands in the Pacific Ocean and a ship in the Atlantic Ocean was established, and each member of the party, furnished with a receiver, was able to hear the remarkable conversation that took place. When the connection with San Francisco had been established, conversations were held between the British consul there and a representative of the British delegation, between the Italian consul and a representative of the Italian delegation in the Italian language, between a Frenchman and the representative of the French delegation in the French language. Then the connection was carried down from San Francisco to Los Angeles and Santa Catalina Island. After the Catalina operator had told the skipper of the Gloucester, who was riding a heavy sea in the Atlantic Ocean's darkness of eleven o'clock, that the sun was just setting off California, Colonel Carty cut in with:

“You, Captain Nichols on the Gloucester, and Operator Spiker on the Catalina Islands, are taking part in an epochal event in wireless telephony. You are the first men to talk to each other from the Atlantic to the Pacific, across the waters of both oceans and the stretches of the continent.”

By automatic devices of American invention, the conversation was taken off the ends of the land wires and transmitted by radio to the ocean stations.

What Have the Last One Hundred Years Wrought?

Stop for a moment and review the dates at which the greatest steps of communication and transportation have taken place. Nearly all of them are in the last century. In fact, the majority of the present methods and instruments are developments of the last quarter century. In no period of the world's history have there been so many basic inventions and such great progress in communication as in the past hundred years. Assuming that the advancement made during the next century will be even proportionately great, it staggers the human imagination to try to comprehend the methods that will then be employed.

The newspapers, books, periodicals, and other printed matter which come under the classification of communication cannot be discussed here, but the modern printing process is a development of the last century. A few miscellaneous methods of communicating intelligence can only be mentioned—photographs, motion pictures, etc.

The Church and Communication

Of the spiritual methods of communication we cannot speak here, but the practical aspects of the modern methods of communication deserve consideration and study. The industrial development of Zion necessarily includes the problems of communication, and it appears advisable to begin without delay a systematic study of these problems and their peculiar application for our purposes. Indeed, such investigations have already been started in a small way.

But what methods of communication and transportation are practicable for us to adopt? Would a private system of steam or electric railways be possible, or would a system of motor transportation be more logical? Or still further, is aerial transportation service beyond reason? Of the methods of transmitting intelligence does not radio appear the most practical for intercity communication, especially between the more distant points; and is not telephony best adapted for local communication?

Wonderful fields are here opened up to our membership, and it is hoped that they will not be overlooked, and that study will not be delayed until the time is finally reached when a private system is needed but not developed to a stage of practicability and usefulness.

Less than fifty-two years ago, the TRUE LATTER DAY SAINTS' HERALD apologized for the purchase of a Taylor cylinder power press. They were spending the church money to buy a steam press! Previous to that, it seems the HERALD had been printed by hand press. Yet this Taylor cylinder power press was indeed a very small affair and insignificant compared to those which are used to-day. It was evidently very little larger than a hand press.

Progress of Education in America in the Past Hundred Years

By George N. Briggs

This article by the president of Graceland College tells why the past hundred years has been the most wonderful century in the history of mankind.

One great American philosopher has said, "We have moved forward one hundred years within the last twelve months."

The Editor, in requesting an article on the subject indicated in the heading, evidently did not have in mind the dictum of the philosopher quoted above, and yet, if he had, it might be quite as difficult, if not more so, to adequately comply with the request, that is to write on the progress of education during the past twelve months as to do so for the past century. We are passing through a period of readjustment and reconstruction educationally as well as along every other line of effort since the armistice that is most bewildering and the total effects of which are yet quite beyond the comprehension of even the leaders who have been most responsible.

A noted statesman recently said, "Since 1914 one thousand years of progress have been made."

This man probably speaks in the superlative and yet it is safe to say that we stand on the threshold of a new era.

Congresses, conventions, and commissions of every conceivable kind have been called and are being called in this and other countries in an attempt to study the problems and reach some conclusions as to our present status and the best thing to do in the forward movements of the world. Only recently I attended as a delegate from Iowa a great nation-wide citizens conference held in the Nation's capitol at Washington to discuss the "Educational crisis," and now regional conferences are being held throughout the country to discuss these great problems of readjustment and reconstruction. It is well, then, that as a basis for the next century we should look back over the past to ascertain our starting point.

As a great college president recently said, "The present world situation is inevitably a time of heart searchings; for the terrible war was an arraignment of our intelligence and our morals—our education and our religion."

We Must Think in World Terms

The subject assigned relates to education in America, and it is well, too, that this summary should be made at this time, because from henceforth we must think in terms of the world rather than in terms of the United States, we must think in terms of education for world-living.

The necessity for education for world-living is very evident to all thinking men and women, to all "forward looking" people. First, because of the great improvements in transportation and communication and through the press, the world is unified and the peoples brought close together as never before in the history of mankind. No education will be complete in the future which does not make it possible for men to enter intelligently into the life of the world. To us in this country the fact that our western civilization is permeating into all corners of the globe is very significant and requires of us, of all people in the world, the very broadest outlook possible.

It is reported by geographers that somewhere in Iceland the rays of the setting sun and the rays of the rising sun mingle with each other. Certainly within the past several years the rays of the rising tide of a world outlook have mingled with and are tending to obliterate the receding rays of provincialism resulting in a world-wide vision, the conquest of race prejudice, intelligent and unselfish cooperation on a world-wide scale, with an extension of those moral and religious convictions that form the spiritual roots of all that is best in western civilization.

Within the past hundred years, which is the period of our study, the etymological meaning of the word education has come to be much more generally accepted as an accurate definition of the process. An individual or a social group is educated by being led out or developed into a full realization of its natural powers. All things, all conditions, all actions, and the laws that govern them, all contact with human influences and with the world outside of man—all these are means or instrumentalities aiding or hindering the process of education. Education in this comprehensive sense, goes on in many phases without the control of conscious human planning or direction.

The education whose aim we are discussing is the education planned and directed by conscious human effort. It necessarily differs with the differing conception of the relation of the individual to the State and to society. In a form of government "of the people, by the people, and for the people," it must have regard for the fact that the prosperity and happiness of the social whole depend directly upon the competence of the intelligence, integrity, and forcefulness of the individual citizens whose collective will is the state. The aim of education in such a state is the development of a citizenship whose life realizes in the highest possible degree the satisfaction of its needs, desires, and ideals.

The topic assigned is the "Progress" of education. If we are to speak of progress, we must have some consciousness of a goal. For our present purposes, we may assume that it is the goal of education to prepare all men to live as cooperative human beings. There are many kinds and degrees of cooperation. It may be local, national, and universal. It may be industrial, political, religious, and it may be plain family life and neighborliness. In every case, every man must play his personal part. So the end of education is individual as well as social. It involves an increase of personal appreciation as regards those things which make for use, for beauty, and for righteousness; it involves also the kindling of personal devotion to the impersonal law of truth. The end of our goal, as well as the beginning, lies in these personal values; for human cooperation even up to its widest development, is a striving that use and beauty, truth and righteousness may prevail among men, that they may be followed intensely and freely by men acting in endless diversity and acting also in perfect unison.

Our goal, then, is a society which shall seek after the best by seeking out the best in every man; it is a society in which there shall be equality in that every man shall have a chance to bring out the best that is in him and to use it for the common good.

Education in this country has become fully conscious of its world relationships. It has, on the other hand, developed a good measure of conscious independence. America has taken her place in the family of nations and her educational program for the next century will be as different from that of the past century as will be her governmental program.

The question presented by our topic is how far had the efforts of American education brought us on our way before the conflict of the nations thrust upon us the problems of the coming age? What have these years done for us as preliminary to the real world education that is yet to be?

Progress in Past Century

The consensus of the opinions of the leading educators of the country is that the past century closed with certain salient features of the progress made which may be summarized as follows:

1. There has appeared a new conception of universal education. In the earlier part of the century, universal education was generally understood to mean the education of the children in the rudiments of scholastic learning. At the close of the period it has come to mean the education of all of the people, of all ages and conditions, not merely in those rudiments, but in preparation for all of their needs in which education may be made to minister. A corollary of this conception is the belief that every interest in life is to be furthered by education. We are coming to find an educational aspect and need in every human undertaking.

2. There has been a most remarkable development of educational activities and activities closely related to education. It would be difficult to enumerate all of these marginal interests and activities which have directly affected our educational development; libraries and lecture courses, lyceums and chautauquas, playgrounds, community centers, "wider uses" of the school plant, the movement for the prevention of child labor, the campaign for health in a score of forms, scouts, camp-fire girls, moving pictures, athletics, pageantry, dramatics, and a score of other activities of supreme importance in our educational program.

3. We have organized the "typical school," the school for exceptionally bright pupils, the school for exceptionally dull pupils, the school for the vocationally minded, and the school for the preparation of the leaders of society. Our country schools have fairly begun to claim a kind of teaching fitted to the needs of country life. Our girls have begun to receive some measure of teaching directed to the improvement of girl life and the life of the home.

4. There has been a marked growth in the provision for vocational education in both public and private institutions of learning. The age of "apprenticeship" has passed to give way to the age of the combination of the so-called cultivated with the so-called industrial in a manner which enables the best in everyone to be developed. Now all questions relating to education for the trades and other vocations are followed with the deepest interest; vocational guidance is receiving very serious attention. The National Government, by recent legislation, is assisting in the carrying out of plans for vocational education on a rather extensive scale; industrial and commercial corporations are conducting schools along vocational lines; continuation schools are being organized in many industrial centers; and the coordination of school and shop is receiving marked attention in educational circles.

5. Educational courses for "social service" are receiving marked attention in all institutions of higher learning and in many so-called social centers in our congested city districts. These efforts bode much for the future well-being of our citizenry.

6. The lessons of the war have brought home to us the fact that there is a possibility that there are many young men in our country capable of doing high grade work in college who have not pursued the prescribed secondary courses of study long recognized as being the basis for admission to college. For such, general intelligence tests are to be given to determine fitness for entering college. As one great university, typical of them all, has announced recently, "They may secure admission either by comprehensive examinations in four subjects, one of which must be English, the others optional with the applicant; or they may elect to take examinations in their ability to use the English language, this to be supplemented by a general intelligence test to determine the applicant's mental power and alertness, reducing to the lowest possible minimum mere memory ability."

7. The war has taught us another thing of astounding importance. Only recently the true significance of it all has been made clear to us. The Government has reported that out of 140,000 white soldiers tested at a certain army camp, 32 per cent were unable to read or write the English language; including the negro draftees, it was found that 79 per cent were unable to read or write the language they spoke. According to statistics recently issued by the general staff, 21 per cent of the total number of white men in the army and 51 per cent of the negroes were illiterate.

Is the above an indication of progress in this enlightened America? If not it is, at least, an indication of the need of adequate provision for wiping out illiteracy in this country, plans for which are rapidly taking shape.

8. Many wealthy men and women have come to recognize that their massed riches have not been given to them for personal uses but that they are mere guardians for the benefit of the public and have, as a result, made available large sums for educational purposes. These foundations have, as a rule, resulted in great good and have had a very decided influence in determining educational tendencies. These endowments poured with lavish hand into our educational efforts will affect the future century much more than the past but it is well to mention some of these foundations here: The General Election Board, the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, the Carnegie Institution, the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, the Russel Sage Foundation, besides innumerable libraries, colleges, and universities liberally endowed. It is an unmistakable fact that our educational advancement has been profoundly influenced by these establishments and there is every assurance that they will be a continuing influence in our national life.

9. "Survey" has been the educational watchword for the past few years and as a means for determining progress educationally, there has been no better basis. There have been self surveys, the criteria for which have been determined on and fixed by outside interests; there have been surveys of school systems, cities, towns, counties, States, higher institutions of learning, colleges and universities, some of them by the Government and some by private foundations, all with a single purpose in mind, to be constructively critical. They have, as a rule, resulted in much good.

10. "Standardization" and "accrediting" have also been written large in our educational vocabulary. The brunt of the battle for standards has been borne by the State universities in their relation with other institutions, by certain State departments of education, by the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, and by various educational societies and associations as the Association of American Universities, the Council for Medical Education, and the North Central Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools.

11. One of the most significant indications of progress educationally which the century showed has been the extraordinary increase in secondary school attendance.

Large Increase in School Attendance

The United States Bureau of Education reports that the registration in elementary and secondary schools has increased 32 per cent while the attendance in secondary schools, both private and public, has increased 87 per cent and the total enrollment has reached nearly the million and a half mark.

Another very significant fact in connection with this is that the standards of most of these schools have been very materially raised both as regards length of course, education of teachers, and value and quality of material equipment.

Thus runs a partial list of things accomplished and things undertaken. How much of this is progress? How much is pioneering along misleading trails? How much is gain that has been bought with loss? The time has not come to answer these questions with any degree of certainty. All educators are confident that ultimate balance will be on the side of good, but like all progress, some losses have been recorded as well as gains.

The past century has been the most wonderful hundred years in the history of mankind, especially the last quarter of it, for which the first three quarters were merely a preparation culminating in the great World War which has brought to a close one cycle in the world's history and opened the way for the onward rush of civilization.

The end of the period showed no slackening of the great pace set by the century in the matter of invention and discovery.

The age of World-Exploration has culminated within this half generation with the discovery of both of the poles of the earth. The realm of the air has been twice conquered, by the aeroplane and by wireless telegraphy. The motor car and the submarine have revolutionized transportation upon the land and warfare at sea. The terrors of yellow fever, or meningitis and of a half dozen other diseases have been broken, if not destroyed. New combinations of sanitation, mechanical devices, and industrial organizations have made possible the Panama Canal and many other engineering works that compare with it in importance to mankind.

But again, we feel that we are in the early dawn of civilization, and we look forward to the next succeeding work of education and the part it is to have in bringing on the new day and the work of that new day.

Reconstruction Program in Education

Looking toward this new day in the history of the world a number of reconstruction programs in education, both theoretical and practical, have recently appeared. One of the most noted, doubtless because of the prominence of the author educationally, is that of President Emeritus Charles W. Eliot, of Harvard. His educational program for the Nation is as follows:

1. Appropriations from Congress to help the States eliminate illiteracy.
2. Immediate expenditure by the National Government to aid States and municipalities to teach English to adults of alien birth.
3. A national program of education against venereal disease, in which all American schools shall cooperate.
4. Considerable expansion by the National and State Governments of the functions of the medical examiner, the school nurse, and the district nurse.
5. Addition to all school programs of instruction in the sciences of observation in the arts and crafts, and in the elements of music, drawing, modeling, and architecture.
6. Teaching of agriculture to be an important feature in the education of every child in both the urban and rural population.
7. Reduction in number of school periods assigned to memory subjects and to mathematics; utilization of more hours in the school day and summer vacation.
8. Better buildings: better laboratory equipment; better teachers; and more money for education.
9. Support by the National Government of better secondary schools and normal schools.
10. A complete course in physical training for every child, the National Government to plan and enforce the course and pay part of the expenses.
11. Development of spirit of patriotic, cooperative service on the part of all boys and girls: "team play."
12. Conveying of fundamental religious ideas to every American child and adolescent in the schools.

Three Overshadowing Issues

As it would appear now there are three capital and overshadowing issues that must be met on the threshold of this new educational century. These are, first: the issue of justice and good will among nations; secondly: the issue of justice and good will among the different races of men; and thirdly: the issue of justice and good will as between the different classes of our industrial society. Unless education can assist in the solution of these vital questions before mankind it will not serve its purpose. Unless educational institutions now organized and yet to be organized are powerful enough to mold our national life and guide it in ways of righteousness, they will have failed. With all of its bigness, our education will be too petty an affair unless its results shall come out beneficently and decisively in times of national stress and strain. That education has been weighed in the balance and found not wanting during our greatest national crisis has been so fully demonstrated that it needs no proof. Education so thoroughly justified itself in every possible avenue of effort during the war and, as a result, received such an impetus as has never before been witnessed in educational circles that all higher institutions of learning throughout the country are taxed to their utmost to meet the requirements.

From now on it is going to be a question of the ability of our colleges and universities to secure buildings enough, library and laboratory facilities enough, and faculty large enough to take care of all the students applying for admission.

Education is the greatest enterprise in America.

We have come to know that there is an educational aspect and need in every human understanding.

To Him That Overcometh

[At the late General Conference, Elder T. W. Williams spoke on the subject, "Our Keynote—Hear Ye Him." The sermon was reported and published in the Centennial Number for September 8, but there were two paragraphs which did not accurately express, as published, Brother Williams's thought, so he has kindly written the following as expressing more clearly the ideas he desired to present.

The paragraphs are fine enough to deserve separate printing, and all those who have kept the sermon can readily substitute the following for the two paragraphs as printed. The opening and closing words indicate the place of insertion.—
EDITORS.]

I can sense what was in the mind of the Great Soul. He understood what it meant to be good when environed by evil. He knew what a great struggle it was for men to fight against inherited evils and formidable wrongs. He knew that character is developed in this way, however. He knew that full manhood comes through meeting and overcoming obstacles. So he must have reasoned, "There must be no social or moral or physical handicap so far as I am concerned. I will therefore place myself in a position where no human being can say, 'You had an advantage over me.' I will subject myself to every human impediment. I will travel more difficult roads than any human being has or will be compelled to travel. I will endure hardship and denial and persecution beyond all others. I will make it impossible for any human being to offer as excuse that his prenatal handicaps, his inherited weaknesses, his social environments are a bar to progress. I will make it possible that by following me all men can overcome."

All the powers of earth and hell conspired to his undoing. No human being has ever been compelled to meet and overcome so many obstacles as did Jesus. He was subject to human passion and purpose. He was encompassed with forces of negation both seen and unseen. The clouds of adversity overwhelmed him. The perfidy of men perplexed him. The lust of the flesh, the lure of wealth, and the glamor of fame, were as real to him as to other men. He won through the inherent power of purity and goodness which dominated his mind and spirit.

You may go only a few blocks from this church and you will find the economic condition of people is not very high. And yet there is not a soul in this neighborhood but what has as great economic and social advantage as Jesus had.

Jesus was not in favor with men. He was compelled to bear the plebeian ostracism. With men he had no particular social caste. He was the son of a plebeian. His father worked for a living. He was only a carpenter's son. Those who know the history of his time know what that meant.

Jesus as our leader sensed and understood what we have to encounter. There is no legitimate excuse which we can put forward against following him. He has anticipated every difficulty. He has provided for every emergency.

And so it is that no man is able to help others unless he senses and understands the conditions under which the man whom he would help is laboring. No man is really qualified to preach Jesus Christ unless he knows at least to a large extent the conditions with which others have to contend. This does not mean that to be a leader a man must himself have been a sinner. He should, like his Master, have met sin and overcome. You cannot preach at people. We fail oftentimes to get down where people are and look at things from their viewpoint. The pulpit has too often preached at people. Jesus did not do this. Jesus was the ideal teacher. He came down, associated himself with the humble and impoverished, he turned around face and looked at things as weak humanity would look, and then tenderly clasping humanity's hand in his own he has been leading up and up and up.

Psychology as a Modern Study

By Floyd M. McDowell

Because the mind of man operates according to law, psychology, a study of the processes of human life, has an important place with us.

History of Psychology

A contemporary psychologist has said "psychology has had a long past but a brief history. Scattered reflections on psychological questions indeed abound throughout the entire history of science, but the continuity of psychological investigation has often been interrupted, while a really fruitful development of psychology belongs to very recent times."

Psychology is one of the youngest of the children of that great mother of sciences, philosophy. This is due, no doubt, to the very nature of the subject itself. Psychology deals, in the first place, with facts which are so closely bound to other facts that they seem to resist any attempt to separate them for scientific purposes. Again, these facts are those which have for centuries been tied up with man's deepest interests, hopes, and passions. For such experiences, he has already formulated a more or less correct description and it has been this very description, that has hindered rather than aided in the attempt to treat scientifically such phenomena.

In early times the treatment of the subjects that are now included in psychology was more or less of a speculative or metaphysical type. The Greeks were especially interested in the phenomena of mental life, but their treatment of such was speculative rather than scientific. One of their number, however, Aristotle, contributed the beginnings of the very important doctrine of association of ideas in mental life. This view is carried over in much of our modern psychological literature.

In more modern times, three lines of development have contributed to psychology in its present form:

First: The attempt on the part of a number of psychologists to give us a careful description of conscious processes.

Second: A study of the close relationship between the physiological organism and mental activities.

Third: An experimental study of what is called the personal equation, as it affects our judgment of the events in the world about us.

In a word, the modern tendency is toward giving psychology an important place among those subjects which deal with facts more susceptible to exact classification. For example; a 1920 author says:

"The sciences may well be pictured as resting on each other in layers, strata, stories, with physics forming the foundation. But if psychology is the top story of the sciences, it is not a mere garret, a dark stow-hole for ghosts, hypnotism, and spiritualism. It is as orderly and well kept as any other scientific suite; its elevation gives it a wide view; and it opens to the free sky, to the larger truths of life."

Of the men who have been influential in the development of modern psychology one should mention Wundt, (born 1832) as the German psychologist who has been the teacher of many of the leading Americans now at work in this field. So distinguished has been his contribution that he is called the "father of psychology." In America, the man who should be mentioned as the leading contributor to this science, is William James, (1842-1910). Another leader in this field, is G. Stanley Hall, (born 1842) who is almost entirely responsible for the initiation of the child study movement in America. Undoubtedly, it is to these great teachers, that we are in debt for our knowledge of mental life to-day. The recency of the work of these men furnishes significant support for the contention that psychology is a modern subject.

Definition of Psychology

The development of the definition of psychology illustrates something of its history. Anciently, it was spoken of as a science of the soul. Traditionally, it has been defined as a science of the mind; more recently it is defined as a science of consciousness, that is, the science of experience subjectively regarded. At present, there are a group of workers in this field who would define it as a science of behavior, particularly human behavior. From this it will be seen that the field of this subject has become more and more closely defined as dealing with phenomena of a more tangible sort. For our purposes, we shall define psychology as that science which attempts to discover and classify, in a definite way, the processes of mental life. Psychology as thus defined, is essentially a modern subject.

Aim of Psychology

The aim of psychology is threefold: First, to discover the elements of consciousness. Second, to discover the relationship of these elements to each other. Third, and most important of all, to make possible a better control of our own life and the lives of others.

The importance of such a subject is well emphasized by a modern writer, in applied psychology, in the following bit of deductive logic:

"There is no human achievement without physical activity.

There is no physical activity without mental activity.

Hence, there is no human achievement without mental activity."

If this be true, it simply means that the study of psychology can be applied in every field of human activity, and such indeed is the real spirit of modern workers in this field.

Fields of Psychology

The marvelous recent development of this study is well il-illustrated by a great diversity of interests among the workers in this field. Finding the above conclusion true, namely, that psychology has its application to every phase of human endeavor, modern thinkers have entered, boldly, and with amazing success, a large number of these fields. Among the leading fields or divisions of psychology resulting from such investigations, we may note the following:

First, normal adult psychology, dealing, as the name indicates, with a description and explanation of the mental processes of the normal human adult.

Second, child psychology or child study, which has furnished for us, in detail and from various points of view, most complete pictures of the child's mind and its development. This study has revolutionized educational procedure within the last few decades.

Third, abnormal psychology, in which field abnormality of all sorts has been studied with surprisingly practical results. We need only to mention here the new point of view in the treatment of crime, insanity, and feeble-mindedness, to justify our claim that psychology has more than paid for itself in this field alone.

Fourth, experimental psychology, which has endeavored to subject to a definite experimental treatment, in elaborate laboratories, various psychological phenomena. This work is already bearing much fruit in the various tests which have been devised for vocational guidance, etc.

Fifth, educational psychology, which has already furnished us with rich literature dealing with the mental aspects of all educational endeavor. As a result of this effort, education is coming to be recognized as a science based upon very definite scientific truths of mental life.

Application of Modern Psychology

We shall not attempt in this article to justify the claim of modern psychology that it can be applied successfully to all fields of modern endeavor. That such is its claim, however, and that to a certain extent, it is realizing this claim, is well illustrated by the following titles of publications available to all:

- Vocational Psychology.
- Child Psychology.
- Psychology of Subnormal Children.
- The Psychology of the Exceptional Child.
- Criminal Psychology.
- Psychology of Insanity.
- Psychology of Salesmanship.
- Psychology of Musical Talent.
- Psychology of Public Speaking.
- Psychology of Religion.
- Psychology of Orthodoxy.
- Psychology of Daily Life.
- Psychology of High School Subjects.
- Psychology of Elementary Subjects.
- Social Psychology.
- Psychology of the Unconscious.
- Psychology of Relaxation.

In a word, we conceive modern psychology to be a study of the human factor in all the activities of life of to-day. In business, we have understood the brick and mortar of the building; we have understood the temper of the steel that went into the machinery; we have understood the soils and the crops, and the domestic animals; but, through it all, and in it all, there has been a surprising ignorance of the most essential factor, man, himself.

As a result of psychology, education has been made to fit the child, and not the child to fit education; as a result of psychology, business has been made to consider the man, not the machine; it has been compelled to make the factory and the coal mine sanitary, not so much for the benefit of industry, but for the benefit of man. Psychology has enabled us to prevent crime, it has made possible for us to cure criminals; psychology has made possible a sane treatment of the insane; it has put into the factory the efficient expert, who studies the human element in production; psychology has given us our schools of business administration and our schools of salesmanship; it has done all of this because it has proven to us that the mind of man operates according to, rather than in violation of, law. Success, in the control of our own life or in the control of others, necessitates a knowledge of the phenomena of mental life. It is to furnish this knowledge, and the application of such, that psychology, as a modern subject, is devoted. Truly, there can be no more worthy aim.

The Progress of Geology

By Ira D. M. Stubbart

The day will come when we all can sit with a Bible in one hand and a book of science in the other and we will read them alike.

As with all the other sciences, there was a time when the people were inclined to sit down and try to reason out geology and thereby develop a philosophy of the mind instead of a study of facts. For some unknown reason it never dawned upon them until about the end of the eighteenth century to cease their arguments and hunt for the facts. The old theories and the reserved church followers failed to fall in line even after the first steps in true science were taken.

About 1785 the world was aroused by a book written by James Hutton and it was this book which gave the first real investigations. It is true that some men had advanced theories which still remain as fundamental facts to-day. They even had gone into the field and had taken a close observation of the earth's strata. But where they differed from the present scientific investigations was in the method of creation of the various successive faunas in the superimposed strata of rock and in the manner of the formation of the surface formations. Hutton's book gave a broad, comprehensive view of the subjects in discussion and it goes without saying that the controversy was not a mild one. But in spite of all the controversy the open-minded scientists and philosophers concluded that the best way to study the past was to study the present laws of nature and apply them to the past.

This was the first real step to our modern ideas along the lines which now prove to us that the Master's plan was a real masterpiece and not a stroke of luck. Men began now to study the plants, animals, volcanoes, hills, streams, seas, and the like and began to apply their findings to the old rock strata and it was astonishing to them to find that the laws existing to-day evidently have been at work through all the ages. God changeth not, we are told, and everything in nature seems to prove that his laws are not variable. The main trouble was to be broad minded enough to comprehend all or any of the great plans and methods that were employed to bring about the object he had in mind.

It took a few great investigators as Darwin, Spencer, von Buch, De Sature, von Humboldt, Smith (William), Macculloch, and Lyell to break away from the ties of the philosophers and study life and facts. These men had no sooner begun their work than to the amazement of the men they found that there was considerable similarity of strata in various regions. They cooperated as is the wisest way to do. So it was not long before others also began carefully to study the fossils and the various evidences found in each stratum. As a result of these studies the various strata became clearly named and easily recognized and were found to exist in nearly every continent almost exactly as they were in Europe. Among the most prominent of these pioneers were Agassiz, Hugh Miller, Lyell, Lonsdale, Murchison, and Sedgwick.

The men who so devotedly worked out the main subdivisions of the geologic record have left a valuable outline for scientists to follow in their present-day investigations. Biologists, geologists, petrologists, mineralogists, miners, drillers for oil, farmers, land seekers, pleasure seekers, hunters, and in fact all of us are greatly indebted to them in a great number of ways.

This opens up the greatest field of value to the thinking and practical mind. How are we indebted to geology? It would take many volumes to tell just how much of gratitude we owe to these scientific investigators. From an industrial standpoint there will never be an end to the value that is a direct result of these geologic findings. I shall merely mention a few industries that are wholly dependent upon the findings of the scientifically inclined investigator with an eye for the practical and economic side of geology: mining for gems, coal, tin, gold, silver, and many other precious minerals and metals found within the heart of the earth. Dentistry, medicine, railroading, manufacturing, and in fact every occupation on earth where material things are handled or sold is ever bound to the geologist in some manner. Yes, and every human being is interested in the great laws that are ruling our destinies to-day. The church, too, must realize that there are tendencies and influences that must be comprehended by the leaders and the masses. We must realize the value of the past and plan our present and future work to accord with these laws of nature.

There is no law that God has used that should be slighted, if there is ever to be a successful development of his works here upon the earth. But there must be investigation of broad enough a scope to show whether the theories advanced are divine plans or some distorted plan conceived in an untrained mind, unable to grasp the real facts of nature.

I should like to mention at this time one of the most misunderstood laws that the Master Mind has used in his work to upbuild the plant and animal life upon the earth. This word which has caused so much concern is the very simple and inoffensive word evolution! Wherever I go people are afraid to hear that word, and everywhere they tell me to be sure and never mention evolution in the school or on the street. They are so afraid that their children will think they are descendants from monkeys. In many cases, I am sure that the children know that they are descendants from monkeys!

Well, at any rate, evolution in itself never means that man descended from a monkey. It does mean that there have been some changes going on and that these changes follow certain laws of nature, which man cannot change. These changes have been brought about by other laws that man cannot change. Man may control or rather employ them, but he can never change them. This is the greatest thing that geologists and biologists have found in recent years. These facts have been of incalculable value to students of social, physiological, and sexual problems.

Darwin after nearly half a century of investigation which covered a large part of the earth gave us (in 1855 to 1870) some valuable findings on the descent of man which have caused some very unfavorable criticism of science, yet, these same findings are being checked up, and all evidence to-day indicates that he was nearer the truth than many are willing to concede.

The church teaches us to try all things and hold fast that which is good, and in a case of this kind it would pay us all to investigate a self-instruction scheme of some kind and see if these "laws of nature" are mere fakes, accidents, spiritual manifestations, or what not.

I do not feel that it is proper at this time to go into the details of geologic findings or the biologic laws of development and change. These are too easily misunderstood, and one not versed in science is apt to get a distorted idea regarding the Bible story and geologic evidences.

The day will come when we all can sit with a Bible in one hand and a book of science in the other and we will read them alike. The truth will some day come to light, and many of us think that we can now behold the dawn of that day when all men will lay aside the jealous prejudices of their churches or creeds and investigate only the facts as they are. This day is at hand, and geology is now becoming a vital part in every man's life and is no longer a "dangerous subject to study." Science has been to the bar of the common people and has found acceptance there, because they love the truth and not mere speculation.

The Restoration

By Sarah Barney

(Recited at the centennial of the angel's visit, June 27, 1920, at Seattle, Washington, by Gale Barney.)

Lo! from out the East a heavenly host has come
Radiant in garments white, which glisten in the sun.
From whence comes this advancing throng
Filling the air with shouts of joy and song?

And see, a mighty one approaches, within his hand a scroll
Upon whose pages clean, God did the name enroll
Of one who should the everlasting gospel preach,
With authority invested and with the power to teach

The "young man" who the prophets said
Should restore the same old gospel, long since fled,
Driven from the church by priestly lore,
And be proclaimed to Gentile and to Jew once more.

And this "young man" was found within the forest green,
Upon his knees entreating by mortal eyes unseen,
Praying guidance from a higher power
For light, in this, to him, his darkest hour.

"Lord, in this my time of need enlighten me,
For I lack wisdom, and in my blindness cannot see
The way, O give me but this boon I ask;
Father, grant sufficient grace for this my task."

The battle seethed and raged within his breast,
And he longed, oh, how his spirit longed for rest!
And while to God above he made his prayer,
The power of evil heard, and with his hosts was there.

Thick darkness gathered round about his head,
And there in deepest gloom, when hope had fled,
He called upon the Lord in mighty prayer
To rescue from the depths of his despair.

And as he called, a wondrous light enveloped him,
Whose glory made the noonday sun grow dim.
Back slunk the powers of evil—lost to view—
And with them fled the darkness, too.

Two beings stood before him, and, spake one:
"Hear ye him, this is my beloved Son."

Heaven and earth were still, not e'en the breezes sigh;
And Joseph, like Samuel of old, cried: "Lord, here am I."

And so the blessed gospel is restored once more,
And is taught throughout the land from shore to shore;
But as our Savior drank the gall upon bleak Calvary,
The cup was pressed to Joseph's lips—a martyr, too, was he.

Well may we hold this jubilee and shout in tones of thunder;
Well may we worship God who gave this marvel and this wonder;

Well may we hold in reverence the memory of our seer
To whom the Lord of Hosts in glory did appear.

One hundred years have passed since then,
We have the dear old gospel once again.
One hundred years of labor in God's field,
What will the future be, and what the harvest yield?

Joseph Smith: His Attitude Toward Property, Its Distribution and Uses

By Joseph Roberts

A reprint of an article appearing in a former issue of the Herald.

Joseph Smith, as an instrument in the hands of God, gave to the church the correct solution of the economic problems confronting the world in the use and distribution of properties. The world's standard of economics will not solve the problems connected with the kingdom of God on earth. It will be our purpose to point out to our readers the high standard revealed in the word of God, as given through Joseph Smith, and compare this word with his teachings.

It is of interest to note that the revealed law will not admit of one individual building up selfish interests at the expense of the brethren. As a safeguard to protect the church from ambitious leaders who might aspire to divert property interests unto themselves though the prestige of ecclesiastical office by the exploitation of the membership, the financial department of the church is removed from the immediate control of the spiritual head, and that department is placed close to the membership, who delegate authority to bishoprics and industrial organizations.

Joseph Smith Was Not an Aspirant

Accustomed to association with those in the humble walks of life, and trained to labor for the temporal necessities, the Almighty speaks and calls him, while yet a young man, to enter upon a life's work of sacrifice and service to humanity. He is found yielding himself obedient to the divine message which comes to him for the guidance of his brethren, and in common with them, he shares in their sacrifices and their triumphs. Together with God they seek to build up the Zion of latter days.

The thoughts and acts of Joseph Smith, as recorded in authentic history and accepted revelation, are the channel through which we ascertain the attitude of the individual toward the subject under consideration.

Joseph Smith, through the revelations to the church, builded wiser than he knew. That is, his attitude was not first assumed, then afterwards he received revelations to bolster up positions already taken; but rather, the revelation is first given, then his attitude is either changed or formed in keeping with the revelation. This is shown by subsequent events throughout his life; therefore we have but to point out the law as given in the revelations through him to the church concerning property, to indicate correctly his attitude.

Joseph Smith on Common Stock

"And that ye might escape the power of the enemy, and be gathered unto me a righteous people, without spot and blameless: wherefore, for this cause I gave unto you the commandment, that ye should go to the Ohio; and there will I give unto you my law."—Doctrine and Covenants 38: 7.

Church History, volume 1, pages 152 and 153, gives an account of a movement started near Kirtland, Ohio, to carry into operation the "all things common plan." This movement was started and participated in by those who were then strangers to the restored gospel, yet those whose hearts had evidently been touched with the spirit of sacrifice and brotherly love in the consideration of each other's welfare. We believe the lives of those individuals were being wrought upon through the divine Spirit, and the way was being prepared in the regions of the Ohio against the time when the law as promised would be given, thus enveloping the message in an atmosphere congenial to its acceptance when the Lord should give the revelation. Joseph states (and in no way condemns their efforts) that the greater number of the adherents to this theory embraced the restored gospel and readily abandoned the "common stock" idea and accepted the "more perfect law of the Lord." (See Church History, volume 1, page 169.)

Afterward Joseph Smith explaining to a certain individual who came to him while at Kirtland, Ohio, making inquiry concerning the holding of property, states that they had no common stock business among them, that every man enjoyed his own property, leaving each individual to his own disposition to consecrate to the support of the poor or to withhold. (See Church History, volume 1, page 593, for this account.)

We are not to conclude from this account, however, that Joseph Smith unduly antagonized such common stock concerns as were attempted at that time, but he was simply taking the affirmative stand in favor of the more perfect way of the Lord, and recognizing in it the higher standard of the gospel. In this connection, read on page 307 of Church History, volume 1, an article setting forth the attitude of some of the followers of Joseph Smith upon the subject of common stock as compared with "the more perfect plan." The positions are almost identical with those stated above.

Individual Rights With a Community of Interests

The individual rights of the membership of the church are recognized in the revelations as given to the church through Joseph Smith in such terms as inheritances, stewardships, and stewardships. The community of interests is represented by the Lord's storehouse. Compliance with the complete law of Christ constitutes heirship in the kingdom of God. The ownership of God and the stewardship of man are the basic principles to be recognized in the distribution and use of property under the revealed law.

Ownership of God

"I, the Lord, stretched out the heavens, and builded the earth as a very handy work; and all things therein are mine."—Doctrine and Covenants 101: 2.

"And, again, a commandment I give unto you concerning your stewardship which I have appointed unto you; behold, all these properties are mine, or else your faith is vain, and ye are found hypocrites, and the covenants which ye have made unto me are broken."—Doctrine and Covenants 101: 10.

Stewardship of Man

"Every man shall be made accountable unto me, a steward over his own property, or that which he has received by consecration."—Doctrine and Covenants 42: 9.

"A commandment I give unto you, that you shall organize yourselves and appoint every man his stewardship . . . for it is expedient that I the Lord, should make every man accountable, as stewards over earthly blessings which I have made and prepared for my creatures."—Doctrine and Covenants 101: 2.

"And if the properties are mine then ye are stewards, otherwise ye are no stewards."—Doctrine and Covenants 101: 10. See also 42: 19.

The idea of responsibility is attached to the principles set forth in the revelations. The rights of the individual are regarded and each is responsible before the law for his stewardship.

"Thou shalt stand in the place of thy stewardship; thou shalt not take thy brother's garment; thou shalt pay for that which thou shalt receive of thy brother; and if thou obtainest more than that which would be for thy support, thou shalt give it unto my storehouse, that all things may be done according to that which I have said."—Doctrine and Covenants 42: 14.

What is true of the responsibility attached to individual stewardships, is likewise true of the responsibility attached to local organizations.

"And let that which belongs to this people not be taken and given that of another church; wherefore, if another church should receive money of this church, let them pay unto this church again as they shall agree."—Doctrine and Covenants 51: 3.

It is required that every man improve upon his stewardship, that every man gain other talents to be cast into

The Lord's Storehouse

"And the storehouse shall be kept by the consecrations of the church. . . ."—Doctrine and Covenants 82: 2. These consecrations are referred to in section 42: 8 of Doctrine and Covenants as that portion of the individual properties which the steward transfers to the Lord's storehouse with a covenant and a deed which cannot be broken. Such individual properties then become the "common property of the whole church." (Doctrine and Covenants 81: 4.) Thus the storehouse represents the community of interests: those having a surplus contributing to, while those in need receive assistance from it.

This is not to be loosely construed to mean a free "hand-out" to any and all, but with the idea in view of those receiving who are needy and worthy to eat the bread and wear the garments of honest industry. (See Doctrine and Covenants 42: 12.)

Note the successive steps taken in order of time with reference to the operating of the storehouse:

1. In February, 1831.

The law was given to consecrate surplus properties. (See Doctrine and Covenants 42.)

2. In May, 1831.

Bishop Partridge was commanded to appoint a storehouse unto the church to receive consecrations. (See Doctrine and Covenants 51: 4.)

3. In March, 1832.

The Lord states that the time had arrived to organize his people to regulate and establish the affairs of the storehouse both in Kirtland, Ohio, and in Zion, Missouri. (Doctrine and Covenants 77: 1.)

As a result of the positions set forth in the revelations as indicated above, attempt was made to effect organization to place in operation the law dealing with temporalities. The organization at Kirtland, Ohio, was to be called "The United Order of the Stake of Zion," and the one at Independence "The United Order of the City of Zion." (Doctrine and Covenants 101: 9.)

We are not prepared to measure the degree of success or failure attached to this attempt at industrial associations to carry out the will of the Lord in the use and distribution of properties, but we are warranted in the belief, however, that whatever failure there may have been connected therewith was not the fault of the revealed system, but the neglect or unwillingness on the part of the Saints to do the things the Lord requires at their hands. (Doctrine and Covenants 102: 2.)

The Single Standard of Obedience

The Lord requires the same obedience to his laws of one individual as of another. Any requirement short of this has the stamp of humanity upon it. The mark of humanity is also indicated where the standard of obedience admits of conditions of inequality or special privileges. These are some of the severest tests to which a revelation purporting to be from God may be subjected to discover the degree of inspiration connected therewith. Will the revelations given through Joseph Smith relating to property stand these tests? Let us examine. In Doctrine and Covenants 58: 7 it is stated that Martin Harris should be made an example unto the church in laying his moneys before the bishop according as the law directs. The law (section 42) directs the consecration of surplus properties. What was required of Martin Harris is also required of every man that comes to the land of Zion.

"Verily I say unto you, It shall come to pass that all those who gather unto the land of Zion shall be tithed of their surplus properties."—Doctrine and Covenants 106.

No stamp of humanity here.

Joseph Smith's attitude is in harmony with the above position, as is indicated by his instructions given to Edward Partridge on the subject of consecration of property.

"A man is bound by the law of the church to consecrate to the bishop before he can be considered a legal heir to the kingdom of Zion; and this, too, without constraint; and unless he does this he cannot be acknowledged before the Lord on the church books."—Church History, vol. 1, p. 300.

Those that claim leadership under the law must needs yield themselves obedient to the law.

Needs and Just Wants

The standard affecting the distribution and use of property is one which applies alike to all the membership, regardless of station in life, wealth, or poverty in property, or occupation of the individual; to one and all the rule applies. Each provided according to his needs and just wants. "And, behold, none are exempt from this law who belong to the church of the living God."—Doctrine and Covenants 70: 3.

This is the position outlined in the revelations, and it is reiterated over and over again, as the following citations attest: Doctrine and Covenants 18: 5; 42: 9; 51: 1; 58: 7; 70: 2; 81: 4; 101: 2, 12; 106: 2.

The Lord's Tenth

Like Jacob of old, Joseph Smith, with one of his fellow laborers, Oliver Cowdery, on the evening of November 29, 1834, entered into a solemn covenant:

"That if the Lord will prosper us in our business, and open the way before us, that we may obtain means to pay our debts, that we be not troubled nor brought into disrepute before the world, nor his people; after that, of all that he shall give us, we will give a tenth, to be bestowed upon the poor in his church, or as he shall command; and that we will be faithful over that which he has intrusted to our care, that we may obtain much; and that our children after us, shall remember to observe this sacred and holy covenant; and that our children, and our children's children may know of the same, we have subscribed our names with our own hands.

"JOSEPH SMITH, JR.
"OLIVER COWDERY."

This covenant was entered into some years previous to the receiving of the revelation commanding the giving of the tenth to the Lord. (Doctrine and Covenants 106.) Yet, prior to this time the Lord had instructed his priesthood to teach the principles of the gospel which are in the Bible and Book of Mormon, in which is the fullness of the gospel. (See Doctrine and Covenants 42: 5.)

The Lord evidently remembered this covenant entered into, for on June 25, 1835, there was a meeting held in Kirtland to subscribe for the building of the Temple, at which subscriptions to the amount of $6,232.50 were subscribed, Joseph Smith subscribing $500 of this amount. (Church History, vol. 1, p. 568.)

A Part of the Gospel

Joseph Smith recognized in the industrial order of things inaugurated through divine inspiration, a part of the great gospel economy for the salvation of men. The revelations state that it is "a permanent and everlasting establishment and order unto my church, to advance the cause which ye have espoused, to the salvation of men and the glory of your Father who is in heaven." (Doctrine and Covenants 77: 1.)

The system is unique. It is independent of human systems established in the earth. Any attempt to compromise the divinely appointed with the human or worldly order of things does violence to the revealed word of God:

"Behold, this is the preparation wherewith I prepare you, and the foundation, and the ensample, which I give unto you, whereby you may accomplish the commandments which are given you, that through my providence, notwithstanding the tribulation which shall descend upon you, that the church may stand independent above all other creatures beneath the celestial world."—Doctrine and Covenants 77: 3.

Economic Policy of the Church Under the Late Joseph Smith

By Charles E. Irwin

"We are just beginning another era of our economic cycles . . . calling for renewed activity along almost every line.

Period of Confusion, 1844 to 1852

With the martyrdom of Joseph Smith in 1844, there was ushered in a period of intense confusion and distress. Not only was the morale of the people seriously impaired, but the economic program was also quite distorted and changed. It is a matter of common knowledge that the people, having been confused due to the conflicting claims of the various leaders, were broken in spirit and were more or less unfit for constructive economic thinking. Those who went west, of course, soon came to the point where the necessities of life became of paramount importance, and with their wanderings to and fro, soon became imbued with the idea that survival could only be purchased through concerted effort in the matter of the establishment of an economic program.

There grew up, therefore, on the desert plains of Utah, an organization which, so far as its efficiency is concerned, is well worth our while to study. This group, however, was not the only group thrown out upon its own resources. There were the Strangites and the Hedrickites, as well as the Josephites, who were the forerunners of the present reorganization. All of these groups suffered to a greater or lesser degree in an economic way. The Josephites, however, were perhaps at a greater disadvantage than any of the other factions, for the simple reason that they were without a leader. These were the ones who gave their allegiance to Joseph Smith, and had not been drawn away by the conflicting doctrines of the various other groups. But while they chose to give their allegiance to Joseph Smith, they gave their allegiance to a cause for which there was no adequate leadership provided.

At last, on April 6, 1853, a semblance of a conference was called to meet at Zarahemla, Wisconsin. This session continued for three days. Elder Gurley, writing of this incident, gives a very interesting picture of the important event:

"I have often thought of it. It seemed as though each one thought that the salvation of the church depended upon the decision being made according to their respective views. So we argued, so we debated, till the close of the second day, when we began to think the world was lost; I would to God that all Latter Day Saints could know the situation of the church at this time; our feelings, our deep distress, our great anxiety. . . . We could not organize. . . . God had commanded us what we absolutely could not do. To my mind and to the minds of others, our effort was a failure. . . . Men who had hitherto been united, had seen eye to eye, had labored together as one man for the cause of truth, we were now opposed to each other, and after a discussion of two days, learned to their mortification and sorrow that they, to all human appearances, were forever separate."

Though that evening the Lord revealed his will and difficulties vanished, yet the church suffered for the lack of the leader.

Joseph Smith at the Amboy Conference of 1860

The commandment given at the Zarahemla conference of 1853, relative to the necessity for organization, had made a lasting impression upon the few who were gathered there, and the necessity for preparation for this organization was being continually reiterated at every gathering of the Saints. Running through the minds of all was the clear consciousness that this period of darkness, which had been foretold in prophecy, would sooner or later give way to a bright day of a new era. There was the abounding faith that through the distress of this temporary period would come the discipline necessary to effect the permanent and lasting organization of inestimable worth.

This type of faith is very admirably illustrated in an article published in the HERALD for March, 1860. The article was written by Elders Gurley and Newkirk, and was addressed to Brother Sheen. We quote as follows:

"Since our last communication we have been commanded to write again, again, and again, showing the necessity of our immediate obedience to the commandment given us nearly seven years since, to organize, that the way may be prepared for the coming forth of the legitimate heir to the presidency of the Melchisedec priesthood; and cause the same to be published to all who are with us in the faith, calling upon them in the name of the Lord Jesus to give heed to and obey the same. . . . To organize acceptably it will require all the faith, talent, and experience amongst us. We want twelve of the best men (men of sound minds that will not turn either to the right or to the left, but will, in the fear of God, discharge their duty) to fulfill the high council. In a word, we want the best men among us to fill the important offices of the priesthood, that from henceforth this work may be under the guidance of men of the priesthood who fear God and will work righteousness."

The Amboy conference opened on April 6, 1860, attended by a most anxious and expectant group of people. For several years they had been buoyed up by faith that the Lord would send a prophet to the church, and many felt that at this conference the time had come for such an event. At this conference Joseph Smith, the son of the Martyr, was introduced and gave an address outlining his position regarding the reorganization. In part, he said as follows:

"For some time past I have received manifestations pointing to the position which I am about to assume. I wish to say that I have come here not to be dictated to by any man or set of men. I have come in obedience to a power not my own, and shall be dictated by the power that sent me. . . . For two or three years past, deputations have been waiting on me, urging me to assume responsibilities of the leadership of the church; but I have answered each and every one of them that I did not wish to trifle with the faith of the people. I do not propose to assume this position in order to amass wealth out of it; neither have I sought it as a profit."

It is quite natural that the acceptance of Joseph Smith as the leader of the church tended to inspire an unusual amount of confidence throughout the body. General consensus of opinion throughout the group was that Brigham Young had usurped the authority of the church and that, by virtue of Joseph's accepting the office of presidency, the reorganization would be in a much better position to achieve success in a marked degree. The stigma attached to the Utah branch caused it to be held in almost universal contempt, so that the people of the reorganization felt that they were in an especially desirable position to draw together all the other factions, if not even to make inroads upon the membership of the church in the West. The Amboy conference, therefore, was a very significant one, not so much from the standpoint of things accomplished, but because it paved the way for the development of a far-reaching, constructive policy.

We have thought necessary to give this rather extended preface to our principal theme because, without a clear understanding of the preliminary events which preceded the development of a definite economic program, one is hardly able to appreciate the importance of the following events.

Evolution of Economic Policy of Reorganization, 1860-1890

A. The Gathering

During the first ten years of this period, the new leader of the church adopted a policy which may be regarded as extremely conservative. At the time of the break-up of the church in 1844, considerable advancement had already been made in the matter of the development of an economic program. Nauvoo was a promising little city, apparently intensely active in commercial and in industrial matters and was rated as one of the most important cities of the State. When the disruption came, however, as we have already mentioned, the city of Nauvoo lost its prestige, her industries were ruined, and the people scattered. But there had been instilled deep into the hearts of the people the desire for the gathering. One of the first questions, therefore, which thrust itself upon the people at the beginning of the reorganization was the question of the gathering. They were saying, "Why need we wait? Let us move into the land of Zion; let's do it now." Joseph Smith considered it important to address the Saints on this particular issue and to give them what he considered to be his best judgment in the matter. This address is one of the most important in our study of the formation of the policies of the reorganization.

The message was sent out through the HERALD in the early part of November, 1860:

"The question is often asked, 'Where is the gathering place for the Saints? seeming to imply the positive necessity for such a place. That such a place was necessary no one doubts; but when, for various reasons not necessary now to mention, the people were scattered successively from Kirtland, from Jackson County, Missouri, and lastly from Nauvoo, there seemed to come a time when there was a necessity for a division, for a sifting of the elements of discord, that the inharmonious and the incongruous might be separated from the better and purer parts of the whole. What the result has been, most of those who know the history of those people are able to see. Yet to many it is still dark. There are many obstacles to be met by us, and each are to be overcome, not the least of which is the prejudice of those who, most unfortunately for us, judge of us from very bad specimens of men who either were and are, or claim to be, of the so-called Mormon faith. Another difference, and one of considerable importance, is the gathering together hastily in so large a body that, being incapable of harmonizing and assimilating the one with the other so as to form a complete whole, it totters and falls of its own concentrated weight. . . . Now, knowing many of the rocks on which the church was split, is it not my duty to keep clear of them, each and every one of them? There is but one answer; most certainly, it is. By keeping the church separated for the present, . . . I know that some of the rocks will be missed, and many differences overcome, that we, as a body existing at any one designated place, could never meet."

It is quite evident that the decision taken by Joseph Smith relative to the gathering was very strange to many. His attitude of conservatism is to be found at the basis of all of his policies, during at least the first ten years of his occupancy in the office of president.

To the sympathetic student, this is not to be wondered at. With the disruption which had occurred in the church some fifteen years before, a general feeling of distrust and suspicion was aroused, so that it appears that the church, studied from the long-run point of view, was exceedingly fortunate in being dominated by a restrictive policy. It was the most reliable and at once the most feasible method of inspiring confidence in the newborn organization. As is the case with all definite policies, this one did not escape criticism. Some even faltered in their devotion to the church, but our recent experiences have demonstrated that above everything else conservatism was one of the prime essentials of the early days of the reorganization.

Speaking of the gathering some nine years later, President Smith indicated some of the important factors which, in his estimation, were to be regarded as preparatory measures to the real work of the gathering. This message was published in the HERALD for April 15, 1869. Even here we see the dominant tendency on the part of the president to be conservative in his attitude toward the gathering:

"The necessity for the Saints becoming self-sustaining is becoming more and more apparent. The widening difference existing between the faith which we preach and that which has grown upon the people as a gospel of saving grace, is pressing home upon us the great principle of the latter-day work, the gathering. When speaking of this, we deprecate that indiscriminate rushing together which has, to some extent, marked the rise and rapid increase of the church at an earlier day. Our reasons for this are the lamentable results which have followed the real disregard to the written word upon the subject; the uncertain reliance which it has been the means of fixing in the minds of the many, upon the word which requires a due preparation, before becoming worthy to be called 'the pure in heart.' If they wait till gathered before beginning their career of righteousness, or process of heart purifying, they are distrustful of God, fearing lest his power does not reach to the confines of the borders; they doubt the wisdom of the provision which is made for those who repent. The man who depends upon the continued reiteration of human intentions and evidences cannot be safely grounded upon the testimony which God gives to those who are to be his at the day of gathering. He that has received the truth of God as he gives it to the seeker is at no loss to bear in his heart the pain of separation from the elect gathered, and still find ample trust in God. Such never fail; but like the generous flower which sheds its perfume when bruised, they will continue to show the love of God which is in them, though trials, persecutions, and languishing away from Zion may be theirs. They are purifying themselves and could be trusted with the honor of a community; while the loud aspirant for the honors of the elect would betray the trust of a people, stir up contention, tear down what others would build up, and scatter by their acts what by their precept they would gather. . . .

"We are just as anxiously looking for the day when the Saints may be at rest in their promised land. But while we earnestly desire this, we cannot by any device known to our philosophy, shut our eyes to the sad lack of mental and moral discipline which is calculated to bring honor to the free citizens of a free Zion. . . .

"We dare not predict a speedy and overwhelming gathering of such elements; nor need any hope for it. For our own part we would by far prefer to be a lonely but faithful sentinel upon the walls, a 'vedette' upon a distant outpost of Zion unredeemed, than to be an unredeemed and unregenerate citizen of Zion redeemed; for the one would result in sure and ignominious expulsion, while the other must eventuate in a victorious bidding to come home."

By the April conference of 1876, we begin to note a gradual modification of this policy of conservatism. At the session of April, 1875, there had been appointed a committee known as the committee on location, with the injunction to arrange for and effect the purchase of lands. The encouraging reports from the missionaries, and the general improvements in the spiritual tone of the people were now justifying this important step in advance. This committee reported to the conference in April, 1876, as follows:

"1. An eligible site for a location is had in view, upon which it will not be difficult to decide.

"2. The committee is not in a position to decide upon any point definitely because they are not possessed of the means requisite to secure the land where to locate.

"3. It will be quite unsafe to fix definitely upon a given point unless there shall be a sufficient amount of means at the disposal of the purchasing agent to warrant the committee in entering in upon proper contracts for such amount of lands as will secure those wishing to settle where such site may be selected from paying exorbitant prices for homes.

"4. The committee know of no property belonging to the church which may be by them offered as security for moneys, if borrowed of capitalists; therefore, do not feel at liberty to pledge the faith of the church for the repayment of means, if so borrowed.

"5. The committee can, therefore, see no more practical method of raising adequate means with which to begin the work of purchasing the lands than the following: (a) by consecration; (b) by loans.

"6. The committee are of the opinion that from twenty-five to fifty thousand dollars should be expended by the church in the purchase of lands at and contiguous to the site that may be selected.

"7. That as soon as a sufficient sum shall be placed at the command of the committee, the purchase of lands shall begin, and continue so long as the means shall permit. . . .

"8. The committee are now ready to receive consecrations and loans, as provided heretofore, and to proceed to the purchase and location of a site for a settlement, and to make a formal appeal to the Saints to now aid in the work.

By 1877, a definite location had been decided upon and the Board of Removal reported that Decatur County, Iowa, had been selected. This important event meant that the business center of the church would be changed from Plano, Illinois, to Decatur County, Iowa; that the building of a suitable community was about to be begun. A tract of land of about two hundred acres was purchased at a cost of about three thousand dollars. This was in the eastern part of Fayette Township, of Decatur County, Iowa, and was paid for by moneys provided from various sources, about half of which was in the form of loans, the remainder being outright donations. This site was, of course, decided upon before railroads were built, though one or two lines had already been surveyed and the construction work begun.

The new community soon developed into a fairly enterprising little town. Lamoni was located in what was then a rather strategic position. Then, as now, it had control of quite a large amount of adjacent territory, and since there was the immediate prospect of the projection of a railroad, its position was made all the more desirable. It is interesting to note that Joseph Smith, in traveling through this section of the country shortly before this, commented in very glowing terms upon the beautiful prospects in store for southern Iowa, Decatur County in particular. We are now, of course, inclined to discount his enthusiasm, since it occurs to the student of agriculture, at least, that the town of Lamoni, indeed Decatur County as a whole, could not have been selected on the ground that it would ever develop into a first-rate cereal crop producing section. Just what the founders of this first important center expected to develop in the way of agriculture we have no way of determining. If we view the situation from other points of view, however, one is inclined to accord to Decatur County the distinction of being located conveniently near valuable coal deposits, of being easily adapted to dairy farming, and the production of forage crops. Without appearing to be unjust in our criticism, in meditating upon the future economic policy of the church, we hope that there is a sufficient number of qualified men and women who, in the matter of deciding upon the location of the various communities of the Saints, may be induced to contribute their expert opinion, so that every possible point of view shall be fully considered.

B. Financial Organization

The conservative attitude which President Smith assumed in regard to the gathering is also to be found in his attitude toward the financial organization of the church. Time and again we find him declaring emphatically that proper care should be exercised so that there should be no suspicion on the part of the people that funds were being used unwisely or dishonestly. So important was this conservative attitude, and so anxious was he to provide against any unnecessary disturbance due to misunderstanding, to dishonesty, or to lack of knowledge, that he frequently exhorted the various quorums of the church, particularly the Twelve and the Bishopric, to have a care in the administration of the finances. Indeed, the relationship between the Bishopric and the Twelve was at one time virtually a system of checks and balances. This arrangement, however, led to a controversy between the Bishopric and the Twelve regarding the financial authority vested in each body. The controversy, however, was never at any time a serious one, but, as we would normally expect, conduced finally to the formation of a definite policy and the determination of the relative responsibility borne by each quorum.

The root of the controversy seemed to be found in certain instructions that were issued by the President of the church back in 1861, which were as follows: "And as a means of fulfilling the law, the Twelve will take measures in connection with the Bishop to execute the law of tithing; and let them before God see to it that the means so obtained are truly used for the purposes of the church."

The question hinged on the proposition as to whether the Twelve and the Bishopric were conjointly charged with executing the law of tithing. The Bishopric maintained that the special duties of the Twelve were that "they are to preside over all the churches, and to travel and preach, and to hold the keys of the ministry; such power and authority came to them by virtue of their apostleship, but that no jurisdiction is given to the Twelve to collect and disburse funds in common with the Bishop and his agents." The Bishopric, therefore, it is quite evident, objected to the idea that financial matters, or indeed, the Bishop and his agents, should be under the direction and in subjection to the quorum of the Twelve. They contended that each quorum should be responsible in its individual field and that there should be no infringement upon the lawful privileges of any of the other quorums.

The Twelve, on the other hand, affirmed that proper measures had not been taken to execute the law of tithing; that there was a misunderstanding regarding the law itself, and that, therefore, entitled the quorum, in harmony with the instructions given by the President of the church, to assist in making the law effective. They were actuated by the thought that, acting conjointly with the Bishopric, means could be provided to effectually prevent the monopolistic control of the finances by one man or small group of men. They were imbued with the idea that the propagation of the gospel was the first object of the law of offerings, and since the spreading of the gospel message was clearly the task of the Twelve, they conceived that there could be no possible objection in their acting conjointly with the Bishopric in the matter of the management of finances. The effect of this controversy is discernible even at the present, in the fact that there has been a consistent attempt to provide fundamental and effective checks upon the management of the church finances.

One of the first and most progressive movements made in the organization of a financial department was the establishment of the Bishop's agent. As a matter of policy, it was regarded as fundamentally important that in each locality some one should be stationed who possessed the requisite authority to collect the moneys in that particular branch, to disburse them in the locality wherever there was a need for such disbursements, and to forward the balance to the general office of the Bishopric at headquarters. This individual, aside from the fact that he is rated as the highest financial authority, is also the agent in the dissemination of the various propagandas.

The best definite statement from the pen of President Smith regarding the requirements of the financial system of the church is to be found on page 400, volume 4, of the Church History. These factors as stated by him are as follows:

First. All wealth of possessions held by the people of the church which are not in use should be regarded as surplus.

Second. In case there were no surplus, then the membership may according to their own choice consecrate as much as is possible. Such consecrations may be in the nature of money, goods, or chattels.

Third. In case there were no surplus wealth and in case there were no disposition to consecrate, then the individual still had the right to make a freewill offering.

Fourth. That there was an annual debt to the church or to the Lord's work of one tenth of the increase.

Fifth. In case there were no increase, then the membership have the alternative as before of giving by consecration or by freewill offering.

Sixth. All these means of securing an adequate revenue for the church were to be used and understood as being subject to the volition of those giving. In other words, compliance with the laws should always be voluntary.

Seventh. That the method of payment of these revenues should be to the Bishop's agent where these have been established and set up. In the absence, however, of the Bishop's agent they might, of course, be sent direct to the office of the Presiding Bishop.

The matter of the disbursement of the funds of the church is explained as follows:

First. Disbursements may be made upon a direct order from the conference by vote.

Second. Disbursements may be made at the discretion of the Bishop and by his agents in harmony with directions from him.

Third. By a definite agreement and understanding between the Twelve and the Bishopric as regards the ministry work and the maintenance of the ministry and their families.

The Order of Enoch

Up to the year 1870, the financial organization of the church had been merely preliminary in its nature. The defining of the duties of the Bishopric and the Twelve in regard to financial administration, the more or less systematic plea for financial support from the body, and the organization of various boards and committees having to do with the removal of the Saints from Plano to Decatur County, Iowa, were the principal accomplishments in the matter in regard to preparation of definite organization.

Prior to this time there had been considerable agitation for the organization of some sort of an order among the membership of the church for the purpose of purchasing lands to provide homes and labor for the worthy and industrious poor. The "committee on location" and the "board of removal" had both attempted in a small way to solve this problem, which committee and board were the first activities of the Order of Enoch. Accordingly in September of 1870, Bishop Rogers, collaborating with others, published the following instructions concerning the organization of the First United Order of Enoch:

"The first of September has been settled upon by those who are more directly moved in the matter for the completion of the organization of the proposed order. The reasons of this appointment are these: As much time will be gained by organization and location made in the early fall, as in midsummer. Many who have made up their minds to take shares will then be better able to make calculations for paying in; and many not able now may then be in circumstances to take one or more shares."

It is quite evident that Bishop Rogers in an attempt to find the most propitious time for the sale of these shares decided that the autumn season should have first preference, due to the fact, no doubt, that since this was the harvest season many would be able to realize on the sale of their crops and thus be in a better position to take stock in the order. Bishop Rogers instructs further:

"It is earnestly urged upon all who are interested in the success of the enterprise, that they now prepare to pay the first installment of their shares, or the whole if they so desire, to Bishop Israel L. Rogers, by the first of September next. The Bishop will receipt for all moneys so paid to him and will transfer the several amounts to the treasurer of the company as soon as he shall be appointed and qualified. As soon as the organization shall be completed the directors will at once enter upon the discharge of their duties and assume the management of the affairs of the company. These directors are to be elected by the shareholders annually by ballot. The first board of directors is formed by the commissioners who are named in the articles of incorporation; it is therefore necessary that so many of the shareholders as practicable should assemble in the semiannual conference at Council Bluffs, Iowa, September 15, 1870, to appoint from among themselves these seven commissioners; for to a very great extent the subsequent success of the enterprise will depend upon their integrity and business tact."

In this same report published May 15, we learn that already $28,000 had been pledged for capital stock and that Bishop Rogers fully expected that at least $100,000 would be subscribed by September 1 of the same year. He urged all possible haste in the transmission of the pledges of subscribers, together with the amounts subscribed so that receipts could be mailed and that the order might not be hindered in its forward looking movement. He warned the people that no stock could be taken after the organization of the company had been completed unless previous arrangements had been made for it. People were given to understand distinctly that no shareholder would be permitted to draw out his or her stock, although the right of transfer of said shares was permitted by law. One year later a report was made regarding what had been accomplished through the Order of Enoch. The committee which had been appointed for the purpose of seeking a location had canvassed the territory in the southern part of Iowa and in northern Missouri, and decided as we have mentioned previously to locate in Fayette Township, Decatur County.

It is interesting to note in this connection, however, that the experience ought not to be allowed to lose its force as a warning that in these days the speculators were present in abundance. They were there with the determination to capitalize the situation to their own individual profit and gain. They proposed to take advantage of the desire of the Saints to move into Decatur County. They were in a considerable measure successful in this sort of dealing. The process of paying for, and securing proper transfers and titles was a tedious matter. Some twenty-five hundred acres of land, however, were purchased, of which amount some twelve hundred acres were in one body. The board further reported that they had met on the ground in May, 1871, and had proceeded to survey the country with the view of accurately describing it to the stockholders and to those interested.

It is further of interest to us to note that while the board stated that they had secured a sufficient amount of land to insure a settlement, yet they instructed those who wished to move in, that the best source of information was the Real Estate Company of Jordan and Robb, of Leon, Iowa, and admitted further that even the purchase made by the committee had been made through this company. They cautioned the prospective settler to look well to the title of lands in order, of course, to avoid further legal difficulty and uncertainty. The following reasons were assigned why the company did not think it wise to begin business in the spring of 1871:

First. Articles of incorporation had not yet been filed either in the office of secretary of State or in the office of county recorder.

Second. They had not yet published their intention in the newspapers of the county which was required by statute.

The promotional work of the Order of Enoch, particularly the subscriptions for capital stock, had not come up to the expectations of those directing the order. Whereas they had expected at least $100,000 in the fall of 1870, the fact is, less than $50,000 had been subscribed by the spring of the following year. Whether this lack of support of the order was due to suspicions on the part of the people, whether there was an absolute lack of faith in the work, or whether there was really an insufficient amount of money in the possession of the people to insure the success of the order, or all three, it is not our province to say. The fact is quite evident though that the movement had not prospered as it was hoped it would.

Eight years later, in 1879, the president of the church made a very eloquent plea for the infusion of a progressive spirit in the development of an industrial program. In an editorial of the HERALD, July 15, 1879, President Smith alluded to the fact that the Order of Enoch was a part at least of a sound economic policy; assuring the people that he conceived it to be his duty to urge the prosecution of the plan. He emphasized the point that it was very poor policy to wait longer. He pointed out the fact that so far as those in authority were concerned they had little or no chance to defraud the membership in the development of the order. His suggestions in this instance were definite and concrete in that he advocated the organization of associations for the purpose of carrying on certain fundamental industrial activities. Some of these activities suggested were the manufacture of farm implements, woodenware, brick and tile, dairy products, and leather products. It was also suggested that in this connection, or following the adoption of a definite industrial program, there would soon be opened up the necessity of establishing distributing agencies. It was his belief further that there was a general misunderstanding as to the function of the Order of Enoch. He pointed out that it was simply an organized legal body, having its origin and membership in the church and that in the last analysis it could never be more than a legal vehicle for the carrying out of the church designs. The law of the church was inoperative and the good which was possible of realization was not enjoyed by the church merely because of the failure to complete the mission of the order, or an obstinate unwillingness to carry into effect that which possibly was already understood.

Economic well-being is dependent upon the evolution of important principles of civil law. Hence, it is necessary for the church to rely on the law to protect it in the establishing of an industrial order. As is the case even now, President Smith was conscious of the fact that those most able to insure the success of an economic plan were those who were the most hesitant in employing their resources to build up Zion industrially. Then, as now, men seemed to have the erroneous idea that to build up Zion meant to make a gift of all that they possessed, rather than to proceed upon the assumption that they could build up Zion by transferring their own resources to the regions designated and there operate as a steward.

Summary

In closing the discussion regarding the formation of an economic policy, it is a most difficult task to evaluate the various tendencies which have projected themselves and which have assisted in bringing the organization of the church to its present standing. So far as our period of study is concerned (from 1860 to 1890) one is quite at a loss to know just how to interpret the work of the church in its attempt to establish itself on a sound economic basis.

In the outstart we made the statement that the first decade of this period was marked by the prevailing insistency on the part of those intrusted with the leadership of the church to gravitate toward the philosophy of conservatism. Whether our interpretation has been correct in this regard further study will alone determine. Much as we are impressed with the realization that the membership of the church was very impatient during this first period, we are converted in our belief, and in that belief we agree with the student of history, that the policy of conservatism has repeatedly justified itself. Whether this conservative attitude too long remained the dominant attitude may be another question worthy of research and study. The raising of such questions is indeed the thing which makes it very difficult to evaluate their interpretation since we are not in a position to become thoroughly conversant with the conditions which existed at that particular time. The things which were accomplished we are quite aware were never spectacular, and because they were of the unostentatious sort some were constrained to the opinion that the forward progress of the church was seriously in danger because of the over-cautiousness maintained by those in authority. We are scarcely prepared, as we mentioned before, to say that the church moved too rapidly or indeed too slowly.

Since we are not in position to view this situation from a prophetic standpoint, we do not know what might have happened had a different course of action been indorsed. It is well to bear in mind that the most important concern of the church during this period was to reunite those who had been drawn away through the conflicting claims of self-centered leadership and to further spread the gospel through the building up of the missionary arm of the church. It is to be expected therefore that this economic aspect of the problem should be shunted into a place of second-rate importance. Instead of viewing the policy of the President of the church with impatience because of a conservative attitude, we ought rather to marvel that the men whose training along economic lines was so meager and insufficient should be constrained to give as much attention as they did give to the economic aspect of the church work.

It is quite evident that in spite of the conservative policy of the sixties the program of the church by the late eighties had progressed far beyond the powers of comprehension of the rank and file of the membership. The inordinate delay in the accomplishment of the economic ideal of the church therefore was set far into the future, not because the leadership of the church had been negligent, but because the people were not in a position to put themselves in harmony with the law as it had been explained to them.

The progress of the people of the church has run in cycles. The Presidency and the Bishopric and the other quorums of the church assemble as a policy-determining body. Desirable features of importance are recommended and re-recommended, but it is much easier to recommend and to plan than it is to execute. Every organization has been under the necessity of waiting for the group to catch up with the policy which has been projected into the future. This appears to us to have been precisely the situation at the close of the century. From 1890 to the present time we have not considered it necessary, at least we have not considered it advisable, to further expand that policy. We are, however, at the present time just beginning another of our economic cycles. We have thrown out in advance an expanded policy calling for renewed activity along almost every line—an activity which if performed faithfully will result in the doing of things which in turn shall call for a further expansion and extension of our economic policy.

Robert Blatchford, writing of the Victorian fifties, which he personally remembers, states that there were no telephones, no motor cars or motor transports, no taxicabs, no tube railways, no trams, no corridor trains, no dining cars or sleeping cars, no parcel post, no post cards, no Atlantic cable, no compulsory or free education, no cheap books, no cheap newspapers, no municipal art galleries, no organized labor, no votes for women, no working-class franchise, no ballot box, no married woman's property act, no gramophones, no canned foods. He is reported as concluding, "I who have lived in those spacious Victorian days do vow and declare that this is a more enlightened, more tolerant, more gentle time. That the present time with all its faults is the sanest, cleanest, healthiest, and most human epoch in the history of the British people."

On January 8, six young people will sail from England on the White Star liner Majestic for America. From New York they will proceed to Lamoni where they expect to enter as students in the Religious Education course at Graceland. Their names are: Madge C. Green, Glasgow, Scotland; Dorris Gibbs, Birmingham, England; Frank and Harry Holmes, Clay Cross, England; Harold Dewsnup, Manchester, England, and Sidney Phillips, Carway, Wales. Let's give them a real Graceland welcome.—Graceland Record.

January 13, 1826, the American Society for the Promotion of Temperance was formed in Boston.

January 15, 1820, Susan B. Anthony, the suffragist leader, was born.

January 16, 1825, Sir John Franklin sailed from Liverpool on an expedition to the North Pole.

In 1830, the first American-built locomotive was completed and used.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

IN 1820 THERE WERE LIVELY PROBLEMS, TOO

At the beginning of every year, or nearly every year, we are accustomed to shake our heads and marvel, both at the seriousness of the problems which we have just come through, and at the equally serious nature of those which confront us. A writer in the Boston Herald, presents, without any particular comment, a resume of the general state of domestic and foreign affairs one hundred years ago. It appears that the people of those times had their world and national victories and perplexities of creditable size, and in interesting measure. As we are reminded:

"A century ago Europe, but lately delivered from the domination of Napoleon Bonaparte, was manifesting the first tokens of unrest under the tyranny of the royalist reaction which had followed Leipzig and Waterloo, and the United States was in the midst of the first bitter conflict over slavery in a debate which was the prototype of all the slavery debates that followed through the forty years that ended with the outbreak of the Civil War.

"In 1790 the population of the Northern and Southern States was practically equal. By 1820 the white population of the North had become more than 5,000,000, of the South less than 3,000,000; the slave population of the North was less than 20,000, of the South more than 1,500,000; the free blacks in the North numbered nearly 100,000, in the South about a third more; the total population of the country was nearly 10,000,000, and the North outnumbered the South by more than 600,000. In 1790 the Congressional representation of the two sections was about equal; the 1820 census gave the North thirty votes more than the South. The slave States, therefore, had begun to watch with apprehension the steady gains of the free States in wealth and power as well as in population. The South saw the necessity of creating more slave States in order to maintain political equilibrium, at least in the United States Senate. This seemed to them a struggle for life. The battle which extended over the three years 1818 to 1821 had its focus in the claims of Missouri and Maine for admission to the Union, the one as a slave, the other as a free State, on the principle of the Senatorial balance of power.

"It was Senator Thomas, of Illinois, who brought forward the essence of the famous Missouri Compromise on January 18, 1820. He proposed that no restrictions as to slavery should be imposed upon Missouri in framing her State constitution, but that in all the rest of the country ceded by France to the United States north of 36 degrees and 30 minutes, that being the southern boundary line of Missouri, there should be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude. After long and acrimonious discussions this measure was adopted and it signified that while the South was obtaining the present object, the North was gaining the future advantage.

"But Missouri came to Congress with a constitution that not only recognized the existence of slavery within her bounds, but that provided also that it should be the duty of the legislature to pass such laws as would become necessary to prevent free negroes or mulattoes from coming into or settling within the State. Then Henry Clay came forward as a pacificator, and Missouri was admitted, conditionally, to the Union on March 20, 1820, the condition being that the State should never pass any law preventing any description of persons from coming to or settling in said State who now are or hereafter may become citizens of any States of the Union. To this condition the Missouri Legislature gave its assent.

"Meantime, Congress also was dealing with the aspirations of Maine for Statehood. The separation from Massachusetts and the necessary division of property having been effected, the bill for admission was divorced from the Missouri measure on March 1, and on March 3 the act was passed by which Maine was declared to be, from and after the 15th, one of the family of States. Thus there was established a geographical sectional line; the slave States and the free were separated; this was the first token of demarcation.

"Florida also was a problem for the National Legislature. Jackson's conduct in capturing Pensacola in 1818 was the question at issue. Pending the discussion in Congress the Spanish minister under instructions from Madrid agreed to a treaty for the cession of Florida in extinction of the various American claims for which the United States agreed to pay $5,000,000. This treaty was at once ratified by the Senate, but the Spanish ratification was not received until February, 1821.

"The ninth presidential election took place in 1820. Monroe was chosen a second time by a vote that approximated unanimity. The sequel is thus stated by the historian Schouler: 'One, however, of the 232 electoral votes cast was wanting to consummate the exceptional honor, for a New Hampshire elector . . . determined, so it is said, that no later mortal should stand in Washington's shoes. Of America's Presidents elected by virtual acclamation, history furnishes but these two examples; and as between the two men honored by so unapproachable a tribute of confidence Monroe entered upon his second term of office with less of real political opposition than Washington.'

"Of interest also is the fact that in 1820 Frances Wright, then only twenty-two years of age, traveled extensively in this country as the first woman who gave lectures in America upon political subjects. Born in Scotland, this pioneer advocate of woman's rights possessed remarkable mental abilities."

Europe was having troubles quite comparable to those which are distracting most of the nations to-day. The royalties and politicians, with Napoleon safely immured at Saint Helena, in 1820 and the neighboring years were striving to check the tides of republicanism which the French Revolution and the Napoleonic wars had set flowing. Specifically:

"France, with Louis XVIII on the throne, was not long in finding that the restored Bourbons 'had forgotten nothing and learned nothing.' Bonaparte collected his expenses from the lands he conquered, so France emerged from twenty years of war with a debt only a sixth that of Great Britain, and soon rose to a general level of prosperity comparable with the rest of Europe, and this in spite of bad harvests, political unrest, and a foreign occupation which did not end until 1818. So 'furious was the tide of reaction,' says J. Holland Rose, 'that the restored monarchy had far stronger powers than had the old system wielded before 1789.'

"The reaction had just been checked somewhat when a sinister event swept away all its obstacles. In February, 1820, the Duc de Berry was killed by a fanatic, whose intent was to cut off the direct Bourbon line. The birth in September of a posthumous son frustrated his design. The only outcome was a new outburst of royalist frenzy. 'In fact,' says the historian, 'everywhere in Europe did absolutism seem to be triumphant.'

"After the fall of Bonaparte, the Czar, the Emperor of Austria, and the King of Prussia had made a personal agreement which was to go with the terms of the Congress of Vienna and which was associated in the popular understanding with that written declaration known as the Holy Alliance. This was a wholly reactionary machine, hostile to all political liberalism, intended to hold back all popular movements—and Metternich was its shrewd and clever manipulator.

"Nevertheless, there was a revolution in Spain against the cowardly Ferdinand VII. There was revolution in Portugal—a country which had been governed from Brazil since 1807—and the whirl of events two years later deprived the House of Braganza of its vast South-American colony. And there was revolution in Italy, Naples, and Sicily extorting a constitution from the king, but the movement soon was suppressed by the machinery of the triumvirate. These outbursts alarmed the Holy Alliance and caused them to convene three congresses in succession, and to police Europe in general, to

Woman's New Power

(We are glad to present this week a little article prepared at our request by Sister Dora Young, of Holden, Missouri. We hope it will prove to be but the precursor of a series which will prove most valuable to our women in understanding the new power which has come to them with the citizenship. Read, and then act promptly, for only so can we obey the command, "and good and wise men ye should seek to uphold." The present Congressional session extends from December 6 to March 3.—A. A.)

Now that Congress is in session it seems an opportune time for the new voter to renew her acquaintance with the duties and general make-up of that body. It is well to remember that the electorate of a democracy has an important duty to perform as an organ of government. The individual woman voter may feel that her idea of an act of legislation is inconsequential. However, some portion of the power of the State rests within her, and it is clearly her duty to use that power in cooperating with the rest of the voters in order to become a controlling factor in legislation.

Things could be done better at Washington if better team work could be accomplished between the representative in Congress and the citizens at home. The folks back home wield a mighty influence in the passage of all bills, provided their ideas are communicated to the Capital. Failing in this, we fail to do our part in lawmaking.

A representative may go to Washington with high ideals and an ambition to serve the Nation as well as his constituents but he finds there a long established system that is difficult to manage and unless he has good backing from his friends at home he succumbs to the influence of the machine and becomes a puppet rather than an aggressive fighting statesman.

Big business with its highly organized plan of work sends its messengers to the lawmakers in the most approved manner. The railroads, the liquor interests, the packers, the oil men, the mine owners, all employ highly trained business men to present their claims to the proper authorities. Their fetter Italy, and to induce France to occupy Spain from 1823 to 1827.

"As to England: There extraordinary social changes were in progress, the factory system was rising, the age of mechanical invention was at hand, the middle classes were rising as a new power, and the cry for reform constantly was growing louder, although the House of Commons continued a travesty of popular representation until 1832. The long reign of George III, crowned in 1760, came to an end on January 29, 1820; he closed his life, wandering from room to room of his palace, in darkness of eyes and of mind. The Prince Regent, the 'Florizel' of the fashionable dissipations of the time, succeeded as George IV, and at once sought to divorce his wife, the Princess Caroline of Brunswick, whom he had married in 1795 in order to get his debts paid. Lord Liverpool brought in the House of Lords a bill of pains and penalties aimed at her degradation from the throne and the dissolution of her marriage. Brougham and Denman gained deserved fame in her defense. When the ministry finally abandoned the bill the country rejoiced and windows flamed throughout the nation. Her good name vindicated, she died not long thereafter.

"The history of Germany through this period is marked with few events of importance. It was a season of gradual reaction on the part of her rulers and of impatience and enmity on the part of the people. South America's states very shortly began that series of emancipations out of which the present situation on that continent has developed."—The Literary Digest, February 7, 1920.

machine works well and they get results because of it. These men work merely for material gain. Let the women of America use these machine tactics for a more righteous purpose.

The Congressional slate of this session contains several bills that reach right into our homes and touch both mother and child. These bills will be sponsored by committees of women from various organizations throughout the United States. These women will meet the proper committees and argue for these bills but without the aid of the women at home very slow progress is made, for the law-makers at Washington will not act until they are assured that the actual home-keepers of the nation desire these measures. Let the women of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints assist in this work by sending personal telegrams and letters to their representatives at the National Capital urging them to work and vote for these laws. Send resolutions from the auxiliary societies urging the same thing. Continue this program until the desired legislation is an accomplished fact.

In order to do this in an intelligent way it is necessary to follow the discussion of the bills in the daily press. The following summary of the most important ones is given:

Sheppard-Towner Bill, for public protection of maternity and infancy.

Curtis-Gard Bill, to prevent child labor and regulate school attendance in the District of Columbia.

Rogers Bill, providing that no woman who is an American citizen shall lose her citizenship by marrying an alien and that no alien woman shall acquire citizenship by marrying an American citizen.

Smith-Towner Bill, to create a department of education and provide Federal cooperation to the States for the removal of illiteracy, for Americanization, for equalizing educational opportunity, for physical education, including health education and sanitation, and for the preparation of teachers.

Fess Bill, to promote vocational education.

In the past, millions have been appropriated for the prevention of hog cholera, other millions for the army and navy. Now that woman has a part in making the laws let her see to it that Congress recognizes the need for Federal aid for maternity, child welfare, and education to be just as essential as for hogs and guns.

The New Women's Bureau

In the Department of Labor there has this year been established a Women's Bureau. Already they are mailing out many interesting and instructive bulletins and pamphlets. Some of those which have recently come to our desk are as follows:

Labor Laws for Women in Industry in Indiana. A report of a survey made by the Women in Industry Service at the request of the governor of Indiana and the industrial board of the State. Indiana is one of 12 States having a law prohibiting the employment of women at night in at least one group of occupations, but it is also one of the six States having no law at all limiting the hours of employment for women over 18 years of age. This survey discloses valuable facts, from which conclusions may safely be drawn concerning the need for laws to protect women in industry.

Charts compiled from bulletins concerning legislation now in force which affect women, such as Mothers' Pension Laws, showing persons to whom allowance may be given, conditions governing, aid to children, amount and continuance of allowance, the administration of the law and the source of the funds so used; Night-Work Laws for Women Workers, showing hours prohibited, with limitations and occupations specified; Minimum Wage Legislation, showing methods of arriving at wage awards, means of securing enforcement, industries covered, exceptions, etc.

Hours and Conditions of Work for Women in Industry in Virginia.

Women in the Government Service.

Employment of Women in Hazardous Industries: A summary of State and Federal laws regulating same.

Home Work in Bridgeport, Connecticut: Showing conditions surrounding the work of hundreds of women employed in one of the large factory centers.

If you are interested in keeping in touch with this new agency through which women are to be protected by arousing public sentiment against the abuses which have been heaped upon them through avarice, ignorance, or necessity—and what true Latter Day Saint is not thus interested?—send your name and address to the Women's Bureau, Department of Labor, Washington, District of Columbia, and ask to be placed upon the mailing list for what publications they are sending out. Read of these movements for betterment, watch the daily papers for added light and knowledge, and thus be prepared to throw the weight of your influence for the good of humanity, through an uplift of its womanhood.

Appeal From Ruling on Women's Night Work

LINCOLN, NEBRASKA, December 3.—Attorney General Davis, on behalf of the State, filed an appeal with the supreme court from a ruling in the district court of Douglas County, which declared night work by women in a newspaper office was not a violation of the law prohibiting the employment of female labor between the hours of 10 p. m. and 6 a. m. The district court declared a newspaper is neither a manufacturing, a mercantile, nor a mechanical establishment and does not come within the prohibition. The attorney general while admitting intelligence is the chief requisite in the issuance of a newspaper contends it comes within the meaning of a mechanical enterprise.

New York Civic League Opens Drive Against Paid Sunday Sports

NEW YORK, December 4.—A call upon all "true Americans in the State of New York to work for the repeal of those laws, signed by Governor Smith, which gave immensely valuable franchises to the Sunday baseball and Sunday motion picture businesses," was made by the New York Civic League's committee appointed to recommend militant measures against "the commercial interests that are desecrating the Sabbath."

"We are not asking for laws to prohibit amateur Sunday baseball or Sunday motion pictures where no admission fee is charged," said the statement. It advocated prohibition of "all Sunday sports and amusements conducted as a business and for profit."

Better Instruction for Children Urged

BOSTON, December 4.—The introduction of more individual instruction for children in the public schools was recommended by President (emeritus) Charles W. Eliot of Harvard University at the annual meeting of the New England Association of College Teachers.

"If children cannot be classified better than at present, he said, "the American free school cannot be maintained as it was originally established. It will become the school of the lower grades of the population because the better classes will not keep their children under the public school system with its slow promotions. They will send them to private schools."

American educators have encouraged an erroneous notion that "the object of democratic government is to average up to the population in intelligence as well as in comforts," he added.—Omaha Bee.

March 2, 1820, the Missouri Compromise Bill was passed by the United States Congress.

March 3, 1817, the territory of Alabama was organized.

March 18, 1818, the needy veterans of the Revolution were granted pensions.

LETTERS

Appointment of Missionaries

By concurrence of the Presidency, Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric, the following appointments and transfers have been made, effective at once:

Glaud R. Kuykendal, Detroit District, Detroit objective, local.

Arthur G. Larkey, Chatham District, local.

E. A. Davis, transferred from Holden Stake to Utah District, missionary.

Amos T. Higdon, transferred from Western Colorado District to Holden Stake, missionary.

Daniel B. Sorden, appointed to British Isles Mission, local.

James Davis, transferred from Eastern Michigan District to Central Michigan District for the winter months.

Charles Fry, transferred from Spring River District to British Isles Mission, local.

James E. Bishop, transferred from New York District to British Isles Mission, local.

Richard Bullard, Southern Nebraska District, as traveling bishop.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY.
QUORUM OF TWELVE.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, December 11, 1920.

The Bishopric

British Isles Mission: By reason of the transfer of Bishop Roderick May by President Frederick M. Smith to other territory, we hereby appoint F. Henry Edwards as Bishop's agent of the British Isles Mission, his address being: Saint Leonards, 19 Amhurst Park, London, N., England. This appointment is to become effective January 1, 1921.

With the increasing opportunities for the extension of our church work in this mission and the additional missionary work which the joint council has arranged for, I am sure that the Saints of this mission will feel the additional responsibility which rests upon them to support with their financial means in proportion to the blessings which our heavenly Father shall bestow upon them. It is in this way that each one of us shall acquit ourselves before God as wise and faithful stewards. While these servants of the Master are administering to the spiritual needs of God's people they in turn can rejoice that to them is granted the opportunity of administering the temporal needs, so that our work becomes mutual both as to benefits and opportunities, and in the performance of the duties and obligations which the Lord has imposed upon us and we shall find an ever increasing joy and a greater abundance of spiritual blessing.

A Testimony by a Prominent Patriarch

Elder Joseph R. Lambert recites some gratifying intimations of the Spirit that came to him.

At, or soon after the close of the late General Conference, while my wife and I were yet in the Sanitarium, I had recovered sufficiently to take little walks away from the building, and while on one of these walks I fell into deep meditation on the present situation in the church.

What led up to this meditation, was the fact that many of our old friends from different parts of the country, brothers and sisters in the church, kindly called on us, and gave us very glowing accounts of the conference proceedings, affirming that they never attended a conference which equaled this one in the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, unity of action, liberality of the brethren, etc. This kind of a report was almost unanimous.

In my meditations my thoughts ran thus: Admitting that the conference was a good and important one, which I was neither prepared nor inclined to dispute, it is possible, if not probable, that the division which has been so apparent to many, will continue for a time, at least; and if so, how can the church do the work which seems now to be demanded at her hands? I believed then, as I do now, that the hastening time is right at our doors. I was strongly wrought upon with the gravity and importance of the present situation, and said in the energies of my soul, "Lord, what can we do?" meaning the church.

At once I felt stirred with the gentle, patient influences of the Holy Spirit, and this is the substance of what was given:

May the peace and good will of our heavenly Father be with the Saints of the English Mission.

Sincerely yours,

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE, Presiding Bishop.

"Stand by the work which you have received—the restored gospel and church—and sustain the First Presidency in the high and important duties of their calling. Oppose that which you conceive to be wrong, and dangerous to the interests of the work, in kindness and at proper times and places, and with all the wisdom you can secure; and I will do the rest."

All this was just as plain as if it had been spoken in an audible voice, and the last statement, which I have taken the liberty to emphasize, came with peculiar force, making the strongest impression on my mind.

Now, so far as I am concerned, a great weight has been lifted from my mind. More than ever do I believe that God is still at the helm, and he will, if we permit him, bring the old ship through all the storms that may seek her destruction, in safety, without the loss of one soul. There is nothing extraordinary, or new, about this communication; but, under existing conditions, and having been given, as I believe, by the Spirit of truth, which is the Holy Ghost, it will, I trust, emphasize, and make still clearer to us, that this is the way, and the only way out without undue loss. Who is to be humiliated in the final decision, is not stated; but can we not well afford to be humiliated if the work has been properly cared for, or humiliated and corrected if we have made an important mistake? Let God be true, however much it may reflect upon us.

Christmas Offering Items of Interest

Sister W. H. MacLaren of Parsons, Kansas, writes: "I wish to report that we have a one hundred per cent (and more) school in the 'Dollar Sunday' offering. We received $26 and have only 25 members. We are trying for an average of $5 per member for the year."

Note the splendid spirit manifest in the following letter received from Sister Maggie Sellers of Lenora, Oklahoma: "Edna, Clarence, Helen, and I have received your several letters. We all intend to pay tithing, Christmas offering, etc. We raised broom corn this year and as soon as we dispose of the crop we are going to give as much as we can."

C. A. Classon, Marseilles, Illinois, reports regarding their "Dollar Sunday" offering: "We have an enrollment of sixty and our "Dollar Sunday" offering amounted to $34.65. Our aim is $250.

Brother J. W. Layton, Nauvoo, Illinois, reports from the old historic grounds: "From only four families we received $10.10 on 'Dollar Sunday,' so you see we are trying to do our part."

Sister Mary E. Richards, Arma, Kansas, reports for their little school: "Our 'Dollar Sunday' offering amounted to $14.62."

Sister Sarah L. Gage, Dennis Port, Massachusetts, writes: "Our Sunday school is small but we like to help all we can. We gave $4 on the day set apart as 'Dollar Sunday.'"

From Sheridan, Wyoming, we received the following letter sent jointly from Sister Lee Deems and Brother Medy Richard: "We each gave $1 for 'Dollar Sunday' and are sending $15 for offering."

We understand that many, many other schools have done equally as well and some better than these we have heard from. We wish all these good schools would write us, not because they might desire to see their names in print but because of the good it will do others, the encouragement it lends to others to know what is really being done by the various schools.

The year is fast drawing to a close and we have much to do if we clear the $150,000 offering for 1920. It can be done and should be done. Let us do it. Let each school do a little better than last year and we will surely accomplish our desires.

Most sincerely yours,

A. W. SMITH,

THE TEST OF LOVE

Wasn't it wonderful! The enthusiasm, the get-together spirit, the sincerity of purpose and desire, the grand finish of the auditorium drive? Who among us but rejoiced because of our success? It was the test of love for our God and his gospel. We succeeded because we all pulled together in one supreme and glorious finish. It was great!

Now for the grand finish on the Christmas offering for 1920. Those who so nobly responded in the auditorium drive will, we are sure, respond just as nobly in this drive for funds to help purchase lands for our inheritance. Before Zion can be established we must prepare the territory round about for the good Saints to inhabit. Lands must be purchased in order that all may have an opportunity to secure their inheritance—your inheritance and mine—for in no other way will Zion truly be established.

The Sunday schools and members have done nobly in the past and we have greatly appreciated your good support and cooperation. We know that God has been pleased with the sincere efforts put forth and that he has rejoiced with us in our success. Our successes of the past are behind us and we must concern ourselves with the future. There remains a great work for us to do and the establishing of Zion is yet to be accomplished. Let us do our part and look to God, the one who has so abundantly helped and blessed us in the past, for he is ever ready to show the way to greater accomplishments.

We would like to receive more letters telling of the successful efforts of the schools and individuals. These letters help to enthruse others. May we hear from you by first mail?

The success of the auditorium drive was made possible because of the whole-hearted concentration of effort in the pulpit and in the home. Shall we not make this same earnest effort in one grand, determined finish in the Christmas offering drive? With each one doing just a little better than last year we will be able to accomplish our aim ($150,000).

Let us make this a "test of love" also.

May God in his infinite wisdom bless all the good workers with a truly Merry Christmas and a Happy and Prosperous New Year.

Send all offering direct to the Bishop's office and be careful to state definitely and plainly the sender's name and address.

Very sincerely yours,

A. W. SMITH.

At the morning service at the Lamoni church on the 12th, Apostle J. A. Gillen addressed the audience. Observance of College Day having been deferred for a number of reasons, it was the theme at this hour. In the evening Thomas L. Sloan, president of the Society of American Indians and editor of the American Indian Magazine, occupied, a large audience being present, though an epidemic of smallpox and consequent quarantine cut down the number materially. Mr. Sloan makes an excellent impression in his plea for a "square deal" for the Indian. Devoting all his time to legal work for the Indians, without compensation, he comes to know the sorrowful side of the system of government whereby the Indian is oppressed and denied his natural rights. He left for Des Moines and will visit several other points ere leaving for his home in Washington.

A Splendid Effort

To the church: It has been most gratifying to see the splendid response the members of the church have made to the appeal for funds to build the much needed auditorium. It is an indication of a fine spirit of consecration and progress. And there is in it that which heartens and encourages us when we look forward and envisage the great tasks to be accomplished by this people.

The whole campaign and its results become additional forces fixing the eyes of the members and officers upon the objectives of the church.

We laid down a definite task for the church. In a splendid effort the membership, from reports received, have apparently responded with more than was asked.

We rejoice. Let us move on to the bigger things. May the blessings of God strengthen us for the greater tasks and his Spirit and guiding wisdom fortify us.

Your servant, FREDERICK M. SMITH,
President of the Church.

LONDON, ENGLAND, November 30, 1920.

A Visit With the Woodbine Sage

It was in the latter part of August, 1918, and I was in attendance at the Logan, Iowa, reunion, that the opportunity presenting itself to visit the home of Brother Charles Derry I gladly accepted it. About four o'clock in the afternoon we left Logan in Brother Charles Van Eaton's car. Besides him and me there were in the car, Sister Van Eaton, Albert Carmichael, W. A. McDowell, and Joseph Lane. We soon reached Woodbine, and without delay went to Brother Derry's home. The aged brother was in the yard slowly walking to and fro for his daily exercise. We were taken into the house, and Brother Derry came in to greet us. How clearly we sensed the sacred atmosphere which surrounds an aged servant of God who through his busy life has lived close to the ideals of his religion.

He delights to talk of the church and along the lines of his past experiences in his church work.

"You may tell the people, Brother Fred," said he, "that I still love God and his cause. I seem to find no stopping place, and there comes to me some degree of dissatisfaction that I have not the strength to stand before the people and declare the word of God as I once could." Then after a pause he added, "But I do get some chance, for as I pass along the sidewalks, people stop and talk, and ask me questions, and I love to tell the gospel story."

Then he sat silent for a time, and his white face perceptibly saddened as he said:

"What strikes me as a dagger to the heart is to hear of our men who were shining lights falling and see their lights go out in darkness."

He evidently had in mind a disaffection which had shortly before that manifested itself in a certain locality, and his keen mind probably sensed one of the underlying causes, for he soon added: "But I fear we are at times to blame, for we give unguarded and unstinted praise to the undoing of those we fain would encourage. Many years ago I read on the cover of a pamphlet I chanced to see words which I have since remembered and often quoted:

"Learn to contemn all praise betimes,
For flattery is the nurse of crimes."

As to his own work, most modestly did he speak. A stalwart, yet he never forgot his own limitations and his dependence on God. His present attitude and his buoyant hope he expressed to us by reading a poem he had written about a year previously, when in his 92d year. I give it here:

"You called me from the anvil, Lord,
A poor, unlearned youth,
And bade me to declare thy word
In meekness and in truth.

"I bowed to thy decree, dear Lord,
Without hope of earthly gain,
Trusting in thy gracious word;
Nor did I trust in vain.

"My duty I have tried to learn
By searching deep thy word,
That none my humble youth might spurn,
But seek thy truth's accord;

"And seeing, they might humbly bow
Unto thy righteous law,
And grace receive to keep their vow,
And thy salvation know.

"I've had to face a frowning world
Who never knew thy power,
Endure their scorn, so proudly hurled
In this, the eleventh hour.

"But thou wast to thy promise true
In standing by my side,
And daily strength thou didst renew,
Through thy Spirit as my guide.

"Nor was I ever put to shame
As thy cause I did defend,
Nor have I blushed to own thy name,
My God, Redeemer, Friend.

"My feeble efforts, I confess,
Are oft with error stained;
Nor can I boast my righteousness,
But I can trust in thine.

"And now in my declining years
My hope is still in thee.
Dispel my doubts, dismiss my fears,
That I thy face may see.

"I know thy promise stands secure
To all who trust in thee,

www.LatterDayTruth.org

Who firmly to the end endure
In glory crowned shall be.

"O help me, Lord, to firmly stand
As witness of thy love,
Till called unto that better land,
To dwell with thee above."

Thus he modestly and humbly speaks of his splendid past work, which has so endeared him to this people, and everywhere left a name synonymous with goodness and saintliness; and thus gives expression to words which indicate the shining hope which has so gloriously illuminated his declining years and cheered not only him but everyone who meets him.

And just before we left he asked for administration. "Not that I am especially ill," he said apologetically, "but because I would like a blessing, if you feel that you can administer thus." Did I feel like it? Could anyone see such splendid humility, such saintliness and not feel like officiating in a sacred ordinance? We administered, and felt that we were the ones blessed in the opportunity to hold up in the arms of faith that grand old servant of the church.

And as we left the house with his lips uttering blessings upon us, we each felt we had made journey to a sacred shrine and were strengthened to "carry on" the cause our saintly aged brother had so long served. And I doubt not that each uttered a silent prayer in leaving: "God bless dear old Brother Derry and the faithful, patient daughter who so tenderly cares for him."

FREDERICK M. SMITH.

The Evans Case

From present appearances this famous case approaches a finale. The supreme court of Ontario has reversed the ruling of the trial judge who dismissed our claims, and holds that we are entitled to certain moneys and properties which Mr. Evans and his followers took away with them when they left the church in June, 1918.

At the time of the division at Toronto, the church officials requested Bishop Evans to make an accounting of these various funds and property belonging to the branch, Sunday school, Religio, and Ladies' Auxiliary, to which, under the law as well as in morals and good conscience, Evans and his disciples were not entitled. Our demand was disdained and denied, and after seeking legal advice and considering the situation from every angle, it was decided to submit our claims to the courts of Canada and abide by their judgment, and the decision by the supreme court is a justification of our action.

The claims filed by our barristers, Messrs. Corley, Wilkie, and Hamilton, of Toronto, asked for an accounting of several funds; the new church building fund, funds belonging to the Sunday school, Religio, and Ladies' Auxiliary, sermon fund, and theater service proceeds.

Church Building Fund

First, we have the building fund. Early in 1917 the Toronto Branch, acting upon what Bishop Evans claimed was an inspiration, at a regular branch business meeting, passed a resolution to build a new church according to the "recent revelation to us," and provided that Bishop Evans be the "treasurer" to collect funds. The evidence showed that after that meeting Bishop Evans made constant pleas for contributions, but never made a report of any kind as to the amount given him in response to his efforts. When the trial was reached his counsel filed a list of subscriptions.

Evans's defense in this matter was very peculiar. He claimed that the fund had been collected in defiance to the general authorities of the church, introduced a letter from Bishop B. R. McGuire written a few days after the branch action referred to above, in which it was very strongly intimated that the time was inopportune to go to the expense of building. We do not propose to make any argument in this account, but when our readers recall that in January, 1917, the World War was on and that Canada was engaged therein and the United States was already feeling the great depression in all money matters, need any more be said to support the wisdom of the Presiding Bishop, though he did not desire, nor did he attempt, to interdict or prohibit arbitrarily. The branch decided to go forward nevertheless, and Bishop Evans remained the treasurer. Now, it was claimed, the Toronto Branch was in rebellion to the general authorities, and, besides, Evans contended, the money given to him was given for the purpose of building a church in which he, Evans, "was to be the pastor," using the stereotyped expression of Evans's willing witnesses. However, under the cross-examination of Mr. Wilkie, the theory rapidly vanished into thin air, and evidence as to the individual transactions, things said and done, showed that no mention ever was made of a "church in which Bishop Evans was to be the pastor" until June 3, 1918, the day Evans and his adherents left the church.

But the law holds such funds as impressed with a trust, and using the words of one of the justices who sat at the appeal hearing, Mr. Evans could not collect moneys pursuant to a resolution of the Toronto Branch and be heard to say afterward: "This belongs to me—it was given to me to build a church in which I am to be pastor." It couldn't be done. On this point, Chief Justice Mulock, in his decision, which was concurred in by associates, said: "In making collections Bishop Evans was the agent of the church. All collections coming to his hands became the moneys of his principal, and it was his duty to pay them over to his principal. If there existed any circumstances which relieved him of that duty the onus was on him to show it. Loose expressions by subscribers that their contributions were being made towards the erection of a church of which he was to become pastor fall far short of creating a trust in respect of moneys paid to him. . . . It may be that some of such subscribers can establish some right in respect of their subscriptions because of Mr. Evans not becoming the pastor of the new church, but that is a matter between them and the church, and it was not for Bishop Evans to determine it, as he has endeavored to do by withholding the money from the branch. In so doing he has been guilty of a breach of trust, and is accountable in respect thereof."

For a little sidelight on this point it may be well in passing to state that Evans testified that never till the 3d day of June, 1918, had he ever thought of leaving the church, and about six weeks prior to that date he wrote President F. M. Smith that anybody who said he contemplated leaving the church was an "infernal liar."

Sunday School and Religio

Early in the course of this litigation Evans and codefendants relinquished claim to any of the property and funds belonging to these organizations and brought the money in their hands into court.

Sermon Fund and Theater Services

For many years Bishop Evans had kept up a propaganda by way of printed sermons, both in book and pamphlet or leaflet form. Many hundreds—more likely thousand of dollars had been donated by branch members to this fund; the branch repeatedly made contributions to it—to make up deficits, the bishop claimed; and there was a standing committee, pursuant to branch resolution, for the purpose of collecting funds from the members in aid of this movement. Bishop

Evans never made a full financial report of this "sermon fund," as it was referred to in branch minutes.

It seemed to us that in simple justice to the branch an accounting should be made to it, and for this reason we included such request in our claims. Evans's defense to this was characteristic of the man. He said it was his business affair altogether; the sermons had been preached by him; he had made all the contracts, etc., and if there were any profits they were his own personal property; however, according to his testimony, there were no profits.

The court took the view that these were "personal ventures of Bishop Evans." We were aware that the legal significance of the conduct of Bishop Evans and the acquiescence of the branch therein during the many years might give color and support to the view reached by the court on this point, but as the loyal membership claimed these were branch activities, we decided to have the question adjudicated by law.

So far as the law was concerned our claim for an accounting of the theater receipts and disbursements was disposed of in the same way the sermon fund was decided.

Ladies' Auxiliary

Some little time before the division of the branch, Bishop Evans asked the Ladies' Auxiliary to lend him the money they then had on hand. This was done. The next day or two after the division at a regular meeting night the auxiliary voted to transfer their society to 35 Huron Street, to which place Evans had removed and where his church headquarters had been established. At this meeting there was an unusually large attendance, and the evidence showed that there was a prearranged plan, even to the extent of a series of resolutions drawn up and at least typewritten by "the bishop." These resolutions were passed by a large vote. But it appears that the women who did not stand always with Evans were not apprised of their plans, and the "slate" was rushed through with all the eclat of ward politics. One of the resolutions thus adopted provided that all remaining funds should be loaned to Bishop R. C. Evans. Thus this man came into possession of every dollar of the society's money, and he afterward stated that he had borrowed the money to get it into his hands and not because he needed it.

From testimony of defendants this money, as well as the building fund, went into the purchase of the church on Caar-Howell Street which is now the home of the Christian Brotherhood, Evans's church. Almost at the same time—between the light of one day and that of the next, all the property of the auxiliary consisting of sewing machines, dishes, etc., took wings over to 35 Huron Street, or at least were placed under the conserving eye of the master mind in the new movement.

The chief defense in regard to the auxiliary funds and property was that the society had never been a part of the general society, had always been independent, and had dispensed their charities and spent their money "as they jolly well pleased," using words of their barrister.

In disposing of this phase of the case Justice Masten's decision, concurred in by Justices Sutherland and Ferguson, is as follows:

"With respect to the moneys of the Ladies' Auxiliary Society, I think that the judgment now under review should be reversed, and the account asked for by the plaintiffs should be directed. The principle applicable to cases of this kind is very clearly stated by Lord Macnaghten in the case of General Assembly of Free Church of Scotland v. Lord Overtoun, (1904) A. D. 515, at page 630, where he says:

"But after all the question at issue is one of very ordinary description. It is alleged on the one hand and denied on the other that there has been a breach of trust in the disposition of property. The complaint is that the funds contributed and set apart for one purpose have been diverted to another and a different purpose. Such questions are of everyday occurrence, and the problem in each case must be solved by the ordinary commonplace inquiry, "What was the purpose for which the funds in dispute were collected? What was the original trust?"

"In regard to the application of this principle I find no difference between the law of clubs and the law of churches. No portion of the property of a club or voluntary association may be alienated by it except in the ordinary course of the administration of its affairs, and for purposes incidental to its objects without the consent of every member; Murray v. Johnstone (1896), 23 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 981. In that case it was resolved by a majority in general meeting of a curling club to present a cup which had been won by the club to the person who had acted as skipper of the rink at the contest when the cup was won, and it was held that the resolution was ultra vires. In the present case a consideration of all the evidence to which our attention was directed by counsel on either side leads me to the conclusion that the Ladies' Auxiliary Society was, as its name indicates, an auxiliary to the Toronto Branch of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and that the moneys collected by it from time to time were properly applicable only to purposes incidental to or connected with that church. The fact that on one occasion it gave certain moneys to the poor, and on another occasion the association made things for the Presbyterian Church does not in my opinion alter the conclusion that the purpose and object of the society was to act as an auxiliary to the church with which it was connected, and fails to demonstrate that its funds were not held in trust for the purposes incidental to or connected with that church. It may be quite true that within the sphere of the church or quasi church activities the Ladies' Auxiliary could dispense its funds as they saw fit, yet it seems to me that outside that sphere they were powerless to go. The mere fact that they applied them on one or two occasions to outside matters only indicated that in a somewhat loose organization this was done without objection. I think that the auxiliary was a branch of the church, that its funds were collected and usable only in connection with the objects associated with the church.

"For these reasons I would allow the appeal on this branch of the case, and direct a reference."

By recent letter from the barristers who represented the church in the Evans case we learn that the question of cost was argued upon application of the defense for a division thereof, and the decision of the court was that the defendants should be taxed all the costs of the litigation from the beginning down to and including the appeal hearing before the supreme court. By this decision the court justifies the bringing of the action.

New Manager Appointed

At a recent meeting of the Board of Publication, Brother Granville S. Trowbridge, of Saint Louis, was elected business manager of the Herald and Ensign Publishing Houses, which are soon to be amalgamated at Independence. Brother Trowbridge has accepted the position and will assume his new work on January 1.

For years Brother Trowbridge has been an active worker in the church. At Saint Louis, where he now lives, he has been a faithful officer of the branch and his work as president of the General Religio Society needs no comment. He is giving up a very fine position with the Cotton Belt Railway, where he is assistant traffic manager, and his acceptance of a church position evidences a consecration that promises well for success in his new work.

Brother Trowbridge has purchased a home on North Union Street, in Independence, and will move his family there soon after the first of the year. The work of consolidating the publishing houses, which has temporarily been held up pending the appointment of the new manager, will now be pushed forward, and will no doubt be consummated early in the spring.

File of Heralds Desired for British Mission

Brother T. W. Williams wishes to know what we can do about furnishing a file of THE SAINTS' HERALD for the church headquarters in Great Britain. We can furnish most of the copies for 1920, but special demands have cut into our extras at so many places it is difficult to get all the numbers.

We believe there are many Saints who have carefully kept all their HERALDS but who would be glad to part with them for such use. If they will write to us, we will endeavor to have the matter looked after and the headquarters at Saint Leonard's supplied. While bound copies would be preferable, we are sure they would gladly receive them just as they come.

Kindly let us know what you have, even though an occasional copy is missing. We might be able to secure the missing numbers. We would like to have the dates extend as far back as possible.

Former Manager and Stake President Goes East

John Smith has now sold all of his household furniture and library, closed his home in Lamoni, and left Wednesday, the 15th, for Fairhaven, Massachusetts, where he will reside with his daughter, Mrs. L. C. Bentley, for the winter.

Brother Smith's service in the church has been long and honorable. He moved to Lamoni with his wife, formerly Kate Blood, over twenty years ago. He came as business manager of the Herald Publishing House, but in a short time was called, in April, 1902, as president of the Lamoni Stake, which office he held until the conference of 1916.

We think it only just that we occasionally express our appreciation of our brethren while they are still living. Some years ago, we used to sing in the Sunday school,

"Surely the Captain may depend on me, Though but an armor bearer I may be."

John Smith has been one of those on whom his Captain could depend. His independence and his integrity have never been questioned.

Subjects Being Discussed

A School That Serves All the People

In writing his series of articles in The Country Gentleman on "Good country schools," A. B. Macdonald visited Pisgah, Iowa, where he says, "The farmers of Pisgah give their boys and girls a square deal." The superintendent is Charles B. Woodstock, formerly of Graceland College. Mr. Macdonald gives considerable space to the early settlement of the Pisgah Valley, out near the Missouri River, by Charles B. Thompson, who was among those leaving Nauvoo to go to Utah. Becoming dissatisfied with the religious teachings of the leaders, he decided not to continue west. Instead, he traveled northward some fifty miles and in 1853 settled his colony near what is now Pisgah, named after a high hill which they called Mount Pisgah. The colony did not survive, some of its members affiliating with the Reorganized Church, the rest dying or moving away.

But the school is the influence that drew him there and about which he wrote most commendably. Without reviewing the entire article, we may summarize by saying that in the development and maintenance of the community spirit whereby every person within reach is drawn to participate in its activities, the school has done what every school should do. The work is made interesting, the play is made recreational. An annual fair is held, at which the results of class work and individual effort are displayed. Altogether, the work done there ranks well with that of many other communities, with apparently much better resources to begin with.

A Long Life of Usefulness

In the recent attainment of Sister Abbie A. Horton, of Independence, of her eighty-fourth birthday, a notable example of what a long life may mean is exemplified.

Sister Horton has not only lived long, but she has lived well. Her list of activities in the church is a long one, and she is yet alert to all the developments in her community, keeping in touch with what others are doing, even though she is not able as formerly to enter actively into all of them.

We wish her continued extension of years and ability to imbibe the best from everything around her.

First Home of Man

It may be a surprise to our readers to learn that the center of Asia is considered by many scientists to be the first home of the human race. Yet it is one of the least explored portions of the world. The so-called primitive men have mostly been found in Europe, as the Neanderthal Man, the Heidelberg the Cro-Magnon, on the Continent, and several different skulls in England.

In 1891, Dubois, excavated in Java, and discovered a skull, two molar teeth, and a thigh bone. From this has been built up the theory that these remains somewhat widely scattered represented a prehuman animal.

An expedition is now arranged with headquarters in Peking, and will devote the first year to the studies in paleontology and zoology in China; the second year in Mongolia; the third and fourth and fifth years will carry its work into the various parts of Asia. Among the difficulties of the expedition will be found the value that the Chinese place on fossil remains, and hence opposition from them.

In addition is the great difficulty of the excursion into the heart of Asia, because of mountain ranges, treeless wastes, and the great cold during the winter. China was inhabited by the aboriginal tribes which have been pushed south and west by the Mongols and Manchus. Remnants of them still remain, some on the edge of the Himalayan Mountains and some in populous and rich parts of China. It is reported that the Lolos are of high intelligence, and have much Caucasian blood.

To Ascertain Results of Prohibition

The Intercollegiate News Service reports that early in 1921, under the direction of the professors of economics and sociology in various colleges and universities, college students will make a survey in their own communities to ascertain just what effect prohibition has had upon every line of industry, business, and investment, and just what the result has been in regard to crime, health, recreation, scholarship, home life, and social welfare. These facts will be carefully gathered and checked, sworn to before a notary, and given general publicity. The purpose is to answer the query from other lands as to the actual effect of prohibition.

As a matter of fact, a man's first duty is to mind his own business.—Lorimer.

The Buying of Lands

An editorial by Sister Estella Wight in Stepping Stones for December 7, 1920.

What about your Christmas offering? There has not been so much written or said about it this year as usual; but surely no one has for a moment forgotten it! Let's hope that while we have all been rather quiet about it, we have yet been working all the more diligently.

Some one asked the question the other day: "What are the Christmas offerings to be used for this year? What special work will my offering help this time?"

I wonder if you are asking that question, too! Of course we know well enough that it will be used for some good work, but the most of us are curious enough to like to know just what particular work our offerings are going to assist. I am sure you want to know, so I think it might be well to mention right here what the Bishop said it will be used for. He has said for the buying of lands and the establishing of Zion, and in this way helping those who could not otherwise obtain homes to have an opportunity to do so.

"Why that is for the same purpose the offerings were used last year," says some one. Yes, you see only a small beginning has been made thus far. In the future a very great deal of land should be purchased and made ready for the people to live upon. It is expected that there will be great need for it, and the reason is this:

You know the gospel is to go to many nations. It must be taken to people in many lands who have never yet had the opportunity of hearing its blessed tidings. Many of these people are in very distressing conditions. They realize what it means to live in very poor homes, and some know what it is to be without a home. Some of them have insufficient clothing, and many, oh, so many know what it means to go hungry day after day. When we take the message of the gospel to these people, we should be ready to give them more than the hope of happiness and comfort in the life to come. We should have places prepared where we can help them to live better and more comfortably right now in this life.

Sometimes when you read about the starving and distressing conditions of the people over in Poland and Armenia or others of those countries that have long been war ridden or oppressed, don't you feel as though you would just like to have lots of money so you could help them get to some good place where they could have plenty of food and clothes and an opportunity to earn a living, so they would never have to go hungry and cold again? And don't you often wish that you could gather together a lot of the children and bring them to this land where they could be better cared for and go to school as you go to school? I think we all feel that way about them many, many times, and yet how few of us are able to do very much in this way! I don't suppose there are many of us who could afford to bring one child over and see that it is cared for as it should be.

But though we may not be able to do as much as we would like, it is still a wonderful thing to have the opportunity of doing a little towards helping others, and many of us together may unite and accomplish far more than we are aware may be done.

Now the Bishop of the church understands a great deal about the needs of the people and what it will take to help care for those who shall some day flee from all parts of the world to Zion as their only place of refuge. We have been told in the revelations of God to his people that such a time is coming, and admonished to make ready for it. And the

MAKING CHRISTMAS FIREPROOF

We hope every person having to do with Christmas festivities will read this. Only last year we saw the hair of a small child set afire by the candle in the hands of another—and all around lay masses of cotton!

Too often the Christmas season, which should be an occasion of unmixed cheer, becomes a time of tragedy in many households because of death or serious injury by fire. The highly inflammable evergreen decorations or the cotton beard of a thinly disguised Santa Claus frequently ignite from a lighted candle or match and serious results ensue.

In a home in Brooklyn, New York, two or three years ago, a Christmas tree on a lower floor was left alight with candles while the members of the family were upstairs and the fire that followed, when the dry branches became ignited, caused the death of several persons besides destroying the house. This is but one instance that stands out among many. A list of authentic cases contain a number of such items as the following:

A mother was fatally burned while acting the part of Santa Claus for her little child.

A scholar was fatally burned, due to her clothes catching fire from a lighted candle on the school Christmas tree.

Children ignited the cotton decorations used to represent snow, around Christmas tree. Tree was consumed and fire spread throughout the first floor. Members of the family were seriously burned trying to extinguish the fire.

Lighted candle set fire to the Christmas tree. Tree blazed up, igniting woodwork of room.

Store was profusely decorated with evergreen boughs and festoons, which were thought to have ignited from defective electric light wiring. The inflammable decorations spread fire so rapidly and burned so fiercely that the department was unable to cope with it. Building and contents were a total loss, $212,154. Fire occurred at night. Had fire occurred during the daytime, a holocaust would probably have taken place.

It is hardly to be doubted that Christmas, 1920, will add many similar cases to this shocking, and totally unnecessary, list, although with a few precautions such fires can easily be avoided.

Safeguards

These precautions should be thoroughly understood in every home where the Christmas observance includes the erection and decoration of a tree. In the first place the tree should be set up securely so that it will not easily topple over, and it should be located several feet away from any heating or lighting fixture. Metal tinsel with flake asbestos and powdered mica make excellent materials for snow effects and will not burn. Cotton and paper, on the other hand, are highly dangerous and should not be countenanced. Needless to say, the tree should never be illuminated with candles. There is some danger from the widely sold colored electric light assemblies due to insufficient insulation and other causes, but the hazard is inconsequential beside that of the lighted candle.

Bishop, heeding this admonition, has begun the work of purchasing lands and the establishing of such places as are needed now and shall be needed for the care of others, and he has said that this year our offerings shall be used for this purpose.

Just one other thing I want to mention. Do you know there are Saints in want and in distress even now in Europe who are anxiously desiring and looking longingly forward to coming to this land? They have already heard and accepted the gospel message, but they are in distress and privation and want, and they are needing our help at this very moment.

If, then, we have been negligent of this duty during the year, let us make haste to earn our offerings at once, that we may have a part in helping in this great work.

Ornaments should be of metal and not of paper or pyroxylin plastic, which is commonly known as celluloid, pyralin, French ivory, and by other trade names. Pyroxylin plastic is extremely inflammable and will ignite at a comparatively low temperature.

On one recent occasion a woman in a New York apartment climbed upon a chair to light the candles on a large Christmas tree to entertain her little daughter and a neighbor's child. While reaching for a candle at the top of the tree, she accidentally touched the match to a colored paper chain, which blazed up and ignited other decorations. The woman tried to snatch some of the burning papers off the branches, but lost her balance and fell against the tree, pushing it over on the floor. When she regained her feet her dress was on fire and she ran screaming out into the hall of the apartment house, fanning the flames until she became a living torch. Aid came too late and she succumbed to the flames.

Toys involving the use of alcohol, gasoline, or kerosene should be avoided and low-priced electrical playthings should be viewed with suspicion since they often are insecurely wired and flimsily constructed. Such electrical apparatus may cause serious burns and fires by sparking or by becoming overheated.

In the South there is the additional hazard of firecrackers and fireworks as part of the Christmas celebration. These should be prohibited for private use and permitted, if at all, only in community displays under proper precautions.

If the call for Santa Claus is a crying need that will accept no substitute, the impersonator should avoid long cotton "whiskers" and should keep away from lights and open fires. As an additional safeguard, the costume used may be partially fireproofed with the following solution: Two ounces of carbonate of soda, two ounces of ammonia carbonate, two ounces of boric acid, and five gallons of water. The mixture should be allowed to come to a boil and should then be strained and sprayed upon the material to be protected. If Santa's clothing or that of anyone else does catch fire, the victim should be rolled in a rug or woolen cloth and the flames smothered as promptly as possible. The flames should be kept from the face.

In order to prevent the spread of any fires that may start, a bucket or two of water and a fire extinguisher should be kept ready at hand.

Another important safeguard is to remove all evergreens immediately after Christmas before they become completely dried out.

Public Entertainments

Where Christmas trees are displayed in schools and churches or other public places, the danger to life is naturally much greater than in the home, owing to the larger number of persons present and to the likelihood of panic.

All the precautions that have been mentioned for the home should be strictly observed at all public celebrations and, in addition, thought should be given to the matter of clear and adequate exits in case of fire. The hall or room selected for the occasion should be upon the ground floor and should be ample to accommodate the expected audience without crowding.

WHAT COOPERATION HAS DONE FOR DENMARK

Just read this quotation over—read it over twice.

And then think.

Then read our comments.

"Denmark is about one fourth the size of Wisconsin. Much of it was formerly a bleak waste of sand dune. Only the eastern part of the country and the neighboring islands were considered fit for agriculture. In addition to its poverty in natural resources, the country was further impoverished by the Napoleonic wars in the early part of the nineteenth century. In the second half of the nineteenth century Schleswig-Holstein was taken by the Germans. Practically all of its commerce was gone. The peasant farmers were in a most pitiful condition. Yet to-day, less than a century later, this same Denmark is, in proportion to its population, the wealthiest country in Europe."

"Denmark is essentially an agricultural country. It has an area of about 10,000,000 acres. More than $90,000,000 worth of butter, eggs, and meats are exported by the farmers of Denmark annually. In 1906 the Danes had $208,000,000 in savings banks. Eighty-nine families out of every hundred own their own farms and houses. This small amount of tenancy is due to the fact that landholdings can be easily acquired."

Not the biggest, blackest type could add a particle to the astonishing facts above stated! Think them over. Poor land! Desolation by war! Robbery of the best lands by a stronger power! General poverty!

And now such general comfort, such immense aggregate wealth, such splendid conditions! And all this attained by what?

War? Conquest? Trading? Manufacturing? None of these. By farming on those bleak sand dunes and the rest of the lands, mostly originally poor!

The secret! It is on the surface. Landholdings are easily obtained." That is the first essential to general prosperity.

Second, cooperation. The farmers of Denmark are the most thoroughly organized in the world. They buy, sell, study, market, slaughter their stock, and pack their meats cooperatively.

And their milk is handled by cooperative creameries and cheese factories.

Land easily obtained for actual workers of land and universal cooperation—think what these things would do for any American state—absolutely any state you may mention!—as compared with Denmark.

The above astounding quotation is not from any Looking Backward or Progress and Poverty—it is from the report of the Wisconsin State Board of Public Affairs and is based on an official study made in Denmark by a state official.—Des Moines News, December 11, 1920.

NUMBER OF COLLEGE STUDENTS INCREASING

There has been an increase in the number of college students from 187,000 in 1914, to 294,000 in 1920, says The Literary Digest. The largest university to-day is that of California, with nearly 12,000 registered; next, Columbia University with over 9,000, and the University of New York with also over 9,000.

The latter shows the largest increase of any college in the country, 6,767, in six years. The University of California shows the second largest gain, 6,213. Twenty-eight institutions have more than doubled their enrollment. Boston University shows a 333 per cent gain; the College of the City of New York, 293 per cent. This raises directly the question how this problem shall be met this coming year, and how it shall be met ten years from now. If we are to adequately meet it in 1930 some steps must be taken now. As we recall, Doctor P. P. Claxton suggests the junior college as a method of meeting this problem and securing adequate instruction in the freshmen and sophomore years.

REASONS FOR ABOLITION OF THE INDIAN BUREAU

The annual convention of the Society of American Indians adopted the following resolutions in favor of the abolition of the Indian Bureau.

Whereas, a calm, dispassionate, unbiased, and nonpartisan survey of actual conditions existing on Indian reservations—conditions brought about by past and present governmental policies and administration—results in disclosures and revelations of a most shocking nature, full of pathos and sad tragedy, injustice, and inhumanity.

And, whereas, there appears to be the utmost determination in the institution and branch of the United States Government known as the Indian Office, consisting of 7,000 employees responsible for the abject and pitiable conditions of the Indians, to continue and perpetuate itself, ostensibly for the betterment of the deplorable Indian situation, but in reality in effect to the utter degeneracy and final extinction of a noble race of people.

And, whereas, it being the solemn conviction of the assembled members of the Society of American Indians and their devoted friends that the further continuation of the Indian Office spells for the Indians of America misery, misrule, and cruel oppression.

Therefore, be it resolved, That the utter and complete abolishment of the Indian Office be immediately urged upon the members of the American Congress, to the end that the Indians be placed under the laws of their respective States and be thereby given the opportunity to follow their peaceful pursuits, unhampered and unrestricted by a most malignant and un-American system of supervision, known as the Indian Bureau.

A Folkestone correspondent of the London Times writes: "Shortly after 9 o'clock this evening a beautiful sight was witnessed at Folkestone by the thousands of people who were promenading on the Leas. The atmosphere was very clear, and the cliffs of France were plainly visible. They gradually, however, changed from their usual whiteness to a flaming red. This continued for about five minutes, and as the ruddiness of the cliffs died down the sky right across the Channel to the southwest became illuminated with all colors of the rainbow, while in one particular spot there was a circle resembling a huge fiery ball. Then these colors faded away, and gave place to dark clouds.

"The cause of the phenomenon was no doubt the refraction of sunset colors through high clouds consisting of ice particles."

The Dearborn Independent attempts to show that the present rail transportation difficulty is not because of a shortage of rolling stock, but rather the methods of operation. It states that the percentage of locomotives fit for service at the end of Government operation was greater than it was at the same time in 1916, and the percentage of cars in repair and fit for service was likewise greater March 1, 1920, than it was four years ago. Under unified operation in 1918, with substantially the same equipment, the Railroad Administration freight tonnage was 403 billion, against 277 billion tons in 1915, under private operation. The difficulty is, cars held too long; cars insufficiently packed; and that under private ownership cars are not shipped to the section where they are really needed, east and west, north and south. The more unified use of equipment similar to the use of Pullman cars is greatly needed.

PASTORAL

Quorum Organization

By E. K. Evans

Read at a session of the Southern Michigan and Northern Indiana Quorum of Elders.

It is the word of the Lord to us that there is no space in which there is no organization.

Of course none of us can comprehend the vastness of space; therefore we cannot comprehend the thought of universal organization. But in this comparatively little world and the still smaller comprehension we have of even it, look where we will and we see organization. I have seen the life that exists in a drop of water. The drop of water is as a world to the creatures that live in it. Each one of these little creatures is an organization in itself—apparently possessed with a knowledge necessary to its existence. A speck in the water, invisible to the eye seems to be the food supply for this little world, and it is interesting to see the little creatures running to and from it, apparently eating what they need and then away for exercise, enjoying themselves as we do in our sphere.

From these we can let our minds run through the thousands upon thousands of different forms of organization on earth, then look above us and view the myriads of worlds, each one in itself an organization, they in turn being organized into groups and these groups being organized into combinations of groups, and it may be correct to say that this goes on ad infinitum.

The human being himself is an organization. Large numbers of them in turn are organized according to their common interests into nations. These nations are suborganized, as for instance our own country, into States, counties, and townships, and the whole made up of still smaller organizations known as families.

Organization Must Function

In this age the great Creator of this great universe has established his organization—his kingdom—upon earth, the purpose of which is to develop the human being to the highest degree of perfection intellectually, spiritually, and physically, with the intention that this organization shall continue forever.

With commendable pride we tell the world of our organization as a church, and of its superiority over all other church organizations. We invite all mankind to participate in the benefits of this wonderful organization by becoming identified with it in membership.

It is not enough, however, to be able to say with the mouth that we have apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, teachers, and deacons. We must have them not in word only, but in fact, or we are not superior to other church organizations. To say we have a prophet is nothing. To be of use he must function as a prophet. By this I do not mean that he must merely tell future events. That is only one small part of his work. He must be an inspired man—inspired every day—that he may direct, guide, lead. But that is not all. Be he ever so wonderfully able to foretell the future, to direct, guide, and lead, we still are no better off than other church organizations if we refuse to be directed, guided, and led by him. And so it is in regard to the fact that we have apostles. They must function as such and we must accept the work they do for us.

We should remember when we tell the world of our church organization, that we not only tell them of the fact that we have apostles and prophets, but we tell them also that we have pastors. It may be more startling to say we have apostles and prophets, but it is every whit as essential to have pastors, that the church organization may be perfect and according to the Scriptures. But have we pastors? You may answer, "Yes, the presiding elder of a branch is the pastor." You may think of the high priest and the elder as being essentially pastors. Personally, I go a little further. I think of the priest, teacher, and deacon as pastors—that is, they all help the pastor do pastoral work, each one in his own department according to his calling. But again occurs the same thought that we have explained in regard to the apostle and prophet. If the pastoral work of the church in a large measure rests upon us as elders, we must function as pastors, or after all, the church really has no pastors. We must learn how to function as pastors, and then do it. To do it, however, we must make the members feel that we are their pastors. We must make them feel that they, more than we, suffer loss if they fail to receive our services as pastors. If they fail in this, wherein are they benefited by our church organization more than they who have no such church organization.

It is well that the deacon sees that there is a place to meet in—clean and comfortable. It is well that the teacher sees that they meet; but no matter how well these two officers have done their work, that is only preliminary, and it all fails of its purpose if the elder then fails to do his part. What good is accomplished if the deacon provides a proper place of meeting and the teacher succeeds in getting the Saints to come to it, if when they get there the pastor fails them?

Elders Quorums

And this brings us back to the subject of organization. The Lord has directed that we elders be organized into quorums that we may sit in council together to learn our duties and to qualify to function effectually in our calling.

In Doctrine and Covenants 104:41 we read: "Again, the duty of the president over the office of elders is to preside over ninety-six elders, and to sit in council with them, and to teach them according to the covenants. This presidency is a distinct one from that of the seventy, and is designed for those who do not travel into all the world."

That means, of course, those who stay at home to do work in local organizations. To that end we are organized into a quorum as a part of the great organization of the kingdom of heaven.

When it says the president is to preside over ninety-six elders and teach them, I in a measure sense the responsibility you have placed upon me. I did not think of that word teach when you selected me. Probably you did not either. But, nevertheless, the selection has placed us in that relationship to each other. I emphasize the thought that I am to teach, not through vainglory, nor because I think I am especially qualified, but to impress you with the thought that if I must function in that capacity, it also places a responsibility upon you—that is, that you learn—for no one can teach except there be some one to learn. And may I say here that in this matter of teaching and learning, I desire most sincerely that you all be teachers in this quorum that I may learn as well as teach.

Special Responsibility of Local Elders

Perhaps we do not properly comprehend our responsibilities as local elders. We have difficulties that no others have. The traveling elder comes to our branch. He has been preaching several nights a week and in the daytime he has been studying or visiting or thinking of the work. If his congregation fails him, or if he in personal conduct, appearance, or preaching does not do the church justice, he moves on and in a short time it becomes an incident of the past. But we as elders must stand correctly before the Saints and the world week after week, month after month, and perhaps year after year. In the interest of the great kingdom of heaven we must not fail. Our daily labor may hinder us from study, from contemplation; we may be besmeared with oil, or lime, or coal, or dust, or ink, and be very unministerial-like in our appearance, but when we come to minister in spiritual things we must be clothed as well as our means should properly permit; we should be clean in body and in garment; we should be as choice in our language as our knowledge of language will permit, and we should be ever learning to improve it; we should keep informed of the events of the day throughout the world; we should search the Scriptures daily and pray much and earnestly that we may intelligently and with proper dignity represent the church. We must respect ourselves and our calling if we would have our branches do likewise. But we cannot respect ourselves, neither can they, if our general bearing and conversation calls for disrespect. We cannot respect our calling if we do not magnify it—not simply by the number of times we preach, or administer, or baptize, but by the quality of our preaching, the sincerity, the earnestness, and the faith we put into our administrations, and the understanding, determination, humility, and faith that we have put into the hearts and minds of those we baptize.

We must learn how to conduct ourselves in the pulpit, at the baptism, at the confirmation, at the sacrament service, at the wedding ceremony, at the funeral, as the guests in any home that we may be required to enter, at any kind of a public function. We must learn not only to talk intelligently on gospel subjects but upon any other topic that may be of interest to anyone with whom we may converse. By this I do not mean that we can become leaders of thought on all subjects, but we can become intelligent men on so many subjects that intelligent men will recognize us as such. We must know the things that other men know if we would expect them to believe that we know something that they do not know. If we are rated as ignorant among men they are likely to give little heed to what we say on gospel topics.

Let us as elders equip ourselves to minister according to our calling as effectually as we expect the apostle or prophet to minister according to his calling.

Preaching and Practicing

According to a story, a fountain pen salesman made his way to a prosperous country store. For an hour he talked to the merchant upon the necessity of displaying fountain pens in the showcase. "Everybody, nowadays, writes with a fountain pen," he insisted. Finally, the serious-minded merchant was convinced that he could no longer keep store without fountain pens, and he told the salesman he would take a hundred dollars' worth. The salesman began to write the order, but the merchant arose, and, as he turned away, said: "No use to write it down—I've decided that I don't want fountain pens." When the salesman had departed, a clerk asked the merchant why he had changed his mind about the order. "Because," was the reply, "he took an hour of my time telling me that everybody uses fountain pens, and that nobody writes with a pencil anymore, and then he began writing down my order with a pencil!"

It is presumed that the salesman's pencil had a point—and likewise has the story.—Christian Standard.

HYMNS AND POEMS

Jesus Who Died on Calvary

By Lucy Davis

In a manger cradle 'mid the hay,
 In peaceful sleep the Christ Child lay;
 The mother gazed on her child the while,
 Her face alight with a heavenly smile.
 She little thought of the future when
 He would be tortured by fellow men.
 She thought not of the time when he
 Would bear the cross to Calvary,
 A crown of thorns causing blood to rest
 On the brow of him she loved the best.
 She never dreamed would those hands and feet,
 She looked upon and thought so sweet,
 Be pierced by nails so cruel, sharp,
 That drops of blood from each pore would start,
 From pain and anguish and misery,
 Upon the cross of Calvary.

And when for water he would plead,
 The bitter gall upon a reed
 Would be held aloft for him to drink.
 Oh, no, I'm sure she did not think
 Of all her tortured son would see
 Before his death on Calvary.

Once again, 'twas Easter Day;
 They asked who'd roll the stone away
 From th' tomb of him they came to see—
 Jesus who died on Calvary.
 Can you imagine the startling sight,
 As she saw an angel dressed in white?
 When they asked for the Lord, the angel said,
 "Why seek ye the living among the dead?
 For the Lord has risen. You'll surely see Jesus again in Galilee."

Can you imagine the mother when
 Her crucified son she saw again,
 Living and happy as he could be—
 Jesus who died on Calvary?

Best of the wonderful things is when Jesus to heaven did ascend,
 Bidding the ones he most did love
 To wait for blessing from above,
 The Holy Ghost and tongues of fire
 To hearts and minds alike inspire,
 To speak the words that make men free,
 Of Jesus who died on Calvary.

Happiness

By Sarah Barney

Happiness is not mere pleasure nor is it found
 Where questionable joys of life abound.
 No selfish thought or deed can bring to us
 The calm and quiet we desire. No, 'tis not thus
 We gain that pearl—the pearl of greatest price
 For which we strive, and naught else can suffice.
 For those who seek the bluebird, known to fame
 As typical of happiness, must try to gain,

The Ten Lost Tribes—Where Are They?—Part 1

By S. K. Sorensen

This writer believes we are the victims of some wrong traditions and misinterpretations of the scriptures regarding this subject.

The above question is one which has been the subject of much controversy and of more or less speculation not only in the church, but also outside. It has for some reason or other become traditional among Latter Day Saints that the ten (so-called) lost tribes are hidden behind the icy mountains at the North Pole, which tradition is based upon Doctrine and Covenants 108: 6.

Whether such tradition is based upon facts and the true interpretation of the above named section, I shall leave for the reader himself to decide. Personally I do not believe, however, that we are warranted in making such a conclusion.

The section referred to reads as follows:

"And they who are in the north countries shall come in remembrance before the Lord, and their prophets shall hear his voice, and shall no longer stay themselves, and they shall smite the rocks, and the ice shall flow down at their presence. And an highway shall be cast up in the midst of the great deep. Their enemies shall become a prey unto them, and in the barren deserts there shall come forth pools of living water; and the parched ground shall no longer be a thirsty land. And they shall bring forth their rich treasures unto the children of Ephraim my servants. And the boundaries of the everlasting hills shall tremble at their presence. And then shall they fall down and be crowned with glory, even in Zion, by the hands of the servants of the Lord, even the children of Ephraim; and they shall be filled with songs of everlasting joy. Behold this is the blessing of the everlasting God upon the tribes of Israel, and the richer blessing upon the head of Ephraim and his fellows. And they also of the tribe of Judah after their pain, shall be sanctified in holiness before the Lord to dwell in his presence day and night forever and ever."

Certain queries arise in the mind of the writer as he is penning these lines.

1. North countries, in the plural, are spoken of. Where are they?

2. Their prophets shall no longer stay themselves. That is, stay inactive, but will move forward at the Lord's command. The prophets of Israel failed to do this. (See Jeremiah 23: 9-17; 5: 30; Ezekiel 13, and many other places.)

3. The ice shall flow down at their presence. Where and how?

4. An highway shall be cast up in the midst of the great

True happiness is joy and not a fleeting pleasure.
 As mete ye to your fellows, so also is your measure.

deep. What constitutes an highway upon the ocean, and how is it traversed?

5. Their enemies shall become a prey unto them. If hidden behind the icy mountains, isolated from the world, who could be their enemies?

6. In the barren deserts shall come forth pools of living water. How shall these pools be brought into existence?

7. The parched ground shall no longer be a thirsty land. How is it to be watered?

8. Rich treasures to be brought to the children of Ephraim. What constitutes those treasures?

9. The boundaries of the everlasting hills shall tremble. What are those boundaries and what constitutes the trembling?

10. Then shall they (those from the north countries) fall down (how?) and be crowned with glory by the hands of the servants of the Lord. Of what does this crowning consist?

11. They shall be filled with songs of everlasting joy. What is the cause of their joy?

12. This is the blessing of the everlasting God upon the tribes of Israel. How many tribes and what is their blessing?

13. They also who are of the tribe of Judah, after their pain, shall be sanctified in holiness before the Lord. How is this sanctification and holiness to be brought about?

In order to treat this subject with at least some degree of certainty it becomes necessary to employ two factors in our research: namely, that which relates to prophecy, and that which is historical, and with these two bases to draw upon for our supply of information relative to the whole house of Israel we may not be entirely left in the dark as to where the ten tribes are, and yet so far as tribal existence and organization is concerned they are lost, as they have none; not so with the tribes of Judah and Benjamin whose racial and national distinction is not obliterated.

In laying down those two basic factors—prophecy and history—as the foundation of our research, we assume to have absolute confidence in their trustworthiness or reliability; if they are not reliable, we would as a result be reasoning upon false premises and hence our deductions would be faulty.

The one thing that must constantly be borne in mind and not lost sight of is God's purpose and object in selecting Israel as his covenant people. The Lord in pronouncing his blessing upon Abraham, says: "That in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand upon the seashore; and thy seed shall possess the gates of his enemies; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed."—Genesis 22: 17, 18.

And to Jacob he said: "And thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth, and thou shalt spread abroad to the west and to the east and to the north and to the south: and in thee and thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed."—Genesis 28: 14.

Is it possible that the Lord could have referred to only the two tribes of Israel and not to the whole house of Israel in pronouncing this blessing upon the descendants of Abraham and Jacob? God certainly foreknew if he intended at some future period to remove the great majority of Israel, known as the ten tribes, into isolation behind the icy barrier at the North Pole, isolated from the association of the rest of mankind.

If God so intended, his promise to Abraham, to scatter them "to the east and the west and the north and the south," was not fulfilled in the ten tribes.

If God intended that all the families of the earth should be blessed through Israel the removal of the ten tribes from among the families of earth would make that an impossibility, so far as they were concerned, and yet they with the other two tribes were equally entitled to the fulfillment of the promises of the Lord. There is not even a hint in the Scriptures that they were not.

In order that they might be a blessing it would be necessary that they be among the people and associated with them and not removed from them by impenetrable icy barriers, which all the efforts and skill of man has failed to penetrate; but to prove that this was not the intention of the Lord, and that he had not forgotten his promises to Israel of a scattering among the nations to whom they should be a blessing, the Lord speaks through the Prophet Jeremiah:

"Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will sow the house of Israel and the house of Judah [both of them] with the seed of man, and with the seed of beast."—Jeremiah 31: 27.

What for? To fulfill his promises made to Abraham and Jacob to scatter them and to become the instrument in the Lord's hand for blessing the Gentiles. Jeremiah is specific in his mention of both the house of Israel and the house of Judah so as to leave no room for doubt as to where the house of Israel, the ten tribes, are. And Ezekiel confirms this by the word of the Lord saying: "My sheep wandered through all the mountains, and upon every high hill [kingdoms and governments]: yea my flock was scattered upon all the face of the earth, and none did seek after them."—Ezekiel 34: 6.

In speaking of Ephraim, one of the ten tribes, Hosea says: "Ephraim, he hath mixed himself among the people." (Hosea 7: 8.)

In speaking of Israel he says: "Israel is swallowed up: now shall they be among the Gentiles as a vessel wherein is no pleasure."—Hosea 8: 8.

The definition of swallow is to absorb, to engulf. Thus Israel had been absorbed by the Gentile nations among whom they were scattered and was entirely engulfed by them, so that, as far as their identity and national organization was concerned it was lost sight of. But, while of necessity this absorbing process and amalgamation of Israel with other races must take place in order for the Lord's designs and purposes to be fulfilled, yet he would not forget Israel, for as he says by the Prophet Amos:

"For, lo, I will command and I will sift the house of Israel among all nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth."—Amos 9: 9.

This language was spoken while yet the ten tribes, referred to as the kingdom of Israel, were in their own land prior to their captivity, showing that the ten tribes known as the house of Israel, were to be scattered among all nations that the leaven of the knowledge of the true God might be disseminated among all people and the word of the Lord as delivered by their prophets should no longer stay themselves within the confines and boundaries of one small locality but become the Lord's chosen messengers and witnesses of his wonderful works among the children of men; as he had led them from the first, so he led them again.

While the Bible abounds with evidences concerning the scattering of both the house of Israel and the house of Judah among all nations, without even once referring to the North Pole and its vicinity, yet the testimony would not be complete without introducing a second witness—the Book of Mormon.

Nephi, the son of Lehi, says:

"For it appears that the house of Israel, sooner or later, will be scattered upon all the face of the earth, and also among all nations, and behold there are many who are already lost from the knowledge of those who are at Jerusalem. Yea the more part [ten] of all the tribes have been led away; and they [the ten tribes] are scattered to and fro upon the isles of the sea [not at the North Pole]; and whither they are, none of us knoweth, save we know that they have been led away."—1 Nephi 7: 6-10.

In addition to the above and to confirm the testimony of Nephi let Mormon speak:

"Yea, and surely shall he again bring a remnant of the seed of Joseph to the knowledge of the Lord their God; and as surely as the Lord liveth will he gather in from the four quarters of the earth all the remnant of the seed of Jacob, who are scattered abroad upon all the face of the earth."—3 Nephi 2: 106, 107.

Not one word about the North Pole or any particular locality, but, "scattered on all the face of the earth"; if it were not so the promises to Abraham and Jacob that their seed should be scattered among all nations and to be a blessing to all people, would fail.

Moses in pronouncing the blessings of the Lord upon the twelve tribes, before his death, points out to them all lines of usefulness and activity and in particular upon Joseph whose sons Ephraim and Manasseh represented him among the tribes of Israel. Both of those tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh, were among the ten tribes and included in what was known the kingdom of Israel after its division. Joseph through his blessing was promised this American Continent as his inheritance, but it was through the descendants of Manasseh and not through Ephraim that it was obtained; as we have already noticed "Ephraim had mixed himself among the people."

The ten tribes are lost, that is, we cannot trace their descendants nor their national characteristics; they have mixed themselves among the nations. Not so with the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, known as the kingdom of Judah, or what are known among us as the Jews. Their racial characteristics are not changed; they have not mixed with other people; statistics prove their number in the world and their whereabouts are known.

Furthermore, the Lord had promised Abraham that his seed "shall possess the gate of his enemies." Has that been fulfilled in the two tribes, the Jews? If not it must be fulfilled in the other tribes of Israel, who we say are lost.

But if they are led away beyond the polar regions, where they would have no enemies, away from civilization, away from the rest of mankind with no one to contest their right of possession, then, what becomes of the promise "to possess the gate of their enemies"? The word gate may be somewhat ambiguous. Various constructions may be placed upon it, depending upon what one aims to prove by it. But I believe that a general term may be safely applied to it, as referring to an entrance or a passageway. Whatever that term may signify does not matter so much, as the significance that it is to be in the hands of Israel, in his grasp, in his power, and that his enemies through this means are at his mercy.

The fact is also held out by this prophecy that Israel would have enemies, those who would seek to do them harm. This fact has been so fully demonstrated from the pages of history, how they were led away captive at different times, and placed in their enemies' land, that it is useless to refer to it here.

The scattering of Israel, the ten tribes, to all parts of the world, instead of to one isolated spot in the polar region, is the main point at issue. The advocates of this theory largely base their theory upon Doctrine and Covenants 108: 6 and other isolated passages, without stopping to consider the multiplicity of evidences against that theory, nor even to weigh and consider the section itself in the light of other scripture and history dealing with the subject.

One of the principal strongholds to support this apparent miraculous reappearance of the ten tribes, I believe, is Isaiah 11: 15, 16.

The prophet had been speaking of the gathering of Israel and the setting up of an ensign and the cutting off of the adversaries of Judah, the Jews, and the reconciliation of Ephraim (Israel) and Judah, and then says:

"And the Lord shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian sea; and with his mighty wind shall he shake his hand over the river, and shall smite it in the seven streams, and men go over dry-shod. And there shall be a highway for the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria; like as it was to Israel in the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt. . . . And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea."

It is apparent from the foregoing that from all the countries named from whence Israel shall be gathered, that the North Pole is left out; and that if the Lord is going to perform a miracle in delivering his people in staying the streams, this is to be done to the river of Egypt instead of the Atlantic Ocean or any other ocean over which the people shall come from the north countries to Zion. But it appears somewhat incredible that it would be necessary in the last days to perform such a miracle, as to stay the stream in the river of Egypt, with all the modern equipments and facilities for transportation, in crossing not only small streams but mighty oceans. However, if that is the true rendition of this passage and the Lord designs so to do, modern equipments might be dispensed with and we accept the statement at face value.

The prophecies, thus, show that Israel will be scattered into all the world, from whence they will again be gathered in the last days.

It is reported that the census figures show an increase of Japanese population in California of over 28,840. The Board of Control had published before the election an estimate of 45,923. This is apparently excessive. Also error was made in estimating the percentage of land held by the Japanese by comparing all holdings by them with the irrigated land only of California.

Reports from all over the United States appear to indicate a much improved situation with relation to the shortage of teachers. In fact, several prominent educators have expressed themselves as satisfied that the grave problem which existed at the close of the war is fast on the way to a satisfactory solution. The widespread salary-raising movement and the awakening of the people to a larger interest in educational matters have been important factors in improving the teachers' situation. In Texas, especial efforts for the welfare of the teachers have been made, and a thousand school districts have taken steps to erect for them homes which shall be not only well appointed and comfortable, but also have adequate land for small gardens. Movements of this character are certain to be an important aid in the efforts to induce qualified young men and women to enter the teaching profession—Christian Science Monitor.

The harvest in England this year has been a great surprise to those accustomed to the leisurely ways of the past. Fields of barley standing at noon have been cut, tied, and stacked by 6 p. m. On one farm in South Lincolnshire a field of barley was actually cut, tied, stacked, threshed, and hauled twenty miles to Boston, England, where it was sold within thirty-eight hours after it had been growing in the field. It is the introduction of modern machinery which has made this possible.

OUR PUBLICATIONS

AT THE FRONT

THE CALL AT EVENING

We are glad to announce that another excellent church book has been placed on the market. While we have some excellent books already, we have all too few even yet. So the issuance of books of this type is a distinct service to the church.

Every good book will be more popular with one class of readers than another, but this new one by Sister Jessie Ward, republished from its serial form in Autumn Leaves, has perhaps as general appeal among adults as any book on our list of church fiction. Comparisons may not be permissible, but we may safely say that this book is ranked very high in the estimation of some of our best-known literary people.

The business department have for some time contemplated the publication of a number of other books, but the facts are that our needs are developing faster than our productive capacity. We hope that the resultant benefits of the consolidation of the printing business of the church may allow such expansion at an early date as will supply us with all the books and other literature for which there is a consistent demand.

The price of The Call at Evening is $1.50, postpaid.

JIMMY UMPHREY

This is an excellent little book recently issued by the Herald Office as one of the birth offering series. It is by Marcella Schenck, who not only understands children, but knows the appeal that will reach their hearts. The style is simple and effective, and the tone of the book very wholesome. It sells for 85 cents.

AUTUMN LEAVES FOR DECEMBER

The editor says of Autumn Leaves: "Practically all our material used last year was from those who had written especially for our pages, putting into their work the spirit that distinguishes the true followers of the lowly Nazarene. They knew, and we knew, that there are more skillful writers, but money cannot buy the thing we want and are getting, and the number of those who help themselves by service to the church in its literary work is increasing."

The current number begins interestingly and continues so to the end.

Apostle T. W. Williams writes entertainingly of "My impressions of London," saying: "It is impossible for a stranger to get lost in London. One always is lost here." It is well illustrated.

"Suppose a Bethlehem shepherd should come back," is the title Lois Beryl Aldridge has chosen to develop the Christmas theme, which is done effectively.

"Burden bearers," is the first of a series of short, illustrated articles, each with an illustration. In this issue, Brother H. Arthur Koehler tells of the heavy loads carried by the women of Palestine.

"The Word of Wisdom from a chef's viewpoint," is the title of a comprehensive article by Elmer A. Kaler, one of the young men of the church who specializes in the work of a chef and whose observations cause one to think twice.

"Lucinda's rebellion" is the title of a Christmas story by the editor. It is the story of a girl with visions of a career, but who enters Graceland College as a means to that end. It will strike a responsive chord in the hearts of those who know or are interested in Graceland.

"Vocational guidance for girls," is the title of a book which is reviewed for the good thoughts it contains.

"Hoagath, son of Jacob," continues, with much dramatic and historic interest.

The official departments, The Parthenon, Religio Department, the Sunday School Department, all contain invaluable material for all ages and inclinations, but especially for those who would keep in touch with the latest developments in the various departments of the church. One point is typi-

OPENING UP THE WORK AT QUEBEC

By appointment of the First Presidency I came east to make an effort to open up the work in the new fields of Quebec. Arriving at Ottawa, Ontario, which is separated from Quebec by the Ottawa River, I joined Elder P. Pement; and later our two young missionaries, Guy P. Levitt and A. C. Martin came to our assistance. We through the good graces of the Presiding Bishopric, purchased a former Anglican church building on the corner of Main Street and Echo Drive, which bears number 115 Echo Drive, Ottawa, Ontario. Here we have established our eastern headquarters and began a series of street preaching where, through the summer evenings, we went forth and proclaimed, in turn, the restored gospel of Christ. The Utah Mormons working hard for a foothold in that city accepted the challenge offered by Brother Pement to a twelve nights' discussion. We sent for Brother J. F. Curtis who is well skilled in how to meet that issue and at the close of the debate the audience gave Brother Curtis a lovely bouquet and a splendid address, while to Neph Jensen, our opponent, they gave looks of mingled pity and contempt as he hurried out rather than listen to the reading of the address.

When street meetings could no longer be conveniently carried on we sent Brother Martin to New Liskeard, where he is doing a splendid work, while Brother Levitt, who later was joined by his wife and son, is living in the church parlors and hustling the work to the satisfaction of all favorably interested therein.

Brother Daniel Nichol, of Ottawa, who is an indefatigable worker for the cause he loves, introduced us to a Mr. La Roque of French extraction who was very interested in our work and who is a brother-in-law of Mr. Phillion, of Cornwall, Ontario. He is an operator on the Ottawa and New York Railroad, and having come out from the Roman Catholics to unite with the Presbyterians had become as badly disappointed with his new faith as a man could possibly be, and was now looking for more light. He wanted to learn our gospel story. Accordingly Mr. La Roque took Brother Pement and myself to Cornwall where we had the pleasure of telling the gospel to Mr. and Mrs. Phillion, who received us and our message most gladly and who with a Mrs. Sayan, in her eightieth year, whose language is French only, were baptized by Brother Pement. And while the writer can understand little that this old sister says in prayer and testimony, yet the Spirit of God bears witness of the integrity of her soul and a more devout Latter Day Saint I have never met. Her works testify where her heart is.

Brother Pement who is at home with the French tongue does the interpreting for me while the good old sister tells me of her joy in the gospel. Brother and Sister Phillion are fluent with the English as well as the French language, and their souls are filled with joy unspeakable. Later Brother Pement and Brother and Sister Phillion went to Ottawa where they visited the home of Mr. La Roque, and Brother Pement baptized him and wife. They too are earnest workers.

While Brother Pement was in Ottawa attending to the baptisms, the writer baptized four in Cornwall, three being heads of families, a Mr. Mullen, a returned soldier of long service, and Mr. and Mrs. Frank Hillman and daughter. These are all earnest workers; in fact it is our purpose to take none into the fold whom we have not good reason to believe are thoroughly converted and anxious to work for the advancement of the cause; thus the work will not soon be shaken when Satan assails it.

During all this time the writer has been making his home with Doctor and Mrs. Weaver who are Latter Day Saints of the through-and-through type, he having been baptized in Toronto about eight years ago, while Sister Weaver is well known to many of the church members as Hazel Hathaway, whose enchanting vocal solos helped very greatly to swell the theater meetings in Toronto when they were in their prime. Having resided in this town for the past eight years as a young married couple who had no church affiliation of their own persuasion, they attended the Knox Presbyterian where they took deep interest in choir work. The doctor has been master of the choir for some years, singing the leading tenor. None were or are to-day held in higher esteem than Brother and Sister Weaver, but popularity was not what they were seeking, and accordingly when we came with the favorite theme of their hearts, at once their home was thrown open and we invited to be their guests. He procured a theater for services with the promise by the proprietors that we could have it all winter, but at the end of four weeks we were notified that we could no longer occupy, as certain religious leaders were threatening to boycott their week-day shows if they allowed us to preach in the building on Sunday.

Doctor and Sister Weaver, who have been for years giving musical concerts in this and other towns have supplied our music, which helped wonderfully to swell our audiences.

Before Brother Phillion's baptism the Lord made known to the writer that as soon as he was baptized he should be ordained to the office of elder, but he modestly declined the honors and responsibility until he received an evidence direct from the Lord. However, while in Ottawa the Lord spoke through Elder Levitt and called Brother Phillion to the eldership, and he receiving the desired evidence manifested his willingness to accept ordination. Accordingly a number of the Saints came down from Ottawa, and on November 21 we organized the Cornwall Branch and ordained Brother Phillion to the office of elder. At the same meeting six children were blessed. Elder Pement was for the time being placed as branch president.

The Lord having revealed to the writer that Brother Weaver should be ordained to the office of elder, I accordingly presented the matter to him, but being a man of careful and certain manner he asked for time to meditate and pray, saying that when he was convinced the time had come for his ordination he would accept and do whatever the Lord asked at his hand. That was sufficient, and we patiently waited and prayed.

Two weeks ago the writer purposed moving on to other places, when in prophecy he was told to tarry for a little season that he might instruct the Saints more fully and there were yet some in this town to be "plucked out from among the tares" and the doors that had hitherto been closed would soon be opened, as well as the hearts of the people, to receive the message.

Yesterday through Brother Pement the Lord's will was made known to Brother Weaver in the sacrament service, and then he arose and told us that the evening previous the Lord had shown him that the time had come for him to accept the call and now being confirmed in that evidence he was willing to accept the ordination to the eldership. We after a vote of the branch so ordained.

This is a very prejudiced town, so much so that on good authority I am told the Roman Catholic priest forbade his congregation to attend our meetings. Since that not one has attended. The Knox Presbyterian minister personally told me that he had advised his young people to stay away, as we would poison their minds. During a three-hour conversation, in the residence of Doctor Weaver, with this reverend (?) gentleman, he accused the writer of doing violence to his intelligence. I suggested that if he wished to name any six subjects I would meet him on the rostrum of the town hall and pay half the expense and canvass those subjects until the audience said that one or the other of us was worsted. He suddenly thought of several very pressing engagements in other lines. Being quite anxious to show him the fallacy of his claims to being a divinely called messenger, I then invited him to twenty nights on the public rostrum, each party affirming his church doctrines. But again he tried to impress Doctor and Sister Weaver as well as the writer that seven days per week were far too short for his requirements and he must decline the pleasure (?). He has, however, had unlimited time to run from house to house advising the people who are interested in our message that we are a very dangerous people.

I many times wondered at the bitter prejudice that raged in the hearts of the wicked in the days of Christ and his apostles, but when the Lord was speaking to us two weeks ago the brother as his instrument turned to us missionaries and said, "There are those in this town who would take your lives to-day, if it were not for the laws of the land hindering."

We are happy in the work, and with Brother Pement, who is a good, earnest worker, we are trying to plod along, trusting in the Lord to guide, direct, and protect, and are hopeful of final success.

Respectfully your colaborer for Christ,
CORNWALL, ONTARIO, Box 577.

R. C. RUSSELL.

GREAT POWER IN PREACHING

I thought perhaps a note of our labors would be well to mention. I am on my way to Capac from Port Huron. Having just closed a series of meetings at Applegate, I wish to say the good Master is fulfilling his promise he gave us last spring at Independence that he would bless us this year.

There were times while preaching at Applegate that great power was given me; that I seemed to scarcely touch the floor at times while preaching. The Saints say they were comforted and edified.

We had the privilege of baptizing three more good people into the fold.

It rained a great deal but Charles Maxwell and wife never failed to have the house warm and clean for service.

Brother and Sister Smith did not seem to tire in providing for us. Ever your brother in the faith,

F. S. BRACKENBURY.

The Presidency is in receipt of a letter from Carl F. Greene, recently appointed missionary to Germany. The letter is dated Hanover, November 17, and in it Brother Greene reports that he reached Hanover safely on the 12th.

If it is not right, do not do it; if it is not true, do not say it.—Marcus Aurelius.

AUDITORIUM REPORTS

All committees having to do with the General Conference Auditorium Campaign are again urged to forward their complete reports to their district bishops or bishop's agents. The bishops and agents are likewise urged to hurry up the reports for their districts, and forward all money, pledges, and reports having reference to the campaign direct to this office at once.

The Saints are eager to know the total figures of the campaign and we will be equally glad to give it to them at the earliest possible moment. However, we do not want to publish figures that are incomplete, hence are sending out this urgent request for the completion of all campaign reports.

THE STAFF

Edited by Arthur H. Mills, 1514 West Short St., Independence, Mo.

The Features in This Issue

We believe that this is the first edition of The Staff that does not contain a single article by its editor. In the past, although we have begged and pleaded with the musical workers of the church to furnish us with good readable articles for our columns, we have had, because of their failure to respond as they should, to furnish the lion's share of material ourselves. This we have regretted because we did not want to be in the foreground in so many things and we also wanted to stimulate and develop other material. Now, we are pleased to present in this number an original article and some interesting accounts of choir development in various quarters of the church. We feel sure that our readers, with ourselves, will be greatly pleased and we continue to urge that those of our workers who have "the ready pen" will favor us far more liberally in the future than in the past.

ARTHUR H. MILLS, Editor.

Our Obligations

Our obligations to God, man, and ourselves, from a musical point of view.

[Brother Thomas R. Seaton, 5 Ross Street, Toronto, Ontario, is chorister of the Toronto, Ontario, District, and is another of our district workers who are pushing musical development in their territories with appreciable results. The following article from his pen is worthy of careful consideration.—A. H. M.]

That the subject of music in the church has not had the consideration that should have been given to it in the past, needs no argument, and only very recently has there been effective steps taken to overcome or correct the error. The fact that God has spoken to his people, telling them to cultivate these gifts, shows the important place the art occupies in the human temperament.

I was very much surprised when I became connected with the church to find so few of its members musically inclined and still more surprised to find so many who thought that music had nothing to do with spirituality, for I was and am of the opinion that music is a great help in building character. In fact, I do not know that God has given to man, by nature, a more powerful agency in his spiritual development. I have thought a great deal on this matter and the object of this paper is to try to stimulate our people to greater activities along this line, both vocally and instrumentally.

What is music? It is a language and a very effective one. One writer has said, "It is a language possessing an intensity of expression and power of communicating emotion to which no spoken language can attain, however perfect it may be." Instrumental music has its place, and we may say something of its worth before we are through, but singing is the most direct expression of the soul, and it is this thought we wish to emphasize.

In Doctrine and Covenants 119:6 the Lord says, "Let the young men and the maidens cultivate the gifts of music and of song." Again, let me quote from a prophecy given through Elder J. W. Wight to the young of the church: "I have told the young of my people to cultivate the gift of music and inasmuch as they are more heedful in this direction, I will give unto them of my spirit, by which they shall be enabled to sing in harmony with the spirit; and this gift of song cultivated and made manifest by the power of my spirit shall become a blessing in my church." Now what more do we want to encourage us in this work than this which we have quoted?

It is written in the scriptures with reference to the servants of God that under certain conditions they should open their mouths and God would fill them. I believe this. I also believe that when a company of God's people get together to worship him and sing the songs of Zion that he will bless them and if we wish a continuation of those blessings, we must continue to comply. We must cultivate the gifts God has given us.

Again it is written, "The service of song in the house of the Lord with humility and unity of spirit in them that sing and in them that hear, is blessed, and acceptable with God; but song with grievous sadness in them that sing and bitterness of spirit in them that hear is not pleasing to God."

We have noticed this very thing, as we moved about from branch to branch, that grievous sadness in them that sing, a long drawing out of the songs of Zion, instead of filling those who hear with joy and inspiration and the Spirit of God, has made them feel discouraged and farther from God. On the other hand we have listened to the singing in those branches where heed has been given to this instruction of God and have felt lifted up above the trials and tribulations of earth life and have sensed a nearness to God that gave us a measure of that joy that was unspeakable.

Now let us back to the cultivation of music, and the young. We have said that music is a help in building character. It is. So we must be very careful in the selection of our music and songs. I do not wish to infer that we would never play or sing anything but sacred music, but we must be careful in the choice of our other music, for in music as in reading, our ideals may be raised or lowered. The Lord has said that we should read all good books and so increase our store of knowledge. We know that if we read unworthy literature that it tends to lower our standard, for it is not conducive to spiritual development. So it is with music; if our time is spent upon "ragtime" and the popular music of the day, we will eventually lose our portion of the Spirit of God and be drawn away from him.

I should like to see every branch in the church have a choir, not to do all the singing but to lead the singing. That choir should meet at least once a week for practice that the members may learn to sing according to the instructions given in God's word. The one most competent and best qualified in the branch should be selected to serve as chorister or musical director. He should gather together the choir and others who are interested and teach them to sing, not mechanically, but through precept and example lead them nearer to God that they may sing with the understanding. Then, and then only, will the choir be the help to the congregation that God intended it to be.

A song service before the preaching is one of the best things ever instituted for the development of the song spirit in a branch. Here is where an orchestra will fit in, and according to the instruction in the Doctrine and Covenants every branch should endeavor to have an orchestra.

There is something in every individual that calls for music. The world recognizes this fact and we see that every place of amusement has music to attract the passer-by. These go in, hear the music, partake of the spirit of the place, and desire to go again and again, and in so doing they consequently wander farther from God.

Now, on the other hand, I have known of at least one branch that has heeded the admonition of the Lord. They have good music and singing, a song service before the preaching, and people have gone miles to hear their singing. Some of these eventually partook of the spirit of the work and were baptized, growing to be faithful Latter Day Saints. I have another branch in mind that has a good amateur choir. They worked hard to cultivate their gifts and God blessed them. People used to walk up and down before their church to hear them singing and one individual was heard to say that he never heard such singing. He was later led into the water and is now an active member of the priesthood.

Let me offer a suggestion to you as individuals, and if it works individually it will also work collectively. When you start for meeting hum over in mind some ragtime tune and see what effect it will have upon your enjoyment of the meeting. Then the next time you go try some good church hymn, like Saint Agnes (number 273) or Olive's Brow (number 90) and note how much more you will enjoy the meeting. Thus you can figure out from personal experience the great benefit a song service will be to the congregation, especially in fitting them for the service to follow. They will be in a more receptive frame of mind; the preacher will sense the spirit within them and feel the inspiration that it brings.

Busy Times in Northern California

Sister Waller plans intensive work in her district.

Sister Christine Waller, 1436 Taylor Street, San Francisco, is the chorister of the Northern California District and by her excellent skill and energy she is producing some very fine development in the musical circles of her district. The following is a letter she has addressed to the choristers of the various branches of her district relative to their work and we reproduce it that other district choristers may be benefited by her ideas.

"Dear Chorister: As the spirit of consecration is taking hold of our members, we who have musical talents should also be more active in our various places, doing all we can through our talents to promulgate the truth and attract those who are honest in heart.

"I trust that you are all working hard to stimulate the interest in your branch along musical lines and that you are, through your musical talent, proving a valuable asset to the work.

"Write and tell me about your work. Plan and do new things and don't lose your enthusiasm.

"The Oakland and San Francisco choirs are to have a practice together at one of the homes of the choir members. Selections from Songs of the Legion will be used. We are inviting strangers who are fond of music to join us and hope in this way to attract them to our work.

"The district choir is to render Gillette's cantata, "The light everlasting," at the next conference to be held in February. As we have already studied this composition, after studying it again we ought to have it practically by heart. If you need any copies of it let me know.

"Will you please write and let me know when you would like me to pay a visit to your choir? I shall look forward to meeting with you."

Philadelphia Choir Takes Forward Step

The choir of the First Philadelphia Branch has for several years been considered Brother Hoxie's own, because he developed and trained it into its state of efficiency. During the war and his activities with the navy he was compelled to relinquish it, but since his release from that service he has again taken up the vigorous prosecution of its work. One of the things recently adopted for this choir to instill into it a better comprehension of the great ideal of the church is the principle that, no matter how remote they are from the central place of the church, their work has a great part in the upbuilding of Zion. This principle is a true one, and other choirs elsewhere, whether near to the central place or remote, might adopt it with profit to themselves and the church work. While the material establishment of Zion may exist as a location, the spirit of Zion must exist in the heart of every true Latter Day Saint. Every choir member in every branch of the church, who is trying to serve faithfully, is in that sense contributing to the upbuilding of Zion. Further, many of our choir members in the various branches look forward to the time when they may come to the central place of Zion and there engage in the work of the choirs in Zion. No better preparation for this can be had than faithful, consecrated service in their own branch choirs.

To accomplish the proper comprehension of this great truth in the Philadelphia choir there has been sent to every member of the choir a paper entitled Summons, arranged in quasi legal style and signed by the secretary of the choir. We quote from it in part:

"Know ye that Zion is not a dream or a fable. Skilled architects have drawn its plans and laid out its streets. Skilled masons are ready to build its walls. Mechanics are ready to give their talent. Men and women deft in the various trades are ready to people its workshops. Physicians are prepared to give their learning and their skill. These people have pledged their all. Zion will be a city. No city is great and strong and noble without a proper love and consideration of all things beautiful—architecture, sculpture, paintings, literature, and music.

"You have your free agency. No one can compel you, no one should beg you. The Lord is not accustomed to begging for tributes of song. Zion will have music whether we help or not to supply it. Zion will lose nothing; we can lose all. Shall we join the artisans who are preparing at a moment's call to give the service they are best adapted to give? Shall we prepare Zion's music while architects prepare her temples?

"It is up to you!! You are approximately one sixtieth of the choir of Philadelphia. Your decision regarding next week's rehearsal votes for or against the preparation for Zion. You cannot remain "on the fence." If you are present and prepared to give the best you have and obtain the most you can as regards music—you are voting for the foundation of Zion's choir. If you are absent you are voting against it. You alone are responsible."

Independence Choir Activities

The "Stone Church choir" gave its customary Thanksgiving concert on the night of last Thanksgiving, to a large and appreciative audience. The program, which was uniformly well rendered, is as follows:

ARTHUR W. SMITH

Brother A. W. Smith, the son of Patriarch H. O. Smith and nephew of Heman C. Smith, has long been known in Saint Louis because of his long service as local and district president of the Religio as well as his association with the district Sunday school work. His secular work has taken him far afield and so has extended widely his acquaintance among church people. His most constructive church service as his local Religio service, has been his work as second assistant general superintendent of the Sunday school since 1917. He was at once given charge of the Christmas offering as a means to help in paying the debt of the church, which was then heavy.

He thoroughly organized his forces, designed an honor roll, later a clock and other methods to keep that particular work before the Sunday schools. The result was that the Christmas offering for 1917 leaped from about $12,000 the year before to nearly $75,000.

Continuing his efforts the next year the result was about $90,000. He has worked hard and built a splendid organization and spirit, with the result that though the debt had been paid the offering for 1919 was close to $100,000. What it will be this year remains to be seen, but he hopes for $150,000, which is the goal set. Next year it will be set higher, for "the purchase of lands" and to help poor Saints get located.

He has also done valiant service in organizing and starting the lecture board and arranging for many lectures where desired for the first few years. This work has been now turned over to Graceland College.

He has traveled rather extensively throughout the United States and Old Mexico and at the time of the trouble in Mexico was personally interested in that country. He had

"More Beautiful Front Yards, More Useful Back Yards"

Or vice versa, for they are interchangeable. Beauty is one of the prime necessities of life, and efficient, orderly utility is ever beautiful.

This is the slogan we have chosen for our civic improvement "drive" through which we hope to make it more popular for women to take an active interest in their home gardens and surroundings.

It is all very well to talk about the "whited sepulcher" homes of the ungodly people of this sinful age, and it is true the Master warned us against the habit of washing the outside of the cup when the inside was full of filth and pollution. He referred, did he not? to the Jewish custom of many washings, and the outward show of righteousness, which in their case was false and deceitful, if we may judge from the Record. At no time did he condemn the beautiful. On the contrary he asked his disciples to "consider the lilies of the field," and spoke in tender appreciation of their loveliness. We have every reason to believe that he understood the ministry of flowers, and the very definite part they play in lifting the thoughts of mankind above the sordid consideration of gain and barter.

There is no reason why Latter Day Saint homes may not be distinguished by their outward appearances of beauty, order, and cleanliness as well as by their inward ones of love, kindness, and hospitality. "By their fruits ye shall know them" was said of old, and fruit is but the outward expression of the inward life and desire. Can we not apply the thought to all external expressions of what we are, what we love, and what we value? May not our homes represent more truly the very beautiful ideals of purity, harmony, and nobility which are pronounced in our church doctrines and objectives?

It was our privilege one afternoon this fall to talk upon this subject to a group of women who have undertaken to lift in a definite way the ideals of their community regarding these civic improvements. In the discussion which followed it was revealed that many had long yearned for a concerted action along this line, and had been impressed with its importance and its influence upon the lives of the people. That carelessness which will allow unkempt, littered, barren home yards finds a sure reflection in the characters of the people who live there. Carelessness in business, carelessness in meeting obligations, in fine points of honor or courtesy go hand in hand with the indifference shown in regard to outward appearances. Can we afford to run this risk for the sake of the children we are rearing for God's kingdom, for the sake of those to whom we would bring the glad news of the latter days, or for the sake of our own selves, from whom the Creator is justified in expecting a service commensurate with his goodness and bounty?

We sometimes speak of the time "when Christ shall come to his own." We believe his coming is near, and often the experience of being one of the three Americans first approached by the mob when they were denouncing the Americans in the City of Mexico, and was the first American to step out into the mob when the mob threatened to throw rocks and bricks through the plate glass window of the building in which he and his companions were sitting. Spent some time in Mexico after the war was in progress and went back twice during the war and had a very serious time in getting out the last time.

He is also greatly interested in archæology and has visited a number of the noted ruins of Mexico, most interesting of which is the ruin of Mitla. He seriously believes that some day archæology will play a strong part in bringing about a better understanding between the church and the outside world.

in the public prayer service we hear impassioned appeals for him to hasten that coming. Would we be willing for him to come and find us just as we are at this time? Would we be proud to invite him into our untidy homes, or ask him to trail his wondrously white robes down our weed-littered walks? Would we rejoice to usher him into a barren little church, almost hidden in a tangle of neglected shrubbery, or staring up from a bed of clay, sticks, and stones? Nay, nay! Let us remember the pride and the glory of olden times, when the best was none too good for the temple of the Lord, and when his path was strewn with palm branches, flowers, and the cloaks of an adoring populace! Let us live each day and each hour as unto him! Let us look at our homes and their surroundings with his eyes of purity and make earnest effort to see that nothing shall be found amiss there!

Since the power of the vote has come into the hands of women, many things which they have long desired will now be made possible—if they will only act intelligently, go after reforms and improvements unitedly, and with open eyes using those agencies which will bring about the desired ends. Time was when a request from a woman, or a group of women, made to a school board or a town council, was listened to with indulgence perhaps, with a sneer at times, with courtesy and consideration in rare instances. We could petition, but our petitions would be treated lightly as thistle-down. To twist an old couplet, "Women might propose, but only men could dispose." Now, however, a change has come about. When a group of women appears before a board or commission with a request for definite things, the "powers that be" realize that they are being approached by a body of voters, representing a still larger body of voters, a power to be reckoned with! Their desire to placate or utilize the power represented causes them to give the request due consideration, and not only consideration but action. For, if voters but stand unitedly on these things, legislation must come their way, or somebody's political head is in danger!

Materials

So much for theory. Now let us to some practical helps for the many local groups of our women who are already planning a campaign of civic beauty. Here are some of the things which have been suggested and most of which are easily available to the average women in the average community.

1. Write to your State Board of Health at your State capital and ask for copies of the laws pertaining to sanitation, sewerage, drainage, garbage disposal, housing conditions for chickens and other domestic animals, etc. Apply to local councils or sanitation commissions for similar information in regard to local ordinances.

2. Write to your State University Extension Department asking for helps in planning the home grounds, both as for beauty and for utility. Apply to your county agricultural agent, also. Write the Department of Agriculture at Washington, District of Columbia, for their helps and list of available bulletins. These latter are upon almost every conceivable phase of the subjects, and are prepared by experts.

3. Call your meetings in the community and put facts and possibilities before them. Have your lectures by specialists in gardening, in canning and preserving the home products, in horticulture and floriculture in landscape effects, etc. Get the people with you. Make it popular for women to work in their gardens or among their flowers in the morning. It is not only profitable but healthful.

4. Get some "before-and-after" pictures taken in your community. Show these at the weekly picture places. Use the films also for various announcements concerning your campaign. Have your slogans and your objectives appear frequently before the people, as well as reminders about timely topics. Flash a line to tell them, "Now is the time to plant your pansy seeds for early plants" or "Now is the time to start your bulbs for Easter lilies," winding up with the invitation to appeal to the civic improvement club for particular information, etc. The possibilities of the screen and the slide for popular education and stimulation cannot be stressed too greatly.

5. Talk with your nurserymen, gardeners, or florists concerning your effort to promote interest in these things. Secure their cooperation and advice. They may find it to their interest to make some very special and attractive prices for desirable shrubs, trees, plants, bulbs, or seeds.

6. Obtain the names of local landscape artists, and counsel with them in regard to planning your yards, your church grounds, or the decorative scheme of your streets. This would eliminate the incongruous effect often seen when Mrs. Jones's patchwork flower beds quarrel artistically with Mrs. Smith's. A dividing line between homes can be made a thing of beauty through team work. The harmony of line and color in a well-planned landscape, when each note is in accord with all others in view, is uplifting as a prayer or a song.

6. Banish rubbish, ashes, and unsightly objects from the back yard. There is no reason on earth why a back yard should not be as beautiful as the front one. Sticks, stones, cans, rags, dishpans, barrels—all have no place there. Get rid of such things, and let orderly rows of useful vegetables take their place. God gave us this wonderful earth for use and beauty. All we have or are, physically, comes from that primal "mother." She is bountiful and impartial, and yields richly in return for intelligent care. If she gives us as freely as she does now with the curse of God upon her, what will be her gift when that curse is removed, when she is "redeemed" and a blessing shall descend instead?

Let us harken to Tennyson's invitation:

"Come into the garden, Maude,

For the black bat, night, has flown!"

and there renew our acquaintance with an old friend of the human race!

8. In connection with the better use of our home yards for the growing of vegetables and small fruits, will come more universal study and efficiency along the lines of canning, and preserving the products for use through barren months.

KIND WORDS FOR THE CENTENNIAL YEARBOOK

"I think it is one of the neatest and most attractive books I have seen for some time. I was especially taken with the frontispiece—the picture of Emma Hale Smith.

"I can assure you that I have full sympathy with the work that the women of the church are striving to accomplish. I trust, with the cooperation of all in this part of the service, you may be able to get definite results."—R. V. H.

A superintendent of public welfare in one of our large cities recently stated that his expense for table for himself, wife, and four children often amounted monthly to but $35 or $40, adding that it was due to the management of his wife, plus the efforts of the family last summer in cultivating two lots at their home. Hard days are before us, if the signs of the times are read aright. It might stand any or all of us well in hand to take extra pains and trouble to raise what produce we can, and to preserve it for times of need. "Go to the ant, thou sluggard," is sometimes quoted to profligate and extravagant young people. We could learn many lessons of thrift and saving from the instinctive habits of some insects and animals.

Wintertime is the acceptable time for laying plans, for getting all information lined up, for stimulating interests, for building constructively towards a movement in the spring which shall include practically all the people in your neighborhood. Get your materials together, your pamphlets and cards of instructions. Get your lectures on the job, your pulpit talks arranged. Let us see if each Latter Day Saint center shall not be a vital advertisement of the principles which distinguish our church—an "outward sign of an inward grace."

Temple Builders Manual

Sister Alice Mae Burgess, in her new book for the Temple Builders, lays a splendid foundation for extended and timely work and play among the older girls of the church. Outlined courses in the study of literature, the drama, personal hygiene, domestic art, and other subjects which deeply interest the girl above fifteen combine to give the manual an air of stability and recognized worth. Suggestions for group activities, including some of fun and frolic and others of real vital service to home, branch, or community, add the variety which is said to be life's "spice."

The rules which govern the Temple Builders are few and simple, as one of the underlying principles has been to allow the young women in this organization ample opportunity for individual expression, believing that a great need at this particular period of a girl's life, is that of discovering her own powers, her own tastes, and her own possibilities. The Temple Builders is not an organization planned for the girls, step by step, rule by rule, but rather one in which the varying desires of the girls themselves may find wholesome expression.

The price of the manual is fifty cents per copy, and may be obtained by addressing the Women's Department, Box 255, Independence, Missouri.

Do You Believe in Santa Claus?

The late Charles Dana once wrote to a little girl who asked, "Is there a Santa Claus?"

"Yes, Virginia, there is a Santa Claus; he exists as certainly as love, generosity, and devotion exist. The most real things in the world are those things that neither men nor children see. You may tear apart the baby's rattle and see what makes the noise inside, but there is a wall covering the unseen world which not the strongest man nor the united strength of all the strongest men can tear apart.

"Only faith, fancy, poetry, love, romance, can push aside that curtain and view the glory beyond. Is it all real? Ah! Virginia, in all this world there is nothing else real and abiding!"

"No Santa Claus? He lives and loves forever!"—Selected.

From Santa's Kitchen

Measurements: c-cup; t-teaspoon; T-tablespoon. All measurements are level.

Bangor Brownies. $\frac{1}{4}$ c fat, 1 c sorghum, 1 egg, 3 squares unsweetened chocolate, 1 c flour (half rye and half barley, if liked), 1 c nuts. To the melted chocolate add fat, sorghum, flour, and nuts. Lastly add the well-beaten egg. Spread evenly in a greased pan and bake in a moderate oven. When done cut in strips.

Nut Molasses Bar. $\frac{1}{2}$ c nuts, 2 T boiling water, $1\frac{1}{2}$ c flour, 3 T fat, $\frac{1}{2}$ c molasses, $\frac{1}{2}$ t soda, salt, ginger, cloves, cinnamon. Add boiling water to molasses and pour over the fat. Sift together the flour, soda, spices, and salt. Add liquid gradually to dry ingredients. Chill. Roll one eighth inch thick. Cut in strips about $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches by 1 inch. Sprinkle the nuts over the top. Bake in moderate oven.

Candied Cranberries. 1 c cranberries, 1 c syrup. Choose large red berries. Prick each one three or four times. Drop them carefully into the boiling syrup and allow them to cook slowly for five or six minutes. Remove from fire and allow to stand over night. Reheat and allow them to stand another night if possible. Then while hot, remove the berries from the syrup and drop on oiled paper to dry. Coat with fine granulated sugar. These may be used in place of candied cherries for decorations.

Peanut Brittle. 1 c white corn syrup, 1 T vinegar, 1 t vanilla, 1 c freshly roasted peanuts, $\frac{1}{4}$ t salt. Cook the corn syrup, vinegar, and salt in a saucepan until it forms a soft ball when dropped in cold water. Put the peanuts and syrup into an iron skillet and stir until the syrup is a golden brown. Remove from the fire, stir in vanilla. Have ready a shallow buttered pan into which the candy is poured and spread into a thin sheet. Cool; remove from pan and crack into pieces.

Pop Corn and Peanut Balls. 2 c popped corn, $\frac{1}{2}$ c corn syrup, 1 c peanuts, $\frac{1}{2}$ square chocolate (unsweetened). Cook the corn syrup and chocolate to hard ball stage. Pour over the peanuts and popped corn and shape into small balls.

Apple Blossom Pop Corn Balls. 1 c syrup, 1 T vinegar, 2 to 3 quarts popped corn, few drops red fruit coloring. Boil together the syrup and vinegar until syrup hardens when dropped in cold water. Add enough of the fruit coloring to color the syrup a light pink. Pour over freshly popped corn and mold into balls. These are especially pretty for the Christmas tree when suspended by pink baby ribbon. Little pop-corn men will please the children. Use the above recipe, omitting the coloring. Mark the features and outlines with melted chocolate.

Parisian Sweets. Put through the food chopper 1 lb. prepared dates, figs, and nutmeats. Add 1 T orange juice, a little grated orange peel, and $\frac{1}{2}$ c honey or syrup. Mold into balls and roll in chopped nuts or chocolate or coconut. This mixture may be packed in an oiled tin, put under weight until firm, then cut into any shape desired. Puffed rice and raisins may also be used in this mixture.

Sugarless Coconut Candy. 2 squares unsweetened chocolate, $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. coconut, 1 can (15 oz.) Borden's Eagle Brand condensed milk. Melt the chocolate, add coconut, and stir into the milk. Drop on buttered and floured pans by teaspoonfuls and bake 15 minutes in a moderate oven. This recipe makes forty.

Opera Fudge. 2 c sugar, 1 c cream, $\frac{1}{2}$ t cream of tartar. Cook all ingredients to soft ball stage. Pour on to moistened platter, cool, and work toward center with wooden spoon. When it becomes hard, cover with a damp cloth for thirty minutes or more. When again soft it may be molded and flavored as desired with melted chocolate, chopped nuts or candied fruit, cherries, pineapple, orange peel, citron, angelica, etc. Pat into oblong sheet $\frac{3}{4}$ inch thick and straighten edge with knife. Crease into squares or bars and wrap in waxed paper. One layer of Fruit Opera Fudge placed upon a layer of Rose Opera Fudge and cut in bars from the loaf is attractive. Opera Fudge may be kept for days if tightly covered.

Sea Foam. 3 c brown sugar, 1 c boiling water, whites 2 eggs beaten stiff, 1 t vanilla, few grains salt. Boil sugar and water to the soft ball stage. Pour slowly on to the whites beating constantly. Beat until stiff. Add nuts and vanilla. Drop by spoonfuls on buttered plates.

Breathing and Other Exercises

(1) Stand erect (by an open window), place the hands on the hips, close the mouth and take a good deep breath, inhale through the nostrils, fill the lungs as full as possible, hold the breath a few seconds and exhale slowly through the nose.

(2) Interlock the fingers at the back of the neck, then draw the head and elbows down to the chest, then slowly raise the head and elbows, and at the same time inhale through the nostrils, completely filling the lungs, and while inhaling push the chest forward and turn the elbows out and back, hold the breath a short time, and exhale slowly drawing the head and elbows into the starting position, and repeat.

Arm Exercises

(3) Stand erect; count four; at 1, place the hands on the hips; at 2 place the hands on the shoulders; at 3 extend the arms straight above the head; at 4 swing the arms down to the sides, and repeat.

(4) Stand erect with arms at sides. At 1 swing the arms up straight in front of the body till perpendicular above the head. At 2 drop the fingers on to the shoulders. At 3 drop the hands to the hips. At 4 replace at sides of body, and repeat. These movements are done to the count of four, and quick.

(5) Swing the arms above the head in a backward, circular motion, raising on the toes with the force of the swing of the arms. Keep the body erect and the chest up.

Trunk Exercises

(6) Stand erect, extend the arms above the head, then turn the body to the right, and stretch, then turn the body to the left, and stretch. Don't move the feet; repeat.

(7) Raise the arms above the head (keep the arms and back stiff), then bend the body forward till it is on a level with the hips (keep the knees stiff), raise into erect position; repeat.

(8) Stand erect. Take one step forward (a little to the side); at the same time raise the arms above the head, and bend the body forward over the extended foot (but take care not to bend the knees); regain erect position, keeping the arms extended above the head, and lean back as far as possible; regain starting position, and repeat. Exercise in 6 counts.

(9) Same as exercise 8, but on the opposite side.

Leg Exercises

(10) Stand erect, chest up, shoulders well back, and head in good poise, place the hands on the hips, and keeping the legs stiff raise up on to the toes as high as possible, lower on to heels; and repeat.

(11) Stand erect, bend the knees and so lower the body till almost sitting upon the heels, letting the fingers come in contact with the floor, then raise slowly making it a strain on the thighs to do so till erect position is regained; keep the body stiff and the chest up during the exercise.

(12) Stand erect, place the hands on the hips, and swing the right leg forward and backward as high each way as possible, but keeping the leg stiff, the foot slightly turned out, and toe rather pointed; repeat.

(13) Same as Exercise 12, but with the left leg. Do each exercise till a little tired; don't overtax the muscles.

All the exercises ought to be taken in heelless shoes; no corsets should be worn; if corsets are worn, have them very loose. By leaving the corsets off for half an hour from time to time during the day, the muscles of the back will become stronger, and in time one will be able to do without corsets (without backache). These exercises should be started in lightly, and followed up daily, and as the bodily strength increases, increase the amount of exercise. In a few months you will be pleased with the results.

MRS. A. M. CLARKE.

An item in the Manchester Weekly Times states there are 135,000 Jews in Palestine to-day, against 20,000 less than forty years ago. The total population is about 680,000, but in Bible times the country supported over three million. It also exported cereals and fruit. A Jew, Sir Herbert Samuel, has been appointed as High Commissioner for Palestine, yet the Arabs realize now that it is not the British intention to place them under Jewish domination, and that all religious rites will be acknowledged, and the holy places protected.

Senator Harding, in a recent front-porch address, stressed greatly the necessity of a return to the old standard of honesty and lofty standards of fidelity in private life and in public service. What is needed is a baptism in righteousness, a new consecration in morality. He urged the power of simple goodness, and that if the American people were honest with one another they could put an end to industrial and social unrest, and if they are honest with God they can become again a moral and religious people.

LETTERS

President Smith's Trip to Ireland

Editorial Note

The office of the Presidency is in receipt of a letter from President Frederick M. Smith, written from Londonderry, Ireland, dated November 18. This letter clearly was not written for publication. Nevertheless though written in the lighter vein and recounting some of the experiences encountered in missionary traveling, we have ventured to give it publicity in the HERALD, feeling that the readers of the HERALD will be interested.

Dear Elbert: One week ago to-day Brother May and I left London for Glasgow. We traveled on the London-Glasgow Express, and found that for comfort, speed, and service it was par excellence. The stops were few and short, so that while we left London at nine in the forenoon yet about seven in the evening we arrived in Glasgow, the train running from Carlisle on the Glasgow and Southwestern Metals. At Leeds Brother Williams joined us.

Our purpose in visiting Glasgow was to see what we could in a short time of the prospects for opening the work there again. We were met at the station by the Brethren Benjamin Green, senior and junior. We appreciate the uniform hospitality shown us while in Glasgow by Brother Green and his family.

Last night Brother Williams and I left Brother May at Glasgow and took passage here on a small steamer called the Hound. Well, that Hound behaved itself quite well so long as she was in the smooth waters of the River and Firth of Clyde; but sometime in the night she seemed to forget she was a boat and imagine herself the canine for which she was named, and began to play pranks. Her ideas of canine frolic are a bit odd, however. Just what she was trying to do cannot be said by a landlubber unacquainted with a ship's mental processes, but I can testify she did a few things. I wedged myself in the bunk, which wasn't hard for me to do inasmuch as my shoulders touched both sides of the bunk, so all I had to do was spread out a bit and there I stuck despite the antics of the boat.

But she pitched and slid down one side of a wave and buried her nose in the other so violently that she shook all over. She rolled till on two or three occasions she lay on her side a few seconds, trembling from the accelerated vibrations of the only half-immersed screw, as though undecided whether to go on over or go back. You have seen a horse rolling, of course, and seen him pause with his feet up in the air, almost over but not quite. Well that's what the boat seemed to be trying. But each time she got back on her keel. Yet she not only rolled and pitched, but she would combine a pitch and a roll, in varying quantities, and seemed to have as many "tricks up her sleeve" as a broncho striving to dislodge a rider.

She didn't shake me out of the bunk, but my hand luggage slid around the floor in a merry-widow sort of a fashion which made me wonder if they would stick even to the floor. A pocket compass I had placed on a shelf by the water bottle left its perch with a bang and landed on the opposite side of the cabin. No damage done, however, in my quarters; but on the deck below not so, entirely.

I heard some shrieks, and finally a crash, followed by some pungent odor quite familiar. A woman had become hysterical, left her cabin, and was rushing around the boat. By some strange accident she got into the pantry, and in just as strange a way the first thing she grabbed was an ammonia bottle. The next lurch of the boat brought another scream from her throat and the bottle of ammonia from her hand. The smashing of the bottle was the crash I heard and also accounted for the odor.

The steward by this time was on the trail of the shrieking woman, and by holding his nose he managed to drag the woman from the pantry, but not till she had frantically made another grab, this time drawing as a prize a catsup bottle. Another lurch, another scream, another crash, and one of Heinz's 57 was mingling with ammonia in odoriferous glee on the floor of the swaying pantry. Not for an hour could the steward get into the pantry to pick up the bottle fragments rolling noisily round the floor as the Hound kept on merrily pitching and rolling. Don't know just how long the Hound kept on with her merrymaking, whether I just slept through it all or we got into smoother water, but a knock on the door awoke me as we were in the smooth waters of the Lough of Foyle, and soon landed at Londonderry on the Foyle River.

Took in the town to-day. Saw several barbed wire barricades around bomb proof shelters. Soldiers everywhere. More trouble in sight, judging by what we see. Curfew rings at 10.30. Any civilian out thereafter is in danger of being shot. You can rest assured we're in. More of my impressions of Ireland later.

A Visit to Belfast, Ireland

A letter recently received from President Frederick M. Smith, addressed to Elbert A. Smith. Was written from Belfast, Ireland. Following is an extract.

We came to Belfast Friday afternoon. Two of the great industries here are the linen and the rope industries. We wanted to see each, but Saturday noon everything stops, so we will see them to-morrow.

Belfast is a fine city, modern, and were it not for the terrible state of unrest and trouble it would be one of the most important industrial cities of the world. There is a wide range of manufacture here. In the linen industry it leads the world and in shipbuilding it vies with Glasgow.

We are gathering information which will be useful to us. This is a wonderful country and people. There must be something for us to do here.

Yesterday we were out in the country several miles. Went to the end of the train line and walked to a curious archaeological phenomenon known as the Giant's Ring with a cromlech in the center. I made some exposures, and if they come out all right I may be able to have a paragraph or two for Autumn Leaves.

An "extra" just now being cried by the newsboys recites that twenty officers were shot in Dublin last night, fourteen of them killed. One woman shot last night here in a riot.

We are in the hotel for the night—the front door locked. It is just 7.50 p. m.

To the Welsh Saints in America: The Saints of Wales greet you!

It is our prayer that God will raise up mighty men to preach the gospel in the valleys and mountains of Wales.

Unite your prayers with ours that God will hear and answer.

Christmas Offering Items

G. W. Harder of Bay Port, Michigan, says they are trying to do their part and have placed their aim at $200 for the year.

Sister Myrtle Ferguson, of Joppa, Illinois, reports as secretary of the school: "I inclose herewith check for $12, also list of members giving one dollar each and statement showing how each one earned his dollar." Three gathered corn, one hulled walnuts, one hulled walnuts and pecans, one gathered up laundry, one sewed, one shoveled coal, one shoveled shells, one did washing, another did ironing, and still another did cooking.

Sister Emma Savage, superintendent of Fort Collins school, also has some cheering news: "We reached the 50 per cent mark on Dollar Sunday and each one told how he earned his dollar. This caused considerable good feeling and some merriment."

Sister Edna Williams, secretary Vancouver Sunday school: "We are already 'over the top' with our offering. We have nearly $105 and only have 30 members, an average of about $3.50. We would like to see each branch do as well, and hope they can."

Let us have more reports from the good schools. We are sure all are working hard to do just a little better than last year—for we want that $150,000. We can get it. Let us all push and pull together.

Toledo Raises Funds by the Social Method

We hear much concerning the raising of money for the church in the way of socials, some approving and some disapproving. I wish to give our experience in this local branch along this line. Of course I do not want anyone to take my word as authority; just to let you see for yourself.

About five years ago I became a member of this branch, then meeting in a hall in lower town. The rent for this hall was six dollars a month. We had a membership of about seventy-five or more. We could not even meet our rent without our leader asking us for it several times. We were not any worse off financially than we are now, but it seemed an impossibility to meet that six dollars. We appointed two of our young sisters to choose sides, each side to see if they could not raise more money than the other. We got busy and had a social or party of some kind every week for about six weeks or two months. The same people that could not raise six dollars in four weeks now raised between three and four hundred in less than eight weeks. We had enough to buy our lot and pay for it; then we got busy and built the church on it. We kept busy until we got the debt on the church down around a thousand dollars; then for some reason everything stopped for some time.

Since the Kirtland reunion we again got ambitious and had a few parties. We have been able to turn over about three hundred dollars. On October 17 our district president came into our midst, and could scarcely believe his own eyes when he saw how much we had accomplished in so short a time. He started a series of meetings at this time so we were prohibited from having any parties during the meetings. Well, the result is that our treasury is empty. It is again time for some parties in Toledo in order to get some money to continue the good work.

Now I know that it is not the proper spirit for the Saints to have. But will some kind-hearted person tell me a better way? (Some one will say, a freewill offering is better, or that the Saints should give without such a method. We agree that such is the proper way but there is such a thing as their not giving in this manner. Should we let the work of the Lord suffer on account of this? or should we proceed with other methods. We will all agree that this work cannot be carried on without money, and I have come to the conclusion as nearly all of this branch have, that if we cannot get it one way we can in the way of parties. We have proved that we can raise it this way and that we cannot get by pledges and freewill offerings. Are we wrong or are we right? It remains to be found out.

Our boy movement is moving to the front very rapidly under our deacon, Brother Hardy. They have a real gymnasium in the basement and meet one night every week. We expect Brother Klar in town to-night and presume we will know better how to eat when he leaves. We are sorry to hear of the accident of Brethren Pendry and Wismer and their wives. They, under the direction of our district president and also the branch president, started to Sylvania for service yesterday (Sunday). About three miles from the city a large truck ran into their machine, smashing it all to pieces and knocking them all unconscious. They were taken to the hospital in an ambulance and the last we hear is that Sister Pendry is hurt internally and that Sister Wismer is suffering very much. The men will be around in a few days if all is as well as it is thought now. Brother Armstrong, who was hurt in an auto accident a few weeks ago, is able to be about. Sister Hardy is able to be on her feet and around the house, although she is very weak. Sister Will Liston expects to go to the hospital for an operation the first of the year. We would ask all who know her to remember her in their prayers. She says and knows that the Lord can heal her and she desires that he will.

We are preparing for another series of meetings after the holidays. Brother Hardin will be the speaker.

It seems as though the work here is growing as never before. Our Sunday school is booming under the leadership of Brother David Morgan. The Sunday school committees are all at work on the Christmas entertainment, and we expect a good one.

The Women's Department has again gotten into the harness. They disorganized and reorganized, electing all new officers, and are taking up the Church History.

Council Bluffs Items

A choir has been organized at the Riverside Mission by the district chorister, W. T. Spanwick, last week.

During the Thanksgiving times Sister Glow Salisbury spent a few days and worshiped with us. She speaks highly of the work at Graceland.

At the annual business meeting held last Wednesday night Elder Orman Salisbury was reelected president, with Brethren H. H. Hand and George Beaty selected as his assistants. Elder J. R. Epperson was selected to have direct charge of all the Sunday schools in the city, associated with the district superintendent of Sunday schools.

It was decided not to execute any building other than otherwise provided for, but to take such preliminary steps as may be thought necessary looking forward to buildings to be provided both in the branch and missions of the city, sufficient to answer the needs.

Provision is made for a chorister to be provided for the city, to be nominated by the presidency of the branch, the one so elected to have charge of all the music, directly and indirectly.

Prayer meetings are started at the Orchard Heights Mission, the first one held last Thursday evening by Brethren T. J. Smith and J. F. Mintun.

The budget system was indorsed and an amount of $2,750 decided upon to meet all the demands of the branch and its missions and departments.

Brother V. C. Bailey worshiped with us last Sunday, and expressed himself as in the enjoyment of the gospel spirit.

SAND POINT, IDAHO, December 4, 1920.

Editors Herald: The work has been opened at this place at last.

Elder J. A. Bronson came from Cour d'Alene and began a series of meetings at the Lakeside Schoolhouse, between Sand Point and Sagle, where the branch is, and where the Saints have a nice brick church.

He preached about three weeks at this place, with splendid interest. Each Sunday afternoon he baptized two or three until ten had united with the church.

During these meetings a Reverend Mr. Willan, of the Congregational faith, who had a regular monthly appointment at this schoolhouse, tried to tear down our work by preaching on "Latter-day delusion" and "The first five commandments and the Latter Day Saints." While it is barely possible that these two sermons may have poisoned the minds of a few, we feel confident, from the attitude of the people and the results in baptisms, that he did himself more harm than he did us.

Closing the meetings here after fully answering all the arguments (if they could merit the term) of the opposition, the campaign was carried on in Sand Point.

The G. A. R. Hall was rented and considerable advertising done by handbills and in the papers. A united "pull all together" by the Saints, and an untiring zeal on the part of the preacher resulted in a full house most every night.

The difference between us and the church in the West was proven. They have preached much here and have a Sunday school here.

Prejudice was removed and the people have accorded us a place among the other churches at least.

As a result of this last series of meetings which lasted over two weeks, six more were baptized, and a number of others left near the water, who, we feel sure, will take the step in the near future if we are not neglected by the ministry until the seed, already sown, is lost, withered, or devoured by the fowls. This made a total of sixteen added to our number, all adults but two. And splendid people they are, who will bring new life into the Sagle Branch.

It had been feared for some time that this branch was about to go the way of all mortals and of some branches. Now the Saints are rejoicing, and some here who from fear of the reproach cast upon us by the people of the West had not let it be known that they were Latter Day Saints have taken renewed courage and are glad.

When we first came to Idaho in 1918 we had a neighbor, a Mrs. Faulkenhoe. She was held in high esteem by all who knew her and one lady told me that Mrs. Faulkenhoe was a Latter Day Saint. In my talks with her I found that she and several of her mother's family belonged to the Bickerton branch of the church and, as that organization had broken up leaving a few scattered members, they were as sheep without a shepherd.

Through her we met her aunt, Mrs. Work, an aged, faithful soul who had lived the gospel and talked it for thirty years or more without hearing a sermon or partaking of the sacrament, and she was hungering for it. Also her daughter and her husband belonged to the same organization. These people refused to join the Utah church and were waiting for light about the Reorganization.

I know now why I came to Idaho. The Lord had this pleasant experience in store for me. I had to come two thousand miles to get it but it was worth it.

We were delighted to see our patriarch and old friend Ammon White at the reunion last summer.

Indeed it is good to be alive and to know that the "little stone" is rolling on, and will fill the whole earth.

Your sister, ALICE MCGEORGE.

AMHERSTBURG, ONTARIO, November 28, 1920.

Editors Herald: On Tuesday the 23d Elder James Pycok came amongst us and held meetings until Friday night, leaving on Saturday for Windsor.

At the annual business meeting J. L. Fryer was ordained to the office of elder, and afterward elected to be president of the branch.

Wednesday evening the service took the form of a question meeting, when much useful information was imparted to those who assembled.

Thursday evening the local priesthood held a session and received instruction, obtaining a more thorough understanding of the duties pertaining to the several offices held. Friday afternoon Elder Pycok met with the sisters in their Women's Department meeting. In the evening a good talk was given on "The church," and a splendid attendance was had at all meetings in spite of the mud. The Saints were commended for the zeal displayed. Although we have only ten families in the branch, we are glad to report over $600 as our contribution toward the auditorium fund.

A. E. AIRRESS, Publicity Agent.

In a recent letter Apostle T. W. Williams says: "We leave for the Continent December 1. This trip will take about two months. Will return to London about February 1. Expect to start for Palestine February 13."

News From Philadelphia

On December 5 we had the pleasure of hearing Brother G. L. Harrington, physician of the church. At 2.30 he spoke to the boys and men and at 4 p. m. to the girls and women on hygiene. It was very instructive as was his talk in the evening, when his topic was the "Word of Wisdom."

We are very busy in Philadelphia with the choir practicing for the Christmas cantata, Sunday school work on their pageant, and the Temple Builders preparing for the social on New Year's Eve.

At 4 p. m. Sunday the choir had a rehearsal of "The Messiah's coming," after which we enjoyed the very appetizing supper prepared by the ladies' aid.

We have a very industrious ladies' aid who meet every Wednesday. In the morning they sew and do other kinds of work and in the afternoon Brother Osler instructs them in the history of the church.

We have a fully organized basket ball team now and we hope that this will aid in bringing many more young men into the work. We wish them all good luck, I'm sure.

The people are growing more spiritual of late for we can see it and feel it in our prayer meetings, and we trust that this feeling will continue with us; not only continue but grow stronger each day.

CORRESPONDENT.

GLASGOW, MONTANA, December 6, 1920.

Editors Herald: I know the Saints who read the church papers are always delighted to read of the work in other places, of the efforts put forth, and the progress made.

We organized a Sunday school at this place four years ago with nine members, and a year ago a branch was organized with twenty members. Seven of these have since moved away, but others moved in, so that now we have twenty-eight resident members. We have a splendid hall we rent on the ground floor in the heart of town.

These few Saints in one year have raised in Christmas offering, auditorium building fund, and collections, just about $800, besides the tithing paid.

Two weeks ago at the close of our district conference we persuaded Elder George Thorburn to stay for a time and hold some special services with Elder Eli Bronson. These meetings close to-night. We have had the very best of weather, and a better hearing has been given us by the townspeople than ever before. The attendance has reached to about one hundred.

We just recently changed our meeting night for the Religio from Sunday night to Friday night, and it appears to have been just the thing as the attendance has greatly increased. Last Friday night there were 84. This was beyond our fondest hopes, and what an opportunity to teach and try to influence the lives of those who come. Our Sunday school is prospering as well. To-day we reached the high mark in attendance of 64.

From the meetings quite a number have become interested in our faith, as evidenced by their coming back each evening during the series.

We have made several openings at surrounding points, going by auto the past summers, where we have been given a good hearing and are hopeful of results to follow these efforts. These openings have been made possible by our efficient and generous Brother Earl Wilcox who owns the auto that carried us to these points.

We expect now to follow up this series of sermons by securing the addresses of all the people who attended the services and visit them at intervals with literature and an invitation to come to our regular services.

Hopefully, JAMES C. PAGE.

PARKERSBURG, WEST VIRGINIA.

We are particularly anxious to receive local historical reports for 1919-1920. This is important, and branch presidents should see that the local secretary or some one especially appointed prepares and sends in this report. Election of officers and a consideration of all the live motions on the district books will be the chief business. Address all communications to W. A. Sinclair, M. Notice of Appointment—District Chorister

To Whom Concerned: At its last conference, the Southern Indiana District selected Sister Katherine Schmitt, 2806 Duncan Street, Louisville, Kentucky, for recommendation to this department for appointment as chorister of the district, vice Sister Cordelia McCormick, resigned.

We are pleased to make and publish this appointment and we bespeak for Sister Schmitt the cordial and liberal cooperaof one of the Saints, as teacher. Much of the early success of the work was due to his interest and energy.

Through the preaching of Brother Newton six were baptized in 1918. A mission was organized following the conference of that year and the work has been more firmly established, continuing about the same through 1919.

In the spring of 1920 Brethren B. and Charles Beall and families moved here from Goose Creek, the former having had experience in church work. Brother James McConnaughy was appointed to West Virginia this year and has preached some fine sermons. He is liked by all the Saints.

Several of the Saints attended the district conference this year at Clarksburg and were greatly encouraged. On October 10, a branch was organized here, with Brother Cross as president. The Sunday school was reorganized and the work took on new life. Things are looking better and about twenty have been baptized since the work was opened up.

We went over the top in the auditorium drive, $1,217 by those here and near here.

Dollar Sunday was also a success here. The amount raised was $15.25. Our Christmas offering is coming along fairly well. We are trying to do all we can to help the work along.

H. B. SMITH.

The elections of officers for the Sunday school and Religio in Lamoni have resulted in the nomination of Max Carmichael by the branch presidency for the office of superintendent of the Sunday school and the unanimous ratification of the school, succeeding himself.

The Religio asked for a nomination, and as a result F. M. McDowell continues to preside over that department. These departments are doing excellent work for the community.

The Saints of the Sarnia, Ontario, Branch, will open their new church on Talfourd Street, on January 9, 1921, and cordially invite all to be with them. The Women's Department will serve meals in the basement.

Elder R. V. Hopkins, pastor of the Independence churches, was in Lamoni recently, accompanying Mr. Thomas L. Sloan from Independence. The latter had addressed the Saints in Zion, a very large attendance greeting him. At the conclusion of the service he was presented with a Book of Mormon. When he had addressed the Saints of the Lamoni Branch, he was presented with a similarly-bound edition of the Doctrine and Covenants.

Pastoral Notices

To the Saints of the Northeastern Illinois District; Greeting: The history of our lives for the year of 1920 will soon be written, and as members of the kingdom of God we soon should take an inventory of our possessions, that through this survey and examination we might be able to determine our standing before God.

The work which lies before us as a district this coming year, calls for individual consecration of talents to the service of the Master, and every one of us possesses some talent which we can put into operation if we will to do so.

The principal thing directly before us is to get our home and branch fences repaired, or in other words, see that our homes are functioning in harmony with God's law. Let us lay aside the human vision, false timidity, and worldly pride, and let true love run through the home as the blood circulates through the human body. The love of Christ can only come into our hearts when we of ourselves open the door and let him in.

The work in the branches is similar to that of the home, for really the branch is, or should be a home, of, and for God's people only on a larger scale.

We plead that the local ministry go forward as the true "undershepherds" of our great Leader and Commander as opportunity permits, that likes and dislikes, friends or enemies, may not in any way retard you in the Christlike service which our Master has called us to render to all. The service to our enemies should be rendered just as promptly, and as freely as to our closest friends; less than this, we classify with the Pharisees of old.

We solicit for our local ministry the full faith, prayers, and cooperation of all the membership. When they visit you in the capacity of a minister and the occasion permits, do not hesitate to invite them to pray with you, and counsel with you in church duties.

In these outlines, if carried into effect, we feel that the law governing in the individuals, as well as in the collective body, will have been sustained, and much blessing brought to all.

We also earnestly recommend that one or more of the church papers be found among the papers and magazines coming into the home.

After the holidays, the Lord willing, we shall endeavor to arrange with your branch president for a two days', or a week's meeting if you so desire.

Praying that the spirit of love and peace might be your chief possession and with the season's greetings to all,

I beg to remain humbly your servant,

JOHN L. COOPER, District President.

An Experiment in Management

The Procter-Gamble Company (soap makers) adopted a year ago the plan of having its 5,000 employees represented on the Board of Directors—one employee from each of their three factories, at Cincinnati, New York, and Kansas City. This has had only one year's trial, and vice president, H. H. Vance, states it is only in its experimental stage, but shows a tendency to bring the employees nearer the management, and is full of promise of present and future success.

To "the Elect Lady"

From the harvest of long years you came
 With your white-flamed soul and honored name.
 When the time was near you leaned to catch the call,
 Where in a land of freedom sweet peace lay over all.
 Long generations, brave from years of old,
 Had brought their glory for your woman-mold;
 And in it, lo, the Master-hand had set a spirit flame,
 For He, alone, knew all, of why you came.
 He knew why this incarnate something fair;
 Knew what wonder-things it should with spirit share;
 And so He made the heart all warm and soft and sweet—
 A heart for all life's loving truly meet.
 But in the will put iron that kept the soul
 In dignified and stateliest control!

For this you came: to meet that other one and stand
 Throughout his life, a vibrant shield at hand.
 The hand that wove the fabric of the gospel plan
 Was under yours; each thread he threw,
 You watched to see that it fell true.
 The pattern lay before his eye,
 You saw the racing shuttle fly,
 And checked or hastened, 'til the day
 When cold and still the weaver lay.

And when the son took up the plan,
 Again you stood to guide the man.
 Tall, gracious, straight, with wondrous eyes,
 You kept your counsel kind and wise.
 And your undying trust kept true
 To all you loved and hoped and knew.

For this you came, a high estate—
 To keep the heart's wild beating straight;
 To guard the spirit, hold the soul
 Calm and serene while storms should roll
 And thunders break and friends betray—
 A blest, high tower of strength to stay.
 To-day we stand with this desire,
 To light our torch by that same fire;
 To keep our watch, to hold control
 Yet give of consecrated soul.

We bring an offering to you
 And consecrate ourselves anew
 To unreserved service wise
 Wherever need for service cries;
 As true as you,
 As brave, sweet, grave,
 Calm and serene as you have been,
 To meet the storm with heart as warm;
 With gentle will, speak or be still;
 To say "I must" and keep each trust
 In memory, brave one, of thee—
 Our Elect Lady.

The Day of Our Lord

Christmas is a day of tremendous significance and of widely varied meaning. It is clear that thousands of years ago at this time, the celebration of the return of the power of light, the sun, from the south was celebrated. It is clear also that it was taken as a symbol of the coming of the Son of God. In Rome, the Saturnalia, with some of its grosser aspects, was decidedly objectionable. In its higher significance it typified the Son of God, the Prince of Peace, who, when he came to reign, would bring true equality. The lamb and the lion would lie down together; the little child would play on the cockatrice's den. It was a time of justice and equality between all, and this was signified by those who were lords or masters before, serving their former servants. It was a time of the evergreen tree, and the distribution of gifts. In the northland, it was in some ways a superharvest feast. In other ways, it was connected with the Yule log. We find the tree again coming in, as of special significance, and the giving of gifts.

With us to-day, the customs differ somewhat widely in western Europe, between France, Germany, and England. In Holland the shoe is put out for Saint Nick. The French speak of Noel, and the English of Santa Claus.

Sometimes the day is made one of trial, for some at least, in the giving or exchanging of expensive gifts. This is, of course, a grave mistake. It is indeed well that we should rejoice for all the day signifies, and especially with our belief of the early preaching of the gospel, and that the Son of God is indeed Jesus Christ, and that symbolism in ancient times, as well as to-day, was trying somewhat imperfectly to express this fact of the coming of the Son of God—the redemption of the world.

The mere giving of gifts in itself would fall short of this reality, even though for childhood. Yet within reasonable limits, the symbolism of the day is desirable.

But for us of older years, the clear fact should be perceived—that the day is one set apart to celebrate the coming of the Son of God to earth, with the intention of giving his life a ransom for many. "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John 3: 16.

So far as the giving of gifts is concerned, we cannot better show our appreciation of that gift than in the giving to the church of God in the Christmas offering to send the gospel abroad, and in the giving to the poor of earth, at home and abroad.

To those who would mourn, the significance of the day, in the coming and resurrection of Jesus, is wonderful. For as he has risen to sit down on the right hand of God, so also shall our loved ones, and we as well, arise to newness of life. Death does not end all, but is merely a prelude to more complete life. For as in Adam all die so in Christ are all made alive.

It is indeed the day of hope, as much as is Easter; his coming, his entrance of life, as well as the fact that he has risen from the dead. For he laid aside his glory on high to the end that he should come, die for man, and rise from the dead, to receive again the glory that he had with the father before the world was.

To those who love humanity, the day is one of rejoicing, because God loved the world. To those who rejoice in the gospel of the kingdom, the day is one of great happiness and holds but a faint symbol of his great sacrifice. In the plan of redemption, was the Lamb slain from the foundations of the world, that through his teaching and example he might draw many souls to God.

It should be a day of deep rejoicing and of peace. As such, the HERALD greets the whole church on the eve of a New Year for Christ. S. A. BURGESS.

Blue Pencil Notes

Every man is the guardian of his own honor. Every woman is the keeper of her own virtue.

We cannot escape responsibility. Pilate washing his hands is the pitiful, ever-recurring picture of man consenting to the crucifixion but wishing to escape the responsibility.

Free agency is not so easily washed away. It is at once the glory and the condemnation of men.

Adam, saying to the Lord, "The woman thou gavest me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat," is the old picture of man ever trying to put the blame on some one else. Blame is not so easily shifted.

It would seem that it would be a splendid thing if we could set aside some particular day or hour, have one Titanic moral struggle, win the victory, and have the matter ended for life. We could then choose the prayer meeting hour, at a time when it would be very easy to win out, and make the fight for all time.

Free agency, however, is given us not only to-day, but to-morrow, and day after to-morrow. Life is the great "Valley of Decision" from the first dawning of a sense of right and wrong until we reach the portals of the tomb. Every day is a day of moral struggle and decision. Every morning we face new or old problems of duty, of right, of responsibility.

But the Lord had done this much for us, he had made us creatures of habit—in every muscle, in every nerve, in every brain cell, we are creatures of habit, and tend to do the thing that has been done before. So that the more often we win the moral fight, the easier it becomes. The Psalmist says that the path of the righteous man shineth brighter and brighter until the perfect day.

Habits are thus splendid servants, if they are habits of righteousness; if they are evil habits they become in time terrible masters. Arthur Stringers wrote of the growth of an evil habit, thus, in not overstrong terms:

"Wee, blind, and weak, he whimpers at my breast,
Teasing and petulant he whines, and will not rest!
Now, snarling, careless-clawed, he drags at me

In uncouth play so fierce I dare not set him free!
 Now gross and slather-fanged and grim of will
 He stalks me naked through the world, whom he must kill!"

Good habits are like good horses. They serve us, even when we are off guard, or holding the reins with weakened hands. I at one time borrowed a horse and buggy of Brother A. E. Jones, in the city of San Bernardino. I started for town, but on the way became engrossed in meditation, and rode along with slackened reins, giving no attention to my route. Presently we came to a full stop. Rousing myself, I gathered up the reins and looked about to see where I was. Lo, and behold, we had stopped in front of the Latter Day Saint church! If the old horse had stopped in front of a saloon, what a different story it would have told about Brother Jones! But the horse had been driven to church three times on Sunday and every Wednesday evening for years—so naturally went where he had often been before.

Good habits will do that too. A temperate man walking the street may look into a saloon window and for a moment be tempted. But his legs carry him right by, even before he has time to rouse his moral faculties, because they have always carried him past saloons instead of into them. Every muscle, every nerve, every brain cell, tends to do the thing that has been done before. How necessary then that we cultivate habits of righteousness and truth. They are our best defense in time of stress and temptation. A man's best protection is within him. And, oh, how much nobler it is than any granite wall, sky-high and devil-proof, that could be built around him to keep evil out. For in the last analysis, every man is the guardian of his own honor; every woman the keeper of her own virtue.

Temple Builders Manual

The Temple Builders Manual is a neat book of some sixty-eight pages, with an artistic blue cover, stamped in white. It is divided into two main parts—organization and work. The first contains a discussion of ideals, symbols, how to organize, initiation, uniform, and clubrooms. Under the latter is considered the work of our young women in the church and the community, home building—with its various subdivisions of home decoration, clothing, food, and a reference to mothercraft; also your calling, including education, vocation, and a list of books on vocational training, health, the social graces, literature, and drama.

The book opens with a poem by Sister Vida E. Smith, and a dedication to Ruth Lyman Smith, who is at present the director general of the Women's Department. It contains some pleasing cuts, and ends with the Temple Builders song. It also contains, on a loose leaf, a pattern of their symbol, to be used in making the arm shield. It is full of a great deal of practical counsel and suggestions. It is advertised for sale by the Women's Department, Independence, Missouri, at the reasonable price of 50 cents. Every young woman in the church should have a copy of this book.

Journal of History Late

Various causes have contributed to making the October number of the Journal of History late. It is nearing completion now, and will ere long be sent out to regular subscribers. We print this item so our readers may not be unduly concerned over the nonarrival of their issue.

The Message of the Yearbook

President F. M. Smith Speaks of the Women's Work

The women of the church must see clearly the close relation of their work to the problems of Zion and the contribution they will be called upon to make in its upbuilding, and I fully expect the women to be alert to their opportunities and active in their task for the welfare of the church, for a tremendous task lies before us, to be accomplished only by devoted consecration.

Director General of the Women

If it has necessitated the development of thoughtful, intelligent, consecrated women, "humble and full of love," to bring the women's work to its present recognized position, what increased qualifications, what renewed consecration, are demanded of the women of this church as they enter into the actual Zion period?—Mrs. Frederick M. Smith.

From the Superintendent of the Women's Department

Ignorance is sin. "Intelligence, or the light of truth," is the only avenue by which escape from the universal disaster is made possible. Acquaintance with the Spirit of God by earnest study of his laws and will, coupled with a determination to live the principles of life thus revealed, is a clear path of duty. As ignorance, the blighting curse of humanity, separated mankind from the pure Source of light and truth, so shall knowledge, rightly gleaned and rightly used, rescue him from the mazes of doubt, the mists of uncertainty, and the wilderness of misery and unprofitable suffering.

In yearning pity for the beings he created, God has again spoken to men, and has implored them to "seek ye out of the best books words of wisdom; seek learning even by study and also by faith," that the day may be hastened when "the earth shall be full of knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." To-day the world is lacking in such knowledge. It needs to know many things. It needs to know that only he shall find his life who loses it in service to others. It needs to know the Christ as the Pattern for earthly lives, to come closer to him, to understand the underlying principles of his existence, and to realize that it is not impossible to follow where he leads.

The world needs to learn anew the fact that only in unselfish and loving ministry, such as Christ's, can the children of men find any real or abiding happiness. Self-interest must be overcome in individual lives and love must rule instead—a love which has deep roots in truth, and a clear perception of its real nature and operation; a love which seeks to minister for eternal ends, which is not content with foolish indulgences or glossing veneer but is built upon the Christian principle of humble service.—Audentia Anderson.

A Tribute by John W. Rushton

I must say that my reverence for woman grows as I learn to appreciate her magnificent fortitude. One sees it everywhere and under all sorts of conditions. I do not wonder that when God wanted a figure for his church he selected a woman. He knows what woman means, and his church must include all the graces and virtues and fortitude of woman to be worthy of him.

Home and Child Welfare

No community can be a safe or wholesome place when it is composed of units given over to unworthy objectives. "No stream can rise above its source," and no nation or church can rise above the standards made by its integral elements.

As women who are looking for the second coming of the Son of Man, and are pledged to a spiritual preparation for that coming, we must feel that in our homes is to be found the field for our very best and most earnest endeavor.

Social Service

That woman who goes into homes that need her cheer and comfort with counsel and encouragement, with tact and love perceiving the greatest needs and with tender sympathy meeting them, replacing despair with hope, gloom with joy, and discouragement with determination, is one who is following thus far in the steps of the Master, whose earth life was expressed in terms of just such ministry.

Social Purity

Perversion of morals is perversion of soul. There is no safeguard against this evil and its sure and pitiful effects except that contained in spreading the saving light of truth and knowledge, and building up the will to walk therein. Young people do not knowingly destroy the bodies of which they are naturally and justly so proud. It is through ignorance of the laws which govern them or their weak and misguided wills, that sins against the body are committed. Safety lies in having implanted in very early years, the proper reverence for life and for every law which governs it and its continuity.

The Home Department

As we emerge from the traditions of the past, we sense more deeply the interdependence of all God's laws, and the fact that his people are inseparably connected in interest in all lines of higher development. Thus the work of the church is towards one ideal, no matter how or by which department it is expressed.

Historical

Present knowledge is based upon past experience, and the book of history holds the key to human advancement. While we may not all, nor at all times, realize to its full extent the value of making record of that which we accomplish, or even of our failures, yet let us try to support our historical department more heartily in the future than we have in the past.

Citizenship

By cooperation women have been able to accomplish their enfranchisement. The record of the struggle is marked by the entrance into the fray of one after another of the leading women's organizations of the country, and the splendid work of the prominent women whose names are endeared to all who have noted and appreciated the service they have rendered, has done much to justify the contention that sex is no barrier to a successful meeting of civic responsibilities. . . .

The women of the church should be found in the foremost ranks of those who are pledged to a betterment of human environment. They should study the history of human government, from its earliest forms up through the varying periods of its development. They should obtain for themselves the broad culture and the broad vision which attend an acquaintance with world problems, with the laws and functions of governments of other nations and with principles which are universally applicable. They should feel the stirrings of those impulses which are to be found in every mother's heart, irrespective of race, color, or nationality, and should understand that it is a world-wide responsibility to meet, in an intelligent manner, world-wide needs. To feel and know these things, a careful study of world conditions is necessary.

Finance

Women should not be burdened with the local financial cares of their branches except as they, individually, shall be anxious and willing to give their share of direct contributions. Their service to their branches should assume the wider aspect of social and spiritual betterment, not neglecting to meet the material needs as well. . . .

Progressive districts and branches of the church are setting aside a budget for the use of the Women's Department, in order that its important work may not be hampered in their localities by lack of means. This plan makes for harmony and close cooperation and is showing its good effects upon the spirit and atmosphere of the districts and branches where this plan is followed.

Zion

The eyes of the church are upon Zion, as set up in these latter days. The eyes of the whole world will be upon her when she arises in the strength of her beauty and righteousness and in successful demonstration that Christian love and Christian principles are not impossible in these selfish and pleasure-maddened times.

Of theory and pronouncements there have been enough and to spare. For visual testimony that Christ rules within and that souls are attune with the Infinite the world has long been hungering. It starves for the things of the Spirit, the waters of eternal life which have so long been lost among the desert sands of selfishness and greed. To subdue self and exalt each the other, to lose sight of individual interests in those of the common good—this is the task of the inhabitants of Zion. . . .

In the fields of the home and child life, women are paramount in influence, and thus a very definite portion of Zion's redemptive work must rest upon them. Truth and purity and sincerity must rule in every home, Christian thought and principle guide every individual unity. Love, the "new commandment," must permeate every heart and find expression in unswerving devotion to the common good. Motives must be elevated and conditions which affect the people of God brought nearer the ideal. Physically, mentally, and spiritually, the standards of the homes and the people, are to be raised according to divine will and purpose. To do this the women must "go about doing good" as did their gentle Example. In fact and in deed they must "do noble things, not dream them all day long."

Subjects Being Discussed

Indian Convention Would Abolish Indian Bureau

Elder Hubert Case writes very favorably of the meeting of the Society of American Indians, held at Saint Louis, the middle of November. He was permitted to hear Tom Sloan, the president of the society, Doctor Coolidge, the former president, and Doctor Montezuma, of Chicago, who is one of the greatest men of the Red race, and the great force behind the movement for freedom for the American Indians. He states that Old General Pratt, the founder of the Carlisle Indian schools, also spoke favorably for Indian freedom. At the Indian reunion, the white people and the Indians were associated both socially and religiously.

He writes in favor of giving the Indians public schools, and educating them with the white children, and favors in the church their association on a basis of equality. He writes that the movement now is to give the Indian a voice and vote in social affairs, as well as in the councils to govern their money and land affairs. He says:

"The Saint Louis Convention was one of the greatest educations I have had in the Indian situation."

Thanksgiving Day he baptized three, and confirmed them, and blessed two babies. He drove over one hundred miles and preached at Yale at night, and already has three names for baptism. He has visited with the Otoes, Sac, Foxes, and Pawnees within the past few weeks.

New Faith With All Things Common

In The Independent, is an account of a new religion in Japan, Omoto-Kyo. The article is by Edwin E. Slosson. The religion appears to be rather recent. A poor woman, who was a ragpicker, claimed to have visions and the gift of revelation. She was illiterate, still she wrote much, though much of it is incomprehensible.

It is a new sect of Shintoism, and has as its fundamental doctrine: (1) faith healing, (2) speaking with tongues, (3) communism, (4) millenarianism, (5) perfectionism (6) equality of women, (7) abstemious life, (8) simplicity of service, (9) mysticism. Money is regarded as the root of all evil. They deny the right of private property, and hold all things in common. The land is divided up between families. The settlement is formed at Ayabe, a rival in beauty to the theosophical community at Point Loma, California. They believe the day of judgment is near at hand, and that the earth will be cleared for a better race.

Incidental parts of its teachings we note: Occidental civilization is based upon individualism, which is selfishness. All its literature and moral codes are inspired by selfishness. All of it must be destroyed by the abolition of individualism. The reform that is needed is the reform of man himself.

They hold that man may become perfect in this life. The writer compares many of their teachings and practices and the social aspects of their work with that of the Utah church.

Great Waste of Fruit

The great waste of fruit, year by year, is a striking factor of the high cost of living. Quantities of apples are left to spoil, because of the cost of labor, containers, and transportation. This has been the case in previous years, and if anything is more fully the case to-day.

During the war, the American Government found they could successfully dehydrate vegetables. The Germans have been doing it for many years. They have dehydrated three times as many potatoes as we raise in the United States annually. This was done during the war to save shipping space. Why should we not strongly urge that it should be done to-day to save the food value? After this is done, the risk of decay is greatly decreased. Why pay high freight rates to ship water? Why lose so much of food and food value simply because of the high freight rates? So much of food is composed of water.

This method is not like ordinary drying, and does not destroy any of the flavor. It is probable there are a great many who will gladly continue to pay for the fresh fruit in its natural state, but when there is a shortage, when there is so much need for good fruit, certainly it would pay socially to secure a strong measure of preservation.

Flying Cheaper Than Railroad Fare

Current Opinion for November describes a motor plane made entirely of metal, with a wing spread of 50 feet, and weighing a little over one ton. It also refers to a similar all metal motor plane with a wing spread of 130 feet, and weighing three tons. The airship not only flies, but does so at a speed of 112 miles an hour, carrying six and eight passengers, with the use of an engine of 150 horsepower. It is now able to fly continually for 1,200 miles. Six persons are thus carried at the rate of 109 miles an hour, with the consumption of only 105 gallons of gasoline. This was done at an actual gross cost rather below the regular railroad fare.

The Oratorio at Lamoni

Very appropriately, the choirs at Lamoni and Independence have both announced Handel's oratorio, "The Messiah," for part of their Christmas program. Independence expects to render it on January 2. The Lamoni choir, of sixty members, gave a splendid rendition on Sunday evening, December 19. Elder Harold Burgess showed marked ability as a leader and a musician in the way in which the choir rendered the various choruses. Also his wife, Sister Bertha A. Burgess, instructor in vocal music at Graceland College this year, gave special attention to the soloists. Competent musical critics said the choruses were the best they had ever heard, while expressing great surprise at the quality of the solo work.

It is really a splendid thing to find in so relatively small a number so many voices of much more than average solo capacity and training. The difficult arias were splendidly rendered. The soloists included: Messrs. George Anway, H. A. Koehler, James Houghton, Mrs. S. A. Burgess, Miss Helen Bootman, Mrs. Joseph Anthony, Miss Lena Wells, and Mrs. H. C. Burgess. Miss Patterson, instructor for the past several years at Graceland College, presided at the piano, and demonstrated her marked ability as an accompanist.

Starving Children of Europe

Many of the national organizations united in reply to the appeal of Mr. Herbert Hoover for the starving children in central Europe. Mr. Hoover estimated that the American effort to feed these children will be completed with one more year of service. Much was done during the war—more has been done during the past two years, but it is found necessary to continue this charity for a third year, on behalf of three and a half million of children of central Europe. It is estimated that ten dollars will care for one child from ten months to a year. The aim is to raise thirty-three million dollars before the 15th of January, of which ten million will be used for medical service. With this amount three and a half million children will be cared for.

Roughly this number is divided with one and a quarter million each in Germany and Poland, three hundred thousand in Austria, one hundred thousand in the Czecho-Slovakia area and the Balkan States, and two hundred thousand elsewhere in central Europe.

The winter before last, America saved six million European children. Reconstruction cut the need nearly in half last year, but unusual conditions make it necessary to care for a like number this year, who would otherwise be in acute distress.

A drive in an effort to raise over 20 million dollars for the three and half million children of Europe, and care for them for the following ten months is drawing near the close, as it is to end about the 10th of January. The Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A., the Jewish Relief, American Friends, and Knights of Columbus are all associated with this effort. Ten dollars, it is stated, will keep a child from starving for ten months. It is a humanitarian move to help these who cannot help themselves.

Elders A. H. Mills and H. C. Burgess left on the 28th for Philadelphia to confer with Albert N. Hoxie and Paul N. Craig, regarding the work of the Department of Music. Plans for 1921 will no doubt be outlined.

ORIGINAL ARTICLES

The Indian Question

[The following article appears in the TRUE LATTER DAY SAINTS' HERALD, back in 1869. It shows the position taken by this church at even that early period, on behalf of the oppressed Indian. We are publishing it because it may be of interest in connection with some present developments, and especially it may prove of interest to our Indian brethren.]

It does require more than ordinary moral courage to plead the cause of the oppressed Indian, the measure of whose wrongs has been pressed down, heaped up, and running over, and which is never presented to the scrutiny of the masses, till the ear is startled by the vibrations of the electric pulse, deciphered as a piece of news. "Horrid massacre by the Indians." "Wholesale butchery of Indians by United States troops." It is these and similar heartrending and soul harrowing announcements that produce spasmodic efforts at reform without once striking at the root of the evil, that is manifestly the cause of such gross and disgusting outrages that are semioccasionally meted out to the frontiersman by his barbarous and at best semicivilized foe.

So widespread has become the clamor for retaliation upon the Indian that it has been declared a weakness only worthy of execration to urge the dictates of justice and a common humanity in their behalf, and the man, or set of men, daring to combat the popular demand for the utter and indiscriminate extermination of the red man is browbeaten and humbugged, till the more reasonable but less potent pleadings of justice, are smothered in the popular clamor, based upon mistaken and false data. Thirty years ago, a broad and humane view of the duty of the United States toward the Indian, was promulgated by our venerable and ever to be revered President, Andrew Jackson. He said:

"No one can doubt the moral duty of the government of the United States to protect, and if possible, to preserve and perpetuate the scattered remnants of this race which are left within our borders. The past we cannot recall, but the future we can provide for."

Again: "I indulge the hope their prosperity and improvement will be secured, and a large portion of the moral debt we owe them," (the Indians,) had been honestly and sagacious and farseeing "Old Hickory," as humane as it was just.

Who can doubt, if the proper applicance of "the moral debt we owe them," (the Indian,) had been honestly and sacredly carried out, since the establishment of the Indian Bureau, we should have been spared the knowledge of the Indian tragedies on the western frontiers. The Government has been lavish in its liberal appropriations to enable the Indian Bureau to carry out its numerous treaties. On the other hand, the disbursing agents of the bureau, by faithlessness with the Indians, have made those liberal treaties gigantic swindles. Such instances are alarmingly abundant, the evidences of which he smothered amid the mysteries and manipulations of investigating committees. "If we are the intelligent Christian party, must we not prove it, by giving the full value of what we take, and giving it to the interested parties, so that it will be as permanent a value as what we take from them?"

We hear anathemas hurled from pulpit and press against the treachery of the Indian; his utter disregard for pledges and compacts, his insatiable rapacity and greed. Out upon such arrant hypocrisy!

We have allowed our agents, who claim civilization, to cheat them. Can we reproach those who are governed by a barbaric law for swindling us? Are not our missionaries and teachers laboring to convert them into such Christians as they find us? Surely we cannot be so unreasonable as to expect them to heed precept, and disregard our example! Has not the oppression of unrighteous exactors, ever led to revenge, culminating in wars of extermination?

What then can be done? "The past we cannot recall, but we can provide for the future." The entire system must be remodeled; the Indian government must be conducted upon principles of humanity and strict justice. "Power when employed to relieve the oppressed and to punish the oppressor, becomes a great blessing," hence the necessity of a rigid enforcement of the "moral debt we owe them" by those intrusted with its discharge.

We have but one duty to perform in our transactions with the Indians. We must deal justly by them in all our agreements, and with over 200,000 of them located upon reservations, (the number now on those reserves,) we can readily find abundant material to bring into speedy subjection the hostile tribes by arraying against them "the weapons of their own warfare." Then, and not till then, will permanent peace be established among the aboriginal tribes of North America.

A Thought on Christmas Cheer

By Mrs. A. McKenzie

"And there was no room for them in the inn."—Luke 2: 7.

Luke is here giving an account of the birthplace of our Savior. A picture in the daily paper of a weeping child, holding an empty stocking on this Christmas morning brought to mind these words, "and there was no room for them in the inn." Our own firesides are happy; we have plenty of the good things of life, plenty on our table, are well clad and prosperous; we see that our children's stockings are well filled; what matters it about some one else's child? It may weep itself out. Or what of the sad, lonely stranger on this merry Christmas day? Is there "no room for them in the inn"? Is there no Christmas cheer for them? Why should there be one lonely stranger, or one empty stocking in this great land of plenty? Christmas is a time for giving, but if all our gifts are only for our own, is not that pandering to selfishness?

Jesus Christ has given an example of unselfishness in leaving his beautiful home above and coming down here to dwell among men. His was a life of unselfishness—a life of service to suffering humanity—an example of unselfishness.

If we can only afford to be generous one day out of three hundred and sixty-five, let it be a Christmas to be remembered. Let us share our Christmas cheer with the lonely stranger, and the poor who cannot return our hospitality. Let them share our home and come to our table and partake of our Christmas cheer and hospitality, and be happy. "Let there be room in the inn."

Elder Daniel Macgregor is having a large number of his "bill-tractos" printed at this office for general use, with space left for date and place. This will reduce the expense and insure a supply when he wants it. A rubber stamp to fill in the required number will make the finishing of them easy. His plan has many advantages and might well be used rather generally. He states a subject, then in some three hundred words suggests phases that may be discussed in the lecture of the evening.

Will, or Will Power

By W. D. Bannister

The will is of two kinds: Selfish and unselfish. What kind of a will have we?

Webster defines it in this language: That faculty of the mind by which we determine either to do or forbear an action; the faculty which is exercised in deciding among two or more objects, which we shall embrace or pursue.

To determine; to decide in the mind that something shall be done or forborne; implying power to carry the purpose into effect. In this manner God wills whatever comes to pass.

We see by this that will is a determination; a decided question in the mind; a firm resolution; a settled purpose.

Again, the will is directed or influenced by the judgment, the understanding, or reason. It compares different objects, which operate as motives; the judgment determines which is preferable, and the will decides which to pursue. In other words, we reason with respect to the value or importance of things; we then judge which is to be preferred, and we will take the most valuable. These are but different operations of the mind, soul, or intellectual part of man.

Who has it? Surely we all have, but do we all exercise it and have we got control of it? If so, how is it, and why is it that we yield so easily to the different and varied temptations and amusements, and do the many things that are displeasing to our heavenly Father? It is because we have not full control of our will. We only have a desire to do, but we do not say "I will," and stick to it.

Webster says that will is often quite a different thing from desire.

Will and Desire

We often hear it said, I desire to do right, or I desire to be this or that. That is not a will, it is only a desire. We must determine which course we are going to pursue, or whether we are going to do right or wrong. We will surely choose that which is for our good. When we have done this, let us say, "I will do," or "I will be," and stick to it. Stand by that will, always with a purpose in view and let that purpose be to do the will of God at all times in our daily walk and conversation.

You know that Christ had a purpose in view, and that purpose was to redeem the world and give God the Glory. And he said, I will go.

He came, and we find that all through his life he kept that object in view. While in the garden, he prayed, "Father, if thou be willing, remove this cup from me; nevertheless, not my will but thine be done." He determined, resolved, or willed to do the will of his Father who sent him.

There are two kinds of a will, for Satan said, "I will go." Yes, he would be sure. He had an object in view, too. What was it? Glory, honor, praise. He wanted it all. He wanted to be the whole thing, but he was defeated in that. Mind you, he has a strong will, and he knows how to exercise it. He causes many an individual's downfall by his cunning devices and different ways of tempting mankind. He attempted to exercise his will power over the Son of God, and came to him as an angel of light, quoting scripture to him.

Again the will of Christ conquered. The selfish will was defeated, and the unselfish will conquered.

Which kind of a will have we? Is it one that says, I will go and do, or I will help in this, or I will take part here or there, yes, I will give so much of this or that, because I know if I do so, I will receive praise, honor, and glory? Why, if some people thought they were going to get certain

THE CHURCH USING WIRELESS

The following, by Gladys Denny Schultz, appeared in the Des Moines Sunday Register for December 5.

Every evening at 5.15 Ralph Knouf unlocks the door of a little wireless room in the Latter Day Saint church on the East Side, fits a headpiece over his ears and turns a knob.

A faint sound begins, a meaningless scratching to anyone else, but words, phrases, and sentences to him.

"Message to Des Moines from Independence," the call comes. "President Smith sailed yesterday for Palestine. He will be gone several months. In his absence E. A. Smith will handle all correspondence. The President is well pleased with the progress of the radio class in Des Moines and the general development of the department of communication."

The scratching stops. Knouf shuts off the apparatus and takes the message next door where A. E. Warr, the pastor of the church, lives. Within a few seconds after the message has been sent from Missouri, Warr has received his instructions from the church headquarters.

Should he wish to send an answer, it would be in the hands of President Smith at Independence, Missouri, almost as soon as the words had left Warr's lips. He could have the same instantaneous communication with the churches at Kansas City, Holden, and Saint Joseph, Missouri, or at Lamoni if he wished.

An up-to-date church to transact its business by wireless you say. But much more than that is involved in the scratch of the instrument.

It is part of a great system of insurance the Latter Day praise and honor, they would give the last cent; yes, they would even sell themselves in order to try to get certain positions in this world so as to receive the applause of man. That is a selfish will.

The Right Kind of Will

The unselfish will is to do the will of God. It prompted Abraham to bind his son on the altar of sacrifice. It caused Joseph to spare his brethren. It caused Moses to stretch forth his rod so that the sea was divided, and the children of Israel saved from the Egyptians. By it Daniel allowed himself to be put into the lions' den, and the three Hebrew children were cast into the fiery furnace. It was the cause of many of the prophets in the days of old being put to death, burned at the stake, sawn asunder; the beheading of John the Baptist; the nailing of the Savior to the cross; the stoning of Stephen; and the persecuting of Paul. It was the cause of Joseph Smith the Martyr and his brother Hyrum being shot to death, and many others in the last century; and many that are alive to-day to be tarred and feathered, scorned, and scoffed at. It has caused the mother and father to say to their son or daughter, "I will not have anything more to do with you; never come near me again."

In order that we may have the will that was in our Elder Brother, even Christ the Lord, let us go before our heavenly Father in prayer and supplication, in the name of his Son, always with the object or purpose in view, not my will but thine be done. In so doing we will receive strength to say, "Thy will be done."

"Dare to be a Daniel; dare to stand alone;

Dare to have a purpose firm; dare to make it known."

Let each ask himself, What kind of a will have I?

Saint Church is building against the deluge which it thinks will soon engulf the world.

The elders do not know when or how it will come, but as they read again prophecies in the Bible, they feel certain that it will be comparatively soon.

They think that it will take the form of strife among men. Probably business will come to a standstill. Trains will stop. Telegraph and telephone wires will be torn down, or else will be rendered useless because there will be no one to operate them. All means of communication and transportation will, they think, be cut off, and starvation and suffering will surely ensue.

Therefore the wireless which clicks its message every evening to the man at the Latter Day Saint church. It is working against the time when the wireless may be the only means of talking from town to town.

The church, also, is building up motor truck transportation service, so that goods and people may be carried from place to place should the railroads cease to operate.

But these are only small items in an immense project for protecting the Latter Day Saints against whatever calamity may be in store for the world.

A movement has been going on for some time to gather as many of the members as possible at Independence, Missouri, because it is regarded as very nearly the geographical center of the United States. Headquarters of the church are there now, and Frederick M. Smith, President of the church and the grandson of Joseph Smith who founded the church, makes his home there.

Already a temple site has been chosen, and in time a magnificent temple will be built. In the meantime, plans are going ahead for a convention hall to seat 10,000. As rapidly as it can the church is buying the land in Jackson County, and taking over industries. All over the world Latter Day Saints are tithing and sending in their contributions to carry on the project.

The movement has been organized down to the smallest detail, with a man in charge of every department. The Bishop of the church is really the financial director, the business head of the project. Under him are directors of transportation, fuel, agriculture, textiles, and communication.

The city will be called Zion. It is planned to build it in a series of squares, which in turn will be divided into squares of at least a half acre. Each family will be given a square, on which to have a home and raise enough food to maintain them. Other parts of the city will be given over to industries. Within Jackson County the Latter Day Saints expect to produce every necessity of life, so that they can be cut off absolutely from the outside world if it comes to that.

A communal system will be observed, known as the stewardship plan. Everything that a man produces over and above what is needed for the maintenance and comfort of his family will be turned into the common treasury. Then if he is in trouble, he may draw out what he needs from the common treasury. This, the Saints believe, is the ideal communal plan, toward which groups have been striving since the days of Plato. It is the only successful system, they think.

In all their planning, they follow directions which they believe come to President Smith by divine inspiration. They point to various chapters in the Bible as prophetic of the trouble which is to overcome the world, and the chosen city, which they believe will be their own Zion, and where Christ will appear at his second coming. For this they refer to Matthew 24: 28, "For wherever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together."

And so the wireless sends news of the progress of the movement to all the church centers, and gives further orders.

They are strictly business messages, and the Saints have been happy to cooperate with The Register in securing news by wireless.

But there is prophetic purpose, too, in the scratch of the wireless, as Ralph Knouf takes its story night after night.

"BORROWERS AND NOT LENDERS"

Q. As a British-Israelite, I always believed that we should lend to many and borrow from none. To what, then, did Mr. Chamberlain refer when he said in his speech on capital levy, "In the course of a month or so we shall pay back a loan of 20,000,000 we contracted in Japan"?—C. E. L. C. (Croydon).

A. You are undoubtedly quite right in believing that we should lend to many and borrow from none, and the above fact which you quote neither contravenes nor contradicts the Deuteronomic principle which is so frequently affirmed by British-Israelite writers and speakers.

The loan which we contracted in Japan, to which Mr. Chamberlain alluded, was purely a private and business transaction between the two Governments, owing to the exacting exigencies of the war, and the need of munitions, etc. It must not be forgotten that owing to exchange and the impossibility of paying in gold (due then to the difficulties and dangers of transport) the payment could not be made to Japan until after the war. Hence the matter cannot justly be regarded as our borrowing from Japan.

It is believed that the only country from which we have actually "borrowed" is the United States of America. But as the Americans are the same stock as we are, and are Israelites nationally as well, it matters not, and therefore the above great principle remains true as ever!—The Banner of Israel, (London) October 13, 1920.

Prayers are desired for a stepson of Mrs. Bessie Belk, Gross, Kansas.

In a letter from Apostle C. A. Butterworth, in the Gospel Standard of October 1, 1920, we learn that Brother Butterworth is considering terminating at an early date his service in Australia. He has served as a missionary there for over 32 years. He left America about April, 1888. He has seen many other missionaries come and go, but he has remained steadfastly at his post there. He states that he is now advised from the First Presidency that he may consider his work as an apostle in Australia completed, and may make arrangements for himself and his wife, and the rest of his family as desired—to return to America as soon as health and other circumstances will justify or permit. But the time of his return is left largely to his discretion. He still is actively continuing his work there as health permits, and is announced to preside over the mission conference, meeting December 25 to 28. The program announced is an excellent one, and shows a desire for intensive preparation.

The San Diego Union for December 4 reports a meeting of the Law Enforcement League against conditions in Lower California, and against advertising gambling in the newspapers of San Diego. Elder George H. Wixom, formerly mayor of San Bernardino, was one of the speakers.

Elder H. W. Savage has begun preaching to the Maoris in their native tongue. His first sermon to them was listened to most attentively by a large audience. Brother Savage has done much work among native people of the Pacific Islands, and so should be well qualified to instruct the Maoris in their own tongue.

Duties of Branch Officers

By Elbert A. Smith

[The following series of articles was published in tract form some years ago. However changes made in the Book of Rules of Order and Debate by action of General Conference have rendered certain portions obsolete. The series has been revised and is to be reprinted, this being the first installment.—EDITORS.]

I. THE BRANCH PRESIDENT

"The elders which are among you I exhort, who am also an elder. . . . Feed the flock of God which is among you, . . . not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind; neither as being lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock. And when the chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away.—1 Peter 5:1-4.

"Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood."—Acts 20:28.

"The Twelve and Seventy are traveling ministers and preachers of the gospel, to persuade men to obey the truth; the high priests and elders holding the same priesthood are the standing ministers of the church, having the watchcare of the membership and nurturing and sustaining them, under the direction and instruction of the Presidency and the Twelve."—Doctrine and Covenants 120:3.

The Hand of the Church

If the general organization of the church, with its First Presidency, apostles, seventies, high priests, bishops, and other officers, is admirable, the organization of the local church or branch is no less admirable.

We may count the officials of the branch on the thumb and fingers of one hand—the elder, priest, teacher, deacon, and clerk—five offices, in a properly and fully organized branch, occupied by at least five active men.

If one of the members of the physical hand is missing, or out of place, or inactive, it is hard to get a grasp on material objects. If all the members are there, each in its place, all active, the hand can grasp things perfectly. In the branch, if some of these officers are missing, or out of place, or inefficient, the branch cannot get a good grasp on the spiritual situation. But if all are there, each in his place, all active and efficient, the branch can grasp and hold the spiritual work that may be in hand.

It is very painful to have even one finger out of place. And it is sometimes very painful when a branch officer is out of his place. So the Lord has said that every man should learn his place and stand in it. Every officer should learn his duty and do it.

The Branch President to Preside

It may seem to be a truism to say that the branch president is to preside. But we mean that he is to preside in fact, and not in theory only. He is to be the head, not the figure-head.

All lines of activity and authority in the branch should be gathered up and center in the hands of the branch president—though we do not mean that he should be an autocrat.

The admirable features of local church organization appear when we reflect that under him are men who function in various departments of local church work. There are the priests, assisting him in all his duties, and moving among the Saints in house to house visiting, strengthening, exhorting, and preaching. There are the teachers, watching over the morals of the people, that iniquity may not abound; admonishing, exhorting, and if need be assisting to prune the vineyard of the Lord. Then there are the deacons, assisting the teachers, and looking after the comfort of the congregation when assembled in the church building, as well as administering the financial affairs of the branch. There also is the clerk, whose work it is to keep the records of the church.

The branch president presides over these men as truly as he presides over the membership. He is their chief, and they report to him. Yet he is not to be a despot. He should be a leader, not a driver. He should hold these men to him in the work by the power of love and sympathy and good fellowship.

He should consult with them frequently, not only in private conversation with them individually, but also in the priesthood meetings, where the officers of the branch may meet and talk over all important affairs of the branch. Thus he secures their fellowship, and the aid of their counsel. Thus he is able to use the initiative of all the officers under him, and secure the benefit of their thoughts and ideas. Thus all may work together harmoniously, with concerted and precise action.

Yet, after all, he is at the head. He must have his own policies. He must have the courage and firmness to carry them out. He must shape the course of his own administration. He must learn to listen to men, get all the good he can from their advice, make up his mind carefully, reach a decision, and then stand by it. A vacillating leader is always unsuccessful.

The branch president should study parliamentary law carefully and be able to direct a business meeting in a legal, orderly, and efficient manner. More than his own dignity is at stake in this.

We have been asked: "Should the presiding elder appoint speakers and those who are to have charge of prayer meetings, or should he leave all such matters to the vote of the priesthood meeting and abide their decision?" It occurs to us that the answer is found in the following:

"The elders are to conduct the meetings as they are led by the Holy Ghost, according to the commandments and revelations of God."—Doctrine and Covenants 17:9.

"It always has been given to the elders of my church, from the beginning, and ever shall be, to conduct all meetings as they are directed and guided by the Holy Spirit."—Doctrine and Covenants 46:1.

In this article, we are supposing, all the way through, that the branch president is an elder or high priest. In those branches where the president is a priest, teacher, or deacon, these functions devolve upon him, so far as the limitations of his priesthood permit him to perform them. The branch president or presidency, as the case may be, should make the appointments suggested above.

As a Pastor

The branch president is to be a pastor to the people under his charge. That is a high and exacting calling. Jesus instructed Peter to feed his sheep, and to feed the lambs. also. Peter passed the instruction on to the elders in the scriptural reading quoted at the head of this article.

This feeding may be done in part from the pulpit. It is greatly to the advantage of the branch president if he be a good preacher. We may scoff at those who are always clamoring for a "good speaker." But the fact remains, that whatever a man does, it is a fine thing for him to do it well. If the branch president is a good speaker (yes, and has the reputation of being a good speaker), it but adds to his power; it enlarges the area of his influence for good.

But by the term "good speaker" we do not mean a mere entertainer. We mean one who can do more than entertain. One who can both hold interest and give something worthy of that interest. One who can instruct and build up. One who can break the bread of life to those under his ministry.

The work of the pastor, however, is not confined to the pulpit. He must visit the Saints in their homes, and get close to them as individuals. He is with them in times of sickness, and in times of poverty, and in times of death. He strengthens and sustains them at such times by his faith, advice, and works. And at such times he gets closer to them than he ever can while preaching from the pulpit.

To Guard the Flock

He is to guard the flock against all influences that would destroy it. If evil spirits or false gifts manifest themselves in the congregation, it is his right and duty to detect them and proclaim against them. And when this is done, let not the Saints make the mistake of supporting the side represented by the evil spirit, or the spurious gifts in opposition to the pastor.

He is to guard the flock against false teaching and false doctrine that might tend to corrupt and destroy. And he is to guard it against evil and designing men that, like wolves, might creep in to devour.

In all this work he should be diligent and watchful. And remember that the good shepherd gives his life for the flock. Not that he may be required to die for them in every case. The man who spends his life in service has given his life for the flock. Jesus, the great Shepherd, both lived and died for his followers. He will always stand by his under shepherds when they are in line of duty.

As an Organizer

The branch president should be an organizer and an administrator, able to organize and direct the forces at his disposal. This will be an important item making for his success.

He must be more than an individual worker. He must be able to show others how to work; able to coordinate their efforts, and indeed all the activities of the local body of Saints.

All Other Functions

The branch president is to perform all other functions belonging to the Melchisedec priesthood as occasion may require, such as baptizing, administering to the sick, ordaining officers, laying on hands for the conferring of the Holy Ghost, administering the sacrament, and all those high and holy duties that belong to his office and calling.

Qualifications

It will be seen by all this that the presiding elder will require the gift of wisdom. He will need intelligence. He should cultivate tact. He must be prayerful and of great faith. He should have the spirit of discernment. He should be punctual, always beginning and closing services on time. He should be a man of tender heart. He should be a leader. Everywhere to-day the church needs leadership. Happy the branch where it is present. Unfortunate the branch where it is lacking.

This list of qualifications, with others that may occur to our readers, might tend to discourage some who feel their weakness. But remember that God has promised to give unto every man according to his need. The Spirit helpeth our infirmities.

Branch Officers Should Be Sustained

If we honor our officers, God will honor them. That does not mean that if we dishonor them he will dishonor them; but it does mean that if we do not honor them he cannot work through them to bless us, because we will not receive their ministrations. This will apply to the presiding elder and to all others of the priesthood.

We should not feel resentful if the deacon calls us to order when we are whispering or disturbing the meeting. He cannot do otherwise and do his duty. We should not resent the ministrations of the teacher as an intrusion upon our private affairs, or repel the visits of the priest. They are doing their work as required by the law. They cannot do otherwise, and do their duty. And likewise with the presiding elder. Members should honor all these men in their offices and cooperate with them and help to make their work pleasant and fruitful, that all together the flock may receive the blessings that wait on an orderly, united, and devoted ministry.

Use of Officers in the Aaronic Priesthood

General Conference suspended the old provision in the Book of Rules which ordered the election of a presiding priest, a presiding teacher, and a presiding deacon. As there never was any provision in the organic law of the church for such department heads most branches have abandoned that practice. All members of the Aaronic priesthood in a given branch who are in good standing and available for service are now considered part of the working force of the branch ready for service under the direction of the branch president. The church, and not the branch, confers priesthood, and an ordained man who is in good standing may be utilized anywhere, under proper direction, without waiting for a branch election. And all local officers report directly to the branch president and not to a department head in the person of a presiding priest, teacher, or deacon.

A Branch Presidency of Three

Some of the larger branches have adopted the custom of electing a presiding elder and two counselors or assistants. There is no provision in the law for such an arrangement—on the other hand there is no law against it. In small branches such a custom would be quite unnecessary and perhaps impracticable. In the larger branches it would have the merit of giving the president the assistance and counsel of two other members of the Melchisedec priesthood.

It should be borne in mind, however, that under such an arrangement the two men selected are counselors and assistants to the president and not presidents of the branch—otherwise confusion may arise. The law says: "A branch may be presided over by a high priest, an elder, priest, teacher, or deacon, chosen and sustained by vote of the branch." It is necessary to preserve the idea in fact as well as in theory of the one presiding head—even though he be given a number of assistants.

Shall the President Provide for Meetings During Absence?

We are frequently asked if it is proper for the branch president to arrange for some one to take charge of meetings when he is unable to attend, or during a temporary absence from the branch. The Presidency holds that it is quite right for him to do so, to safeguard the meetings during any temporary absence; rather than to trust to chance that some one of the priesthood may be present, and possible misunderstandings over precedent if several happen to be present.

In making his selection, all other things being equal, he should give precedence to superior office in the priesthood. But the welfare of the work is paramount and he is not bound to appoint one who is inefficient, or not in touch with the local situation, merely out of respect to priestly position. A meeting fares better under a capable priest than it does under an elder who is not equal to the situation. (Take note:

the rule in the Book of Rules providing so specifically for precedence has been suspended by act of General Conference.)

The Group System

In most of the larger gatherings of the Saints there has been an effort made, almost from the beginning, to subdivide the branch for convenience of work in visiting and administration. These subdivisions have been given various titles. In Nauvoo they were called wards. In Lamoni they are known as districts. In Independence they are called groups. The name is not material. The idea is not new or an innovation.

We speak of division for convenience—really the work is one of consolidation. In Independence a certain number of families are consolidated into a group, the average being about thirty families to the group. Each group is in charge of an elder and has a priest, teacher, and deacon. Then a certain number of groups are consolidated into a division. Each division is under the care of a high priest who directs the labors of the group workers. There are at present nine such divisions. All are then consolidated under the Presidency. Thus it is possible to reach all with one message. And it is possible for all to move at one time to the accomplishment of one purpose. At the same time intensive cultivation is possible. For instance, each little group has its midweek prayer meeting, and in that way many more people are reached and attend prayer service than would be the case if all tried to meet at one or a few central meeting places for the midweek service.

This system, with modifications, may be used in other large branches. Two or more groups may be formed if desired, each under an elder appointed by the branch president, or directly under the branch president, as may be determined. Each should have its corps of visiting officers. Each may have a midweek meeting, even though all meet on Sunday at a central meeting place. Probably only in very large branches will it be necessary to organize divisions, as is done in Independence.

The Presidency feels that in every given locality the Saints should work towards solidarity. In cities where there are now from two to five separate branches, there should be but the one church organization, with one central headquarters for its administration, and with one presiding pastor. There may be in the city many groups, each with its officers and several meeting places, but only one organic body. It will be possible then to work together toward one end, rather than to work independently if not indeed at cross purposes. This is an ideal toward which we should be looking.

Suggestions to Saints

Be humble.
Be on time.
Pray always.
Come every Sunday.
Stand by the pastor.
Invite your friends to come.
Read your Bible every day.
Help the Religio help others.
Pay your tithing regularly and gladly.
Love that which is good and true and beautiful.
Support the choir. It is a part of Christian service.
Practice all the Christian virtues. "Practice makes perfect."

Set your face Zionward and pray for its speedy redemption.
Choose a front pew. You'll feel more at home and the preacher won't feel so lonesome.

When the prelude starts let silence reign. It is time for

The Ten Lost Tribes—Where Are They?—Part 2

By S. K. Sorensen

In this article the writer discusses the conflict between the records of Esdras and Josephus as to the lost tribes.

Having thus far presented prophetic evidences in reference to the Lord's design to scatter Israel into all parts of the earth, we will next take up the historical part referring to the fulfillment of these prophecies.

The Lord through Moses had outlined to Israel the course in life that they might look for, either upon the condition of faithfulness in keeping his commandments or in violation of them.

The course of Israel proved to be one of rebellion toward God, and as a punishment for their unfaithfulness in worshipping God, the Lord permitted the king of Assyria to come into their land and remove them out of it.

The record found in Kings 17: 5-12 says:

"Then the King of Assyria came up throughout all the land and went up to Samaria, and besieged it three years. In the ninth year of Hoshea the king of Assyria took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Halah and in Habor by the river Gozan and in the cities of the Medes. For so it was that the children of Israel had sinned against the Lord their God, which had brought them up out of the land of Egypt, from under the hand of Pharaoh king of Egypt, and had feared other gods, and walked in the statutes of the heathen, whom the Lord cast out from before the children of Israel and of the kings of Israel, which they had made, and the children of Israel did secretly those things that were not right against the Lord their God, and they built them high places in all their cities, from the tower of the watchman to the fenced city, and they set them up images and groves in every high hill, and under every green tree; and there they burnt incense in all high places, as did the heathen whom the Lord carried away before them; and wrought wicked things to provoke the Lord to anger; for they served idols whereof the Lord had said unto them, ye shall not do this thing."

As a result of such transgression the Lord rejected them and cast them out of his sight and permitted them to be taken captive into their enemies' land and to be dispersed, assimilated, and swallowed up in the great world of mankind, until in the Lord's own time he should send out fishers and hunters that should hunt them from every mountain and every hill (kingdoms and governments) and out of the holes of the rocks (out of obscurity) and return them to their promised inheritance in Israel, which they have never as yet possessed.

We have now located Israel in the land of the Medes and the Persians, some of whom were taken and placed in the land of Israel instead of the children of Israel who were carried away. How long they dwelt there is not known and meditation; it is God's holy hour.

Stay for church. Always remember that the Sunday school is only a part of the church.

historical information concerning them is very meager.

The following extract from Esdras in the Apocrypha may be of interest and also throw some light on the subject.

"And whereas thou savest that he gathered another peaceable multitude unto him, those are the ten tribes, which were carried away prisoners out of their own land in the time of Osea the king, whom Shalmanaser the king of Assyria led away captive, and he carried them over the waters, and so came into another land. But they took council among themselves, that they would leave the multitude of the heathen and go forth into a further country where never men dwelt, that they might there keep the statutes which they never kept in their own land. And they entered into Euphrates by the narrow passage of the river. For the most high showed signs for them and held still the flood till they passed over. For through that country there was a great way to go, namely a year and a half, and the same region is called Arsarth. Then dwelt they there until the latter times; and now when they shall begin to come, the highest shall stay the springs, and the stream again that they may go through."—2 Esdras 13: 39-48.

Whether Esdras himself wrote this and when it was written is not known, but at any rate it must have been written before Josephus, the Jewish historian, wrote his history, as he refers to Esdras, which we shall presently refer to. But before doing so we shall briefly examine the claim that this extract from Esdras is made to support.

It is offered as proof to support the theory that the Lord led the ten tribes out of that country where they had been placed, (Media and Persia) and opened the way to the polar regions where they were shut in and shut out from all communication with the outside world, and yet the very purpose for which the Lord scattered them, was that they might be a blessing to all kindred, tongues, and people as promised to Abraham, but the theory, if correct, would effectually defeat and frustrate that purpose.

Another thing which this theory will conflict with, is the time stated that it took them to travel to their destination, namely a year and a half. They could not have reached the pole in that time when we consider their mode and speed of travel in those days, and the great multitude which it is said were led away, perhaps a greater number than were led out of Egypt and they were forty years making their journey from that country. When the Jews were permitted to return to Jerusalem from their captivity in Babylon they were four months traveling about two hundred and forty miles. Lehi and his little company traveled eight years in the wilderness before he reached the seashore and commenced shipbuilding. Even at the rate that the Jews traveled from Babylon to Jerusalem, "the multitude" of Esdras could not possibly reach the pole in a year and a half, but only about a ten or eleven hundred miles distance, and if they traveled in a northerly direction they would land in some of the northern European countries. That would at least appear more consistent with the designs and purposes of God, in order to fulfill their destiny, and we may yet find them there, but more about this later.

The account as given in Esdras does not warrant us in making any such application of it as to apply to the polar theory. If there was an emigration from Media and Persia, it would likely be conducted in harmony with the Lord's purpose to scatter them among the nations, and if you notice the language closely you will discover that there is not one word about icy mountains, either in going there or upon returning.

The language is: "Then dwelt they there until the latter times and now when they shall begin to come the highest shall stay the springs and the stream again, that they may go through"; not a word about ice. Apparently the greatest difficulty with this extract of Esdras is the disharmony that exists between that and the account as given by Josephus in reference to the ten tribes. Esdras was a priest among the Jews in captivity at Babylon and was delegated by King Xerxes to lead the captive Jews back to Jerusalem, and when he had received his commission from the king, he read it to the Jews, who were at Babylon and sent a copy of it to all those of his own nation who were in Media, the ten tribes who were carried away over one hundred and thirty years before. Of this Josephus writes as follows:

"And when these Jews had understood what piety the king had towards God, and what kindness he had for Esdras, they were all greatly pleased, nay many of them took their effects with them and came to Babylon, as very desirous of going down to Jerusalem, but then the entire body of the people of Israel [the ten tribes] remained in that country, wherefore there are but two tribes [Judah and Benjamin] in Asia and Europe subject to the Romans, while the ten tribes are beyond Euphrates till now [the time when Josephus wrote this account about A. D. 93] and are an immense multitude and not to be estimated by numbers."—Antiquities of the Jews, book 11, chapter 5, paragraph 2.

There is a serious conflict between these two accounts, the one furnished by Esdras and the other by Josephus. Esdras says that they were led away; Josephus says the entire body of Israel were in Media and Persia when Esdras led his company of Jews to Jerusalem on their return from the captivity. And when Josephus wrote his history in the year A. D. 93, they were still there, an immense multitude not to be estimated by number. If a choice is to be made between the two statements, I prefer to believe the account of Josephus. His learning and acquaintance with Jewish history and other histories of his time and the rank and dignity which he held because of his superior knowledge and learning, made him well qualified for the work he had undertaken.

However, it is not presumed that the ten tribes as a body continued indefinitely in that country, as that was not God's purpose any more than to send them into isolation beyond the polar regions. When James wrote his general epistle, he addressed it to the twelve tribes scattered abroad, showing that he knew of their existence in a scattered state. His epistle was written A. D. 60, thirty-three years before Josephus says that the ten tribes were still in Media and Persia in great numbers. If Josephus' record can be relied upon and if James had a knowledge of the existence of the scattered tribes to whom he wrote his epistle, the account as given by Esdras over five hundred years B. C. of their miraculous departure will be considered as of an extremely doubtful character; because Josephus, who wrote his account about 600 years after Esdras is supposed to have written his, informs us that the ten tribes were still an exceeding great multitude in Media. If any sudden departure of such an immense multitude had taken place subsequent to the year A. D. 93 strange that no historian ever recorded such a fact, as histories were constantly made at that time, of great events in particular.

But we can conceive of the fact that a constant migration in small bodies of these people could have taken place without attracting particular attention for historians to record. Asia has been the cradle of the human race and "Westward" has been their motto, hence it does not require a great stretch of human imagination or any great degree of credulity to see a tendency in this exiled Hebrew colony to move out from under the yoke of their captors and to follow the ever-abiding instinct of humanity to be free and liberated from under the hand of the oppressor.

The north and west of Europe at this time was an inviting field with its broad plains and beautiful forests, its rivers, its lakes, and its mines, rich in fertility, bright in prospect, a promised land to the children of Ephraim as the Western Continent had been to the children of Manasseh his brother; these are the ten thousands of Ephraim and the thousands of Manasseh. The seed of Ephraim should become a multitude of nations, (see Genesis 48:19) not so with Manasseh.

Hosea says (12:1): "Ephraim feedeth on wind and followeth after the east wind," hence his course is westward; he also says (11:3):

"I taught Ephraim also to go, taking them by their arms; but they knew not that I healed them. I drew them with cords of a man, with bands [captivity] of love: and I was to them as they that take off the yoke [bondage] on their jaws, and I laid meat unto them."

"I will heal their backsliding, I will love them freely; for mine anger is turned away from him. I will be as the dew unto Israel; he shall grow as the lily, and cast forth his roots as Lebanon. His branches shall spread and his beauty shall be as an olive tree, and his smell as Lebanon."—Hosea 14:4-7.

This was written before Israel went into captivity, and truly these are great promises to Israel, the ten tribes, to grow into lives of usefulness and beauty, to spread out and expand as the roots of the cedars of Lebanon, to absorb and assimilate through the processes of such expansion that which in turn is calculated to bring benefit and blessing to others as typified by the olive and the smell of Lebanon. The Lord has decreed that through them shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed. This can only be done by commingling and associating with those kindreds of the earth and not by a removal from them.

All histories which I have had opportunity to examine, agree that the earliest inhabitants of the countries of the west and north of Europe came from Asia, but who they were they do not undertake to say and could have no knowledge of, as tradition was the only means of communicating at that time to future generations. The histories and traditions we do have show that like the American Indians they had a corrupted form of Jewish rites and ceremonies, as well as a belief in one supreme God, of a future life, and the resurrection.

It would occupy too much space to go into details concerning these traditions. Suffice us to say that it is not at all probable that purely Gentile nations could at all have such traditions referring to the form of worship as held by the Hebrews; hence through these traditions though corrupted and perverted they be, their identity as being of Hebrew origin is not at all improbable, but quite clearly established, at least as much so as the origin of the American Indians whose identity was established by the restoration of the gospel. So also will the identity of the lost tribes be established through the same instrumentality.

That the Lord wanted to use Israel in a scattered state to be his emissaries in the world is clearly indicated in Paul's letter to the Romans (11:15):

"For if the casting away of them [Israel] be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead?"

Hosea 9:17 says: "My God will cast them [Ephraim, representing the ten tribes] away, because they did not hearken unto him, and they shall be wanderers among the nations." This was spoken before the ten tribes were cast away and plainly indicates that they were to be among the nations and not at the North Pole. Paul understood it the same, when he took the position that the reconciling of the world, through the gospel of course, depended upon the scattering of Israel. But more about this later.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

Just Ahead

This issue of the HERALD closes the year 1920. It is always natural and often profitable to take a little time at such a season to scan the record of the past, take stock of the present, and plan for the future.

In glancing backward over the year, we are struck with the rapid development and advancement which has followed in the wake of what was perhaps the most constructive conference ever held by the Reorganization. The setting up of Zion, as a city blessed and set apart for certain redemptive demonstrations, seemed to loose the forces of consecration in the church. It seemed to crystallize into material form and action many of the thoughts and desires of the people, hitherto expressed only in yearnings and hopings.

In the Women's Department with the adjustments made necessary many new sources of power have been tapped. Helpers have sprung up from various quarters, and it has been impressed upon us anew that the Lord is surely extending his hand to prepare his people for the concerted effort necessary in these hastening times. Our hearts have been comforted because of the consecrated services so gladly and willingly extended when opportunity was presented.

Looking forward, we feel encouraged. In many places our women are organized for study and service. They are endeavoring, to the best of their ability, to understand the duties which belong to parenthood, sisterhood, womanhood. They are learning, with a speed and thoroughness which are causing their brother voters to "sit up and take notice," about their citizenship and its privileges and responsibilities. They are moving out in their communities and learning to share both the opportunities and the duties which confront them as members of a great commonwealth. They are, above all, learning to appreciate their home cares as stepping-stones to a great development of character, their little ones as great trusts from an all-wise Creator, and their domestic joys as among the greatest and truest blessings bestowed upon the human race. Are we not justified, then, in feeling that the future has much in store for the women of this church, as they rise from one success to another, keeping always in view the worthiest ideals and objectives?

We are happy in offering for the study of our women and girls, a new series of articles on clothing. Among the truly feminine arts is the old one of sewing and of fashioning from simple or crude materials that which shall prove to be at once comfortable, serviceable, and beautiful. To be well dressed does not mean to be expensively dressed. To wear clothes which are becoming and suitable to the occasion for which they are used is the essence of good dressing. Most of our women do their own sewing and much of that required by their families. Not all have had the advantages which have come to the sister who has prepared this series of little articles for us, who has been privileged to both study and teach the subject according to the principles which have placed it upon the basis of a science. But we may all learn much by observation and study, and Sister Mader's little articles are only intended to be suggestive, to make us keenly observant, and to point the way for a deeper study of the subject discussed.

In our yearbook, several especially good books are mentioned which will prove very profitable for those groups interested in studying sewing and the making of garments. Among these may be cited Gibbs's Household Textiles, Cooley on Clothing, Quigley's What Dress Makes of Us. Other good texts are Clothing for Women, by Baldt; Dress-making, by Fales; Garments for Girls, by Schmidt; Clothing and Health, by Kinne and Cooley; Textiles, Woolman and McGowan; Textiles and Clothing, McGowan and Waite; Silk, Cotton and Linen, (Department Store Manual) by Ronald Preso, and Textiles, by Turner.

Woman's New Power

II

The present Congress is being urged to enact laws for the relief of the farmer and the cotton raiser and for control of the packers and the board of trade. Such legislation will affect prices on bread, meat, and clothing. Since the work of Congress so vitally affects our home life it is well to have a look-in on its plan of organization so that we may the more intelligently enter into our work of assisting the lawmakers at Washington.

New bottles are demanded for new wine. The age of cradling the wheat is passed. Nothing but the most up-to-date binders will now avail for the harvesting of our grain. What shall the harvest be if women of trained intellects and high ideals enter the field of legislating for humanity?

A Congress has two regular sessions, each of which begins on the first Monday in December. The first regular session may continue into the summer months, but the second regular session expires with the 4th of March of each odd numbered year. The present session is the short or closing session of the 66th Congress and will expire on the 4th of March, 1921. Special sessions may be called by the President at any time.

The Congress of the United States is composed of two houses: the Senate and House of Representatives. Senators are elected for a term of six years. One third of the senators are elected every two years. All of the representatives are elected every two years. The Senate is practically a continuous body, composed of two members from each State, elected by the direct vote of the people. At present its membership of ninety-six includes sixty-eight lawyers, thirteen business men, six newspaper publishers, three doctors, two farmers, four unclassified.

The House is composed of 435 members apportioned among the States according to their population, and the States with the greatest population have the greatest number of representatives. New York has forty-three, New Mexico, one. The present House of Representatives has two hundred and sixty-eight lawyers, sixty-nine business men, twenty-one newspaper men, nine farmers, seven teachers, five doctors, the remainder unclassified. Two thirds of the Senate and better than one half the House are members of the law profession.

The Senate is presided over by the vice president. The House elects its chairman. He is called the speaker.

Each of the dominant parties in Congress has its steering committee, members of which are elected by a party caucus. These committees very largely decide what is good or bad party policy in all party questions and it is their business to advocate a policy or object to it as their judgment dictates. Hence, the traits and characters of the members of the steering committees largely decide the kind of legislation which will be pushed through Congress.

At present the Republican steering committee in the House consists of Mr. Mondell, chairman, Mr. Winslow of Massachusetts, Mr. Mather of Illinois, Mr. Dunn of New York, and Mr. Nicholas Longworth of Ohio. The Democratic side uses for their steering committee, the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee. However, it is generally considered that the real steering committee of the Democratic party in the House, is composed of Mr. Champ Clark, Mr. Claud Kitchen, and Mr. Pugh, the former chairman of the rules committee.

Each party also elects a floor leader whose duty it is to see that the policies of the steering committee are carried out on the floor.

Another important as well as interesting official elected by party caucus is the whip. Each party has one, of course. It is the business of the whip to deliver the party vote. Whenever there is a party issue at stake he is held to be at fault if he does not whip all the voters in at the proper time. In order to do this, he must keep informed as to the whereabouts of all members of his party. His wrath and discomfort know no bounds if a vote is called and he discovers that some of his members have absented themselves without informing him as to their intentions. A whip has no easy job.

After the election of the speaker, floor leaders, steering committees, and whips comes the appointment of committees. The members of committees are nominated by party machinery but are elected by the House. Action in the Senate is similar but not exactly the same.

DORA YOUNG.

I plan next time to develop the work of committees, "pairing," and the manner in which bills become laws. If I can impress our women with the necessity of their being active in their duties as citizens, I will feel that I have accomplished something of value even though these little articles are imperfect in some ways. People everywhere are anxious for the government to function as the servant of the people but they do not understand their own power to insist on its doing so. This is the vital thing for America to learn. Personally, I believe that unless right thinking people take hold of the reins of government civilization will be replaced by anarchy. I am not a pessimist but I make this deduction from the present tendencies (of women especially) to do too much idling and luxuriating. The ideals of the present age are fine—the problem is to get the masses to work for them. Taste is a hard thing to implant. Unless it is born in one and cultivated by proper environment there seems little chance of acquiring it.

Textiles: How to Know, Buy, and Use Them

I

ADULTERATION AND BUYING

Now that so many ways of weaving and mixing kinds of cloth fibers exist, it is most difficult for the average buyer to know materials, for only a few tests are available for home use and these are not altogether satisfactory. The kind of cloth to be purchased will depend upon the use to be made of it; and the quality required will be determined by its use and by the price paid for the goods.

A few points to be considered in the selecting of materials made from the different fibers are given in the following:

Cotton

Sizing is the main adulteration practiced in cotton materials. It gives an apparent weight and firmness that can usually be detected by feeling, as it imparts a harshness to the fabric. In thin goods it can be seen as starch between the threads by holding the cloth to the light. Pastes are sometimes used to imitate embroidered figures but are unsatisfactory because they are printed on only one side and either disappear altogether, when washed, or turn brown, when ironed. Goods really treated to give a genuine mercerized effect will be lustrous on both sides. That which shows a luster on one side only has probably been made so by pressing with engraving rollers and will lose its sheen as soon as laundered. Tearing goods slightly at the edge will determine its strength which may have been impaired in the bleaching process or by the action of chemicals used in the sizing or dye.

Wool

The ability of wool to retain its shape and smoothness through much wearing, the readiness with which it absorbs and retains dyes, and its retention of the body heat make it in much demand. The adulterations practiced are of a more serious nature and harder to detect. Very little of our so-called woolen cloth is to-day made from new wool. Much of it is made either from old rags worked back into fiber called shoddy and perhaps mixed with a very little new fiber or cotton, or very short fibers—clippings from tailor shops, sweepings from looms, etc.—are matted into the surface of the new cloth to give added weight and thickness. This latter adulteration may be detected by raveling threads from the cloth, when the short fibers will drop out. Shoddy gives us a cheap wool of excellent warmth but the threads break easily and the fabric does not look rich.

The mixture of cotton and wool may be a very good one, as in undergarments where the cotton readily takes up the moisture, giving it off gradually to the wool. The chief objection to such an adulteration is in dress materials because of the uneven shrinkage of the two fibers which makes it impossible to keep the garments well pressed. This does not hold true with mohair and alpaca because the wool used in them is hair-like and does not shrink and felt as sheep's wool does. Burning serves as a fair test to distinguish cotton from wool. Cotton burns quickly and with much more flame than wool. Wool has an odor of burnt feathers and leaves a crisp ash.

Silk

Silk spun from an inferior grade of cocoons does not have the luster or strength of reeled silk but the two used in combination often produce excellent materials. Cotton and artificial silk are frequently used to adulterate and are woven into such fabrics as rajahs, tussahs, etc.

But the very serious adulteration of silk is the using of metallic salts, gums, etc., to add weight. This loading process reduces the wearing quality and causes it to split and wear shiny. The simplest test for such weighting consists in burning a piece of the fabric. If pure the silk will burn slowly leaving a small amount of ash in the form of a crisp edge. If weighted, the silk will burn leaving the ash in the form of the original cloth. This readily drops to pieces.

Linen

The most satisfactory home test for linen to distinguish it from cotton is to use a few drops of olive oil when linen becomes translucent; cotton remains opaque.

While it is necessary to use some sizing or starch in linens so they will not become too badly soiled with handling on the counter, it brings out the beauty of their texture for home use much better to use no starch whatever.

The fiber may be finished as round or as flat threads and is especially desirable for table linens, scarfs, etc., because of its peculiar leathery texture and its ability to retain its place on the table or dresser, etc. Its quality of absorbing moisture makes it especially desirable for towels, handkerchiefs, etc.

Ginghams

It is said all threads for good ginghams are dyed before weaving which can be detected by raveling a little of the goods. I have not been able to verify the statement, however, and do not know that it is conclusive.

BERTHA DONALDSON MADER.

[EDITOR'S NOTE: The above is the first of a series of little articles on textiles and clothing which Sister Mader has prepared for us. They will serve as a basis for study and discussion on these topics which should be of great interest to us. All women desire to be properly and becomingly attired. All Latter Day Saints should desire to be conservative in both appearance and expenditure and our women will appreciate these little studies.—A. A.]

A "Sewing" Program

Many women dislike sewing because of a lack of proper instruction, proper equipment, or proper methods. Such women find a great deal of help and encouragement in talking over the subject with their friends and neighbors. An exchange of ideas is often profitable. Why not have a "Making Sewing Easier" study hour sometime? A program has been suggested for such an afternoon:

Roll Call: My favorite sewing economy.
Talk: Essentials for the sewing room.

Demonstration: Care of the sewing machine and use of the sewing machine attachments. (This may be given by a local agent or by a woman who makes use of her machine attachments.)

Demonstration: The bound buttonhole: (This may be given by a tailor, or woman expert in tailoring.)

Debate: Resolved, that it is more economical to buy the family clothing than it is to make it.

"Illustrative material always makes a talk or demonstration much more effective. For example, if the one who is to talk on 'essentials for the sewing room' would have a number of the smaller pieces of equipment at hand she could make a much more interesting and worthwhile talk than to just mention them in her discussion. 'Things seen are mightier than things heard.'" A. A.

Garment-Making Clubs Being Formed

Many young women over the country are being organized into garment-making clubs. The general plan of these clubs is the same. Each club is composed of five or more members between the ages of 10 and 18. Two years' work in proper sequence is undertaken under an instructor. Each member keeps an account of cost of materials used, time spent, and other items of interest. At the close of the course an exhibit is held to which each member contributes at least three finished garments, repair work on an article of clothing or household linen, a report, and a story on "What I learned as a member of the Garment-making Club."

Can you think of anything finer for the young womanhood of America? Although this is the day of "readymades" and she may never make any of her own garments, yet each will know the mechanism of the job, and be able to keep her clothing in repair.—Omaha Bee.

What Is Your Style?

To find your style and keep it means just this: If you know that your walk, your build, and your size are not in harmony with short skirts, use a tunic skirt, thus acquiring the short skirt effect by means of the tunic and using the foundation skirt to make the dress becoming to you.

If your arms and shoulders are heavy, forget that fashion's calendar carries kimono sleeves; they are not for you. Instead, use as narrow a shoulder as the mode will permit.

If your back is broad, use a form of panel that will be in accord with other lines in your dress and at the same time lessen the appearance of width.—Omaha Bee.

How's This for "Pep"?

From one of our very able organizers comes the following letter:

"The inclosed order completes our list of those to whom we wish to send Yearbooks at this time. In this way we have placed in the hands of every one of our missionaries in this district a copy, and also sent one to some interested person in every branch in the State where our department is still unorganized. Accompanying the books we sent letters and hope the good done in this way will result in a better understanding of our work, as well as perhaps lead the way to final organization in many, if not all, of these outlying branches.

"Personally my estimation of the Yearbook is that it is the best thing that has ever been published by the department.

"Always working for the success of our cause, and with best wishes, I remain, Your colaborer."

Copies of the Yearbook may be obtained by ordering direct from our office, Box 255, Women's Department, Independence, Missouri. Price 60 cents.

Excellent Work at Niagara Falls

First Presidency: I reported to you last spring some plans we had made as a means of stimulus to branch affairs. You would probably be interested in the outcome.

We started by asking the men of the branch to meet with the priesthood at stated times to discuss branch needs etc., by which we learned the views of the laity and were more able to cooperate. This developed all concerned and from the number of men thus helping the Lord has since selected and we ordained Brethren C. A. Spilbury, elder; P. A. Ely, priest; I. Spilbury and Charles Everitt, deacons; and others are developing into useful men in the church.

The priesthood work is excellent. We are getting all members gradually visited. The priests have learned to draw the line and let people know they are not teachers and tend to the spiritual. This is having good results and bringing branch and priesthood to unity and cooperation. We meet about every week to consider ideas and plans.

This is not all that has been accomplished. We painted the church building interior and put in new pews as planned, and to our surprise Sisters Warner and Wahl presented us with a beautiful seat for the ministry, of beautiful, highly polished oak. Sister Hanutt Robins, unsolicited, put on a concert and raised money enough for new light fixtures, and also Sisters Emma Sharpe and Marie Dixon had a novelty sale a week ago and raised money to varnish the floor. The ladies' aid, with Sister Warner as president, are doing fine work and have raised hundreds of dollars and intend also doing much toward repairing the basement, new carpets, etc. We started last spring with no money on hand, hardly making ends meet, and did all the above and are out of debt and also have our winter's coal in and paid for.

The auditorium followed, with $2,800 signed, and tithing doing fine, also Christmas offering. We are not boasting but feel very much encouraged. The auditorium call even brought back some who hadn't come to church for some years; that is very, very rarely. We find that the Saints want to do something. The night we made the call for auditorium funds, I asked a young brother to guess what was subscribed. He guessed less than a hundred—I believe thirty dollars—and he was not joking, but when I told him the hundreds signed he said, "Have they all gone crazy?" but he immediately was equal to the occasion and agreed to give one hundred dollars himself to the fund and fifty dollars tithes. The Sunday school children all signed to help and they are being educated as to what the church is doing and realize that the world doesn't center at the Niagara Falls pivot.

The spiritual side has also increased accordingly; at least we so judge, and much credit is due our worthy missionary force: J. F. Curtis, who carried on a wonderful campaign, also G. W. Robley, James Bishop, and G. F. Robley, with some timely advice by our esteemed Gomer T. Griffiths. Our baptisms have been few but much good has been done and many friends made and we anticipate that some day a missionary will come in and baptize a good number and may get much of the immediate credit; but we will not forget all the preparatory work done.

Brother Robley (G. W.) has been holding cottage meetings. We met last week at an Indian home and a wonderful spirit prevailed. The Indians were delighted and they are of an educated type, college trained, I believe at Carlisle University. We plan to follow up these meetings as we can reach people who fail to come to church.

We have had our election of officers for next year and are already organized for work. We found too much time lost last year at Christmas but do not expect to relax this year. If we can just keep the priesthood and laity busy we will not have time for mischief.

We had a letter from G. F. Robley the other day from Graceland and if all the students write such beautiful and optimistic accounts of the work there it will accomplish a great deal of good. The letter which was a detailed analysis of the college and work made us feel stronger in the faith and hurrah for Graceland.

We are using the card system in our priesthood visiting and keeping a detailed account of all membership and each member of the priesthood returns his cards to me as president to be then retabbed on the larger cards. We intend to start an advanced study class after New Year festivities are over.

May the church move on and on is our united prayer,
Yours in bonds,

NIAGARA FALLS, NEW YORK. WILLIAM J. LANDES.

Southern Wisconsin

No doubt many will be pleased to have a few lines from this district, it being the home of the Reorganization, and especially Beloit, as many of the early movements of the Reorganization were had near this city.

The work is onward in the city of Beloit, and the branch here have just purchased what was the German Presbyterian church, located on Saint Lawrence Avenue, almost in the very heart of the city. It is only two blocks from the street car line, and about the same distance from the Chicago and Northwestern station. The church is 30 by 48 feet, all furnished, with a good organ, piano, and electric lights, having also a Sunday school room, 16 by 24, on the back of the church. The street is all paved, so there will be no street paving expense. This was purchased for $2,500 cash, and while it will be all that the branch can do, yet we believe that in due time the debt will be met. Yesterday was the opening day and several Saints from Evansville and Janesville gathered with the Saints here for the all-day meeting, with services as follows: Sunday school at 10 a.m., preaching at 11 a. m. by J. O. Dutton, preaching at 2.30 by B. C. Flint, Women's Department at 4, Sister Effie Hield in charge, followed by special meeting of the officers of the Religio, N. E. Hield, jr., in charge; 6.30 Religio, local officers in charge; 7.30, preaching by J. O. Dutton. Thus ended a very pleasant opening day for the newly purchased church in Beloit. Should any desire to assist the branch here, do so by sending your donations to Elder E. A. Townsend, pastor and acting treasurer of the branch, 1052 Bluff Street.

Our district conference convened at Evansville, December 4 and 5, meeting in the city hall. The attendance was about as usual, being representatives from all but one branch in the district. Bishop's agent, C. C. Hoague, reported on the auditorium fund, that while our quota was $2,500 yet we had pledged over $4,300 so we hope that by the time the building is done that we will have reached the $5,000 mark.

The election of district officers resulted: J. O. Dutton, president; N. E. Hield, vice president; Sister Audrey B. Dutton, secretary; C. C. Hoague was sustained as Bishop's agent. Sister, Mary Woodstock, chorister. Adjourned to meet with the Soldiers Grove Branch, in June. The Soldiers Grove Branch is building a new church near the site of the old one, three miles south of the grove. And should there be any who could spare some means, it would be very gratefully received by the branch at Soldiers Grove, as it is quite an undertaking for the Saints to build this new church. Send all donations to Elder Arthur Davenport, Soldiers Grove, Wisconsin. The work for the most part seems to be onward in the several branches of the district; Sunday school, Religio, and Women's Department assisting as best they can.

We trust that the Saints will also remember that the regular work of the church is going on aside from the building of the auditorium, and all should be anxious to pay their tithing, and make liberal offerings that the Presiding Bishopric be not hindered.

Should any know of Saints or friends living in Milwaukee, please send their addresses to Elder F. V. Dreyer, 239 Third Street, who will be pleased as branch president to look them up and do all he can for them, together with the other branch officers and the members also. Their meeting place is in a hall at the corner of Sixth Avenue and Mineral Street. The same for Beloit, sending their addresses to Elder E. A. Townsend, 1052 Bluff Street.

Your servant in service,
 BELOIT, WISCONSIN. J. O. DUTTON.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, December 12, 1920.

Editors Herald: The Cleveland Sunday school is progressing very nicely under the enthusiastic guidance of Superintendent Robert Miller.

Brother Frank C. Webbe, assistant superintendent, has had us keep in mind the Christmas offering, and the attendance. The use of charts has proved helpful.

Brother V. T. McKinney, as boy scoutmaster here, has been keeping up the interest of the Boy Scout troop in the Sunday school, and at present we have a fine flourishing boys' class.

Brother and Sister Haynes are in charge of the musical work in the Sunday school.

We are making great preparations for our Christmas entertainment. We are sure it will be a great success.

We had an oyster supper a short time ago, under the auspices of the Sunday school, the proceeds being put into the Christmas offering. Dollar Day was observed in fine shape in Cleveland.

The primary department is doing splendid work under the direction of Superintendent Edna Mehlisch and consists of three flourishing classes.

Ever praying for the success of the Sunday school both here and abroad I remain,

In gospel bonds,
 WILLIAM F. WEBBE, Secretary.

NORTH TOPEKA, KANSAS.

Editors Herald: The branch is growing, both in number and spirituality. Five years ago there was just a handful of Saints here, but now we have a goodly number, and at times the house is full. We can see God's hand in opening the way. The young people are taking hold of the work, and several have been baptized in the past year. There are others near the kingdom. I think we are doing well with the Christmas offering.

We cordially invite any of the Saints to visit with us. We like to see new faces. You can always telephone our branch president, A. P. Crooker.

MRS. J. E. ALFREY.

General Secretary.

Our Departed Ones

REED.—Mrs. Flora Vianna Hicks Reed was born February 7, 1862, in Hancock County, Illinois. When a child moved with parents to Pennsylvania. Married Joseph V. Reed in 1882 and 4 children were born. Baptized in 1898. Moved to Oklahoma, and as a result of her efforts work was done in Nowata and branch organized. Died November 30, 1920. Leaves husband and 3 children, one dying in infancy. Funeral from Saints' church at Nowata, sermon by Lee Quick.

BROWN.—Richard H. Brown was born March 4, 1867, at Omaha, Nebraska. Married Pearl Evans, of Fremont, Nebraska. Father of 7 children, 6 of whom survive. Died December 4, 1920, at Gering, Nebraska, after affliction of 3 years from cancer. Funeral conducted by Hale W. Smith, in Methodist church, at Gering, attended by large number.

SHAFFER.—Lornie Cecil Shafer was born June 27, 1920, at Midian, Kansas. Died after an illness of a few days on November 24, 1920, at Ranger, Texas. Funeral services from Carson's Undertaking Rooms, Independence, Missouri, conducted by Joseph Arber. Interment in Mound Grove Cemetery.

PRING.—Mrs. Lillian F. Pring passed away in Riverside Hospital, Seattle, Washington, November 17, 1920, after a lingering period of suffering. Was not a member of the church, but received comfort by the prayers of the ministry. Laid to rest in Mount Pleasant Cemetery, after funeral sermon by J. M. Terry.

ANDREWS.—George T. Andrews died at his home in Seattle, November 20, 1920, on his 45th birthday. Was ill about a year. Leaves wife, daughter, and other relatives. Funeral sermon by J. M. Terry.

EZZELL.—Levi H. Ezzell was born in Lincoln County, Missouri, September 27, 1843. Died November 10, 1920. Had made his home for some time with his daughter, Mrs. Florence Bloom, of Webb City, Missouri. Was a member and minister in the Christian Church in his younger days, but for forty years had worked for the interest of this church. Survived by 5 children, 24 grandchildren, and 4 great-grandchildren. Funeral sermon by Jasper Richards, of Pittsburg, Kansas; interment in Webb City cemetery.
