There are, however, certain percentages of expenditures which have been worked out by specialists who have examined carefully into the subject, and, taken as average conditions of average people in the average walks of life, these estimates may prove of some value to us as guides in making out our individual budgets. These we will consider briefly.

Household expenses are usually divided into two classes, called "necessities" and "higher life." Under these two classes come practically all accounts. Under the first, we have Shelter, (including rent, taxes, fuel, lighting, etc.) Food, (which would include groceries, meat, fish, dairy products, ice, etc.) and Clothing, (including suits, dresses, underwear, overclothing of all kinds, laundry, cleaning, repairs, sewing, etc.). Under "higher life" we find savings, insurance, health expenses, entertaining, civic activities (such as clubs), culture, (such as books, music, travel, art, lectures, education, etc.) and luxuries, (such as amusements, recitals, automobiles, pleasures, recreations, etc.). Of course different authorities classify some of these things differently, but in a general way, it will be easy for us to determine under which heading to place each specific thing.

Now as to percentages in regard to expenditures for these various things. We find ourselves inclined to consult our well-informed sister, Mrs. Henry C. Smith, who is preparing the outlines of study for our social service courses. She classifies expenditures as follows:

- Spend of your income, about
 - 30 per cent for operating expenses.
 - 30 per cent for food.
 - 15 per cent for clothing.
 - 10 per cent for investment.
 - 5 per cent for health.
 - 10 per cent for general development.

She goes on to explain the items as follows:

1. Operating: Rent, water, fuel, gas, electricity, taxes, insurance, (house, furniture, life, accident, health,) car fare, express, telephone, stationery, postage, newspapers, ice, laundry (and supplies), papering, painting, replenishing kitchen and house supplies, wages for help in house, garden, etc.
2. Food: All food consumed, meals out, candy, ice cream, etc. (According to recent Government record you should spend about

One fourth of food money for bread and cereals.

- One fifth for meat, fish, and eggs.
- One fifth for milk and cheese.
- One fifth for vegetables and fruit.)

3. Investment: Stocks, bonds, Liberty Bonds, savings, payments on property and household furnishings, payment of principal on home, etc.

4. Health: Prescriptions, drugs, doctor's and dentist's bills, etc.

5. General development: Education, music, lectures, books, magazines, clubs, church tithes and offering, charity, travel, recreation, and car fare for these.

It will be understood however, that a budget based upon percentages must in all cases be varied to suit the varying incomes. For instance, the amount needed properly to nourish a human body is practically the same, no matter what be the environment in which that body lives. Thus if a man is earning a salary of $1,500 a year, 30 per cent of that spent for food for his family of four would amount to $450. If his salary be $5,000 should he spend the 30 per cent—$1,500—for food alone? No; we find that the higher the income, the less the percentage needed for the class of expenditures termed "necessities," and the more is spent for items under the heading of "higher life" or "general development."

The Government has been making a campaign to show the people of this highly-favored but extravagant land the beauty and value of saving systematically, whether the amount be small or large. This is a hint for the people of our church, for we all want to have some means on hand with which we may do our part in these many industrial and economical enterprises which will soon be under way in Zion. The large assembly hall which was ordered at the last Conference, the much-needed office buildings and equipments, the various stake buildings, additions to Sanitarium, College, and other sorely-needed items, will necessitate our saving systematically and carefully, if we shall be privileged to assist in carrying out this building program. We should all have, and are entitled to, our needs and just wants, but it is in determining what are "just" wants, that we will have to keep in mind our really sincere and intense desires to help to establish Zion. Is it not significant that the Lord, in referring to our temporalities, classified them exactly as have our national and educational experts, into "necessities" and "higher life," only he calls them "needs," and "just wants"?

In making out our budgets, then, let us see if we cannot all set aside a certain sum for our savings column. The United States Treasury department says that we can all save something, and has made out a table indicating what we might expect in that line. It follows:

Monthly Income	Savings
	Number in family
	one	two	three	four	five
$ 65 ($ 15 a week)	$ 1	$	$	$	$
75 (900 a year)	4
100 (1200 a year)	12	10	7	5	3
150 (1800 a year)	30	27	21	15	10
200 (2400 a year)	60	48	40	31	21
250 (3000 a year)	90	65	53	40	30
417 (5000 a year)	175	126	106	91	77

Several detailed account sheets or books are available from different sources. During the specific drive mentioned above in which the Government tried to instill into the people the principles of saving, many banks distributed without cost, books which were well adapted to the keeping of household accounts. Fifty cents sent to the Society for Savings, Cleveland, Ohio, asking the bank to send a copy of their Household Budget Book will bring you one containing useful information along this line, according to the department of home economics of one of our universities. A request sent to the War Savings Committee, 105 West Monroe Street, Chicago, will bring a copy of their pamphlet "Thrifty in the Household," according to the same information.

If you do not care to send for any of these prepared account sheets, which may also be found in bookstores, you can make your own very nicely, by ruling off large size paper into columns, and placing your headings to suit yourself. According to the United States Treasury Department, the headings should be about as follows:

1. Income: Salary, wages, sale of produce or goods, rental of property or rooms, etc. (Income tax is a minus income, and should be subtracted from income.) Chickens, eggs, milk, vegetables, fruit, etc., produced at home and used on the table, should be added to the income, and the value of such produce may be added to both income and the food columns.

2. Savings: Savings, bank deposits, endowment life insurance, premiums, money invested in war savings stamps, stocks, bonds, real estate, etc.

3. Food:
 Meat, poultry, game, fish.
 Dairy products—milk, cream, cheese.
 Fruits and vegetables.
 Groceries and breads—all bakery goods, fats, sugar, flour, tea, coffee, etc.
 Meals outside the home.

4. Shelter:
 House or room rent; or
 Repairs, taxes, insurance, and interest on mortgage (if there is one) when house is owned.
 Car fare to and from work.

5. Clothing:
 Garments, shoes, stockings, gloves, dress goods, sewing materials, dressmakers' bills, etc.
 Cleaning and repairing, cleaners' bills, shines, shoe polish, gasoline, dyes, etc.

6. Operating:
 Heat, light, telephone, ice.
 Household supplies and furniture, as matches, soap, stamps, ink, kitchen utensils, labor-saving devices, towels, bedding, etc.
 Help and laundry.
 Miscellaneous: fire and buglar insurance, personal tax, car fare for shopping, etc.

7. Advancement and other expenses:
 Education: books, papers and magazines, music, lectures, lessons, school or college expenses, societies or clubs not social or religious, travel (educational), toys, games, pets, tools, etc., for children, Farm Bureau.
 Recreation: movies, theaters, travel, athletics, social expenses, social club dues, etc.
 Church and charity: church, charities, Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A., Red Cross, hospital funds, societies for tuberculosis, infant mortality, etc.
 Personal expense: insurance (life, accident, sickness), barber, hair dresser, toilet supplies, stationery, postage for personal correspondence, candy, soda fountain drinks, flowers (unless a gift).

Gifts and entertaining: whatever one does for the pleasure or comfort of others.

Health: doctor bills, dentist bills, medicine, tooth brushes, paste, etc.

We trust that this article will help a wee bit towards the end that we, the women of the church, shall be more efficient as home makers, more intelligent and economical, that we may have comfort in our homes and still have somewhat to spare for others in greater need, and for our church as well.

Inward Beauty

The rill is tuneless to his ear who feels
 No harmony within; the south wind steals
 As silent as unseen among the leaves.

What has no inward beauty, none perceives,
 Though all around is beautiful.

Our Paper Shortage!

Owing to paper conditions we are informed that it will be necessary for us to order at once the paper for our entire leaflet courses, if we wish to have them at all uniform in appearance and quality. This will make necessary our asking that all who have subscribed for any of these courses, will at once complete their orders, remitting the balance due for the completed series.

This request will not work a hardship upon any, we feel sure, as the price asked for each series is so very small, only 25 cents. It is and has always been the intention of the women of our department to place their instructive literature in the hands of those who desire it, with the least possible expense to those ordering. We realize there are many who find it necessary to curtail every avenue of outlay—in fact, in these strenuous and trying times, it is a duty which falls upon everyone, to conserve incomes, and reduce expenses to the minimum.

That is why we placed a price upon these courses which will barely cover the cost of production and distribution, and it is not a figure which will allow us to make heavy advances of money beyond that which may safely be made by the hearty, generous cooperation of all according to the terms of this request.

Some study circles have availed themselves of the offer we have made, to send copies of these lessons in quantity, at the rate of ten cents per dozen. They have ordered the first or second lesson in this way, and then perhaps have neglected to order their quota of the other lessons which are ready. Thus the files have become somewhat broken, but we are glad to announce that, for a time at least, we will be able to fill orders for the first lessons of the courses, the later ones of which, however, are still in process of preparation.

The three leaflet courses we are offering are as follows: The child welfare course for those having the care of small children; the social service course for those desiring to study modern ideas of relief, charity, supervision, etc.; and the food and body course, giving in simple form the fundamental facts of the body and its fuel needs, the kinds and amounts necessary to health, etc.

The first one of these is prepared by the supervisor of our Home and Child Welfare Bureau, Sister Lydia Thomas Wight. She is herself a young and devoted mother, carefully trained in all that goes to make for efficiency in this important work, withal a Latter Day Saint who has been able, through the training and light of the gospel, to make clear distinctions between essentials and nonessentials—between things of passing and of permanent worth. She is a student, a university graduate, and able to give her work the permanency which comes from an intimate acquaintance with books and research work.

The two other courses are prepared by Sister Henry C. Smith, better known to college and university friends as Mabel Knipschild. Her wide acquaintance with the science of home making, and, later in a large city with the modern methods of relief and charity, makes her offering peculiarly valuable. Her conclusions are in harmony with the fundamental principles of our Zion revelations, which if thoroughly understood and carried out by those having charge of the physical and financial welfare of our people, would hasten the longed-for time when "there will be no poor among them." Poverty is always either the result of misfortune or incompetency, both being conditions which might be relieved and overcome by the proper methods.

Our sisters in local branches can make no mistake, if they include in their study plans, these three fine courses, offered by our department at such trivial cost. We should have a perfect avalanche of orders for this material, and we hereby challenge you to flood our office with the same! Twenty-five cents, to bring to your home from twenty to twenty-four lessons culled from many reliable and authentic sources, condensed to conform to your busy life, adapted by consecrated Saints to the peculiar conditions of our church life and people, is a small matter when contrasted with the good which is thereby received. We who profess to believe that the Spirit of God is the light of truth, should be extremely anxious to line ourselves squarely up with every effort to radiate its illuminating beams; and that which is directly influential in making us better mothers and better home makers, as well as better citizens and better church members, is especially welcome to us.

Let us repeat: All sisters who have ordered heretofore a lesson at a time, will you please send in the balance of the subscription price which will pay for the entire course, and allow us to fill your orders as the lessons are ready? And if, by any chance, anyone has put off ordering these leaflets, let us urge you to procrastinate no longer, but send in your order at once, while the files are complete.

Address all communications to our general office, Women's Department, Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, Independence, Missouri. A. A.

A Home Poet

The skies of springtime made my heart
Grow faster, gladder, in its beat.
I tried in vain to pen my joy;
But, oh, my house was clean and sweet!

The summer days brought plots galore
Of rosy garden—lover's sigh.
I sought to prison them in words.
I only made a better pie!

The autumn colors flaunting gay
Made love-songs float and falter down.
In vain I wooed elusive rime.
(The turkey was a tender brown.)

A thousand sparkling fancies came,
With winter at my heart to knock.
Oh, lure of frost and fairy flake!
I wove them into baby's frock.

—Beulah R. Stevens.

Regrets of an Unfaithful Servant

The Lord Christ wanted a tongue one day
To speak a message of cheer
To a heart that was weary and worn and sad,
And weighed with a mighty fear.
He asked me for mine, but 'twas busy quite
With my own affairs from morn till night.

The Lord Christ wanted a hand one day
To do a loving deed;
He wanted two feet, on an errand for him
To run with gladsome speed.
But I had need of my own that day;
To his gentle beseeching I answered, "Nay!"

So all that day I used my tongue,
My hands, and my feet as I chose;
I said some hasty, bitter words
That hurt one heart, God knows.
I busied my hands with worthless play,
And my willful feet went a crooked way.

And the dear Lord Christ—was his work undone
For lack of a willing heart?
Only through men does he speak to men?
Dumb must he be apart?
I do not know, but I wish to-day
I had let the Lord Christ have his way.

—Alice J. Nichols.

LETTERS

What Is Surplus?

BY THE LAMONI STAKE BISHOP RICH

This letter is a continuation of the series sent out to the Saints of Lamoni Stake.

"That part of a man's possessions, whether of moneys or properties, of which he has no present or immediate need; the word need being determined by the man's position, sphere of action, his business and his dependencies."

That the reader may get the full benefit and significance of this definition of the term surplus, we give the history of this definition.

"It appears that some difference of opinion had arisen among bishops, bishops' agents, and counselors, relative to the meaning of the word 'surplus' used in the 'Address to the Saints' by the joint council. The matter was referred to the joint council of the Twelve, Presidency, and Bishopric, by a meeting of bishops, bishops' counselors, and bishops' agents, in which this difference arose; and to this joint council the Presidency submitted the following opinion which was indorsed by the joint council after considerable discussion." Then follows the definition of the term surplus as given above.

In further elucidation of this term this same joint council added the following to the definition:

"Not all have a surplus; many may have; the widow standing before the treasury giving her two mites did not give her surplus; she did consecrate of her living. Many widows and dependent women, hard-working, self-sacrificing, give of their labor a consecration, yet all may give of that which they have if they choose who may have no surplus under the general laws, either as tithing, free-will offering, or consecration.

Allotment of Stewardships—When and Where?

Recognizing the fatherhood of God logically compels us to admit the divine sonship and brotherhood of man.

Every man being, as Paul says, "the offspring of God," (Romans 17: 28) it follows that every man is a steward of God. (Doctrine and Covenants 98: 12; 118: 4.)

Some men may be entirely ignorant of this wonderful fact, but their ignorance does not vitiate the truth.

Others may understand their relationship to God but fail to assume the responsibility.

There are still others who understand their sacred calling as stewards, and desire to enter therein and occupy for the Master.

When can this be done? Does the person have to live in Zion or her stakes to be entitled to occupy as a steward?

In Doctrine and Covenants 51: 1 we find stewardships being allotted to Saints in Kirtland, Ohio, which was not in Zion at that time. (See also Doctrine and Covenants 61: 4; 64: 4; 83: 18.)

In paragraph 5: "This shall be an example unto my servant Edward Partridge, in other places, in all churches."

This shows that stewardships may be given in all the churches (branches) wherever there is a branch. As stated before, every Saint is a steward of God. His complying with the law of temporalities and receiving the acknowledgement of the church through the Bishop, is what formally makes and recognizes him as a steward.

This formal acknowledgement by the church can be done in Zion or outside, and when the Saints so desire, providing the person so desiring has complied with the laws governing stewardships.

In fact, every Saint should both in theory and deed become an acknowledged steward, no matter where he resides. The sooner the better.

Section 106: 2 states emphatically when the time for procrastination must cease: when we "gather unto the land of Zion." If they do not, "they shall not be found worthy to abide among you."

All Saints now living in the confines of Zion should hasten to comply with the law of temporalities; failing to do so knowingly, they cannot claim the blessings of God.

Our next letter deals with the amount to be invested in a stewardship.

Arkansas District Organized

On my way south from Independence, Missouri, I stopped off at Mulberry, Kansas, and preached in the Saints' church for two evenings, and then by invitation of Elder Bath, who was holding services in the church at Arma, Kansas, I went there and preached for them one evening to a nice audience of Saints and friends. Several of the Saints from Mulberry went over with me for the service.

I went to Joplin and found the Saints well and active. The basement of the church has been paid for and about one thousand dollars more pledged for the completion of the new church. Elder T. J. Sheppard is branch president and well liked by all the Saints. On Sunday I preached both morning and evening to good crowds. In the afternoon Bishop R. Bullard arrived in time to make a talk at the close of the prayer service on stewardships, encouraging the Saints to help raise money for the big auditorium to be built at Independence, Missouri. Elder Charles Fry, who is president of the Spring River District, was in Joplin making arrangements for a ten-day series of meetings.

After an all-day trip I reached Wilburton, Oklahoma, in time for the eight o'clock preaching service that evening. Tuesday I baptized three boys; preached again Wednesday night, and Elder W. M. Aylor preached for them Thursday night while I went on to Fanshawe and preached to a full house and others outside in the yard, Brother Aylor joining me the next day.

Elder S. W. Simmons was holding a series of meetings at Fanshawe and had baptized five and has a fine interest.

Leaving Fanshawe, Brother Aylor and I spent the night on the train on our way to Bald Knob where the Saints were coming for the purpose of organizing the State of Arkansas into a district. We were soon made welcome at the home of Brother and Sister W. F. Martin, which is missionary headquarters.

The Baptist church had been secured for services, so we were kept busy Saturday and Sunday. On Sunday, May 23, the district organization was effected. The following officers were elected: president, Elder A. E. Zeigenhorn; vice president, Elder T. A. Gorden; secretary, Miss (Sister) Ida Emde; Bishop's agent, W. F. Martin; chorister, W. J. Edwards.

The Arkansas District is now on the map and has four branches, as follows: Bald Knob, Fisher, Hot Springs, and Hardy, with Saints scattered in different parts of the State. Elder J. T. Riley was present at the organization and was happy to see his work of several years result in a district organization. Other missionaries have also labored here and much good work has been accomplished.

Sunday night Brother Aylor returned home to prepare for his trip to southern Africa, while I remain here for a week and am holding services in the new Christian church to nice crowds. Strawberries are ripe and strawberry short-cake is just as good as ever. Crops are backward on account of too much rain. In gospel bonds,

BALD KNOB, ARKANSAS.

Canada is to have a diplomatic representative at Washington, who will report directly to the Canadian Government. He will be in charge of the imperial interests here in the absence of the British Ambassador, and so have his headquarters at the British Embassy. Because of the close relation of Canada and the United States, it has for some time appeared desirable that they have a separate representative, and the British Government has consented.

The Travels of Paia a Metuaoro

Brother Paia and I left Independence Saturday, May 8, for the East desiring to reach as many points of historical interest as possible during the limited time he shall be with us.

Saturday evening and all day Sunday, May 9, were enjoyed with the Saint Louis Saints by whom we were well received, and where Paia enjoyed himself immensely. We were pleased to meet Elders Williams, Farrell, and Dowker there. Monday evening, May 10, was spent with the Saints of Maryland Height Branch, where Brother Paia was again royally received.

Tuesday morning we left for Kirtland, Ohio. At Cleveland we were met by Elder Wouters, president of the branch, who drove us in his car from Cleveland to Kirtland. Elder Paia will never forget his visit to Kirtland. When he got his first good view of the temple from the hill across the river all he could say in English accompanied by his usual smile was "Beautiful!" When Paia entered the temple and saw how nice and clean and white everything was he said that that was the way the garments of the Saints must be who desire to assist in the redemption of Zion. Paia and the writer were pleased to meet Sister Lake, who with her husband had done such noble work in the islands. Wednesday evening we enjoyed the prayer meeting with the Saints in the chapel there, and Thursday evening Paia preached in the temple to an interested audience. He felt highly honored in being permitted to preach the gospel, as he expressed it, in the only temple standing to-day built by the command of God.

After Paia's sermon in the temple the Saints gave Paia quite a reception, and an enjoyable time was had by all present. There were about one hundred and twenty-five present, and by reason of the good Spirit that was present we were better able to enjoy the singing, instrumental music, short talk, and refreshments which followed. A purse of money was presented to us to assist us on our trip. It was with great reluctance that we separated from them the next morning.

Friday, May 14, in company with Elder Bishop we reached Buffalo, New York, and together with Brother Voltman of Buffalo we reached Palmyra, Saturday, May 15, and by auto were driven out to Hill Cumorah and Joseph the Martyr's old home, also visiting the place in the grove where Joseph prayed and received his wonderful vision.

We have taken several pictures of Elder Paia in these places of historical interest, and hope to have some lantern slides made for the use of our missionaries in the islands.

Paia enjoyed the visit to Palmyra, especially the visit to Hill Cumorah. While upon the hill as we were all seated there overlooking the beautiful surrounding country we sang to the music of the song, "I will sing of my Redeemer," the song, "Book of Mormon, hid for ages," as translated into the Tahitian language and as we sang those words, "Buka a Momoni i hunahia, I te aivi Tumora," all who were present enjoyed the presence of God's Spirit. We returned to Buffalo that evening with thankful hearts for this great privilege of visiting that sacred spot.

While at Buffalo we stayed at the home of Brother Doctor Weegar. Sunday, Brother Paia preached at Buffalo in the morning, and at Niagara Falls in the evening to interested audiences.

Our brother's visits with the Saints of these various branches has done him much good as well as those visited, and he appreciates the many kind receptions given him and will have much of great interest to tell his people when he returns to his homeland.

We hope to reach Independence some time next week. Paia expects to leave America on steamship Tofua, June 10.

Your colaborer in Christ,

More things would come to him who waits if they were not captured on the way by him who waits not.—Selected.

TOLEDO, OHIO, June 4, 1920.

Editors Herald: Many who have written have expressed themselves as I would have done had I written in regard to the conference past, as compared with the one a year ago. My heart is made glad that many who would not see their way clear to indorse every proposition advocated this year could so humble themselves as to enter into the work with a consecrated heart. How grand to see the young take up the work of sacrifice that is being done this year! It hardly seems right that I should not share with them in the great sacrifices that the hastening time calls for, and it has been hard to feel satisfied to consent to the relief granted me by those whom God has given charge of the appointing of men to their stewardships. When I think of the years in number that I have spent in the work of the Lord, and the sacrifices my family have made in a social and financial way, I feel that I am justified in trying to make their future while I shall live more pleasant by being in a more settled condition. While I do this I shall take no greater pleasure than in doing all I can for the work in the locality where we shall finally locate to make our future home. My joy has been and is in active service.

Since conference we have been trying to make sale of our property, but so far we have been disappointed. Several like the property but not well enough to purchase it. It will be a great relief to find some one who wishes to make Toledo a home and will purchase our property so that we can move into the regions round about Zion. We are located near the church, and have a home that if located where we wish to make a home is all that we would want.

Satan seems to be getting in his work in the church as never before, but thank God some who have been in spiritual darkness for some time have returned and have taken up the work in a way that will not only do them good but do all others with whom they come in contact good. My soul rejoices in seeing the wandering sheep safe within the fold. I hope to so labor that I may lead many others to see their errors, both those in the church and those without, that their joy may increase.

One thing I am saddened at is to know that some who have great ability have let habits so far affect their ministrations as to destroy their influence for good, and this ability is lost to the church and the world. I have more fully enjoyed the Holy Spirit in my ministrations since the last conference than before, and sometimes wish that years could be added to my active service in the work of God. I shall rejoice to see the results of others' labors. My labors on the street have been fraught with great good, and the power has been with me in a remarkable way. This work should be continued, and while I am here will do my part in continuing it.

My hope grows brighter, and in this hope, I am, your brother,

J. F. MINTUN.

BELLAIR, ILLINOIS, May 30, 1920.

Editors Herald: The great commission was to go and teach all nations. The elders travel over this line. When any of them pass through we would be very glad to have them stop off and stay with us. We are trying by the help of God to hold out faithful, up and doing at all times in this grand and glorious work.

Just one hundred years ago the vision was given out of which developed the restoration in this age. The birthplace of the church, in the settlement of western New York, particularly the district comprising Palmyra and Fayette, is a very interesting one in the history of the church.

The messages they brought to us cause us to open our eyes wide enough to see where we were stopping. We are delighted with the sound of the gospel. The work of Zion looms up greatly to me as a Latter Day Saint. "What is expected of me as a Latter Day Saint?" This is a question that confronts us as children of God. If it does not, there is something wrong. It is time to exercise care. The church is staking its future on the young people and they are worth every effort we can make for their good.

MISCELLANEOUS

Pastoral Notices

To the Saints of Central Texas District; Greeting: The undersigned has been appointed to labor in the above district as a missionary. This is to inform you that I am in the field with the gospel harness on and at work, but will need your cooperation. I ask your kindly interest in the work to the end that the warning cry may be heard in places that have not been reached by missionaries in the past.

Come, let us be laborers together with God in the accomplishment of the work intrusted to our care. To me the field is new and I am unacquainted with the Saints and their needs. Come, let us get acquainted. Write me at once, for I shall be glad to hear from the scattered membership as well as branch officers. Inform me of your needs and your demands will be complied with if at all possible, and as soon as possible.

My mission or field address will be 3014 Birmingham Avenue, Dallas, Texas.
J. C. CHRESTENSEN.

To All Saints in Iowa, Manitoba, and Saskatchewan; Greeting: We come to you under favorable auspices. The recent General Conference is still radiating its rays of unity and inspiration. Never was the time so favorable as now. The opportunities for reaching the world with our message are multiplying beyond our capacity to respond. We solicit your assistance.

Our purpose is to unite and concentrate the missionary powers resident within the bosom of every Latter Day Saint. All are called unto the work, and as God has said, "Let him that laboreth in the ministry and him that toileth in the affairs of the men of business and of work, labor together with God for the accomplishment of the work intrusted to all."

That this work is the missionary work is evident from the opening of the paragraph, "Prosecute the missionary work."

To do this work our General Conference appointees are few, far too few, but that is the cry everywhere, so we have no complaint to offer.

We must therefore depend on local help. It is indeed as if the olden times were recurring, when they went forth without purse or scrip, leaving their families to the care of Providence.

We ask, therefore, if there are any who are willing to give their time, or any portion of their time to missionary work. If so, communicate with us at once, and we shall take the matter up with the appointing powers. It is immaterial to us whether you hold priesthood or not, as we can use a number unto the distribution of literature and in many ways assisting in three big tent campaigns now under process of development.

The Saints of Pottawattamie, Little Sioux, and Des Moines districts are responding magnificently, unto the securing of three big tents 40 by 60 for summer campaign work. Doubtless other districts will follow just as soon as we can get men to do the preaching.

In this missionary work it will be practicable to use the splendid talent of the sisters, both in song and tract work. Let us hear from them.

It is intended to put one or two able speakers with each tent, assisted by a band of workers who will simply carry the gospel to the people in a way they have never been reached before.

In this work piles of literature will be required. Don't destroy your Ensigns, HERALDS, or Autumn Leaves. Everything of a gospel character can be used, but it must be unsoiled and attractive. Begin gathering now and in due time you will be advised where to send it.

For a little while I must give my attention to the starting of these campaigns in Iowa, where the field is so prolific of opportunities, and so Manitoba and Saskatchewan will be patient and push along as best they can. We have them in mind and next to our heart. We shall hope ere long to institute something in that splendid north land that will bring our cause to the limelight of a city set upon a hill.

Will the missionary appointees communicate with us early and often. Just tell us how it's going and what is needed in way of assistance. Indeed we wish to hear from all imbued with missionary zeal. Tell us of the opportunities in your locality and what in your judgement should be done.

This missionary work has got to go, and it will go if we all only give it a strong pull, a long pull, and pull all together.

My field address for the year will be 1121 East Fourteenth Street, Des Moines, Iowa. Sincerely and fraternally,

DANIEL MACGREGOR.

To the Saints of the Chatham and London districts, Ontario; Greeting: Having been appointed supervisor of the missionary department of your districts, we take this means of soliciting your cooperation and informing you of our policy.

The many calls for labor and the lack of sufficient missionaries to answer the demands impel us to urgently request every local elder or priest, who can be spared over a weekend or a few hours on a Sunday from his local work, to volunteer his services to do missionary work in the vicinity where he lives. Those with autos might go farther away. We also want those who can sing, and others to distribute literature.

"Let him that is warned warn his neighbor," comes with

The influenza was prevalent amongst us again this year, but not so disastrous as last. We have also had a remarkably dry season since the New Year. The grass was burnt up everywhere, and the people in the country carrying water for weeks. In the city here the reservoirs were very low, and we had been cautioned to use the water sparingly. The drought, however, broke last night, and at present it is raining steadily, so that will relieve the position greatly, and be a boon to those in the country districts.

We are still looking forward to the time when Apostles Rushton and Hanson will pay us a visit, and we hope it will be the means of wakening some of these people to their responsibility.

One of the late General Booth's sons is holding a mission here at present, called "A covenant campaign." We have been to hear him, but his antics on the stage would almost put Charlie Chaplin in the shade. He has drafted a covenant with twelve clauses, and the contents of this treaty will please all those who belong to the different churches, so one can easily conclude that he is out to please the people and not God. How true the statement is, "Blind leaders of the blind."

Yours in faith,
23 Cornhill Street, Northeastern Valley. J. C. BRADLEY.

Everyone can keep the law which says in effect, "Do what you can and do it now." Zion is to be redeemed with judgment. But we must judge ourselves as far as we are able. Only the pure in heart can constitute Zion when the line is drawn.

Seventeen years ago I was baptized into the church. I have never regretted the step. The Master promised that "the Spirit of truth dwelleth with you and shall be in you." Some experiences have taught me that death is not the worst thing that can come to us. There are other influences that control in our lives though we cannot always see the reason why. We must all be faithful workers in the Lord's vineyard to reap a successful harvest.

MARY FERGUSON.

DUNEDIN, NEW ZEALAND, April 19, 1920.

Editors Herald: We are all doing our best to keep the gospel banner flying, and hold our meetings regularly, although we are few in number. It is an uphill fight to convince people of the truthfulness of our message, but nevertheless we remember the patience of Noah, and battle on.

greater force to the man ordained to do so. Our slogan for this year is "Everybody working."

Will the presidents of those branches contemplating holding special campaigns during the fall and winter start making preparations now, by organizing your forces, collecting funds for tracts and advertising, etc.? Have everything ready for the missionary to commence when he comes.

We would also like to hear from every isolated Saint in whose vicinity an opening might be effected.

Will those who are arranging two-day meetings or special efforts at which missionary assistance is required please write us early. Most of these events can profitably be preceded or followed up by missionary efforts.

We believe that at all such gatherings the local financial and missionary departments should all be represented.

My home address is box 30, Humber Bay, Ontario.

JAMES PYCOCK.

To the Saints of Southeastern Illinois District: Being again elected president, I feel the great responsibility upon me, as I realize the hastening time has come. I feel to warn the Saints of this district to have their lamps trimmed and burning, humble in spirit, pure in heart, doing whatever their hands can find to do in righteous work. Lay aside all vain and idle thoughts, words, or habits, with pride and worldly pleasure. Be in the world, but not of the world.

As to the priesthood, I desire the cooperation of all missionaries and local authorities, that we may all together be of one heart and mind, as the Spirit dictated at the late General Conference, in helping to redeem Zion, which is the pure in heart.

We appreciate our noted Brother W. H. Kelley, who has again returned to our field of labor, and hope to soon get acquainted with our new missionaries, Brethren L. O. Wildermuth and Raymond Whiting. We are to give up Brother Sparling, who has served us so well and long, and recommend him to the Saints in his new field of labor as a safe man. We are proud to say that this district has as good talent among the local forces as our needs demand. Besides we have eighteen priests, some of whom are very active, and a number of teachers and deacons.

Now brethren of the priesthood, I am asking you to assist me in our field of labor to help convert the twenty thousand our worthy President has set as a slogan before our next General Conference. The harvest is ripe; thrust in your sickle and reap. The great responsibility is on us, as servants of the Lord of harvest, being ordained and set apart to spread the gospel. Let us strive to open up new places in our respective fields. There is so much to do, we should not be idle. Our time is too valuable to waste.

I am quite sure each of us could find a place to occupy Saturday evening and Sunday of each month, as well as some through the week. If those in either priesthood, who are not branch officers and have no place to labor, will write to my home address, I will assist them in finding a place. Come now, brethren. Let us unite our efforts and get busy.

The district conference is drawing nigh, which will be held at Joppa, June 18 and 19. I hope to see quite a representation of the priesthood there, where we can formulate plans and arrange the work for the convenience of all. I ask of each branch president a report of their respective branches on July 1, October 1, and January 1. Please take notice.

This district has voted to buy a tent for the coming reunion, and to be used for any other services to be held in the district, while there is a committee appointed to solicit funds of which J. M. Henson, Wayne City, Illinois, R. F. D. 2, is the chairman. As it is impossible for the committee to reach all, let each branch president see that his members contribute their part, and assist the committee. Send all sums to chairman named above, in time to purchase tent for reunion to be held sometime in August (dates not yet set) at Brush Creek Branch. We cordially invite all that can to attend, and help to make our reunion a grand success. We are expecting one or more speakers from Independence, Missouri.

Respectfully, your district president,

R. H. HENSON.

To All Branch Presidents

We want to thank those who have complied with our request for the name and address of their branch, but there are a great many that we have not heard from. If the directory to be published by the L. D. S. Sales Association is to be complete and useful it is essential that we have all the names and addresses of all the branches of the church.

This being a Sales Association I know that you expect me to "sell" you on this proposition. Is this not so? Well, let's see! This organization is composed of the salesmen, business and professional men of the church. This means that most of us travel, some constantly, some occasionally. Now if one of us happens to be in your town, what church would you want us to go to? Of course! But in order for us to visit you, we must know where the church is. It is distinctly to your advantage as well as ours that we be enabled to visit and enjoy the comradeship of our brothers and sisters. You see the point. Are you sold? All right then, better send that address right now before you forget about it!

The address of your branch (where the church building is) with your address and telephone number.

WILLIAM MURRAY, President.

Seattle and British Columbia, at Bellingham, Washington, August 6 to 15. Conference, 10th, 2 p. m. It is desired labor performed within the district by all not working in the capacity of a branch officer be reported to the undersigned immediately after June 30, for the six months' period ending on said date. Branch clerks please send in tabulated report showing gains and losses in membership, in numbers only, for the same period, at the same time. Some of the traveling ministry to be in attendance and a joyful and instructive time is anticipated. Frederick W. Holman, secretary, 3633 Whitman Avenue, Seattle, Washington.

The big Indian reunion, August 26 to September 5, in the grove of our Brother David Petette, one mile from the depot at Red Rock, Oklahoma, on the main line of the Sante Fe, eighteen miles north of Perry, Oklahoma, where the Frisco crosses the Sante Fe. Brother Petette has promised to call the Indian tribes together for this reunion. This is the State reunion for the white Saints, and we decided to combine and unite with the Lamanite brethren and friends for one great meeting. Saints from all over the State will be there and many from other States. At least one of the Twelve, G. T. Griffiths, will be there, and the Presiding Patriarch, F. A. Smith, and others of the ministry. We are sure to have plenty of good preaching. There will be singing and recreation. Brother A. N. Hoxie has promised to be with us and lead the big sing. Plenty of recreation. One afternoon is to be spent fishing in the Arkansas River, 10 miles east of the reunion ground for all who wish to go. The creek surrounding the grove is from 18 inches to 4 feet deep. We will have moving pictures to teach by sight as well as by word. The Restoration, the Book of Mormon, and other subjects will be given in pictures. We hope to have some of the pageant plays at this reunion they have had at Lamoni and Independence. All who are coming should order tents at once from Ed Dillon, 331 East Tenth Street, Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. Prices are as follows, 12 by 14, $9.00; 10 by 12, $7.50; 8 by 10, $6.50; cots $1.50, chairs 30 cents. Cooperative boarding tent on ground, meals served at reasonable price. We are anxious to make this first Indian reunion a great success and we invite all who can to come and join us in one of the most interesting meetings ever held in the church. On behalf of the committee, Hubert Case.

Northern Wisconsin, at Chetek, June 29 to July 5. Springs, cots, tents, floors, and straw for ticks or rooms free of charge. Bring your own bedding. Be on the grounds by Tuesday evening or you will miss something. Meals cafeteria style at dining hall. For further information write Leroy Colbert, Chetek, Wisconsin.

Southern California begins July 30. All orders for tents, beds, tables, and chairs must be in the hands of the undersigned at least ten days before opening. Prices for tents will be four, five, and six dollars, beds 75 cents and $1.25. All settlements will be made at reunion. Please be prompt. Peter Kaufmann, Montebello, California.

The Bishopric

John S. White of Hartshorne, Oklahoma, has been appointed solicitor for and by me. His labors will be in Eastern Oklahoma. I have also appointed Earl C. Larche, of Eros, Louisiana, as solicitor. His labors will be in unorganized territory. B. F. Brown, Bishop's agent, Fort Towson, Oklahoma.

Chatham District. For a number of years the Chatham District has been well served by Brother J. H. Terrell, as Bishop's agent and for his services we are truly grateful. We feel, however, that a step forward has now been made by the arrangements of the General Conference in the ordination of John C. Dent, Bothwell, Ontario, who will now serve as bishop of the Chatham District, on and after July 1, 1920.

Brother Dent is a stanch Latter Day Saint, well qualified to serve the Saints of this district. His aim this year shall be to teach the Saints the importance of the financial law, so that they will contribute so liberally that the tithes of the district shall be doubled this year. Cooperating with him, the slogan of the Bishopric, "A million dollars tithing," shall become a fact. Yours sincerely,

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE.

Arkansas District. This district having been recently organized, we are appointing as Bishop's agent of the district, Brother W. F. Martin, Bald Knob, Arkansas, who comes recommended to us by the district conference.

With this additional organization in this territory, the Saints should be able to do more intensive work, and accomplish greater results in a financial way, as well as in a spiritual way, than heretofore has been possible.

Written upon the banner of Brother Martin which he will carry through the district, will be found these words: "Arkansas District will do her part in raising a million dollars tithing by which the gospel work shall move forward."

With God's blessing and your willingness this shall be made possible. Yours sincerely,

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE.

Home Class Workers

A Correction

In the announcements which were published recently affecting the workers in the home department, an error was made which we hereby wish to correct.

It should have been emphasized that by action and wish of the General Religio Department their home department work is to be cared for by the home class workers of the other departments, in order to avoid duplication of effort and expense. Thus all Religio home department superintendents are relieved of further duty along this line, except such as may be rendered by advice and counsel to the local workers who have been asked to carry on this valuable work. The Women's Department desires that all former Sunday school local superintendents accept appointment from them to function under the new arrangement, and we trust that this request will be heartily granted. Let everyone get into communication with our general office without delay, that the work shall not suffer.

AUDENTIA ANDERSON.

Department Work at Reunions

We propose definite, uniform, and comprehensive institute work and educational programs for reunions and district conferences during the year 1920. Now that we are moving towards the elimination of departmental business sessions more time is afforded for real educational and constructive work. The Religio has gone all the way and dispensed with district business sessions entirely. We suggest the following general plan for joint departmental work at the coming reunions:

1. A daily morning study hour under the direction of selected teacher or teachers. This hour to be from 7.30 to 8.30 a. m.

2. The textbooks for this study hour to be: From One to Twenty-one, by Murray, 25 cents postpaid. A Study of Child Nature, by Harrison, $1.25 postpaid.

3. A joint educational program rendered on some evening towards the close of the reunion. The central feature of this program to be a lecture entitled, "Jesus, the ideal teacher." (This may be followed by a general discussion, if desired.) The program will also comprise vocal and instrumental numbers and readings.

4. The head of each department may arrange for special departmental work in addition to the foregoing. (1) The district superintendent of the Sunday school will provide special problem meetings or arrange for Sunday school work as advised by the general superintendent. (2) The field worker of the Religio will take charge of and provide suitable recreational and social activities for the young people, such as baseball, basket ball, quoits, swings, swimming, hikes, roasts, bonfires, etc. The scoutmasters will supervise the work of the Boy Scouts. (3) The district organizer of the Women's Department will arrange meetings for mothers and also for Temple Builders and Orioles as directed by the general officers.

5. The district superintendent of the Sunday school, district Religio field worker, and district organizer of the Women's Department will please notify all teachers and workers in their respective departments within the district of this proposed program of work, and request that each one come to the reunion prepared to participate. All Sunday school, Religio and Women's Department officers and workers should secure copies of the above-mentioned textbooks. Others are invited to participate and will be expected to provide their own textbooks. These books may be secured at the Herald

Publishing House, Lamoni, Iowa. All prices quoted in this notice are subject to advance.

6. The district superintendent, district field worker of the Religio, and the district organizer of the Women's Department will confer, as soon as possible, and make arrangements for the proposed work. If it is impossible to confer personally then this should be done through correspondence. Do not wait on each other. Let each one feel the responsibility of moving out.

7. These officers will select the teacher or teachers to take charge of the study hour and notify each one of his or her appointment. They will also select the lecturer to deliver the address, "Jesus, the ideal teacher." Care should be taken to select the best available speaker for this occasion. When notifying him of his appointment give him to understand we desire the book, The Making of a Teacher, by Brumbaugh, to be the basis of this lecture. This will be a valuable addition to his library, $1.25 postpaid.

Some reunions have already allotted time for department work. If yours has not, please take this up with your reunion committee at once, presenting it as our request for this definite work.

Due notice should be sent to local pastors or presidents of branches, local superintendents of Religio and Sunday school and local presidents of the Women's Department in regard to the proposed work and program, asking them to cooperate and also to canvass their respective charges for work and service.

We sincerely trust that the officers of the various departments in the district of the church where reunions will be held will enter into the spirit of this work. We are starting in on a very definite work which we hope to amplify and extend in the very near future.

Districts where there will be no reunion during the year will do well to introduce the above program as far as possible during the session of the district conference.

On behalf of the departments,

GOMER R. WELLS,
General Superintendent Sunday School Department.
T. W. WILLIAMS,
General Superintendent Religio Department.
AUDENTIA ANDERSON,
General Superintendent Women's Department.

To Sunday School Superintendents

Nearly one thousand letters have recently been sent to superintendents. At the bottom is a coupon to be cut off and filled. As this information is very necessary to the development of our new adult courses, we urge that this be filled out and returned promptly. Be sure to address the letter to the undersigned, as some mail has already been sent to the superintendent only. Such letters are generally delivered to the superintendent of city schools and are delayed.

NEWS AND COMMENT

THE WORLD AT LARGE

On the tenth ballot at the Republican National Convention at Chicago on the 12th, Warren G. Harding of Ohio was nominated as the party's choice for president of the United States, with Governor Calvin C. Coolidge candidate for vice president. Not since 1888 has a Republican convention required so many ballots to indicate its choice. Harding was among the less popular candidates at the first, and not till toward the last did he get the full vote of his home State.

To attend the first world Zionist convention held in six years, a delegation from the United States sailed from New York on the 12th for London, where on July 4 this important gathering will assemble. The definite program is to establish a homeland for the Jews in Palestine. It is planned to provide for an immigration of labor first, that the land may be made ready for at least 4,000,000 Jews who will eventually return to the Holy Land. With the party are Judge Julian W. Mack, Louis D. Brandeis of the Supreme Court of the United States, Nathan Straus, and other noted Jews. Another party will sail later, making in all a total of thirty-nine.

Chicago is now operating under a local ordinance providing for "daylight saving" during the summer months. Official clocks were turned ahead one hour at 2 p. m. on the 13th, and citizens are urged to follow the established rule.

A feature of the Republican National Convention at Chicago was the line of women pickets standing outside the building, with banners held aloft. They represented the national woman's party. One day they stood for four hours bareheaded in the sun, silently picketing the premises.

According to Doctor A. E. Taylor, of the University of Pennsylvania, a former aide of Herbert Hoover in European relief work, the food resources of the world will be entirely consumed by next year before the 1921 crop can be gotten to the markets. Only by the strictest economy and simple living would it be possible for the United States be able to meet the coming emergency, while all Europe faces actual starvation.

In Boston, not long ago, says an exchange, two members of the same household, on successive days, purchased oranges of the same quality and size. One lot was bought at an orthodox fruit stand for a dollar a dozen, the other at a peddler's wagon a few hundred feet distant, for 50 cents a dozen.

Where, how, and why was the peddler able to obtain and sell his fruit at a 50 per cent reduction? Truly, the ways of the economic system in America are mysterious.

Wholesale shoe prices are being reduced from 25 cents to $2 per pair, effective on all shipments after June 1, according to dispatches from Saint Louis, one of the big shoe centers. This should affect shoe prices on fall stock.

The Y. M. C. A. general organization is doubling its foreign budget and intends to carry on work in twenty foreign countries. They will conduct a drive immediately for $1,500,000, about twice as much as last year.

In an important decision the United States Supreme Court handed down a decision on June 1 reversing the lower court of Ohio and the Ohio Supreme Court, holding that a referendum on ratification of a Federal amendment is void. This grew out of a fight on the liquor question and will settle definitely the question of referendum in other States which might raise a question of the right of a legislature to ratify the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution, establishing prohibition.

Conditions in Ireland continue to be very much upset. Various factions are having armed clashes at many and widely-separated points and with a number of fatalities and injuries, as well as destruction of public and private property. British troops are there in large numbers, one dispatch saying that General French was in command of a larger force than he had in France during the World War.

Chaos is reigning east of the Jordan in Palestine, according to reports received by the Jerusalem News. It seems the new Sherifian Government is not strong enough to maintain order nor to inspire respect among the Aarabs. An influential Bedouin said in an interview in Jerusalem: "The Sherifian government cannot keep order, so we are doing it ourselves with our swords, each village on its own account. There are fueds everywhere, and every man goes armed. Not a day passes but two or a dozen, or twenty men are slain. Trains run on the Hedjaz Railway once a week, but armed parties hold up every train and search it for their enemies, whom they kill at sight." And this is said to be a very mild version of the situation. The editors of the news are emphatic in their expressions of gratitude for the protection of the British and the harmony maintained among the various factions in Palestine. The trouble with local Bedouins is reported as subsiding and only sporadic at worst.

ing the duty and selling them to the retailers for $32 each. From $60 to $80 is being charged for suits of the same quality.

We note items in several papers concerning a decline in prices. We hope it will prove real and continue to a successful issue. One of the reasons is the tightness of the money market. A second reason is stated to be that the public is not buying as it has heretofore. This may be partly because of the inability of the farmers to secure transportation for their produce to market. But whether it will prove more than temporary appears doubtful.

Repeated warnings have been sent out that unless the farmers receive the assurance of much additional help in the very near future, that there will be an actual shortage of production in the United States this year. Ohio farms alone are said to need nearly 25,000 men. Some also have felt that the price adjustment has affected too largely the farmers, and too little the middleman who speculates extravagantly. Farm products or food is after all the basis of our living.

Elihu Root left New York June 1 for London, where he will meet the organizing committee of the permanent court for international justice of the League of Nations about the middle of June. The United States has not yet ratified the treaty or approved the League of Nations. He goes as the American member of the organizing committee.

We have noticed that the Jews in a number of communities are holding celebrations of the deliverance of Palestine. Most of them are called "Mandate services," because of the decision of the San Remo conference on April 24 to establish Palestine as a homeland for the Jews, with Great Britain as mandatory.

The Christian Science Monitor states that Edward G. Theodore, premier of Queensland, recently spent more than a week in New York City, and also visited Washington. An interesting factor is that in the course of interview he stated that the citizens of Queensland may buy their sugar for nine cents a pound, and meat for twelve cents.

Air service has been established between London and Amsterdam, requiring only two hours and forty-five minutes for the excursion, instead of the former all-night trip at sea.

CHURCH NEWS

It is planned now to issue a special Graceland College number of the HERALD on June 30. It will be illustrated and feature a number of interesting features in an interesting way.

Editor and Mrs. S. A. Burgess recently left for an extended vacation in Montana with relatives of Mrs. Burgess. He made a business trip to Saint Louis first, and his wife and child joined him at Independence, from whence they will go West. Elder Burgess has not recovered his normal vigor since the severe attack of pneumonia some two years ago, and the additional tax on his strength occasioned by the severe operation for mastoid affection demands that he take steps to recuperate, even though he would desire to remain at work in these days of urgent demands.

The article "Will a panic be averted?" beginning on page 470 of the HERALD for May 19 is by Walter L. Gates, of Kansas City, Kansas, not Yates as printed.

The Chatham District held a well-attended and successful institute of the Sunday school, Women's Department, and Religion at Bothwell, on June 5 and 6. An interesting program was carried out, the details of which are being reported in the July Autumn Leaves, Sunday school department. We are enthused over such institutes and their possible results, for the very best place to become efficient in church work is right on the home field.

Elder Arthur Mills, 1514 West Short Street, Independence, Missouri, wants a copy of the HERALD for July 2, 1919, to complete his files. Will some one having such a copy to spare send him one?

Walter W. Smith, Church Historian, and Sister Eunice W. Smith came to Lamoni recently, incidentally to attend the commencement exercises of Graceland College; also that Brother Smith might attend to the transferring of the Historical Department to Independence. Sister Eunice W. Smith and also Sister Christiana Salyards of Saint Joseph, came to meet with the consulting board of the Sunday school, to consider problems connected with the new Sunday school Quarterlies.

Elder Hubert Case says Indian missionary work is starting fine this year. He and Elder C. J. Smith have been on the road for two weeks among the Indians and have done some very effectual work. The attendance at the little new Indian church is good, and the interest increasing. One young man was baptized the first day they were among them. Philip Cook was among the Arapahoes that day for a big meeting thirty miles south of the church and he reported four tribes present by representative men. Reuben Taylor and Philip Cook have a goodly number of names for baptism in the near future. Prospects good for Indian reunion at Red Rock, on the main line of the Santa Fe Railway, August 26 to September 5. Many Indians and white Saints plan to attend.

FROM THE BRANCHES

Denver, Colorado. On Wednesday, the 9th, the Saints met with Frederick M. Smith who stopped for a few days en route to Independence from California, and were happily surprised to meet Elders Clyde F. Ellis and Paia a Metuaoro, who addressed the Saints. President Smith spoke very briefly at the close of the meeting, as he decided to stay over a few days and address the Saints both morning and afternoon on the 13th on the problems confronting the church.

Toledo, Ohio. Dedication of the Saints' church at Oak Harbor scheduled for the 13th. Many of the Saints from Toledo expecting to attend. J. W. Davis and wife passed through on their way to Oak Harbor. All feeling well and have strong hope of a better condition in the church under the inspiration of God.

Lamoni, Iowa. At a recent business meeting the names of Edward A. Elefson and Lewis Jones were recommended for ordination to office of teacher, and indorsed by the branch. On the 13th Children's Day was observed at morning and evening services. An excellent program was rendered and a very large audience attended. Nineteen were baptized in the afternoon, all young people but two, who were adults recently moved to Lamoni. The confirmation service was held in the evening at the Religion hour, seven o'clock, the entire service being devoted to this special work. At the following service A. M. Carmichael, superintendent, addressed the audience on the responsibilities of adults toward children.

Flint, No. 2, Michigan.—Elder F. S. Brackenbury is in our midst holding preaching services. Good attention is given our brother. One more was added to our number by baptism.

Pontiac, Michigan.—During a seven-week contest which ended June 3, eleven hundred dollars was raised for the building fund.

Butler, Missouri.—Children's Day was celebrated on June 6. The pleasing program was followed by a basket dinner and prayer meeting in the afternoon. The Saints regret giving up Brother H. E. Moler but anxiously await the arrival of Elder Edward Rannie to welcome him. Butler is fortunate in securing Sister Elsie Barnett as public health nurse and the Saints are glad. The place is noted for babies and basket dinners.

The Position of Woman in the Church

It must be clear to all students that the activity of woman in the church is increasing. President Smith has spoken very clearly on this subject on several occasions, notably at a meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary during General Conference two years ago, and again during the public meeting of the Women's Department on April 13 at the recent General Conference.

In this connection it is interesting to note that the recent world convention of the Methodist Episcopal Church had up this question for discussion, though they did not take definite, affirmative action. It is evident that there is a growing disposition at least to consider frankly the position of woman in that church, and her right to claim ordination. It was suggested that the principal objection raised at the Methodist Convention was, that if women were ordained to the ministry, they would be eligible to the house of bishops. The conservative element were not willing to approve of this contingency.

The Christian Work of recent date publishes the report of the committee to the Presbyterian General Assembly on the same subject. To the general assembly of 1919, there overtures were presented on the subject, and referred to the committee on polity. Finally, in accordance with the minority report, a general committee was appointed to consider the question, and report to the general assembly of 1920.

This committee appointed subcommittees to obtain the opinion of prominent men and women in the church, the teachings of scriptures thereon, the practices of other ecclesiastical bodies, the law and equity of the question.

A review of the letters received gives the following results:

"1. From a scriptural standpoint the question was discussed keenly, pro and con, by professors in our theological seminaries and others strong on the Old and New Testaments. After examining these arguments and after independent investigation your committee is of the opinion that the Scriptures do not forbid either women elders or women preachers.

"2. The subcommittee appointed to investigate the usages of other ecclesiastical bodies corresponded with the leading representatives of seven Protestant denominations, receiving courteous and informing replies in each case. In brief, this is the sum of these replies:

"(a) Three of these denominations, namely, the Methodist Protestant, the Christian Church, and the Congregational, ordain women to the ministry; however but few women have availed themselves of the privilege.

"(b) The other four denominations interrogated, viz, the Lutheran, Baptist, Episcopal, and Methodist Episcopal, do not have women preachers, nor does there seem to be any particular inclination in these churches to accord them this office.

"(c) Where women preach their labors are generally limited to small fields.

"(d) In practically all of these seven churches women are admitted to every other official position in the church except the ministry. They serve on official boards, are trustees, deaconesses, etc., and there is a growing tendency to admit them to official equality with men in the matter of counsel and oversight in the government and service of the church.

"(e) If the experience of other denominations is to be considered in helping us to reach a decision, the evidence is favorable to women in the office of the eldership, but is, on the whole, unfavorable to women in the ministry. . . .

"4. As to the propriety and equity of ordaining women as ruling elders and ministers, the hundred letters which were carefully examined and tabulated by your committee and considered as fairly representing the sentiment in our church, were most interesting and illuminating. Seventy of these were from ministers and elders of the church, sixty-three ministers and seven elders, all men of weight and influence in the church; thirty were from women of like prominence.

"Of these seventy men forty-two, or sixty per cent, favored the ordination of women to the eldership; thirty-four, or forty-eight and one half per cent, advocated their right to a seat in the courts and councils of the church, but without ordination; while but twenty-two, or thirty-one and one half per cent, opposed any change in the present usage of the church.

"Of the thirty women whose letters were listed eighteen favored granting women the right of ordination to both ministry and eldership, two advocated admission as commissioners to presbytery and assembly without ordination, while but seven opposed their advancement in any respect or degree in the church. . . .

"Among the arguments advanced by those opposed to any change in the present usage of the church, in addition to the Scriptural, are these: That woman's sphere is the home. That her family duties would interfere with her functions as minister and elder. That her ordination would result in lowering the dignity of the office. That it would afford an excuse for men to shirk their duties. That it would retard and perhaps defeat the hoped-for union of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America with other Presbyterian bodies; that it would keep men away from the church; that it would lend countenance to and accelerate a dangerous feminist movement.

"Some of the arguments urged by those who advocated the ordination of women to one or both these church offices, in addition to the argument from Scripture, are these: The ordination of women belongs to the spirit of the age; her civil equality is assured in our own and other nations, why deny her ecclesiastical equality? A considerable majority of the membership of the Presbyterian Church is composed of women and girls, and they do more missionary work and other church work than the other sex, hence they are entitled to the honors as well as the labors of the church. In many cases, especially on the frontiers, the organization of new churches is hindered and sometimes made impossible because of the lack of suitable material for elders among the men of the community, whereas there is abundance of good 'elder timber' among the Christian women. Women elders and ministers would in thousands of cases be able to do useful and necessary work for the children and the poor which is impossible for male officers. The call to minister to holy things is of God and is not limited to one sex; when this call is heard by a woman it is not seemly in man to say her nay.

"Other arguments on both sides were advanced. It is proper to report that the ladies advocating the ordination of women to the ministry or eldership in each case disclaimed any wish to occupy the office herself, but claimed the right for her sisters."

Pursuant to this, the question was directly presented to the assembly, Shall the constitution be so amended as to admit properly qualified, elected women to ordination as ruling elders with all the rights and duties pertaining to this office? The further two questions, whether they shall be received into the ministry, and shall they be eligible to sit in the courts and councils of the church were not submitted this year.

The committee reports itself to be conservative, and there is some intimation, that for the present at least, this motion will be denied. But it is of interest as showing the tendency of the times.

We are frank to say that we do not know of any scripture in any of the three books excluding women from the ministry. There have existed in the past historic reasons, economic or social reasons, why woman has not been so set apart, because of her position in the social order. But it is of interest to note that Saint Paul refers to the excellent work of some sisters in his time, and that the commentaries and traditions would make of them deaconesses or at least ministers in a sense.

Yet on the other hand, there is no distinctive statement in the revelations that women should be ordained to the ministry. There is the statement that Emma Smith was an elect lady, and should be set apart by the laying on of hands to special work. (Doctrine and Covenants 24.) But until we have more specific statements no action can be taken. It would require a change in the constitution of the church to recognize the ordination of women, which could only be made by a revelation to the church.

To students of history it may be of interest to note the action taken by our late President Joseph Smith, when this question was brought up directly by the attempted ordination of some sisters to the priesthood. He stated directly that there was no authority for such action; nor does there exist such authority to-day. Women do not have and have not had such right at anytime in the restored church. An affirmative law is a necessity before such procedure is permissible.

In our church congregations there will be found a larger proportion of men in attendance, than is the case with any other church. It is probable also a larger percentage of the membership are men. Still, even with this church, more than half of the membership are women and girls.

More About Prohibition

Saint Louis was first settled by the French, and there are a large number of them still in Carondelet and South St. Louis, hence it is not surprising to learn, that until the past year there were many small wine shops, where wine was prepared.

The city is especially noteworthy for its number of large breweries, Anheuser-Busch, W. J. Lemp, and many others. Because of this fact, every time that state prohibition has been up, it has been overwhelmingly defeated by the vote in Saint Louis, which was very near solidly against prohibition.

For this reason it is of interest to note that the Christian Science Monitor gives a half column to the situation in Saint Louis, stating that the economic benefits are becoming so clearly evident, that the attitude of many business men towards the liquor question is gradually changing. It states that city officials and the observation of fair-minded men show that prohibition is proving a benefit to the local government, rather than the reverse.

Despite the fact that for the year ending April 1, 1919, probably 35 per cent of the male population went out of the city in war service, still the number of arrests for that period, on city charges, was over 10 per cent higher for men, and 25 per cent higher for women for the year ending April 1, 1920. The state crimes showed a still greater decrease, as the number of men arrested to April 1, 1919, show 20,000 for the year, against 16,000 for the year ending April 1, 1920, a decrease of nearly 20 per cent. The number arrested for drunkenness is less than one half for the later period.

There is also a decrease in the prisoners in the workhouse of at least 17 per cent, the smallest number in five years. The number of guards will soon be decreased at this institution, and there will be a lessened appropriation for feeding prisoners, both at the workhouse and the jail. There is a decrease of 22 per cent in the number of prisoners in the city jail.

The general prosperity to the workers of the city is shown in the fewer applications for admission to the city hospital, the city sanitarium, and infirmaries. These show a falling off of from 19 to 50 per cent at the hospitals; 30 per cent at the infirmaries; and nearly 15 per cent at the city sanitarium.

The League of Nations

The League of Nations has now been in existence a little more than four months. We learn from The League Bulletin that the following fifteen governments have signed and ratified the Treaty of Versailles, and thus have become members: Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, British Empire—Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, India; Czecho-Slovakia, France, Guatemala, Italy, Liberia, Panama, Peru, Poland, Siam, Uruguay. Also thirteen states, neutral in the war, who were invited to join the league have done so, as follows: Argentine, Chile, Colombia, Denmark, Netherlands, Norway, Venezuela, Paraguay, Persia, Salvador, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland. In addition thereto, eleven states have signed but have not yet ratified the Treaty of Versailles: United States, Cuba, Ecuador, Greece, Haiti, Serbo-Croat-Slovene State, Hedjaz, Honduras, Nicaragua, Portugal, Rumania.

Four states, not mentioned in the covenants, have asked to be admitted to the league; San Marina, Luxembourg, Iceland, and Georgia.

China did not sign the Treaty of Versailles, but will join the league by ratifying the Austrian treaty.

The executive council has held four meetings, and great liberty of action has been secured. In January a meeting was held at Paris, when the council was organized, and the Saar Basin Frontier Commission appointed. On the 11th of February the meeting was at London, and accepted Switzerland's accession to the league, adopted rules of procedure, appointed the Saar Basin Governing Commission, the high commissioner for Danzig, accepted the obligation in the Polish treaty for protection of minorities, approved plans for organizing a permanent court of international justice, freedom of communication, and international health office, and arranged for an international finance conference.

At subsequent meetings, both at Paris, a commission of inquiry was arranged to go to Russia for investigation, and steps taken for the prevention of typhus in Poland. The next meeting is scheduled in Rome.

Experts have brought together all the pertinent data of a court of international justice, and a committee of twelve famous jurists of the world have been appointed to approve the final plans to be submitted to the assembly.

A labor conference was held in October, 1919, and other practical steps have been taken to make the league effective.

In Detroit the valuation of real estate is being raised against rent profiteers. The valuation for taxation is based upon the amount of rent charged. Hence a number of property holders are finding their assessment for taxes greatly increased.

The Eight-Hour Day and Ten-Hour Day

An investigation conducted by the United States Public Health Service, of conditions and productions in standard factories, has been under way since 1917. The purpose was to ascertain the relative efficiency and economy of the eight- and ten-hour day. Several modern factories were selected, and efforts made to secure those as nearly alike as possible, with quality of machinery, manufactured products, and processes in the different cities.

The results were all in favor of eight-hour days or shifts, as compared with the ten-hour day.

As to continuity of output, the eight-hour day gives increased output; the ten-hour day shows decline of output.

As to lost time, on the eight-hour day, almost full power begins and ends on schedule. The lost time is a minimum. On the ten-hour day, work ceases regularly before the end of the period, and there is much lost time. On the ten-hour plan, the output is reduced so that the laborers keep pace with the less efficient workers. With the eight-hour day, the output varies more nearly according to the individual capacity.

As a rule one would expect more industrial accidents with the greater speed of the eight-hour day, but the element of fatigue enters in, so that there are more accidents in the last hours of the ten or twelve-hour day, in spite of the fact that the work slows up.

In every way it would appear that the eight-hour is ideal both for greater efficiency and for economy.

The Issue in America

The Outlook for May 5 gives one of the most fundamental questions before the people of the United States in the coming election to be the community ownership of property and community management of industry versus individual ownership and industrial liberty. This is probably the greatest question before the country, and before the world to-day.

That raises the second issue: Shall it be recognized as a world problem, or shall we insist on treating it as a purely domestic problem?

A third issue rises out of these two, and that is to which political party shall the control of the government be delivered?

There can be no question about the trend of the present time being away from the strict laissez faire ideal of government and extreme individualism and towards a recognition of the rights of society as a whole, the right also of society to determine the conditions of employment and to protect the weak, as well as society as a whole.

It should be clear to all that that ideal will be best in which each individual is developed to his fullest capacity and each individual then works, not for self alone, but for the common good, with the full development of the individual; the development of individual initiative in the choice of employment, and yet the devoted purpose of each one to work for the benefit of his brother and humanity as a whole.

In striving to carry out the social ideal, there has arisen a very considerable party whose aim is extreme communism. For some reason they fail to observe the fact that if the community or group owns all property, that some individuals must of necessity have its administration, and that so far those who have the control on behalf of the group have become autocratic in administration. There is despotism not only of the group, but of a few individuals in the group, working not for the common cause, but for the benefit of the few.

On the other hand, as stated in this article, those who hold for individualism present a picture which sounds beautiful, but which is not working out in practical results. One party believes in the inalienable right of every man to select his job; to determine under what conditions, and with what comrades he will do his work, and to possess the wealth which by his industry he produces under such government control as may be necessary to protect the personal rights and promote the general welfare of all.

The difficulty is that with every man free to select his own job there has grown a gross inequality. No large corporation suffers so keenly in case of nonproduction as do the workmen. With the workman it means his very life; with a corporation it means simply a few more dollars. The recent strikes show invariably that labor losses are larger than those of capital. Of course this also shows that while industry is in progress labor is receiving the greater part of the net proceeds. The individual acting alone is not equal in dealing with the employers in a large corporation. The result is he is soon forced to take what he can get.

On the other hand, those who contend for extreme socialization and community interest in fact really stand often for a strong individualism, or a control by the few of the many. It presents what sounds superficially like a beautiful dream, but has never yet been proven practicable. It does not stand strict analysis from either an economic or legal viewpoint, and from the legal viewpoint neither under the law of the church nor under the law of the land.

We have suffered long under despotism of a few in the name of capital. We do not want to substitute for it the despotism of another class, even though it be the proletariat, or of a few in the name of the proletarian. We do want the right cause for Zion and sound justice, without unjust extremities.

S. A. B.

More of Profiteering

The report by W. Jett Lauck on behalf of the railroad operators shows rather clearly that the high price of labor is not the fundamental cause of the present high prices of commodities. For the present high prices of necessary commodities grows not out of legitimate cost of production and distribution, but show rather the ability of favorably situated industrial, commercial, and financial groups to control the supply, and through that control the exact prices which have no other limit than the inability of the people to pay. It is not so much the result of competition as the result of a certain lack of competition, and of control by a group, even though there be some competition within the group.

The Lauck report shows it as the activity or the real power of those who are strong enough to take their fill from the weak; certain men who consider themselves moral, have yet used substantially the same force that is used by the bandit and ordinary footpad.

The net profits of the war years, 1916-18, were nearly five billion more than the three prewar years, yet there has been an increase of about 20 per cent since the close of the war in the market price of necessities. The heavy overcharge of the steel interests and coal interests have amounted to a surtax of approximately twenty dollars on every individual in America. The steel corporations show an inclination no longer to exact the utmost possible that they can from the public, but the coal interests show exactly the opposite intentions by raising prices at the time of the year when they are normally lower.

Profits are also capitalized in the form of stock dividends. This means an attempt to extend this excessive assessment far into the future, and as the Christian Science Monitor intimates, such actions greatly favor the argument for government intervention. If organized society is to protect the individual citizen from the individual highwayman, why should it not protect the public at large from the bandit practices of a few?

More and more is it becoming evident that we must reach for that organization, and for that method of procedure which will mean a fair consideration of the cost of production and distribution, and upon that a fair profit to those engaged, and a fair price to the consumer.

It is growing out of such conditions as are above indicated that the number of cooperative stores have so greatly increased throughout the world in recent years, and have more than quadrupled in America since the war.

It is because of these conditions and that which grows out of them, that we are so insistent that the time has come when a better industrial order must be established among us, with justice between man and man. In other words, that Zion be established as a city of refuge and of justice:

S. A. B.

Church and Sunday School Time

Question. We have stated times for Sunday school and preaching; sacrament once a month. On the day of sacrament should the time be extended to infringe upon Sunday school time or preaching services?

Answer. It must be realized that the associate editor of the HERALD, in answering these questions, expresses his own opinion, and can hardly speak authoritatively for the whole church.

The question in the form stated almost answers itself. Having stated times for services, as a general rule it would appear to be unwise to permit one service to infringe upon another. All services should be started promptly at the hour announced. If there is a closing time, that time should also be observed. Reasonable courtesy would mean that the time of one service should not infringe upon another.

At the same time due courtesy would take consideration of special circumstances. For example, we have known on Children's Day or Parents' Day, where the Sunday school precedes the preaching service, that the preaching service has been suspended, and the Sunday school service permitted to continue for a half hour or an hour into the time for the regular preaching service. This, however, has been done by consent and arrangement with the branch officers beforehand.

We have also known many instances when the sacrament service was of an unusually high order, it has been permitted to continue over for another hour, instead of being followed by a preaching service. In this instance both services were under the control of the same officers. All things should be done by common consent. In this instance it was by formal vote that the body preferred to continue the sacrament service, rather than have the preaching service.

It is probably true that in most instances where a regular service is thus suspended or interfered with that it will cause adverse criticism. The circumstances should be very unusual indeed where such interference is permitted, and then should be done only by common consent.

The habit of starting services late, allowing the prayer service to drag on, is a condition which should be promptly corrected. Letting one service run into another so as to make the second start late should be strictly suppressed. Where a prayer service is allowed to die out, with the result that instead of being profited a large part of the people go away rather weary, a mistake is made.

As a general rule, promptness in opening and closing services will meet with the best results.

S. A. B.

Subjects Being Discussed

World Movement Plans Changed

The Christian Work of May 29 states that the Interchurch World Movement will continue a program covering the fundamental elements and which will cost far less than that under which it has hitherto operated. Monthly expenses last year reached a maximum of one million dollars. From July 15, 1920 to May 15, 1921, the plan calls for an expenditure not to exceed $150,000 a month, or a total for the ten months of not over one and a half millions. But the cost of the movement from May 1 to July 15, 1920, is estimated at two million dollars. They include in this the cost of a quiet drive to meet the indebtedness incurred the past year. The expense for the year totals about $9,600,000, hence the later drives from May 15 to July 15 for ten million dollars to meet this indebtedness. To meet this deficit and help in raising ten million dollars, before July 15, a group of women have agreed to find 25,000 women each of whom will give or get $100, thus providing one fourth of the amount.

A Colossal Collapse

The Presbyterian for May 27 states that the Interchurch Movement is about to collapse with eight million dollars liabilities, with three million dollars assets, and with five million dollars deficit. It speaks of it as the greatest blow to Protestantism since the Reformation, and the most colossal collapse since Pentecost. There has been from the first a strong element not inclined to approve the movement.

Profits of the "Big Five"

Report by the Federal Trade Commission shows that the "Big Five" meat packers, Armour and Company, Swift and Company, Morris and Company, Wilson and Company, Inc., and the Cudahy Packing Company, at the beginning of 1919 possessed combined assets of one billion, three hundred million dollars, and capital stock and surplus of five hundred and thirty-five million. In 1918 the several companies sold three billion, two hundred million dollars' worth of goods. The report shows repeated additions to capital by way of stock dividends and surplus, so the net result is very high. The commission also states that it is impossible, the way the books are kept, to report accurately as to the percentage or margin of profit, but there is no doubt that it is high.

The League of Nations

In a recent discussion on the League of Nations, it is to be noted that one of the worst, if not the worst epidemic of history, occurred in 1918, influenza, yet it is well recognized from past epidemics in 1897-98, and back about 1847 that influenza spreads from one individual to another. Isolation and thorough quarantine would evidently prevent such a spread. But to accomplish that would require international action, which would be possible under a league of nations.

The women of Great Britain, representing many different interests, at first saw in the league only the one effective insurance against future wars, but now they see the possibility of all the nations, great and small, working together to better the conditions under which the people live.

Cooperation in remedial, and especially in constructive work, should develop international friendship of the greatest force, according to the Christian Science Monitor. There is also the possibility of women being directly concerned in the league itself, and in the International Women's Conference and bureau in connection therewith.

A Cry in the Night

BY T. W. WILLIAMS

"This is the year for consecration. This is the year for stewardship. This is the year for crucifixion. This is the year to put off selfishness. This is the year to permit the love of Christ to take possession of our souls."

Several years ago while residing in California, I was one night awakened from sleep. I was alert. Every faculty was keenly aroused. My whole being tingled with nervous appreciation. I seemed endowed with a sixth sense. I was wide awake.

Omnious forebodings of coming events possessed me. I knew without any visible evidence that something unusual was happening. I sensed that I was in the presence of some superhuman power. My past rose before me. My limitations appalled me. I was helpless and alone. While contemplating this remarkable experience I was conscious of a noise, seemingly far, far away which resembled the surge of mighty seas or the rush of waterfall. Above it all, I heard as though it was the plaintive cry of a child in distress—"a cry in the night" for help. It pierced me to the heart! It echoed and reechoed in my soul! It aroused my whole being to response!

In the Grip of an Invisible Power

Suddenly, I felt myself in the grip of some mighty and invisible power. I was shaken with fearful velocity as a dog does a rat. The whole world seemed falling into chaos. The house rocked, chimneys tumbled to the ground, dishes and bric-a-brac crashed to the floor. The neighborhood was aroused. People rushed into the street.

It was my first real experience with an earthquake.

I lay awake for hours contemplating the experience. I tried to analyze my feelings. I endeavored to explain this strange phenomenon. I could understand the rocking of the earth and the consequent physical disturbance. I could not dismiss from my mind that "cry in the night"—that weird, uncanny, inarticulate cry which froze my blood in my veins and caused my tongue to cleave to the roof of my mouth, that cry which inspired every impulse of my being to response and help.

Nations Calling for Help

To-day, while the whole world seems calling "out of the night" for help; while Europe, Asia, and Africa, India, Egypt, China, Japan, Russia, Armenia, Palestine, Mexico, and South America are reaching imploring hands to us, each voicing in his own tongue and dialect the age-old Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us," I find the great bulk of our people asleep, drugged with commercial anæsthesia, entirely unconscious of the great world needs. These seem engrossed in petty, narrow purposes. Self—position—pleasure; ambition—wealth—self-satisfaction! These are the things which deaden the moral and spiritual impulses.

My soul cries out to God that something might awaken my sleeping fellows—something which will arouse every latent, dormant, divine and humane impulse and cause them to sense the ominous signs of the times—the portent of coming events! Oh! that they hear this "cry in the night" which will set them tingling with divine purpose!

World Aroused from Slumber

Out of the darkness of heathendom comes this cry for help. From continents now sitting in darkness—from remote islands of the sea—there comes this inarticulate "cry in the night." The whole world seems roused from slumber. Nations that have slept for centuries are waking up and taking notice. They have been shaken. They realize that they are in the grasp of a power far beyond their own. Their past is vividly before them. They recognize their limitations and shortcomings. They are conscious of their need. They are crying out for help.

The Spirit of God is preparing the nations for the Christian evangel. The "hastening time has come." God is moving to the fulfillment of his purposes. The "dispensation of the fullness of times" is near completion. The sky is streaked with red—a prophecy of the coming day!

Gospel to the Ends of the Earth

May the power which is awakening the nations grip you, my brother, my sister, and arouse you to the supreme task now confronting the people of God. The gospel must go to the ends of the earth. Swift-winged messengers must herald the coming of Jesus—the ushering in of the kingdom of God.

To do this we must have thousands of consecrated men and women who, with absolute personal abandon, will make the work of evangelism paramount. We should have a host of young men and women saying this year, "Lord, here am I; send me." No other age has ever offered such a glorious privilege for Christian ministry. To be torch-bearers of the blessed truth of Jesus Christ; to be pioneers in foreign missionary work, what a privilege! Oh! what transcendent joy! In the oncoming years, when the gospel of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ shall have been established among the nations, what satisfaction it will be to know that you were among the first to volunteer for service in this the greatest missionary campaign of all the ages!

Your Life's Vocation

Some few weeks ago, while lecturing to my public speaking class I asked this question of each member of the class, "What would you choose as your life vocation if given the opportunity?" The answers were varied. Some hesitated. Some few were uncertain. They had not found themselves. Several of the answers, however, made my blood course more rapidly. My pulse quickened. I knew I had taken the right tack.

One bright young man who was making remarkable success in business life answered, "The one thing in all the world which I would rather do more than anything else would be to become a missionary to the nations of the world." A young sister gave answer, "I would love to go as a companion to a missionary—to be a nurse—to minister in the homes and to teach mothers and train children in the ways of the Lord." This young man did not hold the priesthood. This young woman was not married. They knew, I knew, the whole class knew, that, in making these answers, both of these young people were subjecting themselves to criticism. My soul was filled with the Spirit of God. I knew that the Lord was pleased with both of these offerings. There are many, very many, other young men and women who would make similar replies. They are deterred by false modesty and a feeling that others will not understand their purpose. This is a day of service and of sacrifice. "God is marshaling his army." His call is to all, and particularly to the young. There is nothing in all this world which offers greater returns than a consecrated ministry—a giving of oneself for the good of others.

Young Women to the Rescue

Some few weeks ago I addressed a body of nurses. I pointed out to these young girls the ever-widening field of service now opening before them. I portrayed the ideal of stewardship. I told them that God wanted them to dedicate their lives to his service; that the place of the nurse was by the side of the minister—each a complement of the other. I affirmed that there was as urgent call for the girls of our church to consecrate their lives to the work of God as there was to the young men. Doctor Harrington followed with a splendid appeal. The Spirit of the Lord was present. This class of bright young women was visibly affected. They asked questions. I have learned since that several of them have offered themselves for service to God. One is shortly to leave for the Society Islands. Others are getting ready. God be praised!

My soul is filled to overflowing as I pen these lines while en route to California for a few short days of respite after a year's intensive work in Canada preparatory to some arduous work which has been set before me in Europe. Oh! if the boys and girls of the whole church could sense the supreme joy and ecstasy of spirit which comes as the heritage of unselfish service! I know they would not hesitate.

May I suggest that every minister in the field, every local pastor or presiding elder, every Sunday-school teacher, every Religio worker, every leader among our women and our girls concern themselves with the future of our young people? The church to-day needs hundreds of young men and women who are willing to consecrate their lives to the service of God and humanity. The demand is far beyond the supply. Our work is to be revived in Europe. It is to be opened up in Africa. India and South America are specially inviting fields. What use is there for an apostle to go to these nations and open up the missionary work unless the church will supply needed helpers?

If there is a young man or woman who is willing to dedicate his or her life to this laudable work do not hesitate. Send in your name and address to the Presidency of the church. Set to with your might. Pray over the matter. When once you are convinced as to the work you should do then proceed to active preparation. We need young men and women who can speak Spanish and Chinese and Japanese and German and French. "Get thy spindle and thy distaff ready and God will send thee flax."

A Work for All

And should our young people volunteer, what then? How can we care for this ever-increasing army of missionaries? Let this not trouble you, my doubting Thomas. Have faith in God! Let us hold the thought that the Lord will work mightily on the hearts of our people to supply the necessary means for this great evangel. To do this we must have thousands of consecrated men and women who, with absolute personal abandon, will make the work of evangelism paramount.

Some of us are giving up everything: wife, children, home. We are foregoing the opportunity of laying by for a rainy day. Our families are denied the pleasure and companionship of father, husband, brother, sister. They are subsisting on the bare necessities. In the face of this can you do less, my brother, my sister?

A Great Revolution in the Church

The year 1920 should witness a great revolution within the church, a renunciation of old forms and purposes, a consecration to the Messianic purpose. The time has come for us to put up or shut up. It is easy to prate about this latter-day work, to loudly proclaim our knowledge of its divinity and to register our divine blessings. It is quite another thing to show our faith by our works. It is sometimes hard to make good.

If you care for this latter-day work, how much do you care for it? Do you love it better than your own life? Are you willing to face death to establish its verity? Are you willing to renounce possession, ambition, and all selfish purposes? Are you ready to forsake wife, children, home, your native land, to establish this the kingdom of God in the earth? If you can do all this then are you worthy the name of Jesus Christ. If you cannot do this without any mental reservation whatever, then your protestations of loyalty are as sounding brass and tinkling cymbal. If you cannot make this consecration then, brother, I must tell you that you are joking with God!

Weighed in the Balance

* The Latter Day Saint who, in the face of this great opportunity now opening before the church, will increase his holdings and possessions one dollar during the year 1920 is, to say the least, exceedingly weak in the faith. I will give more credence to his recitals of visions, and dreams, and of healings, and of love for this work, if he will square his life with the call of God to-day—a complete consecration to the work of God.

The men and women of this church should labor to earn and save this year, not to hoard up your saving, but to make a complete consecration of all of your savings to the furtherance of the work of God. Our people do not know what sacrifice is yet. "Give till it hurts" is the slogan of the Forward Movement among the churches. I want to go them one better, "Give until it ceases to hurt."

Aside from tithing and special consecration there are many, very many, men and women who could contribute sufficiently to keep one or more missionaries in the field and make no special sacrifice whatever. There are many others who, by practicing a little self-denial, could do almost as well. The members of our local churches could, by the sacrifice of unnecessary pleasure and diversion, augment our missionaries by many.

Shall Sacrifice and Death Deter Us?

Many of our people cannot go on missionary tours; each and every one can make it possible for others to go. What does it matter though it be sacrifice and denial or even death? Dare we shrink from this our work? God forbid! Then let the young men and women of the church in America, in Canada, in England, and Australia rally to the standard and say, "Here am I, Lord, take me as I am and mold me to thy purpose. I consecrate my all to God and humanity."

This is a missionary year. This is the year when you should lay your all at the apostles' feet. This is the year for consecration. This is the year for stewardship. This is the year for crucifixion. This is the year to put off selfishness. This is the year to permit the love of Christ to take possession of our souls.

Behold, it is not meet that I should command in all things; for he that is compelled in all things, the same is a slothful and not a wise servant; wherefore he receiveth no reward. Verily I say, Men should be anxiously engaged in a good cause, and do many things of their own free will, and bring to pass much righteousness; for the power is in them, wherein they are agents unto themselves. And inasmuch as men do good, they shall in nowise lose their reward. But he that doeth not anything until he is commanded, and receiveth a commandment with doubtful heart, and keepeth it with slothfulness, the same is damned.—Doctrine and Covenants 58: 6.

Is the Nation Forgetting God?

BY HOLMES J. DAVISON

Will the Nation choose enough "righteous men" to guide the ship of state?

The shepherd, king, and Psalmist of Israel once said, doubtless by divine unction, "Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord." The record of that people is replete with evidences that those were not empty words.

When Israel was awake to her own interests that nation was in full accord with the prophet's declaration that it was not in man to order his steps aright. Also that it is not in man, unassisted by divinity, to order the steps of a nation aright.

Before Moses, that great leader, took his departure he was instructed by the Father of all concerning the habiliments of the chief priest of the Aaronic priesthood, in which he placed the Urim and Thummim. And one of the injunctions to the successor of Moses, as a leader in temporal affairs, Joshua, was that he should inquire of Eleazer in times of perplexity, and that at his bidding (by virtue of the Urim and Thummim), he should prosecute his work.

Subsequent history shows that when Israel did inquire of the Lord, and did do his bidding, that nation was a blessed people. History also shows that when they failed to do this, they were a most unhappy people. In all ages, God has been ready to answer to the appeal of any nation that consistently sought his counsel and recognized sovereign power.

It has been with no little degree of consolation and national pride that spiritually-minded writers and speakers have referred to some of the presidents of this nation, notably Washington and Lincoln, who stood at the helm of state in crucial times, that they were praying men, and sought guidance at the hand of Omnipotence; men who conceded that it was not in man to guide the destinies of mankind aright without assistance from a greater source.

This all proclaims well of the past, but what of the present? Is the trend of the national mind in that direction? or is God being left out of national affairs?

The writer has been taking unusual interest in the matter concerning the election of the next succeeding president. Not from a political standpoint, however. Write-ups and speeches have been read and listened to from men and women of different viewpoints who are zealously seeking to inform the public concerning the magnitude and seriousness of the pivotal situation in the which the nation is at present, and will in the near future be involved, perhaps more and more critical. And of the necessity of electing a man of great wisdom, keen foresight, tremendous directing ability, wonderful grasp, gigantic intellect, phenomenal vision, marvelous tact, unprecedented loyalty, in fact the personification and embodiment of every human attribute, whether by natural endowment or acquisition, that go to make up a presidential prodigy.

All this seems to be conceded; and the more so as men sense the import and gravity of national and international questions that now confront us, and those also that so many feel are just below the horizon.

And yet not once has come to notice a reference to the idea that the future guide and leader of the destinies of this vast territory should be a man of God; a man who in times when called upon to make decisions involving the happiness or misery of millions of his fellowmen and supporters would have the consistent right to invoke the wisdom of the Creator of worlds with a well-grounded hope of being heard and recognized.

It may be argued that "there is a destiny that shapes" even the course of nations, despite the rough hewing of politicians. Grant all that, and still that "Destiny" does his shaping largely with tools at hand. And sometimes the "mills" grind exceedingly slow because of it.

Jeremiah, the prophet, tells us by authority that there is a curse upon man that forsakes God and puts his trust in the arm of flesh; that he shall be even as a heath or tamarisk tree that survives fruitless and almost leafless in the desert barren and uninhabited.

Is God's attitude toward men nationally the same as it is individually?

Is there a danger of this great nation becoming like that barren tree because of relying wholly upon the "arm of flesh"?

Judging from the secular press and rostrum, it would appear that such a danger is not an unfounded vagary of the pessimist.

Happily, however, there is another agency at work. The spiritually-minded man and woman are praying. And it may be that even godless men may elect a man not particularly godly, and yet in the hour of crisis a decision may be made not wholly by the wisdom of man.

With this thought before us, the duty and responsibility of the church member is manifest.

The serious question is, Will the requisite number of "righteous men" be found that the impending calamities may be, at least for a time, averted?

Book of Mormon Rays on Scientific Paths—No. 7

BY A. B. PHILLIPS

From what has been noted of the diversity characterizing the aboriginal Americans, it will be seen that to judge them by the Indian types with which our early progenitors were familiar would be very misleading. The degeneracy represented in later times would indicate little or nothing of the capabilities of the ancestors of previous centuries, in many respects. This is indicated by Professor Rawlinson in his work, The Origin of Nations, page 5. He says:

"In America, both North and South, the modern descendants of the Spanish conquerors are poor representatives of the Castilian gentlemen who, under Cortes and Pizarro, made themselves masters of the Mexican and Peruvian kingdoms, and introduced into the new world the time-honored civilization of the old. Civilization, as is evident from these and various other instances, is liable to decay, to wane, to deteriorate, to proceed from bad to worse, and in course of time to sink to so low a level that the question occurs, Is it civilization any longer?"

To-day some of our ablest and most highly-educated men are descendants of Indians tribes that a few years ago gave little indication of the possibilities of development that the future would reveal. Nations rise to great heights of learning, ability, and power, only to be superseded in a future age by others, and only their history perhaps remains to tell of their one-time greatness. So it was with ancient Egypt, Phoenicia, Babylonia, Greece, and other peoples. So also it was in a remarkable degree with the ancient Americans, whose marvelous past is being brought to light more and more vividly year by year. Perhaps in no way has the extent of their civilization been more remarkably revealed than by the numerous evidences of vast cities, magnificent temples, and other structures.

Wonderful Structures in Ancient America

"It cannot be any longer doubted that there has been a day when this continent swarmed with millions of inhabitants, when the arts and sciences flourished," says Mr. Pidgeon, in his Antiquarian Researches. More fully to realize the extent of this ancient civilization let us remember that the millions found here in the time of Columbus quite clearly represented a decline both politically and numerically, and that this decline amounted to practical dissolution in many places. For instance, the History of South America, translated by Adnah Jones, gives the calculations of the Spanish historian Herrera, that Haiti contained a million people at the time it was discovered by Columbus, but in fifteen years it had been reduced to about sixty thousand people, and Columbus stated some time afterward that five sixths of them had died through cruelty. Noll's History of Mexico estimates that there were four millions of inhabitants who spoke native languages. He states: "There are nearly two millions of people in the country who speak the Aztec or Mexican language proper." But this represents only a comparatively small part of the people in all parts of the continent.

The ancient civilizations of these people covered thousands of miles in both North and South America, comprising vast cities whose crumbled ruins alone remain of the powerful governments that once existed there. When the Nephites came to this continent they found the remains of the fallen Jaredite nation, which was very extensive in the time of its prosperity, and upon these ruins they constructed cities of great size. This account, which the Book of Mormon gives us, has since been supported by remarkable discoveries in many places. While many statements could be produced from the various works extant, the following from Baldwin will typically express the essential point involved: "It can be seen that some of the ruined cities which can now be traced were several times renewed by reconstructions." (Page 152.) "These are not the oldest cities whose remains are still visible, but they may have been built, in part, upon the foundations of cities much more ancient." (Page 156.)

The report of Doctor Uhle concerning explorations in Pachacamac and other places of Peru, under the direction of the University of California, calls attention to this renewed construction as having been accomplished by distinct peoples of successive ages, and estimates that not less than sixteen hundred years were required for the entire period of occupancy, and very probably a longer time. The Saturday Bee of April 26, 1892, contains an interesting account of some of his important discoveries there. It is really most convincing to learn that so many details of the Book of Mormon record are being confirmed almost every year, and places beyond successful dispute its general outlines.

These ancient cities were by no means of insignificant appearance, if one may judge by the portions of buildings that remain. Referring to Tiahuanacu, Sir Clements Markham says: "There is ample proof of the very advanced stage reached by the builders in architectural art." That they did not represent a period as late as that of the Incas is clearly shown when he says: "It is quite certain that, in the time of the Incas, the people were entirely ignorant of the origin and history of these edifices." (Pages 24 and 28.) Upon the stones of Tiahuanacu are found, carved with great care, certain beasts, fishes, and birds, that were evidently intended to convey a meaning of considerable importance to the people who were able to decipher them. What their meaning is we of to-day can only conjecture. It is stated by Professor Enoch that in Mexico and Peru the so-called idols and other objects in terra cotta appear in some cases to resemble objects from the Egyptian tombs.

There is good reason to believe that in some instances at least these cities were of such magnificence as to compare favorably with many of our own day. Tezcuco is estimated to have contained at least one hundred and forty thousand houses, and probably many more. This leads us to infer that it was inhabited by more than a million people. The London Geographical Society estimated that the ruins of Palenque extend about twenty miles. Another writer expressed the conviction that it must have been one of the largest cities ever seen. The fact that their great works must have perished many centuries ago, except such as were composed of imperishable materials, indicates that their constructions may well have been far more extensive than the estimates would indicate. It seems impossible that the great extent of their works, marvelous though they must have been, will ever be ascertained with any degree of completeness.

Perhaps one of the most remarkable remains of the American aborigines is that of Tiahuanacu, twelve thousand feet above the level of the sea, on the borders of Lake Titicaca, the largest lake in South America. Mr. Nestler concludes that this mysterious city represents one of the most ancient on earth: "A culture more significant for the totality of human culture than that of Troy." Huge stones, measuring up to thirty-six feet in length, one of which is sixteen feet in width, were skillfully cut, and transported from long distances in order to be carefully placed in position in the magnificent buildings of this vast city. If these massive structures were built in the days when the enormous mammoth roamed the land, it may have been by harnessing these great giants to the stones that they were able to transport them to their destination. The prodigious size of these animals is indicated by the fact that their tusks were sometimes approximately fourteen feet in length and more than a foot in diameter. Beside one of them an elephant would be but a baby. Concerning these magnificent remains Sir Clements Markham asserts: "Apart from the monoliths of ancient Egypt, there is nothing to equal this in any other part of the world." The ruins of many other cities of varying proportions have also been discovered, but there seems not to have been much attempt to describe them nor to attempt an estimate of their several populations. It has however been reckoned that not less than forty to fifty millions of people occupied here in centuries long since forgotten.

By Our Words Are We Known

BY F. J. LEWIS

"The impure cannot speak pure words; the pure mind cannot speak impure words."

"The tongue of the wise useth knowledge aright; but the mouth of fools poureth out foolishness."—Proverbs 15: 2.

Through experience we have found that thoughts, words, and acts make up life; that we think in words, and that words and acts are thoughts expressed. It is an established fact that from pure minds issue good, wholesome words.

We are also taught that speech is audible thought; that it is either pure, impure, foolish, or wise. How many have given this important subject of speech their careful consideration; how many realize that by controlling the mind, the tongue is also under control? Mind and speech are inseparable, and it is common knowledge that thoughts will soon express themselves.

Just as the things of the universe come forth in open life, so will thoughts express themselves in words or actions. In view of this fact it is of the utmost importance that our thoughts be of a pure and noble character, if we are to speak words of virtue and of truth. Whatever the character of our speech, so our thoughts are. Wise words prove wise minds, and man always endeavors to detect the condition of the mind by the words which are uttered by others. We come to the logical conclusion that the meaner the mind is, the meaner will be the vocabulary, A great mind will have an easy flow of language, but a limited mind will have a limited use of words.

There are many ways by which "the mouth of fools poureth out foolishness."

A man is foolish if he talks aimlessly and incoherently. The mind is impure and speech and actions become bad. Wisdom is apparent in the man whose conversation is chaste. Men using impure language are shunned by clean-living people.

A man is foolish if he talks aimlessly and incoherently. He has no control of mind and tongue. Discipline of speech has not been applied. He is wise if he talks with purpose and intelligence, so that the words which he utters are spoken at the right time and in the right way. Many words uttered in haste very often embroil us in trouble which could be easily avoided if our tongue had been more under control.

Foolishness is in the man who utters falsehood. This reacts on the mind and truth becomes subservient. If he rather utters words of sincerity and truth he commands the respect and love of all men. A lie spoken with a good intention is still a lie. For instance when a child willfully violates its duty to its parents, the father does not always stop to inquire into the motives of the child, but proceeds to mete out the due correction, because the act of telling a lie is wrong in itself. The motive is the cause in the mind, the condition of heart; the intention is the purpose in view. In reality a wrong act cannot spring from a right motive, although it may be guided by a good intention. Such an act can only spring from an impure source.

A man is foolish if he speaks ill of the absent and carries about evil reports concerning others. It is better for us if we avoid backbiting and slander, and speak well of, and in defense of, the absent. Let us rather speak in praise of others, but not to the point of flattery.

A man is unwise if he frames flattering words. Psalm 5:9 says: "For there is no faithfulness in their mouth; their inward part is very wickedness; their threat is an open sepulcher; they flatter with their tongues."

Wise is the man who avoids flattery; it is well to remember that we are all, now and always, justified and condemned by our words. By the words which we utter we publish to the universe the degree of our intelligence. To control the tongue, to discipline the speech, to strive for the use of gentler words—this is a very lowly thing and perhaps much despised; but it cannot be neglected by him who aspires to walk the way of wisdom.

A man is foolish if he utters violent and abusive words. Wisdom is apparent in the man whose speech is gentle and kindly. Altered speech follows an altered mind. When a man turns from the paths of evil and treads the path which leads to a more useful life, a life which is good, his conversation becomes cleansed. As a man increases in wisdom, he watches, modifies, and perfects his speech. It is impossible for any being to give utterance to words which are not already lodged in his mind in the form of thought. The impure mind cannot speak pure words; the pure mind cannot speak impure words. The ignorant cannot speak learnedly, nor the learned ignorantly. The foolish man cannot speak wisely, nor the wise foolishly. It is of great importance, therefore, that we watch, modify, and perfect our speech.

Foolish men often speak irreverently and their words are directed against those in authority in criticism and abuse. Even within the church this habit is a constant occurrence, and those who are discharging their duties to the best of their ability are very often criticized and censured.

A man is blessed when he is at one with all men, when he can say to those in authority, "As long as you are in harmony with the mind and will of God, I will help you and support you." Prior to our criticism of others it would be well if we were to begin a self-analysis of ourselves and see how perfect we are. It would be well for us to submit ourselves to a strenuous self-examination and to see whether we are not, after all, a little hasty in our remarks. "The mouths of fools, poureth out foolishness" but "the tongue of the wise useth knowledge aright."

Three Heavens or Glories

BY W. H. DEAM

A clear exposition of the fairness and justice by which men are judged "according to their works."

"I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago, (whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth;) such a one caught up to the third heaven."—2 Corinthians 12:2.

"There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial: but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another. There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption."—1 Corinthians 15:40-42.

Religious Motives

The great majority of those professing religion and subscribing to or obeying church articles or ordinances, no doubt have done so with an idea of bettering their condition in what is called the future world. Some may have united with churches simply that they might be classed with the better element of society, and a few that they might gain prestige to carry out evil designs. There are some who unite not because they love to do right, and others simply because they wish to escape the doom awaiting the unrighteous.

However, aside from the hypocrite, whether the lover of righteousness or those seeking to be free from the doom awaiting the unrighteous, all are looking forward to the time when they shall inherit a place of happiness, whether their time shall be spent in working deeds of righteousness and helping others, or in whiling away their time playing on golden harps.

Degrees of Merit

From the most righteous person, whose life work has been to emulate the example of the Christ, to the vilest sinner, there are almost innumerable degrees of merit or demerit, yet the majority of the Christian world look forward to only two conditions in the after life: one that of the redeemed where God and Christ dwell, and the other a place of misery where Satan and his angels reign supreme.

This is not in harmony with what the Apostle Paul said. He declared that he was caught up to the third heaven, and of what he beheld there he says that the things heard would be unlawful to utter. Then again he says there are three glories, and describes the highest glory as that of the sun, and the secondary glory as that of the moon, and the lower glory as that of the stars, and that there are innumerable degrees in the star glory, even as "one star differeth from another star in glory." This is in harmony with justice; but the idea of only two places, one to dwell in the midst of the best that heaven and God can provide, and the other in the depth of misery and woe without any degrees or grades, would be the greatest injustice.

The apostle says there is one glory of the sun, which is the celestial, and that the "glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another." From this we learn that there are two distinct glories, separate from each other—the celestial and the terrestrial, symbolized by the two great illuminating bodies, the sun and the moon. Furthermore he says there is still another glory, that represented by the stars, making three instead of one glory, and in this glory of the stars is where the great justice of the allwise Being is shown, "for as one star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead."

Anyone going out on a very clear night and observing the varying degrees of brightness of the myriads of stars from big bright Jupiter to the faintest one to be seen in the nebulae millions, and then think that the rewards to be administered in the next world are varying in degrees as these millions of stars vary in brightness, cannot help but see the wisdom and mercy of God in preparing glories to suit the multitudinous degrees of worthiness of those who may not be worthy to inherit the first two great glories represented by the sun and the moon.

The Apostle Paul thus makes it very plain that there are three glories, and that there are varying degrees in the lower glory to suit every condition of merit.

Latter Day Saints Broad-Minded

Latter Day Saints have been charged with being narrow-minded because they teach that everyone to inherit celestial glory must live up to the fullness of the gospel as taught by them. But if all understood the belief of the Saints and that it is in strict harmony with what the Apostle Paul taught, they would know that the position they occupy is far broader and more liberal than that of those who assume that all who "only believe" will go to the glory where God and Christ are, there to play on golden harps, while all who do not believe will go to the place of the doomed, there to suffer throughout countless ages.

A Vision of the Glories

In section 76 of the Doctrine and Covenants there is what purports to be a vision given to Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon. In this vision the three glories mentioned by the Apostle Paul are plainly and beautifully described. This vision was received February 16, 1832.

Before describing the glories, the fate of the disobedient ones is portrayed, including those who have denied the Holy Ghost, those who have accepted of Christ, who have tasted of the good word and of the glories to come, have known the power of God and have been made partakers thereof, and then allowed themselves to be overcome by the Devil, having denied the Only Begotten Son of God, thus crucifying him unto themselves and putting him to an open shame. This class are the only ones who will not finally be redeemed in the due time of the Lord. All others will come out after paying "the uttermost farthing." Of this class who deny the Holy Spirit we are told in Hebrews 6: 4-6, that it is impossible to renew again, "seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame."

Latter Day Saints agree with Paul as regards the condition in the next world of those who deny the Holy Spirit. Of that class both Paul and the Doctrine and Covenants affirm that they "crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame." All the rest shall come forth by the resurrection of the dead. By this we understand that even those who crucified the Lord of glory in the flesh will come forth, because they did not know what they were doing. Of them the Savior said in a prayer to the Father: "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do." Just like the meek and forgiving Savior. If he asked that they be forgiven they certainly will receive forgiveness. They knew not what they did. But the class who deny the Savior after receiving the testimony of him, know what they are doing. They are sons of perdition, and of them the Doctrine and Covenants says: "Wherefore he saves all except them." However, the other sinners must pay the penalty commensurate with the wrong they have done before they are liberated from prison. Justice, isn't it?

Qualifications for First Glory

Now, let us consider the glories. Paul mentions three glories and the varying degrees of the lower glory as does section 76 of Doctrine and Covenants, but the apostle does not explain specifically the character of the glories and the qualifications necessary for citizenship therein as does this vision to Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon.

Those who will inherit the celestial glory according to this vision are the ones who have received the testimony of Jesus, complied with the principles of the gospel, received the Holy Spirit, kept the commandments, have overcome by faith, been sealed by the Holy Spirit which is shed forth on all the just and true, are of the church of the Firstborn, are priests and kings, have received the fullness of God, priests of the Most High after the order of Melchisedec. They are the ones who shall dwell in the presence of God and Christ forever and ever. They are the ones Christ will bring with him when he comes in the clouds of heaven to reign on the earth. These will have part in the first resurrection. This is in part a description of those who shall inherit the highest glory, where Paul was caught up to the "third heaven."

Those Assigned to Second Glory

In the next glories are sown the justice and broad principles of the gospel taught by Latter Day Saints. The terrestrial is the second glory, typified by the moon. The moon on a clear night sheds a great light, wonderful in brightness compared with a night when she is in what is called the dark of the moon, but compared with the great effulgence shed by the sun, it is dim. Those of this glory are not of the church of the Firstborn and have not received of the fullness of the Father. They die without law. Among this class are those whom Christ visited and preached to in prison, and received the gospel (1 Peter 3: 19, 20), but are not entitled to the glory that those are who received the gospel while in the flesh and bore the cross and perfected themselves this side the veil. They have disobeyed and were rebellious, but received the gospel after being punished in prison—justice, is it not? They are also of the honorable men of the earth who have been blinded while in the flesh. There are honorable men, just in their dealings and moral in character, who have not accepted the gospel, yet have committed no great sin. Would it be just to send them to the place of the damned because they have not "only believed"? No, they are entitled to their reward, but not entitled to the highest honor as those are who have complied with all the requirements of the gospel. They will receive of the glory of God, but not of the fullness.

There is still another just feature connected with assignment to this glory. It is this: As those in the prison house have by the preaching of the Savior and others been brought up higher to one of the glories, so those in the two lower glories can be brought up higher in time by ministering spirits from the glory immediately above where they are. Thus those in the terrestrial glory may in time through education and acceptance of higher and greater qualifications ascend to the celestial if they are willing to comply with the celestial law. This is a wonderful provision in the wisdom, justice, and mercy of an allwise Ruler of the universe.

The third glory with its multitudinous degrees suited to the varying conditions of merit belonging to those assigned to this glory, which is in this vision and by the Apostle Paul typified by the stars in their differing degrees of brightness, again shows the wise provision of the Almighty in meting out justice to all, in contrast to the narrowmindedness and injustice of the theory that there are but two places—heaven and hell—with no intermediate degrees of merit. In this vision we are told something about those who shall inherit this glory. Paul says nothing about who will dwell there. He leaves us in the dark in that regard. But the vision that came simultaneously to these two men makes it all plain.

To Inherit the Third Glory

Among those who shall inherit the third or lower glory are those who in this life have not received the gospel of Christ nor the testimony of Jesus, but have not denied the Holy Spirit as those who will remain in perdition have. They will not receive of the fullness of the Father. While they will be ministered to by angels or ministering spirits from the terrestrial glory, they cannot be redeemed until after Christ has finished his work. They shall receive of the Holy Spirit, however, through the ministrations of those from the terrestrial glory. They will eventually be heirs of salvation. The glory of the terrestrial excels in all things that of this lower glory, as also the glory of the celestial excels in all things that of the terrestrial. In this vision the lowest glory is called the telestial, while Paul simply calls it the glory represented by the stars, and as "one star differeth from another star," etc. They are not classed with the wicked, but as those less deserving than the ones in the terrestrial glory.

A Consoling Thought

Here is a great consolation for the devout Christian who has lost a husband, wife, or child who has failed in this life to accept of Christ and his gospel, in that such ones may be appointed ministering spirits to bring their dear ones up perhaps to where they are. Without this assurance that either they or some one else will have a chance to extend another invitation to them to come to Christ it would be a sad parting when they come to die. The principles of the gospel as taught by Latter Day Saints hold forth the idea that they will still have an advocate with the Father and the Son in behalf of loved ones who have refused to accept Christ in this life, after they have served out their time and Christ's work has all been accomplished. Glorious thought!

Is there not more justice, wisdom, and mercy in the three glories with rewards commensurate to merits—three glories besides the place of the doomed—than a theory which provides only the one glory of God and the Lamb, and all who do not measure up to the standard entitling them to this high estate must be doomed to everlasting punishment? Does not the Apostle Paul teach that there are three glories and that in the lowest glory there is provision for degrees of glory according to worthiness, even as "one star differeth from another star in glory"?

In the greater part of rural France, the school has conquered the church, not by anti-Catholic propaganda, but simply by dissipating the ignorance and docility which are essential conditions of clerical domination. . . . It is contrary to public policy to allow persons that profess to have left the world to superintend the education of children who are going to live in it. . . . Illustrative of the popular attitude of the peasantry is the remark of the wife of a village mayor in the Sarthe. "Ah, sir," she said, "the day of M. Poincaré's election I felt sure that no good would come of it: the curé was so pleased."—My Second Country, by Robert Dell.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

PROHIBITION HELD CONSTITUTIONAL

On June 1, the United States Supreme Court handed down a decision that the referendum provisions in certain state constitutions do not apply to amendment to Federal constitution, as the method of amendment is clearly provided:

1. Proposal of amendment by two thirds of both Houses of Congress, or upon application of the legislatures of two thirds of the States.

2. Approval by legislatures of three fourths of the States, or by special conventions called, or three fourths of the States, as Congress may determine.

This decision directly applied to the 18th and 19th amendments.

Then on June 7 the same court decided a number of cases, holding both the 18th amendment and also the Volstead Act constitutional.

Suit by the State of New Jersey was dismissed, as well as petitions filed by the State of Rhode Island.

The decision follows:

"1. The adoption by both Houses of Congress, each by a two thirds vote, of a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution sufficiently shows that the proposal was deemed necessary by all who voted for it. An express declaration that they regarded it as necessary is not essential. None of the resolutions whereby prior amendments were proposed contained such a declaration.

"2. The two thirds vote in each House which is required in proposing an amendment is a vote of two thirds of the members present—assuming the presence of a quorum—and not a vote of two thirds of the entire membership present and absent. Missouri Pacific Railway Co. vs. Kansas, 248, U. S. 276.

"3. The referendum provisions of State constitutions and statutes, cannot be applied, consistently with the Constitution of the United States, in the ratification or rejection of amendments to it. Hawke vs. Smith, U. S. decided June 1, 1920.

"4. The prohibition of the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, and exportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, as embodied in the eighteenth amendment, is within the power to amend reserved by Article V of the Constitution.

"5. That amendment by lawful proposal and ratification has become a part of the Constitution, and must be respected and given effect the same as other provisions of that instrument.

"6. The first section of the amendment—the one embodying the prohibition—is operative throughout the entire territorial limits of the United States, binds all legislative bodies, courts, public officers, and individuals within those limits, and of its own force invalidates any legislative act—whether by Congress, by a State Legislature, or by a territorial assembly—which authorizes or sanctions what the section prohibits.

"7. The second section of the amendment—the one declaring 'the Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation'—does not enable Congress or the several States to defeat or thwart the prohibition, but only to enforce it by appropriate means.

"8. The words 'concurrent power' in that section do not mean joint power, or require that legislation thereunder by Congress, to be effective, shall be approved or sanctioned by the several States or any of them; nor do they mean that the power to enforce is divided between Congress and the several States along the lines which separate or distinguish foreign and interstate commerce from interstate affairs.

"9. The power confided to Congress by that section, while not exclusive, is territorially coextensive with the prohibition of the first section, embraces manufacture and other interstate transactions as well as importation, exportation, and interstate traffic, and is in nowise depended on or effected by action or inaction on the part of the several states or any of them.

"10. That power may be asserted against the disposal for beverage purposes of liquor manufactured before the amendment became effective, yet as it may be against subsequent manufacture for those purposes. In either case it is a constitutional mandate for prohibition that is being enforced.

"11. While recognizing that there are limits beyond which Congress cannot go in treating beverages as within its power of enforcement, we think those limits are not transcended by the provisions of the Volstead act, wherein liquors containing as much as one half of one per cent of alcohol by volume and fit for use for beverage purposes are treated as within that power. Jacob Rupper vs. Caffey, 251, U. S. 264." Federal Court decrees dismissing injunction proceedings instituted by the Kentucky Distilleries and Warehouse Company, of Louisville, Kentucky, to enjoin enforcement of the act against it were sustained by the court. Injunctions sought by George C. Dempsey, a Boston (Massachusetts) wholesale liquor dealer, to restrain enforcement of the enforcement act against him were also denied by the court.

THE MINISTER'S SON

The Literary Digest for May 29 contains a summary of an article in the Christian Advocate and from the New York Evening Sun, the latter of which states that in making a careful study of multi-millionaire heads of 100 leading industries in America, they found that 5 per cent of them were the sons of bankers, 10 per cent the sons of merchants and manufacturers, 25 per cent the sons of teachers, physicians, and country lawyers, while over 30 per cent were the sons of preachers, whose salaries, as Mr. Babson adds, didn't average $1,500 a year.

The New York Christian Advocate continues the theme by stating that as a class, they are remarkable for high character and ability. John and Charles Wesley, Jonathan Edwards, Increase and Cotton Mather, Henry Ward Beecher, and Spurgeon were all the sons of preachers. The father of David D. Field was also a clergyman before him, and all of the sons of Field became famous; one became a famous jurist, another an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court, a third a preacher, while the youngest one, Cyrus, laid the first Atlantic cable.

Of fifty-one Americans in the Hall of Fame ten years ago, ten were the children of ministers; out of twelve thousand names in Who's Who in America, almost one thousand are the sons of clergymen, a number out of all proportion to the number of ministers in the country.

Among American men of letters who were born in parsonages, were William and Henry James, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Richard Watson Gilder, Henry van Dyke, James Russell Lowell, Francis Parkman, and Oliver Wendell Holmes.

In the scientific world are the names of Agassiz and Morse. Among statesmen, Cleveland, Arthur, Wilson, Clay, Buchanan, Morton, Beveridge, Dolliver, and Hughes.

The article continues as follows:

"Linnæus was the son of a preacher, as was Jenner. Sir Christopher Wren and Sir Joshua Reynolds were sons of clergymen, and so were Hallam, Froude, Dean Stanley, Maurice, Charles Kingsley, Tennyson, Ben Jonson, Cowper, Goldsmith, Coleridge, Addison, Young, Keble, and Matthew Arnold. Why is it that so many great men have been reared in a parson's home? Because, 'instead of being a handicap to contend against, it is a positive advantage to be the son of a clergyman—an advantage morally, an advantage intellectually,' the writer answers, and proceeds:

"To a very large extent the minister works in his home. Personally, he is "on the job," and has peculiarly compelling motives for making good at it. Juvenile crimes interrupt his studies; they are a nuisance—to him, personally. Moreover, they hurt him professionally. If a soapman's boy puts the cat in the flour barrel, no one argues that on that account the soapman is no longer entitled to manufacture soap; if the dentist's boy obtains the formulas for making blasting powder, and makes it, and terrorizes the neighborhood, no one says the dentist should quit pulling teeth; yet when the minister's boy goes in for such frolics, or for frolics far less shocking, people talk as if he had proved his father a kind of clerical incompetent and flubdub, or at best a poor, dreamy soul wholly lacking in practicability. To a man of spirit this is insufferable. He deals promptly with the culprit. He deals sanely.

"I note, moreover, that clergymen's sons are especially fortunate in their choice of mothers. The minister's wife is not frivolous. She is not worldly. She is not selfish. She is not shallow-witted. She is, on the whole, the type of woman most admirably fitted to maintain the inspiring home atmosphere in which a boy can grow up into serious manhood. The standards she sets before him are as American as they are Christian. She has no "social ambitions." She never measures people by their incomes. She is not desirous to be rich. The rewards she covets are the rewards of service, and chief among them is the opportunity for more service. Aided by her husband's example, she makes a boy see that success, instead of being the mere piling up of dollars, is a vastly more splendid thing—the binding of people to him in bonds of affection, forged by kindness; the winning of position, not for its own sake, but for the great public usefulness it implies.

"Besides, life in the parsonage overflows with interest. All the big, human, impressive things that are going on in the parish come to his knowledge. All the world's news is discussed at the table. The best books find their way into the parsonage library, and are his for the asking. As a rule, he has a college graduate for a father, if not a college graduate for a mother, and it is understood all along that some day he himself will go to college, and to college he goes eventually—under somewhat difficult circumstances very often, but circumstances that work to his advantage. They teach him economy. They enforce the self-restraints on which economy depends. They preclude dissipation. They throw him in with boys from middle-class families, and prevent his becoming a nabob. No matter how prosperous he may get to be in later life, his standards tend to remain middle-class standards—the standards, that is, of the happiest class in America, and the best.

"Now, considering all the advantages of being a minister's son, and the astonishing proportion of minister's sons among the world's celebrities, how comes it that people still assume that sons of clergymen are "generally unfortunate like the sons of Eli, dissolute in their lives and doleful in their deaths"? Old Thomas Fuller explained the "common report" by saying that people looked too closely at the minister's son, exaggerated his misdemeanors, discounted his merits, and held up the exceptional embodiment of rascality as typical of all the rest. Quoth Thomas, "Clergymen's children have not been more unfortunate, but more observed than the children of the parents of other professions.""

FOOD PRESERVATION

A great deal of interest may be taken in the methods used by the Federal Government and by the allies as well, for the preserving of food during the war. We have grown so used to canning that we are inclined to forget that but a few years ago there was very little canning, and all fruits and vegetables were dried.

Unfortunately the methods of drying used in the past were not always the best, and much of the flavor was lost.

During the great war another problem entered, and that was, space for transportation. We have found by experiment that by extracting the very large amount of water in vegetables by a proper method, it is possible not only to save

PASTORAL

Keeping the Public Informed

A straightforward statement that should be an incentive to many others in explaining our position.

[The following appeared in a local Phoenix (Arizona) newspaper through the efforts of Elder James E. Yates, and was illustrated with a picture of President Frederick M. Smith secured from the Publicity Department. It is the type of communication that any unbiased newspaper is glad to get, as it is newsy, brief, and interesting.—EDITORS.]

The newly erected L. D. S. chapel at Tenth and Moreland streets, on the Brill car line, has raised the question of why are there two Latter Day Saint churches in Phoenix. This question was answered yesterday by the head of the congregation which built the new chapel.

The new L. D. S. church was built by the Phoenix congregation of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. This church is entirely separate from the Latter Day Saints church which has its headquarters at Salt Lake City and its seat of administration at Independence, Missouri.

The L. D. S. church, which has its headquarters at Independence, is headed by Frederick M. Smith, grandson of Joseph Smith, and much of the genius of the man who startled the religious thought of the world nearly a century ago by introducing the Book of Mormon as the purported history of America, seems to be bequeathed to the vigorous grandson.

There has been no affiliation or connection between the two entirely distinct L. D. S. churches since the days of Brigham Young, or since the death of Joseph Smith.

The original church split over the introduction of the doctrine of "celestial marriage." The Reorganized Church, which now centers in Independence, held that the doctrine was a heresy introduced by cunning after the death of Joseph Smith, the prophet of the Mormon church, and falsely laid to his charge. The Salt Lake church contended for the doctrine, but since has modified its position.

That is why, it was explained, there are two L. D. S. churches in Phoenix. A protracted meeting is now being conducted at the new chapel, to which the public is invited.

At the recent general world conference of the Reorganized church, held at Independence, a great constructive program was outlined. Provision was made for the building of an auditorium at that city with a seating capacity of 10,000. The plans for the erection of a magnificent temple will occupy the attention of the church's people. Other features of an immediate building program of no small proportions include public buildings at Lamoni, Iowa, and at various points near Independence.

At the conference the church, through its leader, declared itself for and in sympathy with the cause of labor in all proper efforts to establish economic justice and equity. The conference took action in almost unanimous agreement for the establishment of a plan of stewardship in the property holdings of the people of the church, the plan being calculated to be of great assistance in case of an unexpected financial crisis.

The following is a statement made by the local branch of the church:

"The whole world vibrates with the consciousness that conditions are as they have never been before in the history of man, and with the growing knowledge that past methods of procedure must utterly fail to solve the limitless complications of the economic and social problems that are of local, state, federal and international importance to-day.

"This church addresses herself to these problems, for the welfare of her people, and while it remains to be seen what measure of success will be achieved in this regard, she solicits the moral support of all fair-minded people everywhere, in the undertaking of so laudable a work."

Prior to the war the degree of master of arts was given for advanced work at English universities, but no degrees of doctor of philosophy were given. On the other hand, for advanced work at German universities, including some original research, the degree of doctor of philosophy was given, but not the degree of master of arts. Both had a degree which corresponds to bachelor of arts. In our American universities, both degrees have been given; the master of arts for one year of post graduate work, the degree of doctor of philosophy for three years of post graduate work. We learn now that at Oxford, since the opening of the war, the degree of doctor of philosophy is given. The purpose is to divert to the English centers of culture, the stream of students that have hitherto gone to the German universities.

What is believed to be a successful new treatment for leprosy is announced by the United States Public Health Service, which reports that Surgeon General Hugh S. Cumming has submitted such information regarding the world's most dreadful malady. The treatment involves the use of "ethyl ester" from chaulmoogra oil. The demonstrations have been made in Hawaii and it is hoped will be extended to the leper colony at Molokai.

seventy-five to ninety per cent of the shipping space, but that the food could be delivered and found still to possess its natural flavor. One instance was reported of soup prepared for the Boer War, or rather dried vegetables prepared for that purpose during the Boer War, which upon being opened in 1914, were found still to preserve their original flavor and to be unspoiled. They were shipped and used with good advantage on the French front.

It is reported that such methods of extracting the water, practically a variation of drying, not only preserve the flavor and keep the food really fresh, but preserve food for a much longer period than canning.

IMPRESSIVE RECORDS OF THE AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY

Two hundred and seventy-five miles of Bibles would reach from New York to Boston, on to Lowell, and just run over into New Hampshire. And that is the kind of path the American Bible Society could lay with the Scriptures published by it during the past year.

The annual report of the Society, just made public, shows that over 3,400,000 volumes were issued during 1919. Of these about 350,000 were Bibles, 550,000 Testaments, and 2,500,000 portions of Scriptures.

Nearly 140 million Scriptures have been issued by the Society during its history of 104 years.

During the World War 6,678,301 Testaments were distributed among the belligerent forces of all nations.

A novel feature of the year is the completion of the great Mandarin Version of the Chinese Bible, which has cost several hundred thousand dollars and took twenty-five years of work on the part of the translators. This version makes the Bible accessible to over 400 million people, or one fourth the population of the world; more people than were ever reached by any one translation in history.—Federal Council Bulletin.

WHAT WE BELIEVE

Repentance

BY ELBERT A. SMITH

A most readable exposition of the important doctrinal principle forming part of the foundation of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

"Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."—Jesus.

Are you satisfied with your present mode of life? Are you satisfied with your past record? If not, the message of Jesus comes to you, first, in invitation, "Repent ye therefore, and be converted"; second, in warning, Except ye repent, ye shall perish.

God Will Welcome You

Be assured, at the very beginning, that God will welcome you, under the terms of his wonderful gospel plan. His attitude is one of invitation.

A popular, and so-called "orthodox" confession of faith says of Christ, "Who truly suffered, was dead and buried, to reconcile his Father to us."

Make no mistake, Jesus did not come to reconcile God to us. Jesus came to reconcile us to God. The attitude of God has ever been one of love and invitation.

"For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John 3: 16.

To Reconcile Man to God

God never hated man or assumed an aloof and vindictive attitude, that Jesus should come and live and die to reconcile him to man. Man went out of the way, and disobeyed, hated, and feared God. Jesus came to reconcile man to God.

"And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation; to-wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself . . . and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation. Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God."—2 Corinthians 5: 18-20.

If you have the necessary faith to serve as a spring of action, and the good sense, grace, and courage to repent, God will receive you on the terms of his gospel.

The Return of the Prodigal

Jesus put into imperishable story form the dramatic experiences of the prodigal son. Having demanded his patrimony of his father, this young man left his father's house and went into a strange country. There he wasted his fair inheritance in riotous living.

Presently there came a famine in the land. His heritage was gone. He was in dire want. So he joined himself to a citizen of that country and was set to feed the swine.

So low had he fallen, and into such want, that he would fain have eaten the husks that were fed to the swine. But let the Man of Parables proceed with the tale:

"And when he came to himself, he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger! I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me as one of thy hired servants. And he arose, and came to his father. But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him. And the son said unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son. But the father said to his servants, Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet: and bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat, and be merry: for this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found. And they began to be merry."—Luke 15: 17-24.

The Attitude of the Son

The son had been, in a sense, insane. At least, like all sinners, he had been obsessed with folly. But at last he came to himself. He already had faith in his father. Next he began to repent.

At first his repentance seemed to be only because of his hard circumstances. The results of his course began to obtrude themselves upon his notice, and they were painful.

This probably is the beginning of repentance with many men. It is not in itself adequate. Probably with many, if indeed not with most men, a halt is first called in their downward course because of a fear of or dislike for the consequences of sin.

This frame of mind must lead to something higher, or true repentance cannot ensue. It is at this point that the sense of a Father's love intervenes and leads to complete repentance.

With the prodigal son, the primary impulse to get away from an intolerable situation and back to a comfortable one was succeeded by genuine loathing for the sin that he had committed. He abhorred the state of ignominy to which he had fallen. He loathed himself in that condition. He was resolved never to return to his past course of life, not alone because retribution followed such a course, but because he now saw it in its true light, a thing to detest and forsake because of its very nature. His heart turned back to his father in love.

With the utmost penitence, humility, and sorrow, he returned to his father, willing to do his bidding in all things. Willing to become a servant, he was received as a son.

Never at any time had the father utterly cast him off. He had never ceased to love him. The father abhorred his folly and his manner of life. But when the son came to himself and returned with true repentance in his heart, and with confession on his lips, he received him with the utmost joy. These are among the things that Jesus taught in that matchless parable.

It was just before he related this parable that he declared: "There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth." (Luke 5: 10.)

Are you feeding on husks? Are you estranged from your Father in heaven? Have you wasted your fair inheritance? If so, why not come to yourself now? Repent. Turn from your present life. Trust your Father's love. Do his will.

What Was Accomplished by the Return?

The first great thing that was accomplished by the repentance and return of the prodigal was reconciliation to his father. An at-one-ment was effected. They were one again in spirit.

Note this well: The wasted years were not recovered. The wasted inheritance was gone. The past could not be lived over.

But the prodigal had returned to his father's house. He was again willing to include himself within the circle of that father's love. Reconciliation had obtained. He was separated from his sin. And, second great fact, mark it well, joyful thought, hope of all men, he was ready to make a new start. Yes, he was ready to make a new start. Are you ready to make a new start?

Start from Where You Are

Bourke is author of the truism, apparently absurd, really very wise and witty: "If we would go anywhere, we must start from where we are."

However much we may wish to be somewhere else, we must start from where we are. The prodigal made his start from the pigsty. It was not a nice place to start from; but it was necessary for him to start from where he was. That was where he was.

You may not be satisfied with your present condition as a starting point; but from there you must start. There may be some things that you have lost beyond recall, wasted years, energies, and means; but that cannot be helped.

The question is, Are you ready for a new start? Are you willing to start now, and from where you are? Do you wish to be a true man or woman from here and now, henceforth? If so, on condition of true repentance, your Father is ready to meet you and welcome you with joy, and you will be in a position to make the most of the future.

Sorrow for the irrevocable past is only a part of repentance; to gird up the loins and press forward into as glorious a future as you can create for yourself, with God's help, is certainly equally important.

The Story of the Shasta Daisy

Burbank took the seeds of a common wild daisy and planted them. When the plants springing therefrom grew up, he pulled up all but the largest two, and when they blossomed he plucked off all but the largest two blossoms. The seeds from these he planted, and when they grew he pulled up all but the largest two plants. When they blossomed he plucked off all but the largest two blossoms. From these he saved the seeds and planted them.

This process he repeated with almost infinite patience for twenty-five years, a quarter of a century, and then he had the great, white Shasta daisy. Burbank had only one short life. He was working with nothing greater than a flower.

God has eternity. He is working with immortal souls. If you will cooperate with him, in time, or in eternity, he will carry you forward to the very limit of your capabilities of development.

"Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."—Philippians 3:13, 14.

Fruits Meet for Repentance

We can not emphasize too strongly the thought that repentance should be associated with a forward movement, with a change of living. Good works and obedience to God are the natural fruits of repentance.

To the multitudes that came out to hear him preach, John said: "Bring forth therefore fruits worthy of repentance." (Luke 3:8.)

Jesus himself took up the message proclaimed by John, and, announcing the kingdom of heaven, commanded the people to repent (Mark 1:14, 15; Luke 24:46, 47). The apostles carried the message everywhere with them (Mark 6:12).

Paul said to Agrippa:

"Whereupon, O king Agrippa, I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision; but shewed first unto them of Damascus, and at Jerusalem, and throughout all the coasts of Judea, and then to the Gentiles, that they should repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance."—Acts 26:19, 20.

It will be seen by this that the message was to those who would believe, turn to God, and do the works meet for repentance.

The Chief Requirements

In considering the things required of man and the things required of God to effect a reconciliation, Wright makes this illuminating statement regarding God's chief demand:

"Analyzed, the demand seems to be: (1) a turning from sin, a change of mind, of attitude, of purpose; a repentance; a conversion; (2) the acceptance of a righteous or new nature as a guarantee of righteousness for the future. This second demand, so often overlooked as a necessity of the atonement, is quite essential as the first."—Problem of the Atonement, p. 16.

Restitution Where Possible

It goes almost without saying that true repentance will be accompanied by an effort to make past wrongs right. The law given through Moses required that where one had defrauded another he should restore that which had been taken unjustly, adding to the principal "the fifth part more." (Leviticus 6:1-5.)

Zaccheus declared, "If I have taken anything from any man by false accusation, I restore him fourfold." (Luke 19:8.)

Of course there are many cases where it is impossible to make restitution. In such instances the matter must be left with God for adjudication, trusting to his divine mercy, as in all instances; and if the matter be one between man and man, though restitution may not be possible, human reconciliation and forgiveness should be sought.

A Prerequisite of Baptism

On the day of Pentecost Peter addressed a most remarkable congregation. He faced the very men who had consented to the death of Jesus. He faced mockers who had said that the saints were all drunken. He faced men who would not hesitate to kill him and his associates.

But endowed with that power from on high that Christ had promised them, he preached such a wonderful discourse that those men were pricked in their hearts and stood self-condemned, crying out, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?"

"Then Peter said unto them, Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost."—Acts 2:38.

Peter told them what to do to be saved. They already believed. The next step was to repent. Repentance was to be followed by baptism, in its logical order, for the remission of their sins, and then the gift of the Holy Ghost was to be received. All this is in harmony with Paul's enumeration of the principles of the gospel of Christ:

"Therefore leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection; not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works and of faith toward God, of the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment."—Hebrews 6:1, 2.

The Gospel Mirror

The Apostle James uses this remarkable language:

"Wherefore lay apart all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness, and receive with meekness the engrafted word, which is able to save your souls. But be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves. For if any be a hearer of the word, and not a doer, he is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass: for he beholdeth himself, and goeth his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was. But whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed."—James 1:21-25.

"Blessed are they that do." (Revelation 22: 14.) But do not overlook the figure of the mirror. In the gospel of Christ we get a full, fair vision of ourselves as we are. Robert Burns said:

"Oh, wad some power the giftie gie us
To see oursel's as others see us!
It wad frae monie a blunder free us,

Infinitely more important is it to see ourselves as God sees us. Having been granted such a look into the gospel mirror, how foolish to go away and forget, failing to rectify the defects seen; like a man who, looking into a natural glass, sees his face soiled and sooty and his clothing unrepresentable, and then, forgetting his condition, goes happily out into the society of the clean and decent.

Aroused Discontent

This glimpse at ourselves as we are arouses discontent. The sinner sees himself as he is, black, perhaps, with most loathsome immoralities, deformed and all but ruined by excesses.

Slavery of every kind leaves its unmistakable traces in the features and form, as in the "Man with a hoe," immortalized by Markham:

"Who loosened and let down that brutal jaw?
Whose was the hand that slanted back that brow?
Whose breath blew out the light within his brain? . . .
Hell has no form more terrible than this."

The man with a hoe must see himself as he is before he even desires to be free. No man can be free who is satisfied with slavery. Discontent must be aroused. Discontent with self is the essence of repentance.

Discontent aroused by a look in the gospel mirror might quickly give place to black despair. But here enters the love of God with the gospel of hope, the "perfect law of liberty." Faith in God, repentance from dead works, regeneration in the waters of baptism, these set men free, and the Holy Spirit guides them on to all truth.

Paul enlarges on the mirror simile used by James; for this marvelous gospel mirror has another quality. It not only shows me to myself as I am; it also shows me as I may be. It reveals to me the man that I may become under God's divine direction:

"But we all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord. Therefore, seeing we have this ministry, as we have received mercy, we faint not; but have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty."—Paul.

QUIT YOURSELVES LIKE MEN

"Are you a man? Assert your manhood then.
Break off from the evil ways beneath a man.
They do not contribute to make you men.
Shame! Do not say, "I can not"; say, "I can."
Are you a woman? There is the same need.
Behold the little ones are round your knee,
To all your words and actions they give heed,
And imitate with aptness what they see.
Are you a young man? Oh, then while the light
And dew of life's sweet morn is round your path, Serve ye its Giver in your fresh young might.
For lo, his word a thousand beauties hath.
Are you a maiden? Truly serve the Lord
Before your friends and brothers; make them know
The power of purity in his great word:
Your influence is large, for weal or woe.
Do you love wisdom? Who so wise as he?
Or poetry? Come, you will be at home

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

Our Study Bureaus

We are pleased to tell you at this time about our study bureaus. It has long been recognized that an important feature of the work of the Women's Department of the church was its educational one. It is true that to be efficient and of value to the community, a person's education must be expressed in terms of action. Christ said, "If you love me, you will do my will." If we can love intelligently that love will be transformed into deeds of service. It is to the end that every woman in the church may be helped to the highest purposes of her life, to find her peace and joy in the accomplishment of her most sacred duties, that we have banded together as women and sisters, and across the study table join hands in obedience to the command, "Come up higher, O my children!"

The crying need for noble parenthood and the proper exercise of its authority and privileges to the end that our gifts to posterity and to the cause of Zion shall be of worth and beauty, leads us to face the undeniable fact that the mothers and fathers of the present day have a long way to go before they shall fill acceptably to God their divine responsibility. The laxity of morals, the lack of reverence, the inordinate love for pleasure, and the indifference to things of the Spirit which are witnessed to-day can only be caused by grave and serious neglect and inefficiency on the part of the parents who influence the youth of the hour. Were our homes one hundred per cent Christian, we would not need to fear any attempts of Satan to vitiate those who come within their sheltering circles.

In striving for that one hundred per cent Christian efficiency, we must concede the value of starting the child right, of giving him the right impetus in the right direction. Physically, mentally, and morally he must be carefully prepared for his spiritual stature—the "stature of a man in Christ Jesus!" Has anyone a higher aim, or a weightier responsibility? All the wisdom of the ages is none too much for the mother or father who desires to be in verity and truth what they are in name! The pity is that so few view it in that light. Frivolity and indifference mark too many homes of to-day, and the family altar of love, reverence, and worship is too nearly obsolete!

Our home and child welfare bureau offers much that is valuable to the parent who is earnestly striving to render faithful account of his stewardship as such. The supervisor, Sister Lydia Wight, is preparing the leaflet course on "Child welfare," as well as directing study along many other lines which bear upon the interests of home and children.

The bureau of social service is supervised by Sister Henry C. Smith, who is well qualified for leading the student of social science into many varied and recognized avenues of this subject. Christ was a student—a past master—along

With all things fair and beautiful and free.

Do you love wickedness? Then do not come.
From Noah down all prophets cried repent;
And I of passages might find a score
To prove the doctrine. But my time is spent;
And all that I might say was said before."

—David H. Smith.

EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the third of our series on "What we believe," printed especially for the younger Saints (young in years and gospel experience) that they may the better be able to give a reason for the hope that is within them. The above may be obtained in convenient tract form of either church publishing house, No. T1220, 5 for 10 cents, or 100 for $1.75. The next article will be on baptism in water by immersion.

this line. Ever he sought to mingle with his theoretical advice, that of a practical and immediate nature. Healing the wounds of body, he ministered also to the wounds of soul. He ignored the false lines of caste and of social distinctions, and recognized only the higher ones of human brotherhood and divine Fatherhood. We cannot hope to be intelligent followers where he led, until we can translate our precepts into terms of human service, as did he whom we love.

Then we have the young women's bureau, with its two active departments, the Orioles and the Temple Builders. The supervisor of this practical bureau has general oversight of the good of the girls and young women of our church. With her helpers, she devises plans for their wholesome recreation and pleasure, as well as their steady advancement along spiritual lines. Sister Alice Mae Burgess, who has given clear-sighted and inspirational assistance in this department for several years, has found it necessary to decline reappointment, but suggested as her successor a young woman who, in the opinion of all who know her, is eminently qualified for the work. We refer to Sister Zilpha Monroe, of Lamoni, Iowa, who, while not heretofore actively engaged in this particular work, has had experience with young people in educational pursuits and otherwise, and brings to bear a beautiful spirit of consecrated and loving service. While it is with regret we release Sister Burgess from this important work, we rejoice that another devoted young woman has consented to take it up, and we feel no hesitancy in assuring those interested that Sister Monroe will prove a very able and efficient advisor and director. She desires the assistance of Sister Grace Thompson who has so ably directed the Oriole movement in the past.

Another pleasant announcement in connection with the young women's bureau, is that Brother T. W. Williams, for the Religio, has recently announced their desire to have our supervisor of girls act in similar capacity in the Religio executive. Thus she will help to outline those activities which affect the girls and the boys of the church jointly. This decision on the part of the Religio is to be carried out in locals, also, we understand, where the local Women's Department supervisor of young women will be expected to act with the Religio officers in directing the activities of the young.

Our fourth bureau is that of miscellaneous study, and is in charge of Sister Lucie H. Sears, who will be ready at all times to advise those sisters who desire to take up some special or general line of educational work not cared for in our other bureaus. Some of our women, regretting the inadequacy of their youthful opportunities for study, or wishing to broaden their culture that they may keep pace with their children, or for other reasons, often wish to take up the study of history, English, psychology, or some other subject which appeals. Not caring for the heavy extension courses offered by our universities along these lines, such women will find in Sister Sears just the right kind of advisor. She will gladly respond to requests, will suggest reading courses, give names of books, etc. Just write your desires, your previous preparation or lack of it, what your objectives are, address our general office, and receive in return the wise and careful consideration Sister Sears will give to your request.

In addition to the material usually offered in the above bureaus we plan to present to you, ere long, a list of our loan papers. These are in the nature of papers or articles prepared by thoughtful writers upon various topics, suitable for reading and discussion in study circles, and may be obtained from our general office as loans, to be returned after use, and thus rendered available for other groups. We hope to write further concerning this new feature at an early date.

Meanwhile, we hope there is no local organization of our women which has not subscribed to one or more, of our leaflet courses. In fact, we consider it the mark of a very live and up-to-date local group of women when they take all three courses, thus rounding out specific preparation along several very important lines of women's duty. The "Child welfare," the "Food and the body," and the "Relief and service" courses are exactly the thing for group study and discussion, as well as being finely adapted for individual reading and assimilation. Each of these will contain about twenty to twenty-five lessons, and all three courses will cost but 75 cents, or only 25 cents each. At practically but a penny apiece these lessons are worth many, many times their cost, and we hope every woman in the church will avail herself of this rare opportunity to bring into her home, the simplified essence of authoritative information on the above subjects. Order to-day, money accompanying, from our general office, Box 255, Independence, Missouri, Women's Department.

Guests

Real homes are arranged so as to make all real men really happy. The women folks run the machinery, and the men folks, when they come home, are visitors, guests. And the machinery frequently stops until they go on about their business again.

One knows how it is. Woman knows. Let the bread-winner leave, and the dust begins to fly. Washing, mending, sweeping, cleaning, bed making, and all the household routine goes on with the precision of a properly oiled machine. But the stage is already set for "him," if it is a real home. And when he comes, the machinery stops for the welcome guest. It is then a case of love and laughter. Fine that it is. It's a good thing, maybe, that man isn't around the house very much. Or truly woman's work would never end.

But at that, as a chuckling old gentleman asserts, there are many houses without men, but few homes with them. "Every honest front door is glad to see man's departure in the morning, but is more than happy to see him return at night."—Exchange.

Just You

There's Something makes my morning bright,
No matter if it's raining,
And all the sunshine hidden quite,
And all the winds complaining;
Though all the sky
As clouds trail by,
Show not a bit of blue,
Still, Something makes the shadows fly—
'Tis you, just You!

There's Something makes my labor light,
No matter if I'm serving
At weary toil, from morn till night,
From duty never swerving;
Though days are long,
A happy song
Sings all the dull hours through,
And Something makes me brave and strong—
'Tis you, just You!

There's Something makes a pure delight,
No matter what is wanting,
When work is done, and elves of night,
Day's requiem are chanting;
Though every gain
Was bought with pain,
And though rewards be few,
Yet, Something proves 'twas not in vain—
'Tis you, just You!

There's Something makes the world all right,
No matter if there's trouble
Along my path, and more in sight,
All in a measure double;
Each sorry thing
That life can bring
I never need to rue,
For Something heals the sharpest sting—
'Tis you, just You!

LETTERS

Was It Lip Service?

Copy of a letter by C. W. Lamb to relatives not in the church.

One morning after reading the second chapter of Daniel, (which I believe was to be the Sunday school lesson for that day), you, that is, Thomas, prayed in these words: "O God, thou who art the God of Daniel, grant unto us our requests, and answer us, we pray thee, as thou didst Daniel."

Now how did the Lord answer Daniel? Was it not by means of inspired dreams, and visions, and their interpretation, and by revelations concerning present and future things, that enabled him to prophesy concerning the "latter days" and by miraculous preservation, and by the ministering of angels? It certainly was. Did either of you believe that such divine gifts and blessings from God were to be enjoyed now? No, indeed. The belief in such things now, is met with a sneer of derision, and with contempt and anger. For you had been taught by man made precepts that the day of miracles and revelations and the ministering of angels, was long since past—that God had done his work, and retired; and never again would speak to nor work among men, as of old—had changed, so that he was much like a dumb idol, and no longer the God he used to be.

A prophet of old who dwelt in America foresaw by the Spirit of God the present condition of the churches of men, and said of their leaders:

"They say unto the people, Hearken unto us, and hear ye our precepts; for behold there is no God to-day, for the Lord and Redeemer hath done his work. . . . If they shall say, There is a miracle wrought by the hand of the Lord, believe it not; for this day he is not a God of miracles; he hath done his work.—Book of Mormon, 2 Nephi 12: 5-8.

Your minister, the Reverend Mr. W——, held that the day of miracles and revelations passed away and was no longer needed, after the Christian church and faith became established. And he brought me a bottle of strychnine and requested me to prove to him that the signs now follow "them that believe" by taking some of his poison. His argument was like this: "You believe, Mr. Lamb, that the promise in the last chapter of Mark of the miraculous gifts following them that believe, extends to our time." Of course I replied that I did so believe. He continued, "That promise says if they, them that believe, shall drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; and you say you believe. Now, Mr. Lamb, can you take some of this strychnine and receive no harm from it?"

I replied, "No; not presumptuously; nor any other man! That would be tempting God, to take it purposely, and then expect the Lord to exercise his power to prevent its harming one. There is no promise of miraculous assistance in any such case. The Scripture promise that the Devil quoted to Christ, of angel protection lest he dash his "foot against a stone" (Psalm 91:12; Matthew 4:6) when he requested him to prove his claim and belief by casting himself down from the pinnacle of the temple, was only in case of accident, as stubbing his toe, and would not cover such a case as that of purposely placing himself in danger to satisfy sign seekers. Suppose Daniel had purposely cast himself into the lion's den, to satisfy some sign seeker who claimed the day of miracles was past, do you suppose he would have come out alive? No, he would not.

These things that you opposed, and yet prayed for, would be what you termed "Mormonism"; but it seems that was Daniel's way, and that that way was right, at that time. And if the "God of Daniel" has not changed, then Daniel's way must be right now. We read in the scriptures, "I am the Lord, I change not." (Malachi 3:6.) So Daniel's way will be forever right. Your prayer must have been without faith, not believing that you could receive. Was it not a solemn mockery before God? You were drawing near him with your lips, while your heart was far away with the traditions and precepts of men. And the Lord says of this people to whom the words of the "book that is sealed" should come forth:

"Forasmuch as this people draw near me with their mouth, and with their lips do honor me, but have removed their heart far from me, and their fear toward me is taught by the precepts of men: Therefore, behold, I will proceed to do a marvelous work among this people, even a marvelous work and a wonder; for the wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid."—Isaiah 29: 13, 14.

That the day of miracles and revelations is forever past, is the "understanding of their prudent men." But it is a misunderstanding, for the scripture prophecies show that instead of being past, the great day of miracles and revelations is yet in the future. For the coming of Christ with power and great glory, and the resurrection of the dead, and the translation or change "in the twinkling of an eye," of the saints who are alive when he comes, and many other things, are yet to take place.

I know that you were led to be thus inconsistent by putting your trust in man, and by following priestcraft and human opinions and traditions. Only for that, you would have taken the scriptures of truth as they read, for your guide; then your prayer and your belief would have agreed. The prayer was right, but your theory or belief was directly opposed to the prayer. It was pinning your faith on man, instead of God, that blinded you.

Some one has said, "Why are you looking for the centurion's experience, if you have not the centurion's faith? Can you honestly deny that the promise has been exactly fulfilled, 'According to your faith be it unto you?'" Why are you looking for Daniel's experience, if you have not Daniel's faith?

The Prophet Moroni, the son of Mormon, who, about four hundred and twenty years after Christ, hid upon this land the sacred records, till they should come forth in our time and go from the Gentiles to the Lamanites or Indians, addressing them, said:

"When ye shall receive these things, I would exhort you that ye would ask God, the eternal Father, in the name of Christ, if these things are not true; and if ye shall ask with a sincere heart, with real intent, having faith in Christ, he will manifest the truth of it unto you, by the power of the Holy Ghost; and by the power of the Holy Ghost ye may know the truth of all things. And whatsoever thing is good, is just and true; wherefore, nothing that is good denieth the Christ, but acknowledges that he is. And ye may know that he is, by the power of the Holy Ghost; wherefore I would exhort you, that ye deny not the power of God; for he worketh by power, according to the faith of the children of men, the same to-day and to-morrow, and forever. And again I exhort you, my brethren, that ye deny not the gifts of God, for . . . all these gifts of which I have spoken, which are spiritual, never will be done away, even so long as the world shall stand, only according to the unbelief of the children of men."—Book of Mormon, Moroni 10: 4-23.

Let Us Choose Now

We have reached the harvest time in the history of the world's inhabitants. It would seem as if civilization were committing suicide. The wheat and tares have been growing together side by side, and often it has been difficult to discern between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not. But conditions are developing in the earth that will cause a separation. Men will be compelled to take sides in the time of the harvest. Jesus said to the reapers, "Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them; but gather the wheat into my barn." (Matthew 13: 30.)

A wonderful time is on this generation. Doctrine and Covenants 108: 5 is now making its last call. Zion must be built up. We must put all on the altar, and more fully consecrate our lives to the Lord.

That message the Lord delivered to the priesthood through

Brother Elbert A. Smith, on the morning of April 4, is flashing light on my mind this evening, and bringing peace to my soul. I wonder if we are fully appreciating the blessing given to us that morning by that noble servant of the Lord.

Yes, if there ever was a time man needed a God, it is now. So may the Lord bless us to view the situation as it is.

E. A. ERWIN.

The Amount to Be Invested in a Stewardship

BY THE LAMONI STAKE BISHOPRIC

Another of the circular letters sent out to the membership of the Lamoni Stake

"Every man shall be accountable unto me, a steward over his own property, or that which he has received by consecration, inasmuch as is sufficient for himself and family."—Doctrine and Covenants 42: 9.

Here is the general law governing as to the amount to be invested in a stewardship, namely, "inasmuch as is sufficient for himself and family."

"And you are to be equal, or in other words, you are to have equal claims on the properties, for the benefit of managing the concerns of your stewardships, every man according to his wants and his needs, inasmuch as his wants are just."—Doctrine and Covenants 81: 4.

Our just wants and needs are expressions here used to designate the amount of our stewardship. No doubt both expressions, "sufficient for himself and family," and "needs and just wants," mean the same thing.

"Let my servant . . . appoint unto this people their portion, every man equal according to their families, according to their circumstances, and their wants and needs."—Doctrine and Covenants 51: 1.

And that there might not be any doubt as to whether the above statement was to be taken as the general law governing the amount of stewardships we find the following given:

"Behold, this shall be an example unto my servant Edward Partridge (the presiding bishop) in other places, in all churches."—Doctrine and Covenants 51: 5.

That the reader may get a clearer distinction between needs and wants, we make the following comments.

Needs are always just. Wants may be just or they may not be just.

Needs

To need means to be without that which is essential for our existence or our purpose.

What we need is considered natural and indispensable, such as food and clothing. That which is needed by one is in like circumstances needed by all; for example—as all persons need warm clothing and a warm house in winter.

What do we mean by our

Wants

What we want is artificial. What one man wants is a superfluity to another; For example: tender people may want a fire, when others may be glad not to have it.

To want is to be without that which contributes to our comfort, or is an object of our desires.

Title to:

It is enough to say here that the legal title to that property, sufficient for a man's just wants and needs, is lodged in fee simple in the steward.

This phase of the subject will be discussed in subsequent letters.

In bonds,
LAMONI STAKE BISHOPRIC.

We were astonished a few years ago at the cost of five million or ten million dollars for a fully-equipped battleship, but we learn now that Japan has completed a battleship at a cost of forty million dollars. One cannot help but think of the amount of good which could be accomplished with that amount of money expended for education, or for social good.

Far West Stake

Elders Joseph Luff and R. D. Weaver, the latter of the stake missionary force, recently held a series of revival services in the First Saint Joseph Branch. They were well attended, especially by our own people, and the preaching of the word generally was much appreciated by the Saints. Brother Luff rose to his usual heights on his special spiritual lines of presentation and it seemed like the good days of old to hear from him again. Brother Weaver preached some excellent discourses; he is friendly, a good mixer, and people were glad to get acquainted with him.

At the end of the series Brethren Paia a Metuaoro and J. Charles May appeared upon the scene and furnished an excellent program which was highly appreciated by the Saints. Brother Paia's address, as interpreted by Brother May, the native songs by the brethren, and other features made a very fine program.

The choir of the First Saint Joseph Branch is composed of a body of live, energetic workers who do much to make the services devotional and pleasant. They contributed well-rendered anthems throughout the recent series of meetings and led out in the development of better congregational singing. On May 13 they gave their second annual banquet, attended by members and associate members, at which a very pleasant program was rendered; musical, social, and educational features were very enjoyable. The Sunday school orchestra is also a decided addition to the musical department and its work is appreciated and acknowledged.

This stake, which so long has been without the ministrations of a bishop, has received the appointment of J. A. Koehler with satisfaction. Brother and Sister Koehler and their two children arrived about June 1. They have located on a ten-acre tract bordering on the city of Saint Joseph and are prepared to enter actively into the work of the stake. Sister Koehler has done successful work at Independence and Lamoni and will prove to be a helper in the First Branch, and possibly others.

Brother Samuel Twombly has been holding a series of meetings at the Maple Grove Branch, north of Stewartville. The people there report the services as satisfactory and successful.

The reunion committee held a meeting on Friday. The work was clearly outlined, provision made for improvements on the grounds, and general preparation provided for. It will be the policy of the presidency to program the work, providing for the various departments and also for the leading features of the general work pertaining to temporalities, pastoral work, missionary effort, etc. Addresses and sermons will be followed by round table discussions by the people. We hope to make our reunion more and more educational as the succeeding years permit us to develop it. The reunion convenes at Stewartville, Missouri, August 20, 1920, continuing for ten days.

We are pleased to greet Patriarch H. O. Smith who has been appointed to labor in the stake. He will make his first appearance under his new appointment at the Stewartville Branch; other branches will have opportunity to see him and receive his ministrations. Brother Smith is a man of long experience—a wise man and a good counselor.

The stake presidency has scheduled work for a series of two-day and other meetings in branches throughout the stake, beginning June 20 and including August 8. Following the reunion another schedule will be presented to cover the balance of the year and to include branches that may not be named in the present schedule. We hope to keep our forces busy under a definite plan designed to meet the needs of all localities.

Brother V. M. Goodrich is holding a series of special services at the Third Saint Joseph Branch, commencing June 13. He has a corps of good workers among the Saints there and the interest promises good results.

Brother C. H. Rich is expected to arrive in the stake and enter upon missionary work some time this month. He will make Trenton, Missouri, his objective point with a view of assisting in the development of our work in that county seat.

Trenton is a large, progressive place and we hope to see our work well developed there in time. Brother J. D. Proffit presides over a small branch of our people in that city.

Children's Day was observed in the First Saint Joseph Branch on Sunday, June 13. Following the regular Sunday school session the pastor delivered an address to the smaller children. At 3 p. m. sixteen persons were baptized—children and young people. The evening service consisted of a cantata in which the younger children of the school took part. The committee had secured a plentiful supply of boughs and flowers with which the platform was decorated; the ensemble was very harmonious and pleasing. The program was witnessed by an appreciative audience which delighted in the efforts of the children. The committee in charge deserves credit for good work.

London District Convention

A joint session of the Religio and Sunday school was held at Stratford, Ontario, June 5 and 6. Aubrey Blanchard resigned as second assistant superintendent of the Religio, and Walter Simpson, of London, was chosen as successor. In conformity with the General Religio and Sunday school, home department of the Sunday school was turned over to the Women's Department. This department carried out a splendid program, consisting of solos, talks, and papers. A paper by Sister Alfred Davis on "The spirit of the home," will be sent in for publication.

Sister Fishleigh, of London, demonstrated home nursing, in some of its branches. A number of the sisters of that branch have taken up home nursing and first aid, with splendid results.

Elder Pycock ably addressed us on the subject of "Cooperation," and Elder Grice on "The importance to the church of the Religio and Sunday school." H. W. Simpson talked on "Organized classes," George Tomlinson, jr., on "Zion," and Patriarch J. Shields on "How we should live." Also two able discourses by Elder Pycock, and Elder Guy Levitt, the latter just appointed to labor in Ontario and Quebec. The convention was well attended and each service was highly educational and instructive.

We welcome back Elder Shields, Grice, and Pycock, and also Elder Levitt to our district, and we know that we shall learn to love Elder Levitt as we have learned to love, honor, and trust the others who have labored with us.

BERTHA MCGILLIVARY,
District Religio Secretary.

Des Moines District Conference

Conference of the Des Moines District was held at Boone, Iowa, June 4 to 6. A credit to the Boone Saints is their commodious new brick church, built at a cost of about six thousand dollars, but which is worth twice that amount according to present prices. This branch is presided over by Brother C. Malcor.

Brethren J. A. Gillen of the Twelve, and Daniel Macgregor of the Seventy attended and gave much valuable instruction. Brother Macgregor "got on the job" in his characteristic way in advocating that the district purchase a tent for missionary and reunion purposes. Of course his appeal was irresistible and four hundred thirty-five dollars was subscribed on the spot.

Owing to his leaving the district, Brother H. H. Hand resigned as district president. To succeed him there was only one logical man to choose, that was Brother H. Castings, of Des Moines. He is thoroughly acquainted with the district, having had several years' experience in the district presidency, serving with Brother O. Salisbury and Brother Hand. He is a man of sterling worth, who teaches by example as well as by precept, financially as well as otherwise. Above all he has the confidence and love of the Saints throughout the district. He is a good district president, and while we regret to see men like Brother Hand leave, we feel thankful we have men like Brother Castings to place in.

We had a good conference. The good Spirit was present, bringing much unity and good feeling. So we move onward.

A. E. WARR,

NAUVOO, ILLINOIS, June 14, 1920.

Editors Herald: It has been some time since you have heard from this part of the Lord's vineyard, so thought you might be interested in what we are doing in this old historical place. First of all we are rejoicing in this work more and more each day, and are glad that we have a part in the spreading of this angel message and the building up of the waste places. The work here is going good, and people are interested in our message, and some are being added to the fold by baptism. This is surely a choice land, and you can feel the presence of the good Spirit here all the time. I am sure that when the Lord planted his work here in the spring of 1839, he intended it should remain, and the same Spirit that was here then is present to-day.

Only last week we had the pleasure of leading four converts down into the waters of the old Mississippi, just below the Nauvoo House where Joseph the Prophet baptized so many in the early days of the work, and while standing in the water I looked over to the unmarked spot on the slope of the hill by the Homestead house where this noble man is sleeping, and these thoughts come to my mind: "Joseph, we are trying to finish what you started so many years ago."

Dear readers, I wish you could have been present and felt the presence of the Spirit, for it only added another testimony to the long list that I have filed away in my memory. We have many visitors here; they come from far and near. Not all are anxious to hear the message that we have to tell, but many are. This gives the ones encouragement to do all they can to spread the work. This task falls in the main to Brother and Sister Layton. We have six families here now and the work is growing nicely. We have a fine church and a good Sunday school (take notice, Brother Wells) and things are moving along fine.

This place is well named Nauvoo or City Beautiful, for at this time of year it is surely a beauty spot, with its green hills and the river on three sides of it. A person would have to go far to find a more ideal spot for the building of a city. And just across the river is the old town of Montrose. It is at this point we will hold our reunion this summer, August 20 to 29. One day will be given to a trip to Nauvoo, for that is always one of the main events of our reunion. All the Saints are loaded into motor trucks and cars and then down to the ferry and across to Nauvoo. Brother Mark Siegfried was the historian and delivered the lecture at each place of interest. This year we expect to give some stereopticon views each evening and then the visitors will better understand the historical lectures on old Nauvoo.

Sister Emma Burton is visiting with us this summer, and I am enjoying her company very much, for it has been many years since I have had a visit with my auntie. Sister Irene Layton is home for her vacation. She has been teaching English at Graceland the past year. From the door of my study I can see her in the surf, teaching the youngsters to swim. The water is only thirty feet from our door. We all enjoy the bathing very much these warm evenings. Only wish I could be here all the time, but my duties lie elsewhere in the district, and if we make our 20,000 converts in two years we will have to keep busy.

Brethren J. Charles May and Paia paid Nauvoo a visit on their way west and Brother Paia preacher, many outsiders being in attendance. The comments we have heard of his sermon were very favorable. We extend an invitation to all the Saints to visit this old historical place and I am sure you will go away with a greater love in your heart for this great latter-day work.

Your brother in gospel bonds,
P. R. BURTON.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY.

The Religio and the Local Church

The Religio has a distinct function in the local church. This function is clearly defined by the General Conference as social and recreational.

What more natural than that all regular church social and recreational activities be under the supervision of this department? The general executive committee of the Religio last fall unanimously adopted the following resolution. This was presented to the late convention and unanimously indorsed. We pass it on to you.

"Whereas, the social and recreational work has been made the primary aim of the Religio, be it Resolved, That we, as the general executive committee, urge that this work be given special attention, both at times other than the regular meeting period, and also at the option of the local wholly or in part to supersede the other forms of activity.

"Inasmuch as the work of the Religio is that of entertainment and recreation chiefly, we suggest the advisability of branch authorities referring to the Religio the matter of providing entertainment or recreational activities when needed and not already provided for by the activities of other auxiliaries.

"This would insure the initiative for these activities lying largely with the Religio, as provided for in the report of the coordinating committee. Due credit should be given to the Religio for such work whether it be carried on at the regular meetings or at other times, and Religio reports should be compiled accordingly."

We ask that local pastors and presiding elders of branches give this matter attention.

T. W. WILLIAMS.

Games for Everybody

Calls are coming from various parts of the country for outline of games for evening gatherings, picnics, etc.

The best book by far that we have come across is entitled, Games for the Playground, Home, School, and Gymnasium, by Jessie A. Bancroft. This book is published by the MacMillan Company, New York. It retails for two dollars.

We recommend that each Religio local purchase one of these books at your earliest convenience. This book should be kept by the superintendent of the local Religio as it is quite necessary that the nature of many of these games should not be generally known or else the interest in the game would be lost.

There are games enough to provide diversion and amusement for an indefinite period. There are inside and outside games, inside and outside sports, games for the playground, gymnasium, and house parties, active games and passive games; games for the seashore; singing games; exercises for brain workers, feats and forfeits, and a great diversion of amusements which will delight both old and young. Field workers of districts will do well to secure a copy of this volume also.

We have asked the Herald Publishing House, Lamoni, Iowa, to carry this book so you will please send your order there.

T. W. WILLIAMS,

General Superintendent of the Religio.

Notice to Religio Workers

Acting upon the authorization of the recent Religio convention we have appointed Brother Howard W. Harder as General Secretary of the Religio Department. Brother Harder has acquitted himself in this field of work in the past and we feel assured that he will prove his right to this position in the days to come. He will have charge of the office, will supervise the correspondence, and direct the efforts of the field workers throughout the church subject to the general supervision of the superintendent of the department.

To Officers and Members of Utah District: This is to notify you that Sister M. A. Etzenhouser has been appointed Religio field worker for the Utah District. We commend her to you as one eminently fitted both by temperament and education to care for the ever-increasing interest of this department.

T. W. WILLIAMS,

Superintendent Religio Department.

Girls' New Supervisor

Religio officers and workers will please take notice that Sister Zilpha Monroe, of Lamoni, Iowa, has been appointed general superintendent of the girls' department of the Religio. Sister Monroe is general supervisor of the girls in the Women's Department. This makes for coordination. For several years we have had a general superintendent of the boys' department, but none for the girls'. Sister Monroe will take general supervision of the social and recreational work of the girls of the church. We bespeak for her your hearty cooperation and support.

T. W. WILLIAMS,

General Superintendent Religio Department.

Department of Music

Notice of Appointment: In the issue of The Staff for May, 1920, found in SAINTS' HERALD for May 12, will be found the announcement of the organization of the Department of Music, in which will be seen the statement that it was expected that Brother Harold C. Burgess, of Lamoni, Iowa, would take the office of managing director of the department as soon as arrangements could be made for his release from the Lamoni Electric Company; this appointment having been approved by The Presidency, Twelve, and Bishopric.

We are happy to now state that arrangements have progressed sufficiently that we can, with the approval of the First Presidency, definitely announce Brother Burgess's appointment to this office. As soon as Brother Burgess can be fully released from the service of the above company, he will devote his entire time to the prosecution of the work of the department as its managing director. In the meantime Brother Burgess will give what service he is able to render to the department. Respectfully,

ALBERT N. HOXIE, General Director,

By ARTHUR H. MILLS, Secretary.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, June 18, 1920.

Notice to Reunion Committees

The resolution of the General Conference of 1919 which abolished the Social Purity Board of the church, placed the work of education along those lines with the Women's Department, so far as initiative was concerned. This was done upon recommendation of the coordinating committee.

In harmony with the above resolution, the Women's Department hereby request that all attempts to include in the programs for reunion work this fall lectures, papers, addresses, or other forms of educational effort along the line of sex hygiene, social purity, or the beginnings of life, be discouraged.

AUDENTIA ANDERSON, Superintendent.

How to Send Money to Women's Department

As you order leaflets or other supplies, please make out money orders or bank checks to financial secretary, Marie Morgan, Women's Department, box 255, Independence, Missouri. Leaflet courses, 25 cents per set, in advance.

AUDENTIA ANDERSON, Superintendent.

Reunion Notices

Pottawattamie and Fremont Districts in Iowa and Northeastern and Southern Districts in Nebraska will assemble in one big joint reunion in Council Bluffs, Iowa, August 13 to 22. A good corps of speakers have been secured, together with everything obtainable for the comfort of the Saints who will gather from all points in Nebraska and Western Iowa. A suitable part of the grounds will be reserved for the Indian village which will be an attraction of the reunion. Meals will be served cafeteria style at a reasonable charge. Carl T. Self, Fifth floor Bee Bldg., Omaha, Nebraska, will have charge of tents and equipment, and Saints are urged to get their orders in early. Any further information may be secured by writing O. Salisbury, chairman, or J. L. Parker, secretary, box 291, Lincoln, Nebraska.

J. L. PARKER.

Nauvoo, at Montrose, Iowa, August 20 to 29. A splendid opportunity to visit Nauvoo and her many places of historical note. Grounds well shaded and near station; good well water. Montrose is on bank of Mississippi River. First-class dining room and meals at reasonable rates. Come and have a good, spiritual time for a vacation. Write D. J. Williams, 725 Lewis Street, Burlington, Iowa, regarding tents. Bring your Songs of the Legion and we'll sing. Boy Scout band of Fort Madison will furnish music. Come and spend reunion with us. P. R. Burton, for committee.

NEWS AND COMMENT

According to the Jerusalem News of May 5, the rainfall in Jerusalem had already exceeded forty inches for the season, it being the second time in sixty years that such an event had been recorded. It was estimated that the last few inches were worth a million pounds an inch. The big February snowfall, which had seemed almost a calamity, had penetrated deeply and was a veritable Godsend. Every available plot is being cultivated, and the prospects for a big crop of all kinds is very good.

The car shortage is still serious, after a period when it was thought the efforts of the Interstate Commerce Commission were going to bear favorable fruit. The farmers are bearing the brunt of the situation, not being able to market the grain that is ready for shipment and needed by the world. In Kansas the new wheat crop is nearing harvest and there are approximately twenty million bushels of last year's crop in the hands of the farmers. Elevators are full and cannot ship because there are no cars.

Farmers in the milk business around New York are now operating twelve farmer-owned plants where the milk is sold and all dairy products manufactured on a cooperative basis. The association has a membership estimated at 83,116, with 1,101 branches throughout the State, and the control of 884,901 cows. Expansion is made by means of a revolving fund from profits and initial investments, the latter being made by the farmer on a six per cent basis. The milk delivered by him to the plant indicates the ration to the total profits.

The Southern Baptist Convention at Washington reported that their drive to secure pledges for a $75,000,000 fund was successful, as the total of pledges actually ran to $90,000,000. There are about 4,500,000 members of the Southern Baptist Church.

An aerial route is to be opened between Alaska and the northwestern part of the United States. The plan includes express and passenger service, as well as mail. It is expected that the trip will take ten hours, instead of the usual five days. The United States Aero Mail Service is now over two years old, and many new projections are being made.

The Young Men's Mutual Improvement Society of the Utah Church have taken for their slogan for 1920-21, "We stand for the non-use and non-sale of tobacco." We certainly would agree with such a resolution, but the fact that it is necessary to take it is remarkable. We may try to imagine such a slogan for our own young people's organizations, but we have progressed beyond that.

CHURCH NEWS

In the Geelong (Australia) Advertiser, of April 3, there appears an article by Apostle John W. Rushton on "Mormon methods." An article had appeared the previous week concerning Mormon propaganda in Great Britain. He is well qualified to reply to this propaganda, as he was born and raised in Great Britain, and labored there for many years as an elder, seventy, and then as an apostle. He has also labored in Utah for several years. The article is clear-cut, and covers more than a column of close print. Though more than a month had elapsed, no reply had been attempted at the time of our latest advice.

John W. Rushton was invited to give a lecture on "Social purity" before the Workers' Educational Association of New Castle, New South Wales, the last week in May. This association represents the best elements of the state, in church, politics, and university.

At the Lamoni Stake conference at Hiteman, recently, a splendid series of services was enjoyed by Saints from all over the stake. The following ordinations were provided for: Alvin Ballantyne, priest; Lewis Jones and Edward Elefson, teachers; R. A. Ballantyne and A. M. Carmichael, members stake high council.

Misses Estella Wight and Marcella Schenck are the authors of a pageant on Book of Mormon history which will be presented at the L. D. S. reunion in August. It is entitled "The five sons," and tells the story of the conversion of the sons of Alma and King Mosiah, their carrying of the gospel to the Lamanites and the conversion of the Lamanite king, Lamoni, and his household. The best musical talent of the Lamoni branch has been enlisted to sing the solos, quartets, and choruses, several of which were composed especially for this pageant by Mesdames Vida Smith and Audentia Anderson, and Mrs. Lena Graham will have charge of the action. It will be costumed according to the times in Hebrew and Indian, and will doubtless be a very picturesque, as well as interesting and educational feature of the reunion.—Lamoni Chronicle.

"I am pleased to read of the good reports and the unity of the Spirit manifested in the General Conference. I feel that God is working with his people and that the beginning of a greater endowment of his Spirit is at hand to bring about the redemption of Zion."—From letter of William Spargo, Wigan, Lancashire, England.

The Saints of Clare, Michigan, recently reorganized their Sunday school, twenty-five being present. Brother Newsome was elected superintendent.

The Northeastern Missouri conference at Bevier, beginning June 11, was profitable and interesting. The Religio held the first session. Apostle William Aylor was present and assisted materially in the business and other sessions. Five of the local brethren were indorsed for various offices in the priesthood and ordinations provided for. A resolution prevailed looking with favor on the purchase of a picture machine for the district. The priesthood meeting was addressed by Brother Aylor. Four were baptized. "God be with you till we meet again" was feelingly sung, as some were leaving for other missions, Brother Aylor to his in South Africa and others soon to enter on their work of preparation where the Lord may desire. It was one of the largest gatherings in the district and all felt repaid for attending.

The Des Moines Branch is planning a missionary campaign this fall, with Daniel Macgregor as speaker. On the 13th subscriptions were asked for to finance the affair, and in about twenty minutes a total of $528 was subscribed. The Saints are going at it in a big way and expect big results. The plan is to secure three big tents for several of the Iowa districts, Pottawattamie District already having raised $725 for the purpose.

FROM THE BRANCHES

Lamoni, Iowa. Elder Joseph Luff was in town over the 20th and preached at the church in the forenoon, F. M. McDowell in the evening. The choir has changed its hour of practice from 4 p. m. Sunday to Thursday evening, so they may help out in the preaching appointments out from Lamoni. The Religio held a successful social evening in the church park on Friday evening, attended by about four hundred, young and older people. The Sunday evening sessions are being held in the basement, the classes reorganized to meet the special situation created by decreased membership during the summer months. Elder Garver, local pastor, attended the Eastern Iowa district conference at Waterloo, June 11 to 13.

Port Huron, Michigan. Elder William Fligg has been kept busy and is like a father to the branch. The 13th was observed as Children's Day. Following the Sunday school service sixteen children were blessed. At the following service about one hundred children took part, the church being filled to capacity. In the afternoon there were 22 baptisms, 10 adults and 12 children between the ages of 9 and 14. The day's activities were concluded with a powerful sermon by Elder Fligg. The branch is in good condition, spiritually and financially. The Sunday school is growing in numbers and has an average attendance of 140. In addition there is a mission at the north end, with seating capacity of 125 and a large Sunday school operating.

Hagerman, Idaho. The Saints have recently enjoyed a short visit from their district president, R. C. Chambers, also from J. L. Benson, Bishop's agent, and L. G. Holloway. A new library is being installed in the church. The normal class, consisting of seven members, has taken their first examination. Home department day was observed by the Sunday school, and a splendid interest shown.

Stockton, California. One evening was spent recently in which the membership listened with interest to an account of the most important happenings of General Conference, related by C. W. Hawkins, district president, who made a special trip for that purpose. Two prayer meeting nights have been devoted to song service. One was the songs of prayer, the second the songs of praise, each member selecting his own special hymn. There were quartets, duets, and solos. Both meetings were enjoyed very much. Perhaps no offerings for the temple at Jerusalem were more thankfully given than the bountiful offerings of flowers at the little chapel where roses, sweet peas, and all the sweet flowers of spring are banked. The testimonies, sermons, and conversations of late have been of Zion. The need of fitting ourselves for, and thinking more of, Zion is dominant.

It's In Your Pocketbook Now!

It's in your pocketbook now! The money that you have earned by your honest labor is there. And that's where it belongs at first. Up to a certain time there is joy in having it there. You have the joy of success and achievement; the joy of knowing that you have been blessed with health, opportunity, and wisdom sufficient to bring you the emoluments of labor; the joy of having the confidence of the Owner of all things in that he has trusted you.

This joy will continue when you make a proper accounting to the Lord's representative in temporal affairs, the Bishop. It will depart and with it faith, love, and benevolence if you were to refuse.

Oh, how good you feel when you have placed a full tenth part of your increase in the Lord's storehouse and thereby know that you have done his will and are a helper in his great work.

Is Your Tithing Due? Send the Bishop a Check To-day!

GRACELAND COLLEGE NUMBER

A Quarter Century of Service

JEREMIAH A. GUNSOLLEY

One "who stayed by" through all these years is Jeremiah A. Gunsolley. Faithful, even-tempered, patient but unswervingly dominated by his love for Graceland's highest good, he has given of himself unreservedly for her upbuilding and the sustaining of her honor without jealousy, without bitterness.—Vida E. Smith.

Extracts from President Frederick M. Smith's Conference Address

"For long your leader has been calling for education. Calling for it with a vigor and a zeal that was backed by an intuitive knowledge—I can go farther and say an inspired knowledge that things were before this church, the imminence of which was not at the time appreciated, that have now plunged this church in the midst of a time that we have been hoping our people would be prepared for. I thank God that the manifestations of the Spirit, the workings of the Spirit in the church have been that we come into this time with a far greater degree of preparedness than I, in my deep concern, had thought we would manifest. For the Spirit of God, let me repeat what I said this morning, is working mightily among this people, if I can read aright the signs of the times, leading them surely and even rapidly towards the consummation of this application of the doctrine of stewardships.

"Do you read the signs of the times thus? The time is here when these young people, and older ones, who have with the idea of being useful to the church in this economic Zionie condition—who have been pursuing courses of study, and amassing a wealth of knowledge—the time has come, let me repeat, when they are to be put to the test, to make a practical application of what they have gleaned; and so I will make a slight change in the note of my pleading with you, then, this afternoon, and that is that the education of the people of the church go on with even increased speed until every man and woman can feel the importance of seeing to it that every energy that he or she possesses, every ounce of nervous force that he has command of, is being spent towards his own betterment, not from a selfish motive, but with the idea of being, ultimately, of greater service to God and his church; and yet at the same time that the educational forces are in progress, we must take on an additional burden, and against that I have been warning you—and that is the burden of organization, in a practical way, and demonstrating to the world the feasibility of the doctrine of stewardships in a society which is founded on religion. . . .

"Reverting, once more to the question of education, it would scarcely be logical for us, in the light of what we stated a few moments ago, to do anything else than call your attention to the report of the trustees of Graceland College, and to the recommendations that are made therein, and especially in their budget, where the church is asked to support the college in their efforts to enlarge the activities of this, one of the most devoted servants and potential servants of the church. It seems to me that the college has so established its right to exist, well supported, that there is little need for us to plead for it, though we might well ask that you strain your generosity to give this institution the means that will put it on its feet, to function as it has not yet fully functioned, as one of the greatest of the institutions of the church, looking to the welfare of the future generations."

The Development of Character

BY R. V. HOPKINS

"Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea!"

I am requested to write a sketch concerning the development of character, as reflected in the light of personal incidents, and experiences, during my life as an instructor in Graceland Collegè. I do not wish, however, to make this article merely a record of the chronicling of past history. I hope that it may breathe an inspiration to many of the youth of the church, who have not yet availed themselves of the opportunity afforded them to unfold the petals of their lives in the garden of Graceland, for Graceland is really the garden of the youth of the church. Here the beautiful flowers grow and unfold with others of their kind. Here the soil is fertile and the plants are nurtured with tender care, but few are the moths and worms that corrupt in this beautiful garden, and they are soon detected and banished. I do not speak as one who has heard but as one who has seen, for like the woman at the sepulcher of Christ I have been an eyewitness to the resurrection portrayed in this unfolding.

For eleven years I dwelt in this garden; it was my world, my life; I helped to care for it. I watered the beautiful flowers, and rejoiced as I saw the petals open and receive the moisture and the sunlight. Sorrowfully I beheld when some would not open to receive; they withered and died, and were plucked from the garden. I wept over the tender plants that were crushed and bruised—love's labor lost—and I felt as I think the Savior must have felt when he wept over Jerusalem, and in the agony of his tender love exclaimed: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how oft would I have gathered you, as a hen gathers her brood under her wings, but ye would not."

The best years of my life I gave to the youths and maids of Graceland, and like the period of Jacob's service, it has seemed but a short time, because I loved them so. It was not a sacrifice for me, for I rejoiced daily. The inspiration received from observing the beautiful lives of some of Graceland's students cannot be evaluated. The fragrance of the flowers is still with me. I must be personal. I cannot tell a story so near my heart without speaking from the heart. This is my only apology for the personal element injected into this rehearsal.

The technical teaching which I did at Graceland was only part of my work; rather the smaller part. For years I lived in the dormitories, and knew the life of the student. For eleven years serving as dean of men, I strove to guide the lives of the young men out of the thorny and slippery paths. For seven years, as teacher of the college girls' class in Sunday school, I watched their lives unfold. What a comfort the beauty and freshness of their faces was to me, when burdened and distressed with my own trials. I got back more than I ever gave to that class, and they never knew.

Daily in the chapel service I watched them and the Spirit of the Master was upon me, enabling me sometimes to discern their very thoughts. I knew when the spiritual life was ebbing, and the world was becoming too prominent, and by private talks and interviews, I strove to lead them to Christ.

After so many years of experience, I say candidly and fearlessly: Graceland is the best place on earth for our young people to be educated. The moral, mental, and physical environment is there. If a boy or girl goes wrong at Graceland it is largely his own fault.

Character is a process, an unfolding from within, manifesting itself to the world, without. Like the chambered nautilus whose structure is described in the beautiful poem by Oliver Wendell Holmes, from which we quoted in the beginning, it is builded day by day. Consciously and subconsciously we are forming it; every word, every act makes its impress upon the senses; thus is character built. How careful you young people should be of your words and of your acts, and of your choice of associates and your environment, especially while the clay is yet in the potter's hand, for the period of youth is the period of character building. These are the things I so earnestly essayed to stamp on the consciousness of the youth of Graceland.

I remember writing a Graceland Christmas article for one of our church papers more than ten years ago, in which I spoke of the lives of some of our Graceland students, among them a little girl scarcely out of short dresses. She came from an isolated condition. I can yet see her innocent blue eyes as they filled with tears when she said, as a child would say, "I saw some of our elders drinking coffee at the banquet last night." She had just come up to Zion, and like many others had thought to find perfection, but I recall yet the thought that came to me; it was this: "If anyone offend any of the least of these, my little ones, it were better that a millstone should be hanged about his neck and he be drowned in the depths of the sea."

Here was real character. The germ was there; it needed only this environment to swell and unfold. What a strong, steady woman she has grown to be; and after all these years a letter came yesterday, asking help and advice for her and hers. She is a mother now with children of her own, and the development of the character of her children is safe with her, and Graceland helped to make it so. Thus truly her influence spreads, "even unto the third and fourth generation."

During my first year at Graceland the boys were domiciled on the third floor of the college building—that was before the days of dormitories proper. The boys called it the third heaven; however, I sometimes failed to appreciate the application. Among these boys was a tall, slim, curly-headed youth. He was a missionary's son. His childhood and boyhood had been spent in a hard school. He had worked all through his high school, and was working his way through college. He never had enjoyed the privilege of playing the games that other boys played, but as an athletic director I saw possibilities in him. I placed him at center on the football team. The other boys laughed but Mac soon justified my judgment. I saw in him the quality of perseverance, that downed every obstacle. His character was built on this firm foundation. He fought his way upward. His noble, true character has placed him at the top round of the ladder, as an instructor and an inspirer of the youth of Graceland. I never could feel like a father to this young man; he is a bosom friend and a brother, and he gives Graceland credit for his character development and for being his inspiration for his service to the church.

I recall a small, tow-headed lad in short trousers who came to Graceland in my early service there and remained several years. Honest, true, and upright he was, and spiritually inclined from the first. Often we would go to the cornfield back of the college and pray before our weekly Wednesday evening students' prayer service. He was inclined sometimes to be a little morose, and had to fight his way upward through this hindrance to his character development. I have watched his progress with gratification. This year he takes his Ph. D. These boys, grown to men now, have outstripped me in the race, but I thank God for their noble lives and sterling characters.

So I might go on, relating incident after incident which came under my personal observation in which Graceland playing her part as foster-mother awakened and developed the lives of strong and stalwart young men and women, but space will not permit.

I can recount several whom the environment of Graceland saved from seeming spiritual death, as many who peruse this manuscript will testify. From time to time I meet those of whom I almost despaired, who are now doing a noble work for the Master, and I rejoice, and think of "the bread that was cast upon the waters."

To all my old friends who knew me at Graceland, now numbering into the hundreds, I bid Godspeed. May God bless you all and help you to cherish and keep the lessons learned, and to continue your development of character whose foundations were laid within the noble walls of Graceland.

What Is Education?

BY S. A. BURGESS

"The great purpose of education is development of character. . . . The fullest education is to develop into the stature of the man in Christ Jesus."

Definitions would be valuable if we did not permit them to act as a vicariate for thought and so shut us off from reality concealed behind their symbolism.

The world education comes from the Latin, e-ducere—to lead out, and in its root meaning is only another way of expressing individual evolution, as both infer an unfolding or development of that already latent in the natural possibilities.

The Master, in the parable of the talents, teaches that by right use (usury in no evil sense) of those talents which are apparent we may develop other talents, previously invisible.

Right education develops our natural ability. It does not give one brains, but develops what he has. A full education would develop all his capacity for service, physical, mental, moral, and spiritual. With most of us our education is very fragmentary and partial.

Some would infer that our mental and even spiritual life is absolutely determined by our physical nature, the kind of body and head we possess. Others like to talk of such things as metabolism of the neurons absolutely determining character. But while our mental life is affected by body conditions, the life of the body is also affected by mental conditions, and neither determines the other. While no one knows about the metabolism of the neurons, it is rather true that right processes unfold new possibilities of life and of knowledge.

How Secured

Education may be secured from experience. Some are unwilling to learn any other way. Their own experience is all they consider worth while. Now while knowledge is essentially experiential, it need not be limited by one's own experience, but should be broadened to include that of others, whether that experience be the result of scientific experiments or of living conditions.

A second method, therefore, is study of the experiences of others. This may include repeating definite experiments and observing the results, so that with our own experience the whole becomes intelligible. Schoolboys of to-day may in a short time possess much of the knowledge of the early Greek sages, and so prepare to use quickly the basis laid by the past experiences of the race. That is the value of schools. They teach us first the use of the common symbols by which knowledge is preserved through the experience gained by others. A school under a competent instructor is the quickest method of gaining the lore of the past, ancient or recent.

A third method is by personal home study and observation. In fact without personal study no progress is possible, even though that progress is much quicker with adequate facilities and teachers.

Its Purpose

The great purpose of education is the development of character. "Character is higher than intellect. Character is greater than ability. Character is achievement; it is a fore gleam of immortality." Evidently it is not merely knowledge nor being, but is knowledge and being transmuted by wisdom in right living.

"The purpose of education is preparation for life; the test of life is capacity for service." (Inscription at Hampden College.) But evidently it is more than capacity. It must mean more than physical power alone, or intellectual growth, or both together. It must include the will to serve—to do good. An intellectual giant who is a moral pygmy is an educational monstrosity developed out of proportion, hence a menace rather than a help. Even those whose education is wholly determined by personal experience often gain knowledge without its moral overtone, and so are perverted. The fault is not with the gaining of education, but with the lack of corresponding moral and spiritual growth.

Education is the unfolding of natural powers. Its test, however, is in its use for the good of man and God.

That Which Is Vital

G. Stanley Hall in an address on Founders' Day, a few years ago, urged as the ideal for the American university, not the gaining of abstract facts, but the application of our knowledge to human needs, to make the life of man better. Of course he did not so urge in a narrow, immediately pragmatic sense.

Again he urged that conversion is essential to the development of the highest powers of man. The man or woman who is not converted, who has never felt the tremendous moral urge out of the storm and stress, is living much below his or her possible powers. If he, an educator, can so state, we can fully agree that true conversion, the guidance of the Holy Spirit, is the most tremendous educational factor.

Man being what he is, the greatest knowledge he can achieve is to know God. To do so requires a truly wonderful development. We do not here refer to the initial experience so often emotional, but to the intellectual and spiritual growth of years.

The fullest education is to develop into the stature of the man in Christ Jesus. But before then we must realize that the highest truth, goodness, and beauty are one, and that with them is the only lasting freedom. (John 8: 31-36 et seq.)

But that highest development is not to be found in the line of personal self-limitations of knowledge and service. But rather in the fullest possible development, which includes a knowledge of modern science, language, history, in fact of all human knowledge, not for self-pride, but for use for humanity, then over that continued guidance by the Spirit.

"The glory of God is intelligence," for intelligence of necessity chooses the good, knowing that which is intellectually true must be morally good; and that which is good, true. But it includes also a wide mental scope.

The Need of the Church

In the intensive work of to-day, the church needs specially trained men and women for its service, not only in Zion, and for her upbuilding, but in every scattered field. It is not enough that a few young people come to Graceland; more should come; but the work has to be taken into the fields abroad by short courses, giving much more than our institutes of the past. There must be a forward movement of all, not simply of a few.

She also needs yet more men and women trained to meet modern problems and talk the language of to-day. And she needs a revived vision of the truth behind the mechanism and ritual. We are told by some that very many do not want to know or analyze, but simply to be told what to do, and told something easy.

John W. Rushton, in a recent personal letter, writes (we hope he will pardon our quoting him):

"There is also needed a systematic campaign of education among our people as to the inner meaning of the work we are engaged in. There is too much dependence upon external, mechanical, and personal elements which becloud, if they do not obscure, the principles of life upon which true religion must be founded. We as a people have not learned as we must, that symbols are of value only as they lead us to a higher and truer appreciation of the spiritual essence at the back of all. . . . Only when the soul is inspired by the divine soul has the trappings and mechanism of theologies, rituals, and institutions justified their existence. . . . Mechanical arrangements are the means of expressing the vital qualities of those who can use the organization and if there is not improvement in the spiritual essence and moral idealism in the life of the people using the organic structure, then of what use is it? We feel sure God is not needing money or means nearly as urgently as he is needing moral and spiritual fitness."

Therein lies Graceland's test. She must give us the knowledge equivalent to that which could be gained elsewhere; she must give us the idealism for service equal to that at other schools, and she should evaluate that knowledge and idealism in terms of practical character, giving us the virtues of honesty, integrity, and courage, and also help the spiritual impulse necessary to full education unto the divine likeness. In other words, there should we learn to add to our faith virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity." (2 Peter 1: 5-7.)

Effect of Higher Education on Religious Conviction

BY G. N. BRIGGS

How fifteen students were affected by the study of sociology.

Higher institutions of learning are sometimes criticized for destroying the religious faith and early religious teachings of the students. This criticism is heard at times especially with reference to certain college subjects such as sociology, psychology, and others.

At the close of the recent college year at Graceland, one of the questions asked in the final examination in a class of sociology, composed of over thirty college students, was what effect their study of the subject had had on their religious beliefs.

Without exception, the replies indicated that it had not in the slightest degree undermined their faith in God or the teachings of the church, and in many cases it showed that their belief in the teachings and doctrines of the church had been very greatly strengthened because they had had presented to them many of the problems of society in a way which had never occurred to them before and they began to realize as never before that the Zionite teachings of the church was the only basis on which right solutions might be reached.

Some Characteristic Replies

It will be impossible to quote from the replies of all, but the following will be of interest:

Student A: "The study of sociology has intensified my already existing religious convictions. It has shown us what the world has in the way of religion, what the world needs in this respect, and that the world must have before it can reach its ideals. These facts have so coincided with what we, as a religious people, are believing in and standing for, that this study has increased my confidence, and stimulated my desire to help in giving to the world our own solution of existing needs."

Student B: "Sociology, as presented to us, has not changed my religious convictions in the least. Because the author believes in a divinity and writes that divinity into his work, in giving his philosophy for life, he does not forget to make us feel as though there was a God and that we must co-operate with that God to obtain the highest possible development along any line. It has shown me that we, as Christians, have a part to play in this great world of ours, and that we must make our religion a seven-day-a-week religion, and a workable religion. It has made me resolve to live a better life and to aid humanity not so that some one will point to me and say, he gives so much to this and so much to that institution, but so that I may feel better in my own heart."

Student C: It has also shown me how our own church has in its plans the formation of an ideal condition which answers the laws of sociology. My religious convictions have never been as strong as some, but they have not been weakened at all."

Student D: "I cannot say that sociology has changed, to any marked degree, my religious convictions. It has served to accelerate certain beliefs that were beginning to force themselves upon me. I believe now, more than ever, in the universality of truth and law, and that religion is broad and inclusive in its concept. It has not shaken my faith in God, nor in this church. Its message is world-wide, and I am seeing more clearly that it is tending in the right direction. I am a better Christian, I believe, as a result."

Student E: "I cannot say that sociology has had any effect on my religious convictions. It certainly hasn't taken divinity out of life. I guess that I'm not very conservative in my views along religious lines to begin with. It has more firmly convinced me that some economic and social plan must be a part of any worth-while religious program. That is, the pathological conditions being social, must necessarily be handled largely by the greatest socializing factor, i. e., religion."

Student F: "The study of sociology has deepened, not lessened my conception of religion; it has helped me to understand why there is a religion, why it is one of the most important factors in our lives, and why everyone has some conception of this important factor which affects all our lives."

Student G: "Zionic socialism, which is one of our vital church plans, received added support from me because of my study of sociology. The study of sociology has aided my belief in the truth of our church in regard to charity, etc. Many lines of difference between our church and others can be drawn since I have read of the origin of religion."

Student H: "The study of sociology has emphasized some of my religious beliefs but has changed none. It impressed upon my mind the necessity for the realization of the brotherhood of man."

Student I: "It has shown us the power and influence it has had on social groups in every stage of civilization and I realize more fully the importance of religion in the solution of the problems confronting society to-day."

Student J: "It has helped me to have a broader idea of the true conception of religion, how it can change and influence the lives of people, how much we really depend upon religion for the pleasures and actual thoughts that we gain from living on this earth. I had no idea as to the extent that religion enters into our lives constantly and how it can entirely change the course of our actions and thought."

Student K: "The effect of sociology upon my religion has been a strengthening factor because I see more fully the laws of religion and the results of a religious life by this study. Religion is what we make it; the laws are given, and what we get out of them depends upon our ideals and interpretations."

Student L: "Sociology has shown me that religion is a great motive in civilizing humanity, building higher characters and ideals in society, that is, if this religious conviction is of a high class. There are some religious doctrines which are really degrading to individuals and society. It causes society as a whole to be ignorant of higher ideals and to degenerate. The study of sociology has shown me more and more that there is a higher power, which is over us and who, if we live in the right way, will direct us to higher planes."

Student M: "The study of sociology has not changed my religious convictions in the least. I have merely become more deeply convinced that religion must be the basis of any successful society."

Student N: "Sociology has, however, impressed me more than ever of human possibilities both to rise and to degenerate; of a divine and overruling power in all things, of the importance of knowing and working with, rather than against, fundamental law. I see more the value of individual as well as public interest and effort in all that pertains to general welfare. One thing that sociology brings out is that religion and especially prayer is instinctive and practiced by all peoples, at least in times of stress and danger."

Student O: "The study of sociology has made my religious convictions stronger. As we traced religion from its origin, we saw that it was really instinctive. It has always existed in some form or other, from animism, a belief in many gods, etc., up to the Christian belief of to-day, a belief in one God. But what has strengthened my convictions is to know that religion is a great social factor. It is necessary in society to aid in the development and progress of society."

EDITOR'S NOTE: During the past year the class in sociology at Graceland has been taught by President Briggs. We offer the suggestion that the wholesome effect noted may in large degree be attributed to the manner of presenting the subject.

The Faculty Through the Years

BY VIDA E. SMITH

*For righteous masters seized my youth,
And purged its faith, and trimmed its fire;
Showed me the high white star of truth
That bade me gaze and then aspire.*

—Matthew Arnold.

There is nothing so fascinating and absorbing as the study of individual, man or woman, and for one who loves the process, to attempt a study of these interesting people collectively is absolute disappointment. It would take a more skillful and versatile pen than mine to do so successfully, so I move toward the attempt with trepidation, and a sense of unworthiness.

The faculty of Graceland through all the years from its beginning possessed unique and delightful personalities. It would be interesting to go slowly through the list and produce some pleasant memory of each man, each woman, who had occupied on the staff; for memory however blue the sky above it, or however sweet her flowers and fresh her waters, is not full and complete, unpeopled.

Looking from my open window through a panorama of deep-green trees, I catch glimpses of the College Hill and in fancy picture the faculty coming toward me. It was a goodly company that went up that hill and sat at wisdom's board within the walls of yonder college. These men and women who faced the classes and blazed the trails for Graceland in her pioneer days left an indelible writing on the tablets of her history. Many of them knew that success for the struggling institution was written with the pen of sacrifice and colored with the imperishable hues of self-abnegation.

We have heard that anyone properly equipped, may occupy with honor in old and well-established institutions, but it takes a hero to throw his splendid powers into the building of an institution. It takes real men and women to turn from the alluring and inviting fields of research, and from the universal and cosmopolitan touch with great minds and give of their all to long days and anxious nights in the building of something whose glory and full growth they may never see, giving of personality, character, hopes, fears for the eternal good of unknown people. Several of the Graceland students have come back from higher courts of learning to bestow with true philanthropy the gift they had for their first love. What does Alma Mater not signify to such a spirit?

Before the first enrollment of eleven in the rented rooms in Lamoni stood this first faculty: T. J. Fitzpatrick, J. T. Pence, J. A. Gunsolley, and Miss Nellie Davis. The class and the faculty grew in numbers.

From the first president to the present we follow the line: Joseph T. Pence, Ernest R. Dewsnup, R. A. Harkness, Herbert the quarter of a century has been for some "More than the fire of joy that burned on Greece, more than the light of law that rose on Rome."

Through the medium of this faculty many a youthful spirit first glimpsed the "kingdom of heaven on earth" and felt the deep significance of the glory of God in intelligence. Were we to mention here the names of the faculty certain remembered ones would be called to the heart of some one, but the list is too long so we mention the presidents, a key to unlock the door of memory, the password to a magic world. Some of these men and women put Graceland "on and off" but one who "stayed by" through all the years is Jeremiah A. Gunsolley. Faithful, even-tempered, patient, but unswervingly dominated by his love for Graceland's highest good, he has given of himself unreservedly for her upbuilding and the sustaining of her honor without jealousy, without bitterness. No position was too trying or too humble but that he threw himself into the need and gave his best. The years passed, souls came and went, smiling, steadfast, ready; he welcomed the newcomers with cheery "Hail" and bade the departing one hearty "Godspeed."

No one who knew Graceland thinks of her without a glad wave of the hand to "Uncle Jerry," who never took a vacation. The faculties of twenty-five years, how many of them joy in the triumphs and achievements of Graceland, more than do these who have known so well its faults and weaknesses. These noble souls who knew the great things hidden beneath the careless attitude of youth failed not to meet the demand for sympathy and guidance, tactfully given. Into the souls of men was infused that divine discontent that gave no rest until the utmost of his very being had been taxed to set erring feet in ways of right. The presidency of Samuel A. Burgess, the man with love for things deep and fundamental, seemed to mark the transition from one period to another in the college history.

Perhaps no president has given to Graceland more prestige in the world than President Briggs. A man of wide experience and acquaintance, he brought to the college the fruits of his experience and added to her celebrity by his own personal power, with his mature, strong, purposeful outlook on life and a persistent faculty of "finding folks."

It would be real joy to speak of some of the favorites of Graceland, the manual training, the "music people," the public speaking department, all the other various and delightful spirits that have added to the quarter century of "value received" in Graceland, but we have already overstepped our invitation and desist with the pleasurable sensation of having touched again the spirit of Graceland faculty through the years and felt the uplift and inspiration that they always give.

EDITOR'S NOTE: Sister Smith is the new dean of women for Graceland, which will allow her love for the young people of the church opportunity to function in a very definite way.

A Constant Demand

The thousands of civil service positions requiring competent stenographers provides an open door to young men and young women who will qualify themselves. Salaries are good, and conditions favorable. Those entering for shorthand and typewriting courses will make no mistake. Uncle Sam needs you, and there are thousands of other places open where there is always "room at the top."

A VIEW IN THE COMMERCIAL DEPARTMENT

Instruction in this department includes stenography, bookkeeping, accounting, salesmanship, commercial law, typewriting, business practice, etc.

Spencer Salisbury, C. O. Taylor, Charles Marr Barber, Roland McClaren Stewart, David Allen Anderson, Jeremiah Alden Gunsolley, Samuel Allen Burgess, and George N. Briggs.

Each with his own coterie of associates in his day built for Graceland—many of them moved by that high resolve that made a mighty One to say, "The glory be thine," as they responded to that noblest impulse and intention and gave of time, talent, and physical powers to strengthen the faculty and its service. These men and women have left their imprint on the principles and policies of the institution. Perhaps none of the early presidents save one, was so greatly admired and beloved as President Stewart. He had that charm of manhood that went to the heart of the young and kept its place through every change. But for every member of this teaching force there is a halo when some one looks back to those golden days in Graceland, when with the freedom and informality of the small college, the student and teacher walked close together and shared happy hours without reservation. Who can estimate the unlimited and inestimable value of such companionship for both student and teacher? Always when meeting teachers there comes a solemn feeling of reverence and deep concern, for the office is high and the calling holy to these who "serve the dream at citadel and gate," the dream that keeps the great millennium in sight through all the stress and grind of physical demands. The part in life for Graceland's faculty through

"What Graceland Has Done for Me"

BY C. E. WIGHT

A symposium of heartfelt testimonials from just a few of Graceland's many loyal friends.

Nearly every graduate of a college or university looks back to his Alma Mater with pleasant memories of the hours spent within her walls. The graduates of Graceland are no exception to the rule. In fact, it seems to me that the expressions which follow cover a wider field than would ordinarily be covered. Graceland has a distinct mission that cannot be described in words. It can be felt and recognized only by those who have had the opportunity of coming in contact with it.

If we had been given the entire paper for this one article, I am sure we could have filled it with interesting and worth-while comments. However, time and space have permitted us to get in touch with only a few of our former Graceland students who were close to Lamoni. I am sure, though that their expressions are a good index of the feeling throughout the entire student body. Here they are:

"I value most among the many things of inestimable worth received at Graceland, the broader and truer concept of what is meant by a perfect life; which of necessity means a life ever striving to more perfectly develop the lives of others physically, mentally, socially, and spiritually."—Christine Roberts, Lamoni, Iowa.

"The best thing Graceland did for me was to introduce the girl that afterwards became my wife."—Arthur B. Church, Lamoni, Iowa.

"Before Graceland found me, I had never dreamed of a college education, to say nothing of a university and professional training. I cannot even imagine what my life would have been, aside from Graceland's influence. As a member of the faculty, I am constantly spurred on to a greater activity both in educational and religious lines through the large number of students whose devotion to the cause and native intelligence can hardly be excelled. Next to my home, Graceland stands out as the most important factor in molding my life's ideals. I thank God every day of my life that she found me at an age when I was most susceptible to her influence."—F. M. McDowell, Lamoni, Iowa.

"Graceland gave me my start in the study of expression which study opened up to me a broader and grander view of the possibilities of life. I formed one half of Graceland's first class in expression."—Lena Lambert Graham, Lamoni, Iowa.

"Graceland has helped me: First, in broadening my intellect in temporal and spiritual affairs; second, in rendering better service to my fellow man; third, in finding a wife that has been the support and foundation of my happy home."—Ralph W. Johnson, Lamoni, Iowa.

"While I have no claims to greatness I do feel that Graceland has had no small part in shaping my life. It has given me an outlook on life I could not have obtained at any other school on earth."—Lucy M. Lysinger, Lamoni, Iowa.

"Graceland to a great extent served as a spiritual guidepost for me, and is largely responsible for my continued belief in things religious."—A. M. Carmichael, Lamoni, Iowa.

"I found Graceland to be a college where the information is 'put across' in a wholesome atmosphere. In the method of conducting educational courses the state institutions do not surpass, and for the directing of young lives no deeper interest could be asked for than Graceland offers. I am grateful to Graceland for my years spent there."—Coral Hatcher, Jefferson, Iowa.

"What Graceland has done for me! This embodies so very much that it is hard to summarize it in a short paragraph.

"It was because of the environment and instruction at Graceland that I saw fit to unite with the church and this no doubt means the most of any event in my life. It was at Graceland that I learned that it is our duty to labor for the benefit of society of which we are a part.

"Graceland led me to the church and then taught me that a life of consecrated service for our fellow men is the only goal to be sought in this temporal life."—Harry A. Lorance, Lamoni, Iowa.

"Graceland College, in my twenty-fifth year, when I was moved upon to prepare for work in the church, having had opportunity to finish only the eighth grade in school, and when there was no other suitable place for me to take up again the work of my education, beginning in the academy offered me the opportunity I needed, and brought me into an environment and community and under influences where in connection with my work in the classroom I made the development and formed the ideals which made it possible when the call of God came to me to undertake the work which thereunder the church directed that I do. I shall ever be grateful for Graceland as the instrument in God's hands opening up to me my possibilities and work."—J. F. Garver, Lamoni, Iowa.

"Graceland brought me a life of service following a great sorrow. It was a way to assist even in a small degree in her development."—Audentia Anderson.

"Graceland drew me from an isolated section without any church privileges to a center where Latter Day Saint sentiment prevailed. It thus furnished me the opportunity to get a vision of the meaning of the great latter-day work."—M. A. McConley.

EDITOR'S NOTE: Elder Wight has been connected with the faculty of Graceland several years, teaching church doctrine to the class in religious education the past year. Modesty prevents him from adding his testimony of Graceland's bounty to him, which includes his wife as consecrated to church work as he. He is a member of the Lamoni Stake presidency.

The "Downs" and "Ups" of the Collegiate Department

BY F. M. M'DOWELL

The junior college is so successful that the day is not far distant when it will give way to a full four-year course.

Typical of the hundreds of other small colleges that have arisen under the freedom of American democracy, Graceland was established with a noble purpose and an ambitious program. The former is shown by the following taken from the first annual catalogue:

"Graceland College has been founded and planned with the object in view of supplying the means necessary to the best possible education, and at the same time avoid the evils which so often attend schools of learning and destroy the social and moral nature of students." That her program was likewise ambitious is evidenced by the fact that this first catalogue offered a commercial course, two years of preparatory, and a complete course of four years for the collegiate department leading to an A. B. degree.

Like many another small college, Graceland has had her ups and downs in an actual struggle for existence. This story is familiar to the readers of the HERALD and need not be reviewed except as necessary in the consideration of the subject assigned.

Whatever may be said in favor of the various departments of a small college, it remains a fact that the heart of such an institution is the so-called "collegiate" department. In fact, it is this department that justifies the term "college." In spite of this truth, or better perhaps, because of it, it is this department which suffers when the college as a whole suffers and advances as the interests of the entire institution are enhanced.

In the early development of Graceland, the collegiate department was confronted by serious difficulties. In the first

A little study of this graph will reveal the truth of the statement that for 12 or 15 years the collegiate department struggled for its very life. At one time, in 1903 and 1904, there were only two students enrolled in the entire four-year course. The reasons for this situation have already been mentioned. What we are interested in especially is the fact that it no longer exists since this department has in the last few years developed not only rapidly but permanently. The most interesting feature of this illustration is the rapid and continuous growth since 1914, the increase during these years being from 15 to 90 students, a gain of 600 per cent. The causes of this growth are not difficult to find.

1. We must not fail to credit those who have borne the burden in the heat of the day, those who in the anxious days of Graceland's early history "stayed with the ship." Their faith in ultimate triumph has been a constant inspiration to those that have come later to work for Graceland. Among these devoted workers we mention the names of Frederick B. Blair, J. A. Gunsolley, and Bishop Kelley.

2. The excellent work of President R. M. Stewart who for four years gave all the energy at his command to Graceland. Although not a member of the church his devotion to the cause of Graceland has seldom, if ever, been excelled.

3. The organization of the "junior college" in 1914 marks the beginning of a great epoch in the history of Graceland's collegiate department. Graceland was the first junior college in Iowa to be officially accredited by the State University and the first in Iowa to become a member of the North Central Association of Secondary Schools and Colleges. As a junior college, Graceland proposes to offer only that which she can do well. This policy has increased attendance 600 fold. It has won her respect in state and nation, and finally increased moral and financial support on the part of the church.

4. The coming of President George N. Briggs to Graceland has been perhaps the most important factor in the growth of the collegiate department. It has been under his direction that Graceland has edged her way into educational circles of both state and nation. Due to his influence and ceaseless effort, she has become a fully accredited institution and finally a building program has been approved that far outstrips what had been our fondest dreams.

5. By no means least among the factors that have contributed to the success of Graceland and the development of the collegiate department has been the work of our graduates in higher institutions. It is quite commonly mentioned at the State University of Iowa that Graceland students with hardly an exception make good. This fact alone was especially emphasized by the university authorities at the time Graceland was being inspected for official accrediting. We are justly proud of our record. May we never have cause to be ashamed.

As at present organized, the work of the collegiate department includes the first two years of standard college work. Its completion assures the student of entrance into the junior year of a standard college or university, or admission to the best professional schools. This department has ambitions still. It hopes ere long to become a full-fledged four-year college. In our opinion, this dream will be realized in the near future if the present "ups" of Graceland continue and we have every reason to believe that they will.

place very few appreciated the need and value of a college education. Again, the number who enrolled for this work was very small as compared to the cost of maintenance. The number of instructors per student and the equipment necessary for the carrying on of this work was naturally far in excess of that for any other department. Furthermore, a normal training course was offered which furnished a short cut to a position and hence appeared to be of more immediate value than a classical college course. Under such conditions, it is not at all surprising that this department has had a slow and rather irregular growth.

These ups and downs are well illustrated in the accompanying graph and table which shows the enrollment in the collegiate department throughout the various years from 1895 to 1920.

No institution or individual has ever become strong without having had to struggle against opposition. The "downs" and "ups" of Graceland's history illustrate such a struggle. They explain her strength to-day. The collegiate department reflects to-day the attitude of the church toward higher education. If the work of this department is inadequate and limited it is because the church as a whole has not awakened to its full significance. If this be true, must not the church soon be able to present to the world a four-year college in which not 90 but 900 students are enrolled?

Progress of Education in the Last Quarter of a Century

BY A. M. CARMICHAEL

"Zion really is a condition of mind where men are willing to place their all for the benefit of the masses, as expressed in their young."

That education is necessary is the universal mind. Increasingly has it become accepted by all men, business men, professional men, and laborers that education is a necessary prerequisite to success. Our educational institutions stand firmly rooted in our economic and social life. Never before in the history of education has the teaching profession been so respected as it has come to be in the last quarter of a century. The need of education has so possessed the minds of our farmers that they are making any sacrifice to provide an education for their young. This increase in interest in education is attested by the ever-increasing numbers attending schools. Our universities to-day are two and three times as large as a decade ago. Building programs which ten years ago seemed adequate for half a century more, to-day stand inadequate, and the community finds its buildings crowded.

This increase in interest is reciprocally the cause and result of many changes effected in our educational system in the last twenty-five years. Among these are changes in the curriculum, fitting it to a larger variety of needs, changes in the methods of instruction, and added willingness upon the part of school authorities to provide added buildings and added equipment.

To begin with, we shall take up some specific changes in the curriculum. There has been a great increase in the stress upon the vernacular. A study of the vernacular is recognized as of universal value, and hence is required of all students in all classes of schools. In cultural schools, in civic schools, in business schools, and in individual schools, some course on the vernacular is given.

Another change in the curriculum, and perhaps a very significant one, is the increase in the stress on vocational subjects. The public schools failed to meet this need for a long time, and as a result many small business colleges sprang up all over the country, maintained privately. But to-day, our high schools are everywhere providing commercial courses. Too, just within the last decade, our universities are providing schools of commerce, the numbers attending having grown by leaps and bounds. The graduates of these schools of commerce are literally grabbed up by business men, and after a few months trial, are given responsible positions.

Apprenticeship not Popular

Not only in a commercial way but also in an industrial way has the course of our schools widened to meet larger needs. In the early days of the United States the institution of apprenticeship died out because of the multitude of opportunities in the way of expansion which faced the young man. He did not have to bind himself out to learn a trade. To-day the situation is changing. The young man finds he must learn a trade. Who is going to help him to discover which trade he wants? The public schools have taken hold of the task admirably. They have done it, too, despite the antagonism of the man who has not seen the vision of the public schools and works hard against an increase of taxation to support the public schools. To provide industrial instruction has proven more costly than any other kind of instruction. The instructors have cost more, and the equipment to carry on this work has been very expensive. Workbenches, tools, machinery, cannot be provided without expense. One of the universal problems of schoolmen is to persuade their constituents of the need of this expense.

The increase in stress upon music must not be left out. Its cultural value is receiving universal recognition. This, too, is being done at public expense. To too great an extent this side of our life is left to private initiative. As a result only the well-to-do can afford this education.

The increase in stress upon our social life, our country and its institutions must be mentioned. The war brought out very forcibly the inadequacy of our schools along this line. Where civics has been optional, it is now compulsory. The courses have been extended in length, and in frequency.

Some Wonderful Changes in Organization

The fluidity of our educational institutions has allowed some wonderful changes in organization, and in methods of instruction. The ease with which the junior high school has gained recognition with its attempt to draw a better and sharper line between the adolescent and pre-adolescent stage is remarkable. Again, we are beginning to see the need of change in system of grading. Graduation is more and more built upon the differences in mental capacities of children.

To be specific, children of bright mentality are put together, children of average in a class together, and children below average in their class. While this is of recent development, it will grow by leaps and bounds. It has every social and scientific argument in its favor. By this means society will be more enabled to take care of both extremes of mental capacity.

The increase of money spent upon buildings and equipment is a legitimate part of this article. This phase of the question is closely associated with the enlarging of units of organization. Two things are necessary to make a good school, a large taxing area, and a large number of pupils. The great variety of educational needs can better be taken care of. This, in a word, means consolidation of schools. This movement is properly a movement of the last quarter of a century. It is but one phase of the larger tendency of all business to amalgamate into bigger units for economical reasons.

Education Means Much to the Church

To the church education means much. Zion is a state in which schools form a large part. No man has caught the Zion vision until he has found a willingness to place more and more of his surplus stock at the disposal of the schools. A man fearing an increase of taxes for the betterment of our schools will not be comfortable in Zion. Zion really is a condition of mind where men are willing to place their all for the benefit of the masses, as expressed in their young.

Formerly and Now in Finances

BY J. A. GUNSOLLEY

Our college has seen some trying days in regard to its finances, but is on a firm basis now.

"And Abraham went out not knowing whither he went."

This might almost be said of the fourteen men chosen by the church to build and manage the affairs of a college for the church. The church said, Build; but the money with which to carry into effect the commission intrusted to them, where were they to get it? The board of directors consisting of seven members was to secure the faculty and manage the educational work of the institution, and the board of trustees, also consisting of seven men, was to provide buildings and equipment and look after the finances. Neither body had a dollar really appropriated nor in sight. But like faithful Abraham, they obeyed the voice that sent them forth, and the record of twenty-five years is open to our perusal.

In 1895 and for a number of years following it was generally believed that money paid into the treasury of the church as tithes and offerings could not be used legitimately for the maintenance of the college or any other work aside from the preaching of the gospel and the care of the poor. Hence some means must be resorted to to gather funds, by appealing to the Saints and friends of education for assistance.

Consequently, various plans were tried out. One of the earliest of these was to sell scholarships at thirty dollars each, this being the amount charged for tuition in the regular courses at that time. These scholarships were transferable and good until used. Sunday schools, Religios, branches, districts, and individuals were solicited, with the result that quite a sum of money was gathered, but never enough to meet the needs.

Another plan was to sell room rent in advance, issuing room rent coupons in various denominations redeemable in room rent to holders of the coupons. This was only a method of borrowing money and gave but little temporary relief.

A campaign was launched at a General Conference during a wave of enthusiasm proposing to raise $25,000 by securing pledges of twenty-five dollars and upwards, but none to be called for until the full amount was subscribed. Subscriptions went well for a time, until some who intended to donate the amount, regardless of whether all were subscribed or not, sent in their amounts and were receipted for same. This was thought by some to be a breach of confidence, or faith, and many canceled their subscriptions, and the plan failed. Considerable money was received, however.

Considerable talk about securing an endowment was indulged in from time to time. Various capitalists and benefactors of education were solicited, but all to no purpose. With the hope, however, that an endowment would come sooner or later, a plan for securing a temporary endowment was adopted. It was believed that if one thousand people could be found who would pledge ten dollars a year, the necessities would be amply provided for. It was a simple thing to sit down and figure out that it would be an easy matter to find a thousand people who would pay ten dollars a year for the educational work of the church, especially if the payments were made five dollars semiannually. The plan was approved, pledge cards printed, and solicitors sent out, and as anticipated, it was not a very difficult task to get the promises, for more than the thousand were soon secured. But the story continued reveals the fact that some who pledged never paid a dollar, some made one payment, some discontinued after the second, and so on, and some are still making their five-dollar semiannual payments, hoping yet, evidently, that a permanent endowment will come. Certainly an endowment of glory will come to those thus faithful. While this plan offered a large measure of relief, it was found necessary to borrow money and the debt kept steadily increasing. As early as 1904, the General Conference resolved that the doors of Graceland be closed until the debt was paid.

But it required more than a resolution of conference to close her doors. She was too tenacious of life, and the following General Conference adopted the plan of the annual College Day offering throughout the church. By this plan every branch of the church was to observe the first Sunday in October as College Day. Upon this day, the attention of the membership of the church was to be called to the needs of the college, her work explained, and the Saints and friends asked for an offering. Again it was easy to figure that if each of the more than five hundred branches should contribute twenty dollars a year a fund of upwards of $10,000 would be gathered. But as in other efforts, some branches were never heard from, some would not send more than the equivalent of five or ten cents a member, while some contributed quite liberally. Again the plan was not adequate to the needs of the institution and other means had to be provided to stop the increasing debt and provide for the natural growth and expansion taking place.

The Lord, by revelation, enjoined upon the church the payment of the college debt (section 125:16) and by action of the General Conference of 1916 the Bishop was authorized to use the general funds of the church not already appropriated for the payment of the debt and the carrying on of college work. From this time, relief of a permanent character was enjoyed. The convening of the General Conference of 1919 saw the debt paid and the finances of the college and of the entire church upon a firm basis.

The plan now in vogue and the one likely to be the policy in the future is the budget plan. Each year the college management makes out a budget of estimated receipts and expenditures. This is approved by the conference, which approval in effect authorizes the Bishop to supply from the funds of the church not otherwise appropriated sufficient to meet the items of expenditure in excess of the income. This plan has brought permanent relief and made possible the expansion incident to natural growth.

Religious Education

BY C. E. WIGHT

A new class that will be succeeded by an increasing number each year.

The first year of the Religious Education Course at Grace-land College has passed into history. The day will undoubtedly come when those having the honor to belong to this class will look back with pride upon the fact that they have helped to bring into reality a course that should in the future

This problem was attacked with the full knowledge that truth will stand any number of sledge-hammer blows and that it will have a far greater meaning to the individual who has thoroughly tested it. Here again, we are grateful for the spirit manifested on the part of the class, even though the end might not always be clear from the beginning.

With the lessons of the past year in mind, the course has been modified and revised for the coming year and it is believed that the changes will be very beneficial.

The class for the coming year is in process of selection. Including those who will enroll for the course at their own expense, there will be between forty and sixty in the class. Classes of the future will undoubtedly be larger rather than smaller. But let us figure as a basis that during the next ten years we send into the field from this course forty gradube of inestimable value in the furthering of the great latter-day work.

The enthusiasm with which this new movement has been received by the church has been gratifying indeed. There has been a splendid feeling of tolerance on the part of all who are big enough to see that no such movement can be launched without difficulty. In the first place there was the difficulty of shaping in one year a course that would adequately meet the needs of the class, when in fact we were traveling an uncharted sea. We had nothing to guide in the formation of a course of study except the courses offered in the theological schools of the world. These could be of benefit in a suggestive way, but we must always throw around our course of study such safeguard as would assist in retaining those teachings which are peculiar and vital.

The second great problem was that of accomplishing our purpose of creating in the minds of the class a desire to evaluate and reason to a logical conclusion the various doctrines and dogmas of the religious world. The accomplishment of this purpose makes necessary sometimes the jarring of ourselves loose from preconceived notions and comfortable conclusions reached without the necessity of too great effort.

ates. That will mean four hundred representatives fired with the ideals of Zion building and better equipped to meet the pressing problems of the day. What an opportunity is before us as a people!

Surely, in the words of our leader, "the spirit of God is working mightily with this people." The establishment of the religious education course is only one of the many manifestations of this power which is to some day change this world into the happy Zion of those who are wise in their generation.

A Course for All

Those who are preparing to be teachers need courses in pedagogy; those preparing to be doctors need courses in medicine; those preparing to be lawyers need courses in law; those preparing to be farmers need courses in agriculture; those preparing to be specialists of any kind need courses that give skill and training in the particular line desired; but whether teachers, doctors, lawyers, farmers, or specialists, all need to be trained in the fundamentals of business. The Business Course is, therefore, a course that appeals to all.

The Educational Value of Music

BY A. M. CARMICHAEL

This writer places a high estimate on the educational value of music.

The educational value of music to the masses is too little appreciated. The public schools have been stubborn in refusing their full-hearted support to the teaching of this important subject. True, this statement is more applicable to the teaching of instrumental music than to vocal, but it is all too true of the teaching of vocal music. As a result the teaching of vocal and instrumental music has been left to the private college, and to the private teacher. This in turn means that only the well-to-do can obtain education in music. Many a child of poor parentage, whose life would have been of feeling and purpose are easily obtained by singing. The chorister who leads a thousand voices has a great power in his grasp. This was demonstrated certainly to all who attended the last General Conference. The congregational singing which generally preceded the business meeting shaped the tone and feelings of the participants to a great degree, and was responsible for the harmony which prevailed. Our church pastors have not recognized the value of congregational singing. Too much emphasis comparatively has been placed upon the sermon. Should the congregational singing unite with the sermon in bringing out the theme of the sermon, persuasion would be more common. Nor should it always be arranged that the themes of the songs should be fitted to that of the sermon. The theme of the sermon much fuller is left to starve so far as the æsthetic value of music is concerned, and who knows, perhaps many a musical prodigy has been left undiscovered.

Dare we say that the reason for this lack of appreciation of the educational value of music is because the expense of it has blinded us, or shall we merely say that the appreciation of its value need only be taught and proven, and then will the public be willing to support its teaching at public expense?

Recent developments, however, have shown that its universal value is being recognized. The army's great attempt to encourage community singing, along with the attempt all over our vast country to encourage the community singing among villagers, is that to which we refer. Parents of moderate means are everywhere stinting themselves that their children may have instrumental lessons.

Music Controls Emotions of the Crowd

Nothing is of such value for æsthetic training as music. Its effect upon the emotions is wonderful. By it can the emotions of large crowds be controlled and guided. Unity could often be fitted to the theme and even to the exact words of a great song.

Value of Music in Church Services

The quality and kind of mass singing that any meeting has is generally consonant with the general spirit and effect of the entire meeting. Give us a Sunday school with lusty singing, and we will have a lively, effective organization with a larger attendance, and a greater proportion of attention to the lesson study. A missionary meeting with only the sermon may fail to accomplish the conversions; but if only the crowd can be persuaded to join in a song, their antagonism is broken down and their careful attention secured.

This phase of music is not to be unduly emphasized. The power to sing with restricted numbers, as in a choir, quartets, and solos, is of infinite value also. With these many of the same effects that have been mentioned in connection with the congregational singing can be accomplished. A soloist can be of immense value to the preacher. Too often, however, these special singers make the mistake of centering their own attention upon the perfection of technic rather than upon the making of an effect upon the audience. The soul of the performer is centered upon his rendition rather than upon the audience. The singers should have a definite effect that they wish to accomplish and they should measure their own singing by the degree to which they accomplish the desired effect. A choir supporting a preacher should not merely render a selection to fill in time, or merely to be complimented upon the perfection of the rendition, but they all should have in mind one theme, and one effect upon the audience; they should be cognizant of the theme and effect that the preacher wishes to set forth and obtain.

While used less often, we could not leave out the value of instrumental music. The Sunday school with an orchestra is far superior to one without. Nothing is better to obtain order in a school march than the orchestra itself.

Value of Musical Training to the Musicians

So far we have discussed the effect of music upon the auditors. The mission of the musician in this field is potent with opportunities. But the values of musical training to the musician himself are inestimable.

To keep our young people busy and interested in the church and the good things of life, train him musically. Give him opportunity to express himself in musical terms. Nothing recreates as does music. It offers the best opportunity to create diversion and variety in the program of the day. Furnish a place in the Sunday school, and in the church, where the young can give expression to their talents of playing on musical instruments and of singing. This is one of the best ways to combat the misuse of song. Right here, we might add that the evil resulting from the misuse of song is greater than the evils resulting from any of the tabooed social pastimes. This we must counteract by the proper cultivation of music, not by suppression. Music is the language of the soul, and it must find expression some way. Shall it be for evil or for good?

Buildings in Development

BY J. A. GUNSOLLEY

From three rented rooms Graceland has grown considerably and is still greatly expanding her capacity.

The France Block is a name that will ever be associated with Graceland College, for it was in this building that the very modest beginning was made. A two-story brick building on South Linden Street, two storerooms on the first floor and six rooms on the second, furnished the first home of the college, the upper floor being used for college work. Three rooms on either side of a hall running the length of the building furnished ample accommodations for classes conducted by three instructors, as the music teacher taught from house to house. Professor T. J. Fitzpatrick occupied the northeast room with his mathematics and science, T. J. Pence the southeast with his English and Latin, J. A. Gunsolley the two rooms at the west with commercial subjects, while the two middle rooms were occupied for library and other purposes. Miss Nellie Davis instructed in piano but met her pupils in their homes.

Eleven Students on Opening Day

The opening of school that first morning, September 17, 1895, was a very small and apparently insignificant affair, but as with many other small beginnings, it was large in prospect, and in twenty-five years has developed into something already receiving state-wide, and to some extent nation-wide, and so far as the church in concerned, world-wide recognition. Eleven students and three faculty members greeted Dean Mark H. Forscutt at the assembly for devotional services that first morning in the southeast room.

The church by action of General Conference had selected Lamoni, Iowa, as the place most desirable, all things considered, for the establishment of a college to be built and operated under church auspices. Sister Marietta Walker had for years cherished the fond hope of seeing our college built on her farm lying contiguous to the town on the southeast, and when it was made known that the matter was open to receive proposals for a site by the board of trustees, she very promptly offered twenty acres of her farm, a very beautiful location indeed. W. A. Hopkins also donated thirteen and one third acres and Mrs. Wickes six and two thirds acres adjoining and the site was chosen and the land was laid out in the meandering streets and avenues and set to trees. This has developed into one of the most beautiful of college campuses.

Work at once began upon the erection of a college building, extending throughout the summer of 1896, and completed and ready for occupancy by January of 1897, at which time the school was moved into its new and permanent home. This new building, the present college building, served amply for the necessary classrooms, and living rooms for the janitor and several students. The heating plant was in the basement of the building, and the janitor, F. T. Bradfield, and his successor, John Weedmark, with their families lived quite cozily in other parts of the basement. It was in these apartments that Brother and Sister Bradfield's first daughter was born, and appropriately named Graceland. The rooms on the third floor were used for dormitory purposes, being at the time the only rooms available upon the premises for that purpose.

Marietta Hall

With the increase in the number of students the necessity for housing accommodations became more and more apparent, more particularly for girls, for it could not be expected that girls would be sent to Graceland unless facilities for taking proper care of them were provided. Hence after some agitation, by what then was quite an effort, action was secured resulting in the erection of Marietta Hall, named in honor of the donor of the twenty acres of land for the college site, Sister Marietta Walker. This is a small wooden building of three stories and basement, providing twelve rooms and accommodating twenty-four people. One room has been added, providing quarters for the dean of the building.

This building was erected in 1906 largely by donations from the friends of the institution who were interested in the young people, and it has served the purpose very well in a small way to be sure. When the second dormitory was erected which was for the girls, Marietta Hall was changed into a boys' dormitory for which purpose it is still being used.

Patroness Hall

It soon became apparent with the growth of the college that not only was Marietta Hall inadequate to the need of housing accommodations for girls but that there was also growing demand for similar accommodations for boys. Consequently measures were put into operation to try to meet this demand. Donations were solicited, and various plans for gathering funds were instituted, until Patroness Hall came into existence, erected in 1911, and named in honor of the Patroness Society of Graceland College, out of consideration for their having been the largest donors, contributing upwards of two thousand dollars.

This building is devoted to the use of the girls, accommodating about forty. It also provides kitchen and dining room facilities where all students living upon the premises board, and where many students resident about town take dinners. It might be interesting to mention in this connection that the effort to secure this building was begun with earnest prayers and fasting by those most directly concerned, and there is much reason to believe that its being provided was made possible, or at least hastened, by such act of faith and trust in God, and a deep conviction in the righteousness of the undertaking.

The College Farm

Recognizing the fact that there are many young people who would profit by an opportunity to work for school expenses, and the further fact that to produce our own dairy and garden products would be much to our advantage, it soon resulted in the purchase of the college farm, forty acres adjoining on the east the land already acquired. This purchase brought into our possession a fairly commodious barn much needed in the development of our dairy interests, and the farmhouse which affords a home for the farm superintendent and rooming accommodations for ten boys. Prior to securing this farm, a modest stable and chicken house occupied about where the heating plant now stands.

The hot water heating system which had never been entirely satisfactory, gave place to a modern steam system in 1914 (?) the installation of which resulted in the erection of a one-story boiler house. This building was enlarged in 1918 by the addition of an upper story to be used as a shop, but temporarily converted into a gymnasium. Along with this improvement the old iron smokestacks which had to be renewed every few years were supplemented by a permanent concrete chimney.

Arborvilla

The pressing demands for more rooming facilities for girls caused those in charge to enter into negotiations for the lease of the premises lying north of the campus built by Sister Marietta Walker, and commonly known as the Woodstock cottage, to be used as a home for girls. It was soon seen that ownership of this property would be highly profitable, and arrangements were made to purchase it. The name Arborvilla, suggested by one of the young ladies occupying it, has been adopted.

New Buildings Being Erected

Feeling that in fairness to men who might be called to the position of superintendent of buildings and grounds as well as to bring greater efficiency to the work of that department, the church was asked to approve of an item in the budget of 1920-1921 and this cottage will be ready to occupy by the opening in September.

The General Conference of 1899 approved of a proposition to build a twelve-class-room building to cost seventy to eighty thousand dollars, and the money was appropriated for the purpose. This building is now in process of erection and will be the greatest forward move in the development of Graceland yet made. With it is coming increased and greatly improved facilities in the way of class room, laboratory, and library facilities.

With these enlarged and better facilities, is coming an increased enrollment. This increased enrollment is calling for larger and better dormitory facilities, and means for meeting this larger demand is already under consideration by the authorities of the church and it is expected that the next forward step in our building program will be dormitories.

In connection with larger enrollment and more efficient work comes the thought of the need of physical training which is to be met by an up-to-date gymnasium providing track, swimming pools, and all needed facilities for both sexes.

From this brief sketch may be learned the fact that the church realizes the need of providing the very best possible for the education and training of her young people, not only their heads, but their hearts and hands as well, for the highest degree of efficiency in the Master's service, and that she is endeavoring to meet this need as fully and as rapidly as is consistent with the many demands made upon her, so far as providing buildings and equipment is concerned.

EDITOR'S NOTE: In addition to teaching commercial subjects Elder Gunsolley is treasurer and business manager of the college, a task requiring a great deal of detail work and one that emphasizes the rapid growth of the college interests.

What Is a Junior College?

BY F. M. M'DOWELL

Graceland was the first accredited junior college in Iowa and first in Iowa to be accredited by the North Central Association of schools and colleges.

American institutions are the expression of American spirit and American opportunity. Neither can be understood apart from the other. With an innate desire for freedom of expression and an unlimited opportunity for such, a variety of institutional life is inevitable. Everywhere in this country, individual, local, or denominational pride has worked to establish such institutions as best represented its own peculiar whims, beliefs, or needs. Witness the hundreds of schools and churches in our land. Under no other form of government would such a condition have been possible.

Under this freedom our institutions have sprung into existence more or less spontaneously, sometimes to remain as permanent factors in our social life, at other times to disappear almost as suddenly as they came. In either case we frequently find such established, not as the result of any conscious purpose on the part of any single group of leaders, but rather due to a variety of factors which produce certain variations from the usual forms, leaving for educational leaders the task of defining and establishing standards after, rather than before, the new form appeared.

Such an institution is the so-called "Junior College." This term is now widely accepted as applying to those institutions, either public or private, which offer the first two years of the standard college course, above and beyond the standard four-year high school course. A variety of factors have within the past few years given unusual significance to these particular years of our educational system. These we shall consider briefly:

1. The rapid growth of our universities has made it increasingly more difficult to handle the large number in the classes of the first two years. This, together with the recognition of the fact that work of the first two years was essentially high school work in character and that the students needed individual help, has led many university authorities to openly encourage institutions both public and private to offer the first two years of college work in addition to the regular high school work.

2. Public high schools all over the country are beginning to extend their courses to cover the first two years of the regular college course. The reasons assigned for this are:

- a. Desire of parents to keep children at home.
- b. Desire of students to secure college work near home.
- c. To meet specific local needs.
- d. To provide entrance requirements to professional schools.
- e. To provide vocational training more advanced than high school work.

As a result of these demands, there are perhaps seventy-five or more public high schools in the United States offering "junior college," the first two years or regular college, work.

A large number of private colleges over the country have decided to limit their work so as to include only the first two years of the standard college course. The reasons for this are;

- a. Desire to provide opportunities for higher education under church control.
- b. Desire to be recognized as honest institutions by offering that which they are qualified to offer financially and no more.
- c. Desire to meet the entrance requirements of professional schools.
- d. Desired to provide additional opportunities for vocational training.

In a word, the junior college idea has proved the salvation of the typically American institution, the small college. Through it, these small and often struggling institutions have found their place in our educational system. Educators throughout the country are recognizing more and more the need of particular types of institutions to care for these years in the education of the boy and girl immediately after the completion of high school. Universities are admitting one by one that they cannot meet this need. It remains for the public high school where these boys and girls can remain under control of parents, or the private junior college where they can be under church control in small groups, to furnish the particular training that is needed for this most important period of life. For this reason we believe that the junior college is here to stay.

Graceland College is a junior college, the first in Iowa to be officially accredited by the State University, the first in Iowa to be officially accredited by the North Central Association of Schools and Colleges. To say that Graceland is a junior college means that she offers the first two years only on the standard college course in addition to a standard four-year high school course. To say that she is officially accredited means that her graduates may enter the junior (third) year of any standard college or university on a par with any other students who have taken their first two years' work in a university. It means that they may enter any professional school which requires two years of college work for admission. At Graceland, graduates of high schools have an opportunity to find themselves through close supervision in small groups for a period of two years at which time they may enter, without loss, their chosen fields. Graceland is now known in state and nation as a typical junior college. She is known as an honest institution offering only that which she is qualified to do well. As such, she has won increasing respect from all.

You ask: "When will Graceland become a four-year college? We answer: When she is qualified through financial support and material equipment to do those four years as well as she is now doing two, and not till then. Even then, such should not, in any way, detract from the attention that is now being given to the more or less immature high school graduates who enter each year. It has been our policy for a number of years that it is better to do two years of work thoroughly than four years poorly. For this reason we have become and continue to remain, a junior college.

The Next Quarter Century

BY CHARLES B. WOODSTOCK

A few glimpses into Graceland's future by one who knows her past from intimate association.

We who have composed the working force of Graceland's student body or faculty for any appreciable length of time, have come to interpret its life in terms of human interest and values. We have learned to love the studious atmosphere of its halls, to respect the ideals which motivate its activity, to cherish the sacred hush of the quiet hour of prayer which directs all to the great Master, the source of life, light, and wisdom. And it is this touch of the divine character in Graceland and her environs, the implicit, abiding faith in God and in the eternal verities of his truth, which mark the institution as standing among, and yet apart from, other educational institutions of the land.

It has been the "Faith of our fathers," confidence in the truthfulness of the latter-day message and in the ultimate working out of the divine plan for the redemption of man, which has been for twenty-five years the mainspring of hope prompting life in Graceland. It is the same hope and confidence which grows more bright to-day and which, with increasing animation, motivates the activity of classroom, study hall, and laboratory. It is the same faith which serves as a background for the vision we have of what Graceland is to be. Without our hope in the gospel and faith in what it is destined to accomplish, and in the power of the Spirit of God to assist man in working out the ultimate purposes of the divine plan, Graceland should be as so much dry wood and cold stone: lifeless and unlovable.

It is, then, in our appreciation of the gospel that we must truly read the history of Graceland and interpret the lives of those who have labored and studied within its walls, making its life and setting its ideals. It is in the light of the gospel triumph that we must look for an image of Graceland's future greatness. Graceland shall not accomplish great things in the coming years except as it lends itself, in spirit and in deed, in response to the demands made upon the church in the tremendous work now before it. Its growth is assured and its work will be of paramount importance to the church as they who shape its destiny are inspired with a knowledge of the truth and a zeal for righteousness.

With this background, and with a firm belief in the divine mission of educational preparation for the fullest possible spiritual and material success in life, let us look to "our Graceland" of the future.

Three Fundamental Requirements

One of the three fundamental requirements of a truly great institution of learning is the purely physical requisite, the grounds, housing, and equipment. These are to the college what the soil, water, and air are to the plant, what the leaves are to a book, and what clothing is to a person. For the expanding, growing, developing interests of a live and functioning college which adequately shall meet the needs of the church whose thousands of young men and women are reaching forth for guidance, direction, and preparation, Graceland shall need her broad acres of corn and pasture and grain, and many more than she now possesses. Finding the limits of her present classrooms, halls, and dormitories altogether too confining and restricted, new buildings, amply suited to the particular needs of each department and phase of Graceland's life, shall crown her rolling hills. It does not require a wide flight of imagination to see in the near future, in the light of present need, more extensive classroom and laboratory facilities, the new library and museum, the much-needed gymnasium, additional dormitories, special buildings for science and mechanics, history and art, language and literature, music, religion, and a church edifice sacred to divine worship. With all these, as the needs develop, we see modest but comfortable homes provided for faculty members and assistants who devote their years of service for the common good.

The second requisite to a great institution of learning is the human element, the faculty and student body. To function fully, our church college must have a competent faculty of men and women amply prepared by study and research, and so touched and assisted by the spirit of the gospel that they may not only direct educational preparation of the young and lead in fields of research, but they shall be a constant inspiration to the student body toward honesty of purpose, purity of life, and nobility of endeavor. For this, the coming to Graceland's faculty in the past, and more especially in the recent past, of many sterling young men and women of the church who have chosen the humble path of willing service among God's people rather than the fame and fortune offered by positions in the world, truly clears our vision, and with the eye of faith we can see their number multiplied many fold until every need is satisfied, and the extensive faculty of the future is filled with teachers consecrated to their tasks as those to whom God has committed a great and responsible work.

With the faculty, we see the gathering of the student body. Coming from all quarters of the earth, we see the noble sons and daughters of latter-day Israel assembling for instruction that they may be adequately prepared and equipped to live their lives most successfully. And each is seeking preparation in the line of endeavor which shall enable him or her to serve most acceptably as they sense their respective callings in the church. The "gathered" condition shall materially alleviate many conditions which have hindered, if they have not prevented some of our young people from attending Graceland.

The third great requisite of our ideal institution of learning is the spirit which prompts and motivates its life—the esprit de corps. Other colleges and universities are great from various standpoints. For the present our college may not hope to excel these in costly buildings and equipment, nor in number of students and faculty. But there is no reason why our professors, prompted by the spirit of consecration, fired by the zeal of the gospel, and assisted by the spirit and power of God, should not be remarkably blessed in the work of their calling. With the spirit of preparation and consecration extant among our church people, there is no reason to even fear that adequate means shall not be provided to procure buildings and equipment as fast as the developing interests of the college shall require them. Then, with a student body multiplied many times in numbers, moved with a supreme desire to serve God in all humility and to seek preparation for a life of human service as their callings may be, we may expect Graceland more and more fully to function as a vital part of the Lord's work, until we come to a full fruition of the promise of the ages—a people qualified to serve acceptably, to accomplish the divine plan of redemption, and able to meet the Savior when he shall return.

Shall all this be accomplished in the next twenty-five years? Who can tell? We are not especially concerned in the length of time required if only we perform well our humble part.

EDITOR'S NOTE Elder Woodstock was on Graceland's faculty several successive years and later served as member of her board of trustees. He is now superintendent of schools at Pisgah, Iowa, and so successfully combining school and community interests that the results are attracting favorable attention all over the Middle West.

Physical Education

BY JOHN F. GARVER

Graceland's guardians not only believe in physical education but are putting into effect some actual work to a definite end.

The writer has been asked to treat in this brief article of physical education as the same has had and may have place in the work of Graceland College. Limited as to space, we shall pass over the broader aspects of this excellent field, not dealing with the needs and benefits of physical education which must be apparent to all, nor with the matter of methods, so much as with actual activities as same may be possible and necessary to the college and young people pursuing work there.

When we speak of athletics, the uninformed or unthinking calls up or may call up the more rugged interschool games, baseball, basket ball, football, etc. In considering our theme, then, it will help us to lay aside for the time the word athletics for one coming to be quite common among us, and which will more nearly serve as a medium for the interchange of ideas which will make for the understanding desired by the reader as well as the writer. That word is recreation.

Recreation, as involving the physical exercise, outdoor and in, necessary unto the normal physical and the moral development of our young men and women of the church, and once developed to maintain their morale—it is this in which we are interested.

Looking to this good work, the trustees of Graceland College had engaged for the school year 1919-1920 a physical director. The work of this man was not only the coaching and directing of organized teams engaged in interschool matches, for this became at once his greater problem: To offer in a way to interest and entice all able to engage in physically recreational play of one sort or another to participate therein so the benefits might flow to each student enrolled.

To this end to be sure baseball, basket ball, and football were provided, engaging not only a goodly number of candidates and final participants, who themselves realized the benefits of the physical work out-of-doors, but also taking into the open air to witness both training and contests the entire student body, each of whom profited thereby; and in addition, and so bringing the fuller physical benefits to each and all, tennis, volley ball, and calisthenics, the latter supplemented by varied athletic games and contests, were provided, in which the students of both sexes had part. Volley ball, than which there is perhaps from every angle no more desirable game, adapted as it is to women as well as men, particularly engaged the young people.

Now these games and contests were of course mostly in the open air, limited in number and engaged in only under favorable weather conditions, all of which was necessarily so, since we have as yet at Graceland no gymnasium, hence no indoor facilities only as such are very inadequately supplied by a small and temporary gymnasium room.

It is the policy of the board of trustees to continue this good work in physical training; and the trustees have from Graceland's constituency every assurance the people desire such continuance. It is the purpose, furthermore, to provide eventually for activities in all weather. Hence it is that the trustees have in mind to propose when other needs of the church shall have been so fully supplied as to seem to justify same, the erection of a gymnasium, which would make possible a more thorough and continuous work in physical education for our young people.

We have said we have not in the space allotted to this article room to treat to any appreciable extent the need of physical education; nor does it any longer seem necessary in this church to do so. Our people are for by far the larger part persuaded to this necessary part of our educational work. So we are content only to mention this need.

Recognizing as we do that the college is a place of preparation or should be for all the eventualities of life, in each of which physical alertness and endurance are imperative to the average man or woman who would succeed (and we say average, for the people who succeed though physically handicapped, while challenging our profound admiration are comparatively speaking, few), we of the church are come to desire and to reach out to secure for our Graceland the best in this as in all other lines.

THE BOOSTER AND "PEP" COMMITTEE

Representing the different classes and departments of the college, this committee has charge of many of the student activities.

It may not be out of place to mention just here one of the many ambitions of the college, this one growing out of the recent impetus given recreational work in the church by making the work of the Religio Department primarily recreational. It is apparent to all observing people that in our various districts and large branches we need for this work as leaders men and women of training. This is the ambition of Graceland College: To be so equipped and organized as to be able to offer this training—training in all lines of recreational effort, hence training in the particularly physical. And so should she be able to do so soon as there is a concerted demand for such work.

So it is that the college should have at the earliest time practicable her gymnasium: A need not only for the people desiring particular training for preparation as leaders along the lines suggested, but also to provide adequate facilities for the physical education necessary for the young people attending the college in ever-increasing numbers as regularly enrolled students.

As of the physical, so we speak only very briefly indeed of the moral influence of physical education. For the physically weak, it tones up the body, enabling the individual to arise out of the morbid mental attitude common to many of the invalided, and to the normal, healthy, mental poise necessary to him who must grip himself with assurance of strength would he hold himself to the clean living necessary to Latter Day Saint success. And for the physically vigorous, it burns up the surplus physical exuberance of youth, and leaves the normal mind in a body worn, and not lashing the mind with appetites and passions of the flesh, hence fortified against likes and emotions legitimate in their time and place, but deadly to sainthood when operative otherwise and elsewhere.

Graceland College aspires to a participation in Zion's rising. In Zion we shall yet have the flesh. To have it vigorous though subservient—this is one of the problems of the church. Aspiring to Zion's rising, Graceland aspires to service! To serve fully she must then serve physically. May God grant that her every effort in the physical interests of the church may be of a nature to endure in Zion triumphant.

EDITOR'S NOTE: Elder Garver is a one-time student of Graceland and now president of Lamoni Stake, also secretary Graceland College Board of Trustees. He has a great personal interest in recreation, and upon occasion even yet waxes enthusiastic as presiding authority over the first base on a baseball diamond.

Official Recognition

BY GEORGE N. BRIGGS

Every person and every institution needs some standard towards which to look as a basis for feeling that a certain goal has been reached or may be aspired to.

Christ is that standard among men. He represents the very highest type of life in actions, example, and standards.

Educationally, certain standards have been set towards which persons and institutions aspire in their progress.

In the United States, the North Central Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools represents the highest standardizing and accrediting association for the fixing of a goal towards which the higher institutions of learning aspire.

It is a distinct honor to hold affiliated or accredited relationship with the North Central Association. Its official recognition gives prestige to a school among educated men and women everywhere. Its recorded approval is a letter of introduction to all colleges, universities, and professional schools in the land, and guarantees efficiency and high standing to these institutions. Accredited relations with the association bring to a school the same distinction and honor as an institution that membership in the society of Phi Beta Kappa or Sigma Xi confers upon an individual or that high rating by Bradstreet or Dunn brings to a firm in business.

In the closing days of Graceland's first quarter of a century and indeed on her first application for official recognition by this North Central Association, both the collegiate department and the academy were fully recognized and officially accredited thus giving her the very highest academic standing attainable in the educational world.

Along with the other hundred and thirty-five institutions of higher learning on the official list of the North Central Association, it is the determined purpose of Graceland to cherish the honor conferred upon her and seek to uphold the standards mutually and cooperatively established to the end that her graduates may go anywhere in the world and apply for advanced standing with the knowledge that her membership in this association carries that honor and distinction which admits those thus honored to the educational councils of the country.

Graceland is the pioneer junior college in the State of Iowa and thus has certain responsibilities in the fixing of standards and their maintenance which gives her a distinct place in the educational circles of the Middle West. Since Graceland's organization as a junior college, two other junior colleges have been established in Iowa, one of which has been officially recognized for one year of college work, the other one being denied accrediting of any kind. Outside of Iowa, there are numbers of junior colleges and the ever-widening influence of this type of higher institutions is justifying the expressed conviction of President Harper, the first president of the University of Chicago, published to the educational world a quarter of a century ago, that there is a distinct place in the educational program of the country for the junior college. Graceland's history is demonstrating the wisdom of this farsighted educator. Her ambition now is to perform her tasks so acceptably that there will be no question about the wisdom of farther tasks when those are imposed either by the church or the State.

The State of Iowa early recognized that Graceland was in a position to render not only the State, but the student body a most efficient piece of service by the preparation of public school-teachers.

Through the expansion of her activities, including the enlargement of her laboratories and libraries and the establishment of a teacher training and practice teaching department, she has received official recognition from the State and placed on exactly the same basis as the state institutions in so far as the granting of state certificates to her graduates is concerned. At the present time, one of the students graduating from the department of education, which includes the teacher training courses, is granted by the State of Iowa the highest grade of state teacher's certificate which can be granted to a graduate of a two-year college course. After two years' successful teaching experience, this can be converted into a higher grade state certificate renewable from time to time and good for life so long as the graduate remains in the teaching service.

By Iowa law, our teacher graduates are guaranteed a minimum salary of eighty dollars a month which after two years' successful teaching experience is raised to a minimum of one hundred dollars monthly. Most of our graduates, however, have been employed at salaries greatly in excess of the minimum fixed by law. They have no difficulty in securing most desirable positions in their chosen profession. Due to the reciprocal relations existing between Iowa and many of the States of the Union, Iowa certificates may be transferred to other States, thus granting to Graceland graduates practically universal official recognition in their certification as teachers.

In the past, students pursuing courses in the commercial school have been quite materially handicapped in the matter of the recognition of their credits in case they later decide to continue their education in this or another college.

However, because of the higher standing of the institution at present and because of the better standardization of her commercial courses, full recognition is now accorded our commercial students who desire to continue their college education. By a combination of our academic and commercial courses, students may pursue all the required academic studies and take as electives courses in the commercial school thus completing all credit work necessary for admission to college and at the same time complete the stenographic and business courses, thus enabling him to enter directly upon his commercial career or use his business and stenographic education as an aid during his college course.

This is recognition of prime importance to our commercial students who are ambitious for a collegiate education as it gives them the standing required for college entrance and at the same time enables them to prepare along commercial lines, equipping them for a business career.

During the war, all institutions of higher learning were called upon by the Government to assist in whatever way possible to meet the supreme crisis of the ages. Some were equipped to assist in one way, some in another. Graceland was made one of the comparatively few institutions in the country officially recognized by the Government as equipped to prepare wireless operators, large numbers of whom were needed in the war service. As a result of this high recognition, large numbers of young men were prepared not only during the regular school term, but during vacation periods as well, to take their very important place in the communication program of the Nations at war and Graceland wireless graduates were to be found in the front line trenches of France, in charge of important communication centers, in training camps assisting in the preparation of other radio operators, and in the fields of active communication operations.

All of these evidences of the recognition of the distinct place of Graceland College in the educational world have only served as incentives to greater performances and to the fulfillment of her obligations as an educational institution.

But above all and beyond all has been the very fine recognition which has come from the people of God during this quarter of a century. Without the knowledge that God's hand and the hearts and souls of God's people were in and a part of Graceland, it would have been impossible to have accomplished the very fine piece of work wrought during the quarter of a century.

The knowledge that God had a distinct purpose in founding this college and the manner in which that knowledge has been proven so frequently during her brief history, have been the highest type of official recognition that could come to anyone or to any institution.

Thus, as we enter upon our second quarter of a century, it is with the knowledge that we are approved of God and approved of his people and that if God's full purpose is to be realized here it will call forth the very best with which he has endowed his servants.

The Auxiliaries of the College

BY EDWARD D. MOORE

Organizations which are indispensable to college life and wield a mighty influence.

Athenian Literary Society

During the wee, small hours of one dark night some years ago the girls on the third floor of Marietta Hall (then used as a girls' dormitory) were aroused by strange noises in the hall. Some unseemly disturbance was taking place. After the usual chorus of feminine vociferation a flashlight revealed the presence of a half-grown Poland China as frightened as themselves. With an exhibition of great bravery and by much shooing and scating, poor Mr. Porker was induced to descend to the next floor but he decided not to risk his precious hide any further and remained till he was gallantly rescued by some of the young men who had been called in.

Great excitement prevailed. The culprit must be located, so the Athenian Literary Society of Graceland appointed officials to investigate. These minions of the law found some evidence, made charges, haled the suspicioned before a court that had been organized by the students and had a trial, attended by many interested spectators from town as well as the entire student body.

As a result, it was brought out that some of the students had in the night gone to the College Farm and chloroformed the pig, and while he was in that somnambulant state had transported him to the place where our account opens.

More recently there was a shooting scrape at the college (with blank cartridges and prearranged plans but effective so far as the innocent bystanders were concerned) which brought out some of the methods of the executive arm of our social system most effectively via the Athenian.

But not all the Athenian's activities are so spectacular. Meeting as they do each Saturday evening during the school year, there are many commonplace programs on which you and I might have a part if we were students, whereby our reticence might be overcome and our latent talents developed. Not all students are going to make good lawyers or judges or even jurymen, but there is something we can do in public, if it is nothing more than to be a good listener. And that is what the Athenian attempts to find out: the ways it can develop the students we send there from year to year.

The academic courses offered at Graceland College, good as they are, are not sufficient. There is a long list of social needs that must be supplied at the time the young people demand them, hence the Athenian.

Entirely democratic, manned by its own officials who are allowed to serve but one semester, in order to give place to a greater number, it surely bears fruit in turning out a product much better than the raw material which comes to it from year to year.

Sometimes, indeed, it seems to have performed miracles, while at other times a solid-ivory head has gone away from college at the end of the appointed term of weeks as solid and impervious as ever. But the student who desires to advance in public ability and will take the customary riotous interest in the parliamentary battles staged at the business sessions, will participate in the many debates arranged, will sing or recite, goes out from the college a much stronger man than when the college received him.

Since the enrollment has so greatly increased we are not surprised that the society has been divided and made into three organizations. It is but a manifestation of commendable growth, and the friendly competition sure to continue as it has begun, will incite to greater excellence. We are glad to lend our moral support to the lusty infant societies born this year, listed alphabetically here to avoid any seeming preference, for they are all very excellent: Alpha Phi Sigmas, Niketes, Victorians.

There are always several smaller student organizations flourishing, rather limited and exclusive in their nature, but we cannot name them all here.

The Patroness Society

Then there are the Patronesses of Graceland College, that band of noble women who for years have stood by the college and furnished not only moral support, but real financial assistance. Through their efforts they raised over two thousand dollars to help build Patroness Hall, now used as the girls' dormitory and dining hall for all students.

In those days when the college finances were more or less uncertain, before the church decided to grant it a stated amount for sustenance each year, the help these women of Lamoni gave the college was surely a Godsend. And even now, when the college is granted from the general fund sufficient to cover deficits, the personal touches the Patronesses give to the table linen, etc., as well as the good they do their own members in a social way is worthy of much commendation.

Greater Graceland Association

And though it only remains to write the epitaph of the Greater Graceland Association, since it died last year and gave place to the Graceland Extension Department, we would inscribe, not on cold marble but on the tablets of the hearts of many throughout the church who have labored long and lovingly in the interests of a Greater Graceland, thus: "They did a noble work, more resultful than they could realize, and we who profit by their sacrifices are duly grateful."

Through the generosity of Elder G. J. Waller of San Francisco and Honolulu, the college is in receipt of seven very fine specimens of genuine ancient Babylonian tablets secured from Edgar J. Banks of Alpine, New Jersey. Mr. Banks is a noted Egyptologist and has described and given a translation of the inscriptions on these tablets.

Relations With Other Institutions

BY G. N. BRIGGS

With institutions as with individuals, there are certain relations which indicate the extent to which those institutions are functioning in the world of activities in which they are particularly interested. With educational institutions, these relations are largely of a forensic and athletic nature. The forensic relationships consist, for the most part, of intercollegiate debates, oratorical and declamatory contests. The athletic relationships are largely in the nature of football, baseball, and basket ball contests with field and track meets.

The relation of Graceland College with her sister institutions, not only junior colleges but normal schools and standard colleges in Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska, have always been most cordial and friendly. She has had her fair share of victories in these contests and of course, at times, has been compelled to see the victory go to her competitor, but always with the feeling that she performed her part to the best of her ability and that the victory did not belong to her because she had not prepared herself for the contest.

In debate, Graceland has the very best of relationships with two of the standard colleges of the State with one of which she carries on an annual girls' collegiate debate, with the other an annual boys' collegiate debate.

As types of the questions debated from year to year those of the past college year may be of interest.

For the girls' debate the following question was discussed:

"Resolved: That Congress should enact legislation prohibiting the immigration of unskilled laborers from Southern and Eastern Europe for a period of five years."

The boys of the collegiate team had the following question:

"Resolved: That a federal board of arbitration, having compulsory powers, should be established to which all industrial disputes of national concern must be submitted for final decision."

In view of the fact that our academy had been fully standardized and officially accredited, we have been admitted to the State Debating League composed of some sixty high schools and academies of the State. The State is divided into four sections for debating purposes, Graceland Academy being assigned to the Southwestern Section and we had the opportunity of participating in four debates before we went down to defeat. We were successful in winning the first three debates by unanimous decisions in every case, the last debate going against us by a two to one decision and it is very significant that the team defeating us by a two to one vote was the successful team in the State, winning the state championship.

For our first year in this state league, the academy feels that it accomplished a very satisfactory piece of work, not entirely because of having won so many victories, but because of the very fine experience gained which cannot help but be of great value to those taking part.

The question for the state debate this year was:

"Resolved: That Congress should enact legislation providing for a system of compulsory military training for all able-bodied men before they reach twenty-one years of age."

Our academy is also a member of the Declamatory Association of Iowa which enables our students to participate in the declamatory contests held within the State. The winner of our home contest usually participated in by so many that preliminary contests must be conducted before a final one is held, represents the institution in the subdistrict contest which leads up to the state contest. The winner of second place represents us in the county contest.

In athletics, we take part in the usual intercollegiate con-

LETTERS

Iowa to the Front

Old Iowa is coming to the front in a most remarkable way. The missionary spirit is bubbling in all parts of the State.

Recently I took up the question with our several district conferences, of purchasing suitable tent outfits for our missionaries.

The first conference visited was that of Pottawattamie, where with the splendid support of the district president, Orman Salisbury, and Brethren Vanderwood and Long, was secured subscriptions in one day totaling $500.

Next was visited the Boone conference of the Des Moines District, where in less than twenty-four hours some $540 was donated. After this we attended the Little Sioux conference, and were gratified by the generous response of over $600.

The tents we purpose securing will be 40 by 60 feet, seating capacity between four and five hundred. The best that can be purchased will be bought, altogether costing, together with the small tents 12 by 16 feet, to accompany each large one, for the habitation of the elders, about $2,300.

It is intended, if possible, to place a company of singers and tract distributors with each tent, and thus reinforce the efforts of the missionary in a vigorous campaign that cannot but bring results. We trust that Saints, whether old or young, finding time to respond will advise us at once of their readiness to serve. Advise at my field address, 1121 Fourteenth Street East, Des Moines, Iowa.

And now comes the cheery word from Cedar Rapids, via Charles Putnam, our sturdy auctioneer who has recently turned missionary, that they have raised $300 for a campaign in that city in the immediate future.

Last, but not least, old Des Moines, the hub of the State, has just raised $548 in less than half an hour, for a campaign to be staged there in November.

Why, we have more opportunities for doing big things than ever before, and we are in sore need of men to move out and carry on.

But the youth of the State are on the stir. We can hear the shuffle and the tramp of many who are preparing for real service.

We trust the Saints and friends in outlying localities will not fail to communicate with us as to the opportunities for service.

We suggest that the Saints everywhere will collect HERALDS, Ensigns, and Autumn Leaves to be available for distribution. Notify us of what you have and you will be instructed where to send it.

Sincerely,
DANIEL MACGREGOR.

HORNER, WEST VIRGINIA, June 16, 1920.

Editors Herald: Just closed an eight-day meeting here with the privilege of baptizing two precious souls into the kingdom—Brother and Sister Harris, and they have sub-tests, football in the fall, basket ball in the winter, baseball and field and track meets in the spring.

"A sound mind in a sound body" is our slogan. However, our ideal in physical education is not especially to develop winning teams, but to give to every student the necessary amount of physical training to assure him a healthful body and a healthful mind. This can be done only by providing some form of physical education for everyone.

These intercollegiate athletic and forensic contests with colleges and normal schools not only of our own State, but of our neighboring States, results in a relationship on the very best plane and puts our institution and our students on a basis of civic preparedness which enables them to play their part in an altogether satisfactory way in whatever community they may be called upon to labor after graduation.

scribed for the HERALD. They are poor people, but well respected. But I suppose they will not be so well thought of now. Prejudice runs high here. Only a few would venture to come to the meetings. A Mrs. Hall, who keeps boarders, opened her home, giving us a room to hold meetings in. And she did all she could to make the meetings a success, and make it pleasant for the preacher. She believes the message is true, and we hope she will obey soon.

I leave to-day for Orlando. That is where Brother Burdick got into trouble with the preachers, was arrested, and the judge turned him over to the sheriff. The sheriff kept him overnight, and the next morning told him to go where he pleased, that he would not look him up if he lost his job. I hope to be as lucky at least as Brother Burdick. This is a new opening, and we can expect Satan to rage. He hates to have a Latter Day Saint preacher intrude upon his sacred territory, and he has a nice little following here. But I leave at least three others much interested.

Still in the faith,
JAMES MCCONNAUGHY.

Equality in Little Things

One night last winter I awoke under the influence of the Holy Spirit, which remained with me for some time after awaking. Those who have passed through such experiences know the sweet peace and joy which attends such ministrations.

I had just emerged from a dream in which I saw myself in some foreign field where I had been talking to the elders concerning financial matters. At the close of our words of instruction one of the brethren approached me and said, "While laboring with two other missionaries, my wife accompanied me, she looking after providing for our food, and instead of pro-rating the expense we made a flat charge to the other two missionaries, which netted a profit."

He sought my views upon this procedure. I reasoned with him upon the matter about as follows: Let me see—at the present time you and your companion enjoy the respect, confidence, and love of your brethren?"

"Yes!"

"They are making equal sacrifice with you in your gospel service?"

"Yes!"

"Don't you think, then, that if it became known to them that you were profiting in a financial way by reason of your association that the seeds of distrust and suspicion might be sown and the pleasant relations now enjoyed be broken?"

At this point I awoke, conscious of the fact that God approved.

From a commercial viewpoint no criticism would be considered just; but we must weigh our acts in more delicate balances than the scales of commercialism. The standard of Jesus was higher than that of the Pharisees. "Except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, there is no light in you."

It may be that some one of the missionaries now have this very problem before them and are in a quandary to know which course to pursue; and so we have related our experience that they might have the benefit of it.

BEVIER, MISSOURI, June 21, 1920.

Editors Herald: The Northeastern Missouri district conference convened at Bevier, June 12 and 13. It was one of the best attended conferences held in the district for several years, isolated Saints being present from many points in the district: Apostle William Aylor, missionary Arch E. McCord, and F. T. Mussel, district president, representing the missionary forces.

Just before the afternoon social meeting two ladies, one from Brookfield and one from Novinger, and two young boys were baptized by Brother McCord. Five young men were ordained to the priesthood: Ben S. Tanner and Vernie Ruch to the office of elder; F. L. McKane, priest; John Pear-

Institute Teams

Among the outlines furnished for institute work will be found papers treating on social purity and home department.

As you will remember the late General Conference decided that these departments should be turned over to the Women's Department. Because of this the subjects mentioned will have to be treated from a slightly different angle. The Women's Department requests that the handling of these subjects be discontinued until such time as they are prepared to furnish details and complete plans for carrying on this work.

We ask that you kindly take from the outlines all papers treating on these subjects and leave them out of all institutes held from now on.

Just as soon as new outlines are prepared we shall see that all teams are supplied with the new data.

We are receiving a number of reports from teams telling of their plans to hold institute sessions during reunions and conventions, etc. This is surely good news and we trust that all the good workers will enthuse over this work and push it along. We would like to see greater activity and enthusiasm manifest in this good work.

Let us hear from you What have you done? What are your plans? Can we help you?

son, teacher, and Samuel Perry, deacon. Three babies were blessed, and a peaceful, enjoyable time was experienced.

Tuesday, 15th, Elder W. B. Richards and wife and son David, left for Winnipeg, Canada, where he will take up his missionary work. A number of farewell meetings were held by branch, Sunday school, Religio, Women's Department, and various classes in honor of Sister Richards and son, who have been active in all departments of the work. They were made the recipients of many little tokens of remembrance from the various organizations.

Sister Richards had been president of the ladies' aid for many years, and was a very active member in the Sunday school and religio work, as well as the branch. We shall miss this excellent family very much in all departments of the work here and commend them to the Saints of Winnipeg. The work seems to be making good progress throughout the district, and we are in hopes that other branches may soon be organized in some of the isolated places.

Ever praying for the advancement of the work, I am,

Your brother,

J. L. WILLIAMS.

NEWS AND COMMENT

CHURCH NEWS

While at Denver President Frederick M. Smith was interviewed by a reporter for the Post and his political views rather fully quoted, with a statement as to the primary differences between our church and the Utah church. President Smith confesses that the present state of politics rather disconcerts him and he is awaiting developments, especially regarding the League of Nations, which he has favored.

Eastern Iowa conference met under the coordination plan, almost universally observed by the districts. The departments and the church are inseparable and are the same people in different lines of activity, each blending into the other. Among the features reported were "hikes" (does anyone know of a better word?) for the boys and girls. Amos Berve was reelected district president, to be associated with Milo Burnett and C. A. Beil. Publicity was combined with secretarial work and given over to J. E. Benson. A. J. Fisher was ordained to office of elder and I. S. Green to office of deacon. J. F. Garver of Lamoni, was present, also Charles Putnam of the missionary force.

President Elbert A. Smith has recently been quarantined at his home with smallpox but is recovering without serious consequences. On account of this enforced "vacation" he was compelled to cancel at least his trip to Utah where he was to attend the district conference.

Apostle T. W. Williams is in Los Angeles on a visit. He writes that he has been home only six weeks in the last two years, and expects to leave soon to make preparations for his trip to Europe. He goes with much earnestness and deep devotion.

One of the teachers in public speaking at Graceland College next year will be David Hopkins, a former Graceland student, who this year finished his junior year at the University of Iowa. He shared in the Frank O. Lowden prize of $100 divided equally between the members of the winning intercollegiate debating teams at the university. He made an excellent record, being the first student in the history of the university to win during his first year of attendance a place on the oratorical contest and intercollegiate debating team.

Mrs. H. C. Burgess, of Lamoni, is at Chicago for the summer, taking special work in music at the Chicago Musical College and private instruction, preparatory to teaching voice in Graceland College next fall. As announced in last week's HERALD, H. C. Burgess has been appointed managing director of the Department of Music for the church, and will devote all the time possible to the work for the present, and when released as manager of the Lamoni Electric Co., devote his entire time to the work.

Elder Floyd M. McDowell leaves on the 28th for Saint Louis, Missouri, where he will represent Graceland College in a national conference of junior colleges June 30 and July 1. He will discuss the curriculum of junior colleges, and on the program one notes such names as George F. Zook, specialist in higher education, of the Bureau of Education in Washington, and P. P. Claxton, national commissioner of education.

FROM THE BRANCHES

Salt Lake City, Utah. The Saints greatly appreciated the two sermons by Frederick M. Smith at that place June 6. They had hoped to have President Elbert A. Smith with them on the 20th as he had expected to attend the district conference, but was detained on account of illness. On Children's Day eight were baptized, two middle-aged women, two young women, and four young men. These people will give valuable assistance.

Coldwater, Michigan. Elders Paia, Charles May, and Clyde F. Ellis were here on the 27th and held a meeting in the church, going on to Battle Creek. Brother Ellis preached four times the following week. Elder S. W. L. Scott has been holding services in Lansing. June 27 has been set apart by the branch for an all-day meeting in commemoration of the organization of the branch. Several good speakers are expected. June 6 was Children's Day and a very good program rendered.

IT TAKES MONEY

to carry on the work of the church. Why not? Anything worth while is worth paying for. Will you heed this call?

"Moved that we request all the districts in the church to set aside budgets for the necessary expenses of the district organizers in the pursuance of their duties."

A Quarter Century of Service

☞ Time is the acid test through which every institution must pass before it can receive the full confidence of those it would serve. No matter how propitious the circumstances of its beginning, no matter how glowing its promises of success, a skeptical public demands the test of time and only service rendered will justify its beginning or its continuance.

☞ Graceland College has stood the test of twenty-five years. Beginning with only the faith and the limited means of a few who saw the vision to back her, and battling against heavy odds from the very first, she has forged bravely and successfully ahead, and to-day has justified her cause and has firmly established herself in the confidence of the entire church.

☞ The history of Graceland College has been the history of service. Her traditions are all traditions of doing good. No life has she touched except to better it; no hour has she employed except to make knowledge more vital and truth more precious than it was before.

☞ Graceland College refers to the past only to give emphasis to her purposes for the future. Splendid as have been her achievements, they are as nothing compared to what she would next accomplish. The vision of the church and the vision of the college open to the same shining goal. Truth is the ultimate of them both, and Graceland's task is to hold high the lamp of learning that the path to God may be made more clear and that the youth of the church may enter into a more useful and more acceptable service.

EDITORIAL

Early Ideals of the Church

Patriotism and Good Citizenship

(This series of editorials has been revised and is reprinted by request. Lend these HERALDS to your neighbors and to others who may be misinformed as to the early history and ideals of the church. The subjects to be treated are: I. "Patriotism and good citizenship." II. "Temperance and honesty." III. "Education." IV. "To live at peace with all men." V. "Marriage and the Home.")

The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints was organized on American soil under the jurisdiction of the United States Government. At present it has its corporate existence as an organized body in the United States of America; and here Saints gather from all parts of the world. Under these conditions it was and is quite proper for the people of America in particular to challenge Joseph Smith and his associates concerning their attitude toward their native land and its government. We do not object to questions on that subject, but we do object to certain erroneous opinions that obtained at an early date and are still cherished by some.

Not long ago an Eastern daily paper, issued from the "hub of the universe," the classical seat of culture, fads, baked beans, and the sacred cod, speaking of the church, restated an old charge in this language:

"Since its beginning, it has been defiant of the law! it puts fealty to its priesthood above the law of the land, holding itself 'to be the only legitimate power that has a right to rule on earth.'"

If this statement were really true the church might well be looked upon with severe disapprobation. Its members could hardly be classed as good citizens. However, it is not true, but exactly the reverse, as we shall show from the standard books of the church. These books teach that God has designated America as a choice land of liberty; that he directed in the founding of the United States Government; and that all citizens should be strictly obedient to the laws of their land.

Going back to the very beginning, we quote these words from the Book of Mormon, as they came from the lips of the Prophet Nephi:

"And I looked and beheld a man among the Gentiles, who was separated from the seed of my brethren by the many waters; and I beheld the Spirit of God, that it came down and wrought upon the man; and he went forth upon the many waters, even unto the seed of my brethren, who were in the promised land. And it came to pass that I beheld the Spirit of God, that it wrought upon other Gentiles; and they went forth out of captivity, upon the many waters. And it came to pass that I beheld many multitudes of the Gentiles upon the land of promise."—1 Nephi 3:147-149.

Here it is indicated that God directed Columbus on his voyage of discovery. We do not believe that the discovery of America was simply a stroke of luck. It came about at such time and in such a way as God directed. We do not agree with Ingersoll who said that the Christian God was ignorant of the existence of the New World until Columbus told him of it. On that matter Frank Basil Tracy in his Tercentary History of Canada (1908) says:

"The world was in a low state at the close of the fifteenth century. It despaired of progress, for it did not know how freedom could be got. But behind the thought and determination of Columbus when he set sail to the west in 1492 there seems to us to-day to have been an impulse, a guiding hand, an overseeing power, of which he knew nothing, and of which the world could have no conception for centuries to come. The discovery of America may be said to be one of the most fortunate events for mankind, or one of the most inspiring and wonderful manifestations of Providence in all history."

We are in accord with the thought expressed by Mr. Tracy that behind Columbus there was a guiding hand, but not with the thought that Columbus was ignorant of that fact. It is a matter of history that he believed himself to be an instrument of Providence. That belief led him from court to court in his discouraging effort to raise funds.

And when the expedition was at last fairly launched in its strange course out over unknown waters that thought held him steady amid the mutinous protests of the crew who felt that they were sliding down over the rim of the world never to return:

"Behind him lay the gray Azores,
Behind, the gates of Hercules;
Before him, not the ghost of shores,
Before him only shoreless seas,
The good mate said: 'Now we must pray,
For lo, the very stars are gone!
Brave Adm'r'l, speak; what shall I say?'
'Why, say: Sail on! Sail on! Sail on!'"

—Joaquin Miller.

From the foregoing quotations from the Book of Mormon it appears further that God directed the pioneers, the Pilgrim Fathers and others, who came and settled America subsequent to its discovery. Or as Longfellow expressed it in the Courtship of Miles Standish: "God had sifted three kingdoms to find wheat for this planting."

Reverend C. I. B. Brane, D. D., writing in the Preacher's Helper, expresses a similar thought:

"May it not be that the failures of the Mohammedans and Chinese and Norsemen and Aztecs were providential, God having reserved this land for his own persecuted people? That God settled the American continent with a class of his own selection seems to be a fixed fact in our calendar."

Reverend Brane thinks that God reserved this land to be settled by a class of his own selection. Listen to the Book of Mormon:

"But unto the righteous, it shall be blessed forever. And behold, it is wisdom that this land should be kept as yet from the knowledge of other nations; for behold, many nations would overrun the land, that there would be no place for an inheritance."—2 Nephi 1:15-17.

Concerning the character of the land we have this from the Book of Mormon:

"And inasmuch as ye shall keep my commandments, ye shall prosper, and shall be led to a land of promise; yea, even a land which I have prepared for you; yea, a land which is choice above all other lands."—1 Nephi 1: 54.

"For it is a choice land, saith God unto me, above all other lands; wherefore, I will have all men that dwell thereon, that they shall worship me, saith God."—2 Nephi 7: 31, 32.

"Behold, this is a choice land, and whatsoever nation shall possess it, shall be freed from bondage, and from captivity, and from all other nations under heaven, if they will but serve the God of the land, who is Jesus Christ who hath been manifested by the things which we have written."—Ether 1: 35.

Thus it will be discovered that we believe that America is a choice land, destined to be a land of liberty. So far as we know, Latter Day Saints are the only people who hold that America is a land of Biblical prophecy, known to God in the times of the patriarchs, and described and designated as Joseph's land. (See Genesis 49 and Deuteronomy 33.)

We gather, too, from the foregoing, that our liberty is contingent upon righteousness. That America will continue to be a land of freedom, impregnable to outside assaults, subject to overthrow only if she shall lapse into iniquity. This idea is strikingly in harmony with the words of the martyred president, Abraham Lincoln, in an address before the Young Men's Lyceum, Springfield, Illinois:

"If it ever reach us, it must spring up among us; it cannot come from abroad. If destruction be our lot, we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a nation of freemen we must live through all time or die by suicide."

Having directed in the discovery and colonization of the New World it is not unreasonable to suppose that God would so direct the organization of governments thereon that the liberty promised might be conserved, at least during the good behavior of the occupants. Accordingly we find this statement in another of the standard books of the church:

"Therefore, it is not right that any man should be in bondage one to another. And for this purpose have I established the Constitution of this land, by the hands of wise men whom I raised up unto this very purpose, and redeemed the land by the shedding of blood."—Doctrine and Covenants 98: 10.

Surely the church could not at heart be an enemy to a government founded on a constitution that its God had inspired. The highest patriotism is fostered by the thought that God is back of the Constitution of the land.

The idea that God raised up the wise men who framed the Constitution (the great document that was pronounced by Gladstone to be one of the finest productions ever struck off by the mind of man), is in harmony with the best thought of some of the best writers and speakers. In an address at Burlington, Iowa, February 7, 1910, the Reverend Rollo F. Hurlburt, Ph. D., D. D., said: "Surely no one can read the pages of American history without believing in an all-wise, directing, and overruling providence. It was not mere chance that gave to our infant Republic the great men who so wisely matured it into vigor."

In an address before a joint session of the senate and house of representatives, of the Iowa Legislature, on the occasion of the Lincoln centennial, February 12, 1909, the Honorable Lafayette Young said:

"The Anglo-Saxon conscience swept on and on as irresistible as this great river through the great waves round the shores through all seas. The Creator has ever been watchful of this Republic, the last and greatest effort of man at self-government. Every American shot aimed from any cannon in a century or more has struck an object higher than the one aimed at. Washington could have had no foreknowledge of what was to follow his seven years' war. Beauregard in the gray of that April morning fired on Sumter. His purpose was to establish a southern confederacy. The result was the destruction of slavery. In modern military equipment the man in the casement who aims the gun, does it by mathematics and does not see the object. He is given the elevation and the distance by a range finder. It would seem to me that the country has had a splendid range finder in all the years that have gone."

That the men who met in Philadelphia, in 1787, to draft the Constitution felt that they were under divine direction is evidenced by a remark made by George Washington at the time. In the History of the American People, volume 3, page 71, by Woodrow Wilson this is recorded:

"General Washington had stood in the midst of a little group of delegates, during the anxious first days at Philadelphia, while they waited for commissioners enough to justify them in effecting an organization, and had cried, 'Let us raise a standard to which the wise and honest can repair. The event is in the hands of God.'"

Not all of the wise men that God raised up to establish the Constitution were present at that convention. Some of them were not yet born. At the time when the revelation quoted was given God in his own peculiar way was educating and preparing Abraham Lincoln who later defended the Constitution in the time of its greatest peril. Of Lincoln, Jesse W. Week, his old-time friend, wrote in the Outlook, February 2, 1909:

"The world has never yet been able to account for Mr. Lincoln's amazing ability and intellectual perfection Whence came his marvelous sublimity of thought, the discrimination of his expression, the grandeur of his language? The question has never yet been answered."

Mr. Week's question was answered by Reverend Hurlburt in the address already referred to:

"You professional, you business men here at this time, who started from the humblest beginnings in life, and have pushed your way to the front in the face of the greatest obstacles; you, as you draw yourselves up, proudly say: 'Lincoln was one of our self-made men.' This may all be true. And yet, after all Abraham Lincoln was not self-made. He was God-made."

Lincoln himself in his parting address to his old friends and neighbors, just prior to his first inauguration, said:

"I go to assume a task more difficult than has devolved upon any other man since the days of Washington. He could never have succeeded except for the aid or divine Providence. . . . I feel that I cannot succeed without the same divine blessing that sustained him; and on the same almighty Being I place reliance for support."—Encyclopedia Americana, vol. 9.

Finally we desire to quote most emphatic language from the Book of Doctrine and Covenants:

"Let no man break the laws of the land, for he that keepeth the laws of God hath no need to break the laws of the land; wherefore be subject to the powers that be, until He reigns whose right it is to reign, and subdues all enemies under his feet."—Doctrine and Covenants 58: 5.

That was the law given to the church and accepted by the church as early as 1831. Under its provision all men, from the president of the church down, were required to obey the laws of the land. Those laws are to be honored absolutely until the second coming of Christ himself. That was the idea of the church in an early day, and it is still held and honored by the true church.

As we have stated in a former editorial: "Those men were not tarred and feathered; they were not driven from State to State; their homes were not burned; they were not killed in harmony with the law, but contrary to it. Not they, but their persecutors were opposed to law and order and good citizenship.

Members may have gone astray at times, as was inevitable in any church, but the church itself stood for law and good citizenship. The representative men of the church ever obeyed the law of the land and taught others to do so. Stories to the contrary were circulated by Dame Rumor, of whom Mr. Dooley has truly said, "Twill whisper ye'er virtues an' megaphone the scandals about ye."

ELBERT A. SMITH.

Some Offerings for the New Auditorium

Two incidents passing under by observation recently impress the facts that the Saints are alert to the need of a General Conference Building and that they are ready to sacrifice for it.

In returning from a trip to Los Angeles, I stopped over Sunday at Salt Lake City, speaking at the chapel morning and evening. A good German sister, sixty-five years of age, approached me asking if I would carry to Bishop McGuire a sum of money for the building. On assuring her I should be glad to thus serve her and the church, she untied a knotted handkerchief and poured one hundred and forty-five dollars in gold into my hand. By inquiry on my part, I learned from others that this sister had earned this money washing dishes, scrubbing floors, and washing windows. And this donation is in addition to her tithing. I value highly the splendid interest in and devotion to the church this incident reveals.

From Salt Lake City I went to Denver and remained over the next Sunday. Sister Cowan, representing the Theta Lambda Zigma Class of the Denver Religio, handed me thirty dollars for the conference building; and a little later the secretary of the class gave me $2.30 in addition. The class is an organized one of young men and women of high school age.

If everyone in the church will do as well according to his ability, as has been done in the two instances named, we can soon see much accomplished. In attempting the erection of this building, the church is undertaking the largest task it has yet assumed in the building line; but the evident determination of the Saints and their willingness to subscribe of their means, make bright the hope that in due time the building will appear.

Have you done your part yet?

FREDERICK M. SMITH.

Twenty Thousand New Converts

To some this may seem a large number, but it is not in fact so. It should prove but a beginning of our work in this hastening time. It is a goal set before the missionary forces of the church, but means something more than that, for if they are to accomplish their work, it must be because they can point to what we are actually accomplishing.

First: What are we doing to build up Zion? Not what are the general officers planning, but what are you and I doing?

Second: What are we doing to let our light shine before the world, "a light set on a hill"? The world is prone to judge our religion by the manner of our light.

Twenty thousand new converts with the face of each one turned towards Zion before next General Conference is a goal before not part of the church, but before the whole church, including in this each and every member thereof.

First: by our life to bear a living testimony to the truth of that which we teach.

Second: By our associated efforts to show what we are doing to carry out the message of "all ye who are weary and heavy laden, come unto me, and I will give you rest." In other words to show what the church of God is in relation to industrial and social problems of to-day.

Third: In each home to erect and maintain with earnestness the family altar, that our own family may be kept true to God, and brought up in the worship of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Fourth: Let each man warn his neighbor. There is much that can be done if we will, helping our brothers and sisters. There is more that may be done in the distribution of literature, and in conversation with our neighbors.

There is still more that may be done by our attendance at missionary meetings, as well as the regular services of the church. We cannot do away with the regular church services, for after the missionary effort is over, there is where the newly-inducted children of the kingdom must be cared for. That spiritual home must be maintained. But with this we should also go out to help with our singing, or in what way we can in the near-by mission work even though it be only our attendance to sustain the efforts made by our missionaries.

It is surprising when we consider in how many ways we can let our light "so shine," that others seeing our good work may glorify our Father which is in heaven.

To expect from our small missionary force twenty thousand converts would seem a large task. They must receive the moral, spiritual, and physical support of the church, by our prayers and means. For when the church receives, in an especial measure, the blessings and divine direction of the Spirit of God, our endowment of the Spirit that lighteneth every man that cometh into the world, the task becomes rather one of thanksgiving and praise than of difficulty.

The Spirit of God is moving upon the nations of the earth. His servants are already going forth to prepare the world, and it is our duty to be workers with God and with his messengers. The call is therefore to the whole church:

Before next General Conference twenty thousand converts with the face of each one turned towards Zion.

Slander and Libel

Question. Will you write concerning the law of slander or libel, as given in the laws of the several States of the Union? Some of our members believe a person can tell anything that is true and circulate it over the neighborhood. A person may have committed adultery, or have been a thief, or in other ways a lawbreaker, but I am inclined to believe that it is unlawful to circulate what is true if it is liable to injure the person. Will you give us a little light on this subject?

Answer. There are two vital aspects to the above question. The first consideration of a Christian should be the good of his fellow man. There are circumstances under which that which is not good is a privileged communication. Mere tattling and gossiping should be governed by the principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ. In fact, all of our efforts should be judged by the principles of the gospel; and that will mean asking ourselves something more than, Is it true? We should also ask, Will it help, and will it make for good?

The broad principles suggested by Jesus of "do unto others as you would have them do unto you," would prevent much slander and gossip. Also let us note what the Bible has to say concerning slander (Exodus 23:1; Psalm 15:3), also in the Doctrine and Covenants concerning backbiting. All of these are based more or less on jealousy, and in unwillingness to forgive one another. The Master forgave the woman taken in adultery and told her to go her way and sin no more. We are told in the Old Testament that the soul that sins and repents of his sins, his sins shall be remembered no more against him.

In the law of the land there are several general propositions to be considered. One is that a work of art, or a man in public life must expect to be scrutinized or criticized. Such does not as a rule lay a basis for slander. Also certain privileged communications are recognized; that is, in relating the story to proper officials.

However the question here concerns only the question of truth, and an adequate defense in an action for libel or slander.

It is the general rule of common law, and also included in the constitutions of some of the States, that in all civil actions for libel or slander the truth is a complete defense. This is true in England, Canada, Georgia, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Michigan, Missouri, New York, Pennsylvania, and Rhode Island. If the charge is true, the question of good faith on the part of the defendant does not enter in.

But under some constitutions or statutory provisions, the defendant cannot exempt himself simply by showing the truth, but must go farther and show that he acted with good motives and for justifiable ends. This is the case in Delaware, Florida, Louisiana, Nebraska, West Virginia, and Quebec.

Also there are a number of cases from Massachusetts, to the effect that the truth is a complete defense unless malice be shown. Of course in all cases the burden of proof is upon the defendant to show the truth of the charge.

The above applies, however, only to civil cases. When it comes to criminal prosecutions, the rule is reversed. "The greater the truth the greater the libel," evidently refers to the case of criminal prosecution. The truth is no defense whatever on a libel or slander charge in an indictment. But the prosecution is founded on the idea that a libel or slander tends towards a breach of the peace, which effect is not altered by the truth of the publication.

There are some jurisdictions under statutory or constitutional provision, in which the truth is admissible in criminal prosecution, and will be a defense if the publication was made for the public good, or with good motives and for justifiable ends. Such cases are found in Canada, as well as in Iowa, Louisiana, Massachusetts, and New York.

The question of the chastity of a woman is very often the basis of prosecution for criminal libel or slander. The question of conspiracy may also enter in. Defamation of a family or class comes under the criminal statute in several States.

Some reason for the law can be seen upon consideration. It is not on so high a plane as the law of the gospel, nor would we expect it to be so. Consciousness is also essentially remedial. Because of public notoriety one restriction exists on immoral conduct. There are also communications which become necessary for the public interest, or the administration of justice. So it is invariably the rule that communication to a proper officer of the law, or in the case of a church offense, to the proper officer of the church is privileged. Also that the discussion of a trial in the civil courts, and the findings of the judiciary are as a rule proper elements of public report.

The malicious spreading of a slander is liable to get one into trouble; especially if it is part of a conspiracy, which becomes criminal, or if it is forbidden by the criminal law of the State because of its liability to bring about a breach of the peace.

But again we may quote that, "he who keeps the law of God has no need to break the law of the land." A sincere desire to help our brother or sister, to work for true reformation, will give us a safe answer, still protecting the interests of the body and society.

Transvaal

Transvaal, in which is located Johannesburg, in South Africa, and from which our missionaries will do their initial labor, is an inland province of the union of South Africa, between the Vaal and Limpopo Rivers. The area is about 111,196 square miles.

The highest part of the country lies west of the Drakensberg, a mountain range and inner rim of the great tableland of South Africa. The eastern slope of these mountains is quite precipitous, and range between 7,000 and 8,725 feet. The table-land to the west ranges from 4,000 feet at the extreme east up to 5,400 feet at Johannesburg; and from 5,000 to 6,400 feet to the east of Johannesburg. The two highest veldts extending east to west 120 miles, and north to south 100 miles consist of rolling grass downs, and are absolutely treeless except where, as at Johannesburg, plantations have been made by man.

The country is more or less hilly, and is formed of a number of different veldts. The plateau land called the high veldt covers about 34,000 square miles, as distinguished from the other high veldts.

The Bankan veldts is much broken up, and is rich in romantic scenery. It covers about 20,000 square miles, and has an average breadth of 40 miles. In places between Mafeking and Johannesburg the descent is in terrace-like steps, each step marked by a line of hills. In other places there is a gradual slope, while elsewhere it is abrupt.

The inhabitants on April 17, 1914, when the first complete census was taken were nearly 1,270,000 or about eleven and one third persons per square mile. Of these, a little over 20 per cent were European or white. The colored population is principally aboriginal, these constituting about 74 per cent of the whole population, while a little over 35,500 were mixed races. Sixty per cent of the whites were males, and the greater part of the whites were British or Dutch; the percentage of all others being but 8.6. The British predominate at Johannesburg, and in Pretoria, and other towns on the Rand. The Dutch predominate in the rest of the province.

Most of the railroads are owned by the state, and all lines converge on Johannesburg. Distances are stated in terms of miles from that city. Cape Town, where our missionaries will land, is 957 miles via Kemberly from Johannesburg.

Subjects Being Discussed

Sugar Prices Have Reached the Top

According to Department of Justice consumption of sugar has about reached the high mark, and prices are not apt to go higher. There is some talk of putting an embargo on export of sugar, but this is said to be unwise, in view of the fact that some of the countries to which we ship sugar have merchandise that we need. The prevailing high prices for our national sweet have attracted imports from Java, Argentine, and Peru. Nonessential industries are using about fifteen per cent of the supply.

This is the best day the world has ever seen. To-morrow will be better.—R. A. Campbell.

The Gospel Restored to the Islands of the Sea

BY PAIA A METUAARO

A sermon by a native South Sea Islander, at Lamoni, Iowa, June 3, 1920. Interpreted and introduced by Elder Charles May and reported by Estella Wight.

Introduction by Charles May

I wish to say a few things about Paia and his people before he speaks to you to-night. In introducing him I wish to tell you how to pronounce his name correctly. Someone called him A-pie, another called him Pie-a, and we even heard him called A-pie-eater last night. When he was told that the one who called him a-pie-eater was considered a great chicken eater he wanted to know if it was any worse to be a great pie eater than a great chicken eater. Paia's full name is Paia a Metuaaro. A great many people are mistaken in the last part of our brother's name, "Metuaaro," thinking that our brother is a son of Metuaore the former native bishop of the island mission. Note the difference in their names, M-e-t-u-a-a-r-o and M-e-t-u-a-o-r-e. Paia is in no wise related to Metuaore who came here several years ago to the General Conference. Brother Paia is the first full-blooded native of the South Sea Islands to come to a General Conference in America.

Brother Paia is a good type of a native. The islands from which he came are about thirty-six hundred miles south and west of California. It takes about twelve to fourteen days to make the voyage, and from the time you lose sight of America until you reach the islands you are out of the sight of land.

Paia is the assistant governor of his home island, the island of Manihi. He was chosen at one time to be governor, but his heart was in this work and he desired to be free to do missionary work in the islands, and therefore refused to accept the office even though elected. They honored him by electing him assistant governor. We have several governors from among our native brethren serving in that capacity over several islands of the group from which our brother comes.

We are indeed grateful to know that our people are held in such great esteem and are so highly respected among those who know them, and have been shown many favors by those who are and have been the general French officials over them. The native people are a very intelligent people.

Paia is a big man. I do not mean in stature only. He weighs three hundred pounds, but he is just as big in influence, and the South Sea Island people are awaiting his return. They realize that he will carry a great message from the late General Conference, and I believe that Brother Paia will carry a message to them that will fill their hearts with joy. Since General Conference we have had a most enjoyable trip throughout the East. After leaving Independence we went to Kirtland, and from there to Hill Cumorah and on our return visited Nauvoo. During this trip we were permitted to visit over twenty branches.

Let me say further that Paia is a man consecrated to this great work and believes in keeping the temporal law. He is a great pearl-shell diver. He can dive down one hundred and forty-four feet in the sea and is considered one of their good divers. A few years ago he brought up a pearl worth $3,500. As soon as he got his money he went to the Bishop's agent and gave him $350 tithing and sent $100 to the Order of Enoch for his wife.

So I take pleasure in introducing Paia to you, and ask for him your undivided faith, attention, and prayers.

The Sermon by Paia a Metuaaro

In the first part of my remarks to-night I wish to say to all those who are gathered under this roof, greeting unto you in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

I am somewhat troubled in heart to-night because to-morrow we shall separate, and I shall never perhaps be permitted to stand before you again and speak to you, as we shall leave to-morrow. By reason of this I am somewhat troubled in mind at this time.

Since I have been asked to address you this evening there has been no other basic thought presented to me than that of the restoration of the gospel in these the last days, and my reason for presenting this theme is simply that we are all bound together in the great name of Christ, and we have become one through the gospel of Jesus Christ, as revealed in these latter days by which we have been made children of the seed of Abraham.

I do not intend to present to you to-night anything regarding faith, repentance, baptism, the laying on of hands, resurrection, or eternal judgment. This is the great land where the gospel was restored, and I am assured that you have heard these things many times; for we find in your midst in this land the Presidency and the Twelve Apostles, the seventies and others whom God has chosen who are pillars of the church, and you have heard from them many times these various subjects presented, and I am satisfied that the majority of those who are assembled together in this one place to-night are members of the church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

You are a people who have faith in the great foundation principles of the gospel of Christ in his church. You are aware of this fact that it is the only means—the only way by which people can become associated together in his name or affiliated with his church, that is, by having faith in God, repenting of their sins, and being baptized and confirmed into the great church of Christ on earth, and because I am one witness from the islands of the sea, one of a people whom you very seldom see, I have a desire to-night to tell you something about our people and the coming forth of the gospel to us in these latter times; for great rejoicing exists in the midst of my people by reason of the restoration of the gospel of Christ which was brought to us in these last days.

Traditions of the Natives

In the first place, before the Bible was brought to us, we did not know how to worship the true God. They did not know that there was a God who created the heavens and the earth, and by reason of the many traditions that were taught to them in former times they were somewhat confused as to the system of worship, and were thus in the dark. I wish to tell you of some of these traditions.

One of them was that in the beginning there were some great and powerful men who created the earth and who manifested great power in the midst of their work. They also believed through traditions that the way the islands became peopled in the beginning was that the people came out of some large rocks. Others believe that the people of the islands came from some far-off land and drifted to the islands of the sea, but they knew not from whence they came.

Some people believed that the islands were inhabited in the first place by people who were brought there upon the backs of large fish.

By reason of the many traditions the people of the islands were in the dark and failed to worship the true God, and not knowing of him, the God of heaven, they made idols with their own hands out of stone and out of wood and worshiped them in the place of the living God.

I rejoice to-night that I am living in the time of God's saving power, and that he is no respecter of persons; that it matters not under what flag we may be or of what nation, that it is through the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ we are brought together and made one in his name.

I wish to express my gratitude for one thing, and that is that there were certain missionaries sent from various denominations to us who brought the Bible, and we were taught by them that we should worship the God who made the heavens and the earth and the waters of the great deep. I am very thankful for the first of the missionaries who were sent before the truth was brought in its fullness.

By reading the Bible we were informed of the God who created the heavens and the earth. The light dawned upon those who read it that there was a great power which created the heavens and the earth. Through these things that were taught by the early missionaries the people became affiliated with the various faiths and strove to worship God according to that light received by them.

I desire to tell you of the nature of some of the teachings that were presented by those who came among us before the true gospel reached us. They believed that the Bible contained all the word of God, and there was nothing outside of the Bible that could be called the gospel of Jesus Christ. We were told that the gifts of the Holy Spirit were no longer to be found among the children of men, that they were done away with and no longer needed, and thus we were taught things that were not in harmony with the teachings of the Bible.

Rejoicing Over True Gospel

But how greatly we rejoiced when we heard the beautiful sound of the gospel which came in fulfillment of the statement found in the fourteenth chapter of Revelation wherein we are told of the angel flying in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach to them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people.

There were many, many points of the gospel upon which the people of the islands were confused, and when I was sent forth to carry the gospel to the people there were many questions asked me concerning the gospel. They would tell me that the gospel was simply the words of God which were found within the lids of the Bible from the first of Genesis to the last of Revelation, and they would then make the statement that nothing should be added to or taken therefrom. We were told by others that the gospel was simply the Bible accompanied by the moral acts and deeds of men, and that that was all the gospel consisted of.

I would always answer these question by calling their attention to the statement of Paul, "For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation," and that we do not look upon the words of the Bible, and the Book of Mormon, and the revelations found in the Doctrine and Covenants as being all of the gospel of Jesus Christ, but that we realized that the power of Jesus Christ must be associated with the word.

God Not Dumb

We have also realized that God was not dumb throughout the ages that he would not speak, but he gave his revelations to the children of men throughout the various periods of time. Paul states plainly in his writings in the Bible that the gospel comes not in word only, but also in power, in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance. As we read this sacred word concerning God's dealings with his people, we find there was no time when God had a church on earth when he failed to give to that church his Spirit that they might be led and directed by his great power. It was received when Jesus was here upon earth and after he left his apostles. He told his people whenever he had performed his work that he would depart, but that he would send his Comforter, and that it would guide them into all truth and that it would bring to their minds a remembrance of those things that he had taught them.

We read in the Bible in the twelfth chapter of Revelation that it was made known to John that the power was taken up into heaven, and that it no longer continued on earth; the power that was manifested among his people when he was here.

We are informed in the Doctrine and Covenants that at the time when this gospel was to be brought forth that he would choose his servants and that he would give them power to go forth and to do that work which should be done in his name, and thus God commanded in the first revelation found in the Book of Covenants, and gave them power that they might establish his work here.

We have been enabled to recognize as the people of God that the gospel of Jesus Christ must have associated with it that great power in order that his servants might act in his name, so that these ordinances may be recognized of him according to the power that he gives to them who administer these ordinances among men.

I wish to tell you to-night of the great joy and rejoicing that is in my heart that God remembered the people upon the islands of the sea, and that he listened to their prayers, remembering what he had said in the very first revelation in the Doctrine and Covenants and the first verse which says.

"Hearken, O ye people of my church, saith the voice of him who dwells on high, and whose eyes are upon all men; yea, verily I say, Hearken ye people from afar, and ye that are upon the isles of the sea, listen together; for verily the voice of the Lord is unto all men, and there is none to escape, and there is no eye that shall not see, neither ear that shall not hear, neither heart that shall not be penetrated; and the rebellious shall be pierced with much sorrow, for their iniquities shall be spoken from the housetops, and their secret acts shall be revealed."

A Witness for the Prophecies

I am standing before you to-night as a witness, not that you should simply hear these words, but that you might also realize the fulfillment of this statement showing that we were to be remembered by the Lord. I am here to-night as a witness that this prophecy has been fulfilled and that the gospel has been heard in the islands of the sea, and that we have listened together and have become one in this great work. By reason of the fulfillment of part of these words we should rejoice, and we should also rejoice that the rest will be fulfilled and that the gospel will continue to go forth. It matters not what men or nations may do by way of persecution, this gospel will continue to go forth and will reach the nations of the earth in fulfillment of the rest of this prophecy wherein we are told that all eyes shall see and all ears shall hear.

We are sure of these things which are in harmony with the statement of Daniel concerning the little stone that was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that this gospel is to be preached until the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the deep. As this stone rolls forth it will break in pieces the various things that were not builded by the Lord, and the power of the gospel shall be manifested among the children of men in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance. The fulfilment of the many prophecies of old is not all that we shall behold, but the great endowment shall be poured out upon his people. They shall go forth with greater power, and the gospel shall be carried to the nations of the earth with greater power than ever before.

I wish to tell you of some of the things that have transpired in the islands of the sea in the coming forth of the gospel to us. You have been told by others who were associated with us in the gospel in years past, and there are those living to-day who are witnesses to these things which I shall present. There were many wonders and miracles done by those who carried this gospel to us in the first place, which evidenced to those then living that the gospel came not in word only but with power and with the Holy Ghost, and with much assurance. Those who beheld the many miracles and great power of God in the early days of the church continued as pillars in the church, and now their posterity are as pillars in the church, and we are enjoying the same power of God which was given to our forefathers in times past.

The Apostasy in the Islands

There was a time when a great number of our brethren were overcome with darkness and trouble, and during that period of time they were cut off from the church, but they did not apostatize. They continued faithful to the teachings of this church, and although there were many of the missionaries of the different denominations who tried to get them to join with them, by reason of the great knowledge they had of the truthfulness of this church they did not turn away from it, but returned to the church of Jesus Christ and were glad to become affiliated again with it.

During this period of darkness the church continued to grow, and even though it was a time of trouble, those who were his servants labored diligently to build up the work of the Lord, and it continued to grow until the present time when we have grown and have attained that standard of spirituality that has never been reached before.

I wish to express to you my great joy concerning the last conference; for there were many of the young people, young men and women who were chosen to go to the islands of the sea to labor in the interest of my people there. When I was chosen as a delegate to this conference that which was first in their hearts was for me to come here with the request that there might be sent to us more missionaries to assist in our land in building up the kingdom of God, and that was my purpose in coming and my message and since reaching this land I have sought to prevail upon the officers of the church to send help.

The Journey

I wish to tell you something about my journey to this land from the time I left my home to the present time that I am standing before you to-night. From the time that I first landed on American soil and met with my dear brethren, the Saints in this land, I have been welcomed, and have received many favors from you.

I have rejoiced together with you and wish to say that I have enjoyed the Spirit of God in meeting the Saints from place to place until the time I reached General Conference. Great has been my joy in meeting with the brethren here in this great land.

From the time that we, my brother and I, have been associated together we have traveled through the many branches and places, and where we have gone we have rejoiced because of the great receptions given us and the Spirit of God that has been received by all in this place and in that place.

I have much that I would like to say to you to-night. I am too filled with words to speak, but I know that my time has expired, and I do not wish to weary you at this time.

Before I close I wish to tell you that the many things that I have heard, the many things that I have seen, and the many things that have filled my heart with rejoicing shall continue to be with me, and I shall carry them to my people, and I shall endeavor to encourage them in the performance of their duties.

I also wish to tell you before I finish that from the time when we shall separate to-morrow, I shall continue to work in this church unto the end, and if we are not permitted to meet again in the flesh, I trust that God will bless you and that he will bless me that we may be permitted to meet again in the paradise of God. I desire that you may continue faithful and that I may also remain faithful in the work of Christ. This is my prayer and my desire in the name of Christ our Redeemer. Amen.

Warning the World

BY T. W. WILLIAMS

A call to every ordained man, that our work may go on as never before.

There is urgent need for a revival of the old-time missionary spirit. One has but to revert to the New Testament and study the life of Jesus, and John, and the apostles, to be impressed with the intense missionary fervor of these pioneer souls.

It is an inspiration to review the history of the early years of the Restoration period. The intense devotion, the unselfish consecration, the engaging zeal, the absorbing passion to save souls, manifested by the early elders of the church is at once a stimulus and a command to follow suit.

The passing years have witnessed a lagging in missionary purpose—a growing indifference, a manifest apathy, a tendency to self-sufficiency—an absorption in other things. All too many of our people seem to think that we are so near the end that there is little more to do except prepare to meet the Savior. No greater calamity could befall the church than to have this idea become general.

A clarion call comes to every man who has been intrusted with the priesthood. This call is urgent. It is imperative. No man can afford to ignore it.

The Word of God

Men of God! Give heed to the voice of God to you to-day.

O ye that embark in the service of God see that ye serve him with all your heart, might, mind, and strength, that ye may stand blameless before God at the last day.

Ye who have given your names to go forth to proclaim my gospel and to prune my vineyard: Behold, I say unto you, that it is my will that you should go forth and not tarry, neither be idle, but labor with your might, lifting up your voices as with the sound of a trumpet, proclaiming the truth according to the revelations and commandments which I have given you.

The world is ripening in iniquity and it must needs be that the children of men be stirred up to repentance, both the Gentiles and the House of Israel.

Behold, the field is white already to harvest. Whoso desireth to reap let him thrust in his sickle with his might and reap while the day lasts that he may treasure up for his soul everlasting salvation in the kingdom of God.

You are called to cry repentance unto the people. And if it so be that you should labor all your days in crying re-penance unto the people and bring save it be one soul unto me, how great shall be your joy with him in the kingdom of your Father.

He that thrusteth in his sickle with his might the same layeth up in store that he perish not but bringeth salvation to his own soul.

Faith, hope, charity, and love, with an eye single to the glory of God, qualify him for the work.

If ye are faithful ye shall be laden with many sheaves and crowned with honor, glory, and immortality, and eternal life.

I give unto you a commandment that every man, both elder, priest, teacher, and also member, go to with his might with the labor of his hands to prepare and accomplish the things which I have commanded.

Let your preaching be the warning voice every man to his neighbor in mildness and in meekness. And go ye forth among the wicked. Be ye clean that bear the vessels of the Lord.

To the elders: Take with you those who are ordained unto the lesser priesthood and send them before you to make appointments and to prepare the way, and to fill appointments that you yourselves are not able to fill. Behold, this is the way that mine apostles in ancient days built up my church unto me.

And, behold, the high priests should travel, and also the elders, and also the lesser priests.

Priesthood Implies Service

Priesthood implies service. This is what it was instituted for. Conferment of priesthood is not an honor. It is a responsibility. It is God's call to work. It is the right to serve. Honor comes at the end, not the beginning, of our ministerial race.

No greater trust can come to any man than the right to represent Jesus Christ. We must answer for the way in which we fulfill this trust.

God has called us to warn the world to preach the gospel as a witness—to carry the glad tidings to the peoples of the earth—to warn our neighbors—to win the world to Jesus Christ.

The first and paramount consideration for everyone holding the priesthood is the magnifying of his office. A man who has accepted ordination thereupon forswears worldly ambition and worldly interests and obligates himself to consecrate his life to the establishment of the kingdom of God. His very position suggests a complete and unreserved dedication to the work he is called to do. Jesus has well said, "Seek not the things of this world; but seek ye first to build up the kingdom of God, and establish his righteousness."

No Furloughs Granted

There are no furloughs granted. You cannot get a leave of absence. It is impossible for you to lay off your authority. Priesthood responsibility extends into eternity. There is no honorable discharge. Forfeiture comes through failure to magnify.

God wants every man holding the priesthood to magnify his office. Those who are called to preach should lift up a warning voice. High priests, elders, or priests, not engaged in local work should devote every possible moment to missionary effort distributing tracts, making new openings holding cottage prayer meetings, preaching on the streets and in available buildings, and pushing in every available means the missionary work.

Those who do this, with an eye single to the glory of God and with love unsullied for the people with whom they minister, will be blessed of God. Those who will not magnify their office and are careless and indifferent to the call of the hour will lose the Spirit and fall into darkness.

This is a day of sacrifice and service. Sacrifice is not foregoing pleasure or ease—this is imperative. Sacrifice is going without actual needs in order to further the kingdom of God. It is the privilege of all to forego every unnecessary purpose; to renounce the alluring pleasures of the world and the passing diversions and consecrate the means thus saved to further the missionary work of the church. It is a glorious opportunity to go farther and forego some things which it would seem we need in order that the missionary arm of the church may be farther strengthened.

A Wonderful Opportunity

What a wonderful opportunity is now offered the members of this church to give a manifestation of self-denial commensurate with the needs of the hour! What a glorious heritage of blessing is ours if we only qualify; to qualify we must crucify self; we must renounce the world; we must give up everything and follow Jesus.

Have you the missionary spirit? Are you doing all you can to warn your friends, your associates, your shopmates of the glorious truths of this gospel of Jesus Christ? If not, why not? Do not be ashamed of Christ. He is not ashamed of you. He has more occasion to be ashamed of you than you have to be ashamed of him. Do not be fearful of your ability for if you make the effort God will supply and give strength commensurate with your need. Trust him!

Let the members of the church as one man resolve that this conference period, 1920-1921, shall be the greatest missionary period in this dispensation. Let us each and every one set to with our might in the Spirit of Jesus Christ to win the world to him.

BY A. B. PHILLIPS

It is generally believed that civilization attained its highest development in Peru, Mexico, Central America, and a few neighboring states. Many more than the three millions who inhabit Peru to-day occupied this empire of the Incas in the days of its supremacy. From the best available evidence we trace the Book of Mormon descriptions in these localities, and find that they correspond in general features to that which has been discovered there. The remains are so numerous and of such a varied character that a detailed account would require from ten to thirty volumes, comprising anywhere from six to twenty thousand pages, according to the completeness of the work; and even then many items would have to be omitted. The opportunity for future exploration covers vast territories that have never been penetrated in this age. It is believed that Yucatan and Guatemala, which are partly covered with dense and almost impenetrable forests, contain many remarkable ruins of great interest and significance. It is near these forests that the wonderful remains of Palenque and Copan have been discovered.

Wonderful Old Temples

It is significant of the culture of these people that they left enduring evidence of their greatness in some of the most remarkable structures that were ever built by any ancient nation. Not only were many of their buildings of enormous size and splendid construction, but their proportions, designs, and sculptures in many instances are of such interest that they excite the admiration of the connoisseur as well as of the novice. Their remarkable designs, which must have been doubly notable when they were new, are plentifully found among the ruins, and compare favorably with those of our best modern constructors.

One of these, the Si An Temple, is located on the Muchi River in the North Coast valleys of Peru. This sacred edifice is eight hundred feet in length, four hundred and seventy feet in width, and two hundred feet in height. The entire building covers an area of seven acres. One can scarcely imagine the vast congregation that such a building would contain. The great temple of Mexico shows a construction of about three hundred and seventy-five feet long, three hundred feet broad, and nearly ninety feet high. Though much smaller than the one previously mentioned, yet it covers two and one half acres.

As nearly as can be ascertained this temple was built by the Nephites early in their national history. Its distinctive construction remarkably conforms to the Book of Mormon

The number and character of the temple ruins found in America indicate the deeply religious traits of the people who built them, and also denote a well-established governmental system that must have been very extensive and highly developed. From the Book of Mormon we learn that the construction of a temple was one of the early achievements of the Nephites. This building was perhaps more fully characteristic of Israelitish impressions than might be expected in the following centuries when individualistic concepts were more fully developed and crystalized or molded into distinctive national forms.

Some of these temples were built upon magnificent terraces, and were reached by a series of steps that were set in the terraces. These terraces were made sufficiently broad at the top to give room for the temple and its approaches, and as a place of worship the general appearance was of a character to inspire reverence and awe in the beholder.

RESTORATION OF GREAT TEMPLE

description of a temple that was similar to the Temple of Solomon in the manner of its construction, but was not built of so many precious things. But whether or not this was a later temple than is mentioned is perhaps not very material, so far as the character of the building is concerned. In his work on Mexico, page 39, Brantz Mayer gives us a picture of this remarkable temple with a restoration of certain portions and we are presenting a copy with this article. The striking similarity to the Book of Mormon description is notable.

The Copan Temple, so called because it is located on the Copan River, in its present ruined state is eight hundred and nine feet long, six hundred and twenty-four feet wide, and the ruins still rise ninety feet in height. It is protected by a wall one thousand six hundred feet long and nine hundred feet across at the end, with a thickness of about twenty-five feet. There are several other temples that also challenge our attention, but it must suffice to state that the Pyramid of Cholula is considerably larger than any of the pyramids of Egypt, and is crowned at the top with an elaborately ornamented temple. The base of this great American pyramid is one thousand four hundred and forty feet long, or exactly three elevenths of a mile. Only a people of great intelligence, ambition, and skill could have performed these marvelous miracles in stone and sculpture.

Ancient Roads and Aqueducts

Aside from the great cities and buildings, many other constructions that the aboriginal Americans have left for our astonished contemplation are truly remarkable. Among these may be mentioned the public roads, some of which reveal such marvelous skill on the part of their constructors that they would be considered a credit if they had been built by our best modern experts. Some of these roads are many hundreds of miles in extent, and give evidence of having been used to connect the important cities and other parts of a large and prosperous empire or other cohesive form of government. They were constructed of paving, or crushed stone mixed with lime and bituminous cement, and the sides were reinforced with walls six feet in thickness. The roads were usually from twenty to twenty-five feet in width, and sometimes were cut through solid rock, extending in this way at times for several miles. In other places they passed over rivers, marshes, and great mountain chasms by means of bridges or fillings of masonry.

One of these roads extends from Quito to Chile, a distance of about two thousand miles. Another road connects with this at Cuzco, running to the coast and extending northward to the equator. It is now known that thousands of miles of these roads were built, and it is believed that they were

CRIME WAVE AFFECTING MOVING PICTURE STANDARDS

Is the crime wave also submerging shadowland?

An appalling slump in the moral standards of the movie world would certainly seem to be indicated by an analysis of the 68 chief films (excluding serials) shown to the trade in the last four weeks.

In these stories—as important features of the plots—there were 25 murders, 9 suicides, 13 seductions, 6 robberies. (Of these productions, it may be noted, 11 were British, 45 American, and 12 Continental.)

Problems of sex and matrimony figure even more prominently in this lurid list of kinema "attractions." Marriage is now the starting point of the hero's adventures and misfortunes rather than the glad climax of his career.

Sinister is the sound of the wedding bells with which the play opens; the way to lasting joy lies through the portals of the divorce court.

Plots mainly consist of the heroine's unequal struggle to be happy though married—until the timely death of her husband sets her free to sink, with a girlish sigh of coy content, into the arms of her true lover.

Nine husbands or wives found relief through the deaths of their partners in the films under review. In one case the lover gallantly murdered the husband of the woman he adored, escaping the gallows through the perjury of his own wife whom he afterwards divorced. In another play the superfluous husband tactfully committed suicide.

Intimate phases of sex relationship are discussed with sensational frankness in the eloquent language of pose and glance and gesture. In American films particularly there is, constructed long before the time of the Incan rulers, and were in use for many centuries. The Incan dynasty, it is believed, extended back to approximately a thousand years ago. Of its people Baldwin says: "It is now understood that they represent only the last period in the history of a civilization which began much farther back in the past."

Nearly a century ago the Book of Mormon was found to contain this startling information, explaining that "There were many highways cast up, and many roads made, which led from city to city, and from land to land." The record found in this book has now been most remarkably confirmed. Actual knowledge of the facts is here plainly indicated before this knowledge had been corroborated to us by archaeological research. At the time the Book of Mormon was discovered we would have thought it highly improbable and even absurd that a people anciently possessed this continent whose constructions are in some respects equal to those of any ancient civilization in the Eastern World. Remains of ancient roads exist also in Florida.

Of little less wonderment than the public roads are the remarkable aqueducts that the ancient people of this land were able to build. Some of these were several hundred miles long, and Baldwin mentions one that extends a distance of four hundred and fifty miles. It is a surprising fact that there are several of these aqueducts which are in actual use at the present day, with such thoroughness did these prehistoric laborers perform their tasks. They were built of hewn stone and cement, and appear to have been used to convey water to their cities, and in some instances may have been employed for irrigation purposes.

often, an abandonment of reserves on the most delicate subjects that is startling even to the toughened London play-goer, and must be astonishing, in its revelations, to the maiden at the village movies.

One need not be a prude or a crank to deprecate a tendency that is making the kinema programme resemble the Newgate calendar.

There is no reason to suppose that familiarity with the Headless Murderer of Hangman's Gulch impels the office boy to appropriate the petty cash, or that the distribution of glad eyes by film vampires is a menace to the sanctity of British homes. But, quite apart from moral questions, sordid crimes, and morbid sex situations do not, broadly speaking, make good entertainment.

The kinema should be a place of honest laughter and pure sentiment, not a laboratory for the dissection of sinful souls.—The Weekly Dispatch, London, England, May 23, 1920.

Mrs. Guy Blanchard, in charge of the motion picture department of the federation [General Federation of Women's clubs], spoke urgently for legislation for better films.

"The sex plays which are being shown universally are directly responsible for much of the juvenile delinquency of to-day," she said. "Judge Victor P. Arnold of the juvenile court in Chicago has remarked that he can trace a direct connection between the showing of certain types of film and a wave of juvenile crime which fills his court.

"You have found that you can expect no help from the newspapers because they are choked off by their financial interest in the movie advertising. But you can agitate the matter strongly by word of mouth.

"There is no industry which takes so much of the public's money and makes so small a return to the public good as the motion picture industry."—Des Moines Register, June 19, 1920.

THE BRITISH PLANS IN PALESTINE

[The following from the Christian Science Monitor's European News Office, under date of June 13, from London, is of special interest to our readers. The government of Palestine has been rather temporary but with this assignment will no doubt attain a most satisfactory stability.—EDITORS.]

Herbert Samuel, recently appointed High Commissioner for Palestine, was invested by King George on Saturday with the the insignia of the Grand Cross of the Order of the British Empire. Sir Herbert, as he now is, has made an important announcement to the press on his future work in Palestine. His intentions comprise complete religious liberty, civilian administration for the country, higher ranks to consist of British officials, other ranks to be open to local population irrespective of creed; economic development of country to be actively promoted and order firmly enforced.

The general ideas which will be followed by the new administration in Palestine were announced to-day by Sir Herbert Samuel, High Commissioner for Palestine. Sir Herbert said:

"Complete religious liberty will be maintained in Palestine. Places sacred to the great religions will remain in control of the adherents of those religions. Civilian administration for the country will be established immediately. The higher ranks will consist of British officials of ability and experience. The other ranks will be open to the local population, irrespective of creed. Order will be firmly enforced. The economic development of the country will be actively promoted.

"In accordance with the decision of the allied and associated powers, measures will be adopted to reconstruct the Jewish national home in Palestine. The yearnings of the Jewish people for 2,000 years, of which the modern Zionist Movement is the latest expression, will at last be realized. The steps taken to this end will be consistent with scrupulous respect for the rights of the present non-Jewish inhabitants.

"The country has room for a larger population than it now contains, and Palestine, properly provided with roads, railways, harbors, and electric power, with the soil more highly cultivated, the waste lands reclaimed, forests planted, and malaria extirpated, with town and village industries encouraged, can maintain a large additional population, not only without hurt, but on the contrary, with much advantage to the present inhabitants.

"Immigration of the character that is needed will be admitted into the country in proportion as its development allows employment to be found. Above all, educational and spiritual influences will be fostered in the hope that once more there may radiate from the Holy Land the moral forces of service to mankind. These are the purposes which, under superintendence of the League of Nations, the British Government in the exercise of its mandate for Palestine will seek to promote."

PALESTINE'S VESTED INTERESTS

Some ten years ago G. K. Chesterton, the brilliant essayist, observed that "we would no more dream of matching Australian soldiers against German than Tasmanian art against French." It is probable that Mr. Chesterton wished his sentence out of print many times between 1915 and 1918. While we may accept his generalization that new countries seldom produce anything notable—his mistake was in choosing fighting qualities for one of his examples—he cannot be permitted to include governmental processes and social experiments in his dividing the new from the old countries. It has been from New Zealand and Australia, after our own western states of the American union, that the world has received its novel contributions to the science of practical government in the last generation. Now another country is about to enter the lists with real experiments in a new social and political order. This country is Palestine, as the Zionists of America and the European Jews propose to conduct it.

It will be hard for many to understand why the American Zionists, numbering as they do some of the most successful Jewish business men of this country, can view complacently any "socialistic" experiment. And yet the executive secretary of the Zionist Organization of America, Mr. Jacob de Haas, proposes that public ownership of land, a cooperative commonwealth, and equal rights for all be the chief principles in the social program for the new Palestine. The people to whom he makes the suggestion are the honorary president of the organization, Supreme Court Justice Louis Brandeis, and the members of the American delegation to the Zionist conference in London July 4. Their names include those of Nathan Straus, Professor Felix Frankfurter, and Captain Abraham Tulin. These people have never been "socialists."

Most Americans will recognize the wisdom of Mr. de Haas' statement that "the Zionists are not going to be satisfied with a Palestine or land of Israel which will be a mere duplicate of the numerous small states of Europe or South America." To the end that it shall be a different country the platform of the Pittsburgh conference of American Zionists will be presented to the international gathering. To prevent land speculation and "unearned increment," the Zionists will have public ownership of land; to promote community feeling they will have cooperative effort wherever possible; and the only thing they borrow is the American ideal of "equality before the law."

It is quite possible that most of us would follow in the same course the Zionists are outlining, if we had at our disposal a whole country to make over as we chose. Changes come slowly in an old country because vested interests are protected, not only by those in whom they are vested, but by the public as well. In new countries what the old peoples would do if it were not for the vested interests can be done speedily.

But the amazing thing about the Zionist proposal, and the encouraging one for the old and established countries, is the fact that these measures are to be tried out in one of the oldest countries on earth. It will be interesting to see what the Zionists do with the vested interests of Palestine, some of which must have remained vested for hundreds of years.—Des Moines (Iowa) Register.

A FRANK COMMENT FROM WISCONSIN

The Wisconsin Magazine of History for June contains the following, which we quote in full.

Heman H. Smith, assistant church historian of the Reorganized Church of Latter Day Saints, visited Madison in March to consult the Society's collections on Mormonism. Mr. Smith is a great-grandson of Joseph Smith, the founder of the Mormon Church; also of Lyman Wight, one of Smith's apostles, who headed a Mormon settlement in La Crosse County for a time. From there Wight went to the Texas frontier and made himself the leader of a faction of the Saints in the endeavor to plant the headquarters of the Church in the Lone Star State.

The connection of the Reorganized Church with Wisconsin has always been intimate. The church was founded chiefly by Wisconsin men, and the initial steps in this connection took place in Iowa County. The most spectacular Mormon activities in Wisconsin were those connected with the Strangite colony of Voree in eastern Walworth County; but the far-reaching consequences of the work of the little group of founders of the Reorganized Church far outweigh all the activities of the Strangite group. The latter is now but a memory (and even this to but few people), while the Reorganized Church is a vigorous organization with upwards of one hundred thousand members, several thousand of whom live in Wisconsin.

In contrast to the Utah branch of Mormonism and to the church in the lifetime of Prophet Smith, the Reorganized Saints have always lived on terms of harmony with their Gentile neighbors. Asked the reason, in his opinion, for this contrast the present church historian stated that he supposed it to be due to their attitude with respect to land holding. The Reorganized Saints have carefully eschewed the earlier doctrine that God had given them certain lands, from which non-believers might properly be expelled by violence. We venture to add as contributory causes of the peaceful career of the Reorganized Saints their abstention from politics and from plural marriage. We think the career of Strang at Voree and (later) at Beaver Island illustrates this statement. At Voree he refrained from building up a political organization and condemned polygamy and spiritual wifery as abominations in the sight of the Lord. He likewise lived on terms of peace and harmony with the surrounding Gentile community. At Beaver Island he involved himself deeply in local and state politics (he even aspired at one time to determine a presidential election) and almost from the first he both preached and practiced polygamy. Coincident with these developments was a state of warfare with the surrounding Gentiles which Held under the auspices of the Department of Music and for the benefit of Zion, Kansas City, and Holden Stakes, at Independence, Missouri, June 26 and 27, 1920.

The Department of Music has succeeded in conducting its first venture in the line of musical festivals and institutes, which it proposes to hold at various strategic points throughout the church, and the event we chronicle took place at the Stone Church at Independence on June 26 and 27, 1920.

The object of this festival and institute, as will be the object of all events of like character held under the auspices of the department, is to acquaint the church with the work and aims of the department; to stimulate the spirit and growth of music throughout the church; and to give instruction and help to musical workers in the problems that confront them in many ways. Of course these occasions will provide much in the way of musical enjoyment and entertainment to those participating, but the great aim for them is in the way of stimulation and instruction.

Those who had charge of this event, and upon whom the great work of preparation fell, naturally approached this first venture with considerable anxiety not unmixed with fear, for it was an untried experiment, and its success or failure meant much to the work of the department. It can therefore be easily understood how great was the relief they felt and how deep was their gratification when at the close of the last session, they could look back and feel the rich assurance that the event was a success, even a greater success than they had hoped for.

And it was a success, not merely in the way of temporal pleasure and sensual enjoyment, for that is the least they could have hoped for, but it was a success in lines that meant much for the future growth and development of music in the church. Those witnessing or participating in it gleaned a far greater vision of what the church earnestly hopes to do for its music through this department; the stimulation they felt will not only be permanent but in its infectious character will spread to others; many went away with the determination to be more and to do more for the cause of music in the church than ever before; many were made to know in a richer measure the great place and importance of music in the church and many supporters were added to the ranks of the musical workers of the church; many went away with definite assistance and a greater vision of their duties than ever before.

A registration of visiting musical workers (and we believe that all did not register) showed attendants from many quarters of the two stakes outside of Independence. Many, of course, came from the various branches of the Kansas City Stake, while from more remote and much more inconvenient locations of the Holden Stake there was an abundant representation. But all went away richly repaid for all exertions in coming and with expressions that they had received renewed strength for the daily musical battle.

Of the various programs, which are appended in full, we desire to comment first upon that of Sunday afternoon, which continued practically without intermission until the "king" was assassinated and his colony razed and destroyed by a turbulent Gentile mob. Gentile readers (we presume this magazine has no other) may be interested to know that the Reorganized Church has twice in civil contests won court decisions upholding its claim to be the true successor of the original Mormon Church (notably in the Independence Temple Lot case, decided by Judge Philips of the United States Circuit Court), thus by clear implication branding the Utah church as an apostate body.

was devoted mostly to institute work. Brother Harold C. Burgess's address was in its nature a declaration of the aims and ideals of the department and its future work; that by the writer was devoted to a summary of the various problems that musical workers meet with and an invitation for workers to bring their needs to the department for assistance. Succeeding these addresses there was held the "Round table" which reversed the position of the speaker and audience and solicited questions and comments upon the part of the audience and replies to the same. The workers were divided into two classes: one that desired to consider problems of an orchestral nature and another that brought their choir problems up for review. This round table was one of the most successful features of the institute, for it elicited much thought and inquiry and awakened a more lively interest among the workers.

Of the other programs will say but little other than appending them entire. It will be noted that the various numbers given are all of a very high order of merit and quality. Those participating came with excellent preparation and all the programs were rendered with scarcely a hitch anywhere, a most unusual exception. We will make mention of but one number on these programs, had at the Sunday morning session at eleven o'clock. This was the sermon of President Elbert A. Smith, which was a gem of excellence both as a sermon and as a timely and pertinent musical address. For the enjoyment of those musical workers over the church who need this fine thing, we had it reported and it will be published entire in both HERALD and Ensign at an early date. So watch for it for you will enjoy it.

Some Reunion Work Ahead in Music

On June 29 the writer, as secretary of the Department of Music, will start on a trip covering a number of the reunions of the church in the interest of the work of the department. This trip will bring him to ten different reunions of the church, situated in quarters of the country and is intended for the purpose of presenting the musical interests of the church before the people; of stimulating musical development and of affording instruction in the work of music as may be had in the somewhat limited opportunities at reunions.

The itinerary of this trip is as follows and in the order noted, with probable dates upon which he will be present:

Saskatoon, North Saskatchewan District, July 4.

Northern Saskatchewan District, at Artland, July 8-11.

Alberta District, July 15-18.

Southern Saskatchewan District, at Radville, July 22-25.

Chatham, Ontario, District, Erie Beach, July 27-August 1.

Toronto, Ontario, District, Lowbanks, August 2-8.

Kirtland Joint District, Kirtland, August 15-22.

Kewanee District, August 24-27.

Southern Wisconsin District, Madison, August 28-31.

Northeastern Illinois District, September 1-5.

Returned Traveler.—Is your daughter as fond of music as ever?

Hostess.—She has not touched the piano for two years.

Returned Traveler.—Indeed! I did not know that she had married.

"Mrs. Larkin," remarked the minister, "we wish you would let your daughter join the choir." "Oh, I couldn't think of it," replied Mrs. L. "She has such a sweet disposition, and I don't want her to become quarrelsome."

A person who is trained to consider his actions, to undertake them deliberately, is in so far forth disciplined. Add to this ability a power to endure in an intelligently chosen course in face of distraction, confusion, and difficulty, and you have the essence of discipline. Discipline means power at command; mastery of the resources available for carrying through the action undertaken. To know what one is to do and to move to do it promptly and by use of the requisite means is to be disciplined, whether we are thinking of an army or a mind. Discipline is positive. To cow the spirit, to subdue inclination, to compel obedience, to mortify the flesh, to make a subordinate perform an uncongenial task—these things are or are not discipline according as they do or do not tend to the development of power to recognize what one is about and to persistence in accomplishment.—John Dewey, in The Outlook, May 26, 1920.

It was Lord Durham, says the Christian Science Monitor, who in 1839 laid the plan for the organization of Canada. Prior to that the British idea of colonial government had simply been hand to mouth. But Lord Durham not only advocated self-government, but self-government of a most complete kind. He urged a general assembly for Canada, both upper and lower; an executive council, responsible in every sense to that assembly, and to these authorities he proposed to intrust the sole management of Canadian affairs. Only the preparation of a new constitution, the foreign relations, external trade, and public land were to be left to the care of the imperial government. It was not, however, until 1870 that Canadian Government was established, with broadly independent powers.

Woman's Work

"Man's work is from sun to sun,
But woman's work is never done."

An Editorial Chat

Your editor recently spent a fortnight in Independence, meeting with the General executive of our department. A prodigious amount of work came before us for consideration and action, and the days were filled from dawn to sunset—and then some! Through it all, however, we are impressed anew with the conviction that God is guiding his people in this hastening time. Problems of adjustment which were vexing and difficult seem, after a while, to fade away, as definite and constructive plans emerged from chaos and took form and place. We can but feel a deep sense of gratitude that this is so, for otherwise we would be almost submerged.

The work of organizing the women of Zion into groups has gone steadily on, under the direction of the organizer, Sister C. J. Hunt, who brings to the work a consecration equaled by efficiency and preparation. She tells us she is surprised at the manner in which the women are taking hold of the work. They are eager to do, eager to study, eager to qualify themselves for wider service. At times she had felt anxious about who was to be the proper leader for a prospective group, but when the time came, exactly the right woman seemed to be found.

It may interest some to know that Independence is divided into groups, each presided over by an elder, priest, teacher, and deacon. In each group now the women are being organized, being officered by a leader, a secretary-treasurer, a young women's director, and a "friendly visitor." This is a beginning which permits of definite work being done at once along many lines which would be difficult were the whole city to be handled en masse at all times. These groups are back of several efforts, and will be the means through which policies may be effectively carried out from time to time. At present there is a great interest in the study of our leaflet courses, the "Food and the body" and the "Child care" courses vying with each other in popularity.

The organizer (Sister Hunt), her secretary (Sister Morgan), and a corps of assistants as the work will demand, form the executive committee in Zion. They and the general executive, and the officers from all the groups, as well as leaders of all local circles, classes, societies, etc., will form an advisory council which will meet regularly to discuss things of mutual interest and importance. Here problems affecting the various groups will be considered, and the executive bring to the different leaders any constructive measures they may wish.

The work on the Year Book is advancing steadily. We hope to present to you one which shall be of value, suggestive as well as inspirational. The present high cost of paper may prevent us from having it just as we would like, and doubtless will require a price higher than charged heretofore. The manual for the Temple Builders will be printed about the same time, and we feel secure in promising a treat for all who purchase one.

The home department work has swung into concrete shape under the enthusiastic direction of Sister Eva Holdsworth, who was called to the task upon the resignation of Sister Schwab, whose health did not permit her to take the enlarging responsibilities of the department. We are glad to know, however, that the fine and consecrated spirit of Sister Schwab is finding expression in local responsibilities and service.

Reunion material is collected, and will be sent upon application made to our general office. It consists of papers, suggestions for activities, round tables, and other interesting features for reunion work. Sisters Madison and Gardner have this in charge. Reunions who desire the attendance of any general officer and are willing to bear the entire expense of such a worker, may write to our general office.

Watch for cradle roll plans next week!

A. A.

So runs the old couplet. Sometimes it occurs to us to question. Like the four-year-old, the eternal "WHY?" creeps into our minds. Is woman's work never done because there are not enough hours in the day to meet her demand? Is it because she undertakes far more than her share? Or is it that she is a slacker, an idler, an inefficient?

In the home it is a common thing to see the tired husband drop into an easy-chair after his supper, with the evening paper and enjoy complete relaxation from the activities of the day. Wife clears the table, washes the dishes, puts the babies to bed, dampens the clothes, and brings out the mending basket about ten o'clock, and even sews far into the night at times, because the uninterrupted hours tempt her to the completion of a task. Overdrawn? Perhaps, sometimes, and somewhere! But too pitifully true to life for those who enact such scenes!

The picture just drawn has come to my mind frequently since last conference, when the heavy responsibilities I am at present carrying in the Women's Department of the church were placed upon me. I find myself burning the midnight oil over its problems, both figuratively and literally. There seems so much to do, so much that is pressing, vital, necessary, if the church is to take her rightful stand, and solve the vexing problems of this selfish, sin-sick old world. Is it that we, true to some of these age-old instincts, are trying to assume more of the duties than we should? Is it that, as in some homes, the labor has not been properly coordinated? Or is it merely that we are mere dabblers, tinkers, unsystematic, unfruitful?

However it may be, as superintendent of this department of church work, I sense a field so wide, so varied, so neglected in some corners, that the days have never enough hours, nor the leader enough workers to accomplish half of that which seems so vital, so pressing, so worth while.

Let us take, for instance, the task of properly caring for the homes and the children of this church. Who is optimistic enough to assert that this is being done at the present time? And if it is not being done, why? and what is the remedy? It may seem simple, this task of finding out the causes and removing them, but let us look at it a moment. Why is this mother or that home maker inefficient? Lack of education along the lines necessary in caring for a family, you will say; or lack of a proper appreciation of the importance of so doing; or lack of an opportunity to learn about the things which affect the happiness or the wholesomeness of a home. The young woman was bright enough; she shone in her Latin class, or she was an expert at the typewriter before she married! Sanitation? Oh, no, she didn't expect to be a plumber? Food values? Oh, no, she could buy such good things at the bakery! Nutrition? Nursing? Why, no, she never wanted to be a doctor. Make clothes? Cook meals? Mend? Clean house? Oh, the road is long and weary indeed, and strewn with the wreckage of mistakes and errors by which the average girl becomes perhaps not until later life, if ever, adept and successful in her management of a home! Sometimes the mistakes are mixed with grief! Many a first-born has been a victim to ignorance! And the pity of it is that it is not the girl's fault! Who is responsible for her preparation for life, or the lack of it? Who has guided her education in the past? Who should have trained her for the duties which were almost sure to come to her? Almost sure, I say, for it is stated that seventy-five per cent of American women are married and most of these become mothers. And it is a safe guess that not five per cent of these mothers had any preparatory training in the care and welfare of children.

Can any conceive it then, to be a simple or a light task for the women's organization of our church, standing as it does for the ideals of better motherhood and better homes, to bring to every woman who needs it, the opportunity for greater knowledge along the lines of her life's duties? We offer study courses, group lessons, individual readings, lectures, etc., etc., but we cannot force any to take advantage of them. We may spread our table with the most wholesome of food, the choicest of tidbits, but it will do no good to those who stand aloof! Even Christ must invite. "If any man will come unto me, I will give him of the waters of life abundantly!"

As women, too, a part of our task lies in the proper guidance of the young. Who will say that this is either a light or an inconsequential duty? Witness the many wayward feet, the many selfish and pleasure-mad children of our day! Note the dearth of interest in the things of the spirit, the absence from the churches, and the crowds at the ball games or picture shows! Is there no need to study this situation with the greatest gravity, thought, and prayer? Shall we longer say "don't" and not "do" to our young people? What shall we provide? Shall the mothers have anything to say about these things? Shall we deny natural hunger, giving the stone instead of bread?

Not the recreation problem alone confronts us, but the more serious one of sex education. Tell me, who is taking care that our young people have a proper and true conception of the matters of life, and those impulses which are God-given but man-perverted? Who is teaching your boy, or your girl about them? Are you? As parents, have you studied and prayed over this duty, and are you, in fear and trembling because of the grave consequences which attend upon failure, trying to give your child a safe and intelligent comprehension of the laws of his being, and his own responsibility thereunto? If you are, tell us what you are studying, what books you are reading, what sciences are you delving into, as a slight preparation for so stupendous and vital a task. It will help us, and help other parents who are groping in the dark for some illuminating rays. Alas, too often the parents neglect or laugh the tiny questioner aside. Too often a half truth, or a whole falsehood is told the inquiring child, who later learns that the one whom he trusted had played him false. His sensitive nature recoils and shuts itself up away from the heart which truly loves, even though foolishly and thoughtlessly. His confidence is shattered. He turns to companions at school or in the street, and learns many things which cause him shame and misery all through his after life! Whose fault, pray tell me?

Where and from whom is your child or my child learning the vital facts of existence? At your knee, in your arms, uniting his prayers for purity with yours? Or are you leaving it to his school-teachers, or to the Sunday school? They are leaving it to you, or both to your pastor?

Let us throw aside the bandages which are holding our vision! Let us shake off the sloth and negligence which have kept us from action in this matter, and let us see to it that our children shall be forewarned and forearmed, shall be safe through the light of knowledge and shall no more stumble in dark and dangerous paths. Let us face the enemy of souls, meet him on this most fruitful of his grounds, and give battle worthy of those who have girded on the protecting armor of Christ! Can anyone say that as women and mothers, we can afford to omit this most important work? Surely, surely there is much to do! Will the hours of earth's night find it undone? Will the dawn of millennium's day find us at the tasks we have set ourselves? Or will we unite as a disciplined army, recognize the great needs, and conquer through grace? Zion's host must become very great and very bright before Satan will admit defeat! The pure in heart! What can we do to establish it, and hasten its redemption?

The Piper, a monthly publication of one of the large publishing houses, calls attention to the fact that the good we receive from the books in our library is not subject to income tax. If one goes to the theater a tax must be paid. Yet one can have equal and greater pleasure from a book, and can have any chapter repeated without additional expense. He can also extend his pleasure to many other of his friends without further expense or tax.

Woman's Share in Social Culture

Regular industry is rather an acquired habit than a natural tendency in the human race; and women rather than men seem first to have attained the discipline of a "steady job." Primitive woman in the remote past was harnessed to definite tasks, which began with each morning. Leslie F. Ward in Pure Sociology shows that while some modern economists talk as though labor was natural to man, and as though the main question was how to give men enough work to do, the original problem was to make men work. Of primitive man it was written, "He hunts, spears fish, fights, struts about and does considerable yarning. The rest is woman's work."

All the essential processes of peaceful industry, all those severely practical activities which led directly toward care for the individual life and comfort, and the start of the primitive home toward social well-being were, all students agree, initiated by woman in the dim past. Woman as a human being of the mother sex, found her job already waiting for her when she arrived upon the scene, and has never since been allowed to become an industrial tramp, seeking her work afar. For the same reason woman has never had at her command those convenient "fictions," which have served man as ways of escaping irksome labor, and as means for procuring better opportunities for easier self-support. Woman, from the primitive mother down to the modern housewife, has seldom, if ever, had time to go afishing at house-cleaning time or to plead "urgent business down town" in a domestic crisis.

The woman of talent or special gifts has had until very recently, and in many cases still has, to go against the massed social pressure of her time in order to devote herself to any particular intellectual task. Men as they have stepped ahead of women in industrial organization have been able to choose what they liked best as their share of labor, and have called it "instinct" that made what they did not like to do woman's work.

To-day women are entering the ranks of the professions and are making good in spite of the adverse social pressure. What women ask for and are fast gaining is the chartered right to legal protection from abuse, equal educational advantages with men, full citizenship, and the right to reform the world if she can.

The womanhood of our time is moving along new pathways swiftly, and with native power of instantaneous adjustment to difficult claims. To the highest leadership among women it is given to hold in one hand the ancient sanctities of life and in the other a flaming torch to light the way for the oncoming generations.

"When things get to the pass they are in to-day there is only one remedy left, a rousing call to the people themselves to take things into their own hands once more, to send all timid, time-serving, incompetent public servants home, and to call out the strong and fearless men, the upright and clear-headed men, to take their places. There is no chance or hope for democracy unless we can trust the plain, honest intelligence of the millions in a time like this. If we cannot build on that we have nothing left to build on."—Judge Stafford, of District of Columbia Supreme Court.

"The Osage Indians have a plan unlike that of any of the other tribes. Their income goes into a common fund and is distributed evenly—'all same socialist,' as a full-blood explained. Oil has made them wealthy. The oil income distributed to them last year by the Government amounted to more than $7,000 for each man, woman, and child in the Osage Nation. And the families are not usually small."—The Country Gentleman.

Zion and Jerusalem

My heart was made glad on Sunday, May 9, when in Toronto, Ontario, President F. M. Smith delivered a discourse to the Saints of that place in their church on Soho Street, on the subject of Zion, and the conditions that should prevail, etc., when at the same time 35,000 Jews were parading the streets of Toronto in celebration of the acceptance of Great Britain of the mandatory over Palestine. An elder and I, on our way to the church passed group after group who were preparing for the parade. I suggested that I take down what was written on one or two of their banners. While doing so, the elder said to one of the Jews, "This man [pointing to me] has been preaching this for over forty years—our church has been preaching it for nearly one hundred years."

He and those standing by seemed to be so glad to know that the Saints were so favorable to them, and in the assurance of their return to the land wherein their fathers dwelt.

One of their banners read, in letters about ten or twelve inches square, "God bless the British Empire." Another, "Our long-awaited expectations have been realized." One more, "Pride of Israel, S. B. S. Our faith and hand is for Palestine."

Feeling so glad that as a church we were so interested in their return, one of them, with tears, pinned his little badge on the lapel of my coat, and another standing by pinned his on the coat of the elder who was with me. Those badges bore the impression of the British flag, with the Jewish flag under it—combined.

This was a wonderful coincidence, and neither knew of the other's movements, until it occurred. It is the Lord's doings.

The Toronto Globe says (May 2, 1920): "Doctor MacNordui, the famous essayist and Zionist leader, says the Jews are now only awaiting for the British mandate for Palestine to become effective before they emigrate there."

One week later this came about.

The same Doctor MacNordui said: "We hope that in ten years there will be nearly five million Jews settled there. Five thousand Jews have already signified their desire to remove to Palestine. And I am informed that the Oriental-American Society, recently formed in New York, will invest $150,000,000 for the purpose of establishing economic relations between America and Palestine. This is not charity, it is business. Ultimately, we hope to have a Jewish Republic established on the broadest and most democratic lines."

So God is moving for and with his people, both Jew and Gentile, and we must be workers with God.

Jewish leader, Chaim Weizmann, said: "My message from San Remo is that the political foundations of the future Jewish state in the Holy Land are being laid satisfactorily. It is the Jewish duty to make good in the rebuilding of Palestine, as a national home. The Jews must sink all differences to develop the beautiful land of Israel into a model state." (Toronto Globe, May 7.)

"Sokolow said that last month had been the most eventful in Jewish history. Two thousand years of military rule in Palestine was coming to an end. San Remo marked the beginning of a new era for the Jews." (Ibid.)

The editor of the Globe said of that parade in Toronto, May 9: "The procession which was almost two miles in length, assembled at 3 p. m. at the Zionist Institute on Beverley Street. From there it passed to Spadina Avenue, and to Queen, up Yong to College, and back to Beverley, taking almost two hours to pass, and being one of the most orderly and well organized the city has ever seen. Great was the rejoicing manifested everywhere. 'Can you imagine greater?' said a prominent Zionist to the Globe. 'We have waited 2,000 years for this moment, and at last it has come. The prophetic scriptures are coming true.'"

Wonderful! and more so when we consider that we have the scriptures to assist, and a living prophet to lead and further instruct. While they have and believe in the Old Testament only, yet that belief has followed them and their children for the last two thousand years.

God is with his people and will bless them in their endeavors to establish Zion and Jerusalem.

From the Wheat Fields of Canada

A few words from the "Bread basket of the world" may be of some interest to your readers. In the prairie provinces of Canada the wheat belt is a thousand miles long by three hundred miles wide. Fourteen railroads cross the Manitoba-Saskatchewan line and ten cross the Saskatchewan-Alberta border. Few people in the States have a correct idea of the extent of this great Northwest. Many do not seem to realize that the Dominion of Canada is larger than the United States. Many of her natural resources have scarcely been touched as yet. From Canada the United States must get her pulp wood, and sooner or later her timber and coal, and also her oil.

In this cool climate alone grows the No. 1 hard wheat which is best for flour. In this newer country grows immense crops of this kind of wheat that brings the very highest market price at home and abroad. As yet the yield is much greater than in the older country further south.

In all this extent of country, we have only seven missionaries, four districts, and about twenty-seven branches. But in every part of the country there are a few members scattered here and there which make places for the opening up of the work and the preaching of the angel's message.

Prejudice runs high, however, in most places, as all the different churches are interested in keeping the others out that they themselves may get in on the ground floor. Some churches are sending out young theological students to teach school and practice their sermons on the community. Two or three purposes are thus served. The school is served and the church is served, while the preacher-teacher draws his pay from each. The community is thus theologically fenced about and the preacher developing as a leader among men. Why cannot some of our men do the same thing?

In the smaller towns the church union business is made to do its best, so that all the smaller churches in town must come under or stay out. In several towns and communities I have come up against both these propositions. In such places we are at a greater disadvantage than anywhere in the States, but on the other hand we have a much better show where we have a live branch. The others stay out. Recently at Viceroy, when preaching there, the Chautauqua was on for three days. We dismissed our meetings for the time. As the days of the Chautauqua were Friday, Saturday, and Monday, Brother Jordan secured the large tent for Sunday evening, the Chautauqua managers announcing our meeting from the platform. We also circulated numerous hand-bills announcing a lecture on "The language, habits, and customs of the South Sea Islanders." As the old saying goes, the tent was "full, inside and out." Some prejudice was removed, I think, from the expressions of appreciation that came in from many.

I took occasion to explain, briefly, the difference between our work and that of the Utah people in the islands. At the close of the lecture some strangers, three men and two women, came up and congratulated me very cordially. They proved to be the Chautauqua workers and speakers for the following day. One of them, a lady, while they still lingered near, said: "You spoke of the Mormons in the islands." I replied: "Yes, we are often in opposition to them in many places."

She then said: "I am a Mormon myself, but I do not understand who you are. I heard you were a Latter Day Saint; in fact, I think you called yourself such."

I replied that I was "what your people call a 'Josephite.'" "What are they?" she asked.

To her and the rest who came up to listen, I explained the difference, mentioning the place of our headquarters and Presidents Frederick M. and Elbert A. Smith. She wanted to know who they were.

I informed her they were the grandsons of Joseph Smith. She seemed to know nothing of them, and nothing of our work.

That reminds me that it is repeated that when our late Joseph Smith died there was no mention made of it in any Mormon paper in Utah. From these and other incidents I am of the opinion that the Utah church in all their publications make a practice of saying as little as possible of the Reorganization. Not hard to guess why.

The branch at Viceroy seems to be doing well under the presidency of Brother T. J. Jordan who is also president of the Southern Saskatchewan District. The junior choir did fine on the Chautauqua platform, others also rendering their part well in the program that preceded the lecture. A neighboring band also rendered several pieces free of charge, the Chautauqua people and the electric light plant also making no charge. We stood all our expenses of handbills. No collection was taken which was quite a surprise to some who contributed last year to the Methodist people. All in all, I think much good was accomplished there.

Happy in Zion's interest,

The Farm and the Social Problem

The following interview with an old farmer, printed in one of the leading daily papers not long ago represents one of the most important problems with which we have to deal—the problem of social life on the farm. It affects us most poignantly because it has to do primarily with the retention of young blood in the rural areas. This is the way the venerable farmer put it: "I've quit urging my boys to remain on the farm," he said sadly. "I have always talked farm to them and have done everything I could to get them to remain. I have tried everything to make them contented but I have failed.

"They have an automobile and I bought a tractor and I give them half the proceeds of the farm, but now I am telling them, 'If you want to go to town where you will make more money and will not have to work so hard, go; I will not stand in your way. You have a right to do what is best for yourself.'

"If they go, of course I'll have to give up the farm and turn retired farmer like thousands of others all over this State. I don't know what everything is coming to.

"If it keeps on there will be more farmers living in town than on the farms. But what can we do?"

We are not deluding ourselves that the church is going to be permitted to side-step this very important situation. The same social pressure is being applied within the church as well as without. It would therefore seem that attention to this problem now would not be altogether untimely.

There may be other solutions but two alternatives at least may be presented here. We may drift with the tide of public sentiment and encourage the exodus from the farm or bring the advantages of the urban centers where they may be utilized by those who logically ought to live on the land, whose maximum productivity can be realized in the tilling of the soil. Put in another way, is it possible to maintain the farm home on the present individualistic basis and at the same time make adequate social contact, or will it really be necessary to group our farmers in small communities in which institution most of the city advantages will be attainable?

There are of course other factors which have a definite bearing upon the problem, but an open discussion upon this point by those who are interested would be very valuable.

Saints Should Both Read and Report

While perusing the SAINTS' HERALD and Ensign pages I thought of how necessary it is that all of the Saints, and especially the isolated ones, should take the church papers and keep in touch with what the church is doing. And, too, how necessary that all progress of the church be reported through the columns of the HERALD and Ensign.

We have lately had with us Elder Walter W. Chrestensen, in a three weeks' meeting. Had large crowds and many were interested listeners. Some of those who came were poisoned with prejudice, and came to find fault. On Sunday, June 13, three were baptized, and on the 20th two more accepted baptism. This is a very busy season of the year, and short nights, which militates largely against meetings, yet the attendance at all services was good. Much good has been done through this series of meetings, as some are investigating.

The Saints have been edified, and the gospel presented to many who have never heard it before. Some were inclined to stop the meetings, and concluded to shut the schoolhouse against us, but their efforts failed. One of our poets wrote some years ago:

"And when it doth their systems rub,
Proud men become uneasy;
They call the Master Beelzebub,
And all his servants crazy.
But truth is strong and will prevail,
For it proceeds from heaven;
It always did, and ever shall,
By inspiration given."

The little flurry of persecution only caused those near the kingdom to want to get into it. In our song service we used a songbook used by the locality, so all could help sing. One of the songs selected was, "Where he leads me, I will follow; I'll go with him all the way."

Brother Walter when presenting his theme asked them if they would be willing to go with him all the way. It caused some of them to look rather pale. How natural it is, too, for members of all the different churches to join together in antagonizing the gospel. How many, too, for popularity's sake stick to their old creeds, when it is so plainly shown them how faulty their creeds are.

Ever praying for the welfare of Zion,

Appreciation of American Kindness to Jerusalem Saints

(Excerpts from Sister Olinda Nejeim's letter, written April 18, 1920, Jerusalem, Palestine, to Sister H. A. Koehler.)

My Dear Sister Koehler: We have received the boxes sent us from America, and how grateful we are to you and all those who have been so kind to send us these nice clothes. We cannot thank you enough, and may God bless all for it.

We have had very much trouble here of late. The Mohammedans had a fight with the Jews. You see it was the feast of the Prophet Moses for the Moslems, and the people of Hebron were coming through the city with the flags of the prophets. People say that it was the Jews who interfered with them, and they began fighting each other, many getting killed. No one could be about the town for fear of being killed. It was a terrible demonstration against the Jews, as they are getting so many here, especially the Zionists; but now, thank God, things are peaceful again, and I hope there will not be another row like that.

We have a very rough winter; in February we had such a heavy snowstorm such as our forefathers had never seen before in this country. Such a heavy snowfall! It had no stop for days; the height of the snow was four feet. Many people could not get any bread as all shops closed, and nobody was about. We could not get out for nearly a week, but my brothers got out and brought us what we needed in the line of bread. Many trees also broke from weight of snow.

Eros Branch Gains Thirty Per Cent

The branch here is still going forward in every respect, as we are trying to reach a higher and a more desirable condition than that which has been our record in times past.

We are trying to heed President Smith's call for ten thousand new members this year, and there have been thirty-one added to our branch by baptism since February, 1920. The branch formerly contained about one hundred members, a gain of above thirty per cent in five months. This is the result of the extensive labor done by the local priesthood recently.

We are looking forward to the time when we may be favored by some of the missionaries, especially Brethren E. A. Erwin and J. T. Riley.

The Saints here are beginning to look Zionward. But we know we have much to do before we can be gathered.

I have been thinking that as the church has decided to do a great amount of building, and perhaps needs a large amount of lumber, the Saints perhaps could help to furnish the same.

The Saints own hundreds of acres of all kinds of timber (especially pine) which they desire to be manufactured into lumber. A man with a small sawmill could do well here. So if any one sees this who has a mill or can get one, write the address below. This would be a fine place to operate a mill on the stewardship basis, and then perhaps we could furnish the church with the lumber it needs.

Yours for the redemption of Zion,
EROS, LOUISIANA.

In New York

I preached out on the Tuscarora reservation last Sunday afternoon and in the evening in the church here. Assisted Brother Robley in four meetings which he held among some colored people of the Baptist Church. We were out to the reservation again last evening. The weather was against us, but we had seven Indians present; one of them was a chief, one a doctor. We arranged a meeting for Sunday afternoon. On this reservation there are three hundred ninety-four Indians and it seems they are a mixture of several tribes as there are about seven chiefs among them and an Indian preacher of the Baptist faith. He is the man who opposed Brother Chase years ago when he did some tent work on this reservation. Brother Chase is remembered by some of the Indians and it is unfortunate that his work was not followed up.

These Indians are progressive and do not seem to be of the slow and very objective type of thinkers. Many of the younger element have been to Carlisle and the Pentecostal religion has had some sway. It really looks to me as though we were just in time to prevent that deception getting too big a hold on them. They are still in their plastic years and I have hope. Last evening several questions were asked relative to the importance of the gift of tongues. (The Pentecostal people hold it to be an indispensable and sure sign of salvation.) The questions were handled very finely, and to their mutual satisfaction by George W. Robley.

Have had privilege to preach on the streets here two nights each week and I think that this leading out in missionary work will have a good effect on the long standing and subtle division that has been and is in this branch.

The New Era Movement of the Presbyterian Church started in the spring of 1918, in the midst of the world war. The second year of a five year's program has been completed. It resulted in a marked increase to the various boards of that church, six of which it is stated, have received a larger increase this year than in the ten preceding years. It is also an organization for more intensive work.

CALDWELL, TEXAS, June 26, 1920.

Editors Herald: My husband and I are in the big State of Texas, doing all we can for the gospel work. I often feel how I would love to have all the people accept the gospel, and enjoy the peace we enjoy in this work.

There is much to be done here, and we are going to make a special effort this year to see how much we can do. We surely have been blessed in our work, and have kept the Word of Wisdom in all conditions and have not been sick with all the changes of climate. It is awfully hot here at present, but I feel good, and would be willing to live on dry bread, and lay my head on a stone, if I could encourage all the Saints to live the gospel, so Zion could be redeemed; and the hearts of many would be made glad because of the results that would come. I can see in the future great things for the faithful.

May God bless all, is my prayer.

MRS. F. A. ROWE.

PEORIA, ILLINOIS, June 21, 1920.

Editors Herald: We have just returned from Rock Island, Illinois, where the Kewanee district conference was held.

We met under quite favorable circumstances. The weather was good, although a little cool; the roads very good, and the Rock Island Saints were untiring in their efforts to provide food, shelter, and every comfort for the visitors. When we consider what it cost them to do this, and remember that only last year, they entertained the conference in the same royal manner, a vote of thanks seems hardly sufficient to meet the obligation.

Their new church is very pleasing in appearance, both within and without. I understand that it will be ready to dedicate before very long, and will make the number of church buildings in the district to be seven, while Mather-ville is provided with a hall of their own; only Peoria is homeless.

There was the largest gathering of the Saints that we have seen for the last few years, and it was pleasant indeed to again clasp hands with those that we have known and loved in the gospel for this long, long time. Their presence very forcibly recalled the days of "auld lang syne." We remembered the many, many times when the Saints of Kewanee District have sat with tear-wet eyes while one of God's servants preached under the influence of the Holy Spirit what we said was "the best sermon I ever heard." And oh, the testimonies that have been borne to the truth of this latter-day work! The prophecies that have been uttered and many of which have been fulfilled, testifying that the prophet was sent of God! The rest is either being fulfilled or remains before us. How many sick have been healed under the hands of some that lie silent and moldering into dust, yet the blessing remains. Yes, those who laid the foundation for Kewanee District have passed on, or are very many in far distant fields of labor. Yet some remain and to these are added new faces, new voices each year.

Will they, too, look back a few years hence when the distance softens the sharp angles that now disturb our faith and perplex our minds, and forgetting, agree with the poet Riley, as do we to-day, and say, "There hain't no better times, than the times that ust to be!" But we are reminded that God is the God of the living as well as the dead. "Yesterday" is turned over to the Recording Angel to await the opening of the books.

"To-day," with all its possibilities, its work, is here. The "now" insistently calls for our consideration. So we turn us to the present and look for the signs that herald the fulfillment of the dreams of the prophets. We must shoulder the responsibility that belongs to our time and to our age. And looking, we find that as often as "Elijah" departs, there is an "Elisha" waiting to receive the falling mantle and carry on still the work that shall not be left to another people. I am constrained to believe that the great and glorious army of the Lord is preparing and they are coming, coming to carry on this work to its triumphant conclusion. There is much to encourage, much to confirm our faith in the God of Israel. And if some of the new ways being introduced seem to be steps in the wrong direction, we remember that

Having recently been appointed superintendent of the Religio department, may I solicit your cooperation in an endeavor to further this particular branch of the church work in this district? Read carefully and then determine to offer yourself for service now. Here are a few of my desires:

1. In touch with each local. a. Correspondence (regular). b. Visits. c. Regular writeup in HERALD and Autumn Leaves. d. Semiannual leaflet.

2. A more active interest in—a. Program. b. Music. c. Education. d. Assuming social responsibilities. e. Publicity work. f. Games. g. Outdoor sports. h. Physical culture. i. Tithing, etc.

3. To see more initiative. a. Original articles. b. Write songs. c. Ways and means for securing new members. d. In each officer.

4. An up-to-date picture machine. a. For present locals. b. For new openings.

5. A general awakening. a. Our larger vision. b. Our opportunities. c. Our talents.

6. Institute work.

7. A greater interest in scholarships for Graceland.

8. To see an interest in the boys' and girls' departments.

Some Things We Need

a. More team work.

b. Less grumbling about New York State.

c. Live officers.

d. Appreciate our talents.

e. More quartets, duets, solos, etc.

f. More effective choir work.

g. More original songs.

h. More instrumental music.

i. A song and cheer leader.

j. Start meetings on time.

Let the Religio be a real feeder to the church. The church ideals are ours. All for Christ. One million dollars tithing. Twenty thousand new faces pointed Zionward in the next two years. Come on now, all go. Who'll be the first to write me? Let's surprise ourselves and make old New York, the cradle of the restored gospel, ring with the joys of her growing child, the Religio. Altogether steadfast and stalwart; now is the time.

Enthusiastically,

DOCTOR P. L. WEEGAR.

BUFFALO, NEW YORK, 1721 Main Street.

Notice of Silence

To Whom It May Concern: This is to notify the church at large that John M. DeWolfe is under silence and has surrendered me his license. James G. Groombridge, president Second Flint, Michigan, Branch.

God will overrule and ultimately Zion will be redeemed and our salvation secured. So we determine to "hold on."

In conclusion, the district chorister rejoiced to find the beginnings of orchestral music in the district. A more active interest in the singing and young members cultivating the gift. So we are hopeful. Kewanee District is determined to do her part, reflect credit upon those gone on, and lift higher yet the banner of the Lord Jesus Christ that every honest soul may be left without excuse, and may have the opportunity to rejoice in the angel's message. May he continue his blessings.

In gospel bonds,

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, June 30, 1920.

Our Departed Ones

HORTON.—Josie Elizabeth Mullen was born December 27, 1884, at Nemo, Texas. Married Albert D. Horton, December 11, 1904. To this union eight children were born, the oldest of whom died in infancy. She leaves to mourn, husband, 7 children, 3 sisters, and four brothers. Sister Horton was firm in the faith, and will receive the crown for which she has labored. Funeral at LaJunta, Colorado, June 2, conducted by J. D. Curtis.

VAROA A MOO.—Varoa a Moo was born July 30, 1867, in village of Tetamanu, island of Fakarava, Tuamotu. Baptized December 2, 1894, in Taronia, Papeete, Tahiti, by William Gilbert; confirmed by Joseph Burton. Ordained to office of deacon by Hubert Case. Ordained elder April 10, 1900, by Pohemiti. Married Teroromate of the island of Anaa, to whom he was sincerely devoted until the time of her death in December, 1918. Varoa has been a useful servant of the Lord in this mission, having served the church as missionary a number of gret their departure, we wish them well and bend our efforts to the training of other workers to supply the need.

Brother Arthur McKim, publicity agent for the church, was in Burlington and spoke here, just prior to the district conference which was held at Fort Madison, June 4 to 6. He spoke at Fort Madison on Friday evening, June 4, owing to which the auxiliary program was deferred to the evening of the 5th. An exceptionally good conference and convention is reported. Of especial interest to the Burlington Branch was the ordination of Brethren J. F. MacIntire and G. E. Schweers to the office of elder.

Brother William Hartley, priest, of Philadelphia, who has been appointed to labor in the district spent a few days in Burlington, including Sunday, June 20, and was the speaker of the evening.

Owing to the district conference the first Sunday of the month, local sacrament service was held June 13, and Children's Day was observed June 20 with a well-rendered program.

years, being a wise counselor, an eloquent speaker, valiant in testimony, and successful in discussion. He assisted to open the work in Moorea several years ago. Passed to his reward April 24, in Taronia. Buried in Ziona Cemetery. Sermon in Ziona Chapel by A. V. Karlstrom, Mauna a Tetoofa in charge.

BECKSTEAD.—Mary Elizabeth Beckstead passed from this life May 30, 1920, at Hamburg, Iowa, at the home of her sister Mrs. M. Claiborn, aged 64 years, 10 months, and 14 days. At age of 8 was attacked with infantile paralysis, which left her blind. Lived with parents till their death, then made her home with relatives. Baptized in childhood and lived true to her covenant till death. A brother, Frank, and 5 sisters survive. Funeral service at Saints' church, in charge of H. A. Higgins, sermon by V. M. Goodrich.

SMITH.—Thomas Jefferson Smith was born July 17, 1839, in Saint Louis County, Missouri, and died at Independence, Missouri, April 20, 1920. Baptized in 1865. Ordained elder. Served as president of the Eastern Nebraska District for a number of years and has also labored as missionary for several years. Was four years in the Oklahoma mission. During Civil War served as seaman in United States Navy. April 24, 1873, married Catherine Butler, at De Soto, Nebraska, and to this union were born 4 sons, all of whom survive. Lived in Independence since 1904.

WOOD.—Anna Sommerfield Wood was born July 7, 1881, at Munger, Michigan. Baptized January 18, 1894, by John A. Dowker; confirmed by William Dowker. Married Elory A. Wood at Bay City. To this union were born 3 children, the youngest but three months old. Died May 26, 1920, at Detroit, Michigan. Interment in Tawas Cemetery. Sermon by E. S. White.

HARDY.—On June 15 occurred the death of Eugene B. Hardy, in Toledo, Ohio, at the age of 43 years, 3 months, and 15 days. He had been a member of the church for many years and manifested great interest in it. He leaves five orphan children, four of whom need a home and are worthy. Funeral services at Saints' chapel in Toledo, conducted by J. F. Mintun, assisted by W. S. Hettrick.

BURGESS.—Ethelyn Holt, widow of the late Henry Burgess, was born at Canning, Kings County, Nova Scotia, July 31, 1862. Baptized September 19, 1891, at Irvington, Alameda County, California, by Joseph F. Burton. Died at San Jose, California, April 15, 1920. Leaves to mourn one son, Burton, one sister, Laura Gorsky, and many Saints and friends. Funeral services at parlors of San Jose Undertaking Company. Sermon by E. S. Chase.

EMSLIE.—After but 4 days' illness of pneumonia, William Emslie passed peacefully away at Seattle, Washington, at the age of 54 years, one month, 9 days, on June 8, 1920. Leaves wife and 4 children, one brother and 5 sisters. A strong pillar in the church. F. W. Holman offered prayer and J. M. Terry preached funeral sermon. A large congregation attended, and floral offerings were bountiful.

KARLSTROM.—Christina Karlstrom died at Joplin, Missouri, after several weeks' illness, June 15, 1920. Born in Sweden, and came to Massachusetts in 1873. Married John Aaron Karlstrom, who with 3 sons and 2 daughters survive her. Came to Joplin in 1898. One son, Albert V., has labored in the ministry, and last year went on a mission to the Society Islands, baptizing both his parents before his departure. She was a good woman, quiet but with depth of character. Funeral services at Saints' church, Joplin, Missouri, in charge of T. J. Sheppard. Sermon by Charles Fry.

JENSEN.—Martha Jensen was born May 31, 1845, at Slinde, Bergen County, Norway. Came to this country in 1868. Married Christian L. Jensen at Stoughton, Wisconsin, 1878. Baptized July 29, 1894 by W. S. Pender. Retiring on the evening of June 18, she complained of not feeling well, and in about an hour had passed away. Leaves to mourn, husband, a number of uncles and cousins, together with many Saints and friends. Was loved and respected by all. Her noble, self-sacrificing life will be remembered by a host of Saints and friends. Funeral at the home in Evansville, Wisconsin. Sermon by W. A. McDowell.

MIZELL.—Rebecca J. Courtney was born August 3, 1861. Married John W. Mizell, July 3, 1881. Died June 3, 1920. Baptized by Heman C. Smith some 38 or 40 years ago. Four children preceded her in death, while 7 children, and 23 grandchildren, with her husband, remain to mourn her departure. Funeral services at Escatawpa, Mississippi. Sermon by Levi Gamet.

SHIELDS.—The name of Miss Mary Shields should have been included among the sisters remaining to mourn the demise of Percy Claremont Shields whose obituary notice was published recently.

RAMBO.—Alta May, daughter of William C. and Sarah Rambo was born August 17, 1909, at Kansas City, Missouri. Died June 20, 1920, at Kansas City, Missouri. Funeral services conducted from Stone Church at Independence; burial in Mound Grove Cemetery. Leaves to mourn, father, mother, and brother.

Conference Minutes

NEW YORK.—With the Niagara Falls, New York, Branch, June 5 and 6, with a very good attendance at all sessions and an interest manifest. Officers elected: James Bishop, president; Frank C. Mesle, vice president and treasurer; Frank Mesle also sustained as Bishop's agent; Anna Brothers, secretary. A. F. McLean and wife of Toronto in attendance, Elder McLean occupying the morning hour on Sunday. A well-attended prayer service Sunday morning. On Sunday afternoon the Women's Department held a session under leadership of Sister Frank Mesle, which proved interesting as well as instructive. Sunday evening George W. Robley was the speaker. Adjourned to meet at the call of the district presidency. Anna M. Brothers, secretary, 36 Tremont Avenue.

LITTLE SIOUX.—At Pisgah, Iowa, June 12 and 13. J. W. Lane and Sidney Pitt, sr., of district presidency, in charge, assisted by Daniel Macgregor. Reports from priesthood and of spiritual condition of branches encouraging. Bishop's agent's report showed receipts from January 1 to June 7, 1920, $11,439.58. A resolution was adopted and copies sent to quorums having jurisdiction, calling attention to the volume of business done by the Bishop's agent and looking with favor on the elevation of the office to that of a bishopric. The resolution also looked with favor upon the appointment of the present Bishop's agent as bishop. A committee was appointed to solicit funds for the purchase of a district tent for missionary purposes. J. W. Lane was elected district president, and chose Fred A. Fry and J. C. Ballantyne as associates. Sister Charles VanEaton was elected secretary, Charles VanEaton treasurer, C. R. Smith member library board. Charles L. Hyde and George Carlisle ordained elders, Roy Derry and Charles Derry priests. Adjourned to meet in October at Logan. Ada S. Putnam, secretary.

WESTERN WALES.—At the Anchor Cafe, Neath, May 22 and 23, 1920. Bishop R. May was associated with the presidency of the conference. District president's report was read, and a letter from the First Presidency and Joint Council of the Twelve, respecting boundaries and the joining of Monmouthshire into Wales, to be under the heading of the Welsh District. The advices were received and adopted. Three elders reported. Brother May announced that his report to the district in future would be made subsequent to his reporting to the general church, June 30, his annual reporting time. It was resolved that the elders reporting to the conference use proper blanks. The adoption of diaries by all the ministry was urged. The petition of the Nantyglo Branch of last conference was called for by resolution, and acted upon, the result of which was that the said branch is now a part of the Western Wales District. It was decided that we request the general authorities of the church to change the name of the Western Wales District, and that it be called, "The Welsh District, to include Monmouthshire." It was agreed that the matter of the expected visit of the President and those with him be left with the district officers to arrange for their reception, and best means for all the Saints to meet with them. The General and local authorities of the church were sustained by vote. Officers elected: Thomas Jones, president; John Phillips, secretary; Sidney Phillips, treasurer. Sunday morning a priesthood meeting was held, also excellent fellowship meeting. Time and place of convening of next conference left to the discretion of district president. Thomas Jones, president; John Phillips, secretary.

New Courses at Graceland

Social and Recreational Leadership

In response to urgent demands from the field and the strong recommendations of the general church officers, the authorities of Graceland College take very great pleasure in announcing that we are prepared during the coming school year to offer courses designed especially to prepare leaders to carry out in the church communities of the land the general Religio program for social and recreational activities.

As one of the coordinate departments of the church, the Religio has a very particular function, that of providing for the social and recreational interests of the young people of the church in particular and as another department of the church the college has its particular work, that of assisting in the education of young people who can function in the various lines of church activities.

In offering this new course, Graceland believes that one of the very finest opportunities possible is presented to the young people of the church to assist in the preparation for the building up of Zion. The Religio has a very large field opened before her and a very definite program of activities and this new course in Graceland will assist in making it possible to put that program into full operation.

Faculty

F. M. McDowell,	C. E. Irwin,
David Hopkins,	Daniel Sorden,
A. E. Bullard,	Graduate Nurses.

The above-named members of the regular college faculty will assist in carrying this new course into operation.

Elder McDowell is superintendent of the boys' department of the Religio and is in a specially fine position to render very effective service in this new course.

Elder Irwin is returning to Graceland after two years leave of absence in attendance at the University of Chicago where, in addition to his regular university courses, he was superintendent of one of the largest playground and recreation centers under the supervision of the Chicago Southside Play Ground Association. One who is acquainted with the activities of this association will appreciate Brother Irwin's very fine opportunity for preparation for this new course at Graceland.

Brethren Hopkins and Sorden are at present in attendance at the State University of Iowa in special preparation for their work here next year.

Brother Bullard is a practical scoutmaster of experience and will bring strength to the faculty along this line.

The work of the graduate nurses will be along health, hygiene, and sanitary lines and will be of great aid to the students.

NEWS AND COMMENT

THE WORLD AT LARGE

Russia has sent a representative to England to arrange for an exchange of commodities between that country and the various western nations, but representatives of ten countries have expressed themselves as opposed to any commercial agreement until the national debt of Russia is assumed by the present government.

England is also apprehensive over the serious shortage in wheat acreage. The shortage in British territory is estimated to be as much as 300,000 acres. The ministry of agriculture is proposing a maximum price for the 1921 crop with guarantees sufficient to increase the amounts sown this fall and next spring.

At a recent meeting of the American Institute of Banking, held at Boston, a debate was held on giving the worker a voice and vote in the management of industry. The negative argument was given the unanimous decision, the victorious debaters being a Philadelphia group, who argued that systems of collective bargaining and shopcommittees were excellent means to the solution of the problems of industrial unrest, but that the management of a business involved many

Purpose

The purpose of this course shall be to prepare leaders for the various lines of social and recreational activity now carried on under the auspices of the Religio. The course will be open to all students and will be accepted in lieu of the required course in physical training. The work will be conducted two hours each week throughout the year.

General Nature of Work

In the fall and spring or during suitable weather this training will be carried on in the open and in the gymnasium and will consist in actual participation in various lines of recreational activity. During the winter months and at other times when necessary there will be regular classroom instruction consisting of lectures, discussions, and assigned readings, as in regular academic courses.

Suggested Problems

1. Psychology and pedagogy of recreation.
Ages of childhood, characteristics, methods, etc.
2. Recreation and the church.
Proper forms, need of, effects, etc.
3. Recreation as a sociological problem.
4. Various forms of recreation available.
Merits and demerits of each.
5. Playgrounds and playground supervision.
What is being done? What can be done? Equipment? Problems? Leaders? etc.
6. Scoutcraft: First aid, camp craft, hikes, nature study, knot tying, tracking, games.
7. Games: indoor and outdoor. (Each student is expected to learn a large number of games so he can direct them at any time.)
8. Training in Oriole and Temple Builder work for the young women.
9. Health lectures: Minimal essentials of health to physical efficiency. Effects of various practices and habits upon health, etc.
10. Sources of materials.

As will be noted, this course can be taken in lieu of the regular required work in physical training and does not in any way interfere with the regular college courses. All students are eligible and can elect it in addition to other desired courses in any of the departments.

Canada, the home of the pulp industry, is facing an acute print paper shortage, so serious in aspect that practically every paper in the prairie section of the dominion is facing suspension. In fact thirty-five per cent of all Canadian newspapers have already shut down, while a fourth of the remaining periodicals are in imminent danger. It is said that newspapers in this country are paying the price and securing the greater part of the output of Canada's pulp mills.

CHURCH NEWS

President F. M. Smith left for the East on July 3. He will visit Kirtland, Toronto, and other points, and sail for England July 21.

Bishops B. R. McGuire, J. F. Keir, and M. H. Siegfried were in Lamoni on business Thursday and Friday of last week. Brother McGuire was in Council Bluffs on Sunday.

E. D. Moore and daughter Ada were in Omaha over the 27th and addressed the Saints in both branches. South Omaha had Children's Day exercises in the morning, followed by his address. The Saints of the Omaha Branch are maintaining preaching services at two homes in the city and by the use of tracts and personal visits reaching a satisfactory number of people each week.

Apostles P. M. Hanson and J. W. Rushton, after five months' work in Southern Australia, are now in the northern part of that continent, where they expect to continue for some months. They report a splendid body of young people, some of whom may come to Graceland College, especially if the situation improves with regard to the admission of missionaries.

A letter from C. L. Monro, of Missouri, says a statement in the New England HERALD is incorrect, that the Brockton, Massachusetts, Religio was organized in 1907, for it should be 1896, with eight members and that George L. Munro was president.

Elder Hubert Case has purchased a home at Union and Maple, Independence, Missouri, and is moving his family to that place immediately. Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Church and child (Mrs. Church being a daughter of Brother and Sister Case) are moving to Independence at the same time.

Elder Levi Gamet reports a pleasant trip on his way to the Southland from Nebraska. He visited Independence and Saint Louis on the way, enjoying the hospitality of Saints and friends at these points. For the first time in all his ministerial experience he enjoyed the experience of a sleeping car from Saint Louis to Mobile. He finds the Saints of the South the same warm-hearted people found everywhere and believes it is the gospel influence that makes them so. He is staying at the home of Sister Jane Dent, Ross Street and Bay Avenue, Mobile, Alabama, where letters may be addressed.

Elder Paia sailed from San Francisco on June 19 for his homeland, on board the Tosua. There were several on board who spoke the Tahitian language, so he will have company for the trip.

A successful two-day meeting is reported from Coleman, Michigan, the discourses being given by Elders E. Welsh, G. W. Burt, McDonald, Bailey, Willis Schrock, E. S. White, S. Pendleton, and James Davis. There were several baptisms and the services of a high order. Saints were present from Clare, Beaverton, Bentley, Rose City, Midland, Saginaw, Bay City, Flint, and elsewhere.

The new appointment of Elder E. J. Gleazer being Massachusetts District, Providence objective, the Saints of Archbald, Pennsylvania, recently tendered him a farewell reception, the speeches setting forth the fact that he had come to Archbald when it was but a tender twig, but had nourished it till it had grown strong enough to stand on its feet and maintain its own growth. He had baptized many into the fold and been a sustaining force to the various departments of the work. A substantial purse was given him and the Saints all joined in extending their best wishes for his continued success in his new field.

We are pleased to be able to report in The Staff department of this issue the full program of the recent successful musical festival and institute at Independence, under the direction of the Department of Music for the benefit of Zion, Kansas City and Holden Stakes. It was attended and very inspirational from every standpoint. Though the mere reading of a program without the pleasure of enjoying its rendition is disappointing in a way, we believe the plan should be of much more value to other communities throughout the church. And we hope soon to publish a transcript of the sermon by Brother Elbert Smith. We are sure the Saints will appreciate the efforts of Brother Mills in his reunion trip to the North, the itinerary of which is printed in the same department.

The July number of Autumn Leaves, "dedicated to the growing army of valiant boys in the church" is almost exclusively a Boy Scout number. It contains a message to the boys of the church from their general leader, Floyd M. McDowell, greetings from the Presidency, Twelve, and Bishopric, some excellent articles, poems, editorials, and pictures. It is altogether a pleasing number that the boys should appreciate. The editor calls attention to an error in the statement that Mrs. Alice Mae Burgess had resigned as editor of The Parthenon. She has resigned as supervisor of the young women's bureau but continues as editor of the department. Miss Zilpha Monroe, of Lamoni, Iowa, is the new supervisor and also at the head of the girls' department of the general Religio.

Elder Frank B. Almond and wife, Elder F. V. Elliott and wife, and Sister Ethel Hanson leave for San Francisco on Sunday, July 4, to sail on the Morama on July 12 for their mission in the Society Islands. Elder H. A. Merchant and family, of Omaha, will leave for the same mission in September.

FROM THE BRANCHES

Clay Cross, England. The Sunday school gave a service of songs on Whitsunday afternoon and evening, the first of its kind in our branch. It was greatly enjoyed by all present, and all were pleased with the success of the scholars. On Whit-Tuesday the scholars were all entertained at a free tea in the church room, and on Whit-Wednesday they were all taken to Matlock by wagonettes free. On returning they all expressed themselves as having had a jolly time, and their hopes are like ours, that we may have many more of these gatherings.

Denver, Colorado. The Sunday school gave a Children's Day program June 27. At eleven o'clock Elder H. W. Smith was the speaker on "Be prepared." Ten children were baptized. Brother Smith was the speaker at eight o'clock also, giving a Children's Day sermon. Sister Will Cowan's Religio class, in their play May 18, cleared $32.30 for the conference auditorium fund. This was accomplished in spite of great difficulties, and speaks well for the class and its leader.

Bisbee, Arizona. The Bisbee Branch has been enjoying a series of special meetings during the month of June. Brother William Anderson, missionary to Arizona, has been the principal speaker. We also had the pleasure of a visit from Brother and Sister F. G. Pitt, who are on their way to California. Brother Pitt gave several blessings, preached several times and showed his Palestine views three evenings. He also addressed the priesthood on Sunday afternoon while Sister Pitt addressed the women of the branch. We appreciated their visit very much. We are also pleased to have Brother William Anderson's family with us during the summer. The Religio held their business session on Sunday afternoon, the 20th, resulting in election as follows: T. R. Davis, superintendent, Forest Harrell, superintendent boys' department, Gertie Davis, superintendent girls' department, Jessie Gibson, secretary, Leslie Davis, treasurer. Provision was also made for the following committees: calling, flower, music, and missionary.

Waterloo, Iowa. The conference, June 11, 12, and 13, was one that will linger long in the minds of all those that attended. The glimpses of the progress the church is making along so many lines fairly puts one on tiptoe to know how to move that we might not be left far, far behind in the great advance of the army of the Lord. The spirit of peace rested over us to a remarkable degree. The young people were well cared for in their privileges. An early morning hike with a breakfast on the banks of the Cedar was greatly enjoyed on Saturday morn and on Sunday morn thirteen of these young Saints gathered at the same place and engaged in an inspiring prayer meeting. Next comes the reunion. "Let's go!" Smallpox has been in our midst, but as it has been with us as a branch God has been ever near to bless and heal and all the sick are on the rapid road to recovery. Brother Amos Berve, district president, came to the branch Friday to stay a few days to counsel and advise.

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. We, in Philadelphia, are alive and active. We have just finished a series of evangelistic meetings. We are not looking for tangible results at present, but hope that some seed was sown that will mature in its own due time. On June 12 we held our annual Sunday school picnic. During our relay games we discovered some hidden talent. Six handsome loving cups had been presented by the seniors to be given to the six best relay teams. We yelled and jumped and applauded, cheering our favorites until they rounded the homeward curve, then with breathless impatience we saw the victors touch the goal. Much to our chagrin, we discovered that no team had been arranged to include our pastor and other senior teachers. But we expect some time in the near future to see if a Canadian can outrun a Philadelphian. An organization that is still in the embryo stage is our Photography Club for all "camera nuts." We are going to develop our own films on Tuesday night and print the negatives on Friday night. Other arrangements will develop later. This is an entirely new proposition for us and we would welcome any suggestions or plans from other branches. This district was anxiously looking forward to a reunion this summer but because we were unable to obtain grounds suitable, this will have to be postponed. But here's wishing those who are going to reunions a time that will exceed any past gatherings.

First Chicago. The Saints have been very fortunate recently in having opportunity to hear many splendid sermons in addition to those of the local brethren. A few weeks ago we were pleasantly surprised to have Elders J. Charles May and Paia a Metuaaro, our South Sea Island missionary. Their music was a pleasure to all, and sermon by Brother Paia made a profound impression upon all who listened. We also enjoyed Elder McKim's address on publicity, which brought to our mind many phases of the work which lie open to all. Bishop McGuire met with us for the Wednesday prayer service and gave a splendid sermon the following Sunday morning. The Saints who attended the Deselm conference are warm in their praises of the hospitable and cordial treatment accorded them by the Saints there, and report an excellent conference. All are looking forward to the winter conference in Chicago. The Children's Day exercises were enjoyed by all. Instead of the usual way of having the children entertain the older members of the school, the tables were turned and the older members of the school entertained the children. A small blooming plant was presented to each child in remembrance of the occasion. At the conference Florence Bourbonaise was baptized, making another member for our branch. All are looking forward to the joint picnic at Villa Park on July 4, and an exceptionally good time is looked forward to. Splendid games and races have been arranged.

Spokane, Washington. The interest of the people at Couer d'Alene, where the reunion is to be held has already been aroused through the series of meetings held there by S. N. Gray and J. A. Bronson. S. N. Gray was elected branch president recently. Brother Bronson was with us on Sunday, May 30, and told the Saints of the General Conference and its wonderful events, inspiring us to greater efforts in the Zion movement. Wilbur F. Yates, district president, was here June 6 and 7, preaching both evenings.

Durango, Colorado. Children's Day exercises were held on June 20 at our usual place of worship, Woodmen Hall on Main Street. In addition to a very good program by the children, William B. Farley addressed the children. A new normal class has been organized, with John T. Scannell as leader. Brethren Amos T. Higdon and Chester Young will be with us for ten days to hold services. They were welcome to our community and our homes, as are any of God's people.

Knobnoster, Missouri. We begin the new year with renewed hopes and zeal. Have adopted the "group" plan in our branch, and the "budget system" in our finances, both of which give promise. Four were called by baptism last Sunday; others will follow soon. Brethren C. C. Joehnk and E. E. Petre are keeping a monthly appointment at the Crab Orchard Union Church, twelve miles southwest. The branch has paid out on our new church building, and will dedicate soon. Date will be announced later. Word from Lexington, Missouri, informs that Gomer R. Macrae, who was ordained at Warrensburg the 20th, preached his first sermon at Lexington, Sunday, the 27th.

II. To Be Temperate in All Things and Honest with All People.

Some years ago the writer had occasion to attend a lecture by a Mrs. Weed, who at the time was gaining some little notoriety by lecturing against "Mormonism." In the course of her remarks she said, "At almost any hour of the day or night Joe Smith might have been found drinking, smoking, and carousing with his fellows in the old Mansion House."

This is but one of many false statements that go to make up the average popular "expose of Mormonism." One attending such a lecture can hardly escape a feeling of humiliation or sorrow when honored and honorable names are thus smeared over by the filthy paw of slander. And yet there is deep consolation in one thought, as we expressed it to the lecturer at the close of her effort, "Mrs. Weed, some of your statements caused us a degree of pain; but not nearly so much as we would have felt had they been true."

On this very matter of the Mansion House, Josiah Quincy, in his Figures of the Past, said: "On the right, as we entered the house, was a small and very comfortless looking barroom; all the more comfortless, perchance, from its being a dry barroom, as no spirituous liquors were permitted at Nauvoo."

The articles of incorporation filed at the State capitol forbade the sale of liquors in the Mansion House. Under Joseph Smith's management it was one of the very few public houses of the time with a "dry barroom." They are not so much of a curiosity now.

Article nine of the articles of incorporation of the Nauvoo House, as approved by Thomas Carlin, governor, and witnessed by Stephen A. Douglas, secretary of state, is as follows: "It is moreover established as a perpetual rule, of said house, to be observed by all persons who may keep or occupy the same, that spirituous liquors of every description are prohibited, and that such liquor shall never be vended as a beverage, or introduced into common use, in said house."—Millennial Star, vol. 18, pp. 391, 392.

So much for Mrs. Weed's fanciful tale about drinking and carousing—we can but wonder where she put up in Burlington.

The facts are that the church during the life of Joseph Smith was in favor of the strictest temperance. Joseph Smith did not drink, smoke, or carouse, at the old Mansion House or elsewhere. By example and precept he opposed the use of intoxicants and narcotics. The church leaders not only opposed the use of string drinks, but also tea, coffee, and tobacco. All must admit that such a stand was in advance of their time. We now quote from the church law:

"Behold, verily thus saith the Lord unto you, In consequence of evils and designs which do and will exist in the hearts of conspiring men in the last days, I have warned you, and forewarn you, by giving unto you this word of wisdom by revelation, that inasmuch as any man drinketh wine or strong drink among you, behold, it is not good, neither meet in the sight of your Father, only in assembling yourselves together, to offer up your sacraments before him. And, behold, this should be wine; yea, pure wine of the grape of the vine, of your own make. And again, strong drinks are not for the belly, but for the washing of your bodies. And again, tobacco is not for the body, neither for the belly, and is not good for man, but is an herb for bruises, and all sick cattle, to be used with judgment and skill. And again, hot drinks are not for the body or belly."—Doctrine and Covenants 86: 1.

Under the provision of this law, known as the Word of Wisdom, the church stood opposed to the use of liquors and other stimulants and narcotics.

At least a part of this law was restated at a later date, as follows:

"Avoid the use of tobacco and be not addicted to strong drink in any form, that your counsel to be temperate may be made effectual by your example."—Doctrine and Covenants 119: 3.

It will be seen by this that the old ideal is still maintained and members of the church are commanded to abstain from tobacco and from strong drink in any form.

The fact is that the Saints were pioneers in the cause of prohibition. While they were in control of affairs at Kirtland, Ohio, the following resolution was adopted by the church High Council, the highest judicial body of the church, October 23, 1837:

"That we discountenance the use of ardent spirits, in any way, to sell, or to be brought into this place for sale or use."—Church History, vol. 2, p. 110.

After they had removed from Kirtland to Far West, Missouri, a similar action was had. July 26, 1838, the High Council and bishop's court adopted the following resolution:

"That we use our influence to put a stop to the selling of liquors in the city of Far West, or in our midst, that our streets may not be filled with drunkenness."—Church History, vol. 2, p. 166.

Joseph Smith himself, in a letter to the church, gave this advice on the subject of temperance.

"Brethren, from henceforth let truth and righteousness prevail and abound in you, and in all things be temperate, abstain from drunkenness, profane language, and from everything which is unrighteous and unholy, and from the very appearance of evil: be honest one with another; for it seemeth some have come short in this thing, and some have been uncharitable towards their brethren who were indebted to them: while they have been dragged about in chains and cast into dungeons: such persons will have their turn and sorrow in the rolling of the great wheel; for it rolleth and none can hinder: remember whatsoever measure you mete it shall be measured to you again."—Times and Seasons, vol. 1, p. 86.

The cause of temperance has made great headway during the past few years. In many places now it is popular to be an advocate of prohibition. But it must be remembered that in the times when the church passed the resolutions quoted and the leading men penned the words that we have reproduced it was not so. Then nearly everyone drank. Even preachers kept a decanter on the sideboard from which to moisten the dry pages of the commentators. Great statesmen interviewed King Alcohol before attempting to manage the affairs of the greatest republic on earth. Orators looked through an inverted glass for inspiration.

Credit should be given where credit is due. Because of inspiration, or goodness of heart, or clearness of intellect, the leaders of the church saw the evils resident in strong drink and its associates, narcotics and the lesser stimulants, and waged a very effectual warfare against those evils long before public sentiment was aroused to the gravity of the situation.

Honesty in Business Matters

Honesty between man and man in business matters, as well as in spiritual matters, is an essential characteristic of good citizenship. Were the Saints good citizens?

In the Book of Doctrine and Covenants we find this commandment: "Behold, it is my will that you should pay all your debts."

The Saints accepted that commandment literally. It is true that during their sojourn in Ohio, in the regions about Kirtland, in 1836 and 1837, they became involved in financial difficulties, during the business depression and bank failures of those days. But that was the common experience of men at the time.

After their removal to Missouri they sent an agent, Oliver Granger, back to Ohio, to settle all just claims held by creditors. (See Journal of History, October, 1909.)

During the sojourn of the church in Nauvoo the principle of honesty as enunciated in the Book of Covenants was still observed and enforced. Individuals moving to Nauvoo from branches of the church in the East, and elsewhere, were not received unless they had settled with all creditors before coming. We quote from the minutes of a General Conference held in 1840, appearing in Times and Seasons, vol. 1, p. 136:

"President Hyrum Smith arose and stated that there were several individuals, who on moving to this place, had not settled with their creditors and had no recommend from the branches of the church where they had resided.

"On motion, Resolved, That those persons moving to this place, who do not bring a recommend, be disfellowshipped."

Concerning the character of the Saints in Ohio, Robert Lucas, governor of Ohio from 1832 to 1836, wrote to President Van Buren, from Burlington, Iowa, April 22, 1839, as follows:

"I think it due to that people to state, that they had for a number of years a community established in Ohio, and that while in that State they were (as far as I ever heard) believed to be an industrious, inoffensive people; and I have no recollection of having ever heard of any of them being charged in that State as violators of the law."

The following also is of interest concerning the character of the Saints as citizens in Missouri and Illinois:

"When the testimony on both sides is carefully weighed, it must be admitted that the Mormons in Missouri and Illinois were, as a class, a more moral, honest, temperate, hard-working, self-denying, and thrifty people than the Gentiles by whom they were surrounded.—Bancroft's History of Utah, 1890, p. 164.

Justice will be done the church sometime, and it will be understood that the Saints of that early day entertained excellent ideals concerning the priceless virtues that make for good citizenship and high Christian character.

[EDITORS' NOTE: This is the second of a series of five articles by the author on this subject; the third will appear next week.]

From a man from whom we little expect it comes a deed of touching kindness, or a cool heroic surrender of life itself for another, by which he offers an atonement for his soul.—Elwood Worcester, in Religion and Life.

On Debates

Some months ago we advised all local men and missionaries who contemplated engaging in a religious debate or discussion to write to the office of the Presidency before definitely committing themselves. One brother rather resented the advice, seeming to feel that his judgment was sufficient and that the Presidency did not know the last word on debating. The Presidency does not claim to embody all wisdom in that line but may be able to refer the matter to those who have had experience.

Many of our men have had experience and are prepared to defend their cause; we do not reflect upon them; but unless there is such a storehouse of experience to draw from one may very readily be put at a great disadvantage in the matter of propositions. There are tricks in all trades, and some of our adversaries are very expert in drawing up propositions so as to secure for themselves an advantage.

Again, an inexperienced man may put himself at a disadvantage. A case in point: a local elder formulated propositions and signed them and submitted them to one of the shrewdest and most unscrupulous of our adversaries. They were accepted. Then at that late day the local elder wrote to one of the apostles, asking him to come on and conduct the debate. Two obstacles were encountered. First, the apostle was booked for other fields for months to come. Second, the propositions were such that he would not debate them. They were one-sided, and furthermore placed us, by implication at least, in the attitude of discrediting the Bible the while we defended the Book of Mormon. They were all that our adversary could ask for in the way of propositions.

And yet our own man had drafted them and signed them. He had committed the church and put us in a very unenviable position: to go into a debate under a handicap, or to repudiate his work and stand the charge of backing down under fire. Had he first sought advice this might have been avoided.

Again, the necessity and wisdom of holding the debate at all should always be considered. The day is past, if it ever existed, when it is necessary for us to meet every unprincipled, unauthorized mud-slinger who raises his voice against us. This is especially true where we are well established and well known. In such places we can afford to demand that the man who is to meet us shall be a gentleman and represent some established organization. There are times in pioneer work on the frontier where our men must meet every comer in argument or get out; but such instances are becoming fewer. In fact the day of the rough and tumble religious discussion is happily passing, in most places.

Again, it is noticeable that some of our opponents are very, very ardent to meet us in places where we have a strong following and they have none; but they do not care to meet us where they have a following. In other words they will debate where they have everything to gain—nothing to lose. They should be forced to reciprocate. The old proposition to the Utah people, for instance, to debate in Lamoni and repeat the debate in Salt Lake City, was a fair proposition. They preferred, however, to meet us in the Brick Church in Lamoni and keep the Tabernacle in Salt Lake City hermetically sealed against us.

In a general way we feel to repeat the advice formerly given. Be sure of your grounds, your proposition, your man, and the needs of the situation locally, before going into a discussion.

The Church Library

From its beginning the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints has attempted to build up and maintain a church library. From time to time the appointment was made by the Presidency and confirmed by the General Conference. At times it was placed under the supervision of the Presidency and Presiding Bishopric.

In the meantime, the departments of church work, the Sunday school and Religio were appointing all through the country local librarians, building up small Sunday school libraries, and when the later organization was formed, Religio libraries. This included not only Bibles, Books of Mormon, and songbooks, but also good literature and books of general interest.

As far back as 1864, nine months after the organization of the branch in Saint Louis, a special entertainment was held, and money placed in the hands of the Bishop for the library.

This part of the work has grown from those early days until now. It did result at one time in a diffuse effort. We have known of cases where three books of the same kind were purchased, as volume 1 of the Church History, one for each local library, kept in the same room, but none of them had either the second or third volume. Because of this, and because of the appreciation that these were after all but departments of church work, the Library Commission was formed, in 1907 representing the general church and these two special departments.

But the work of the church has expanded, and the number of separate departments increased. For the local work scattered all over the world the principal effort is to secure good reading, or the reading of a better class of literature. There should be collections of the church books in each locality, and the public and private libraries should be brought into use, as well as books purchased for the local library.

For the general church interest, each department work requires its own library facilities. This is true of the College, of the Sanitarium, of the Children's Home, of the Old Folks' Home, of the First Presidency, the Presiding Bishopric, and editorial rooms; and it is especially true of the church historian, so far as it affects our own publications of books and papers now out of print, and various publications attacking the church.

For the local libraries and for the department libraries, books are wanted which are up to date. A reprint is as convenient as the original copy. The new books are of more value and use than are old publications. But the historian's office needs as complete a file as possible of original copies of books and periodicals and newspapers published by the church, or by our opponents as dealing with our work.

Pursuant to this, a recent appeal has been made by the historical department, for original copies of The Evening and the Morning Star, Messenger's Advocate, Elder's Journal, Times and Seasons, Millennial Star, Voree Herald, The Seer, The Messenger, and The Prophet. Also for any publications issued by the church or any of its factions, as a periodical, manuscript, tract, or book.

The church at one time possessed a good collection of books concerning our own and other religions, but most unfortunately many of these books were lost in the Herald Office fire of 1907.

In the past these valuable documents have been gathered into various private libraries. It may be that the book was given to a man occupying a certain position in the church, because it would seem to be most useful in his hands. He placed it in his private library, so it has gone to his family at his death, instead of to the church. Lack of care by the church promoted this course, also many of these rare books have been secured by individuals through great self-denial. Doubtless this mistake has been made, though with good intentions.

Time and time again has a library been secured for those going upon certain missions, and when the man returned from the mission he has a good library, either donated or largely purchased with his own funds through self-denial. Then for the next missionary it has been necessary again to secure a similar library.

We are pleased to note the request issued by the Presidency to secure a mission library—a library doubtless to be passed on, to be used in connection with the work in certain missions by anyone who enters in the work there. But the books will belong to the church, and to the mission library, so that the new missionary will have immediate access thereto. They do not become the private property of any individual.

It is, of course, unfortunate that some valuable books were lost in 1907, but the most valuable were preserved, and every effort is made to see that these valuable documents are preserved in a safe, fireproof place.

We know from experience that access can be had to these records most valuable, and that all books except those that are extremely rare are kept on public display. This is true of Tullidge's history, of the Times and Seasons, and many other works of which a duplicate copy may be possessed.

It is strongly urged that these rare publications do not be given to individuals, but that they be presented to the general church for the use of its library interests. These rare books may then very properly be placed in charge of the historian, but belonging to the historical department, so that all historians and their successors may have access thereto, with other interested individuals and books of special interest to other departments placed where most accessible.

It is to the interest of all of us that a good collection of rare works on archaeology and other subjects in which we are especially interested be preserved at some place to which we may have access upon occasion, rather than being scattered widely abroad. It is to our best interests that rare church publications be gathered so they can be used by all of us and consulted.

A return is being now made to the earlier plan, by which a church librarian was appointed by the First Presidency. It is a very important work, requiring great discretion and ability, to see that these books are not only preserved, but that they are also placed where they will be of the utmost possible use to the church, not simply for a few individuals.

It has been a source of complaint that so many books and periodicals purchased with church funds are not made accessible. We look in the near future for the establishment of at least one, if not more library buildings, in which books can be cared for in accordance with their value, and where all recent books and publications purchased by the church can be made reasonably accessible to all—a library ideal.

A fireproof building is needed in which the books can be properly cared for, and the most rare books absolutely preserved, and a librarian who is thoroughly competent to purchase and care for books. Requests from different department heads would go to this librarian, and a certain amount would be set apart for the purchase monthly of such books as are needed.

These books should then be made accessible by special display, so that all who are interested may have ready access to them.

Our ideal is the good of the whole, not the gain of individuals.

Malnutrition--The Relation of Weight to Height of Children

The reports of the Children's Bureau Conferences held in May and June, 1919, as given under the general heading, "Child welfare," are decidedly refreshing, because of the frank way in which every problem is discussed pro and con.

As an instance we may refer to the child of school age. There are a number of standards set up that a child of this age should maintain. Efforts have been made through lunches at the schoolhouse for provision for making up the deficiency of feeding at home. Also the laying down of rules with regard to personal cleanliness, the necessity for sleep, the elimination of tea and coffee, and all narcotics, attention to defective teeth, the careful mastication of food, not using water to wash down unmasticated food, sitting quietly through the meal, instead of eating standing up and moving around.

It is found that with the school feeding, the children gain, and yet if the feeding were continued they would gain more during the period they were not attending school.

The following paragraph is part of the discussion on this subject:

"There are exceptions to this general rule. One child, who was considerably underweight in the beginning, has made almost a continuous and rapid increase in weight. He is now as much overweight as he was underweight at the beginning of the class. This result has come about despite the fact that he has consistently ignored practically all the recommendations made. He has refused to rest, he has refused to give up the use of tea and coffee, he has refused to go to bed early enough to get what we consider a requisite amount of sleep, he has refused to have defective teeth removed or treated, and in general disregarded all the questions of slow eating, of not using water to wash down the unmasticated food, and remaining seated during the meal hour. The one thing which he has done is to increase the caloric intake. It is one of the cases where more food seemed to be the essential requirement; and having that greater amount of nourishment he was able to overcome all the handicaps of physical defects, bad habits, and bad environment.

"The general condition cannot, however, be dealt with in this superficial manner. Too many children are underweight, and constantly so, for us to be satisfied with any special cases such as this. We must seek a reason for the failures of these children to increase in weight. The first condition which we may consider as an explanation for this failure is that of a possible biological variation which has not yet been completely understood. We have assumed that the maximum variation possible for a normal child is seven per cent. Certain individual cases lead us to suspect, however, that a normal variation of considerably more than this is possible. It may be that some children are biologically much lighter in weight for their height than other children."

Other causes are suggested, as emotional disturbance, an unusual stress of certain periods of the school life.

Doctor Emerson suggests that tea and coffee are perhaps the most important single cause of malnutrition:

Three Perils Menacing Our Modern Educational System

Elder Wardell Christy has kindly taken the trouble to report a lecture given by Robert McWatty Russell on "Church education." He has written it up in three installments, the first of which appears in this issue, together with his own comment.

While we do not know of anyone within our church membership who holds such ideas as are set forth under pretentious psychology and pedantic pedagogy, still it is well that we should know and be conversant with the conditions existing in the world, and if there should be any holding any such ideas, in the church, their ideas should be properly corrected. That there is such a tendency growing out of some aspects of German literature, is doubtless true; but the statements of Doctor Russell go beyond anything that we have run across in many years' careful reading. It would be a grievous mistake to think that these ideas and materialism dominate either modern psychology or pedagogy. The articles contain some splendid material and deserve careful reading.

Subjects Being Discussed

Graceland's New Course

Much interest is being taken in the announcement made in last week's issue by Graceland College to the effect that they were adding a new course this year in social and recreational leadership "to prepare leaders to carry out in the church communities of the land the general Religio program for social and recreational activities."

In addition to the strong group of young men and women listed as the faculty, R. C. Smith, son of the late president of the church, who has been attending the University of Iowa, has decided he will join forces with Graceland in this good work in preference to accepting flattering offers elsewhere which do not bring the same satisfaction of true service.

We have always maintained that once the church set into operation a definite program that gave promise of some immediate results there would be no lack of enthusiastic supporters.

It will be noted that the people whose names appear in this connection in the college announcement are going to spare time from their otherwise busy schedule to take care of this work. They are willing to do this because they know it will bear fruit in the lives of those who take the training.

The church has for a long time needed specially trained leaders in recreational activities, and we are much elated at the prospect of getting them through this beginning. Once we get a goodly number trained in this way, their influence will be manifested in the development of many others in the local work.

Labor Approves League of Nations

During its late fortieth annual convention the American Federation of Labor, presided over by Samuel Gompers continues its approval of the League of Nations. The executive council had a year previous declared in favor of an international pact among the nations to insure peace, and the matter was brought up in the report of the committee on international relations, in which they indorsed this declaration.

The debate was extended and included a number of surprising features, but concluded satisfactorily by approving the League of Nations and asking the Senate to ratify the peace treaty. "I cannot recall," said President Gompers, "an instance where the labor movement has failed to place itself on record in favor of international peace. The American Federation of Labor has used its influence and power to tranquilize the world against war of man upon man."

Investigating for the railroad brotherhood, W. J. Lauck states that the woolen mills' profit for the present year will approximate five times the amount taken in 1910; and the garment manufacturers' profits are at the present three and a half times the 1910 average. So it is easy to understand the increased cost of clothing.

BY A. B. PHILLIPS

Not only did the aborigines of America build aqueducts, but they also constructed great reservoirs, some of which are found at considerable depths underground. To reach these underground water repositories winding paths were devised that enable one safely to traverse the distance and pass by those who might be going in the opposite direction. Somewhat allied to these constructions were the great canals, which were doubtless used for both irrigation and transportation purposes. In some instances these canals were so constructed and located that they might well have been employed for the transportation of the great stones that were used in some of their buildings. These stones must have may be to some extent classified according to their distinctive forms. While much speculation has been indulged in by various observers as to the purposes of these mounds, perhaps the most rational conclusion is that some were used for defensive purposes, others for burials, and a few exceptional forms devoted to religious work. On some of the mounds it is probable that wooden buildings once stood, but with the mutations of time these have long since passed away, for it is evident that at least some of them were built many centuries before the discovery by Columbus.

As we go westward the character of the remains changes to some extent, but seems to indicate the truth of the Book of Mormon account which says that they builded of wood and also of cement work. It also tells us of the fortifications that were built to protect their cities, and this is borne out by the large size and significant shape of many of the remains that may still be more or less closely observed. In one mound Doctor Fewkes, of the Smithsonian Institution, discovered prehistoric ruins of unusual interest. The Boston Herald of January 16, 1916, reports of this: "The mound, the largest of any thus far located, was in Mesa Verde National Park, in New Mexico, and apparently was built for religious rites and ceremonials. It has been named Sun Temple. There are 25 rooms; and the walls, which total more than 1,000 feet in length, average four feet thick." This mound does not appear to be as ancient as some of those previously referred to, and this is perhaps true of most if not all the remains in this part of the country. It is in this territory that are found the celebrated cliff dwellings, the existence of which was unknown until Simpson's discovery in 1849, and the reports of which were first made by Hayden in 1874-76 to the United States Government.

been, in many cases, brought from long distances, and probably could have been conveyed by water more readily than in any other manner for at least a considerable portion of the way.

Remarkable Variety of Structures

When one reads the history of the ancient American nations as found in the only volume that presents the interesting details of their activities recorded by their own historians, it is possible more fully to appreciate the varied character of their development. The Book of Mormon occupies in this respect as unique a place as does the Bible with respect to the ancients of the Eastern World. While this series does not assume to exhaust the rich reservoir of its treasures, nor by a lengthy verbatim recital collate them for purposes of research, it places in juxtaposition some of the principal points of the historical document with the discoveries that relate to them. The number and remarkable coincidence of these items will be convincing to the observant reader, from the fact that nothing had been presented sufficiently to comprise the substance of what the Book of Mormon contained when it was published in 1829.

In North America, particularly in Ohio and Michigan, many remains have been discovered of what once constituted a vast body of people, whose construction of mounds in great variety has given them the name of Mound Builders. The mounds, of which there are a vast number that still remain,

It appears according to the Book of Mormon, that the cliff dwellings of these prehistoric people were built by a numerous band or secret order that were known as Gadianton robbers. They were strongly built in the most inaccessible sides of the mountains

under overhanging cliffs usually, and served as places of retreat for the robbers when returning from a plundering expedition. In time this band became so numerous and well intrenched that it became almost impossible to dislodge them from their cunningly devised strongholds.

Some of these ruins are of considerable size, and extend for many miles intermittently. The openings, that served as doorways, were sometimes built wider from a point about three feet high and upward, and thus the plunder carried on the back of a robber was more quickly admitted as he hastily retreated through the doorway. For this purpose the stolen goods may have been carried in large sacks or bundles that could be quickly made up ready for flight. The character of the ruins seems to harmonize with this explanation quite closely.

The civic and private activities of this remarkable people also included granaries, quarries, mines, forts, pyramids, and lookout towers, scattered over thousands of miles of North and South America, that would require many volumes in order to give a detailed description of them. The Incan empire alone covered more than two thousand miles of territory, some of which is literally strewn with relics of various kinds. The references to many of these constructions noted in the Book of Mormon show an intimate knowledge of the work of their builders, and throw a considerable amount of light on the subject that the remains do not always reveal.

It is in this way that we learn that over fifteen hundred years ago civilization among the Lamanites became darkened by the offering of women and children in great numbers as human sacrifices to idols. The following account is only one instance of the terrible conflicts between them and the Nephites, which resulted in the destruction of the latter as a nation: "And when they had come the second time, the Nephites were driven and slaughtered with an exceeding great slaughter; their women and their children were again sacrificed unto idols." That great numbers of captives were thus sacrificed has been quite clearly substantiated. Over a considerable portion of the territory where these people once dwelt have been found monuments of many shapes, and of various sizes from two feet to nearly thirty. Some of these clearly show that they were connected with idolatrous worship and human sacrifices. It is thought, however, that some of these were for a much more useful purpose originally, while others were never of idolatrous significance. It is quite certain that some of them are of historical meaning, as the inscriptions on them will show. This will be noted in another part of our subject.

Ancient Mining and Metals

At first it was generally supposed that iron was unknown to the American nations, but this opinion has been radically changed, and to-day some of the most critical observers consider it proven that it was in familiar use in the cutting of the great stones used in building as well as in many other instances. The Book of Mormon tells us that they had this useful metal as well as gold, silver, copper, and other metals. Some of the native languages had names for iron and must have been the result of employing it in their work at some time, probably. It is considered impossible that the many objects in diorite, granite, trachyte, basalt and other hard rocks could have been carved without the use of tools of iron or some similar metal. The skillful work done in the hardest stone represents an enormous amount of labor even if it had been done with the most perfectly finished modern tools, and so extensive and numerous are these remains that it must have required centuries to complete them under favorable conditions. Mr. Squier says the world has nothing to surpass the stone cutting and fitting at Cuzco.

In the days of a very oppressive ruler the people were subject to severe taxation, which was levied largely on their metals. The Book of Mormon states: "And he laid a tax of one fifth part of all they possessed; a fifth part of their gold and of their silver, and a fifth part of their ziff, and of their copper, and of their brass and their iron." In another place ziff is mentioned with other metals as having been used to ornament some of their "elegant" buildings. What metal is here meant is not certain, but it seems probable that it refers to either platinum or tin. Next to Russia, the greatest supply of platinum found anywhere in the world is said to be in Columbia, South America. Professor Holmes, however, specifically mentions the knowledge of tin and alloyed metals among the ancient Chiriquians; and Doctor Peschel states that the Yucatecs and Mexicans were acquainted with copper and bronze, the Peruvians also having had battle-axes and lances with bronze blades, while "the northern nations used gold dust enclosed in quills, bars of tin and copper, and also cocoa beans, as money."—Races of Man, p. 446.

"The newspapers announce that many foreigners are seeking homes in America. Quite true, but so are many Americans."—Mark Cross.

"A certain firm of shoe dealers in New York, intent on testing the extent of public gullibility, unpacked a case of shoes just bought from the factory at nine dollars the pair. They were all one kind of shoe, sold to them at the one price. They put six pairs in the window and marked them at $15, $18, $20, $22, $25, $28 respectively. At the end of the week the $15, $18, and $20 shoes were still in the window, but the store shelf was empty, the public having bought all except those three pairs at the higher prices. The public has got to learn 'horse sense' and to cease from squandering before the profiteer can finally be brought to book."—Jerusalem News.

Three Perils Menacing Our Modern Educational System

BY WARDELL CHRISTY

"Our modern educational system is imperiled from three sources: an exaggerated materialism, a pretentious psychology, and a pedantic pedagogy."

There has been so much said of late years on the subject of education that one is made to wonder if there is much more to be said that would aid us in our research for truth. We will assume that every member of the church believes in knowing, and is anxious to obtain the knowledge that is best calculated to make us free, a thing that we could scarcely boast of at the present time. What I am about to say upon this subject is very largely a copy from an address to the graduation class of the Moody Bible Institute, by the Reverend Robert McWatty Russell, D. D., LL. D. He said: "Modern Christendom is confronted by the appalling defects of its educational system. Chief among these is the tendency to eliminate the Christian element."

I believe it was Horace Mann who said, "Scientific truth is marvelous, but moral truth is divine; and whoever breathes its air and walks by its light has found the lost paradise." I am fully convinced that there are important truths and that there are vital truths, and that the vital truths are to be found in Christ, "in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." And I feel like saying with Hosea, "Come, and let us return unto the Lord; for he hath torn, and he will heal us; he hath smitten, and he will bind us up. After two days will he revive us; in the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight. Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord; his going forth is prepared as the morning; and he shall come unto us as the rain, as the latter and former rain unto the earth." (Hosea 6: 1-3.) May God help us to see the importance of Christian education.

But back to Doctor Russell: "Education is intended to acquaint man with his true environment, and to train him to live in harmony therewith." "To educate," says Webster, "is to instill into the mind principles of art, science, morals, religion, and behavior." "To educate in the arts is important; in religion indispensable."

"Our modern educational system is imperiled from three sources: An exaggerated materialism, a pretentious psychology, and a pedantic pedagogy."

Materialism

The German system of public instruction, so long held up as a model for the world, consisted largely in "systems of science, philosophy, and theology wrought out by minds that had thrown the supreme emphasis of thought upon the material. Every true scholar must rejoice in our modern triumph in the realm of natural science. It is to the credit of modern life that in the last fifty years we have made more progress in the physical sciences than was secured in the previous two thousand years. Obtaining mastery over nature is in accord with God's original purpose for humanity, and the charter of man's liberty to study nature and dominate her forces was given in the morn of creation, when God, viewing both nature and man, the crown of his creation, issued the command, "Subdue it." But it is lamentable that man in making a closer scrutiny of the earth should lose his vision of the sky; that because of finding fireflies in the meadows he should forget the stars, and that through an increased knowledge of things physical the modern generation should be taught to worship at the shrine of matter, force, and motion, ignoring the spiritual trinity of "Father, Son, and Holy Spirit." Materialism is a menace to modern life.

A Pretentious Psychology

"We suffer likewise from a pretentious psychology. Psychology is a noble science. The science of mental phenomena, as dependent upon or correlated with physical changes, is worthy of much attention, but it should not exclude theology or rob mankind of spiritual treasures." Pope was roaming in a mental fog when he wrote:

"Know then thyself, presume not God to scan,
The proper study of mankind is man."

With vision clarified as to our nature and needs, we can answer:

Look thou on high; thy source is not the clod,
The proper study of mankind is God.

A pretentious psychology would account for all the spiritual phenomena of sainthood, ancient and modern, without recognizing the existence of a personal, self-revealing God, or world-Savior, historically accredited by his resurrection from the dead.

A pretentious psychology finds no need for the activity of the Holy Spirit in the phenomena of conversion. The new life produced by regeneration is classified as a movement of adolescence. The faith of the early disciples in the resurrection of Jesus is traced to the mere subjective experiences of men in whose hearts there was a struggle of sorrow and hope.

Christian ethics the world of course needs, but it is presumed that these may be accepted and retained without definitely relating them to the divine teacher. In other words, our modern psychologist proceeds cheerfully to cut down the tree of historic Christianity, vainly imagining that its ethical shade will remain for world life. While boldly eliminating from the gospel record all that lays claim to the miraculous and finding no source for spiritual phenomena outside the movements of man's own mind, these teachers still desire to be viewed as Christian men and seek to be the guides of a new generation.

Because of the prevalence of this kind of thought, young people who go forth from Christian homes with Christian faith in their hearts, return from the colleges and universities talking of "the mistakes of the Bible," the folk-lore of Genesis, "the myth of Palestine," and "the impossible theological vagaries of Paul." A pretentious psychology writes "myth" where our fathers wrote "revelation," and would substitute for the glorious light from the "Son of Righteousness" the "pale gleams from the rush-lights of human speculation."

Personally I am convinced that Jeremiah was right when he said: "O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself. It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps." And we would ask with Isaiah, "What hath directed the Spirit of the Lord, or being his counselor hath taught him? With whom took he counsel, and who instructed him in the path of judgment, and taught him knowledge, and showed to him the way of understanding?" This stupendous task has awaited the development of the pretentious psychologist of the modern times, who would dare to accept the challenge and answer: "Here am I." Well may we "beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the traditions of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ."

A Pedantic Pedagogy

"A third form of danger to our educational system is a pedantic pedagogy. Pedagogy, or the science of teaching, is important; and much good has come from rational effort to secure the best lines of approach to the child mind and the true proportion and order for the presentation of truth. But much of modern pedagogical theory, in so far as it concerns religious education, is chimerical, unscientific, and absurd."

"For instance, it is claimed that it is only after a long course of instruction that the child should be confronted with the truths that involve personal relation to God. Religion is to be taught with a reversal of the chronological order. Instead of starting with the story of creation and saying, 'In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth,' and then following this with the story of sin and human need, and God's manifestation in Christ, child religious education is to begin with the latest phases of Christian phenomena. He is to learn about religion by observing the conduct of his parents and Christian friends. Next comes the biography of modern church leaders, and in this line he is later to study the development of Christianity as seen in the lives of Luther, Calvin, and Augustine. Pushing further, there will come studies in the life of Paul and Jesus, and then the political and social life of Israel.

"In all this progress the Bible is not to be made a text-book. Indeed, none but these pretentious modern scholars, with their vision of how to eliminate the unhistorical from the Bible, can be trusted to prepare these progressive lessons for the young. Indeed, it is claimed that better illustrations for the fostering of the Christian life can be found in modern history than in Bible history. Says one, 'How few are the stories in the Old Testament that cannot be matched by better ones from recent American history! Compare any incident in the military history of Joshua with incidents in the career of Washington. Compare the story of David on his deathbed, giving bloody advice to his successor, Solomon, with that of President McKinley on his deathbed, singing, "Nearer, my God, to thee."'

"Such books as Jacob Riis's The Making of an American, Edward A. Steiner's From Alien to Citizen, Mary Antin's Promised Land, and Booker T. Washington's Up From Slavery, are considered as quite superior to the Bible for the inculcation of Christian morality and patriotism. Indeed, where the Bible is used, care must be taken not to submerge the child mind with advanced truth concerning his relation to God. Perhaps the largest truth for little children to be learned from the Bible story of the Good Shepherd is that we should be kind to animals. Later, after years of study embracing Jewish history and comparative religions, there will be provided a series of lessons on the great doctrines of Christian faith, particularly the doctrine of God, prayer, and immortality."

The above is a true exhibit of the scheme of certain forms of modern pedagogy for the education of the child. How far it is from the Biblical way and the natural way is easy to discern. The true Christian life is union with God and the development of knowledge of God through that union. The true, physical education of the child does not consist in lectures in anatomy and hygiene, and later the providing of nourishing food and the placing of the child in the mother's arms. The reverse order is the process. The personal touch and the personal ministrations come first. Life consists of living, not knowing how to live. Generations of men enjoyed and digested food before ever a book was written upon processes of digestion, or the movements of muscles that control the jaws and the existence and activity of submaxillary and sublingual glands. The men who have moved the world spiritually were not educated by this new-fangled method of pedantic pedagogy.

Moses, Samuel, and Daniel and the heroes of modern faith looked with child eyes into the face of God, and met the temptations of youth because of seeing the invisible, and of being consciously girded by the everlasting arms,

"The modern theory of religious education for childhood should hardly be dignified with the term pedantic pedagogy; it should rather be styled attenuated asininity. Modern indifference and opposition to Christian education should be met by clear and persistent challenge as to the importance and reasonableness of the Christian element in education."

Knowledge the Measure of Life

Any educational system is rational only as it includes the spiritual and puts the soul in contact with God. In both scientific and religious phases, the measure of life is knowledge. Life is high or low, broad or narrow, according to the nature of the environment with which the organism has the correspondence of knowledge. The worm life is of a low order, because its environment is limited; in fact, it knows nothing but mud. Bird life is higher because its circle of knowledge is wider, including earth and air, sunshine and shadow, song of companions and the whisper of wind in waving grain and leafy forests. Man's life stands highest in the scale of earthly being, because his is the ability for correspondence with the wider circle of reality. Man knows the elements of earth better than the worm, the tints of field and sky better than the birds. He holds a social fellowship with the people of his own age and locality, and then sweeps out to discern the historic and geographical conditions that have characterized the lives of other ages and continents. By patient research he produces multiplied sciences until his environment of knowledge includes the chemistry of earth and air, the measured pathway of comets and stars, the philosophic dreams of man concerning the origin of nature's phenomena, and indeed every interest that throbs in the heart of the race universal.

The Widest Circle of Truth

"The widest circle of truth, however, is not that which concerns sun and stars, or even race history and philosophies, but that which concerns God, the infinite One whose power lies behind all physical forces, and whose truth furnishes the light for all the broken beams that enter into human philosophies." "This is life eternal," said the great Teacher, "that they may know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." I have lately read an article that would seem to try to make us believe that it was a sin to be educated, and as with riches, "how scarcely shall a rich [or educated] man enter the kingdom of heaven."

We have also been harassed and bored with articles that evidently are written by those who believe that the widest circle of truth is that which concerns sun and stars, race history and philosophies. God save us from the time when men's eligibility and fitness to enter the ministry of Christ shall be measured by what he knows about the philosophies of men, instead of what he knows about God and to what extent his soul is in contact with God.

"The only truth, therefore, that holds within it the promise and potency of an endless and happy existence for man, is the truth that centers in Jesus Christ as the revealer of God, and thereby furnishes man with an inner life principle and an eternal environment."

It is plain to the most casual thinker that life as a function consists of harmony with an environment. Every earthly phase of man's life must, in a sense, be transient, since all earthly environments fail, while our whole assurance of a happy immortality consists in our harmonization with an eternal environment, even God in Christ. Christian education, therefore, becomes a prime necessity in any scheme of culture, which aims to take account of man's real nature and needs, and to embrace in its scope the supreme facts of life.

"For by the power of my Spirit, created I them; yea, all things both spiritual and temporal: firstly spiritual, secondly temporal, which is the beginning of my works; and again, firstly temporal, and secondly spiritual, which is the last of my work; speaking unto you that you may naturally understand, but unto myself my works have no end, neither beginning; but it is given unto you that ye may understand, because ye have asked it of me and are agreed. Wherefore, verily I say unto you, that all things unto me are spiritual, and not at any time have I given unto you a law which was temporal, neither any man, nor the children of men; neither Adam your father, whom I created; behold, I gave unto him that he should be an agent unto himself; and I gave unto him commandment, but no temporal commandment gave I unto him; for my commandments are spiritual; they are not natural nor temporal, neither carnal nor sensual."—Doctrine and Covenants 28: 8, 9.

"Christian education emphasizes the truth that we live in a spiritual universe, and that God is behind his creation. It is pathetic to think of a man in a laboratory holding in his hands the tubes of combining elements, or bending over the crucible, and yet failing to recognize that God is the Great Chemist in the laboratory of nature, that a supreme intelligence has mingled the gases of the air for our breathing, combined the elements for the waters of ocean and fountain, and arranged in a wondrous way the combinations that give us the scent of the rose, the flavor of the strawberry, and the lusciousness of the peach.

"It is equally pathetic to think of a teacher in the physical laboratory manipulating his electric machine, producing sparks and intonations, feeling a pride in his work, and recognizing that his personality and mental powers has something to do with every electric manifestation, and yet failing to bow in reverence at the thought that when night is lurid with the lightning and the storm clouds answering each other in flash and roar, there is behind this the power and personality of an infinite thinker.

"The mathematician who draws his lines upon the board, is not fit for the leadership of his class, unless he perceives that the universe has been laid out by a mathematical mind, and that we have our ideas of circles and angles because God first had his in the orbits of the planets and rock. Inventors who are proud are simply drunken with folly, for what are our greatest inventions and most splendid mechanical achievements, but meager copying of the works of God?

"Have we invented the trowel and chisel as implements for building? God gave us the models in the beaver's tail and tooth. Have we in surgery devised the scissor lance? We copied it from the probe of the black fly of the Adirondacks. Have we augers for the boring of wood, and cast-iron linings for the tunnels beneath our rivers and hills? We copied the one from the head of the locust-borer and learned the other from the ship-worm which bores by means of a funnel-like projection on its head and enamels the sides of the tunnel in its progress with the exudations from its own body. Did Eddystone erect a lighthouse to withstand the storms of a century? He patterned it from a tree trunk, and indeed erected a granite oak. Did Paxton, the gardener, outdo the architects in presenting roof plans for the Crystal Palace of London? He copied the architecture of God in the Victoria-Regia leaf. Do our modern band stands constitute wonderful contrivances for the projection of sound? We learned the method of construction by the study of the human mouth. Have we the process of making paper from wood pulp? It is as old as the world among wasps. Have we the modern camera, with its instantaneous process of making pictures? God anticipated this in his furnishing of eyes to animals and men, and provided a process of printing the picture, developing it in the dark room of consciousness, and transferring it to the halls of memory, in a way which cannot be equaled by our inventions.

"Think of what you will along the lines of our mechanical contrivances, whether they be pulleys, levers, stranded ropes, or beams and arches, and you have everything anticipated by the thought of God in the wondrous structure of the human frame or in the devices of nature. Inventions in all lines have been anticipated. Our storage batteries had a prototype in the electric flash; our armor plate in the scales of the crocodile; our plumbers' clutch wrench in the claw of the lobster; our telegraph and telephone system in the nerve lines and centers of the body. Everything beautiful in art is copied from God's work in nature. Not only do our painters find inspiration and color schemes in sunsets and landscapes, but when the weavers of old sought color and harmony for the beautiful cashmere shawls for our grandmothers, they copied these from the wings of the Indian butterfly, a creature God had made."

The more we think of the works of God, the more readily we can say with the Psalmist, "I will praise thee; for I am fearfully and wonderfully made; marvelous are thy works; and that my soul knoweth right well. My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth. Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being unperfect; and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them. How precious also are thy thoughts unto me, O God! how great is the sum of them." May God give us the key that we may unlock the treasures of heaven and "know the truth and the truth shall make us free."

A Self-Revealing God

"Christian education not only recognizes that the power of God is behind all physical phenomena, but that he is possessed of moral attributes, and is a self-revealing God. Romanes, a scientist of the last century, emerged from the doubt and unbelief into which he had been plunged by his scientific studies, through the realization that true reasoning demands belief in the existence of a self-revealing God. During the period of his skepticism he read in a magazine of science the story of the discovery of some new crustacean in the Japanese waters. The discoverer was a college friend, and later a missionary. Romanes wrote the former school friend asking how he, a man possessed of keen scientific instincts and mental powers, could still go on believing in the myth of Christianity. The missionary replied that he was a Christian because he used the same kind of common sense in his religious reasoning that he did in his scientific thinking. He pointed out that in scientific studies he had found that the possession of an organ by an organism was the pledge that there existed something in the environment which corresponded to the character of the organ. The eye stands as a pledge that there is light; the ear that there is sound; the lungs that there is air; the olfactory nerves that there are odors. Following this line, it becomes evident that since man is possessed of conscience, demanding loyalty to God and worshipful emotions, causing him to seek a throne of glory and power, therefore God must be a self-revealing God, or else man in the loftiest phases of his nature is an organized lie. Romanes accepted the logic of his friend, returned to the faith of his fathers, and wrote a book demolishing the arguments of his previously published infidelity."

Men are not laying aside their reason when they accept the facts that center in Christ. Faith is not as the facetious boy described it, "Believing what we know isn't so," but faith ever deals with fact, and is the acceptance of fact upon the basis of adequate testimony.

The Crisis in Education

BY GEORGE N. BRIGGS

"The gravity of the situation in which we found ourselves less than three years ago has not passed, has not even materially changed for the better."

"The need for readjusting programs of education to the requirements of the new era are so great as to justify the calling of a national conference of representative citizens to consider the pressing problems of education from the standpoint of statesmanship and the public welfare. At my request, the secretary of the interior is inviting the governors of the several States to attend this conference, and to appoint as delegates from each State a dozen representative citizens—men and women of affairs, business men, farmers, lawyers, representatives of labor, ministers, physicians, editors, and other publicists, club women, and educators."

In response to the above call by the United States Commissioner of Education, the Governor of Iowa appointed me as one of the Iowa delegates to this national conference on education which met in Washington, District of Columbia, in May.

The meeting was very largely attended, there being delegates from all the States of the Union and representatives from several foreign countries.

We were advised by the British Ambassador, Sir Auckland Geddes, that the English schools had gone to pieces as a result of the war and the period of reconstruction. The same was reported true of the other school systems of Europe, all of which means that the educational hope of the world rests in America. And when we were told that we are "a nation of sixth graders taught by tenth- or eleventh-grade teachers" the problem before us is appalling and we may well enough feel that there is an educational crisis to be met.

We are advised that our educational program must be nothing less than one which will "bring effectively within the reach, not only of every boy and girl, but also of every adult citizen, all the training, physical, mental, and moral, literary, technical, and scientific, of which he is capable."

We have long held this to be our ideal but the mere mention of the scores of thousands of totally illiterate, and the hundreds of thousands of practically illiterate, young men sent overseas to fight for justice and intelligent democracy, is sufficient evidence that the very first steps, even, in such a lofty objective, have not been approximately realized in America as a whole. The contemplation of this evidence, in the light of the most superficial knowledge of the conditions out of which it has grown, must convince anyone that America generally has never seriously intended that all Americans should know how to read and write even, which is assuredly the first step in bringing "effectively within reach all the training, physical, mental, and moral, literary, technical, and scientific" of which they are capable.

We have long deceived ourselves with words and phrases about "free, public, universal education." Up to the present time, we have barely the beginning here and there, of such an effective educational program as these terms ought to imply.

The educational task immediately before us is to make universally real the ideals that we have long boasted and in which the war, more than any one thing, has demonstrated our failure.

Some have said the cost would be prohibitive. The facts are, it would be almost insignificant compared with the cost of war. And there is this difference, which should never be forgotten: The cost of war is the cost of destruction; there is no guaranteed return. Indeed, the total cost may exceed manyfold the original investment, while the cost of education is returned manyfold, even in kind, in wealth-producing capacity to make the investing nation materially prosperous, but even greater is the return in intelligence, in public spirit, and in civic responsibility. Investments in the education of her children and youth, of her whole people, is the most gilt-edged investment, that any state can make. Unlike all other investments, it combines the greatest safety with the largest rate of return.

"The time has now fully arrived when education generally should be considered and treated as of great, indeed the greatest, concern. The crisis of the war helped to make this fact stand out in clear relief.

The conference emphasized the fact that we must not deceive ourselves; the gravity of the situation in which we found ourselves less than three years ago has not passed, has not even materially changed for the better. The great task of achieving real national unity is still before us; the war's crisis disclosed how far we are from this goal, and brought home the supreme importance of attaining it. Since the war ended, the every-day tragic occurrences in our social, industrial, and commercial life only emphasize and keep before us the war's disclosure and lesson. In going about this task of achieving essential national unity, education must be our great reliance.

The definite conclusion reached by the conference was that we are not now prepared. We are no more prepared to-day for the great emergencies of peace that confront us than we were prepared three years ago for the emergencies of war. Education, hasty and hectic, was our chief resource in preparing for war. Now education, deliberate, intensive, and sustained, must be our basic resource in preparing for peace.

If this is the lesson for the Nation, how much more truly is it the lesson for the church. Indeed, no one can have followed President Smith's admonition for the past twenty years and not realize his far-sightedness in this direction. Note the following from that masterpiece addressed to the late General Conference:

"For long your leader has been calling for education. Calling for it with a vigor and a zeal that was backed by an intuitive knowledge—I can go farther and say an inspired knowledge that things were before this church, the imminence of which was not at the time appreciated, that have now plunged this church in the midst of a time that we have been hoping our people would be prepared for. . . . My pleading with you . . . is that the education of the people of the church go on with even increased speed until every man and woman can feel the importance of seeing to it that every energy that he or she possesses, every ounce of nervous force that he has command of, is being spent towards his own betterment, not from a selfish motive, but with the idea of being, ultimately, of greater service to God and his church."

What response are the young men and women of the church to make to this clarion call of President Smith for greater preparation along educational lines? Now is the time to act. Now is the time to enter upon that period of preparation. It can be done at Graceland College.

In America alone it is said that the storehouses contained seven hundred million pounds of wool last September, or over one hundred million pounds more than the country's annual consumption. The so-called all-wool clothing of to-day is much of it made up of shoddy. Shoddy is simply old wool worked over, and is therefore much cheaper. There is a bill before Congress to compel the manufacturers to mark each garment with the percentage of shoddy or cotton it contains.

A SCHOOL THAT BROUGHT FARM AND TOWN TOGETHER

An article by Macy Campbell, from the June number of Successful Farming, telling of the excellent community center work of Professor Charles B. Woodstock, well-known because of his work in Graceland College and the Lamoni public schools. Pisgah is in the western part of Iowa, near the Missouri River.

The Pisgah, Iowa, consolidated school is developing into a real community center. Five years ago the farmers in the trade territory round about this little town of four hundred souls joined hands with the people of the village to bring to both the children of the farms and the children of the town educational opportunities equal to those enjoyed by any children in the State. They have more than succeeded. This cooperative effort has brought to the children of the community the privileges of a full, standard, twelve-year school with complete high-school facilities, and in addition it has brought to the adults of the community a rallying point for the improvement of rural life conditions.

Only a few years ago, the particular point in the valley of the Soldier River in Harrison County, where this prosperous and progressive community is now located, was a swampy lowland. The rough and barren hills all about were little prized for agricultural purposes. However, the most important asset of a community is its people. And when the people of a community are thoroughly organized in a cooperative effort under intelligent leadership, it is surprising what they can accomplish in increasing the general prosperity and improving the community as a place in which to live. The consolidated school has furnished the center of interest and inspiration for this cooperative effort.

The people of the Pisgah community are holding a fair share of their most capable young people on the farms. They are holding the most desirable families in the community. They are doing this by developing in the life of the community those advantages which so often attract away from the farm the most energetic and enterprising. The consolidated school offers the young citizen a real opportunity to get an education in preparation for life and, in addition, it furnishes an unusually effective center for the development of community interests and community spirit which we will describe in some detail.

The writer spent two days recently studying the Pisgah school and community. The first thing which struck him in observing the children at work in the various schoolrooms was the atmosphere of hard work and close attention to business on the part of the pupils. The teachers and pupils alike seemed bent on doing a full day's school work. This situation was encouraged by properly grading the pupils and putting those of like age and ability into the same grade, with a teacher especially interested in that grade of work and especially prepared to do it well. For example, the children who were away from their mothers for the first year of their school life were placed together and given a teacher especially prepared to look after them and to give them the best possible start in their school work. The superintendent of the Pisgah school seems to think there is something in the old adage—"Well begun is half done." Possibly he remembers the long, weary hours the little folks in the old rural school often spent with nothing educational to do, while the teacher was busy with other classes or coaching the eighth-grade pupils in preparation for their examinations. The pupils in the intermediate and high school at Pisgah are given the same special attention by teachers interested in doing the work of each particular grade well. In this new type of rural school at Pisgah, the older pupils have the opportunity to bring their growing minds into contact with the mature minds of two men teachers, well educated and experienced in the affairs of life. This is a valuable school experience which many pupils in the old-type rural school miss altogether, as experienced men teachers have practically disappeared from the one-teacher country school in the Middle West. We noticed that by arranging the pupils in grades in this new rural school, no teacher had the responsibility for more than two grades, instead of eight, as in the case in the old rural school. Good sanitary conditions and plenty of equipment were supplied. We asked a teacher, whose work especially interested us because she had taught the previous year in one of the better old-type rural schools in the State, how she liked teaching in this new type of rural school, compared with the old. Her spontaneous and emphatic reply was: "Oh, this is so very much superior. The pupils and the teacher have so much better chance to get something done!" It seemed to us that in her reply the teacher struck the fundamental purpose for which school taxes are paid, that is, to get good, thorough school work done. Our impression was that in the new-type rural school like that at Pisgah, the taxpayers are getting larger returns for their money, measured in terms of school work done, than in any other type of school which we have ever seen, either city or rural. Why shouldn't they? Here are red-blooded boys and girls with all the advantages of country life; with none of the disadvantages of city life; and with a school system equal to those found in the best cities. The second thing which struck our attention forcibly in observing the Pisgah consolidated school was that it had wiped out the line between the town and the country. There we saw children of all ages each happily at work in the proper grade. It was impossible to tell by observing them which were from the country and which were from the town. The facts are that about two thirds of the children are from the farms and one third from the town. The little fellow from the remote corner of the district has equal opportunity with the others to get acquainted with the boys and girls from the farms north, south, east, and west of the village and with the children of the village as well. The young citizens from the homes in thirty-two square miles of territory—town and country alike—are gathered together to become acquainted. Friendships are forming which are making the people of the Pisgah community one great community family. This is a valuable part of education in a democracy where success depends on the ability of the people to work together toward common ideals and where individual success depends largely upon a broad understanding of human nature and the ability to cooperate with others in carrying out an undertaking.

The Pisgah consolidated school has not only wiped out the line between town and country so far as the school children are concerned, but it has accomplished the same thing among the adults of the community. On Monday evening we noticed the gymnasium of the consolidated school brightly lighted and upon entering found the men of the community, farmers and townsmen alike, engaged in lively athletic sports having a jolly good time under the most favorable conditions for becoming acquainted. They were discovering the force of the adage, "Get acquainted with your neighbor, you might like him."

The Men's Community Club has a paid-up membership of one hundred. They not only indulge in athletic sports but each month they hold a business session at the schoolhouse. They are working out together many undertakings for the improvement of the community. At present they have on their program of active cooperative effort, better roads, further development of the consolidated school, development of their community fair, providing a proper memorial for the soldiers of the community, and securing a State park at a picturesque spot near by. The women of the consolidated school district have organized the "Ladies' Civic Improvement Club," which meets at the schoolhouse each month on the same evening as the men's club. The women's club cooperates with the men's club in carrying out the program of community improvement, and in the social affairs which follow the business meetings. A good meal together is the starting point of these happy social diversions.

Editor A. H. Smith of the Harrison County News said recently, "We are one hundred years behind the times. We should go to Pisgah and learn a lesson in community center work; learn what real, lasting pleasure means. How happy their home life, their school work, and their community efforts!"

In casting about for the fundamental reasons for the success of this community school which reaches old and young alike, and might well be taken as a model by ten thousand other communities in the Middle West, we came to the conclusion that it was not because of unusual wealth or favorable natural conditions, for there are neither. The fundamental reason is that the people, both country and town, are willing to pull together to give their children full, standard, educational opportunities as good as are enjoyed by any children in the State. That these opportunities are appreciated is shown by the fact that while the attendance in the old-type rural schools round about is constantly falling off, the attendance in the new-type rural school at Pisgah has increased from two hundred and fifty-five, years ago when the school was opened, to three hundred and thirty at the present time.

The second reason for the success of this undertaking is found in the fact that the Pisgah consolidated school is the biggest and most important undertaking in the community and is thus able to attract into its service, as members of the school board, some of the most capable men in the community. President J. A. Lane of the board remarked, "We are none of us in this community very rich, and none of us very poor; we all just pull together for the best school for the children. At first some of our people were very bitter against the school but now they are tickled to death with it." The people of the consolidated school district have selected for their school board three farmers and two members from town. This is particularly appropriate, as the most important duty the board has to perform is to provide satisfactory transportation to and from school for the children of the farmers. The people of the Pisgah consolidated school district have shown their knowledge of human nature by electing to the school board farmers who have children of their own to ride to school in the busses, thus insuring that all the children of the district will be transported in the way that a farmer would like to have his own children hauled. And were this not done these board members would immediately hear from their wives.

The farmers of the Pisgah consolidated school district are desirous of reducing as much as possible the time spent on the road by their children and in providing comfortable transportation for them. So these farmers transport their children to and from school in inclosed motor busses. Does anyone in Iowa have a better right to ride in a comfortable inclosed motor car than the children of Iowa farmers? And strange as it may seem, this better transportation has proved to be cheaper in the long run than horse transportation. A member of the school board said to the writer with a chuckle, "When we proposed to use motors a lot of people around here said we couldn't haul 'em in this swampy valley and in these rough hills with motor busses. Well, last year we had the worst roads in these parts in the memory of the oldest settlers, but in spite of that Burnham Silsby, a farmer boy out here who was a senior in our school, drove one of our routes with a motor bus straight through the year without missing a day. You see, when you make it your business and pay attention to your business, you can haul 'em with a good motor bus." Burnham's father gave him the money he earned driving the motor bus to use in securing a college education and the writer was pleased to meet this energetic, capable farm lad in an Iowa college a few weeks ago.

The Pisgah community school operates seven motor-bus routes, and one horse-drawn route in the worst hills. The motor routes are in the neighborhood of seven miles in length and the horse route four miles. A horse bus is provided for each route in case of emergency. These horse busses have been used less than two weeks in the last two years. The motor busses are owned by the farmers. They are good, sturdy farm trucks of various makes, provided with two bodies which are easily interchangeable—one an inclosed body for transporting children, the other a regular body for farm trucking. These motors do double duty transporting the children to school and doing the farmers' regular trucking. The school pays the farmer, this year, a flat rate of $100 per month to furnish the motor bus, driver, and all upkeep.

The third reason for the success of this new type of rural school at Pisgah, is the fact that the school board takes pains to select a superintendent with a broad vision of what such a school should do for the children and adults of a farm community. In Charles B. Woodstock the board secured a superintendent with preparation, successful experience, and real vision. His first care was to surround himself with a corps of efficient teachers and to make of the Pisgah consolidated school a place where thorough school work is done. The things which add to the interest and value of a school were built around this center.

A practical business course is provided in the high school for the young farmers who expect to be the managers of high-priced land. It was noticeable that the high-school boys who had to drop out for a time to assist in corn husking kept their school work up at night so as to be able to go on with the classes. An unusually helpful course in home nursing is being given in connection with the home economics work for the girls. A school orchestra provides training for the music lovers in the community. Great use is made of the school gymnasium in breaking the monotony of rural life by adding the zest of athletic sports. An excellent athletic field in front of the school building provides a much-prized opportunity for baseball and other outdoor games.

A lecture course is maintained during the winter to add to the interest of community life. This course is selected and promoted by the school and the splendid spirit of cooperation existing in the community is shown by the fact that the course is always gladly underwritten by the business men of the community. A five and one half acre plot is given over to some very interesting work in connection with the classes in agriculture. A practical course in the use and repair of the gas engine is being developed for the boys' shop work. Probably we cannot better illustrate the practical, helpful type of work being done in this new rural school than by quoting the following article written by a high-school pupil for the county papers on one of the activities of the school.

"The boys of the Pisgah high school have an opportunity to get good business experience and to learn in an experimental way how a stock feeder buys, feeds, and sells hogs at a profit.

"On the school experimental plot, we have four half-acre fields of corn fenced for the experiment, under the direction of the State College at Ames. Thirteen boys have taken one or more shares of stock at $10 a share and have become members of the company. Under the direction of Mr. Woodstock, the boys have adopted by-laws and elected officers.

"A committee of the boys has been elected to look after the purchase of twelve hogs to be put in the four feeding lots, to purchase the corn from the school board, to buy other supplies, to look after feeding and care of hogs, and then to put the fattened hogs on the market.

"The secretary will keep an exact account of all expenses and the gain in weight made by the pigs in each of the four lots. Three of them are to hog down corn and soy beans, another three to hog down corn and be fed tankage, another three to hog down corn and to be fed a commercial slop, and another three are to hog down corn alone. Much interest is being taken by boys and by men in the community to see which shall really be the most profitable.

"The shelter houses and self-feeders have been made by boys of the manual training class. When the experiment is over the fattened hogs will be sold on the Omaha market and the boys will share in the profit after all expenses are paid. It is planned for the entire club to make a trip to Omaha with Mr. Woodstock when the pigs are sold, to see them put on the market and to learn all they can about the stockyards and packing houses.

"An advisory committee of two experienced farmers has been associated with the boys on the project."

The high-school pupils who write the news articles for the county papers receive regular English credit. Surely, this is a very practical and valuable kind of English work. The management of the Pisgah school believes in keeping the people of the community posted on what is going on in the school. This leads to a greater interest and more cordial cooperation on the part of the people. In addition to articles written for the newspapers, posters are prepared from time to time and placed on display.

Superintendent Woodstock serves as leader of the boys' and girls' club work during the summer months and thus the activities of the community school are kept going the year around. During last summer fifty-four children were enrolled in the garden club, eighteen in the pig club, twelve in the canning club, eighteen in the basketry club, and six in the water color club, a total of one hundred and eight. The water color and basketry clubs were under the leadership of Mrs. Woodstock. Last fall the exhibits at the Pisgah community fair were so exceptional that the Harrison County Fair Association made a special request that they be placed on display at the county fair. They were loaded on motor trucks and taken down in a body. Last summer Marion Woodstock, ten years old, a pupil in the sixth grade of this new rural school, raised on four square rods of ground six and one half bushels of early potatoes, which he sold for $21.85, or at the rate of $874 per acre. Marion began his lessons in thrift by depositing $16 of his earnings in a savings account.

The superintendent and board of this community school are looking forward to improving the school by providing a home for the teachers and a new community hall with additional schoolrooms which will be dedicated to the memory of Pisgah's gallant men and women who saw service for Uncle Sam. The thought constantly uppermost in the minds of the people of Pisgah is that the most important crop raised in the community is the crop of boys and girls, and that the organization of their community and school is but the scaffolding on which to build men and women.

Pisgah is showing the way to others. The whole Middle West may well follow this example.

THE NEW WORLD DISEASE

A carnival of social disease has swept over Europe since the Armistice, crossed the Atlantic, and invaded our own land. This new form of epidemic is vividly described in the Atlantic for May by the English journalist, Sisley Huddleston:

"The diagnosis of the malady is not difficult. There is, first, this crazy seeking after artificial amusements, generally of an unpleasant kind; there is a love of display that runs to the utmost eccentricity; there is a wave of criminality; there is an unscrupulous profiteering, a cynical disregard of suffering, a mad desire to get rich quickly, no matter by what means; and there is a reluctance to do any genuine work. You can visit any capital, and you will find these characteristic stigmata. This pathological condition is certainly the legacy of war. Men's mental outlook has changed. Those who were sober, industrious citizens, content to rear up their families and to walk usefully and humbly in the world, are now stricken by the wild notion of having a "good time"; a good time that means the easy earning of questionable money, its prodigal dispersal, forgetfulness of the family, nonproduction of necessities, hopeless confusion and incompetence, which affects private as well as governmental persons, and a lowering of moral values, a debasing of intellect.

"Continuity has been broken. All is in the melting pot. The old landmarks have vanished. People were torn up by the roots. Their habits were shattered. Their beliefs were destroyed. Their very soul was melted in the fiery furnace of war, and molded and twisted into new shapes. To straighten it back will be a prodigious feat. They have trampled on their religion. They have abandoned those good prejudices which kept society together. They have become cynical and selfish."

The demoralizing regime of war accounts for much of the present social discontent. As Mr. Huddleston puts it, the habit of soldiering develops unconcern for human life, one's own and the enemy's; disregard of property, one's own and one's neighbor's; disregard for the sanctity of women; disregard of Time and Eternity. The evils that have arisen from this "philosophy of heedlessness" can be eradicated only if we recognize the causes and apply ourselves resolutely to the cure.

Behind all the strikes and threats of strikes Mr. Huddleston finds no generous impulse, no spiritual stirring. It is all cold materialism. Everybody is profiteering. The contractors who can buy and sell at exorbitant profits are frankly unscrupulous. The manufacturer sells at a swindling price because he has had to deal with governments that took no heed of money, or with officials who corrupt. The worker naturally demands his share, for he has found that labor also is something on which a profit can be made.

"What is worse is that in France, in England, in Germany, in Poland, the worker wants to dodge his work. That he should get a high price is permissible. That he should try to escape his obligations is another matter. He thinks no shame if he does not deliver the goods. He is in exactly the same moral position as the grocer who mixes sand with his sugar. I think it may honestly be said that the worker is the last to succumb to this spirit of greed. Now the circle of social immorality is practically complete, and all grades, from the Paris landlord who has doubled his rent because there are not enough houses, the contractor who deliberately supplies shoddy material, the shopkeeper who chats and robs his customers as a habit, down to the workman who demands the highest possible pay for the least possible work, are doing their best to live at one another's expense."

Mr. Huddleston has only the most scathing censure for the new rich of Great Britain. He refers to the findings of the Central Profiteering Commission, which revealed in some instances profits of 3,200 per cent. One Lancashire cotton factory before the war earned $40,000 a year in profits. During the war it reached $200,000, then $300,000, then $600,000, and last year netted $2,000,000. Factories are prospering as never before, and yet their products are almost inaccessible to the ordinary person. Shares of stock in one instance were bought at $5 and sold at $50. A new company had a capital of $1,000,000 subscribed before it could be registered.

As to the wave of actual crime that has swept over Europe, Mr. Huddleston cites with approval these reasons as set out by an English writer:

"(1) That many men who had criminal instincts, but also a horror of killing, before the war are now more or less devoid of that horror.

"(2) That many men who had embarked on a career of crime before the war were liberated from prison during hostilities, and entered the army, and that these are now free again to resume their depredations against society.

"(3) That unemployment and the high cost of living have forced many men who would otherwise have been law-abiding citizens into criminality.

"(4) That the general feeling of unrest which is permeating all classes is responsible for much crime."

In addition, it is found that nervous diseases, which it would be difficult to diagnose, are prevalent. Many men when closely questioned by Mr. Huddleston confessed that it was a year or so after the war that they felt "a strange depression, a lowering of vitality, a mental and moral degeneration." Mr. Huddleston can only conclude that, turn where one will, one finds only that the war has worsened mankind.—Review of Reviews, June, 1920.

INDUSTRIAL PROBLEMS

[At the annual assembly of the Presbyterian Church of New South Wales, the moderator, J. Henderson Craig, delivered an interesting address, according to the New Castle Herald and Miner's Advocate, of May 12. The following extract comes through the kindness of Elder John W. Rushton]:

Spirituality was not a force operating in the clouds, but on the earth, amongst men, and especially in those societies which declared they existed only to improve men in their thinkings and their morals. To measure the usefulness of a quality or the strength of a moral aim, find out how it worked towards the world's betterment. Was it theoretic or was it practical? Some theoretical proposals to remedy the nation's intemperate habits had been put before the thinking world by politicians, and some by business men, being generally proposals to control and not to eradicate the drink traffic. But the control plan had been in existence in Britain for centuries with poor results, the issue there being that the traffic refusing to be controlled (save in war time) must be throttled, lest it should throttle the nation. It stood to the credit of the church that she had no personal ends to serve, no ax to grind, in what she was doing in the cause of temperance. In America she had led the way in this reform, even though it was the fashion for some temperance orators to declaim against her cowardly inaction. In Australia she was providing the brains, the driving power of the reform, whilst others were providing what she was too poor to provide—the money, the sinews. In the inland towns of this state the temperance leaders were almost invariably the clerics. Again it was spirituality which constrained the religious man to share in this duty of destroying the evil of strong drink.

"Our spiritual Lord Christ demands that his people should, amongst other things, take up the position of peacemakers between the two contestants. As he was 'in the midst' on Calvary, so his followers are (let it be said reverently) to be between the two opponents. The employer has found that browbeating has failed, that the starving tactics which prevailed in the East End of London amongst workers in clothes, boots, and furniture, and in the east end of Dundee amongst the sewers of bags and sacks, would not succeed here in Australia, and would not always succeed anywhere. The threat of 'locking out' was useless; the compulsory closing of workshops, factories in the workers' face was a boomerang that would fly back and strike the capitalist himself and his family, and diminish the comforts which he and his friends had enjoyed so long that they can scarcely exist without them. The worker was finding that strikes and threats of striking will soon fail to effect their purpose. Already some apparently successful strikes have produced disappointment and misery to the worker, and drawn the black lines of starvation on the face of the striker's child. The thousands who applaud and uphold the sentiments of the boss agitators in the hall find it difficult to justify themselves to their wives in the privacy of the home; the empty cupboard speaks louder than the Domain orator.

"The worker may well tremble lest capital should in reply to his menace organize itself as thoroughly here as it has done in America, where it has become victorious in many a struggle. In Australia on the one side is fierce business competition which is really suicidal, and on the other side organized labor, savage and selfish, and smarting under the recollection of wrongs endured by parents and grandparents elsewhere in the bad old times, which, I pray God, may never return. With each demand of labor on capital comes a demand from the latter on a third party, that has been silent all along and too long, the general public, the middle classes whom the revolutionaries in Russia are determined to destroy. But the evidence goes to show that this third party in the strife is about to rouse himself and assert his right to live without being crushed between the hammer and the anvil. I do not pretend to be omniscient in this matter of industrial strife, but it seems to me, after briefly studying schemes varying between the pale armchair theory of Rousseau, and the sanguinary theory of Marx and Trotsky, and the legislation of various lands in the direction of compulsory arbitration, that cooperation will be the bridge over the gulf, and that the transforming of corporations, trusts, industries, limited liability companies into cooperative societies will do much towards ending industrial strife.

"The principle of cooperation means giving everyone a partnership share in the scheme, at the head being highly-paid competent managers. The success of the venture depends on each man's personal, and not merely pecuniary, interest in it. I took the trouble to ask the Registrar in Bankruptcy how many cooperative societies had during 1916 and 1919 become bankrupt or had voluntarily sequestered their businesses. No answer could be given, but the Year Book of New South Wales shows that no bankruptcies had occurred. Cooperation is successful financially; my assertion is that it is successful morally, sociologically, industrially, and the more that the church ceases from her platitudes about brotherhood and makes cooperation a common public affair, working harmoniously everywhere, the sooner will the fight between capital and labor end, and the sooner will the third party thank God he has escaped from between the upper and the nether millstone.

There is a danger which cooperators perhaps do not foresee. I hope that the societies will not accept the Federal Government's backing as outlined in Mr. W. M. Hughes's letter to a recent congress. His policy, he said, was to remove the food of the people from the operations of speculators, and bring the producer and consumer more closely together, giving to the one the utmost for his labor, to the other the product with as little added cost of distribution as possible. He hoped the deliberations of the congress would narrow the field for exploitation and widen the possibilities for a people unwilling to be exploited, to seek by cooperation 'a social way out.' Now, any attempt by a government to regularize cooperation is needless, and will be harmful. Governments become fond of adopting military methods and of drilling the industrial community according to a kind of modified king's regulations. To turn a society into a semimilitary body is to deprive the society of some of its freedom of movement. Cooperation must be free to do or not to do as it shall please its members, of course with the unvarying limitation, provided others' comfort and liberties are not infringed. Rulers have during the five years of war had so pleasant a feasting on the sweets of power that they are averse to quit the banquet table."

The moderator went on to emphasize the necessity for the establishment in Sydney and other large centers of hostels for Presbyterian girls whose educational requirements rendered temporary separation from their parents necessary.

"To recall the whole world, civil, social, religious, and ecclesiastical, to a more serious view of the ethics embodied in the commandments and our Lord's sermon on the mount, and to a deeper consciousness of moral responsibility for thought and speech, is one duty laid on the church, a duty made more needful by the excesses and immoral outgrowths of the late war. But before the church can begin this work of cleansing the world's stables she must cleanse her own front door. Observers outside the church comment unfavorably on the obvious antagonism in view and belief prevailing amongst churchmen on vital and practical topics, such as the Lord's Day question, divorce, profanity, war, loyalty, amusements, as well as on doctrinal topics, the inspiration of the Scriptures, the resurrection, and the ascension. They note the lack of brotherliness and of mutual love and trust, the abundance of superciliousness, the ambitiousness of some and the pugnaciousness of others. The world thereupon demands that these evils and those other differences of belief and of practice should be swept away before it will consent to listen to admonitions and expostulations about its moral defects."

PASTORAL

The Public Prayer

[Our men of the ministry will all be interested in the following editorial by one of the best writers whose work is appearing in the contemporary press, Frederick Lynch, editor of The Christian Work. We hope we are less censurable along these lines than the men he is cautioning, but we are sure that at least many of our younger men will be glad to think introspectively concerning these things.—EDITORS.]

We would like to be very frank and personal, if we may in this editorial, and call the attention of the younger preachers who read The Christian Work to one or two temptations into which some of our Protestant pastors occasionally fall. We say occasionally purposely because the rank and file of our pastors have a deep sense of reverence and realize that a church service is a time of worship, when one bows in awe and adoration before God and the mystery of the universe. And we can indulge in this one word of warning and of criticism because we have so often praised.

During the last five years we have preached at two services practically very Sunday in the year, and thus stood in several hundred pulpits, both in America and England. Generally, the pastor has been in the pulpit with us, and conducted the service. Our impression of these hundreds of pastors has been that on the whole they were a splendid lot of men, possessing both personality and leadership, and we believe the churches are better manned than they have ever been. We have continually praised the preaching, too, in the face of much absurd talk about the decline of the pulpit. We read many sermons every month, and we think that in many ways they surpass the sermons of the fathers. They may not have the intellectual grip and grandeur of the sermons of fifty years ago, because we are not interested in the theological and metaphysical problems of those days. But they certainly have nearness, directness, touch the real problems of life, and do get down to reality in a way the fathers did not always do.

Having said all this again and again, we will be pardoned if we say just a word or two about the other side. And the first word is this: We have again met preachers who are simply boring their congregations to death by interminable prayers, and prayers which are not common prayer at all, but express the dominant enthusiasm of the preacher rather than the common aspirations and needs of the congregation. The probability is, also, that this interminable, personal, individualistic prayer is about the same every Sunday, so that many of the common needs are seldom touched. These prayers too are often in the loosest English, colloquial, lacking all liturgical beauty and sense of reverence and adoration, and again and again have been nothing but sermons in the guise of prayer. They ramble on for ten, fifteen, and twenty minutes, while we could feel that the only prayer the congregation was making was that their pastor might stop. We are absolutely sure that in some of these churches these prayers are keeping people away. Sometimes we found ourselves asking if we could bring ourselves to attend if we happened to move to those communities.

Could we dare to warn our younger brethren against this danger and say one or two words of counsel? We may venture to do this because they are born out of our experience in the pulpits of our best preachers and ablest ministers. First of all, as much care should be given to preparing the prayer as is given to the sermon, especially in the early years of one's ministry. Remember it is to be common prayer. The minister is not to voice his needs but his people's, and he is not to pray for the particular corner of the kingdom in which he happens to be most interested, but for the whole kingdom. So, too, there are many temperaments in every congregation, and the prayer must be couched in universal language, not in the preacher's peculiar style. The reason the Anglican and Episcopal Churches use a book of printed prayer is not primarily, as so many suppose, for liturgical beauty, nor loftiness of utterance, nor words steeped in reverence—although these of course are part of the reason—but because it is common prayer the church is after, not the prayer colored all through by this individual temper or that. It is called the Book of Common Prayer, and did we often have the experience we occasionally have we would have been converted to it long ago and the most ardent advocate of liturgies. But we can have that common element, that reverential spirit, that liturgical beauty in free prayer if our ministers would prepare their prayers with the thought that prayer is the highest moment of worship, that the minister's duty is to carry his congregation to the throne of God, and that he is to utter their thoughts, not his, and that above all the language must match in dignity, greatness, and beauty the high, holy, mystical thoughts and feelings which accompany prayer. And above all, do not ramble on and on. God knows what you require without being told in too elaborate detail.

Again, beware of fluency and the fatal habit that comes with it of talking and talking all through the service until the people are wearied to death of your voice. Again and again have we sat and heard ministers consume fifteen or twenty minutes commenting upon the notices—often when the notices were all printed in the calendar, too. These men generally say the same thing over and over. They are generally the men, too, who make the long prayers, for the fatal fluency breaks out everywhere. How often have we seen a full half hour of the morning service consumed by the prayer and the unnecessary comment on everything. The people are tired to death by the time the sermon comes. There has been one hour of "preliminaries," as our ancestors used to call them. Now real worship does not tire. Half an hour or even forty minutes of beautiful song, praise, and reverent, common prayer prepares for the sermon. But the interminable individualistic prayer and the unceasing injection of the minister's own voice, personality, and opinion into a service are deadly to it. Beware of this fluency, young man. Especially beware of too much injection of self. Flee humorous comment and all commonplaces and provincialism as you would the Devil. Govern your whole attitude in the pulpit by the consciousness that you are the priest conducting your congregation into the very presence of God. Shape your prayers with that in mind. Make as few remarks as possible that are not directly connected with the act of worship in which you are engaged, and whatever you must say, say it as though the Lord were there. The Catholics have much to learn from us, but we have something to learn from them, namely, reverence, adoration, prostration before God in his holy temple. This lack of reverence or solemnity in God's house we invariably noted in the churches of which we have been speaking. It is one of the things that is driving many souls to the Episcopal Church. Doctor Sullivan, the gifted preacher and pastor of All Souls' Church, New York, who stood very high in the ranks of the Roman Catholic Church ten years ago, gave this same warning to a group of Protestants a year or two ago. We remember his saying that the one thing he missed when he threw in his lot with Protestantism and found liberation of his soul and joy in adventure, was that reverence and sense of adoration among Protestants. They entered a church as they would a store. They sat down, listened to a sermon, shook hands all around, and went home. There was none of

Our Cradle Roll

It was with considerable satisfaction we left Independence a week ago, after bringing to completion many plans in regard to the women's work. We know the cradle roll workers who have waited so long and patiently for specific instructions will be very glad to hear what has been done regarding this very important line of endeavor.

We are told that the cradle roll work was, in the first place, an outgrowth from the attempts made by local congregations to increase their membership by special visits and calls upon people residing near their churches. Many people indifferent as to which church they should join, often became attached to one or another through special efforts made to enlist the babies of the household as members of some certain Sunday school. From the report of our own general superintendent of cradle roll last year we learn that 407 babies were enrolled whose parents were not members of our church.

This would emphasize the value of the work as a missionary enterprise.

Not wishing to lose sight of the cradle roll work as a means by which people may become interested in the gospel through the Sunday school allegiance to their children, to say nothing of gaining the children themselves, the Women's Department desires also to extend the service of the work to include a supervision of the general welfare of the children. For a consecrated cradle roll visitor to come to regard the child whose name she enrolls upon the cradle roll of the church, as her special "ward," whose whole welfare is dear to her, and to whom she shall attempt to bring much that is essential to its best development, is an ideal not too far or too high to be reached, we feel sure. The spirit of 1920, as regards the church, is one of service, consecration, and deep devotion to high objectives, and we are confident it will be reflected in the attitude of the cradle roll workers, and the mothers and fathers upon whom they shall call in the interests of the children.

The United States is behind many other countries in its care for children. In their failure to regard the child as an asset of the Nation they have neglected to make some very necessary provisions for its conservation and efficiency. True, education is, in most States, compulsory, but why stop at the mental need? Can an educated mind function to its best efficiency in a diseased body? Why not have health compulsory as well? Thousands of dollars are appropriated by the various State legislatures to stamp out animal diseases, but paltry and grudging have been the appropriations for human health. Read the poem appearing elsewhere in this issue entitled, "To the men of America," and ask yourselves that awe the Catholic feels in the presence of God, no sense of abasement before the holiness of God, no exaltation of soul such as the Catholic feels when the Presence is lifted up, and he is face to face with his Lord. He missed this. It is just what we missed in the churches of some fluent—sometimes flippant—men. Make your congregation feel that Christ is just as much present in the Protestant church as he is in the Catholic cathedral, and that if one sees him not with the eye he feels him in his heart and falls down before him as reverently as the most reverent Catholic and says, God is in his holy temple; "let all the earth keep silence before him."

in all fairness where lies the greatest real interest of all parents to-day. Yes, and of all citizens, as well.

The church health department is taking advantage of the opportunity offered by the cradle roll to get in close touch with newly made mothers, telling them of the interest the church has in their children and trying to enlist their cooperation in its effort to keep watch over the health of the Saints. A birth record is followed by periodical health records, from which the assistants in the health department may learn concerning the new baby its general conditions and development. Where serious trouble is indicated, they will communicate and give advice which will be a beginning, at least, in the right direction. The whole desire of the health department is to keep the Saints well, and we should all join in their efforts so heartily, that health will come in time, to be a part of our church character.

Along with the message from the health department, the cradle roll visitors carry a message from our department, in which we place our services at the disposal of the mother. If in the new responsibilities which have come to her, she feels a sense of her own unpreparedness therefor, and a desire to better qualify for the serious and grave task of properly rearing and training an immortal soul, we assure her of our keen sympathy and ready assistance. Our leaflet course on "child care," simple and yet comprehensive, beginning with four lessons on prenatal care, offers a very real help and guide to the young or inexperienced mother. As the course proceeds, too, it takes up the consideration of the mental and spiritual development of the child, reaching into the mysterious adolescent years, when nature seems in wild tumult and revolt, a period through which only the most thoughtful and intelligent parents can hope to safely guide their young.

Another service the cradle roll visitor may perform for the new mother is to see that the child is registered with the State Board of Health, and a certificate of the same returned to the child. The lady from the Children's Bureau at Washington who responded to our request for information, wrote of a couple of instances which had that day come to their notice, in which children were deprived of their just inheritances because of some one's failure to record their birth. In most States this registration is demanded by law, but not in all. Physicians are sometimes lax in attending to it. The town clerk in small places, or the board of health office, is the place where one may usually find such record. In case other means fail, write directly to the State Board of Health, and get the certified registration. (Doctor Cook of Independence cares for this work for Jackson County.)

In addition, the names of new babies are to be placed on our church cradle roll, record being kept in the Department of Statistics and a certificate returned. When the children reach the age of three years, the visitor gives their names and addresses to the Sunday school in their locality, that they may become members.

We have requested every local cradle roll to accept appointment from us for this work, and to send her name to our general office. The response has been very encouraging. If this should reach the attention of any such person who has not yet sent in her name, we trust she may see in the outline of work given, an incentive to join with us in this child welfare work. It will broaden as opportunity is given, and, with proper cooperation, will become a great factor for good.

One argument the antiprohibitionists have overlooked is that by emptying the jails prohibition has increased the house shortage. But as suggested by an exchange, this argument can be effectively met by changing the jails into apartment houses at a fair rental.

What You Can Do!

There were a few measures before the late Congress which vitally affect women and their interests, and which remain unpassed. While it is true that Congress has adjourned for some months, it is timely that women should be giving attention and consideration to these bills, and become acquainted with their responsibility and opportunity in connection therewith.

Since women are being granted suffrage, and the vote is being placed in their hands, it is fitting that they should record themselves indelibly and unmistakably concerning those measures which affect their welfare and that of their children. During the summer months, women may be able to join their sisters in petitions, duly drawn and signed, by which they may request their various senators and representatives to vote for the passage of those bills in which they are interested. These petitions may come from any and every society, club, or other organization, and may be signed by good men and women everywhere. The more such petitions and the more signatures, the more attention will be paid to the requests contained, when the lawmakers again assemble.

In addition to these joint petitions, personal letters to her representative should be written by every woman in the United States who desires that these vital things should receive their just attention. Millions are voted for armament—to destroy the human temples built at what cost and suffering and pain, only woman knows! Why not like amounts to conserve the human life bought at such travail?

Herewith is a summary of the Sheppard-Towner bill. We also give some extracts from a letter from the Children's Bureau, which tells of other legislation of interest to women. Read these over carefully and try to realize, if possible what a tremendous power has come into the hands of the American women with the vote! About half the population is female, therefore the influence of women upon legislation is incalculable, providing they prepare themselves to properly wield it. Let Latter Day Saint women, especially, see to it that they are ready to act promptly and in a way that will bring the best and quickest results!

The Sheppard-Towner Bill

A bill for the public protection of maternity and infancy was introduced into the Senate on October 20, 1919, by Senator Morris Sheppard of Texas and referred to the committee on public health and national quarantine. The same bill was introduced into the House on December 5, 1919, by Judge Horace Towner of Iowa and referred to the committee on interstate and foreign commerce. The number of the Senate bill is 3,259 and that of the House bill 10,925.

This bill provides for a Federal appropriation for the use of the States accepting the provisions of the act and undertaking public measures for the protection of mothers and children. The amount of appropriation is to be $2,000,000 for the first year, the sum to be gradually increased until it reaches $4,000,000 annually. It will be apportioned among the States in the proportion which their population bears to the total population of the United States, provided that each state appropriates a like sum. In addition to this sum, the bill provides for an annual appropriation of $480,000 to be divided equally among the States without guarantee of a like sum.

The act is to be administered by a Federal Board of Maternal and Infant Hygiene to consist of the Secretary of Labor, chairman; the Chief of the Children's Bureau, executive officer; the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service; and the United States Commissioner of Education. Plans for State work must be submitted to and approved by this board.

The administration of the act in the States is to be in the hands of a specially created State Board of Maternal and Infant Hygiene or of the State Board of Health in those States having a child welfare or child hygiene division in connection with that board. The Federal board may require the cooperating State Boards to appoint advisory committees both state and local to assist in carrying out the act. At least half of the members of these committees must be women.

The work done under the act must include instruction in the hygiene of maternity and infancy through public health nurses, consultation centers, and other suitable methods and the provision of medical and nursing care for mothers and infants at home or at a hospital when necessary, especially in remote regions. The act provides for the cooperation of the State Board with the State universities or land grant colleges in furnishing popular, untechnical instruction in the hygiene of maternity and infancy and kindred subjects.—Government Bulletin.

From the Children's Bureau, Washington, D. C.

"In regard to new and pending laws bearing upon child and mother welfare, you will probably be interested first of all to know of the Sheppard-Towner Maternity and Infancy Bill. I inclose a copy of this for you, together with a summary of the bill, and some matter pertinent to it. The studies carried on by the Children's Bureau during the past seven years have disclosed facts which indicate clearly the need for public protection of mothers and babies. As you will see, this bill would make available to all mothers throughout the country, the instructions which they need, as well as hospital and medical and nursing care. The bill has had nation-wide indorsement from many national organizations and numbers of State and local agencies.

"There is also a great deal of interest among women in the bill proposing a Federal Department of Education. This is the Smith-Towner bill. In addition to this there is a bill for the establishment of a Women's Bureau in the Department of Labor, and there is a bill appropriating a large sum for the physical education of children.

"You will find on the birth registration sheet reasons explaining why birth registration is so important. We just received a newspaper clipping from a Kentucky paper yesterday, giving several instances where failure to have a birth certificate works against the interest of the individual. For example, it reports that the little son of an American officer was born in the Philippines and there is no record of his birth to prove that he is his father's child and entitled to inherit his property. Another case cited is that of a little girl who is deprived of a large estate because an American physician was too busy to record her birth and establish her legitimacy."

Thirty-eight States "Carry On"

Thirty-eight States, the District of Columbia, and Hawaii, are actively engaged in measures to promote child welfare, according to a bulletin issued by the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor. This bulletin summarizes briefly the work done during Children's Year and contains suggestions for follow-up work.

"Throughout almost the entire country," says the report, "there is an obvious need of the continuance of certain activities which may be said to constitute a Children's Year follow-up program." Among important measures mentioned are better birth registration, the establishment of health stations, weighing and measuring tests, open-air classes, nutritional clinics and other measures for the protection and development of school children, protection from illiteracy and premature work by Back-to-School and Stay-in-School campaigns, public provision for wholesome play and recreation under trained leadership and supervision of commercial amusements, study by each community of local needs and resources as related to the care of handicapped children, the promotion of new legislation for the care and protection of children based on a study of present laws and local needs, and a study of the child welfare standards adopted by the Children's Bureau Conferences on Standards of Child Welfare, held in May and June of last year.

It is hoped, the bulletin states, that the child welfare standards will prove a strong influence in concentrating public attention on the need for Federal and State action to protect the health of mothers and children. Interest in the standards has already resulted in the formation of a national permanent committee to establish physical standards for children entering employment, and in measures in a large number of States to secure better legislation for children born out of wedlock.

The bulletin contains two maps, one showing States included in the birth registration area in April, 1920, and one showing States organized for child welfare work and cooperating with the Children's Bureau in follow-up measures.—Government Bulletin.

To the Men of America

You talk of your breed of cattle,
And plan for a higher strain,
You double the food of the pasture,
You heap up the measure of grain:
You draw on the wits of a nation,
To better the barn and the pen:
But what are you doing, my brothers,
To better the breed of men?

You boast of your Morgans and Herefords,
Of the worth of a calf or a colt,
And scoff at the scrub and the mongrel,
As worthy a fool or a dolt:
You mention the points of your roadster,
With many a "wherefore" and "when,"
But, ah, are you conning, my brothers,
The worth of the children of men?

You're proud of your roan-colored filly,
Your heifer so shapely and sleek,
No place shall be filled in your stanchions,
By stock that's unworthy or weak.
But what of the stock of your household,
Have they wandered beyond your ken?
Oh, what is revealed in the round-up
That brands the daughters of men?

And what of your boy? Have you measured
His needs for a growing year?
Does your mark, as his sire, in his features,
Mean less than your brand on a steer?
Thoroughbred—that is your watchword,
For stable and pasture and pen,
But what is your word for the homestead?
Answer, you breeders of men.

THE SOCIAL CIRCLE

Will Visit Great Britain Soon

As announced at the late General Conference, President Frederick M. Smith and Apostle Thomas W. Williams will visit the British Isles soon in the interests of the church work in that part of the world.

PRESIDENT FREDERICK M. SMITH

Accompanied by Apostle T. W. Williams, he will leave New York on the Rotterdam for England, July 20, to remain several weeks.

While President Smith's trip will likely be limited to England and not cover more than six weeks, Brother Williams intends to go on a trip to France, Switzerland, Germany, and probably to Holland and Belgium. Later he hopes to cross to Egypt and also visit Palestine.

He will represent the church in his office of apostle and endeavor to ascertain the various possibilities for mission work in the eastern lands.

We are sure the Saints in the British Isles and elsewhere will be impressed with the pleasing personalities of these two brethren, who have consecrated their whole souls to the furtherance of the cause of Christ. Whether it be in the presence of kings and potentates or among the lowly and humble, these men of God will represent with dignity and effectiveness the highest ideals of Sainthood.

The European address of T. W. Williams will be Care Roderick May, 19 Amhurst Park, Stamford Hill, London, N 16, England.

The British Mission has always been an interesting one, especially in the early days of the church when our missionaries converted not only individuals, but whole communities at a time. Very many of the sturdy pioneers of the Reorganization were men and women of that land who had emigrated to Zion. Some of them came across and at great sacrifice journeyed across the the plains to Utah, only to be grievously disappointed and as soon as possible return to the Middle West where many were overjoyed to find and affiliate with faithful followers of the early church recognizing the leadership of the young Joseph Smith whom God had chosen to lead the flock after the death of the Prophet.

The resident Saints of England and Wales have done a noble work in the years past, maintaining their faith, carrying on as much missionary work as their time and means would allow, but have felt the task of warning their neighbors too large for them to accomplish without other help. They and we appreciate the decision on the part of the administrative and missionary authorities of the church to investigate missionary possibilities in that land with the hope that when the survey is completed and the men are available the British people may again have the opportunity of hearing the angel message, the great restoration.

The prayers of the Saints accompany these brethren on this mission and their personal and material support will follow. Already one young brother, Ray Rumel, of Omaha, has been appointed to that mission, and will proceed thither within a month or so. We are sure many others will follow as the occasion seems to demand, until we shall preach the gospel to all nations as a witness.

The war made serious inroads into the personnel of the workers of England, not only requiring the flower of their youth but some of the elderly men as well.

And though comparatively few of them were required to give up their lives for the cause, yet being in the military service for such long periods tended to dishearten those who awaited their return. But without doubt the experiences of the young men who served their country in various lands will in the future prove of much value to them. In France, Macedonia, Egypt, Palestine, Mesopotamia they learned of customs, languages, and racial characteristics that will prove of inestimable value later. Perhaps the majority of the Saints are thoroughly imbued with the Zionie ideals and only await the time when they may feel that their neighbors have been warned ere they participate in the gathering.

APOSTLE T. W. WILLIAMS

to leave for the European mission this month.

LETTERS

The Title to Our Inheritances

BY THE LAMONI STAKE BISHOP RICH

An important point discussed in another of the circular letters to the Lamoni Stake Saints.

In a former letter we promised to further discuss the question as to who may hold title to our inheritance.

Let us remember the two kinds of stewardships as there stated:

- a. Spiritual stewardships. (Responsibility.)
- b. Temporal stewardships. (Responsibility.)

Stewardships are so classed for the purpose of enabling us to better understand. (See Doctrine and Covenants 28: 8, 9.) Every legitimate activity engaged in by us is a spiritual activity. To God all things are spiritual. As a spiritual stewardship does not include property, there is no need of discussing the title, there being none.

Temporal stewardship. Keep clearly in mind that a stewardship is the responsibility assumed in our using or managing anything in our possession, and that an accounting for this responsibility should be given by us "in time" (while we live) and "in eternity" (at the judgment bar of God).

The inheritance is the thing that is in our possession or held by us and for which we may or may not hold the title or deed, this holding of the title or deed depending on the nature of the inheritance, as well as the utility or use of the inheritance.

The nature or kind of inheritance: Inheritances as to kind or nature are divided into two classes: a. Immaterial. b. Material.

Immaterial inheritances: The gifts of music, painting, business ability, priesthood, etc., are examples of immaterial inheritances. These gifts are inherited from God direct, or from God through our ancestors. The responsibility of properly using these sacred gifts is the stewardship. Obviously there can be no title or deed for such inheritance.

Material inheritances: Land, houses, cattle, etc., are examples of material inheritances. These gifts also come from God direct or from God through our ancestors. The responsibility placed upon those who have these material things, for a proper use of them, is their stewardship. For these things there must be a title or deed held by some party or parties. Who shall hold this title or deed depends on the utility or use of the thing. If the use directly is such that the welfare of the group (the public) depends upon the proper use, the public or group should hold the title or deed. As an example we cite such things as water works, the church publishing houses, etc. The persons who assume the responsibility of managing these utilities will have a managerial stewardship. If the welfare of the public or group does not directly, but only remotely, depend upon the use of the thing, then the title should be held by the individual. As an example: Houses, land, various kinds of businesses, etc. This class will include by far the greater number of inheritances. Such an inheritance will be a private inheritance.

Between these two extremes of inheritances, i. e. those publicly owned and those privately owned, will necessarily be some that are what may be determined quasi-public. Such inheritances may be held "in trust" for the group or public. Among these may be mentioned transportation lines, telephone service, lighting service, etc. Holding "in trust"

MISCELLANEOUS

Attention, Stenographers!

If you are or have been a stenographer, you should read this. If you are not a stenographer, you should read it anyway, as you may know some stenographer who belongs to the church who has not seen it.

There are hundreds of stenographers in the church. As yet, they have not been organized. It is not the purpose of the writer to form such an organization at this time, although the data gathered as a result of this article being read and the request complied with might well form the nucleus of such organization. However, it is desired to form what might be called a stenographers' bureau.

As you know, there are many general officers of our church traveling over the country all the time. The work of many of these, when they leave their offices in Independence or Lamoni, is held up until they are able to return and take it up where they laid it down. As a result, the important work of the church is often hindered and sometimes stopped entirely. Then, too, when these men know that upon their return to their offices they will be "snowed under" with work, they cannot do their best while away. In other words, the knowledge that he is getting behind with his work acts as a mental drag on a man, and he is consequently hindered in his work. So he returns to his office greatly handicapped.

In order to overcome this serious difficulty, it has been suggested that the writer make an appeal to stenographers throughout the church, and that the names and addresses of those willing to work for these general officers, when traveling, be kept on file in the office of the First Presidency, and available to the men when traveling, so they may keep up their correspondence. Thus, if Brother A. is to make a trip to Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, New York, Boston, Toronto, and return to Independence, he can get the names of the stenographers in these cities who will help him, and then have his mail forwarded to him and take care of it while on the road. Then, when he returns to his office, his desk will be practically clear and he will be in position to take up the routine work without delay. His mind will have a complete grasp of the situation and he will not have to worry through two or three weeks' accumulation of mail. The trip will have done him good, and the office work at the means that the title or deed to the property may be held by the group and managed by an individual or individuals, the net profit to go to the group.

BUHL, IDAHO, July 1, 1920.

Editors Herald: A few days ago I received a letter from a sister that lives near Filer, Idaho, desiring that I go there to hold some meetings. I lost the letter, forgot her name, and I am now holding meetings near Filer. But I cannot or have not been able to locate the sister. We have tried to, went to the post office, made inquiries there; thought perhaps we could find out who the HERALD and Ensign were addressed to. Our errand was fruitless. I am very sorry that I lost the letter, for it is hard to be isolated from the church. If this sister will write to Elder H. P. Hanson, Filer, Idaho, he will call on her, and she will find her way to a nice little Sunday school. Sacramento the first Sunday of each month, preaching every Sunday but the first Sunday. I will send a copy of this to the Ensign, and if the isolated Saints of Idaho who read this will write me and let me know what the opportunities for preaching are I will accommodate as many as I can, and put them in touch with other brethren that will be able to wait on them.

same time will have been kept up. The benefit is to the church.

How does the suggestion strike you? Many of you stenographers are anxious to be of greater service to the church. Here is your opportunity. Will you grasp it? It is not necessary that you be a fast writer. If you are willing to help, we should know it.

We also have desired for some time to get in touch with the stenographers of the church for the purpose of ascertaining who the fast writers are, so as to be able to utilize their services in reporting sermons, court trials, institutes, etc., in the different sections of the country. For instance, if there is to be a court trial in San Francisco, one of such importance as to require a verbatim report, we should have the names and addresses of stenographers there, or near there, capable of doing the work. Much money could in this way be saved to the church, and at the same time it opens up an avenue of service for you stenographers. Are you with us?

So that an adequate record will be in the office here, we desire you to send the following information:

Name Address
 Working? What business?
 How long have you written shorthand?
 What system to you write?
 Can you write 125 words a minute?
 If so, about what is your average speed on sermon matter?
 Have you a typewriter at home, or is one available?
 If not, can you use your office machine after hours?

Pass the word along to your brother and sister stenographers, and address your letter of information to HOWARD W. HARDER,
 Box 255, Independence, Missouri.

The Presidency

President George N. Briggs, of Graceland College, chairman of the commission to investigate educational conditions in the church, etc., has submitted the following names for addition to the commission. This list has the approval of the Presidency:

Myron C. Fisher, Boston; C. B. Woodstock, Pisgah, Iowa; F. M. McDowell, Lamoni; A. M. Carmichael, Lamoni; W. W. Smith, Independence; Doctor G. Leonard Harrington, Independence; Mrs. Henry C. Smith, Independence; Mrs. Leslie S. Wight, Lamoni.
 June 30, 1920.

Notice is hereby given of the following appointments made by the Presidency, Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric:

Fred B. Farr, Northern California District, San Francisco objective. Local.
 W. R. Kapnick, Western Maine District, Deer Isle objective. Missionary.
 A. V. Robinson, New Zealand. Missionary.
 R. E. Burgess, Holden Stake. Local.
 July 8, 1920.

Bishop E. O. Clark of Des Moines, has been asked by the Presidency to take the chairmanship of the Fuel Commission. With him there have so far been appointed two others, viz: J. P. Warren, of Independence, and C. A. Gaither, of Columbia, Missouri.

To Reunion Presidents and Others Interested: Attention has been called a number of times to the importance of the higher education of our young people in preparation for the full performance of their part in the important work before the church.

We are inviting attention now to the matter to suggest that at least one program during the reunion or conference or series of church services be set apart for bringing to the attention of all the importance of this matter. Graceland college is prepared to furnish printed matter and an outline for such a program. Presidents of reunions and others interested are urged to write the President, Graceland College, Lamoni, Iowa, for the printed matter with a view to its use during coming reunions, conferences, two-day meetings, etc.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY.

Pastoral Notices

To the Saints of the Southern Michigan and Northern Indiana District; Greeting: The events of the times are ominous with indications of the "closing of the times of the Gentiles," and the approach of wonderful and strange transformations among the nations. The Adversary is working everywhere with all subtlety and cunning to turn the hearts of men away from their God. Let us as Saints of God resist this influence, and be careful to keep our covenant with him. Give the service of God your greatest consideration, and make it your chiefest delight.

Shall we not strive to make the present year one of great success? Then let us take a greater interest in all the meetings of our respective branches. Try to encourage and build up the prayer meetings. Give each department of the work our support unreservedly. Persistently maintain prayer and devotion in the home and in the family circle. In this line of conduct is our safety. Woe and calamity await the wicked, and blessings and peace the righteous.

Will all the scattered members in the district, those absent from branches please write the undersigned, giving name, address, and the opportunities for holding services in your localities.

Let all be diligently concerned in this wonderful gospel reaching others. Our district is large, and the laborers are few. Hence there is work for all to do. Try and provide such an abundance of opportunities for our missionaries that there will be no occasion for their having to hunt for places to preach.

We suggest that when special meetings are desired in any branch, the following taken from letter of instruction issued by the President of the church be observed:

"If there should be need for special services in any branch, we would like all such matters to be referred by the branch president to the district president, the latter to take it up with the missionary or missionaries assigned to that district, or with the Presidency who may assign a missionary to the work."—SAINTS' HERALD, May 23, 1917, p. 481.

If this is observed, it will enable the district president to know what is being done, where being done, and by whom.

Your servant in the Redeemer's cause,
 H. E. MOLER,
 District President.

Field Address: HIBBARD, INDIANA.

To the Saints and Friends in Arkansas and Louisiana: I have again been appointed to this field, and the Presidency and Twelve saw fit to appoint me as supervisor over the field for the conference year. We want to make a special effort in trying to get the gospel before the people.

I would like to hear from all the scattered Saints in the field, where you are, and what the chances are for preaching in your town or neighborhood, and we will try to get to your place some time during the year if possible.

To the local elders and priesthood, I would like to hear from every one of you that can give us any assistance in the work in any way. We would love to have all the help we can get in the missionary effort. Anyone who can give us any time in the field, please let me hear from you, and I will try to arrange to keep you busy.

If there is anyone who can give us any help in music and song service, we would be glad to hear from you also, for music is a great help in gospel work, and we want to make the greatest effort this year that has ever been made in this field, and hope to do more good than has ever been done in the past.

Therefore, we call on all to thrust in your sickles and let's reap a great harvest, as this is truly the day of harvest, and the laborers are few. Therefore, we call for volunteers.

And let us not forget what we owe the Lord in a financial way, that his work of the harvest may not be hindered. We can all do something to help carry on this great work. Let us not rob God out of his tithes and offerings.

Let me say to the Saints of this field that Arkansas is a district now, and Brother W. F. Martin of Bald Knob, Arkansas, is Bishop's agent for the district. He would love to have your name on his books as a tithepayer, though it be little or much. Let us have our names written there. Address Brother W. F. Martin, Bald Knob, Arkansas, box 181, and he will gladly receipt you for any amount you may send. Let us make this new district of great value and service to the church.

Anyone wishing to write me, address me at 109 West Adams, Pittsburgh, Kansas, or Bald Knob, Arkansas, in care of W. F. Martin, box 181. The latter is, or will be my field address.

Hoping to have the cooperation of all the Saints throughout the field, I am,

Your brother and servant in the gospel,

J. T. RILEY.

To the Saints and Friends of the Southeastern Illinois District: In harmony with the appointment of the Twelve I take pleasure in asking you to cooperate with me in the missionary work in this district.

We want to keep in touch with all the local workers who are able to fill week-end appointments and any who feel the need of missionary work in their localities.

We are glad to have with us Brother W. H. Kelley, who because of his ability and long experience in the missionary field will be of great assistance to us who are new appointees to the field.

And we greatly appreciate the fact that the church has sent to this field one of the live young men, Brother Ray Whiting, who is surely a live wire, full of energy and zeal in helping to warn the world. And Brother F. L. Sawley, our well-known and genial worker, is busily engaged in pushing the work forward.

If you know of any calls or demands for missionary work, please address the writer. Mission address: Care Charles Wesner, 429 Maple Street, Centralia, Illinois.

LESTER O. WILDERMUTH.

To the Saints in Arizona; Greeting: Having been made supervisor of missionary activities of the State, I would like to get in touch with Saints or friends that would care to have a missionary visit their locality.

The State is large and strange to me and it would be a great help if Saints living in the different parts would write us so that we could plan intensive work with the thought of reaching as many parts of the field as possible during the conference term. The call for intensive effort has been given; a goal has been set—20,000 converts by next conference. We need your help; will you help us to open up the work in your locality?

"We are workers together with God." Are you willing to work with us for the honor and glory of God? If so, let us hear from you as soon as possible so that we can plan to reach your locality.

As missionaries we need the cooperation of the Saints in the outlying places and feel that if all would respond greater good could be accomplished and the people be warned.

If there are any who have friends in the State that they would like a missionary to call on and will furnish us with address we will try and arrange for a call.

Yours in hope of success,

WILLIAM ANDERSON.

CHURCH NEWS

An important step toward the consolidation of the publishing interests of the church has been consummated recently in the purchase by Bishop B. R. McGuire of the Battery Block in Independence, Missouri. This property is just east of the Ensign Office, facing Lexington and Osage Streets. The part facing Lexington (one of the principal streets of the city) is a two-story building with 156 feet frontage, the lower floor providing for several business establishments and the upper floor occupied by business offices. The large building facing Osage, known as The Armory, will, when possession is obtained likely be fitted out as a publishing house, and the Herald Publishing House be transferred in the spring of 1921.

At the monthly sacrament meeting at the Lamoni church A. M. Carmichael was ordained a member of the stake high council, Edward Elefson and Lewis Jones ordained teachers, and Brother and Sister F. V. Elliott and Brother and Sister Frank B. Almond set apart by special blessing for their work in the island mission for which they departed that day.

Consecration + Preparation

Consecration alone is good. Preparation alone may be valuable. Put the two together and you have an unbeatable combination!

Graceland college fosters the spirit of consecration and the ideal of preparation. It should mean much to you, young man or woman, to be able to attend a school where the environment promotes the development of Zion and her institutions.

The church needs trained workers in every field of human endeavor: Agriculture, Chemistry, Music, Law, Business, Religious Education, Advertising, Medicine, Science, Dentistry, Pharmacy, Teaching.

Graceland is fully standardized and officially accredited. She is equipped to give you the necessary preliminary preparation for the above courses.

Early Ideals of the Church

III. To Secure the Best Education

It has been represented that the Saints who were gathered together in New York, Ohio, Missouri, and Illinois, under the ministry of Joseph Smith and his immediate associates, were an ignorant class of people, not educated and not caring to become educated. This representation, like others of its class, is based on an entire misconception of the church, its ideals, and the individual character of its representative members.

by the elders who were studious and earnest in their work.

In 1836 a class of forty elders was formed in Kirtland with Joseph Smith at the head. Their purpose was to study the Hebrew language. They secured the services of Professor Seixas, of Hudson Seminary, for a term of seven weeks, paying him three hundred and twenty dollars.

Poor the church was, undoubtedly, at that day, and engaged in pushing its way over the western frontier, in its movement toward Missouri, yet these men had time and inclination to study Hebrew.

From the personal diary of Joseph Smith we select entries made on three consecutive days:

"Monday, 21 (1835). Spent this day at home, endeavoring to treasure up knowledge for the benefit of my calling. The day passed off very pleasantly. I thank the Lord for his

THE BATTERY BLOCK

The above frontage is on Lexington Street, Independence, Missouri, and with the building in the rear, shown in another view, comprises the recent purchase made by the church to be used for offices and publishing house.

Less than two years after the organization of the church a revelation was received through Joseph Smith and accepted by the church from which we quote:

"Therefore, verily I say unto you, my friends, Call your solemn assembly, as I have commanded you; and as all have not faith, seek ye diligently and teach one another words of wisdom; yet, seek ye out of the best books words of wisdom; seek learning even by study, and also by faith. Organize yourselves, prepare every needful thing, and establish a house, even a house of prayer, a house of fasting, a house of faith, a house of learning, a house of glory, a house of order, a house of God; that your incomings may be in the name of the Lord; that your outgoings may be in the name of the Lord; that all your salutations may be in the name of the Lord; with uplifted hands unto the Most High."—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 36.

A brief glance at the history of the church will show that the members began to obey the injunctions contained in this law, to seek knowledge and wisdom out of the best books. In 1834 a school of the elders was established in Kirtland to study matters of general interest and especially those immediately connected with their ministry. A regular course of lectures was undertaken; and the school was well attended blessings to my soul, his great mercy over my family in sparing our lives. O continue thy care over me and mine, for Christ's sake.

"Tuesday, 22. At home. Continued my studies. O may God give me learning, even language; and endue me with qualifications to magnify his name while I live.

"Wednesday, 23. In the forenoon, at home, studying the Greek language."—Church History, vol. 1, p. 625.

The following from the pen of Joseph Smith gives a picture of the intellectual activities of one week in Kirtland in the winter of 1837. Could any frontier community of those days show a better record?

"During the winter, the house of the Lord at Kirtland was filled to overflowing with attentive hearers, mostly communicants; and in the evenings of the same, the singers met under the direction of Elders Luman Carter and Jonathan Crosby, jr., who gave instructions in the principles of vocal music.

"On Monday evenings the Quorum of High Priests meet in the west room of the attic story, where they transact the business of their particular quorum. On Tuesday evenings the seventies occupy the same room. On Wednesday evenings the rooms are occupied by the Quorum of Elders. And on Thursday, p. m., a prayer meeting is held in the lower part of the house, free for all, though generally conducted by Patriarch Joseph Smith, sr. The Twelve, the High Council, and other quorums, generally, meet each week to transact business, and during the week the "Kirtland High School" is taught in the attic story, by H. M. Hawes, Esq., professor of the Greek and Latin languages. The school numbers from one hundred and thirty-five to one hundred and forty students, divided into three departments; the classics, where the languages only are taught; the English department, where mathematics, common arithmetic, geography, English grammar, writing, and reading are taught; and the juvenile department, the last two having each an assistant instructor. The school commenced in November, and on the first Wednesday in January the several classes passed a public examination in the presence of the trustees of the school, parents, and guardians, and their progress in study was found of the highest order.—Church History, vol. 2, pp. 98 and 99.

Concerning the church during its sojourn in Missouri, and its attitude toward education, we now quote from the History the remission of their sins when eight years old, and receive the laying on of the hands: and they shall also teach their children to pray, and to walk uprightly before the Lord."—Doctrine and Covenants 68: 4.

It will be remembered that in those days our free school system as we now have it did not exist. Schoolbooks were not written, printed, and on sale so freely as they are now. And the church, pioneer as it was in educational matters, was instructed to meet the situation as it then existed:

"And again, you shall be ordained to assist my servant Oliver Cowdery to do the work of printing, and of selecting, and writing books for schools, in this church, that little children also may receive instruction before me as is pleasing unto me. And again, verily I say unto you, For this cause you shall take your journey with my servants Joseph Smith, jr., and Sidney Rigdon, that you may be planted in the land of your inheritance, to do this work."—Doctrine and Covenants 55: 2.

THE ARMORY BUILDING

The building in the foreground was used by the Religio Exposition at Independence last spring, and contains ample room for the proposed publishing house the church may establish therein later on, and the office rooms pertaining thereto. This building faces Osage Street. The Battery Block adjoining it on the left is shown in another view.

of Caldwell and Livingston Counties (pages 120, 121), published by the Saint Louis Historical Society:

"In the fall of 1836 a large and comfortable schoolhouse was built. . . . The Mormons very early gave attention to educational matters. There were many teachers among them and schoolhouses were among their first buildings."

We are glad to learn that schoolhouses were among the first buildings to be erected by the Saints when they moved into a new section of the country. It was justly the pride of American pioneers that everywhere they went the little red schoolhouse sprang up side by side with the first log huts or pine board shacks. We are pleased to hear it acknowledged that there were many teachers among the Saints. These facts do not support the charge that they were an ignorant and degraded people.

Not only were the older people enjoined to educate themselves by study and prayer and the perusal of all good books, but upon them was placed the duty of educating their children in religious matters and on questions of morality:

"And again, inasmuch as parents have children in Zion, or in any of her stakes which are organized, that teach them not to understand the doctrine of repentance; faith in Christ the Son of the Living God; and of baptism and the gift of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands when eight years old, the sin be upon the head of the parents; for this shall be a law unto the inhabitants of Zion, or in any of her stakes which are organized; and their children shall be baptized for

We have presented enough to convince anyone not blinded by prejudice that the attitude of the church toward education was misunderstood by the world at large. Their ideal was high. In fact we believe that they had the true and only safe theory of education, stated in the law quoted, "Seek learning even by study, and also by faith."

Faith divorced from study and intellectual effort soon becomes credulity and degenerates into superstition. Study divorced from faith heads directly toward atheism, the curse of many colleges and universities, to-day.

The ultimate aim of education was held by the church to be the discovery of truth. The breadth and liberality of that ideal may be understood by the church's definition of truth. "Truth is knowledge of things as they are, and as they were, and as they are to come."—Doctrine and Covenants 90: 4.

In other words, he who understands things as they are, as they were, and as they are to be, is in possession of truth. That is the end and aim of education. Such an education can never be secured by study alone, as it involves things unseen, and earned only by revelation. Neither can it be secured by faith alone, because man is a reasoning being, and is required to reason and study.

In harmony with the above definition of truth we quote the following:

"To the student of society present themselves the questions,

What is? What has been? What tends to be? What may be? . . . The first two are tributary to the third. . . We seek truth not merely for the pleasure of knowing, but in order to have a lamp to our feet."—Edward A. Ross, professor of Sociology, in preface to Foundation of Sociology.

EDITORS' NOTE: This is the third of five editorials on this subject, all worthy of saving to hand to your friends who are interested in the facts concerning the church we represent. The fourth article will appear next week.

The Sunday Schools and the Million-Dollar Slogan

One of the points in the newly adopted standard of excellence in the Mobile district Sunday school Department reads:

"Every member of the school who is a member of the church a tithe payer."

Since the schools must nearly all revise their standards this year because of the transfer of the home department and cradle roll work to the Women's Department, it would be well to consider the use of this most excellent point in the standards for judging schools.

While it is true that the basis of religious teaching is necessarily in the home and no organization can expect to relieve parents of their responsibility, we believe this is a fine opportunity to have the home training on this point materially supplemented.

The instructions to parents regarding the teaching of their children regarding the church and its precepts is very plain (see Doctrine and Covenants 68:4) but every father and mother comes to realize that sooner or later the influences outside the home loom large in the minds of their offspring. The parents may have imparted the necessary information about the law of tithing, we will say, and the child believes because they are his parents, but let him associate constantly with boys and girls who do not know this law, to say nothing of practicing it, and there is a disposition to decide that it doesn't matter so much or others would be doing it. He may realize the justice of it, but there is the group spirit, the gang spirit, that strongly urges a child to be like those he plays with, lest he be thought queer.

So whether we like to concede it or not, these outside influences are strong factors in the life of a child, and as he matures and tries out his own ideas, one finds him shaping his expression of his former teachings by the attitudes and habits of the groups in which he moves. His associates and companions have a great deal to do with his interpretation of the ideas he received earlier.

If begun early enough, the child is made to understand that the law of tithing is important. He soon comes to realize that when the family owes the grocer for the food they eat he must be paid. Likewise the clothes they wear and the fuel they burn. And if something happens so the bills are in arrears it is no excuse for trying to evade them. In the same manner he should consider his duty regarding the payment of the tenth that the Lord asks for. There is nothing mysterious about it; nothing that anyone cannot understand; so why should any member of the church plead ignorance?

There are wonderful opportunities for the teacher in a class of eager pupils, and there are times when he can say just the thing that will supplement the teachings of the parents and have it corroborated by some member of the class. Or it may be the teacher will have to take over the work the parent has neglected, for far too many parents leave all religious teaching to the Sunday school, Religio, and church services. Since the first-named is the most influential in the impartation of religious education in his impressional years, it has a grave responsibility in this regard.

The course of lessons provided for the Sunday schools gives due emphasis to tithing, but if a teacher or officer desires to do so, there is little difficulty in making a place for the special consideration necessary to develop further this subject. In fact there should be a constant effort to apply to some practical purpose the general ideals the lessons teach, and a thoughtful teacher will appreciate this as one of them.

There are two good ways of carrying out this Sunday school plan of gathering tithes. One is to have a local solicitor in charge who has been appointed by the Bishop or agent, who will collect all amounts brought in and be responsible for the turning of the funds into the hands of the proper authorities and the giving of receipts to those paying.

Another method is to hand or send to the representative of the Bishop direct the amount due for tithing. The local representative method has some special advantages, one of them being the habit of paying small amounts while convenient, rather than waiting till a later time and possibly changing one's mind.

In either case the importance of keeping the tithe and offering receipts by the payee should be explained. It is both businesslike and personally encouraging, often proving to be a direct incentive to increase the amounts one can give for the furtherance of the cause.

The church publishing houses will furnish at small cost cards especially made for the collection of tithing in small amounts. The pupil is given a card and the solicitor retains a duplicate. Each time something is paid in as tithing both cards are punched alike and the process continued till the card is filled, when an official receipt is issued instead. It is especially valuable for children and worth while for all ages.

Properly understood and appreciated, taught in its true aspects, the impartation of tithing ideals will not only be of value to the pupils coming each year under the influence of the school, but will greatly help the teachers and officers as well by strengthening them in their resolutions to practice the things they teach. And the influence of the child's good work on the parents is most wholesome.

The Sunday school has already demonstrated what it could do with the Christmas offering. The church was debt-stricken and almost discouraged over it till the Sunday school took up the task. As a result, not only the debt was paid but a hundred thousand dollars subscribed to buy lands, and great enthusiasm developed which showed material results in the receipts of tithes and offerings.

If the Sunday schools were to take hold of the slogan of the bishopric: "A million dollars tithing," no power on earth could stop them from going past it, and at the same time carrying on its plan to do more than last year with the Christmas offering.

The Lord's tenth must not be forgotten. The Sunday schools can well give a rightful place to the teaching of the importance of the observance of the tithing principle.

E. D. MOORE.

Elder L. C. Moore, now president of the Tunnel Hill Branch, residing at Creal Springs, Illinois, observes that it would be a distinct advantage to the Saints if they would subscribe for one or more of the church periodicals to keep pace with the progress of the work.

It will be wisdom on the part of housekeepers to can the usual amount of fruits and vegetables this year, even if part or all of the fruit must be canned without sugar, according to a statement issued by the United States Department of Agriculture. From all indications, sugar will be more abundant next winter, when the fruit will be used on the table, the department says. There will apparently be an increased acreage of both cane and beet sugar this year in the United States, Cuba, and in other countries in the Northern Hemisphere.

The Infant Mind

We have noted many times the assertion that the priesthood of the Roman Catholic Church have stated: "Give us a child until he is eight years of age, and we care not who has him after that." This is expressed in various ways. We have seen the age sometimes stated as five years.

Eight years is rather significant as the years of preparation, as at eight years of age the Lord has declared a child should be prepared for baptism, and to enter the kingdom.

It may prove of interest to some of our readers to note that the Freudian school of psychologists insists rather strongly that the origin of the greater part of nervous ills of later life, if not nearly all, are to be found in the experiences of infancy. They go farther and place there the root of many later psychoses, and of later illness in life. The experiences of the infant mind sink deep into the unconscious to make their presence felt in the dream vagaries and illnesses of later life, or with proper care, in the strong and devoted character which can stand the test of life.

This being the case, we see at once how important it is that proper care be given to infants, not only of one year and two years of age, but also of three, four, five, six, and seven years of age and care given with regard to early kindergarten and school work and the period before that in which the child is so often neglected. The habits formed then often have a life-long set. The things done then make the habits of later life. The way the twig is then bent, the tree will afterwards grow.

It is very important then that that work should be well done, and that the father and mother should not be content in the creating and the feeding of the physical body, but should also give their attention to the development of the mind and soul, especially to prevent that which is untoward. It is a very great and sacred trust. It is a very important period also for the church, which has been heretofore practically neglected.

Subjects Being Discussed

Young Women Insistent for Korean Independence

Though Japan is maintaining political control of Korea, and according to many reports manifesting considerable cruelty in doing so, and her intentions and motives are seriously questioned by the natives, young women and girls in the schools have been the means of creating and maintaining a strong nationalistic spirit and fanning the flame of patriotism in the hearts of the illiterate population. At times wholesale arrests of the pupils of an entire school have been made because of their participation in "Independence" celebrations.

Next Twenty Years a Critical Period

In an article by George P. McLean, United States Senator from Connecticut, he says: "All men should take an active interest in politics, and especially those who have had superior educational advantages. . . . If the spirit of the rising generation of young men and women is to remain sound, it will be at the price of eternal vigilance on the part of those whose feet are still on the earth, and whose minds are still unconvinced that governments can preform miracles."

Employers Want Open Shop

It is reported that in the East there is a strong sentiment among employers in favor of the open shop, as opposed to the employment of union labor. The real demand for this has been largely induced by the strike of dock laborers which cause such a congestion of freight at the wharves in New York.

However, union officials are inclined to belittle the efforts of the employers, largely because of the long-time contracts existing between many employers and union labor.

The Irish Demand World-Recognized Republic

Carl W. Ackerman, the well-known journalist, now in Great Britain and in close touch with the Irish situation, believes that Ireland will either succeed in getting recognition from Great Britain as an independent republic with international standing or there will be a bitter war of several years' duration. He asserts that the whole south and west of Ireland, except the six counties of Ulster, are solidly Sinn Fein, and will not be content with anything but their ultimate goal: complete independence.

Fewer and fewer trains are being run, hatred of the populace for the British troops is very bitter, especially toward those who go about armed, and the Irish parliament, though officially dissolved, is holding frequent meetings.

After discussing the matter with Arthur Griffiths, acting president of the so-called Irish republic, and other prominent leaders, Mr. Ackerman is of the opinion that only through mediation, preferably American, can peace come from the extremely strained relations now existing in the Emerald Isle.

A New Nation in Palestine

In an editorial in next to the last issue of the Jerusalem News (June 7) this statement is made: "A new nation is being born in Palestine, conceived by inspiration and fathered by prophecy. This new nation is a child of promise; its birth has been expected by devout people throughout the ages and its advent foretold with mathematical accuracy. . . . Behold the new Palestine under strong guardianship! This is the moment for a vote of thanks to the good men and true who gave life and treasure that the Holy Land might be free. . . . The form and outline of the new Palestine must be determined with accuracy and justice to all concerned. It is assumed that in general the boundaries of the lands occupied by the twelve tribes of Israel will be taken as marking the frontiers of the new nation, allowance being made for the needs of a modern, well-equipped state. . . . The new nation will also have to be protected until it is able to take care of itself and this means the expenditure of large sums of money; judging by present indications considerable numbers of troops will be required for some time to come. Somebody will have to pay for the maintenance of these troops. Who will pay the bills? Will everybody cooperate with the troops and thus help to reduce the charge upon the new nation? Many questions present themselves in regard to the education and upbringing of the promising infant, but we have faith to believe that all impediments will be overcome, and that this land, dear to millions, will become the glory of the nations."

In Michigan this fall the voters will decide on the adoption of a constitutional amendment compelling the attendance of children at a public school until they shall have completed the eighth grade. This movement is aimed directly at the system of parochial schools which has grown so strong, and is being greatly opposed by the Roman Catholics especially.

Was Joseph Smith a Polygamist?

BY J. W. WIGHT

Having abundant opportunity to learn of such a fact if it ever existed, Elder Wight believes Joseph Smith a man of God and shows how at least one woman claimed to be a wife of the Martyr.

Lying before me is page 27 of The Presbyterian of July 21, 1920, containing the following item with a query from a HERALD editor as to my caring to answer it. It reads:

"Josephites

"Do the Reorganized Latter Day Saints (Josephites) believe in polygamy? They do not.

"Was Joseph Smith, jr., a polygamist? A relative of Brigham Young told me that a son of Joseph Smith, jr., came to Utah and got the affidavits of twenty women that they were the wives of Joseph Smith, jr.

"C. W. H."

C. W. H. is certainly to be commended for his frank and truthful answer in paragraph one of the above statement. But it would seem to have been the proper course to pursue to let it end at that since he had no other than hearsay by which to implicate Joseph Smith, jr. As to which "son" it was that got the affidavits we are not informed, neither is there information as to the name of the "relative." Since the statement is founded on hearsay it is at once removed from the realm of evidence and would be treated as worthless by any court of civilized nations, hence the only reason for attempting a reply is that some may accept it as proof.

It may be as well to say, however, that could it be proved beyond the question of controversy that Joseph Smith did in the latter period of his life practice the abominable doctrine of a plurality of wives, it would in no way detract from the truthfulness of the doctrine of Jesus Christ as previously taught and practiced by him but would be rather an evidence of his own transgression and departure from the principles previously taught and practiced. Neither would the Reorganization in any sense accept it as being right because of such a practice by him.

From the very incipency of the organization of the church these had been the teachings of the standard books: Bible:

"Yet ye say, Wherefore? Because the Lord hath been witness between thee and the wife of thy youth, against whom thou hast dealt treacherously: [They were practicing polygamy and being condemned for it by Malachi] yet is she thy companion, and the wife of thy covenant. And did he not make one? Yet had he the residue of the spirit. And wherefore one? That he might seek a godly seed. Therefore take heed to your spirit, and let none deal treacherously against the wife of his youth."—Malachi 2: 14, 15.

It would be hard to find a clearer condemnation of the doctrine of a plurality of wives, for if this means anything at all it is this: That God had residue of the spirit so that had he chosen to have made more than one wife for Adam he could have done so but he made the "one" that he might "seek a godly seed." This clearly infers that more than one would have meant an ungodly seed! Jesus just as clearly teaches monogomy (Matthew 19: 4, 5; Mark 10: 5-9). Book of Mormon: (A history of and revelations to prehistoric Americans dwelling upon this continent from 2200 B. C. to 420 A. D.)

"This people began to wax in iniquity; they understand not the scriptures: for they seek to excuse themselves in committing whoredoms, because of the things which were written concerning David, and Solomon his son. Behold, David and Solomon truly had many wives and concubines, which thing was abominable before me, saith the Lord. . . . Wherefore, my brethren, hear me, and hearken to the word of the Lord: For there shall not any man among you have save it be one wife: and concubines he shall have none: . . . Wherefore, this people shall keep my commandments, saith the Lord of hosts, or cursed be the land for their sakes."—Jacob 2: 6.

It is difficult to get language more positive. There are at least three other places in this book just as condemnatory. Doctrine and Covenants: (Revelations from God, given to Joseph Smith, jr.)

"Thou shalt love thy wife with all thy heart, and shalt cleave unto her and none else."—Section 42: 7.

"Wherefore it is lawful that he should have one wife, and they twain shall be one flesh, and all this that the earth might answer the end of its creation; and that it might be filled with the measure of man."—Section 49: 3.

The emphasis is mine. And here is the marriage covenant: "You both mutually agree to be each other's companion, husband and wife, observing the legal rights belonging to this condition; that is, keeping yourselves wholly for each other, and from all others, during your lives."—Ibid., 111: 2.

From the above it will readily be seen that, did Mr. Smith enter the awful practice, he did so in open violation of all previous teaching. But it is at least passing strange that did he marry the above twenty women there was no issue, as he was physically vigorous and the last issue by his wife Emma was born a few months subsequent to his martyrdom.

The historical fact is this: That the first polygamous child was born to Brigham Young, June 19, 1845, almost a year subsequent to the death of Smith! And it is even stranger still that the very woman whom the Utah people say Joseph Smith married as early as October 27, 1841, never bore him issue.

Mr. Andrew Jensen, at the time historian for the Utah church, says that this Miss Zina D. Huntington married a man by the name of Henry Jacobs, bore him two sons, but the marriage not proving agreeable she afterwards separated from him and married Joseph Smith on the above date. The records of Hancock County, Illinois, show that the license for her marriage with Jacobs was issued March 7, 1841. It was my privilege to interview this same lady in Salt Lake City, in 1900, if memory serves me right. A part of that interview is here attached as taken from the stenographer's report:

"Q. Can you tell me when you were married to Mr. Jacobs?

"A. That is no matter.

"Q. Can you tell me how many children were born to Mr. Jacobs?

"A. I had two sons, both noble boys.

"Q. Do you remember the dates of their birth?

"A. That is no matter.

"Q. Is it not a fact that one of those boys was born after you left Nauvoo? Was he not born on the Chariton River?

"A. Yes, on the Chariton River. That is the reason he was called Chariton.

"Q. Then it is a fact that it was as late as 1846 or 1847 this boy Chariton was born on the Chariton River?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Then it is a fact, Mrs. Young, is it not, that you married Mr. Smith at the same time you were married to Mr. Jacobs?

"A. What right have you to ask me such questions? I was sealed to Joseph Smith for eternity."

Yet, sealed to him for eternity after his death! and in that way became the "wife of Joseph Smith"! Bah!

Had the interview been embellished with all the interesting sidelights it would have been more comprehensive to the reader, but the stenographer, doubting her ability under such conditions, was instructed to take only the direct questions and their answers. Mr. Penrose was responsible for a continuation of the interview at the vital place—that is brought out in the above extract. "Aunt" Zina's daughter, at the evident instigation of Emeline B. Wells, a very intellectual woman and who was "seeing things" as to where the questions were leading, objected to her mother having to answer "all those lawyer-like questions"! Mr. Penrose interposed that "the questions are simple and Mr. Wight gentlemanly." The priesthood having thus spoken, opposition ceased and the interview proceeded.

The most interesting facts of the interview are that Mrs. Young had a very deficient memory as to dates, and especially so when she feared that such dates would interfere with her claims; that she did not marry Mr. Smith until after she had separated from Mr. Jacobs; that she bore a son to Mr. Jacobs at least two years after Smith was dead; that at most when pushed for a direct answer she was only willing to testify that she had been sealed to Smith for eternity. And this latter thought is the key to the solution of the problem of her and others becoming Smith's wives—sealed to him for eternity after he was dead! This was at one time quite a common practice in Utah and is likely so now in their temples.

If one is to judge the "pudding" by the eating, the situation resolves itself into this: The Utah people, R. C. Evans, et al, claim that Smith began the practice of polygamy, as early at least as 1841, giving him more than three years to act the part of a husband to other women than his wife, and yet not a child born of such relationship! The facts are that Brigham Young began to teach and practice the law of plural marriage before leaving Nauvoo and enlarged upon it, as Mr. Snow would have said, after reaching the mountain fastnesses. Nearly every woman whom they name as a wife of Smith bore children to the men they married in Utah, but not one of them could produce a child old enough to belong to Smith!

And it is upon such testimony that Utah and more modern recalcitrants, seek to fasten the stain upon a man who showed himself willing to die for his religious convictions and whom it has thus far been impossible to fasten the "crime of polygamy" upon even before the courts at law, where testimony has to be sworn to and submit to cross-examination.

Of two of these so-called "wives" Judge Philips had this to say when rendering his decision in the Temple Lot suit:

"It is charged by the Respondents, as an echo of the Utah Church, that Joseph Smith, 'the Martyr,' secretly taught and practiced polygamy; and the Utah contingent furnishes the evidence, and two of the women, to prove this fact. It perhaps would be uncharitable to say of these women that they have borne false testimony as to their connection with Joseph Smith; but, in view of all the evidence and circumstances surrounding the alleged intercourse, it is difficult to escape the conclusion that at most they were sports in 'nest hiding.'"

Of their further claim, President Woodruff's in particular, he also said:

"In view of the contention of the Salt Lake party, that polygamy obtained in Nauvoo as early as 1841, it must be a little embarrassing to President Woodruff of that organization when he is confronted, as he was in the evidence in this case, with a published card in the church organ at Nauvoo in October, 1843, certifying that he knew of no other rule or system of marriage than the one published in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, and that the 'secret wife system,' charged against the church, was a creature of invention by one Doctor Bennett, and that they knew of no such society. That certificate was signed by the leading members of the church, including John Taylor, the former president of the Utah Church."

Judge Philips has gone to his account but his decision stands as a monument to his ability to weigh evidence. And mind you this decision was not based upon the thought that "somebody said that somebody said" but upon the direct testimony of the witnesses as placed upon the stand and where opportunity was given them to testify direct, and not upon what "somebody said"!

But be it remembered that shall the time ever come when the submitted evidence shall fasten this "crime" upon Smith so completely that doubt can no longer exist, then it but lowers the man in the moral scale and does not affect the church, only as it shall conform to such a standard. And shall such evidence ever be produced then I shall be ready to denounce the acts of the man for his gross deception. But I have been long making diligent research, three years of that time spent in Utah where evidence is supposed to exist, but so far have not found it.

What Coordination Means to the Church

BY C. I. CARPENTER

(A paper read by the author before the conference of the Kewanee, Illinois, District.)

Coordination: The act of coordinating; harmonious adjustment. The state of being coordinate.

Coordinate: Equal in, or of the same rank, order, or importance; not subordinate. To place in the same order, class, etc. To harmonize.

Our first effort in this discussion shall be to determine if we may what coordination is and how it will affect the administration of the affairs of the church, including all its departments in our branches and district. Our starting place, then, must be the definition or meaning of the word, and for this purpose we quote from authority which we all recognize as standard: the dictionary which says that coordination is the act of coordinating; harmonious adjustment. The state of being coordinate. Then when we look farther to learn what is meant by coordinate it says, Equal in, or of the same rank, order, or importance; not subordinate. To place in the same order, class, etc. To harmonize.

The Church and Its "Auxiliaries"

To what is it proposed to apply these principles of coordination? You say the church and its auxiliaries. Yes, but wait. Auxiliary: Aiding, helping; subordinate, subsidiary. You say you mean the Sunday school, the Religio, the Women's Department, and such other organizations as have been called into being to lend help, aid, and assistance to the church.

Very good. Let us examine these for a moment. First, what are they auxiliary to? The church. Correct, perhaps. Let us see. Of whom does the Sunday school consist? Mostly members of the church and their children. Who must the superintendent be? A member of the church in good standing. How about the Religio? Here we find the same condition. Those not members may meet with us and partake of the benefits to a limited degree, and so it is with each institution.

In the more or less distant past these institutions, one by one, came into existence, not from spontaneous generation but to meet a condition and supply a demand which had developed within the church, but which was not specifically provided for by the church as its organization and functions were then interpreted by its officials. They were allowed to grow up more or less self-supporting, and independent of each other and the parent body like neglected children of an indifferent or ignorant parent, until the family became so large and the demands so insistent that the parent has begun to awaken to a realization that they are really her children, a thing which the children themselves have each one directly or indirectly claimed from their infancy. Not subordinate to; not auxiliary, but a part of the original body. Departments if you please.

The children are grown now, and a complete reconciliation with the parent has been effected, whereby it is now proposed that the children shall take and enjoy their proper place in the family from this time forward, assuming, each his proper share of the work and responsibility, and sharing equally in the blessings and benefits derived from the family relationship. No longer domiciled under the same roof, but each going his own way, pursuing his own fortune without regard to the interests of the others and without their help or their influence, but now a properly recognized parent furnishes the family name and oversees and superintends the activities of the whole family, shapes its policies, suggests, advises, instructs, and if necessary controls its conduct, at the same time assuming due responsibility for its combined successes or failures, while John cares for the horses, George looks after the cows, Henry tends the hogs and the chickens, Mary washes the dishes and sweeps the floors, and Susan makes the beds and helps with the sewing, each doing the part best suited to his or her strength and ability, and all enjoying the happiness and prosperity resulting from the combined effort of the whole family.

The Word Auxiliaries Now Obsolete

We no longer have the church and its auxiliaries as in days of old. Since the reconciliation we have the family, which is the church of Jesus Christ, divided into departments to meet the varied demands arising from a broader and higher conception of its field and its functions.

The Sunday school is given the task of providing religious instruction to all ages. To the Religio is assigned the supervision of the activities of the young people, with especial reference to meeting the social and recreational demands of our children in such a way as to satisfy the natural and legitimate inclination for such activities and yet in such a wholesome and uplifting manner that we shall no longer have to face the fact that notwithstanding nearly all of our children attend our Sunday schools, yet when they reach maturity, more than fifty per cent of them either never unite with the church or drift away and are finally lost from our membership. The Women's Department is intrusted with the responsibility of making our homes better, brighter, and happier in every sense, so that they may become what they are intended to be, types, shadows, foretastes if you please of the perfect home in the life to come. So with each of the other departments, publication, publicity, health, etc., each taking up its special feature of the general burden of providing for every legitimate demand of the members of the church.

For nearly a hundred years we have preached to the world that the gospel would meet our every need, and yet when they united with us they were disappointed to find that we only believed these things but did not practice them, so many went back to their former connections where they did the same thing. To us, in our day, comes the opportunity of setting the church right before the world. By coordinating our efforts under the one head, the church, we may demonstrate that we practice what we preach.

The Power of Nomination

But you say, What will it mean to our district? How will it affect us? Here it will be necessary to notice briefly the laws by which our organic structure has been builded.

These laws are basic and cannot be changed without subjecting ourselves to the almost certainty of collapse, which would mean destruction. To use a familiar term and one which will be readily understood by all, we wish to suggest that the power of nomination (do not be frightened now, we did not say one-man power) was exercised in the very beginning of our organization by the divine trinity. Did you catch that word trinity? That means three, not one, in nominating Joseph Smith to be the president of the church, subject to the approval and acceptance of the members of the body. Two men were nominated by that same trinity to act as counselors, advisers, helpers if you please, to assist him in the duties of the presidency, subject likewise to the approval of the body.

As a district we are a division of the general body, made so and limited to certain territorial boundaries for the purpose of convenience in administration. The law states that those having direct charge of districts and large branches should be high priests where possible, or else elders having presiding ability, and in the discharge of their duties of administering the affairs of the church in the district they are under the direction of the Presidency. Following the principle, and the precedent set in the beginning, the Presidency, not one man, but now assisted not only by his counselors in the Presidency, but also by the Quorums of Apostles and Presiding Bishopric will nominate the man to act as our district president, not arbitrarily appoint, but nominate subject to our approval and acceptance. He will in turn nominate again, subject to our approval or acceptance, or we will select one or more men to counsel with and assist him in the administration of the affairs of the district. No one-man power yet, but now look out. Here is where we may have trouble. The head of the family or church in the district of course is the district presidency, and the branches and departments correspond to the separate households of John, and Henry, and Mary, and Susan, each with his individual tasks and responsibilities, but contributing to the success of the whole family and subject to parental advice and direction.

Again the power of nomination comes into operation. The head of the family in the district suggests that from observation and experience it seems that John is best suited for this task, Henry for that, Mary for another, and Susan for another. The district presidency, not one man, but two or three men, nominate Brother Holmes to superintend the interests of the Sunday school Department, Brother Jones the Religio, etc., in each case subject to the approval of the body, not forgetting in any case that all things shall be done in order and by common consent in the church.

Experience and development will doubtless prove to us that this rule of action should extend further, and being responsible for their respective departments, Brother Holmes, Brother Jones, etc., should have the power to nominate those who are expected to share their tasks with them, still subject to the approval of the body in every case.

Branch Administration

In branch administration the same principle would apply. The branch being a division of the district, and the district executives being responsible for the work in all of the branches, would have the power of nomination of branch presidents at least where conditions seemed to make it wise to do so.

The branch president being assisted in all his duties, including presiding, by the other men holding the various orders of the priesthood, they being standing ministers in his branch, will after proper counsel with his assistants, nominate those who will be assigned to the direct oversight of the various departments in the branch.

Now to recapitulate: To coordinate is to place together in one class, to make of equal rank, order, or importance. To harmonize. It is proposed to bring the different phases of church activity together as church departments on an equal plane with each other, recognizing them to be of equal importance each in its sphere and contributing its portion to the full success of the whole body, so that the departmental activities will no longer be left to their own fate to sink or swim, live or die as best they may, but every branch presidency will come to realize that the branch is made up of the various departments, that if one department is sick and neglected, the diseased member must have professional attention, and corrective and remedial measures must be applied before the whole body becomes weakened and its usefulness destroyed.

Our local pastors will give their personal attention to the success of the Sunday school to make sure that the members are being reached by its opportunities, and that they are being given the proper and most effective religious instruction. They will give attention to the work of the Religio, to make sure that the best and most wholesome amusement and recreation and yet that which will attract our children and young people are being provided. They will interest themselves in the work of the women, see that their department is doing the most profitable kind of work for their particular local needs, and that they are following the best and most effective methods in the prosecution of their work. The pastor will learn to be an all-around man, for he must understand the varied needs of his people and ever be ready with wholesome advice and counsel where needed, exercising not lordship but fatherly interest and direction over every department, recognizing that the success of the whole cannot be complete without the success of each department. The natural activities of church members coordinated and administered under such conditions cannot fail to produce a normal body wherein dwells the Spirit of the Master manifested by its natural fruits, love, joy, peace, happiness, etc., an earnest of our inheritance in the celestial world.

The Dangers Recognized

Dangers? Yes, we recognize and admit them. There is scarcely a human activity with which we are acquainted but what is fraught with more or less danger. Because some people have been run down and killed by the carelessness of a chauffeur in an effort to cross a street does not argue that we shall not attempt to cross the street on foot, nor does it argue that automobiles should no longer be manufactured, nor even that they should not be operated by chauffeurs. The custom of pedestrians walking across the street cannot be denied, neither can the use of the street by automobiles be denied, nor can the method of operation of the car be questioned, but the laws for the public safety can and should be so framed and enforced as to insure safety to both the pedestrian and the driver.

The priesthood is a dangerous instrument in the hands of men whose hearts are not right before God, and it has been necessary in a number of cases to deprive such men of their right and privilege to act under their calling, but that does not argue that because they might or could abuse their powers no more men should be ordained. Under the principles of coordinated administration the responsibilities, powers, and privileges of the priesthood will become a much more sacred trust to those called of the Lord than ever before, and the rights of the people instead of being jeopardized will be more jealously guarded and protected by men of God exercising under the spirit of their calling.

The question as to whether or not his district desires to have its affairs administered under this plan we leave for others to discuss, praying that the Lord may direct in the final outcome.

BY A. B. PHILLIPS

The great abundance of various ores is repeatedly mentioned in the Book of Mormon, to obtain which "mighty heaps of earth" were cast up. The numerous proofs of ancient mining operations in America began with the discoveries of Mr. Knapp in 1848. They are now known to have covered an extensive area. Peschel states that "copper was worked in Alabama and various places east of the Mississippi, but the most important mines were situated on Lake Erie." He concludes that the achievements of ancient North Americans have always been undervalued, and says it is maintained that cast copper utensils have occasionally been found. Metal relics have been found in such profusion and variety

A PIECE OF CLOTH FOUND IN AN OHIO MOUND in both North and South America that more need not be mentioned.

Ancient Tools, Utensils, and Ornaments

It will not greatly surprise those who are acquainted with the remarkable achievements of these people of past ages to learn that they made and employed many instruments of labor, which enabled them skillfully to produce in considerable variety articles of service and adornment. The many interesting discoveries that have confirmed the Book of Mormon mention of their varied activities, seems inconceivable, unless the book is a genuine record written by these ancients themselves.

Among their many accomplishments were casting, swaging, molding, decorating, painting, weaving, knitting, and various other domestic and agricultural pursuits. For performing their several labors, the record states that they had an abundance of "all manner of tools" and machinery, and fine workmanship in wood, metals, and buildings. The relics discovered include objects of both metal and stone, such as knives, axes, hammers, pestles, gorgets, chisels, picks, scrapers, grinding stones, spindles, dibbles, needles, and a thousand specimens from New England alone, including a variety of articles the purpose of which is conjectural. In the Gilbert Museum, at Amherst College, are about three mortars, bowls, tomahawks, hoes, pottery, and other articles not named in this paragraph.

Specimens of their pottery have been obtained from many places in both South and North America. It varies considerably in the quality of its workmanship, but is often comparable with specimens of the most highly civilized ancient nations. The Encyclopedia Britannica says: "As regards internal communications, the working of gold and copper, and the manufacture and decoration of pottery, these American kingdoms were on a level with all but the most advanced nations." The articles include ornamented jars, bowls, bottles, vases, pots, water crocks, cups, and objects of various sizes, forms, and designs, some of which are elaborately decorated. Some specimens found by the writer on Barton's sought after."—Appendix, p. 6. These people were very rich, as the Book of Mormon states, and this fact is borne out by the great value of the ornaments that, as noted above, were sometimes taken from one of their graves.

To make these ornaments, the Book of Mormon tells us that there were "curious workmen" who were able to refine the ores and work them. This is supported by Mr. Wright. He says: "It seems also that they not only knew how to work the metal into wire or drawn gold but to plait it so beautifully as to compare even with the goldsmith's work of the present day. They appeared to have understood thoroughly melting and casting into molds, hammered and repousse work, and soldering, the solder being itself of gold."—Ibid., p. 7. He shows from this collection some very interesting portraits of gold ornaments made in the likeness of a bird, frog, fish, animal, or person; also finger rings, belts, charms, hairpins; and forehead, neck, breast, and priestly ornaments.

Ancient Textile Art

The Book of Mormon states that some of these people in their pride wore costly clothing, and that they made all manner of cloth for this purpose. Markham's History of Peru states that "the Incas had also made progress in the metallurgic, ceramic, and textile arts. . . . Spinning, weaving, and dyeing employed a great number of people. There were rich dresses interwoven with gold or made with gold thread." "Their finest works were probably in the precious metals, and were melted down by the conquerors."—Pages 33, 34.

It was once ignorantly supposed that the prehistoric Americans could not produce cloth, and the Book of Mormon was ridiculed because it stated that they had silk and linen, as well as "good homely cloth," and cloth in abundance. Since then this statement has been abundantly corroborated.

The Government of the United States has caused to be printed a work by W. H. Holmes, on Textile

AN OLD PONCHO FOUND IN A PERUVIAN MOUND

Island contained a mixture of fool's gold, which produced a very pleasing effect.

During the later years of Book of Mormon history the people increased in pride and the vanity of worldliness and wore fine clothing and many adornments. It would therefore be quite natural that evidences of this fact are being found from time to time. A collection of gold ornaments found in the states of Antioquia, Cauca, and elsewhere, in the United States of Colombia, is described by Bryce Wright, F. R. G. C., who says: "Many of these huacas [graves] contained ornaments of immense value, amounting, according to some authorities, to as much as £4,000, £8,000, and £13,000 respectively; so it is no wonder they were assiduously

Fabrics of Ancient Peru. In it he says:

"The strands employed in all classes of work were spun from cotton and other vegetable fibers, or from the wool of the llama, the alpaca, the vicuna, and the guanaco, and were generally moderately fine and exceedingly even and well twisted." He tells us that "the grade of culture represented by this work would seem to be very high, considering American products only, but its equivalent in old world culture must be sought in remote ages. This is shown in a striking manner when we place the more delicate pieces of Peruvian work beside fabrics taken from the mummies of ancient Egypt. In quality of fabric, method of construction, color, and style of embellishment, the correspondence is indeed remarkable."—Pages 6, 7.

That the textile art of these people was not exaggerated by the Book of Mormon ancient historian is further assured by Mr. Holmes when he states: "There is throughout a purity of design and a refinement of color that could be studied to advantage by the foremost decorators of the world. A most noticeable feature of the fabrics, and one calculated to challenge the attention of students of art development is the employment of animal forms in decoration."—Page 9. He continues, in his admiration of their wonderful skill for decorative work: "Indeed, in some cases it is difficult to say whether the ornament is woven in or embroidered. The skill exhibited is truly marvelous. The ancient people were exceedingly fond of fringes, and some of their toweled garments are marvels of elaboration." Illustrations of ancient American work are shown by Mr. Holmes. Museums contain many samples also.

The farmers of Kansas assert that they cannot raise wheat for less than $3 a bushel, consequently are organizing an association with the purpose of holding wheat from the market this fall long enough to obtain a price of $3.13 at the terminal markets of the State. They have thus organized in sixteen counties of Kansas and three counties of Oklahoma.

At the San Francisco national convention of the Democratic Party, the forty-fourth ballot resulted in the choice of James W. Cox, governor of Ohio, for presidential nominee and Franklin D. Roosevelt was nominated by acclamation for vice president. Mr. Roosevelt is a fifth cousin of the late Theodore Roosevelt and has had experience as assistant secretary of the navy. The chairman of the national committee of the Prohibition Party announces that they will hold a convention in Nebraska July 21 to put a ticket in the field so that those favoring prohibition may have opportunity to register their choice.

Denmark has offered to sell the United States five million pounds of butter at a price which will allow it to be sold anywhere in the United States for fifty cents a pound. The lack of terminal markets in New York City compelled a refusal of the offer.

Greek armies, supported by allied fleets, have succeeded in routing Turkish rebel forces in Smyrna and have taken charge of Panderna. The Turks have been carrying on a guerilla warfare at the expense of all the inhabitants, and the invasion is expected to have the effect of quelling these disturbances and restoring order. Since the sultan has admitted he cannot control the situation, the assistance of outside forces cannot be refused.

Since January 1 gasoline prices have been raised twenty per cent, yet in the report of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey for the year ending January 1, 1920, the surplus, after deducting charges and taxes, was $77,985,684, an increase in surplus of almost $20,000,000. The argument set forth was that the advance was necessary because of a shortage, yet at the end of March this year the stocks totalled 626,393,000 gallons, while in March, 1918, the figure was 526,383,000 gallons.

Miss Jane Addams, noted social worker, who has submitted a report to Herbert Hoover, who is feeding 300,000 starving children in Europe each day, cannot understand "What is the matter with America?" nor why we are so indifferent to the needs of Europe. She believes America is overlooking a great opportunity to demonstrate our human interest in the world's problems.

THE INTERCHURCH MOVEMENT FAILURE

The Interchurch Movement has fallen on evil days. It is important that all Christians understand just what has happened. There are many rumors and bits of gossip in the air, and misunderstandings are always easy. A few facts should be fixed in the mind. There were thirty-one cooperating denominations. There were 1,400 salaried workers in the offices, and 400 others in the field, or 1,800 in all. The aim was to raise $336,000,000. This was the ideal. It was placed high because the needs are great, and because we are living in days when men and women are expected to do extraordinary things. The actual contributions aggregated about $180,000,000, about one half of what was asked for. But it was not this falling short which brought the movement into straits. The crisis was precipitated by a failure to raise the funds necessary to carry the running expenses of the movement. This money was to come from people outside the churches. It was a large sum which was needed, and it did not come. That has caused all the trouble. The contributors were divided at the outset into two groups. In the first group were all church members and all church attendants who had contributed to the church within the last two years, and also all others who had members of their families in the membership of the church or in the Sunday school. All other persons were classed in Group II, and were called "Friendly Citizens." From these "Friendly Citizens" it was hoped that $40,000,000 might be collected.

The men who made this computation guessed wrong. They overestimated the size of Group II, and were wild in their expectations as to what this group would do. The bulk of all the money used by the churches of our country has always come from their members and church attendants, and from these it must continue to come. The outsiders who are not connected in any way with the church or any of its organizations can hardly be expected to become enthusiastic in the raising of funds for the enlargement of church work. Instead of $40,000,000 from the "Friendly Citizens," only $3,000,000 was raised, not much more than one third enough to defray the running expenses for the first year. Money had been poured out like water in the expensive work of making a detail survey of the needs of the whole world, and workers had been multiplied in the expectation that an enterprise so gigantic would appeal to the imagination of men who hitherto had manifested no interest in the propagation of the Christian faith. The scheme failed. The "Friendly Citizens" did not come to the rescue. Seven million dollars must now be contributed for running expenses by the denominational boards which went into the Movement. A total of ten million dollars will be necessary to pay the expenses of the last sixteen months and the next twelve. The most expensive part of the work—that of making the surveys—has been largely done, and that will not have to be done again. Administration expenses from now on will be much smaller than during the past year. The corps of workers has been greatly cut down and various economies have been introduced. . . .

After the public had been fatigued and exhausted by numberless drives it was a glorious achievement to raise a fund of nearly $200,000,000. The work which went into the surveys will be of service through the coming years. The vision of the whole world conquered for Christ by cooperating churches will never fade.—The Christian Work.

AT THE FRONT

SISTER BROWN WRITES FROM THE ISLANDS

She says the Lord has verified his promises to them in that far-away mission.

It hardly seems possible that we have been here two years and a half, but when I get time to consider my surroundings I am convinced that it is a fact.

We have been blessed with two tender buds of promise, Violet Mae, whom the natives call "Meme" (you will sound the e's as we would sound the a in pay), and Doris Emily so you will know that I am not lacking for something to keep my hands busy.

My first task after our arrival was to try for a working knowledge of the Tahitian language, and let me say that those who think that all we have to do is to open our mouths and the Lord will do the rest will be sadly mistaken if ever they have the situation to meet. I confess that I wasn't and am not at present the most brilliant of those who have come to this mission, but I have tried to do my best under the conditions which I had to meet. I have tried, prayed and cried, yet when I commenced to put sentences together it seemed as if all that I had tried to get by way of a vocabulary had left me and I seemed to be going backward rather than forward, but that seems to be the common lot of all. Yet when those times of despair would come I would remember the rich promises that the kind Father had so abundantly bestowed upon my companion and myself before leaving the homeland, and I can truthfully say from experience that we have been protected both on land and sea. I especially remember one promise that was made to us, which was in this wise: "You will meet with experiences and the way will seem closed so that nothing but death will seem the outcome, but I will protect and open the way for your escape."

I can truthfully say that I have seen it fulfilled during the dreadful epidemic of influenza when we were all bedfast without a soul to bring us a drink. We thought our lot rather hard, but where could we go for succor but to God? This we tried to do. We had to part with one of our number and it is needless for me to enlarge upon this phase of our experience, but suffice it to say that I lost a true friend and the church an efficient worker.

I have traveled considerably among the islands and am very thankful that I have so far been spared the rigors of seasickness, but I cannot say that I feel the best while at sea but that is not to be compared with what some have to endure.

I have endeavored to do what I could among the sisters and children. The field is surely wide here for the wives of the missionaries, but we must not expect to meet with as ready a response from our labors as we would in America. At times when reflecting upon the seeming slow pace of our work, so far as results are concerned, I would think of the condition that exists in the homeland and the years of education that have been at our disposal, so in time we may yet be able to realize some of the things that so many of our noble sisters have worked for.

A present I am trying to carry on the work, or a part of the work, that was carried on by Sister Ellis. I have a class of native children taking lessons on the organ and it is much different to teach children here from what it was in the homeland, as they haven't the educational facilities, so we have continually to be with them until they get a good insight into the rudiments. Some of the children have developed considerable talent and already their influence is being felt for good.

So far as my health is concerned, it is not as good as I could wish for, but I hope that I may be able so to live that I may be worthy of the blessings of our heavenly Father, that I may be of some little service in trying to assist the noble band of workers that we have in the church.

We were surely glad and delighted to get the conference news, although it was rather old when it arrived, as we didn't get it until June 11, but it was good news to us from a far-off country and especially since our force here has been increased.

I received a letter from Sister Merchant asking as to their needs while here from a woman's viewpoint so think that I might better serve all by writing a few suggestions to the church paper.

We are in a much better condition now than we have been heretofore, as we all have a place that we can look to and call "home, sweet home," but this has been made possible by the sacrifices of others in days gone by. Of course we do not have things as nice as some back home, but we feel very fortunate to have shelter all our own.

I have since coming here often wished that I had known more of the place and conditions and I would have been better able to judge as to the needs.

In the first place, we are spending at least five years of the best part of our lives in this mission and in the majority of cases the missionaries are young couples, so why make needless sacrifices when we can avoid them and at the same time be less expense to the church?

First, I would suggest that if the newcomers have a few small rugs, to bring them along, also table linen with sufficient dishes to serve their needs. We have to use granite ware principally in the upper islands so it seems good to get back to Papeete and eat a good meal as we would back home. If you have an electric iron, bring it along, as we will be able to get electric current from now on while in Papeete, but the upper islands are vastly different from what it is in Papeete. They do not possess any of the modern conveniences. As for bedding, bring a fair supply, such as pillows, sheets, spreads, also a pair of cotton-flannel blankets, and a bed comforter will not come amiss and will be used when traveling upon some of the ships which are not as well equipped as some of the ocean liners. Usually a soft plank in the deck floor serves for a bed, with occasional rain clouds for a shelter from the sun.

As to clothing, I would not advise all white clothing. Heavy clothing will be of little or no use, but colored clothes are worn much, also dark shoes and stockings, so get a good supply before leaving America as everything is dear here now and especially since the American exchange is so high. Don't be afraid that you will overdo the buying of stockings and shoes, also ladies' underwear, and by using a little judgment in regard to packing your trunks you will not be troubled with the duty so far as wearing apparel is concerned. The government officials have been very good to us in the past.

Wishing all the brothers and sisters in the homeland a hearty "Ia ora na," which is the native greeting, I remain your sister and colaborer for the cause of Christ,

PAPEETE, TAHITI, June 21, 1920.

VIOLET E. BROWN.

People are leaving the farms of Missouri and Oklahoma, according to the census figures being released. Nearly 47,000 persons have left four Missouri counties and one Oklahoma county in the past ten years, supposedly to go to the cities. Decreases in population are from 3½ to 9 per cent. Experts believe the country as a whole will show much the same situation.

A REPORT FROM ONTARIO

Since I came to Ontario five years ago this coming October, I have labored in the Chatham, London, Toronto, and Owen Sound Districts, the latter being my mission for this year.

I had the privilege through the kindness of the Saints of several of the branches where I labored this spring, of attending my fifth General Conference, and by far the best of the five. The inspiration that I experienced while there has never left me, and now as I write it thrills my soul; it has been my strength in preaching since then, and I feel keenly the burden of souls in darkness and sin resting upon me.

After conference I spent a few days with my parents and brothers and sisters in Michigan, and hastened to my field of labor as quickly as I could. Of course it was necessary to stop in Saginaw where my brother lives and make the branch a flying visit; also my old home in Flint, among the fine Saints there, where many peaceful hours of worship were enjoyed while living there and laboring in the shop.

Then a fine visit at Kimball and Sombra, in Ontario, the scene of very great opposition in my early experience as missionary. The kindness of the Saints of Kimball, and the friends (now Saints) of Duthill and Terminus, shall never be erased from memory's collection of kind acts toward me.

After the week at Sombra, I went to Redickville, in Owen Sound District, and visited Brother George Mortimore's home, where the latchstring is always on the outside, and after a week there went to the Praton Branch, near Dundalk, Ontario, and began a series of services which lasted for three weeks, and which in many ways was a success. Sometimes the church was filled to its capacity, and quite an interest created.

On the last Sunday of our services eleven were baptized, nine children from eight to seventeen, and two adults.

I left that part with reluctance, as others were interested, but I felt the leading of the Spirit to attend our district conference, which was a decided move for higher attainments, and more united service. Special features of the conference were the little orchestra, composed of members and non-members; the choir which did excellent work under the leadership of Brother Nurnace of Owen Sound, and the sweet voices of the Taylor sisters of Grand Valley, and others from different parts.

A resolution prevailed that the district purchase a tent for missionary work, for which in about a half hour, $367 was raised. You can guess how Brother W. A. Smith smiled.

From Port Elgin conference I accepted the invitation to hold services up on the Bruce Peninsula at Colpoys Bay, so to Warton I went, and while waiting to begin services on Sunday, spent three days at Elder D. B. Perkins's summer cottage on Lake Huron, at Sauble River. I enjoyed every minute of the time.

Two of the Taylor girls of Grand Valley are stopping for a time to help out with the singing at Colpoys Bay. They are genuine songsters.

Last night we held a good service at Colpoys Bay at the home of Brother Rydall. His big house was filled to the door with Saints and nonmembers, even a Disciple preacher. The services proper began Sunday, the 11th. Prospects good.

In bonds,

WIARTON, ONTARIO.

J. H. YAGER.

The various church world surveys with regard to education reveal the fact that only fourteen out of one thousand children entering the first grade of the public schools are graduated from a college or university, according to the Christian Work, and as it states, these fourteen furnish the vast majority of the country's leaders.

BOSTON BRANCH

The Boston Branch is surely in good working condition. If there is a jar anywhere among the Saints, I have not been able to locate it.

The attendance at our prayer meetings is almost as large as at our preaching services. We are having some wonderful meetings. The Lord is surely blessing the Saints in this place.

Last week I made about twenty-five visits to the Saints in their homes. My experience has taught me you can do more good in building up a branch and bringing spirituality among the Saints than you can in any other way.

Yesterday was another banner day. I had the privilege of baptizing six fine people. Five of them were adults and one a young man. These are people who have been attending my special series of sermons on Sunday evenings. These people are all strangers and have no relatives in the church, so you see we have three more new families in the branch.

Very sincerely,

RICHARD BALDWIN.

JOPPA, ILLINOIS, July 2, 1920.

Editors Herald: We came to our field of labor May 20, the first stop being Mount Vernon. We were glad to find in this city of 12,000 a genial and whole-souled organization of God's people. Brother C. Lowery, branch president (also merchant), met me at the depot, and taking me home, he and family made me welcome in true southern Illinois style and hospitality. Four of the brethren here are in the grocery business—J. S. Rockett, J. M. Fuga, and M. F. Lowery, besides the brother mentioned above.

Brother J. M. Fuga surely enjoys leading the singing for the various church services held in their comfortable little building of worship. And our young Brother O. C. Henson (son of the genial district president, Hilliard Henson), who was lately ordained at the late district conference at Joppa, will be of assistance to the work there.

The writer held meetings until the latter part of the week, when our gifted and worthy Brother W. H. Kelley, of Indiana fame, joined us.

On Sunday the 27th the writer was called to Benton, a coal mining center, by Brother Earnest Robinson, where the work had been attacked by a Pentecostal brother, who was anxious for discussion and debate. Brother Robinson replied to his outpouring of "wolves in sheep's clothing," "beware, dangerous," "don't go near," etc. By the time the writer arrived on the scene, unexpectedly, he was all over his desire to discuss church propositions. I replied to him three evenings, the minister and his wife attending but carefully warning the flock to keep away.

We held meetings during the week, and also became acquainted with several families of Saints and friends. One fine young man, Brother Hill, was baptized by Brother Robinson, who will, we are sure, be of help to the work. We appreciate the kindness shown by Brother Robinson and kind wife and family, and others of the scattered Saints there. There is a good opportunity for the development of the work there.

On Sunday we met with the Saints of the Parrish Branch, in sacrament and preaching service, meeting J. M. Davis, branch president, and other worthy Saints. I was made welcome at the homes of Carrol and Andy Dillon in true saintly and brotherly style, during my stay there. Brother Andy Dillon surely is holding his own for a man of his age, and Sister Dillon is still strong in the faith.

We next held meetings at a coal mining camp between Johnson City and Marion, and were taken care of by the two families of Brother J. L. Simmons, making us feel at home and welcome. We enjoyed the visit there.

We then held meetings at Marion, a fine little city of ten or twelve thousand. There is no branch there, but there is a fine group of Saints there, and a good Sunday school. Brother Will Kelley, brother of our well-known T. C. Kelley, lives here, and tries to keep the work moving ahead, with the help of Brother F. Campbell and other Saints and friends. We find the same spirit with the Saints here as elsewhere. May God bless them for their kindness.

On boarding the train south we found several Saints en route for district conference at Joppa. Also Brother W. H. Kelley and our young Brother Ray Whiting, full of that well-known Graceland pep and enthusiasm. It surely does cause one to rejoice to see such young men coming forward and taking hold of the work. Surely Zion will be redeemed, and the world warned with the army of consecrated young workers coming forward to put their hand to the plow, and also to assist in the great work of the final redemption of Zion.

Waiting to make connections at the beautiful town of Cypress, for several hours, we were royally entertained by a railroad conductor, Henderson, and wife, and surely the brother and companion and daughter radiate the very spirit of the latter-day work. Brother Henderson is well known to the Saints of Northern Illinois and Chicago, and is always ready to let his light shine in warning others and doing his part in every way to help in the great work intrusted to all. God is blessing and will continue to bless him in his endeavors.

And in the district conference, of which others may write and report, the Spirit of God was there in power. Two of the speakers were our talented and gifted young brother, Charles Wisner, of Centralia Branch (the live wire branch of the district so we hear) who preached a splendid sermon Friday night, and Brother Whiting who on Saturday evening addressed us with all of that pent up Graceland enthusiasm, and he was surely blessed in presenting the word to the audience.

The Spirit of God was present in all our meetings. The word of prophecy came through Brother F. A. Sawley, accepting the Saints' offering, and speaking to several individuals encouragingly to move forward in their line of work. We were glad to meet Brother Sawley again, and enjoy his smiling countenance and cheery methods. His well-known musical talents helped amazingly in the success of the conference.

Of course we talked over old times in Wisconsin, where both of us have formerly labored and lived, in church and secular work. Brother Sawley stayed for a few days and assisted in the continuation of services during the week, and then announced a call to hold meetings in Kinmundy, farther north.

Brother Ray Whiting and writer have held meetings here for two weeks, mostly on the lawn in the open air, in the beautiful rays of the glowing moon, on the banks of the majestic, slow-moving Ohio, where occasionally a packet or tie boat of the stern-wheel type plows through the water on its way.

On Sunday one adult, a married lady, asked for baptism, and Brother Barrett, who is in charge of the faithful little flock here, officiated. On yesterday, five more lambs of the flock, Sunday school scholars, were buried beneath the waves of the Ohio. A more beautiful baptismal service I have never witnessed.

The Spirit of God attended both confirmation services. That Spirit the Lord promised he would endow his people with at the General Conference. He is surely keeping his word.

Brother Ray Whiting officiated at the baptism of the young people.

Brother Oscar Smith is a merchant here, well thought of, and furnishes a room for the meeting of the Saints, and is doing all in his power to further the cause.

Brother Barrett, coming in over a rough road one night to the services, brought his family and others with him. Being strong in the faith God will surely bless him and the little flock in moving forward the work there. And others of the Saints and friends there are doing their part to assist in the missionary effort.

Brother Ray Whiting is a splendid preacher and speaker, and takes well with the old and young, and you will hear from him yet in the councils of the church, and the development of Zion.

We have several calls for missionary work that we will attend to as fast as we can, consistent with the demands of the work where we are laboring.

We want to hear from any or all that wish missionary labors in the country or cities, especially in the towns where more thorough organized effort should be made.

Be sure and let me know your needs at my field address below as I want to keep in touch with all who will assist in the missionary work, both local and general, so we can labor together in harmony with the general appointees.

I will never forget the ministrations of the Saints of southern Wisconsin for eight years, and my heart is full when I think of their kindness.

I thank God for the Sanitarium and the nurses and doctors, and their wonderful service, and for my wife's wonderful recovery from the serious operation. The Spirit of the Master is there. The college, the Sanitarium, the homes, all are wonderful helps toward the redemption of Zion. Surely the light begins to shine from the firing lines.

Field address: Care of Charles Wisner, 429 Maple Street, Centralia, Illinois. LESTER O. WILDERMUTH.

NEUVA GERONA, ISLE OF PINES, WEST INDIES, July 5, 1920.

Editors Herald: After a pleasant rest at the home of Brother Alfred Peterson, at Independence, and the association of the Saints at that place, we resumed our journey enroute to the Isle of Pines, West Indies, where we have been sent to open up the work. Our journey was pleasant enough, until we were drawing near Atlanta, and our train was wrecked. The engine, mail and tourist cars deposited themselves at the bottom of an embankment, and the dining car, which we had left but a few minutes, was twisted and smashed, tea, coffee, steam pipes hissing, etc., presented an awful spectacle.

Fortunately none were killed, but many were injured. The rest of our journey passed pleasantly, and now we are here in the tropics, where grapefruit, oranges, lemons, limes, pineapples, bananas, coconuts, peanuts, jack fruit, sweet potatoes, and all kinds of native fruits and vegetables grow profusely. But the insects—mosquitoes, etc., are a dread for newcomers; but a few weeks pass by, and one forgets the nights of torture spent in a vain endeavor to do away with the persistent biting of these pests.

Now we are feeling more like getting into harness, and waking up a people who have been long dead religiously. Other denominations have tried, and are trying to get the people interested, but thus far have failed. May God prepare the people, that they may be responsive to the restored gospel.

I have had to answer, through the press, insinuations regarding the message we represent, but up to the present not even those who accused us of being one with the Utah Mormons have answered us.

We are living at the above address for the present. Will our many friends in the Northern and Southern Saskatchewan Districts please note, and write us often as possible.

This is a very difficult mission to open up, and I can assure Apostle T. W. Williams that his message in a recent HERALD came just at a time when Sister Tordoff and myself needed encouragement, for we were on the very verge of losing our baby son. So encouragement of that nature cannot come too often in this far-away, southern mission.

Many are making sacrifice in the church to-day, who are many times accused of having, as I have heard expressed, "soft jobs." It has been very truly said, "This is a day of sacrifice," but how very few there seem to be who are willing to leave all and follow the Master, either by preaching the word, or by financial assistance. Yet, those who unjustly criticize, and really do very little when their works are summed up, are the ones who cast the first stone, and sometimes unfortunately are a detriment, rather than a help to this beautiful work. Let us then be careful, and by prayer, faith, and works, seek to plant within ourselves seeds of kindness, charity, and long suffering, that when our life's work is ended, not only will we gain the great reward, but will leave a monument behind us, that the storms of life, and even time will not be able to erase.

I am hoping to begin at another point of the islands a series of meetings of at least ten nights' duration. This and other topics of interest to our northern friends will no doubt appear in the pages of the HERALD from time to time.

It costs five cents to send a letter from here to Canada, so we would be glad if our Canadian friends will accept this letter as a personal one, and thus save postage and time which can be used effectively otherwise. Rabbit Foot Lake, Viceroy, and other Saints, please note.

Very sincerely,

WILFRED D. TORDOFF.

McCLELLAND, IOWA, July 8, 1920.

Editors Herald: Our greatest need in this part of the field is more men. Truly the harvest is great, and the laborers are few. Calls are being made daily, for work, but I can be only in one place at a time, which means that it will be months before I can reach some places where help is desired at present.

We are in the hastening time, and the very best there is in us is required of us. We need consecrated preachers and singers, but we should also remember that we need consecrated tithe payers as well. The good Lord has arranged matters so that all may have opportunity to assist in the work.

The one encouraging feature of our work rests in the fact that the young of the church are arising with a larger vision, and trained minds; and we therefore have great reason to hope for permanent advancement. Our older men have wrought well in their time; many of them have done nobly; but the work of to-day calls for methods and qualifications far transcending anything we have yet known.

Truly the Saints of this part of the world ought to be able to give material assistance to the work. I have never seen a better prospect for corn than at the present. Many old-time farmers have been heard to say that the corn crop looks better at present than they ever remember having seen corn look at this time of the year. We feel sure that the Lord will bless his people with wisdom and with provisions; also with great substance if they will remember always to honor him with their substance. I feel confident, too, that

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

Our Reunion Calls

The department is receiving a gratifying number of calls for reunion workers. Nauvoo, Des Moines, Clinton, Alabama, Florida, Eastern Colorado, and many other districts have asked for some one to present the work of the women. We wish it were possible that during the precious season when, for a few days, Saints gather together to spend a time in the study and contemplation of God's work on earth, the women there could imbibe a great deal of the spirit which dominates the department. It is a spirit of loving helpfulness, and one which desires to extend its area of usefulness, to reach out and put into the heart and thought of other women the hope and joy which has become so great a light. It is a sense of unity, a consciousness of what great good can be accomplished by united action. It is the joy of service to others, that service referred to in the words: "It becometh every man who hath been warned, to warn his neighbor."

There is much of evil to be overcome, not only by individual effort, in individual lives, but by united forces for the purification of the masses. There are many harmful influences exerted upon the lives of our people, both old and young, which can with patience and determination be removed, if only the women would "arise in their might" and unitedly act, instead of vainly wishing. Public sentiment is said to be the reflection of public thought. We wonder if the thoughts of the quiet, obscure, stay-at-home-and-mind-your-own-business sort of people could be recorded in our public press, if we might not find quite a different sort of "public sentiment." Indifferent morals are frequently the most clamorous, the really stable ones being more given to actions than words.

The time has come, however, when it is no longer possible for women—or men either—to discharge their full responsibility to mankind by simply cherishing a fine set of private opinions. The world demands a cleansing, a moral house cleaning. It is necessary for everyone to come out into the open, not with whitewash brushes, but with those of the advanced ideals set us by the President and Bishop of the church will be reached, because I believe that the Lord is working mightily with his people.

Personally, I have never felt better in preaching than at the present time. My ability to apply myself to study seems also to be increased. I see, too, a great awakening among the young in the way of education and preparation for efficient work. I hope to see our present efforts increased and intensified until the highest possible condition of efficiency will be reached by all. In other words, I hope to see each one learning his respective duty, and doing it in the best possible way.

At present I am holding tent meetings at this place. Our interest and attendance is encouraging. Brother Morgan joined me here a little over a week ago, and is assisting in the work. We have had some good support from the Saints of Hazel Dell and North Star Branches. Sister Cora Scott of this place has rendered valuable assistance with her violin, and some of our musicians from the little town of Underwood have also given us assistance that has been greatly appreciated.

In the mind of the writer we have reached the time when we must do organized team work, if we are to be successful in our missionary work. I trust that the Saints throughout the districts will rally to our support in this work.

Hopefully,

the scrubbing variety. And along with them, plenty of the good will and energy which make the same effectual!

As our workers go before the Saints at reunions, they carry with them a sense of responsibility in regard to arousing our people to the great possibilities just before them. A new era has dawned; a new impetus has come to the church. The upward urge is upon our members, and they are asking, in vast numbers, "What can I do?" An age-old query, is it not? Shall we not answer it as of old, and each one, for himself, determine anew, "As for me, and my house, we shall serve God"?

Within a reasonable limit our department will attempt to respond to the call of any district for a representative, providing full expenses of such a worker shall be guaranteed by the reunion making the call. An abundance of good papers, articles, suggestions, etc., from all our departments will be sent free upon requests made to our general office, Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, Women's Department, box 255, Independence, Missouri.

From Far-Off Australia

With deep interest I read of the activities of the women of the church through the reports in the columns of the SAINTS' HERALD.

The movement in our land has made good progress in its initiatory stage, and our hope is that as the years come and go "advancement" will be our annual report. To my mind there is nothing to fear. Our executives have proven to be a consecrated band, and I believe that the majority of women who have taken up the work have seized the opportunities for "service" to their lasting good.

As in most institutions there will doubtless be a few who become weary and lag behind but our prayer is "may they be few." When the "Macedonian cry" went forth and organizers were sought, the sound fell on my ears and not wanting to be a shirker, I accepted the office, very timidly, but with a firm resolve to do my best.

Northern New South Wales District, which is my field for women's work, stretches for nearly five hundred miles from east to west. There are five branches of the church scattered along the coast, at four of which our locals have been organized. The scattered sisters seem equally anxious to see the movement go forward and some have taken up "reading" as a hobby. By this means we hope in time to have higher education before the people. Unfortunately in the western area of the district there are no branches.

Some locals in relief and service department do a lot of sewing for sale and donate the money as missionary helps. Although the sums of money so raised seem small in comparison to the great need, still it shows a devotion to duty on the part of the women workers.

One local in a farming center devote their hours of relief work to assisting the sick, sewing for a day at some home where help is needed, taking the necessaries of life to some home that may be neglected, and in various other ways acting as comforters in time of sorrow.

Another local, in home and child welfare, has successfully studied "first aid," which is to be followed by "nursing aids." Study in both of these subjects has been under the direction of professionals.

Another local has not yet been able to determine the most suitable course, but since these sisters never knew failure we expect to see them do splendid things in the months ahead.

Our sessions during the mission conference at Christmas in Sydney, were well attended and good interest shown. A report of these meetings may appear through other channels. We feel very much strengthened by the fact that Brethren Butterworth, Rushton, and Hanson are in sympathy with the movement and their addresses in different localities are deeply appreciated by those in charge of the work. When men like these, of such stalwart character, see the great need for better homes and better parenthood, surely none of us should sit idly by and let ruin follow in our wake.

When I read the soul-stirring articles in the column of the HERALD I raise my heart in gratitude to God that such noble women have been raised to enlighten the world. Our worthy editor is truly an adept at her work and every word from her pen seems to help one walk one step higher. We cannot mention here all those whose names seem so familiar and who have done so much good with their pens.

Being engaged in the state school work here we read with interest Sister Speer's articles, wherein she pleads for better care and proper nourishment in sufficient quantities, for children. We could cite many instances where years ago children's health was impaired by neglect of minor ailments which grew to alarming consequences through no other reason than parents' ignorance.

Better methods prevail in our educational department now. Fully qualified doctors and nurses visit the schools throughout the state and parents are informed of any defect and requested to have attention given to the same. This request is followed up by letters of reminders, within a given time. In almost every case, the need has been given attention. Besides this advantage, we have a visiting dental clinic, with good equipment for work, and the work done immediately under our observation has proven to be of the very best. We have noticed that when the children's teeth have been thoroughly attended to their health improved. These dental visits have resulted in good business for the nearest store which carries toothbrushes!

With all this being done free for the parents of children, is it any wonder they are waking up and trying to become proficient in every other way?

May our church women be blessed in every effort put forth, that they may indeed be lights in this darkened world. May peace prevail throughout all our meetings, to the edifying and strengthening of each member, is the prayer of

Your coworker, ANNIE J. PARKER.

Would You Like to Help?

In establishing a general office this spring, the Women's Department has experienced a great deal that is encouraging, and some things of an opposite nature. The idea, not having been included in the budget for the coming year, was not easy to materialize because of lack of means for proper equipment, but a room was secured and sufficient gotten together so that we have been able to get the work "on its feet," after a fashion.

We have felt, however, that the time has come when our department must be recognized as having needs similar to those of other departments. The work has outgrown the stage when it could be cared for by one or two women in the few odd moments left after housekeeping cares were over. It is full size, even now, as might be indicated by the statement that in eight days one of our department heads answered five hundred letters, and that was, at that, only a segment taken from several weeks of similar close application.

We anticipate that when the new office buildings at the center place shall become a reality, the Women's Department will have suitably arranged and adequate offices, office help, and office equipment. With all progressive Saints, we are looking forward to that time. Until then, we will try to be patient, and do with what facilities we may have. We would beg that the sisters everywhere, however, would try to exercise a similar patience, and if letters, appeals, or suggestions appear to be unnoticed, please understand that our women are striving to do what they can. They are women without salary—all have homes and families which demand a portion of their time and attention, and, while our budget is allowing some help for these women in their home work, everyone knows that it is not possible for a wife or mother to give a full measure of her time to outside duties.

It has been suggested that if the sisters at large knew of the lacks and needs in our office, some of the generous ones might be glad to make donations that would add materially to the comfort of the sisters who are giving so freely there.

Would you like to sit, for six or eight hours at a stretch, upon a folding camp chair at a typewriter placed upon an ordinary desk? Try it out once, and see if you will not agree that some desk chairs, a typewriter table and chair, are among the reasonable necessities of our office.

A clock, and a dictionary, some paper weights, knives, and shears, are among the articles listed also. The sisters have refrained from spending in this direction any of the money allotted for other expenses, and they will gladly receive any of these articles, or money for the same. We feel quite sure that many sisters will be happy to know that they can assist in our work by donating in this way.

Full Tide

Contemplating the developments of the past few weeks, we feel quite sure that full tide is in, so far as the adjustments necessary since conference are concerned. Our office is flooded with questions regarding the home department and cradle roll work, as well as the usual ones incident to our older lines of effort. One would think that people read announcements only to forget them as quickly as possible! Sometimes one wonders if they ever read them at all! Perhaps there are some places where even yet the rumors that the home and cradle roll departments have been transferred to the women have not penetrated!

At any rate, our superintendents have been almost submerged with questions which the attempt to answer personally has become a real burden. We have suggested to these sisters that they gather together the questions of a similar nature, the duplicates, the oft-repeated, and reply to them through the columns from time to time. This will enable our superintendents to keep afloat, and we are sure in time the adjustment will be well understood, and things will be easier. Some may possibly miss the personal reply to their questions, but we would suggest that they read carefully and conscientiously each issue of the HERALD and Ensign, in order that they may be guided right in these matters, and be very lenient in their criticisms.

A Little Boost

Rather incidentally we became aware of a fine little "lift" the Laurel Club, of Independence, gave the Sanitarium just before conference. This club is composed of ladies who, in days past, used to be foremost in "making money," when dollars came slowly into the branch treasuries. Of late they have identified themselves more closely with social and educational activities, never losing sight of an opportunity, however, to give a helping hand to a worthy cause.

The particular "boost" mentioned in this paragraph was expressed in providing the Sanitarium with the following articles all of which were very much needed and exceedingly welcome:

One dozen invalid trays, completely furnished with proper and attractive dishes; eighty tray cloths; and forty-six dresser scarfs.

Sister Margaret Sturges is president of the Laurels at the present time.

"Economic ills cannot be cured by economic appliances. Economic ills are human at heart and can only be cured by moral and spiritual appliances. Society is in greater danger of breaking down in its character than in its finances or industries. If the church fails as a moral and regenerative force it is helpless economically. The one supreme cry out of this wild hour is a cry for a revival of personal and social religion. We must mobilize our forces, not for a sociological or economic war, but for a holy crusade of evangelism, personal, social, and industrial. This is our gospel."—From bishop's address to Methodist general conference in Des Moines.

A Few Thoughts on Reunions

For some time I have had it in my mind to write a few thoughts on the subject of reunions, but have deferred doing so, thinking that one more able than I would take up the matter and write a few thoughts in regard to (1) the object of having a reunion; (2) the conduct, especially of all Saints at and during the whole time of the reunion.

The first and primary object in having a reunion is (or should be) to glorify God by seeking to build up and establish the work of the Lord. In order to do this, it is very urgent and necessary that all Saints should meet together in unity and love, seeking in prayer (and fasting, if necessary) for the blessings of God to be poured out upon all the assemblies of the reunion, to the extent that in the devotional exercises, the spirit of the Lord may be abundantly given to strengthen, encourage, and confirm all the Saints of God; and so far as it is necessary for the good of the Lord's work, and the spiritual development of his people, that they also may be endowed with the Holy Spirit in spiritual gifts and revelations from God, instructing and enlightening his people on the various things requisite for them to know to enable them to walk in the light of God.

Also the Saints, both young and old, should be united in prayer, seeking for the blessings of the Lord to rest upon his servants in light and liberty, and in power to preach the gospel, and rightly divide the work of the Lord, so that those who come to see and hear from the world may be convinced of the power of God in the gospel of Jesus Christ unto salvation.

Second: I believe that all who have charge of a reunion wish to govern and have it governed so that the best results may be obtained. Therefore it is necessary to have a wisely selected set of rules, and then have men selected to see that those rules are strictly carried out. Have the meeting appointments made (especially preaching services) at times it will be for the best interest for the work in getting the gospel before the world. Have all announcements made clear and far enough ahead to avoid mistakes. Be prompt in time of both opening and closing services. Do not make the sad mistake of trying to force too many meetings, or too much service on limited time, lest interest be lost in the services. Yet be faithful and do all that is wise to be done.

What I mean is this: When a prayer meeting is appointed have a prayer meeting, but do not intrude upon the time allotted to that prayer meeting from three to six ordinations, from four to eight confirmations, and the blessing of two or three children. I am a witness to such being done, and in addition I have seen the one officiating in such ordinations and confirmations, make a prayer from fifteen to twenty minutes long, which is, to say the least about it, very unwise. To my mind it would be much better and more in order where there are a number to be ordained or confirmed to have separate meetings appointed for that purpose.

Again, keep good and proper hours. Don't have a rule stating that all must be in their tents by 10 or 10.30 o'clock, and then allow some to be prowling around up to 12 and 2 o'clock in the morning, thus bringing disgrace upon the reunion, for if allowed to continue, it will ultimately destroy the good effects desired by all faithful Saints, through the efforts of the reunion. Hence have a responsible man or men (not a boy or boys) appointed to see that your rule is enforced, or otherwise report disobedient parties to the officers in authority who are conducting the reunion.

Allow no games played by the Saints on the grounds or near the tents during the hours of service.

Third: The conduct of Saints should be above reproach. Hence, arise in the morning in sufficient time to prepare yourself to partake of breakfast within the appointed time announced by the dining tent committee. When the dining room (or tent) is full, don't get in the way to annoy and hinder the waiters. Help all you can when help is needed to make the reunion a success, and put no obstruction in the way of anyone.

Be orderly. Don't let anyone get the idea that a reunion is only just for an outing. But let us always remember that it is a united effort made by the Saints to advance and establish the work of the Lord. Then let us conduct ourselves so that we may have the favor and blessings of our heavenly Father to rest upon our efforts.

Recreation and sports are good in their places when properly conducted. A game of baseball is very interesting and enjoyable when the contestants conduct themselves with propriety. But when angry words, disputes, and quarrels are allowed to arise to the extent that it becomes a brawl, then it is wrong and would become a disgrace to the reunion, and should not be allowed.

Bathing is all right when the parties are modest and equipped with proper bathing suits. But when one of either sex force themselves into a bathing suit two or three sizes too small for them, they then become conspicuous, and subject themselves to criticism and unpleasant remarks, especially a stout or fleshy person. Mixed bathing should be avoided as much as possible, especially so when the reunion is held on the grounds or near to a summer resort (like Erie Beach Reunion in Canada) where people of the world are intermixed with the Saints in their bathing in Lake Erie. But I believe the harm in mixed bathing is in the conduct of the bathing parties themselves, when they introduce football playing, wrestling, and scuffling, with contests to obtain a certain article or object, while in the water, thus at times becoming engaged in a general mix-up that neither God nor honorable men could approve of.

Therefore, let me say in conclusion: Let us all try to make ourselves commendable to God and his church by observing and being obedient to all the righteous laws and rules that have been adopted by the reunion committee, in order that the best interests to the church and the reunion may be obtained.

Yours for unity and right,

A. LEVERTON.

On the Way to Europe

EN ROUTE, July 12, 1920.

Just a line before leaving the United States. My sojourn in California was short and sweet. Six weeks out of every fifty-two serves at least to keep up a speaking acquaintance with one's families and friends. This is my limit the past three years. Some of these days we will not consider it in good religious form to break up the home life of our missionary force. God speed that day!

Was able to meet with the missionaries assigned to the Southern California District. After canvassing the needs of the entire field, made appointments as follows: J. M. Simmons, San Diego and Imperial Counties, with San Diego objective; D. Amos Yates, San Bernardino, Riverside, and the eastern half of Los Angeles Counties; George H. Wixom, Santa Ana and western half of Los Angeles County, Santa Ana objective; David E. Dowker, Los Angeles city.

Brother Simmons will act as the pastor of the San Diego church; Brother Wixom will act as pastor of the Santa Ana church, and Brother Dowker as pastor of the Los Angeles church.

I also held a conference with the pastors of the various churches in the district, and agreed upon a uniform policy and program.

The brethren seemed elated over the work done. There is a promise of aggressive labor for the year. There was a good spirit with us in our meetings; our every act was unanimous.

Los Angeles seems to be the mecca for Latter Day Saints as well as latter-day sinners. There has been quite an influx of church members from the East during the past two years. A number of these are active, and particularly helpful in the local work.

Brother Dowker, Los Angeles pastor, is indefatigable and persistent. Brother Wixom, district president and Santa Ana pastor, is a good mixer and aggressive. Brother Yates has met with favor in the West. The people expect much of him. Brother Simmons is an untried quantity, but bids fair to keep up his record made in the South in other years. Brother and Sister F. G. Pitt are recent arrivals. They expect to labor in southern California indefinitely. Brother Pitt finds it quite difficult to let go the gospel plow. He bids well to die in the harness.

The sisters of the local churches and district are a pillar of strength in southern California. Without them the work would suffer irreparable loss.

Sister F. M. Smith and daughters are cozily situated in Hollywood suburbs, and are delighted with their new home.

I visited and delivered addresses in the Los Angeles, Santa Ana, and Long Beach churches, and also a Fourth of July address at the district picnic, July 5.

Will stop off in Independence, July 13, for one day, then go direct to New York where I will join President Smith and sail on the Rotterdam, July 21, for Plymouth, England. I will know more and possibly be disposed to say less after the ocean trip. God speed the work in America! God speed the work in the whole wide world.

Fraternally,
T. W. WILLIAMS.

Prices Rising in Australia

Your conference numbers have just come to hand showing to us the progressive movements made. These are of intense interest to Australians, who are watching keenly for manifestations of Zion's progress.

Though still divided owing to recent misunderstandings, the church in Australia is progressing in every way, and we hope soon more stable conditions may obtain, and greater unity be reached.

We are pleased to note that two more apostles are to visit us and that the two here are to come back to Victoria to conduct a series of evangelical meetings, and possibly be present at our conference before leaving for New Zealand.

There is a great deal of sickness among the Saints at present, and we are grieved to have to record the death of young Sister Bessie Cuthbert, from a wasting disease. This young woman was a niece of the late Sister J. W. Wight.

Widespread rains during May and June have dispelled the fear of some that droughty conditions would bring famine.

This country is now being visited by the Prince of Wales, and there is a tremendous wave of loyal enthusiasm energizing the vast crowds who press around his person at every conceivable opportunity. The prince is so exhausted that his engagements have to be cancelled for a week. This at the behest of his medical adviser.

Recently a great demonstration was given at the departure of the Sinn Fein Catholic Archbishop of Australia. This prince matter is a kind of counter to the elements then manifested and should heal some of the gaping wounds of disloyalty.

Our country is in a bad way financially after the war, and our politicians have made themselves infamous by increasing their salaries from six hundred to one thousand pounds. The people hoot the prime minister when he appears in public. They are being called pirates, grabbers, and all kinds of unsavory names.

Prices are high for food and clothing. A good suit costs from twelve to sixteen pounds. Butter is two shillings and six pence per pound, and all other commodities to match. Amid it all we have never wanted for any good thing, and the Saints generally are well off the poverty line. Yet with the rest of the suffering world we are longing for settled times. Will they come, or is Zion the only salvation?

Still desiring to press on, I am as ever,

Yours in bonds,

RICHMOND, VICTORIA, June 2, 1920.

The wise prove, and the foolish confess, by their conduct, that a life of employment is the only life worth leading.—Paley.

North Dakota Reunion

The North Dakota reunion just closed and, though not so well attended as others of former years owing to the late spring and other things that could not be helped, was very successful, those attending enjoying the association of the Saints, and the meetings which were of the best. The Spirit was present in power, several prophecies being given.

Quite a number arrived the latter part of the week so the latter end was better than the beginning, so far as numbers go.

The district presidency presided and the preaching was by Elders F. A. Smith, Bishop Bullard, Henry Sparling, William Sparling, W. E. Shakespeare, and J. E. Wildermuth, a few of the local brethren assisting. Seven were baptized.

One of the features of the reunion which was appreciated very much by the young folk, also some of the older ones, was the recreation hours from four to six under the direction of Warren McElwain, and Sisters Bertha Graham and Hattie Kennicutt.

It was decided to hold another reunion in 1921. The district officers were elected as the reunion committee, time and place left to them.

The expenses were promptly met by the Saints, some not forgetting remembering that part of it and a nice surplus left over for next year.

Wake up, Saints of the district, and start to make your plans now to attend next year and let us make it the best ever held in the district.

Brother and Sister M. D. Graham did all in their power to make things pleasant for those attending and truly have the sincere thanks of the Saints.

Developments in Omaha

The Saints have been favored during the past two Sundays with a couple of excellent sermons by Elders E. D. Moore and R. S. Salyards respectively, Elder Moore coming to Omaha on a business trip, while Elder Salyards came to spend the 4th with his son Joseph R., of this city. The brethren enjoyed splendid liberty in presenting the message, which was deeply appreciated by all.

The two branches continue to worship in their respective halls; the contemplated church structures have not been commenced, owing to the unstable conditions of building materials and labor.

Three openings for preaching services have been established in the city, two in cottages, and one in the district tent. We are following the Angel Message Series of tract subjects. A systematic canvass of distributing tracts in each neighborhood, before presenting the subject, has proven a valuable asset. The locations of these meetings are as follows: At home of Brother and Sister Roy Bryant, 1614 North Thirty-second Street, each Thursday evening, preaching by Elder Carl T. Self, an attendance of thirty nonmembers, same ones returning each time. The orchestra has rendered valuable assistance in this home. At home of Brother and Sister C. W. Patrick, 4423 Sprague Street; though the attendance is small, the people are very attentive. Preaching by Elder David Lewis, each Thursday evening. The solos rendered by Sister Nell Kelley are appreciated and surely give inspiration to all. The district tent located at Thirtieth and Haskell Streets, under the supervision of the South Branch; preaching each evening by local priesthood. Good reports are coming in; an attendance of sixty-five. They are ably assisted by the choir.

We are looking forward to the arrival of our newly-appointed city missionary, Elder T. J. Elliott; under his leadership we expect to reach many souls with this grand Angel Message. The seed has been sown; if properly nurtured the harvest will be great.

Omaha has made her start in the greatest of all campaigns, with the view of bringing souls to Christ, thereby being instrumental in doing her bit in bringing those twenty thousand into the church, with their faces towards Zion.

DAVID LEWIS.

Some Places I Visited in Arizona

There are many things of interest in this State, and the writer has seen but few of them as yet. My first stopping place was Phoenix, where we were associated with Brother Yates for a short time.

The first part of my stay was utilized in an effort to regain some of the old-time energy, but was not as successful as we had hoped, conditions not being as favorable as expected.

Phoenix is a wonderful place to spend the winter, but not so desirable for the summer. The mercury hovers around the 120 degrees mark much of the time for about four months, so I am informed.

During our stay there we were permitted to visit some of the mountains, and view the desert, which to the writer is of ever-increasing interest with its towering cactus as well as the smaller kinds, which when in full bloom are beautiful. Parts of the desert in the springtime are a virtual flower bed and beggar description. We have learned the names of but very few of the flowers and shrubs that grow on the desert.

One looks out on the vast acreage of the Salt Valley and recalls that at one time it was a barren waste where nothing but cactus and such like grew. Now it is under cultivation because of the irrigation system that has been developed. It is a strange sight to one who has never seen irrigation to see the farmers (ranchers) get their land ready for planting, and then put in an order for water. The field is covered several inches deep and when that has soaked in planting begins. The principal crop in the valley now is cotton, of which there are many acres grown. It is said that they grow the finest cotton in the valley that is grown in the United States. Mexicans are employed to pick the crop. They live in tents or any old way while the crop is being gathered. The cotton association furnishes the help, or better, assists the grower to secure the help. We are looking forward to seeing the cotton harvested.

From Phoenix we went to Tucson, and through the kindness of Brother Monroe we were permitted to see some of the surrounding country. There were only three Saints living in Tucson so we were unable to hold services there. We stayed over one Sunday and visited some of the places of interest, enjoying immensely the auto ride. We visited what is called the picture rocks where it is supposed some of the ancient tribes inscribed the characters. We were not able to interpret their meaning. We tried to get a picture of the rock, but as yet we do not know how it came out as we have not had it developed.

From there we visited the ancient French mission, called the Saint Xavier Mission which was founded in 1692 and was conducted by resident Jesuits until 1751. In 1767, following the Spanish expulsion of the Jesuits, it was turned over to the Franciscans. In 1827 Mexico expelled all the religious orders, from which time it was practically abandoned. In 1900 Reverend Henry Granjon was appointed bishop of Tucson; he secured title of the property from the Government and restored the building.

The mission stands in an Indian reservation, the Papago's, and most all of the Indians there are Catholic. There are several sisters and a priest located there, the sisters teaching in the school and attending to other duties belonging to the order.

The church is built of brick and stone, 107 by 27 feet, inside measurement, and of a Moorish-Byzantine style.

On entering, the first thing that greets one's eye is a fresco representing the coming of the Holy Ghost upon the disciples. On the opposite or left side is another picture of the same type, representing the last supper. Both paintings measure about 9 by 5 feet and are a work of art, though marred by age and misuse. The architecture of the building is unique and in its day was no doubt most beautiful. The altars have the various images representing the different saints and great personages of the past ages. There are three altars, and that which strikes one most is the sacredness in which they hold the altars and in fact the edifice. I often wish that our people would reverence the place of worship as those benighted people who worship God through the means of images.

The ornamentation of the building possesses great artistic merit, and one stands and looks in wonder at the beauty displayed, especially as one's mind reverts back and thinks it is a product of what is commonly called the Dark Ages.

Within a short distance of the mission there is a low, cone-shaped mountain known as the Mountain of the Holy Cross. Many years ago this mountain was an active volcano, and from the now silent craters there rushed forth streams of molten lava. After the coming of the Jesuits and the Franciscan Fathers to convert the Indians, they began to pray (so the story goes) to God that the molten river would cease to visit the valley. A cross was erected over the crater, in honor of their devotions, hence the name. It is claimed that the volcano has not been active in the memory of anyone living.

There is a story of a French peasant girl who at one time used to go to the Shrine of Lourdes in France and there offer up her devotions and it is claimed that the Virgin Mary appeared to her, and as the Indians were in the habit of going to the mountain to pray the bishop before named conceived the idea of reproducing the shrine of Lourdes and expert miners were employed to excavate the grotto so as to carry out in detail the original grotto at Lourdes. The grotto is protected by a rude screen which was wrought from exact measurements of the one at Lourdes.

Within the grotto is the altar; in front of the altar is a maltese cross inlaid in the floor, around this cross are twelve stars, also inlaid. Above the grotto is a niche hewn in the rock and a life-size statue of the Virgin Mary, brought from France. One gets a very fine view of the surrounding valley as he walks or drives around the mountain on which there is a driveway over half way up.

Each day, I am told, the angelus is rung at noon and if one happens to be there he will see the Indians who are at work in the valley stop and kneel in prayer for a few moments. Superstition it surely is, yet in it all there is a beautiful lesson of devotion and reverence that causes one to wonder if God does not notice it, and then on the other hand it causes one to ask the question, Do I who profess to have the gospel in its very beauty so that I do not have to depend upon images or sainted shrines—am I as devout, or do I show the reverence to God that those benighted souls show to the shrine of stone?

From Tucson I came to Bisbee, a city in a canyon, with its homes built on the mountain sides, one above the other, so that one could almost spit down his neighbor's chimney. Bisbee is a mining town, copper being the chief product.

Brother C. A. Gaither, of Columbia, Missouri, writes: "We moved here from Lexington about a month ago, have made an opening seven miles north and I preached twice each Sunday to a large and interesting audience. One sister resides there and they have organized a Sunday school with fifty enrollment. Several are ready for baptism in Columbia.

How Shall We Establish Stewardships?

BY THE LAMONI STAKE BISHOP RICE

A continuation of the series of letters sent to members of the Lamoni Stake.

In an address by President F. M. Smith at our late General Conference, he said:

"So far as the work of the church is concerned, then, the time is here for the establishment of the practical aspects of the doctrine of stewardships, and for that the Presidency stands, and that we recommend to you—that we enter upon the establishment of stewardships without delay. Let me emphasize those two last words, without delay—for the time demands it."

The bishopric of your stake heartily concurs in the sentiment therein expressed. This brings us face to face with the vital question:

"What is meant by the establishing of stewardships, and how shall we proceed to enter into our several stewardships?"

We submit the following as an answer to the above question and sincerely hope that you will give it your candid and serious consideration.

The first thing absolutely necessary:

True conversion is the first prerequisite. To be born again, both of the water and of the Spirit. This means something: that we have caught the same vision, in a degree at least, of our work, as the Master had, that we are here for service and not to be served—that we can only serve God through serving our fellow man—that we are here to give rather than to get. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, etc."

Do not misunderstand the position of the church. The motive that should control us in our warfare is that of serving, but this does not mean that we are not expected to receive anything. We are to receive just enough to enable us to properly serve. Our receiving should be secondary, as a means only to enable us better to serve.

We repeat that none can expect to enter fully into the exalted work that still cling to the old order of things; the putting of self ahead of his brother; the putting of individual rights above the rights of the group.

In other words true conversion is to be wholly consecrated. We can reserve nothing. Our lives, our fortune, and all we possess are pledged for Zion's weal.

We only have need to follow the Christ all through his ministry to have this great and needful lesson indelibly stamped on our memory, that everything he did was eventually for the good of the whole. He purified the individual that thereby the group might be pure. To accomplish this he consecrated all he had for his fellow man.

He has said to us: "Follow me."

Shall we do it? To do so leads on to success. To fail to do so inevitably leads on to failure.

The ideal is high but to succeed we cannot lower it.

In our next letter we shall continue this very interesting subject.

RAY, INDIANA, July 6, 1920.

Editors Herald: The report of the post-conference council assigning me to the Southern Michigan and Northern Indiana District reached me while in the city at San Antonio, Texas, where I had gone to visit my son Alma who was seriously ill. The appointment came as a surprise and with it a feeling of regret in the thought of leaving the Saints of the Clinton District where I had labored for three years; but this was compensated, in a great degree, by the prospect of again laboring with and among those whose associations of twelve years ago are still a pleasant recollection.

In San Antonio, we found Brother Mannering engaged in a series of meetings with the South Side Branch, and at the earnest solicitation of our brother, and the Saints there, we assisted in the services. It was a great pleasure to meet with the dear Saints of that beautiful city, with whom we had labored in the years of the seeming long ago. We were glad to see the Saints encouraged and strengthened. Brother Mannering is a faithful, humble worker, and Sister Mannering is a great help to him.

Returning to my Holden home I made a visit of short duration, and on June 4 left for my new field arriving at Knox, Indiana, on the 5th, to be with the Saints there in an all day meeting on Sunday the 6th. Was very agreeably surprised to meet Brother S. W. L. Scott there. The passing of the years in no sense seems to lessen the well-known eloquence of Leonard, nor impair his recognized power as a preacher of the gospel.

I have also visited Hibbard, Galien, Buchanan, Kalamazoo, Battle Creek, Coldwater, and Clear Lake Branches.

At Battle Creek I found Brother F. F. Wipper in the midst of a tent campaign, carrying a great burden individually, but nobly assisted by the faithful workers of the branch there. He appears to be a wonderful little bundle of great energy, remarkable versatility and commendable enthusiasm. We are hoping and praying that good results may follow this effort being made in the big district tent.

A reunion of the district has been arranged for to be held in Lemon Park, Indian Lake, Michigan, situated on the Grand Trunk Railroad, about two miles east of Vicksburg, to begin July 30, and last for ten days. The first three days of the meeting to be taken up with the coordinate conference of the district. We are hoping for a wonderful time of spiritual uplift and great rejoicing.

I am now with the Clear Lake Branch, the home of Brother G. A. Smith, deceased, for years president of this district, and who is very much missed by the Saints and friends. Thus the old workers are passing away one by one, and should remind our youths that they should be prepared to step forward and fill in the ranks that are thus being broken. I am glad to observe, however, that Brother Smith has sons that are moving commendably forward in their father's footsteps. And in many places we have young men, of whom we are proud, that are coming nobly to the front. It was an encouraging sight to look over the large assembly of ministers, at the preconference lectures, and note so many young men present; it made us feel that this work would not fail by reason of lack of representatives.

Clear Lake is one of the old landmarks of this district. Many of the ablest ministry of the church have preached here, a number of whom have passed into the great beyond. This was at one time the home of Apostle E. C. Briggs, the pioneer missionary of the Reorganization.

From here I expect to return to Coldwater to be with them over the 11th and then continue my work among the branches till the reunion time.

Yours in gospel work,

H. E. MOLER.

TOLEDO, OHIO, July 9, 1920.

Editors Herald: On June 13 occurred the dedication of the church at Oak Harbor. This branch had its origin on May 25, 1898, when Brother Francis C. Smith made the first missionary effort in the vicinity of where the church is now located, at which time the following were baptized, all of whom are still living: Daniel Finken, Pauline Finken, Louis Finken, Nina Dewitz, Elizabeth Hawley, Anne M. Myers, and Clara D. Schluntz. Since the above effort Brethren R. Etzenhouser, U. W. Greene, George W. Robley, S. W. L. Scott, J. R. Beckley, O. B. Thomas, James E. Kelley, I. M. Smith, H. A. Koehler, C. Scott, R. Baldwin, V. M. Goodrich, James Carlile, Jesse M. Harden, James McConaughy, Samuel Brown, Gomer T. Griffiths, R. C. Russell, J. A. Becker, E. C. Briggs, E. E. Long, Jacob Halb, M. W. Liston, J. F. Mintun, and F. L. Ulrich of the general missionary force have done more or less labor. There may be others who have labored there but their names have not been recalled. Several of the local brethren have done good work here.

The Oak Harbor Branch was organized February 27, 1913, at the home of Louis Finken by Samuel Brown and Jesse M. Harden, both of whom with Brethren R. C. Russell and E. L. Ulrich have assisted to make the building what it appeared at the dedication.

The dedicatory sermon was by Elder O. J. Hawn, the prayer of dedication by W. S. Hettrick, the services in charge of Elder J. F. Mintun.

At the recent regular business meeting of the Toledo Branch Brother W. S. Hettrick was elected president of the branch, and an excellent spirit prevailed.

Having sold my property here I expect to move to Council Bluffs, Iowa, next week, the Lord willing.

As a result of our moving from the city of Toledo, and because it was my sixty-fifth birthday, a gathering of about fifty-eight Saints and friends expressed their respects to me and family by kindly greetings and presents that were both a memento, and profitable. It seemed that the expression of good will and an expressed gratitude for my services and the association of the family with the Saints was overdrawn, but I felt glad in my heart that such expressions could be made so freely and publicly expressed.

We hope that during the future we may merit the commendations that we have received from the Saints and friends here and from the council of the Presidency, the Twelve, and the Bishopric. God bless all who have manifested a disposition to make life both joyous and profitable.

In the hope of the gospel,

J. F. MINTUN.

KIRTLAND, OHIO, July 14, 1920.

Editors Herald: We feel encouraged enough to tap gently on the door of the editorial sanctum and proffer the following few items relative to this little beauty spot of God's footstool. We have had a peep at our President as he moved about amid these scenes where his revered father first saw the light of day and the father of him again who was so instrumental in bringing forth this work that so blesses us to-day. How different must Kirtland in her summer glories have appeared to him in contrast to that former visit, now sixteen years ago—a stormy conference and a miry setting!

The Temple was well filled to hear Brother Frederick M. Smith speak from the pulpit where in times past grandsire and father had stood to declare the same message; he confessed his chagrin that four generations of his family's ministry found the world still unwarned, seemingly. That while the nations deliberated upon peace terms the Red menace apparently moved ever nearer. He plead for greater loyalty, pointing out that we lived in a day when men worshiped self alone. There was greater need than ever of a place of safety and he outlined the work of the church in this regard. Our attitude toward our fellow man must be determined by our attitude toward God.

There were many Saints from Akron, Barberton, Canton, and Cleveland in attendance; good motor roads and prospering conditions making this possible on so short notice. After the meeting a social gathering enjoyed an impromptu program, Brother Fred M. being asked to give his ideas for Kirtland. His impression had undergone a change, he admitted; whereas he had always thought of Kirtland in its past tense he now found himself curious as to its future. What was its mission? And he saw it as a "gateway" of Zion, a preparatory place where people would come and learn how to comport themselves, make themselves ready and acquainted with conditions necessary to go up into Zion properly. From this place—alluding to the Temple—should go forth those who had learned the law. All of these sayings were accompanied with the impress of the Spirit upon the minds of the hearers, for he spoke as one having authority. Many expressions we have heard since indicate that he has given new courage to many faithful Saints who have held out bravely in this little outpost of Zion! Can it be termed little any longer? Does the church at large realize its importance as a "gateway" of Zion?

Taking the slogan of the commercial interests of Cleveland and applying the same facts to our own aims: "Half the population of the United States within a radius of 500 miles of Cleveland," cross out Cleveland and write Kirtland, which is only nine miles from its easterly limits!

A gateway indeed for the world to see Zion through! And

In addition to local workers, we will have Daniel Macgregor, Apostle M. A. McConley, and Patriarch W. A. McDowell. Vida Smith will care for the women's and girls' departments. A nurse from the Sanitarium will be present. Thursday, August 19, will be Children's Day with appropriate programs, music, and sermon. Friday, August 20, will be a Centennial Day and a pageant, "A hundred years of Latter Day Saintism," will be presented. The departments will combine in institute work. Afternoons will be devoted to recreational and social activities. A large gathering is anticipated and committees are active in preparation. Roy A. Cheville.

Little Sioux and Gallands Grove, in joint reunion in city park at Dow City, Iowa, August 20-29. Tents may be rented at the following prices: 10 by 12, 3-foot wall, $5.50; 12 by 14, 3-foot wall, $7.50; 12 by 14, 6-foot wall, $10.75; 10 by 19, 6-foot wall, $11.50; cots, $1.50. Orders for tents and cots should be forwarded with remittance to L. V. Butterworth, Denison, Iowa, before August 1. Orders received later will be considered subject to supply available. Meals and confections will be furnished on the grounds at reasonable rates. Prominent speakers will be in attendance. Sunday school, Religio, and Women's Departments are given a prominent place each day. F. R. Schafer, secretary.

Clinton, Missouri, at Rich Hill, Missouri, August 20 to 29. Persons desiring tents should write as soon as they see this notice. Prices for tents as follows: 12 by 14, 6-foot wall, $7.25; 12 by 16, 6-foot wall, $8.50; 10 by 12, 3-foot wall, $4.25; 12 by 14, 3½-foot wall, $5. It is a very difficult matter to get tents for campers and the rule will be first applications will be first served. The committee desire an immediate answer to this notice so that we can get our orders in early. Meals will be served in the dining hall on the camp ground at prices as reasonable as the high cost of food will permit. Address all orders to Edward Rannie, 709 South Fuller Avenue, Independence, Missouri. Edward Rannie, for the committee.

Southeastern Illinois, with the Brush Creek Branch, beginning Friday, August 20, and continuing over two Sundays. Bring Hymnals, Zion's Praises, Sunday school and Rethe nations of the earth—they surround us in miniature, districts that are wholly Italian, Finnish, Jewish, Austrian, Hungarian, Polish, besides quarters where dwell colonies of lesser prominence, the Chinese group for instance.

So one might well believe that Kirtland has a future mission if it is accorded due attention and its assets utilized. From this working center should radiate many lines of activity, many avenues of influence. A certain rich man boasted that they would buy up every acre of ground till there wasn't a "Mormon" left here, but the contrary has obtained to some extent for some of our worthy neighbors have now and again been tendered a little farewell social. Meanwhile several families of Saints have gathered in here to get away from the clutches of the rent profiteers of near-by cities! Carpenters, painters, builders, all as busy as the farmers so the little town must be holding its own. The old mill now houses many thousands of dollars' worth of material and new machinery to help beautify the town and its bigger sisters abroad. Then there's the reunion about due as you read this—and they say it's the second largest of its kind in the church activities. It is destined to grow in importance and popularity each year and the indications are that the present occasion will outdo all previous records. The arrangements for devotional exercises, educational and intellectual sessions, recreational entertainment, etc., are of the best. It is planned to present a pageant of Longfellow's "Hiawatha" classic on Nature's amphitheater, bringing out features dear to students of Nephite and Lamanite lore.

How many were fortunate enough to see the wonderful aurora borealis that occurred in the heavens just prior to convening of General Conference of this year? Many stated it was a sign of divine portent and pleasure. Had you seen it in its later phase from the southern end of Kirtland, which placed the wondrous old Temple in the very center of those mysterious polar light waves you would never doubt but that the Author of all light was again about to flash the message of life to the four ends of the earth. May we soon enter upon that triumphant period is a prayer in which we may all join.

ligio Quarterlies, Bibles, Books of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants. Come praying, fasting, and prepared to make this; with God's help and approval, the best reunion ever held in this district, in the way of getting lined up more fully in the onward march of the work. F. L. Sawley.

Spring River, at Pittsburg, Kansas, August 6 to 15, in Lincoln Park. One of the Twelve, other ministers, and Maggie Macgregor expect to be present. Efforts being made to make the reunion a place of attraction for young people. A dormitory tent with a matron in charge for single women and girls, at nominal fee. Tents: 10 by 12, $3.50; 12 by 14, $4.50; 12 by 14, 6-foot wall, $8.50; cots, 85 cents. Orders must be in by August 3, to Arthur E. Stoft, 120 West Jefferson Street, Pittsburg, Kansas. Meals at as nearly cost as possible and if we can make a lower price than the following, it will be done. By ticket for 21 meals, (not transferable) 30 cents per meal, single meals 40 cents. Sunday dinner 50 cents. For further information, address Charles Fry, 112 West Jefferson Street, Pittsburg, Kansas.

At the Kirtland reunion Brethren Arthur Mills and A. N. Hoxie intend to be present and one day will be devoted to music. For choir work it is expected to use Winnowed Anthems, Nos. 5 and 6 combined, which can be secured of Hope Publishing Company, 5707 Lake Street, Chicago. Any who can assist in orchestra are requested to write C. M. Romig, 514 North High Street, Barberton, Ohio, who will have charge of that feature. Let soloists bring music and players their instruments. John F. Martin, music director.

Two-Day Meetings

Butman, Michigan, July 31 and August 1. Midland, Michigan, August 7 and 8. Glover, which is two miles north of Bentley, Michigan, August 14 and 15. Section Eight, which is five miles north and one mile east of Gladwin, Michigan, August 21 and 22. Matthew Umphrey, president, Bentley, Michigan.

Pigeon River Branch, five miles south of Elkton, or four and a half miles east, and one mile north of Owendale, Michigan, July 31 and August 1. Everybody bring baskets. William H. Sheffer, president, Uby, Michigan.

The Bishopric

Southwestern Kansas, unorganized territory: We hereby appoint Elder J. W. Wooten, 857 North Saint Francis Street, Wichita, Kansas, as Bishop's agent of the above territory. Saints living in this territory may send their tithes and offerings direct to Brother Wooten hereafter.

Respectfully,

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE.

Notice to Reunion Committees

Class work based on the scientific books, Ellen Torelle's Plant and Animal Children: How they grow and Galloway's Biology of Sex, recommended in the Women's Year Book, 1916-18, may be continued when desired. The education of mothers need not be neglected while waiting for the development of the enlarged social purity policies now under consideration.

MRS. FREDERICK M. SMITH,

Director General of Women's Department.

In the recent elections in Czecho-Slovakia universal suffrage prevailed, open to all citizens, both men and women over twenty-one for the chamber of deputies and over twenty-six for the senate. The Czechs and Slovaks obtained 199 seats, with 82 for the racial minorities, 72 of these being German and 10 Magyar. There are some differences of political views among these groups but an entire agreement among the Czechs and Slovaks on national ideals.

NEWS AND COMMENT

THE WORLD AT LARGE

The United States Government has removed restrictions on trade with Russia, except on materials which might be used for immediate war purposes. Export licenses must be obtained by those shipping to soviet Russia. The action was taken independently of other nations but is believed to be with the concurrence of Great Britain and France. This change of attitude does not affect in any way the political relations of the two countries, and those engaging in trade with Russia do so at their own risk. The state department believes Russia has but little raw material to export. Great Britain has decided that in their trade relations no gold shall be accepted in payment from Russia, for the national debt of that country to the other nations must be settled first, therefore trading must be by barter only.

According to the Jerusalem News, the best available maps of Palestine are those prepared by the British Government about fifty years ago, in which work Lord Kitchener, then an officer in the Royal Engineers, had a prominent part. It is so well made that it furnishes the most reliable information concerning the topography of Palestine to be found to-day.

W. Jett Lauck, consulting economist for the United Mine Workers of America, has made a careful survey of production in the United States, and believes there is more than enough food and clothing being produced for our needs. He has estimated that it requires $2,200 to support an average family in the mining regions of Pennsylvania.

little used. Some district secretary or publicity agent may be glad to know of this opportunity to get such a machine at a reduction, since the prices have advanced materially of late. Address the Women's Department, Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, box 255, Independence, Missouri.

The executive committee of the general Religio Department met in Independence on the 14th and considered the various problems before the Religio. They held a meeting with the presiding authorities of the stakes and thereby helped to establish a good working basis for the Religio in the branches represented. In a reception given Brother T. W. Williams a token of remembrance was tendered him by the local workers ere he left on his trip to Europe.

Bishop Albert Karlstrom writes from Papeete, Tahiti, on June 26, as follows: "We received the news of the conference on the tenth of this month and it is needless to say that we were delighted with the same. I am heartily in favor of all that was done and rejoice in the onward movement of the work. The natives partook of the same spirit and it was gratifying to hear them express their hopes in the ultimate triumph of the work. Everyone is in a hustle here now preparing to go to Hikueru for the diving season which will open the first of August. There will be an immense crowd there this year and it is hoped that the price of shell will be good, for the prices of living commodities are soaring skyward. I have engaged passage on the Teheiporoura which will sail about July 8, going by way of Tubuai and Hereheretua."

Apostle Gomer T. Griffiths writes from Niagara Falls, New York, that two meetings a week have been held among the Indians of the Tuscarora reservation by himself and James E. Bishop. There is some interest and opportunities for enlarging it. It is hoped that meetings may be held later in the year, using stereopticon slides and charts. He says Brother Bishop is doing a good work among the bright and up-to-date younger element of the Tuscaroras.

Brother A. T. Gray writes that in Phoenix, Arizona, they are enjoying the Spirit of God. Brethren Yates and Anderson are giving them some good help, which is greatly appreciated. The branch is trying to qualify to be among those who are faithful in the building of Zion.

The Leon Laundry Co., a branch of the Lamoni Steam Laundry, has been recently sold. The Lamoni concern will continue to be managed by R. J. Wildey for the church, on a stewardship basis.

The managers of the Lamoni Storehouse have recently purchased a general store at Hatfield, Missouri, eighteen miles southwest from Lamoni, and it will be conducted by Brother Ralph Travis, who is moving there with his wife from Woodbine, Iowa. Hatfield is an inland village serving a large and fertile territory.

Elder Harry Passman, writing from Marseilles, France, to the Presidency, says he expected to sail from that port on June 25 for Joppa, Palestine.

Elder Arthur Mills is attending the Senlac conference in Saskatchewan and also the Alberta province in the interests of the Department of Music. He visited the Iowa and Minnesota Branches last week. He will visit both Northern and Southern Saskatchewan Districts and then proceed to the reunions in eastern Canada.

One of the brethren borrowed some of the cuts illustrating "The call at evening" and we have mislaid the memorandum of his name and address. Will he kindly return them to us soon, as we need them.

FROM THE BRANCHES

Trenton, Missouri. Pulpit of our East Ninth Street Church was filled Sunday, both morning and evening by Scottie Daniels, one of the local ministers of Cameron, Missouri, to a fairly good-sized audience considering the fact that a union service of all of the other churches was held in the evening. His subjects were uplifting and enlightening. Many people outside of the church present. Local branch president, J. D. Proffit, having been called to fill the appointment at Raines Mission, southeast of Jamesport, Missouri, reports fair audience morning, afternoon, and evening. The Sunday school at Raines Mission, under the leadership of Wallace Diem, is progressing nicely and is gaining in membership almost every Sunday. Meetings have been arranged for regularly, the second Sunday of every month.

Denver, Colorado. Apostles Gillen and Curtis were with us the 4th and remained over the 11th, working among the members so that the situation here is much improved, the outlook bright. Also preaching services held all week—these brethren occupying the stand alternately. Night of the 11th Brother Curtis preached a stirring gospel sermon; a man and wife, neighbors of the writer, accompanied him there. They've been attending the Church of Christ, Scientist, but said they believed "every word of that sermon." The church was full at Sunday services.

Kansas City Stake. The "Stake Forward Movement" is looming big. The Bishop has sent out a call for $10,000 for the erection of two churches this year. From 65 per cent to 75 per cent of this amount has been subscribed and the other will come in as rapidly as the people are given the opportunity to sign up. The churches are to be constructed for the Mount Washington and the Quindaro Saints. The Mount Washington building is sufficiently along in the process of construction that the Saints met there for the first time on the 11th. The foundation for the building at Quindaro will be completed by the 16th, nothing preventing. In asking for this amount of money the Bishop figured that every wage earner would have to increase his subscription $30 per year. Five thousand dollars was assigned to Central Church, two thousand of this to the young men and the unmarried women. The women have over half of theirs now and the men are coming right along. One person who has been a regular subscriber to expense funds and tithing thought that about the limit and that another $30 would be almost out of the question but after due consideration the pledge was made and the next day the income of this same person was increased to such an amount that the $30 could be paid in a very few weeks. Does it pay to make the effort to do your part?

Plano, Illinois. Lester O. Wildermuth, laboring as missionary in Southeastern Illinois this year, was at home recently and we are glad his wife is much improved from her operation. Several families have moved in of late. A normal class and one in Doctrine and Covenants has been organized of late. The Orioles are organized now, with Bessie Eggleston as monitor. Henry Worby passed away recently.

Durango, Colorado. Elders Chester Young and Amos T. Higdon preached for us on the 27th. The former was taken by Brother John Scannell and family to visit the Mesa Verde ruins. Some of the Sunday school pupils spent a day recently picking cherries for Christmas offering fund.

Denver, Colorado. Just as prayer service commenced last Wednesday, Brother J. A. Gillen walked in; during the meeting he gave us an encouraging account of the work in Iowa. The sacrament of the Lord's supper on the 4th was in charge of Apostles Curtis and Gillen, a fine, spiritual service; two songs were sung by the Spirit, the one in tongues, the other the interpretation. Brother and Sister Gillen will be in Denver over the 11th; we expect him to speak that day. We miss Brother and Sister Cowan, and Sisters Nellie and Blanche Sampson, all of whom are in Independence, the two latter in the Sanitarium for treatment. They have our faith and prayers for an early recovery. Thousands of tourists here in this gateway to the wonderful Rocky Mountain playground.

Pontiac, Michigan. We are glad to state that through the goodness of God we are doing our best to keep the home fires burning. On June 20 we had the pleasure of hearing Brother Cooney of Detroit preach to us. The Women's Department had an ice cream social Thursday evening, June 24, at the home of Brother and Sister Edwin Schell. Our Sunday school will hold a picnic at Orchard Lake July 5. Our Religion is now on its way to carry out the social and recreational activities, and all look forward to the near future when both young and old will have something to do.

Wiley, Colorado. A series of meetings has been in progress here since July 1, conducted by Elder J. Charles May. Sunday, July 4, was celebrated by the branch with nine baptisms by the branch president, Elder M. F. Ralston, and others are interested. A branch picnic was held July 5 at a grove along the Arkansas River. An enjoyable time was had by all present. Last Thursday evening a lecture was given at the church by Elder May, the subject being, "Polygamy, the curse of the ages," and we believe that some prejudice has been removed. The branch membership here is now 124. Prospects and outlook are favorable. Last evening a surprise and a substantial purse were given to Brother May as a token of appreciation.

Coldwater, Michigan. An all-day meeting was held on June 27, commemorating the birth of the branch. Preaching was by E. K. Evans and H. E. Moler. Attendance was good, a goodly number coming from Clear Lake Branch. S. W. L. Scott has been holding services at the latter place. Brother Moler has been here a week and will go next to Kalamazoo.

The Workers of To-morrow

Must Be Efficient

The business world is demanding trained men and women. Slipshod methods can no longer be tolerated. The unprepared worker can never climb.

Business and the Church

Business adopts efficiency methods because they are essential to the making of money. The church is not a money-making institution. But if it is to be successful it is just as necessary that its workers be efficient.

Training for Efficiency

Efficiency cannot be bought ready-made. No man by taking thought can add one cubit to his stature. If he wants to grow he must exercise. If he wants to become efficient he must study efficiency methods.

The Training Ground of the Church

The church has delegated to Graceland College the task of training its future workers. Only a church institution can foster the ideals of the church. Only a church school can train efficient Zion-builders.

Will Graceland Succeed?

Complete success can come only as the result of full and loyal cooperation of every member of the church. The world is recognizing her work and her students. Her credits are accepted everywhere. She is making an enviable record in Scholarship, Athletics, and Debate. Surely, the church will not fail to see what the world recognizes! A boost for Graceland is a boost for the church—and for yourself.

Labor and the Church

Every member of our church can well learn a lesson from history in making his decision for his future course toward the demands of organized labor and toward the church.

Social reforms come slowly, and yet most of them come violently. From the struggle of the Albigenses in southeastern France to separate from the Catholic Church in the twelfth century, until the present day, the struggle for freedom of religious practices has been going in. Even yet, we are aware that complete religious toleration does not exist. No more forceful proof can be had of this than the period of so-called Mormon wars in Daviess County, Missouri. Such liberty as we now have has been obtained by the sacrifice of veritable millions of human lives, whose slaughter has been tragically staged at various occasions. One early instance of one of these occasions is the massacre of Saint Bartholomew. Ten thousand victims fell in France in one day—Huguenots, the Protestants of France.

As early as 1265, the English nobles won from their king the privilege to send representatives to a parliament, yet as late as 1911 the Commons of England were struggling for the right to pass laws over the veto of the hereditary nobility of England. It has taken over a century of ever-recurring days of slaughter and massacre to win for France a republican form of government. Time after time the republican leaders seemed in the ascendancy, and yet France would soon drift back to monarchical relations.

Why Do Reforms Come Slowly and Violently?

There are some common elements running through all of these instances, which will tell why the change has been so slow, and yet so violent.

We will notice first that those who are opposed to the reform have the government with them. Society organized is against the reform. Antagonism toward change is entrenched in the then existing government. The Catholic Church, well organized, and the national governments, were opposed to religious freedom. The constituted governments of England and France were opposed to democratic reforms. The leaders who seek reform must work against this handicap. They must either persuade the constituted authorities to grant the reforms voluntarily or wrest the reforms from them by force.

The next element opposing reform has been the ignorance of the masses for whom the reform is intended. This is well exemplified in the history of France. Time after time the masses practically voted themselves back into the monarchical form of government. It took a long time after the first great struggle for free government for the great mass of the French people to become republican in heart and to demand it. The leaders for reform have always been too far ahead of the masses. The ignorance of the masses and the complete organization of the authorities were allies against reform. No wonder reform must of necessity come slowly, and even then by violence. For only by violence could the masses be awakened to their condition. This violence has as often been initiated by the constituted authorities as by the leaders demanding reform, but in each case, it has reacted in the long run to increase the numbers demanding the reform, and hence, to hasten the reform.

How Will Future Reforms Be Accomplished?

History repeats itself very definitely along general lines, yet with limitations. New factors are constantly entering in as unknown quantities which affect the course of history. Reforms in the future will come more quickly than they have in the past, and the most of them with less violence. The new factors entering to cause this change in historical procedure are first, our democratic forms of government, and second, our increased facilities for the spread of information. The latter factor will make it possible to apprise the masses of the nature of the reforms. By the peaceful pursuits of education, the masses can learn of their common wants the more easily. Then in turn, by the increased use of the ballot, their constituted authorities can be persuaded to grant the reform. Thus with the growth of democratic governments and the growth of educational facilities does our optimistic hope of the peaceful settlement of disputes grow.

But by these very factors, democracy and education, is the use of violence made more easy to accomplish reforms where the existing order does not want the reform to be accomplished. These very factors help leaders for reform to use violence to accomplish their ends when they think the established order does not grant the reform soon enough to suit them. The leaders for reform will find it easier to organize their adherents for concerted action.

Labor's Most Significant Demand

The beginnings of a reform movement start in very humble circumstances and in very unpretentious places. They are unnoticed at first, and their relative significance is not appreciated by the populace until they have already grown to be great monsters. To us the most significant and far-reaching reform which is already out of its baby clothes is the demand of labor for a voice in the management of industry. As yet this demand is not considered the most important thing by the constituted authorities of organized labor to-day. Yet labor leaders as Samuel Gompers are having a hard time to keep under the control the wing of labor which does make this demand a prominent one. It will become of increasing significance. This demand will give the keynote to future world history.

What are the possible ways this demand may be satisfied? As we view it, there are three ways.

First, by converting capitalists and employers of labor voluntarily to grant their employees a voice in the management of the industry, man for man, with the employees by various forms of representation, and labor being satisfied to wait for its full return for its work until the product is sold, and being satisfied to let the legal title of the working capital remain with the capitalist.

Second, by legislating into existence this form of economic relationships.

Third, by evolutionary change through the soviet form of government to the socialist form of government. To our view neither of the latter two would ever come without violence. The right of private property is too well entrenched in our system of the government to admit of the success of the latter two of the three methods without resort to violence. While the first method might be adopted by a considerable few, and is to-day quite successfully illustrated by the Good-year Tire Company, we do not see that it can produce an ultimate solution to the proposition. Capitalists as a whole would want to be quite satisfied that labor was capable of managing the industry before turning over its management to them. Notwithstanding our increase of educational facilities, it will be a long time before the laboring classes will be able successfully to manage large industries. This method will prove too slow for the leaders, even if augmented by legislative enactments. If labor continues to make this demand, and we believe it will, violence will come.

In that day of violence will come the test for every individual member of our church. First of all, we must be cautioned as laborers to measure every demand which we are taught to make by our labor leaders of the world in the light of the gospel plan. We must see to it that our minds are firmly rooted in the gospel, and in the stand we intend to take both toward these demands and toward the church.

In the gospel we firmly believe lies the solution without violence but with the Spirit of Christ. The bulk of the world will not accept our solution. That day, too, will bring the test to our church. Unless the church is in readiness to place us as laborers in a position whereby we can answer this question of the proper attitude toward these demands rightly, the church will have lost its opportunity. Indeed unless the church has its plan in operation when these days of anxiety break out, it will have passed up the opportune moment to reach the honest in heart, who cry out for safety and for a practical religion.

Our Finances

We may draw a lesson from the means used in their various efforts by other organizations. The work of preparation lasts for a considerable period, and a particular effort is made to see that all the people are informed as to what is to be done and how the moneys raised are to be used. The issue is kept before them—just what different congregations are doing, how much different States are accomplishing, how much is actually in hand.

For our work that is needed, and something more. What does that mean? It means that the church would be informed, not once a year, and long after the event, but would be kept currently informed as to the status of church finances, with some information as to the period and time of the year, and what should ordinarily be expected. It is certain that receipts are not equal throughout the year, nor are expenditures equal throughout the year. There are periods of greater receipts and periods of larger expenditures.

Twenty-five thousand dollars is a great deal of money to any of us. It represents far more than most of us are worth. Can we face the fact that the Bishop has twenty-five thousand dollars in cash and still send in our tithing? The budget for the year is six hundred thousand; that means that twenty-five thousand would scarcely be enough for two weeks' expenses. If the work is to go on, we must continue to contribute. We must be sufficiently informed that we can face the situation intelligently, and continue to work together to accomplish the work before us, otherwise only failure can be expected.

Never within our knowledge has such an appeal been made to the membership of the church. Efforts have been made from time to time to collect special funds; but weekly, nor even monthly statement of amount now collected, and the amount still to be raised has not been given.

To accomplish the work before us is going to require faith. We want and must have efficient business administration. We need the conservatives, as well as those who see visions. The time has come that we must move forward with faith in God and faith in one another.

Are we prepared to do our part?

One of God's Noblemen Goes to His Reward

A brief telegram informs us that Elder M. H. Bond passed away at the Onset reunion, July 24, and that the body will be shipped to Independence, his late home, for interment, perhaps on Wednesday of this week.

Elder Bond has been an energetic missionary and local worker in the church many years, his fields being Pittsburgh and Kirtland, Saint Louis and Southern Illinois, Eastern Mission, Massachusetts, Chicago, and Northeastern Illinois. Till 1900 he labored as a seventy and at that conference was ordained a high priest.

For some fifteen years he has been located in Independence, doing such local work as he was able to do with his somewhat delicate constitution.

He was a deep student, a speaker and writer of unusual ability, and always in the forefront of progressive movements in the church and retained a clear perception of life's values in spite of advancing years.

Early Ideals of the Church

IV.—To Live at Peace With All Men

The true follower of Christ is placed in a delicate and trying position. He is quite likely to be subjected to abuse and persecution; yet according to the tenor of his belief he cannot retaliate in kind. He must follow the way of peace among those who are bent upon killing him.

Christ said:

"They hated me without a cause. . . . If they have persecuted me they will also persecute you. . . . They shall put you out of the synagogues: yea, the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you will think that he doeth God service."

He also said:

"My kingdom is not of this world. If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight. . . . When they persecute you in this city, flee ye into another."

Certainly the Saints of the early church knew what it was to be persecuted and hated without just cause. They may have erred in some particulars at times, as individuals, but as a rule the conduct of the church was remarkably free from retaliation. They were not permitted to dwell in peace in Ohio, Missouri, or Illinois.

Driven From Jackson County

In 1833 their enemies came upon them and drove them from Jackson County, Missouri. The Saints at that time suffered great hardship, with accompanying loss of life and property. One charge made against them at the time was set forth in a circular issued by the citizens, as follows:

"It is more than two years since the first of these fanatics or knaves (for one or the other they undoubtedly are) made their first appearance amongst us, and pretending as they did and now do to hold personal communion and converse face to face with the most high God; to receive communications and revelations direct from heaven; to heal the sick by laying on hands; and, in short, to perform all the wonder-working miracles wrought by the inspired apostles and prophets of old."—Church History, vol. 1, pp. 313, 314.

In 1833 it was blasphemy for one to ask God for spiritual direction or physical healing and to believe that he would answer. To-day leaders of the Emmanuel Movement and many others, highly respected, are "blasphemers" if judged by this standard.

Asked to Leave Clay County

Fleeing as best they could from their abandoned and dismantled homes the Saints sought refuge in Clay County. There they were hospitably received and proceeded to settle upon their own purchased or rented farms and allotments. But in time their ancient enemies followed them up, determined to oust them from the State; and by various means succeeded in raising up a strong faction against them.

Matters reached such a stage that neutral and cool-headed members of the community felt that something should be done to avert bloodshed. They accordingly appointed a committee to confer with a committee to be appointed by the church. This committee advised the church in the interests of peace to withdraw from the county.

The committee attempted to formulate some of the reasons for the existing prejudice against the Saints. We italicize certain portions of their statement for the purpose of calling attention to particular reasons. It seems that (as is so often the case) the Saints were hated because they were "different." Established communities resent the introduction of new customs of speech and dress, and new ideas in religion and politics. Human nature is at best tolerant of ways and customs that are foreign.

The Saints were newcomers in the West. They differed from their neighbors in dress, in speech, in politics, and above all in religion; and these differences were at the root of the trouble. We quote resolutions drawn up by the committee to which we have referred:

"They are eastern men, whose manners, habits, customs, and even dialect are essentially different from our own; they are nonslaveholders, and opposed to slavery, which, in this peculiar period when abolition has reared its deformed and haggard visage on our land is well calculated to excite deep and abiding prejudices in any community where slavery is tolerated and practiced. . . .

"These and many other causes have combined to raise a prejudice against them, and a feeling of hostility, that the first spark may, and we deeply fear will, ignite into all the horrors and desolations of a civil war—the worst evil that can befall any country. We therefore feel it our duty to come forward as mediators and use every means in our power to prevent the occurrence of so great an evil.

"As the most efficient means to arrest the evil, we urge on the Mormons to use every means to put an immediate stop to the emigration of their people to this country. We earnestly urge them to seek some other abiding place, where the manners, the habits, and customs of the people will be more consonant with their own. . . .

"The religious tenets of this people are so different from the present churches of the age that they always have and always will excite deep prejudices against them in any populous country where they may locate. We, therefore, in a spirit of frank and friendly kindness, do advise them to seek a home where they may obtain large and separate bodies of land and have a community of their own."—Church History, vol. 2, pp. 58 to 60.

Church Leaders Admonish Peace

Under the circumstances the Saints might have felt that they would be within their rights as citizens to stand their ground and defend their position by force, as they were admittedly occupying within their constitutional rights. But their ideal was to follow after peace; and at that critical time they were true to their ideal.

Under date of July 25, 1836, the First Presidency and others, to be exact, Joseph Smith, Sidney Rigdon, Oliver

Cowdery, F. G. Williams, and Hyrum Smith, wrote from Kirtland to the Saints in Clay County, advising them as follows:

"We forward you our letter to Mr. Thornton and others, that you may know all we have said. We advise that you be not the first aggressors. Give no occasion, and if the people will let you dispose of your property, settle your affairs, and go in peace, go. You have thus far held an asylum, and now seek another as God may direct. Relative to your going to Wisconsin, we cannot say; we should think if you could stop short in peace, you had better. You know our feelings relative to not giving the first offense, and also in protecting your wives and little ones in case a mob should seek their lives. We shall publish the proceedings of the public meeting, with your answer, as well as our letter. We mean that the world shall know all things as they transpire. If we are persecuted and driven, men shall know it!

"Be wise; let prudence dictate all your counsels; preserve peace with all men if possible: stand by the Constitution of your country; observe its principles, and above all show yourselves men of God, worthy citizens, and we doubt not (the) community ere long will do you justice and rise in indignation against those who are the instigators of your sufferings and affliction."—Church History, vol. 2, p. 73.

Similar circumstances might be related at length, but this is representative. No one not blinded by prejudice will deny that this was a noble and Christlike ideal nobly lived up to under great provocation to do otherwise. We believe that the ideal was quite consistently lived up to during all the early history of the church.

Only in the most abject extremity did they attempt to defend themselves by force. When persecuted in one city they fled into another. Their kingdom not being of this world they did not fight. If at any time the ideal was forgotten for a time, it was because of human weakness, such as Peter betrayed when he provided himself with a sword and used it. If the Saints retaliated in kind at any time, it was the exception and not the rule. You, gentle reader, under similar conditions might have done much worse.

They at least made a consistent effort to abide by the exalted instructions contained in their church law:

And again, I say unto you, sue for peace, not only the people that have smitten you, but also to all people; and lift up an ensign of peace, and make a proclamation of peace unto the ends of the earth; and make proposals for peace, unto those who have smitten you, according to the voice of the Spirit that is in you."—Doctrine and Covenants 102: 11.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the fourth of a series of five articles by President Smith on early church ideals. The fifth will appear in an early issue.

Public Health Nurse

It is to be seriously questioned if a nurse as trained in the hospital for the cure of the sick, is properly prepared for public health work. One grave reason is that the nurse in the hospital is trained not to think; that is her greatest function, but to do as she is ordered by the doctors. The public health nursing requires a broad capacity, and can only be done by a person with faithful and independent thinking in the solution of problems connected with the family, and is willing to tell even the doctor that he does not know how to feed a baby.

Doctor Winslow suggests as an ideal training, two years of college, six months of theoretical instruction, eighteen months in the ward, and a year of special training in public health nursing. This would be the ideal of instruction for a public health nurse.

The public health nurse has to make her work for herself; she has to search out her work. There is danger where it is confined with ordinary nursing of sick persons that the child work will be neglected.

Hygiene, sanitation, and housing are a few of the things that the public health nurse should know.

Subjects Being Discussed

The Legal Right to Remain Ignorant

The legal right to remain ignorant says the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor is annually granted to thousands of children in States where child labor and education laws are backward. According to an account of the administration of the Federal Child Labor Law soon to be published by the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor, only 783 children out of 19,696 to whom certificates were issued, or less than 4 per cent, had attended or completed the eighth grade, though completion of the eighth grade is generally regarded as necessary to secure even the rudiments of an education.

Only 1 of these 5 States has a compulsory school law for children up to 16, even when unemployed, and that law permits many exemptions. Both parents and children, through ignorance of the value of schooling, are apt to take advantage of the legal right to dodge an education. In a recent study of school attendance in Cleveland it was found that 2,550 children were so irregular in their attendance at school as to interfere with their studies, and that the reasons for staying out of school were in many cases trivial. Among foreign groups, children were kept at home on bargain or market days to act as interpreters for their mothers.

In addition to lax school attendance laws, 3 of the 5 States permit children 16 years old and younger to go to work even if they can not read or write or have never been to school. Two require only that the child applying for work shall have gone to school for a brief period during the preceding year. Among the other States in the United States 23 require the completion of a specified grade, and 12 more and the District of Columbia require the ability to read and write.

None of the 5 States where children were granted certificates makes any provision for continuation schools in order to make up for defective education in childhood. Only 18 States in the United States have laws which make such provision. England, under the Fisher Education Act, which went into effect April 1, is rapidly establishing continuation schools throughout the country, and will shortly compel attendance up to the age of 18. Every effort is being made in that country to get teachers with the best training and to arrange suitable courses of study for working children, in order that they may have every opportunity not to grow up illiterate because they have been unfortunate.

Christian Union

The retiring moderator, John Willis Baer, delivered a strong address for church union at the opening of the Presbyterian General Assembly, at Philadelphia. He stressed that religion is not denominationalism, and urged that the differences which keep the denominations apart should be ignored, and that we stress rather, the important convictions which are held to be fundamental by all Christians. He especially urged that the differences between the Presbyterian Church, North and South, should be buried, and the Presbyterian Church united. But he goes farther and pleads for an organic union of evangelical churches of America.

We strongly agree the Church of Christ is and must be one, and we respect the sincere effort made by many to bring about a unity of the Christian church. But that unity, if it is to stand approved of God, must be founded on the truth rather than on compromise. Still personal idiosyncrasies ought not to permit the lack of brotherly union, as there are many views on which there are minor differences, which should not be allowed to keep the church from progress; nor should they keep individuals from pledging themselves to the Church of Christ.

A Strong Zionist Leader

Recent press dispatches inform us that Louis D. Brandeis has been elected president of the international Zionist conference now meeting in London. This conference is formulating a program for Jewish occupation of Palestine and the choice of Mr. Brandeis is recognized by all observers as an excellent one.

He has an enviable reputation as a lawyer of national fame and is now one of the justices of the United States Supreme Court. He is not only a man with skill in his profession, but in addition has a heart that responds to humanity's needs and the disposition to recognize human problems in their true relations. William J. Bryan had the name of Brandeis at the head of his list of proposed presidential candidates at the late San Francisco convention. But in some ways, his new task is as pregnant with possibilities as to preside as our national leader.

Cooperation Succeeds in Restaurant Management

In San Francisco, John H. Leighton, a proprietor of five restaurants, decided, according to The Cooperative News, to try cooperative ownership as a means of solving his labor troubles. As a result the business practically runs itself because of the great personal interest taken by the employees, and the force has been reduced from one hundred to sixty-five. In addition to this, the cost of raw material and merchandise has been cut from 25 to 50 per cent. He says, concerning the motive necessary:

"I firmly believe that in a cooperative business where the human element, represented by a large number of individuals, makes so large a factor in the undertaking, the nature of the motive held by the prime mover and the coworkers is a most vital factor in the situation and will go far to make the venture a success or a failure. If the organizer and his associates are absolutely sincere, if they have some conception of the principle underlying the true and just relations of individuals in industry, and if they have a greater desire to establish just and happy relations than they have to make money, then they have laid the foundation of success and the battle is already more than half won. The right purpose, the good will, and the united thought of the coworkers will prove irresistible and failure will be impossible.

"But if, on the other hand, the prime motive on the part of the organizers of a cooperative industry is to get as much money as possible and as quickly as possible, cross-purposes, confusion, and strife would come in, and under such conditions the chances of success would be diminished.

The United States Railroad Labor Board has granted a wage advance to railway employees totaling about half the amount the men asked for. To date not over two thirds of the unions represented seem to have accepted the offer. Certain divisions of the thousand classifications involved, such as the switchmen and yardmen, claim they have not participated in the previous advances in wages proportionately with some other employees. The advances total $600,000,000 and will no doubt result in an advance in passenger and freight rates.

Crusaders for Christ!

BY T. W. WILLIAMS

"We need hundreds, aye thousands of men and women with this larger vision of Christian ministry to carry the gospel message to the nations of the earth."

The grainfields of God are languishing. The call for "hands" is very urgent. It is imperative. Men, real men, are needed. There is no place for the weakling, the molly-coddle, the idler, the effeminate, or the ultrapious.

God wants men who are strong and unafraid. He wants men of valor and purpose—men of will and determination—men of red blood, muscles of steel, and iron nerve—men who are willing to roll up their sleeves and work—men who can face the world, the flesh, the Devil—and win! It's a real man's job. None other need apply.

Shirkers and Idlers not Wanted

God wants grubbers and woodchoppers, and plowmen, and harrowers, and sowers, and tillers, and caretakers, and harvesters. Men are needed who love to work seven days in the week, fifty-two weeks in the year—men who will not strike or soldier on the job. He is even now "weeding out" among his employees the shiftless, the aspiring, the unstable, the selfish, and disloyal. He is making place for real men.

There is a great scarcity of men who can qualify for service. The qualifications are: selflessness, consecration of body, mind, and spirit to the service of humanity, a passion for men, a reverence and love for God!

Much of the work is pioneer. New trails must be blazed. The jungle must be penetrated. Wild beasts must be encountered. There will be many hazardous experiences. The man who enlists must be brave and courageous. He must not know fear. He must be willing to endure privation, to put up with frugal fare, to live under unsanitary conditions, to practice self-denial, to work without regard for reward, to give himself with absolute personal abandon for God and humanity. The call of God is not to comfort and ease, but to heroic endeavor and hardship; to the ministry of love and service.

Work for the Joy of Working

The twentieth century crusader will not work for wages, nor strive for reward. He will not be moved by selfish ambition nor lust for power. He will not shirk responsibility nor flee danger. He will serve and not be served. He will work for the very joy of working. He will welcome crucifixion and be resigned even unto death in his zeal to prepare the soil, plant the seed, and gather the harvest in the grainfields of God. The hours will be long and the work taxing. He will be separated from friends and oftentimes encompassed by enemies. His beneficiaries will misinterpret his motive and malign his purpose. His nearest friends will not understand him. He will get nothing out of his work except the satisfaction of having given himself to establish the kingdom of love and fellowship among men.

Condition of the Field

The fields are the earth, the whole earth. The seed is the truth, the whole truth. The crop is humanity—all of humanity. Some fields are in their virgin state. The rank growth of superstition and ignorance and prejudice and error must be uprooted and the soil prepared for the sowing of the good seed. Here we need grubbers, and woodchoppers, and stump pullers and brush burners. Other fields have been cleared and only wait the sowing of the seed. We need sowers bearing from the very altar of God the message of life and salvation through Jesus Christ. In still other fields the seed has been sown and neglected. Weeds are choking the growing grain. The soil is untilled. Here we need husbandmen and tillers of the soil. Other fields are ready for the reapers. The grain is "white unto the harvest." Harvesters are needed to thrust in their sickles and reap.

God's Challenge to the Church

God has issued a great challenge to his church. Thus far we have failed to answer that challenge except in a half-hearted, desultory manner. We have been waiting on God. The fact is, God is waiting on us! He is becoming impatient with our slothfulness and indolence and half-heartedness and lack of faith. He is seriously considering giving us our time and putting other men to work. He will do this if we persist. We must work or lose our birthright. God is never behind. He is always on time. He leads. We should follow. The time of God's waiting is about up. We must keep step with him or be left behind.

Nothing Counts but Service

Nothing counts with God but service. Prayer, going to church, devotional religion may serve as aids in helping us to discard the things which hinder essential religious service. They may serve to discipline and equip us for a larger ministry. But at best these are only means to an end. A devotional religion which does not react in men's lives is a delusion and a snare. Prayer, if not backed up by real works, is an affront to God. Going to church is mocking when pursued as an end. If going to church does not quicken the impulse to win the world to Jesus Christ, it is abortive. If going to church does not arouse an altruistic purpose to minister to others it is a deterrent, rather than an aid to Christian purpose. If going to church does not stimulate a desire to carry the gospel message to others, it fails of its highest purpose. If our devotional and religious work does not lead us to consecrate our life and substance to advance the kingdom of truth in the world, then there is no abiding benefit in the going.

Going to Church as a Habit, Is a Bad Habit

Going to church from a sense of duty is like being true to one's husband or wife because the law enjoins it. Going to church as a habit is a bad habit. Devotional religion with no altruistic purpose fosters selfishness and precludes God. A religious enthusiasm which stops at self-exaltation is suicidal to real spiritual life. It is true that religion does equip us with heavenly gifts. It does not stop there. It impels a sharing of those gifts with others. The gifts of God are not given to be retained, but to be passed on. A true disciple of Jesus Christ is a bearer and not a retainer of blessing.

Men and Women Needed

We need hundreds, aye thousands, of men and women with this larger vision of Christian ministry to carry the gospel message to the nations of the earth. We need crusaders for Christ. We need men and women who can duplicate, aye surpass, the crusaders of past dispensations. Within fifty or at most a hundred years from now the church of Jesus Christ should be represented in every part of the habitable globe. Where our church membership is now limited to thousands it should register millions on the side of God and truth. The time has come to throw off the swaddling clothes of our infancy and to remove the provincial restrictions to church expansion. From henceforth it behooves us to think of this work as universal, and our ministry as the most important thing in the world.

Zion, a Religious Cantonment

Graceland College, the great disciplinary center of missionary tuition and preparation! Zion, the strategic spiritual cantonment for gospel evangelization! Zion, the busy headquarters for training and disciplining young men and young women to become crusaders to do battle with sin and entrenched wrong, and to carry the banner of Jesus Christ to the ends of the earth! What greater vision than this? Oh, that the whole church might catch the spirit of this new evangel—an evangel of expansion, not contraction—an evangel of commingling, not isolation—an evangel of moving out, not closing in—an evangel for the universal reign of Christ—an evangel to make the whole world safe for God, for Christ, and for humanity!

The oncoming years should witness an ever-increasing army of young men and young women thoroughly trained and disciplined to engage in this crusade. We will need missionaries, and doctors, and nurses, and engineers, and builders, and teachers, and social workers to care for the interests of the kingdom in its widening activities and expansion into new fields.

Clarion Call to Parents

Mothers and fathers of the church! What is your attitude towards the greatest question of the age? Are you glorifying the Christian ministry before your children? Are you leading them to realize that no greater honor can come to any human being than to be a bearer of the King's message? Are you working and praying that your boy and your girl will offer their service to Jesus Christ? Let me ask you to look into your own heart and answer back to God whether you would prefer to have your daughter giving her life and effort in the mission fields of the church, or that her life be surfeited in the lap of luxury? Would you prefer to see your son unstintingly devoting his talents and efforts to bring the heathen to a knowledge of the truth, or would you prefer to see him achieve opulence and temporal prosperity at a sacrifice to his spiritual life?

Glorify the Christian Ministry

Is it possible that the ministry of Christ is at a discount? Are the mothers and fathers of the church more concerned with the temporal than with the spiritual success of their children? Answer me, fathers and mothers! Would you rejoice to have your children crusaders for Christ?

Then let us glorify the Christian ministry. Let us revive the ancient patriotism for the colors of our King. Let us express commensurate chivalry for the heroes of the cross. Let us inspire within the minds and hearts of our young men and women a glorifying reverence for the uniform of the army of the Lord.

You were proud of your boy when, having served his country faithfully and with credit to himself, he came marching home again. How much greater your joy should be in knowing that your son is serving under the banner of the great King of all the earth!

The Call of God

The call of God comes to those who fit themselves to receive it. It behooves the parents of the church to stimulate among their children the desire to give themselves to the service of the church. Latter Day Saint parents should feel that they have missed something when they have not given one or more members of the family as crusaders for Christ.

During the late war it was considered a disgrace for an able-bodied young man to claim exemption or to evade the draft. A nation's plaudit went to those who enlisted for service overseas. To be enrolled even as a private in the cause of democracy was considered a signal honor. Evaders of the draft will carry with them throughout life the brand of cowardice. How much more must this apply in the larger and more important work of moral spiritual expansion! Every young man and young woman must answer to his own conscience, to his fellows, to Jesus Christ the Commander of our hosts, for the way in which he treats this call to service.

God Is Waiting on Us

Let me once again emphasize this thought—God is waiting on us. Our progress and advancement depend on our effort. We can move rapidly or slowly as we decide. We can speed up our efforts. We can drop out of the procession. We can enlist other workers. We can revive the old-time missionary spirit of the church. We can win our boys and girls to honor the Christian ministry. We can use our influence to have them consecrate their lives to this work. Oh, if the parents of this church would set to with wholesome consecration, a new day would dawn for the church!

May our young men and young women become enamored with a desire to serve. May the fathers and mothers be moved to impress youth with its opportunities. May God's Spirit awaken in our hearts a passion for souls and a purpose to do our part in this the twentieth century crusade for Jesus Christ.

Seek Means to Bring Them In

BY EDWARD J. GLEAZER

The missionary work of the church is not confined to the priesthood.

"And it came to pass on a certain day, as he was teaching, that there were Pharisees and doctors of the law sitting by, which were come out of every town of Galilee, and Judea, and Jerusalem: and the power of the Lord was present to heal them. And, behold, men brought in a bed a man which was taken with a palsy: and they sought means to bring him in, and to lay him before him. And when they could not find by what way they might bring him in, because of the multitude, they went upon the housetop, and let him down through the tiling with his couch into the midst before Jesus. And when he saw their faith, he said unto him, Man, thy sins are forgiven thee. And the scribes and the Pharisees began to reason, saying, Who is this that speaketh blasphemies? Who can forgive sins, but God alone? But when Jesus perceived their thoughts, he answering said unto them, What reason ye in your hearts? Whether is it easier, to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Rise up and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of Man has power upon earth to forgive sins, (he said unto the sick of the palsy) I say unto thee, Arise, and take up thy couch, and go into thine house. And immediately he rose up before them, and took up that whereon he lay, and departed to his own house, glorifying God."—Luke 5: 17-25.

I am glad that the historian has recorded this wonderful incident in the life of our blessed Master, not simply for the fact itself but for the wonderful lesson we can learn from it. We do not know whether or not these four men were baptized believers. Little is said concerning them, but I want you to notice the interest they had in their afflicted friend and the faith they manifested in Christ as the Mighty Healer. They knew that Jesus was in the neighborhood and decided to carry the sick of the palsy to him that he might be healed. When they arrived at the home where Jesus was teaching they could not get in because of the multitude.

So they sought means to bring their friend in. They raised him up to the roof and removed the tiling. Slowly they lowered the afflicted man upon his couch into the presence of Jesus. The record states that Jesus seeing their faith, (manifested in the efforts they had put forth) said unto the sick of the palsy, "Man, thy sins are forgiven thee." The scribes and the Pharisees found fault with this statement, and Jesus, realizing the thoughts of their hearts, said unto the sick of the palsy, "Arise, and take up thy couch, and go into thine house. And immediately he rose up before them, and took up that whereon he lay, and departed to his own house, glorifying God."

There were certain conditions necessary in order that this afflicted man might be healed. It was necessary for some one to bring him to Christ; because of his condition he could not go himself. He may not have known anything about Christ or that such a one was in his neighborhood. What a blessing to him that four men knew that Jesus the mighty healer was in town and that they were interested enough in him to carry him to the house where Jesus was teaching. Notice again nothing is said concerning the faith of the sick one, but Jesus, seeing the faith of those who brought him said to the sick of the palsy, "Thy sins are forgiven thee. Arise and walk." You will note that there were obstacles to overcome, difficulties to surmount before they were able to bring their friend into the presence of Jesus. The spirit of cooperation was also necessary. It was a difficult task for four men, but should they have disagreed over the means of getting him there and one have turned back it would have been more difficult for three. Then if another had lost faith or became weary think of the task that two men would be confronted with. And what if one of the two refused to go any farther for some cause or other, what would have happened? It is doubtful whether or not this poor, needy soul would ever have reached the presence of Jesus. Truly these four men working together made it possible for this man to be healed.

The great mission of this church is to bring people to Christ. The commission of the Master, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature," is still in force to-day. "He that is warned let him warn his neighbor," is the advice of God to us in this age. The world is full of sin-cursed and afflicted souls, who because of their condition cannot come into the presence of the Mighty Healer. They know little concerning him or his power to save. They cannot see the kingdom. Men of faith are needed to bring them to the Christ. Men who have come in contact with Christ and know of the gospel and its power to save. Men who will work together in the spirit of humility. Men who have such an interest in the welfare of humanity that they will be willing to overcome every obstacle and surmount every difficulty in order to bring souls to God. As a servant of God and as a member of the missionary quorum I am intensely interested in this work and a believer in every legitimate means to bring people to Christ.

Seeking means to bring souls into the presence of Jesus is not confined to those who hold the priesthood. We do not know whether any of these men who brought the sick of the palsy to Christ held the priesthood. It is the duty of every Saint to seek means to bring people to Christ. Doctrine and Covenants 119:8 reads:

"Prosecute the missionary work in this land and abroad so far and so widely as you may. All are called according to the gifts of God unto them; and to the intent that all may labor together, let him that laboreth in the ministry and him that toileth in the affairs of the men of business and of work labor together with God for the accomplishment of the work intrusted to all."

No one is excluded, according to the word of the Lord. All are called to bring souls to a knowledge of the gospel.

Prayer is not the only means of bringing people to Christ. All are not called to preach or administer in the gospel ordinances, yet we have a part in this work. Some one must make it possible for the servants of God by paying tithing to reach the people. You can assist in bringing people to Christ by making it possible for those whom God has called to devote their time and talent to that work. You may make it possible for your sin-sick friend to find Jesus by inviting him to the services. If we will permit the gospel to have its place in our lives, this will be the means of bringing many to Christ. Jesus said to his followers many years ago, "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your father which is in heaven! As missionaries we experience little difficulty in getting a hearing in a community where Saints live their religion. It is not my intention to discuss the means whereby we might bring people into the church. I want to impress you with the thought that it is your mission in life as well as the mission of the ministry to take advantage of every opportunity to bring sin-sick humanity to a knowledge of Christ. I see no other reason for our existence in the flesh. Jesus had this thought in mind when he said, "Seek ye first to build up the kingdom of God, and to establish his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." (Matthew 6:33, I. T.)

We are about to put into practice the doctrine of stewardships. This will be an effectual means of bringing people to Christ. The world will see in a few years a practical demonstration of the gospel. The righteousness of Zion will in time attract the nations of the earth, for the Prophet Micah states that many nations will say, "Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob." They will be attracted there because of the equality and the peaceful conditions of God's kingdom.

Saints, let us arise and take advantage of every opportunity to bring relief to a sin-sick world. We have come in contact with the Mighty Healer; surely we are interested in bringing others to him that they might be healed. If we have truly received the spirit of this latter-day work we will not be content unless we are seeking means to bring others to a knowledge of the truth. Remember, all are called and we must labor together. The spirit of humility and cooperation is necessary. Surely we have no desire to prolong this day of suffering. The Mighty Healer can be reached to-day. His arms are outstretched to a sin-sick world. Obstacles and difficulties are in our pathway but let us labor to bring the afflicted in spirit to his blessed feet.

Sister Nettie E. Patter, of Wellsville, New York, writes that they have been enjoying a few meetings held in homes of the community. Some are reading the Book of Mormon and interested. She is an isolated young Saint who would like to correspond with other young people of the church.

The Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor has issued a pamphlet entitled "The child welfare special," describing the work of a motorized child welfare station that was put into the field last summer to tell mothers of children in rural districts all the things mothers of city children learn at the city child health centers. This "special" visited five rural counties and found that rural children are subject to the same troubles as those in cities and towns, bad teeth and poorly developed bones being the most prevalent. But there was considerable malnutrition from ill-chosen foods and unsuitable hours for meals. The pamphlet is of value and is sent on request to anyone addressing the department at Washington.

BY A. B. PHILLIPS

The marvelous skill of American aboriginal artificers was not confined to spinning and weaving the fabrics which, we have learned, they produced in such perfection and variety, but they also excelled in the art of dyeing with almost equal facility, it appears. Americana informs us that "they [Peruvians] made most excellent thread and dyed it so honestly that to-day much fabric a thousand or more years old has not lost its brilliancy of color."—Article "Archæology." Mr. Holmes remarks that "dyes of numerous rich and brilliant colors were used, but their nature is not known to us."—Page 7. The natives of Georgia in De Soto's time are said to have made white clothing from the product of mulberry trees, and yet it is quite evident that in remote times their textile industry vastly excelled that of later days.

The Sciences in Ancient America

That various sciences were known among these people of long ago, as is indicated by the Book of Mormon, was thought to be an absurdity at the time the book was first published, and seemed to provoke considerable amusement on the part of those who held it to be a huge joke. The items that once excited their risibilities do so no more. We have already begun to learn why.

Something has been said of Book of Mormon chronology, which is quite accurately presented in the Nephite history. Nothing anywhere in the world has been discovered that excels the accuracy of the astronomical time which these people evidently employed. The Mexican Calendar Stone reveals a chronological system made up of eighteen months of twenty days each, and five additional days to complete the year. The years were so devised that they formed cycles of fifty-two years, at the end of which were provided thirty additional days. Their system was thus as accurate as our modern chronological system, closely resembling the Egyptian year. Each month was also divided into four sections or weeks, and the days were composed of specific periods somewhat as our day contains its hours. One writer states that one of their books was devoted to their system of time.

Each division of time had its name or sign, and the whole calendar system was well distributed among the people, it appears. Baldwin informs us that small calendars of gold and of silver came into the hands of the early Spaniards, who converted them into coin. The design of this remarkable calendar must be seen and studied fully to be appreciated.

These ancients not only were so learned that they could devise the most wonderful system of time in use anywhere in the world, but Mr. Spinden tells us in the American Anthropologist that "it is well known that the Mayan and Nahuan tribes were able to determine with great exactness the length of the year, and to calculate the synodical revolutions of the moon, Venus, and other planets."—Vol. 18, No. 1, p. 57. That astronomy and other sciences were taught in Mexico is affirmed by no less an authority than Bancroft. He says: "There were higher schools or colleges for sons of nobles and those destined for the priesthood, wherein were taught history, religion, philosophy, law, astronomy, writing and interpreting hieroglyphics, singing, dancing, use of arms, gymnastics, and many arts and sciences."—Essays and Miscellany, p. 36. Such an educational system as is here indicated could be attained only by a well-regulated, long-established government controlled by people of no inferior intelligence.

That these people of antiquity were remarkably proficient in medical skill is perhaps one of the most convincing evidences of the high order of their scientific skill that could be required. Yet the Book of Mormon not only so informs us, but the statement has been amply verified. The book tells us that plants and roots were used in the treatment of fevers and diseases to which they were subject by reason of the climate, so that not so many appear to have died from diseases as from old age.

The people were therefore a strong, virile, and healthy race as a rule, and this fact is indicated by Doctor Alex Hrdlicka in his Anthropological work in Peru in 1913, Smithsonian miscellaneous collections, volume 67, number 18, in which he says of research around Lupo:

"Also they were a people remarkably free from such constitutional diseases as would leave marks on the bones, for pathological specimens among the latter were very scarce. Injuries of the various parts of the skeleton were also rare, but on the other hand wounds of the skull were common. These wounds were evidently due in a large majority of the cases to sling shots and clubs, and often when the injury was not immediately fatal the subject would be operated on by trepanation."—Page 9.

These wonderful surgeons of prehistoric Peru performed successfully one of the most dangerous operations known to the modern profession. Of this the New International Cyclopedia, of 1914, says: "Large numbers of crania taken from the burial places of Peru bear testimony to the fact that the critical operation of trephining was practiced more frequently even than in a modern military hospital, and with a degree of success hardly exceeded by that of the best modern surgery."—Page 40. Nearly a hundred human skulls that had been trephined by the ancient Peruvians were exhibited at the Pan-American Exposition, "the condition of most of the skulls showing that the patient recovered and survived for years." (Youth's Companion, May 16, 1901.)

The Evidence of Hierology

The Book of Mormon is distinguished from writings of a secular class. It comes to us as a sacred history written by the ancient priesthood of the American Continent, and was therefore to at least some extent produced under divine direction. This anticipates the question: Was there a priesthood among the American nations, and if so were they historians? The answer to this query will give rise to further inquiry as we proceed. Perhaps the most complete answer possible is found in the fact that the Books of Chilan Balam, as explained by Daniel G. Brinton, are prophetic as well as historic records of the Mayas copied, it is thought, from more ancient manuscripts largely. The term "Chilan Balam" is a title that was held by the priests, and Doctor Brinton tells us that "prophecies of a very striking nature are attributed to ancient priests of a date long prior to the Christian era." The chronicles of the prophetic and historical portions of these books reach back to the third century A. D.

The priesthood, then, was of long establishment. That it was well organized also is fully shown in the Book of Mormon. This fact is supported by Mr. Le Plongeon in his Sacred Mysteries among the Mayas and Quiches, where he tells us that under the auspices of the Smithsonian Institution Mr. Cushing discovered "the existence of twelve sacred orders, with their priests, their initiations, their sacred rites, as carefully guarded as the secrets of the ancient sacred mysteries to which they bear great resemblance."—Page 48. Other authorities quite fully bear out this fact. Donnelly, in his Atlantis, tells us: "The priesthood was thoroughly organized in Mexico and Peru. They were prophets as well as priests."—Page 159. Doctor Brinton remarks that "a more perfect method of writing prevailed among the Mayas of Yucatan and Central America." Of this he says: "It was a hieroglyphic system, known only to the priests and a few nobles."—Page 18. According to Peschel it was the work of the priests of the Arawaks, who lived north of the Amazon, to preserve the history of the tribes that the young might be instructed.

Having presented a few of the many proofs available that a well-established priesthood existed in America ages ago, who recorded historical matters by means of hieroglyphical writing, we shall now proceed to determine other facts connected with the subject, some of which are of great significance. We have refrained from presenting lengthy quotations, so far as possible, and many more could have been given on practically every point, but the high authority of those submitted makes this superfluous.

One of our members recently in Michigan says the developments within the past few weeks in Michigan on the part of the farmers has really been remarkable. They have in large numbers become affiliated with the state organization of the Nonpartisan League and are holding their wool and grain by a pooling of their interests and claim they will do so till there is either a higher standard of prices for wool or a reduction in clothing prices.

The Trenton (Missouri) Republican cites the example of J. D. Proffit, president of the branch at that place, in demonstrating intensified gardening, as worthy of emulation. He has a plot of ground 20 by 50 feet in size and not only grows almost every edible vegetable but many varieties of flowers as well. And near the garden is a grape arbor which produces abundantly, while they also have a small-scale chicken yard, all of which contribute to the well-being of the family as well as materially help in cutting the high cost of living. Brother Proffit is in the real estate business at that place and is giving a fine demonstration of what Missouri land will do.

An interesting advertisement has been appearing in the Jerusalem News, for the Jerusalem Laundry, in which the statement is made that "prices have been fixed at a minimum, the equipment and accommodation having been provided by public generosity and by the administration; only the smallest margin of profit on actual current expenses is aimed at."

STATUS OF THE AMERICAN INDIANS

[The following data is taken from the Hearings Before the Committee on Indian Affairs, Serial Number 1, and is from the record of their hearing on Tuesday, September 23. The statements are those of Mr. Cato Sells, the Indian Commissioner, as he was the only witness that day. The statements are as follows]:

Formerly, approximately 350,000 Indians were under the supervision of the Indian Bureau. The number of restricted Indians under the supervision of the Indian Service at this time amounts to 229,000, of which 23,000 are located in the Five Civilized Tribes. There are approximately 150 Indian reservations in the United States, located largely west of the Mississippi River and scattered among 22 States of the Union, 36 of which comprise reservations opened, 14 partly opened, 60 reservations not opened but containing surplus area, and 46 reservations closed, which means that there are no other lands to allot in the last-mentioned class. Outside of the Five Civilized Tribes, there have been about 130,000 allotments made to Indians, the aggregate area of which is 20,000,000 acres. . . .

Under the act of May 27, 1908 (35 Stat. L., 312), the restrictions have been removed from 12,294 tracts by the Secretary of the Interior, the area of which aggregates 858,000 acres. Under that part of the act of May 27, 1908, and other congressional acts removing restrictions on the land of allottees of one half or less Indian blood in the Five Civilized Tribes, the restrictions have been removed from 71,198 Indians, involving an area of 12,252,615 acres. . . .

There is no method of ascertaining the exact number of Indians which came under the supervision of the United States Government when the Constitution was adopted, and it is not accurately known how many were under the charge of the Indian Service in 1832, when the Office of Indian Affairs was a part of the War Department. It is believed that the Indian population in this country for the past century has remained practically the same. A conservative estimate would be about 350,000 Indians when they were placed under charge of the War Department, and while there are about 350,000 Indian population in the country at the present time, as before indicated, only 229,000 of this number are under the direct supervision of the Government. . . .

As fast as you individualize Indians you multiply the work. Every Indian who is released and has his property turned over to him is very apt to want to have some information, want individually to ask for what had theretofore been asked for collectively.

For example, the Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes write more letters and make more inquiries as individuals than the Indians do on the Navaho Reservation. The Sioux Indians are given to that sort of thing. They have more individuality. They do not approach the office so much collectively. We do not get one letter from the Navahos where we will have 50 from the Five Civilized Tribes or 20 from the Sioux, so that the logic is when we ultimately accomplish that distribution by education and industrial progress among the Navahos as among the Sioux and the Five Civilized Tribes, the activities in connection with the Navahos will be correspondingly increased. . . .

It is marvelous the progress the American Indian is making. No race since time began has progressed as rapidly as the American Indian. Our ancestors wore skins on the mountain side of Judea 2,000 years ago. Fifty years ago the average American Indian was a nomad, an aborigine. During that half century the educational opportunities afforded by the Government in bringing about a change in his ideals, giving him individual ownership and individual responsibility and the use of the educational system for which the Indian Bureau is responsible, there has been not an evolution but a revolution. That is one of the most marked indications of progress and achievement and advancement in civilization of which the American people can boast. . . .

MR. SELLS. . . Mr. Snyder's bill and Mr. Carter's bill, giving citizenship to the particular Indian, are along that line. I am in favor of both bills. Every American Indian should be a citizen, but I do not wish to convey the idea that that will release him from wardship.

MR. KELLY. What is the difference?

MR. ELSTON. Guardianship is left of the property but not of the person.

MR. SELLS. That is it, exactly. Every American Indian should be declared a citizen and that is what your two bills contemplate. I am strongly in favor of them and I am strongly in favor of the policy of the Interior Department, the policy of the Secretary, to release every man from guardianship just as fast as we can decide he is competent to take care of his own affairs. . . .

I want this record to contain the statement from me that among the most noble characters that I have ever met—and some of them as intelligent men as I care to meet, men who have the highest ideals of devotion to duty, patriotism, love of family, and industry, if you please—have been men every drop of whose blood was Indian. . . .

That would be good business sense. However, I would anticipate if we should declare part of a certain tribe competent and turn him over his lands and divide up his share, give him his share of the tribal funds, then he might have an interest, say, in the tribal herd. Give him his share of it. There might be pastoral land that he still has some interest in. The only way we could do that would be to appraise it and arrive at what the proper distributive share would be and either by a reimbursable fund or some means advance the money. It would be a gratifying thing to me if that could be done in every instance. . . .

MR. HAYDEN. . . Is there any reason why, if the Navahos become an educated people, competent to do business, that their range conditions could not be handled in the same manner as by white people in a forest reserve? On the forest reserves the title to the land remains in the United States. Grazing permits are given to various citizens to run their stock in the national forests.

In the case of the Navaho Reservation the title to the whole reservation would be in the tribe, and individual Indians would have permission to run their stock on the reserve and in the same manner as a white man does upon the forest. It would never be necessary to allot the tribe and yet you could put them in the same status as white men.

MR. SELLS. There would be complications.

MR. HAYDEN. You don't want to say that the Navaho Indians, forever and ever, all eternity, are not to be classed as other citizens of the United States?

MR. SELLS. No; they should be made citizens; but so far as their property relations are concerned, it is difficult to segregate them. . . .

MR. HASTINGS. . . The difficulty as I have seen it in my experience with the Indian question is that the average member of Congress and citizen of the United States everywhere does not distinguish between Indians. His idea of an Indian is with blankets, paint on his face, and feathers sticking out of his hair. There is as much difference between the thirty or fifty Indian tribes as among the other races of the earth, and some of them are perfectly competent to be turned loose now and able to cope with the white men and white civilization in any place in the United States, whereas there are members of other tribes that have had to be dealt with entirely differently and held longer under supervision of the Government, and general observations you might make would not, I think, be of much benefit to the committee. . . .

MR. ELSTON. Then, you combat the idea that you are exercising a bureaucratic tendency or trying to keep under your control these wards?

MR. SELLS. Yes. I would not only combat that, but advance the theory that our policy is just the opposite. . . .

MR. SELLS. Let me explain a little about the competency commission. The Indians now being declared competent are not confined to them. The Indian Office is all the time declaring Indians competent upon the recommendation of the superintendent and upon facts coming to the office. The idea of appointing commissions was adopted some few years ago to hasten things, cover larger territory, and reach more Indians. More recently we have inaugurated a plan of releasing them in bulk by declaring that Indians with one half white blood are competent if they are physically sound and not mentally deficient. So we do not inquire into specific cases any more than to understand that they are not imbeciles, that they are ordinary useful citizens, and if they have the blood of which I speak they are released. . . . The department has, of its own initiative, extended its administration to none of them without an appropriation by Congress. . . . And to my very great pleasure we find that the race prejudice that once existed in the schools is fast being eliminated. There was a time when white families and white children didn't care to encourage Indians to come into the schools. That is rapidly being done away with. It has been our policy to take the Indian children out of Indian schools and put them in white schools as rapidly as possible. There are possibly 30,000 Indians in the white schools of the United States. Pretty nearly one half of the Indian school children in the United States to-day are inside of Indian schools and they are going out just as fast as we can properly get them out. . . .

I suppose that I come in contact with more Indian tribes in America than any other individual. I have made it a practice of going to the Indian instead of having him come to me. I go out 100 miles from the railroad, for instance, among the Apaches, or among the San Carlos Indians, where they are all full bloods, where they are entirely away from civilization, where I won't see a white man for from a week to three weeks. I go into their teepees, and all sorts of life, in their various activities. I am inclined to the opinion that, while a tendency did exist and does exist to some extent yet, that a very large percentage now of the Indian boys and girls who go out of schools wear citizen clothes, short hair, and conduct themselves in most respects as the white men do outside of reservations. . . .

MR. SINCLAIR. Are you able to get men who will themselves to these conditions at the salaries you are able to pay them?

MR. SELLS. Not always, Mr. Congressman. We have some very splendid superintendents. We have some that are not so strong. We have some that it seems possibly we could get along without. Of course we have to confront all the time the civil service. We can't walk up to a man and say "Good-by." But we have to have a reason for it.

He who hurts others injures himself; he who helps others advances his own interests.—Buddha.

Question of Electing a Presiding Priest, Teacher, and Deacon

Important information on a subject of current interest.

A great many questions come to the office of the Presidency asking as to the propriety of continuing to elect presiding priest, teacher, and deacon in the official forces of a branch. One of these questions elicited from the Presidency the following answer, with it being associated the question of electing assistant presidents or counselors in the branch presidency:

"You will remember that at the General Conference some years ago (1917) we repealed the provision in the Book of Rules providing for the election of a presiding priest, teacher, and deacon. Since there never was any provision in the Doctrine and Covenants for such officers there remains no authority for their election, though the practice continues in some places. The whole matter of rules to govern the election of branch officers was referred to the committee to which had previously been referred the work of rearranging the Book of Rules. In the meantime the Presidency has advised that the local branch elect a branch president, and that all local officers of the Aaronic priesthood who are in good standing and available for work shall be utilized under his direction. This brings them in immediate contact with the presiding officer rather than placing them under some department head elected by the branch who may or may not be in sympathy with the branch president. There is no objection to the branch sustaining the various grades of priesthood at their regular election in some such way as is done at the General Conference.

"We see no reason why in large branches a presidency of three should not be elected. One of these, however, should be the president and the other two elders should be regarded as counselors or assistants, and not necessarily as presidents having equal authority with the head or chief. In the smaller branches such an arrangement would be quite unnecessary. The branch president ought in all instances when he is to be absent from the branch, to arrange for one of his associates or some other of the official forces to take charge, so that confusion will not arise over the right to take the lead.

"Other elders resident in the branch who perform branch work come under the jurisdiction of the branch president and should labor under his direction. If they are performing district work they would come under the direction of the district president. If engaged in purely missionary work they should be directed by the authorities who may be in charge of groups of missionaries, or whoever may be engaged in directing missionary work in the given locality.

"In some of the larger branches in this country the Saints are divided into groups, and elders are placed over these groups as group superintendents, or you might call them under-shepherds, or pastors, to look after the interests of the families assigned to them. Each group has also a priest, teacher, and deacon. In that way the services of men who might be otherwise idle can be utilized to excellent advantage."—One, May, 1920.

Because of difficulty in securing coal for State institutions, Indiana is considering the purchase of a coal mine and cars to supply them. It is estimated that the State can mine coal for itself for $1.75 a ton, while if the same coal were bought in the open market it would cost $5 to $6 per ton.

Trust

BY RALPH WARREN FARREL

'Twill not be long, faint heart,
Bear on!
The goal's in view, and 'tis
For me and you.
Press on!

But, brother dear, I see
And hear
Gray waves that leap and splash
So near, so deep—
I fear.

You must not fear, for see,
So clear,
The arm divine of Him
Is near. 'Tis thine.
Why fear?

Spiritual Growth

BY PHILEMON PEMENT

What effect on my life has the Word of the Lord
Had to mold me and change me like him?
Can I see any place I'm transformed by his grace,
And his Spirit, that's dwelling within?

Has my mind been enlightened that plainly I see
My Lord in his beauty and power?
Is his infinite Love richly shed upon me,
To mold me like him every hour?

Have I learned the great lesson he taught here on earth,
And truly denied myself here?
Have I walked with my Lord tho' the path has been rough,
Sustained by his Spirit of comfort and cheer?

Has the cross been too heavy I'm required to bear,
Or with sorrow o'erwhelmed as a flood?
In Gethsemane's cup have I mingled my tears
And striven 'gainst sin unto blood?

Nay. In all of my trials his presence is near,
And the voice of his Spirit would guide and control,
And I yield to its pleadings of Love, not of fear,
While this balm of fair Gilead restoreth my soul.

He has promised a way of escape shall be made
In any temptation which falls to my lot,
And if I would be true and ne'er be afraid,
For one moment by him I'd ne'er be forgot.

O Lord! In the web of my life which I weave,
As day after day I toil at the task,
May its warp be thy word which cannot deceive,
And its woof be thy love is all that I ask.

And then clothed upon with such "linen" as this,
Pure and white in thy presence I want to appear,
Transporting, exulting, inspiring bliss,
May I live, work, and die in such atmosphere.

THE FORUM

Using the Truth to Make Error Plausible

This writer is exercised over the apparent inroads of destructive ideals among us.

How distressingly often do we find in literature, whether it be "high-class" or on down to the "yellow" brand, such examples of God-defying nonsense as this—

"Too many people confess without shame that they 'can't use their hands.'

"Do they know or care, I wonder, that the only reason why a brain worker has a brain is because his ancestor, that blue-faced, grimacing, arboreal apparition, had a hand—a small, black, sinuous hand—with an opposable thumb? It picked things up and gazed intently at them in its shifty, nervous way—dropped them, picked them up, took apart, and then put it together again. Got a stick and dug a hole with it; tied the stone to the stick, and was electrified by the results. And so, painfully, agonizingly, while geologic ages crept by—under the same sun, moon, and stars that light us on our own confident way, these hands of our poor ancestors built your nest and mine, O complacent one! And will you then forget this? Is there any point of honor involved in this matter of hand work?"

"Whether there is or no, you are involved. You cannot longer neglect the sources of sanity and strength; and these are not in brains, but in brains plus hands. And out of brains and hands combined comes that spiritual thing which alone irrigates the life of men—the thing which, after thirty years as a carpenter's son and carpenter, produced a man capable of stooping to the earth before the Magdalen, and asking that most penetrating question of the brain workers standing there with their stones; and in his profound oriental way, telling those immortal stories of the good Samaritan and the prodigal son. Will you trace that genealogy back to the black hand of the ape and then not reverence that hand and all hands?"—The Atlantic Monthly, June, 1920.

And such sacrilegious concoctions as this are dished up daily for our intellectual palates, and to get the food accompanying we must either strain them through our teeth or swallow them whole. The latter alternative we refuse, and we hereby register our protest against any sympathetic consideration of the ideas involved.

Our schoolbooks to-day are literally saturated with all manner of delusionary theories, based on some man's discovery of something and his conclusions thereupon. These vagaries do everything but give God the credit for creating man in his own image and providing a means for his salvation.

There are many phases of this evolutionary theory about the origin of life. If one cares to delve into the German and the French literature as well as that written in English, he may find some seven distinct theories, with their innumerable variations and combinations.

But we urge that unless one is willing to do this, as few people can and will, it is a dangerous thing to dabble in the subject and then color our whole set of conclusions with the unrepresentative smattering we may get.

No one whose heart has been touched with fire from the holy altar of God will deny the value of wide cultural knowledge, but—

"A little learning is a dangerous thing;
Drink deep or taste not the Pierian spring:
There shallow draughts intoxicate the brain,
And drinking largely sobers us again."

Yet since few of us can devote the necessary valuable years to sounding the depths of these atheistic and faith-destroying speculations, why should anyone everlastingly cloud our theological atmosphere by bringing in mystifying allusions and manifesting a condoning attitude toward them?

Do any of our learned religious preceptors want us to infer that they believe these man-made "explanations" of the origin of life, etc? Or do they want us merely to be impressed with the fact that they have read somewhat on these subjects? If the former, they deny the very God they claim to worship, and if the latter, it is but a cheap exhibition, unworthy the calling of teacher or minister. There are many subjects of greater moment requiring our attention.

"But we believe in evolution, properly understood," we are assured over and over. If that means progressive development of the soul, why not say so, frankly, and avoid this perpetual obeisance at the thrones of men whose whole lives have been enlisted in a cause which directly seeks to discredit God?

Culture does demand that we explore many a field, and we must have culture, but it is not required of us to indiscriminately drink at every pool nor taste of every fruit we discover in our travels.

Then there is the higher criticism of the Bible. What do we care what a lot of atheistic Germans wrote against Holy Writ and all it involves, except to refute their arguments? Simply because there are thousands of voluminous tomes written to discredit the authenticity of the Bible, must we believe that the Old Testament is but a collection of folklore and the New Testament largely apocryphal?

Because in our study of religions we find there are so-called primitive types, must we suppose that they are autochthonous, invariably proceeding from the simplest forms to the complex? Is it unethical to accept without equivocation the simple Biblical account of the origin of man, the establishment of the gospel plan (per Inspired Version of the Bible), the gradual perversion of that religion, with a survival of many of the original ideas?

Or, is it old-fashioned nowadays to think of prayer as a simple, natural process for normal man rather than a problem in mechanical psychology that must be reduced to equations and solved thereby.

Culture may grow lopsided and top-heavy, only to fall and drag down the highest and holiest impulses of man. The sciences all have a legitimate place, but too often they become the cuckoo's egg, laid in the young mind as a nest, becoming a fledgling which throws out the rightful occupants to die, and takes unlawful possession.

Education surely does not mean the young-robin method of acquiring indiscriminate knowledge and an unquestioning acceptance of all that learned men have written. We prefer to think it should be regarded as a careful consideration of facts and problems and methods with an increasing discrimination and judgment. Our students, young and old, are compelled to wade through volumes which contain some good and much poison, but we object to an attitude of commiseration and sympathy with manifest error, whether it be in the pulpit, the teacher's desk, or in private. We plead for a stancher adherence to the accepted wholesome principles of our religion—an adherence which will make us a "peculiar people" indeed, but giants in spiritual and intellectual (we separate the terms merely because of usage) strength. By which we mean an intelligence bulwarked by eternal verities so impregnable that they will veritably emanate strength and assurance rather than invariably arouse latent doubts.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Church Problems Requiring the Help of the Women

(Address of President Frederick M. Smith before the women's meeting, during General Conference, April 12, 1920. Mrs. A. Morgan, reporter.)

I remember a little incident that happened some years ago, at Holden, Missouri, when in the course of a program rendered there, where several of our men spoke, Sister Young [whose address preceded President Smith's.—EDITOR], in the goodness of her heart, and considering the welfare of the church, made an earnest and appropriate but perhaps an unwise plea for the ministers of the church to use better English; and she has been in disgrace ever since. On the same program I as a young speaker made so earnest a plea for social reform that I was dubbed a socialist. So we have been fellows in misery, although not on the same platform, since, and I will venture the guess that it has done her heart good to see the progress made in this conference in English, as well as other things, and it surely has done my heart good to see how recommendation after recommendation of the so-called "socialist" was adopted at this conference, without even a shadow of complaint; so perhaps we are growing.

Yes, we are growing. These transitions it is necessary for us to make show we are growing, and to-night the Women's Department has come to one of these transitional periods that will necessitate the women of the church rousing themselves to what is before them. Can you catch a vision of the work that lies before the church, and fail to have an appreciation of what part the women should play? I am delighted to-night to see these representative school-teachers give to us some vision of what the work of the women of this church must be in order for them to make their contribution to the development of the church and the establishment of Zion.

The Women's Department, let me repeat, standing thus at the threshold of a transition, has been compelled to make a rather bold change in its organization. It is to-night under the direction of a director-general who has assumed the responsibility, through the spirit of consecration that she has placed in the work, realizing the issues of the task. Sister Smith, my good companion, has assumed to direct, take the helm of this good ship, the Women's Department, and let us hope it will find smooth sailing and eventually a safe harbor.

I present this statement to you simply that it may afford me an opportunity to say this (and I know she would ask me to voice this sentiment if she had spoken to me about it) that if her work is to bring about the results of coordinating the activities, she must have behind her the energy and spirit of every Latter Day Saint woman who appreciates what the women's work means to the church; and I may give you at least a few things on which to hang some thoughts in regard to what this work is.

I want to speak to you briefly about some of the problems that confront us in the church, in which we must have the cooperation of our women. Our sister made a plea for equal opportunity for women; our church has been standing for advancement along that line. We are glad to see a growing recognition on the part of the church that the contribution that can be made to the welfare of the church, as well as humanity, by the women is fully as great and important as that which can be made by the men.

A Spiritual and Health Worker for Each Group

You will remember that in the course of our talks before conference, we have had occasion to speak about the reorganization of the Independence Stake, the center place, as we can well call it now.

We spoke of the evolution, and we wish to say now that Independence has been divided into groups, each group having a corps of officers over it, elder, priest, teacher, and deacon, no group to be so large but that the presiding elder, priest, teacher, and deacon of that group can know intimately every member of that group, that they may be alert to the spiritual conditions in the group, constantly stimulating that group to better conditions and to a higher development spiritually and in every other direction; but I have been convinced that there must be two other workers added to each group, and it is up to the women to furnish those two workers for every group: a social worker, or let us call it, a friendly visitor, to visit in the interests of better conditions in the home, to do it in a friendly way. The department should have trained workers who can give the help needed, the encouragement or strength where necessary.

This requires a woman alert to the spiritual, intellectual, and general social conditions of the group, whose heart and soul is devoted to the interests of the people, and who is determined to lift them up.

Added to that social worker or friendly visitor will be the one along a line of activity which runs closely parallel with it, and that is a health worker. Nurse, you may call her, but one who does not wait until conditions have brought disease so that she can minister to the afflicted one and there show her training, but because of her alertness and her knowledge of general conditions she can act as guardian angel to keep disease away from people who are in her group or care and protection; and these workers coordinating their work with the general movements of the church, especially the general health movement, will result in a living up to better conditions in every group. You can see the ideal and see the number of trained and educated workers yet to be produced; and that is one of the problems of the Women's Department today.

An Important Part in Our Educational Program

Beside this there is the great problem of education that one of our speakers so excellently pointed out to-day. We have called for education, we have made a plea, and make it in even more emphasized form to-day, for let me say this, if every man and woman in the church to-day was a degreed man and woman, we would still have to go on with our education, and will always have to go on, just so long as we remain human because the fields that are to be conquered, new realms to be unfolded, and amount of knowledge to be gained are so immense as compared to what has been accomplished. There is no end to it, so far as educational activities are concerned. So if you think I am going to quit calling for education, get rid of that idea, because I am going to keep right at it. The only thing that will relieve me is that so many of you will catch the cry that I will not have to waste any more words on it.

I noted the rather keen sarcasm with which our sister spoke of the Smith-Towner bill. It is perhaps one of the most significant pieces of legislature presented in the last few years. H. M. Towner is the man who is responsible for the bill in the House—Judge Towner of the Eighth Congressional District of Iowa, known to many of you—Senator Smith is sponsor for it in the Senate. At first I thought there was perhaps a little chance for it, but last month I met a congressman from Massachusetts and said to him, "You are on the educational committee; what are the prospects for the Smith-Towner bill?" He said, "Not the slightest in the world. Too much politics!" So it is dead. So we will not have our secretary of education yet. They still make large appropriations for the secretary of war and the navy, and a few others who have been spending large sums of money.

And yet I do not know but what we have something more to congratulate ourselves on. Our sister told us this country is forty thousand school-teachers short because the school-teachers cannot remain in the schoolroom and maintain a decent standard of living through the returns from their profession. Many a consecrated school-teacher has been compelled to seek other employment unless she has been fortunate enough to have a bank account to draw on. Yet such a thing as a large percentage of people leaving the vocation of teaching is an impossibility under the stewardship plan, because then people will be teaching because they love it.

It will become a joy and not a drag, and you will not find teachers leaving the schoolroom in order to go into stores as clerks and other things, because they will have what they need, on the same basis as the rest of society, and their full contribution to the welfare of society will be made possible. Follow this out. You will find this another pleasing thing to contemplate in connection with the general subject of stewardships.

By the way, right here I want to mention educational work as part of the work of the council I spoke of in conference. I expect to see at work an educational commission to study not only present conditions of school work in Zion, Independence, in the stakes around, but we shall hope that because of their application to the subject, keen knowledge of the general problems of education, they will be enabled to anticipate what are likely to be our educational needs for years to come, and hence make plans, or we can, as the result of their report (even though we have to look several years down the vista of time) which will involve the location of colleges and universities here, Lamoni, Holden, and other places, where our people will gather in large numbers. Can you think of such a thing as an educational commission studying the present needs of the church in Independence and neighborhood without having a representative of the Women's Department on it? It is one of the vast problems ahead of us in the Zion condition, to determine this question of education. Let the period of chaos come that seems to be threatening almost every day, and we will be compelled to fall back on our own resources of organized forces of education, to take care of the youth of the church, and I do agree with the sister that "Child welfare" is the slogan the Women's Department of the church can well raise, and never lose sight of, for the youth of to-day is the church of to-morrow, and we must take care of them, for the quality of the church to-morrow will be determined by the quality of the child we produce to-day.

The Housing and Food Problems of Zion

Closely allied with that is another commission that we expect to appoint to make a study of housing conditions. We must understand about housing conditions, in their relation to an ideal condition of society such as we hope and know we will produce in the Zion condition, and can you conceive of a commission appointed by this church, working for this church, studying great and fundamental problems of the housing conditions of the people of the church with the idea that the average shall be constantly and consistently raised—can you conceive of that commission doing this work as it should without the Women's Department being represented on that commission to-day? Hence, before the Women's Department is the task of furnishing members for at least two of the commissions we hope to appoint. We shall expect the women will have a vital interest therein, and see to it that they may keep in constant touch with all the departments of the church along these lines, so that they shall be able to have some contributions when these reports come in, and these reports constitute the basis on which we shall attempt to do some practical development and meet the solution of every other practical problem.

Closely allied with that is the commission on foods, and not only the production of foods, but their preservation and distribution, and the general problems of seeing to it that food reaches the tables of every Latter Day Saint beyond question or doubt pure and uncontaminated or undefiled because of the commercial spirit of the day. And can you conceive of such a commission doing its complete work without housekeepers represented on that commission?

Woman's Chief Problem Is the Home

Of course, general home conditions bring about the question of home problems, and of all departments of church work that are fundamentally interested in the home problems the Women's Department is first; and hence the Women's Department has this big problem before it, to meet changing conditions, and changing conditions made most probably by your action in this conference within the last few days.

Hence, if they are going to be alert to meet these problems the women themselves must be in touch with these problems, alive to the situation, and alert to what these changes are likely to mean; so they can make their contribution in preserving that thing which is fundamental to us as to all people; that is the home. The future condition of the home will measure the standard of civilization of any people, and hence we can expect to progress and develop only as we shall lift the condition of the home onto a constantly higher plane.

The Zion condition involves the question of economic and industrial opportunity; that is, that every individual shall have the opportunity and shall know that it is his duty to rise to his greatest possible development. I wish I could repeat that until it has become fixed, that this fundamental idea of the Zion condition comprehends that equal opportunities to make the maximum development will be offered to all individuals in it and that the Zion condition in its perfect manifestation or expression cannot come until every individual has been developed to that highest point to where he can make the greatest possible contribution to the welfare of society of which he is a part. If this be true, then can you not see what a tremendous factor in this development the women shall be, and the women's work? Why? Because what a man is depends almost inevitably upon the conditions of the home from which he came; and hence, our women being home makers, are molding destiny in this church, and we cannot get away from that; and hence, women must make their contribution in seeing to it that the condition of the home in which the child is raised is such that the greatest possible development is offered to every child in that home; so that when it reaches the age when the church shall reach out and seize it for its activities and developments, we can know, that the child is in the very top notch of condition.

I wonder how soon Zion will be able to see this manifestation of its work. I wonder how long it is in the future when we can say that every child in every family of Latter Day Saints is having its fullest development, an educational unfolding of its soul, that the very utmost possible pinnacle of achievement lies immediately before the child, because right has been clearly pointed out, and the child's energy and ability has been developed until his contribution is of increasing value to the church and society at large.

Well, sometimes, when we look at some of the pessimistic sides of the conditions that exist it looks a long way ahead, and yet let me repeat what I have said before, when you read the signs of the times and appreciate the change coming over this people, we can know of a surety that God's Spirit is so working among them that there is the utmost promise being held out that we can see a fulfillment of these things. May the time be hastened when we can show the change of condition and make the adjustments until as we heard to-night every child will be properly developed, and every home will be in the very best condition, physically, spiritually, intellectually, and proper development of the child will be perfected until every child coming to an age where he can present his service to the church may make a perfect contribution, as a perfectly balanced man or woman, the maximum contribution that it is destined from the first that he shall make to society.

May this time speedily come, and our Women's Department be so organized that it may make its full contribution to this condition. I am just foolish enough to believe that we have a body of women in this church who have the determination and the ability to place our department on a plane which will be unequalled by any other organization of people the size of this, and I shall hope and pray that their consecration to this task may be so complete and so earnest that the fulfillment of that expectation may not be delayed.

The spring of 1920 was unusually late; in only four years in the past 37 years has the progress of plowing to May 1 been more backward than this year, namely, in 1912, 1904, 1903, and 1899. The outturn of 1912 was bumper crop yields, 1904 large crop yields, 1903 slightly above average, and 1899 about average.

Innocent Victims of Ignorance

The "summer peak" of infant deaths is now beginning. The conditions responsible for this "peak" are described in a series of studies of infant mortality made by the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor in six industrial cities.

In Manchester, New Hampshire, more babies died from gastrointestinal diseases than from any other cause, the rate being 63 per 1,000 babies born alive. In August more deaths occurred from these diseases than occurred in any other month from all causes combined. Two thirds of the babies in Manchester were born to foreign-born mothers, two fifths to mothers who could not speak English, over one sixth to illiterate mothers. Nearly half of them were in families where the fathers' earnings totaled less than $650 a year, and over two fifths were to mothers who were gainfully employed during the year following the baby's birth. Mothers who worked away from home were in most cases obliged to wean their babies, and did not understand the importance of care and cleanliness in giving artificial food. Only seldom did a mother report that she modified the baby's milk.

In Johnstown, Pennsylvania, Waterbury, Connecticut, and New Bedford, Massachusetts, where similar conditions prevailed, the infant mortality rates for diseases of the digestive system were 32, 41, and 48, respectively.

In Saginaw, Michigan, and Brockton, Massachusetts, where the proportion of foreign born, illiterate, and gainfully employed mothers was comparatively low, and incomes more nearly adequate, artificial feeding when resorted to was more scientific. The infant mortality rates from gastrointestinal diseases were only 8 and 12, respectively.

These reports emphasize the importance of family income and better domestic and municipal sanitation. But they indicate also the need of teaching mothers how to take care of babies. The lowest rates for each one of these cities were for breast-fed children, so that mothers should be taught first of all to nurse their babies. But, as several of the reports point out, the difference in rates for the artificially fed of different nationality and economic groups is almost as striking as the difference in rates between the breast and the artificially fed, due to the care, or lack of care, used in preparing the food.

Babies who perish because their mothers do not know how to take care of them, thus piling up the tall black moment of summer deaths, can be saved if baby health centers, a system of visiting nurses, and other forms of educational work are established. The infant mortality rate in cities where these measures have been tried has been markedly reduced.—Government Bulletin.

O Boy of Mine

The time will come, O boy of mine,
When I can't hold you tight
Against my heart and sing to you,
As I have done to-night.
The time will come, how well I know,
When youth to childhood calls,
Down from my knee you slip away
As dusk on sunset falls.
The time will come, O boy of mine,
When I shall have you back,
Sweet memory will light your love
To me along that track
My heart will ever make to yours
When childhood takes its flight,
And I can't sing or hold you, son,
As I have done to-night!

—Hiram Moe Green.

The conversion of a large brewery in San Antonio, Texas, into a cotton mill capitalized at $1,300,000 is one of the developments of prohibition. A firm of industrial engineers spent five months on the matter and decided there was everything in favor of the change.

LETTERS

Germany as She Is To-day

Elder Harry Passman reports a visit to the Saints in Germany.

HANNOVER, GERMANY, May 25, 1920.

I was privileged to attend the reunion held at Hannover, Germany, May 23 and 24. Here we met Saints from Braunschweig, Maugschutz, Einbeck, Gross Raschen, and Hannover. The Saints assembled to praise God and worshiped him in spirit and in truth, and God certainly met with his people and poured out his Spirit upon them, and each heart rejoiced because of the blessings received. I was privileged to tell them about the progress we were making in America, how we had worried for them, prayed for them during the war, and now having heard that only six had been killed in the war, it caused us to lift up our heads and say, Great is latter-day Israel's God; surely, the Lord is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer: my God, my strength in whom I will trust; my buckler, and the horn of my salvation and my high tower.

The watchword among our people in Germany is Zion, and every member has his heart and soul set upon that place and is praying for the day to come when God shall reveal himself and say it is time to gather. The overflowing scourge has swept the land; desolation is present everywhere; fear permeates every being; there is only one place of safety, and that is Zion. When you mention that word Zion the atmosphere is at once charged with the spirit of reverence and one feels like taking his shoes from off his feet, "for the place where thou standest is holy ground." I never met a more hospitable group of people in all my life; from their scanty allowance they will offer you half, yea, even to the very clothes on their backs, and one can easily discern the same spirit that prompted Him who walked upon the shores of Galilee. It was a grand reunion and I am glad I was present, glad that I was willing to make the sacrifice, for what we lacked in nourishing food was made up in the manna that cometh from on high. Our souls have been enriched.

Food and Clothing

A person is allowed three pounds of bread per week, but the quality of this bread is awful. It is made of rye and straw. The straw is ground up with the rye into flour and when you put a piece of this bread to your lips it requires some determination to complete the operation. You turn from it for the first two or three days, but after this you get good and hungry and then you can eat most anything. I am sending a slice of this bread made in Germany to the First Presidency. Ask them how it tastes. One pound of potatoes per day per person, but too often the supply is short and people receive as low as three pounds per week. I believe potatoes are the salvation of the German people. This was our main food in Germany. Butter, thirty to forty marks per pound, but the average family receives as low as fifty grams in four weeks. Eggs are one mark seventy-five pfennig each. Meat costs twenty to thirty marks per pound, lard twenty-five to thirty marks per pound, margarine is eighteen to twenty-three marks per pound and is made of flour and oil. When it gets warm the flour settles on the bottom, the oil on the top. A cotton suit of clothes costs 2,000 marks, a cotton overcoat 1,600 marks, a pair of stockings of coarse wool thirty-five marks. A workman receives all the way from thirty to sixty-five marks per day. Just imagine how far he can go with it; he cannot buy food for his family and the proposition of purchasing clothing is out of the question, the prices making it prohibitive.

The man who owns many houses finds himself in a terrible strait, as the law does not allow him to raise the rent over twenty per cent per year, consequently an average six-room flat brings 540 marks a year, a two-flat building brings in 1,080 marks a year. The purchasing power of 1,080 marks is about twenty-seven dollars a year. This will not pay for repairs on the building. Talking with a woman from Berlin who was about sixty years old, she said she had worked and saved approximately $10,000 in marks. She saved these when they were worth about twenty-five cents each. Now these marks are worth about two and one half cents each, so she suffers a reduction in her small fortune, and is now worth about $1,000. These are examples of how hundreds of thousands of people are affected in Germany.

Tuberculosis Is Claiming Its Toll

We visited Frankfort on the Main River, Hannover, Halle on the Saale River. Men, women, and children walk through the streets with the skin lying on the bones of their faces, fat gone, flesh disappearing; some state they have lost fifty pounds during the war. Children two to three years old with legs like broomsticks, cheeks sunken, are unable to walk because of the lack of nourishing foods. Many children die anywhere from birth to six months old. In Halle on Saale it is conceded that half the population are affected with tuberculosis, practically the same condition exists in Hanover and Frankfort. Tubercular tumors are seen on the necks of many of the people and some of the children of the Saints are not escaping this disease. Some of our members have been operated on, but the tumors appear in other locations later.

The people who live in the country have escaped the pangs of hunger and look very different from those in the cities. The crops look very good; rye is growing generously and promises a good crop for the fall of the year, but I am told that a part of this must be given to France and there will not be sufficient to feed the starving population. Traveling from Basel, Switzerland, to Hannover, Germany, took us from the very south to the north of Germany. We were eighteen hours on the train, and traveled about thirty miles an hour making a distance of about 540 miles. In all this stretch we saw less than 200 head of cattle and a great percentage of these were very young. We saw less than fifty horses and not a solitary pig. Much of the farm land is not being worked and in some places cows are used for plowing and pulling wagons.

At the Crystal Palace

The Crystal Palace is a large hospital in Hannover, Germany, where many wounded soldiers are domiciled. Here we were privileged to gaze upon the product of grim old war, and what a terrible picture it is. Oil paintings of this scene should hang in the palace of every president, emperor, czar, or ruler so that the horrors of war may not be erased from their memories. Our guide was a young man about thirty-two years of age with nose and right eye shot off; his lower jaw had been torn open by shell fire, but through a successful operation was patched up so it made a fair appearance. His teeth and gums had been shot away and he was wearing a silver plate deposited in the flesh of the lower jaw. In spite of his injuries he was very pleasant and cheerful and made an excellent guide.

The dental department was the first division we visited. Here we saw many photographs of men who had shared the same fate as our guide, men with faces torn and shot to pieces, operated on and restored to a fair appearance. Models were on exhibition and the work done and the results accomplished were almost miraculous. We were not permitted to enter the operating room because a young man had just died while undergoing an operation. In the yard lying in beds were about twenty-five men that were very seriously wounded; men with rubber tubes buried in the flesh and projecting from their backs, others with nasty leg and foot wounds. Into all these wounds there dripped an antiseptic continuously and you could see the putrified flesh. Some of these men had been lying in this hospital two to three years and some will remain as long as they live. In another hospital men are lying in tubs of water to treat the numerous body wounds. Some of these men spend twenty-three hours a day in this water. We next entered into the large hall which is filled with cots upon which lie wounded soldiers. Even these wounded men are not receiving the nourishing foods that the body requires.

Revolution

At Hannover we visited Aegidien Torplatz. A few weeks ago a revolution occurred here. Fifteen people were killed and many injured. At Halle on the Saale River a revolution occurred six weeks ago in which two hundred people were killed. The Social Democrat minority attacked the Government troops and along the Saale River, cut their heads off and threw them in the river. This battle continued for four and a half days. The people remained in the houses until they were very hungry, then they had to go for bread. Of the two hundred killed, one hundred twenty were civilians who did not participate in the battle. At Saltzgrafenstrasse and the lower market place many shots were fired. I counted fourteen holes in a large plate glass window and nearly all the windows in this locality are peppered with bullets. The bullets have left their indentation in the brick and stone buildings in this neighborhood, and it is evident that many thousand shots have been fired. Another battle took place on Rainstrasse where Elder A. Kippe lives. The revolutionists took possession of a large yeast factory on Rainstrasse and were firing on the Government troops and the Government troops returned the fire with cannon from a hill behind Elder Kippe's house, so the shells were sailing over his house. They are expecting another battle in Halle. It was announced for May 28 but did not materialize. We didn't leave Halle until May 29.

A Republic

I talked with many people in Germany in regard to the Republican form of government. Among them, Doctor Iur Rudolf Alsberg and Hermann Schneider, a man prominent in military circles. The former favored Germany's present form of government, but did not believe Ebert was capable of carrying it through successfully. Everybody I talked with held this same opinion, so I believe they will have a new man after the next election on June 6.

The Saints Need Help

Our members in Germany need help. Smoked pork and canned milk should be sent at once in quantities large enough to take care of their needs for months. Clothing should follow so that the people will not suffer during the coming winter. Coal will be very scarce and the people will depend upon their clothing to keep warm. The First Presidency have written to find out the needs of our people in Germany. An appeal will be made to help. This should receive a hearty response, not with nickels or dimes but with ten and twenty-dollar bills so that our brothers and sisters in Germany may know that we are interested in them to the extent that we will not permit them to starve or freeze, that they may know that by one spirit are we all baptized into one body.

HARRY PASSMAN.

Help for German Saints

The Presidency suggests that those who may wish to help the Saints in Germany should send money directly to the Presiding Bishopric. This money will be used to purchase food and clothing in England under the direction of Apostle T. W. Williams and Bishop Roderick May. This food is to go to branch presidents or other church officials in Germany, for distribution among the Saints.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY.

We insistently need an intelligence that is not honeycombed with weakening mental reservations aroused by a partial knowledge and immature mental digestive ability. We urge a sympathetic study of man from a rational human standpoint rather than an overemphasis on the conclusions of men who, no matter what else they knew, did not know God.

We stand for a straightforward, constructive program of study that will build up our faith and strengthen our resolutions, as opposed to tendencies so supertolerant that they actually encourage the growth of pernicious seeds of skepticism, atheism, and final despair.

OBSERVER.

An Indian's Plea

[The following is the plea of a full-blooded Indian. The Indian Bureau is intended to protect the Indian from exploitation by designing men. There have doubtless been mistakes and losses. The head of the bureau stated before a Congressional Committee that there were some superintendents they could probably get along better without. But the aims as stated by him, are high. Still there is another side, and that is presented here, the desire for freedom to live and to act for themselves. There are many Indians who have rather fully adopted the culture and customs of the white man, who feel these restrictions of wardship keenly, and who want full citizenship. William Madison is one of them.—EDITORS.]

America is a free land to all races, except the Indians. The Indian—the 100 per cent American—is in bondage in his native land, without the rights and privileges of citizenship. He is denied freedom and citizenship because he has land, because he has trust funds, in other words tribal funds which are held in Washington to his credit.

In 1832 the bondage of the Indian commenced. In 1920 it is still existing. It must be because Indians still have land held in trust, and still have claims to a tribal fund.

For nearly one hundred years the Indian has suffered worse than slavery. Because of this bondage we are humiliated and made to sense that the people of the world still consider us a thing apart from civilized manhood. England found with four short years of army service that the lack of self-responsibility, initiative, and forethought made their men lazy, and one third less productive. What would be the result to the white man of nearly one hundred years of such lack of self-determination? Yet we are told that such a bondage has been a blessing to the Indian, that he was not able to handle his affairs—that if he had not had the protection of the Indian Bureau his moneys and lands would long since have been in the hands of the unscrupulous white men.

But do we not see that in exchange for his probable loss of property and lands he would have had the experience and the resulting opportunity to stand on his two feet and face the world as a man? Would anyone for a moment say that the opportunity to be a man to battle our way up in the world by our own initial efforts is to be exchanged for all the gold and treasures of any government? It is a difficult thing for a white man to really know and sense the actual need of the Indian, since he cannot be one of us.

Our moneys are appropriated from our funds for the upkeep of Indian schools, of roads, and other civic improvements; then the state turns around and taxes our lands over which we have no control, for state schools and state roads, etc. We are permitted the privilege of double taxation and dying on the battlefield for the country of which we are denied citizenship.

Seventeen thousand Indians fought in the World War to make freedom possible for others, while we remain in bondage. We Indians want citizenship. We want to be a free people. We want to think and plan for ourselves. We want the rights and privileges the same as any other race of people. We need all the help we can get towards freedom. It is the world's Christian duty to look into our affairs for investigation. We need people with boldness and vision to sponsor our cause. We need a Lincoln. We need a Joan of Arc.

WILLIAM MADISON.

With her people speaking thirty-three languages, including English, as has been shown in an Interchurch World Movement survey, New York seems to have earned the title so often given to her of the modern Tower of Babel. Of the 1,700,000 persons speaking the foreign languages, from the English-speaking standpoint, it is worth while to note, the Germans, Italians, Swedes, Norwegians, Chinese, Japanese, Magyars, Russians, Bohemians, and Poles have church services carried on in their own languages, according to the survey, while the dozen other nationalities in the "Tower" go without religious services in their own tongues.

"We're Off!"

ON BOARD Rotterdam, July 21, 12 M.

We're off! Expect to reach Plymouth, England, July 31. Our love and confidence to church in America. When confronted with responsibility the confidence of confrères is an inspiration to do one's best. One of the most potential factors contributing to the virtue and integrity of any man is the loving support of a God-fearing people. The greatest help to a missionary abroad is the continuous reminder that the "folks at home" are keeping the camp fires blazing. Let us fear God and keep the faith.

Sincerely yours,
T. W. WILLIAMS.

Graceland Graduates

The close of the first quarter of a century in the history of Graceland College is a very fitting time to gather statistics with respect to her graduates. During Graceland's first two years' existence she graduated no classes but with the commencement of 1898, she presented to the church and to the world, her first graduating class consisting of one, the present President of the church, Doctor Frederick M. Smith. With that large beginning she has continued to grant degrees, diplomas, and certificates every June up to the present year when her graduating class consisted of sixty-five students from the eight departments of the institution. The total number of graduates for the first quarter of a century is five hundred forty-two or an average of nearly twenty-four graduates per year for the twenty-three years since the first class graduated.

As will be noted from the table, the stenographic department has graduated the largest number, the commercial department second, while the collegiate department comes third. It is only in recent years that the collegiate department has begun to function, and with the increased facilities in the way of buildings, library and laboratory equipment, and added members of the faculty, the collegiate department is in a position to render service of a continuously higher order thus placing that department where it properly belongs, as the apex of the institution's efforts.

Of the fifty-one collegiate graduates during the past five years since the institution was fully standardized and officially accredited, forty-three have met the requirements of the State in the department of education and have earned the state teacher's certificate.

These statistics have not before been published but it is believed that they are of sufficient interest to the church as a whole to issue them at this time as a basis for a comparison at the end of the second quarter of a century, 1945. What will the next twenty-five years show?

Good Prospects for Des Moines Campaign

The publicity committee at Des Moines telegraphed me to come up Tuesday to assist them in putting on a big publicity campaign prior to a series of tent meetings which they are going to hold. I went up and took samples of tracts that I thought would be appropriate and went over the matter with their committee and laid out a most ambitious publicity campaign. Before I left that night I had written most of the copy and I am forwarding the rest to-day by mail.

I find that the Saints at Des Moines are thoroughly awake on the missionary program and they begin their series of meetings next Sunday night in a splendid location and under most auspicious circumstances. The district has bought a fine big tent that will seat five hundred people, and Brother Dowker, together with Brethren Warr, Chevile, and the other branch officers, has made up a fine set of tent chairs. The men are untiring in their efforts to put this series of meetings across in big style.

I was pleased to note that Des Moines is one of the exceptions to our general church rule in that our church is located on a representative street near the center of the town and of easy access.

ARTHUR E. MCKIM,
Publicity Director.

Situation in Hilo Encouraging

You will remember my stating in a recent weekly letter that I was sure that the silver lining would soon begin to appear. Last Tuesday morning as I was studying, the Spirit came upon me, and for about two hours I lived in bliss. This is twice that I have experienced this since coming here. Our prayer meetings have been very cold and void of the Spirit until the last two. They have been better, but when I enjoyed the Spirit that morning as I did, my heart yearned for the Saints of this place, that they might receive just a taste of what I have enjoyed. Our Sunday morning sacrament service saw its fulfillment. Forty-two were present and only one member present refused the sacrament. The Spirit then came in our midst and filled the house with the glory of God. Such a feast and how we rejoiced! It surely will be a source of strength and encouragement to this people. I am sure that it was largely due to the fact that the hardness between so many of the members has been almost eliminated. The Spirit which we enjoyed was present in power from the beginning of the service until the close.

This week we expect to hold more cottage services, continuing to push the missionary work in the city as well as the local work, until such time as we can arrange to go over to Maui, which I think will be our first missionary effort away from Hilo.

(Excerpt from letter to Presidency from Gomer J. Reeves, Hilo, Hawaii, July 5, 1920.)

HAMILTON, ONTARIO, July 18, 1920.

Editors Herald: The work is going along quietly, with faces looking Zionward. We have had much good instruction along this line since the conference this spring, and no doubt many times we wonder if we shall be able to qualify for a place among those who shall be redeemed in Zion.

A few weeks ago, June 21, we had our children's program, which resulted in some good being accomplished. Five children were baptized. There were others who should have been baptized, but were not ready at this time. There was one child blessed as well. We trust this work shall prove of greater worth in the future, as I believe we all need to give more attention to our children, making them feel that their place is of interest in the church.

We are looking forward to our two-day meeting which will be in August. These meetings are being arranged by the district president, Brother George E. Harrington. We believe this brother has been working hard to bring about a more spiritual condition throughout the district, and we trust his labors shall be crowned with success. P. A.

CAMERON, MISSOURI, July 19, 1920.

Editors Herald: A number of our people were privileged to attend the late General Conference and the opinion has been unanimous that they all saw a brighter vision of what was before us than they had ever seen before. Realizing this all have put forth an extra effort to push the work in this place.

Elder Roy S. Budd, our pastor, has been putting forth strenuous efforts during his stay with us to win the people of the town over to our work and although no great number have been baptized yet much progress has been made in the way of prejudice being removed. It is nothing out of the ordinary to have from fifteen to thirty-five nonmembers present on Sunday evening. At present we have a membership of about 180 and the prospect looks good for more.

The first Sunday in July Elder J. W. Roberts of the stake presidency was with us, having charge of the sacrament service in the morning and at the evening hour favoring us with an excellent sermon.

On July 11, Roy S. Budd occupied the morning hour, giving us much food for thought. In the evening we were pleased to have with us Bishop J. A. Koehler who delivered an excellent sermon. Although a stranger to most of us, we are sure he has won the confidence of the Cameron Saints.

E. A. Robertson of the stake presidency was with us July 14 meeting with us in the prayer service, his presence being enjoyed by all.

On July 18 we had one of the stanch veterans of the early day missionary force in the person of Elder J. S. Roth, who spoke for us both morning and evening. Although advanced in years, Brother Roth still tells the old, old story in the forceful yet kind and simple way characteristic of those veterans. Elder John Davis of Stewartsville was also a visitor, shaking hands with old friends and noting the many changes that have taken place since he was a missionary in this locality.

The Kingston, Far Kest, and Oakdale Saints invited us to join them in a picnic to be held July 15, at Stoners Bridge, near the old historical spot, Far West. A large representation of all four branches was present. After all were assembled Bishop J. A. Koehler led in singing America, President R. S. Salyards offered prayer, and Roy S. Budd made a short talk very appropriate to the occasion. Later on, baskets of all sizes and shapes, all well filled with good things, and four large packers of ice cream were disposed of. Foot races, jumping, and other athletics were indulged in by young and old until the day passed altogether too swiftly and when time came to part all were unanimously agreed that the day had been profitably spent.

The improvements on the church, which have been held up so long on account of scarcity of help, are practically completed and we have no hesitancy in inviting our friends to come to church. G. SCOTT DANIEL.

PITTSBURG, KANSAS, July 15, 1920.

Editors Herald: The gospel work in the Spring River District we believe is keeping pace with general progress. At our June conference a subscription of nearly five hundred dollars was raised in less than a half hour for a new missionary tent. The tent has been purchased and last night we began a campaign in this city with Brother Lee Quick as the principal speaker and we had a splendid beginning. We shall continue till just before the reunion, which is to be held here August 6-15.

Prospects were never brighter for a good reunion, and our program for spiritual and educational work with the addition of recreational and entertaining features surpasses anything we have ever had. We are making a special effort to appeal to the young people and make the occasion one which they will thoroughly enjoy. Brother Arthur Stoff, our pastor at Pitts-

BOOK REVIEWS

Three Valuable Books

BY VIDA E. SMITH

From One to Twenty-one, A Study of Child Nature, The Making of a Teacher, all recommended for reunions this summer.

Before us lies the open HERALD for June 15, 1920. On page 589 we read the notice, "Department work at reunions," and observe that three textbooks are mentioned for use in the morning study hour. One of these is little more than a pamphlet and bears the significant title, From One to Twenty-One; another, A Study of Child Nature, by Harrison.

The third is a larger book and has the title, The Making of a Teacher. These books are not new to many of the students in our midst. They were all three included in the Teacher Training Course, and forgetting that they are "lessons" to be "studied," you will find them profitable reading and pleasurable and then will study.

From One to Twenty-One, as the title implies, covers a long range of thought, motive, and desire on a few pages and imparts correspondingly, suggestions and possible assistance for parent and teacher, as this regarding children's lies:

"Many conscientious folk have grieved much over the wild romances, or the 'downright lying,' as they term it, of some little visitors to fairyland. The romancing is natural. It is possible, because the child's experience is not so complete in every detail that his fancy is brought up sharply at every turn. In dreamland, where only a few ideas are present, we can soar over continents in a second, pass from slave to sovereign without shock. Dreams vanish before the richer experience of waking life. So 'children's lies' dissolve as experience grows. Observation effects the cure, not blows.

"These romances of the child are his explanations of what goes on in the world around. The child and the peasant summon fairies to do for them what hypotheses do for the scientist. Thus, a little child, to quote another example from Sully, seeing a tramp limping along with a bad leg, exclaimed: 'Look at that poor ole man, he has dot a bad leg. He dot on a very big horse, and he fell off on a big stone and he hurt his poor leg, and he had to get a big stick.'"

The Study of Child Nature is even more interesting and gives in pointed illustration and pleasant story form that which will help many mothers and teachers to meet trying situations and solve vexing problems, for instance in "The training of the muscles":

"A friend came to me and said: 'What shall I do with my Willie? He dallies so about everything that he has to do. If I send him upstairs after my thimble or thread, it may be a half hour or even an hour before he returns. I have scolded him and scolded him, but it seems to do no good.'

"'By scolding,' I replied, 'you have emphasized the fault

burg, knows how to entertain the young people and will devote much of his time to their interests. Sister Maggie Macgregor will be present as field worker, and in addition to other activities will do much for the young people.

Several new ministers will be at the reunion including Apostle William Aylor. Stereopticon pictures will frequently be shown at the night sessions. A large tent in charge of a matron will be fitted up as a girls' and women's dormitory so that they can be cared for at a minimum cost.

The missionaries of the district as well as the district officers are active and there have been already this year a goodly number of baptisms. We expect the Spring River District to acquire its proportion of the 20,000 new converts the church is working for. That means 400 new members in this district and we appeal to the branches and local priesthood to exert themselves to the utmost in spreading the gospel message and to accomplish the work that properly falls to them to do.

CHARLES FRY.

you wished to cure and have separated yourself from your boy. Now, try to emphasize the opposite virtue, promptness, by praising him for it when you have the opportunity.'

"'Oh, there's no use in talking of that,' she answered, 'he is never prompt.'

"'Then,' said I, 'if he is never so voluntarily, make an occasion. Ask him to go to the kitchen, or some other part of the house on an errand for you; tell him that you will count while he is gone. When he gets back, praise him for having returned more quickly than usual. At dinner tell his father as if it were a fine bit of news. This will make it a meritorious achievement in your son's eyes.'

"The next week she came to me with her face fairly radiant and said: 'I have been counting and Willie has been trotting ever since last week.' I laughed and told her that her mother wit would soon have to hunt up some new device."

Or this:

"A child who is rightly treated will accept this right kind of punishment as a matter of course. A friend of mine who had been given this idea of punishment, upon returning home one day found that her six-year-old boy had taken his younger brother over to the wagon shop across the street, a forbidden spot, and they had smeared their aprons with the wagon grease. In telling the story afterwards, she said, 'My first impulse was to whip the boy, because he knew better than to go; but I thought I would try the other way of punishing him, and see if it would do any good. So I said, 'Why, that's too bad. It will be rather hard for you to get the grease off, but I think I can help you, if you will get some turpentine. Run to the drug store on the corner and buy a small bottle of it.' On his return she took the two aprons and spread them upon the floor of the back porch, then, giving him a little sponge and the bottle of turpentine, she showed him how to begin his cleaning. In a few minutes he said, 'O mamma, this stuff smells horrid!' 'Yes,' she serenely replied, 'I know it does; I dislike the smell of turpentine very much, but I think you will get through soon.' So Willie kept on scrubbing until he had cleaned the aprons as well as he could. 'Well,' said his mother, as she helped him put away the cleaning material, 'I think my boy will be more careful about going to the wagon shop, will he not?' 'You bet I will!' was his emphatic reply."

And let me quote a few lines used by this author in the preface:

"The destiny of the nations lies far more in the hands of women—the mothers—than in the hands of those who possess power, or those who are innovators, who seldom understand themselves. We must cultivate women, who are the educators of the human race, else a new generation cannot accomplish its task."

You see the point; we must understand children and become skilled in our dealing with them. They are the hope of the ages, and this book is a real help. Secure one, mother, teacher, and read and think upon its contents. You will rejoice in the inspiration that moved the "helping triangle," i. e., Sunday school, Religio, Women's Department, to make its study part of the program.

The last and best of these books is the one on Making of a Teacher. We notice this is not included with the others in the study hour, but why not? It is wonderful for teachers.

Jesus the ideal teacher is kept always before one. The language is simple, but most effective. Subjects that are vital to every class in every place are treated clearly and in such a heart-to-heart manner that we feel in some instances that the inspiration of the author was especially for one's own benefit. For instance, "How the attention may be secured." Do you ever have any trouble that way?

"If my teacher had only known the things of interest to me, how readily he could have made them the occasion of securing my attention, of building there the tabernacles of truth, into which with joy my spirit would have entered to find and to partake of His truth. How splendidly Jesus understood this. To those whose interests clustered about their flocks he was the Good Shepherd. To the man whose flock had been scattered, how readily would the search for the one that was lost quicken interest, secure attention, arouse concern, and lead to an understanding of his mission. To those whose physical ills had saddened life, how tenderly helpful was the statement, 'They that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick.' How their interest was thus aroused, and they were fitted to understand, 'I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.'

"Some Facts Concerning Memory"

"I wish the teacher at this point to pause for a moment and consider the miracle of memory. Things learned in years gone are by it held in the everlasting present. What we once learned we always may know. What we now teach to our pupils they may retain and recall as long as their spirits are body-incased, and it is my conviction that they are recalled when, free from the body, the spirit mounts to eternity. This is God's method of dignifying the work of the teacher. God has so planned that what we plant in a human soul may bloom perennially. We have no right to plant carelessly, since we have no power to reset our plantings. If what we place by wise teachings in the soul of a child were to fade and die in a fortnight, how very hopeless and useless would our teaching be! Thank God that you teach for time and for eternity. Get up on the heights. See the splendid prospect God sets for those that teach in his name!

"Retention and Recollection"

"The impression must be given when the mind is in the right attitude to attend to it. If we are to retain the impression long, we must acquire it under conditions of interest. The boy who is excited over a game of ball is able for a long while to recall the details of the game. This keen interest secures a fineness of detail that is of tremendous significance. How futile it is to try to secure right memory products when the mind of the pupil is attending to matters foreign to the lesson in hand!

"The Teacher a Good Governor"

"The fact that somebody believes in a boy is the surest stimulus to his standing stanch and strong for the things that some one believes him capable of doing.

"When Jesus said to those he helped, 'Go, sin no more,' he placed confidence in them, gave them to understand that they could do the right, and that he was willing to accept their own life determinants after they had been properly taught. It is not easy to describe the quality I have in mind, but the thoughtful teacher will understand that truth, taught in a way that impresses the pupil with the fact that the teacher believes in the pupil's ability to live it out in his daily life, is most likely to find such a result is attained by the pupil. Jesus told the people what he knew they could do, and then left them to do it, under the constant conviction that he expected no other issue in conduct.

"Building of Ideals"

"Without ideals there could be no progress—only endless and changeless, dreary and hopeless monotony. Without ideals our minds would become like the wayside pool—stagnant and deadly. With ideals they become like mountain rills that leap from moss-rimmed rocks in endless showers of silver spray, clothed in rainbows, and bearing in their sweep life and beauty and grandeur. Happy the child whose unfettered spirit may build after its own plans the terraced slopes, the sun-crowned spires, the carved pillars, and the golden portals of the temple of truth. Into it his spirit may pass to find the sweetest communions, and to greater inspiration for the highest achievements. It is the soul's most holy place. Here the divinity that is in us is enshrined. Here we may worship and adore. The soul is most joyous when most free. The desire to build ideals is innate. We long to become what our ideals figure. The struggle is always from the thing we are to the thing we wish to be.

"The Recitation"

"I notice generally that Sunday school pupils come to class without the least idea of what the lesson is. The result is poor recitation, wasted time, unprepared minds, futile effort, and altogether an unfortunate exercise. I see no reason why a teacher of a Sunday school class should not assign the work a week in advance. It is not enough to say that the lesson next Sunday will be found in such and such a place in the Bible. That is not assigning a lesson, nor is it a proper preparation for a recitation. Suppose we have thirty minutes in which to teach a lesson. A wise teacher will consider eight minutes of that time well spent if spent in assigning the work of the week to come. I believe that in this one matter a great reform could be carried out in our Sunday school teaching. We have a right to expect pupils to prepare their work, and it is our duty as their teachers to have that work properly prepared.

"Educational Methods Used by Jesus"

"It is the business of the teacher to mold the conditions and bring to pass the sublime moment and then teach as Jesus taught.

"At the opening of Matthew 5 we have a striking illustration of the deliberate quality of this teacher. He sees the multitude. He then goes up into a mountain. Then he sat down, and after that his disciples came unto him, and he opened his mouth and spoke unto them. Notice with what deliberation he predisposes the disciples to receive this great message. There is no sign of haste. There is no evidence of impatience. There is no attempt to hurry the conditions, but with a masterful control of himself, he predisposes the conditions for favorable teaching. I have no doubt his sayings went all the more deeply into the conscience, and fastened themselves more securely within the soul of the disciples, because of this deliberate treatment of them. In a preceding chapter I called attention to this same quality when Jesus was at the Feast of the Tabernacles in Jerusalem. It will amply reward you to go through the Gospels and make a personal study of this same quality as it appears again and again in his teaching."

Indeed the book is crowded with good things. One reads and turns back again to read some particularly impressive points. We learn that we must pay the price if we would teach—we must put the soul daily, hourly to the great test. Reluctantly we lay aside Brumbaugh's Making of a Teacher to go most joyfully and with greater consecration to the duties of a teacher. The book is a jewel and will make for good in any place where it is read, and with unusual gratification we recommend its study.

Great Britain is attempting by the sale of Savings Certificates to raise fifty million pounds ($250,000,000) with which to repay the loan due the United States which that nation and France secured in 1915. France owes an equal sum. The loan falls due next October, and the argument is made to English investors that if it is paid at that time it will assist in the rectification of the present adverse American exchange.

In recent meetings of the British Medical Association in London, attended by from two hundred to three hundred doctors, the question as to whether a physician should divulge professional secrets without permission was discussed at length and it was decided that they should not. Especially was the question raised as to the doctor's responsibility in a case where he knew one of the contracting parties to a marriage was afflicted with some loathsome disease which would affect children of the union, though it runs the entire gamut of physiological and psychological ills.

In the Zionist conference at London a recommendation was adopted which provided that all land and property in Palestine be declared the property of the Jewish people, and that the control of this property be gradually assumed by the Palestine state. There was a considerable sentiment in favor of the majority who wanted the land and property declared immediately the property of the Jewish state and that private ownership and speculation be forbidden.

"The only sure things in life are those that have already happened."

Pastoral Notices

Seattle and British Columbia District: Having only two missionaries in the district, Brother George R. Brundage and myself, you must know if there is done any very extended missionary work in this big district, we will need the co-operation of the local force to help us. We have quite a nice list of the eldership, as well as priests, teachers, and deacons, and it would seem we certainly can spur up a little and do considerably more than we have heretofore done for the general missionary cause. No man has done so well but what he can do better.

I am going to ask all the priesthood to spend at least one Sunday of each month in missionary work for the church. I know many have responsibilities in branches which should not be neglected, but if it is possible, I would request you to give one fourth of your time allotted to religious duties to the work of introducing the faith to others.

The service which I ask you to give is the making and maintaining of appointments for preaching, distributing bills and tracts, collecting papers, and supplying racks in public places with our reading matter, visiting, and talking the gospel, corresponding and sending our literature through the mails, securing favorable notice through the press, and even doing street preaching. Those who have autos can help the missionary in getting over the district, and thus reach points that are hard to reach otherwise, as well as secure appointments for themselves. We will also need some help in running the district tabernacle.

I know many of us think we are burdened and have no time for such work, but do you know there is no more important work on earth to-day than this very work of preaching the gospel? We are no doubt burdened with other cares, for we all find ourselves with this handicap, yet many times we gain relaxation from those same cares by doing missionary work. Many a man can testify it is a good way to rest up. I am of the opinion we can do much more than we have done in the past, if we will only will to do it, and let no minor discouragement hinder us. The priesthood should constantly watch for opportunities, and devise means for introducing the faith and making it enticing to others. Other churches are doing it with an inferior message, why not we who are blessed with a superior message? Possessing as we do the most reasonable, scriptural, and heavenly message—that which is glorious and truly of God, why be selfish with it? Why not pass it on to others? Thousands to-day would rejoice with us in the truth and light of his grand work if they were but given opportunities to hear and understand.

Some of the priesthood hesitate so long they lose the spirit, and their vision is gone, and they settle down to the conviction that but little, if anything, is required. Don't wait, or put it off. We should interpret priesthood in the light of service, for that is what it means.

Brethren, do not wait for the missionary to come to your community before you think it is time to do work on this line. If you have the fire of the missionary spirit, you will be active all the time, and it is then you will feel the real joy of the great service. It is better to wear out than to rust. Our slogan, if one here is needed, is action. Our ideal—let it be that of achievement. If opportunities do not come to us, the thing to do is to make opportunities. We should strive for a better qualification in study, and a richer endowment of the Spirit by prayer and right living.

The address of G. R. Brundage is 1720 King Street, Bellingham, Washington, and my address is 2014 H Street, Bellingham, Washington. As missionaries we are at your service. Drop us a line occasionally and tell us what you are doing, and if you have any wants in our line, we will do our best to reach you and give you service.

Never, I believe, has mankind been in such a ferment of unrest as to-day. Pathetic indeed is the plight of the human mind to understand the issues of life and to find out God, and indeed strange the vagaries and eccentricities of thought in which their searchings have led. We will always find plenty of foes to the faith, combating the truth with error. We all know what it means to represent an unpopular cause. And, too, we all know the value of the possession of the Spirit of God in our work. Anti-Christ is abroad, and if there ever was a time when we should be humble and faithful, that we may be divinely endowed, that time is now. Success is certain if we are valiant. The church calls for your help. You are wanted! The present is freighted with golden opportunity; make no delay.

Respectfully in gospel fellowship,
July 10, 1920. S. S. SMITH.

To Scattered Saints of Southern Indiana District: My field address from now will be Marengo, Indiana, box 272, and I will be glad to hear of any new openings or opportunities to get the gospel message before the people. Trusting that I shall receive your full support, I am at your service,
R. EVERETT BOZARTH.

To the Saints in Florida District, Greeting: Having been chosen to preside over your district, I request that we unite our efforts for the building up of the work that is intrusted to all.

I request that all branch presidents keep an accurate account of all work performed in their respective branches, and report same to me at close of each quarter.

I also request that all local workers, whether in branches or not, laboring in this district, report their work to me at close of each quarter, and would be pleased to hear from you at any time that I might be of service to you.

I desire to keep in close touch with all, and if there are any that are not actively engaged, that have a desire to work, please communicate with me, and I will try to assist you to get started in the work. Our missionary force is small this year, and in order to keep the work on the upward move it will require a united effort. We can do a good work here in the Florida District.

CATAWBA, FLORIDA. W. A. WEST.

Addresses

O. J. Hawm, Bradner, Ohio.

Reunion Notices

Saints of Utah, Idaho, and Eastern Oregon are invited to attend the reunion at Boise, Idaho, August 20 to 29. A splendid program has been arranged for the opening night. An effort is being made by the committee to provide motion pictures for the instruction and entertainment of the Saints. An exceptionally good corps of speakers and instructors will be in attendance. Recreational features will be provided for both old and young. Tents may be rented from the undersigned at the following prices: 8 by 10, $6; 10 by 12, $7; 12 by 14, $9; single cots, 50 cents and $1; chairs, 25 cents each. Borrow or bring your own tents if possible. Bring your own bedding. Tents and equipment must be ordered two weeks in advance to insure supply for demand. Reunion will be held in Elm Grove Park where there is plenty of shade for all tents. Come and enjoy a good, spiritual feast for your vacation. Address Earl F. Hoisington, 1802 North Sixteenth Street, Boise, Idaho.

To missionaries who contemplate attending the Kirtland reunion. It has been customary during the past years to care for all missionaries and their families attending the reunion. Last year we cared for forty or more people free, and it is with regret that we find it necessary to make a change. Owing to the increased prices in foodstuffs and believing it would be unwise to increase the price of meals, we are compelled to announce that all missionaries who anticipate attending should kindly be prepared to pay their expenses. The reunion committee.

Arkansas, at Bald Knob, Arkansas, September 3, continuing 10 days. Every Saint in the district is asked to make a special effort to be present. We expect William Aylor of the Twelve, and district missionaries, also a patriarch and other good speakers, to be present. Further details regarding tents and meals will be given later. Ida Emde, Bald Knob, Arkansas, secretary.

Conference Minutes

SOUTHEASTERN ILLINOIS.—With Joppa Branch, June 19 and 20, 1920. District President R. H. Henson, with W. H. Kelley and L. O. Wildermuth, chosen to preside. Reports from 12 elders, 5 priests, and one teacher. Provisions made for ordination of Chester Henson to office of elder, John Clements priest, and Henry Feltman deacon. Preaching by Charles Wesner, Ray Whiting, R. H. Henson, and L. O. Wildermuth. At Sunday morning sacrament, prayer and testimony meeting, the gifts of the Spirit were manifested to the instruction, edification, and comfort of all present. The conference as a whole was considered the best and most spiritual the district has ever held. Preaching most excellent. Much routine, and important business was provided for to be done throughout the district. Next conference with Tunnel Hill Branch, conjointly with Sunday school, Religion, and Women's Departments, October 29 to 31. F. L. Sawley, clerk pro tem.

OWEN SOUND.—At Port Elgin, Ontario, in the town hall, July 3. Reports show that many changes have been taking place in the branches; 28 baptisms were reported, 26 transfers received. One branch indicated a gain of 18 members, means of gain not indicated. Twelve deaths were reported, and 43 transfers issued, the district apparently having made a gain of twenty members. Three invitations were received for conference of 1921, that of Redickville being accepted, meeting there the first week of July, time to be determined by presidency and superintendents of departments. Officers elected: president, D. B. Perkins, Wiarton, Ontario; vice presidents, King Cooper, Guelph, Ontario, and Sidney Smith, Port Elgin, Ontario; secretary, J. H. Leeder, Port Elgin; treasurer and Bishop's agent, F. B. Stade, Harrison; chorister, Amelia Taylor, Grand Valley; librarian, S. M. Shute, Wiarton. Votes of thanks were tendered the retiring officers and to the retired Bishop's agent, J. A. Morrison. The speakers were J. L. Mortimer, W. A. Smith, and J. H. Yager. J. H. Leeder, secretary, Port Elgin, Ontario.

ALABAMA.—With the Lone Star Branch, June 26, 1920, J. R. Harper in the chair. Levi Gamet chosen to preside, assisted by district presidency. W. H. Drake chosen secretary pro tem. Branches reporting: Pleasant Hill. Ministerial reports: 3 elders, 7 priests, 3 teachers, and 2 deacons reported. J. R. Harper resigned as district president. Levi Gamet was elected to fill his place. Brother Gamet chose J. R. Harper and A. A. Weaver as his counselors. Preaching by Alma Booker, Levi Gamet, and E. C. Shelley. Conference adjourned to meet at call of district presidency. W. H. Drake, secretary pro tem.

NORTH DAKOTA.—Sunday school, at Burlington, June 24, district superintendent in chair. Reports from superintendent, secretary-treasurer, cradle roll superintendent, home department superintendent. Officers elected: Thomas Leitch, superintendent, Lester Anderson, assistant superintendent, Gladys Darling, secretary-treasurer. Adjourned to meet same time and place of next district conference. Gladys Darling, secretary, Thorne, North Dakota.

NORTHERN SASKATCHEWAN.—With the Artland Branch, district presidency, associated with Elder J. W. Peterson, in charge. Ministerial reports read, and some reported verbally. Reports from branches: Artland 102, Battleford 24, Iowa 94, Minnesota 112, Rabbit Foot Lake 36, Senlac 48. Bishop's agent's report read and approved. Officers elected: President, W. J. Cornish; vice presidents, J. A. Beckman, C. E. Diggle; Bishop's agent, C. E. Diggle; historian, E. Leslie Mogg; secretary, Eva Land; treasurer, C. E. Diggle. Some fine sermons were preached by the following brethren: Richard Bullard, A. H. Mills, Birch Whiting, J. W. Peterson, J. A. Beckley. The conference was the best ever held in the district, the gift of prophecy being manifested several times, and was greatly enjoyed by all. W. J. Cornish, president; Eva Land, secretary.

SPOKANE.—At reunion grounds at Coeur d'Alene, Idaho, July 3, 1920, district presidency in charge. Statistical reports received from Spokane, Gifford, Valley, and Sagle Branches. The committee on revision of district conference resolutions reported that all former resolutions had been carefully gone over, and recommended a set of eight resolutions for the future government of the district. These were taken up separately, discussed and amended, and finally adopted as follows: (1) All members of the Melchisedec priesthood laboring in the district shall report their labors in writing to the district conferences. (2) Each branch in this district shall send a statistical report, made out on the official form provided, to the district secretary, not later than one week prior to conference. (3) Ministerial reports shall be read in detail. (4) All reports from committees shall be made in writing. (5) District conference shall meet at the call of the district presidency semiannually. (6) We approve of the principle of coordination. (7) All other previous district resolutions in the nature of laws or rules for the government of the district are hereby rescinded. (8) The Bishop's agent shall act as district treasurer. The appointment of W. W. Fordham as district historian was approved. W. F. Yates was elected district president; S. N. Gray, vice president, and Oliver Turnbull, secretary. Oscar Casé was elected to succeed himself as a member of the auditing board. Bishop's agents report read. A motion prevailed that the next conference be held at Spokane. Oliver Turnbull, clerk of district.

Our Departed Ones

COURTNEY.—Bessie Brooks Courtney was born January 30, 1897, Arlington, Iowa. Baptized August 18, 1907, at Edgewood, Iowa. Married Clifford John Courtney, October 28, 1916. Funeral from the church in Des Moines, in charge of H. Castings, sermon by A. E. Warr. Interment in Glendale Cemetery.

MIZE.—Joseph Thomas Mize was born April 24, 1886. Died June 14, 1920, of acute appendicitis. Baptized when 10 years old by Uncle Billy Booker. When taken with his last illness was working at Jonesboro, Louisiana. Funeral service at the home of his parents, Brother and Sister J. L. Mize, near Flomaton, Alabama. Sermon by D. M. Rudd.

CHURCH NEWS

The Saint Louis Religio, presided over by Sister Anna de Jong Smith, is offering a fine set of courses for class work, presented by well-trained instructors who are giving their time and talent for the good of the cause.

That their example may be an incentive to others, we reproduce here the courses offered and the instructors in charge:

Shorthand: Walter L. Wehrli, graduate Brown's Business College.

Oratory and Public Speaking, Ruth Loevy, post graduate of the Perry School of Oratory.

Gymnasium Work: Grace Billinsky, attendant at Saint Louis Teachers' College.

Millinery: Nina Lloyd, connected with the largest wholesale millinery house in the city.

Dressmaking: Jessie Eastman, head sample maker in a Saint Louis house, also a designer.

Religio Normal Work: J. J. Billinsky, superintendent normal department.

Regular Quarterly Study for Young People: R. Archibald, president Saint Louis District.

Regular Quarterly Study for Adults: Mrs. S. R. Burgess, assisted by Mrs. R. Archibald, head of Women's Department.

Junior Quarterly Study and Handcraft: Anna de Jong Smith, Graduate Saint Louis Teachers' College; and Saint Louis School for Church Workers.

The Regular Friday Theme will be in charge of G. S. Trowbridge, Religio field worker.

A short, pleasing program will follow the theme work each evening.

There will be no registration fee but each one is given an opportunity to contribute to the Religio budget as he feels able. Some courses will require the purchase of textbooks. No course is given unless there are at least ten selecting the course. Certificates will be granted to those who properly complete a course. Anyone over twelve years of age may select any course, but those under twelve will be expected to enroll in junior work.

Good results are being attained in tent meetings on the Kansas side in Kansas City by Elders Joseph Arber and Keith Rogers. The help afforded by the publicity department has been fruitful. Some baptisms have resulted. It is an excellent initial experience for Brother Rogers and wife, who are awaiting passports for South Africa.

The Saints of Plymouth, England, are anxious that any of the Saints who may be attending the Mayflower Tercentenary celebrations at that place next September make their presence known by calling at 65 Gibbon Street, Plymouth, where they will be directed to other addresses. The brother who thus represents the sentiment of the Saints, expressed in a recent business meeting, is F. J. Brookes, 30 Hanover Road, Laira, Plymouth, England. An extensive pageant will be presented by Plymouth people, in which from 800 to 1,000 will take part, the first date being September 1, and shown twice daily with exceptions of opening day and the 6th till the 11th.

Under date of July 17, President F. M. Smith writes from New York City: "Brother Williams reached here yesterday. He is somewhat the worse for wear contingent upon the trans-continental journey. Got passports issued yesterday and am ready for sailing, as I have sailing permit. About twenty thousand such permits are granted each week, at New York customs house."

Mrs. Emma Savage, branch clerk, 520 West Oak Street, Fort Collins, Colorado, would like the address of Brother D. C. Clevenger.

Since the arrival of the structural steel for the new college building in connection with the Graceland building extension plan, the work on the building which had been delayed for a number of weeks has been proceeding rapidly. Most of the material seems to be on the ground and it is hoped that it may be ready for occupancy sometime this fall.

Graceland College has purchased a new Simplex motion picture machine to be used in connection with the proposed new building for a recreational center, authorized at the late General Conference, and arrangements have been made whereby Lamoni Branch may use it for outdoor picture projection. A booth is to be constructed and motion pictures in the church park each Friday evening, and already a series of ten stereopticon lectures on "A better America" by Newell Dwight Hillis have begun for Sunday evenings.

Elder E. E. Long writes from Wagner, South Dakota, that he was supposed to be working among the Indians but found such a fine interest among the white people at Wagner that he could not resist holding some meetings. And in spite of the foul murder of Walter Stafford while domiciled with him, which upset the neighborhood for a time, the interest is growing and there are several baptisms announced, all strangers to the work heretofore.

Sister Emma B. Burton, who for sometime has been visiting at the home of her daughter in Nauvoo, writes that she intends to start August 3 on her return trip to California. She will travel alone. She mentions her personal interest in the new serial in Autumn Leaves, "Hoagath, son of Jacob," and that there seems a general interest in the story. She also notes with gratification the effect the Boy Scout work is having on the boys in the Nauvoo District.

A new serial will begin in the second number in August of the Stepping Stones, a Graceland story entitled "Under the navy and gold," by the editor, Estella Wight. A six-chapter story for Oriole girls, entitled "Fidelity," will begin in a few weeks.

An interesting feature of the Lamoni Stake reunion that we would like to see duplicated at many reunions, is a schedule of volley ball games for various afternoons during the reunion period, between teams from five Religios of the stake. Some are to be held between usual services, with others given special time on recreation days of the program.

On Saturday evening, July 24, at the home of the bride's parents, occurred the wedding of George Anway and Miss Marjorie Gunsolley. Brother Anway is well known as a singer, having a part in the rendition of the oratorios at Lamoni this year and the baritone singer in the Graceland College quartet. Sister Gunsolley, daughter of J. A. Gunsolley, taught typewriting at Graceland the past year. J. F. Garver officiated.

We have an opening for some one to engage in an electrically-equipped shoe-repairing shop with shoe stock, which will require $3,000 capital. Sufficient business to keep two men busy. The business last year netted $3,000. Benjamin R. McGuire.

FROM THE BRANCHES

Trenton, Missouri. "On College Avenue the L. D. S. church people are beautifying their church grounds. Their grounds have a frontage of 126 feet and a depth of 118 feet. At the front of the grounds large flower beds have been made and these will soon show flowers, the first one red, another white, the third blue. Each bed forms a letter, 'L. D. S.' The lawn is kept nicely trimmed. In one spot the grass is permitted to grow in the form of a star of considerable size. In another spot a cross is formed by shaping the growth of grass. The rest of the grounds is rows of flowers. The entire grounds are to be further ornamented by having a low hedge surrounding them. The whole will make a color effect delightful to the eye and should be a sermon in shrubs, grass, flowers. It is the intention to paint the exterior of the church building and to make extensive interior improvements. When these things are done the grounds and church building will add greatly to College Avenue."—Trenton Republican.

Wiley, Colorado. Nine were baptized recently and the Saints are confident they can do their share in the 20,000 converts before next conference. A recent attack on the church by a young minister of another church resulted in a published statement by the Saints that he could have the local church for the purpose of proving his contention that there was secret affiliation between ourselves and the Utah Church, but there has been no response. At a pie social Elder Charles May was appointed as treasurer, and at the close was told to keep the $36 he had taken in. The choir is prospering under the leadership of a competent instructor. Wiley expects to send at least one young man to Graceland this year.

Tunnel Hill, Illinois. The Saints held a very good all-day meeting on July 4, including patriotic program with addresses and music. Preaching is held about every Saturday and Sunday evening. The branch is taking a new lease of life under the direction of Elder L. C. Moore.

Bisbee, Arizona. Among the spiritual activities we note two regular preaching services every Sunday except the first Sunday in the month, when we observe the sacrament of the Lord's supper at 11 o'clock. Then we have Religio and Sunday school every Sunday, and prayer meeting on Wednesday night. The attendance at Sunday school has increased since we have been holding our meetings in the Women's Club Building where we have plenty of room for our classes.

The Clarion Call of Your President and Leader

"For long your leader has been calling for education; calling for it with a vigor and a zeal that was backed by an intuitive knowledge—I can go further and say an inspired knowledge that things were before this church, the imminence of which was not at the time appreciated, that have now plunged this church in the midst of a time that we have been hoping our people would be prepared for."

WHAT IS YOUR REPLY?

"I plead that the education of the people of the church go on with ever-increasing speed."

Propositions for Debate

In a recent number we gave some attention to the question of debates. Propositions constitute an important item in every debate. Some rather interesting propositions have come to our desk since the former article was written. Here, for instance, is a copy of ten propositions submitted to Elder Philemon Pement by Elder Nephi Jensen, representing the Utah Mormon Church:

"Questions for debate between Elder Nephi Jensen and Philemon Pement:

"1. Resolved, that the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints teaches the doctrine of Deity taught in the Bible. Pement affirms. Jensen denies.

"2. Resolved, that the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints teaches the doctrine of Deity taught in the Bible. Pement denies. Jensen affirms.

"3. Resolved, that the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints follows all the teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith in its practice of the principle of salvation for the dead. Pement denies. Jensen affirms.

"4. Resolved, that the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints does not follow the teaching of Joseph Smith the prophet in her practice of the principle of salvation for the dead. Pement denies. Jensen affirms.

"5. Resolved, that the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints through its authorized history and its authorized publications has admitted that Joseph Smith the prophet was a polygamist. Pement denies. Jensen affirms.

"6. Resolved, that Brigham Young at the time of the death of the Prophet Joseph Smith the prophet held the Holy Melchisedec priesthood and was an apostle of the Lord Jesus Christ. Pement denies. Jensen affirms.

"7. Resolved, that Joseph Smith the president of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints in his lifetime held the Melchisedec priesthood and the apostleship. Pement affirms. Jensen denies.

"8. Resolved, that under the law of God the office of president of the church descends from father to son. Pement affirms. Jensen denies.

"9. Resolved, that Brigham Young was the true successor of Joseph Smith as president of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. Jensen affirms. Pement denies.

"10. Resolved, that Joseph Smith the son of the Prophet Joseph Smith was the true successor of his father as president of the true church. Jensen denies. Pement affirms."

Brother Pement very properly refused to sign these propositions. Some of them are reversed, others illogical, and all of them in a loose-jointed way amble over a great deal of territory without covering any of it very well. A common error of the inexperienced is noted in proposition number four. Jensen proposes to affirm a negative. He asks Pement to deny a negative. But Jensen gives the matter one extra twist never before attempted. Not only does he ask Pement to deny a negative, he asks him to deny it before it is affirmed. He puts the negative first. In fact in four other propositions he puts the negative first. Evidently it never occurred to him that in debate a thing must be affirmed before it is denied. In orderly debate, the affirmative must always set up its case first.

Evidently the trick of putting proposition number four in negative form is due in this instance to inexperience. We prefer at least to think it a blunder. But it is a practice that frequently is resorted to in order to escape affirmation. It is easy to attack the other man's position, to riddle him with argument, or cover him and his church or doctrine with ridicule; that is a picnic that many a peripatetic polemic is willing to indulge in at any time for fifty dollars and expenses. But to set up one's own church and defend it, to put up affirmative, constructive argument, and meet an offensive on one's own ground is quite another matter. Many prefer the German policy, to keep the warfare always on enemy territory. But fair religious controversy requires that both sides shall set up their claims and take turn about at affirmation. To escape this, while seeming to comply with it, the expedient of affirming a negative is adopted.

To illustrate: R. C. Evans issued a challenge to President F. M. Smith. He submitted four propositions of his own framing. They were very good propositions—from his standpoint. In three of the propositions he put President Smith directly in the affirmative. That was most generous indeed—to Evans, as it relieved him of any necessity to defend his own newly established church, or any religious convictions which he may have still retained within his own bosom. In the other one of the four, Evans ostensibly took the affirmative. But what did he affirm? He attacked the character and teaching of Joseph Smith the Martyr. He required President Smith to affirm and defend, while he denied and attacked, exactly as in the other three propositions, only this proposition was inverted so as to fool the inexperienced and gullible. At no point did he bind himself to defend his own cause and at that some wondered why President Smith did not accept the challenge.

In honorable warfare a man expects to take blows as well as to give them. We should insist on well-balanced propositions that compel our opponent to spend half his time in defense of his own cause. For that reason it is not advisable to meet religious tramps who have no cause to defend. In other words straight church propositions should be the rule.

Counter propositions drafted by Elder J. F. Curtis were submitted to Elder Jensen. So that comparison may be made, they are here reproduced:

"No. 1. Resolved, that Joseph Smith, the son of Joseph Smith, jr., was the legal successor to his father as president of the church, and that the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, with headquarters at Lamoni, Iowa, and Independence, Missouri, is the lawful continuation of the original church organized in 1830, and is in harmony therewith in doctrine, organization, and practice.

"The Reorganized Church affirms.....

"Utah Mormon Church denies.....

"No. 2. Resolved, that Brigham Young was the legal successor to Joseph Smith, jr., as president of the church which the said Joseph Smith, jr., founded in 1830; and that the church in Utah called the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is the lawful continuation of and successor to the said church, and is in harmony therewith in doctrine, organization, and practice.

"The Utah Mormon Church affirms.....

"The Reorganized Church denies.....

"Standard of Appeal"

"The Bible, the Book of Mormon, and the Doctrine and Covenants up to the year of 1876, shall be the standards of evidence; other books and periodicals may be used, but shall stand on their own merits.

"Time, place, and rules to govern discussion to be mutually arranged.

"Each disputant shall put into the hands of his opponent an epitome of the faith and doctrine of the church he represents at least ten days before the discussion begins.

"Should the contingency arise each signatory to these propositions shall have the right to substitute some one to take his place.

"Respectfully submitted,

"Address:"

These propositions may not be perfect, but they are much better than the ones submitted by Elder Jensen. They are comprehensive. They are fair and well balanced. Both sides have an equal chance. They cover all the grounds at issue in few and easily understood terms. E. A. S.

Early Ideals of the Church

IV.—Marriage and the Home

The true church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints has always taught, still teaches, and always will teach that monogamy is the true system of marriage. The ideal home is built on the idea of one wife to one man, and one husband devoted entirely to one wife; the marriage covenant to be held sacred until death.

Even our friends of the Utah faction at times inadvertently admit the force of that statement. The Liahona, the Elders' Journal, official organ of their missions in the United States, published at Independence, Missouri, in the issue for February 19, 1910, had as its leading number an article entitled, "The ideal home." It was by Reed Smoot, and originally was an address delivered in the Tabernacle, at Salt Lake City, October 4, 1909.

It seems a little strange that after advertising the beauties and glories of polygamy for so many years, when they wanted a real good article on the "ideal home" they turned to a man who has only one wife and who is reputed to desire no more. Why not get the article from the pen of some one of the many polygamists?

Possibly they would spoil the effect. Reed Smoot says that he has never left home a single time, from his wedding day until now, without kissing his wife good-by. Imagine him saying, "I never leave home without kissing ten of them good-by." His daily passage to the front gate would be a long and noisy celebration.

One writer has defined a harem as "a bunch of firesides organized into a trust." Let these other gentlemen write on "How to corner the great American fireside"; but if an article on the ideal home is desired, by all means turn to Reed Smoot, who has but one wife and is content.

There can be no good citizenship separate from a high ideal of family life. No nation can become great unless its homes are kept pure and sacred. In his book, Elements of Sociology, Frank W. Blackmar, Ph. D., says of the family:

"The center from which flow all the impulses of social life. Here is the vital institution for the propagation and perpetuation of the race. . . . It is the most complete and perfectly organized group, from which radiate the tender sympathies and the refining impulses of life. It is the source of the larger brotherhood of humanity."

Our Standard Books Upon Marriage

Communities into which we carry the gospel have a right to ask us concerning the attitude of the church toward marriage and the home. It is an important question.

We refer them directly to the standard books of the church. First we go to the Bible, and in its opening chapters we read of the institution of marriage as established by God himself in the Garden of Eden. Adam and Eve were the high contracting parties. The whole wide world was waiting to be peopled, yet God chose to found the race on monogamy; and he evidently intends to continue as he began, for every utterance from that day until now confirms the system there established. He could not now establish any other system without squarely repudiating former utterances, which of course would be an abdication of his high throne as the unchangeable God, an alternative forever barred from consideration.

Second, we refer the inquirer to the Book of Mormon, noted in the minds of some, notorious in the minds of others, yet by all accepted as representative of the church. In it we read:

"There shall not any man among you have save it be one wife; and concubines he shall have none: for I, the Lord God, delighteth in the chastity of women."—Book of Jacob 2: 36.

Our next reference is to the Book of Doctrine and Covenants in which are the revelations that came through Joseph Smith and helped shape the early ideals of the church. In section 49, paragraph 3, we read:

"And again, I say unto you, that, whoso forbiddeth to marry, is not ordained of God, for marriage is ordained of God unto man; wherefore it is lawful that he should have one wife, and they twain shall be one flesh, and all this that the earth might answer the end of its creation; and that it might be filled with the measure of man, according to his creation before the world was made."

The statement is emphatic: "Marriage is ordained of God unto man." There is a growing sentiment in the world that marriage is a civil contract—only that and nothing more. Before a magistrate representing the state a man and woman make a contract to live together. They keep the contract until one or both tire of it and then it is at an end. Or as one writer expresses it, men and women hire a companion until they tire of him or her, and it is merely, "hire, tire, fire."

Such is not and was not the idea of the church. Marriage is regarded as a sacred institution ordained of God in which with his approval a man and a woman make a most solemn covenant to continue as husband and wife as long as both shall live.

The form of the marriage covenant as adopted by the church in 1835 (Doctrine and Covenants 111:2) is as follows:

"Marriage should be celebrated with prayer and thanksgiving; and at the solemnization, the persons to be married, standing together, the man on the right, and the woman on the left, shall be addressed, by the person officiating, as he shall be directed by the Holy Spirit; and if there be no legal objections, he shall say, calling each by their names: "You both mutually agree to be each other's companion, husband and wife, observing the legal rights belonging to this condition; that is, keeping yourselves wholly for each other, and from all others, during your lives." And when they have answered "Yes," he shall pronounce them "husband and wife" in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and by virtue of the laws of the country and authority vested in him."

Our Church Demands Fidelity From Both

This is a clear recognition of mutual duties and rights. No pledge is required of one that is not required of the other.

Men of the world feel that they have a right to demand a fidelity of their wives that they are not prepared to give in return. Doctors and legislators advise them that man's nature is such that he cannot be expected to remain continent, as the wife does. And so a man will spend six nights of the week with his affinity. Coming home on the seventh he finds that his wife has been conducting an intrigue during his absence. He immediately becomes highly incensed, has a "brainstorm," and murders his wife and her paramour. Then twelve good men and true acquit him because of the "unwritten law." What is this "unwritten law"? It is that a man may trail his own honor in the dregs of hell; but if his wife "dishonors" him he may seek vengeance as seems good to him.

But it should not be called the unwritten law. It is to be found in the famous revelation on polygamy as published by the Utah church, in the paragraph that reads:

"And if he have ten virgins given unto him by this law, he cannot commit adultery, for they belong to him, and they are given unto him, therefore is he justified. But if one or either of the ten virgins, after she is espoused, shall be with another man; she hath committed adultery, and shall be destroyed."

Here we find the idea boldly advocated that man may go to any length in collecting, arranging, and classifying his affinities, but if one of any of these "weaker" vessels goes astray, something will drop, some one be destroyed. It is the old story and it may be read any day in the newspapers.

The law of the church just quoted recognizes and demands absolute fidelity from both. The wife promises to keep herself for her husband and from all others. The husband promises to keep himself for his wife and from all others.

The Two Should Be Mutual Helps

The promise is also exacted to observe all the rights belonging to such conditions. There are rights and duties, dissimilar in nature, devolving upon each. When these duties are evaded by one or both or when one or both seek to enjoy all of the privileges without due return, trouble ensues.

It is said that a young couple who were about to be married were talking matters over. Said he, "Dearest, do you think you can live on my twenty-five dollars per week?"

"Yes, Jack," she replied, "I think I can, but what will you do?"

This reflects an attitude of mind altogether too common. The husband is the dollar machine and grinds out the cash needed to pay for style and social standing, while at home the servants do the work. Perhaps we have few women in the church who are willing to sell their immortal souls to get "into society," but there are many such in the world.

Marriage should be a working combination. If it is right that a man should provide food and a home it is right that a woman should prepare that food and care for that home. The task cannot wholly be shifted to the shoulders of servants. The woman who willfully turns her back on home duties to take the trail of locoed fashion is no true wife to her husband, for a wife is a helpmate.

Man Should Have But One Wife

In conclusion we desire to present one more quotation from the Book of Doctrine and Covenants:

"Thou shalt love thy wife with all thy heart, and shall cleave unto her and none else; and he that looketh upon a woman to lust after her, shall deny the faith, and shall not have the Spirit; and if he repent not, he shall be cast out."
—42: 7.

If a man loves his wife with all his heart it is impossible for him to love some other woman with a part of his heart. If he cleaves unto her and none else he cannot cleave to one or a half dozen others.

Church Ideals Summarized

The whole tenor of the church law, from which we have so liberally quoted, and upon which the church's ideal of marriage is founded, is unalterably opposed to the forms of polygamy upheld in Utah, Turkey, India, and elsewhere, and the various more or less veiled forms of polygamy and concubinage indulged in by others the world over.

In the series of editorials of which this is the last number we have shown that the church stands for good citizenship. It holds that, pending the second coming of Christ to rule and regulate in person, men and women must be subject to the laws of their respective governments. As regards the particular land in which the church was organized and where the gathering is to be, it holds that it was long ago designated by God as a choice land of liberty and that God directed the men who founded the government and established the Constitution. It holds that men and women should be industrious; that they should abstain from all forms of strong drink and tobacco; that they should pay their debts; that they should live in peace, not returning evil for evil; that they should be studious, seeking the highest education, by study and by faith.

It holds to the old, Biblical idea of the sacredness of the marriage covenant.

As regards marriage we believe that the ideal home is found where one woman as wife and one man as husband live in mutual trust and fidelity, carefully rearing their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord to take their places as good citizens of the community and good members of the church. Such homes are the pillars of the community. We believe that there are many such in the church; and we are optimistic enough to believe that there are many such in the world, among the honorable men and women of the world.

If any who are not members of the church have followed these articles we trust that their minds have been disabused of the absurd and false notions that some have instilled into the minds of the people concerning the ideals of the church.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

Bishop McGuire in Western Canada

At the solicitation of Elder J. W. Peterson, Bishop B. R. McGuire recently made a trip into the western Canada provinces in the interests of church work, visiting his agents at several places and appearing at the conference at Ribstone (Alberta District) and Radville (Southern Saskatchewan District). He preached twice at each of the conferences at Ribstone and Radville, and personally visited the branches at Regina, Saskatoon, Artland, and Weyburn.

"His preaching as preaching was marked by unusual liberty and power, and good audiences and attention were noticeable," writes Brother Arthur H. Mills, who was with him. "At the Saturday evening service of the Radville conference an audience mostly of outsiders greeted him but he rose to the occasion and preached a fine 'outsider' sermon. A general missionary present on the occasion was heard to remark: 'Just listen to the Bishop. He's preaching a regular proselyting sermon.'

"He made many friends for his department on this trip. The Canadian Saints seemed to 'take' to him heartily and he went among them like he was accustomed to them all his life. Under his preaching they got a better understanding of some of the church's ideals regarding Zion, redemption, stewardship, etc. He left this district in company with the writer, going as far as Minot, North Dakota, when he took train for Salt Lake City. From there he goes to Omaha and then home."

Brother Mills writes interestingly of his trip in the interests of the Department of Music, and his letter appears in The Staff department of this issue.

Hindu Festivals

It is well known to all students of church history, of folklore and comparative mythology, that all of our festivals of the present time have, at least to some extent, a heathen origin. The significance has been made Christian, but the time at which they are held goes far back into antiquity and has usually been associated at some time at least, with certain heathen practices.

A study of the history of the early Christian church will show that the church, in its efforts to reach the people of Southern Europe, adopted many of their practices and festivals, and because of this, to a large extent Christianity became corrupted.

It is of interest, therefore, to note, in the Literary Digest for March 27, the urgent appeal of certain missionaries in India, that Christian feasts should be made of the Hindu festivals, and that the usual festivals of Europe, Christmas and the Christmas tree, April Fool, and the May tree, etc., should be dropped. An extract from The Challenge of London follows:

"All over (Hindu) India the Dipavali feast is kept at the beginning of the cold weather. It is in commemoration of the victory of Vishnu over a certain demon, and is symbolical of the triumph of light over darkness. The word means 'a row of lamps,' and every house is illuminated; even the poorest boasts its single little flickering lamp, while cheerful boys let off squibs and crackers in the streets. The fact that the feast is connected with a Hindu (quite possibly the legend was invented to explain the already existing feast) need not deter Christian people from celebrating it as the triumph of light over darkness, knowledge over ignorance, truth over error, using the same symbol of the lighted lamp. Again, another day in the year, varying according to locality, is set apart as a day of thanksgiving to the oxen who have toiled in the fields, and to whose labor the ingathered harvest is largely due. All oxen that day are given a rest from work—get an especially nice meal, and in the evening they are led in procession about the village with painted and gilded horns and other adornments. Why should this charming and truly oriental form of harvest thanksgiving not be incorporated with the Christian custom of holding services of thanksgiving to God? The element of cattle worship which enters into the Hindu method of celebration is not an integral part of it, and could easily be dropped out.

"Again, the universal holiday and rejoicings on Makara Samkranti, the winter solstice, might well be retained by Indian Christians. This is another of the seasonable feasts, arising naturally out of the sense of gladness and relief at having passed the shortest day, and entered upon the season of lengthening days and increasing warmth. Everyone experiences this sense of gladness, in a greater or less degree; why should it not find outward expression? The manner of celebrating this day varies in different parts of India. In western India one custom, both quaint and cheerful, is to give one's friends a handful of sugared sesamum seed, with the words: 'Take my sweets, and speak me sweetly.' It is the sign for a desire that friendships should continue unbroken by quarrels throughout the year, a more than satisfactory equivalent of the western New-Year card, and no one need be suspected of indulging in sun worship who observes it."

The effort to understand the festivals and ideals of the people among whom they are laboring is an excellent one. One should understand not only the language, but also the religion, the symbolism, and the ideas involved in the symbolism. The fundamental truths should be shown to be a part of the Christian religion.

On the other hand, the Christian church does not want to adopt wholesale the myths and ideas which have come out of paganism, but may show their more ancient Christian significance in many instances.

There are in every religion in the world important truths which should be conserved, and our teaching should begin with a recognition of the truths which the people already possess, and then attempt to educate them to something higher and better.

Subjects Being Discussed

John Bull Pays for Healthy Babies

John Bull believes that healthy babies make strong men, and is willing to pay for them, according to reports recently received by the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor. In 1918 grants made by the national government in support of infant welfare work in England and Wales amounted to about $1,150,000, which represents one-half of approved expenditure for welfare centers, "health visitors," maternity care, and similar work for mothers and children.

The number of health centers increased from 850 in 1917, to 1,550 in June, 1919, over one half of them supported entirely by public funds. Attendance at the centers has also shown a phenomenal increase. One center in Gloucester, which in 1918 received 263 expectant mothers, had 932 on its rolls in 1919.

As a result, it is thought, of public protection of maternity and infancy, the infant mortality rate for England and Wales for 1918 is 94. There was no increase over 1917 even under the adverse conditions of war and influenza.

The 1918 infant mortality rate for the United States birth registration area, just published, is 101, 7 points higher than the rate for the preceding year.

Children's Bureau investigations have shown that Uncle Sam's babies die because they and their mothers do not have skilled care. Until such care is made available, as in England, for all women in all parts of the country, regardless of economic standing, no great decline in the infant mortality rate may be expected.

Minimum Income

The report before the Department of Child Welfare of the Children's Bureau Conference, held in May and June, 1919, states as the minimum for the average family, $932 to $1,354 per year. This does not, however, include insurance, or books or magazines, nor the extras collected with emergencies—christenings, marriages, or extreme sicknesses; nor is any allowance made for charitable gifts, or contributions to the church. The figures were based upon ordinary human well being, not a just wage but the minimum for charitable help. They also found that infant mortality increased as the father's wage decreased.

In Chicago those working on the problem figured that it takes $1,500 a year to buy the essentials for an average family of five.

W. Jett Lauck, consulting economist for the United Mine Workers of America, has from careful consideration of the subject of family needs decided that it requires $2,200 a year for proper maintenance of a family in the anthracite mining regions of Pennsylvania.

Does God Answer Prayer?

BY T. W. WILLIAMS

A vigorous and pungent discourse on a subject of vital interest to every son and daughter of God.

(A sermon preached at the Stone Church, Independence, Missouri, May 16, 1920, reported by Howard W. Harder.)

"After this manner therefore pray ye; Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us. And suffer us not to be led into temptation but deliver us from evil. For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen."

This prayer was given by Jesus to his disciples as a model. He said: "After this manner pray ye." This prayer is a literary classic. For conciseness and clearness, for expressiveness and simplicity, it cannot be excelled. It begins: "Our Father." Not "My Father" but "Our Father." Then follows the salutation: "Hallowed be thy name." The thing uppermost in mind comes next. "Thy kingdom come." This is followed by an expression of self-surrender—a subordination of self: "Thy will be done." Not "my will" but "thy will" be done. The next sentence implies dependence, a willingness to trust God for spiritual, mental, and physical food: "Give us this day our daily bread." This is followed by introspection: Lord, treat me as I treat others. "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us." The next paragraph is the soul's cry for companionship and protection: "Suffer us not to be led into temptation but deliver us from evil." The prayer closes with a great peroration, a fitting climax to this all-inclusive petition: "For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen."

I wish to read in this connection a short excerpt from one of Tennyson's poems.

"More things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of;
Wherefore let thy voice
Rise like a fountain for me day and night,
For what are men better than sheep or goats
That nourish a blind life within the brain
If, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer,
Both for themselves, and those who call them friends;
For so the whole round earth in every way
Bound by gold chains about the feet of God."

My theme is prayer. Before we can intelligently discuss this vital subject it will be necessary to supply a definition of God. It is quite impossible for man to pray intelligently unless he has some conception of the character and purpose of the Being he worships. He cannot center his thoughts on nothing.

Views on God

Varied views are held concerning God. Some hold to the idea of an absentee God—a God who exists somewhere in the universe. These people are not quite sure of his location. Some relegate him "beyond the bounds of time and space." Others say he is in heaven. Some place him in Nirvana. In any case the location is vague and uncertain.

Such people hold that God rules the universe by his will; that things are right or wrong by divine fiat; that God knows all things from all eternity, and, knowing all things he has predetermined the end from the beginning. It follows that he must be arbitrary in his rulings and that he works according to the mandate of his own mind.

Another school postulates God as becoming; that his knowledge is limited; that he does not know all things; that he learns by experience; that he is constantly progressing; that his mind and purpose can be changed through the importuning of human beings providing they are persistent in their demands.

Another class of people hold that God is transcendent; that he is imminent. They affirm that he exists within and not without his universe and that the universe is dependent upon his indwelling power.

God Is Imminent

If God is confined to a place he cannot be imminent. If he is limited to conditions he cannot be transcendent. In order that you may know where I stand I will affirm that God is both imminent and transcendent. God is not (he could not be) an absentee God. He is everywhere within his universe. I reiterate God is everywhere. We cannot conceive of the universe without postulating God. To think of the universe presupposes God.

This does not mean that God is impersonal. God is inseparable from his universe. All life is dependent upon him. There is no independent life in the universe. There is no independent life in heaven, or in earth, or beneath the earth. You may span the heavens; you may reach the "utmost bound of the everlasting hills," you may "take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the earth"; you may "dwell in hell," yet nowhere will you find life that is independent of God.

If we could find such life it would mean that God is not imminent; it would prove that he is not transcendent. It would show that he has not complete dominion throughout the universe. True, sentient beings have their field of activity. They have their individual life. They are still dependent upon God.

I wish to read a quotation from Wordsworth which fits in here. Wordsworth says:

"I have felt
A presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts; a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused;
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean and the living air
And the blue sky and in the mind of men
A motion and a spirit, that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thought
And rolls through all things."

Universal Rule of God

You ask me: "How can God be everywhere and still be personal?" I answer, by his power, by his wisdom, by his love, by his goodness, by his will, by his authority, by his Spirit. President Wilson is here to-night. He is not here in person. He is here in power. He is here in all the attributes of his office as the chief magistrate of the United States. He is operating here to-night through the means which are at his command. As president of the United States his authority, his power, his administration, extends throughout the confines of the United States.

While it is a long sweep from the human to the divine and my illustration may be somewhat crude, still my premise is correct. God by his power, by his authority, by his supreme will, is everywhere present. No one can invade his authority; no one can transcend his power; no one can supersede his will.

God Answers All Prayers

God is immutable. He cannot change. He is omniscient. He knows all things from all eternity. He works by law. That law is a part of himself.

Does God answer prayer? This question has been asked throughout all the ages. You have asked this question many times. Sometimes you have felt that he does answer prayer. Sometimes you have been led to think that he does not. It all depends on the conditions at the time you pray and the immediate results growing out from your prayer.

Despite your conclusions or experiences; despite my own experiences, I affirm that God always answers prayer. There is no exception. God answers all prayers. I am not referring to hypocritical cant. I mean real, genuine prayers. I refer to the impulse of the soul as it reaches up to God and pleads for communion, for guidance, and for help. No prayers to God go unanswered. There never has been a prayer voiced by the tongue of man; there never has been an expressed or unuttered desire that has not been answered. No other position is possible. Postulate God as a loving and just and merciful being and the above conclusion is inevitable.

Does Not Give Us What We Want

"If God answers prayer, does he give me what I want?" I answer, Never, never, never! "Does God ever give me what I want?" I answer, Never. "Is it not true that sometimes he permits us to have what we want?" Yes, but he does not give this to us. When we, in asking, make demands to have the thing which God does not want us to have, and persist in having this thing, we then part company with God. God does not depart entirely from us. He never forgets us. When we leave him he still stands within the shadow. He awaits our evolution. He is always willing to help us. He cannot follow us when we leave him. When we return to the point where we left him we will find him waiting.

You ask, "Suppose we want what God wants, will he not give us then what we want?" No, for it thereby becomes not our wish but his own. Whenever what we want agrees with what God wants, and we receive the same, it is not our want but his want which counts. God never gives us what we want. He may permit us to have the thing we ask for in order that we may learn obedience by what we suffer.

Not an Information Bureau

Prayer is not an information bureau. Prayer is not telling God something. You can talk with God. You can commune with him. You cannot add to his information. You cannot break in upon God and surprise him. You cannot tell him anything which he does not know better than you do. God's knowledge is absolute. His capacity to know is unlimited. Everything IS to him. Your most secret purpose, your innermost thought, is an open book to him.

May I suggest that it would be an excellent thing for you not to forget this when you approach God in prayer? Nine tenths of all the prayers that are offered are of this kind. When you kneel in the silence of your own bed chamber tonight in prayer take note of your every expression. You will realize the powerful force of habit. You will be surprised and humiliated when you learn that the majority of all of your prayers are a recital of things which God knows better than you do. It will take some time to discipline your mind so that your approach to God may be properly made. Habit is a strong thing to overcome. Persist, and in time you will be able to pray aright. When praying it is well to remember that "God is in heaven and thou art upon the earth, therefore let thy words be few." (Ecclesiastes 5: 2.)

Cannot Break in on God

Do not try to break in upon God. Do not attempt to add to his information. Do not make the season of prayer an occasion for gossip. Trying to tell God something is not prayer. It is not within the province of man to spring any surprises on God or to convey any information to him which he does not already understand and appreciate.

We mortals think we understand ourselves better than anyone else. We like to tell our own side of the question. You cannot tell God your side of the question. He knows your side before you attempt to tell him. He knows your side better than you do yourself. He knows your side of the question just as it is and not as you would have it to be. He sees you without any rouge or make-up. He sees into your innermost parts. He knows your purpose. He knows your secret intent. Make-believe has no effect on God. At best your vision is dwarfed. Your opinions are oftentimes prejudiced. Your viewpoint is frequently narrow and obstructed. You see through human eyes. You see things with yourself as the center, and the universe—incidental.

God, on the other hand, views your condition as it is related to all the rest of the universe. God does not think of you by yourself. He views your condition and needs as they are related to all the rest of the universe. He views the universe as a unit. He cannot isolate you. He cannot consider your desires and wishes separate and apart from the desires and wishes of the whole universe.

Must Bring Humanity With You

You cannot possibly come to God unless you bring the whole universe with you. You cannot come to God unless you bring the rest of humanity with you. You should not expect God to help to carry your burden unless you are willing to share the burdens of the whole world. You cannot bring your burden to God and expect relief unless, at the same time, you are helping to lift the burdens of the world. The man who so far forgets his relation to the universe as to crave some special consideration is not in a position to receive any consideration from God.

The Golden Rule should govern in prayer. Do not ask God to do anything for you which you would not ask him to do for another in like condition.

If you, in your appreciation of the wonderful power of God in ruling within his universe, will bear in mind that God cannot interpose his power to give you some special privilege or do violence to the rest of the universe you will then sense the divine harmony. It is a much higher mental and spiritual state to be in harmony with God than to ask God to be in harmony with us.

After this manner pray ye: "O God, help me to come to you. I do not ask that you come down where I am. Assist me to rise to that point where I can meet you. Lord, help me to change myself to be more like you. Help me to submerge my will in yours. Give me that which is best for me. I leave myself in your hands. Do for me and with me as seemeth best to you."

Purpose of Prayer

The purpose of prayer is that we become attuned to the divine. If I am in tune with God I will be in tune with the universe. Prayer helps us to find ourselves. It enables us to know others. It saves us from ourselves. It brings us into harmony with the universe.

You cannot change God's mind. Have you ever tried to do this? I frankly admit that in the days of my ignorance I attempted to do this thing. The Jews at one time tried to change God's mind. They failed. It is impossible to change God. Sometimes you may think that you have succeeded in doing so. You will eventually discover that God is immovable. Do not try to change God. The purpose of prayer is to change yourself.

The little boy who goes to his mother and begs, and coaxes, and pleads, and pouts sometimes influences his mother to yield to his pleadings. Mother, however, is human. God is divine. Mother is susceptible to our whims and our caprices. Her knowledge is limited. God is above and beyond all pleading or coaxing or blandishment. He is not afraid of us. He knows what is best for us.

Some would like very much to interpret the parable of the "judge which feared not God, neither regarded man" and the importuning woman as applying to God and his relation with humanity. It does not represent God. It relates simply to the attitude of a human judge. Christ showed that, if a human judge could be moved to action by the constant entreaty of a woman, how much more would God move in the interests of those who rightly deserved his help. In the comparison everything is against the continuous importuning of the woman. This parable illustrates human limitations and divine possibilities. You recall the parable. The woman plead and entreated until the judge became impatient and, in order to get rid of her, he did what she asked him to do. This is not true of God.

We may coax and entreat until God leaves us to ourselves. We may even get what we want but, in doing so, God permits but he does not grant. He allows but he does not bestow. God permitted Israel to have a king. It was not according to his wish. It was not God's king. It was Israel's king. God allowed the Jews to have their own way. They suffered the consequences. God's viewpoint on kings has never changed.

God Not Influenced by Man

It would be a chaotic universe if God could be influenced by man. You may get what you want. You may have your own way. You may persist until you realize your ambition. But in doing so you run counter to the higher forces. You forego communion for realization. You give up God for the thing you would have from God. You choose the shadow and discard the substance. You may drink the cup of selfish purpose but know this, oh, my brother, that the bitter dregs lie at the bottom of the cup. This is the penalty for having your own way.

You cannot move God to do what he has not already planned to do. God's foresight is equal to his hindsight. He governs by an unchangeable law. It may be a great comfort to feel that God is as a waiting maid ready always to do our bidding. It would prove a veritable calamity if it were true. As Ella Wheeler Wilcox has so aptly said:

"Could our desires
Voiced one by one,
In prayer ascend to God,
And come back as
Events shaped to our wish,
What chaos would result!"

Thank God it is not true. God does not wait on man; that is, he does not serve man. He does not serve human purpose. The combined will of humanity could not move him to do what he had willed not to do.

If prayer changes God, then God is limited in power and wisdom. There is no such thing as a miracle with God. God works by unalterable law. It is our ignorance which makes some things seem like miracles. The things which we now look upon as miracles are simple with God. The cosmic law of the universe is always operative. Cause and effect is the universal rule. "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he reap." Praying for miracles is asking that twice two will not be four.

Why We Love

A little boy goes to his mother and says: "Mother, I want a piece of bread and jam." The mother gives it to him whereupon he says, "Oh, mamma, how I love you." A few days later he comes to his mother and says, "Mamma, give me some bread and jam." She replies, "No, my son, it is not good for you now." He persists. She is obdurate. He then bursts out with, "Oh, I don't like you any more. You won't give me what I want." What does the little fellow love most, his mother or the jam? He loves the thing which he expects his mother to give him. We, big boys and girls, are prone to think of the things which God has the power to bestow and our worship consists in petitioning him to give us what we want. Many of the testimonies which we hear are based on what God has given. This is not true worship. It is not prayer. It is not love. It is selfishness. It reveals an ignorance of true worship.

Many of us still love jam. When you go to the Lord and ask him for something and he answers your prayer how happy you are! You approach your fellows and say, "See how good the Lord has been to me. I love him for what he has given to me." At another time you pray and pray but receive no answer. You mope around, bemoan your fate, and think God has forsaken you. You come to church with a long face; you bear your testimony and say, "I don't know whether I believe in this work or not. I do not know whether there is a God. I pray to him but I get no answer." What is the matter? Simply this: God has not given you the bread and jam you asked for. You have been oblivious to his purpose. Your selfishness has eclipsed your blessing. Your blindness has prevented recognition of the larger blessing of denial and crucifixion, of discipline and of trust. Oh, poor, misguided soul! Repent of your littleness. Forsake your selfish ways. Love God for his real sake. Love God because he is good, not because he gives you things. Love him because the good or God in you responds to the good or God in him. Love God for what he is, not for what he does.

My attention is called to the text, "We love God because he first loved us." Certainly. We do not love him because he gives us things. We would not know how to love if God had not loved us first. God sheds abroad in our hearts the principle of divine love—the spirit of communion. There is begotten in our hearts reciprocation—a desire to love him. God kindles in our hearts, the spark of divine love. The love of God comes flooding into our lives; its divine rays kindle in our souls the spark of divine love. Like begets like. Divine love begets divine love. There is no place for selfish purpose or sordid intent in love like this. It would be sacrilege under such conditions to ask for something for self.

Love Is Communion

Love is communion. It implies a longing to be with the object of our affection. It implies nearness, harmony, fellowship, endearment, becoming, doing, giving out, yearning, rest. Why does a man love his wife? I will not ask the men who are present to answer. I wonder if you will love your wife if she fails to satisfy your demands upon her! Will you love your wife if you are treated to soggy biscuits for breakfast, makeshifts for lunch, and tough steak for dinner? Do you love your wife for what she gives to you? Do you love her for what she does for you? Or do you love her for what she is? Do you love the external qualities which minister to your comfort or the internal qualities of her own soul? Do you love her as a companion or as a housekeeper? The man who really loves his wife will love her for what she is and not for what she does. The woman who loves her husband will love him for what he is and not for what he does.

True, if the wife has lovable qualities, her acts will be lovable. Real love goes beyond acts and finds character. If your wife is noble, her acts will be noble. But it is the nobility of her being which you adore. What is true of men and women is true of God. We love God for what he is and not for what he does. The purpose of religion is to enable us to know God—to know him as he is. This knowledge moves us to want to be like him—to be with him.

Prayer Is Not a Pulley

Prayer is not a pulley to pull God down to us. It is a lever to lift us up to God. Prayer is not the medium to change God. It is the means to change us. Prayer does not bring blessings down to us. Prayer can, and does, bring us up to the blessing.

Why ask God for things all of the time? Why specify? Jesus taught his disciples to pray, "Give us this day our daily bread," which means, Give me what I need to-day. There is no occasion that we indicate the entire menu. As James Whitcomb Riley has aptly said, "When God sends rain—rain is what I like." We can rightly say, "God, send such weather as you think best." We should then be satisfied with whatever kind of weather he sends. The asking here is more of confidence and trust than of specific petition. We may ask God to give us our daily bread and trust to his judgment as to what will comprise that bread. Specification savors of dictation. I may think I want palatable food. Coarse, plain food may be best for me. Why not say, "O God, if rye bread is better for me than cake, then let me have rye bread. It is not the thing which I like that I ask for, but the thing which I need. You know best what I need. Send me the things which I need. Help me to appreciate and use the things which you send to your glory and the good of humanity."

I repeat that it is not necessary to ask God for things. It is not necessary that we be specific. We need not enumerate all our wishes. Jesus Christ did not ask God for things as we do. He did ask for divine communion, for guidance, for power, for blessing to others. Hear him say: "Glorify me with thine own self—now come I to thee. The world hath not known thee, but I have known thee. Note also the burden of his heart: I pray for them. Keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me, that they may be one, as we are. Sanctify them through thy truth. For their sakes I sanctify myself that they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; and the glory which thou gavest me I have given them. I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one. Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am."

Think of Others First

When we pray we should think of everybody else first and of ourselves last. Jesus was so engrossed with the needs of the world that he had no time for personal sympathy. Jesus was just like a mother. When mother prepares dinner, what does she do? Does she sit down and eat what she wants, and then leave the rest for the other members of the family? No, when she has cared for everybody else in the house then she cares for herself. I recall the memory of my dear sainted mother. We were poor. My mother was a widow. She was compelled to wash for a living. I am not ashamed because of this. My father died when I was a small boy. I now recall times when, after her day's work was done, she would come home and nearly always bring my small sister and myself something. One time in particular comes to mind. She brought each of us a nice red, rosy apple which she had purchased at a sacrifice. How good those apples tasted! I was so engrossed in eating my apple that I overlooked that mother had none. In fact, I did not recall this until later in life when mother had gone to her reward. My mother thought of us first. She went without that we might possess. Was she worse or better off? Ah, mother had joy which we knew not of! The apple was for a moment. The unselfish devotion of motherhood is for eternity. God make us like our mothers! God make us like thee! To bring joy and blessing to others is greater than to have joy and blessing ourselves. When a man loves God before himself, when he loves humanity more than he does himself, when he thinks of the needs of others and foregoes his own satisfaction that others may have—he is close to divine communion. Selfish satisfaction and realization is of the earth, earthy. Selflessness is bliss.

Placing Others First

Real prayer is petitioning God to bless others first. It puts the most urgent needs first. When you approach the throne of God with a "me-and-my-wife, my-son-John-and-his-wife—us-four-and-no-more" attitude God will never hear you. The reason why so many of you are not receiving answers to your prayers is because you are selfish in your petitions. You are carrying your own burdens to the Lord. You are obsessed with your own troubles. You haven't time to think of others, you are engrossed in your own petty, selfish purposes. If you will concern yourselves with other's woes you will be surprised to see how quickly your own will dissipate. Many, many times I have gone to my bed, tired and weary in body and mind, when some one has called me out of bed to go and administer to some sick brother or sister. The phone has rung and a voice speaks: "Brother Williams, my wife is very sick, can't you come and administer to her?" To do so required that I go miles on a street car. It meant that I would get no sleep that night. My flesh said, "Tell him you are too tired, you are not able to come." My spirit said, "Go! Here is opportunity for you to bring blessing to others." I went. I spent the entire night in helping to relieve this sister. I returned home in the morning fresh and bright. Every ache was gone. My soul was happy. My mind was clear and my body invigorated.

The greatest blessings in the world come through carrying blessings to others. Forget yourselves. Become so much engrossed in the cares of others that you have no time to brood over your own. Then will you have joy and peace and blessing.

Asking God to Be God

Is it not singular for a man to ask God to be God! Let me repeat this: Is it not singular for a man to ask God to be God! I know you are shocked. You deny that anyone does this. Not so fast, please. Almost every day most of you are asking God to be God. What do I mean? I mean this: In your prayers you are constantly reminding God of his duty and imploring him to do the things that he must do if he is God. You are so concerned in the things which he is expected to do that you must continually remind him of his duty. Do not ask God to be God! Let us believe in our very soul that God is all right. Let us have faith in God. Let us take it for granted that he is always on duty. God never sleeps. He is not absent-minded. He is not deaf. He does not need that we remind him of his functions in the universe. Let us take it for granted that God is God; that whatever he does is right; that he never goes on a vacation; that he never goes to sleep; that he is always at his post. God never makes a mistake. He never forgets. Why should I be concerned and think that if I do not go to him often and remind him of his responsibility that he might get careless and let some things slip? God needs no reminder. He needs no stimulant. He does not need prompting. We do not have to call his attention to the fact that he is so busy he cannot give attention. He knows. He sees. He understands.

If we would turn things around, look into our own souls, and let prayer become a hungering and thirsting after righteousness it would be better for us. May I illustrate the relationship between God and man in this wise? God holding a microscope in his hand looks at us poor, puny, seemingly insignificant mortals and thereby sees in us potential power and possibilities which we ourselves do not comprehend or understand. On the other hand, I see man with a telescope, which enables him to see what he could not see with his natural eyes—God in all his wonderful love and goodness. This is my idea of prayer—the means which reveals man to God and God to man. Under such circumstances God has more faith in us than we have in ourselves—he knows what we can do. He knows that it is not wise for him to do for us what we can do for ourselves. He trusts us. He knows that we will come out all right. Oh, if men could only trust God as God trusts them, what a wondrous revolution would be wrought! God trusts us all of the time. He constantly expresses confidence. He awaits our evolution. He is patient with us. We must trust him. When we ask for blessing and he does not give as we wish let us trust him still. Job puts this correctly: "Though he slay me, yet will I trust him." It is easy to believe in God if we get what we want. It is divine to believe in God when we do not get what we want.

God Works by Law

God works by law. There is no accident in the universe. God does not violate his law. All the prayers in the universe cannot make God violate his law. Let me illustrate. I hold this book in my hand. If my hand was not under the book it would fall to the ground. What would cause it to fall? The law of gravity. Why does it not fall? The law of mind is operating. My mind suggests to my hand and the book is held in the air. Now I say, "Hand, withdraw," and the book falls. Is the law of gravity suspended? Not at all. It is operating all the time. Is the law of gravity violated? Not at all. But I have introduced a superior law which transcends the operation of the lesser law. I call into action forces which relieve the book from the limitations of the law of gravity and project it into the domain of mind forces. Prayer can do this thing.

If I do wrong the cosmic law of the universe applies. This law cannot be violated. It cannot be suspended. I may introduce a higher law which does not violate the lower and thereby introduce a cause which will undo the effects of the anterior cause. So through prayer, I believe it is possible to get forgiveness of sins—that is to relieve ourselves of the results of sin. We do so not by violating law but by the introducing of a higher law. James says, "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up, and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him."

Sickness Result of Sin

I do not wish to startle you, but all sickness is the result of sin. "Then," you say, "if I am sick, I am a sinner." This is probable. It is not necessarily true. You ask, "Is sickness the result of individual sin?" It may be. It is not necessarily the case. It matters not how remote the cause, the effect is there. If man had not sinned there would have been no sickness. So along the stream of time somewhere you or your immediate or remote ancestors—your progenitors or antecedents—sinned, if the effects of sin are within your body. If you are sick, somebody sinned.

Prayer is a remedy for sin. Please note that. By it we get close to God. Prayer puts us right with God. Prayer removes the cause. A little boy was suddenly taken sick. He had acute peritonitis. A doctor was hastily summoned. He plied the boy with questions. Reluctantly the little fellow admitted that he had eaten a number of green apples. The doctor began to give him a lecture on the danger of eating green apples. The little fellow cried out, "Oh, doctor, never mind about the apples; please help me to get rid of this stomach ache." But the doctor answered: "My son, I am not concerned about the pain. What I am concerned about is the green apples. So long as these green apples stay in your stomach you will have pain. If I can get rid of the apples the stomach will take care of itself."

Pain is God's medium to save us. Thank God for pain! Were it not for pain we would perish and not sense what caused our destruction. Pain is God's danger signal. Pain is the red light of life. So, my brother, do not ask God to take away the pain—ask him to help you to get rid of the green apples. See?

Opening of Ourselves

Prayer is the opening of ourselves to God. God is always willing to bless us. His blessings are always extended. Prayer is the opening up of our spiritual life; the intensifying of spiritual confidence and trust. In this way our willingness for God to come into our lives corresponds with the willingness of God to come in. Prayer is asking God to help us to bring ourselves into communion with him. If you were in a dungeon would you ask God to send the sunlight into the dungeon? Would it not be much better and more consistent to ask God to bring you into the sunlight? In the first instance you are asking God to do the unnatural, illogical thing. In the latter case you are following the lines of least resistance. God always follows the lines of least resistance. Remember, there is no such thing as a miracle with God.

If you have asked God to do the almost impossible thing you have taken the longest way to a given objective. When you find yourself in a spiritual dungeon away off from God do not pray, "O Lord, come down where I am." But in the earnestness of your soul pray, "Lord, help me to climb out of the dungeon." Prayer should always have a reflex action in your life.

Prayer is communion. If you have been separated from your mother, or your wife, or some loved one, you know what it means to meet them again. Ye missionaries know what this means. Oh, the longing, the hunger for communion when one has been a long time separated from his loved ones! Do you recall, my fellow missionaries and friends, how when you were privileged to greet your loved one words failed you? You could not say anything. Your heart was too full for utterance. It was sweet just to be close—just to clasp each other's hands. Ah, it is a blessed thing just to have God hold your hand—to feel his imminent presence! How the little fellow when he is tired with the day's play loves to cuddle down and fall asleep with the lullaby of mother resounding in his ears! It is unalloyed bliss to cuddle down in the arms of God while the harmonies of communion soothe and thrill.

I have met God only a few times in my life. Once on the mountain top; at another time by the seashore; again on the desert. I love to go into the silence, to be alone with God. At such times I do not wish to speak. I feel! I sense! I understand! I am conscious of a sixth sense. Thank God for communion! We are so obsessed with the idea of asking

God for things, to give us something, to attend to our wants, that we forget the need of communion.

God Knows Best

Would it not produce chaos if God answered all our prayers as we wish him to? Oh, how many foolish petitions I have offered to God! I praise his name that he had the wisdom to refuse my petitions. My mature judgment brings me in humble devotion to God that he hath refused my youthful supplications—offered in ignorance and selfish purpose. Let me read in this connection a poem entitled, "Cross purposes":

"What sorrow we should beckon unawares,
What stinging nettles in our feet would grow
If God should answer all our thoughtless prayers
Or bring to harvest the poor seed we sow!

"The storm for which you prayed, whose kindly shock
Revived your fields and blessed the fainting air,
Drove a strong ship upon the cruel rock
And one I loved went down in shipwreck there.

"I ask for sunshine on my grapes to-day,
You plead for rain to kiss your drooping flowers,
And thus within God's patient hand we lay,
These intricate cross purposes of ours.

"I greeted with cold grace and doubting fears
The guest who proved an angel by my side;
And I have shed more bitter, burning tears
Because of hopes fulfilled than prayers denied.

"Then be not clamorous, O restless soul,
But hold thy trust in God's eternal plan;
He views our life's dull weaving as a whole,
Only its tangled threads are seen by man.

"Dear Lord, vain repetitions are not meet,
When we should bring our messages to thee.
Help us to lay them, then, at thy dear feet;
In acquiescence, not garrulity."

Working Out Life's Problems

I recall my experience as a schoolboy. I had trouble with mathematics at times. Some problems just would not come right. Try as I would I could not get the answer. In desperation I have gone to the teacher and said, "Please, teacher, show me how to work this problem." The teacher would sternly say, "Tommy, go back to your seat and work out that problem yourself." I felt resentful. I knew that the teacher knew how to work the problem. It would not have cost her anything. I felt she was cruel and unkind. If I had been the teacher and she the scholar, how quickly I would have worked the problem for her! How little did I understand life's problems. After a long time I would get the answer. And then, with my face all wreathed in smiles, I would rush up to the teacher and cry, "Teacher, I got it, I got it!" And she would answer, "I knew you could if you would. I wanted you to work the problem yourself."

We so often go to God and say, "Lord, I have been working hard on this problem. For days, and weeks, and months, and years, I have struggled and agonized over it. Please, God, won't you work this problem just this once?" But God answers, "My son, keep on working. The answer will come in time." And it always does. It never fails.

I am willing to endure the trials, to suffer the disappointments, to bear up under denial, to pass through Gethsemane, aye even endure the cross if, at the last day—when I meet God, I can cry out, "Lord, I have worked life's problem"; and what a joy will fill my soul when he will answer, "My son, I knew all the time that you would." This will be reward enough for me.

"Sometimes when all life's lessons have been learned
And sun and stars forevermore have set;
The things which our weak judgments here have spurned;
The things o'er which we grieved with lashes wet
Will flash before us out of life's dark night
As stars shine most in deeper tints of blue;
And we shall see how all God's plans are right,
And how what seemed reproof was love most true,
And we shall see how while we frown and sigh,
God's plans go on as best for you and me;
How, when we called, He heeded not our cry
Because His wisdom to the end could see;
And even as wise parents disallow
Too much of sweet to craving babyhood;
So God, perhaps, is keeping from us now,
Life's sweetest things because it seemeth good.
And if sometimes commingled with life's wine
We find the wormwood and rebel and shrink
Be sure a wiser hand than yours or mine
Pours out this potion for our lips to drink.

"If we could push ajar the gate of life
And stand within and all God's workings see,
We could interpret all this doubt and strife
And for each mystery could find a key.

"God's plans like lilies pure and white unfold,
We must not tear the close-shut leaves apart,
Time will reveal the calyxes of gold,
And if through patient toil we reach the land
Where tired feet with sandals loosed may rest,
When we shall clearly see and understand,
I think that we will say, God knew the best."

Book of Mormon Rays on Scientific Paths—No. 12

BY A. E. PHILLIPS

That many dialects were spoken in America during the time of the Conquest does not indicate that there was not formerly a parent stem. The history of various nations is proof of this fact. Mr. Clay, in his Light on the Old Testament, considers that "The language of Canaan, as represented in the later times by the Hebrew, Phœnician, and the Moabitic dialects, goes back to a time in Palestine so remote as to be lost in the mists of antiquity."—Page 147. Yet from the Phœnician period to the time of Noah was not at most a remarkably long interval. Brinton states that the Maya language comprised about sixteen dialects, "none very remote from the parent stem." When we consider that this people possessed many books and an educational system it serves to indicate something of the facility with which diversity in language develops. He mentions a grammar of the Aztec which contains from twenty to thirty synonymous expressions, and a dictionary of the Maya tongue that contains over thirty thousand words, of which scarcely a hundred words are of foreign extraction.

It is reasonable to assume that these people with so well developed a language represented at least an older culture than those tribes which did not possess such a vocabulary or the means of acquiring it. One authority has classified the aboriginal Americans, according to language, into about sixty linguistic groups, including about six hundred and fifty tribes of North America only. According to C. R. Enock, F. R. G. S., "The Quichua language of South America must have taken a thousand years to evolve, at least." This would take us back to a period five hundred years more recent than the last items recorded in the Book of Mormon, at which time, it states, the Nephite nation was broken up. This diversity of dialects is precisely what must be presumed to have resulted from the character of the people and their habits of life, except for those who maintained superior governments. This leads us to expect practically the very conditions found here in the Columbian era.

We find it necessary, then, to go back to a more ancient period than the time of the Conquest, in order to ascertain the relationship between the hieroglyphics with which the

A. D. 400, but being of the priestly type they were probably not subject to as radical changes as were those employed in more secular affairs.

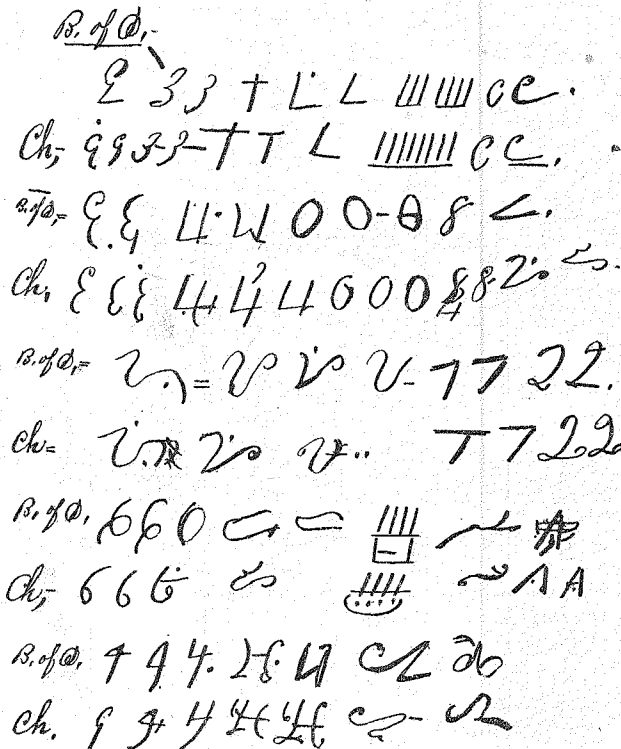

Delafield calls attention to the fact that "we find the three species of hieroglyphics common to Mexico and Egypt." It is affirmed by Le Plongeon that: "The ancient Maya hieratic alphabet, discovered by me, is as near alike to the ancient hieratic alphabet of the Egyptians as two alphabets can possibly be."—Ibid., p. 113. The resemblance between the Book of Mormon hieroglyphics and those of the Mayas, the Egyptians, and the Hebrews of antiquity, is found to be sufficiently close to confirm the statement of the book as to their origin. It is as close as might be expected of different persons writing at separate periods in a changed language. While some are practically alike, others are very similar. Professor Enock says: "It is considered by the best authorities that the analogy of this important step toward phonetic writing with the manner in which the Egyptian hieroglyphics passed into phonetic signs is remarkable."—Secret of the Pacific, p. 111.

It has been declared by several writers that inscriptions at Chichen Itza contain ancient Egyptian letters. It is also claimed that the Maya word "Tat," meaning "father," was applied to Osiris by the Egyptians, and that "Taita," meaning "father," is to this day used by Quichuas of Peru. (Ibid., p. 137.)

While the written language of this people indicates the origin represented by the Book of Mormon, the Israelitish ancestry of the people is suggested by some of the words employed among various American tribes. The words: Ale, abba, ish, ishto, and several other words of similar spelling and pronunciation are asserted to be of identical meaning in both the Indian tongue and that of the Hebrew or Chaldean, by Mr. Haines in his work, The American Indian. Other works also contain lists of such words. A considerable number of Indian and Hebrew points of similarity are presented by Haines, Adair, Bancroft, Priest, Boudinot, and other authors.

The Witness of Sociology

We briefly notice a few of the sociological conditions discerned among the native races here and compare them with the Book of Mormon record. Such of these as have been suggested by the material already submitted will of course be here omitted. Their facility of expression, as indicated by the book, it may be noted however, seems clearly to have

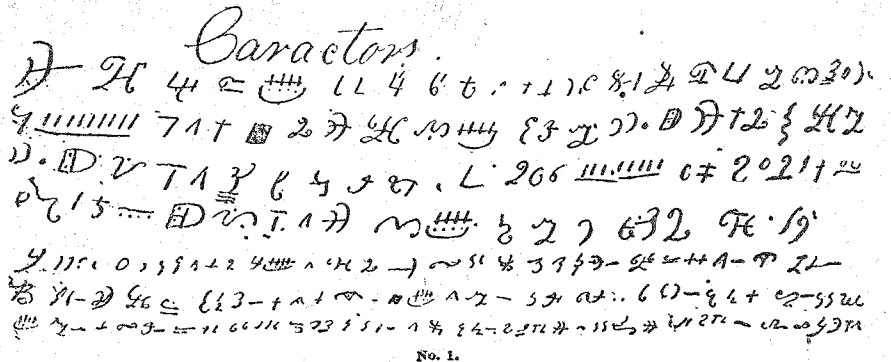

A comparison of characters from the Book of Mormon plates with Chaldean characters. The people who colonized this land took with them Egyptian and Hebrew culture, and these were greatly influenced by the Chaldaic.

Book of Mormon was recorded and those of the ancient Americans as independently discovered. These people separated from their ancestors of Israelitish origin at a time when there were both Egyptian and Hebrew learning among them. The period at which some connection may be noted would be necessarily remote from our time. Sir Markham suggests: "I am inclined to think that the separate dialects were the debris of one original language spoken during the megalithic age."—Page 137, Incas of Peru.

Reformed Egyptian Writing in America

The Egyptians used three forms or systems of writing, the pictorial hieroglyphic, the hieratic (of the priests), and the demotic (of the people). In constructing the English alphabet from the Greek the connection is more or less apparent, but when comparing this English with the original Greek from which the later Greek was developed the resemblance is not so easily recognized. When, however, we place the English beside the Phoenician, from which the ancient Greek was derived, the similarity is very remote. The Reformed Egyptian, in which the Book of Mormon was inscribed, consisted of characters derived from the Egyptian and the ancient form of Hebrew, but in making this combination certain of the characters were altered. The characters used in the Book of Mormon were those in vogue about been handed down to very recent generations. According to Markham, the Quichua language, so named because first learned from one of that tribe, "was spoken over a vast area of the Andean region of South America. It has an extensive vocabulary, is rich in synonyms and in particles varying the meaning of words, and is well adapted as a vehicle for the

BUY BATTERY BUILDINGS

A deal was closed in this city, to-day, for the sale of the Battery Office Building, and the Battery, proper, to the Reorganized Latter Day Saint Church. The Battery will be used to house the publications of the church, and a part of the Battery Office Building will house some of the church's general offices.

In connection with to-day's agreement, which is simply a contract for the sale, subject to the title being found satisfactory, a deposit of $5,000 was made by the church. The sale is made by Willis R. Munger, of Kansas City, head of the Munger Securities Company. He has owned the Battery Buildings about three years.

The deed will be made to Benjamin R. McGuire as trustee for the Reorganized Latter Day Saint Church, of which he is the presiding bishop and the financial head. The contract closed to-day requires that the deed to the property be filed October 1, next, and that full possession be given on January 1, 1921. The consideration is $67,500, which is to be paid in full on the filing of the deed.

The deal for the sale of this property located in the business part of this city, was made by George A. Gould & Company, who represented both parties. Bishop McGuire is out of town, but he was represented in the proceeding by I. A. Smith, who recently became his counselor in the presiding bishop's office.

The tract of ground included in this deal fronts 156 feet and nine inches on Lexington Street, that is from east to west, and 145 feet on Osage Street, or from north to south. The office building, which was constructed and owned for several years by Ira J. Hedrick, fronts on Lexington Street, the entire length of the ground, and has a depth from north to south of 44 feet. It is all two stories high, the first-floor rooms being occupied by various commercial houses, and the second-story rooms by lawyers, real estate men, and other lines of office business.

The Battery Building proper, which was constructed when the late Judge Edgar E. Axline owned the property, has a depth of 156 feet and nine inches from west to east, and of 88 feet from north to south on Osage Street. Between the two buildings is a 13-foot driveway. The Battery contains not only the big auditorium but the dance hall south of it and a large room east of the dance hall which was used as a barn when the Battery was held for military purposes. The front end of the Battery is two stories high, having clubrooms above.

In purchasing this property it is the intention of the church in the not far-distant future to bring to this city its large publishing plant now at Lamoni, Iowa. A recommendation to this effect made by President Frederick M. Smith at the session of the general conference in this city last April was adopted by the church by unanimous vote, and the matter of finding a suitable site for a new building, or of the purchase of a building already constructed was put up to the general church officers. They have considered several properties, but finally decided on the Battery Buildings as best suited to their uses.

The purchasers did not close the deal till they had satisfied themselves that the present foundations and walls would carry additional stories in case this should be found desirable or necessary. It is said that one of the first changes to be made in the buildings when they pass into the hands of the church will be to construct a two-story vault in the north-western corner of the Battery, and to build a bridge connecting the second stories of the two buildings.

Neither was the deal closed till the purchasers had been assured that the sale of the building would not interfere with the continued use of the Battery by the American Legion, they being given to understand that Adjutant General Harvey Clark had decided already to cancel the State's lease of the Battery Building proper on January 1, 1921.—Independence Examiner, July 1, 1920.

INDIAN LEGEND PROVED TO BE HISTORY

In 1844, when John C. Fremont—nicknamed the "Pathfinder" because at the instance of Congress he had explored the West and investigated its possibilities for settlement—was in Nevada with his expedition, an aged Indian chief solemnly assured him that the history of his people, the Piutes, went back to the very beginning of the world. Thousands of years before, he declared, his ancestors had driven a whole nation of their enemies into a great cavern and sealed its entrance, thus putting them out of the way for all time.

This tradition, centuries old, evidently had been handed down by word of mouth from generation to generation. Historians were interested in it as a legend, but regarded it as only that—a mere myth without any definite, discoverable historical truth behind it.

When the story told to Fremont and by him passed on to the world came to the attention of scientists familiar with its setting in Arizona, it seemed to them to bear the earmarks of historical truth, for they found in it statements that dovetailed perfectly with known facts. They set to work, and a few years ago discovered a cave which when opened appeared to be the very one referred to in the legend.

They estimated that the cavern had been closed by natural agencies something like 3,000 years before. Inside they found numerous relics of an ancient race, including fosthoughts and works of a civilized people."—Ibid., p. 28, 29.

Among the teachings that were promulgated earnestly from time to time for the guidance of the people was that of equality. The Book of Mormon tells us that this doctrine was at one time so observed that "they had all things common among them, therefore there were not rich and poor, bond and free," etc., so that they prospered exceedingly. Markham shows that this condition actually obtained in Peru, where "the social condition of the people, and the form of government under which their peculiar civilization was originated and developed is well worthy of more than a passing glance. Peru is one of the few nations in which a form of socialism has obtained a firm hold upon the people and has been successful. In many respects Peru under the Incas resembled the Utopia of Sir Thomas More."—Pages 34, 35.

The remarkable accuracy of the statement that they had all things common is borne out by the conditions proven to have existed here, for "under the Inca system all who could work were obliged to work, all lived in comfort, and there was ample provision for the aged, for young children, and for the sick. . . . No money was necessary, for every family had a right to everything necessary for the nourishment and well being of its members, from the catu or market, without payment."—Ibid. Enoch states that "no one was allowed to buy or sell land. It reverted to the state on the death of its owner." Markham says, it seems certain that "the dreams of Utopians and socialists became realities for a time, being the single instance of such realization in the world's history." It was a marvel of sociological culture that was for a time a challenge to all mankind.

Musical Notes in Western Canada

Early in the season and soon after the organization of the Department of Music it was determined to make a presentation of the work of the department at some of the reunions held throughout the church this summer. So the writer made a careful study of the field and its needs and laid out an itinerary, which was detailed in the last issue of The Staff.

The itinerary planned and the reunions selected have carried him quite far afield, and we trust that before the season shall have ended that much good shall have been done to the cause of music in the church. Of one thing we are certain: the trip made, the contact with the people, and the interchange of ideas had, and the new thoughts gained have been of wondrous benefit in enlarging viewpoint and comprehension of the work and its needs. So far the experience has been a most wonderful one; the knowledge gained most valuable, and we trust the benefit conferred upon others has been fully commensurate with the good personally received.

Up to the present time the work done and the itinerary covered has been within the borders of the western Canada provinces—Saskatchewan and Alberta. We are now en route from this section to the two reunions in eastern Canada, of the Chatham and Ontario Districts.

Our selection of and advent into the western Canada districts is due to the personal solicitation of Elder John W. Peterson, a seventy laboring in these provinces. Brother Peterson has done what every missionary, either local or traveling, should do: interest himself in the work of the Department of Music and endeavor to secure its aid in developing the musical interests and sentiment of his mission field. The department is deeply concerned with the development of the church's music work in such a way that it shall become a real aid to the missionary arm of the church's work of extending the gospel, and it urges the missionaries to regard it as a really friendly ally, anxious to assist in every possible way.

We left home June 29, going straight to Saskatoon, a thriving little city in the North Saskatchewan District, where we joined Brother Peterson. Near this city are found two very prosperous and interesting branches of the church—the Iowa Branch (so named because a number of Saint colonists from that State naturally gravitated together at that point) situated about twelve miles east, and the Michigan Branch (another colony caused by similar gravitation) about the same distance west. We visited both of these branches, preaching the "gospel of good music" to very interested congregations and with excellent "liberty." In each place we presented the work of the department, held congregational "sings," gave personal interviews and talks, and strove to stimulate and encourage the spirit of music in every possible way. Considerable interest and enthusiasm were aroused; the Saints responded heartily and gladly to every feature of the work.

We well remember one social gathering on the Monday evening preceding our departure for this section, at the home of Brother and Sister Ferry, about a dozen miles from the Michigan Branch. Here in spite of a driving rain storm (which the farmers welcomed joyfully) this home was filled with the enthusiastic young—those young in years and those of years who were still young in spirit. All gathered round the piano and soon were singing some of the folk songs dear to the hearts of the people everywhere. And with such a hearty, enthusiastic concourse, we had no difficulty in talking to these young and still young people upon the importance of the cultivation of "the gifts of music and of song" within the church. Nor was this occasion any less gratifying than the afternoon service of the Michigan Branch the day before, when under the open sky, at the home of the parents of Sister Claire Van Eaton, of the faculty of Graceland, the audience of Saints and interested outsiders for miles around, gathered in a semicircle and sang—some sixty or seventy strong—ranged on seats and in banked automobiles not only some of our best hymns, but some of the immortal folk songs that live here in Canada as well as in the States of the Union. Thus "The sunshine of your smile," "Mother Machree," and "A perfect day," were sung with highly evident satisfaction by those who formed this unique congregation.

From the branches near Saskatoon, Brother Peterson and the writer went to the district conference at the Artland Branch, in the western limits of Saskatchewan. The region around this branch is one of the most unique in the church. A long valley-like part of the country, large enough to hold five branches of the church, is here seen, and with but small exception, practically every foot of ground belongs to Latter Day Saints. These Saints are very zealous and devoted, and they have dubbed their settlement the Zion of Canada. Yet their hearts are turned towards the appointed gathering place of latter-day Israel, and they long for the time to come when their time shall come to gather home.

In this section is found the veteran of the church's frontier missionary work, Brother John J. Cornish. Most of his children have followed him to this frontier section; have with him homesteaded and preempted their present farms and have wrested from the soil and an obdurate climate their present competencies.

The conference of this (North Saskatchewan) district, was held in a tent hard by the church. Here an improvised "choir" stand was constructed, the organ carried from the church, and seats arranged, and as the conference progressed (in reality it was a four-day reunion) a choir gradually was formed that did good work at the various services. Also some of those attending brought their instruments and these were pressed into service as an "orchestra" which helped to support the work of congregational singing.

And how the Saints at this conference did enjoy the "sings" had before the principal services, and with what enthusiasm would they respond! It soon became the feature of anticipation of these meetings. Not only were the old favorite hymns of the church sung (in fact there is never any difficulty in getting the Saints to sing such hymns as "Redeemer of Israel," etc.) but some new ones were learned, and also some of the popular songs included in Brother Hoxie's book, "Songs of the Legion," were sung. They readily learned to sing, understand, and love Brother Hoxie's "Pray, men, pray," and even his round song, "Oh, how lovely is the evening," was the occasion of great enjoyment when sung. A goodly and interested audience was before us when we presented the work of the department on an evening assigned to it, and we must not fail to mention the pleasing little entertainment offered on another evening, that served to furnish enjoyment and relaxation to those attending the conference.

From the Artland conference we went to the conference of the Alberta District at Ribstone. Here we found another interesting band of Saints situated almost precisely as the Artland Saints are situated as regards exclusiveness of settlement. But they do not style their section as a "Zion" for it is evident that the Artland Saints "beat them to it." Their conference was held in their pretty little chapel until towards the latter part, when they moved into the same tent used by the Artland conference.

The same work was attempted at this conference as at the Artland conference, and the same description of the one will in a measure answer for both, so will not repeat. The same love for congregational singing was found here, and at the service where the "round song" was sung, the harmonious mingling of the three phrases was so evident that Bishop Benjamin R. McGuire, who toured this same section of Canada about the same time as myself, used it as an illustration of the harmonious relations that must exist in Zion.

From Ribstone we went to the conference of the Southern silized human skulls, estimated to be no less than 5,000 years old, thus antedating the celebrated Pittdown skull found in England several years ago.—The Detroit News.

Saskatchewan District, held at Radville. There is no branch at this place, yet the district officers chose to hold the conference there for the sake of interesting outsiders. Its sessions were held in the Province Theater, a small town "movie" structure, and practically the same work was attempted here as at the other conferences, and the results were largely the same. One feature of interest that was made possible because of the projector in this theater, was that some of the songs used at this conference were, at the evening services, thrown on the screen, and sung by the audience. This was found to be an excellent idea, and could be adopted by other departments of the work with advantage. The audience were undoubtedly led to sing more because the songs were there before them so plainly.

At this conference, and at all the conferences of these districts, the national song of Canada, "The maple leaf forever," was used and was sung with enjoyment and enthusiasm by all, especially the children, who are taught it in the schools.

One thing was evident to us in our trip through these districts—the great virility of the Saints of this section of Canada. Most of them have gone there as pioneers and have, in spite of many hardships and obstacles, wrested from the virgin soil and rigorous climate, homes and competencies. These efforts and hardships have resulted in building within many of them characters of force and strong qualities of mind. They are the stuff empires are made of, and in proportion to their faithfulness will they prove part of the strength of Zion in time. They have acquired many of the essential qualities necessary to their foundation as portions of society. Now they should "add to their faith virtue," and begin to cultivate the graces and accomplishments that refine and elevate the soul. And our observation gives us the assurance that they have ample gifts and endowments upon which to build.

We shall long remember our trip to these western Canada provinces, both for the pleasant associations with many worthy Saints, and the rich experiences gained.

We write this en route to the eastern Canada districts, about which we will write later.

ARTHUR H. MILLS.

Music as Essential as Is Daily Food

That music in the home is as essential to the well-being of the family as are the meals upon the table, is the declaration of one woman reader of the Prairie Farmer, a weekly farm journal published in Chicago, expressed in the leading article of a recent issue under the heading, "Music makes home life happier."

Communications from dozens of subscribers to the popular weekly reveal many uses to which music is put on the farm with which the urban resident is not familiar.

On one farm the threshers are entertained during the luncheon hour by strains from a phonograph set up in the shade of a tree on the bank of a brook which runs through the field.

One reader declares that music has contributed more to her happy married life on the farm than anything else. Another says she would put a musical instrument into every home in the land. She finds music an effective substitute for medicines and declares that there is no medicine more pleasant to take than music.

In some large farm families every member is a musician, each playing a different instrument.

Music Is Healthful

"Music in our house is as essential as are the meals on the table," is the declaration of Mrs. J. H. Hohimer, of Pulaski County, Indiana, and Mrs. J. W. H., of Pike County, Illinois, says: "I think that where there is a home with neither flowers nor music there is apt to be neither harmony nor love. If I could, I would put a musical instrument in every home in the nation. Music is healthful; there is no better cure for bad humors, for old or young, and there is no medicine more pleasant to take."

"It is my experience that music, aside from a good husband and the dear children, has contributed more to the happiness of my married life than anything else," writes Mrs. E. C. Cavins, of Coles County. On the birthday of each member of the Cavins family the other members make it a practice to give him a phonograph record. By this means the record library is frequently replenished.

That music is intensely practical as well as æsthetical in its influence is evident from the experience of Mrs. Otto Reichard, of Winnebago County, Illinois, among others. "Always on a large farm," Mrs. Reichard says, "it has been necessary for us to employ help both with farm and household labors. We have found that music has been one of the chief reasons why the very best of this hired help always remained with us until they were ready to enter a home of their own."

Keep Boys at Home

Mrs. Thomas Stewart, of Henderson County, Illinois, found that by introducing music into her home in the country she stopped her sons from frequenting the music halls and movies of a near-by village. No argument other than the home music itself was necessary to induce the boys to remain at home. After expressing satisfaction with her experiment with music, Mrs. Stewart adds: "Now I am wondering how soon we can install film service in our attic or basement."

"I find," writes Emma Shula, of Will County, Illinois, "that it is a great recreation for the hard-working men on threshing days to play a nice selection of John McCormack or some one like that while they are eating their dinner. It helps them to forget the hard work they have accomplished the first half of the day."

"Music has helped to a considerable extent to make our home 'Home, sweet home,'" declares Dorothy Kobusch, of Du Page County, Illinois. "The greatest enjoyment of all is when my brothers and sisters come home with their different instruments. One brother plays piano and saxophone, another trombone, and another alto. One sister plays piano and 'cello and another, eleven years old, the piano, and I am thirteen years old and play the piano and will soon take up violin lessons."

A SMILE OR TWO

Chauncey Depew relates that a Bostonian went to heaven and remarked condescendingly that the place was all very well in its way, even to a Bostonian.

Then he adds, a deceased Chicagoan declared after arrival in the other world, "Heaven isn't so very much better than Chicago after all," and heard the whispered remonstrance, "S-s-s-sh! This isn't heaven."

One of the great difficulties (at the general conference in Des Moines) was that the delegates on the rear seats could not hear what was said from the platform. During this cry for help from the embarrassed members, "We would like to know what is going on at the front," a delegate arose on the front row and called out, "Can't you hear back there what this man is saying?" "No, we can't." "Well, stay there. I am coming back to join you."—Western Christian Advocate.

A London minister was preaching on the H. C. L. To illustrate his subject he first showed a basket with forty-eight eggs: "This is what my predecessor got for a shilling seventy-five years ago," he said. Then he held up a basket with twenty-four eggs. "This is what my predecessor got for a shilling thirty-five years ago. And this," holding up two eggs, "is what I buy for a shilling." That congregation held a meeting, and raised their pastor's salary.—New York Times.

THE SOCIAL CIRCLE

Bishop of the Society Island Mission

[With the idea that we should become better acquainted with various of our church workers, especially those whom we might not get to see and know personally, we are printing in this department an occasional introductory sketch and picture. At our request, Brother Charles Fry wrote the following concerning Brother and Sister Karlstrom, now in the Society Islands.—EDITORS.]

When in the summer of 1915 I first visited Joplin, Missouri, under an appointment to the Spring River District I met among the many splendid Saints of that place Brother and Sister Albert V. Karlstrom. Being immediately brought into close association with him by our mutual work on the committee of the Joplin reunion I soon discovered him to be a young man of high ideals who dearly loved the restored gospel and who was anxiously willing to give consecrated service in its behalf. During the four years that that association continued with frequent intervals, his interest was never known to vary but continued steadfast. He was faithful to every trust and diligent in the performance of every duty; his field of activity gradually enlarging until he was called to his present foreign mission.

Brother Karlstrom seems to have been the first of his family to come into the church, having been baptized by Elder H. J. Thurman in 1907, when nineteen years of age. He was called and ordained a priest in 1912 by T. W. Chatburn and W. H. Smart and rendered acceptable service in the Joplin Branch, his secular work being that of carpenter and at times contractor. He later went into the restaurant business in which he gained valuable experience in handling people and in learning properly to judge human nature, in addition to the business experience in which he was successful. In May, 1917, he was ordained an elder and counselor to Bishop Ellis Short by Apostles W. M. Aylor and J. F. Curtis, and served under Bishop Short as the financial officer of the district.

During a tour of the district by W. M. Aylor and the writer in the fall of 1917, divine evidence was given of Brother Karlstrom's call to the active ministry, which call when placed before him received a ready response: "I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord." His business affairs were accordingly closed up, and from the General Conference of 1918 he received his appointment, entering immediately into the missionary work in the Spring River District, and continuing his work in the financial department. As a preacher he made rapid improvement and soon brought himself in demand in numerous places. One incident will show how he was received. A call having come to the district president from one of the branches for meetings, Brother Karlstrom was requested to go. The branch officers told me afterward that great disappointment was felt when they heard who was coming, for they knew he was but young in the work, but when they heard the sermons their disappointment changed to appreciation and they said, "We'd like to be disappointed that way often."

Brother Karlstrom's interest and success in the gospel work has been made possible in part by the interest and hearty support of his wife, Laura, daughter of H. J. Thurman, whom he married in 1909. She was a faithful worker in Sunday school, Religio, and Woman's Auxiliary, and for several years acted as secretary of the district Sunday school association, and like her husband could be relied upon to discharge any duty laid upon her.

It was not strange therefore that when the joint council of the church were considering the needs of the Society Island Mission which at that time was urgently in need of some one to look after its temporal interests as well as spiritual, it should have turned to the subjects of this sketch as the most suitable ones to fulfill that need. The call to that distant and trying island mission was answered by them as each previous call had been answered: "I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord." That answer involved the breaking up of home and home associations to enter new environments among strange people where they would be subject to dangers and hardships.

Accordingly Brother and Sister Karlstrom left Joplin on August 3, 1919, but not until their hearts had been made exceedingly glad by his having that day baptized his aged father and mother with several related children into the church and assisted in their confirmation. This privilege was especially gratifying as the prejudices of former years had kept them aloof from the church, but now it had melted away through parental love. Whatever burden of sacrifice may have been felt at their leaving was now lifted by the joy of seeing his parents in the fold of Christ. Going to Independence the final plans were arranged for the journey, and he was ordained to the office of bishop in the church offices. They left San Francisco on September 8, 1919, with Bishop Lewis of Australia and Apostles P. M. Hanson and J. W. Rushton and arrived at Papeete on the 21st.

The church may safely trust Brother and Sister Karlstrom to do loyal work, but like all such workers they will need the prayers of God's people for sustaining grace.

With the coal miners of Indiana and Illinois nearly all on strike and the situation threatening in other regions on account of discontent among the day laborers in the mines, the coal shortage is getting serious. Some big cities are threatened with absolute coal famine for public utilities and factories. On account of the competition for the available supply prices are running as high as $25 a ton for bituminous coal. Rural districts are feeling the pinch as well. As we write this, farmers are driving to Lamoni from points many miles distant because of difficulty in getting threshing coal. The limited amount stored in the local bins will last only a short time with this demand, and contracted and expected shipments are not coming through. And this situation is typical of a large percentage of the communities all over the country.

With a national system that we work efficiently and do the best for mothers, every woman can feel that she has accepted the service as a right and as a citizen. We do not want anything that savors of a charitable institution, for if we have, our mothers would not accept it.—Standards of Child Welfare.

The French Government has sent an army against the Arabs in Damascus and have not been opposed. They are also advancing on Aleppo. This is the result of certain ultimatums by France to the Syrian Government requiring an acceptance of a French mandate, which was not accepted by Syrian leaders.

"Folks Need a Heap o' Lovin'"

Every child has a right to be well born. Every child has a right to come into this world with a strong body and a healthy mind. It is God's perfect plan for parents to bring forth children in love, and it is also his plan for them to continue to love them throughout the days of their lives.

Love is the greatest thing in the world. It is the balm by which hurt minds are healed, and it is the deepest source of true happiness. The keynote of our gospel and all religion is love. God so loved the world that he sent his only Son, that through his love it might be saved. Christ commands his disciples over and over again—"Love one another." He does not dwell on the theme of hatred, nor speak of God as a terrible avenging being, but as of a father—forgiving, kind, and loving.

A human being is so constructed that he not only needs love even more than food or clothing, but he requires a physical expression of it. There is a deeper need in a little child for caresses and a concrete form of love than many people know of.

How many parents there are who work early and late for the physical comfort of their children. They will see that they are well clothed and well fed, yet they go on and neglect to give their children the one thing they crave and long for the most. Are you that kind of a mother? or that kind of a father? If you are, won't you look at this fairly and candidly, study deeply over it, and then resolve to change? You wouldn't dream of letting your child suffer from want of food. Yet, you let him go on and grow up (and away from you, too) longing and actually suffering for an outward expression of your love.

You may say, "Well, if I work for them they ought to know that I love them." Yes, that may be true, but it is not sufficient. Children and grown-up children too need the concrete, material form of love which comes in caresses, and those little acts which only love can bring forth.

And then, not only the little ones need loving, but far, far more do your adolescent children need it. This period of adolescence is the greatest time of upheaval in a child's life, the time of storm and stress. It is a time which may make or mar your child's life forever. Here are children being tossed from their old routine of life into a new and strange world. New emotions, new doubts, new sorrows, and new experiences come upon them so thick and fast that they need a mighty lot of loving to get them safely through. Did you ever in your life feel that you were an alien in your family, that you were the one that nobody loved, that perhaps you didn't even belong there, but were adopted? Those experiences are natural to nearly every child and when one looks back in retrospect they seem funny. Yet to the child they are not humorous emotions, but bordering even on the tragic. The one thing that will bring your child safely through this period is your love. And again, I say, not only the love which finds its expression in providing for the creature comforts of your child but the love that is shown in tangible form.

Some parents go blindly and ignorantly through this period with their children and then suddenly awake some day to find a stranger inside their home. I've heard mothers say, "I don't know what to think of my child. I don't have his confidence and he never tells me anything. And the way I've worked and slaved for him—" and so on. You've all heard it! Oh, if it takes time to give your children a little bit of loving, for mercy's sake, stop your working and slaving for a while and love them. That's the vital thing in their lives, and in yours—not whether or not the kitchen gets scrubbed.

Every day in my work I come into contact with children who are starving for a little love. It is pitiful to see what a little touch or pat or hug means to them. I've had little children edge up and touch my dress or my hand, and then look into my eyes with the utmost longing shining from theirs. Oh, if only their parents could see and understand that need! If only they, the natural ones to supply and receive that love, could and would do it!

"Do you want your child to say, 'I can never remember of my father or my mother kissing me'?" And then do you want to see the agony and longing even in the memory of that? Do you dare to give them the cause to say it? A family had best go in rags and without sufficient food rather than starve for love. Should the father in the home be only a bread earner and disciplinarian? Analyze yourself and your place in the home. Whatever it is, you have made it so. Do you see yourself one with your children, loving them, adored by them; sharing their joys and sorrows; having their confidence to such an extent that you can tell them the vital things which you, as a father, ought to tell them? or do you see yourself as an alien in the family you ought and do in your heart love? Do you see yourself a bread earner, a spanking machine, a necessary evil, and as far as real heart-to-heart contact with your children, a stranger?

Do you want them to remember you by the times you spoke unkindly to them and the times you were indifferent to them? Oh, if you are a father—no matter what your trade or calling: preacher, laborer, or what, the one big business of your life is that of being a father. Do you perform the duties of your trade conscientiously and then let the one big thing in your life be neglected? Don't do it! If you have done it up to this time, stop and think, and then resolve to do differently. Right now is the very best time in life to stop a bad thing in order to start a good one. Begin now to play with your babies, love your children, and don't forget that your big children need it far more than your little ones. Let your children have the right to say—and it may be long after you've gone on—"My father and mother gave me love, and whatever I am I owe it to them." Which one of these girls is yours? One says, "My father yelled at me to get up early, then growled and grumbled while he was home. We always had more fun while he was away at work," or, "My father always awakened me with a kiss, and the happiest memory of my life is our perfect love and companionship."

Don't forget to live up to the office of your holy calling. Don't fail to be a father or a mother in very word and deed. And don't forget, in the words of one of our poets, "Folks need a heap o' lovin'" every minute.

Have You a Sunday Feeling?

How do you feel on Sunday? When you awaken on Sunday morning and realize that it is Sunday do you feel just as you do on Monday, or does that realization bring an emotion not inspired by any other day of the week? Perhaps you feel a bit of relief that this is not a working day; that accustomed tasks do not await you. Perhaps you lie in bed an hour or two longer and relax in body and mind, feeling that you are entitled to just such relaxation. Perhaps Sunday seems to you the day to loiter about the morning work, to read the Sunday paper, to slip into loose, comfortable clothing, do a few chores that are always waiting, eat a heavy noon meal, and await the coming of friends, or go auto-mobiling or visiting. Perhaps, on the other hand, Sunday brings to you the feeling that it is a little better than other days; that something good will come to you on this good day; that because the day is better you wish to do better deeds than Monday, Tuesday, and the other days of the week inspire. Perhaps your Sunday feeling impels you to perfect cleanliness of body, to the donning of clothing a little finer than the weekday garments, to a thoughtfulness of mind and a kindness of attitude, to a preparation of yourself to wait upon the Lord. Perhaps your Sunday feeling cannot be complete until you have gone to the house of God, in the assembly of the Saints and worshiped him. Are you grateful for such a feeling? Can you account for it? Can you explain why you are unhappy and why the day is incomplete if you have missed going to his house and worshiping?

Think back. In the long ago, was there not one who saw that you were clean and neatly clad in Sunday clothing, who went with you to the house of the Lord? Did she not do this Sunday after Sunday, from your early childhood, until you were able and glad to do it for yourself? In doing this your mother established for you a righteous habit which you cannot break easily and happily. No doubt in the gratitude of your heart you wish to repay her for this bit of your training. You cannot repay her in kind—she does not expect it. You can repay her, and her expectations are that you should, by passing on to your children this devout habit, which makes Sunday for them a day of blessedness and joy.

A more careful consideration of habit would reveal a new value. Habit is more than a mere doing over and over of a particular act. It has its persistence in sentiment, which is a deep feeling born out of respect. It has its endurance in sentiment which gives pleasure. Because the sentiment gives us a feeling of elation, or exaltation, or joy, or happiness it perpetuates the habit—and after the reason for doing a thing has passed away the act is continued because it gives pleasure.

The churchgoing habit should be begun as soon as the child is old enough to sit quietly in the pew. This may be as early as three years of age, surely at four, when he may go to kindergarten and Sunday school. While it is true that a great deal of the service is beyond his comprehension yet the atmosphere is there, and the sensitive little person feels and imbibes with senses keen and alert. He hears the sweet-toned organ and the majestic hymns with their awe-inspiring harmonies. Such music as this he hears nowhere else. He hears the solemn voices of the minister and men of God in prayer and sermon. He is attracted by the mellow, softened light falling through colored windows. He observes the kneeling figures, the bowed heads, the clasped hands, the reverential attitude, and the hushed stillness. It is an atmosphere that calms and soothes and permeates and lingers in his memory. This will be the warp and woof from which is woven his Sunday feeling. He will miss all of this when it is denied him; he will long for it, and scarcely be satisfied with all else. In his maturity he will look back to this experience, to these emotions, and wish to leave them in the lives of his children.

A sermon lasts too long for a little child. He could not listen to a fascinating story for so long a time. It is not to be expected. The wise mother must make the time endurable without detracting too much from the solemnity of the occasion. There are crayons and pencils and paper available. These may be handled silently by the mother, and the child be given in silence little tasks which will employ mind and fingers during the sermon, when the thoughts of the minister and those of the child have scarcely a single concept in common. On the other hand it is surprising how quick little ears are to catch at a familiar word or phrase, and how longingly young minds attempt to understand. One four-year-old boy, as the minister began to tell graphically the story of Moses and the children of Israel, whispered gleefully to his mother, "I know that good story," but when the minister had told enough to illustrate his point and passed on to his argument, the boy gave a sigh and whispered, "Please finish the story, he doesn't know it." As the years go by there will be more and more of the sermon which the child can understand, and some happy day he will realize that he has understood the message—he has thought with the minister to the end.

In this connection Doctor Radcliffe, president of Canada's largest teachers' college, suggests an ideal method of fostering the splendid habit of church attendance on the part of children. He observed the mothers and fathers, the aunts and uncles, the grandmothers and grandfathers, in fact all the adult members of the family attending church. He missed the youths and maidens, the boys and the girls, and the little children. He concluded that the young people were absent because they had not formed the habit of going to church in their childhood, and he set about to form the habit in the young people of the future. He suggested to his pastor, a service for children, and the pastor asked him, an educator, if he would conduct it. "In a moment of weakness and great enthusiasm," he said, "I consented." It took his best thought, his most careful planning, and his most splendid energy, as well as the most religious and intelligent people whom he could enlist. But the result was worth the effort to the children, to the adults, and to his church. He brought into this service much thought and care. There was soul-exalting music; there was heartfelt devotion and worship; there was a sermon made interesting by use of picture and other device; there was the artistic presentation of the splendid Bible story, which he considers the supreme story; there was the reverential attitude; there was the incentive to come, hear, see, and feel Sunday after Sunday; there was the habit-forming act on the part of the children, based upon the sense of pleasure. At the age of about fourteen the children were graduated from the children's service and took their places with honor in the congregation of adults, which places they held with pride and pleasure. And after awhile that church became famous for the number of young people who were among its regular attendants, and there are richer fruits to follow, for the churchgoing habit is established. Their Sunday feeling finds glad expression in waiting upon the Lord in his house.

In our own church several attempts have been and are being made to hold services for children. When parents are unable or unwilling to form this habit others who are interested in the young have seen the need and are striving to supply it. Let them not be discouraged; rather, go forward prayerfully, carefully, thoughtfully, with purposeful aim. Think of habit forming. It alone is worthy the services of the most capable. It is worthy the most skillful planning, the most conscientious execution of plans. There are other results in a work of this kind—the teaching of the word of God, the teaching of all the virtues that make for righteousness and nobility—but if the churchgoing habit were the only result, it is adequate. So, dear friends of the children, go forward, study the children, know the material you wish to teach, make your service interesting; make it beautiful, impressive, reverential and stir if you can the emotions of the children. All of this renewed and persisted in from Sunday to Sunday will establish the habit and develop a Sunday feeling.

Keeping Children Off the Streets

Vacation days bring again the problem of "keeping children off the streets." That this is a community responsibility is made clear in suggested standards for children's play published in "Standards of child welfare" by the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor. These standards cover in detail the subject of organized recreation for city children only, but it is hoped that in the near future similar standards will be worked out for rural children, whose need for wholesome recreation under intelligent leadership is as great as the need of city children.

The standards given declare that at least two hours of organized play every day throughout the year are necessary for every child. To insure this, there should be a playground within a quarter of a mile of every child under six years of age, one within half a mile of every child over six, and a baseball field not more than a mile distant from every boy old enough to play on a team. One acre to serve five hundred children is advised as a minimum amount of space. This general playground should not be used for games requiring a great deal of space. Baseball, football, tennis, and similar games should be provided for by an athletic field containing about six acres.

Active play, the standards warn, should be carefully directed, and vigorous games should be followed by quiet ones. Every child over ten years old should have a chance to play on a team of some sort, and special emphasis on team games for girls is recommended.

Where lack of funds makes it necessary to limit equipment, the standards point out that game supplies such as basket balls, baseballs, bean bags, etc., are more important than

BOOK REVIEWS

The Army and Religion

BY E. E. LONG

"One of the most remarkable books of recent days," says the reviewer.

The Army and Religion is the title of one of the most remarkable books of recent days. It sets forth in categorical style the result of an extended survey of the British Army which was conducted by a committee of some of the ablest churchmen of Great Britain to ascertain the attitude of the British soldiers toward the churches. The discovery was startling. Showing, as it does, a colossal ignorance of spiritual things, it bodes ill for the future.

In 1917 discussion arose as to the status of religion in the British Army and a committee was appointed to make the survey. The committee prepared a questionnaire which was sent to a great many chaplains, Red Cross, and Y. M. C. A. workers, besides a number of army officers of various grades. The result was a mass of evidence remarkable for its unity. The compilation of the matter for publication was placed in the hands of Doctor W. T. Cairns. It is published in this country by the Association Press, New York, and it is well worth the price of $2 to every student of religious conditions. It has been reviewed and commented on by both the religious and secular press throughout the land, and it is still going the rounds. Lack of space forbids more than a mere mention of some of the things of which the volume abounds.

It was found that "the structure of Christian faith was being undermined at the base by the materialism of the age," that while the soldiers had "religion," their thought of God was "not Christianized." To many of them, Christ was an extraordinary character remarkable for his piety, an historical figure standing out more prominently than his fellows, but nothing more, and on page 40 it is solemnly declared that "it is well also to remember that the same impoverished type of faith prevails widely at home, and there also has too often fixed apparatus, though swings and a sandbox are essentials for little children.

Leadership is declared to be of fundamental importance and should never be sacrificed to elaborate equipment. Experience has shown that splendidly equipped playgrounds are little used when they lack the inspiration of real leadership, while near-by alleys and streets are crowded with children. The interesting suggestion is made that children be formed into groups of from eight to twelve members "with a gang leader self-selected and self-propagating as in the old neighborhood type of gang."—Government Bulletin.

Quarreling at Meals

Happy the family that bows at the dining table during a brief expression of thankfulness for the blessings of life, in a prayer for health and domestic harmony. Such a family is likely to thrive.

And alas for the family that permits quarreling at the table, that tolerates subjects which arouse the temper, that permits ill nature to show its demoralizing influence there.

There is one time when every member of every family is entitled to peace and should be encouraged to laugh. It is when the meal is served. It is as necessary for good health as for the affection of the family. Children should never be taken to task during meal time, nor wives, nor husbands. Many a boy has forever lost all regard for home influence when he has found that he could not eat in peace at the family table. Many a daughter has been inoculated with waywardness in the same way.

Even the beasts of the field must eat at ease. The surest way to destroy the natural ties which bind families together is to chew the rag and food at the same time.—Exchange.

proved itself unfit to meet the shock of the times." A staff chaplain says, "It may be well maintained that the attitude of the army to-day towards religion is fairly indicative of the moral attitude of the British people as a whole toward religion." "Four fifths," we are told, "of the younger manhood of the nation in the armies, do not seem to so much as have heard that there is a Holy Spirit," while "the majority do not seem to think of religion at all."

Writing of a conversation with brother officers, an artillery major says: "I ventured then to give the churches' view of human nature as something that needed conversion and that could be converted. I got keen, and they listened almost as eagerly as I gave them an outline of the churches' idea of Christ from this point of view. The conversation reached its last phase with a very angry retort in these words: 'And when you go to church the bloody thing they offer you is the most damned insipid thing imaginable.' Don't bother about the awful language. It was the tragic cry of a soul that had asked the church for bread and had been given a stone."

An officer in a Highland regiment writes: "The war has undoubtedly widened the gulf between the men and the churches. They think the latter utterly divorced from real life. The great fact which has been burned into my mind is that, while almost every man goes through times of intense religious emotion in the trenches, very few seem to have the faintest conception that the emotion which has gripped them has anything to do with Christianity. This is a terrible indictment of the church. The religious men whom I have met in the army have been almost entirely men with a strong point of view of their own, usually unorthodox and reformatory."

Says a staff officer in the engineers: "Such thought as there is on religious subjects is usually very superficial, and there is little or no serious reading done in such subjects. The general result of all this is a totally false or inadequate conception of what the Christian religion is, which is mainly thought of as a number of negations, often of what is their one and only source of pleasure. Further, although they admire and respect our Lord, his life, and example, it is usually looked upon as absolutely unpractical, unattainable by men in this life, and he himself an unpractical dreamer and lacking in very many of the manly qualities which we admire so much among our fellow men."

Of course, this gross indifference is attributed to "misunderstandings" on the part of the men. But the conviction grows as one proceeds with the narrative that the church is to blame for the misunderstanding for having failed properly to teach the truths of Christianity. The indictment laid against the church one hundred years ago, and which was, and still is, resented with such bitterness, is fully sustained by the evidence set forth in this book, and it is all the more forceful and condemnatory because of the fact of its having been collated by the churchmen themselves.

But the strongest count in the whole indictment is in the chapter on "The failure of education." In the analysis of this chapter the editor says: "There is unanimous criticism of both our religious and secular education in the evidence." "Throughout the evidence," it is said, "two complaints recur (1) that there is an absence of serious thought about religion, and (2) that there is ignorance of the facts and truths of Christianity." On this point an officer says: "When I first joined the unit over two years ago, the thing that struck me was the ignorance of the men both on the dogmatic and practical side, particularly the former. Now, after becoming more familiar with the men, the point that strikes me is the materialism and complete absence of any recognition of the spiritual. . . . I suppose they have all had as much religious experience as all of us in adolescence and early manhood, but there being no dogmatic knowledge to explain this experience, or knowledge of the practice of religion to develop it, the faculty of religion has withered away. I place the 'failure' in our educational system."

A chaplain finds "the crude religious ideas expressed in officers' messes are generally lamentable," while another chaplain says "their ignorance is colossal." A senior chap-

Far West Stake

The stake authorities and other general appointees have been busy filling a schedule which provided for two-day and other meetings in various branches of the stake. This schedule covers the months of June, July, and part of August. Following the reunion another will be made out to cover the year, subject of course to such changes as may be necessary. We like this method. It enables the ministry and branches to work together more efficiently. Every man knows his engagement ahead, and the branches are notified to make preparation to cooperate. The plan has worked well. Brethren H. O. Smith, E. F. Robertson, Samuel Twombly, J. W. Roberts, J. A. Koehler, R. S. Salyards, and V. M. Goodrich have filled the appointments. We hear good reports of all of the meetings.

The stake president accompanied the newly appointed bishop, introducing him to the Saints of the various branches. All points visited manifested earnest interest and gave practical, undivided support to the efforts. The work in the stake is growing, and we are encouraged by the outlook.

Crops in this northwestern Missouri territory are a wonder. The quality and quantity of wheat is good, and corn never looked finer; hay crop, though light in some places, is very fine; fruit not overly plentiful; vegetable crop excellent.

lain whose experience extended to "every type and branch of the service" says "education has been rotten with materialism." "Our Sunday schools are woeful—" declares a hutterer, and a chaplain says "Sunday schools of all denominations are still grievously ineffective." This conclusion seems to be verified by the fact that "about eighty per cent of the scholars are lost to the direct influence and service of the church and Sunday school from fourteen years of age and upwards."

Thus the evidence accumulates revealing a terrible apostasy from primitive Christianity completely vindicating the angel's message as delivered by Joseph Smith. Why, then, it may be asked, will not the churchmen who record the truth about it accept the Restoration? The answer is found in the following paragraph:

"If Jesus Christ were to come among us to-day doing the same deeds and saying the same things in our modern speech, is it too much to say that he would revolutionize our whole current conceptions of God? If that be so, there must somewhere have come into our world of thought influences which have weakened and distorted our thoughts of him, for nothing graver can be imagined than that in this central thing we should hold other thoughts than his. Have we not here the secret of the weakness of hope and the lack of love? Let it be ever remembered, also, that if such a distortion or impoverishment of the idea of God were general and long continued, it would be very hard to detect it, because it would affect all our standards. If for many generations any malady affected a whole race, such a race would think of its condition as normal health."

This is precisely what has happened. For "many generations" there has been a steady drift in the wrong direction and when God in his infinite goodness called attention to the great disparity the leaders of thought could not see back to the starting point with sufficient clarity of vision to detect the departure, so they branded the angels message as a fraud and continued their downward course. Now they have had a rude awakening, but still their vision is as the words of a book that is sealed and they cannot see when good cometh. Little do they realize that this survey fulfills the conditions of a prophecy by Jeremiah when he declared that "the Gentiles shall come unto thee from the ends of the earth, and shall say, Surely our fathers have inherited lies, vanity, and things wherein there is no profit." (Jeremiah 16: 19.)

Everybody seems well pleased with what the Lord is doing for them in temporal as in spiritual things.

We are glad to know that a number of Saints in other localities are looking toward this Zion section of country with a view to making homes. Quite a number have added themselves to our rural branches to the decided benefit of the work. We shall be glad to welcome other newcomers as they may find it wise and consistent to locate in this stake.

Brother Samuel Twombly has been requested by stake authorities to labor for the balance of the year in the northern part of the stake, making Guilford his objective point. This will give him the field which includes Ross Grove, Ravenwood, Bedison, Guilford, and Fortescue Branches, the territory formerly known as the Nodaway District. We have many fine Saints there including splendid young people who are an honor to the cause. Brother Twombly will be assisted by the stake authorities.

Brother R. S. Budd will devote one Sunday of the month to assisting the work at Trenton. He will distribute literature and visit among the people living in the vicinity of the church building—not members only, but others. By this means, supplemented by assistance of the branch officers and stake authorities, we hope to build up the work at Trenton. Brother Budd has done excellent work at Cameron, and we are sure his service will be of material aid at Trenton. Trenton is a county seat, a division point on the Rock Island, a good place for Saints to locate, and as stated before, we want good Latter Day Saints to strengthen the branch at Trenton.

The First Saint Joseph Branch has been ministered to of late by Brethren H. O. Smith, J. W. Roberts, E. F. Robertson, and J. A. Koehler while its president has been absent visiting other branches. The First Branch has enjoyed the services of these brethren, while the absent president has enjoyed his visit among the rural branches.

The Sunday school of the First Saint Joseph Branch held a picnic at Krug Park on July 4. It was well attended and greatly enjoyed. It seems that no branch can be entirely alive without its regular picnic on the Fourth. We wouldn't think of giving it up.

While with the Saints of Cameron, Kingston, Far West, and Oakdale of late, those branches joined in a picnic held near Far West, on the 15th. We were surprised to see so many Saints present from practically everywhere in that region of country. They presented a fine appearance and manifested an excellent spirit. Saints are making friends of their neighbors—why not? There should be no antagonism; our work is a work of friendship. The gospel itself is to bring harmony among the people and to make them normal in every respect. Let us not forget the social side of our work. Sometimes people complain that Latter Day Saints are too clannish; that they enjoy their religion so much they practically find self-satisfaction in their own groups and neglect to cultivate closer contact with their neighbors. We think this is true sometimes. We think it advisable to get better acquainted with our neighbors. We are not only able to do good to them, but we receive good from them, decidedly so, for there are splendid hearts and clear heads among many of them. Let's be sociable.

Brother John L. Bear has filled the monthly appointment at Edgerton Junction for the months of June and July. He has been well received. John is a live wire, full of energy, and the people are pleased to have his ministrations.

The Saints of the Oakdale Branch, located four miles south of Hamilton, Missouri, Brother Coleman Snider, president, have subscribed a fund to provide for advertising in the local papers to cover a period of one year. They are enthusiastic in their determination to let their neighbors know who and what they are and what they believe. They are cooperating with the Department of Publicity. We expect to see this good work taken up by other branches and not only by tract distribution but also by good local advertising get the gospel before the people and make new openings for its presentation by the ministry. We have only begun to present our work to the people. The compactness now being developed by work of the different departments is raising up people who are qualified to do good work for the church in all lines of endeavor. We have good grounds for encouragement when we see effectual means made use of to do actual, practical work in behalf of the church.

Two more were baptized in the First Saint Joseph Branch on the 18th by Brother J. W. Roberts. This branch has contributed about twenty-five, and the city of Saint Joseph about thirty baptisms in all during the past thirty days. We are trying to do our part to make up the number asked for by the First Presidency this conference year. However, we want to make sure that all baptized are really converted—a necessary thing in church policy.

Because of the illness of his son, which required change in his appointment, Brother C. H. Rich, appointed by general authorities to this stake, has been obliged to be located and to work for the present year in the State of Colorado. We regret the illness of this son, also that we are obliged to give up Brother Rich. We hope, however, that the son will recover and that the father will in due time do a work in Far West. Sister Rich and the boys will also be welcome.

Please say to all people coming to our reunion that we want them to be there on time, all tents up and ready to begin on schedule time—Friday, August 20, at 10 a. m.

A BROTHER.

Onset Reunion

The Onset Reunion is in full operation and a larger gathering in attendance than there has been for the last two or three years, and they are still coming and will be, until the end. The opening service was a great success as there were so many present to arrange for the future of the reunion. The services on Sunday were abundantly blessed by the Spirit of the Master and a great crowd was in attendance, some of whom had to return to look after business for a few days but will be back soon.

Brethren of the ministry present were: G. T. Griffiths, Richard Baldwin, C. Edward Miller, A. B. Phillips, Edward Gleazer, John Sheehy, H. Arthur Koehler, Bishop M. C. Fisher, with a host of local preachers. We wouldn't be surprised if President Elbert A. Smith would make his appearance on the camp ground ere we close the reunion, and we are certain he would be given a grand welcome, should he do so.

On Friday night prior to the convening of the reunion Brother Myron H. Bond who was well known to most all of the members throughout the church motored from Boston to here in company with E. H. Fisher, arriving at the camp ground at about nine o'clock.

He retired in the home of Sister Arnold about ten o'clock, seemingly feeling fine physically and told Brother Fisher that he enjoyed the motor trip immensely, and seemed delighted to think that he was going to meet with so many of his old friends and associates. He ate a lunch and talked very freely with the sister and apparently slept soundly throughout the night.

About 7.15 next morning the sister heard him snoring very loudly and supposed that he would get up soon for breakfast. The snoring ceased but Brother Bond didn't get up, and between 9.30 and 10 o'clock she became very uneasy about him, and reported to Brethren Joy and Koehler that Brother Bond had not made his appearance yet and she felt very uneasy about him. They went up to the house and entered the bedroom and to their great surprise discovered that Brother Bond was dead. He lay on his left side, with one hand under his face, the other upon his arm, with his legs crossed, just as though he was in a sweet blessed sleep. He hadn't moved a finger, hence we discovered that there were no death struggles, and the spirit had taken its flight, wafted away to the paradise of God.

It surely was a peaceful passing away to join the dear companion Nellie, whose demise took place a short time ago.

Bishop Fisher took charge of the remains, which were taken to the undertaker's parlor in town and prepared for burial. On the next day the undertaker brought his body back about eleven o'clock to the tabernacle where a short service was held, in memory of him.

I made a short address. Brethren William Johnson and Arthur Koehler sang some very beautiful pieces. The following brethren who had learned to love him in life acted as pallbearers: M. C. Fisher, D. F. Joy, Richard Baldwin, E. H. Fisher, George Gates, John Sittell. One of his old and dear friends whom Brother Bond was instrumental in bringing into the church, namely C. H. Coombs, offered the prayer. A. B. Phillips pronounced the benediction.

Hundreds of Saints gazed for the last time upon the pleasant face which looked natural, as disease had made no inroads upon his body. It was a very sad and solemn scene, one that will not be soon forgotten by those who witnessed it. Brother Bond had been a missionary in this part of the Lord's vineyard for many years, and was greatly beloved by the old and the young in these parts.

A week ago last Sunday, he preached twice—in Providence, in the morning, and in Attleboro in the evening. On last Wednesday night he spoke to the Saints in the Boston Branch, encouraging them to hold on to the gospel rod, and bore his testimony to the divinity of the latter-day work.

Brother Bond and I officiated together two weeks ago yesterday at Buffalo, New York. He had just come from Kirtland where he had been in company with President F. M. Smith for several days, viewing the historic temple and surrounding country. I never saw him feeling better in the work than when I parted with him last. He was anxiously looking forward to the Onset reunion, and to meeting so many of his old friends whom he had been associated with so many years in gospel work.

He was surely prepared for the change when it came, and the good Lord kept his promise to all good Saints that at death he would take away the bitter sting. While the Saints' hearts were made sad and sorrowful at having to part with our brother yet they rejoiced in their hearts that the end was so peaceful and that they were privileged to behold his loving face once more though it be in the arms of death.

It behoves us all to prepare as this brother had, for the great change that must come to all sooner or later.

As I looked upon his face in the casket, during the time that I was making the address I thought of the saying chronicled in Revelation: "And I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, Write, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them."

The remains were shipped this morning by express by way of Boston and Kansas City and will reach there about Wednesday.

Our dear and worthy brother had been engaged in the general ministry for over forty years and had been an instrument in the hands of the Lord in leading many people out of darkness into the marvelous light of God. He will surely be missed but not soon forgotten by those who knew him.

He anticipated attending the Kirtland reunion on his way back West.

He was seventy-seven years of age and as a matter of course, he realized that the time was nearing when he should be called upon to throw off the tabernacle of clay. He told me that he was the last of the Bonds, and hence they are all gone. He was the only one of the four brothers interested in the gospel, notwithstanding the father and mother were members of the church in the early days and resided in Kirtland. It has been my fortunate lot to have been very closely associated with him for the last forty years and I am pleased to note that I found him to be a man of honor and integrity. Very few men are blessed with such intellectual powers at this brother possessed. His power of discernment was keen and he was a preacher of renown.

I had a very tender spot in my heart for Brother and Sister Bond. God bless his loved ones and comfort their hearts in their deep sorrow.

Yours hastily,

July 27, 1920.

GOMER T. GRIFFITHS.

MISCELLANEOUS

Conference Notices

New York and Philadelphia, at Bloomsburg, Pennsylvania, September 4, 5, and 6. Elizabeth Teal, secretary, 318 East Tioga Street, Philadelphia.

West Virginia, at Clarksburg, West Virginia, September 10 and 11, instead of August 20 and 21, as previously announced. All reports must be from September 1, 1919, to August 31, 1920. Members outside the district are cordially invited. Ottis O. Forester, secretary.

The Presidency

By concurrence of the Presidency, Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric notice is hereby given of the following appointments:

Elder Amos Chase, New York and Philadelphia District. Missionary.

Mrs. Alma Booker, Alabama and Mississippi. As an unordained missionary.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY.

The Bishopric

Western Colorado District: Having received the resignation of Brother M. L. Schmid as Bishop's agent of the Western Colorado District, we hereby appoint Brother Davis S. Boyd, Ouray, Colorado.

Brother Boyd is a banker. His experience in this line, together with his interest in the work, well qualifies him for this appointment, and I feel that the Saints of the Western Colorado District are to be congratulated upon having one this well qualified to serve them in this capacity.

Our prayer is that God will bless the Saints of this district, that during this year they will be able to double the tithes of last year, that the slogan of the Bishopric may become a reality, A Million Dollars Tithing.

Brother Boyd's appointment is effective as of August 1.

We appreciate the splendid services which Brother Schmid has rendered in the interest of the Bishopric during his tenure of office.

Sincerely yours,

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE.

Notice to Missionaries

This is to inform all who are under General Conference appointment that stationery and envelopes will be furnished gratis for your official correspondence, by sending your request direct to the Office of the Twelve, Box 255, Independence, Missouri.

Very sincerely yours,

THE QUORUM OF TWELVE,

By U. W. Greene.

New District Superintendent

To the Saints of the Eastern Michigan District: The office of district superintendent of Sunday schools having been made vacant by resignation of Brother Levitt and the first assistant not being able to serve, Brother John Kearns, second assistant, of Carsonville, is hereby appointed to fill the unexpired term. We ask the cooperation of all concerned as Brother Kearns seeks to advance this important department.

GOMER R. WELLS,

Superintendent Sunday School Department.

Two-Day Meetings

At Prescott, Michigan, August 28 and 29. At Alma, Michigan, 110 Grover Avenue, September 4 and 5. At Beaverton, Michigan, September 11 and 12. Let us not forget to assist in these two-day meetings by bringing our pocketbooks or full baskets, that all may work together in the burden of these meetings, and that we may leave all earthly cares aside and come to enjoy a spiritual feast. Matthew Umphrey, president.

Reunion Notices

Kewanee, Matherville, Illinois, August 20 to 29. Those desiring tents and cots notify J. W. Bean at Joy, Illinois, at once. The plan of conducting the business of the reunion will be the same as last year. No definite charge will be made for tents or cots, but each will contribute according to his ability to meet the entire expense of the reunion. Everything will cost more this year than last so we will naturally be more liberal in our contributions. Plan to be on the grounds and located so that meetings may begin on Friday the 20th. Let's make his reunion better than last year's. Presidency Kewanee District, by C. I. Carpenter.

In arranging for tents for the Northern California reunion, write C. W. Hawkins, 615 Spencer Avenue, San Jose, California. For rooms, write J. H. Driver, Irvington, California. Ask for certificate when purchasing ticket, that you may get the benefit of the half fare on return trip if a minimum of 100 tickets are purchased. Cecil Hawley.

To Choristers and Singers of Pottawattamie, Fremont, Southern, and Northeastern Nebraska Districts: We will use for anthems at our coming reunion the following numbers: "The radiant morn," by H. H. Woodward; "Hear my cry," G. F. Morse; "Savior when night," H. R. Shelley; "All hail the power of Jesus' name," J. L. Galbraith; "How beautiful upon the mountains," Charles G. Buck; "Send out thy light," Charles Gounod. Also the following from 1914 Conference Series: "The Son of God goes forth to war," page 104; "The glory of God in nature," page 106; "Christ my life," page 50. The above anthems may be obtained from Theodore Presser, Philadelphia. Special invitation is extended to regular choir members and singers to come and take part with us in our music. Do not wait for a special invitation, but come prepared to take part in the singing and help us make the musical part of our reunion an unqualified success. Reunion commences August 13. W. T. Spanswick, Chorister Pottawattamie District.

Indian Reunion, at Red Rock, Oklahoma, August 26 to September 5 inclusive. Tents 9 by 9, and 16 by 16, $5 each. Cots, $1.50 each. Chairs, 20 cents each. Tents will be ready to occupy. Bring bedding with you. Order tents and equipment from Ed Dillon, 331 East Tenth Street, Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. Cash must accompany all orders, or they cannot be received. Charles J. Smith, chairman committee.

Our Departed Ones

BUTTERFIELD.—Chauncey Commodore Butterfield, son of Josiah Butterfield, was born near Watsonville, California, February 4, 1854. Married Jane S. Rodger, daughter of Brother and Sister Gland Rodger, September 6, 1874, and to this union 8 children were born, 7 of whom survive. Sister Butterfield died in 1895. In August, 1897, Brother Butterfield married Sister Mary Betts, who also survives him. Died at his home, Newport Beach, California, January 23, 1920, after a long period of suffering. Services at Santa Ana, California, David E. Dowker officiating.

DONALDSON.—Lewis C. Donaldson was born July 5, 1838. Died June 29, 1920. Funeral services were held at Mount Zion, 4 miles south of Riverton, Iowa, conducted by N. L. Mortimore.

MASON.—At Lamoni, Iowa, July 8, 1920, Elvira S. Mason, aged 83 years, 4 months, and 22 days. She was a daughter of Alva and Sabrina Smith, old-time Saints. Was born in 1837, and baptized in April, 1870, at Plano, Illinois, by Brother Forscutt. Never wavered in her gospel faith. Married W. V. Mason in 1855, who died in 1889. Of their 8 children, 3 survive her, Clarence, Roscoe, and William. Sermon by H. A. Stebbins, assisted by Columbus Scott and T. J. Bell.

HUNTLEY.—Near Lamoni, Iowa, May 21, 1920, George Franklin Huntley, aged 87 years, one month, and 11 days. He suffered a long time with Bright's Disease, and was glad to be released. He was twice married, and had 6 children. His wife and one daughter survive him. Funeral services held at the residence. Sermon by H. A. Stebbins.

MILLER.—John Albert Miller died at Nevada, Missouri, July 5, 1920. Was born in Poweshiek County, Iowa, December 9, 1877. United with the church December 17, 1900. Ordained a priest August 24, 1913. Later to the eldership. Served as president of the Post Oak Branch. Married Miss Ida Farris July 9, 1900. Leaves to mourn wife and 5 children: Beulah, wife of Brother Joseph Beckett, Post Oak, Missouri, Shelby, John, Delbert, and Alice. One daughter, Zelma, preceded him in death. Also leaves father and mother, 2 sisters, and one brother. Funeral at the church in Holden. I. M. Ross in charge; sermon by D. J. Krahl. Burial in Saints' cemetery, Holden, Missouri.

BANDY.—Eula Golda was born June 12, 1890, near Cainsville, Missouri, died at the home of her parents, Lamoni, Iowa, July 9, 1920. Baptized June 9, 1901, by J. A. Gunsolley. Suffered severe physical affliction for many years but the immediate cause of death seems to have been influenza, as she never recovered from its dread ravages. She leaves to mourn father, mother, 2 brothers, and 2 sisters, besides numerous other relatives and friends. Buried from the church in Lamoni, her body being laid to rest in Rose Hill. John Smith had charge of the obsequies, F. M. Weld offering prayer at the church, and J. W. Wight preached.

HARTMAN.—Mary Jane Hartman, Reagan, Texas, was born December 25, 1840. Baptized May 30, 1886. Died July 7, 1920. A true Saint. Leaves a number of children, grandchildren, and other relatives to mourn. Funeral services at grave in Rosedale Cemetery, near Reagan, Texas, in charge of J. R. Allen. Sermon by J. C. Chrestensen.

REDFIELD.—Artie Redfield, of Independence, Missouri, died June 13, 1920, at the age of 17 years, 9 months, and 22 days. Baptized in childhood and lived a noble consistent life. She was patient and cheerful in affliction and thoughtful of others. She leaves a mother, one brother, two sisters, and a host of friends to mourn her loss. She was held in high esteem by all who knew her. Service in charge of P. A. Sherman, sermon by Arthur Allen.

BARTON.—Sister Sadie Barton died at Vinal Haven, Maine, on June 15. She had been sick for a few weeks, and though her affliction was very severe, she remained cheerful until the very last. Her character was beyond repute. She was intensely interested in the progress of the Vinal Haven Branch, and regretted that she could not live to see it placed upon a permanent basis. Her disposition was such as to cheer up everyone who came in contact with her. Many sorrow at her death, and the tribute of flowers manifested with unspeakable terms the many friends she made in life. Sermon by H. A. Koehler.

NEWS AND COMMENT

THE WORLD AT LARGE

An Australian paper of June 11 says the western and northwestern parts of Australia are suffering worse drouth than the serious dry spell of 1902. A loan of two million pounds, ($10,000,000) is being floated for the benefit of the sufferers.

There are good reasons to believe that prohibition legislation will ere long be in effect in several Central and South American nations, especially in Cuba which has suffered from too many visitors of the most undesirable class in the United States since prohibition went into effect in this country.

In spite of the hue and cry over under production in the United States, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company has announced it will discharge twelve thousand employees, and the American Woolen Mills in Massachusetts threatens to close its doors and thereby throw a hundred thousand people out of employment. Yet according to a statement by Samuel Gompers the latter company increased its net income 316 per cent for 1918 over 1914, with a net increase in common stock earnings of 531 per cent.

In New Zealand the government is building houses for the people, and 183 families are soon to move into them, with many more such buildings under construction. Building costs are as in the United States, but there is a concerted action manifest to solve the building problem, and the results are gratifying.

Reliable authorities continue to insist that China's four hundred millions of people are threatened with a grave menace in the vast traffic prevailing in that land of habit-forming drugs, especially morphine. Chinese authorities are especially bitter against Japan for the part she is said to be playing in the awful tragedy.

A charter has been granted for the organization of a national bank in Cleveland, Ohio, by the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. Only members of the brotherhood are allowed to hold stock, which is divided into hundred-dollar shares, with ten per cent surplus to be paid in.

The Agricultural Department has had persistent rumors that a certain New England concern has gone to all the large potato growers in New England, except in Aroostook County, Maine, and offered the farmers five dollars a bushel for their potato crop as it stands in the field, based on estimates. It is said the Aroostook County growers are holding off for higher prices.

When prohibition went into effect there were many people in Peoria, Illinois, who believed the city would see many lean years, because the city had been the seat of the whisky distilling business. But instead it has been more prosperous than ever before. "Bank clearings are larger, merchants are tussling with fewer unpaid bills, and happiness is general," says the Peoria Journal.

Through cooperative societies in England the price of milk has been lowered in the districts where they have farms. There has been considerable agitation over the price of milk, which has been selling at 16 cents a quart. In some places the cooperators were able to bring the price to 13 cents, which was followed by a drop by the milk dealers' association to 14 cents.

Ontario, Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Nova Scotia, also the Yukon, are to hold plebiscites in October to decide the question of the importation of liquor into their territories. The organized farmers are favorable to prohibition, and woman suffrage is expected to exert a big influence. Temperance workers will put on a big campaign to carry the movement to victory.

The move in New York City to place a copy of the Constitution of the United States in all of the 20,000,000 homes of the country is, of course, commendable, but that is only a small part of the battle. It is somewhat similar to putting a fine piano in the home. After the instrument is placed at the disposal of the members of the household, it is for them to learn to play.—Christian Science Monitor.

The current number of The Review of Reviews contains an article by Governor Harding, of Iowa, on consolidated schools and with it a picture of the playground at the Pisgah, Iowa, school, using school-made equipment under the direction of Charles B. Woodstock.

CHURCH NEWS

President Frederick M. Smith cabled from London that their party had arrived safely and well in London on Thursday, July 29.

Work is being rushed on the new college building on the Graceland campus and the contractor expects to have at least the first story ready for occupancy when college opens on September 16.

Alberta conference rejoiced over the presence of Bishops McGuire and Bullard and A. H. Mills of the Department of Music. J. W. Peterson, A. J. Cornish, and Fred Gregory were also on hand with their appreciated help and advice. Frederick Gregory was chosen district president.

The Holden Progress tells of the recent death of an E. R. Stark at that place, sixty-nine years of age, of whom almost nothing is known. In his possession were found receipts for tithing paid to our church in 1906 and signed by an elder in Michigan, but no evidence of his having been connected with the church since.

The Bowraville Guardian and Nambucca Gazette, from New South Wales, Australia, dated June 10, reports a good conference of our church at Argent's Hill June 5, 6, and 7, with about eighty visitors present from the district. A resolution was adopted disapproving existing liquor laws and urging the government to amend the existing act. Editorial comment regarding the speakers included the following: "Many an intellectual treat was given by Apostles Rushton and Hanson, the former being one of the clearest and cleverest speakers we had the pleasure of hearing; and when we mention the fact that we have sat under the voice of Doctor Clifford and Reverend F. B. Meyer, the Reverend Campbell Morgan, the Reverend Hugh Price Hughes, and Canon Hensley Henson, it will possibly be realized that in J. W. Rushton there is a speaker of no mean order. . . . Apostle Hanson spoke on 'Zion,' and explained that Zion is the perfection of the law, and that it resolved into a condition of the people rather than a collection of houses and buildings. Zion is the pure in heart."

The Barberton, Ohio, child welfare class of the Women's Department reports very commendable results. They meet once a month and see much improvement in the health and general deportment of the children.

"The Central Radio Company of Independence, Missouri, has filed articles of incorporation in that city. The capital stock is to be $10,000. A controlling interest is held by Arthur B. Church and Paul E. Anway, and small interests by Henry C. Smith, J. P. Warren, and I. A. Smith. Church, who recently moved to Independence from Lamoni, Iowa, had charge of an army radio school at Leavenworth, Kansas, in the days of preparation for war. Anway has served the government in radio work on the Mexican border and recently has had charge of a radio station at the Stone Church in Independence. The company proposes to establish a radio school in Independence in a building recently moved to a site on Lexington Street just west of Pleasant Street, maintain radio stations, and do a general radio business."—Kansas City Times.

FROM THE BRANCHES

Waterloo, Iowa. Our Religio has started off under the new regime with Mabel Hall as superintendent; Irving Green, superintendent boys' department; Myrtle Grapes, superintendent girls' department. Our hearts are saddened at this time by the unfavorable physical condition of our faithful branch president, V. A. Hall. We have started what we hope will be a splendid orchestra some day, consisting of two violins, a bugle, and a cornet.

Lamoni, Iowa. Extensive preparations are being made for a successful reunion, including the rendition of the big Book of Mormon pageant, "The missionary spirit of ancient America," with over a hundred characters, to be given outdoors on the evening of August 18. The series of motion pictures given on Friday evenings in the church park has begun, with good attendance, and the Sunday evening series of slides on "A Better America" are also appreciated very much. A film exchange in Kansas City that distributes specially censored films for schools and churches is furnishing the Friday-night films.

Fort Collins, Colorado. Some of the Saints are attending the State agricultural school at this place, preparing for work in the church. Boy Scout and Oriole organizations are progressing. Letha Tilton is in charge of choir work. A series of meetings are being held by J. R. Sutton, district president.

Industrial Unrest and Its Cure

The newspapers and magazines to-day are full of existing world conditions; of want and unrest in Europe. We are urged that the United States must feed and clothe the world, but again it is pointed out that many of those nations that also want feeding and clothing are still maintaining extraordinarily large armies. Most of us consider that the war is over, even though technically it is not so, as the Peace Treaty has not yet been signed even with Germany, while the terms are still to be arranged with some of the smaller nations. At the same time, there are many small wars going on all over the world.

Even in this country, we find more strikes threatening than ever before. There exists a condition of unrest after the strain of the war, and in too many instances a spirit of extravagance, collectively and individually. There is a decided slowing up of production reported from most large factory centers.

It is probable that many of those living in the country and in rural towns are but little touched by the industrial situation and realize only in small part as a tale apart. We only know that prices are high, and do not seek the underlying cause.

In fact, many inform us that people both inside and outside the church do not care for causes, or for analysis, but just for enough to get by with for the present. We hope that this is not so, even though the church membership is undoubtedly affected by conditions in the world.

The problem is a grave one, not only for us as citizens, but also as church members. What position shall we take? What are we doing? It is as unwise to ignore it as it is to ignore an epidemic, until we find that our loved ones are suffering and many who should have been saved are leaving us.

It may be urged again that people do not care to think or be disturbed. They prefer to leave everything to President Wilson and Congress, in the National Government, and in the State to the officers whom they have elected; and in the church, to the leading authorities, not giving any really intelligent support. Whatever may be the condition in the world, and it is serious enough, we hope the time is now at hand when in the church, at least, we shall not desire to avoid meeting the real issues before us.

As we have intimated before, when the commandment was given in the early thirties, for the establishment of Zion and for an economic and social program of the highest character, the need of such a procedure was then only dimly perceived. But of recent years, business men and employers have been coming to see more and more that the cheapest work is that which is performed in relatively short hours. Men do, as a rule, better work in an eight-hour day of intensive application, than in ten or twelve hours, and they produce more good work. Of course, there is a limit. We cannot hope to have hours reduced indefinitely, and still improve both quantity and quality.

We are finding that low-priced labor is the most expensive kind; that where but little remuneration is returned, the physical ability is not maintained; that it is the poorest labor on the market, and represents the greatest loss and highest expense. Unfortunately, some poor factories are in the same class as poor people everywhere. They have to take what they can get. When a man has the means, he finds that to buy good coal in large quantities at the proper season is by far the most economical method of procedure. But to the poor, this is not possible. They must buy when and where they can, and buying by the basketful or in relatively small quantities, they pay a greatly increased price.

So does the so-called capitalist. When he does not possess the means to put his factory on an efficient basis; when he has not the means to pay high wages, and therefore just drags along from year to year, with cheap labor, which after all is the most expensive in its blunders, and in its waste, and in its relatively small production; when he is unable to provide sanitary workrooms, he does not make sufficient profit to get out of the rut.

Enlightened employers have discovered that good sanitary working conditions are cheaper and are to the benefit of the factory; that it pays in dollars and cents to maintain the health of the workingmen; that those conditions which make for better living, though showing a large initial cost, in the end pay, and pay well.

In fact, the history of the last twenty-five years shows that enlightened business men and manufacturers have not been driven by the law, but have been leaders in every advance and reform movement for better working conditions.

Labor's Share in Business Management

Now since the war, we find the great importance of labor recognized as never before, especially in England and the United States. Numerous articles have come to our attention, including one in the Atlantic Monthly, several in the newspapers, and in popular magazines.

Mr. Charles F. Lang, President of the Lakewood Engineering Company, is quoted in The Saturday Evening Post as saying:

"Of course, we're discussing the Browning plan and all the other plans of workers' representation on the basis of what they may accomplish in educating the men in the responsibilities, difficulties, and problems of the management. But I guess it's no secret that the average management stands in still greater need of being educated in the problems of the workers. I'm getting some of it every day and the more I get the better I understand my need of it. That fact is that we're right now called upon to settle the scores for the sins of our industrial fathers, who held the viewpoint that labor was an inert commodity, a machine to be bought at the lowest price possible, pushed as hard as it would stand to be pushed, and then disposed of to the best advantage obtainable. Some of the employers in this class went the limit, while others seasoned their treatment of labor with considerable personal kindness and some lofty paternalism. But they didn't recognize that their employees had any real claim on them beyond the lowest wage at which their labor could be bought.

That viewpoint seems rather odd and antiquated to some of us now, but the fact remains that there are yet thousands of employers who are in dire need of that education which comes from putting their feet under a table along with those of the workers from their shops."

While some are completely disturbed at the situation and consider it hopeless, we note Montague Ferry, formerly of the Industrial Relations Department of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, but now with the Armstrong Bureau of Related Industries, quoted as saying:

"To many employers the labor problem is more complex and more hopeless than ever before, but those who study it and have the feel of it know this is not the case. Ten years ago cooperation between the employer and the workers in his plant was practically unheard of except in very small plants where almost daily personal contact was possible.

"To-day cooperation is getting to be common, and while mistakes are made and setbacks suffered there is not the slightest doubt that the movement is gaining momentum and producing splendid results.

"Alert manufacturers and constructive labor leaders are learning that the interests of employer and worker are actually mutual; they are learning to sit down together and discuss the problems confronting them without prejudice or bitterness; they are tasting the satisfaction of real cooperation toward a common end.

"The slogan of the successful ones is this: 'What can we do to make this plant useful to the nation, to those who buy its product and a credit to the community? What can we do to make this institution a good place to work in, a productive unit in the country's commerce and a profitable venture for all of us?'

"When men tackle constructive things they have little time left for selfishness and bickering. Sincerely undertaken by both employers and workers and carefully guided through the earlier stages such a movement is to my mind virtually a sure cure for industrial unrest in any plant."

These are but a few out of many that might be quoted.

Sheldon Cary, the president of the Browning Company, states:

"That labor bought at less than the current wage is an expensive purchase, because it means lack of enthusiasm on the worker's part. That a man or woman works best who has a financial interest above wages in the success of the business. That teamwork wins in baseball, battles, and business."

He goes on to show how that by calling the workingman into consultation and into the actual management of the business, that production and profits have been greatly increased, the men's share in the increased profits. One instance is cited of a laborer new to the concern. He was paid an average of a little over ninety-six dollars a month wages, and received an average of fourteen dollars a month share as profit.

Another instance is a machinist who has been with the company more than five years. His wage was nearly one hundred and ninety-three dollars a month. His profit share is about forty-two dollars a month.

This is merely one concrete instance out of many. On one hand there is a clear recognition of the importance of management, and that of the work done by the administrative officer. On the other hand, there is a clear recognition of the fact that industry is a cooperative effort in which the share holders (or capital) have a part, administrative officers have a part, and the workingman also has his share, and a prominent share at that. In most of the plans discussed, labor has from one third to one half voting membership in the working council, considering questions of working conditions, wages, hours, and all other matters which concern the workingman.

In the midst of all of the confusion in the world, we should not lose sight of this clear current which is growing stronger and stronger towards a broad recognition of the brotherhood of man, and of the cooperative nature of all work.

In the church, the principles have long been laid down in our economic program. We preach them sometimes. We talk of them sometimes. Yet much remains to be done as to putting them into effect. We have seen many instances where a man put in charge of a work, whether it be industrial, temporal, or in the spiritual field, at once begins to make of himself something of a boss, and to fall back on that convenient resource of ignorance, making his own ipse dixit as the controlling officer, acting as president, manager, superintendent, or what not, the decisive factor.

We do not question that the final responsibility for direction must rest somewhere and that with the administrative officers must rest at times the duty of making a final decision.

But we do insist that a business stewardship is not a matter of one man, but the stewardship concerns all those who labor to make it a success.

Even the most selfish of trust managers has seen the importance of making those who do the work feel a vital interest in the result. It is their company, and their success. How much more, then, is this true under cooperative principles. It is a matter of common, hard, business sense. Men who are fairly paid, men who are given good working conditions, men who are made to feel a vital interest and share in the production and in the results, pay far beyond the man who is paid only a minimum wage, who is restricted in his work, and who cannot reasonably be satisfied with the conditions under which he labors.

Business judgment would warrant reasonable remuneration. Business judgment would warrant delegation of responsibility. Business judgment having regard to dollars and cents would seek to put a man on his toes, and make him feel that it was his work with which he was concerned, and that in the results achieved he had a vital interest.

But beyond the matter of dollars and cents, there is also the principle of brotherhood, the principle of cooperation, the principle of Christian justice. We emphasize these things because to our mind Zion will only become possible when they are fully recognized.

Another Indian Viewpoint

Doctor Montezuma, editor of Wasseja, as recently pointed out, urges strongly that the Indians be at once freed from reservations, and given full individual control of their property.

But the Society of American Indians (at least in 1916-17, the latest copies we have yet seen of The American Indian Magazine.) concedes that this is only a small part of the problem.

The development of the Indian is most important. Everything that will make each individual Indian prize his heritage, and make himself self-reliant and a better citizen is essential.

The white man has robbed the ancestors of the Indians. But that is past.

The Indian Bureau has been corrupt and injustice has been done. But much of this has been corrected, and the bureau is trying consistently to find and fulfill the Indian's best interests. Many will still need care and help if the bureau were abolished. They should be protected, while all who are capable of citizenship should receive it, with full personal rights. And this is the aim of the bureau.

The position taken is, the bureau has made and still makes mistakes, but the solution is not to be found simply in abolishing the bureau.

Further, there are many tribal claims for lands, reimbursements, or treaty rights not yet adjusted. Until they are settled, these tribes will maintain tribal organization. Their full rights should be determined as soon as possible. And by act of Congress, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is directed to investigate and report as soon as possible, so these claims may be finally settled, and the Indian takes his individual place as an American citizen.

When the Indian was met with kindness and peace—peace resulted. The French treated them as children of the same Father, and dwelt in peace, and had the Indians as allies in every war. Roger Williams and William Penn found them very ready to respond to kindly treatment.

Kindness during the past fifty years has meant peace, despite the injustice of some white men towards them, and almost despair at times.

Tithe Paying in Divided Homes

Question.—How can I pay tithing when my companion refuses to allow me to have money with which to do this?

Answer.—We believe that whatever you do in supporting the Lord's work in a financial way should be with the full knowledge and consent of your companion. To do otherwise might bring into the home an element which would cause trouble and unhappiness. If your companion refuses, there is nothing to do but to abide the time when he may be moved upon to permit you to do the things that you believe God wants you to do. In the meantime, make it a subject of prayer. The Lord is able to touch the hearts of men.

A Social Evil

In a recent bulletin of the State Institutions of Iowa, we are struck with the emphasis given to the evils of venereal diseases.

We have noticed heretofore in five different medical magazines, during a period of five years, whether monthly or quarterly magazine, that there is not a single one which did not continuously discuss this problem. Again and again was the assertion made that the white plague (consumption) was mild in its evil effects compared with the "black" plague.

We note that this same theme is still carried on in these State bulletins. The question is directly asked, Is there any other disease that can begin to compare in the evil results to children, with these? From the answer it seems to be inferred that there is none other.

When we were in the East we were struck with the fact that such a disease as smallpox, terrible as it is considered, does not kill as many people in the whole United States in one year as did general paresis in just one State. General paresis is only one branch of one disease.

Again and again has it been emphasized, and still is, that heredity plays a tremendous part in insanity and all delinquencies. Its evils are to be traced in epileptic children, among the delinquent children, among the feeble-minded, in the insane asylums, and in the penitentiaries. While mental deficiency is not a sole cause of criminality, it is a very large contributing cause.

The direct statement is made by one physician that after a critical examination it was discovered that of the fallen women of a certain city, much over half of them were mental defectives. Again, this writer in the State bulletin who is himself the superintendent of a State institution for the insane, adds that in his judgment the same thing will be found true of the men engaged in this peculiar trade. The mentally deficient are those who go to make up the bulk of the trade.

It may seem a surprising thing to some to question the mentality of the men who go wrong. Yet it seems quite in accordance with critical observation.

Another aspect is that the effect of these diseases on a person is to lower, not only his physical tone, but also his mental tone, and that which is lost is in the higher realm so that he becomes less moral.

When we recognize this for what it is, one of the worst scourges that confronts mankind; when we recognize it for what it is as a contagious disease, certainly the strongest and clearest action should be taken for quarantining. We note that many physicians of hospitals for the insane urge this emphatically—that it should be quarantined as quickly as is smallpox. And why not, when it has proven itself far more damaging to the race than has smallpox or any other contagious disease? Why not, when it has proven more destructive any year than has war? Why not, when a large percentage of men, young men, had to be rejected from the army because of deficiency caused by this evil?

This matter of quarantine does not take into consideration anything else except the contagious nature of the illness. Whether it be man, or woman, or child, strict isolation should be resorted to and at once in the proper medical care.

It is urged that many would not report. The same is true of other contagious diseases. But the penalty should be the same. When people understand the dangerous risk they run from the lack of proper treatment, surely such attention would not be neglected.

It must also be recognized that in some cases at least the origin of the disease is innocent. That is true of smallpox. It is true of diphtheria. It is true of other contagious diseases. In this discussion we are not touching upon the morality, the goodness or badness of the condition. We are considering the health of the Nation.

The cure in a practical, rational way, without regard to right or wrong, is absolute personal cleanliness, considering our bodies as the temple of the living God. This includes both moral cleanliness and also physical cleanliness from bathing.

Second: Be careful not to use public towels and cups, and see to the avoidance of the use of all public receptacles.

Third: Strict quarantine in all cases of infection, with careful medical attention.

A Note on E. Haeckel

The Christian Science Monitor, for October 29, contains rather a remarkable review of E. Haeckel and his work. The writer takes the view that Haeckel is more of a poet than a philosopher. He considers his work under three general headings. First, as a biologist, in which sense he ranks undoubtedly high. We think no one will contradict that.

Second, as one who made popular his theories of Darwinism and evolution, answering in popular terms the query whether man is a separate creation or the chief of the Primates, which he answered in accordance with modern scientific views, that man is part of the whole creation, the first of the animals.

His Riddle of a Universe (Walt Ritsel) has incidentally reached a circulation of 300 thousand in Germany alone, and very nearly as much in England, and has been sold as far as Japan. In this he is presenting not a logical, connected theory of reality, but rather attempting to satisfy the curiosity of humanity for harmonious adaption to life. It is to be judged rather as a creed and as the establishment of a faith than it is as a philosophical or logical presentation, nor is he in any sense a materialist.

The writer declares that Haeckel held that the atoms were endowed with spiritual life. We have usually seen this rather emphasized concerning the electrons composing matter. His desire for unity, for monism, caused his later writing to carry him beyond anything which can be demonstrated by evolution and beyond the confines of technical knowledge, so that he considers the inorganic and organic portions of the universe as manifestations of the same reality or substance.

However, we cannot lose sight of the fact that he did make a direct attack upon religion and that to him the Supreme Being is simply the one law of the universe, that animates rock, water, tree, gorilla, and man. It is doubtless true, whatever other comments may be made, that Haeckel made basic his law of substance, though he considered that this substance was not the dead matter of mechanics, but that every particle was rather endowed with spiritual potency. He recognized no matter without spirit.

The conclusions of his work are, at least so far as we have been able to ascertain, materialistic, even though that may not have been his intention.

We consider the above sketch as presenting his work in a most favorable light, as it disregards some of his unfortunate entries into the field of Christian history and theology.

Child Labor and the Schools

At the Child Welfare Conference, held at Washington last June, the question of child labor necessarily arose. The laws forbid child labor, but they all have a limiting age after which a child may be fully employed.

The discussion brought out the fact that a child may be put on half time school, where that is advisable, and half time work, to his own benefit. All agreed that young children should not be permitted to leave school and go to work. P. P. Claxton, at the head of the United States Department of Education, urged strongly that in the larger democracy that is coming throughout the world, there will be required a kind of education which cannot be given under fourteen, or even sixteen years of age. At twenty-one, young men and women go to the polls to decide the destiny of their local community, their State, and the Nation. Their votes even affect world relations. Such training cannot be given for industrial life, and the underlying principles of science that are necessary for industrial and commercial life before fourteen or fifteen years of age. Education for life work must be continued through adolescence.

With our labor-saving machinery, it should be possible for us to create sufficient wealth so that children may have the right and opportunity to continue until the years of early manhood and womanhood, their preparation for life and humanity.

Doctor Claxton made the suggestion for those past fourteen years of age that a forty-eight-week year be arranged, with half time in school or two weeks alternately in school and in a shop with formal instruction with reference to vocation. The child should always be consulted in vocational guidance, but should first receive a sufficiently broad training to be able to make a reasonable choice.

He frankly took the position that it is not necessary with our labor-saving machinery that children shall begin making a living or devote all their time to making a living at sixteen years of age. We should have a higher aim.

It should be noted that this in no way interferes with manual training and domestic science courses, but quite the contrary. Nor does it mean that the time shall be given wholly to schoolbooks; quite the contrary. There should be industrial training, as well as book training, through the years up to manhood and womanhood; and this training shall be such as to fit for a cultured life and for service to humanity. This training should be such as to fit for life work and life problems, and broad enough to give a real culture. But education should be made more practical instead of teaching subjects which are dropped immediately upon leaving school, and should be such as are adapted to the life work of the child, when he or she reaches maturity.

Subjects Being Discussed

War Did not Bring "Moral Cleansing"

The editor of The London Graphic, the famous British illustrated weekly, writes rather sadly in a recent issue, confessing that before the war he was one of those who believed that nothing but a great war could arrest the great wave of materialism, infidelity, and sensuality getting such a hold in the world.

But now that the results of the war are all the other way he realizes that the expected did not happen.

The curse of extravagance, with all its kindred evils, has fastened itself upon the world, engendering selfishness, sensuality, and even cruelty. The war has given us false standards of comparison, till even the sanest minded are often at a loss for a common standard for present values.

It is a day when religion must stand for something definite, for a plan that reaches to the very hearthstone of our homes and will check our perverted tastes and correct them by the plumb line of sacrifice for a definitely good cause. Nothing short of this will reach the goal.

Medicine and Religion

In ancient times it is quite apparent that medicine was closely related to religion. Among the American Indians, the term "medicine man" is evidently applied to one who acted in a religious way quite as much, if not more than he did as a healer. The same is true among the nations of antiquity.

In the early Christian church it is apparent that the officers claimed to possess the power of healing the sick. It is a fact that the monasteries became the seats of learning, and it is not surprising that the hospitals and sanitariums were primarily associated with religious institutions. So it is probable to-day that the larger part of the hospitals of the country are under the supervision of some church.

Our own Sanitarium is a return to the principle laid down by the early Christian church, of the healing of the sick through faith, and the laying on of hands, and the application of such medicine as the surgeons could provide for their help.

According to news dispatches from Turkey the Turks are buying the Christian Bible in unprecedented numbers. The secretary of the American Bible Society in Constantinople says: "We have what will prove, I think, to be an unprecedented demand for the Scriptures during the coming year. There are indications from all sides that this demand will be large and this in all the languages used here. The demand for Scriptures in Turkish will doubtless exceed that of any year."

A correspondent to the Christian Science Monitor says the court system in force in Ireland, backed by the Sein Feiners in three parts of the land is one of the most remarkable systems of justice the world has known, for it is based entirely on the good will of the people, having no legal authority behind it to enforce its sentences. Even though the British courts are supposed to be in operation, this correspondent says most of the Irish people flock the Irish courts. They act in the capacity of police as well, and are waging relentless war on the liquor traffic. There are persistent rumors that there is a mysterious island somewhere off the coast to which are consigned serious offenders.

Cooperation the Design of God

BY J. A. KOEHLER

Some of the ends to be attained by cooperation, and a suggestion as to the methods required.

In order to judge whether or not cooperation is the design of God we must bring two things into comparison: "cooperation" and "the design of God." But in order to bring these two things into comparison so as to form a rational conclusion we must have an adequate notion of the meanings of the terms we are employing. Words are but symbols which stand for ideas. Ideas exist in the mind.

What do we have in mind when we employ the term "cooperation"? The prefix "co" means with or together. Operate means to perform a work or labor. To cooperate then would mean to perform a given act of labor together. The word "together" implies a company, a number of things (persons or men) acting as a unit. So true cooperative undertakings are those in which a number of people are joined together as a unit in a common effort. It is self-evident that voluntary cooperation arises from the fact that a number of persons have a common interest which they wish to promote.

The history of cooperation is a history of society. Society is but so many forms of mutual aid. True mutual aid and true cooperation are synonymous terms. Society is not merely the massing of a number of people in a given area, but society is the sum of the formal relations in which associating individuals are held together. The term "society" does not stand for objects but for actions, and refers to the kind of activities that characterize a group and by which they are held together. The relations, of course, arise from mental states; they have a psychological groundwork.

Men intuitively discern the need of cooperation, and therefore history is replete with accounts of cooperative movements. With many of these societies every person, who is not dead to the world in which he lives, must be more or less acquainted. There would be, therefore, no special advantage in recounting these events. We may, however, with profit inquire into the causes of failures and successes of cooperative efforts. But this is to big a task to be undertaken in so short an essay. We venture the assertion, however, that the conditions of continued successful cooperation are quite fully implied in the following definition: "A division of responsibility on terms which relieve one individual or group from the responsibilities others assume and agree to carry, and under which terms all the parties to the common effort are assured participation in the benefits arising from the joint activity on the basis of equality."

It is obvious that people who cannot see or believe alike cannot cooperate successfully. Mental agreement is the first condition of successful cooperative effort. Secondly, we cannot hope for a continuous effort unless it promises to yield continuously some product for which there is a continuous desire and by which the effort made is satisfactorily rewarded. And third, the moral standard of the cooperating units must be such that a faithful performance of the duties imposed by the terms of association may be hoped for without the aid of too much machinery or checks and balances.

These conditions are not met by society at large and therefore there is no true cooperation in society as a whole. It is true that all men have needs in common, and that every person, either instinctively, intuitively, or with a conscious purpose, tries to supply such needs.

The primary conflict between men, in which they killed or enslaved one another as a means of self-preservation or individual welfare, has evolved into a secondary conflict in which numerous artifices are employed to achieve the same ends. So that society as at present constituted is not in purpose or in effect a life of true mutual aid, but it is a struggle under established customs, in which all men are supposed to have an "equal opportunity," in which each individual takes for himself the things he desires and leaves others to shape their actions within certain limitations and to exert their own powers for their own ends.

But cooperation or mutual aid has a different signification; it implies an interchange of equivalent values. And an interchange of equivalent values is by nature exactly opposite to a struggle for advantage. One issues in advantages to some at the expense of others' welfare, and the other maintains an equality of advantages and an equality of distribution for the sake of the good of all.

The Christian Religion a Cooperative Life

Christianity postulates the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. Note the principles comprehended in the prayer in which every truly Christian mind must be in accord: Our Father, not my Father but our Father, making all men common brothers to a common father.

This relationship has for its necessary concomitant another principle implied in "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors," which is to say that our claims upon the bounties of a common Father are in exact ratio to our purposes to do for others what we would have God do for us. This is another way of stating that in human society each individual is in duty bound to seek to find his orbit of duty and to walk in it, to give fully as much to others as he receives from them; to make human activity an interchange of equivalents, to be mutually helpful, to establish a truly cooperative society.

This principle of cooperation which underlies all Christian activity is further amplified in the writings of Paul and in modern revelation.

"Now he that planteth and he that watereth are one: and every man shall receive his own reward, according to his own labor. For we are laborers together with God."—1 Corinthians 3: 8, 9.

That is to say that the Christian church is a formal, organized, common effort or undertaking in which the responsibilities are divided, in which every man does his part, and in which every man shares in the benefits proportionately to his labors. He has no right to claim more than he is willing to give.

Again, in Ephesians 4:16 Paul says the church is an organization so constructed that each activity is complementary to all the other activities, and that the workings of every part contribute to the common good. And in 1 Corinthians 12: 25, 26, this is made even stronger by the statement that "the members should have the same care one for another"; that the benefits (or losses) should be shared alike by all the members of the body.

The Latter-Day Work; Its Divisions of Labor

All doubt that cooperation is the design of God is removed by latter-day revelations. At the same time in these revelations the conditions of continued successful cooperation are clearly outlined.

Let us examine first of all section 119, paragraph 8, Book of Doctrine and Covenants (italics mine):

"All are called according to the gifts of God unto them; and to the intent that all may labor together, let him that laboreth in the ministry and him that toileth in the affairs of the men of business and of work labor together with God for the accomplishment of the work intrusted to all."

Here we find (1) a number of men joined together into one body for the purpose of putting forth a common effort in which all have a common interest. We find (2) a division of responsibility, the work being divided into three classes to be carried on by three groups of workmen: 1, the men of the ministry; 2, the men of business; 3, the men of work.

Associate with the foregoing the provision that every man should "labor in his own calling" (Doctrine and Covenants 83:21) and we have the third condition of successful cooperation, viz, that each set of workers is relieved of the responsibility attaching to other groups of workmen. In order that each may be assured that the work of others will be carried on as intended and that there may be proper guarantees of participation in benefits, a formal organization of those who manage the properties of the group for business purposes is provided for:

"He shall have power to bring evil upon you. It is wisdom in me; therefore, a commandment I give unto you, that ye shall organize yourselves, and appoint every man his stewardship, that every man may give an account."—Doctrine and Covenants 191:2.

The next provision is that all parties to the cooperative effort shall be assured participation in the benefits arising from the joint activity on the basis of equality:

"Inasmuch as they receive more than is needful for their necessities, and their wants, it shall be given into my storehouse, and the benefits shall be consecrated unto the inhabitants of Zion."—Doctrine and Covenants 70:2.

"Behold, this is what the Lord requires of every man in his stewardship, even as I, the Lord, have appointed, or shall hereafter appoint unto any man. And, behold, none are exempt from this law who belong to the church of the living God; yea, neither the bishop, neither the agent, who keepeth the Lord's storehouse; neither he who is appointed in a stewardship over temporal things; he who is appointed to administer spiritual things, the same is worthy of his hire, even as those who are appointed to a stewardship, to administer in temporal things; yea, even more abundantly, which abundance is multiplied unto them through the manifestations of the Spirit; nevertheless, in your temporal things you shall be equal, and this not grudgingly, otherwise the abundance of the manifestations of the Spirit shall be withheld."—Doctrine and Covenants 70:3.

"And you are to be equal, or in other words, you are to have equal claims upon the properties, for the benefit of managing the concerns of your stewardships, every man according to his wants and his needs, inasmuch as his wants are just; and all this for the benefit of the church of the living God, that every man may improve upon his talent, that every man may gain other talents; yea, even an hundred-fold, to be cast into the Lord's storehouse, to become the common property of the whole church, every man seeking the interest of his neighbor, and doing all things with an eye single to the glory of God."—Doctrine and Covenants 81:4.

Elsewhere are rules laid down which limit the number who are united together for the purposes of building up the common interests of those (1) who believe in these doctrines, i. e., who see alike, and (2) whose moral standards give reasonable guarantees of a faithful fulfillment of the covenant by which they are bound together.

The matters referred to in the foregoing excerpts from the law of God are specifically terms of successful cooperation and are prima facie evidence that cooperation is the plan of God.

The Purpose of the Plan

We ought to go one step further in our inquiry. We should ask, What is the purpose in planning such a cooperative effort? The answer is: The purpose of human experience—"the measure of the fullness of the stature of Christ" in man.

Cooperative efforts are commonly regarded as having for their end the production or distribution (or both) of goods. This is not the primary purpose of Christian cooperation. Christianity aims to make men, and in order to achieve its end Christianity sets forth the conditions of successful continued cooperation because they are at once the conditions of Christian development. Only by honoring God's law with respect to property, rights, to its uses, to the employment of our powers of body and mind, and with respect to the equitable distribution of the goods that arise from the common effort can we hope to become men of God, to have a fullness of life—eternal life.

"If you will that I give unto you a place in the celestial world, you must prepare yourselves by doing the things which I have commanded you and required of you."—Doctrine and Covenants 77:1.

Cooperation, then, is the plan of God because God's plan is to save the human race, and the cooperation he prescribes is the process by which this salvation is brought about.

The Spiritualism of the Bible and Christianity—No. 1

BY MAHLON SMITH

The first of two articles on this subject, this one setting forth some of the practices of spiritualism as contrasted with customs of the early Christian church.

There seems to be a great revival of the subject of modern spiritualism in the largest newspapers as well as the leading magazines, like the Woman's Home Companion and other influential periodicals. That subject is eliciting world-wide interest. The movement is growing. In the daily Kansas City Star it is reported that the congregations of spiritualists in that city number almost as many as any one of the leading Christian denominations. At the same time revivals of religion seem to be very scarce or else they are not reported in the papers. Hence, it seems to the writer that an effort to have the Jesus of Nazareth represented in this discussion would be timely, and if given universal consideration would be a benefit to the reader.

All we ask is that if by an examination of this subject anew, it awakens an interest in the reader, that he will do the writer the favor to call his neighbors' attention to it. It is customary with spiritualist writers to submit experiences of an extraordinary and supernatural character to support their claims to having communications with the dead. Now, the writer believes that Christians should be able to command just as wonderful testimonies of the miraculous as can the spiritualists, even in our own day, and so I shall expect to offer two or three of such testimonies at the close of these articles. And if I do, to what people shall I resort for these experiences to match those of spiritualism but to the Latter Day Saints, whose official church paper the HERALD is? They claim unflinchingly and without any reservation to observe all things the Savior commanded before he disappeared before the earnest and steadfast gaze of his three leading apostles and his mortal body was enveloped by the waiting cloud, which would protect it from the various and changing conditions which it would pass through on its journey to the paradise of God.

Now, the writer's boyhood days were spent in New York State, about half way between the two sections that gave rise to both modern spiritualism and to the Church of Jesus Christ restored, as it claimed, a reproduction of the primitive Christian church as it existed and as it was during its first four centuries. I was born in 1852 and hence, as my school days began, these two classes of people, both considered almost equally peculiar, but very different from each other, had then got under full headway.

Both soon had adherents among our nearest and most intimate neighbors and even relatives. And it might be said of both classes that their children and grandchildren yet adhere to the faith of their fathers quite universally. And as I have stated, both these organizations still exist and enjoy a degree of growth and prosperity. Very good and respectable people listened to the claims of both these classes of people then, and such people are examining their respective claims to-day by the thousand.

Let me make a statement here, of the condition of Christianity during the years 1830-48 which witnessed the origin and rise of these two systems of spiritualism. Christianity is founded on and built upon and comprises the teachings of a certain book called the Holy Bible. And that book divides the spiritualism of Christianity into two different forms, viz, the fruits of the Spirit and the gifts of the Spirit, the latter sometimes referred to as the signs to follow believers. Teachings and explanations of these two forms of spiritual blessings and privileges are contained all through the New Testament almost side by side, and no one need err in an understanding of them both.

Now, the extraordinary spiritualism of the Bible is comprised entirely in the last-named form, "the gifts of the spirit." There is no requirement for miraculous light, power, or knowledge comprised in the first division, i. e., "the fruits of the spirit." But these the Christians of that time had and enjoyed and respected. No ordinance was needed to receive them, no authority. One could be as proficient in an understanding and practice of them as another. They do not comprise and are not governed by the "gift of the Holy Ghost." But the "signs" the "gifts" of the Spirit do comprise all these miraculous manifestations. They comprise the spiritualism of the Bible and true Christianity.

The gift of the Holy Ghost stands back of these signs to believers and, as I expect to show, the gospel ordinance of the laying on of hands stands back of and is intended to bestow, the gift of the Holy Ghost. No teaching could be made plainer or more unmistakable than that of the New Testament concerning these principles, that by and through them the true church of Christ should be filled with manifestations and miracles, healing the sick, casting out and overcoming evil spirits, dreams, foreknowledge, prophecy, visions of the future, etc., and these manifestations were promised to every man "to profit withal." It explained that to one would be given one gift and to another some other, dividing to every man severally as he, God, will.

At the period referred to, the Christian churches utterly discarded and disclaimed these "gifts of the gospel." They said they were no longer needed, that they were confined to the days of the apostles, and both these statements were, I believe, absolutely false and untrue. At no time were these blessings more needed than in the present age to afford such testimonies to men as will convince them that Jesus is the Christ, and to afford a means to cope with the claims and wonders of modern spiritualism. As to their being confined to the days of Christ and the apostles, nothing could be more contrary to the history of the primitive church through its first four centuries.

Hence, when spiritualism came forth and demonstrated to the world that it had the power to work miracles and to obtain communication with the spirits of departed friends and relatives, it is no wonder its claims were at once investigated, for even the most ignorant and unlearned could easily discern that the churches were repudiating the best and most important privileges that God had promised to them and which they should yet have. As Moses and the magicians of Egypt went before the king and both demonstrated their ability to perform miracles, yet the power of God through Moses was proven to be higher and superior to that of the magicians, so these two forms of spiritualism were to go before the world, and though both demonstrated they possessed powers above that of other classes of people, yet it remained to be seen which of them was superior to the other and to all else in the world.

The healing mediums and the vision-seeing mediums of spiritualism have their counterpart in the healing of the sick by the apostles and the promise to Christians that "your old men shall dream dreams and your young men see visions." What spiritualism seeks to do the Christian church does do, or should do, and it will do if that church is owned by the Great Master as his own.

Christianity should comprise the genuine; it did comprise it for centuries, while spiritualism should be put to the test, "to the law and the testimony, and if they speak not according to these it is because they have no light in them."

I well remember how a boy of my own age, some twelve or fifteen years old, whose father's and his uncle's families were spiritualists, telling at school how his uncle, a heavy, portly man, was lifted nearly to the ceiling of the room as he sat on a table around which were seated the medium and as many "believers" as could be seated, all with their hands on the table awaiting the power and the presence of some unseen force which at length came repeatedly and with such power that the experiment was tried to see if this man would not be lifted by it, as stated, and sure enough he was so that they were all amazed and some of the younger ones frightened. This is what is called by spiritualists "levitation" or the passing through the air of a human body through the agency of, and sustained by spirits summoned from realms of those who had departed the present life.

I have never doubted since hearing this schoolmate tell of such occurrences, in his frank and innocent way, that there is a miraculous power in spiritualism, but is it a good or an evil power? Is it from light or darkness?

At about that time, or a little later, it happened that my oldest brother, then a young man, was killed by an accident in a mill where he was working. It caused great sorrow in the community and my mother, a devoted Latter Day Saint, was almost stricken and overcome by the great and sudden bereavement. A short time after this it was arranged that one of these spiritualists and his family should come and make us an afternoon visit and then spend the evening at my uncle's, not a spiritualist, who lived close by, and my parents were to accompany them.

This was very acceptable as they were highly respected and honest farmers aside from their peculiar belief. A man and a woman came along with them, both having different names, showing they were not a married couple, and yet, though they both had families living a few miles away, were very free with each other, the woman sitting on the man's lap frequently and performing similar acts of really undue familiarity. These turned out to be spiritualist mediums, and it had been arranged unknowingly to my mother that a sitting, a seance, should take place at my uncle's house that evening, although he was a local Methodist preacher, but very tolerant to other beliefs.

So, after some visiting in the evening, this lady medium suddenly looked up with a startled expression toward the ceiling of the room and exclaimed that she saw the spirit of a young man that had appeared in the room but, she said, it had disappeared because of such a strong influence of some opposing person in the room and that further interview with this spirit would have to be discontinued. Well, she was right in that statement as my mother was very pronounced in her belief that such things were not from a good but from an evil source. She was all the more opposed also because of the conduct of the medium she had seen in the afternoon.

Not long after this there occurred the last spiritualist seance I ever heard of taking place in that neighborhood. An old man, a believer in the Bible, had attended out of curiosity. And in the course of the "sitting" this heavy man who had been lifted so mysteriously at a previous meeting, became inspired, as he represented, with the spirit of an Onondaga Indian chieftain by the name of Antiaugur who had lived several years before that on the reservation of that tribe situated a few miles away. He gave himself up to the speech and antics of an Indian, waving the tomahawk in pantomime and celebrating the war dance in a very noisy manner.

After this had subsided, this old man arose and expressed some objections to the exhibition that had taken place, quoting some passages of scripture from the Bible, whereupon the "chieftain" with a loud war whoop fell upon the old man and it was said would have killed him had he not been taken off by main force of several strong men who happened to be present. This incident was a hard blow to spiritualism in Marcellus Township, Onondago County, New York where it occurred.

This and other similar incidents I know of leads the writer to two wonderful conclusions, first, that these manifestations of spiritualism are subject to a better and stronger influence that may oppose them. They may be thwarted, changed and turned out of the way, or prevented entirely by the stronger will power, or perhaps better spirits, of a skeptic who may be present. Second, from the testimony of their own members, nearly all of which, I believe, I have heard or read from their start, these conclusions may be made, that they recognize only one state or condition in the future world, inhabited by all the promiscuous spirits of all that live upon earth, the good, the bad, and the indifferent, the ignorant, the educated, honorable men, and liars; they do not believe in the heaven and hell of the Bible, they generally do not believe the Bible itself. The writer has known of all kinds of messages from the dead rapped out by their mediums, some simple and almost unintelligible, some absolute lies, others somewhat sensible.

I believe the only really pleasing and beneficial circumstances I ever knew of in that neighborhood, I will mention. Two of these people emigrated to Ohio, taking their little girl, then two years old, with them. Four years after, my aunt and the grandmother of this little girl went to Ohio, to visit this family. She had left her husband, the Methodist preacher mentioned above, at home, not feeling well when she left. He was old and she knew needed her care. So, when she had been there a few days she got uneasy to return home before her visit was out.

So, a medium was called in, a neighboring woman, who had this little girl sit in the rocking-chair provided and she had her in a deep trance immediately. And then the little girl commenced to talk just as she would if she were walking down the path to my aunt's house by the back way. Although she had never been over this path, even in her infancy, she described the very large balm of Gilead tree that stood beside the path, the water of the milldam that came close to the kitchen door, (this house was owned by the proprietor of the mill that stood near by) and finally as she seemingly passed into the house she exclaimed, "Why here is an old man lying on the bed inside these curtains. He is reading a great big book. He has been sick but is much better now and is quite well."

This message was told so innocently by the little girl that it reassured my aunt and she stayed to the end of her contemplated visit. When she got home she ascertained that her husband, at that very time, was lying on the bed in an annex, the front of which was hung with a curtain, reading the Bible in preparation of the next Sunday's sermon. But, mark you, this mesmerizing of the little girl soon made her frail and delicate and had to be discontinued in order to save the child's life.

The principle of spiritualists has been to demonstrate that they can communicate with the dead. The practical and salutary results are very meager. It may be some comfort to those left behind, to know their friends still live in spirit in another world. If this be so in any one case, let them have the credit of it. Their mediums seldom live to a good old age in honor, like the fully ripened shock of grain, serenely awaiting their eternal garnering.

The Fox sisters, whose Rochesters knockings startled the world, afterward became dissatisfied with little or no recompense for the excitement they had occasioned and made a statement they had deceived the public by a peculiar sound they had produced by the bones of their ankles—a physical impossibility. And it is very peculiar that the sittings and seances of this people must take place in a darkened room, as though the spirits called up were from a place of darkness and could not bear the light.

In turning to the Bible and Christianity, we find the good book bearing testimony to the existence of a Godhead consisting of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. In the last of the three is comprised the spiritualism of that Godhead. It is by the latter agency that he rules the destiny of mankind, and by it is brought to pass "special providences" among the children of men as well as bringing harmony to the works of nature and the movements of the starry worlds. Now, the testimony of the Bible that God exists brings faith to man and in answer to this faith, God gives to man an absolute knowledge of his existence as well as the existence of a brighter and a better world than this present world in which we live, and in which the spirits of the good and the obedient dwell together in happiness and hope, awaiting the time, when it shall fully come, when to each of them shall be resurrected a glorious body and the means provided to make that body and spirit together, immortal, never again to be separated and die. Thus it is that the promise of the gift of the Holy Ghost, made unto every Christian without exception, makes that person, if he receives it, a Christian spiritualist. He needs no mediumship except the Savior alone who hath said, "If I go away I will send the Holy Ghost, which is the Comforter unto you." So, let us fully understand this important subject, for the gospel of the Son of God provides an established and fixed operation, a channel as it were, by which he sends, miraculously, a knowledge of him and of heaven, unto every man. To be brief, let me give a chronological history of Christian spiritualism:

In the days of the youth of our Savior, came one John, presaging a new dispensation of light and knowledge to mankind. He was the immediate forerunner of the Savior. He prepared the way. In locations where much water was to be found he baptized many people for the remission of their sins, thus preparing them for the reception of the Holy Ghost, which he said one who would come after him would impart unto them.

Then, as John stood upon the banks of Jordan, approached that form and face and figure expressing so much gravity, humility, and benevolence; he, too, was "buried" as Paul expressed it, in baptism. Then followed his personal ministry to that people, and time and country. Everywhere he worked miracles, some of them of the usual nature of healing the sick, etc., others very uncommon, such as never were done before and seldom, if ever, done since that time. John had said, "There cometh one after me who will baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire."

In fulfillment of this, Jesus came with the God-ordained authority of Melchisedec, and with this authority standing back of his ministrations, he laid his hands on different ones and ordained them, some apostles, some seventies, some elders. Then they in turn went forth and by virtue of the authority they had received from Christ, they ordained others to the same power. Jesus also told them it was expedient that he go away that the Holy Ghost might take his personal work up and make it more far-reaching and universal.

After his departure, preliminary to the further extension of the bestowment of the Holy Ghost, that exhibition of its wonder and power took place at Pentecost, in public congregation for the express purpose of demonstrating that the spirit and power of the prophets had returned to earth, and also at Cæsarea to demonstrate that this spirit might now be received by the Gentiles. After these two exhibitions of a public nature for a special purpose, was established and observed the ordinance of the "laying on of hands" following baptism, by those having authority, for individual reception of that Spirit.

The work had commenced; the promise was being fulfilled, and like a prairie fire driven by variable winds, it would spread here, there, and everywhere, no power on earth being able to stamp it out, its presence being terminated only by its withdrawal by God himself. Foreknowledge, healing, and miracles then went into the families of the Saints, in fact Christian spiritualism. The authority had been conferred, the ordinance of the laying on of hands provided, and by this gospel means God made provision for the Spirit of the Lord, the Holy Ghost, to be conferred upon every baptized believer, a Comforter to abide with them forever, in fact not only with them but with their children and their children's children after them.

It is stated that God changeth not. Going back from Christ's day for two thousand years we find this same procedure established and committed to the natural house of Israel, Abraham receiving the authority from Melchisedec himself; then in turn committing the same to his children and they to their children on down for generations, by the laying on of hands, the ordinance God now fixed in the gospel plan for the same purpose.

Notice the wonderful and practical results that followed. The Old Testament scripture is an emanation of the spiritualism of that dispensation, the New Testament of the gospel dispensation. How the whole civilized world holds those books in the greatest veneration! How they continually bless mankind! What a wonderful privilege is provided in the two sole covenant-making ordinances of the gospel, baptism first and the laying on of hands following, to bring to us remission of sins, and then the manifestations of the Spirit of God to come to us and at needed intervals to continue with us all through our lives.

This is an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast; it is a knowledge that reacheth to that within the veil. That Holy Book relates the occurrence of thousands of spiritual manifestations, distributed all along the centuries for four thousand years. The destiny of individuals and nations has been molded by it. It has brought peace and assurance and hope to millions. If the world wants spiritualism, let them turn to the spiritualism of God, of the Bible and Christianity.

"But," says the reader, "to what form, what denomination, shall I turn? What you speak of does not now exist in any of the churches I know of." Well, let me apply to the pages of church history that you have become acquainted with, the facts bearing on this subject, as well as the Bible itself.

Some time after the Reformation had got well established, learned men of Europe, generally in sympathy with the Reformation, found that the teachings of the Bible, as well as the history of the church and Christians after the days of Christ, had been thrown into confusion and ambiguity, by the divers opinions and teachings of men. So, it was arranged that a nobleman and a historian by the name of Mosheim, Baron Mosheim, should investigate the history of the primitive church and write a true history of the same, unbiased by the contradictory and sectarian creeds of men. They gave him all the assistance they could, and some of the crowned heads of those leading countries, England, Germany, and Denmark, as well as others contributed to make the work when finished, dependable and authentic.

Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History was the result of the enterprise. This work took up the subject century after century, each by itself, the different divisions growing in volume as the church spread out and grew in numbers. Now, on the authority of that history which anyone may procure and examine, I want to make the following propositions:

1. Baptism was administered by the immersion of the whole body in water, during the first, the second, the third, and the fourth centuries of the Christian era.

2. The laying on of hands was practiced for the reception of the gift of the Holy Ghost, during the first, second, third, and fourth centuries of the Christian era.

3. These two ordinances being thus observed, the gifts of the gospel, the signs to follow believers, the gift of the Holy Ghost, miracles, prophecy, healing the sick, tongues and interpretation of tongues, visions, dreams, etc., followed obedience to them, through the first, second, third, and fourth centuries. The authority of Melchisedec committed to the church by Christ vitalizing and making operative those ordinances and the spiritualism of the church existed through the centuries alluded to.

4. John Wesley, greatest scholar of the Reformation, bears witness to the truth of the above propositions. He says in the ninety-fourth of his published sermons that these miraculous manifestations were received by the early Christians down to the time of Constantine, A. D. 325, but at that time and soon after entirely ceased, because, he said, the Christians had almost turned heathen again and had only a dead form left. He said it was not because these blessings were no longer needed, nor that the whole world was turned Christian, very few being nominally Christian at that time, in proportion to the number of inhabitants.

Thus we learn that the popular churches of the present day bear no resemblance to the primitive church during its first four centuries, except in respect to the "fruits of the Spirit" which do not include the vital principles of the gospel. They do not include any extraordinary manifestations of the Holy Ghost, in fact no Christian spiritualism as it existed and continued during the centuries named. The situation should be alarming to them indeed.

Book of Mormon Rays on Scientific Paths—No. 13

BY A. B. PHILLIPS

Markham, whose work we have quoted, makes it plain that the Inca government was one of the most wonderful that ever existed in the history of the world. Yet this government of so-called savages was cruelly and treacherously destroyed by those who pretended to be their civilizers. He remarks:

"So perfect was the Inca organization that it continued to work efficiently, and almost mechanically, for some time after the guiding heads had been struck down. The Spanish conquerors found that when they marched through the districts, sacking houses and destroying growing crops, the local officers kept a careful record of the injury done. The accounts were then examined and checked, and, if one district had lost more than another those that had suffered less made up part of the difference, so that the burden might be shared equally by all. Under such a system there could be no want, for thought was taken for the nourishment and comfort of every creature. There was hard work, while provision was made not only for rest, but also for recreation."—Page 38.

When the ruthless conquerors of Inca civilization had completed their devastating work they made one of the most foul blots that ever disgraced the pages of history. To brutally crush an innocent people and wipe out of existence the most perfect social system ever known is a fiendish enormity that human decency must forever abhor. Mr. Markham says: "A few of the destroyers, and a very few, could appreciate the fabric they had pulled down, its beauty and symmetry, and its perfect adaptation to its environment. But no one could rebuild it."—Page 169. Thus perished from the earth a system that was brought into most successful operation by a people whose origin and history are revealed in the Book of Mormon.

The Testimony of Tradition

The events of moment in the formative or progressive periods of a race are often of such impressiveness that they are cherished or valued for ages. With some deviations as to circumstances, aspects, and details, many of the occurrences of importance have been transmitted for generations orally, even through the mutations of civic and social life, with sufficient accuracy to assist in the tracing or verifying of historical connections. What is true in this regard of the nations of the East is also noticeable with respect to the aboriginal Americans. We therefore present a few of the parallels found in the Book of Mormon and American folklore that are significant of an identical origin.

The tower of Babel, the confusion of tongues, and the dispersion, are mentioned in the Book of Mormon. It informs us that those who came at that time to America were allowed to retain the same language, and that these consisted of several families who traveled together to this land. Traditions of this nature were widespread among the American nations. Saint Giles says: "There were many legends, too, reminding us of the scriptural Babel tower. . . . As in the Bible, the differences of dialect are accounted for by the interposition of Deity causing confusion of tongues."—Faiths of the World, p. 298.

Josiah Priest tells us that "among them were fifteen heads or chiefs of families, which were permitted to speak the same language, and these were the Tultecs, Alculhucans, and Azteca nations, who embodied themselves together, which was very natural, and traveled, they knew not where, but at length arrived in the country of Aztalan or the lake country in America."—American Antiquities, p. 206.

Another widely-diffused tradition that harmonizes remarkably with the Book of Mormon account is concerned with the early history of the Nephites, whose civilization grew out of a colony of four brothers and associates who came from Palestine. The youngest brother, Nephi, was chosen leader and led his people, but not without much opposition from his older brothers. At one time this opposition became so great that he was made prisoner, but was finally released. This ancient record does not of course contain modern geographical names, as it was written many centuries ago by those who lived on this continent before modern names were applied to any part of it. From the various statements contained in the book, however, it appears that the Nephite colony landed in South America and by a series of migrations eventually developed their greatest civilization considerably northward. Of the various traditions held by the Incas, it is claimed that the following one has been handed down for ages: "It is related that four brothers, with their four sisters, came forth from the apertures of the dawn, and that they were children of the Sun. They advanced northward. One was sealed up in a cave by reason of the jealousy of his brethren."—Page 21. This quotation is from Markham, and is given somewhat similarly by various writers. As they came from the East it was but natural that tradition should make them "children of the Sun," who had come from "the apertures of the dawn."

The Book of Mormon gives a considerable account of fierce and frequent wars that arose between the descendants of Nephi and those of certain of his brethren who wished to obtain the fertile lands which they occupied. This also appears to be indicated in the tradition mentioned by Markham in his translated work, Rites and Laws of the Yncas. This tradition says: "After the country was peopled, there was a great want of space, and, as the land was insufficient, there were wars and quarrels, and all the nations occupied themselves in making fortresses, and every day there were encounters and battles."—Page 70. The Book of Mormon specially mentions the building of the fortresses for strengthening their cities. One of these works mentioned by Markham is of exceptional interest. He states that it was on the hill above Cuzco, "consisting of three lines of wall built of gigantic stones and arranged in salient and retiring angles. Some of these stones are twenty-seven feet, and they average fifteen feet in height."—History of Peru, p. 19.

This younger brother not only held temporal power over his people, but the Book of Mormon states that he also possessed prophetic and miraculous powers that were given of the Lord. The Mythology of All Races, volume 10, by Doctor Alexander, remarks of American tradition: "It is interesting to note that the younger brother is the one to whom medicine-powers are ascribed."—Page 295. As an inspired prophet, Nephi foretold the coming of Christ and promised that he should appear to people on the American Continent after his resurrection, which should be preceded by a great darkness over the land. Traditions of this happening were actually handed down from generation to generation and were recited to the early discoverers of the New World. In J. W. Bouton's work, he says: "For ages before the landing of Columbus on its shores, the inhabitants of ancient Mexico worshiped a 'Savior'—as they called him (Quetzalcoatl) who was born of a pure virgin."—Bible Myths, page 129. He says that the Mexicans and Peruvians worshiped a crucified Savior anciently.

Kingsborough also mentions this fact, as does Markham. Concerning the tradition of a period of darkness, the latter tells us: "They relate that, a long time ago, the sun disappeared and the world was dark for a space of five days." Other writers have mentioned similar traditions that were repeated among them. Markham suggests that "this may have been the eclipse which occurred when our Redeemer died."—Ibid., page 132. The fact that the emblem of the cross was an ancient object of devotion in America and was associated with a crucified Deity is stated in several works besides those already named. Of his appearance on this continent, in fulfillment of the prophecy of Nephi and others, there seems to be evidence in the coming of the great Healer, of whom Markham says: "As he went through all the land, he performed many miracles. The sick were healed by his touch." In some of their traditions he was called the "white One," and was revered as a God.

Doing Good

BY A. JENSEN

"I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple concerning evils."—Romans 16: 19.

Doing good is the watchword of creation. Life is a serious proposition, and not a round of useless pleasure. This life is a training school. In doing good we must be thoughtful.

Being careless is one of the things that exerts a most tremendous influence in life, spiritually as well as temporally. There are many ways in which we might do good. We cannot all do good in the same way, but we can all do good some way.

Like King Albert, speaking of Belgium and America: "If there is no equality of power and riches between them, there is equality in the love of liberty and in aspiration toward social progress."

There is a grand thought presented here by the king. Love should be the moving spring in all our actions in life. We cannot love God without loving our brothers and sisters and all our fellow men. The power of God is greater than the power of men. We are all equal in that sense of love, to do good if we are so minded.

A Methodist preacher said once: "If you can't preach, you can live." I have been in meetings where persons have risen to their feet, and could not speak a word, but they brought an influence over the whole congregation that caused many to shed tears. Their life was of such a character that the Lord blessed them with his Spirit. And they won the confidence of those with whom they associated. Such lives are doing good.

A word of encouragement many times does more good than the gift of money. We sing, "Speak gently, let no harsh word mar the good we may do here."

Silence at times is doing good. It sometimes causes men to use their own heads instead of giving heed to unwise talk. Paul's advice was, to be wise unto that which is good.

The time in which we live requires more carefulness than any previous time. We are living in perilous times. The love for gain is causing many to be shortsighted in the things pertaining to the life to come.

There is a wave of extravagance sweeping the country. We need patience, self-control, the exercise of frugality, the application of wisdom, common sense, and straight thinking.

The State of Kansas prints all the textbooks used in the schools of the State, and will soon have completed a million copies at a saving in cost of about 25 cents for each book sold. About thirty-six different books are published.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

COOPERATIVE PLANS FOR AGRICULTURE

After leaders of some of the foremost farmer cooperative marketing organizations of the United States had told how they have developed cooperation for the last thirty years, accomplished wonderful results under the Rochedale system, but are now at a point in their growth where they are at a standstill, Aaron Sapiro, San Francisco attorney for fourteen of the largest cooperative associations on the Pacific coast, told them that they were all wrong, fundamentally and economically, and then told them how it is done right in California.

He said that they had made the mistake of using consumer cooperation methods when they were producers and should use producer cooperation methods. He said producers should go to Denmark to study producer cooperation, and not to England to study their cooperation, because theirs is consumer cooperation.

The two kinds of cooperation, he said, are fundamentally different, but not antagonistic to each other. On the contrary, their interests are identical, he said, and the cooperative producers' organizations in California are getting ready for the time when they will deal only with cooperative consumer organizations.

Difference in Plans

The fundamental difference between the two, he said, is that the consumer cooperators, under the Rochedale plan, sell to everybody and return to their stockholders the profits they make at the end of the year. Under the California producers' cooperative plan, the organization dealt only in the products of its members, made no profits, and returned to each member the resale price of his products, minus the cost of selling.

Another difference, he said, was that consumer cooperation is organized by local units, at the point of sale, while producer cooperation is organized by commodity and not by the localities of production.

A fundamental of producer cooperation, he said, was that the trading company should not have a capital stock, nor should it own warehouses or any of the physical necessities for carrying on business. Warehouses should be owned by a separate legal entity, another cooperation, which should do no trading, but just own the plants and pay a certain fixed return on the investments. This left the trading companies with a clean slate. The trading company financed itself on warehouse receipts.

Boards of Trade Attacked

He scored the cooperative grain marketers of the Middle West for trying to get memberships on the boards of trade. "Why should you want to get in a gambling exchange? Why don't you go out quietly and take away the customers of the speculators that deal on the exchange? Reaching out for the top price is not business—it is gambling! Boards of trade for marketing grain are absolutely nonessential."

Cooperative grain marketing, on the producers' plan, he said, would require control by the farmers' organization of fifty-one per cent of the grain production in nine of the most important States. This must be obtained by absolute contracts for the products of the members for five years. The five-year clause is necessary, he said, because the buyers of grain would be afraid to deal with them if it were for one year only, as, if they had to go back to the speculators the following year, the speculators would punish them. So they had to have assurance that their supply was assured for years.

He said that his statements were based on years of experience and success in California. He told how the prune growers got control of the crop, had driven speculators out of the business, had secured contracts with wholesalers for their whole crop, all signed and with the price left blank to be filled in by the growers' association when they got ready to set their price. On top of that they had vastly increased the prune consumption in the United States by advertising. The better prices for prunes had stimulated the production to such an extent that they had to create new markets.

Salesmen Are Needed

The farmers should get out of their thoughts that they should have none but "dirt farmers" in control of their marketing companies, as has been the case in the past. He said that they should get to the other extreme and rule that no farmer should be employed by their marketing companies in marketing. They should go out and buy the best salesman they could find to market their products.

Farming is a specialty, he said, and a man that is a good farmer does not have time to learn salesmanship. They should hire experts in every line, and pay enough to get the best experts to be had in that line.

E. T. Meredith, Secretary of the United States Department of Agriculture, addressed the group, telling that they had failed to take advantage of the studies of the department that have been made of cooperative marketing. He told how the decreased appropriation for his department had cut down much essential and valuable service that it has rendered in the past, because the farmers did not insist that their congressmen make proper appropriation.

Keynote of Conference

Cooperation among cooperators was declared to be the purpose of the conference that has brought to Chicago for two days the leaders of all the foremost farm organizations, agricultural colleges, and the agricultural press of the United States and Canada, by Leonard Howard, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, which called the conference, in addressing the opening meeting.

Desirability and necessity for forming a national organization to coordinate the activities of all the cooperative organizations now in existence was emphasized by three speakers at the morning session.

These different organizations, operating independently, have accomplished a great deal and have grown to tremendous proportions, but they have now come to a point, the three speakers agreed, where larger usefulness requires that they all get together. Petty jealousies and suspicions have prevented such an amalgamation in the past; the speakers said that the time has come when these obstacles should be swept aside.

Representatives of the Chicago packers were recognized among the audience of about three hundred men. They were attracted, apparently, by a natural business interest in what the farmers might have to say at this conference about live stock marketing.—Christian Science Monitor.

NEED OF PRENATAL CARE

In the United States, every year some 16,000 mothers die in childbirth, and nearly a quarter of a million babies die under one year of age. Most of these deaths are preventable, we are informed by the Children's Bureau at Washington. Other countries show a markedly lower death rate, both of mothers and of babies. In sixteen leading countries, thirteen show a more favorable maternal death rate than the United States, and six a more favorable infant mortality rate.

So far as gain has been made it appears only in the deaths occurring during the later months of infancy, deaths due to improper care and feeding of the baby, with which infant welfare work is mainly concerned. But the mortality from maternal causes are not decreasing. About half of all infant deaths occur within six weeks of birth, and these are due chiefly to the condition of the mother and the lack of proper care and instruction for the mother. This lack of prenatal care not only results in many preventable deaths, but it also results in lower vitality and permanent impairment of health and efficiency of thousands of women and infants who survive.

In rural communities it is very rare that mothers have adequate care.

The Children's Bureau has secured detailed information about the mothers of 2,978 babies born in eight rural areas representing six different States. In only five cases did they have prenatal care approaching the minimum standard of adequate care. In 80 per cent of the cases, they have no prenatal care whatever.

One basic difficulty is the family income was found in most instances below the amount needed for decent living. This is the result of the analysis of 31,000 family budgets. Of 23,000 city babies, more than half were born in families where the father's earnings were below the minimum to provide the bare necessities of existence. Only one in seven was in a family where the earnings reached a fair minimum.

The problem is nation-wide, for high as the general figures are, they are still too low to show the facts.

Many other governments provide a special payment to mothers to tide them over the period of greatest need. But the primary need is for increased facilities for care and instruction. The payment of $25 upon the birth of each child has not produced as good results as has the New Zealand plan of giving proper instruction concerning proper care.

A SMILE OR TWO

Reverend Francis L. Beal, rector of the Episcopal Church, Peabody, Massachusetts, has issued the following message to his people, which he calls "seasonable":

"The Lord is in His holy temple—except in summer."

"I will come into Thy house in the multitude of Thy mercy—except in summer."

"How amiable are Thy tabernacles—except in summer."

"My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord—except in summer."

"God is known in the palaces as a sure refuge—except in summer."

"Preach the Word. Be instant in season and out of season—except in summer."

"Not forsaking the assembling of yourselves together—except in summer."

"They continued steadfastly in the Apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and breaking of bread and prayers—except in summer."

An old Scotch woman was famous for speaking kindly. No sheep was so dark that she could not discover some white spot to point out to those who could see only the blackness. One day a gossiping neighbor lost patience with her and said angrily: "Wumman, ye'll hae a guid word to say for the deevil himself!"

Instantly came the reply: "Weel, he's a verra industreeous body!"

THE SEMINAR

We have long contemplated opening a column under this heading in the HERALD, and have had for two years a brother in mind to conduct the column, and still hope that he will be able to take up in time this important work.

The purpose of The Seminar is to discuss questions of interest to our young students. It should develop into a course of religious education, not attempting to discuss the questions simply on the basis of ordinary conditions, but considering the results of research and human knowledge, and the light that can be thrown thereby on the subjects. The three books will be referred to, and should be, but we assume that our readers are entirely familiar with these writings. The purpose will be to discuss other questions and other matters also of interest tending to a clear comprehension of the work before us, and publish from time to time what we believe.

In the ordinary use of the term, a seminar is a group of students, taking an advanced course of study, or conducting original research under the direction of a competent instructor. It implies an assemblage of students for real research in some specific study. But in these columns, the specific study will be religion. An article or research will be welcome, associated with topics lying within the field of our investigation.

Evolution

Continually is the question raised from east to west and elsewhere, among our young people, Do you believe in evolution? The bare form of such a question is nearly a contradiction. One does not believe in any scientific theory in the sense in which we believe in the apostles' creed.

Scientific theories and hypotheses are but the bases for further investigation. They are partial explanations of empiricism, or of observed data, and a basis for further investigation.

It is unquestionable that truth is to be found in the evolutionary theory, given in its broadest possible scope, for we note that John says, "It doth not yet appear what we shall be like; but this we know, that when he comes, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is."—1 John 3. Elsewhere we are told that the child that reaches one hundred years of age will be changed in the twinkling of an eye, will be changed into his glorious likeness. This mortality is to put on immortality. (1 Corinthians 15.) Paul says, "We put away the carnal man, and put on the spiritual man." All of this implies a spiritual evolution in the case of the individual.

But we may suggest here that the attitude of modern biologists is towards saltations and unit qualities according to the Mendelian law, rather than to minute accretions. The bare idea of the inheritability of the acquired characteristics is subject to frequent direct frontal attack.

There are dominant and subordinate characteristics; those that are apparent, and those that are submerged, so that we find leading biologists insisting that in the initial crab apple there appears, though submerged it may be, all the possibilities and characteristics of the Jonathan apple, and of every other apple known to modern pomology.

All of this will be discussed with more particularity later. Its importance is the implication that there is involved in the individual all of that which is evolved; in other words, if there is to be evolved or rolled out from us the divine likeness, it must be because in some measure at least the divine likeness has been impressed in our hearts, and has first been involved or involuted.

Again, for the past fifty and seventy-five years, evolution has been the open door to science. It is a language that we must learn to talk if we are to reach the scientific thinkers of the age. A missionary in Russia should expect to speak Russian; in China, to speak Chinese; a missionary to the Society Islands, Tahitian; a missionary to Holland, or South Africa, Dutch; for if they do not speak these languages an interpreter will be necessary. So if we are to attempt to talk to the thinkers and scientists of to-day, it is necessary that we learn their language, with what is meant by the evolutionary theory, recognizing, however, that this term covers a multitude of ideas.

Evolution has tremendous importance for pedagogy, as it is convenient to proceed by discussing first the simple, and then going on to that which is more and yet more complex. Because of its value as a method, it deserves approval, and should receive our candid consideration.

But, when in the name of evolution or science we are offered materialism as an explanation for the known universe, naturally such an idea is of necessity in opposition to the Christian religion.

To reject positivism altogether would be unwise. The tremendous advancement of the world in modern times, and especially in the past century in material things, has been due to scientific synthesis, the observing of facts, the collating of these facts, and the reaching of certain results by induction. But on the other hand when positivism is offered as the sole explanation for the universe and all created things, then it necessarily parts company, not only with metaphysics, or ontology, which are seeking for the first cause, but also with religion, which offers as the first cause, God.

There can be no conflict between truth and truth; between religious truth and scientific truth. There have been and are different ideas held in the name of religion. There have been and are different ideas held in the name of science. There have been and are repeated conflicts in the realm of philosophy, in its explanation of the known universe.

There has been opposition by the Pharisees of the church to frank scientific investigation. There has been a tendency on the part of the Pharisees of the church to stone or crucify the leader and thinker who brings new ideas.

But there has also been the tendency of later years on the part of the scientific Pharisees to stone the church, and those who would accept the church's position on religion. In neither case do we find this true of the master mind but only of the camp followers, those not even of secondary, and hardly of the third rank, whether it be in the church and religion, or in the field of science and her theories. (See Oliver Lodge—Continuity).

Austrian universities and technical schools, once occupying a high place in the world of science and art, are reported as utterly incapacitated for service on anything approaching the old basis. The war took all their rubber, glass, metals, including platinum. Foreign periodicals are almost out of reach on account of the very high exchange rate on money. The return of thousands of students from the war has deluged the schools with applicants, but because of the conditions mentioned, including the utter inadequacy of the government grants for support, the Austrian schools of higher learning seem doomed.

"I want to thank you for your prompt reply in sending me copies of your church papers, etc. As I read them over, especially some of the articles, I am becoming more and more enlightened and convinced that the church they represent is divine. The simplicity of the articles makes them very easy to understand. I am much interested in the Latter Day Saint work and hope to have the pleasure of having a talk with one of the elders of your church."—From a letter to us by a young man at Costigan, Maine.

Thrift

(Address of Bishop Benjamin R. McGuire before the Women's Department meeting April 7, 1920, at Independence, Missouri. Reported by Mrs. A. Morgan.)

Sister President, Brothers and Sisters: I am certainly pleased to have this opportunity of addressing you this morning. Among the multitude of things that demand thrift on our part, I had overlooked the fact that I had to say something upon the subject. I believe, if we keep busy at our special task, we will not have much time to say anything about thrift.

I recall the statement in the Book of Covenants, that we should "be clean—frugal." Doubtless you have heard cleanliness discussed. Cleanliness of person, of thought; but we haven't heard very many discourses upon the subject of frugality. It seems to your speaker that if the work that has been assigned to the membership of the church of Jesus Christ is to be accomplished, we should sense the meaning of that work frugality, which is akin to the word thrift. I also find this word frugality in paragraph 7 of section 130, wherein the Lord asked us to repress in public and in private, expenditures that are unnecessary.

Recently a shopkeeper in the city of New York, when I propounded the question to him, whether or not with the high prices the number of sales had fallen off, told me that the number had not fallen off, although prices were considerably higher. Some have attributed this to the fact that prohibition had been made effective. Consequently funds that heretofore have been spent for intoxicating liquors and beverages were now being spent in the purchase of wearing apparel, etc.

You may ask me what relation this has to thrift. It is not only what we produce, but it is also the amount that we save that will measure our appreciation of the meaning of thrift. If, in our youth, we practice the virtue of repressing unnecessary wants, if we take care of the small amount of surplus that will result as a consequence of repressing unnecessary wants in our youth, when the time comes that we have the opportunity to engage in some pursuit in life we will have the means with which to engage in that pursuit; and I have no doubt that there are those within the sound of my voice who will say we have had the bitter experience; we have been made painfully aware of the fact that if in the days of our prosperity we had saved, until the time came when the opportunity was presented that we might augment or increase our holdings, we would not to-day be quite or so nearly poverty-stricken as we are.

It is discovered by those who from time to time administer what we are pleased to term aid to the poor and the needy, that in a great many instances, I wouldn't say in all instances, not in all cases, but in a great many cases, if the individual who applies for help, financial help or otherwise, had in the days of his prosperity taken care of that that the Lord had given him or permitted him to acquire, instead of being among those seeking aid he could contribute his part to help others that had not been so highly blessed as he had been.

Thrift means more than keeping busy. There are some people who are always busy and never accomplish anything. Thrift carries with it the idea of organizing our activities in a way that will accomplish results. Thrift carries with it the meaning expressed in the word efficiency, doing what we do in a manner that will, with the least expenditure of time and of energy, accomplish the result desired.

The Woman's Auxiliary has mapped out a program. Considering their work as including that which is mapped out in their program, they should not, and doubtless will not, spend so much effort on minor details as to rob them of ample time and energy to give full consideration to the working of every part. In the working out of any program, if we would do it in the manner that would be considered thrifty, we should first consider those things that are basic and fundamental. Never mind something that is going to happen as a consequence of our present effort six months or a year or two years from now. Execute our work in such a way that when we get to the accomplishment of the thing needed to be done a year or two years from now, we will be prepared to take care of it.

You heard the statement made by the President of the church in his address the other day, about the necessity of a building program. We should consider our work as a whole, and do the thing to be done now, at this time, and do the thing that is to be done at a later date at a later time. For instance, if we would build a house for ourselves we would first get the plans and specifications.

I have heard the preceding speaker refer to a survey. Before a builder had fully decided upon the plans and specifications he would consider what his needs would be. Then, having the plans and specifications, with the workmen competent to perform work, the material that goes into the foundation, he would construct the foundation; and you would think that he did not know his business if he undertook to build the roof before the foundation; and yet, I think as we consider our work at times, that that is the very thing we try to do: put on the roof before we put in the foundation and build the superstructure. We should put in our foundation first, then the superstructure, and after that the roof; then the mortar and trim, and after that bring in our furniture, and then if we are going to have a home the next thing to bring in is the Spirit of God that finds expression in a relation maintained between husband and wife and family that would reflect Almighty God, that he would be pleased with. To maintain that relation in the home it is necessary that each member of the family, in proper time and season, perform the duty incumbent upon him. We know happy homes result from the members of the family being careful, frugal, and thrifty; not only in repressing unnecessary material wants, but in the repressing of those desires and ambitions that oftentimes spring up in the minds and breasts of individuals that tend to estrange the members of the family.

While we think of the word thrift as one that has to do only with dollars and cents, it can be given a more general and comprehensive meaning, and be applied to our every thought and act that has to do with our social relation, that has to do with our relation to our fellow man and with our relation toward God.

I have seen the statement printed and posted upon the wall in a home or office, "Do it now." Well, I think, using the statement of one of our brethren, that I can identify myself with that observation if the thing is to be done now, but if the thing that is up for consideration now isn't to be done now, if the time isn't ripe to do it now, it is not a manifestation of frugality or thrift, but a waste of effort best devoted to something else at the present time.

The thing for us to do is to find out what is best for us to do now, and devote ourselves to doing it at the present time, and if we do, then we are exhibiting that attitude, we are exhibiting that disposition, if you please, we are exercising ourselves in that way that people may refer to us as thrifty people.

May I now say something in regard to what isn't thrift? Maybe we can obtain a better comprehension of the term by considering what it isn't.

Shiftlessness! Shiftlessness isn't thrift. A shiftless person oftentimes is a very busy person; however, he is a more or less vacillating, changing person, hopping first here and there and yonder, but always keeping busy doing a multitude of things, and never accomplishing any one thing. That isn't thrift.

We are told in the Book of Covenants that those that come to Zion must labor for Zion. Here's our ideal—our program. What will contribute to the accomplishment of our ideal? And as a department of the church work the Woman's Auxiliary should ask itself, what can we contribute now that will be a real contribution to the ultimate accomplishment of our ideals—Zion? That's your problem. I might make some observations upon that subject. However, I feel that is your field of activity. We that labor in Zion must labor for Zion.

We that labor in the territory, if you please, the community—all who have this ideal must labor for the ideal held by those of that community. Otherwise we are not thrifty people. We should cooperate, be one, and if we are not one in this then the Lord says, "Ye are not mine."

Thrift, then, means cooperation, working together; and that is something that we probably fail to do sometimes. We surely do not always cooperate. We have heard a statement like this made, referring to what we should say about individuals. If you cannot say anything good about a person, you had better not say anything. Now if we have purposed the accomplishment of our Zion ideal, if we feel that we cannot work with some individual, let us try not to work against him. We had better do nothing, if we cannot work together, because if we are not working together, we are pulling apart, and what's the result? We don't go forward, do we? Did you ever try it out? Most likely we stand still or go backward.

Thrift, then, calls for frugality, devotion to purpose, cooperation; and as I have said, it calls for a repression of things that we feel sometimes that we would like to have, but shouldn't have at the present time. Maybe it is a good thing, but not at the present time—maybe not at all. Thrift is the repression of unnecessary wants. Not only because the thing we desire isn't good for us at this time, or isn't good for us at any time, but it also indicates or implies that the time, energy, or money, means that would be expended for the unnecessary want is wasted, whereas, if it were saved it might be utilized in a way that would further advance the work.

You can take this thought and apply it in your own homes. You can apply it in the work of the general society, or district or local society. You can apply it in any one of the circles of any of the societies. There are things that some may think are very necessary that we should have, but considering the other needs of the society and the needs of other departments of the church it may be a luxury.

Maybe if we waste our time and energy and means upon these things instead of advancing the cause we will be retarding it, keeping it back.

Thrift is a little word, but when it is understood, when the principle is understood and applied by a great many it brings large results; we see this is a means that was used by the treasury department of the United States during the World War. They put the emphasis upon the thrift stamp. It engaged the attention of everyone, be he ever so poor. It secured all the surplus means in the hands of the community, of the Nation. No matter how small, it gathered it all in. That was thrift, and that brings me to this thought.

You often hear people say that they can't do anything in this department of the church work, or anything in that department, and they probably cannot do anything in this particular department under the auspices of which this meeting has been held here this morning, but we do not believe that there is any one of us who has, if you please, a spurious talent, that we can afford to tie up in a napkin and bury. Every one of us has a talent. We can find place in some department of the church work where that talent can be increased to the blessing of humanity and the glory of God.

Why, I have sat in prayer service (to give you an illustration) and heard some one who didn't have the courage to stand up and bear his testimony, yet with trembling voice, that was hardly audible, ask that a certain hymn be sung, and when it was sung, the sentiment, if nothing else, seemed to touch those who sang, so that the Spirit of God was brought down upon the audience. If in this way, in weakness and humility, we can do that which will inspire men to do more, can anyone say he cannot find something to do that will evidence his interest in the cause?

It wasn't a great amount that the widow put into the treasury, but it was that which called for commendation; that which was pointed to by our Master, and it is the little things of life that make up the whole. You may go down on the seashore and see there the small particles of sand, and say there isn't any one of them that is of much consequence, but the numbers of them, the volume of them, make the mighty land.

We sometimes think the little word here and there doesn't amount to anything. We sometimes think it doesn't make any difference whether we give a kindly look, or say a kindly word, or do our part, or concern ourselves at proper times to attend the services of the church. Sometimes we think it does not amount to much, but when a hundred or a thousand members of the church do the same thing, it does amount to something.

We thought a few years ago that a few cents, given by the members of the Sunday school, didn't amount to anything, but in the last year, when each member of the Sunday school gave, on an average of a couple of dollars each, we had the princely sum of a hundred thousand dollars.

Now the same thrift that is exercised, interest that is taken, effort made, in this work, can be duplicated, triplicated, quadrupled, in every department of the church work. I don't mean by that, Saints, in the way of raising of money, but in every other aspect of the church work, the same interest, devotion, energy that has been put into it can accomplish in every other line of work the same large results; and when we speak of living in the hastening time, we shouldn't think so much of it being the time of hurrying, running, and getting excited to accomplish something, as we should think of it as a serious, earnest, devotion on our part, to see that our time and our energy, our means, are utilized in that way that will not be wasteful, but will be utilized in that way as to spend and still have it.

Is there any one of you who would buy an acre of land for $250 or $500 if he didn't think that, if the occasion arose, he could sell it for at least the same amount he put into it? No. You want to get your money's worth, don't you? That's the thought! Every effort that we put forth ought to bring us back the return that we put into it, plus. Otherwise we are making no progress, we are wasting. So we should not spend our time and means and energies for the accomplishment of that which does not build up and will not ultimately accomplish the ideal that we hope to realize. Inasmuch as we do not practice thrift, to that extent will we put off the accomplishment of that ideal, and to that extent will we slow up the hastening process.

I am satisfied that the spirit of the times, rather the spirit of the Saints of this time, is that they should make every moment, every dollar, every effort, count, and so I would feel to leave with you the statement of the Savior in which he says, My Father works, and I work. If we have the mind of Christ, if the Spirit that moved Christ moves us, we will work, and when we think of work we think of a workman, and when we think of a workman, we think of something accomplished, something really done. We do not think of time idled away, time or means or money or effort wasted. We think of skill in execution; and so, as God has, in his wisdom, ordained the accomplishment of something that will be accomplished, so far as we are to play any part in it, when the mind that was in Christ Jesus is in us, we will work the way our Savior worked. It can then be said of us that we are thrifty and we will be blessed in our deeds.

Gasoline is so scarce in California that when a trainload recently reached Los Angeles from Oklahoma the mayor of the city and officials of the Automobile Club of Southern California officially welcomed it.

It is said that the good people of Ontario, Canada, are greatly exercised over the great amount of liquor smuggling going on at Windsor, where the contraband article is in every possible way taken across into the United States. Naturally the lowest class is making this a business, and the Canadians do not like to have their country represented by these smugglers.

The wheat crop in Oklahoma is unexpectedly good this year, the president of the State Board of Agriculture estimating the yield of the State at 40,000,000, while 35,000,000 was the earlier liberal estimate.

BOOK REVIEWS

Religion Among American Men

BY ELMER E. LONG

A book which confirms and sustains the charge laid against the churches one hundred years ago by the angel who said the churches were all wrong and the religious professors corrupt.

Religion Among American Men may be said to be a companion book to The Army and Religion, being one of a series of reports brought out by the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook. "The Committee was constituted," says the editorial preface, "while the war was still in progress, by the joint action of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and the General War-Time Commission of the Churches and was an expression of the conviction that the war had laid upon the churches the duty of the most thorough self-examination." The committee consisted of thirty men and women of national and international repute among the churches so that the "report" bears the weight of official Protestant authority. Published by The Association Press, New York, price $1.50, and well worth the money to every church worker who would keep abreast of the times.

Like The Army and Religion, this report confirms and sustains the charge laid against the churches one hundred years ago by the angel who said the churches were all wrong and the religious professors corrupt, as the following paragraph from the foreword shows:

"There is one generalization, in particular, which the evidence in hand makes it necessary to record—the widespread ignorance on elementary religious matters even of those who professed to be church members. Perhaps the one exception was among the Roman Catholics. Such a condition as revealed constitutes a grave indictment against the churches. It certainly calls for a careful revision of the pulpit message."

We are assured that the value of this report consists in its "fidelity and honesty," and that "it has not been tampered with nor colored." The foregoing "generalization" is strengthened by the following observation found in the introduction:

"The chief reason for the conviction that there are lessons which the church may learn from the army lies in the fact that the soldier was the average man. . . . In the first place, he is the product of the last twenty-five years of secular and religious training. His roots go deeper than that, but his training has taken place in that period. His beliefs and character, his moral and religious habits, pass judgment on the religious education and training of the years just past. . . . In the second place, the soldier is typical of the men the churches are trying to reach. 'What he thinks about the state, about social questions, about education, about religion and the church, is what young men generally think. His interests and enthusiasms are just those of the coming generation. Where he is wrong, the Nation is wrong. To whatever extent he is morally sound, to that extent it is well with us as a people.' His mind is the mind we have to interest, his will is the will we have to win. His virtues are what we have to build upon, his sins what we have to overcome."

Soldiers Profess Religion, but Know Nothing About It

Passing judgment on the Nation religiously and morally, using the soldier basis, places us in a bad light, according to information found in chapter one. It reads in part:

"The great majority of men in the army were nominal Christians. A large proportion had some slight church connection. The number of active, conscious Christians or church members was relatively small. The number of avowed unbelievers, atheists, and agnostics was almost nil. This is the general opinion that comes with great unanimity from chaplains and other religious workers."

Then follows some census figures showing that out of 25,607 men 586 "failed to express some church preference," and out of 1,487 men in a base hospital only 16 expressed no preference, but nominal Christians are by no means Christians in the true sense of the term. "Nominal Christians and nominal church members are numerous, but real Christians and active church members are few," says this report on page eleven. Note the following in direct testimony:

"Few are genuine churchmen." "A small number were faithful; a large number irregular and the majority indifferent."

"The churches ought to recognize that they have never gained the interest and enthusiasm of eight out of ten of the generation just coming to maturity. As far as vital motivations go, these fellows are not Christians at all, but merely more or less decent young pagans."

And yet, these boys for the most part had religious training in their youth. Say two chaplains:

"I find that nearly all the men in this base hospital had some kind of training in the Christian religion."

"The men have been almost invariably under religious influence of some sort in childhood."

Yet, among these young men, most of whom had some sort of religious training, and nearly all of whom claimed to be nominal Christians, there is a "widespread ignorance as to the meaning of Christianity and church membership."

We read:

"The first thing that I noticed among the men in the camps was a very prevalent lack of any definite religious teaching. This was true of men of all denominations; comparatively few of them had any reason for the faith that was in them.

"I honestly believe that three fourths of the men who went into the camps had only a hazy and very unvital idea of Christianity, despite our Sunday schools, etc.; and that these defects of teaching must be remedied at once.

"The paucity of his knowledge about the Bible and the church has appalled me and made me realize how superficial has been the impact of the church upon him.

"To my mind the important thing is the revelation of general ignorance about church and religion and so of the almost total failure of the teaching work of the church."

These testimonies lead the committee to say that "our laity are not instructed in Christian faith and practice." In this connection, it is interesting to note that this report deals with conditions which are the results of the last twenty-five years' religious work. During that time there has been a woeful lack of proper religious training with the results that eighty per cent of the young people are lost to the church after they are fourteen years old, and now when put to the test they do not know the first rudiments of the Christian religion.

Sandwiching of Religion and Social Pleasures Failure

Yet, the last quarter of a century has been one of the most active periods in Christian endeavor of any period in modern times. For some time we have had it dinned into our ears that the young people were being neglected and that we must provide for them in a way to hold them to the church. To do so various schemes of entertainment, and elaborate "social programs" have been devised. But what of the harvest? "Widespread ignorance" of religious fundamentals, no adequate idea of God or Christ, and "only a hazy and very unvital idea of Christianity." While on every hand it is freely admitted that the church has failed to "teach" the gospel to the laity. The social side has been stressed but the spiritual side neglected. An "enlisted man" put it this way: "For quite a while I have looked for the Spirit of Jesus Christ in the work of the Christian church and according to my way of thinking it is damned hard to find it." Nor is he beside himself in that.

"They look upon the church as a negative, prohibitory institution only.

"Each of them knows a clergyman whom he likes, but they regard the profession as an association of trained kill-joys.

"In practically every church there is a social standard set and only those persons are welcome who grade up to that standard. They do not actually throw you out bodily, but they throw you out by the attitude they take. If you are under grade they do not notice you at all.

"One of the most damnable forms of insincerity is the camouflage used to beguile men to attend services unknowingly. A man goes to the Y. M. C. A. to see a moving picture. The psychology of his consciousness is all set for amusement at that moment. But, no! he must pay for his amusement by sitting through a sermon, and is there anything more unchristian than that? Or perhaps only the service is held but the camouflage comes in the advertising. 'Hear Doctor So and So of Toledo speak to-night.' And instead of a lecture, as expected, it is a regular religious service.

"When we want vaudeville, we know where to get it; when we want religion, we know where to get it. We don't want it mixed."

These shams and deceptions were practiced on the boys before they ever went to the front or the training camps, and doubtless had considerable to do with the religious apathy found so prevalent in the army among young men who had had previous religious training at home. But the soldiers had religion, we are told. It was a religion of humanity. For instance:

"A soldier student, when asked what should be the task of the preacher when the war was over, said that he must become untheological, turn right-about face and preach humanity.

"I call religion a bum religion that only asks you to worship God without getting down to more practical matters.

"His convictions are few and largely ethical."

Their knowledge of and attitude toward the Savior is probably correctly represented in the following paragraph:

"Most men still carry over from Sunday-school days a general idea that 'Christ was the best man that ever lived,' but they could tell you exceedingly little about his life or character. They would vaguely say that he was good and kind and unselfish. To great numbers he was hardly more than the sorrowful figure that they had seen in stained glass windows, or a dim figure of the past far removed from their own present interests and needs."

Soldier's Religion Superficial

In the summary of part one the following is of interest:

"Probably the most outstanding fact that emerges from our investigation is the widespread ignorance and misunderstanding of the fundamentals of Christian faith and life—and that not only among men outside the church but also among those nominally in its membership. It is evident that the church has seriously failed as a teacher of religion."

"The following vices were widely found and largely condoned: sexual immorality, profanity, obscenity, and gambling."

The report shows that there was a wide prevalence of what is termed "emergency religion." This peculiar product of the war was manifest most when danger was the greatest. Said a young Jew to his chaplain:

"When I was at the front I promised God to cut out everything if he would save me from the shells. But all them things is vanished now."

An officer put it this way:

"When I was in the trenches I prayed like a good one; but a week later, when I was back in the billets, I didn't care a damn for religion."

Fatalism seems to have been the dominant factor in the soldier's life. As to its religious significance there was considerable difference of opinion. Says one:

"In my opinion the common fatalism of the soldiers is the logical outgrowth of the teachings of the church. War has emphasized man's weakness, the frailty of life, the certainty of death, and the dependence of the individual on God.

"The fatalism of the soldier is, of course, not Christian at all. It is a pagan survival."

Soldiers Used Bibles Little

There was a lavish distribution of Bibles among the soldier boys, there being 4,558,871 copies of the Holy Scriptures supplied "from the first day when America went to war to the last day of 1918." Chaplains disagree as to the extent of Bible reading in the army. Says the report:

"There was a very great increase in Bible carrying. Was there the same increase in Bible reading? Certainly not to anywhere near the same extent. 'Thousands carried Testaments and seldom read them.' 'Although hundreds of thousands of Bibles have been handed out, they have not been noticeably used except during passage through the U-boat zone or on the fringes of No Man's Land.' Many men figuratively transferred the Bible from the top shelf to the blouse pocket. It was comforting to have it there as a symbol of religion and a suggestion of home piety."

Did Soldiers Presage Church Unity?

Much ado was made over the prospects of church unity as a result of the war, but it was a very superficial unity in the end. Said one optimistic chaplain:

"With reference to church unity, the men in the army united. Catholics and Baptists and Presbyterians and Southern Methodists, Jews, and even the one Mormon and the two Mohammedans in our regiment came to hear me preach. The question of denominations was never raised."

But the mere fact that the boys went to hear their chaplain preach was no sign of church unity. On this point the report speaks with some emphasis:

"Was this church unity? We question whether it was. The 'binder' in this union was principally comradeship in arms, not fellowship in a common faith. We are inclined to believe that such a sense of fellowship, of organic life in the church, what has been referred to as the "all-one-body" feeling, is relatively scarce in Protestantism. The comradeship entered in as a substitute for this and united men of many affiliations and many faiths in a half religious, half military fellowship."

The necessity for church unity is stressed by chaplains, there being "no need so great as Christian unity." But it is admitted that the "returned soldiers are not greatly interested in the church, whether united or divided." There seems to be a consensus of opinion among chaplains that a mistake was made by combining entertainment and religious service. We read:

"In many cases the men objected to such informality as combining vaudeville singing and jazz band music with re-

LETTERS

Establishment of Stewardships

A continuance of the series of letters being sent to the members of Lamoni Stake.

We continue our discussion of the all-important subject: "What is meant by the establishing of stewardships and how shall we proceed to enter into our several stewardships?"

We have submitted in our last letter that we must first be fully consecrated to our work. Then and only then are we ready to take the

which is to comply with the law of consecration of temporal things.

This step is easy providing we have unreservedly entered into the true spirit of the Master's work. He who has consecrated his life finds no difficulty in consecrating his means.

But we ask, "What are the laws governing the consecration of temporal things?"

Let the Lord answer this query: "For according to the law every man that cometh up to Zion must lay all things before the bishop in Zion."—Doctrine and Covenants 72: 3.

The first step to take to comply with the law of temporalities is "to lay all things before the bishop in Zion."

What is meant by laying all things before the bishop in Zion?

It means to do just as we have to do with our Government. Every year we have to make out a financial statement showing our assets and liabilities so the Government may know just how much taxes we owe to the State or how much income tax we owe the United States.

When we make out this statement we take it and "lay it religious services. Some welfare secretaries seemed to think the men wouldn't take religion straight. A mistaken notion."

On this point the committee remarks:

"A more dubious result has been the development of the 'bright and snappy' service and the overstrained effort to express religion in the vernacular. Still worse has been the combination of vaudeville and preaching, and the confusion of entertainment with worship."

Lessons for the Church

Part three of this report is in the nature of a summary under the title. "Lessons for the church." A brief excerpt or two must suffice, as this review is already lengthy.

"The revelation of the large degree of failure in our religious education, challenges us to a far more serious attention to the Sunday school and a candid examination of its curriculum, methods of teaching, and organization."

"The religious instruction and training given in the home outlives all other religious education. In directing or controlling that influence lies our greatest opportunity."

"The fundamental doctrines of the church need to be 'revitalized'—taught in such a way that they shall appear as real explanations of the meaning of life and the answer to men's practical needs."

On the whole, this report is a valuable asset to the Latter Day Saint who must defend his position against the attacks of sectarian ministers, for one little pebble picked at random from the stony ground of facts contained in this book, cast from the gospel sling in the hands of a modern David, will slay the most boastful Goliath and put to rout the army of sectarian opposition. Besides, there are valuable lessons to us on methods of teaching and practice. Some of our borrowed junk, so discredited by this report, should be scrapped.

before the state authorities" or if it is the income tax report we "lay it before the United States authorities." In neither case do we, by this act, give all we have to our Government, but the act is a formal recognition of the fact that the Government is the lord owner of all we have.

Just so does the Lord demand us to lay what we have before the church through its authorized representative, the bishopric. The object being to enable both ourselves and the bishopric (the church) to determine just how much we have to give, if any. By this formal act we recognize the fact that the Lord is the moral owner of all we have.

Having made out our financial statement (called an inventory) and filed it with the stake bishopric, we wish now to know how much should we give.

The amount that we should give, if we have anything to give, and when and how is fully revealed by God in his law.

The Apostles in Australia

Apostle Rushton writes extensively and interestingly of their travels in far-off Australia.

A few lines from the "topsy turvy" land beneath the Southern Cross may be appreciated by some of your readers.

Brother Hanson and the writer after the mission conference had opportunity to become better acquainted with Sydney, the metropolis of the southern hemisphere. Certainly, there could scarcely be conceived a place "more beautiful for situation" than the harbor surrounding which Sydney and its enviroining suburbs are built. "Our Harbor" is one of the finest in the world, if not the finest, though some esteem that of Rio Janeiro as being the premier harbor of the world. It is certainly the largest, but to the citizen of Sydney, better? Ah, well.

Having a population of over 900,000 and being perhaps the oldest city of the Commonwealth, Sydney possesses many fine buildings and interesting features. The old town was largely built by convicts and the streets are tortuous and narrow, but modern improvements have remedied some of these defects and one meanders along fascinated by the attractive stores, indifferent to the jostlings of the crowd. One store appealed to us very strongly; it bore the title of "The Golden Gate Sundae Shop," the proprietor being an American from San Francisco, and the "wares" proved to be the "real thing."

The Botanical Gardens and the Zoological Gardens at Taronga are as fine as anything we have seen. Of the buildings we saw and admired we mention, the university, the city hall with its magnificent pipe organ, the art gallery, the museum, conservatory of music, the public library, and the cathedrals (Anglican and Catholic). A handsome railway station is in process of completion.

The Australian people are devotees of sport, recreation, and culture. In all the capital cities of the states are to be found similar public buildings, together with cricket and football grounds and race courses. In some parts baseball is becoming popular, as also is tennis, and at the seaside towns yachting and aquatic sports are cultivated very enthusiastically. They are also a very musical people and each large town seems to possess vocal and instrumental organizations of merit. It was our privilege to hear Mr. Truman, the Sydney organist, render a fine program on the pipe organ, and one evening in company with Brother and Sister Gresty we heard the renowned orchestra and choir under the leadership of Verbruggen, the well-known Belgian musician. The rendition of Beethoven's setting of Schiller's "Ode to Peace" was a delight we shall not soon forget. One evening we also were much pleased to hear Madame Antonia Dolores in a very impressive program, as guests of Sister Mina Hendricks.

On New Year's Day, in company with Bishop Craig of Melbourne, we enjoyed a ramble through the Botanical Gardens. It was a glorious midsummer day and the sunlight filled the landscape with living gold and danced upon the blue waters of the harbor, converting even the grim battleship, H. M. A. S. Australia, into a gigantic toy with its parti-colored buntings and huge flags floating lazily in the morning breeze, while the strains of the ship's band were wafted to us from the distance. The many coves and inlets of the harbor and the ragged indentations of the shore line all fringed with vegetation made the sight one never to be forgotten. The gardens with the varied flower beds, shrubberies, ferneries, and massive trees with the clean gravel walks twining in and out of the laughing greenery with occasional statuary and ornamental fountains made of the whole a sylvan dreamland. Out in the main channel the ferryboats were gliding swiftly to and fro, carrying loads of holiday seekers, for all Sydney was joyously welcoming the New Year.

A long tram ride, winding round the broken shore and climbing higher and higher until we reached the summit of the southern Head, commanding the entrance to the harbor, was very enjoyable. From this elevation we looked eastward over the broad expanse of the Pacific, and at our feet the billows broke into masses of foam and clouds of spray in what is called the Gap, which has a tragic history. In the early days an emigrant ship reached the Heads at night and in the fog and driving storm of a "southerly" the captain mistook the gap for the entrance to the harbor and before discovering his mistake the ship was upon the cruel rocks and all lives were lost except one sailor; some relics of the fated Dunbar were gathered up and are on exhibition in a small hut close by. Behind us, stretching away westward, the harbor runs into various coves and inlets, all more or less featuring some fine residential buildings on the hillsides.

Later, a trip was taken to the northern side of the Heads and we enjoyed the spirit of the occasion, mingling in the restless currents of humanity as they surged along promenade and shore. Thousands of bathers were enjoying the surf, while others wandered through the lanes and walks around the base of the promontory, and still others lounged on the sward and sands. Everybody seemed to be happy and carefree. Manley is but one of many seaside playgrounds of the Sydney populace, and it is one of the most picturesque.

Having some consultations and official work in association with Brother Butterworth, we had the pleasure of preaching at the Balmain and Leichardt Branches, also enjoying the Sunday school, Religio, and Women's Department meetings, and one evening attended the boys' club and watched their work in the gymnasium under the leadership of Brother Swain. Afterwards the boys were gathered together for a little service in which addresses were given by the visitors. We also had the opportunity of attending some open-air services which are held every Friday evening when weather is fine, and renewed our acquaintance with this class of work with much enjoyment.

Brother Hanson and the writer left for Melbourne on January 15, traveling by train, and arrived in the Federal capital about 1 p. m. the next day. The Australian railways are similar to the British, and travel very swiftly along the well-ballasted tracks. Unfortunately each state has a different gauge, which necessitates changing cars and is uneconomical as well as inconvenient. There is at present much discussion going on with a view to unifying the gauge throughout the Commonwealth. While in Melbourne we were made welcome at the home of Brother and Sister J. H. N. Jones and were well cared for as indeed we have been at all places we have visited.

Melbourne, though not so large as Sydney, is a very fine city and in some respects is superior. The country is flat and the streets are wide and laid out more nearly approaching the American cities. It seems to be very busy and a number of industries are thriving; we noted particularly the leather trade. It is also a seaport, but its docks are approached by traveling about one mile up the River Yarra which of course has constantly to be dredged.

The Federal Parliament buildings are located here, and one day in company with Brother Jones we had the pleasure of attending a session of parliament and seeing some of the country's most celebrated public men and hearing them in debate. We were particularly impressed by Mr. William Hughes, the premier, who is a fragile little man and very deaf, but alert and of strong personality. He is a forceful speaker and very resourceful. In debate he is a dangerous antagonist whose sarcasm and sallies can pillory an unfortunate opponent very uncomfortably. He is always well informed and speaks with fluency and some eloquence. He is perhaps the most abused man in public life but just the same everybody holds "Billie" in esteem. He is a self-made man of the labor party originally, but since the war owing to his imperialism and support of conscription, he became a Nationalist, but under any name Mr. Hughes is an Australian of whom the Australian people are justly proud.

There is keen and at times bitter rivalry between Sydney and Melbourne, characterized in a familiar dialogue: The Melbourneite is proud of his city because he made it himself. That, says the Sydneyite, is the reason it is such a poor place. Well, retorts the man from Melbourne, all you have to boast of is the harbor, and God made that.

We have two branches in Melbourne, one at Richmond, which is the largest, presided over by Elder J. H. N. Jones who is also president of the district, the other at Footscray, presided over by Elder W. Craig. The former congregation possesses a good brick building nicely equipped and nearly free from debt. It is expected to have the debt paid off by September and the dedicatory services will then be held. The other branch meets in the Masonic Hall. In both branches there is a band of good and faithful workers.

On the Saturday evening following our arrival, we were given a formal welcome at the Richmond church which was also attended by members from the Footscray Branch. This social function included a program of musical numbers and speeches, then a very dainty supper was provided in the vestry room at which speeches of welcome were made expressing pleasure to see Brother Hanson back in Australia once again and greetings to the writer in cordial terms. During our stay of nearly one month in this city we attended a number of services in both branches, held several priesthood meetings, spoke at open-air meetings which are held usually every Friday evening when the weather is favorable, and also the Sunday school and the Religio sessions and the Women's Department meetings all of which are under the care of earnest, capable workers. Brother Jack Harrison is superintendent of the school, Brother Sid. Harvey superintendent of the Religio, and Sister Sid. Harvey president of the Women's Department.

We found that the musical features of the Richmond Branch are a great asset to the work, and the choir under the leadership of Brother Winn Chenoweth contributes materially to the success and pleasure of the services. Melbourne is very fortunate in the possession of some fine talent; Sister Myra Craig, the wife of Bishop Craig and daughter of Patriarch J. T. Gresty, is a very gifted pianist and also possesses a splendid voice, and for some years was on the platform; a world tour in which our sister was taking a leading part was interrupted at India by the war. Brethren Dummit and Thorpe have very fine baritone voices and often have engagements for public work. Brother Oppenheim is also a professional musician of many years' experience and is leader of one of the city bands. It was a great pleasure to see all of these good people so gladly consecrating their time and talent to the good of the work.

While in Melbourne it was our good fortune to be invited to an informal social gathering at the studio of Miss Layton who is a singer of extraordinary talent and of reputation in America and Great Britain. This lady is teaching and training several of our people, including Sister Craig and Brother David Grayden of Philip Island who is developing into a lyric tenor of much promise. Besides listening to several of the students, Miss Layton very generously rendered a number of operatic airs and then some exquisitely sweet French and Irish ballads. Her rich and powerful voice was heard to splendid advantage in one of the numbers from "Samson and Delilah," and then its sweet and delicate restraint in the ballads exhibited the wonderful control the artist had. We enjoyed the evening very much, in company with several of the Saints, including Brother and Sister Gresty, and found that Miss Layton was not only a talented artist but a woman of fine personality who found in her work the spiritual qualities which enable her to appreciate something of our message.

On January 26 we were invited to take part in the Sunday school picnic at Wattle Park, and though the day broke dull and threatening rain, a large number of the Saints assembled at the appointed place, and though showers did come, the sports and pleasures were not seriously interfered with. Besides a good program there were also supplies of food, ice cream and soda pop, and candies. Brother Hanson and the writer took part in some of these exercises, especially the "eats," and upheld the honor of our country. Such gatherings have a high social value and it seems to be a trait peculiar to the British people to appreciate the importance of meeting serious difficulties around a dining table, and then after relaxation the business of the moment is approached with good humor and in a genial disposition. It is not improbable that international problems lose some of their asperities because of this wise use of social functions. Maybe some of our church troubles would not assume such tragic proportions if the officials concerned could have met with their knees under a dining table, and thus have been approached gastronomically and socially.

Besides enjoying our work we found time to visit several places of interest, including the botanical gardens and the "zoo" where Brother Hanson tried out some new salad combinations which included dates and other "delicacies" on a mandrill, a monkey possessing a highly ornamental face done up in scarlet and turquoise blue. The monkey ate voraciously and had a splendid appetite, and seemed to thrive upon the strange comestible. Saint Kilda is the seaside resort of the Melbourne populace and is a very charming place. One of the most appreciated pleasures was the public library where we often went. The reading room is a large circular building with lofty roof and lighted from the ceiling; the books are all classified and shelved around the walls, plenty of desk room with a vast number of books on all topics and subjects. It was noticed that the Book of Mormon is classified among the "non-Christian" religions. Both Sydney and Melbourne are metropolitan cities having archbishops of the Anglican church and fine cathedrals. We attended one or two services in these edifices and many happy memories of early days were revived as we took part in the once familiar liturgical service. It is a very restful experience to slip into one of these religious buildings, leaving the noise and bustle of the world without, and lose oneself in meditation while the subdued light and the quiet reverential atmosphere create a spirit of devotion which seems to lift the soul to higher and holier things. Sometimes our social exuberance is embarrassing and perhaps destructive of the true spirit of worship which should characterize those who "go up to the house of the Lord." We perhaps do not see the face of the Lord because there is too much humanity roisteringly self-assertive, and the "still small voice" is unheeded because of the tumultuous shoutings of our own voices. It helps us to adjust ourselves properly to try "in all our ways to consider him."

February 6 we were on the wing again, this time our destination being Adelaide, where we arrived about 10 a. m. the next day after a cold night ride on the train. We were pleased to see Brother E. H. Davies at the station, who took us to his home where we were made very welcome by Sister Davies and the two boys as well as our brother.

Adelaide is the capital city of the state of South Australia and a seaport, though not built quite on the coast, and is situated on the eastern side of the Great Australian Bight. In addition to the usual sights of a city, we were particularly interested in the large market which every Friday night is crowded with people who make purchases of fruits, vegetables, and other foodstuffs, carrying their purchases away in baskets or kit bags. One interesting feature illustrates the sporting spirit of the people of this land, that is the chance wheels. Numbered wooden paddles are sold for sixpence each, and when all the paddles have been disposed of, a large wheel is turned, upon which numbers are painted, and when the wheel stops, the number at the indicator is called out and the owner of that paddle secures the prize, of more value of course than the sixpence paid.

We found the climate of Adelaide very beautiful, though rather hot. It reminded us very much of the Southern California climate, especially that of San Bernardino. The skies were of cerulean hue by day and indigo by night when the constellations stood out very brightly and seemed to cheer one by their apparent winkings. There is an abundance of fruit and many varieties; grapes, citrus fruits, figs, peaches, and apricots were much in evidence.

The church work is in an encouraging condition despite many adverse conditions and hardships. At present the Saints meet in the Odd Fellows' Hall, not having a church building, but they have this dream in their minds of owning their church home and have accumulated some money towards this end. Brother Edwin H. Davies is an energetic and devoted worker, and besides being the pastor of the branch is also the superintendent of the Sunday school. In all his work he had the sympathy and support of his wife and two young sons. We had good congregations at our services and that in spite of the suspension of the cars because of the marine engineers' strike making coal scarce.

Though we could not have the hall during the week, we held priesthood meetings, prayer services, and a Women's Department meeting in the homes of the Saints and enjoyed the spirit of the occasion, and once we held a service at Kilkenny, one of the suburbs, in the home of one of our members, which was well attended.

This is the home of Brother Walter Dyke and family. Many readers of the church papers will remember our brother who wrote of some of his experiences while a prisoner of war in Germany. He was glad to be home and now is engaged in doing what he can for the building up of the work in this city.

During our stay in Adelaide we attended the Henley on Torrens Regatta. There was a tremendous crowd all dressed in holiday attire and the river was crowded with all kinds of small craft gaily decorated for the occasion. Rowing and swimming races and other sports made up an interesting program and provided much amusement to the good-natured people.

After about three weeks' stay in this city we moved on to fill the program which called for visits at all the branches of the Victoria District, so we bade good-by to the Saints of Adelaide, and as we shook hands with our sister whose hospitality we had enjoyed, little did we think that in a few short days she would be no more. A sudden and very short illness laid her low in death, and accompanying the soul of an unborn baby girl she left her husband and two boys bereft of wife and mother. The death of Sister Davies deprives the church of a good and loyal worker and one whose delight seemed to be in the upholding of her husband in his work for the Master. May she rest in peace awaiting the reward promised to those who have even given a cup of water to the weary servants of the Lord.

Returning to Melbourne, we found the city in holiday mood, the occasion being the expected arrival of the Smith brothers who had traveled from England to Australia in a large airplane and were on their way to Adelaide, which was their home.

From this point we visited Hastings, where we have a small band of faithful people under the care of Elder Max Kippe, brother of Alexander Kippe in Germany. From this place we traveled by train and then small steamer to Philip Island where we have a small but thriving branch composed very largely of the Grayden family. This island is the southernmost point of the Commonwealth and is washed by the heavy seas which sweep through the Bass Straits, and one hundred eighty miles away to the south lies the island of Tasmania. Our trips to the Nobbies, Seal Rocks, and Cowes were much enjoyed. We were very kindly provided for by Brother and Sister Joseph Grayden during our stay on the island. The island seems to be infested with rabbits which proved such a pest that many were poisoning them and as skins were bringing extraordinary prices, this seemed to be profitable.

Our trip to Seal Rocks was made in a very squally sea but we saw hundreds if not thousands of these animals sporting in the tumbling waters or airing themselves on the rocks.

Glen Forbes was our next call. Here we had the pleasure of visiting also Wonthaggi, which is a prosperous mining town and one family of Saints provided an opening for a missionary effort. Brother George Eden is the president of the branch, and considering the limitations of a country district, the prospects are encouraging. During our stay here we mounted horses and spent the major part of one day in the bush hunting for native bears to shoot (not with guns but cameras). They are very pretty little things and are like living Teddy bears, very harmless, and find their habitat in the gum trees, the leaves of which are their principal food. It was here also we heard the kookoburra or laughing jackass. This bird is remarkable for its good humor expressed in its hearty laughter.

From Glen Forbes we went to Geelong. Here is the home of Brother C. A. Butterworth and family with whom we made our home during our stay in the city. Brother William Jones is the president of the branch and the services are held in a neat little church which is surrounded by a good fence inclosing also a well-kept flower garden. By the kindness of Brother McGurk and family we had an automobile ride around the outlying country, which proved to be very scenic and attractive. We also held a service in one of the suburbs in the home of a Mr. and Mrs. Kidd who came from Scotland. We found that the work of Elder A. Ferrett was well spoken of and his removal to Sydney generally regretted.

From this point we returned again to Melbourne and took part in the district reunion during the Easter holidays. The services included priesthood meetings, auxiliary programs, and preaching meetings, besides the devotional exercises. It was the general opinion that this was the best reunion held in the district and made a fitting close to our work in the South. We were pleased to meet among others, Elder Peisker, who is in charge of the work in West Australia and has been the president of the branch at Perth. He gave a satisfactory report of the work out there and we were glad to note our brother's eager interest in the work to which he was assigned. Monday being a general holiday, the church people had a very enjoyable picnic at Richmond Park and this function brought to a close a very happy and profitable reunion.

From this point we returned to Sydney, Brother Hanson traveling by train and the writer by the S. S. Katoomba. A pleasant sea voyage of two nights and a day took me to my destination without mishap. Here we met Brother Butterworth and had many things to talk over and plans to develop for the work.

Our minds often turned to America and wonders were expressed as to the coming General Conference and anxiously we prayed for the success of the work. News of the conference would not reach us for some time, perhaps by the end of May or even beginning of June. Since, however, we have received much news and rejoice that peace and unity prevailed and that all seemed to have experienced a spiritual uplift. We appreciated the many kind friends who thought of us and sent greetings to each through Sister Ruby Hitch.

We pray that God will bless the activities which have been programmed, and as the various ones go forth to take up their tasks as servants of God, to bless humanity and seek to build up his kingdom in righteousness, may his grace and Holy Spirit sustain and qualify each one.

Before us lies a tour through the northern part of this country of which we hope to write later.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. RUSHTON.

Cost of College Education

The United States Commissioner of Education recently made public statistics gathered for the college year 1915-1916 showing the cost of college education per student in attendance.

The 507 colleges and universities of the country were divided into nine classes according to incomes and the cost per student in each class.

Class	Number of Colleges in Class	Cost Per Student
1	8	$500.00
2	14	450.00
3	30	375.00
4	56	335.00
5	92	250.00
6	102	185.00
7	122	145.00
8	54	120.00
9	29	75.00

Average cost per student in all institutions of all classes $309. These were the figures for the years 1915-1916 and for the present they will probably be at least 50 per cent higher.

None of the higher institutions of learning charge tuition high enough to cover the cost of instruction. The deficit must be made up from some other source, taxation in the case of publicly supported institutions, endowments, gifts, and offerings in the case of church and other institutions.

An investigation of the tuition charged in the colleges of the country belonging to the same class as Graceland College, our own higher institution of learning, was made some time ago and it was found that only one such college charged an annual tuition as low as one hundred dollars, some charging as high as two hundred dollars while the average was a hundred and fifty.

The University of Pennsylvania has just announced a change in her tuition schedule for the session of 1920-21 as follows:

The College	From $200 to $250
The Towne Scientific School.....	From $200 to $300
The Wharton School.....	From $200 to $250
The School of Education.....	From $200 to $250
The School of Medicine.....	From $200 to $300

Yale announces that her undergraduate tuition for the coming year is increased from $240 to $300.

In view of the above figures Graceland's tuition, making the comparison not only with standard colleges of the country, but with junior colleges as well, is indeed quite modest and is possible only because of the general interest taken in education by the church as represented by their annual appropriation for higher educational purposes.

In connection with this last item it may be of interest to know that the Utah church appropriates approximately three quarters of a million dollars annually for the maintenance of its twenty-two higher institutions of learning which are located as follows: one in Canada, one in Wyoming, four in Idaho, one in Colorado, three in Arizona, one in Mexico, one in Hawaii, and ten in Utah. They had an enrollment last year of 8,200 students and employed 371 teachers.

Conference Notices

Southern Ohio, at Wellston, September 4 and 5, 10 a. m. We request all ministry to make complete report of all labors performed, in harmony with the method of reporting adopted by district. My address for the conference will be 1004 South Vermont Street, Wellston, Ohio. J. A. Grant.

September will be a busy month for the Northern Michigan District, three two-day meetings, and a conference. Two-day meetings as follows: September 4 and 5, at Ammon Guy's farm, one mile south and one half mile west of Hillman. September 11 and 12 at Boyne City. September 25 and 26 at Onaway. Good speakers, good people, and a good time will be there. Will you bring your baskets of good things to eat, as there will be no charge for meals. September 17 conference at East Jordan, in Saints' church. First meeting 2 p. m. by Sunday school. Religio Department during conference, instead of Friday forenoon as heretofore. Entertainment at 8 o'clock Friday evening. Saturday morning at 8.30, prayer meeting, followed by business meeting at 10 o'clock. Meals served by East Jordan Branch for 10 and 20 cents. Arthur E. Starks, president.

Pastoral Notices

To the Saints of the Central Texas District; Greeting: Having been chosen to preside over your district, I earnestly and kindly ask for your cooperation. Your help is needed, there being only two conference appointees in this large field—myself and Elder F. A. Rowe, hence the need of keeping in close touch with the local force, that we may work together hand in hand. I need your help; you may need mine. Let our watchwords be masterly achievement and prompt action, when golden opportunities present themselves, in delivering the angel's message, and may God fire our hearts and brain with the real missionary spirit, to remind us of our responsibility as ministers and members of his kingdom. All branch presidents will please keep an accurate account of all work performed in their respective branches, and report same to me, together with the condition of branches at close of each quarter—September 25, December 25, May 25, and June 25. Local workers, whether in branches or not, laboring in the district, will kindly report their labors to me at close of each quarter. Let me hear from you often or from time to time, that we may be of service to each other.

Trusting that I may have your full support, I am
Your servant in gospel bonds,

J. C. CHRESTENSEN.

DALLAS, TEXAS, 3014 Birmingham Avenue.

The Presidency

Please note that Certificates of Ordination, to take the place of licenses heretofore in use, will henceforth be issued from the general church offices. In order that the one ordained may secure this certificate, the officiating minister is expected to promptly report the ordination to the Department of Statistics as at present. Be sure and give address for the sending of the certificate.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, August 7, 1920.

The Bishopric

Southern Michigan and Northern Indiana District: Owing to the ill health of Brother Samuel Stroh it has been necessary for him to discontinue his work as Bishop's agent of the above district, and upon the recommendation of the district conference we are appointing Brother William F. Shaub, R. F. D. 1, Ray, Indiana, to whom the Saints will kindly send their tithes and offerings in the future.

Brother Shaub comes to us well recommended as a man competent to look after the financial interests, one who enjoys the confidence and esteem of the Saints, and who we feel sure will perform his work with credit to himself and honor to God.

I trust that the Saints will loyally support him in his newly appointed duties, keeping in mind the slogan of the year, "A Million Dollars Tithing." If the above district will do likewise, we shall accomplish our end. I know that you will work for this accomplishment.

We appreciate very much the splendid work done by Brother Stroh and regret that his ill health makes it necessary for him to discontinue the work.

May God bless the Saints of this district, not only temporarily but spiritually as well.

Sincerely yours,
BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE.

To the Saints of Arkansas: Having been appointed Bishop's agent for the Arkansas District, I take this means of reaching all. I would be glad to visit each one, but that would require much time and money, and I am a man of very moderate means, and have to work to support myself and family, so I hope each Saint in Arkansas will take notice and do your best. The Presiding Bishop has set the standard for the church at one million dollars tithing this year, and of course we can come up to that standard if we do our best, but we must make some sacrifice. Let each one ask himself, Have I done all the Lord requires of me? Dear Saints, the promises of God are great, but all conditional. If we fail to do our part we have no promise. Can we afford to withhold our service and our means? I think not. We cannot all preach but we can all put something in the Bishop's hands to send some one that can.

The principle of tithing is very plainly held out in the three standard books of the church, and is just as much a part of the gospel as any other principle. I expect to have the name of every Latter Day Saint in Arkansas on my book as a tithe prayer before the year is out; I hope I won't be disappointed. Don't hesitate because you cannot send as much as you would like. Just pay all you can and the Lord will bless you. I have a solicitor in each branch in the district; also Elder J. T. Riley, missionary; any of them will take your tithing and receipt for same; or you can mail it to W. F. Martin, lock box 181, Bald Knob, Arkansas. We would not like to be classed as slackers, would we? So let's all do something. Yours for a million dollars tithing,

W. F. MARTIN.

Correction

A transposition of lines occurs in A. B. Phillips's article, third paragraph, on page 696 of HERALD for July 21. The last sentence should read, "In the Gilbert Museum, at Amherst College, are about three thousand specimens from New England alone, including mortars, bowls, tomahawks, hoes, pottery, and other articles not named in this paragraph."

CHURCH NEWS

On a recent priesthood meeting day in Lamoni the following subjects were under discussion in the various quorums: The high priests were in the midst of a series of discussions on relation of civil law enforcement to community betterment, the value of higher community ideals on religious life, etc. The elders were studying the program of the church, especially at that session discussing the required preparation for participation in business, industry, and education, in the development of Zionie ideals. The priests were taking up in a very personal way how more effective visits to the membership might be made. The teachers and priests were in combined session, addressed by the bishop of the stake, this session being on "The evils of speculation." At the beginning of the service a half hour had been occupied by the stake president discussing his ideals as to church participation in recreational movements, including the motion picture.

The superintendent of the Saints' Homes in Lamoni desires to get in touch with one or two young men who understand milking, care of dairy cattle, and handling of farm machinery. Married men with small families preferred. Position open September 1. Write to Floyd T. Lesh, 802 West Main Street, Lamoni, Iowa.

Lula Linkhart, of Mounds, Oklahoma, about twenty miles south of Tulsa, would appreciate a visit from any of the missionaries. If they will write before coming, she will try to arrange a place for holding meetings.

The Nauvoo Independent reports that at the Annual Home-Coming of the Latter Day Saints in Nauvoo on August 1 there were members and friends in attendance from Fort Madison, Rock Creek, Ferris, Adrian, Montrose, Burnside, and Argyle. The event was in the nature of a surprise for Sister Emma Burton, whose sister, Mrs. Ida Layton, is residing there. Luncheon was served on the lawn of Charles Mulch, who occupies as a residence the old Masonic Temple. William Hartley and P. R. Burton, missionaries in that district, were the speakers, about one hundred and fifty being present in the evening.

Elder Amos Chase and wife, who have been in charge of the Children's Home in Lamoni for several years will again take up missionary work under Elder Chase's appointment to the New York and Philadelphia District, and the duties of superintendent will be assumed by Miss Zilpha Monroe, of Lamoni. The change takes place about September 1. This will most likely prevent Sister Monroe from continuing her newly-acquired responsibilities as head of the young women's bureau of the Women's Department and the superintendent of the girls' department of the Religio.

Reports from the reunion at Coeur d' Alene, Idaho, state that eight were baptized. The meetings were good and the attendance all that could be expected.

FROM THE BRANCHES

Spokane, Washington. The visit of Evangelist Ammon White has been appreciated and his efforts have done much in building up and strengthening the Saints. He left for the Bellingham reunion, near the coast. There has been a good interest in the street preaching. The local ministry have taken considerable interest in this work and helped much. We are always glad to have Saints and missionaries passing through call on us. The writer's address is Sidney N. Gray, South Smith Street, Spokane, Washington.

Whittemore, Michigan. On July 4 an all-day meeting was held here, and attended by members from Prescott, McIvor, Twining, and other branches. We have Sunday school and prayer meeting regularly but no preaching only when a missionary or local elder visits us as we have no presiding elder.

Fort Collins, Colorado. Five were baptized recently. The normal class of 16 members is taking up the new normal course and are much interested. A number of our members attended the reunion at Cope, Colorado.

Verbal Inspiration

Words are but symbols for the truth in thought.

One of the curious features of human thought, which has already been noted several times in the HERALD, is the fondness of a certain type of mind to follow closely the verbal text and ask, Why did the Lord use and instead of or in such and such a passage in the Bible? Or why did he use a instead of the in the Doctrine and Covenants?

Yet the answer is clearly stated by Peter (2 Peter 1: 21) that "Holy men of God wrote as they were moved upon by the Spirit of God." The Spirit gives the divine truth. The man puts it into words, so that the language of one prophet differs from the language and style of another prophet. The truth is divine and eternal. The form in which it is communicated is human.

This would apply as much to the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, or the Book of Mormon, as it would to the Bible. We do not claim plenary inspiration of the Bible, nor of either of the other books. We do not claim verbal inspiration. The truth is divine. The language is the language of a human mind.

With the Bible there is added the factor, that the original texts are lost, so what we have is a translation. In the case of the King James Version, or either of the Revised Versions, it is after all only an approximation, and admittedly so. So far as the Inspired Version is concerned, we can only claim a restoration to the original. There also would remain the difficulty of expressing certain thoughts in English equivalent to the original language in which Moses wrote, or the disciples of Jesus for that matter as well as the human language of the original. We are informed that the New Testament was written in a colloquial Greek, not in the clear classic tongue. This would mean an added difficulty in expressing clearly every shade of meaning in the English. The words selected are those of men; in the case of a translation doubly so.

Words are after all only convenient symbols or instrumentalities for expressing thought. The idea or the thought is essential. The letter and word are not.

There is a certain type of mind which leans greatly towards definition and turns regularly to the dictionary to secure a definition. They fail to see that every word which has been long in existence has gone through a process of growth and change of meaning. Some earlier meanings have become obsolete; later meanings have developed until the meaning of the word is quite altered, and sometimes is even reversed in sense. Still, definitions are a very convenient help to thinking when rightfully used. But if they are treated as a vicariate for thought, as a final symbol, as answering all questions, then they become deceptive. Used merely as an incidental starting point for the expression of an idea, they are valuable.

Artists who can best see and determine each shade of color know how it is composed; how it appears both wet and dry, and can use them the more intelligently. So is there a wonderful beauty in words to the man who understands the real fundamental significance of words, and then how they have unfolded and developed to their present shade of meaning, can use the best of them in the composition of his thought to express a variation of meaning of which the words are capable. But after all they are only symbols for the expression of ideas or thoughts.

So far as our observation has gone it is not the best trained mind, the most widely educated persons who place the most decisive stress on definition. It is those of whom Bacon speaks when he says, "A little learning is a dangerous thing." Sometimes such are woefully misled by a definition to making a most incongruous use of a word. Such often follow strangely set forms entirely from a basis of definition—mechanical building from words—a sort of prelogical procedure. It is not true logic, as the result secured is often quite erroneous.

Such men as Doctor G. Stanley Hall have come to have almost a distaste for definitions, as they are so greatly abused and so often used as being decisive, instead of being an introduction to a thought.

It is the spirit that maketh alive. It is the letter that killeth. It is the living thought that is essential; the cold, literal form is but a body with which to clothe the living spirit of thought. And it is a body often, most crudely formed. It is often formed to conceal rather than to reveal the truth.

The limitations of words are clearly shown when we attempt to express some new idea, some new revelation, from the divine. To every word has been given a meaning. It is connected with old thought. How difficult it is then to use these old words to perfectly express a new revelation. It can only be an approximation at the best.

Hence, he who speaks should speak by the Spirit and not in some other way. There are many other modes of expression besides through the spoken word. The movement of the hand, the voiceless speech of the eye, the whole personal expression may be used to express our thoughts at times, as plainly as words do. Our bodily attitude is another means of expression. It is sometimes better, sometimes less accurate than words. And above all, the moving spirit in the man will at times rise above all physical expression and make itself felt. Even as it is said in Job: "There is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding."

The Spirit of God can cause us to know truth beyond our ability to express in language.

Cod liver oil at one time was held in high repute as a remedy in tuberculosis, and because of the vitamin contest there was a reasonable foundation for its use in this disease. Doctor McCollum states that while fresh air, sunlight, and rest are essential in the treatment of this disease, he believes that the importance of these measures has been exaggerated and sufficient emphasis has not been placed on the necessity for proper food in sufficient quantities and that food—cow's milk.—O. The Lamoni Stake Reunion

The reunions held throughout the church this year have uniformly been successful, and the Lamoni Stake reunion promises to be in the same class. As we write this, it has been in session four days of the twelve arranged for, and is maintaining its usual high standard. The prayer meetings are of a high order, not only in the manifestation of the outward gifts of the gospel, but in the general tone of consecrated devotion.

The attendance is about as usual, the number of tents running to about one hundred and fifteen and some five hundred people camping on the grounds. Meals are served on the cafeteria plan, furnishing wholesome food at a low price.

In addition to the usual services, motion pictures are given two evenings after sermons, and two evenings are given over to lectures on better America with stereopticon slides to accompany.

One evening, the 18th, has been set aside for the rendition of the Book of Mormon pageant written for the occasion, in which over one hundred persons appear in the costumes of Nephites and Lamanites.

Visitors have been registered from nineteen other districts and stakes, some camping the entire time, others staying a part of the time.

Apostle U. W. Greene and wife are present, and President Elbert A. Smith is expected the latter part of the reunion. Frederick A. Smith, J. W. Wight, and other general church workers are in attendance with the local force, which is not small in number nor lacking in talent.

Among the organized recreational features this year is a volley ball tournament between five Religio teams in the stake. "Indoor baseball" played outdoors, croquet, jumping matches, trolleys, and swings, are all appreciated by young and old.

The order of the camp is excellent—so much so that the custom of recent years of having no police for the grounds is still in force—and the cleanliness of the grounds most marked.

The Boy Scouts sound reveille at six in the morning and taps at 10 p. m., while their flag-raising and lowering exercises are observed morning and evening. They also take care of the camp telephone service.

The Saints of the stake are fortunate in owning such a fine place for a reunion and to be commended for keeping it in such good shape for the annual gatherings. They have a goodly fund for building a permanent pavilion, but have delayed it on account of the high cost of materials.

They have drinking water piped to various parts of the camp, continuous electric light service all over the grounds and into every tent where desired, with excellent garbage disposal and toilet facilities.

A copious rain fell the first night of the reunion, and the weather has been favorable each day.

Messages From the Dead

"Behold, I and the children whom the Lord hath given me, are for signs and for wonders in Israel from the Lord of hosts, which dwelleth in Mount Zion. And when they shall say unto you, Seek unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto wizards that peep and that mutter: should not a people seek unto their God? for the living from the dead?"—Isaiah 8: 18, 19.

There are few questions which are receiving as much discussion in the newspapers, magazines, and books of to-day as the conditions of the life hereafter.

Many newspapers have run symposiums of the opinions of different thinkers, in widely separated fields of activity. Others have much to say of Sir A. Conan Doyle and Sir Oliver Lodge, and their observations and opinions; still others contain series of articles on spiritualism and personal observations.

This trend is also noticeable in the weekly magazines of review, and in the monthly and quarterly publications.

The line of discussion is usually either observation and experiences with mediums, or one's own mediumistic experiences; it may be a single experience, or it is an attempt to sum up the evidence, consider the issue from the viewpoint of reason, and reach conclusions therefrom.

Basil King has published one book and started another concerning his experiences with a young woman friend and automatic writing. He asked the questions and is convinced that the answer arose neither in his consciousness nor sub-consciousness, nor in that of the young woman who wrote.

Sir A. Conan Doyle and Sir Oliver Lodge have both written. And now since the first of the year, in The Weekly Dispatch (London, England) there has appeared a long series of communications secured by the Reverend Owen Dale, a vicar of the Church of England. He evidently writes as he is impressed, but is conscious of the external suggestion and of what he writes. It is on the whole by far the most remarkable series of any that have so far appeared.

It is not strange that the heavy loss suffered in western Europe through the late war should result in aroused general interest in the life hereafter, its reality and nature. Nor is it remarkable that this should be followed by several serious discussions of the subject from the standpoint of science and religion.

From earliest times have people sought the witches and wizards, who peep and mutter. So perhaps it is not surprising that there should occur many experiences of this sort, though some appear to go far beyond what would be thus expected, and are not readily explained in usual terms of thought transference, self-suggestion, and the like.

Whenever there is a death of a dear one, there is this longing to see and hear, to know more of what lies beyond the veil. The universal loss of the past five years has meant an equally widespread desire to know.

Now it may seem strange to some, but hardly to our readers, that the best of these experiences condemn the usual efforts through a medium and advise the receiver to avoid the usual seances, recognizing plainly that there are deceptive unseen forces at work. But does the evident fraud at times mean that no one can ever receive a true message?

We have been asked several times concerning these writings. The words of our text makes answer, as did also the warning to Saul, that we should not seek unto them that have familiar spirits and wizards who peep and mutter. We can read the story of the witch of Endor and see her counterpart to-day. Not that Samuel was really called up. But there was deceptive power.

To-day there are mechanical frauds and deceptions. There is a residuum that cannot be explained. But there are to-day as in ancient Israel spiritual powers of darkness to deceive.

May there be a genuine element to some of these experiences? May it be some are from above, and convey truth? Some say no, that the grave is silent, (Psalm 31: 17; Isaiah 38: 18, Psalm 6: 5, etc.) and that our text means that certain ones shall say "Seek etc., . . . should not a people seek unto their God? for the living from the dead?" That the answer then is, "To the law and the testimony."

Now there is no dispute among us that verse 19 applies universally. "To the law and the testimony, if they speak not according to these words, it is because there is no light in them." All that is presented or may be, must be judged by the word of God, the law and the testimony. That which God intended for us has been, is, and will be given according to his law.

But many believe that if the above explanation is correct, then all such experiences would be necessarily false, and there remains no need to go to the law and the testimony to test whether they speak according to this word.

That the grave is silent so far as we who remain are concerned, we all know, even if all the experiences, seances, etc., were true, yet it would be a pitifully small return. Death becomes the great silence, and still remains, even though a few genuine answers were received.

By others this passage is read as though it said, When they say to you, seek to these who have familiar spirits and wizards, come to a seance or medium to hear from your loved ones, go not, for shall not a people seek unto their God the living to hear from the dead? What God gives is then right, but seek only to him. All spiritual communications are to be judged by the law and the testimony. In fact this was done by the Jewish church and by the early Christians; that is, even revelations through the representative of God were weighed.

New light, whether on a matter of personal need and anxiety, or on a question before the whole church, need not be identical with that already given. If so, it would be no new revelation. But it must be in harmony with that already received from God, for he is unchangeable, and therefore always consistent. It must therefore be tested by the word of God. Again, does it uphold Jesus as the Christ, and help to better living before God and man? Is it according to the word of God?

It behooves us then to consider what the word of God teaches.

The Care of Mothers

If we are to preserve the lives of mothers and babies preparatory work must begin at an earlier period, and be established on a broader basis than is possible at present. The United States is far behind Australia and New Zealand, as well as many countries of Europe in its provision for mothers and children. The result of this neglect is to be found in the extremely high percentage of infant deaths during the first year, and also in the loss of the lives of mothers, who could otherwise be saved.

To meet the problem properly, federal action is necessary in order that there may be uniformity throughout the United States. But there should be first of all increased facilities for the care and instruction of mothers, and these facilities should be standardized. Three reasons are given by the Children's Bureau why Federal aid should be extended:

"A. It would stimulate the rapid extension of work which is necessary to prevent further loss of life and health and it would make possible the coordinating and supervising of local work which are essential if the lessons of experience are to be generally applied.

"B. In many communities and areas where the needs for facilities is greatest the local funds are least able to provide them. State and Federal appropriations should be available to supplement local resources.

"C. And, in general, it would further the nation-wide interest in the protection of maternity and infancy which has developed in recent years, and help it to find effective and permanent expression."

New Zealand shows an infant mortality of 48 to 1,000, against 94 to 1,000 in the United States. England, in the midst of war expenses steadily extended a system of national grants for prenatal, natal, and postnatal care, and for the instruction of mothers. In Australia each mother receives five pounds upon the birth of a child. But more even than money is there needed provision for care and instruction.

D. R. Mendenthal, of the Children's Bureau, has estimated in this country two and a half million births occur in a year, and that 200,000 of them die during the first year. But in addition to this we have 125,000 still births, one third of which were caused by syphilis. Out of living births, 125,000 children were also victims of the same disease, and one fourth of them died very shortly as a result.

There is no use of our needlessly closing our eyes. Some people tell you that you cannot kill a baby, and that mothers come through somehow. The plain figures show the awful waste of life in America. The mother should have every possible opportunity for recovery, as well as good prenatal care.

The Children's Bureau secured a year ago detailed information about nearly 3,000 babies in different rural areas in six different States. Of these only five cases received a minimum of adequate prenatal care; in 80 per cent of the cases, the mothers received no prenatal care whatever.

Prenatal care includes adequate provision through the father's wages for a well-balanced diet, and sanitary provisions in the house are also a great help. The advice of a competent physician or nurse is also necessary.

Then at the time of the great event, the mother and child should both receive the necessary care. When we realize that by care beforehand and afterwards, a hundred to a hundred and thirty thousand babies can be saved in the United States each year, the importance of adequate care will perhaps at last begin to come home to us, and also the necessity that provision be made in such a way as to secure uniformity and adequacy.

A minimum: 1. Prenatal care of competent physician, a well-balanced diet, and good, sanitary surroundings.

2. Adequate care at the great natal event for both mother and child, with proper food and rest, and sanitary care.

3. Postnatal care of both during the first year.

The lives of too many mothers have been needlessly shortened and wasted and too many babies lost by lack of care.

Heredity

Doctor Max E. Witte, of one of the State hospitals for the insane in Iowa, in his address as president of the Iowa State Medical Society, emphasized the relation of degeneracy to heredity, according to the Mendelian law.

In the union of a normal individual with a normal individual only normal children will issue.

When a normal person mates with one insane the union may yield apparently normal offspring, but they are capable of passing on either the dominant or recessive traits. Insanity is not transmitted, but the constitutional basis which offers a tendency is.

When a normal person marries one apparently normal as set forth in the paragraph above, one half of the children will be normal; one half will be apparently normal, but capable of passing the defective constitutional strain.

When a member of such a family mates with another of similar make-up, the children will, as a rule, consist of one normal, two apparently normal, and one defective. That constitutes one of the great problems at present.

For it is plain that where one apparently normal, but capable of transmitting a defective strain, weds with one openly defective, the result is that half the children will be normal, but capable of passing on the defect, and the other half will be openly deranged. According to Doctor Witte, such mating should be entirely prevented. In such a case, only one in eight of the grandchildren will be normal.

It is interesting, however, to note some start with such an objectionable union, and in a few generations are able to secure a dominant aristocracy of safe, sane, normal individuals. But it should be noted that it is an aristocracy; it is the very few of the group. But it emphasizes the fact that sanity is dominant and will appear if possible.

In society at large, the great majority are sane. It is not a few man aristocracy of sanity, but the continuation of dominant sanity and health in the race. S. A. B.

Subjects Being Discussed

Women's Dress

A brother writes to us and wants to know if there is nothing to be said about the dresses women are wearing, but we wrote him there was so little to write about that we disliked taking it up.

But seriously, the fashions of the day are a serious matter. Their spirit has crept into the most conservative homes until hardly anyone is entirely free from its insidious influences. We are confident that where the gospel influence has had a real effect, though, we have a much larger percentage of real sanity on the subject in our ranks than most any organized body. We cannot expect that our women will voluntarily attract adverse attention by being greatly out of style, but the demands are such these days that to follow them only part of the way brings reproach from the ultraconservative.

So we are confident that the biggest problem is to truly convert every member whose name is on our records, relying on their God-enlarged wisdom to conform to standards in dress that will be acceptable to all good men and women.

Paris may dictate the fashions of the world, but the time must come when our own church women who have studied the problem and prayed much over it, will be ready to serve us in designing fashions so we shall have the highest forms of pleasing beauty in dress.

"Our Slogan This Year: 'A Million Dollars Tithing.'"

We were much interested recently in looking over copies of some letters being sent out to the missionaries, to branch presidents, and to local bishops and agents.

We noted that each letter bore in pleasing display the words used as a title to this little comment.

The missionaries were asked to think a few moments on the cost of one of their sermons, or the cost of a convert made by them. They were asked to put up a question to themselves such as this: "Am I an asset or a liability to the church?" It was suggested along with this catechism that the good men can accomplish is not to be measured in dollars and cents, but the cost to the church of our work is worthy of at least a passing thought.

They were asked to keep before the Saints the tithing law of the church. And it is well, for only recently a sister wrote one of the church papers that she did not know the teachings of the church on tithing. Many of our younger members (young in years and in church experience) depend on the missionary to learn these things.

The branch presidents were asked to see that their organizations were wide awake, active, progressive, and spiritual, and the natural result would be an observance of the financial law of the church.

Some of the present needs of the church were suggested to the local bishops and agents, such as increasing the missionary force each year, a church paper in every home, distribution of the church periodicals to nonmembers, a tubercular and mental case division for the Sanitarium, new dormitories for Graceland College, enlargement of the publishing plants, a new General Conference building.

All these can be attended to if all will observe the law of one tenth of our increase. It is a just provision and should be observed.

Brotherly Love

The love of our neighbor and the love of the brethren may be included in three things:

First, to think well of them—that is, not to be suspicious of them, but to put the best construction on their words and actions. It is said that love thinketh no evil; it does not charge it upon his neighbor without the clearest proof. This is opposite to envy and hatred, and shows a truly benevolent disposition.

Second: it is to speak well of them. The scripture forbids us to speak evil of our neighbor, though what we say may be true; much less should we invent or spread false report to hurt their character or injure them in any respect. We should also say all the good we possibly can of them, and delight to speak well of them.

Third: it consists in doing them all the good we can. Real Christian love opens both the hand and the heart; it makes us willing to show all possible kindness by advice or by pecuniary assistance. When this is done to Christian brethren, it must spring from the love of Christ, and be done to them that belong to him; and when it is required to be shown towards our neighbors, it must be because, from the same motive, we wish to do by them as we should desire them to do by us in like circumstances.—Reverend R. Neal.

Vaccination Laws Opposed

It is interesting to note the various news items gathered and the comments thereon on health subjects appearing in the Christian Science Monitor. While this excellent daily paper is not partisan nor sectarian, it is but natural that a news item of this sort has considerable significance to its staff and is consequently given considerable space.

One of its latest items is a column on the fact that North Dakota has repealed the State compulsory vaccination law, allowing admission to schools without vaccination.

As laymen we are always interested in both sides of these professional subjects, and naturally we expect a responsible sheet like this to find the side we have suggested, since the Christian Scientists stress faith healing.

The big objection seems to be that compulsory vaccination, regardless of whether there is danger from an epidemic or not, brings much needless suffering, sometimes other diseases, and an occasional death, while if individual freedom is allowed, those who believe in vaccination may accept of its benefits and those who do not may dispense with them. In the opinion of one of the members of the court, this statement is found:

"England with its dense population and unsanitary conditions, was the first country to adopt compulsory vaccination, but there it has been denounced and abandoned."

We have developed the greatest home market of any country in the world, and this makes it possible for us to organize production upon a large scale. We have installed more labor-saving machinery in our various plants than has any other country, and this, with our enormous outputs and our abundant supplies of raw materials, enables American manufacturers to produce a great many articles at a lower cost than the same things can be produced for in foreign countries with cheap labor. As an example, we may take our automobile industry, in which the workers receive higher wages than do similar employees in other countries, and yet motor cars are here produced at a lower cost. The bugaboo of cheap foreign labor is becoming less of a problem for us each year.—Saturday Evening Post.

Fighting the Forces of the World

BY W. F. YATES

The most essential things are not gold, land, proper organization, but proper reorganization of our shortcomings and being full of true charity.

All too often in the past Christian people have passed harsh and rigid judgment upon the sinner, and that is wrong. This thing has brought a barrier between the class that has posed as teachers, and the ones they sought to teach.

The Scriptures say, "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God." (Romans 3: 21.) This being the case, should we not all be just a little modest, when we have occasion to call attention to things that are wrong? When the Lord had occasion to speak to the world in general, he pointed out their error.

But from the fact that the world is sinful, it does not justify us in showing an attitude of almost hatred, and passing condemnation upon it. "For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved." In the mercy of the Lord he permits the sinner to continue and does not cast him off at once. Surely all will agree that there is much that is wrong in society, that our whole law, our government, our institutions, are shot through with human mistakes and errors, that oftentimes work hardships upon us as creatures, but what should be the attitude of a minister or any person toward a wrong, a shortcoming, a failure, whether this is expressed in governments or other organizations of men?

It is easy to see how it is with the average human being, to those who think they have made a glaring mistake. Usually they show at the earliest opportunity by their looks, their attitude in general, that the principle of forbearance, of kindness, of charity, is not sufficiently apparent. This the culprit can detect often in the one who seeks to reprove him. Then instead of reaching the sinner through these never-failing principles (that is, to make him somewhat better), he goes his way with a hateful feeling for his would-be teacher.

Now that "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God," etc., how should we approach the wrongdoer? Looking at the extreme wrong in the world, there is an inclination to cast off with almost a feeling of disgust, the wrongdoer. And when we have occasion to speak of this class, we do so with an air that God had almost failed, and these people were beyond his control. Can we teach in this way? I do not believe that we can.

Teaching

The things that were apparent in Christ's life as he went forth to teach, were patience, kindness, longsuffering, and meekness. He had all the attributes of charity; in this lay his power. Any individual that ever has or ever will benefit this world (in the way of teaching) must possess to some degree these things. The more he possesses them, the greater his success will be.

I have been pleased to see in men who had never made a religious profession, the willingness to overlook a mistake in another, oftentimes showing a marked patience toward the evildoer. When a disposition was shown to make a wrong right, they overlooked freely the wrong done, and did not allow these things to stand in the way of giving the best they had for such an one.

Those who possess these qualities are always bettering conditions. And those who do not possess them can never hope to better the world or lift it to a higher plane.

Few people are ever so wicked but what they can feel and sense the charitable touch or attitude of a fellow being.

Any human who has love, and a desire for the betterment of the world will never belittle in a grumbling manner the same, for should their desire for right cause them to rebuke, reprove, or point to the better way, their sympathy and righteous desires for the world's welfare would be so apparent that appreciation by the world would be the result. Then that man has bettered the world. This principle works individually, or world-wide.

Any minister who would do his work, whether his is to sit in judgment, preside, preach or teach, must possess the deep sympathetic feeling for the Lord's creatures. "Unless you are humble and full of love you cannot assist in this work." Measuring our work by this standard, surely much of it will fail.

Anyone with self-respect will resent the efforts of one who would seek to set him right when bigotry is the most apparent thing in the effort; but how different when one feels that the person who seeks to correct, has in mind a kindly feeling for him as he does so. Perhaps our attitude towards our fellows has something to do with our long-drawn-out difficulties in the past, when if we possessed more of these Christian graces our differences would soon sink into oblivion.

Both parties can be blessed because of differences when charity is there. What almost insurmountable differences can be turned into channels of blessedness, if charity is possessed along with the differences! Men at almost sword's points can be made to love and appreciate each other by this principle. Then the thing which seemed to be a hindrance proves a boon to higher experience and knowledge. So two persons, sincere in their stand upon some point, having the right attitude toward each other, explain how "the wrath of man can be made to praise the Lord."

A common difference has arisen of late as to the principle of "loyalty and patriotism." It seemed that it never was the question between these two disputants whether men were to be loyal or not, but what condition should require this loyalty. One, eager to make his point, would leave the impression that his opponent was disloyal to the Deity, to be loyal to error of some kind; while the other's stand was to the effect that he questioned and hesitated as to the principle he was to be loyal to, therefore he was an enemy to righteousness.

This question was one that was easy to tempt men to have a suspicious attitude toward each other, especially so where there was not enough Christian fortitude to desire to see each other's viewpoint. The two attitudes and arguments of various ones would have furnished fertile soil for the cartoonist. As one brother said, when one mentions patriotism, some think it is some kind of a wild animal, with fire shooting out of its ears. We might put the other extreme, as a sheep-killing dog on the retreat, with his tail between his legs.

After all, is it not true that in the sober moments of our lives we want to know the truth, and indeed, we are made to feel that "all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God"? And when our devotional spirit cries out toward God, then there comes an influence which is noticeable within us, and then our attitude toward the world and suffering humanity becomes ameliorated.

When President F. M. Smith said, when speaking of stewardships, during his recommendations to the conference, "I appreciate even the difficulty of holding in check those who are convinced that they have followed the right line of reasoning, and have reached the only and indisputable results of those conclusions, and therefore are not easily converted from the error of their way," our mind instantly thought of the many methods employed to hold people in check, and wondered which one of those would be employed. Then when his expression was qualified by saying further, "If they have fallen into error," my further thoughts were, his attitude surely will be fair and cautious that he might learn whether error were there or not. And then again when he further on completes his thought by saying, upon the matter of how stewardships should be held, etc., "Remembering in my own experience as an executive, how frequently, almost apparently unsurmountable difficulties have disappeared before the free exchange of opinion, the widening of the circle of our common understanding, rather than attempting to fight to the end our difficulties," etc., I appreciated to the full this last, because it seemed to me that the attitude was the true condition. I wonder if we are not reaching a time when we as ministers will reason rather than argue in thunder tones to hear our voice ring out with a masterful tone.

In our mental vision we can see a school of the prophets, where is such love and consideration for each other, and the world, that with loving tones and sincere hearts the one thought will be to help each other on the plane of truth. By so doing they could do the work as the servants of Christ, and assist in the redemption of the race.

Persecution

That persecution usually commences when men lose their grip on charity. Can we put our finger upon any history of the past where persecution was rife that charity was not absent, speaking of societies and not individuals? It is quite reasonable to believe that Christ suffered in person because of the sins and follies of his followers. No doubt many became as quarrelsome as Peter did, when he drew the sword and cut off the ear, and thus prepared the soil for contention which gave the evil a better chance to work, and thus agitated the minds of the wicked men who took Christ's life.

His charity seemed to hold out till the last. Who can tell what a powerful agency this has been in the world? His charity toward the world did not cause him to become contentious, for contention arises when charity ceases. This explains why people cannot be fighting and peaceable at the same time. Looking over any hard trial any society or organization has passed through, we find it was at the time when contention was rife. On the other hand, we like to think of the peaceable things in the past, when love was the dominant thing. No one is quoted so much as the dear mothers of the past. There is a reason for this.

Let us think of the many promises made to the church as to their peaceable deliverance and salvation upon the land of Zion. But why the scattering? We find that the Saints were pointed to the very principle of peaceable deliverance that was old as the universe, "When you are reviled, revile not again," or "When you are smitten, return not to smite," but a little glimpse into the first volume of the Church History shows that they did revile when reviled. It records that fifteen thousand dollars' worth of guns and ammunition was taken from them at one time. Surely the spirit of contention was there. The God-given advice was forgotten; the scattering was the result.

Yes, "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God." There must be a higher standard of love recognized, if we ever are the recipients of the promises made as a church. While there is and has been a shortage in glory, prophecy is plain that this glory will be realized "some sweet day." In this is our hope.

Contention is war in a mild form. May the good Lord deliver us from contention, for it seems to be "the green-eyed monster" in all hindrances of righteousness.

How Will the Lord Fight His People's Battles?

Will it not be by preparing a people that will keep his commandments, and thus live beyond the Devil's limitations? The Scriptures teach that we can do the things that will make him flee from us, but it seems easier to do the things that cause him to take up his abode with us.

Any organization of people that were perfect in love could not be overcome by the adversary, because he (the Devil) is bound. They have placed themselves outside his limitations. But as pertaining to individuals, sometimes they have become martyrs for or because of wicked persons.

Should the two classes that are becoming more enraged toward one another (capital and labor) continue until they should each try to find out who was for or against them, and they came to a people who were actually putting into practice the fullness of the gospel law, perhaps their conversation would run something like this:

Mr. Laborer (to Miss Church): "How is it with you people? Do you permit one class (and they in the minority) to control the larger part of that produced by the entire body, by exacting interests and profits from the laborer?"

Miss Church: "No, our philosophy is that if a man does not work, neither can he eat; the idler cannot control, neither can he wear the garments, nor eat the food of the laborer."

Mr. Laborer: "What kind of a system do you employ that you do not give the idler an advantage?"

Miss Church (Turning to her textbook, Doctrine and Covenants 101:12): "'And again, there shall be another treasury prepared, and a treasurer appointed to keep the treasury, and a seal shall be placed upon it; and all money that you receive in your stewardships, by improving upon the properties which I have prepared unto you, in houses or in lands, or in cattle, or in all things save it be the holy and sacred writings, which I have reserved unto myself for holy and sacred purposes, shall be cast into the treasury as fast as you receive moneys, by hundreds, or by fifties, or by twenties, or by tens, or by fives, or in other words, if any man among you obtain ten, or twenty, or fifty, or an hundred, let him do likewise; and let not any man among you say that it is his own, for it shall not be called his, nor any part of it; and there shall not any part of it be used, or taken out of the treasury, only by the voice and common consent of the order.'"

Mr. Laborer: "Do you mean to tell me that all money coming into the hands of your membership, whether it be fives, tens, twenties, fifties, etc., is turned over to an agent? If so, how about money for their support?"

Miss Church (reads on): "'And this shall be the voice and common consent of the order; that any man among you, say unto the treasurer, I have need of this to help me in my stewardship; if it be five talents, or if it be ten talents, or twenty, or fifty, or an hundred, the treasurer shall give unto him the sum which he requires, to help him in his stewardship, until he be found a transgressor, and it is manifest before the order plainly that he is an unfaithful and unwise steward; but so long as he is in full fellowship, and is faithful and wise in his stewardship, this shall be his token unto the treasurer, that the treasurer shall not withhold.'"

Mr. Laborer: "No individual piling up wealth at the expense of others, but all unitedly have a claim on production, and issued according to just wants. I see. I see."

Mr. Capitalist (who comes on the scene): "Miss Church, how is this; does this religious body of people countenance this common thing among laborers, that seems to claim that we have taken advantage of the laws (formed unitedly by the people), and have in our control the larger part of material produced, hence we should be the subjects of hate and recipients of sabotage?"

Miss Church (turns to her ever-ready textbook): "Thou shalt live together in love. (Section 59:2.) Therefore I give unto them a commandment saying thus: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy might, mind, and strength; and in the name of Jesus Christ thou shalt serve him. Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.' Now, Mr. Capitalist, to live our system means for us not only to say and teach, but to actually express our love to our fellows by keeping the fullness of all the laws of justice, and this because the Lord has said, we were not 'only to say, but do.'"

Mr. Capitalist: "Do you mean to say that you are dealing with this problem from a moral, as well as economic standpoint?"

Miss Church: "We do! And if you and Mr. Laborer will be seated we will tell you of some valuable information from a loving Father." (She turns to section 45:4.) "'And in that day shall be heard of wars and rumors of wars, and the whole earth shall be in commotion, and men's hearts shall fail them, and they shall say that Christ delayeth his coming until the ends of the earth, and the love of men shall wax cold, and iniquity shall abound; and when the times of the Gentiles is come in, a light shall break forth among them that sit in darkness, and it shall be the fullness of my gospel; but they receive it not, for they perceive not the light, and they turn their hearts from me because of the precepts of men; and in that generation shall the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled; and there shall be men standing in that generation that shall not pass until they shall see an overflowing scourge, for a desolating sickness shall come over the land; but my disciples shall stand in holy places, and shall not be moved; but among the wicked, men shall lift up their voices and curse God, and die. And there shall be earthquakes, also, in divers places, and many desolations; yet men will harden their hearts against me, and they will take up the sword one against another, and they will kill one another.'"

I will ask the reader to imagine the rest of this dialogue behind the curtain. But sufficient to say, Miss Church will come face to face with her opportunity; she must retain with her teaching, love and sympathy (and not condemnation) for the contending forces of evil always recognizing the good and seeing the end, even of that salvation from sin.

While it is stated in the quotation above that when this light shall break forth they will harden their hearts against it, we also find promised in the book that the righteous of earth shall be gathered from all nations.

The light that will shine out no doubt will be all of the gospel in operation. That certainly will be a beacon light for the weary pilgrims of earth.

What then is the most essential thing needed? Is it gold, land, or proper organization? We feel that it is neither. But the proper recognition of our coming short of the glory of God, and accepting charity, which is the most valuable of all agencies, all other things will come. The poor will know exactly what to do; the well-to-do will rejoice for a chance to bless, and all by compliance to the law will find their places to work together. With love we stand; without, we fall. Within the church are the possibilities of the redemption of the world. Was there ever a greater opportunity for man than now?

The Spiritualism of the Bible and Christianity—No. 2

BY MAHLON SMITH

The second of two articles on this subject, this one bringing various historical developments down to our time.

We must now notice the events which led to the apostasy of the church, and to the long Dark Ages of the world's history.

During the centuries marked by the presence of the supernatural gifts of the Spirit in the church, throughout the entire time, the primitive Christians suffered the most bitter, bloody, and relentless persecution by the successive emperors of Rome. And it has been said that the blood of the martyrs was the seed of the church.

Accordingly as martyrdoms increased the number of Christians multiplied. They became very numerous in the provinces of the Roman empire. A child could tell of the fate of John the Baptist, of Jesus himself. It was only 65 A. D. when Peter and Paul were beheaded at Rome by the edict of Nero. All the apostles but John suffered martyrdom. In 85-90 took place the persecution of the Christians by Domitian. Great persecutions took place during the decline of that empire under the Emperors Marcus Aurelius, Severus, Maximian, Gallus, Devius, and Diocletian. This brings us down to the time of Constantine, A. D. 325.

At the beginning of the fourth century, the empire of Rome had become divided by dissensions into four separate governments. The strongest of these was that of Constantine, whose capital was Rome. The next in importance was that of Licinius whose capitol was Constantinople, as it was later named. These two governments soon overcame and assimilated the weaker two. Then came the question as to which of these two should become the sole master of the whole empire. It was settled by a civil war. Constantine triumphed over his adversary and became the sole emperor of Rome. In order to do this he had become the patronizer of the Christians for the sole purpose of enlisting their aid in overthrowing his former colleagues and bolstering up his crumbling government.

Constantine's Cause the Bane of Christianity

The long and bloody history of Rome was soon to be terminated. The Christians, weary with centuries of persecution, embraced the opportunity to end the horrors they had experienced by an almost universal espousal of the cause of Constantine. They hailed him as a friend and deliverer. In turn he heaped favors on the Christians in general and especially on the Christian clergy. The ban against the hated Nazarenes was lifted in the days of this emperor. Instead they were elevated to positions of honor and emolument.

This circumstance, said John Wesley, Mosheim, and others, was fatal to true Christianity. Pride, vainglory, and formality crept into the church. As these came into the church, the spiritualism of the church went out in the same proportion. The Christian Jews also left the church. They could see that Rome and the Gentiles were converting the church, not the church, Rome. It has since been impossible to interest that people in Christianity to any large extent. The Christians gained popularity; they lost spirituality. Even many of the Christians of the present day regard Constantine as the great friend of the church. He is to-day called Constantine the Great. Likewise by some writers Herod, of Christ's day, was called The Great! But these two men were guilty of the most atrocious crimes that history records.

I quote from Drury's World History, using his exact words: "The latter [Maxentius] was the next to disappear, being banished by his son and put to death by his son-in-law, Constantine. Maxentius II succumbed to the blows of his brother-in-law, Constantine, near the Milvian bridge, which spans the Tiber. Thus the empire had now only two masters, Licinius in the East and Constantine in the West. This was one too many for these ambitious and perfidious princes who sought each other's destruction. Under pretext of protecting the Christians, Constantine attacked his colleague and took him prisoner after two victories. He stripped him of the purple, promising that he would respect his life, but some time afterward put him to death. To multiply conversions he made it plain in what quarters imperial favors could be found, bestowing offices on Christians and on cities that overturned the pagan temples. The council of Nicea convoked by Constantine, A. D. 323, [and presided over by him] finally drew up the Creed of Christianity. From his defeat of Licinius in 323, to his death in 337, we find nothing in his personal history except the bloody tragedies of the imperial palace, in which by his orders his son Crispus, his Empress Fausta, and the son of Licinius, a child of twelve, were put to death. A few days before expiring, Constantine was baptized."

The Apostasy Gradual

The principles of the gospel did not all expire at once after this period but they were so changed, this addition made and that, abridged here and there, that God gradually withdrew his Spirit from the church. The last of the apostles, John, while lingering yet in life in banishment, had seen in vision a woman beset by a dragon from whom she fled for 1,260 days or years. No one doubts but that woman typified the Christian church.

Now, my reader, I refer to the child as typifying the authority referred to and necessary to put in operation all of the ordinances of the church. If it were taken away, then with it went authoritative baptism, the laying on of hands, in fact Christian spiritualism that was consequent on all these ordinances being operative.

It would be difficult to conceive or to tell how much the world and the church lost by these dire events. The church fled into the wilderness. The Holy Spirit that at first had come to Jesus in the form of a dove and had continued its presence to obedient men, women, and children for four centuries, was taken from the earth. Words fail to describe the magnitude of the loss to mankind. In those 1,260 years of darkness, honest men in the succeeding Catholic Church went into secluded places and mourned for the iniquity and shame of the church.

The ancient nations were idol worshipers during all their history. Rome had her pagan temples and her graven images and gods, until her ignoble end came. The flamens or kindlers kept their sacrificial fires burning throughout her history. But now a nominal Christianity was to succeed all that. But what a Christianity indeed was that which succeeded! The very first of the ten commandments directs and commands that "thou shalt have no other gods before me. Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth. Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them nor serve them."

The Worship of Images

The Christian churches after Constantine became filled with images and likenesses of various saints and holy persons. The holy virgin was the principal one of these. After several centuries, a council of the church ordered these objects of worship to be removed from the churches. The practice was discontinued for two or three centuries. Then another counsel, after much debate and interchange of learned opinions, concluded a mistake had been made and ordered a reinstatement of these objects of worship in the churches and homes of the Christians. They remain to this day.

The writer had occasion to stay overnight some months ago with a wealthy member of the Catholic Church, being there on business for an insurance company. And one of the boys, a fine, manly young man, occupied the same bed in the chamber. After I had gotten into bed, he extinguished the light and was perfectly silent for I should think a full half hour. I did not know what it meant. In the morning I noticed a small, silver-plated image of some holy man, not the Savior, on the stand. This was an emblem of worship.

In the morning the large family surrounded the breakfast table standing, all sang a suitable verse or two of a hymn, a little girl said grace, they all crossed themselves and then sat down. Reader, I have always remembered that night's visit, the example of devotion I witnessed, cheering to me. Indeed I felt honored by my visit to them. I was touched with their devotion in their worship, though in my opinion that intelligent young man was as plainly an idolater as were the Babylonians of old who were commanded to fall down and worship the standing image of gold, ninety feet high, which Daniel and his two companions absolutely refused to do though they incurred the death penalty by the refusal. But those three were Hebrews and there has been a vast difference between the Gentiles and the house of Israel in regard to such things.

Then later, being on the same business, I came to a family where I noticed two wooden, graven images on the mantle. A few weeks after I called there again and three others were added to the two, some women but more men, and these were old-country people and uneducated. They also had a small string of beads thrown over the shoulder of the largest image, about ten inches high. I have not forgotten the hearty friendship of these two families to me. I only allude to these incidents as suggestive of, and relics of, not only the Dark Ages of the Christian era, but also of the idolatry of the Gentile nations of ancient times. It may show us that the world has not yet arrived at an age of universal light, and that the apostasy and darkness of the Dark Ages has not yet been dispelled.

I wish to cite the reader to the fact that the fate of the saving ordinances of the gospel came through the hands of a church; were changed to suit their pride, interest, or convenience, by a church, the ministry and officials of which, though university educated, yet had not enough sincerity and honesty of purpose, or intellectual or spiritual discernment, to establish the meaning and to command the observance, of the first, plainest, and perhaps the most important of the ten commandments of the decalogue.

The Bible teaches "they shall change the ordinance, break the everlasting covenant," and those ordinances remain changed to this day. The church when at Jerusalem and among the house of Israel in the Holy Land, was owned by God; when it came down to Rome and the Gentiles it soon lost its vitality and the extraordinary blessings it should always have, and disappeared. And how could image worshipers be expected to reinstate them?

An Angel With the Gospel

But John saw in a vision another angel coming to earth with the everlasting gospel. Taking courage by this, the reformers, one by one, protested against the darkness of their times. They were at first promptly put to death, generally by burning at the stake. The word heretic in those times carried with it more danger and contumely than that of a murderer. But when they were at last permitted to live, they realized they yet lacked the most important results of the gospel, and Luther and the Wesleys predicted yet to come a fullness of "latter-day glory" as some of them called it.

To receive the blessings that the church once had, is not everything in importance, but it is very necessary indeed. They show that the church having them is owned by the Master as his own, and that is surely of much importance. And in presenting the claims of a people to this preeminence, I shall not select any of the churches of the Succession, or the Reformation, but one claiming a full and complete restoration of all the primitive church enjoyed during its first four centuries.

Experiences of a New York Woman

In that same school district where those spiritualists lived in Onondaga County, New York, dwelt a woman at that time who accepted the claims of such a restoration and rejected the claims of spiritualism. She had been brought up in the Presbyterian Church, and in her younger days had acted as an altar girl, as they had them then, in the ceremony of christening and baptism of infants by sprinkling. She afterward became a school-teacher, but at the period of which I write she had married and was raising a family of children. But this infant baptism did not appeal to her as being in harmony with the teachings of the Bible. The command to "repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of your sins," and the expression, "buried with him [Christ] in baptism" did not look to her like this sacred function of infant baptism was the proper mode of fulfilling those commands.

She was therefore in a receptive mood, should something better appear, to give it an investigation. At one time she visited the Oneida Community, coming back with quite a good opinion of them, but it did not fill the bill of what she conceived the true church ought to be. Again she investigated the claims of the "Apostolic Church," a new sect that started in Montreal, Canada, the claims of which were presented to her by a lady from Oswego, who visited in that neighborhood. She easily detected the invalidity of their claims.

So, there finally came into her life an incident that she ever afterward remembered. A few words will relate it. It was but a dream she had one night, but the impression and the spirit that accompanied it, witnessed to her that it was by that same Spirit that visions were shown in ancient times to the old prophets of Israel. She had the assurance that from the same source from which that came, others also of a similar character might at future times come into her life. In this dream she found herself walking along the edge of a deep gulf, the sides of which were too steep and rugged for her to cross over to the other side. It was dark with only light enough for her to see her way along a path, on which she was walking. She looked across this gulf to the other side which was bathed in the light of the sun, and she saw throngs of people enjoying the green fields and the light and sunshine. But she could not cross over at any place as she walked along seeking some means of getting across to those people in the light. And finally she looked ahead and saw, as it appeared, a log or plank across where the edges of the chasm came close together, so that this object would reach across. And she went up to this and readily stepped onto it and crossed over. Then she turned and looked back and saw the object she had passed over was that of a man, and looking closer she discovered it was the body of Christ the Savior. She passed on to join these people near by and wondered.

I mention this singular incident as the first experience that came into that woman's family, and which has molded and directed their religious connections down to the third and fourth generations. Soon after this occurrence her husband came in one day and said to her that "these people they call Mormons that we have heard so much about, have secured the schoolhouse and will preach there to-night." He proposed to attend, but she objected. She had heard such reports about them that her Presbyterian pride was too strong yet to think of an association with a people that had such a name as the Mormons had at that time. But they went.

Let me describe that meeting: Two elders by the name of Theophilus Taylor and Ezra T. Whitehead sat on the platform, perfect strangers in the neighborhood. One of them gave out a hymn and the congregation stood while the two men alone sang.

"The Spirit of God like a fire is burning,
The latter-day glory begins to come forth,
The visions and blessings of old are returning,
The angels are coming to visit the earth."

One of these men, Taylor, turned out to be a very capable preacher and competent to defend his cause against any opposer, but their sermons were very plain and to the point. They knew it meant a fight for them and opposition wherever they went and they nailed the facts down with all the more plainness on that account. They preached one church, one body, and no more, one baptism and that immersion, and no other mode, not the slightest deviation from that mode. They preached then that by the laying on of hands, and by no other way, should the Holy Ghost be conferred on baptized believers. Then they taught that the signs and gifts of that Holy Ghost would follow the application of the gospel in this way. Then they related that an angel, who said that his name was John, the same that was called John the Baptist, had come to earth, in the western part of that same State, and had conferred the authority to baptize men again; that the angel actually laid his hands on two men, Joseph Smith and a school teacher by the name of Oliver Cowdery, and conferred that authority upon them, which was followed later by the Melchisedec authority being also conferred on the same two men and that by the same ordinance this authority had come down to them and that they were there, ready to act in the office of their calling.

These men preached the gospel then in great plainness; they did not bring confusion on it by multiplying sermons and opinions of their own by the hundred. In that way they covered a great deal of ground and went into many different neighborhoods in a year. The result in that neighborhood was that four of the best women and one good man were baptized by them, the woman I have referred to being one of them. I will not take space to tell how the people, especially sectarians, in that neighborhood almost raged. This occurred in the year 1843.

The same elders happened to be back in that neighborhood the next summer, and one day they came walking down the path to this woman's house, looking very thoughtful. And they said they had heard another rumor that Joseph Smith had been killed by a mob in Illinois, but they said they did not believe it; they had heard the same thing several times before. The woman replied, Brethren, the rumor is true. The prophet of the Lord is dead. I saw him shot, as you say, in a vision I had of the occurrence and I know he is dead. She had even seen the manner of his death, soon to be confirmed.

She was faithful to the cause she espoused, down through the forties, the fifties, sixties, and seventies. She died a member of the Reorganized Church in a good old age. The Millerite excitement in 1844, spiritualism which followed in 1845-8, of which I have written, the ghastly reports of polygamy coming into that church afterwards, all these things moved her not, but in 1860 she was one of the first to enter the church, reorganized and died a faithful member of the same. Even the presence of polygamy in the Utah church, her greatest trials, did not overthrow her faith in the church and she endured the stigma until 1860, as I have said, joining the Reorganized Church instantly and gladly as soon as she had opportunity, as she was counseled, on her original baptism.

A Vision

We pass on to the next generation and will present the testimony of one of this lady's sons, who joined the Reorganized Church and is yet living to verify these statements if necessary. I select his testimony as being one that bears so much resemblance to the aims of spiritualism, in fact a Christian testimony of the gifts of the Spirit, somewhat out of the ordinary, but seemingly relevant to the subject of this article. It is only a feeling that it might be a benefit to some one, that he has consented to make the experiences public. I have the circumstance related by him in his own words before me in writing, and will give his own words:

"Some thirty or more years ago, it was my sad experience to lose my only child by diphtheria. She was about two and a half years old, a bright, healthy, handsome little girl. Both my wife and myself have both been members of the Latter Day Saint Church all our married life and that is the only church we ever did belong to. So, as the neighbors came in and saw the serious condition of the child, one of them, also a brother in the church, suggested a few of the neighbors come in that evening and together offer prayers for the sick child. When this was concluded, they went home with two exceptions, neighbors who volunteered to sit up with the child during the night. I therefore lay down in an adjoining room to get some sleep. My wife came in and lay down beside me, and putting her arms around my neck, she wept like a child and said to me, 'You need not worry about getting any different treatment for the baby.' I surmised her meaning, and if the reader has been through a similar trial, he can realize the pangs of sorrow we felt. The next morning at ten o'clock our only child died. May not many be called to put away the little shoes and clothes and playthings of an only child.

"At a convenient time after we had buried our child, my wife explained to me the reason of her words to me that night. She said that as one of those present that night was on his knees praying, suddenly the scene before her disappeared entirely and that she found herself opening a door that led into another room. And on a cot opposite her in the room there lay a young child like our own. And she saw just over the child a half window that was open. And a personage appeared in the window, having the appearance of our Savior as she had seen him represented in a picture. And he had a circle of light around his head a few inches above it as she had also seen in the pictures of Christ. And the child held up its arms for this person to take it, and he tenderly reached down to the child, took it in his arms, and bore it away out of her sight. My wife, after telling this to me, never made mention of the occurrence, unless it be to corroborate the truth of it, when mentioned in her presence.

A Sequel to the Vision

"Now, I feel there is a sequel to this which only a duty to my fellow man would induce me to recite. Thirty-five years had elapsed after the above took place, when one night my home was crowded and I was sleeping on a lounge in my office up in town. I was taken seriously sick soon after going to bed. The sickness was caused by eating some potatoes at supper time, which were very unwholesome, and which, as I was in a hurry to get back to town, I did not notice at the time. But I was alone and if I had undertaken to walk home when so sick, I know I would have failed. I am getting old also, sixty-seven years, and I felt alarmed at my condition. But finally I had a spell of vomiting and the sickness left me at once, and after turning the light down so as to leave the room partly lighted, I went to sleep. In about a couple of hours I slowly awoke. I had bolstered my head up higher than usual when I went to sleep, and as I opened my eyes, I saw the figure of a little girl's head and shoulders in the room directly over and above the foot of the lounge. Her face was exactly in front of mine and she was looking intently at me, her hair reaching down to her collar in ringlets, the face full, beautiful, and her eyes and countenance filled with expressions of watchcare and intense interest in my condition, which just before had been so helpless and distressing. I had but just fixed my gaze upon her before I saw she was disappearing and slowly fading from my view. And very soon she was gone and I lay there steadfastly gazing out into that half-lighted room, realizing I had just before lay there face to face with a being, or the vision of one young and beautiful, who had come to me as a guardian spirit to bring me comfort and give me renewed hope and faith in that Savior that had before borne our child from our sight. I was at first filled with awe and was afraid, alone as I was, with the lamp turned low, but this feeling soon passed away and my whole being was filled with unutterable gratitude, and I wept tears of joy that one so unworthy and from the common walks of life, should be the object of our heavenly Father's care. The next day I told this to my wife, who at once recalled these incidents, the dear child that was lost, still alive and returned to us. Then as I remembered the features of the child and recalled those of our little girl, I recognized the similarity, and ever since the occurrence last fall I never think of it but my heart is gladdened and comforted beyond expression. Though in the stress of business cares which in the last five years had become almost unbearable, my child's face after so many years had become a stranger to me, yet I am assured that it was indeed her sweet face that appeared to me in the dead hours of that night."

I hope my readers may be interested in this article, intended as it is to draw their attention to the Christian religion as a divine system by which we may receive the greatest hope, joy, and assurance of the immortality of the human soul, and to increase their interest in, and their honor for, the word of God, the plan of salvation, the hope of eternal life.

A Unique, Useful, and Growing Institution

BY G. N. BRIGGS

No institution has quite the same place as Graceland College in the hearts of its students.

Visiting speakers invited to address the students of Graceland College almost without exception speak of it as being "a unique institution." This expression has been used so frequently by those addressing the assembly that a speaker is marked as a rare exception who does not impart this information. Yet, perhaps, there is no other adjective in the English language which places the emphasis quite so well.

Graceland College is different; in many ways it is in a class by itself. While the grade of its work, the qualifications of the members of the faculty, the extent and quality of its library and laboratories all meet the most exacting requirements of standardizing and accrediting associations, and because of these facts Graceland is fully accredited, yet no other college is just like it. Others teach similar courses of study and approach some of its methods, but in the processes by which its students obtain their education and the methods through which the college has been able to conduct its work and secure the results, there is no parallel in the school world.

Some years ago there stepped off the train at Lamoni one of the oddest-looking specimens of the genus "homo" that had yet applied for admission to the college. His academic preparation had been very limited. He had very little money in his pockets, had no source from which he might hope to draw more. He thought he might be able to remain in college one term. He remained seven years, then continued his education in one of the State universities of the country, and now occupies one of the most important positions in the commercial world.

This story might be duplicated hundreds of times in the life story of Graceland graduates. It is true, some have not been so greatly handicapped in their youth, and yet one born with a silver spoon in his mouth is sometimes the one who would not take full advantage of his opportunities. It is a greater handicap to a college student to have too much money than it is to have too little. Our failures have been more frequent on the part of the student with too much money and too much time than on the part of the one who has to help provide himself with the wherewithal to enable him to remain in school.

Of the graduating class this year composed of nearly seventy students, the two honors awarded annually for high scholarship in different departments were earned by two students who made their way through college largely by their own efforts.

The relationship sustained by students with each other in all the various student activities gives them a sympathetic understanding of the problems that go to make up the lives of others, and they go out into life not only trained to think, but prepared to perform the common tasks of life. Students who go out as teachers and in religious work are especially fitted to render unusually helpful service.

Graceland is different in the ideals which it imparts to students. A great majority of her students come from Christian homes, have been taught in their youth the history and doctrines of the church. Some, however, come to us without this Christian teaching, but almost without exception it is only a few months before they make a profession of faith in Jesus Christ as their Lord and Savior and become active members of the church.

It is because of the high ideals with which the students come into contact during their college course that they are so willing to consecrate their lives to the work of the Master in local and foreign fields, in teaching, preaching, and ministering to the sick, as educational and religious workers in the homeland, as teachers, Christian home makers, in the professions, and in exercising Christian leadership in their communities. Graceland lives for others; her watchword is "Service" and her students catch this broad spirit and give themselves to the service of God and humanity.

The Department of Education of the United States Government informs us that practically all of the colleges of America enroll eighty per cent of their student body from within a radius of one hundred miles. Graceland shows a marked difference in this respect. During the past year, which is typical of her twenty-five years' existence, she had students from thirty States of the Union, from several foreign countries, and from the islands of the sea, representing as they did several different nations.

Graceland is an institution of church-wide interest, is one of the officially recognized departments of the church, has a distinct mission to perform as have all the other departments of the church, and all working together, each in its own particular field, the ultimate goal can easily be reached.

Experience is a dead loss if you can't sell it for more than it cost.

Book of Mormon Rays on Scientific Paths—No. 14

BY A. E. PHILLIPS

The New Testament teaching that Christ is the Savior of the world holds a much more inclusive meaning when we learn that he appeared to the ancients on this continent and taught them also the way of salvation. The Book of Mormon, therefore, comes to us as a witness of Christ and his world-wide mission to all humanity. Through the destruction of the Nephite nation we have lost the means of tracing the evidences of scriptural teaching to the extent that would otherwise have been possible, for the Nephites rather than the Lamanites, who were the more direct ancestors of the Indian tribes, were the teachers of their religion in its purer form. Nevertheless, many of the most important phases of their cult seem to have been retained, though beclouded by innovations or deviations more or less.

Parallels in Theology

Aside from the traditional evidences that corroborate the Book of Mormon, the actual worship, and practice that entered into the religious observances of these people since the discovery, retain something of their ancient significance as presented in the book. Their belief in God was almost universal. Doctor Alexander says: "As a matter of fact, there is hardly a tribe that does not possess its belief in what may very properly be called a Great Spirit, or Great Mystery, or Master of Life."—Ibid., p. 82. Nine prayers to the Universal Ruler are mentioned by Molina. We are informed by Markham that this worship occupied the thoughts of the Incas in life and in death, and that they earnestly prayed for a knowledge of the Deity. Of their hymns he says: "These hymns are the expression of a longing to know the invisible God, to walk in his ways, and to have the prayers heard which entreat the Deity to reveal himself."—Incas of Peru, p. 99. One of their remarkable prayers he records as follows:

"O Lord of divination, Where art thou? Thou mayest be above, Thou mayest be below, Or perhaps around, Thy splendid throne and scepter. Oh hear me! From the sky above, In which thou mayest be, From the sea beneath, In which thou mayest be, Creator of the world, Maker of all men; Lord of all Lords, My eyes fail me For longing to see thee; For the sole desire to know thee. Might I behold thee, Might I know thee, Might I consider thee, Might I understand thee. Oh look down upon me, For thou knowest me."

This prayer is too long to give in entirety here. Its rich imagery and sublimity are revealed in the following lofty appeal:

"Oh come then, Great as the heavens, Lord of all the earth, Great first cause, Creator of men. Ten times I adore thee, Ever with my eyes Turned to the ground, Hidden by the eyelashes, Thee am I seeking. Oh look on me! Like as for the rivers, Like as for the fountains, When gasping with thirst, I seek for thee."

Another prayer is recorded by Enoch that was had among the Aztecs: "Truly the gods which I adore, idols of stone and wood, speak not nor feel; neither could they fashion the beauty of the heavens, the sun, the moon, and the stars, nor yet the earth and the streams, the trees and the plants which beautify it. Some powerful, hidden, and unseen God must be the Creator of the universe, and he alone can console me in my affliction or still the bitter anguish of this heart." The magnificent temples so abundantly provided for worship are a sufficient testimony of the importance which they attributed to religion. We are told by Enoch that "At Palenque twelve truncated pyramids, built of earth, stone and masonry, have been discovered, eight of which are crowned by temples."

In both North and South America the soul was believed to be immortal, and the resurrection of the body was commonly taught. Bancroft remarks that "The opinions of the Mexicans with regard to the resurrection of the body accorded with those of the Jews."—Native Races, p. 86, vol. 5. Prescott also mentions this significant fact, and it has been variously commented on by several other writers. The Book of Mormon fully records these teachings.

The Christian rite of baptism was of widespread practice, according to a number of commentators. Bouton states that baptism was practiced in Yucatan, as well as in Mexico and ancient Peru, and was known as a regeneration. Brinton also remarks: "It was practiced by the Nahuas of Mexico and Quichuas of Peru. With the Mayas of Yucatan it was in common usage and was known by the significant name, 'the second birth.'"—Religions of Primitive Peoples, p. 195. Saint Giles informs us that "an unbaptized person was held to be incapable of leading a good life; the banquet at baptism was called the Descent of God, and the baptized were spoken of as 'born again.'" The Book of Mormon shows that baptism was taught on this continent both by Christ and his followers, and was considered a very sacred and essential ceremony. This clearly explains why baptism was so generally observed by the people in later ages.

The promise of the second coming of Christ was frequently referred to by the sacred teachers in Book of Mormon times, and this has its echo in the Books of Chilan Balam, the Prophetic and Historic Records of the Mayas. Brinton gives a translation or paraphrasing of a prophecy in one of these books, as follows: "Four ages yet shall be inscribed, Then shall come the holy priest the holy God. With grief I speak what now I see. Watch well the road, ye dwellers in Itza. The master of the earth shall come to us. Thus prophesies Nahau Pech, the seer, In the days of the fourth age, at the time of its beginning." Here is both a promise and warning of the great day that is to come, and this was carefully recorded in their most sacred archives. A belief in the prophetic office was most natural, from the fact that these ancient people were from time to time led, instructed, or warned by prophets among them, according to the Book of Mormon.

Much more could be adduced to show the similarity existing between the record of the book and the settled religious convictions of the people many centuries afterward. Those which we have compared are in the main such as constitute essentially prominent features of their religion, and would not therefore be as susceptible of radical change, perhaps, as would matters of less fundamental value. Zoomorphism, it is true, may have resulted from a degenerate system of worship in some places; but this has been shockingly so in the history of both Christianity and Judaism, and has been found among people who were not idolaters. On the other hand, the so-called Mexican idols have almost certainly been misinterpreted by writers in the past in at least a number of instances. It is now known with reasonable assurance that historical monuments have been mistaken for idols. In some instances this has been due partly to the fact that very ancient monuments of a historical character, having lost their special significance to later generations, were employed in religious observances by those who knew not their original meaning.

Tracings in Etymology

As previously referred to, the followers of Laman were of more nomadic habits than were the Nephites, and were finally so far successful in their frequent wars that the latter people were either killed or subjugated by them. Some of the conquered Nephites were thus assimilated into the fabric of the Lamanite life. In view of this fact, considered in the light of Lamanite hatred for them, we cannot suppose that the Nephites would in many instances thereafter occupy ul-

OF GENERAL INTEREST

WHAT UNCLE SAM IS DOING FOR THE INDIANS

In reply to resolutions adopted by the Women's Civic Center, of San Diego, California, relative to the status of the American Indian, Cato Sells, Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the Government, explains the Indian situation.

Confusion as to the legal status of the Indian rests largely with those who have not studied the subject. The general allotment act of 1887, providing for the allotment of lands in severalty, with the amending provisions of the Burke Act of 1906, made the issuance of a fee simple patent the primary legal requirement for citizenship of Indians, but also provided for the citizenship of any Indian by his voluntary separation from tribal relations and the adoption of the habits of civilized life. The later act of June 25, 1910, also provides for the allotment of lands to Indians from the public domain with the issuance of a fee patent as provided for in the case of reservation allotments.

Under my administration the Indian Bureau has made special effort to extend citizenship to the Indians and prepare them for its duties and responsibilities. In the declaration of policy issued April 17, 1917, I announced that every Indian as soon as found to be competent to transact his own business affairs would be given full control of his property and have all his land and moneys turned over to him, after which he would no longer be a ward of the Government. In furtherance of this movement, on March 7, 1919, I instructed the superintendents of the various reservations as follows:

"You are requested to submit to this office, at the earliest practicable date, a list of all Indians of one half or less Indian blood, who are able-bodied and mentally competent, twenty-one years of age or over, together with a description of the land allotted to said Indians, and the number of the allotment. It is intended to issue patents in fee simple to such Indians."

Under this broadened policy Indians, both mixed and full-bloods, are being released from Government supervision as rapidly as their condition warrants. Whenever an Indian is found to be as competent as the average white man to transact the usual vocations of life, he is given a patent in fee, full control of his lands and moneys, and made a citizen of the United States. About 225,000 allotments of land have been made to Indians and during the last three years 10,956 fee simple patents have been issued, or 1,062 more than in the ten years preceding.

I have, however, gone further and taken the position that the citizenship of Indians should not be based upon their ownership of lands, tribal or in severalty, in trust or in fee, but upon the fact that they are real Americans, and favorable report has been made on a bill introduced in Congress having ing places among the people, nor would they be permitted to segregate. There would also doubtless result an intermingling of names from the offspring of marriage. The names given in the Book of Mormon that would be most easily handed down to succeeding generations are the names of persons and places, but many of these names would in the course of time be liable to some change. This will be more fully explained in our next number, in which will be found some material of considerable interest to every Book of Mormon believer, and of equal significance to other readers also, we trust.

for its purpose the conferring of citizenship on all Indians but retaining control of the estates of incompetents.

I am fully convinced of the wisdom of this restriction and that competency must precede the control of property, otherwise great injustice would follow to thousands of Indians.

In this connection I said in my last annual report:

"Of the large number of Indians still under the supervision of this bureau, it should be understood that more than 75,000 are situated practically the same as the reservation Navaho, Hualapai, Hopi, and Apache, whose property cannot now, nor for many years to come, be wisely allotted. There are thousands of full-bloods and near full-bloods whose landed interests and whose personal possessions and prospects are suggestive of a capacity for independent self-support, but who are not qualified to withstand the competitive tests that would follow a withdrawal of Federal guidance. To abandon these at the point in their progress where elementary requirements are shaping into self-reliance and a comprehension of practical methods, would be to leave them a prey to every kind of unscrupulous trickery that masks itself in the conventions of civilization.

"I shall not be outdone by anyone who would hasten Indian progress by the extension of release and obligation to those who are ready for this status, nor shall I be swerved from what I believe to be a course of just aid and protection to the less fortunate and less progressive Indian."

It is not necessary in establishing the patriotic and heroic part of the Indians in the World War to make such unwarrantable statements as that they purchased over sixty million dollars' worth of Liberty Bonds. I feel that their actual investment of $25,000,000 in this way is a magnificent showing. No one questions the war-time evidence of the Indian's Americanism or that it carries great weight in the plea for his citizenship, and you are advised that a bill approved by this bureau, which became a law in October, 1919, provides that Indians who served in the military or naval establishments of the United States during the war against Germany and who have been honorably discharged may be granted full citizenship by courts of competent jurisdiction.

Few things have been more obstructive to Indian welfare than the professional agitator who claims the abolishment of governmental supervision as the salvation of the Indian. There would be no wisdom in the withdrawal of Federal supervision over all Indians at this time. The result would be that a large number of old or incompetent Indians would soon be fleeced of their property and thrown upon the States as paupers and mendicants and public protest against neglected conditions would surely and shortly follow. Such procedure would be unwise, unjust, and undefensible.

The Indian Service has been aided by sincere and sane criticism, for which it is grateful, but its work is too often seriously impeded through misrepresentations to the public by speakers and writers of superficial knowledge or excessive zeal, and what is more unfortunate, by selfish adventurers of both the white and Indian races who are chiefly concerned for personal gain and who seek a condition that would enable them to profit at the expense of those who, if unprotected, would be duped by their clever rapacity. These go to the people, perhaps with imposing testimonials, and with ready-made resolutions to be presented in fluent and picturesque rhetoric, probably followed by a collection to cover "necessary expenses." They should meet with a conservative reception. The public should be led by no one to draw conclusions from less than careful and impartial inquiry.

The Indian is moving forward. He is progressing numerically. His population is greater than at any time in the last half century. He is improving in health and knowledge of how to keep well. He is accepting hospital facilities that have been more than doubled in the last seven years, as shown by an increase of 10,000 patients treated annually. His medicine men are retiring from practice. Fifty thousand Indian families live in permanent homes and take an interest in sanitation. The women are becoming better housekeepers; their babies are better cared for, and infant mortality is decreasing.

The Indians are growing in knowledge and general intelligence. Three fourths of their children eligible for attendance are enrolled in some school, Federal, State, or mission. Nearly two thirds of their entire population speak English and about one half read and write English. Their gain in the use of civilized speech has been remarkable in the last seven years.

Too much has been said about Indian-school graduates going back to the blanket. Any assumption that more than a negligible percentage of such students are nonprogressive is unwarranted. In some instances where pupils not long in school have returned to backward home conditions the results have been disappointing but by no means an entire loss. If these boys and girls carry no more than a speaking use of English into homes still under the thrall of barbaric ignorance, they have started a lifting force and planted imperishable seeds of civilization. Considering the effect of previous environment, habits, and prejudice, the school-trained Indian compares favorably with the average white student whose home surroundings as a rule are generally to his advantage.

The Indian's progress is too frequently measured by his garb. We want the Indian to cut his hair and wear citizen's clothes. We urge him to live in a white man's house, but if he does not entirely and promptly respond in all of these respects it is not proven that he is not a progressive man. Sometimes young men returning from our schools to the reservations resume certain outward forms of tribal fashion as a matter of expediency or social deference to their elders but their activities show what they are; their farming, their stock raising, the homes they build and the way they furnish them, and their desire to have their children go to school, are the best evidences of their progress.

Recent careful investigation shows that the product of the Indian schools is so generally successful and of good standing, that the conclusion is overwhelmingly against any adverse criticism of the Government's system of Indian education.

The war service of 10,000 young Indians brought them distinct educational value in a better use of English, greater self-confidence, respect for authority, and disciplined industry that will add strength and character to their citizenship.

The social and domestic life of the Indians is steadily improving. Marriage by tribal custom is notably giving way to legal rites. At present there is hardly more than one fourth the drunkenness among Indians that prevailed ten years ago. The missionary workers have been a powerful aid. Their number among the Indians has doubled since 1900, with a corresponding increase of churches and church attendants.

The Indian's industrial progress is especially noteworthy. Their individual funds on deposit have increased in the last eight years in excess of $20,000,000. During that period they have expended for homes, barns, and modern farm implements $18,000,000 and have added $13,000,000 to their capital in live stock. The Indian's transformation from a game hunter and wanderer to a settled landholder and home builder is everywhere evident. Nearly 37,000 Indian farmers are cultivating almost a million acres, 47,000 are engaged in stock raising and their live stock is worth close to $38,000,000. Their last year's income from the sale of crops and live stock was approximately $14,000,000. The Indians are dependable wageworkers. Their annual earnings in public and private service exceed $3,000,000. Their number receiving rations

How Socrates Taught

"Before he had talked five minutes he had his crowd," says this author. We may learn much from this ancient philosopher.

Jesus Christ is not only the Sunday school teacher's main theme; he is his chief model for the difficult art of teaching. And next to the divine Teacher, we find our most helpful exemplars in other Bible characters, notably Paul and the Old Testament prophets. The Sunday school teacher will never exhaust the pedagogic hints that are to be found in his Textbook.

Though all this is true—and I, certainly, would yield to no man in emphasizing it—yet it would be foolish for us to neglect the great lessons in wise ways of teaching to be learned from teachers outside the Bible. One of the noblest of these instructors is the old Greek philosopher, Socrates—a man so wise and so noble that some have not hesitated to compare him blasphemously with our Lord himself. Every one who attempts to teach others, youths or adults, should be familiar with the ideas and methods of Socrates. What are some of these and how will they help us to teach our modern boys and girls?

Well, in the first place, Socrates was absolutely sincere, simple, and unpretending. These are splendid qualities in a teacher. Strangers always found in him more than they expected. His talk was a constant surprise, even to Plato and Xenophon and his other intimates. Barefooted, hatless, coatless, pale of face, flat of nose, protuberant of stomach, Socrates was the reverse of showy. He began his conversations hesitatingly, apologetically. But before he had talked five minutes he had his crowd.

If any of us are fussing over exteriors in this matter of teaching—if we think that fine garments or fine words or elegant manners are necessary to make an impression on our scholars, a little study of Socrates will set us right. The heart! The head! Love your scholars and teach them! You need no other charm.

The second feature in Socrates' way of teaching was his application of the same principle to others. Unpretending himself, he abhorred pretence in others. In his famous discussion with the scholars and philosophers of his day, his first step was almost invariably to convict them of ignorance.

The Oracle at Delphi had once declared that Sophocles was wise, Euripides wiser, but the wisest of all men was Socrates. Our humble philosopher was conscious of deep ignorance, as all wise men are; but he laughed off the Oracle's statement by asserting that he was wiser than others only in this: that he knew his own ignorance, but others did not know theirs!

Socrates made many enemies by his merciless process of exposing the ignorance of men, and these enemies became numerous and powerful enough to procure his death. Perhaps he foresaw the result, but it would have made no difference if he did. Socrates had taken up the work of teaching, and he knew that he could not teach anything to any man if the man was sure that he knew it already.

After the same fashion the modern teacher must clear the ground before him, removing from the scholars' minds all conceit of knowledge that is not possessed. "Where is Jerusalem?" Do not be satisfied with the easy answer, "In Palestine," unless you are sure that your scholars know where Palestine is, and what it is. "Point toward Jerusalem." "How would you go to Palestine from here?" "How far would Palestine reach across our State?" "Can you walk twenty miles a day?" "How long would it take you to walk the length of Palestine?" "How much of the eastern Mediterranean shore does it occupy?" "To what empire does it belong?" "In what part of Palestine is Jerusalem?" Continue these questions, and repeat them until, with the help of the globe and maps, you are sure that Palestine and Jerusalem have real location in your scholars' apprehension. You will not go far in the process with many scholars without discovering much confusion, not to say blank ignorance, even on this fundamental point of Bible geography. Your scholars will not be pleased to perceive how little they know, nor you to perceive how little you have taught; but there is no other way.

Socrates was the real discoverer of the definition. He was the first to insist upon its value, if men are to think and speak accurately. How many misunderstandings would be avoided if in all our talking together on disputed points we were always to begin with definitions! Agreement on those would usually show us that, after all, we think alike. But some of us urge that faith is the essential, and not works, and others that works are essential, and not faith, while all the time each of us had different definitions of works and faith, and we are not talking about the same things at all.

For instance, if some one were to meet Socrates on one of our American streets, and casually ask him, "Do you think it right for the Government to tax the selling of liquor?" he would hardly get an immediate answer from the philosopher. At once Socrates would begin to probe for a definition. "What do you mean by a government?" the sage would ask. "What are its purposes? Who make it up? Whence comes its power? What do you mean by taxing? What are the purposes of taxation? Whence comes authority to tax? What is temperance? What is intemperance? What promotes the first? What causes the second?" Socrates would not go near your main question until every one of these fundamentals had been thoroughly discussed, and some sort of answer agreed upon. Even then he would probably remain provokingly silent, and leave you to draw a just conclusion from the principles you had reached, which would not be at all difficult to do.

Now of course I do not intend to suggest the adoption of this method in toto in your Sunday-school teaching, but the main idea is continually to be kept in view. Be sure that you and your scholars know what you are talking about. Sin, salvation, repentance, forgiveness, inspiration, miracle, parable, immortality, righteousness—such great terms are constantly used in Sunday-school teaching, and often, I fear, with little definite understanding. Socrates knew, and we should know, that to get one great thought clearly into a man's head is a good morning's work. Let us follow his example in our zeal for definitions.

One other particular in which we may wisely follow the teaching ways of Socrates is his use of illustrations from common things. Like our Lord, he saw parables everywhere. In this he was quite unlike the pompous rhetoricians of his day, who scorned to introduce butchers and meat and ship's and supplies not paid for in labor has decreased one half in the last seven years.

There are not many defenders of the earlier processes of treaty making and treaty breaking, but the constructive plan, followed now for nearly a third of a century, of allotting the Indians land in severalty, of conducting hospitals and schools for physical and mental betterment, and providing them guidance in the productive use of the soil and its related industries, if not a perfect one, is the best plan yet devised for a dependent people and is amply justified by results.

helms into their elegant harangues, and who ridiculed the homely similes wherewith Socrates clinched arguments.

Here, for instance, is the way Socrates used the argument from design, to prove that there is an intelligent Creator: "The eyes are weak, but they have two doors to protect them, open when we will, closed when we sleep. Isn't that an evidence of design? Then, the eyelashes grow over them, to strain out the dust from the wind; and the eyebrows jut out over them to hold back the perspiration from the forehead. Yes, and the ear receives all sounds, and is never filled; what do you think of that? And the front teeth cut up the food, while the back teeth receive it from them and grind it finer! And the mouth, through which we take in food, is placed near the eyes and the nose that judge the food!" In that way Socrates went on, developing from these common things his proof that there is a good God who made us.

I hardly think that Sunday school teachers even yet are well aware of the immense value of illustrations—yes, the necessity of them—if our teaching is to be vital. But illustrations out of a book are of far less value (though they are useful) than illustrations that we have picked up for ourselves from the scenes around us, from our own experiences and the lives of our scholars. An illustration from your backyard is worth ten illustrations from India. A comparison to some happening in your town is worth all the similes in Shakespeare. Observe and reflect. Venture upon the commonplace. You have no less an authority and example than Socrates.

But the feature of Socrates' teaching methods that the world has most admired and sought to imitate was his questioning. Indeed, when we speak of "the Socrates method," that is what we generally mean; bringing out the truth by a long series of persistent, connected questions. Socrates never lectured; he simply conversed. He taught by dialogues.

When an artist would mold the clay into a form of beauty, he shapes the image by a thousand delicate pressings here and pullings there, adding and subtracting as the growing realization of the idea demands. Suppose he had united all those little pats and pulls into one mighty blow; where would have been the image? Yet just this grotesque mistake is made by those who imagine that the delivery of a harangue is teaching.

The ideal recitation is a conversation; but it must be a real conversation, in which both teacher and scholar are thinking. In our class, for instance, we may wish to instruct the pupils in the folly of being angry with disagreeable people, and we may ask: "Johnny, suppose you should say, 'Good morning,' to somebody, and he should look off and not answer, you ought not to be angry, ought you?"

Johnny: "No, sir."

One lesson taught, and easily taught: Johnny's conduct will not probably be materially changed! But here is the way Socrates taught that lesson once:

Socrates: "You're gloomy to-day, my friend. What's the matter?"

Friend: "I just passed Lysias, and I said 'Good morning' pleasantly; but the sullen boor only scowled and walked on."

Socrates: "Well, my friend, suppose you had passed a lame man, would you have been angry at his lameness?"

Friend: "No, of course not. Why should I?"

Socrates: "Or suppose Lysias had been sick with some terrible disease; would you have been mad at him for that?"

Friend: "Certainly not. What of it, Socrates?"

Socrates: "Well, then, my dear friend, why, pray, should you get angry when you meet a man with a diseased soul?"

That lesson will not be forgotten.

HYMNS AND POEMS

Our Agency

BY PHILEMON PEMENT

The agency which we are given
By Him who gave us life,
Makes us responsible to heaven,
For our actions wrong or right;
And if we daily introspect,
We very clearly then can see,
Just what we are in all respects,
And what we really ought to be.

The ego, in us, then will shine,
And the Spirit by its holy power,
Will lead us into paths divine,
And work with us each day and hour;
Till we are free, and naught can gain
O'er us the power of control,
Except Christ, whose image, not in vain,
Is transfused in our very soul.

And not by human power and will
Are we enabled thus to do,
Amazing love, and mercy's still
At work with that great end in view;
To lift the human race to God,
From sin and death to be made free,
By atonement of the Son of God,
The death of Christ on Calvary.

the "Memorabilia" and "Symposium" by Xenophon, and you will gain a superb teaching stimulus along many lines, but chiefly along this of the wise use of conversation. The interrogation point may well be adopted as the symbol of the teacher's art. If you are in the habit of spending three hours in reading for your Sunday's teaching, storing up a mass of facts, comments, and anecdotes to unload upon your admiring pupils, take my advice: spend only half the time in gaining your material, and spend the other half in considering how you can best present it, in framing your questions so that they will arouse interest, hold attention, and elicit and develop the scholar's thought. That is teaching. Anything else is lecturing.

One should not close even a brief account of Socrates' teaching without a word about the lofty motives that impelled it. He was an ardent lover of the truth, one of the most sincere and earnest that ever lived. He inspired the same love of truth in his pupils, notably Plato. He lived solely to discover the truth and show it to others. When persecution came because of the truth, he did not swerve a hair's breadth. When his enemies brought him to trial on charges absurdly false, he adopted no compromising tone toward his judges. Rather than yield a jot of the truth he drank the fatal hemlock, engaging to the very last in the high converse to which he had given his life.

What a splendid Christian he would have made! How gladly he would have followed Him who was the Truth incarnate! With what joy, guided by the Light of the World, he would have walked and leaped where he was obliged dimly to grope! Truly in heaven Socrates must be filled with gladness when he learns that the methods of teaching which he employed with a power so original and bold are now set to the service of the one true God, whom having not known he served.—From a booklet issued by David C. Cook Co.

That we might live—that he should come
 And recreate this sin-curs'd earth,
 That in the end it might be the home
 Of all who have celestial birth;
 With such a prospect—such a hope,
 Inspiring heart and mind and soul,
 How long will man in darkness grope,
 And let the world his life control?

O God of mercy and of love!
 Thy promise true we still believe,
 Endow thy servants from above,
 That we thy power may receive
 In measure such as they of old,
 When first the church on Pentecost
 Proclaimed with holy power and bold,
 Redemption unto sinners lost.

They heard the burning words of life,
 Their hearts were pricked with holy power,
 Their agency—their power of choice
 They exercised that very hour;
 Into the fold that glorious day,
 Three thousand souls—their sins forgiven,
 Began to walk the narrow way
 That leads from earth to God in heaven.

Peace

BY ELEANOR WALDORF KEARNEY

"My peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you."—Jesus.

Not as the world gives peace—ah, no!
 The world so full of vexing strife!
 The world's peace so mixed with woe—
 So full of yearning turmoil rife.

God's peace the world can never give,
 And, blessed thought, not take away;
 Through what wild warfare we may live
 Still let his peace in us hold sway.

Men bicker not about his peace,
 Nor twist its thought with vicious art,
 His peace before which passions cease,
 And kindness fills the mind and heart.

God's peace seeks not its own—extends
 With willing hand its blessedness;
 Mercy with justice, love, defends
 The periled cause of righteousness.

Lord Jesus, let thy word subdue,
 As oil upon the troubled sea,
 The hate which worldly strifes imbue,
 And let our peace abide in thee.

An interesting development in radio service was chronicled recently in the United States Air Service magazine. A mail airplane encountered darkness and a big storm on coming into Chicago from the east, so it called all radio stations within reach and asked them to telephone to the Government mail field at Maywood, Illinois, the following message: "Light all flood lights, place flares on center of field. We are coming. Mail Plane 206." The manager at Maywood received five calls from various amateur stations, each delivering the message. The lights were put on the field as directed and the big mail plane landed safely. "Another big step in the advance of aviation," says the writer reporting the event.

THE SOCIAL CIRCLE

ELDER WILFRED D. TORDOFF

This brother and his wife have been sent to the Isle of Pines, West Indies, to open up mission work for the church, going there in June of this year. He has been in the church about five and a half years, serving as president of Rabbit Foot Lake, Glen Ellyn, and Viceroy Branches, in Saskatchewan, successively. He was ordained a deacon in 1917 and an elder in 1918. Their little boy, Clarence Wilfred, died August 2, at the age of six months, at Neuva Gerona, Isle of Pines.

If you have forgotten where the Isle of Pines is located, take your map of Cuba and it will likely show the place pleasantly located to the south of the famous sugar island.

A SMILE OR TWO

The story is related that a certain noted agnostic who insisted very strongly upon his theory of evolution, that nothing had been created, but that the world and all that is on it had simply developed or happened to be so, acting through undirected and unintelligent forces known as nature, entered the office of a Christian minister and there noted a remarkably fine globe.

"Why," he remarked, "what a splendid globe! Who made it, if I may ask?"

The minister glanced up and remarked quietly, "Who made it? Why, no one made it. It just happened that way."

A man stepped up to Henry Ward Beecher one day and said, "Sir, I am an evolutionist, and I want to discuss the question with you. I am also an annihilator; I believe that when I die that will be the end of me."

"Thank goodness for that!" said Mr. Beecher, as he walked off and left the man dazed.—London Blighly.

Grown-ups may learn something from little Johnnie. On the morning of his birthday this notice was found pasted on the door of his room: "Remember my birthday; give till it hurts."—Oregon Journal.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

Some Things for Which Our Department Stands

Primarily our department stands for better and more efficient homes, presided over by better and more efficient women; better and more desirable communities composed of better and more progressive citizens, and better and higher. Zionie conditions in the church because of a membership throughout becoming better and more spiritual-minded along with an increased practicality.

To accomplish this so far as the women are concerned more concentrated study and application will be required. No woman can hope to be the highest type of woman, of home maker, of mother, or of church member, unless she is willing to concentrate upon a consideration of the essentials which go to make up those types. Mistakes of the past have reaped a heavy toll of sorrow, of loss of children, of broken health—shall we let it go on and on, and not try to stem the disasters of evil by overcoming them with pronounced good, meet the peril of darkness and ignorance by bringing to bear the healing and wholesome forces of light, truth, and knowledge?

So we have our courses of study, and the women all over the church are uniting in these. The "Child care" course, arranged for the use and guidance of young or busy mothers, embraces the essentials of proper care, feeding, and training of children, from prenatal days to the turbulent ones of adolescence.

Our "Food and the body" course is designed to give women in a concise and convenient form the information they should have in regard to the natures, the values, the preparation, and the uses of the various food elements by which our bodies are sustained. The doctor and even our own Sanitarium may have to discontinue business so far as Latter Day Saints are concerned, if all our women obtain a perfect knowledge of the principles of human nutrition, and the courage and convictions to live them conscientiously. The problems which confront mothers in regard to their children are many and constantly arising. A course based on a scientific book dealing with these matters, has been prepared for the use and study of our women in groups. This is Mothers' and Teachers' Problems, and is based on Forbush's text. A fair understanding of her children, the workings of their minds, the effects upon them of certain training and attitudes, the principles of government and development which are fundamental—all these are needed by the mother who would be such in very fact as well as name—the mother who desires to hear a "well done" when she shall present her life work to her Master.

We do not feel that a Latter Day Saint is filling her whole duty when she does not use what influence she may possess for the betterment of conditions in her community life. Our women desire to be, and should be, deeply interested in those things which will improve the environment in which they are bringing up their families. It is often because they do not know how to go about it to change undesirable conditions that they do nothing about them. We stand for a study of civic conditions—national, state, and communal—for our women, when once thoroughly awakened to their opportunities along this line, will always exert their influence on the side of progressive and constructive legislation, and a proper and efficient conduct of civil affairs.

Our department feels that as women of the church we are responsible in large measure for the proper preparation of our young women and girls for the highest duties of life. If every mother were awake to all the dangers, well-prepared to properly educate and instruct her daughter, and fully consecrated to that task, the department might have no further duty in that direction, except to provide for those girls whose mothers have been taken from them. As it is, many mothers are not thus awake, not thus prepared, nor thus consecrated, and many girls are approaching marriage and maternity with twisted and perverted ideas and convictions which modern tendencies and attitudes only serve to strengthen. Who is to sound the notes of warning, who going to set up in the minds of our young girls those fundamental ideals of morality, of grace, of virtue and beauty?

The teaching in the church on social purity was, so far as initiative is concerned, turned over to our department. Where shall this responsibility not commence and where can it conscientiously end? The tiniest child needs guidance and training, the growing lad and blossoming girl should be forewarned and anchored for the times of stress and turmoil, the young man and woman planning for the establishment of a new home should be instructed in the principles of their being, their mating, and the purposes of life, and even the older ones need much knowledge concerning their duties and responsibilities in this direction. It is not a time to shut our eyes or fold our hands! Only to the alert and the promptly active will victory be assured!

Our duty to our fellow men is another of our studies. To what extent are we our brother's keeper? Is it enough to carry a few flowers when illness has stricken him low? Shall we not help him to keep well if we can? Is it enough to take up a subscription for a family in distress? Shall we not also find out the causes of the disaster and try to remedy them? If their poverty is a spiritual one are they any the less in need of our help and sympathetic succor? If it be ignorance, shall they not be thankful for the life-giving light of adequate knowledge? Many a discouraged woman with child cares and home cares proving too heavy for her because of her lack of preparation and training therefor, has dated the hour of her emancipation to that one in which a kindly neighbor in loving and helpful sympathy has shown her better and more efficient ways to conduct her home, to train her children, or to prepare the food for her family. In our course, "Training in relief and service," there is discussed the "friendly visiting" and many other phases of our duty to our neighbor. The course is one which the deacons and other officers of every branch might well take up and study along with the women. Sewing and quilting to raise money for branch expenditures is fast becoming merely an incident here and there. The women in our branches are organizing for better and more far-reaching service. They are studying home nursing and first aid, that in times of the prophetic "scourges" they may be better prepared to succor and assist. Branch officers, taxed with numerous calls for administration here and there, and seeing the many in dire need of womanly assistance, will find a great source of comfort in having at hand an organized and intellectually equipped corps of women, trained in the principles of nursing and relief, and who can carry on their work systematically, avoiding over-attention to the sick on some days, and neglect on others.

Then, too, our women in many places are already gathering up cast-off clothing, cleaning and repairing, making comfortable and suitable dresses, aprons, skirts, shirts, blouses, stockings, coats, and other useful things out of that which would otherwise be thrown aside. When the days of cold and distress shall come again, these sisters will be prepared to help, and what branch officer but would welcome such assistance in caring for his flock? The dollars and cents needed for the branch coal or the new carpet or shades should come directly from the pockets of the members just as they would provide shoes or clothing for their own children, and it should be given gladly as offering to the Lord. The women, with their nimble and willing fingers have, in the light of their social service, other work to do than to toil for a few dollars wrong for branch purposes from people who expect a material equivalent for what they give! Some measure their religion by the numbers of church suppers or bazaars they patronize, and seem to think their duty done handsomely when they donate a pound of sugar, or buy, for family consumption, a plate of ice cream apiece or a chocolate cake! Great profit for the coal fund, that!

It is not meet for any to say that this or that is not of value. "The head must not say to the feet, I have no need of thee." All are to work in the Lord's vineyard, as opportunity and talents shall indicate. All have their places in the economy of God, and success is to be measured by the universal effort and industry rather than by similarity of service. The feet will be doing their duty if they walk well, while of the head is expected something far different. So we feel that the sisters are following the direction of the Lord when they are doing with earnestness and intelligent assiduity that which their hands find to do in this latter-day effort to show our great light to the world. Expressing it is service this way or that way; it is all acceptable, providing a constant effort is being made to progress, to enlarge the understanding, to train the intellect, and to perfect the processes of self-elimination.

"None can assist in this work except he be humble and full of love." If there be harshness one with another, or pride, or a lack of charity and forbearance, if there be unwillingness to be directed by those in positions of responsibility, or to work together with great and high purposes, God will not be pleased with the offering. He could not smile upon Cain because his tribute did not come by way of obedience nor in humility. He has set his approval at various times and in various terms upon the efforts and the aims of the Women's Department, and we feel sure, in urging the women of the church to line themselves up with us, that he will bless every attempt that is made in his name, which is in harmony with his divine purposes for his people.

We hope to see the day when the women of the church will, to a unit, express to the world in terms that are unmistakable because of their grace, beauty, and love, that they are walking in the light of this restored gospel of hope, faith, charity, and work!

Government Help for Mothers

Below we publish a list of publications issued by the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor, which would be of great help to mothers and prospective mothers, as well as some which will appeal to those women who are making a study of child welfare, and wish to keep informed concerning what the Government is doing in that direction. Most of these may be obtained (single copies) free of charge. Others will require a small sum in payment. Address the Children's Bureau, United States Department of Labor, Washington, District of Columbia.

Care of Children Series.

No. 4. Prenatal Care, by Mrs. Max West.

No. 8. Infant Care, by Mrs. Max West.

No. 30. Child Care, by Mrs. Max West.

No. 35. Milk, the indispensable food for children.

Infant Mortality. Several papers which are the results of field studies in various localities showing how home and community conditions affect the welfare of children. Nos. 6, 9, 20, 29, and 37.

Industrial Series. These show the state of child labor legislation in the United States, stating some of the laws, their administration, list of references concerning them, and some of the laws in foreign countries. Questions asked about this series will receive helpful and instructive reply.

Rural Child Welfare Series. This series gives a view of conditions in which rural children live, as disclosed by surveys in various parts of the country. They show the effect of too hard labor on the part of mothers, and the results of neglect in regard to her care before, during, and after confinement. Nos. 26, 33, 34, and 46.

Legal Series. Two numbers, 31 and 42, give a glimpse of laws concerning illegitimate children in this and other countries.

Miscellaneous Series. In this section are several which are interesting, No. 14, telling of child welfare exhibits; No. 15, of Baby Week campaigns; No. 23, how to conduct a children's health conference; No. 19, on maternal mortality, discussing causes and prevention of deaths in childbirth and reviewing available statistics.

Children's Year Series. In this series many fine things are available, such as No. 45, telling of Children's Health Centers; No. 47, of the Public Health Nurse, and how she helps to keep the baby well; No. 53, advising children in their choice of occupation, and supervising the working child; No. 55, on the visiting teacher; and No. 58, listing the States with certain restrictions as to child labor.

Local Activities

From Sister Eva Short's news column in the Ensign, we glean that the sisters at Independence are taking renewed interest in women's work. Study classes are marked with lively enthusiasm, and some attempts are being made to put into practice lessons learned.

A story hour for children was established at the library building, and for the first three weeks an average attendance of thirty-five bespeaks its popularity. The library is open evenings, now, too, through the devoted service of a group of women who take turns in supervising its activities. Children's books, magazines, and periodicals of interest to young people will be gladly received as donations from those who see the worth of keeping youth wholesomely and pleasantly occupied—evenings as well as in the hours of light. Any such donations may be sent to Sister Viola Short, librarian.

One group of the city encourages the mothers to bring their children along with them when they attend the study classes. Middle-sized girls are taught to crochet, and smaller ones string beads. Croquet and games interest boys and entertainment and recreation are combined with profit in pleasant ways.

A group of young ladies are receiving instruction in intelligent home making, some of the subjects being discussed being good manners, costume and design, interior decorating, story telling, etc.

One group has made forty garments ready to wear, using for the purpose, cast-off or outgrown clothing. Another donated a basket of clean white cloths to the Sanitarium, a much appreciated service.

Another group reports friendly visits made to everyone "within its gates." This is a line of work directly in harmony with the spirit and essence of our gospel, which is one of doing good in kindly ways.

From Lexington, Missouri, comes a report that "Our store, which is financed by three members of the branch, is operated under the auspices of the Women's Department." What shall we not do when opportunity knocks at our door?

Stay-in-School Campaign

To abolish child labor not merely by prohibiting employment, but by providing suitable education is the aim of the Stay-in-School campaigns now being carried on or just completed in 20 States in cooperation with the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor. The campaign is to be followed in the fall by a Back-to-School drive in order to round up the children who fail to report at the opening of school, since the influence of vacation work in leading to permanent withdrawal from school has been strikingly shown.

An encouraging feature of the campaign is that 6 of the States taking part in it are among the 10 in which more than 20 per cent of all the children between 10 and 15 years of age are regularly engaged in agricultural work. Rural child labor, which involves three fourths of all the child workers in the country, is the most difficult form of child exploitation to reach. It is subject to no legal regulation except through school attendance laws, and these are, as a rule, inadequate and poorly enforced. In 3 of the 6 States taking part in the Stay-in-School campaign, the percentage of illiterates over 10 years of age represents more than one fifth of the total population. The other 3 States have illiteracy rates considerably higher than the country as a whole.

The campaign is being carried on in accordance with local needs and resources. Moving pictures and slides are being utilized in some places to show the harmful effects of too early work and the advantages of schooling. Posters and

Like Getting Married

A letter written by T. W. Williams regarding his trip in company with President F. M. Smith to England.

An ocean trip is like getting married—a great adventure. One thinks wonderingly and wistfully beforehand. He is in a kind of a haze while it occurs, and remembers it for a long time afterwards.

Like marriage it is a venture—a leap in the dark. One never knows how it is going to turn out. Anything is liable to occur, even to the sinking of the ship. You are subject to adverse winds and sunless days. You may encounter squalls and fogs and gales; you may have a head-on collision; you may even meet up with an iceberg. Your safety and happiness depend very largely on how the bark is managed under these varying conditions.

Whether you take a sea voyage or get married, you are never sure of yourself. There are times when you seem walking in air. At other times the very bottom seems to have fallen out. You are kept guessing all the time. When you feel the most secure is the time you are in the most danger. Numerous and undreamed of conditions threaten your course from the beginning to the very end.

A sea voyage, like marriage, is an up-and-down experience. Anything and everything may come up. The ship with all on board may go down. Success is largely dependent upon a level-headed captain and an all-around, astute, and clever first mate.

But where is the man who, having sailed the sea, regrets that experience! It is wonderful! The glorious rising of the sun, the days crowded full of joyous experiences, and the indescribable sunsets, the exhilarating moonlight evenings on deck! One would forego nearly everything to enjoy this! There is nothing like unto it—except marriage and congenial married life.

They say June is the month for happy marriages. I vote "July" for a pleasant ocean voyage. The Rotterdam is my ship. It has a capacity of 37,190 tons displacement, and a registered capacity of 24,170 tons. They have carried as high as five thousand four hundred passengers, but the regular capacity is three thousand, as follows: First cabin, 500; second cabin, 700; steerage, 1,800. This ship was built in England. The inside finishing was done in Holland. The entire interior is hand-finished inlaid work—a marvel of workmanship. The crew numbers 500. The ship is owned by a firm in Holland.

"Water, water everywhere, and not a drop to drink!" Oh, there is plenty of champagne and wine and beer and other kinds of spirituous liquors on board ship. Wine and women are in evidence here as elsewhere. On the whole the passengers are well behaved.

By the way, New York is a wonderful city. Sailing out of the harbor on a pleasant afternoon affords an excellent opportunity for a bird's-eye view of its greatness. The unexcelled leaflets urging children to make wider use of the vocational courses offered in local schools are being distributed. Leaders in vocational guidance and placement work are giving talks to seventh and eighth grade pupils on the advantages which school training gives when the boy or girl enters the working world. A ruler, called A Rule for School, showing children why for the sake of their future they should stay in school until they have at least enough education to enter a skilled occupation, is being furnished local committees by the Children's Bureau.

The 20 States carrying on campaigns are Alabama, Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Iowa, Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, Nevada, New Jersey, North Dakota, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Texas, and Wisconsin.

panorama of the New York sky line, the bold relief of skyscrapers, the myriads of all kinds of crafts weaving in and out in seeming abandon—all these give to the trip a magnificent splendor, quickening the heartbeat, and sending a flood of thought to the brain.

There are opportunities which come but once in a lifetime. To be on a great ocean liner putting out to sea and without warning, to be projected into the very pathway of an international yacht race only a few hundred feet beyond the finish, beggars description. To witness the Resolute and Shamrock with every foot of canvas furled to the breeze, coming head on, neck and neck, to meet you makes the heart stand still. To see these champions and rivals cross the line only a second apart with the Resolute in the lead—well, I'm no sport, but I felt like yelling when my traveling companion remarked, "Isn't that great!"

The trip has been uneventful. With the exception of a rain or two, a couple of days and night of fog, the weather has been ideal. It's a new experience to hear the fog horn blow forth its note of warning for six seconds every minute of the day and night.

Who will believe a man when he disclaims seasickness! My chum and I have never missed a meal. We have walked miles and more miles each day on the promenade deck. Our clothes are getting more snug each day. It's our own business what we do with our food. Men do not get fat on salt air and salt-water baths.

I believe we could fulfill the command to warn all the nations of the earth if we were given opportunity to prosecute mission work on this ship. I am sure that there are representatives of nearly every nation under the sun here assembled.

This is a Dutch ship; at least the Dutch predominate both among the passengers and crew. There is one Englishman on board. How do I know? He forgot to bring his h's with him as usual. I like the Dutch. They tend to their own business. They are good feeders. They are spotlessly clean. When they gossip they talk in a language you do not understand. If they make fun of you, you are not conscious of it. They patronize California markets, and supply one with an abundance of California vegetables and fruit. They know a good thing and use it.

The second day out we were hailed by a sailing craft in distress. It was about ten miles to starboard. It was a French freighter sixty-five days out, and becalmed for four weeks. They were out of food. We shared our lunch and left them to their fate—a reflex of civilization.

There are a great many icebergs afloat. Our captain takes no chances. Our route lies three hundred miles south of the beaten track. Strictly speaking, I doubt if anyone but an experienced mariner could find any footprints along the way. It looked to me as though we were stalking through an unexplored country not knowing where we were going, and not quite sure where we came from.

It's a fine thing to have a congenial roommate—a real chum; one who is human and can adapt himself to your whims; one who does not patronize you; one who treats you as an equal. I like an all-around companion—a good mixer. It makes an ocean trip pleasant when you have such a companion. I am enjoying the trip.

I admire the capacity and foresight of the camel. In anticipation of the desert he tanks up at the feeding places. We are trying to imitate the camel. We are feeding well these days in anticipation of what we may find on the Continent. We order the full course. For a missionary to fare this way reminds one of a tramp in dreamland.

It's a homesick distance from London to Los Angeles. It is eight hours difference in time, and some six thousand miles to walk if one has an inclination to desert his post. We are in London.

The only cloud across our sky now is that it is as far back to America as it was from America to England. As we look back over the expanse of water and recall our experience as we saw the United States sinking in the sea, we wonder! We wonder!

Two-Day Meeting in Oklahoma

The Saints of Sperry, Oklahoma, held a two-day meeting on July 31 and August 1. Patriarch F. A. Smith was with us, and gave us some fine instruction. His sermon on Zion was especially good, and all enjoyed it very much. Brother Hubert Case was with us, and gave a good lecture on the Book of Mormon, also a fine sermon.

On Sunday morning we held Sunday school, with the usual good attendance. Our newly appointed missionary, R. E. Miller, was present. He is the assistant superintendent of the district, but owing to an accident to our auto he was unable to be present at Sunday school. At eleven o'clock sacrament service was held. The house was full of good Latter Day Saints, gathering from all parts of the district. A very peaceful and enjoyable time was had, and God's blessing rested upon all.

After sacrament service was over, everybody was invited to go to the old schoolhouse, where a dinner would be served to all. And such a dinner as we had: chicken and pie, cake, cookies, pickles, and salads of all kinds. Even here we were forced to see God's goodness to his people.

After dinner we again gathered at the church for a half-hour sing, which was very difficult after eating such a dinner; but we finally got started, and before we knew it the time for afternoon service was upon us. At three o'clock Brother F. A. Smith gave us a sermon on Zion, which all enjoyed. I for one could not see how he could preach so long after he had eaten so much, but he did, and it was good too. Brother Fred gave some blessings, then started home on the six o'clock train.

Seven thirty found the house full again, and ready to sing. Another half hour of song, then Brother Case talked to us on the Book of Mormon and the Indians. A few Indians were present. One lady asked Brother Case to talk to her people some day.

Very happy but tired, all returned home to take up the usual worry of the days that makes up this life, thanking God for the gospel and all its blessings.

Successful Tent Meetings in Western Iowa

Our tent meetings at McClelland, which continued five and a half weeks are now a matter of history. Though we are in a locality that is pretty well surrounded with our people, yet our message was practically new to the people of McClelland and environs. They, however, have a much better idea of our work now than they have heretofore had. Our attendance and interest was good throughout the entire meeting. One thing that was particularly noticeable was that we did not miss a night. When it rained in the day, it was always good weather by church time, and if it rained at night it was after church was out.

Our purpose was to get the gospel message before the people, and this we did in a constructive way. Personally, I see no place for anything but constructive work. By reason of building our work and not tearing down the work of others, we have made friends of the people of this community. I find too that when we are able to make friends of the people, we are able to draw them to us and lead them to the feet of the Master, but when we antagonize and offend them, it is quite hard to lead them to the truth, because people generally don't respond very readily to antagonism; if they do the response is not very favorable.

On July 29 six were baptized. Brother C. W. Morgan did the baptizing. The writer was made the chief speaker, therefore it was only fair that our brother should do the baptizing.

We leave the community in most excellent spirits, and if the brethren who are left in charge of the work here will keep in touch with those who are interested, it will be only a matter of a short time until others will be with us. At our closing session on Sunday night we had a very large attendance. The tent was full, and people sat in their cars all around the tent as well.

The writer goes to Crescent this week where he is to hold a meeting. Brother Morgan will in all probability go to Oakland and make some plans and arrangements for a tent meeting there, following our reunion at Council Bluffs, which will be held from the 13th to the 22d inclusive.

The older I become in the work, the more I see the need of thoroughness and efficiency in our work. It is possible for us to instruct the people without getting their ill will, and I think it is a duty on our part to make the message so beautiful and inviting that people will be drawn to it by reason of their love of the beautiful and true. There is a great work to be done if the Saints everywhere will rally to the support of the church so that we may have men and means to care for the fields that are fast ripening. We are all needed in the work.

McCLELLAND, IOWA.

Respectfully,

J. E. VANDERWOOD.

Good Tent Meetings in Kansas

I am cooperating with Elder J. W. A. Bailey, operating a gospel tent here since the latter part of May. Have finished a good long campaign in Netawaka and are just concluding a series of meetings at this place.

We have a church building in Netawaka but the work has been permitted to run down, because of the death of those who had been leaders in the past, and others moving away. But we were able to meet the situation and aroused the people, believers and nonmembers, and after a month's work we had many reasons to believe that the work would be re-established at that place. Three were baptized and quite a number are near the kingdom. Last evening one man from that town drove in a car thirty-five miles to attend our meeting and stated that he and his wife were ready for baptism. Others are near the kingdom.

At this place we met with a feeling of prejudice. There were a few of the Saints around here, about twenty in all. In times past they had services and a Sunday school but this part of the field has been neglected because of scarcity of men to meet the demands of the service. However, the Saints were still in the faith but needed to be revived. That has been accomplished.

The first week we were here our attendance was not very large. We were hopeful that we would have better success the next week but the neighbor, a minister of the Methodist Church, had planned that such would not be the results.

We had our tent close to the Congregational church, on a lot that belonged to them. They were kind enough to let us have it. Our headquarters were at the home of Brother and Sister O. D. Smith who lived but a few steps from the tent. Next door to the Smith home was the Methodist parsonage and next the Methodist church—a very good location for our work but rather unusual to be so fortunate.

Sister Smith heard the minister say, "I have them bested." We did not know the meaning until a few days later we learned from different sources that he had made efforts to darken the minds of the people in different sections. Then it was up to us to meet the issue.

The attendance had fallen off considerably. The ladies were afraid that we were going to kidnap them and go to Utah and the men did not want to hear those things that might corrupt their morals, so they stayed away. We had tracts but none that would meet the issue so we secured the services of a duplicating machine and printed some bulletins and made a house-to-house canvass.

The bulletins contained the themes that we intended to discuss at the meetings. The one that headed the list was "The difference between this church and the church in Utah." That was a drawing card and we had a full house. Then other questions followed as the meetings went on. We turned the light on and those subjects drew the largest numbers.

We feel that the bulletins did a great work in reaching the people. I am persuaded that a similar machine should be with every gospel tent and that the follow-up method should be used to keep the people posted on what is going on at the tent. It might be a good idea and do much good to publish sermon notes so that they could see that there were some good things being said at the tent.

We closed our meetings at this place last evening with a full tent. Many were sitting in their autos and would have finished filling the tent had they come in. But they could hear with the curtains up. We leave this place with a very fine feeling. Many have been caused to say, "You helped us very much. We learned things that we never knew before."

We would have continued here another week but the Chautauqua will be here in a few days and it would not be a wise thing to try to compete with that. We feel that we have opened the way for the work to be developed later. Many are interested so much that it would not take much to persuade them to obey the gospel.

The Methodist preacher is going to the mountains of Colorado. He notified the people when he was going, and asked them to pray for him that he might obtain a new vision while he was gone. Brother Bailey and I felt that he had shunned the day of his opportunity. The servants of God were next door. He would not hear them by coming to the tent. But we believe he heard most every sermon. He could not help hearing the preaching unless he would get into his car and leave the town. When Brother Bailey preached he could be heard two or three blocks and since the preacher lived but one half of a block away we are sure he could hear. He was bold enough to come in one night. And at other times he came up and sat around in the dark where he could hear better and not be seen.

We have reached the best people and the most influential people of the town, and the best of his flock and we are very sure that he would not dare to launch a campaign against us.

A Holiness preacher had been attending most of our meetings, and last night he gave us a dollar and said he wanted to help the Lord's work.

We are going with the tent to Hiawatha, Kansas, to try to open the work up at that place. It is about thirty-five miles from here and we will take the outfit there on a truck. I trust that we will meet with as many friends there as we have at this place.

Yours in the gospel bonds,
CENTRALIA, KANSAS. LYMAN W. FIKE.

ENFIELD, MIDDLESEX, ENGLAND, July 29, 1920.

Editors Herald: Once again I renew my subscription for the HERALD, and am grateful to those who have "let their light shine" by contributing to its pages.

The Saints in the London District are looking forward to having President F. M. Smith and Apostle T. W. Williams with them at the coming reunion in August.

During his stay in this land, Bishop R. May has from time to time endeavored to instruct us in the principles of the financial law, and to make clear our duty along these lines.

With the nations in confusion, not knowing the way of escape, we as Saints should give heed to the oft-repeated admonition of the Spirit, "Come up higher."

With a desire to be numbered among those who are pure in heart,

Your sister in the gospel,
C. LILY TATMAN.

SIDNEY, IOWA, August 8, 1920.

Editors Herald: I get my HERALD the following Thursday after its publication, and enjoy reading what the Saints in other places are doing towards spreading the gospel. I lend my HERALDS and Ensigns to my friends to read when I get through with them.

The Tabor Saints are holding together fine and have a good Sunday school and Religio.

The Saints are few in the Thurman Branch, but they are making some effort to hold together.

May God bless the isolated ones,
Your brother in gospel bonds,
M. B. OLIVER.

The Bishopric

Eastern Iowa District: We hereby appoint Brother Milo Burnett, 2404 Farnam Street, Davenport, Iowa, as Bishop's agent of the above district to succeed Brother John Heide.

Brother Heide has served as Bishop's agent of this district for a great number of years, and his work has been very satisfactory.

We are very much pleased that as Brother Heide lays down this work we have as capable a man as we have in Brother Burnett to continue it.

With our slogan this year "A Million Dollars Tithing," it will require vigorous work upon the part of the Bishop's agents, supported by the branch presidents and the Saints everywhere, to meet the increasing financial needs of the Lord's work.

We feel sure that the Eastern Iowa District will try to double during 1920 the tithing paid during 1919. Splendid reports concerning crop conditions are reaching us from various sections, and as God's people are blessed we trust that they will remember the portion that the Lord has required of them.

Yours for a Million Dollars Tithing,
BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE,
Presiding Bishop.

Southern Wisconsin District: Due to the fact that Brother Ed Smith has arranged to take up work in the Presiding Bishop's office in charge of the accounting department, we have arranged with Brother Charles C. Hoague to act as Bishop's agent of the above district.

His familiarity with this work during the period when his father served in this capacity will make him a splendid man to occupy in this position. We have no hesitancy in recommending him to the Saints, and trust that by their splendid cooperation the slogan of the Bishopric, "A Million Dollars Tithing," may be made possible. We need God's help in no matter what activities of life we may be engaged, and we can with faith ask his blessings upon our efforts when we respond to the demands of his law. A tenth of our increase belongs to God, and when it is given cheerfully our hearts are made glad and an increased joy comes to us in the service of the Master.

Brother Hoague will begin his work September 1. After that date branch solicitors and scattered Saints will kindly forward their tithes and offerings to him at Janesville, Wisconsin.

Yours for a Million Dollars Tithing,
BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE,
Presiding Bishopric.

Conference Notices

Southern Ohio, at Wellston, Ohio, September 4 and 5, Sarah E. Batchelder, secretary.

Central Oklahoma, at the Red Rock reunion, August 30, 1920. All are cordially invited to attend and make it one of the most enjoyable times of your life. Pearl Greenwood, secretary.

Two-Day Meetings

At the Slash, Ontario, Manitoulin Island, September 4 and 5. Good speakers expected. Anyone coming on boats will be met at Manitowaning. Come, bring your baskets and the Spirit of the Master. J. L. Mortimer, president, Manitowaning, Ontario, Box 42.

Pastoral Notices

To the Saints of the Southwestern Kansas Unorganized District: I have been appointed Bishop's agent of the southwestern Kansas unorganized territory, and would like to get acquainted with every Latter Day Saint in the district, either by mail or personally. Brother Chrestensen (missionary) will also take your tithing and receipt you, or send it directly to me. Do not hesitate because you haven't as much as you would like, but send what you can and the Lord will bless you.

J. N. WOOTEN.

WICHITA, KANSAS, 857 North Saint Francis.

Reunion Notices

Northeastern Illinois District, at Elmhurst, Illinois, August 27 to September 5. Beautiful grounds, ideal for the purpose for which we have purchased them. Let every Saint make special effort to be present. Apostle Myron A. McConley and Bishop James Keir, together with the district force, will assure us a real speaking force. We have secured a reduction or better rate on tents: 10 by 12, $7; 12 by 14, $9; single cots $1 each; chairs 15 cents each; this includes freight. Elmhurst is located on the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad. Trains leaving Chicago for Elmhurst, a. m., 6.25, 6.50, 7.25, 7.50, 8.16, 9.10, 11.25; p. m., 12.26, 12.54, 1.59, 3.05, 3.31, 3.44, in fact every few minutes. Those coming over the Illinois Central take train to Suburb Hill. Trains leave Randolph Street Station 10.45 a. m. and 5.45 p. m. There is no agent at this place, simply a shed and platform, cannot check baggage to Suburb Hill. There is also a train every few moments over the Aurora and Elgin Electric line. When taking this route, get off at Villa Park; it is one mile north to the grounds and across Salt Creek. Hacks will meet all who send notifications; these are hired hacks and there will be a nominal charge for rides and transfer. The dining hall will be run on the cafeteria plan, and it is our purpose to furnish meals at as low a cost as possible. Everybody come. We are compelled to pay rent in advance on tents; let all who can, send the price of your tent to Ward L. Christy, 6532 South Hermitage Avenue, Chicago. The committee.

Conference Minutes

SOUTHERN SASKATCHEWAN.—At the town of Radville, in Province Theater, July 22 to 25, 1920, with District President Thomas J. Jordan in charge. Missionary J. W. Peterson, Bishops McGuire, Richard Bullard, and A. H. Mills and Otis D'Arcy were the speakers. Doctor M. M. Seymour and his assistant, Nurse Peers, gave four lectures. These people are from the Department of Public Health of the Province of Saskatchewan. Provision was made for the purchase of a moving picture machine in the district. The former officers were reelected. Six children and one adult baptized. J. R. Miller and C. B. Bergersen were recommended for the office of priest. Another year is before us and with added effort on the part of all, there is plenty of room for advancement. Efforts had been made to show some reels and slides, but the slowness of the Dominion censors prevented their use. C. B. Bergersen, secretary, Radville, Saskatchewan.

CENTRAL TEXAS.—Met with the Central Branch, near Hearne, July 24 and 25. District President A. J. Banta, with D. S. Palmer and F. A. Rowe chosen to preside. Reports from 7 elders, 2 priests, 2 teachers, and 4 deacons. Also Sister F. A. Rowe, unordained missionary, gave in a report. There are five branches in the district, all of which reported, showing a membership of 472. A resolution was adopted to purchase a tent, Ford truck, and other equipment for the work of the district. A committee consisting of J. C. Chrestensen, D. A. Fuller, B. F. Spicer, Frank James, Carl Sherrill, Douglas Dotson, and Sheldon Armstrong were appointed to solicit the means.

The present district president stated that he intended to move out of the district. Counsel was sought from Apostle W. M. Aylor before the election of officers, after which the following officers were elected:

J. C. Chrestensen, president; A. J. Banta, vice president; Sheldon Armstrong, secretary-treasurer; Sister F. A. Rowe, chorister; Nettie Tischer, organist; Ida Nicoll, librarian; Sheldon Armstrong was sustained historian, and A. J. Banta was sustained as Bishop's agent. Douglas Dotson was ordained to the office of teacher. The reunion followed the conference. Four were baptized. Brother Sam Dotson had a field of very choice watermelons which he donated to the conference and reunion. It was a continual watermelon feast from the first day of conference to the last day of the reunion. Sheldon Armstrong, clerk.

FLORIDA.—With the Coldwater Saints, Saturday, June 26, W. A. West presiding, E. N. McCall, secretary. Statistical reports: Alaflora 202, Santa Rosa 99, Coldwater 68. Reports from 6 elders and one teacher. Bishop's agent's report: Received $259.59; on hand $62.75. Officers elected: W. A. West, president; A. D. McCall and D. M. Rudd, assistants; E. N. McCall, secretary; W. M. Hawkins, treasurer; A. D. McCall member library board; Bessie Clark sustained chorister. Next conference to be held at the Alaflora church, time left with the district presidency. E. N. McCall, secretary.

NORTHEASTERN MISSOURI.—At Bevier, Missouri, June 12, 10 a. m., William Aylor, F. T. Mussell, and W. B. Richards presiding; W. C. Chapman, clerk. Three elders, one priest, and one deacon reported. Benjamin S. Tanner and V. D. Ruch were ordained elders; F. L. McKane, priest; John Pearson, teacher; and Samuel Perey, deacon. The district presidency and secretary were chosen a committee to purchase a picture machine for the district. F. T. Mussell was sustained as district president, and he chose V. D. Ruch and Benjamin S. Tanner as his associates. William C. Chapman was chosen secretary-treasurer. Adjourned to meet in November, at the call of the district officers. William C. Chapman, secretary.

EASTERN MONTANA.—At Glasgow, July 2, 3, and 4. District President Eli Bronson chosen to preside, with G. W. Thorburn assisting. Reports from 6 elders, 3 priests, and one teacher. Statistical reports from Vida, Fairview, and Glasgow Branches. Bishop's agent's report read and approved. Sunday school and Religio Departments rendered an entertainment with stereopticon slides, by James C. Page. Officers for coming term are: president, Eli Bronson; vice president, James C. Page; treasurer and Bishop's agent, J. W. Vail. Fall conference at Glasgow, date to be set by district officers. Earl Wilcox, district secretary.

Convention Minutes

NORTHERN SASKATCHEWAN.—Sunday school, at Artland Branch, July 9, with district superintendent, A. J. Cornish, associated with J. W. Peterson, in charge. The following schools reported: Blue Bell, Minnesota Prairie, Iowa, Star of Bethlehem, Battleford, Shellbrook, Saskatoon. Officers elected: superintendent, A. J. Cornish; assistant superintendent, E. D. Peidt; secretary, Grace Huggett; treasurer, Avis Hemstock. A musical and literary program was rendered and greatly enjoyed by all those present. A. J. Cornish, superintendent; Grace Huggett, secretary.

FROM THE BRANCHES

Pontiac, Michigan. August 5 the Women's Department had a pie social in the basement of the church and raised $85, which will be applied on the church fund.

Bisbee, Arizona. The priests have become more active in their duty as visiting officers than ever before in the history of this branch. This is a very healthy symptom, and if carried on in the true spirit of the gospel will accomplish much good, and bring reward to those who have been faithful to their office and calling. The Sunday school has enrolled several new members of late, and the attendance at the Religio is increasing. A musical program was offered by the Religio at their meeting of August 8. The Normal class has revived again, so has the Women's Department. A Doctrine and Covenants class on Tuesday nights is among the new activities of the branch, where we are to become acquainted with God's word as contained in the three books.

Manitowaning, Ontario. At the annual two-day meeting held recently our hearts were made glad over the successful preaching of Harvey Sagle, baptized in May, 1919, and called to the office of priest in June of the same year. J. L. Mortimer filled the pulpit afternoon and evening in his usual energetic and forceful manner, making very clear the need of preparation for occupation in Zion. We feel we are on the forward march here. Sister Mortimer spoke once on the study courses put out by the Women's Department.

OUR SLOGAN THIS YEAR
"A MILLION DOLLARS TITHING"

JUMP ON and Help Raise the Million Dollars
 In Unity There Is Strength. Are You With Us?

The scope of our church work is enlarging. New fields are being opened. Missionaries are being sent this year to Switzerland, Germany, Palestine, and Africa.

Increasing demands are being made upon all our church institutions—the Old Folks' and Children's Homes, Sanitarium, Graceland College, and publishing plants.

The growth of the church and its institutions is dependent upon the increase of the spirit of consecration and service among the membership.

The restored gospel must go to every nation, kindred, tongue, and people. May its progress not be hindered by want of material resources.

Yours for "A MILLION DOLLARS TITHING."

BENJAMIN R. McGUIRE.
 Presiding Bishop.

Woman Suffrage Now in Effect

With the recent ratification of the nineteenth constitutional amendment twenty million women of the United States are now given the sacred right of the ballot. The last State of the thirty-six necessary for ratification was Tennessee.

The legislature of Tennessee was called in special session, as was the case in many other States. Its senate ratified it about August 12, but the house did not join in the necessary resolution until August 18, and then by a very close vote.

This represents the result of over seventy years' effort to secure what is only ordinary justice. Women are part of the citizens of the United States, and as such should have the right of personal representation. Wyoming was the first to grant woman suffrage, over fifty years ago. And all other States, even in the West, are of much more recent date in extending this right. Full suffrage has been confined to the western States. The right to vote for presidential electors has been granted by thirteen States beginning in Illinois in 1913.

While full woman suffrage was a moral right, it has not been a legal right until now. When universal male suffrage was proposed, there was the same opposition, even in this country, that there has been to woman suffrage. Prior to that time, property holders were allowed to vote. In England, in earlier times, the vote was not only restricted to property holders, but a property holder could vote in each borough in which he held property. The Reform Bill of 1830 changed this in England, and did away with many of the so-called "pocket" boroughs and "rotten" boroughs. In this country the rule has long been for each man, one vote, and only one vote. Now at last we have true universal suffrage, the only restriction being one of age and citizenship.

The nineteenth amendment is that drafted by Susan B. Anthony in 1878 and has been presented to twenty-two different Congresses, and was finally approved June 4, 1919. It was first proposed as the sixteenth amendment, then seventeenth, then eighteenth, and finally adopted as the nineteenth amendment. It reads as follows:

"Section 1—The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

"Section 2—The Congress shall have power by appropriate legislation to enforce the provisions of this act."

From this it will be seen that the right of suffrage is given not only in Federal elections of the President and Vice President of the United States, United States Senators and Congressmen, but is also extended in every State to every officer elected. The right to vote of any citizen of the United States shall not be abridged in any State because of sex. It is a clear-cut provision.

Fortunately, the decision of the Supreme Court on the fifteenth amendment determines the interpretation of this act and the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on the eighteenth amendment has already settled a question which might otherwise be raised. Congress having provided in ratification by the legislatures of the States, this means the body so elected by the people, and such action is not subject to a referendum in those States whose constitution provides for a referendum on the acts by legislature, as amendment to the Federal Constitution is not governed by a state constitution in any case, but by the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. By decision of the Supreme Court on the fifteenth amendment this nineteenth amendment is self enforcing and does not require legislation by Congress or by any State.

Opposition to woman suffrage has long been strong in the East and in the South. The eastern States have, however, been converted. In the South, that is, the Old South—the southeastern part of the United States—there are several States which have refused to ratify. Still, to that section goes the honor of providing the thirty-sixth State necessary for ratification.

A strong source of opposition has doubtless been opposition to the liquor interest. In fact, the movement for woman suffrage grew out of opposition to the liquor traffic. But all opposition has not been sufficient to prevent the simple justice of this national action.

The responsibility is therefore laid upon the women of the church, as well as the men, to seek earnestly to choose and elect God-fearing men, good men, to carry out justly the work of government.

Lamoni Stake Reunion Closes

The reunion of the Lamoni Stake closed on the evening of the 22d under most favorable circumstances, the entire series of meetings being exceptionally well attended and the matter presented of a high order indeed.

There were one hundred and eighteen tents on the grounds, nine of these being service tents. One tent was maintained for a resting place for mothers, two were equipped for guests visiting the camp, one for administration, one for the presidency's office, and one for the bishopric, with two for meetings and one for a dining tent. One of the large tents was occupied by about sixteen Oriole girls from Hiteman, who gave some excellent first-aid demonstrations, showing much skill and speed in bandaging and resuscitation work of all kinds.

Among the 132 visitors in attendance from 29 districts and stakes outside Lamoni Stake, were Elbert A. Smith and E. F. Robertson, who preached. We mentioned last week that U. W. Greene and wife were in attendance, also F. A. Smith and J. W. Wight, the latter leaving for western Iowa reunions and later to attend at Montrose and Red Rock.

Though the actual number camping on the grounds was not so large as a few years ago, the use of automobiles has become so general that many people drove from considerable distances and attended the meetings, at the same time keeping up with their necessary farm chores. Nearly every service was well attended, and the weather pleasant. There were several good rains but most of them in the night.

The rendition of the Book of Mormon pageant was a great success, it being a gorgeous affair, all in costume, either Nephite or Lamanite, and the lighting and natural background effect indeed effective. Nothing anywhere near as colossal has ever been attempted in the church, and the results were truly inspiring. There must have been three thousand people in attendance, and though rain began falling during the evening and some left, most of them stayed right through and were well repaid for it.

It represented the actual scenes in the Book of Mormon concerning the sons of Alma who were working against the interests of the church but later were converted and went on a mission to the Lamanites, converting a large number. Much of the conversation was taken from the narrative itself.

The words were written and arranged by Estella Wight and Marcella Schenck; Vida E. Smith had charge of the musical part of it, securing compositions for the occasion from a number of people, among whom we recall Mabel Carlile, Elbert A. Smith, Audentia Anderson, and possibly some others. The directing was in charge of Lena Graham, and most of the costuming done by the authors of the play. For convenience in costuming, the Lamanites were arrayed and made up as North American Indians, though it was conceded that the Lamanites of that period and that section likely did not dress the same.

At the urgent request of the Des Moines Register, an attempt was made to secure photographs of the characters, and one flashlight was taken with fair results, but a heavy rain came on just after the close and prevented further efforts along this line.

It has been urged that this be written as a scenario for film production, and we have no doubt that this will be attempted in the future. One of the effective features of this pageant in its present form is the music, it approaching the grand opera in scope but of course it could be made over to express the sentiments in some other way.

The singing of the "Hallelujah chorus" by the entire cast with orchestra accompaniment was a very pleasing finale.

Among the chief characters we might mention C. E. Wight and D. T. Williams of the stake presidency, H. C. Burgess and wife, and Forest Roberts, while it is not possible to mention all who had important though minor parts.

Several afternoons were given over to recreation, and the organized games of volley ball proved very interesting. The tournament developed into a tie between Lamoni and Hiteman, and was played out with Hiteman winning. Then a team of all-stars was picked from all the other teams and played against Hiteman, with Hiteman winning again. They are nearly all coal miners, young and well-muscled, and have practiced a little till they do excellent teamwork as well as individual playing.

A band concert and weinie and marshmallow roast was a feature of one evening and is a popular affair each year with the young people especially.

The excellence of the prayer meetings is taken for granted by those in attendance, a high spiritual plane being attained and some of the gifts being manifested, though not in such large number as in some of the years past. The Saints were exhorted to come up higher, and the priesthood warned that there was no escape from their responsibilities as leaders of the people.

The young people met each morning at 7.45 and had some wonderful meetings, excellently attended.

There were story-hour meetings and sermonets for the children, the following subjects being presented: "Preparation for service to the group," by C. E. Wight; "Love for the group," by J. F. Garver; "Loyalty for the group," by A. M. Carmichael; "Sacrifice for the group," by D. T. Williams.

Sunday school was held for the younger pupils, and two general sessions given the Sunday school and Religio for institute work, one to the Women's Department. Estella M. Roberts, trained nurse from the Sanitarium, had two sessions at the general tent, one for women and the other for the general public.

An excellent series of meetings was held for the girls on five forenoons.

The Camp Cricket was issued three times as a camp newspaper, being mostly in the lighter vein.

Though there is about $3,500 in the building fund for the erection of a permanent pavilion for holding services on the grounds the committee reported that they considered it inadvisable at present to proceed with its erection, largely on account of high prices of building material.

A reunion was provided for next year and the stake presidency, bishopric, and secretary made the committee, they to determine the time and number of days.

J. F. Garver has left for Boise, Idaho, to attend a reunion, Cyril E. Wight for Madison, to attend the Southern Wisconsin reunion, and D. T. Williams for Matherville, Illinois, to attend the Kewanee reunion.

World Conferences

Three conferences were held in Switzerland this month, looking toward a closer affiliation of the various Protestant sects.

The first was a preliminary meeting of a proposed ecumenical conference. An effort was first made in this direction in 1914 and was repeated in 1916, 1917, and twice in 1918 without avail, because of war conditions. This is the first attempt at an ecumenical conference in the history of Protestantism. It does not attempt to deal with matters of faith and order, but rather with the practical aims in the realm of moral or social questions, where all Christians can begin at once to act together. This meeting was held at Geneva, August 9 to 11.

Following immediately after was held the preliminary meeting of the World Conference on Faith and Order. This had its origin in a general convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America in 1910. This preliminary conference will not discuss questions of faith and order, but such will be deferred to the world conference, to be held later, and which will doubtless extend over some months. This preliminary meeting is being held from the 12th to the 20th of August, also in Geneva.

The third conference deals with international friendship. The first of these conferences for this purpose were held last year at the Hague. An attempt was made in 1914 for an international committee on world alliance for international friendship through the churches, but the first attempt was made last year at the Hague to tie the broken threads. It is expected that the meet this year will note additional progress. This meeting was held August 20, at Saint Beatenberg, Switzerland.

The Professional Attitude

H. W. Holmes, dean of the Harvard Graduate School of Education, is reported in the Christian Science Monitor as having spoken before the Harvard Teachers' Association on "What is a good teacher worth?" He presents the ratio between the cost of living and the teacher's salary as common knowledge, yet stated the basic difficulty to be the commodity theory of labor as applied to the school-teachers. We pay only what we have to pay on the grounds that teachers can be secured for so many dollars a year, as if teaching ability were a thing which could be bought and sold in the market without regard to whether they are capable or not.

We must consider quality rather than quantity in education. True education is more than pumping facts and figures into a student. Each has its social value, and the character of the teacher is more important than mere numerical enrollment in the school, or the condition and equipment of school buildings.

We may offer the comment that it is probable that most of the public will consider and judge an educational institution most unfortunately first of all, by its buildings; secondary, by its equipment—its laboratories and libraries; in the third place, by its enrollment; and last of all, if at all, by the quality of its teachers. In a real school, the primary value—the thing most essential—is the teacher, the person who is really capable of true teaching because of character and natural and acquired ability. Of second importance is the body of students. Of only third importance is the equipment. And of least importance is the school building.

Mr. Holmes continues that the mechanical view of teaching is not less satisfactory than the commodity view. The mechanical view implies executives who develop the policy, and hand definite tasks to the teachers. The teachers are not asked to cooperate in working out a course of study; nor are they allowed any great initiative. In fact initiative is not desired. There is no democracy. Education is a scheme imposed from the top. The teachers under it are merely doing piece work; they do certain things in a prescribed way. All that is required is mechanical faithfulness in doing the prescribed task. Such a method, as he points out, is not professional, and can hardly be called even craftsmanship.

To this may be added the comment that the same principle is applied in directing other institutions. Such a system is defective, it is true, in education. But it is also defective in the handling of other state or private institutions, such as orphans' homes, or hospitals. To have an executive body which determines the whole policy, while those having the active charge, the immediate contact are allowed no discretion or initiative, but only carry out assigned tasks, is merely another aspect of shortsighted management.

Returning to Mr. Holmes, he said part of the work of the teacher, in what he calls the professional view, requires both ability and experience, and presupposes democracy in school administration. Labor is demanding democracy in the shops, a share in control. It is far more important that teachers should have a share in the control of the schools. Of course it is even more regrettable that persons not actively engaged in teaching presume to tell teachers what they should do.

We refer to the above because it represents a basic principle. In our schools and elsewhere is there a need for professional attitudes which require ability and which permit discretion as well as initiative. We need the professional attitude in our various departments of work. S. A. B.

All Should Read the Instructions

Just above the Contents of each issue of THE SAINTS' HERALD (at the bottom of next to the last page) are a few lines of type that should be read and observed by all our readers.

Please note the instructions about obituaries, marriage notices, and items for publication in the Miscellaneous Department. Very often we get an urgent notice on Tuesday for insertion in the HERALD of the following Wednesday, but it must be held a week before publication. Since the last form goes to press on Monday each week, our readers will do well to observe the dates.

Address matter for publication to Editors Herald, Lamoni, Iowa, and items of business to Herald Publishing House. If both are inclosed in same envelope, use separate sheets for each.

Living Waters

In the mountain stream many rocks are to be seen, apparently hindering its flow. And in a rapidly flowing river sometimes can be seen an island with indentation at the lower end, like an inverted U, so that while the water on both sides is flowing rapidly forward in its course, in the middle of the river the water is not only apparently, but some of it is actually flowing backward.

Again, with a great flow of water, there will be found upon the river banks quantities of still water. Every experienced person knows that still water, the backwaters, are not fit for drinking, and one must proceed to the flowing river; then there is danger that the backwater is being drained out, and one attempting to secure drinking water below the point where the stagnant water flows in, runs a risk.

One must go above, nearer the source of the stream, where the water flows freely. Sometimes it is necessary to go a mile or more, when camping out, in order to get beyond a stagnant backwater, and secure the living, good water of the river.

That which appears thus visible before our eyes in the waters of nature, is true also of the invisible, living water, of which the Master spoke. We are told that through the celestial city there flows a river of living water. We are told that the water that the Master gives us is as a well of water springing up into everlasting life. (John 4: 14 and 7: 38.) The waters of life flow freely; let whosoever will, come and drink thereof. (Revelation 22.)

But in the church we see the obstacles that are placed sometimes even in the forefront of the stream by those whom we would expect to be in the midst of the current of life, helping the flow of the waters. Then there are those who are quick to rally around and attempt to flow backward against the current.

There is also the backwater of backbiting, and of spite. When we find such, there is only one thing to do—we must go above the place where the backwaters enter in—go nearer the source, that we may receive the living water of life flowing freely.

It is true that the backwaters may be drained back into the river, and that they will be thus in time purified and cleansed; still it is unsafe to drink too near their point of entrance for he who drinks of the backwaters will drink death to his soul, and drinks to his own pollution.

Even the waters in the midst of the river, which attempt to flow upward, against the stream, oft present a stagnant aspect, for it has stirred up the mud of the river bottom. They are not to be compared to the free-flowing waters of the river.

It is before us to choose. We may drink of the living waters of life to the cleansing of our hearts and souls, and the partaking of spiritual life. We may drink from some side pool or even from the backwaters. But there is only one way that strength can be found; only one way can the real, reviving, cleansing water be gained, and that is to drink, from the river of life itself, being open to receive the joy and sense of well-being which comes therefrom. S. A. B.

“To contend that adversity was unnecessary is to question the love, wisdom, and power of the Almighty.”

Conscience tells man that he is a responsible being. Chesterton says of Herbert Spencer: “He rejected dogma and affronted heaven and the angels with his doubts and denials, but there was one hard, arrogant dogma that he never doubted: he never doubted that he was responsible.”—William V. Kelley, in A Pilgrim of the Infinite.

Every Gain Counts

There is considerable discussion in the West concerning the Yellowstone project for irrigation. We have not seen a clear statement of this project, except the territory to be benefited thereby. It is repeatedly stated, however, that it will in no way interfere with the natural beauty of Yellowstone Park, but is intended to dam Yellowstone Lake at its outlet into Yellowstone River.

Having passed through the park we are struck with the fact that a very slight rise of water would inundate parts of the road and the paint pots at the west thumb. Also, that the bridge over the outlet is not very far from the water.

Yet a quick estimate shows that a rise of one foot in the level of the lake will mean a matter of over twenty-seven billion gallons of water, while a rise of two or three feet might be a possibility without affecting any of the natural beauties or interesting features of the park.

There came to mind the resolutions made by the recent conference, and a consideration of the apparently slow progress made by the church. Yet the changes have not seemed very great in the past few months. But we are reminded that a very slight advancement by the whole body will make a considerable total, and there occurs to mind this illustration from Yellowstone Lake.

The Shoshone Dam is three hundred feet high, and only two hundred feet long at the top. It is impressive, yet a very shallow dam at the outlet to Yellowstone Lake would represent an equal volume of water available for irrigation.

It does not appear that we have progressed as much as we should. A more earnest effort should be put forth. But it is not a time for discouragement, for when the whole body moves it represents real progress, and each step made by all represents a substantial gain.

The appeal of the Bishop continues for one million dollars tithing. The value of the dollar has depreciated; the work before the church has multiplied. There are wonderful opportunities before us if only we are ready to take advantage of them.

If the tithing were to be paid by one man, it would be a significant donation, but when it is distributed through the whole membership of the church, the burden upon each one is not great. But even then, some may find a pro rata too heavy, with family and other obligations. But there are many who are able to do much more than their average share and so maintain the general level.

The ideal set before the missionary arm of twenty thousand converts, and each one with his face turned towards Zion seems a large gain, but when distributed on a percentage basis, among the membership of the church, each one to do his duty, it does not appear to be too great.

We are anxious for the spectacular, which appears great, but that of which we stand in need is that quiet surge of many waters—the whole body of Christ moving forward.

S. A. B.

The Witness of God in Nature

"I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills from whence cometh my help. My help cometh from the Lord which made heaven and earth."—Psalm 121:1, 2.

"I cried to the Lord with my voice, and he heard me out of his holy hills."—Psalm 3:4.

"Lord, who shall dwell in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill of Zion? He that walketh uprightly and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart."—Psalm 15:1, 2.

"Who shall stand in the hill of the Lord, or who shall stand in his holy place? He that hath clean hands and a pure heart."—Psalm 24:3, 4.

The above are a few of the passages found in the Psalms, of similar purport, and there are many others throughout the Bible.

There are also several passages in the Bible concerning the idols which were erected upon the high hills, which of course must be cast down.

Now will it be surprising that we find passages to indicate that the Lord is not to be found alone in places. The Jews worshiped in Jerusalem. Their temple was on Mount Moriah. The Samaritans had their own holy mountain, yet Jesus declared that the time would come when they would worship God, neither in Jerusalem or on that mountain, but he who would worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth. (John 4:21-26.)

There is something elevating to the soul in the grandeur of the views among the mountains of the earth; something that makes it a type of eternity.

So also when one stands in the midst of a great plain or desert of which the horizon appears only in the far distance as a straight line the mind turns to the simple, great truths of life. The same is true upon the high sea. There is beauty and inspiration about it; something which makes man feel his own littleness. Passages come to mind like the opening of Genesis, "In the beginning God."

We are sometimes asked the meaning of that verse in the 121st Psalm, "I will lift up mine eyes to the hills from whence cometh my help." But the Psalmist himself answers, that his help will come from the Lord, and can only come from him.

Science has much to tell us concerning the mountains and the theory of how the great ravines have been cut by a river through many millenniums, if not millions of years. The sense of worship is not for this material symbol, but rather for the Eternal One who made the heavens and the earth.

A beautiful poem is inspiring. A fine piece of music lifts up the soul. The printed word in poetry and in prose also helps us to remove our thoughts from the sordid things of life to that which is finer and higher. So also does the wonderful picture of nature in the majesty of the mountains and of the sea, and in the beauty of growing trees, and grass, and the flowers that lift up their heads to the light.

Yet great as is the majesty of the everlasting hills, they are less than the mystery and wonder of human affection; and they sink into insignificance and pass away before the grandeur of the concept of God.

As there are those who dwell in the presence of the wonders of nature, and fail utterly to appreciate the beauty, so there are those who in the midst of the witness of God in nature, and even in his holy temple permit their thoughts and attention to be wholly absorbed with the trivial, if not with the frivolous, passing things of earth. Having eyes, they see not; having ears, they hear not.

When he comes a highway is cast up in the midst of the great deep for his people. When he comes the everlasting hills fall down at his presence. When he comes and reigns the earth cleanses herself and puts on her beautiful garments.

It is sad to see those who are in the presence of the beauties of nature still remain blind. But it is far more sad to see one who is spiritually blind in the presence of the works of God; whose eyes cannot perceive the glory of his coming.

S. A. B.

The human soul seems to me in some way—I cannot say just how—identified with God; and there comes in the value of prayer. Prayer is like opening a sluice between the great ocean and our little channels.—Tennyson.

Christian Education: Its Relation to Modern World Life

BY WARDELL CHRISTY

Second of a series by this author on a lecture by Robert McWatty Russell on "Church education."

Under this heading Doctor Russell makes a flat claim of infallibility for the Bible. He says: "Christian education also presses the conviction that the Bible is the product of divine revelation, and that in it we have an infallible textbook for the religious life."

With this we are and are not in agreement. We believe that "man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God," and that, as soon as we are assured God has spoken it becomes our duty not only to believe but to accept the word of God as final and make it the basis of our activities, the rule for our religious conduct and education. While we accept without reservation the word of God so far as it is contained in the Bible, we are not ready to concede that the Bible contains the first and last word that "a self-revealing God" has ever spoken, but we believe that he not only was but is "a self-revealing God."

But, lest I make this article so extended as to prohibit it because of space, I shall endeavor to give as nearly as possible the balance of his address, hoping that my readers will be able to analyze and dissect it to their good and to the awakening of a realization of the import and necessity of our own educational institutions, and a realization of the importance of the development of more spiritually minded men and women, charged with the true Christian spirit, who shall occupy as teachers to educate our young people to the highest degree of intellectual and spiritual development possible to man. Every day brings me deep conviction that the first duty of the ministry of Christ is to "study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."

Do we want an educated ministry? My answer is, How can we get along without them? We had as well try to live in Christ and not know Christ. True teachers are not masters, but helpers; they are not to make religion, but to show it. That is what we want of our ministers. We do not ask of our preachers an eloquent oration—two or more orations a day, fifty days in the year. We want our minister to have a well-defined theology; but we want him to use his scholarship, not to recite it. When my arm is broken, I want a surgeon who is familiar with anatomy; but I want him to set my arm, not to give me a lecture on anatomy. In the words of another, "We want no quacks in either the pulpit or the sick room. But we want in both some one who is more than either a savant or a lecturer. We want a life-giver."

The Christian Use of Reason

Under this heading Doctor Russell says:

"It can also be justly claimed by the advocates of Christian education that a Christian use of reason in the physical realm guards the youthful mind against the assaults of unbelief and prepares for the acceptance of the fundamental doctrines of the gospel. It is a scientific principle that life cannot be produced without the touch of preexisting life, and that no form of matter can climb from a lower kingdom to a higher without the invitation from above.

"This is illustrated by the fact that the materials of the soil remain in the mineral kingdom until invited by the life of the seed to the vegetable kingdom above. That which is vegetable ascends to the animal kingdom through the touch of animal life in mastication and digestion. The forces of animal life remain such until the flesh of the market place becomes the food of our table, and then those forces that produce the squeal of the pig and the bellow of the ox become sublimated to produce the high notes of the prima donna or the basso profundo of the concert soloist.

"Since this is so in the realm of nature, why should we be surprised to learn that in the realm of grace we must be 'born again' before entering the kingdom of heaven, and that there is a kingdom of God and goodness, in which the soul can come only as it is born from above?"

Conformity to Type

"A proper recognition of the natural law that like produces like, and a proper discernment of the place of heredity in human development, prepares for the easy acceptance of the Bible doctrine that a fallen Adam would beget children in his own image, and that a lost race, to have redemption, must become connected with a second Adam through a faith that overcomes the power of heredity, and an imparted power which secures conformity to a divine type."

Revelation by Limitation.

"A clear discernment that in the study of time and space and electric energy, that which is infinite can be apprehended only in terms of limitation, will secure a mental hospitality for the great fact of the gospel that the infinite God revealed himself through limitation, and that Jesus Christ was God expressed in terms of humanity. To illustrate: we cannot apprehend space in its infinitude, but we must first think of extension between our hands and then that which stretches between the walls of the room or in wider circles until the mind sweeps out to the orbit of Neptune and the circle of the stars. All thought of infinite space is, however, in terms of limitation. . . . The student who understands these facts of the natural world in their parallel relations with the thought of the spiritual will, in reverence, realize that God to manifest himself must resort to the method of limitation; that in the human life of Jesus, lived nineteen centuries ago, there was the manifestation of the divine perfection, the flashing before humanity of the very light and life of God; and that God must have forever remained an unknown God unless subjecting himself to limitation, and in Jesus Christ shining forth indeed as the light of the world. In truth, men are never hindered from accepting the gospel of Christ because it is contrary to reason, but by failure to recognize that the movements of God in revelation meet the highest demands of reason."

The Christian Teacher

"Because of all this, there should be an insistent demand, by those who control our educational activities, for the Christian teacher. Christian character in the teacher is a prime necessity. Teachers create atmosphere, and atmosphere is an essential of spiritual health. A teacher with an unbelieving or flippant attitude toward Christian truth can vitiate the atmosphere of a university. Leadership by such instructors constitutes the tragedy of education in many of our leading universities."

If the assertions of Doctor Russell as stated above are true, and my research has largely substantiated these statements, it is easy to comprehend why the Lord instructed an institution of learning to be established in the church, and these conditions make it imperative that every loyal Latter Day Saint should support, boost, and encourage our own institutions, that the young people of the church may receive as much as possible of their education in an atmosphere that produces spiritual health. But to return to Doctor Russell:

"Somewhat recently, a professor of philosophy in a prominent eastern university closed his course of lectures with the following words: 'It must be apparent to you that the course of lectures to which you have been listening has in some sense been destructive, in that it has dealt with some of the beliefs that you have deemed important and basal and has shown that they are not. This, however, is the resultant conviction of my years of thinking that we are probably in a universe governed by spirit rather than by blind material force, and that we have a little more than a fighting chance for our belief in God and immortality. But to declare that these things are certain is foolish, for they are not; and to teach little children that these things are certain, is wrong, for, when they grow older and find out differently, it may affect their morality.

"Anyway, we are in this world to clean up as much of it as possible, and it does not behoove us to think much about immortality or God. Most of the supporters of our great universities agree with the Davidic sentiment, 'The fool has said in his heart, There is no God'; but they should go farther and say that neither the fool, nor the near-fool, who is without convictions concerning God and immortality, shall display his vacuity in the classroom of institutions supported largely by Christian contributions. Even a modern teacher of philosophy should be sufficiently informed in history to know that Jesus Christ has lived and taught in this world, and he should have sufficient reasoning capacity to conclude that he who spake with absolute perfection concerning all the ethical relations of humanity could not have been blindly mistaken in all his estimates of his own nature and his transcendental relations to the infinite.

"True teaching has to do with the facts of life, and the greatest and most important fact with which human thought can deal is 'the fact of Christ.'"

The Bible in the Home

"Consistent effort for the advancement of Christian education should have very definite aims; the return of the Bible to its place of importance in the home should be sought. Our colonial fathers read the Bible morning and evening in family worship. Burns, in his Cotter's Saturday Night, declares the importance of family religion when he said:

"From homes like these, fair Scotia's grandeur springs,
That makes her loved at home, revered abroad."

"The Christian character which we crave for youth secures its true foundation through the use of the Bible in the home."

The Bible in Public Schools

"The Bible should have its old place in our public schools. In the beginning of our national life, it seemed assumed that ours was a Christian nation, and most of the States provided for the reading of the Bible and prayer before the students of public institutions. In later years, there has developed much effort to exclude the Bible from the public schools.

"The supreme court of Wisconsin has decided that the Bible as a whole is a sectarian book and may not be used in the schoolroom, although portions of it are not sectarian and may be read with profit. The supreme court of Illinois has declared the Bible sectarian without making any such exception. Attorney generals have decided its use illegal in California, Missouri, Minnesota, and Washington. State school superintendents have rendered similar decisions in Arizona, Montana, and New York. The method of reasoning in such decisions is absolutely illogical, and applied in another direction would include Lake Michigan in the present prohibition movement on the ground that water is a basal element in all intoxicating beverages. Bible truth may be a part of all sectarian creeds, but the Bible is not sectarian. It is high time for Christian voters to make Christian character and logical consistency qualifications in candidates supported for state and national offices."

The Bible in the Colleges and Universities

"Chairs of Bible should be established in all our colleges and universities. The movement is already strong for this in our church colleges, but university life is not complete without at least the elective opportunity of studying that Book whose truth is the fountainhead of our civilization, and whose legislation is the source of the major part of our laws."

The Bible in Theological Seminaries

"The study of the English Bible should have a larger place in the curricula of our theological seminaries. Too often the method of study is merely critical, and the student comes out with more knowledge of the oppositions of destructive critics to the Bible than of the Bible itself.

"In many cases so much place is given to the study of historic and comparative theology that the student is left without knowledge of true Biblical theology, and is, therefore, without preparation to give a real message to his future congregation. Religious thought should always be Christocentric, while the curricula of theological seminaries should always be Bibliocentric. Too much time is spent with matters almost totally unrelated to the future work of the ministry, while in many cases what is called modern critical scholarship undermines faith in the Bible as the authoritative revelation of God. . . . A radical reform is needed in the teaching methods of our theological seminaries, if we are to have a gospel ministry which shall speak with power.

"Will you not please think this over, and especially if there are those who feel to criticize the church's efforts to provide opportunity for the ministry and Christian workers of the church to gain a knowledge and preparation so needful to successful proselyting under an environment and in an atmosphere pregnant with the love of God and respect for his revealed word?"

Desirable Results

"Some very desirable results will be secured by a new emphasis on Christian education. A spirit of sobriety will be brought to the youth of our age. The pleasure-loving spirit of our time will be challenged with the voices of eternity. With the Bible restored to its place in the home, our Josephs will learn to meet temptations with the shield of God's conscious presence, while our Daniels in college and university environment, where incense of tobacco is ever burned to a deified appetite, may purpose in their hearts not to defile themselves. A holy discontent will also be awakened at the industrial and social conditions of world life.

"Already we have a murderous discontent that would seek redress of wrongs in all forms of riot and destruction. This should be supplanted by a sober recognition of world ills. It is to the discredit of our civilization that, notwithstanding the fact that God furnishes unmeasured wealth in the mountains and in the seas, and sends bounteous harvests to hillside and plains, millions are in want because human selfishness forbids the proper distribution of divine mercies. With the products of mechanical ingenuity, multiplied in laborsaving machinery, we find life each year becoming more strenuous, and the problem of how to make both a living and a life more complicated. We have great national and state scandals of graft and in most cases not sufficient moral power to bring criminals to justice. With God furnishing every means of comfort, the nation continues to have periods of writhing in want and misery, fear and mistrust. Christian education would produce a holy discontent with such conditions.

"The above is a truism scarcely to be denied by any save students of present world life. We with the greater possibilities and the greater life in Christ should be bringing to the world's struggle the higher type of Christian education. From men like Doctor Hillis comes the plea, 'The greatest need of America to-day is ministers, teachers, and parents who will teach children that God is more than gold. They should be taught that wealth is an obligation to poverty and that from those who have received much, much will be required.' If this republic is to continue to prosper, once again we must produce that splendid type of manhood that can hold back our people from trampled cornfields and bloody streets, not only with prosperity, but with peace."

Christian Remedies for Modern Wrongs

"It should go farther and inquire into their causes and seek adequate remedy. It is folly to talk of overproduction as the occasion of glutted markets when there are thousands of people yearning for the things produced, yet without the purchase money for their securing. Meditation upon the life and Spirit of Jesus in the matter of furnishing bread to the hungry will bring some lesson for our economic life.

"Jesus was the incarnation of that power which still takes the seed of the husbandman and multiplies it into the laughing harvests. His method of meeting human need and his spirit of philanthropy should guide modern thought. He provided for an orderly arrangement of the needy groups of humanity. He asked that those nearest to him in power and efficiency should distribute the blessings that fell from his hands. There would doubtless have been a vacancy in the ranks of the disciples had Judas and some companion striven to conceal a third of his provision in cold storage so as to wait for the increased pressure of need with the festival throngs. In the presence of Jesus, the great motive of distributing effort was not the profit of the twelve baskets that came at the end of the service, but the joy of working with Jesus for human needs. Humanity needs regeneration by the Holy Spirit to change its methods of selfishness into those of philanthropy.

"It is not fitting that human ambition should find its initial expression in the amassing of great fortunes regardless of the general condition of mankind, and its subsequent expression in the endowment of universities for the rich and soup houses for the poor. Christian education should lead to a form of life in which those with vast administrative power shall from the very beginning consecrate themselves to the duties and privileges of public life, and the making of our politics the application of moral law to public affairs."

Modern Religious Apostasy

"The effort for Christian education will do something towards stemming the tide of religious apostasy which is so marked in our day, manifesting itself both in world life and the thought of the churches. Five distinct marks of a modern apostasy stand out in world thought."

Reason for Revelation

"There is first the substitution of human reason for divine revelation. Time was when the quoting of a scripture verse meant the settlement of controversy, but to-day almost any tyro feels that his opinion may be superior to the knowledge of Paul, or even to that of Jesus himself. It is quite true we should be thoughtful, and the experience of Christian faith does not involve the laying aside of our reasoning powers, but we shall find it quite sufficiently taxed to understand the words of revelation, rather than in effort to refute them."

Attainment for Obtainment

"A second tendency is the substitution of attainment for obtainment. The Bible makes it plain that lost humanity needs salvation—that salvation is the gift of God and not merely the result of human effort toward an ideal. 'Educate! Educate!' is the cry of the modern world, without any emphasis upon the need of the absolute regeneration of man's fallen nature. 'To inoculate our youth with the Spirit of Christ,' is one description of the modern ideal in apparent forgetfulness that humanity is too far along to be saved by vaccination on the outside, but needs the spirit of life within."

Political Philosophy for Bible Prophecy

"The substitution of political philosophy for Bible prophecy, in viewing the future, is a third mark of modern apostasy. Five years ago the eloquent sirens of our Chautauqua platforms were assuring the world of abiding peace because of extensive armaments and a general spread of culture in human life. The world peace conference at Constance was interrupted ere it began by the boom of cannon in the world's greatest war. To-day the same teachers blandly assure us that endless peace is now at hand, absolutely ignoring the Bible teaching that God cannot make sin happy; that for the present age 'wars, desolations are determined,' and that down the centuries there rings the divine prophecy, 'I will overturn, overturn, overturn, until he comes, whose right it is.' A reading of Bible prophecy will remove all illusions as to an immediate world peace."

Social Reform for Individual Regeneration

"The substitution of the social by-products of Christianity for the main product of individual conversion, is a marked feature of modern church policy. It is now claimed that the main effort of the church should center on the thought of better homes, better industrial conditions, better roads, i. e., the bettering of the conditions of the natural man, rather than individual conversion and the building up of a true social order through the securing of regenerated units. . . ."

Human Advancement for Divine Advent

"The fifth mark of apostasy is the centering of human hope upon the advancement of the sons of men, rather than upon the advent of the Son of Man. It is boldly proclaimed in Christian pulpits that the advancement of the sons of men is the advent of the Son of Man, and that man is to lay aside his anxiety as to the world events because of human efficiency. One preacher lately said, 'Let not your hearts be troubled; ye believe in God believe also in men; for there has never yet arisen a crisis with which man has not been able to cope.' Everywhere we find what one has termed 'The silliest version of Christianity,' that mankind is advancing toward perfection by some process of evolution, or development of resident forces apart from what may be the movements of God in the heavenly sphere, and so that preaching is popular which magnifies the powers and possibilities of man, and makes scant references to the potency and promises of God."

And so you have it. Between all this and the plain teachings of God's word, men must take their choice. May we be directed to choose wisely.

BY A. B. PHILLIPS

The difficulties met in the attempt to identify the Book of Mormon names with those retained in American tribes at the time Columbus came to this continent are not difficult of explanation. The book was completed about one thousand five hundred years ago, since which time the people became divided into hundreds of separate nations and tribes. These tribes quite naturally developed changes in dialect, some of which were very different from the others, making it less easy to recognize even some of the principal words that were retained from the parent stock language. This is illustrated by the changes known to have taken place in our own language as well as in that of other nations. For instance, Jerusalem, which in the Hebrew is spelled Yerushalayim, is found on the Tel el-Amarna tablets to have been originally Urusalim, and on the Assyrian inscriptions is Urusalimmu. (See New International Encyclopedia, 2d ed., vol. 12, p. 645.) The exceptional character of the word is of some assistance in identifying it in these different forms but is not sufficient. Without our modern dictionary few of us would know that good is from the Anglo-Saxon god, that cow was once cu, that English was Englisc, that Welsh was Waelisc, and that many English words of even the 17th century can scarcely be recognized to-day.

In order to overcome the difficulty of the many dialects used by the aboriginal Americans, and because the Spanish or Portuguese could not be forced upon them, certain native languages were selected from among those in use and were taught in mission schools. In this way the Tupi-Guarani language soon displaced many that hitherto had prevailed. Stanford's Compendium of Geography, volume 1, by A. H. Keane, F. R. G. S., says of this: "Thus it has come about that the dialect of an obscure coast tribe, slightly modified and reduced to written form by European missionaries, has become widely diffused throughout Brazil, Paraguay, Corrientes, and some other parts of Argentina."—Page 38.

It should be observed that when one of these languages was taught in the mission schools thus established by the Jesuits, it was "slightly modified and reduced to written form."

Changes in Orthoepy and Orthography

The modifications and forms of the words reduced to writing by the missionaries who labored among the American tribes were no doubt mostly such as conformed to the Spanish or Portuguese method of spelling and pronunciation, so far as it suited the ideals of the missionary who performed that work. But that these ideas were by no means uniform is proven from the fact that some of these words were spelled in quite a variety of ways. Even had a particular spelling been correct, the pronunciation doubtless varied somewhat according to the difference in usage, and this very likely accounts for at least some of the differences in the way certain words were spelled. The exact orthoepy of the Book of Mormon names, with respect to those unlike the English, is not always certain. Considering the probability that certain words found in the Book of Mormon, as used fifteen hundred years ago, may have been pronounced in a slightly different manner by native Americans of three hundred or more years ago, and that the spelling has been changed accordingly, we find a considerable list of names in use at and following the Spanish conquest that strikingly compare with names given in the Book of Mormon.

The following list does not contain all that could be included, though possibly some that are given might, in the judgment of various readers, have been omitted. It seems not improbable that certain names more or less dissimilar in orthography, however, may have been derived from a common source, and they are therefore included in such cases. Some of these names have from two to six or more spellings given, and are in some instances noted hereafter. In certain cases names are of tribes and in other cases refer to localities, and occasionally refer to both. The same or nearly the same name sometimes is located in several very different localities. A possible explanation of this is the fact that places were usually named from the ones who first possessed them, and the people of that jurisdiction were commonly known by that name. When these people were scattered, as happened in many instances, the name would become known and established in more than one locality. In other words, by the scattering of a city or tribe the name would also be scattered.

For convenience the Book of Mormon names are given above those of the authors quoted, thus being readily compared. Following the names of authors are the names listed, and in parenthesis the page is given on which the name appears. Unless otherwise noted, volume 1 of the work referred to is meant, other volumes being indicated by a figure following the page given. The letter (N) following a name indicates that reference is made in the body of this article. Influences That Make One Useful

BY JAMES E. BISHOP

The author portrays the lives of great men and then summarizes the influences which helped to make them great.

Interest in formative influences is a test of intelligence. Such was the chief interest of Jesus. Men's destiny is determined by their reaction to the powers of uplift that operate in the social and spiritual realm. Both realms of influence are essential, and all are affected by influences that originate in both realms. Some years ago The Forum published eight articles on the subject of formative influences, written by people who had made a success of life. Mr. Yoder has made a study of the boyhood of great men. It is the purpose of this writing to give a review of the eight articles and also Mr. Yoder's study.

These subjects ought to be of keen interest to a people who believe in a community of interests and equality of opportunity. It is evident that in a perfect society the group must be in absolute control of social forces that make for progress and that each individual as he comes to self-consciousness must acquire intelligence from his group that will enable him to adjust self to progressiveness, or the unfoldment of his natural powers.

Boyhood of Great Men

The first contributor to the subject of "Formative influences" is E. E. Hale. His father and mother detested indolence and idleness. His occupation he counts as a formative influence and also that his father and mother loved an outdoor life. Mention is made of the give and take of life that he learned at school and a liberal share of disagreeable duties. Working in a printer's shop and writing for publication gave him the power to use language with facility and of thinking of what to say before saying it. Intercourse with men of intelligence is valued as formative. As a child he was taught that he was God's child and that in him he lived, moved, and had his being. Consequently he was never troubled with religious battles.

Frederick Harrison says that his childhood was passed in the great epoch of progress that followed the break-up of absolutism in Europe after 1830. He was educated in King's College, London. He felt that socialism was the solution of the great class question, although in politics he was a republican. He spent six years as student and tutor at Oxford, visited France annually and also visited the cities of Northern Italy and Germany. "Our teachers succeeded in instilling into our minds a zeal for work and a passion for self-improvement." At no time in his life did he lose faith in a supreme being and the immortality of the soul and in spiritual life. His fondness of concrete experience over against book learning is emphasized, especially in the realm of political economy. Notwithstanding the many changes that developed during the life of the author, human life has remained essentially the same.

Edward Eggleston's childhood was spent in Vevay, a beautiful town on the banks of the Ohio River in the State of Indiana. The beauty of the country developed in him the poetic attitude. He was born into an intellectual atmosphere. He was taught to do disagreeable things. He was brought into contact with a well-trained cousin who guided his reading. He also had experience with typesetting. The author won a prize in a literary competition at the age of fifteen, which gave great stimulus for further work in that direction. His great desire to become intellectual, and his respect for the Methodist religion are esteemed as formative influences. His visit to Virginia and the witnessing of slave life caused him to be an abolitionist. His experience in Minnesota and other parts of the West brought him health. Finally he says: "My whole life is but the interpretation of the oracles of my childhood."

F. W. Farrar was blessed with a good mother whose saintly influence impressed him with the importance of a Christian life. He attended the King William College on the Isle of Man, and while there the sight of the sea and mountains gave him the sense of the greatness of nature and led him to contemplate and reverence the God of nature. He was three years at King's College, London. While there he heard the most famous preachers of the time, and the sermons heard had a formative influence. The author mentions social intercourse with such men as, Lord Macaulay, Charles Darwin, Thackeray, Carlyle, the late Lord Lytton, Sir Arthur Helps, Archbishops Tait, Trent and Bishops Frazer and Lightfoot, Doctor Lightfoot, etc. . . . He mentions such poets as Milton and Coleridge whom he read when a boy and attributes to them a profound influence over his life and opinions.

Timothy Dwight's occupation was that of a teacher and preacher. When he was young his parents used to talk to him about becoming a preacher. The customs of the times caused colleges to consider three professions only, namely, law, medicine, and the ministry, and the author chose the latter. He regarded his mother as the minister and the interpreter of God's kindness. He appreciates his early graduation and postgraduate work under President Woolsey and other studies under Doctor Nathaniel Taylor. During the latter part of his student life he had opportunity to teach, which opened up his future work to teaching and preaching. He also received some training in Germany which helped him to further insight in teaching and college administration.

Martha Lamb was born into a well-ordered family where education, religion, and political affairs were common subjects of conversation. In such conversation she was encouraged to take part. The author loved to go to school and had a special liking for mathematics and composition. In this she was encouraged by her teachers. She was acquainted with the best authors in the English language and also studied Scotch and English history. The discipline caused by work and the union of many formative influences brought about results in her life.

Simon Newcomb was born in Nova Scotia. His father was a school-teacher and in his early life he breathed an intellectual atmosphere. His mother awakened his love of truth telling. Early in life he read books on natural philosophy, algebra, and Euclid. Occasionally he was encouraged by the preacher for his love of learning, but by the farming population he thought he was held in contempt. He wrote an article for The National Intelligencer, which brought some commendation. After this he met Professor Joseph Henry who encouraged and promoted his advancement. Opportunity came to Mr. Newcomb to move to Cambridge and this gave him the privilege to further his studies at Harvard and commune with men like Agassiz, Pierce, and Gould. "What you learn, that shall you know; what you make yourself, that shall you be; what you earn, that shall you enjoy; what you are fit for, that shall you do."

Mr. Gildersleeve had good parents. His father was a controversialist in religious matters and was his tutor up to the age of thirteen. He read the Bible through by the age of five; also learned Latin and Greek at a tender age. In England he read everything he could lay his hands on and was helped by his uncle in studying Shakespeare and the Waverly novels. He developed a love for composition. All that came into his after life lay implicit in his childhood days. Mr. Gildersleeve studied at Jefferson College and Princeton. His chief study was literature and he considers Carlyle and Goethe as leaders in that field. He spent three years abroad studying most of the time in Germany and to the educational institutions of that country he is indebted for everything professionally in the way of apparatus and method. Subsequently he was engaged in the University of Virginia and afterwards participated in the Civil War. He then occupied at Johns Hopkins University. In this position he had opportunity for the production of literary matters.

Summary of Influences

A review of Mr. Yoder's study is as follows: The modern school is adapted for the average child, therefore the dullard and the exceptionally bright suffer.

The average age of the parents (39 fathers and 25 mothers) of the great man child is about 37 years for the father and about 29 for the mother. The list covers two hundred years of time, several countries, and at least fifteen occupations. Fifty men are included in the study. Galton's study and the other authors show that the child born in the prime of physical life of parents has the better chance of greatness. The beauty of the parents, especially the mother, is noted as a physical basis for genius. The average number of children in the family of great men is six, which does not include half-brothers or sisters. The average time between the birth between the great man child and the previous child in twenty-six cases is a little over 22 months and 33 cases a little over 25 months.

By birth eleven are only sons and sixteen are youngest sons. Here again the results agree with Galton who finds that the elder son becomes great twice as often as the younger. As reasons for the development of the elder son, early responsibility; companionship of the parents; independent means for following the occupation most desirable are given.

While poor health seems to have been the lot of many great men in their childhood, others enjoyed good health and it cannot be said that poor health or weakness of body is a factor in mental greatness.

The stature of great men varies; some were tall, some were medium—the tall predominate.

All the men in the author's list were fond of play. In a few cases, as Tolstoy, Alfieri, and Shelley, there has been morbidity, but the idea that great men as children have been weakly, sickly, and inactive physically, is erroneous.

The early surroundings of most great men have been advantageous to them. Some were born in cities, others in the country, but all had natural advantages of environment, of education, and personal contact.

The greater number of the list felt the stimulus of poverty. "When the oil of wealth is poured on the flames of youth, there will little more be left of the phoenix than the ashes; only a Goethe has the power to keep his phoenix wings unsinged in the sun of prosperity."

Great men have strong and wonderful memories in their lines of interest. The power of memory and imagination in their boyhood is above the average. They also have a love of dramatic art. The use of picture and rhythm has remarkable effect on childhood. Ruskin was tremendously affected by rhythm that he was taught in childhood.

A too early awakening of self is as bad as ignorance of one's power in maturity. Great men have loved solitude. There is some exception to the notion that all great men have felt the pedagogic influence of mother; though most of them have been influenced by mothers, sisters, and aunts.

Home, Religion, and Education

These studies bring clearly before us the profound influences of home, religion, and education.

Home is a divine institution and is the foundation of society. Without the monogamic form of marriage, home would be impossible and John Howard Payne would never have secured the inspiration to write the wonderful lines of "Home, sweet home." Those who have made the experiment of home building with the polygamous form of marriage have testified that it is anything but sweet.

Jesus told the people, when questioned on the subject of divorce, that divorce was allowed by Moses because of the hardness of their hearts and that it was not so from the beginning, but that monogamy was instituted by God and that the marriage contract was evidently for life. Divorce and any form of marriage other than monogamy are evils that undermine home life and thus destroy social life at its very roots. Sociologists teach that monogamy was the primitive form of marriage and is the only form of marriage that can secure social progress. (Sociology and Modern Social Problems, Ellwood.)

Religion is the profoundest influence that has ever touched the lives of men. It is universal in its sway, and faith in the unseen and the all-powerful are the springs of its activity in the human heart. When the cognitive processes are not smothered by the feelings and the expressive processes are thus given opportunity to function normally we are then in a position to react definitely to the message of Jesus Christ. Of the tripartite division of mind the cognitive processes are as essential and must receive equal development with the feelings and will in order that the individual may react definitely to the gospel of Christ.

Education as skill in the manipulation of mental processes in adjustment of the ego to his environment is vitally essential. Education may be thought of as formal and informal. Its formal aspects are the schools provided for childhood and the adolescent. Certain professions that are trained for in the school never cease learning.

The informal aspects of education are wide reading and association with people of culture. Each one of the individuals referred to in the above study had the advantage of the influence of men of culture. The gathering together of men who are engaged in the same lines of activity for educational purposes is a universal custom.

Home, religious, and educational influences are essential to the development of life to its higher levels and a Zion without these would be impossible. But these are fully provided for in the revelations of God.

It Is Up to You!

BY T. W. WILLIAMS

Photoplay, the world's leading moving picture magazine, in a leading editorial entitled, "It's up to you," remarks:

"There is a great deal of cheap, tawdry, and worthless material going the rounds of the country's twenty thousand theaters, stories that are false in sentiment, untrue to life, equivocating in their handling of the great world issues, misleading in their pretense of mirroring reality."

We can heartily indorse this statement. But what is the remedy? When the editor of a magazine which depends almost entirely for support upon movie enthusiasts pleads thus for higher ideals on the part of movie patrons, it points its own moral. It is a case of the king's fool depicting the perfidy of the crown.

Within the church we hear much these days about worldliness and worldly pleasure. The ages decry the moral lesions and social infractions of youth. The younger look knowingly on the foibles and senility of age. The gulf between the old and the new is almost, if not altogether impassible.

We are passing through one of those abrupt changes known as revolutions; at such a time the past ends and the future begins. Revolution is the culmination of many evolutions. Age never becomes reconciled to revolution.

It is useless to attempt to mold youth in the grooves of age. The youth of to-day are not following old paths. They are blazing new trails. What our fathers said or did is of little moment. This we may deplore. We must reckon with it just the same. It is a condition and not a theory.

It is folly to bury our heads in antiquity and not be able to read the signs of the times. Age is reminiscent. It trails back. The golden days of yesterday are enshrined. Morals are static. Religion is a fixed star. Time works at no ancestral shrine. It has a mind of its own. Morals and time and place act and react. Religion is a growth.

From the days when Adam in self-justification said, "The woman thou gavest me, she gave me and I did eat," into the present, the human tendency has been to shift responsibility. Let me put this question of amusements squarely up to you.

Are you a movie enthusiast? Do you frequent the movies? Then read the following comment by the editor of Photoplay, and give answer. Speaking of these stories, scenarios, that are "false in sentiment and untrue to life," the editor says:

"And of course you deplore that . . . naturally you want to know who is really to blame. We are here to tell you. You are to blame.

"The ultimate responsibility is yours. You can't lay it on the charlatan producer, the pin-brained director, the wrong-minded author, the greedy exhibitor.

"Fundamentally, you are just as responsible for what is unworthy on the screen as you are praiseworthy for the screen's best. Because the whole of screen-craft, from the mightiest manufacturing organization to the youngest player, toil merely to give you what you want.

"Motion pictures are the mightiest artistic endeavor of the twentieth century, but they are also, and always, a business; but even the men who make these low and endeavor to force their execution recognize the existence of one mightier regulation, upon which all business is based: the law of supply and demand.

"If you insist upon having only strong, honest, self-reliant American manhood and womanhood in your celluloid narratives, you can have these, but don't vocally insist and in the same night on the same street give a financial demonstration that you didn't mean anything you said. Discriminate, select, restrain that purposeless desire merely to pass the time in any form of optical entertainment.

"What you money says, goes. No censorship, no editorial thunder, no legislative pronouncement can compare to the oratory of the lady on the silver quarter.

"Don't blame anyone else for unworthy pictures. It's up to you."

"Many a man never does anything worth while because he thinks it isn't worth while."

All that is great in man comes through work, and civilization is its product.—Smiles.

The London Daily Mail says that a thousand people were carried by airplanes from England to Paris, Brussels, and Amsterdam in seven weeks not long ago. Strap-hanging is already an accepted method of travel on the air routes. As many as twenty passengers are carried on one trip.

Kansas is one of the few States that has a textbook for voters. It contains detailed information on duties of citizenship, etc., even to the details of casting a ballot. Altogether it is a most useful book, and it is likely that the State will take it over and use it for its high schools.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

THE PROBLEM OF PROPERTY AND EQUALITY

"Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own?"
—Matthew 20:15.

These words form part of the story of the laborers in the vineyard. At first sight it would seem as if the householder were claiming that he was free from all responsibility. "Have I not a right to do what I will?" But a more careful study of the parable will show that our Savior was trying to represent in the character of this householder one of the characteristics of God. And so read, we see what it was the householder was saying to the discontented workmen. The discontented workmen, curiously enough, were using language which we are more familiar with to-day as coming from the lips of what are called the capitalists. They were objecting to the use of the property of the householder, on the ground that he had not done what was right, because he had given equally to all. But the householder's answer was, "Have I not a right, if I see fit, to use my property to bring about equality?"

A Burning Issue

This brings before us one of the burning issues of the day—the problem of property and equality. Think with me for a moment of it as a moral question.

The problem of equality did not arise, at least in an acute form, in the early history of this country, because men were practically equal economically. But no sooner had political equality been granted to all people, than they began to see that it was a vain thing if it was not followed by economic equality, and that is what multitudes of people to-day are asking for. They are also complaining that private property blocks the way to economic equality. There are two ways evidently in which economic equality may be attempted—I say "attempted" because I do not suppose any sane man believes that absolute economic equality is possible. That may be no more practicable than the squaring of the circle. But because no number of straight lines can make a curve, it does not follow that we must rest content with a "square"—we can progress to hexagons and so on ad infinitum, even though we cannot do the impossible. Approximate economic equality is indeed the passion of the hearts of men to-day.

Now, I say, there are two ways in which we may attempt to bring that about. One is the use of property by men of power who have been a benefit to the community. The other, the short and quick way, is by a great explosion that will bring down the turrets and pinnacles of life to the level of the dust. There are two equalities for which men may strive—one the equality that brings up, and the other the equality that drags down.

The Limit to Property Rights

Now let us pass to a second thought—"The relation of private property to the community." What is the relation? Well, you must have heard many men and women say the relation depends entirely upon the wish of the owner of the property. "If I am an owner of property I have a right to withhold all of it, if I see fit, or I have a right to distribute it. It is mine absolutely, without any reference to the community." Now while every good man and woman will admit that a Christian man ought to use his property for the benefit of the community, many of them will not admit that if he fails to do so the State has a right to take his property away from him. And yet, no remedy is proposed.

It has happened more than once in history.

At the time of the Reformation a large part of the landed property of England was held by the monasteries. But, just as soon as the public conscience of England became convinced that that property was used for the ill instead of the good of the commonwealth, it was all confiscated.

In the French Revolution the landed property, and most of the wealth, was in the hands of a comparatively few aristocrats. As soon as the conscience of the French people was convinced that the nobles were making ill use of their property, it was all taken away from them, and distributed among the peasants, who hold it to this day.

In our own land, just so soon as the conscience of the people was convinced that slavery was wrong, and that the owning of slaves was inimical to the commonwealth, by the stroke of a pen all that vast wealth was swept away.

The Law in the Hearts of Men

Now, why should we suppose that this process is to stop? Some men will say: "It is not right. No property ought to be taken away from a man unless it can be shown that he has violated some statute."

Well, in no one of these cases, so far as I know, was any existing statute violated. What was violated was this: The law written in men's hearts which had not yet been written on the statute books!

If it ever comes to pass that in this country people are convinced that private property is being used for the hurt of the community, it will be taken away.

Now, some of us believe in private property. We believe in it, not only because we think it is the just reward of faithful service—not only because we believe it to be a strong incentive to initiative upon which we also believe the prosperity of the people largely depends—but some of us go even further than that.

We believe it has a spiritual value—that property is one of the great sacraments of life, and that by the right use of it, a man comes to possess his own soul; by the right use of it he develops his personality and becomes such a man as he never could have become if he were not the owner and director of private property.

The Truth in Revolution

Let us take one step further. Let us remember that in these manifold revolutionary movements all over the world to-day there is an element of good. We are naturally so antagonistic to the outrages that have been committed, or which are threatened—we are so horrified by what has been done, for instance, in Russia, that it is hard for any man or woman quietly to consider the whole problem and admit that in spite of all their mistakes and crimes these revolutionists have laid hold upon a truth which Christian men ought to lay to heart—that no private property should be used except for the welfare of the commonwealth, and that if it is not so used it will be taken away again, as has been done in the past.

I say we ought to lay that to heart.

Good Kings and Bad Kings

In a previous discourse I tried to point out how modern kings, as well as some ancient kings, had been a blessing to mankind. But there was no time to listen to the voice of the objector. We ought to hear him, and what he would say would be something like this:

"No man who has read history can deny that certain great kings have been of value to the community in the days in which they lived, and that we are reaping to-day the benefit of what they planted. But what is overlooked is this—that while one great king may change the destiny of the people committed to his trust, it all may be ruined by the king's successors. Charlemagne's great empire was certainly a cement, holding together the warring elements of the Middle Ages; but look upon the feeble princelings who rose up after the great emperor died! Edward III was a great king. But when he died the crown was taken off his great head and put on the vain head of Richard II and it slipped down around his neck, and then contracted until it choked him! Henry V was a great king; but think of the misery that followed when that poor little Henry VI attempted to reign! Henry VIII was a great king; but think of the feebleness of Edward VI in the hands of the powerful nobles. Cromwell was the greatest king of all, but when he died Richard's hand could not lift that mighty sceptre.

"So much for your analogy," the objector will say about kings, ancient and modern. What about the successors of our American kings? What about the men and women who are holding the property that these great men held—and they are not ten or twelve or fifteen—there are thousands of them in this land. How are they using that property?

Trustees of God Versus Robbers of God

Here I will have to interrupt the objector and answer for myself, because perhaps about this I know more than he does, and I answer that some of these men and women are using it ideally, with a deep sense of responsibility—that they are working not eight but ten hours a day, not for themselves, but for others—modest, unassuming, receiving no applause—going into hospitals, prisons, homes for the friendless, day by day, acting as God's trustees—worthy successors of the great American kings.

But now the objector says, "Yes, but think of the others. Think of the large number of men and women whose doings are spread before you in every newspaper—who really represent to the world the aristocracy of America. Good God, what a people they are! What a life they are leading! Look at the women lapped in luxury—never doing a day's work in a year, lying abed until all hours in the morning, then wrapped in priceless garments—yes, and indecently arrayed—gambling all the afternoon, dissipating and worse through the night—they eat too much—they used to drink too much. They are idle wasters of the money that they call their own, but forget that they are using the unearned increment that is the result of the general prosperity for which you and, in a measure, I have worked to produce. And think of the men—the men who walk about here and talk as if their property was something for which they were responsible neither to God nor man—wretched examples! Godless, lustful, miserable creatures!"

It is all true, but think what is to be their fate? It is too awful to think that a man has been given thirty, forty, sixty years of this pilgrimage, with every opportunity to do good—and behold, he has wasted it all in riotous living, and goes down into death never saying: "Father, I sinned against heaven and before Thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son." What can be the fate of such a life as that I dare not think.

Be Not Partakers With Them

What I say to you, my people, is this—do not imitate them. You do not approve them. You condemn them as much as anyone can do. But what are you doing to change them?

The Psalmist long ago said this to the respectable people of Jerusalem—just such people as I am talking to this morning—he did not accuse them of being murderers, or adulterers, or thieves, but what he said was this:

"When thou sawest a thief thou consentest unto him and hast been partaker with the adulterers."

Have we ever "consented to" a thief—not a pickpocket but a "big" thief? Have you "partaken" with adulterers—not street walkers—but "ladies" who have left husband and children and contracted an adulterous connection which the backward States call "marriage"?

Have we asked the adulteress to sit down at our table? Do we welcome these wasters—these men and women—incen-tors to revolution?

There is where the reform should begin. There is no use in gathering up a hundred of these poor, wretched, wild-eyed, long-haired creatures, who do not understand the English language and know nothing about America, and call them anarchists. That is not the way.

Expel from decent society the willful, lustful, rich anarchists—the men and women who are violating the law of God and humanity. Those are the ones that will bring the revolution in this country if they have their way, as the same people brought it about in Russia.

What Are Christians Doing About It?

And what I would remind you in conclusion is this, that you and I have no right to sit on the side lines and watch the great game of life—not those of you who call yourselves Christians. For every Christian man and woman has solemnly declared that he is a soldier of Jesus Christ, to fight among other things against the "world."

Now, these people of whom I am speaking are the "world," and it is the business of every Christian man and woman to fight against it—to see that their influence does not spread, to see that our children do not imitate them, that we ourselves do not envy them—idle, wasteful, self-indulgent lives. We have promised before God that we will fight against this sort of thing.

Now, that is only half of it. The real question is not to be solved by you and me. It is going to be a question for our children. How many years will pass I do not know—but the problem will confront our children.

To-day, sum it all up in one word—"Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with my own?"

It depends. If you mean, "Have I not a right to spend what is my own to gratify myself without regard to the community?" the answer is, "No."

But if you say, "Have I not a right, in spite of what public opinion at any moment may say, to use my property in order to bless mankind, and to do the little I can, if it is only the giving out of the penny of the parable, to bring about a nearer approach to that economic equality which we all know has got to come?"—

Then you not only have a right so to use your property, but in so using it, whether it is great or little, you show yourself the trustee of God.—The Reverend Leighton Parks, D. D., rector of Saint Bartholomew's Episcopal Church, New York.

IMPORTANT FIND OF GOLD ORNAMENTS IN SOUTH AMERICA

The finest collection of gold ornaments left untouched by the Spanish conquerors of South America in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries has just been received by the University of Pennsylvania. In the collection are fifty-two pieces, ranging in size from solid gold breastplates, thirty inches in diameter, to tiny strings of bells. The total weight is sixteen troy pounds.

Second only in interest to its great historical and artistic value was the romantic way in which the collection came into possession of the educational authorities here.

The pieces were dug up in the early part of last year by a peon in Colombia. He was employed by Aurelio Gutierras, of the town of Ayapel, province of Antioquia in Colombia, to search for Indian graves. That occupation is a favorite one

To Be Well Is a Duty

[It is our pleasure to present this week, an article from the pen of Sister Laura Mann, who has been appointed by the church physician to be nursing director to the church. It is a resume of an address she gave before the Women's Department at the April conference, and should be read with care and thoughtfulness. She asks that we add that the Red Cross textbook, Home Hygiene and Care of the Sick, can be obtained from P. Blakiston's Son and Co., 1012 Walnut Street, Philadelphia. Also that Prenatal Care, Infant Care, and Child Care, all by Mrs. Max West, and Maternal Mortality by Julia C. Lathrop, may be obtained from the Department of Labor, Government Printing Office, Washington, District of Columbia.]

To my mind the time for study of all good books or subjects was never more needed in the history of mankind than at present. And I wonder if there was ever a time when it was so easy to get good books as now. This makes me wonder still more at the apparent indifference to good literature which is found everywhere. How can people read so many books that are merely entertaining rather than those that are full of entertainment and full of instruction likewise? And I particularly wonder that so many Latter Day Saints have this bad habit, for it is a bad habit, considering the fact that God has commanded that we study all good books. Isn't it sad? I think so, for the failing to heed this command is no doubt the reason for much of the suffering and sickness now prevalent among our members.

I wish to mention one particular subject concerning which, to my mind, there is much evidence to prove that we suffer because we fail to study. This one I wish to mention is the in South American countries where the peons are staked by wealthy men of affairs with the understanding that the peons are to turn over their finds in return for the food and lodging given them when the peons are not successful.

This peon was particularly lucky and stumbled across sixty-eight or seventy pieces, all of the finest workmanship. The collection was turned over to Senor Gutierras. William Wrigley, of Chicago, the millionaire chewing-gum magnate, obtained one fourth of them and gave sixteen pieces to the Field Museum in Chicago. The authorities of that institution were delighted, and F. W. Skiff, the curator, described the sixteen pieces as "the largest and most important collection of pre-Conquest gold" in existence.

But the collection in the University Museum numbers fifty-two pieces, all made in the finest fashion by the Chibeha Indians. These peoples are regarded by ethnologists as the connecting link between the Aztecs and the Toltecs on the north and the Incas on the south. Experts have declared that the artistry of the Chibeha Indians is the equal of the Incas, although the Incas surpassed in science of government, architecture, and road building.

Some of these relics were dug up 200 and 300 years ago by the conquering Spaniards, but those conquistadors were more interested in the monetary than the artistic and scientific aspects of their discoveries and these wonderful ornaments, it is said, have become very scarce.

The university authorities are delighted over their acquisition, and more complete details and descriptions of the collection will be given out later, when the officers of the museum have had a chance to catalogue and inventory their priceless relics.

The collection for the University Museum was brought to the United States by Ernesto Cortisso, head of the principal bank in Barranquilla.—The Collector's Journal.

study of health or hygienic subjects. The Red Cross and Government have the following information for all that, approximately, fifty per cent of sickness and death could be prevented if people generally were not so ignorant of the laws that govern health.

Because the Red Cross is confident that it will be a saving of lives, suffering, and money, they are now spending vast sums to send out nurse instructors all over the Nation. If you have an opportunity to avail yourself of the information so offered, do so. They are giving a course of fifteen lessons two hours each, and all members of classes are to secure and study a textbook and recite their lessons at the class, where, also, the nurse in charge is supposed to demonstrate all treatments that the book is covering.

This course does not, as some suppose, "try to make nurses of us" but is a means of giving a small, but very beneficial help in learning what causes disease, and how to prevent it, which is the most important thing for all mothers or home keepers to know as regards health. How to cure is not nearly so important as how to prevent.

Because of this fact the church health department, in planning its future work in the church, feels that its greatest duty is the teaching of the prevention of disease. "Why do you care to lay stress on the health subject at all? Cannot God heal us?" are no doubt questions that come into the minds of many Latter Day Saints. Our answer is, "Yes, God can heal and he does heal. But sometimes he lets us suffer because of our ignorance, particularly when that ignorance is due to a failure on our part to keep his commandments, to one of which—'study'—I have already referred."

God has established laws which govern health and when we break them we suffer the consequences. The idea that we are sick to teach us lessons is perhaps more true than many realize; but the lesson that God is probably most anxious to teach us through sickness, we fail to recognize or search after. As a usual procedure, most will say, "What have I done that God allows this to come upon me?" When sick, this is really the proper question—a most important one! But we so often misapply it and we search for some falsehood, moral misstep, reproach or gossip of another in our past lives, or, in other words, for sins of the mind rather than for sins of the body.

I call them sins, because I understand that the breaking of law is sin. Then in this case it shouldn't be so much, "What have I thought or said?" but "What have I done?" "Where did I break the laws of health?" Now, no doubt, you think, "How can we question ourselves, and answer our own questions, as this seems to imply we should, when we don't know the laws of health? You can't—God knows you can't—so he said "study."

Now the church health department hopes to assist you in that study and we are anxious to do this because we have observed in actual association with the sick, many things, among them:

That the condition of	{	Intelligence—that which gives God glory
		Spirituality—A Latter Day Saint's greatest help.
		Happiness and comfort
		Future generations and to a large extent
		Future morality

how and knock at the door of health. No one can reach the maximum along any of these lines with poor health, and they are the things, the ideals that, as a church, God expects us to reach. We must necessarily study all subjects that will help us to that end. This, briefly told, is why we are so anxious that you study the laws of health.

It would be impossible for me, in one brief article to tell you all about these laws if I were able, but I shall make a small outline that may help you to more fully understand the importance of this line of study. I would like you to question yourselves as to whether you, yourself, don't need to study as well as others whom you probably think of as needing it.

As we take up the laws briefly, we find the following among the most important:

Proper	{	Cleanliness
		Work
		Rest
		Sleep
		Food
		Drinks
		Study
		Recreation
		Vacations

All play a very important role in helping us keep well and reaching our maximum ambitions.

I have not space to explain these subjects in detail. Each is a study that requires a great deal of necessary explanation before it can be understood as we desire that you and all Latter Day Saints should understand them.

I will mention briefly some bad habits that are common:

- Kissing—babies and other persons.
- Common drinking cups.
- Common towels.
- Spitting most anywhere, on the street, etc.
- Coughing or sneezing with mouth or nose uncovered.
- Hot drinks.
- Dry sweeping.
- Exposure to weather unnecessarily.
- Eating any kind of food at most any time.
- Physical overwork.
- Mental overwork.
- Idleness.
- Wasting or killing time.
- Neglect of small wounds.
- Indifference to cleanliness.
- Indifference to slight symptoms of disease.
- Use of patent medicines without knowing why, or a physician's orders.
- Alcoholism.
- Drug habits, sometimes headache tablets.
- Tobacco habits.
- Coffee, tea, and cocoa habits.
- Patronizing entertainments in overcrowded and unventilated rooms.
- Sleeping with windows shut.
- Drinking water for indefinite periods, even though polluted and knowing it, without boiling.
- Infrequent baths, sometimes only in summer.
- Neglect of infants in many regards.
- Neglect of teeth, and bad mental habits, etc.

We may go and name many more unnecessary and bad habits which hinder us in our work of bringing Zion to the condition that Christ will have pleasure in coming to see, or in which to live with us. Of this one thing I am confident, God will be pleased to have us a clean people in mind, body, and moral character as well as in our homes, towns, and cities, which must be kept in a like condition of cleanliness. Happiness, comfort, morality, prosperity, and maximum intelligence are depending on our doing so.

This is a small hint of my idea of equality and Zion. May God help us and lead us in paths of the best methods for the perfecting of his Saints, that his coming may be hastened, is my prayer with yours. Truly trying to fully consecrate my life in service to this cause, I am, sincerely, with love,

Your sister in Christ,

Laura E. Mann, R. N.

It is curious, is it not, with what skill we will adapt our sandy land to potatoes and grow our beans in clay, and with how little wisdom we farm the soils of our own natures? We try to grow poetry where plumbing would thrive grandly!—not knowing that plumbing is as important and honorable and necessary to this earth as poetry.—David Grayson in Adventures in Friendship.

Community Club for Rural Women

The isolated condition of rural people is being overcome to a great extent by better country roads, automobiles, rural telephones, rural free delivery and by electric railroads. Rural women are taking advantage of these improved means of communication, and are organizing in order that they may further the development of every phase of activity which will help to produce better home life on the farm, greater agricultural opportunities, and an ideal rural community life.

There are thousands of women's rural clubs in the United States, and although most of these are small in numbers and simple in construction, they are doing much to better rural conditions. Clubs which are organized for purely social purposes often become instrumental in interesting the members in home economics and community work. All clubs should devote part of the time to something that is serious and genuine.

Some of the activities of rural club women which help to develop home life on the farm and to promulgate new ideas of household efficiency, are the studying of foods; the promoting of the study of child welfare; encouraging the use of labor-saving devices, and the promoting of penny savings to encourage thrift in farm homes.

Many of the extension departments of the state agricultural colleges give assistance in organizing home makers' clubs and furnish program material and trained demonstrators in domestic science.

The women's clubs are generally the only means through which the married women may study these subjects, and through them the farm women are brought together for discussion of the problems of daily life in such a way that they return to their work with renewed enthusiasm and interest.

Country women's clubs are not only developing home life but are also making practical efforts to solve agricultural problems and bring about broader agricultural opportunities. Practical experiments in marketing have been carried on by women's rural clubs, which have assisted members in marketing farm products. Some clubs have made a study of the grading, sorting, and packing of fruit for market. Some have encouraged cooperative buying and selling. Some have experimented with seed selection and germination. Young trees, plants, bulbs, and seeds have been collected and distributed by women's rural clubs in order to encourage tree planting and flower growing. Some women's rural clubs are endeavoring to prepare girls and boys to take advantage of the opportunities offered by the agricultural colleges, by creating an interest in natural history, agriculture, and domestic science. Among other things which the young folks study, under the direction of some of the club women, are many of the varieties of grasses, trees, flowers, and birds. These things stimulate an interest in practical agriculture.

Many rural clubs are instrumental in obtaining better opportunities for reading by starting club libraries.

Rural women are not only interested in developing a better home life and greater agricultural opportunities. They are also interested in developing an ideal rural community life. For this purpose many women's rural organizations help to secure trained workers for the county, such as home demonstrators, county nurses, and county social service workers; do much philanthropic work; celebrate Arbor Day by having shade trees planted in the school yards and on country roads. Clean-up and paint-up campaigns are successfully carried on; rural cemeteries are improved and kept in a good condition; and better country roads have been secured through their efforts.

Community singing and entertainments are encouraged.

Women's rural clubs are often instrumental in having home economics, manual training, nature study, and agriculture introduced into rural schools.

The work of women's rural clubs is varied but constructive. All who will may be included as workers in helping to improve community life in the country. Community interest in country life and country problems has been stimulated through the efforts of country women.

Physical Culture

Those who refuse to USE little time and money in keeping well will inevitably be compelled to LOSE much time and money while being ill.

The real purpose of physical culture is the restoration to and maintenance of bodily health by obedience to the laws of health.

Shakespeare has written, "Self-preservation is the first law of nature." This has been unwisely contradicted by distinguished people. In their ignorance they have attacked self-protection instead.

The fact of our sleeping, eating, bathing, etc., conscious at the time that fatal accidents, starvation, and other tragedies are occurring, is significant proof of our recognition of the correctness of Shakespeare's principle. Physical culture is the "alpha and omega" of self-preservation.

For skill, ingenuity, and wisdom the human anatomy surpasses all other machines in the world. Millions of people live and die in ignorance of the knowledge of physical preservation and, in most cases, unconscious of their ownership of this masterpiece of mechanism and their duty towards the care of the human body.

The master scholars and greatest thinkers and geniuses of all time have unanimously agreed that doing right and character development is the supreme motive of physical life upon this planet.

The laws of health are intricately interwoven with those governing character; therefore obedience to their laws is the primary object for the ultimate perfection of both. Some wise people professing religion, but being utterly unconscious of its true meaning, assert that the Omnipotent One after creating the anatomy of man, discovered this mistake, and decided that we should scourge, abuse, and generally neglect it instead of cultivating it as He originally intended, if we desired a future heavenly home and spiritual body.

Never was a greater delusion, detrimental to the human race, conceived! To intelligent and untrammelled thinkers it is comparatively significant that our mentalities were constructed for study and investigation of the world's wonders represented by physiology, astronomy, botany, chemistry, music, and many others. Consequently those who through fanaticism, narrowness of vision, and laziness, waste valuable time in hovering over the surface of truth and knowledge owing to their expectancy of being miraculously endowed with perfect knowledge and perfect health instantaneously, wait in vain.

However some people have fortunately chosen to use their brains and in doing so have learned of an existing reign of law demanding strict obedience thereto if such rich rewards are earnestly desired and determinedly sought for.

Physical culture is a science which necessitates study and application in order for superabundant health to become resident in the individual.

Owing to lack of volitional evolution not one person in ten thousand loves all the manifold activities of life such as working, playing, thinking constructively, relaxing, public speaking, debating, reading, writing, studying, bathing, walking, laughing, eating, and others. Instead discontent, unrest, jealousy, immorality, and carelessness are the rule of the majority.

Many people possessing vast knowledge upon many dynamic subjects, including physical culture, exhibit brazen inconsistency by refusing to expend the energy in either regaining, retaining, or maintaining a sound physical organism, personified by clear eyes, cool yet cheerful disposition, normal appetite, strong nerves, erect posture, and wonderful endurance.

Many are the excuses advanced and objections raised in failing to study and participate in physical culture, the chief one being, "I haven't time," yet whatever we are determined to do we invariably find time in which to do it. Another excuse is, "I do hard physical work all day, I don't need it." Perhaps not; but exercise is only one of the many phases of physical culture. It also includes such vital necessities as deep nasal exhalations of oxygenized air as often as possible, di-

HYMNS AND POEMS

At Erie Beach

BY ELBERT A. SMITH

Where break the waves at Erie Beach,
Upon the sandy shore's long reach,
We gathered in with one accord,
And cleansed our hearts to meet the Lord.

We built our tented city here,
And pitched our canvas temple near,
We walked the long, white, tented street
And joyed each friendly Saint to meet.

Some dwell in Canada's fair land,
And think the Maple Leaf most grand;
Some live beneath the flag of stars;
But here our peace no evil mars;

For we are one and love ðne God.
We walk one path and grasp one rod—
One Lord, one Faith, one Prince of Peace,
Whose government shall never cease.

And meeting here, our God to each,
Has given peace at Erie Beach;
Our weary souls are lifted up,
We've had one draught from Zion's cup.

Fresh courage take, be strong of heart—
Some day we'll meet, no more to part,
In that fair city pure and white
Whose homes shall shine with holy light—

And every life like living flame
The gospel message shall proclaim,

And looking back, we'll say to each,
God promised this at Erie Beach.

Why I Must Suffer

BY MARY LELAND CARTER

As I thought upon the past,
Doubts and murmurs filled my soul,
Sorrow and trials hard to bear
Seemed like a flood o'er me to roll.

"Oh, why is it?" I doubting cried.
"Father, all is in thy power.
Dost thou indeed feel love for me,
And yet not save me from this hour?"

"Peace, my child, my love for thee
These very things do truly prove.
Much of wrong is in thine heart
Which I must now remove.

"For thou hast asked to grow in grace,
A strong, true Saint to be.
To so live that others seeing thy life
May be led to honor me.

"That this may be, with trials many,
Thou must be cleansed and purified,
For never in unworthy temples
Comes my Holy Spirit to abide."

"This answer given, Lord, I may
Do as seemeth good to thee.
I ask that thou, who hast begun
Wilt perfect that which changes me."

eting, fasting, massage, sun, air, electric light, and steam baths; also hot, tepid, and cold water baths; sufficient sleep and the cultivation of the cheerful mental attitude by the refusal to worry.

A farmer seldom dreams of health, because his vocation perpetuates it. Our prehistoric ancestors lived in the great outdoors; the wind and rain caressed their uncovered bodies; the sun, tanning their skins, rejuvenated their beings; and their occupation of hunting and fishing developed their muscles and attuned their whole physical structures. As civilization advanced, walled-in rooms, adulterated foods, six layers of clothing, and other disadvantages came into vogue. Consequently, with a continual progression of science depicted in gas, electrically-run machinery in huge factories compelling sedentary occupations, there arose a demand for knowledge on healing the new diseases created by the false habits of living. Thus hospitals were established, while thousands of medical doctors came into existence through the failure to observe a steady change in social conditions from one of reality personified by cooperation with nature, to one of artificiality, as exemplified in the present day hot-house plant system of living.

Only lately, after many years practically wasted in the study and practice of medicine for the cure of disease, it has been discovered that the most obstinate diseases which hitherto have been regarded by the medical profession as incurable, almost always succumb to the powerful onslaught of fresh air, sunlight, baths, dieting, systematic exercise, fasting, sleep, and proper rest; simply a retrogression to nature.

Christianity boiled down is essential to good character development. This is only possible whilst in possession of earthly life in a physical body. The innate desires of humanity are happiness and conservation of life. The priceless gift of health can be maintained only by obedience to the laws governing it.

With increased health the possibility of rendering unto humanity a greater service becomes a reality; for the combination of love and health are the personification of illimitable wealth.

Prayers, drugs, faith, and medicine are absolutely worthless without actions which are evidences of seriousness.

Ever since the dawn of human reason upon this planet, humanity has been consciously, semiconsciously, and unconsciously groping and yearning for perpetual perfect happiness, and when every virtue and talent in the universe is in possession of all, health will still be absolutely necessary before perfect happiness, the goal of mankind's ambition, shall become their everlasting inheritance.

A Statement Concerning G. M. Hinkle's Part in Church History

To Whom It May Concern: I am writing you this morning in regard to a matter of history which I am thinking about; not only I, but many others with whom I have conversed, concerning what the Church History has to say about the action of G. M. Hinkle in delivering Joseph Smith, jr., and others, to the Missouri militia, at Far West, Missouri, during the Mormon trouble at that place in 1838.

I see on page 268 in the letter of Joseph Smith, jr., written from Independence, Missouri, where Joseph calls G. M. Hinkle a "traitor"; also in several other places and times he and others make similar statements. I think Joseph's criticism was very hasty and without foundation, as shown in Hyrum Smith's statement in Church History, volume 2, page 677, where he said, "Along some time the same night Colonel Hinkle came to me and told me that he had been pleading my case before the court martial," etc., as well as the fact of said G. M. Hinkle being an officer acting, no doubt, under direct command of General Doniphan as shown (Church History, volume 2, page 668) where "General Doniphan ordered Colonel Hinkle to call out the militia of Caldwell and defend the town." In justice to G. M. Hinkle, I maintain that Joseph's criticism was hasty and incorrect.

Colonel G. M. Hinkle, being an officer of the state militia, acting under orders of his superior officers could do nothing but obey the orders or mutiny. The case of General Doniphan refusing to execute the orders of the so-called court martial, which was to "execute the prisoners at sunrise on the public square of Far West," was a different proposition altogether. General Doniphan, being a superior officer and a great lawyer, knew that the order was illegal because the prisoners being civilians did not come under the jurisdiction of the military court, therefore he was right, while on the other hand Colonel Hinkle had been ordered to "deliver up" certain persons who were under his protection, he at that time being under the orders of General Doniphan as above cited (Church History, volume 2, page 668).

However, Colonel G. M. Hinkle did not surrender or "deliver up" the "prisoners" till the commanding officer or officers had "pledged their honor that they should not be abused or insulted, but should be guarded back in safety in the morning, or so soon as the consultation was over," which shows that Colonel G. M. Hinkle did not betray them but did do all a human could do to protect them not alone from bodily injury, but from "insult."

G. M. Hinkle did not sign over the property; he did disband his militia and surrender his arms as ordered and is honorably spoken of by the historian of Caldwell and Livingston Counties as shown in Church History, volume 2, pages 262, 263. You will note that G. M. Hinkle did not sign over the property of the Mormons, as shown on page 275, volume 2, Church History, but those so signing were never called "traitors" but were forced to sign the same as was Colonel Hinkle forced to either deliver up the leaders or fight, and a fight could have resulted in but one way as was shown by Haun's Mill Massacre.

Now we see that it is necessary to go to the history of Caldwell and Livingston Counties written by men of the world, or, as we call them, "Gentiles," in order to get a concise description of the events in controversy (Church History, volume 2, page 262, 263). Also to the report of the committee of nine appointed by the citizens of Caldwell County, where it was shown that the said Colonel G. M. Hinkle did only what he was compelled to do in relation to the military part of the orders and that he suffered the loss of all of his property exactly like the rest of this unfortunate people.

The only thing that can be questioned: It is claimed that Colonel G. M. Hinkle concealed the nature of their delivery from them. I will say in reply to that, all military orders are secret and are never known until they are carried out. Now suppose, Joseph, that Colonel Hinkle had told you all about it, what would you have done? Would you have fought? No! I don't believe you would. You would have put your trust in God. You would have walked right over into the camp of the enemy and have put your trust in God for your deliverance, as no doubt G. M. Hinkle was doing.

Now, as a son of G. M. Hinkle, I have always believed and still believe that Joseph Smith at one time was inspired to do a great work for the Lord in bringing forth his work upon the earth, but I do not believe that he was always and at all times inspired, no more than was King David of old. The Church History is full of accusations against Colonel G. M. Hinkle from the time of the writing of Lucy Smith to the Young People's History in these last days, all of which is founded upon the one act of his life which I contend is a wrong criticism, unwarranted in fact of history. I believe G. M. Hinkle did just what you or any other sane man would have done under like circumstances. I have examined every phase of the subject from first to last and will say without fear of successful contradiction that there was no more treachery about the action of G. M. Hinkle than there was about the surrender of Robert E. Lee to General Grant, or the Germans who surrendered to the allies at Paris. This one accusation certainly caused G. M. Hinkle a great deal of trouble and I am unable at this time to tell what it may have cost his children and is still costing his grandchildren. I have just recently made quite an extended trip around among the Saints and old settlers of Decatur County where Hinkle spent his last days and not one word have I ever heard against him as a Saint or citizen, but some of the old Saints have told me he was the best preacher they have ever heard. He lived and died in Decatur County, Iowa, preaching the restored gospel until his death, which occurred at New Buda, Decatur County, Iowa, in the fall of 1861, and interment was in the Hamilton Cemetery near Pleasanton, Iowa.

The first I ever saw of any of the accusations in print was in the History of Joseph Smith, by Lucy Smith. Later in the new edition of the same history I noticed a correction which was made, as I supposed, by the late Joseph Smith, in which he argued that there must be some mistake in the accusations against G. M. Hinkle as he had been informed that G. M. Hinkle had remained faithful to the church until his death and had raised his family so that most of them had become members of the Reorganized Church. I thought that would settle that matter, so dropped the subject from my mind, but in these latter days, I see the old issue is dug up and is being taught anew to the young of the church, but I am glad to see in the young generation a more liberal disposition; they are not so apt to jump at conclusions and they are weighing these matters in the light of history and subsequent events.

I am an elder in the Reorganized Church and have been for many years, and have spent time and money for its advancement and am still willing to assist in advancing its interest but think it is high time that the church take steps to right this matter before it is too late.

Now brethren, I have made this article as short as possible as I am writing this with hopes of it being published and I ask its insertion in the church papers, but have not written one tenth part of what might be written in defense of Colonel G. M. Hinkle's (my father's) honor.

I have written this that the world might know that it is never too late to right a wrong.

Yours in gospel bonds,

OWASSO, OKLAHOMA, July 15, 1920.

President Smith Writes From England

(Letter to Elbert A. Smith of the First Presidency from London, England, August 3, 1920.)

The conference is progressing according to program. Attendance is good and interest seems good. Brother Williams and I find much to interest us and find the Saints earnest and fervent. The church means much to them. We hope to see the work here given impetus.

The voyage over was exceptionally smooth. We landed at Plymouth on Thursday the 29th, about 7.30 p. m. A special train on the Great Western called the "Ocean Mail" brought us to London. We reached Paddington Station about 2 a. m. Friday, and found Brethren R. May and Joseph Dewsnup waiting for us. It was after 4 a. m. when we reached Brother May's home.

A reception Saturday night for Brother Williams and me was well attended. We were warmly welcomed by the representatives of the church, and made to feel at home.

Conference-reunion began Sunday, the 1st. Brother Williams was the speaker in the morning and I at night. The prayer and sacrament meeting in the afternoon was enjoyed by all.

Yesterday, Monday, was devoted to business sessions—three, and one more at least will be needed to finish.

Brother May, Sister Crick, and her two boys are well and have made us feel at home by their genial hospitality.

Brother Williams and I expect to visit the House of Commons to-day.

Yours,
F. M. SMITH.

The Reunion at Pertle Springs

The Latter Day Saint reunion at Pertle Springs, Warrensburg, Missouri, opened Friday, August 13, at 7 p. m., resulting in the selection of R. V. Hopkins, J. A. Tanner, and D. J. Krahl to have supervision of all services. The bishopric of the three stakes were given charge of the grounds, etc. Friday night at 8 p. m. sermon by Elder J. W. A. Bailey. Saturday morning prayer service 8.30 a. m., and at 10 o'clock classes of study along educational lines were organized with their various instructors. At 11 o'clock was a lecture by Elder R. V. Hopkins, 7.15 p. m. song service, and preaching at 8 p. m., by Elder Joseph Arber.

The order of services is as follows on week days:

Young people's prayer meeting at 7 a. m.

General prayer meeting at 8.30 a. m.

Class meet at 10.

Lecture at 11.

The afternoons are given over to recreation.

Song service, 7.15 p. m.

Preaching service, 8 p. m.

Sunday prayer service at 8 a. m.

Sunday school 9.40 a. m.

Preaching at 11, 2.30, and 8 p. m.

Sunday was a very profitable day. The stakes are fairly represented. At Sunday school there were about five hundred. The speakers for the three preaching services were Elders I. M. Smith, W. S. Macrae, and Russell Archibald. The "Independence Council, Boy Scouts of America" attended in a body, the Reverend I. D. Borders being invited to offer the opening prayer, which he did very effectively.

There was a service at the Boy Scout camp at 7 p. m. The camp is located about one mile west of the general camp, with Mr. J. B. McDonald, scout commissioner in general charge of the camp; Reverend I. D. Borders, scoutmaster in drilling and camp chaplain; Eugene E. Closson, scoutmaster in charge of the camp grounds; Joseph A. Arber, scoutmaster in charge of swimming activities; Hilton Hartley, assistant scoutmaster of troop 6. There are between 50 and 60 scouts camping.

The young people are holding a prayer service each morning at 7 a. m. The first one which was held on Monday was the most spiritual meeting yet held. There were during the hour's service 12 songs, 11 prayers, 26 testimonies, 1 prophecy, 1 tongue and interpretation. It was indeed a wonderful meeting. Monday continued: Prayer service 8.30, class work at 10, a lecture by Sister D. H. Blair, on "Reasons for Bible training for children." There were about 800 in attendance Sunday. The general health of the camp is good, only one or two cases of sickness. The grounds are in good condition. Almost everyone is enjoying the reunion.

Good News From Switzerland

Saturday evening I had the pleasure of baptizing two very good women of Basel, one about sixty years old and the other twenty-eight years of age. On Sunday morning, after the Sunday school, we had the confirmation, followed by the partaking of the sacrament. There were just our three Swiss members and my wife and I present. It made my heart rejoice to see every one taking part in the meeting, and to hear the new members thanking God that they had been privileged to hear and accept the gospel. As the brother remarked at the close of the services, it had truly been a beautiful meeting, one in which the Spirit of God was present.

From the time it was necessary for us to leave Basel, the attendance at the services has been very poor and there were among them that did come, those who used their influence against the work. While wife and I had fasted and prayed over the matter, things seemed to continue in the same way. On Sunday, even though my heart rejoiced to see the two ladies take upon themselves the name of Christ, yet I felt as though I was burdened with a very heavy load. When it was about time for the evening service I began to expect the same few who had been attending, but not one of them appeared, and instead came new people until our twenty-three chairs were filled, then next the window sills filled up, and still came the people until there were forty-one present, all adults with the exception of one boy perhaps fourteen years of age. This was the largest number of people we have ever had present and I do not need to tell you that my heart became much lighter and I realized that God was still with us to bless.

I have been tracting in Zurich and the neighboring towns but I think that I shall have finished by the middle of next week. Then as our second application for permission to rent rooms in Zurich has been refused, I shall leave here for Bern and try to get a permit to do tracting there until the registration of the church has been completed. So far this month I have given out one thousand and forty tracts.

Hoping that the way may yet open up so that we shall be able to do a good work here, I am

Your brother in Christ,

On the Death of Peter Anderson

The sad news of the death of Elder Peter Anderson, just received, has filled us with deep sorrow. This event occurring with such suddenness suggests that it is still possible for men to die of a broken heart.

Our brother's all was invested in the church work. With an intensity known only to those intimately associated with him, he made his ministry the absorbing passion of his life. This was quite marked in his public service. While he was not generally regarded as eloquent or popular in preaching, there was always a quiet suggestion of the strength and power of conviction born of experience, and his familiarity with the standard books of the church was not merely textual, but analytical, aiming always at solid construction.

His reserved character gave him a dignity and poise which made it difficult for some to approach him intimately, yet under this exterior there beat a heart warm in genuine friendship and fervent in devotion to the cause of Christ.

He was always loyal in his defense of principle, and uncompromising in his allegiance to the truth.

In public gatherings and in the council meetings our brother was not conspicuous as a controversialist. His judgments were deliberate and matured independently. When he did speak in debate there was the ease of speech which revealed meditation, reason, and judgment, and his thoughts were expressed in well-chosen language.

Most of Brother Anderson's ministerial work was done away from the glare of publicity, often on the frontiers where there was demanded sacrifice, courage of the finest quality, and patience. He suffered much for the work's sake of which he seldom spoke and then only to those who were close to him, and never for the sake of boasting. His ministerial qualifications were developed in the painful school of experience and his course, like the Apostle Paul's, was marked by "unwearied endurance, afflictions, distress, toil, sleeplessness, hunger and thirst, purity of life, knowledge, patience, kindness, and sincere love; wielding the weapons of righteousness in both hands through honor, ignominy, calumny, and praise."

Such men are the monumental witnesses of the power of God in the lives of his servants. For such a ministry there can be no substitute, and the church is poorer indeed for the death of such a man as Peter Anderson.

From this far-away land we humbly pay this tribute of respect to the memory of our brother and in deepest sympathy unite our prayers for the bereaved wife and family.

PAUL M. HANSON.

A Letter from a Nonmember to Her Father

My Dear Father: Received your long-looked-for letter Saturday; surely was glad to hear from you and was surprised to know that you enjoyed the church papers as others we have sent church papers to didn't like them at all. I think it is a grand gospel. I am being convinced more every day of its truthfulness. I think it is the only true gospel. I just wish all my people could be here and learn of it as I have. I didn't like it at first but I heard so many good sermons and have been with the members till I fully believe it is all right. We don't belong yet but we are going to join soon. I wish every one of my people could see as I do; but don't suppose they could ever believe it unless they were here to see so much of the good work that is being carried on. I am fully convinced that there is nothing in Campbellism for me any more.

You see, father, that Christ is coming to reign on the earth a thousand years with his Saints. (Read Revelation 20.) Now if he is coming back to the earth (as you believe he is) he will have to come somewhere to wed his wife, which is the church of the Saints, and his wife, or church, must make herself ready; that is what the Saints here are trying to do in righteousness. (Read Revelation 19: 7, 8, 9.) That is why the Saints are gathering here to meet him for he will suddenly come to his temple. (Read Malachi 3 and 4.) And when he comes, we, the church or Saints, the bride, the Lamb's wife, shall be caught up to meet him in the air and then we will be with him and he will be our King here on earth for a thousand years. Because we go up to meet him is no sign that he will go back, for when you go out to meet a friend you don't make them go back home; you let him come on to your house so when we are caught up to meet him we do not turn him back but he will come and reign with us a thousand years. That is what the Latter Day Saints are doing, preparing for his coming, and his temple and throne and place of headquarters will be here at Independence, Missouri, for the people of this continent who will gather with Ephraim, the son of Joseph that was sold into Egypt, for this is the Gentile gathering place. And Jerusalem is the gathering place for the Jews.

You know the Jews are gathering back there now by the thousands and will become a nation in the Holy Land; he also will appear to them and his headquarters on that continent will be Jerusalem. As you know, Christ cannot be everywhere at the same time; he never was at but one place at a time, for when he was at Jerusalem he was not in Bethlehem and when he was in the river of Jordan being baptized by John he was not in Galilee, so when he comes again he will not be in Jerusalem and in America at the same time, but now by the power of his Spirit, his presence is felt everywhere or the power of the Holy Ghost sometimes called the Comforter; so when he comes again he will be here in person and will go from Zion to Jerusalem and from Jerusalem to Zion and instruct his Saints for a thousand years, preparing us to meet God (at the end of the thousand years) so we may dwell with God in that new Jerusalem that comes down from the new heaven to the new earth and God himself will be our God and our Father in eternity. (Read Revelation 21.)

Now, father, I know you have been preaching since you were a boy and have enjoyed a goodly degree of the Spirit at times, but you have not had the spirit of this everlasting gospel which the angel had in heaven to be preached to every nation, kindred, tongue, and people that dwells upon the earth, according to Revelation 14: 6, 7, for that angel restored the gospel in its fullness to Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery and the church was organized on April 6, 1830, as it was anciently with its gifts, powers, and blessings, such as prophecy and tongues and interpretations, for I have heard them to-day.

I hope that this will not offend you but that you will read it in the spirit it was written in, for I think it was written in the Spirit of Christ. I hope you will read the quotations I have given you and tell me what you think of them for I am sure this is the true gospel and I would be so glad if you would investigate it, father.

Your daughter.

ROSA.

PORT HURON, MICHIGAN, August 16, 1920.

Editors Herald: The last two numbers of the HERALD containing a book review by Elmer E. Long I have greatly enjoyed. When you remember that the majority of chaplains were selected from the English Church during the war, the National Church of England, and it dying in formality and pride, could we expect any other confessions?

But I want to draw the attention of Brother Long to another work just published, and would enjoy seeing a review of it in the HERALD. It is entitled A Community Church, written by Henry Jackson, who had held two very important charges—one in New York, and one in Philadelphia. He has since left them and now contends for a church to be built upon lines of democracy entirely.

It is another wonderful proof of the intelligence given to Joseph Smith by the angel with reference to the creeds of men. I can recommend the work as splendid reading.

The work here is moving forward nicely. Several have been baptized of late, and the prospects are still good. Brother Fred Cadow and myself have been holding forth at a new opening south of the city for some six weeks. Five have been baptized as a result.

Our mission at the north end is thriving splendidly. Brother Roy Clark, late of the missionary force, is holding forth every Sunday night, with good interest. Throughout the summer thus far our attendance has been first-rate. The Lord is blessing us with an increase of numbers and spiritual blessings at the main church.

We have started street work on Saturday nights, and gather up quite a large crowd in a few minutes. Find it a good way to advertise our work and distribute our literature. I am enjoying my work, and feel and know the Lord is blessing.

Faithfully yours,

WILLIAM FLIGG.

MISCELLANEOUS

The Presidency

By concurrent action of the Presidency and Twelve, W. L. Shotwell, at his request, has been released from his appointment as missionary to the Spring River District.

Elder Fred Gregory having been elected as president of the Alberta District, Canada, his appointment has been changed from missionary to local.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY.

The Bishopric

Winnipeg District: For the next six or eight months Brother Arnold will be absent from Winnipeg, and has arranged for Elder W. B. Richards, 177 Langside Street, Winnipeg, Manitoba, to take care of the work of Bishop's agent for him.

The Saints of this district will kindly send their tithes and offerings to Brother Richards until such time as Brother Arnold returns.

I trust that the Saints of this district may be blessed in their temporal affairs and be moved upon by the Spirit of the Lord to contribute of their earthly portion. He that soweth sparingly reapeth sparingly, but as we sow freely of our earthly substance we reap in return not only an abundant harvest of material things but spiritual blessings as well.

Yours for a Million Dollars Tithing,

B. R. MCGUIRE,
Presiding Bishop.

Conference Notices

Northeastern Kansas, at Fanning, September 3, 4, 5. R. L. Tilden, clerk.

Wheeling, at Wheeling, West Virginia, September 4 and 5. Business session Saturday afternoon. Other meetings will be arranged for by those in charge. All branch secretaries are to get the people interested in the restored gospel.

We feel encouraged in the great latter-day work. Our attendance is fair, and we are having good spiritual meetings.

One of the ministers of another church here told me, "The Latter Day Saints have the best attendance of any church in town, and it is the only church that has any spirituality in it." In fact, it is hard for the other churches to have services at all. A few women and children go, but scarcely ever a man goes.

Our work is looking upward here. We are beginning to see the good effect of our efforts. We are looking forward with great anticipation to our coming district conference, which convenes with us October 2 and 3. We are trying to get it well advertised and we hope to have a good attendance and some baptisms.

Yours hopefully,

MRS. EDGAR BUTTS.

NEWPORT BEACH, CALIFORNIA, August 11, 1920.

The First Presidency: Wife and I were present at the Southern California Reunion from the 31st of July till the close last Monday. The general opinion seems to be that the reunion was a success, and one of the best. I know that we enjoyed ourselves, though we were kept very busy. Had charge of the music, preached four sermons, addressed the priesthood twice, gave nineteen blessings and baptized fourteen, besides administering to a number and doing a lot of other work. Wife also was kept busy in various ways.

Visited Long Beach Monday and Tuesday. Home for a few hours to-day to catch up with my correspondence, and go to Santa Ana this afternoon. Am feeling fine.

In gospel bonds, requested to report their present number of members, also their gains and losses. Jasper Dobbs, secretary.

Central Nebraska, with the Meadow Grove Branch, September 3, 4. Arrangements will be made for auxiliary services. Send reports to Sister Mary Patras, Neligh, Nebraska. We should like to see a good representation. F. Gatenby, president, Clearwater, Nebraska.

Central Illinois, at Beardstown, Illinois, September 4 and 5. Agnes Minton, secretary.

Western Michigan, at Marion, September 10, 11, and 12. Reports are desired from all departments at this time. John Schreur, president, Freesoil, Michigan.

Convention Notices

The Women's Department of the New York and Philadelphia District will meet in convention at Bloomsburg, Pennsylvania, during the conference, September 4, 5, and 6. Mrs. J. R. Lentell, organizer.

All-day Meetings

There will be an all-day meeting at Allenton, Michigan, August 22. Everybody come and bring your baskets. Come early and stay all day, and help to liven up the little town. William H. Sheffer, president, Ubly, Michigan.

There will be an all-day meeting at Minden City, September 5. Shabbona holds a two-day meeting September 11, 12. Marlette will hold an all-day meeting September 19. Dinner will be served at 35 cents; supper 25 cents. Bring your baskets to the two former meetings. William H. Sheffer, president, Ubly, Michigan.

"Lucky to Have Attended a Junior College."

An extract from a letter recently received from one of Graceland's graduates who recently presented his credits at one of the great universities of the country may be of general interest:

"The registrar and other professors that I talked to said that I was lucky to come from a junior college and be ready for a business course with a quarter's work. Some have to take two or three quarters.

"It made me feel pretty good when I saw the registrar fill out the card which showed that Graceland was fully accredited. I know it saved me a great deal of red tape."

There are going to be a great number of other "lucky" young people at Graceland this next year. Will you be among the number?

Our Departed Ones

BURDICK.—Mary J. Burdick, aged 51 years, was a member of the Boyne City Branch for a number of years. Died at the Petoskey Hospital July 19, 1920. Leaves husband, 2 brothers, and many friends to mourn. She was of a kind and loving disposition, and will be greatly missed.

COOPER.—Sarah Stone Cooper was born in Michigan in 1849. Married W. Stone at Amboy, Illinois, in 1867. He died in Idaho in 1887 and she moved to Lone Rock, near Lamoni, where she married E. W. Cooper in 1900. Died very suddenly of apoplexy at Lamoni, Iowa, July 24, 1920. Three sons and 3 daughters are living, and all attended her funeral. She was baptized in her youth at Amboy, Illinois. Sermon by H. A. Stebbins, assisted by Peter Muceus.

JONES.—Maude Winnie Edwards was born July 5, 1877. Died July 19, 1920. Married L. T. Jones, September 29, 1908. Baptized July 6, 1902, by Joseph J. Emmett. Death resulted from operation at Wesley Hospital, July 17. Leaves to mourn, husband, 6 sisters, and 3 brothers. Services from the home in charge of J. A. Tanner. Burial in Quindaro Cemetery.

STIVERS.—Annie M. Jones was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, January 5, 1839. Died at Irvington, California, July 4, 1920. Married Simeon Stivers, September 12, 1858, who preceded her in death 22 years. She became a bride in the house in which she died, making a home there for over 62 years. Was the mother of 5 sons and 3 daughters, Letitia, Simeon, Charlotte, Samuel, Champion, Annie, Mark, and Edward. Besides her 7 children she leaves to mourn, 9 grandchildren, 6 great-grandchildren, and many other relatives and friends. Baptized in childhood. Her home was always open to the missionaries and together with her husband she entertained many of the pioneers of the gospel in California, among these Alexander and David Smith, W. W. Blair, J. W. Gillen, and J. C. Clapp. Many of the more recent missionaries will remember her for services rendered them, especially at the Irvington reunions. Interment beside her husband in the I. O. O. F. Cemetery, Irvington. J. A. Saxe officiated at the funeral which took place from the home. A devoted wife, loving mother, liberal neighbor, and faithful child of God has gone to a glorious reward.

GLASIER.—Orson Nephi Glasier was born August 9, 1902, at Romney, Ontario, Canada. Baptized October 22, 1910, at Chatham, Ontario, by Stewart Lamont; confirmed by G. M. Shippy, D. Snobelen, and S. Lamont. Died June 28, 1920. Deceased at the time of death was living at Bala, Ontario, with his mother and sister, where they had gone for the benefit of his health, some ten months ago. He had many severe afflictions during his life, but had recovered each attack, and at the time he was taken was enjoying the best of health, and had gone to the river for a morning bath, when in some unknown way, was overcome by water. Medical aid was summoned, but could do nothing, death being from heart failure, due to shock. Leaves to mourn his mother, sister, and grandmother. His sudden death has cast a shadow over his home, and among his many friends, where he was a great favorite. The remains were brought from Bala to Chatham, where the funeral service was held at the Saints' church, in charge of J. C. Dent, of Bothwell, assisted by A. R. Hewitt. Interment in Rosedale Cemetery, Tilbury, Ontario, where his father and brother are buried.

CHAPMAN.—William Franklin, son of Brother and Sister Edmund K. Chapman, was born at Higbee, Missouri, October 7, 1918. Died July 15, 1920, of diphtheria. Besides father and mother, he leaves one brother, Bertram Kelso, to mourn. D. T. Williams held a short service at the home, assisted by Samuel Smith.

JONES.—Abram Jones was born in Abadaire, Wales, about 75 years ago. Came to America when a young man, locating in Maryland, but later in Illinois and Iowa, and for the past thirty years has been a resident of Taylorville, Illinois, where he died July 19, 1920, after three weeks of intense suffering which followed 6 years of failing health. In September, 1872, married Miss Ann Jones at Saint Louis, Missouri. To their union were born 8 sons and 2 daughters, all of whom survive but two sons. Baptized July 25, 1875, by Abram Reese and has lived a life worthy of imitation. Ordained to the priesthood many years ago, and in June, 1912, ordained an elder. Was the first Latter Day Saint in Taylorville. Although he labored daily in the mines he did missionary work among his fellow workmen and through his instrumentality and upright life many were brought into the church. A branch was organized and a church builded, all through his untiring efforts. He was often spoken of as the father of the Taylorville Branch and was loved and respected by everyone in and out of the church. He will be sadly missed by all with whom he was associated and the large concourse of fellow workmen, friends, and relatives who paid the last tribute of respect, bore evidence of the high esteem in which he was held. Funeral services from Latter Day Saint church, with Luther Simpson (whom he convinced of the gospel) in charge, and sermon by Walter L. Daykin.

PENROD.—Floyd E., son of Brother and Sister A. D. Penrod, of Hereford, Oregon, was born at Ogden, Utah, May, 1895. Baptized at the age of twelve. Married Gladys Fletcher of Boise, Idaho, June, 1919. Died at Baker City, Oregon, July 14, 1920, from a mastoid operation. Survived by wife and three-weeks-old baby. Funeral conducted at Boise, Idaho, July 17, by T. B. Jackson. Interment in Morris Hill Cemetery.

RICHARDS.—Joseph C. Richards was born April 13, 1849, at Scranton, Pennsylvania. At 16 he had mastered the brass and iron molding trade. Later he came west to Denver, Colorado, laboring there and in Leadville until 1881. Married Lillie M. Scanlon, May 1, 1880, and moved to Iowa. In 1885 removed to North Platte, Nebraska. Since then he has engaged in engineering, farming, and carpentering. Six children were born, three of whom have preceded him in death. Baptized in 1887. Died at his home in North Platte, Nebraska, August 10, 1920. Was well respected and leaves a host of friends. Sermon by C. W. Prettyman.

BULLIS.—Henry Enoch Bullis was born February 28, 1854, at Clarenceville, Quebec, Canada. Removed to Cass County, North Dakota, in 1878, where he lived until the time of his death, June 14, 1920. He always manifested a respect for God and religion, but never united with any church until he heard the restored gospel, and was baptized in 1913, at Fargo, North Dakota. Married Josephene Herz at LaCrosse, Wisconsin, February 23, 1893, and to them were born 5 children, all of whom still remain at home, and with wife and mother mourn the loss of a kind father and husband. Funeral from the Presbyterian church at Chaffee, North Dakota. Sermon by J. E. Wildermuth.

WHITING.—Frank Alonzo Whiting was born in 1871, at Old Clitherall, Minnesota, where he grew to manhood. In 1893 he married Elsie Fletcher, they making their home at Henning, Minnesota, for several years, when they moved to Ryder, North Dakota, where they homesteaded Government land, and after proving up, went to Canada, and again took land. Died in the hospital at Minot, North Dakota, June 19, 1920, after a serious operation, and was taken to Clitherall, Minnesota, for burial. Of their 6 children, 4 remain to mourn, together with their mother. Funeral in Presbyterian church at Clitherall, as the Saints' church was too small. Sermon by J. E. Wildermuth.

SMITH.—Lawrence Clyde Smith was born January 31, 1874, at Blair, Nebraska. Died very suddenly with apoplexy, at Houston, Texas, July 31, 1920. Leaves wife, one daughter, mother, and 3 brothers. Baptized April 9, 1899. Ordained an elder June 14, 1910, by Hubert Case and S. S. Smith. Served his country for two years in the Philippines during the Spanish-American war in 1898. Married Marietta Dietrick, June 7, 1903, at Hobart, Oklahoma. Elected sheriff of Kingfisher, Oklahoma, November 8, 1910; reelected in November, 1912. Was working in Houston to the time of his death as a public accountant. Worked continually in church work, and his mind was ever on the advancement of God's work.

VENNARD.—Matthew Vennard was born July 15, 1846, at Arthur, Ontario. Died July 26, 1920, at Portage-la-Prairie, Manitoba. Baptized January 24, 1904, by Alvin Knisley. He suffered an attack of acute appendicitis, and passed peacefully away after an operation for same. Brother Vennard had lived an exemplary life, was held in highest esteem by neighbors and friends, and will be greatly missed by all. He leaves wife, 4 daughters, one son, and 5 grandchildren to mourn. Services at the residence of a brother-in-law, Robert Henry. Sermon by W. B. Richards.

MCLOUT.—Frederick McClout was born August 31, 1842, near Union Deposit, Crawford County, Pennsylvania. Died August 7, 1920. Married Elizabeth Houser, May 30, 1866, who died in 1900. To them were born 4 boys and 2 girls, three of them having preceded him in death. Married Eliza Maxwell, July 20, 1903. Both were baptized in 1911. Deceased served his country all through the Civil War. Came to Iowa in 1879 to Mechanicsville, and later to vicinity of Anamosa, where he spent the remainder of his life. Leaves wife, 2 sons, and one daughter, and many relatives and friends. Services at the home. Sermon by Edwin Love.

OLSEN.—Soren Olsen was born in Norway, December 9, 1835. Came with his parents to America when 6 months old, they settling in La Salle County in the same year. Married Sophia Danielson December 21, 1857. To this union 3 children were born, 5 of whom are still living. In 1865 the family located on a farm five miles from Kempton, Illinois, where they resided about 37 years. Ten years before the death of his wife they moved to Kempton, living there together until his wife passed away, December 24, 1913. Brother Olsen continued his residence in Kempton until about four years ago, when he went to live among his children. Died July 24, 1920, at the old homestead, the present home of his son Jacob and wife. His sickness was of short duration, having been taken ill only three days before his death. Baptized July 16, 1866, at Mission, Illinois, by Thomas Hoagas. Confirmed by Andrew Hayer and Thomas Hoagas. His life was a grand exemplification of his profession. He was honored and loved by all who knew him, and in his passing the world has lost one who helped to make it better. Sermon by J. L. Cooper. Hundreds of his old neighbors and friends were present to pay their last respects to this worthy man. Interment in Broughton Township Cemetery.

Conference Minutes

WESTERN COLORADO.—At Delta, August 7, 8. Institute meetings were held previous to the conference. Apostle J. F. Curtis was present and preached some very stirring gospel sermons. Street meetings were held in the evening, before the evening services. Both prayer meetings were well attended, and the Spirit was present to a marked degree. At the election of officers Chester Young was chosen as district president; Amos T. Higdon, vice president; J. T. Scannell, secretary; David S. Boyd, of Ouray, Colorado, treasurer and Bishop's agent. John T. Scannell, secretary, Durango, Colorado.

EASTERN OKLAHOMA.—August 7 and 8, with Wilburton Branch. Officers elected: J. Arthur Davis, president; G. C. Smallwood, secretary-treasurer. B. F. Brown was ordained priest, and J. E. Kelsey to office of elder. Next conference at Fort Towson, date to be decided Doctor G. Stanley Hall has resigned as president of Clark University, and will give his time henceforth to literary work, publishing the results of some of his many years of research in the college.

It is stated in a recent Christian Union Quarterly that in the survey by the Federal Council of Churches made in 1920, the entire Protestant population of our country falls short of three million of the 1906 census estimate of the seating capacity of six sevenths of the Protestant churches. This deficiency, however, loses sight of the large number of people who are not affiliated with any church organization.

In all the discussion concerning church unity, it must be remembered that the plan laid down so far provides only for a federation, not for any approach to organic unity. Various denominations will be left distinctive to carry on their own particular work. There doubtless, however, will be some method to avoid duplication of effort, as has already been the case in foreign mission fields.

An amendment to the Federal Constitution providing for woman's suffrage became the law on August 19, when Tennessee became the 36th State to ratify. This is decidedly a step forward for human progress. As we write, every effort is being made to rescind the action or nullify it in some way.

The wireless telephone has progressed to that point that newspaper men coming from England, while still twelve hundred miles away, were able to communicate by telephone with Saint Johns, Newfoundland. They were also able to give a concert to another steamer hundreds of miles away, the other steamer, of course, also possessing wireless telephones.

At a recent meeting held in Canada objection was made as to the propriety of the use of "empire" in connection with Great Britain. The term most frequently used was "the British Commonwealth." It is of interest to note how very large a measure of autonomy has been granted to the various British colonies. The extension of organization and control is at a minimum. Independent government is the rule rather than the exception.

Prayers are desired for Mrs. Rose Land, Nutana, Saskatchewan, who is very sick with tuberculosis.

the cost of ink. Despite this fact, we are informed by Bishop McGuire that the expense of the Blue Stepping Stones this year was only $216.89. This is due solely to the fact that the names of schools only were published, except in case of a few individuals who sent their offering direct to the Presiding Bishop's office. If all names had been published of all who joined in the splendid success of the 1919 Christmas offering, it not only would have taken a great deal of paper, but would have cost the church several thousand dollars.

Heman Hale Smith, assistant church historian, acted as master of ceremonies at the Davis City reunion. This is an old settlers' reunion, and is a local affair of the town. Usually there are several speakers of note, and the duty of the master of ceremonies is to introduce them and look after the afternoon platform work.

Elder S. A. Burgess and wife returned recently from Montana after their vacation, much refreshed with the trip and ready to take up again their respective duties.

Apostle W. M. Aylor has received word that the British Embassy at Washington has refused him the privilege of entering South Africa as a missionary in the interests of the church. It is supposed that this includes all the appointees to that country. No doubt the matter will be appealed and likely in due time decided in favor of the church.

Letter from H. H. Passman, dated Jerusalem, July 4, announces his arrival there safely. He began preaching services at Nice, and opened a school for English.

The little six-months-old son of Elder and Sister Wilfred Tordoff, located at Neuva Gerona, Isle of Pines, died on August 2 at the age of six months. The Tordoffs are there on a mission for the church in that West Indian island.

The two-day meeting at Butman, Michigan, the last day of July and August 1 was a spiritual feast to all the Saints attending. There were eight sermons, one question meeting, one priesthood meeting, two prayer meetings, one child blessed, and one baptism. There was one gift of prophecy—admonition on preparation for living in Zion. Everybody satisfied. (From local reporter.)

Mary Leland Carter desires the prayers of the Saints in behalf of her husband, who is afflicted with lung trouble.

How much Tithing Do I Owe is the title of a new booklet issued by the Presiding Bishopric for general distribution. It is a very plainly written explanation of this important subject, and should be in the hands of every member who does not fully understand the financial law of the church.

"We desire to express our sincere gratitude to our many friends for their many acts of kindness administered during the sickness and death of our dear mother, and for the sympathy extended and expressed in the many letters of condolence." Albert V. Karlstrom, Laura Karlstrom, Pa-peete, Tahiti.

Bishop B. R. McGuire is in the East, but is expected to return to Independence in about two weeks. Bishop J. F. Keir left on the 20th for the reunion at Stewartville, and will visit Lamoni, then go on to Montrose for the reunion of the Nauvoo District and that of Northeastern Illinois. He is traveling by auto and accompanied by his family. The Bishopric expect to move into offices in the Battery Building about October 1. It is likely the Presidency, Twelve, and Recorder will occupy present office building near the church.

A millinery company conducted by members of the church in a city of five thousand population, located within 125 miles of Kansas City, desires the services of a Latter Day Saint saleslady. Anyone interested should correspond with the Presiding Bishopric, Box 256, Independence, Missouri.

Miss Estella Wight, editor of Stepping Stones, expects to attend the Indian reunion at Red Rock, Oklahoma, and will assist her uncle, J. W. Wight, in reporting patriarchal blessings.

The new radio school at Independence, under the auspices of Central Radio Company, Inc., is enrolling a class for September 7, to include radio-telegraph and radiophone, with day and evening classes. It is in charge of Arthur B. Church and Paul Anway, the building located at 513 West Lexington Street, and the school known as the Central Radio School.

Word from Elder L. O. Wildermuth says he and Brother Ray Whiting closed a series of meetings at Marion on the 16th with fourteen baptisms. A splendid spirit was manifested. Those baptized were excellent people and will be a great help to the work in Marion. Meetings are now being held six miles from Goreville, with large attendance and good interest.

FROM THE BRANCHES

Fort Collins, Colorado. Sunday, August 8, a busy day. Visiting Saints present from Eustis, Nebraska, Scotts Bluff, Chappell, and Greely, Colorado. A promising young man, an ex-Baptist, was added to our number by baptism, Elder George F. Bullard, pastor, officiating.

Which Side Are You On?

OUR GOAL

PULL, BOYS! PULL!

Of course, all of us are rooting for Captain Consecration and his loyal teammates. But our shouts of encouragement will help but little. Their opponents are accustomed to such noise and attach but little significance to it. Something is needed which speaks louder than words.

Captain Selfishness and his kindred associates are alert to their own interests. Their mission in life is to look out for self. They are well-trained and the victors of many conflicts. They rejoice in their power and are confident of walking away with this contest.

But Captain Consecration and his devoted workers have each entered the contest with his whole heart, might, mind, and strength. They are determined to win the prize—not to consume it upon themselves but to turn it into the Lord's work that the blessings of the gospel may go to every nation, kindred, tongue, and people.

The opposing side has its host of friends rooting for it. We can count upon the gameness of our boys to the last, but it is not fair to leave them alone.

LET US SHOW OUR COLORS! The waving of tithing receipts will manifest the measure of our devotion. Their rustle will encourage and energize the tithing team, and at the same time unnerve their opponents and break down their boasted morale. With a WHOO! and HURRAH! our boys will then pull them over the line.

PULL, BOYS! PULL! and we will wave the tithing banners!

Yours for A MILLION DOLLARS TITHING,

Benjamin R. McGuire, Presiding Bishop.

The Issue of the League of Nations

It is rarely that we refer to the political situation in our columns. But the political situation affects not only the economic and social, but also the religious situation to-day and limits what can be done by the church.

There exists, not only in America, but throughout the world, diverse theories of economics, variously stated. There are countless great issues of opinion. On one side is the principle of laissez faire, and extreme individualism. On the other extreme there would probably be found communism, which would demand a community, not only of capital and labor, and of the products of labor, a service of one for all, but of all property, in theory at least.

Without taking either extreme, there still does exist a natural division, which is sometimes referred to as conservatism, standpatism, or reactionary, and on the other hand—liberal or progressive. As we have already stated this issue in a recent HERALD (page 595), and as the issue is clearly stated there, yet it is hardly the division which is actually presented to the American people this fall. It certainly does not represent the issue between the two leading parties, the Republican and Democratic, as both have shown themselves at present to be reactionary.

Some attempt has been made to draw a distinction on the grounds of prohibition, but we note by the Christian Science Monitor of August 13, that the Anti-Saloon League has decided to make no recommendations. Law must be enforced. Both candidates agree on that.

But while the broad economic problems are not made a distinct issue in this campaign, and while the two leading parties do not offer directly such a division, there is still one thing which is made a prominent factor in this campaign, and which does present the elements of operation or of progression, and that issue is the League of Nations.

It is interesting in this connection to note the bitter attacks on the surrender of State rights in the formation of the Federal Constitution, and also the bitter attacks made upon Lincoln in his effort to preserve the Union. No doubt, if we go back far enough, we will find the attack made that those who favored the Nation were untrue to the tribe or duchy. That issue was fought out in the Middle Ages, when smaller groups combined to form a nation, or if we go still further back those who favored the formation of the tribe were alleged to be untrue to the family.

Experience has shown that no right personal liberty is lost in the recognition of family responsibility, nor does the family suffer in the recognition of the community interest and control.

While the issue is many times raised in different places of home rule for cities, and independence from the state in handling their affairs, yet it cannot be doubted that the recognition of state sovereignty makes far better conditions than would be the case if each city continued to maintain its complete autonomy.

It is clearly evident that the formation of a federal union, which is after all more than a confederacy, while it requires a surrender of certain rights of the state, does not destroy state sovereignty, nor does it injure the citizens of the state, but quite reverse.

Some attack the League of Nations, on the ground that prophecy declares that there will be still wars and rumors of wars. Still, what better preparation can there be made for the reign of the Prince of Peace than the attempt to practice the doctrine of cooperation, of justice, of equality, and of peace.

We remember a few years ago when an argument was made on the floor of General Conference against a resolution in favor of peace, on the ground that the prophecies declared that there would be wars, and who are we to oppose "the Supreme Ruler of the Universe"? But though modern revelation declares that there will be war, though the Bible also declares there will be war, yet our Example, and Master, and Elder Brother was called the Prince of Peace, and we are commanded to-day to lift an ensign of peace. Doctrine and Covenants 1:6 informs us that peace is to be taken from the earth, but 95:3 informs us that we should proclaim peace, and 102:11, that we should sue for peace, and should lift an ensign of peace and make a declaration of peace unto the ends of the earth. We are also informed in 36:6 that peace is the habitation of God's throne.

It does not become us as a church to take a political part and favor one party or another as such. But it is our place to consider the constitutional law of the land, to select honest men and wise men, diligently, and to seek to uphold them. (Doctrine and Covenants 95:2.) This evidently refers to the men in political positions, whose duty it is to administer the law of the land, and in legislative capacity to make the law of the land, in order that the constitutional law of the land may be upheld.

It is also our duty to seek to bring to pass and uphold economic justice and brotherly love, as set forth in the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, acting on the principle of what can I do, and not what can I get out of it for myself; but rather what can I do for the benefit of others including my own household.

Senator Harding's Promise to the Indians

[The following correspondence and clipping is sent us by William Madison. The article referred to in Brother Madison's letter is the one by him published in the HERALD, July 28, last.—EDITORS.]

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, August 19, 1920.

SENATOR HARDING,
Marion, Ohio.

Dear Mr. Harding: I inclose copy of a short article that I wrote which I want you to read, and tell me what kind of a stand you would take?

I want to know if the Indian has any redress if you are elected president, and I want you to answer this and not your campaign manager.

Respectfully,

(Signed) WILLIAM MADISON.

www.LatterDayTruth.org

MARION, OHIO, August 25, 1920.

MR. WILLIAM MADISON,
408 South Grand Avenue,
Independence, Missouri.

My Dear Mr. Madison: Your letter of August 19 has been brought to the attention of Senator Harding.

He desires me to express his appreciation of the editorial which you were so kind as to inclose.

By his direction, I am forwarding you a clipping from the Marion Daily Star of August 18, containing a report of his speech to the American Indian delegation on that day. I think that you will find it satisfactorily answers your query.

Very sincerely,

(Signed) GEORGE B. CHRISTIAN, Secretary.

A delegation of American Indians, some of them garbed in their native dress, called on Senator Warren G. Harding this afternoon to pay their respects and ask his aid in securing effective citizenship for the race. The nominee's assurance that the Indians will get a square deal if he is elected brought a round of applause.

The delegation consisted of some twenty members of the Society of American Indians, an organization formed by Indian students at the Ohio State university a number of years ago to advance Indian rights generally. It was headed by Thomas L. Sloan, of Washington, and consisted of representatives of a number of different tribes.

Acts as Interpreter

David Sincere, one of the delegation, acted as interpreter for those of the delegation who did not understand English. The senator was told that the Indians, as true American citizens, would like to have a voice in the management of their own affairs and have freedom of property and other rights according with citizenship.

Effective citizenship, Father Gordon, an Indian priest, told the senator they wished. He spoke of the thousands of Indians who fought in the World War and said the Indians feel that their record in the war showed them to be self-reliant. He also said that the last seven years of administration have been the saddest in the history of the race.

Doctor Carlos Montezuma, of Chicago, spoke of the Indians as being slaves to a "machine" and invited the nominee to come and see them in their homes. Mr. Sloan spoke of the part the Indians took in the World War and informed the Senator that a number of Chippewa Indians will be at the Minnesota State Fair to greet him upon the occasion of his address there.

Nominee Speaks.

Senator Harding expressed pleasure at the call of the Indians and also at their interest in party policies and party nominees. He told them something of the Indian history of Ohio.

"I have heard something about the dissatisfaction of many Indians residents," the senator said, "but it has not been my good fortune to hear of it in detail. I think we will agree about one basic principle, that the American Indian is as much entitled to a square deal as anybody in the republic, and if we are called to responsibility he will get it.

"Americans First"

"While we are talking about democracy and human rights, I think we had better bestow them on the native American rather than sacrificing American lives in trying to bestow it thousands of miles across the sea. I believe in bestowing them on Americans first. You take that message back to your people from me.

"Whether I am elected to the presidency or not, I am still a member of the Senate for a little while and I will be glad to add my voice and efforts to see that the Indian gets a square deal."

Seances

Before examining the law and the testimony on the conditions of those who have gone before us, now, in the millennium, and later, a warning should first be sounded concerning the usual seances.

Whether a people can seek out their God the living to hear from the dead, or whether some other power is manifest—in "familiar spirits," no one can study the record of the past one hundred years and not be convinced that the overwhelming majority of so-called manifestations are fakes.

About forty or fifty years ago an excellent tract was published by the church on spiritualism, or as it is now called, spiritism. Later M. H. Bond prepared a booklet under the title, "Spiritual gifts and manifestations." Both of these treat the phenomena as genuine, but of adverse powers.

To-day we are confronted not only by that factor, but also by plain fraud in probably ninety to ninety-eight per cent of the so-called manifestations.

We have noted many exposes in psychical journals, in books, and in more or less technical periodicals. There are many books which explain seances, magic, and sleight of hand. There have also appeared several write-ups in popular periodicals as is the case with a recent article in the Saturday Evening Post (April 24, 1920).

It is well that these deceptions be touched upon, lest any be misled by the seemingly remarkable results.

Part is to be explained by sleight of hand, handcuff tricks, and the like carried over into this field for purposes of profit. Often the plan is built up on some new scientific discovery perverted for superstitious ends. But back of it all there is a host of people who have been duped.

Some have gone to seances out of curiosity, others have bought books on spiritism, or lost loved ones. They are listed; information is secured as to name, address, age, where born, names of children living and dead, personal incidents in life of person listed. With this information in hand, of course "remarkable" private information of the past is given. As a rule an appointment must be made beforehand. This gives an opportunity to secure and consult this listed data.

Sometimes they do not have the data, but as the Saturday Evening Post relates, two Chicago women went to a fashionable spiritist parlor. They had never visited such a place before, and went out of curiosity, and did not even let their friends know. They found many there before them. After waiting for hours they were told apologetically that the "professor" could not see them to-day, but if they would leave their names an early appointment would be made. They gave fictitious names, and made an appointment for a few days later.

But they did not notice that they were shadowed through the rest of the day, and followed home. This man who followed them readily learned their real names, made inquiries in the neighborhood and gained much personal information. When they kept their appointment they were dumfounded to find that the wicked "spirits" had told their correct names, guided the professor's hand to write their true addresses, and revealed several intimate details of their life.

Another illustration:

"A small glass bowl was placed in the center of a table about which were grouped eight or ten persons. The one in charge suggested that each person write two or three questions, each on an exactly similar slip of paper. The questions were then signed, the paper wadded into tight balls and dropped into the bowl. No lights were extinguished at any time. All was visible from beginning to end. No one went near the bowl. The medium did not enter the room till all questions had been written and placed in the bowl. No one left the room either before or after she entered. No word was said to her and no sign given. Neither did any of the writing material leave the room or pass into or through the medium's hands.

"She entered, went directly to the chair left for her, searched the faces of the sitters a little, asked that the curtains be drawn, and began to summon spirits. After a few moments of concentration she took a wad from the bowl, held it loosely between her finger and thumb so that all could watch it, pressed the wad against her temple for a few minutes and then read off the question and answered it. The person who had written the question was required to say when an inquiry of his or hers had been asked and whether the answer seemed correct. In half an hour the medium ran through a list of twenty-odd questions and gave satisfactory if general answers to all. She made not one mistake. The ejaculations of wonderment were endless.

"How was it done? Very simple. First of all there was one confederate in the crowd. Second, every sitter had been looked up in advance and his history was thoroughly familiar to the medium. Third, in writing out his questions the confederate palmed his wads and only pretended to drop them into the bowl. When the medium pulled out the first wad and pressed it against her temple she read off not what was in this wad but what the confederate might have written on one of his slips. As she repeated the imaginary question the confederate jumped up excitedly and said, 'Correct, correct!' Then the medium answered this unasked question to further exclamations of approval and wonderment.

"The medium now unfolded the first wad, looked at it, nodded, and tore it up. The sitters supposed it to have been the question just answered. In reality it was the second question. The medium now took a second wad from the glass and pressed it against her temple, repeating as she did so the question written on the first wad and answering it from her foreknowledge of the sitter. Thus merely by being one ahead in the matter of the wads she ran through the whole bowlful with perfect ease.

These are but few examples out of very many. They represent neither divine, nor any other power, except human power to deceive.

But all this trickery does not affect in the least the real conditions of the dead, and the life hereafter. To the law and the testimony as given in the word of God.

We Are for a Return to New Testament Christianity

There appears in this week's issue a few extracts only from many which might be printed concerning the religious situation to-day. Not a few insist that the sectarian or Protestant world has failed in its work during recent years, and there is more and more seen the necessity for a return to the New Testament Christianity. For this we have no disagreement, since our church has so insisted for the past ninety years. We must return to the plan laid down by Jesus.

There are some who object to a reconciliation between any of the factions into which this church has broken in the past seventy years. This is well answered by a recent story in the Christian Union Quarterly, concerning the man who tried to reconcile a husband and wife. It seemed that neither of them could say things too mean about the other. Finally their child took each by the hand and led them together. Their mutual love for the child brought about a reconciliation. Should we then insist that they separate because of the harsh things which had been said? Does it mean that there can be no reconciliation because of unkind and even bitter things which have been said in the past?

We are in complete sympathy with the idea of a cooperation, so far as community work is concerned, and social work.

We are also in complete sympathy with the idea that non-essentials should be laid to one side, and that there should be with us the spirit of reconciliation. There should be a spirit of reconciliation and conciliation for the purpose of bringing about a unity of effort for righteousness.

Nevertheless, when the Master prayed that his disciples might be one, he was not praying simply for an individual agreement, but for a unity in accordance with his teachings, a unity based upon truth as he had given it. There must of course be the willingness of the heart to try to work together, but there must also be the willingness of the head to understand the word of God, and work in accordance with his divine direction.

"If ye continue in my way, then are ye my disciples indeed."

"If a man love me, he will keep my word, and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him and make our abode with him."—John 14: 23.

The idea that some have that such a unity can be brought about without a head contradicts the very statement of the Master, "There shall be one fold and one shepherd," though he himself be that shepherd. We must of course set aside all man-made creeds. We must of course set aside all that has been added since the teachings of the apostles that contradicts it, and all that has not been given of God. But there must of necessity be men raised up of God, inspired of him, true prophets for the leadership of the people, who are able to communicate with him, and act in accordance with his divine direction. Such is a necessity if any unity is to be achieved that will be approved of him. And we believe it is a necessity if any unity at all is to be reached.

Religious Education

The New York Board of Education recently voted to give a whole afternoon a week for the religious instruction of children by their own churches.

It has been found by investigation that the Jews give nearly one hour a day of religious instruction through the year, or about 335 hours a year. The Catholic children receive about two thirds that amount, or 200 hours a year, an average of four hours a week, but the Protestant Sunday schools offer only one half hour a week or twenty-four hours a year.

Of course these figures do not take into consideration the value of special sermons for children, and the value of children attending the regular services of the church. We are informed that some few other churches arrange to give religious instruction during the week, but when the New York Board of Education made this offer, the Protestant churches were found on the whole unprepared and not equal to the task, because of a lack of prepared teachers.

We are informed that only about one half of the fifty-three million children in the United States are enrolled in religious schools of any creed. Of Protestant children scarcely two in five receive any religious education, and that as pointed out, is very meager. In 1916 the enrollment of Protestant Sunday schools was reported as nearly twenty-two million, and in 1920, according to interchurch statistics, the total was less than sixteen million, a loss of over six million, two hundred thousand, despite the increase in the population of America during that four years. Furthermore, these figures include adult classes as well as the classes for children.

It should be self-evident to anyone giving the matter consideration that religious instruction to children must be in terms which they can understand. Joseph Smith, Sidney Rigdon, Frederick G. Williams, and Bishop Partridge were all reproved for neglecting the instruction of their children. (Doctrine and Covenants 90.) They were preaching enough; in fact so much they were neglecting this particular duty.

W. W. Phelps and Oliver Cowdery were directed to prepare books for the children. (Doctrine and Covenants 55:57.) But they too felt they had "more important" work to do. So they failed in this. It would appear then to be self-evident that inspiration directs special instruction for the children. Evidently, also, preaching to the church is not enough.

Partly this need may be covered by special sermons by those prepared to teach children. The Sunday school covers a small part, but there is still a need for a considerable extension, and this is more so in the face of the growing tendency to decrease religious instruction in the young people's or Religio Department. Provision should be made for more adequate religious instruction, and this will require prepared teachers.

The New York Board of Education has made the offer for that State. If this opportunity is extended in the educational system of the country those who are forehanded will be prepared to take advantage of it. In any event, those who are ready will take care that their children do not suffer from lack of proper instruction in religious lines regardless of state action.

An Ancient American Ruin

The Denver Post of August 1 reports the discovery at Aztec, New Mexico, of a sealed room by Doctor Clark Wissler. This room was found in perfect condition. It surpasses in beauty and state of preservation any previously found in America, according to Doctor Wissler. The interior is plastered and painted in brilliant white, with deep red side borders, and a running series of triangular designs. A sacred serpent carved in wood decorates the ceiling. It is of the finest workmanship, and two and a half feet long. Strands of finely made rope hang down from the ceiling, and on the floor there were a large number of finely cut stone slabs. Several adjoining rooms are not as yet uncovered.

The ceilings were of wood, supported by great logs of cedar and spruce, overlaid by split cedar and bark. Some of them had been burned and lay in the lower rooms in great charred masses. As the fire did not reach to the west side, there are a large number of rooms with their ceilings still intact, and household utensils on the floor.

The Growth of the Church

The Home Missions Council gives circulation to the following: "There are 202 denominations in the United States. Thirty-one new denominations were born in ten years and seventeen died. Of all the people in the United States 41,926,854 are church members, an increase of 6,860,000 in ten years, or 20 per cent. There are 227,000 churches, an increase of 15,000. The value of church property is $1,676,000,000, an increase of $420,000,000 in ten years. There are 15,721,815 Roman Catholics. From this number should be deducted 15 per cent for infants and children, all of which are included in the Roman Catholic statistics. Less than one third of the church members in the United States are Roman Catholics. The Roman Catholic proportion in the total membership was 40½ per cent in 1900; in 1919 it was 37½ per cent. In ten years the Roman Catholics gained 10 3-5 per cent, while the Protestant churches gained 23 2-5 per cent. The Baptists gained 26 1-5 per cent; the Disciples, 24 4-5 per cent; the Presbyterians, 23 1-5 per cent; the Methodists and Episcopalians, 23 1-5 per cent; the Congregationalists and Lutherans, 13 per cent. The Universalists are losing, having to-day only 59,000 members. The Unitarians have only 82,000. The percentage of men in nearly all Protestant churches is increasing. It is now 43 9-10 per cent. The average ministerial salary among the Northern Methodists is $1,223; among the Congregationalists, $1,343; Northern Presbyterians, $1,474; Episcopalians, $1,632, and Unitarians, $2,080.—Brooklyn Daily Eagle, July 5, 1920.

It is of interest to note that the church recorder reported to the conference of 1917 a gain for ten years, January 1, 1907, to January 1, 1917, of 41 per cent. However, an examination would appear to indicate that this was comparing December 31, 1907, with December 31, 1916, a period of only nine years and is a little over 42 per cent. The membership December 31, 1918, as reported to the General Conference of 1919 (the last statistical report to the church) with the membership December 31, 1908, as reported to the conference of 1909, we note an increase of over 51 per cent for the ten-year period.

Interchurch Movement

There is much in the papers of to-day concerning the cause of the failure of the Interchurch World Movement. The Wall Street Journal states that its purpose was to raise means for the better remuneration of pastors. This is a new idea of its fundamental purpose, which was supposed to be the unity of the Christian churches. Labor papers declare that it was because of the withdrawal of the support by big business, principally because of the report on the steel strike, which it seems has only been published in very small part, and then at this late date.

The Christian Union Quarterly declares that its fundamental difficulty was denominationalism, and instead of the funds being secured for the work of Interchurch, the drive became instead a divided one to provide means for the different denominations only.

When we were in the West we attended one of the community churches, and heard the rather surprising declaration that the Methodist Church, the Presbyterian, the Christian, Congregational, and Baptist Churches had agreed that they would enter into no arrangements for a community church which was not placed in charge of one of these denominations. The drive was made fundamentally for denominational funds.

Subjects Being Discussed

Difference of Opinion on Sugar Shortage

There are many contradictions in the statements concerning the sugar situation. The sugar interests, of course, are insisting that there is a shortage, and state that a special agent of the Department of Justice agrees that there is a shortage, and the present price must continue. But the department itself gives figures showing a total of 11,178,000,000 pounds produced in this country and imported. There were exported 1,444,000,000 pounds, leaving a total for the United States of 9,743,000,000 pounds. The average annual stock for the last three years has been only 8,428,000,000 pounds. And when prices were the highest there were in the United States 1,300,000,000 pounds more than is ordinarily received within a year. There appears, however, to be some difference in opinion on this matter of excess.

The Jew in Palestine

BY HARRY PASSMAN

"In the morning thou shalt say, Would God it were even! and at even thou shalt say, Would God it were morning!"

God mentioned a list of blessings that would attend the children of Israel if they kept his commands. He drew another picture of a darker hue and stated that Israel would experience this if they failed to come up to the requirements. It was definitely stated that Israel would be scattered among all people, from one quarter of the earth even unto the other, "and among these nations thou shalt find no rest." Undoubtedly this part of the program has been fulfilled in part, and possibly in its entirety, and to-day we see Israel gathering back to the land of promise. One may think the spirit of distress mentioned above is a thing of the past, but we need only to focus our eyes on Israel in the land of promise to learn that the very conditions of sadness mentioned by Moses are existent to-day.

"Ye That Labor and Are Heavy Laden"

Many of the children of Israel are treading over the hot, stony paths of Jerusalem without shoes on their feet, their legs and shoulders exposed to the merciless rays of the ever-shining sun, flesh burnt to a reddish-black, and the body thickly sprinkled with sores. A scanty supply of clothing made of a burlap sack hangs over one shoulder, covering a portion of the body, and a piece of filthy cloth wound around the head, hanging down in the back, to serve as a hat. I visited the home of one of these unfortunate persons and here I found six people occupying two rooms, one of which was about twelve by twelve feet in size, and the other about half as large. The floors of the Jerusalem houses are made of stone, ill fitted and very rough; the side walls resemble the floors except that they are made of plaster. There was a scanty supply of furniture, and it harmonized in every respect with the balance of the interior decorations. Our conversation was a jargon and we did not proceed very far until we drifted into religion, and to my great astonishment, the gentleman told me he believed in the law and the prophets, and the prophets of the Old Testament mentions the Christ, and he believed that Jesus is the Savior of the world. It was during this conversation that the gentleman gave expression to the innermost thoughts of his mind, caused by the anguish of his soul, "A few more years and this misery will be over!" My mind reflected back: "In the morning thou shalt say, Would God it were even! And at even thou shalt say, Would God it were morning!" The fate of this poor man is shared by thousands in the Holy Land, and it extends to Arabs, East Indians, Turks, and many others.

A thoughtful eye and a sad expression are noticeable upon the countenance of the Israelite, and when you see him standing upon the street corner, with a small round table containing delicacies which he has for sale, prayer book in hand, chanting his daily prayer that consumes hours, one cannot help but think that he has a godly zeal, but not according to knowledge.

The Fulfillment of the Promise

Some of the Israelites are highly elated over the thought of the land reverting back, and it is acting as a stimulant to spur them on to greater activity. The incoming Jew believes the time is fully ripe for the coming of the Messiah; the native Jew agrees. Little do they think the stage is being set for the great drama of Zechariah 14: "For I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle; and the city shall be taken, and the houses rifled, and the women ravished. Then shall the Lord go forth, and fight against those nations, as when he fought in the day of battle. And his feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, and the Mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west, and there shall be a great valley; and half of the mountain shall remove toward the north, and half toward the south, and ye shall flee to the valley of the mountains." Here we believe they shall meet the Christ, and ask the question, "What are these wounds in thine hands? And he shall answer, Those with which I was wounded in the house of my friends."

The recent attack on the Jews by the Arabs, in which several were killed and many wounded, is only a manifestation of the inward hatred that is rapidly developing in Israel's neighbor. The Arab does not hesitate to state openly that the Jew will never rule this land; he is willing to give his life to prevent it. Imagine this fervent hatred developing in the mind of man, and even if it is suppressed for years, will this reduce it? Those that know the Arab best, say, "He never forgives." It will continue to grow until, like gas, when it has sufficient pressure it will burst. I believe the bursting time will take place when the above prophecy has its fulfillment. Of course, this does not mean that no local quarrels will take place in the interim, for with the people keyed up to the highest pitch, quarrels are bound to result, and in the Near East quarrels mean murder.

The Weak and Foolish Things

BY E. R. DAVIS

"The weak and foolish things mentioned in the word of God do not mean that God is going to use the unlearned and ignorant to accomplish his work," says this author.

"For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel: not with wisdom of words, lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect. For the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness; but unto us which are saved it is the power of God. For it is written, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent. Where is the wise? where is the scribe? where is the disputor of this world? hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? For after that in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe. For the Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom: but we preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumbling-block, and unto the Greeks foolishness; but unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God. Because the foolishness of God is wiser than men; and the weakness of God is stronger than men. For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called: but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty; and base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to naught things that are: that no flesh should glory in his presence. But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption: that, according as it is written, He that glorifieth, let him glory in the Lord."—1 Corinthians 1: 17-31.

What is meant by the weak, foolish, and simple things with which God is going to break down the mighty and destroy the wisdom of the wise? Does it mean that God's servants are to be weak, foolish, unlearned, illiterate, and ignorant?

Why did God choose Joseph Smith and so many other unlearned men in the early days of the church, as well as in the early part of the Reorganization? Was it because he could make better use of an uneducated person? Were these men who accomplished so much in the Lord's work weak, foolish, and simple in the sight of God, or only in the eyes of the world?

In the scripture just quoted from the Corinthian letter, Paul refers to the things of God as being foolishness in the eyes of the world, and that the things which the world looks upon as being foolish, weak, and simple will the Lord use to break down and destroy that which the world looks upon as strong and mighty; and that which the world might look upon as the foolishness of preaching, is, after all, in the wisdom of God, for the world by their wisdom knows not God and cannot find him by that means.

When Paul said, "For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel: not with wisdom of words," he did not mean that he could not and would not baptize, neither did he intend to contradict the statement of James, that if any lack wisdom let him ask of God, but he had reference to the wisdom of words as the world uses it. The foolish and weak things in the eyes of the world are really the wise and strong things in the sight of God. And the base things according to the views of the world and the things which the world despises are not base and despised in the sight of God. And in the 26th verse of the before-mentioned scripture Paul states that not many wise, mighty, and noble after the flesh are called. This does not mean that those whom God calls are not wise, mighty, and noble in his sight, but only after the flesh from a worldly standpoint. A person may be well educated and still be considered weak and foolish by the world, as many of our noble men and women are.

Why Did God Choose Paul and Moses?

If God could have made better use of an unlettered man in the days of Paul, why did he choose a highly educated person like Paul? Surely he could have found plenty of unlearned ones in those days, and the same in the days of Moses who was learned in all the ways of the Egyptians. These men were weak and foolish in the eyes of the world but not in the eyes of God; they were wise and mighty men in his eyes. When an individual becomes weak in his own eyes and realizes his littleness before God and his inability to accomplish the great task imposed on him, he leaves himself open to the workings of the spirit of humility, and at that time becomes mighty in the sight of God; but, on the other hand, when a person becomes boastful and boasts of the wonderful things he has done and the wonderful things he will do, that person becomes weak and foolish in the sight of God.

It is true that Joseph Smith was an unlearned man when God chose him to begin a great work, but he did not remain unlearned, and in the fourteen years he was connected with the church, made great progress in an educational way, and sought to establish schools and houses of learning in every place where the Saints were established. His son and successor in the presidency of the church was an advocate of progress and education, and we need have no doubts as to the attitude of the grandson, Frederick M. Smith, on the question of education. But the question might arise, is it not possible that these advocates of education are in the wrong? The best way to settle this is to consult the word of God on the subject.

Some Historic Instances

In the Book of Mormon, the very first paragraph of the book, we learn that Nephi was born of goodly parents, and that he was taught in the learning of his father, which consisted of the learning of the Jews and the language of the Egyptians. Thus we see that both Lehi and Nephi were educated men. Turning now to Mosiah, 1: 2-6, we learn that the good king Benjamin caused that his three sons should be taught in all the language of his fathers, that they might become men of understanding and not suffer in ignorance, and that this good king was taught in the language of the Egyptians and was able to teach his children, they in turn to teach their children, and so fulfill the commandments of God.

Again in the Book of Mormon, chapter 4, verses 97 to 99, Moroni asks that neither he, nor his father, nor those who had written before his father be condemned for their imperfections, "but rather give thanks unto God that he has made manifest unto you our imperfections, that ye may learn to be more wise than we have been." Here we learn that we ought to be thankful to God that we have learned of the imperfections of our forefathers and learn to be more wise than they have been. The record goes on to state that if the plates had been sufficiently large so that they could have used the Hebrew language, there would have been no imperfections, showing that they were better versed in the Hebrew than in the Egyptian language.

Now turning to the first chapter of the same book we learn that Mormon, when he was about ten years of age, began to be learned somewhat after the manner of the learning of his people, and that Ammoron saw that he was a sober child and quick to observe, and that he should prepare himself to keep the record of his people when he reached the age of twenty-four years.

All of these references from the Book of Mormon approve of education rather than disapprove.

Modern Pronouncements Favoring Education

Now turning to Doctrine and Covenants, section 1, paragraph 4, we read of the fullness of the gospel to be proclaimed by the weak and the simple unto the ends of the world and before kings and rulers, and in paragraph 5 we read that these commandments were given to the Lord's servants in their weakness, that they might come to understanding; and inasmuch as they erred it might be made known, and inasmuch as they sought wisdom they might be instructed; and inasmuch as they were humble they might be made strong and receive knowledge from time to time. Here we see that weakness and humility bring strength and prepare the way for understanding, wisdom, and instruction, and prove to us that the Lord expects his people to make educational progress.

In section 85, paragraph 36, we read:

Therefore, verily I say unto you, my friends, Call your solemn assembly, as I have commanded you; and as all have not faith, seek ye diligently and teach one another words of wisdom; yea, seek ye out of the best books words of wisdom; seek learning even by study, and also by faith. Organize yourselves; prepare every needful thing, and establish a house, even a house of prayer, a house of fasting, a house of faith, a house of learning, a house of glory, a house of order, a house of God; that your incomings may be in the name of the Lord; that your outgoings may be in the name of the Lord; that all your salutations may be in the name of the Lord, with uplifted hands unto the Most High."

Here is a commandment to seek diligently by teaching and study, to obtain words of wisdom out of the best books, and to establish every needful thing, among which is a house of learning. Are we to narrow this down to the three standard books of the church? Or are we justified in the belief that the term best books will include other books than the three standard books of the church? For answer let us turn to section 87, paragraph 5, and read where Joseph Smith is to preside over the church and the school, and to study and learn, and become acquainted with all good books, and with languages, tongues, and people. Can anyone obtain a knowledge of languages, tongues, and people from the Bible, Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants alone? Are we not justified in the study of other books?

In section 90, paragraph 12, we read, "And verily I say unto you, that it is my will that you should hasten to translate my scriptures, and to obtain a knowledge of history, and of countries, and of kingdoms, of laws of God and man, and all this for the salvation of Zion." Much of the knowledge here mentioned cannot be procured from a study of the three standard books alone. And we should be thankful that there are men and women in the church broad-minded enough to see the necessity of obtaining this kind of knowledge for the salvation of Zion, and to obey the instructions of the Lord that it is his will that his people obtain this knowledge.

Now in paragraph 2 of section 55 we have a revelation directing that William W. Phelps be ordained to assist Oliver Cowdery in "printing, . . . selecting, and writing books for schools, in this church, that little children also may receive instruction before me as is pleasing unto me." Is this not making provision for education?

In section 122, paragraph 13, is a revelation directing a joint council of the Presidency, Twelve, and Bishopric, for the purpose of bringing about a more perfect understanding and accomplishment of the Lord's will, which he said should have been done before, "but the adversary hath hindered, desiring to prevent the success of my work in the earth." In accordance with this revelation the council met on April 20, 1894. (The names of those present are given in 1st paragraph of section 123.) Joseph Smith was chosen to preside, A. H. Smith offered prayer, and after a few remarks from the president and others, the first resolution passed is as follows: "Resolved that we look with favor upon the effort to build a college at Lamoni, to be controlled by the church. Resolved, further, that we believe it should be a purely educational institution and free from sectarian influences or bias. Resolved, further, that we give our hearty support to the present movement looking in the above direction."

Then a few years later the Lord spoke and said that the college debt should be paid, and that the ministry of the church should not throw obstacles in the way nor try to prevent the accomplishment of that with which the officers of the church had been intrusted. (125:16.) And in paragraph 11 of the same section the church is directed to provide tracts in several different languages, these tracts to be written by the ministry and others who have talent for writing. The accomplishment of this will require education.

Now turning to section 94, paragraph 3, we find provision made for "a place of instruction for all those who are called to the work of the ministry, in all their several callings and offices; that they may be perfected in the understanding of their ministry; in theory; in principle; and in doctrine; in all things pertaining to the kingdom of God on earth." And in section 119, paragraph 2, the ministry are told to "study to approve their ministrations to the people by candor in speech and courtesy in demeanor, that as ministers of the gospel they may win souls unto Christ." These two paragraphs imply education and instruction that the ministry might be better equipped in manner of speech and in their conduct before the people and in all duties pertaining to their office and calling.

Why Does Anyone Oppose?

In the light of all these scriptures it is hard to understand why some will oppose education and anything tending towards an improvement in manner of speech, pulpit conduct, etc. The only unlearned men whom the Lord has ever called who have made a lasting success in their ministry are those who have made constant progress towards education and have improved themselves by constant study and become self-educated men. The individual who will not try to improve his grammar, manner of speech, and pulpit decorum is nonprogressive and will not accomplish much of lasting good in the church. And the individual who will not accept private criticism offered in a true brotherly way, with the intent of helping him to overcome some of his imperfections, is placing a barrier in the way of his progress and in the way of the progress of the work in which he is engaged. Hail the day when all our men who occupy the pulpit will be blessed with a goodly supply of proper language and be able to clothe the Pearl of Great Price in such a setting that it will not be distasteful to the refined classes, of which many shall grace the threshold of Zion in her perfection of beauty.

The weak and foolish things mentioned in the word of God do not mean that God is going to use the unlearned and ignorant to accomplish his work. The rising generation will be far better equipped for the carrying out of God's purposes than the past generation, by reason of their educational opportunities. Not that education should or can take the place of the Spirit in the preaching of the gospel. No amount of education void of the Spirit can make a Latter Day Saint preacher. On the other hand, it is folly for us to say that an educated servant of God cannot and does not enjoy the Holy Spirit in his work as much as the uneducated man. And it is also folly for us to say that an educated man in possession of the Spirit is not better equipped for his work than an uneducated man even though he may enjoy the Spirit in his work.

May God's blessings continue to rest upon Graceland in her work of preparing sons and daughters for Zion's warfare.

Book of Mormon Rays on Scientific Paths—No. 16

Corum is also spelled Coram by Tucker (52). Hodge gives Cumera, Cumero, and Camero, as variations of Cumaro (371). Reclus says David was the capital of the Chiriqui in Panama (323:2), North America); and Joyce states that various types of axes, celts, metates, and ornamented stools, have been found around David (Central America and West Indian Archipelago, page 130). Hermanos includes three mountains on the south coast. It could be derived from Hermounts only if migratory movements carried the name to those parts, which is very possible. Alcedo gives Jacome as a river in Cumana (370:2). Hodge gives Xacoms and Jacoma as an ancient town in northern Mexico (627). Alcedo names Jeruma as a river in Paraguay (328:2); and Lamai as a place in Peru where a fortress and palace ruins are found (362:2).

Hodge says the Laymon (also spelled Laiman, Layamon, and Lamoines) were a Lower California tribe (753). For Laymans see Universal Geography, page 283, volume 3, by Reclus. Thomas names the Laman (79); also says "the northern Cachimi are mentioned by some authors as the Laymon (2). Laman is also given by others. Lehigh is identified with Lechau by Hodges (763). Both Mahaw and Maha are given by Pilling (1110). Alcedo locates Manta in the kingdom of Quito (443:2). Hodge says Huddle named it Mantas in 1662. Mocomo is located in Peru by Alcedo (310:3); and Moron is a river in the kingdom of Quito. He also identifies Mosina as a place in Cumana (347:3), and Morini as a river in Cumana. Reclus names Maroni as one of the greatest secondary rivers of the Guianas (18:2, South America), and gives the Morona as a large river flowing into the Amazons (90:2). Oneida is also spelled Oneidas, Oneydas, and Onejdas, by Hodge (125:2). Alcedo locates Sama in Peru, and Saman as a cape of Peru (378:4). Keane shows the village of Sama in Chile, and the River Sama at the south of Peru (Map). He also shows Sarai as a main division of a race south of Quito (Table). Except where otherwise noted, Keane's names are listed in his table of South American Stock Races and Languages, in the work previously named. Peihoun is also given as Peinhoun by Hodges (222:2), and was an old Indian village in Texas.

Other references might have been given for various names, some of which have been spelled in several ways (as for instance, Cuemani, shown on map of Rand, McNally & Co.), but the names already given are sufficient to prove the probability that the Book of Mormon names are genuine names of the aboriginal American people. The difficulty of constructing a system of spelling that would restore words perfectly to a pronunciation used over a thousand years ago, when no ancient lexicon was available, can be readily understood. These variations are therefore to be expected in at least most of these instances. Other sources give us words of somewhat different orthoepy and orthography which may nevertheless come from the same ancient origin. It is presumed that the Book of Mormon spelling conforms to the English method to the extent that the words themselves would permit, but very unusual words doubtless have a somewhat unusual spelling. It may not, then, always be correct to select the word having the most similar orthoepy, though this must be an important factor.

It is entirely possible, and in some cases probable, that names now pronounced and spelled somewhat differently sprang from a common source in the remote past. The Ay-mara race, according to Keane, lived around Titicaca largely. Markham's Grammar and Dictionary of Quichua gives us Amaru (page 71), and the Book of Mormon gives us Amaron, who was one of the last writers of the book and lived, according to accepted Book of Mormon geography, not so far from the land referred to but that his posterity could have settled there. In the remote past both names may have been derived from Amaron. Markham also gives us Amini, and this name suggests descendants of Ammon of Book of Mormon nomenclature. The Inca empire of Peru had an eastern division called Anti-suyu. Markham explains that "suyu" means a province. In other words it was an Anti province. The Book of Mormon gives us Ani-anti in practically that portion of the empire, and one or more other places beginning with "Anti" that could have been the source of the later name.

To-day a once great people are scattered in far places and broken into fragments of their one-time solidarity and power. But their record has been discovered and its contents revealed and published to the world. A Divine Providence moved upon his instruments of a New World disclosure in order to hold aloft the torch of intelligence to a benighted people.

When Columbus pleaded his cause before the reigning monarchs of his time he was actuated by no petty or specious notions. He was inspired by a great discovery so marvelous that, in their unbelief, these visionless rulers turned from him in derisive scorn, or solemn disapproval. The very newness of his startling revelations gave rise to suspicion in the minds of those whose wisdom was founded upon the conjectures of supposed sages of the past. But who is he that to-day can measure the good resulting from the tireless energy and perseverance of the great discoverer?

Since that day the face of the earth has altered its features, and many modern achievements are eloquent tributes of his praise. On every hand they speak to us and thrill our very souls by their potency. And he who was scorned by the wise, who suffered from the intrigues of the vile, and who languished in confinement through the inhumanity of fiends in human form, towers above us in his greatness to-day, while the shadow of his mantle falls on every land of the civilized world.

But of greater glory that earthly fame is this latter-day revelation, for it has made known to us the condescension of God and the supreme power of a transcendent love impartially shed upon all his creatures. He whispers to us from the earth mounds where a great nation now sleeps in the silent dust. He speaks from the cliff dwellings where once swarmed a turbulent and restless people. The elaborately carved temples and monuments are vibrant with new meaning as we read the sacred record that unfolds their mystery. And it tells us the same heaven-born story of him who came to his own as the Redeemer of all humanity.

The ignorance, superstition and prejudice of the world could not annul the wonders of natural law, and the New World lives to-day as the bulwark of civilization. So also the Book of Mormon, brought forth by Joseph the Seer, thrills us with its spiritual life, while its opponents lie in somber silence, buried in the failure of their unholy attack. It testifies of the God who "made of one blood all nations, to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation, that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him and find him." (Acts 17:26.) That the ancient Americans did feel after the Lord and find him is abundantly proven by all the evidence that could be reasonably required. Why should we not believe these truths?

To believe the Book of Mormon is to believe the voice of reason. Its historical accuracy is confirmed by the most careful modern research. The atmosphere of its pages is the atmosphere of faith, holiness, and purity. Its lofty precepts breathe an inspiration of purest harmony with the Bible. Its sublime truths impel a deeper consecration to God and a nobler purpose for the goal of life. It imparts a clearer vision of human brotherhood and the Divine Fatherhood, and inspires the soul to reach upward toward the supernal heights.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

A PLEA OF THE CHURCHES FOR UNITY

[The following extracts are taken from The Christian Union Quarterly, for July, 1920.—EDITORS.]

"We must go back to essential New Testament principles, for their ancient program, re-emphasized in the largest way, is the conquering program of the future."—Reverend Oliver Huckel, D. D. (Congregationalist), Baltimore, Maryland.

"The only solid basis of church union is the general abandonment of doctrines, traditions, theories, and rites not found in the New Testament. So long as Christians cling to the traditions of the later fathers, and refuse to go back to the plain teachings and simple ordinances of the New Testament, there will be irreconcilable divisions in the body of Christ. The true basis of the union of Christendom, for which so many to-day are longing, is a general return to primitive Christianity. It is not difficult to determine what that is, for it is writ large on the pages of the Book. Let us all cheerfully give up every dogma, every ceremonial, not found there, and Christian and Church union will come of itself. Any attempt at union on a lower plane will prove a failure."—Examiner (Baptist).

"All things are calling us just now to give ourselves and our church to primary things, and to keep out of the way all secondary things, however good and true, however much we prize them. It is time to rally to the defense of our common Christianity and let our private, partisan, and denominational peculiarities shift for themselves. If they die, so much gain for the kingdom of God."—Doctor William P. Merrill (Presbyterian).

"We, the representatives of the Presbyterian, the Methodist, and the Congregational branches of the Church of Christ in Canada, do hereby set forth the substance of the Christian faith as commonly held among us. In doing so we build upon the foundation laid by the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the chief corner-stone."—From "The Published Basis of Union."

"There is a necessity of a return to first principles; we must get behind the prejudices, interests, errors, and associations of history to the fountainhead of Christianity; we must sit at the feet of the Master, and move again in the company of the apostles. We must become in temper and in spirit, and not merely in name and in claim, an apostolic Church."—Canon Hensley Henson (Episcopalian).

"The church that we need is a church that stands for the simplicity and the sufficiency of the religion of Jesus Christ, calling itself by no name but one. The best men in all the churches are seeking to a common basis of union, to come together on some large Christian confession, and to live with one another as becomes disciples of Christ."—Doctor John Hunter, of Trinity Church, Glasgow, Scotland.

"We do hereby affirm that Christian unity, now so earnestly desired by the memorialists, can be restored only by the return of all Christian communions to the principles of unity exemplified by the undivided Catholic Church during the first ages of its existence, which principles we believe to be the substantial deposit of Christian faith and order committed by his apostles to the church unto the end of the world, and therefore, incapable of compromise or surrender by those who have been ordained to be its stewards for the common and equal benefit of all men."—The Bishops of the Episcopal Church to the Whole Church.

"We want a Christianity more pure, more practical, more conformed to the original Gospel."—Catholic Conformist.

A PLAN WE MUST ADOPT

The Marquis of Graham, a "big business" and agricultural man in England, suggests the following in the London Daily Mail.

Does it not strike you as curious that while a number of individuals are trying to farm on "factory lines," no one is attempting to establish a farming factory? What I mean is that no effort has been made to centralize the manufacture of agricultural produce in one big scheme. There are plenty of mills, bacon factories, creameries, egg depots, and vegetable bottling businesses dotted about the country, but they are mostly independent small retail affairs, not interlocking, big wholesale producing concerns.

The idea I have in mind is that there should be groups of farms all up and down some good railway and all under the management of one big business directorate.

The produce from all groups should be brought to one factory site on its own siding. The factory establishment should consist of a complete milling and granary plant, a creamery and cheese factory, a vegetable bottling business, a jam factory, a sugar factory, a seed-treating station, a chemical laboratory, a general implement repair shop, general offices, and central stores.

Intensified Production

The whole point of the thing would be intensified production on the land, the marketing and disposal of the produce being independent of the growers.

There should be some elimination of waste, as the by-product of one department would often become the raw material of another. For instance, the whey from the cheese factory and the offal from the milk would go to feed the pigs, the dry pulp from the sugar factory would go to feed the cows; and the sugar department would supply sweetening to the jam factory.

As all the manufacturing departments would be grouped together, and all on the railway, transport and labor would be economized.

Of course there would be shops in the cities in connection with the business, so that no middleman would be required from the time the seed is put into the ground until it appears again in finished form on the consumer's table.

The buying and selling of fertilizers and stores would be on wholesale lines, and the use of the seed and chemical laboratories, implements, and veterinary surgeon would be shared among the groups of farms; all of which would save an appreciable amount of individual expense. Even some casual labor and also repairing staffs might be shared, and this, in the matter of draining, fencing, threshing, and wood work, would mean a big economy.

Power From Refuse

Power and light for the factories would be derived from engines driven on wood, straw, and milling refuse; so that there would be a very small fuel bill. All this "will cost a tidy sum," they tell me; of course it will, and so would entry into the steel business, shipbuilding, or cotton trade, or anything else on a similar scale. But if men are found willing to put down money to develop business on factory lines in minerals, iron, and textiles, why do they hesitate to do so in regard to the greatest industry of all?—The Rural Weekly, August 12, 1920.

Every loss you suffer here through no fault of your own, God will give it back with interest. Comfort yourselves with these thoughts.—Joseph Smith.

WHAT WE BELIEVE

Baptism of Water

BY PAUL M. HANSON

This is an excellent article to hand to your friends who are inquiring about the doctrines of the church. The next one in the series will take up the baptism of the Spirit.

Did Jesus Teach Baptism?

What He Did

"Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him. But John forbade him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee and comest thou to me? And Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer it to be so now: for thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness. Then he suffered him. And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water: and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him: and lo a voice from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."—Matthew 3: 13-17.

What He Said

"Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."—Matthew 28: 19.

"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved."—Mark 16: 16.

"Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God."—John 3: 5.

The Test

"He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me."—John 14: 21.

"He that loveth me not keepeth not my sayings."—John 14: 24.

"Whosoever transgresseth, and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son."—2 John 9.

In Days of Old

"And they that gladly received his word were baptized: and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls."—Acts 2: 41.

"And the Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved."—Acts 2: 47.

Baptism of Water

"And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen."—Matthew 28: 18-20.

In order to establish a true relation among men and between man and God, the church was instituted through Jesus Christ. Various ordinances and commandments were given by him for faithful observance. He provided a perfect form of worship which would when accepted result in a marvelous transformation of character, purity of life, loving one's neighbor, rendering assistance to the needy, visiting the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and keeping oneself unspotted from the vices of the world.

Discrimination Necessary

The foregoing words of Christ spoken to the apostles indicate that baptism is positively commanded.

Is it true that in carrying out the command so-called, baptism may be administered by pouring or sprinkling, or by immersion, under the hands of one not holding authority from God to officiate in the ordinances of the Lord's house? Are there three distinct ways of keeping the one positive command of Christ?

To be involved in spiritual iniquity or confusion means to be away from God. He does not walk in crooked paths.

John the Revelator announces that in due time an angel will cry:

"Babylon is fallen, is fallen, that great city, because she made all nations drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication."—Revelation 14: 8.

He also writes:

"And I heard another voice from heaven, saying, Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues."—Revelation 18: 4.

It is necessary to discriminate between doctrines of men and the doctrine of Christ; otherwise, there will be no rejection of the doctrines of men and no acceptance of the doctrine of Christ. Truth and error should not be intertwined in the minds and hearts of men. One should believe in Christ, affirm the truth of his teachings, and have faith in the efficacy of all the words that come from his gracious lips.

Baptism is declared to be one of the "principles" of the "doctrine of Christ":

"Therefore leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection; not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God, of the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment."—Hebrews 6: 1, 2.

John writes:

"Whosoever transgresseth, and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son."—2 John 9.

The Jews made a great mistake in setting aside their best judgment concerning Christ and his work, and accepting in lieu thereof what their leaders enjoined upon them.

Baptism Essential

"And he [Jesus] said unto them, Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned."—Mark 16: 15, 16.

So important was baptism that Jesus after his resurrection made this direct reference to the ordinance; and also commanded his apostles to go and "teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Words could not convey more plainly that this ordinance precedes and is a condition of salvation.

Jesus said to Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews: "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." (John 3: 5.)

Simpler words, or words fraught in their operation with greater consequences, were never spoken. They reveal the mind of Christ relating to an entrance into the kingdom of God, and should be accepted as the truth.

Peter is on record as follows:

"The like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God), by the resurrection of Jesus Christ."—1 Peter 3: 21.

Concerning Christ we read: "Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved."—Acts 4: 12.

Personality of Christ

It is not well to allow any theory of belief or philosophy to separate the Savior of the world from the church he founded, the gospel he proclaimed, or the work he performed. There is no salvation in Christ apart from his royal representations showing forth the will of God. Can one believe in Christ and reject his words?

Napoleon Bonaparte loses his unique personality if not identified with his military achievements. Abraham Lincoln can in no true sense be separated from his work of emancipation of the colored race; George Washington is inseparably connected with the service he rendered to his country; and Christ, the Savior of the world, cannot be separated from his gospel. James declares it to be the "perfect law of liberty." If Christ were separated from what he stood as a representative of, wherein would his personality be different from that of any ordinary person?

Since salvation is the result of obedience to the teachings of Christ, loss and disaster must follow in the wake of a repudiation of what came through the Son of God. In no mystical sense does Christ save, apart from obedience to his gospel. He said:

"Why call ye me, Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?"—Luke 6: 46.

"But in vain they do worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men."—Matthew 15: 9.

"He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him: the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day."—John 12: 48.

Citizenship

An alien applying for citizenship in the United States must do the very thing exacted by our Government to obtain citizenship; he must live in the country a certain number of years, appear before an authorized officer of the law and swear allegiance to the Constitution of the United States. All this is required before citizenship is secured. Respect for law and authority is necessary to obtain citizenship.

Jesus, the "head of the church," the "apostle and high priest of our profession," has said, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." Exacting are the requirements of entrance into the kingdom of God. Have you obeyed Christ? Are you a citizen of the kingdom of God? Paul writes: "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ."—Galatians 3: 27.

For the Remission of Sins

Baptism is one of the conditions provided in the gospel for the remission of sins; this the law of God unequivocally proclaims:

"Then Peter said unto them, repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost."—Acts 2: 38, 39.

These words were spoken on the day of Pentecost to the immense throng, under the guilt of sin, who asked: "What shall we do?" (i. e., to get rid of our sins and receive pardon). The answer made by Peter is in full accord with the words of Christ: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." It is in perfect harmony with Christ's words to Nicodemus, making known how man can gain an entrance into the kingdom of God.

Ananias said to Saul: "And now why tarriest thou? arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord." (Acts 22: 16.)

We read concerning John the Baptist:

"John did baptize in the wilderness, and preach the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins. And there went out unto him all the land of Judea, and they of Jerusalem, and were all baptized of him in the river of Jordan, confessing their sins."—Mark 1: 4, 5.

Man fell by disobeying the words of God; now salvation is possible by obeying the law of God revealed through Christ the Lord. The servants of Jesus Christ to-day are teaching and practicing in harmony with Peter and Paul and John and Christ; and administer baptism as did his church nineteen hundred years ago for the "remission of sins." "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever." (Hebrews 13: 8.)

Prerequisites of Baptism

Peter said to the Pentecostal throng, outside of the church: "Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." Without repentance there would be no remission of sins in the administration of baptism. Jesus said, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Unless accompanied by faith in God baptism would be a useless form. Combined with faith in God and repentance, baptism remits sins. The value lies in obedience to an ordinance instituted of God.

Infants Not Baptized

Baptism is for the "remission of sins" (Acts 2: 38), children have committed no sins, therefore they are not proper subjects for baptism. No case of infant baptism is recorded or referred to in the Bible. It is not true that "Hell is crammed with infants damned, without a day of grace." Little children are of the "kingdom of heaven"—when they arrive at the age of accountability they may be baptized.

Infant baptism is based on the traditions and doctrines of men. It comes in conflict with the true ordinance of baptism, the administration of which requires upon the part of candidates faith in God and repentance. Children before arriving at the age of accountability cannot exercise faith or repentance—in case of death they are not lost, but are saved through the atonement of Christ.

The practice of the church of Jesus Christ was, and is, to have little children blessed through the laying on of hands; not baptized. Consider the following:

"Then were there brought unto him little children, that he should put his hands on them, and pray; and the disciples rebuked them. But Jesus said, Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me; for of such is the kingdom of heaven. And he laid his hands on them and departed thence."—Matthew 19: 13-15.

Jesus is the "Apostle and High Priest of our profession." (Hebrews 3: 1.)

According to Greek lexicons the primary meaning of the Greek word baptizo, from which comes the word baptize, is: dip, plunge, immerse, submerge, overwhelm. This should satisfy any mind as to whether scriptural baptism includes sprinkling or pouring. No command from God exists for water to be poured or sprinkled on anyone as a means of entrance into the kingdom of God. All are commanded to be baptized. No example is given in the Scriptures of three distinct modes being offered to the world for keeping any command of God.

The terms immersion, and sprinkling are not convertible terms. To read sprinkling where the word baptize occurs does not make good reading or sense. To illustrate:

"I indeed have baptized [sprinkled] you with water: but he shall baptize [sprinkle] you with the Holy Ghost."—Mark 1: 8.

"And John also was baptizing [sprinkling] in Ænon near to Salim, because there was much water there: and they came, and were baptized."—John 3: 23.

"And Jesus, when he was baptized [sprinkled], went up straightway out of the water: and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him."—Matthew 3: 16.

"And now why tarriest thou? arise, and be baptized [sprinkled], and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord."—Acts 22: 16.

"Therefore we are buried with him by baptism [sprinkling] into death: that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life."—Romans 6: 4.

A perfect definition of a word will make good sense when substituted for the word; the substitution of sprinkling for baptism renders the reading ridiculous, and makes void the word of God. The erroneous doctrine of "It makes no difference what one believes, just so one is sincere," does not make commandments of men equal to the doctrine of Jesus Christ.

The manner of Christ's baptism is thus chronicled:

"Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him. And John forbade him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me? And Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer it to be so now: for thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness. Then he suffered him. And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water: and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him: and lo a voice from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."—Matthew 3: 13-17.

Christ "when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water." The Father, Son, and Holy Ghost took part in the baptism; the Son of God obeyed; the Holy Ghost descended in the form of a dove; and the Father said, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Reader, have you been baptized, and did you come up "out of the water" as did your Savior? All in the church were baptized after the manner of Christ's baptism—they followed the words and example of their Lord.

One Baptism

Paul writes there is "one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in all." (Ephesians 4: 5, 6.) In writing to the Hebrews mention is made of "baptisms" as a part of the doctrine of Christ (Hebrews 6: 1, 2). There is no conflict. Jesus said: "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." The baptism of water is not sufficient without the baptism of the Spirit. On the day of Pentecost Peter promised the gift of the Holy Ghost to all who would be baptized "in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins." John said those whom he baptized with water Christ would baptize with the Holy Ghost.

Concerning Cornelius and those with him who received the Holy Ghost before baptism, which was done to confirm to those of the circumcision that the gospel was designed for the Gentiles as well as for the Jews, Peter said:

"Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we? And he commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord."—Acts 10: 47, 48.

The two baptisms are thus associated. To be "born again" one must receive both baptisms.

There is "one God," yet there are "three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost; and those three are one." (1 John 5: 7.)

There is an "inward man" and an "outward man"; but it is proper to speak of the two as one man. (2 Corinthians 4: 16.)

So one may speak of "one baptism," or of "baptisms," as did Paul.

Character Transformed

The truth of baptism may be determined by dealing with its source, its substance, and its results. The results of baptism are disclosed in the following texts:

"Buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead."—Colossians 2: 12.

"Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection: knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve him."—Romans 6: 3-6.

Baptism is represented as a burial, the purpose of which is the putting away of the old man and his deeds, the bringing to an end of a sinful life, and the rising to a "newness of life" in Christ. Can one be "buried" with Christ in baptism except by immersion?

Note the character and unquestionable standing of those who are baptized: Jesus, Paul, and all the church for it is written: "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ." (Galatians 3: 27.)

"Hear Ye Him"

Membership in the kingdom of God is not gained merely by refraining from evils prohibited in the Mosaic law, swearing, stealing, lying, and covetousness. Who will say one can be saved through the law of Moses? If so, why was there a need for a faultless covenant, sealed by the blood of Christ? The voice out of the bright cloud on the Mount of Transfiguration said concerning Christ: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him." (Matthew 17: 5.)

Why all the testimony through the world about Christ being the Savior of the world, if one can be saved without hearing and obeying him? He has spoken: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned."

Authority Necessary to Baptize

Citizenship comes in an earthly government by obedience to the law of the government, and recognizing its authority—the same is true of obeying the law and recognizing the authority of the kingdom of heaven. All governments have authorized officers. Jesus said to his ministry: "As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you." (John 20: 21.) By baptism one gains citizenship in the government of God.

Has any man, or woman, or child, the right and authority to baptize persons who profess to believe Christ is the Son of God? In the Mosaic system, which was a "shadow of good things to come" under Christ (Hebrews 10: 1), there was an administration of its ordinances only by those holding the priesthood, the right to act for God. So the ordinances of the kingdom of God, under Christ, should be authoritatively administered. Otherwise the mosaic policy was not a "shadow" of the order of government that was to rest on the shoulders of Christ.

Baptism as an ordinance in the church of God is not simply immersion in water; it is immersion in water of a repentant person having faith in God, by an authorized servant of God. Aliens must appear before authorized officers in order to obtain citizenship, whether in the governments of men or the kingdom of God. In the commission given to the apostles, the Lord said:

"All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.—Matthew 28: 18, 19.

Authority is thus associated with baptism.

No elder, deacon, evangelist, or bishop has the right to officiate to-day in the ordinances of the Lord's house on the basis of authority given nineteen hundred years ago to apostles, or to other men; to do so would be no less absurd than claiming civil authority on the basis of authority given by our government to other men. One must be called and authorized of God to act in his name. Men without revelation from God cannot appoint their fellow men to officiate in the ordinances of the Lord's house. "No man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron." (Hebrews 5: 4.) The fundamental teaching of the church of God is respect for law and order. True orthodoxy is that which is in harmony with divine law. We read:

"And it came to pass, that, while Apollos was at Corinth, Paul having passed through the upper coasts came to Ephesus; and finding certain disciples, he said unto them, Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? And they said unto him, We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost. And he said unto them, Unto what then were ye baptized? And they said, Unto John's baptism. Then said Paul, John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people, that they should believe on him which should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus. When they heard this, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them; and they spake with tongues, and prophesied."—Acts 19: 1-6.

Why were these persons baptized by Paul after having been immersed by some one? They evidently had been immersed by some one not sent of God, not having authority to baptize; hence they were "baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus" by Paul. Paul defended John, taught these people concerning the Holy Ghost, and who had baptized in imitation of John's baptism. If these persons had been baptized by John, Paul would have recognized the baptisms as valid, for John was "sent of God." (John 1: 6.)

Christ asked certain ones who interrogated him: "The baptism of John, was in from heaven, or of men? answer me." (Mark 11: 30.) This discloses that there can be a baptism "from heaven" and a baptism "of men."

Has one authority to baptize who denies that baptism is essential to salvation?

Has one authority to baptize who is willing to sprinkle, instead of baptize?

Has one authority to baptize who says the ordinance is not for the "remission of sins"?

Has one authority to officiate in the ordinances of the Lord's house who says God does not reveal his will to men to-day?

Without a call from God by revelation, how is a man to know he should act as an officer in the government of God? How would he know what office he should occupy?

Jesus came from Galilee to Jordan to receive baptism at the hands of John the Baptist, who possessed authority to administer baptism by reason of being "sent of God." Nowhere is there an account in the Scriptures of valid baptism being administered by one not holding authority to act of God.

True Baptism

What a beautiful ordinance has been given to close a sin-sick life and start life anew in Christ!

As national festivals have been ordained and established to commemorate great events in the history of nations, so it is eminently fitting that the children of God should look back

THE SEMINAR

The Problem of the Ages

BY C. E. WIGHT

An outline for advanced study by groups interested in acquiring useful knowledge.

Under the above caption a young men's class in the Lamoni Sunday school, composed largely of college men, made an attempt to work out in outline form the Zionie problem which confronts us as a people.

The outline below is the result of the year's effort. It is submitted for the benefit of any who may be interested in this subject. In case it should be adopted by any other classes as a basis for study certain features should be kept in mind. Any questions regarding the outline should be directed to the author, at Lamoni, Iowa.

In the first place the outline covers more territory than that covered by the class during the past year. Great care should be exercised on the part of the class to avoid studying any one part of the outline for too long a time, thus making the work tiresome.

The first part of the outline has been worked out in connection with a most excellent book entitled The Social Problem, written by Doctor Ellwood of the University of Missouri. This book is published by the McMillan Company of Chicago, and should be in the hands of every teacher who attempts to present this subject. Other good books that will be very helpful are Church and the Changing Order, by Shailer Mathews, and The Social Crises, by Rauschenbusch.

Under the heading "The attitude of Jesus toward the problem," the outline we have included is an exact duplicate of that worked out when Floyd M. McDowell was teacher of the class some three or four years ago. The book used at that time as a text is Jenk's Social Teachings of Jesus.

That part of the outline dealing with communistic societies and socialism is the result of the study of a number of leading books dealing with the history of these organizations; in their religious life upon an ordinance which to them commemorates their translation from the kingdom of this world into the kingdom of God's dear Son. The ordinance, being a burial, symbolizes in a beautiful manner the burying of the past life, the "old man with his deeds," and the rising to walk in "newness of life" in Christ.

Christ declared, "I will build my church." One church only was established by the Lord. The latest book of the New Testament was written near the close of the first century. After the first century serious changes took place, affecting the organization, doctrine, and practice of the church. The multitudinous sects of to-day testify by their existence to a departure from the faith of the primitive apostolic church. But God has not changed. And now in the evening of time, he has restored the gospel, as it was in the beginning, in harmony with prophetic announcements. (Matthew 24: 14; Revelation 14: 6, 7; Malachi 3: 1-6.)

The Church of Jesus Christ in these latter days exists in complete accord with the primitive apostolic model of the church. The invitation is extended to all outside of Christ:

"Come. And let him that heareth say, Come." (Revelation 22: 17.)

The above article may be had in tract form if desired. Order of either publishing house, No. T1221, 5 for 10 cents, 100 for $1.75, postpaid.—Editors.

some of these books being written by the adherents, others by the opponents of these systems.

I regret that time has not permitted the working out of a syllabus to assist in placing the outline in lesson form, but we submit the outline in the hope that it may serve as a basis for future work along this line.

I. What is it?

Problem of the Ages

- A. A problem of adjustment—
 - a. In the religious world.
 - 1. Of the individual with God.
 - 2. Of the individual with his fellow man.
 - b. In the economic world.
 - 1. With God, through natural physical environment.
 - 2. With man, as a factor in the shaping of environment.
- B. A problem of expression—
 - a. On the part of man.
 - 1. For the good of society.
 - 2. For the glory of God.
 - b. On the part of society.
 - 1. To make possible the best development of the individual.
 - 2. To give the individual a concrete example of true living, under conditions that make for equality.

II. What are the factors?

- A. God—
 - a. As the giver of divine law.
 - b. As the creator of the universe.
- B. The individual—
 - a. His rights are—
 - 1. "To cease where the rights of society begin" (common law).
 - 2. Limited by a regard for the good of his fellow man.
 - b. His responsibility is—
 - 1. To adjust himself to the divine law.
 - 2. To work for the continuance of society under the divine law.
 - c. His contribution is—
 - 1. The development of self to the highest point of efficiency.
 - 2. The spending of his energy in that department of society in which he is called through inspiration, natural qualification, and special training, to labor.
- C. Society.
 - a. Its rights are—
 - 1. To protect itself against attacks from without and within.
 - 2. To make laws which will guarantee this protection.
 - 3. To enforce these laws.
 - b. Its responsibility is—
 - 1. To give every individual member full opportunity for development and expression.
 - 2. To prevent the encroachment of its members upon the rights of others.
 - c. Its contribution is—
 - 1. To hand down to posterity an organization calculated to promote peace, encourage industry, and develop initiative.
- D. Laws of the universe.
 - a. Evolution.
 - b. Heredity.
 - c. Environment.

III. Phases in which the problem is made manifest—

- A. The material world—through the pressure of economic conditions.
- B. The spiritual world—through the establishment of ideas, ideals, and valuations.

IV. Elements of the problem.

- A. Historical:
 - a. Tradition plays a large part in development of society—
 - 1. Society of to-day is a complex of Jewish, Grecian, Roman, Teutonic, and Anglo-Saxon beliefs as to religion, ethics, art, etc.
 - 2. Separation of tradition from truth necessitates a review of the development of civilization.
 - b. Modern history presents new forces—
 - 1. Individualism.
 - 2. Development of science.
 - 3. Revolution of industry.
 - (a) Making men cogs of the great machine.
 - (b) Enormous growth of wealth.
 - 4. The critical movement.
- B. Physical:
 - a. The individual, as a part of society, cannot develop and express himself fully except through a normal physical condition.
 - 1. This presupposes the right to be well born and fixes the individual's responsibility toward posterity.
 - 2. It further argues for physical education.
 - 3. It requires an environment suitable for physical development.

(Note: It is well to notice here the warning of Doctor Ellwood as to the overemphasis of the physical element. "In recognizing the very great part played by physical and biological elements in the social problem, we wish expressly to repudiate, as unscientific, physical and purely biological theories of human society, and to warn the reader against that one-sidedness in social theory and practice which results from the exclusive attention to these physical elements."—The Social Problem, p. 94.)
- C. Economic:
 - a. This element has been brought to the fore by an age predominantly commercial.
 - b. It has developed the theory of "economic determinism," that is, "that if economic conditions are made right all other conditions will adjust themselves."
 - c. As a main feature of the economic element should be noted the rise of modern capitalism with its attendant evils:
 - 1. Exploitation of labor.
 - 2. Unjust distribution of wealth, with consequent breeding of class wars.
 - 3. Fostering of materialism, among rich and poor alike.
- D. Spiritual:
 - a. This element is a prerequisite to a right social order, since development of a true society is dependent upon right ideals and values. Such ideals are—
 - 1. Education for marriage and parenthood.
 - 2. Revaluation of government and law on the basis of patriotism rather than self-interest.
 - 3. Rebirth of faith in true democracy.

4. A revaluation of religion, in which its social as well as its individual doctrines are stressed.
5. A revaluation of morality.

V. Attempts to solve the problem.

A. Historical attempts—

a. Theoretical.

1. Plato's "Ideal Republic."
2. More's "Utopia."

b. Educational.

1. China attempted to solve the problem by developing a static society. Has she solved it? Has she given us a scheme worthy of imitation? Note carefully again the statement of the problem.

c. Scriptural.

1. In the days of the apostles: "And they had all things common." There are two theories with regard to this matter; 1st, that the statement "all things common" means a communistic system in the present-day understanding of the term and that the system failed because it was not founded on a true economic basis; 2d, that this statement should be interpreted liberally and may mean equality of opportunity, the keynote of our church policy to-day. Believers in this theory argue that the failure of the system was due to the unconverted condition of its adherents and the fact that economic conditions were not so pressing as to-day.
2. In Book of Mormon times: Here again, though the statement is plain that they "had all things common" yet no details are given. Why? Their system must have been correct, for Christ gave it. Why did they fail?

B. Modern attempts.

a. Communism.

1. Listed attempts—

- (a) The Shaker communities.
- (b) The Harmonists.
- (c) The Separatists of Zoar.
- (d) Communities of Robert Owen.
- (e) The Perfectionists.
- (f) Experiments in Fourierism.
 - (1) Brook Farm.
 - (2) North American Phalanx, etc.
- (g) The Amana Society.
- (h) The Icarians.

2. Causes of majority of failures of communism.

- (a) Materialism predominant as in experiments of Robert Owen. Religion ruled out. Experiment an almost immediate failure.

(Note: To what extent, if any, did the experiment of Owen influence Joseph Smith in his plan for Zion?)
- (b) Separation from the world.
- (c) Adoption of celibacy.
- (d) Failure, on the part of those distinctively religious, to cultivate the missionary spirit.
- (e) Adoption of extreme community ownership, leading to final individualistic revolt.
- (f) Self-abnegation and repression carried to extreme.

- (g) Tendency to destroy initiative.
- (h) Lack of continued good leadership (This is a logical outgrowth of (g)).

3. The best example of communism: Amana. Reasons for success:

- (a) Founded as a religious organization.
- (b) Belief in divine direction and revelation.
- (c) Marriage permitted (though celibacy commended as holier condition).
- (d) System a judicious mixture of community control and individual liberty.

(Note: It will be noticed that the most signally successful society was most distinctly religious, accepting divine revelation. Communistic societies have succeeded in direct ratio as they have been fired and held together by a distinct religious belief. Communism has been in every case a distinct and usually an immediate failure without this influence.)

b. Socialism.

1. Its historical teachings.
 - (a) The class struggle.
 - (b) Exploitation of labor.
 - (c) Rule of the Bourgeoisie.
 - (d) Elimination of national boundaries.
2. Its tenets.
 - (a) Elimination of capital and the capitalistic class.
 - (b) Common ownership of the tools of production. (In the words of Morris Hillquit, "Collective ownership of all social sources and instruments of wealth production, to be operated under democratic administration for the benefit of the whole people.")
 - (c) Spargo's definition: "Democratic collectivism in the production of wealth and liberal individualism in its distribution and consumption."
3. Weakness of Socialism.
 - (a) Failure to recognize the fatherhood of God as of equal importance with the brotherhood of man in the solution of the problem.

(Note: This does not necessarily indicate a repudiation of religion, but simply that Socialism recognizes only a materialistic foundation without reference to the spiritual. Note the almost immediate collapse of all communistic organizations which were based purely on materialistic foundations.)
 - (b) The purely selfish attitude of its adherents.

(Note: This and all other weaknesses are but outgrowths of the failure to recognize the Fatherhood of God.)
 - (c) Revolutionary rather than evolutionary. This feature admitted by Marx and Spargo.
 - (d) Socialism works entirely from the outside in, not from the inside out. It makes paramount the system rather than the man. It works on the theory that the change in the system will change the man. Admitting the probability to a degree, we are forced to the conclusion that a permanent system requires that the hearts of its adherents must first be filled with love for each other. Love cannot be legislated into the human heart.

- (e) Many phases of socialism recognize free love and nationalization of women.
- (f) Failure to recognize national boundaries.
(Note: This brought about such distinctly treasonable utterances during the late war as to cause the withdrawal of many leading American Socialists from the party.)
- (g) Socialism discredits leadership, according to Spargo, holding to pure democracy in administration of affairs. This tendency to discourage development of strong leaders would of necessity discourage initiative and incentive.

- c. Liberalism.
- d. Anarchism.

VI. The attitude of Jesus toward the problem.

A. Society and social forces.

- a. Work of Jesus primarily social. His work was universal and abiding because he dealt with the fundamental elements in human nature and society.
- b. Some of these fundamental characteristics are:
 1. Interdependence of men.
 2. Mental and moral inertia.
 3. Self-interest.
 4. Religious aspiration.
 5. Social nature of men.

B. Jesus' preparation for his life's work.

- a. His early environment.
- b. His early training.
- c. His character.
- d. His conception of his messiahship.
- e. The three temptations.

C. Jesus' conception of his social mission.

- a. Jesus came to establish a new kingdom.
- b. This kingdom was a spiritual kingdom based upon the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.
- c. Admission to citizenship must be through Christ.
- d. Growth to be gradual, through the influence of soul upon soul.
- e. Christ was supreme because he expressed God's will.

D. Individual responsibility.

- a. Twofold responsibility of individual.
 1. Duty of self-development.
 2. Duty of service.
- b. Responsibility for use of opportunity.
 1. "All talent, all social power and influence are opportunities for service and for the use of such each man is held accountable."
- c. Responsibility in making independent judgments.

E. Jesus' teachings as to faith and contentment.

- a. Each individual life is profoundly significant.
- b. Belief in Jesus is not consistent with worry.

- c. Our business is to work: "The duty of each is to do the thing he can do best."
- d. Our work does not conflict with our Father's business if we conscientiously work in line with service to society.
- e. God should be trusted for results.
- f. Faith and contentment necessary to good government.

F. Jesus' attitude toward pleasures.

- a. Jesus conformed to customs only in so far as they contained nothing harmful.
- b. He opposed asceticism.
- c. He emphasized the need of thoughtfulness in determining one's course of action.
- d. Proper pleasure is necessary for the proper development of the individual. Unless the individual develops, society cannot progress.
- e. Social life should be a place of development.
- f. THE TEST.

"Any act or habit which weakens the individual physically or mentally, morally or spiritually lessens his power of service and hence should be condemned."

G. Jesus' teachings concerning wealth:

- a. Wealth not important compared with entrance into the kingdom.
- b. It is very difficult (impossible) to seek selfishly for wealth and at the same time spiritual character.
- c. Thrift however is commended.
- d. Wealth brings with it responsibility for its use.

H. Jesus' attitude toward the poor:

- a. Had boundless sympathy for the poor.
- b. Generosity is of great value to the giver.
- c. He does not encourage begging.
- d. Only such assistance should be rendered as will really improve the one that receives.
- e. Christ denounced in strong terms hypocrites and frauds and yet says that their existence cannot be given as an excuse for selfishness.

I. Jesus' view regarding crime and the treatment of criminals.

- a. Christ's "Judge not" meant unrighteous judgment.
- b. Christ searched the soul of the criminal.
- c. Reform, not revenge, the thing needed.
- d. Christ's method that of overcoming evil with good.

J. Jesus' principles of social reform.

- a. Necessity of knowledge of men and society.
- b. Nothing can injure a man who is a member of a community that does not injure the community.
- c. Christian social progress will be slow.
- d. Opposition bound to come.
- e. Patience and faith needed.
- f. God exists, Christ is his Son, we must follow Christ.

K. Jesus the exemplar of his teachings.

- a. He found joy in life.
- b. The sources of this joy were:
 1. His love of nature.
 2. His social life.
 3. His mental activity.
 4. His consciousness of power of right.
 5. His certainty of success.

VII. Does the gospel offer the solution?

- A. Gospel plan fundamentally sound because it teaches:
 - a. The fatherhood of God.
 - b. The brotherhood of man.

- c. Elimination of selfishness.
 - d. Consecration for service.
 - e. Development of talent for good of the group.
 - f. Sanctity of the home, the family as a unit.
 - g. Necessity for law and government.
- B. Problem cannot be solved outside of the gospel, since—
- a. Love and fellowship are essential to its solution and—
 - b. This love and fellowship cannot be developed outside the gospel.
(Note again the almost immediate failure of all attempts made to solve the problem on a purely materialistic basis.)
 - c. Love and fellowship can only be developed through constant seeking of communion with God.
- C. The basic features of the gospel plan—
- a. Conversion of the heart.
 - b. Equality of opportunity.
 - c. The gathering.
 - d. Establishment of Zion.
 - e. Doctrine of stewardships.
- (Note: It is the belief of the writer that a and b above are the real fundamentals of our plan and that the method of holding title to property is but incidental. In this the majority of the class concur, although a few hold that this is fundamental.)
- D. The solving of the problem is a process of true education.

VIII. How can we carry our solution to the world?

- A. By putting into practical operation the Zionie program.
- B. By the formulating and carrying out of a definite missionary program.

Cooperation and service must be substituted for discontent to insure successful national reconstruction.—A. J. County, before the Philadelphia Rotary Club.

In the beginning of the contest with Britain, when we were sensible of danger, we had daily prayers in this room for divine protection. Our prayers, sir, were heard, and they were graciously answered. All of us who were engaged in the struggle must have observed frequent instances of a superintending Providence in our favor. To that kind Providence we owe this happy opportunity of consulting in peace on the means of establishing our future national felicity; and have we now forgotten this powerful Friend, or do we imagine we no longer need his assistance? I have lived, sir, a long time [eighty-one years], and the longer I live the more convincing proof I see of this truth: that God governs in the affairs of men. And if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without his notice, is it probable that an empire can rise without his aid? We have been assured, sir, in the sacred writings, "that except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it." I firmly believe this; and I also believe that without his concurring aid we shall succeed in this political building no better than the builders of Babel. We shall be divided by our little partial local interests; our projects will be confounded; and we ourselves shall become a reproach and a byword down to future ages; and what is worse, mankind may hereafter, from this unfortunate instance, despair of establishing government by human wisdom, and leave us to chance, war, or conquest. I therefore beg leave to move that henceforth prayers, imploring the assistance of heaven and its blessing on our deliberations, be held in this assembly every morning before we proceed to business, and that one or more of the clergy of this city be requested to officiate in that service.—Benjamin Franklin.

Home and Education

This little word of four letters is said to be the broadest of all words in our language and any attempt to define it minutely would be of no avail here for lack of time. Roughly speaking, we will include in the use of the word home, one's habitual abode, together with all people, things, and influences connected with it.

Familiarity breeds contempt. We note with wonder the greatness in an unusual or unfamiliar object or event, while at the same time we may be ignoring the more wonderful things which surround us continually and which are more or less common. We seldom wonder at the stalk of corn which develops from the little seed, the oak which springs from the acorn, or even the more wonderful thing of a mature man developing from the helpless infant; and yet they are as great and marvelous as the miracles of which we read. Nearly everyone has a home and so the commonality of the institution obscures its real greatness and importance.

Home is the one social institution that has continuously existed since the creation of man. Kingdoms may rise and kingdoms may fall, but the home goes on forever. It is the basis of community, town, state—all humanity, and is the greatest of all institutions. In the evolution of the human race, it has functioned to meet every need of man, being, in the case of modern complexity, supplemented by many other activities such as school, women's organizations, men's organizations, specialized industry, etc.

Corruption in the homes will cause sin to prevail throughout all the nation. A great European historian declares that there is an exact historic parallel between the present condition of our industrial civilization and the final period of the Roman empire. He finds the same fundamental forces of degeneration at work and states that the empire broke down finally when its family life was rotted to the roots. The promulgation of education, morals, the church, and all institutions of society is carried on through the home. So, reconstruction or reformation in any phase of human activity must use the home as its base of efforts or be content with futile attempts. Reformation carried on through individuals or sets of individuals would be like fighting the house fly only with the swatter; while one was being adjusted to our ideals, a great many more would spring up who would be in need of the process. So only by Christianizing the home can we Christianize the world. Home is the foundation of society. Destroy the foundation and the superstructure falls as a natural consequence.

The parents are the presidents of the home and in them is centralized the responsibility for its conduct. This includes the responsibility for the conduct of children, which is the most serious duty that can devolve upon any person. All things are in the world for the use and benefit of man. In other words, all things, objects, and forces are merely tools for the use of man in perfecting his life and the lives of others for which he is responsible. From this viewpoint, for the parent all phases of life are incidental to their one great responsibility for the right conduct of their children.

"But," some may ask, "do we not owe ourselves a duty also?" All mothers owe themselves the duty of doing all they can for the betterment of their children. The training of self is a prerequisite to the training of others. No person whose habits are crude and coarse can train children to be refined, loving, obedient, and righteous. We cannot transmit qualities which we do not ourselves possess; so duty to ourselves becomes a means to the end of performing our duty towards others, and "I" becomes secondary to "you."

The study of human beings is a science. Of all the sciences in the educational field, the ones which have man for their subjects are the most complex and indefinite. That two plus two make four is a definite and specific fact in the arithmetical field. That inflammable gas, heated to kindling temperature, will combust, is an equally fixed principle in the realm of chemistry; but the thought processes prerequisite to the act of robbing a bank is of such an intricate nature that the best we have in the way of human intelligence cannot give a complete answer of positive accuracy. Put coal on a fire and it burns; the speed of an automobile can be regulated by man to any desired rate and, in the hands of an expert, is at all time under perfect control; but that which will run one human machine will stop another, and what will run a certain human machine at one time may not even budge it at some other time.

Our knowledge of the laws governing the action of people is so general, and the subject so wonderfully complex, that all the wisdom and knowledge we can get on the subject is necessary for even a crude effort to manipulate them in the right direction; while ignorance is worse than shooting in the dark. This is the being for whose proper training the home is responsible.

Realizing the complexity and difficulty of the task, the logical primary factor in the proper education of the child is prayer. A truly educated person realizes that his knowledge is but a drop in the bucket. The human machine is imperfect, and there is no learning that needs not to be supplemented by the perfect intelligence of God. Prayer is the only means of calling the intelligence of God to supplement and supply the deficiency of our meager knowledge. Jesus, himself, while on earth prayed often; and surely if one whose equal no person can hope to attain felt the necessity of communion with God, no weakling of the earth would consider his wisdom alone sufficient.

However, man is given his agency, and prayer is but supplemental to our personal efforts. If God were to function as the intelligence for every individual, he might just as well have made man in the form of a physical machine whose actions would be perfect, but who would also be stereotyped and incapable of variation; but man was made in the image of God with the power to choose and act for himself, and, in climbing the ladder of life, the nearer we can get to the round of perfection the more desirable is our state of existence.

This being true, we can see that other things than prayer are necessary. Our ideal is to perform all of our acts and functions perfectly; but since our acts are directed by our thoughts and intelligence, the attainment of this condition would require a perfect intelligence. God, who has perfect action, also has perfect understanding. A result can never be higher in nature than its cause, so our actions will never be better than our wisdom. "Be ye perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect" includes perfect education as the means to perfect action, which is our end.

We are commanded to study all good books, not for the purpose of the passive storage of knowledge, but for the purpose of putting this knowledge to use in the direction of our behavior; and the test of the value of all knowledge is the extent to which it can be applied in our lives. Hence, we should be satisfied with nothing short of the best; and if this necessitates a college or university training, apply ourselves diligently to the task.

How often, in the home, are the educational opportunities of the girls sacrificed in order to educate the young man. Man needs an extensive training in order to cope with the modern intricate machines of the industrial world. But if this preparation is required in order to operate the man-made machinery of industry, how much broader an education should be given to the woman in order to give her the power to manipulate the machine of divine origin, whose intricacy and delicacy is numberless times greater than that of our modern machinery. With the educational policy of to-day it is no wonder that the present social condition exists; no wonder the progress of the world is negative and the advancement of the church is slow.

Ignorance is no excuse. It would be easy enough for all to lean on this crutch, if by so doing all responsibility would be eliminated, but we would drift back to a condition of universal ignorance or savagery and barbarism. The "sins of the parents are visited on the children, even to the third and fourth generation," and "Inasmuch as parents have children in Zion, or in any of her stakes which are organized, that teach them not to understand the doctrine of repentance; faith in Christ the Son of the living God; and of baptism and the gift of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of the hands when eight years old, the sin be upon the head of the parents."

The argument might be advanced that the school looks after the education of the children. The child does not start to school until the age of six years, and by this time the home has furnished the basis for his future education. During his school life he is under the jurisdiction of the school for six hours each day, the remaining eighteen hours being parental responsibility. How much can the six hours of school do, unless it is pushed by the eighteen hours of home?

Morals and religion, two of the most important factors involved in life, are not taught at all by the schools. These must be received through the home, and if every individual is not equipped with a thorough knowledge of morals and religion, the blame and condemnation in the great majority of cases is properly placed on the home and those responsible for its functioning. The home should be a hothouse for the best and most refined elements of life, and the results of this institution, properly and wisely conducted, will be a more complete Christianizing of our social life and a nearer approach to our perfect ideal.

Women Study Child Welfare

Preparedness is the watchword of potential woman voters, to judge by requests received at the Children's Bureau of the U. S. Department of Labor for information regarding the most approved measures for child welfare. In response to numerous requests for suggestions in carrying on a study of child welfare problems, the Bureau has just issued "Child Welfare Programs," a set of outlines for the use of clubs and classes.

These programs are comprised under five heads: "The community and the child"; "Child welfare in rural and village communities"; "The care of the mother, the baby, and the young child"; "Detailed outlines on infant mortality, children in industry, recreation, and children in need of special care"; and "Development and present status of infant welfare work in other countries."

The outlines are simple and popular in language and treatment, but, while designed primarily for the use of busy women interested in obtaining a general knowledge of the field, they furnish also the framework for detailed study of special problems.

Each program with the exception of the one dealing with work in foreign countries makes provision for a study of local conditions in the light of the knowledge of child welfare work gained through the general study.

The section on foreign infant welfare work is not a study outline, but a brief account in outline form of the main facts in the development of this work. It is intended to provide data for comparison with similar work being done in the United States or to furnish publicity material in demonstrating the value of child welfare measures.—Children's Bureau.

Eastern Michigan Activities

Port Huron: Superintendent of educational work, Mrs. Foster, reports class studying Church History, eleven sessions held in past year. As chairman of Red Cross work, she reports six meetings, thirty-five garments made. Mrs. Otto Fetting, chairman of prayer union reports fifty-two meetings held, $370 taken in, besides a flower fund. Mrs. Oscar Engel, superintendent of relief and service, says: "In reviewing past year I feel very grateful to our heavenly Father for the blessings bestowed upon us as a society. I have many times greatly enjoyed the outpouring of the Holy Spirit of the Master, and its guiding and encouraging influence in the endeavors I have made to assist in the various departments of the work. I have attended 96 meetings in the women's work the past year, made 38 'sick' and 'relief' calls, cared for the sick at my home for nearly two weeks, and can report flowers sent to the sick 18 times."

Croswell: Mrs. Lewis Grice, local correspondent, reports for six months: "We are taking up relief and service work, and also home and child welfare. Present enrollment 26. Sessions held, in relief and service, 21; in home and child welfare, 4. Money taken in by society, $228.11.

Shabbona: Secretary, Mrs. J. P. Neville, says: "We are taking up child welfare and aid work. In the latter we have an enrollment of 11. Not all able to assist, but we are doing what we can. Two years ago we made $90, from which we paid tithing, and last year promised to pay tithing again on all we took in and we certainly were blessed. We made aprons, handkerchiefs, dresser scarfs, etc., and had ready sales for all we made. A sister in Ann Arbor made many sales for us, which helped much. We always used best materials and did our work well, so received a good price for our goods. We also help a sister with her housework when needed and do not charge for services. Are getting along splendidly, working in unity and love."

Macgregor: Mrs. John Farley, local correspondent, reports activities in the following departments: relief and service, home and child welfare, and young women's. Have a new set of officers. Are hopeful of doing fine work this year. "We expect to put forth greater effort and pray God may be with us."

Uby: Local secretary, Mrs. Walter Cook, says: "We have a sewing and aid department with an enrollment of 9 members. Twenty-one meetings were held the past year, and a number of substantial payments have been made on church property, furnishings, etc."

Saint Clair: From local secretary, Mrs. George Skinner: We had short response, but much appreciated, expressing hopes to revive the work in the social service department.

Minden City: Taking up study; have class of ten studying Forbush's Child Study and Child Training, which they find very helpful. Begin sessions with a season of prayer, and after study have select readings and discussions of different subjects. Also do some relief and service work, aiding those in need with material help and assistance. Have charge of church cleaning and are raising money for a new carpet for the church building. Also trying to do what they can for the girls of Oriole age. Members volunteer to entertain them occasionally in a helpful way, and lead them to better understanding of Oriole work. Last Christmas a sister helped them prepare Christmas boxes for the sick, which they distributed. All enjoyed this work greatly, which teaches the important duty and privilege of visiting and cheering the sick. At present they are preparing songs to sing for the invalids of the town. At some of their gatherings they have read and discussed the Oriole plans, had helpful talks by older members who are interested in the girls, and at their last gathering they read Sister Bertha Hulmes's article on table service, having demonstrated table setting. Lunch was served, strict table etiquette fully observed.

Sandusky: The local here was revived through the efforts of Sister Vera Smith, who is president at present. They have an enrollment of nine members, taking social service study and work. At present they are making a quilt, and doing other work for members as needed.

Owendale: Here a new local was organized with Sister James Gimmel as secretary. They also have nine members and concern themselves with relief, educational, and child welfare work.

The above locals are in the Eastern Michigan District, over which Sister May Engel of Port Huron was recently appointed organizer, succeeding Sister Plato-Whitford, whose efforts in the past have been greatly appreciated. The district women greet Sister Engel, and wish her great success in developing the women's work in their locality, and desire to cooperate with her in every way to that end. Most of the locals are in their beginning stages, but all feel very thankful for the nucleus formed, and desire a better understanding of the work of the Women's Department. A great

Among the Indians in Oklahoma

The First Presidency: I have seen the Indians as never before the last ninety days. The five civilized tribes have furnished me with new visions for the work among the wonderful red men of America.

I see there is a chance now to get hold of the class we are to need for the missionaries who can reach them as we will not be able to do. The meeting among the Creeks last Saturday and Sunday was a fine meeting. We were at a disadvantage as the Methodist preacher had thrown a gloom of prejudice over their minds regarding the Saints.

They gave us no chance to preach but we ate with them some of the finest food I have yet seen anywhere in my travels.

We met the famous Red Feather (Tenena), who sang to the soldier boys in France during the war. She has wonderful composure, great control, and is a very sweet singer. We talked with her some and hope to meet her again as such Indians have much influence among the white people as well as the Indians.

We are having so much rain this week that I am very glad the reunion isn't until next week.

Joseph G. Smith and I have driven among the Osages, Cherokees, and Creeks. I was also at the Wilburton conference at the request of U. W. Greene of the Twelve. There I met the Saints of the Eastern District and found many good openings among the Choctaw Indians and especially at Holdenville where Brother Hixson has some of the leaders very much interested.

These points will be my next move in the work.

I am your coworker,

HUBERT CASE.

Missionaries Arrived in Islands

A week ago to-day the new missionary party arrived safely and in good spirits and we have all rejoiced because of their associations. It affords me pleasure to report that they all made a very favorable impression which will develop into lasting confidence on the part of the natives as their several grand qualifications respond to their righteous desires to be of service to mankind. Their diligence in striving to take hold of the language is commendable and they have already organized a class, and Sister Emma Christensen is rendering splendid service as teacher. (From letter by A. V. Karlstrom, Papeete, Tahiti, July 31, 1920.)

Extending the Work in Hawaii

The First Presidency: We have just returned from a two weeks' trip to the island of Maui. We held our preaching services there at Pauwila in the big Orpheum. We had very good attendance all the time. The lowest number we had out was 32 and the highest 60, with an average of about 43.

This was the longest series that has ever been held on this island and I believe it was just what was needed. At these meetings the first night or two we did not have very good order, but it gradually grew much better until at the need is that of qualified leaders in the various special lines of the work, and we surely appreciate the words of encouragement given by the general department through the HERALD that to help develop leaders is to be a part of the district organizers' work in the future.

May God help all of us to find our places in life and make the necessary preparations of heart and mind that we may fill our missions successfully.

Sincerely your sister,

close it was excellent. The last night being near the sacrament Sunday, we held our confirmation service and then had a prayer and testimony meeting during the remainder of the hours. There were no emotional feelings manifest, but we were certainly blessed with the Spirit. The fruit of the Spirit is peace, and surely peace did abound. There were fifty present, including quite a number of children, but everything was quietude and peace.

Six souls were added to the kingdom and we came away leaving them a very happy people. They are earnestly longing for the time to come when some one will be sent among them to labor in a more local way. We now have 14 members in Pauwila.

These Saints are making preparations for a big future and are looking ahead to the time when they can have a little house of worship and they have started a building fund and have nearly $250.

There are several others near the kingdom in this place, but by leaving them hungry for a season, they will be ready to receive the gospel with glad hearts when we are able to return again.

Our work is only established on three islands of the group of eight, but just as soon as we can arrange to get away we expect to carry the gospel to the remaining five. Two of the islands are quite small, but have a few people there also that should be warned. It is our aim to leave none with an excuse.

Very sincerely,

August 1.

Pertle Springs Reunion

The joint reunion of the Kansas City, Independence, and Holden Stakes will be a matter of history ere this reaches you for publication. The gathering as a whole has been very well attended. All expressed themselves of the wonderful enjoyment of the services and all other activities. J. A. Tanner, R. V. Hopkins, and D. J. Krahl were in charge and constituted the program committee. The joint bishopric had charge of grounds, rent, rooms, etc., and they did all within their power to meet the comforts of the people.

R. V. Hopkins was in charge of the recreational activities. Brother Hopkins is indeed a splendid man for this work as he commanded the love and respect of both old and young. Brother J. A. Tanner added very much to the enjoyment of all the sports that he entered into. All services have been very spiritual and educational, not the least of these, the young people's prayer service at which the Lord graciously recognized them in the gifts of the gospel through two of the ministry. These young people were loyal to their prayer service, the average attendance being over a hundred each morning at 6.45 a. m.

The speakers at the reunion were J. W. A. Bailey, Joseph Arber, I. M. Smith, W. S. Macrae, Russell Archibald, I. N. White, J. A. Tanner, F. B. Blair, Reverend J. D. Borders, pastor of the Methodist Church south of Independence, Missouri, C. J. Hunt, and R. V. Hopkins. Special lectures at the eleven o'clock hour were delivered by R. V. Hopkins, Sisters D. H. Blair, C. J. Hunt, Doctor F. H. Criley, Bishops C. J. Hunt, F. B. Blair.

The musical department was in charge of F. A. Cool, assisted by E. C. Harrington and Sister E. S. McNichols. They were also ably assisted by Sisters K. G. Waldson and Royal Brocaw, as pianists. W. S. Macrae, J. A. Arber, and Sister Emma Sneed rendered very effective instrumental music, which was helpful in blending the harmonious feelings of the different services.

Mrs. C. J. Hunt, of Independence, Mrs. Lulu Sandy, of Kansas City, and Mrs. I. M. Ross, of Holden, were placed in charge of the Women's Department. The classes in the following departments were conducted: One to Twenty-one, with Mrs. C. J. Hunt in charge, average attendance of thirty-five. Temple Builders, Mrs. R. E. Newkirk in charge, assisted by Mrs. O. K. Fry and Edith H. Lungwitz, average attendance of thirty-five. Besides the regular work, lectures were given by the following: Mrs. Lulu Sandy of Kansas City, Mrs. N. Johnson of Warrensburg, and R. V. Hopkins of Independence. Mrs. I. M. Ross of Holden was in charge of the Orioles with an average attendance of twenty-four. Mrs. James N. Curtis was in charge of the kindergarten work with an average attendance of seventeen. Mrs. Maud Campbel Halley conducted the vacation school with an average attendance of fifty-one. As a result of the interest in these departments the leaders recommended that the work be conducted at the next reunion.

Southern California Reunion

The First Presidency: Our district conference and reunion closed last night. A peaceful spirit prevailed throughout all the sessions.

It was declared to be the best attended and one of the most successful reunions ever held in the district. There were about seventy-five tents on the grounds, with several autos which were used as tents.

The prayer meetings were well attended and were full of life and spirit and all seemed to enjoy them very much. The morning study hour which was conducted by Sisters Dora Glines and Ella Harris was one of the interesting features of the reunion. There were fifteen people baptized including five adults which will be of value to the branches where they reside. The nurse, Sister Hazel Williams, was also on the grounds to assist all who needed her assistance. We are pleased to report that she was not needed to any extent except to deliver us a very fine lecture. Her address was much appreciated by all.

The bathing in the surf was a great pleasure to those who took advantage of this great treat. The playground was also a pleasing feature. The time from early morning till late at night was all taken up in real activity, and harmony and good will seemed to prevail.

GEORGE H. WIXOM.

Good Reunion at Onset

The First Presidency: Our reunion at Onset, Massachusetts has just closed and many have remarked that it was the finest reunion ever held in this district.

All of our services were well attended. There were many strangers, both from the town and friends of the Saints present, and the Spirit of God was with us in abundance.

There were twenty baptized, and taking it all in all, the reunion served to uplift the hearts of the people, encourage them to greater consecration, and many are rejoicing because of receiving strength therefrom.

Russellites in Convention; Set Millennium Date at 1925

The First Presidency: The Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society (Russellites) are holding a convention in this city. They claim to have 2,500 delegates. I attended one of their meetings. There were three thousand present. Their new president, Judge J. F. Rutherford, of Saint Joseph, Missouri, was the speaker; his subject was: "There are millions now living that will never die." On next Thursday he will sail for a four months' tour of Europe, visiting Egypt and Palestine. He will also visit Great Britain, France, Belgium, and Switzerland, where they have associations. He expects to have taken numerous photographic views in these foreign countries for filming on his return to the United States. He will be accompanied by his secretary, A. P. Goux, also G. C. Driscoll, of Los Angeles, California, and W. G. Soper, of Cleveland, Ohio.

Three hundred of this society went to one of our lakes and performed the ordinance of baptism. They have circulated their Watch Tower magazine around the city. This month it has 232 pages. They claim it has twenty cents' worth of paper in each number, and that price they charge for the book at the meeting place, but on the street where I live they had men delivering these books at the houses free. The judge is a good speaker, advances many new things, such as the sixth dispensation which he claims has ended a few years ago, and the millennium begins in 1925. He makes a specialty of this date. That is the foundation of the subject: "Millions now living that will never die." He bases his calculations on Bible prophecies in the Old Testament.

Difficulties Endured by Other Churches

The First Presidency: I am especially pleased that our men and work are so far ahead of the other churches. From a Methodist minister we learn some of the almost unbearable conditions their men work under, also the result. During the year 1919 in the Saskatchewan District they lost five by death; eighteen students quit college; and forty-three ministers resigned; not one new application for the ministry. The Catholic priest at Vanscoy says they simply can't get young men for the ministry.

All the churches as far as I can learn are on the rocks financially. I am glad we are out of debt and our ranks are so well intact.

Because of climatic conditions the work goes slow here, yet almost everyone is desirous of helping and is confident of the 20,000 converts and a million dollars a year.

The Runnells Reunion

Hello, good-by, and the reunion of the Des Moines District has passed into history, but in passing has left an impression on the minds and lives of all who attended that will not soon be forgotten.

There were many new features added to the reunion work and play that made all feel that it was a large family gathering.

Every morning was taken up with services in the large new tent that was purchased recently for missionary purposes, and special children's services were held in a smaller tent in charge of a young sister, Fern Richeson, and Sister Malcer. The usual order of excellent priesthood meetings, spiritual prayer meetings and soul-enriching sermons was carried out each morning, but from 9.45 to 10.30 a. m. was taken up with interesting institute sessions.

A teacher training class was conducted by A. E. Warr, young people's history class by Vida E. Smith, Doctrine and Covenants by J. A. Dowker, and Book of Mormon class by M. A. McConley and F. T. Mussel. Everybody was interested, and plans are being made for better work next year.

The missionary force received a hearty welcome and brethren McConley, McDowell, Dowker, Macgregor, Chevile, Mussel, and Sister Vida E. Smith did their best to instruct the Saints and were assisted by an unusual degree of the Holy Spirit. Sister Smith lectured during the institute sessions and also gave special lectures to the sisters. Oh, yes, we nearly forgot the "Little Nurse," Miss Radnall, with her quiet manner and big lectures, but that was something new and she will excuse the oversight. Her presence in the interests of the health department was very much appreciated, and two young sisters, Lena McCowan and Helen Weeks, decided to give their life's work to the church in this department and will leave soon to take up their work.

A special fast was observed on the last Sunday morning at 7.30 and the sacrament was administered to about 200 members. This was a spiritual feast and the gifts were manifest in tongues and prophecy.

A brother was permitted to see the Savior come into the meeting and stand upon the rostrum overlooking the congregation.

Afternoons were largely taken for recreation and Brother Chevile took care of this part in his characteristic manner.

The boys went swimming and the girls went swimming. There were volley ball games for old and young, wiener roasts, baseball games and as usual the preachers won the games.

The pageant, "One hundred years of Latter Day Saintism," was given on the last Friday night. Sister Margaret Davis of Des Moines was the author and manager of the pageant and it was well received on a rainy night.

There was a high degree of spirituality manifest on the part of the Saints and the way all took the recreation proved that none had lost the gladness of youth.

In this manner the reunion of 1920 has passed into history but space will not permit me to tell of all the good things enjoyed.

Minnesota Saints Looking Zionward

It is with a glad heart that we read in the pages of the church periodicals of the progress being made by the organization of which we are members.

"Twenty thousand converts before next General Conference, with their faces turned toward Zion."

The question came to me as it did to those in olden time: What must I do to be saved? And another came with it: What can I do to help save others?

They brought to my mind a dream I had when Brother T. C. Kelley was sent into this State the last time. As he was about to leave, I prayed earnestly that he might be sent back again. I dreamed one night of seeing him with a very large basket on his arm, a much larger one than I had ever seen before. As I stood wondering what he was going to do with it, it was made known to me that he was going to gather in the sheaves. When I read of him being placed as one of the group supervisors over so many States the meaning of the dream came to me. If other missionaries carry as large baskets at the next General Conference the goal set by our worthy president will be attained. What a gathering that will be!

Brother J. E. Wildermuth, of Fargo, North Dakota, was appointed group supervisor for Minnesota and was here in the interests of the reunion. He gave us a good sermon. We have heard him speak before, but it seemed this time there was a greater endowment of the power of God with him than usual.

Several have gone from here to the promised land and others have their faces turned in that direction. Some have thought this year would be the last time a reunion would be held in Clitherall but we hope not.

We read of the admonitions of the Spirit to the Saints in Kansas City, to the effect that the efforts of the past would not avail but greater efforts must be made and more sacrifices required, with more preparation for service if they would be acceptable as coworkers in the future. It applies to us as well.

Eastern Iowa Reunion

The reunion of the Eastern Iowa District held at Maquoketa August 13 to 22 has become history. The separation was with regrets, all loath to leave, still rejoicing in the Spirit which was present in all services. Special manifestations were given several times, largely to the body in general.

Apostle M. A. McConley and Patriarch W. A. McDowell gave several very instructive lectures, being supported by the local ministry of the district.

Each evening stereopticon pictures were shown, giving all a mental picture of scenes which support this latter-day work in Bible and Book of Mormon history.

Daily institute work of each department, with priesthood meetings have prepared the Saints for more effective labor.

Along with the spiritual feasts were hikes and recreational activities for the young people, including a trip to the famous Moorhead Caves, one of the natural wonders of Eastern Iowa. Here we saw manifested God's marvelous handiwork. As we wended our way through the gorge, under the natural bridge and into the caves, we wondered how many of the early Jaredites and Nephites with others inhabited this region. A weinie roast was enjoyed at the close of the Saturday evening service.

The girls in attendance organized a booster club, also there was perfected what is known as "The Eastern Iowa District Reunion Association," which organizations with the Busy B's expect to make next year's reunion the best ever.

It is to be noted that the names of the district presidency, with the heads of departments, all begin with B, hence "The Busy B's" observed by some to be the strongest organization in the history of the district. It is our hope to so build Eastern Iowa that she may be foremost in this part of the vineyard in prosecuting the work of the Lord. Our motto is, "Let's Go; Watch Us Grow." May we meet you at our 1921 reunion.

In bonds, J. E. BENSON.

"Unto the Least of These"

Lowbanks Reunion

Men may build great tabernacles in the name of the Lord, and may search the earth for heathen nations to whom to preach of God's goodness, but he who brings a smile to the face of a little child, and creates a bit of sunshine in lives that might otherwise be in shadow, has come very near to the achievement of the Master's mission, and it is of such that Jesus spoke when he said: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

When the Toronto Saints planned their reunion this year, their hearts expanded to include all within their branch, and they determined that the joy of camping by the beautiful shores of Lake Erie and the happy experience of living out-of-doors and near to God should not be denied a single little child whose parents would permit it to be taken. So when the camp was pitched on the wonderful grounds at Lowbanks, the first tent up was the "Kiddie Koop" and it was a "Koop" of generous size. A regular little colony of youngsters were brought from the hot city down to this cool, refreshing camp ground, and no love or care was spared to make their comfort and their happiness complete. There were good, motherly women who watched over them as they would their own, and everyone in camp felt the responsibility and pleasure of looking out for them.

Their shining little faces were lined up at a long table three times a day, and good, wholesome food and fresh, sweet milk in abundance were given them. Throughout the day there was supervised play and singing and happy hours on the beach, and early at night they were tucked into their cribs as safely and with as much love as their own mothers could have bestowed.

With such undertone of service and blessed with so many happy children, how could the reunion help but be a success? Nature conspired with the Saints in making it a happy time for all. As was expressed over and over in the prayer meetings, a new era had dawned for Toronto, and in the joy of a new-found freedom they were passing the blessing on to the little ones and to those who could not make a share for themselves.

And again was demonstrated the fact that the church of Christ knows no border line. Even as we are all of one family, so are we all one people. Artificial barriers have been raised in times past, but those who honor the maple leaf and those who thrill at the stars and stripes have learned that their patriotism to home and country may still be pure and loyal when they enlist under the banner of Christ Emmanuel.

Truly it is good to travel to a far place and yet be at home, and to sit down among strangers only to find oneself among brethren and friends. What but the gospel could bring such experiences!

Preachers expected for the occasion are Judge Aaron Kirkendall, of Creola, Ohio; J. E. Bishop, of Stubenville, Ohio; J. A. Grant, district president, and J. W. Davis. C. W. Clark, 58 East Blake Avenue, Columbus, Ohio.

Meeting at Alma, Michigan, September 4 and 5, will be held at the Odd Fellows' Hall on State Street, instead of at 110 Grover Avenue, as previously announced. Doctor T. J. Carney, noted physician, will lecture on social purity. Earle G. Falconer, 110 North Grover Avenue, Alma, Michigan.

Our Departed Ones

CARPENTER.—Nancy Ann Carpenter, daughter of Hamilton and Marie Carpenter, was born May 31, 1902, at Wallaceburg, Ontario. Baptized August 11, 1912, by R. C. Russell, at Erie Beach. Died August 1, 1920, at Toledo, Ohio. Leaves to mourn, father, mother, 2 brothers, and one sister. Services at Saints' chapel, Toledo, Ohio. Sermon by W. S. Hettrick.

BISHOP.—Beatrice Bishop was born May 1, 1894, South Wales. Baptized September 18, 1905, by William Lewis at Scranton, Pennsylvania. Died July 9, 1920, at Scranton. She was a faithful worker for the Master and loved by all who knew her. She leaves to mourn her departure father, mother, 7 sisters, and 4 brothers. Funeral services at Saints' church, Scranton, in charge of E. B. Hull, sermon by J. R. Lentell.

NEWS AND COMMENT

CHURCH NEWS

During the General Conference Brother R. H. Oberly of Denver solicited orders for conference pictures. Many of the Saints were disappointed in that their orders were not filled until very recently and considerable blame has been attached to Brother Oberly. However, we are informed that the trouble was with the local Photo Company in Denver, with whom he had contracted to fill these orders, as they did not live up to their contract. The matter has been adjusted and it is hoped that all Saints who ordered these pictures have been supplied.

Word has been received from Elder Robert Brown, Papeete, Tahiti, that the new missionary party had arrived there safely. The letter was dated August 1.

Elder Frederick A. Smith, presiding evangelist, has sold his home in Lamoni and purchased property at 1704 West Lexington Street in Independence, shipping a car of household goods to that place on the 25th. He has resided in Lamoni for about twenty-seven years, but gravitates to the center place in accordance with the policy of the church to assemble the general church offices in one place.

The Milwaukee Saints have just moved into their new hall located on the ground floor 391 Sixth Avenue, near the corner of Mineral Street. Sunday services are held as follows: Sunday school 10 a. m., preaching 11 a. m. and 7.30 p. m. Prayer meeting Wednesday evening 7.30 p. m. Any Saints knowing members or friends residing at or near here will kindly communicate with the undersigned and an effort will be made to locate them. Fred V. Dreyer, 239 Third Street, Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

Later word from Goreville, Illinois, by Elder Lester O. Wildermuth, says that in addition to the 14 baptisms reported last week 18 more have been baptized, making 32 in all in the last 8 days. All will become members of the old Tunnel Hill Branch. Brother Wildermuth says: "There seems to be a great spiritual awakening here, as well as in other places we have been. Large attendance at our meetings. Unable to seat them all."

The Iowa Journal of History and Politics for July, 1920, announces that during the summer months seven different men are carrying on research work for the State Historical Society. Among these we note Professor Heman Hale Smith of Graceland College. The work on which he is engaged is a volume dealing with the church and its various factions in Iowa.

We note as manager of the Pisgah, Iowa, Community Fair, to be held September 10 and 11, C. B. Woodstock, who was formerly of the Graceland College faculty, and who is now at the head of the consolidated schools at Pisgah. This precedes immediately the Harrison County Fair, which is held from the 14th to the 17th.

At the Lamoni Stake reunion eight persons were baptized. A number of visitors were present during the sessions, investigating the work.

FROM THE BRANCHES

Mobile, Alabama. The branch here seems to be on the forward move, with good attendance in all departments. The Religio has been backward but is manifesting new interest and has good programs. Seven have been baptized by the local force of late. Brethren Alma Booker and Levi Gamet of the missionary force have been with us of late, making this their home in the mission. We are planning an extensive campaign in the city of Mobile. Brother Booker is promoting the enterprise and will be assisted principally by N. L. Booker, and the Saints will all give hearty support.

Lamoni, Iowa. There are manifestations of an intense preparation for the coming season and the assimilation of some two hundred young people into the church activities of the place. The classes of the Sunday school and Religio will largely be organized and reseeded to provide the best possible courses not only for the visitors but the regular members. The present plan is for the Religio to offer the various sections of the normal course that the Sunday school teachers may have opportunity for special training. Motion pictures continue to be shown on the church lawn on Friday evenings, with a series of stereopticon lectures on Sunday evenings. Various of the brethren give the lectures, such as D. T. Williams, C. E. Wight, J. F. Garver, E. D. Moore, G. N. Briggs, Max Carmichael. We note some of the classes in the Sunday school taking up a brief course in citizenship for the special benefit of the sisters who will vote for the first time for the entire ticket in the coming election.

Get Ready for a Big Task!

At last General Conference the church unanimously and enthusiastically indorsed President Smith's building program, and ordered that a big assembly hall be built without delay. We are now ready to begin that work. The requirements of such a building have been figured; preliminary plans have been drawn, and the next and biggest step is to raise the money.

$500,000 Is the Minimum Required

Five hundred thousand dollars is the very least sum on which we can start this building. It is no small task to raise such a sum, and it will require the devoted effort of every officer and member to bring this campaign to success, but it can be done, and it must be done, for the continued progress of the work depends upon it.

Instead of allowing this campaign to drag over a year's time, it will be intensified and two weeks will be consecrated to this task.

October 15 to 31 Will Be Consecrated Weeks

During this period every member of the church will be made acquainted with the program before us, and the duty of each will be made clear, and an opportunity given to subscribe to the utmost of the ability. Each district will be assigned its quota and every member of the ministry, local and missionary, will be called to assist during these two weeks in raising the sum required.

Our Influence on Doctrine

BY ELBERT A. SMITH

The church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints as a factor in shaping the world's religious opinions.

The Latter Day Saint is frequently asked, "What is the principal difference between your church and others in matters of belief?"

While attempting to reply with a concrete statement of differences, many will occur to him; for instance the question of authority,—a vital question on which we differ from nearly all others, whether Catholic or Protestant.

Yet he will be struck with the fact that many differences which might have been named in years gone by apparently do not now exist.

Many items of doctrine preached by few if any, and opposed by most, when we began their exposition, are now either quite generally taught by many orthodox believers, or are looked upon with much more favor, and every decade they receive a wider acceptance.

You may run over the list: The gathering of the Jews, the second personal appearing of Christ, divine healing, probation after death, yes, even continued revelation, gathering, tithing, stewardships, and consecration of properties. Others will occur to you, perhaps. At the same time many obnoxious tenets opposed by us have been dropped from the creeds, or if retained, the public promulgation of them has ceased.

Why this change? Many who have opposed us, and who yet oppose us, are much more nearly on common doctrinal ground with us than in years gone by. Yet we have never abandoned a single position taken by us in the beginning.

The statement that Latter Day Saints have been one of the great factors in forcing a revision of the world's religious opinions would probably be hooted by many prominent divines. Yet it is no less or more than the truth.

Our missionaries have for many years carried on an aggressive campaign, reaching most parts of the United States, Canada, England, Scotland, and Wales, as well as parts of Germany, France, Australia, Scandinavia, New Zealand, Palestine, and the islands of the sea. Multitudes have listened to their convincing presentation of doctrines, who have been loath to unite with us—but not slow to borrow those doctrines.

Thousands of influential clergymen have attended these meetings or otherwise investigated the message, mostly with a view to debate or combat. Very many have actually engaged in public debate. They have found our position on doctrinal points invincible, and as a sheer matter of self-protection, have themselves aided in the work of creed revision. In addition to this, most of our adherents, the world over, have been actively engaged in teaching their neighbors.

Probably no other religious movement ever received greater publicity, and it has had its effect. Furious and constant attack has been made upon us and we have met it with strenuous and unexpected resistance.

Many a lance has been broken on the helmet of truth and the aggressor has retired with battered theological mail, only to reappear as a reformer on his own account. It is easier to imitate than to surrender. John Alexander Dowie, for instance, borrowed most of his ideas on doctrine and organization from Latter Day Saints.

So to-day other voices than ours are preaching our doctrine; voices of ministers whose particular denominations bitterly opposed that doctrine fifty years ago.

In the one item of the doctrine of the second coming of Christ, and its imminence, what a change in a few years! The voice of God to us, in October, 1831, was, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight." It was much like the commission to John the Baptist, and conditions were somewhat similar.

Christ was coming in the first instance with blessing. It was but just that the people be told, otherwise his paths would not have been straight, or strictly in harmony with justice. John was sent as an authoritative messenger to warn; yet his was not the only work. The Jews themselves preached Christ's coming and daily looked for it. The Messianic idea was at its height among them when he came; it afterward declined. John warned them and they warned each other.

Christ is coming again, this time to judge as well as bless. It is but just that the people should be warned with authority, as they have been; and now they themselves have taken up the work.

At a so-called "prophetic conference," held in the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago, in 1914, a new creed or statement of faith was adopted by the seventeen hundred or more delegates present, representing churches all over the United States and Canada. As reported in the Sunday School Times for March 21, 1914, the ninth article of that creed reads:

"We believe in the second, visible and imminent coming of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, to establish his worldwide kingdom on earth."

Even more emphatic was the statement issued in 1917 by a group of British divines, representing Baptist, Presbyterian, Methodist, Congregationalist, and Episcopalian denominations. Their "manifesto," called "The significance of the hour," published in the London Christian World, and later in the Chicago Herald for December 6, 1917, was signed by clergymen of world renown. The first two declarations were as follows:

"First—that the present crisis points toward the close of the times of the Gentiles.

"Second—that the revelation of our Lord may be expected at any moment, when he will be manifested as evidently as to his disciples on the eve of his resurrection."

The doctrine of the literal, personal, second advent of our Lord, so little considered a generation ago, when our elders set about the task of making his paths straight, is thus, now, in most spectacular manner espoused and announced.

If there shall not be a work of getting ready as well as preaching, when Christ comes he may justly say, "Why are you not ready? My paths were straight. You were warned, and you yourselves taught my coming."

Zionic principles, too, are winning their way. As I write I have before me a book entitled, Stewardship Starting Points, by Harvey Reeves Calkins, published by the Methodist Book Concern. The author says:

"Moreover, the great free churches, the Methodist, the Presbyterian, and the rest, have now discovered in the tithe an unworked gold mine. As expert money raisers who have need of vast resources, many of the evangelical churches are beginning to exploit the tithe. . . ."

But he regards this only as the apex of the pyramid. Stewardship is the base—the conception that God, not man, is owner of property, man being but a steward. Of this doctrine he says:

"Stewardship is the broad and sufficient foundation, ordained of God, for the material maintenance of his kingdom. . . . It is the message of Christian inspiration. It is the commanding note of virile evangelism. It will be the saving word for our generation."

At times it would seem that this borrowing of our doctrine has robbed our message of its force. Yet when we take a comprehensive view of God's work we are satisfied. Our work in part is to warn and teach. People will be judged not alone by what we have preached to them, but also by what they themselves have preached to one another.

The work of warning has been more thorough and comprehensive than we had thought; and we need not feel badly that others have relieved us of a part of the responsibility.

Probably it would be impossible to determine just how much Latter Day Saint preaching has had to do with the wonderful changes in theology that we have noted—but without doubt our influence has been considerable.

It will be noted, briefly to recapitulate, that the major voices among the so-called "sectarian" denominations, proclaiming the personal, second advent of the Lord have risen after we had preached that doctrine for many years. The healing cults, Christian Science, the Emmanuel Movement, etc., in like manner arose long after we had proclaimed the doctrine of divine healing. The same general remarks apply to ecclesiastic teaching on the financial law, the return of the Jews—the latter now not only proclaimed by leading divines but also by prominent rulers in the political realm.

Five Periods of Church History

Address by Elbert A. Smith, Independence Stake Conference, October 6, 1918. Mrs. A. Morgan, Reporter.

I take my text from an unusual source. Sir Oliver Lodge, one of the greatest and best of modern scientists, says: "This is the lesson science has to teach theology—to look for the action of the Deity, if at all, then always; not in the past alone, nor only in the future, but equally in the present. If his action is not visible now, it never will be, and never has been visible."—Science and Immortality, published in 1914.

This is almost identical with the message that we have borne to the world for nearly one hundred years—not to look backward alone toward the Isle of Patmos, or forward toward the pearly gates for revelation, but look for the manifestation of God now.

I. The Period of Preparation

It has been suggested that I review, briefly, some of the salient events of church history. The history of the church is quite naturally divided into periods. The first of these, of course, is the period of preparation. The first event in that period that I choose to notice this afternoon is that of the first revelation, or vision, given to Joseph Smith early in the spring of 1820. We can hardly realize, perhaps, the startling nature of the announcement made to the world by that individual, that he had received a revelation; because whatever differences may have existed between or among all of the denominations, they were at one in this sentiment—that revelation was not for that age.

You will remember that Joseph Smith went into the forest and presented his petition to God for wisdom and knowledge. The first thing that occurred was that he was assailed and overcome and all but destroyed by the powers of evil—the forces of darkness; but when he called upon the Lord he tells us that light presented itself, and the powers of darkness were driven away. This struggle between darkness and light on that occasion is symbolical; and possibly was prophetic of the continual struggle that has been going on from that day to this between these two forces. And we deceive ourselves if we indulge in the thought that the powers of evil have ceased the conflict; but our salvation when destruction seems imminent is the same as it was then—to call upon God for deliverance.

When the light was revealed two individuals presented themselves before him, and one of them, indicating the other, said, "This is my beloved Son; hear ye him." I am fond of dwelling upon this as being, to my mind, the keynote of our message. Prior to that time there had been many individuals who had been presenting their views to the world, individuals highly endowed and educated in the best universities and theological schools of the day, bearing many titles and degrees that they had legitimately won by hard study, but all of them at variance, and hopelessly in the dark and in confusion. In the midst of that confusion of counsel came this, like the clear note of a golden bell—this statement concerning Jesus, "Hear ye him." Whatever advancement we may yet make in learning, and I pray God they may be many and notable, we must ever bear in mind that Jesus Christ is to be the man of our counsel on all occasions.

I remember listening to a concert by a splendid orchestra, where a violin soloist rendered one number that brought forth tumultuous applause, which continued while she was selecting her next number; but in the midst of all that applause she listened intently and caught the note that the leader struck upon the piano, and tuned her instrument accordingly. So I believe that we, amid all the tumult of applause or disapprobation that the world may hurl at us, should ever listen attentively for the voice of Jesus Christ, and govern our lives accordingly.

Finally, when the Lord came to answer the question propounded, the statement was made to Joseph Smith, concerning the churches of the day, that they were all wrong and their creeds an abomination in his sight. That statement is still on record. It is either true or false. I believe that, as representatives of the church, we should deport ourselves always with Christian courtesy, as Christian gentlemen, in our treatment of other churches and their ministers. Our charity ought to equal our candor in our statement of this fact; yet that declaration forever sets us apart, and renders us unique in the religious world.

There is a sort of popular theory that in some mysterious way all of the churches, with their conflicting theories, with their truths and errors, with their faults and virtues, all thrown together, constitute the church and kingdom of God, and the body of Christ on earth. If that indeed be true, then we have no legitimate reason for our existence, and we are something in the situation of the little boy who could not tell the teacher his age on the first day of school; so his mother, the next day, wrote a little note telling the teacher the day of his birth and the year. He lost the note on the way and so presented himself at school in great distress of mind, saying to the teacher that he had lost his excuse for being born.

This period of preparation included the restoration of the priesthood; and that is another significant historical event that we must never lose sight of. Authority to represent God is not spontaneously generated in the heart by religious fervor. It cannot be exercised properly without that; but it is restored by divine authority, and it is handed down from individual to individual under the imposition of hands; and that fact certainly stands out in history as being true, else a great deal of our work is without foundation.

II. Period of Organization

The period of organization began upon the 6th day of April, 1830, when the church was organized with its six members, at that time—organized with the common consent of the assembly, by vote, and in accord with revelation. The body of the church moved to Kirtland within a year from its primary organization, and there the organization progressed, including the organization of the quorums of seventy, the organization of the first presidency (near Kirtland), that of the high council, the opening up of missions, and so on, so that the church, in a very short time, was equipped to perform its various functions: executive, legislative, judicial, financial, and missionary; and growth and organization went forward in spite of opposition and persecution. It was at that place that the Kirtland Temple was erected and dedicated with such grand power, such demonstrations of the Spirit of God, and such blessings poured out upon the people.

I might divert myself from the thread of the discourse just a moment in regard to that temple. It was abandoned when the Saints were driven from Ohio. I am told that they went in such haste that they even took the great canvas curtains that divided the courts of the temple and used them in manufacturing covers for their wagons. The temple stood open, and it seems that all evil powers tried to move in and desecrate it and destroy it. Sheep came in from the meadows, and used the lower court for a fold. That was not so bad, but wandering theatrical companies occupied the upper court, and dances and drunken revelries were held there. Perhaps I may be accused of being superstitious, but the fact that the temple was three times struck by lightning, and on several occasions set on fire, either accidentally or maliciously, indicates to my mind a certain design to destroy that noble edifice. But it was miraculously preserved, and in due time came back into the possession of the church, and was renovated, remodeled, and put into fit condition.

When I was there in 1910, standing in the pulpit, close to the altar rail where it is said that the feet of the Lord Jesus rested when he revealed himself, the impression came to my mind clearly that the temple had not filled its mission, and that we may yet receive an endowment of power there.

The thought that I want to impress on your minds is that in all these periods God was with the people. I pass over the period of persecution which culminated in the expulsion of the Saints from Nauvoo, and the murder of Joseph and Hyrum Smith, and the destruction of the temple that had been erected at Nauvoo. That sanctuary was less fortunate than the temple at Kirtland, possibly because unholy hands attempted to complete it. It, too, was smitten by the thunderbolts, in the very hours when the remnants of the Saints were leaving Nauvoo. Later it was burned and only the stone walls were left standing; and still later a terrible hurricane threw those walls into ruins so that there remained only three pillars, which furnished the poet his theme: "Three remaining pillars still, like the three remaining pillars of the temple on the hill"—referring to Joseph, Alexander, and David.

III. "The Dark and Cloudy Day"

Then ensued the period that has always been known in church history as the "dark and cloudy day," when it seemed that foes without and traitors within had entirely destroyed the beauty and marred the excellency of the work God had so nobly begun. We can hardly realize, perhaps, the sorrow, anguish, and anxiety of the scattered Saints. And to crown it all, there sat that institution in the West, in her valleys and in the midst of her mountains, with her painted face and her harlot robes, saying to all the world, "I am all there is of Mormonism. I am all that there ever was of Mormonism. I am the culmination and chief exponent of the work begun by Joseph Smith. And I stand for polygamy, blood atonement, and a thousand dark, oath-guarded mysteries, whispered behind my temple doors." And she added to that the proud prophecy, "I am all there ever will be of Mormonism."

But prophecy projects itself into the realm of uncertainty and awaits the demonstration in time. You remember that Hindenburg prophesied that on the first day of last April he would eat his dinner in Paris; but General Foch had a string on that April fool dinner. And this was another prophecy that never was fulfilled, because, as in the first vision, in the very hour when it seemed that the powers of darkness had prevailed, the people called upon God, and the powers of light asserted themselves, and the work of reorganization began.

In 1851, there was given a most remarkable revelation to Jason W. Briggs, in which the Lord said:

"Behold, I have not cast off my people; neither have I changed in regard to Zion. Yea, verily, my people shall be redeemed, and my law shall be kept which I revealed unto my servant, Joseph Smith, jr., for I am God and not man, and who is he that shall turn me from my purpose. . . . In mine own due time I will call upon the seed of Joseph Smith, and will bring one forth, and he shall be mighty and strong, and he shall preside over the high priesthood of my church; and then shall the quorums assemble, and the pure in heart shall gather, and Zion shall be reinhabited."

IV. The Return and the Reorganization

Jason W. Briggs had no way of knowing that those things would come to pass. There are things in that prophecy by which it may be tested. The sons of Joseph Smith, at that time, were but boys—the oldest of them, I believe, only about nineteen years of age. No individual could possibly know that they would grow to manhood, or ever, any one of them, identify himself with his father's work. He had no way of knowing that the quorums would be reassembled, and the Saints return to Zion; but you are the witnesses to-day that these prophecies have been fulfilled, quite in harmony with the prediction found in Doctrine and Covenants, section 98, and paragraph 4, where the Lord said, "Zion shall not be moved out of her place, notwithstanding her children are scattered, they that remain and are pure in heart shall return, and come to their inheritances; they and their children, with songs of everlasting joy." Men who were driven from Missouri, and remained pure in heart, came back to Independence, with their children; and their children's children to-day join with us in the songs of joy that are raised at this place.

In due time our late lamented President, Joseph Smith, then known as "young Joseph," took his place at the head of the church, April 6, 1860, and shortly issued what is known as the first general epistle, in which he said:

"In the name of the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, I now call upon all the scattered Saints, upon all the broad earth, to arise and shake off the sleep that hath bound them these many years, take on the armor of the just, calling on the name of the Lord for help, and unite once more for the emancipation of the honest in heart from the power of false doctrines and the shackles of sin.

"In the name of bleeding Zion, I call upon all those who have been wandering in by and forbidden paths, and have been led astray by wicked and designing men, to turn from their scenes of wickedness and sins of convenience, to turn from their servitude to Satan, in all his seductive devices; from vice in every phase, and from the labor of sin, the wages whereof are ever death, unto their true and delightful allegiance to the principles of the gospel of peace. . . .

"And in the name of the Lord of hosts, I call upon all the inhabitants of the earth to repent, believe, and be baptized, for the time cometh when the judgments of God are to be poured out upon all nations, and the besom of God's wrath shall smoke through the land. . . ."

I wish you would read that epistle. We can hardly realize the effect it had upon the scattered Saints. It was like the note of a trumpet sounding the assembly. Old veterans who had labored under Joseph the Martyr lifted up their hearts again because it had the sound of Cumorah. Sons and daughters of old Saints lifted up their heads and said, "If that is the message our fathers believed in, we have nothing to be ashamed of; we can once more look all men in the face." I can judge the effect it had upon them, because I remember the first time I read it, as a boy, perhaps twenty-five years after it was published. I found a little discolored leaflet in the attic and read it, and I said, The man who wrote that is a prophet. I said to myself, That is the message my father preached, and that is the message I will preach.

V. The Redemption of Zion

The period of reorganization, strenuous as it was, building from the ground up, the quorums, districts, branches, missions, publishing houses, and church institutions, has come to a close. You and I recognize that God was with the people in that period. We are now definitely merged into another period, and that, I believe, is the period of the redemption of Zion. The gathering is an accomplished fact, to a certain extent, at least. We have enough people here to begin to redeem Zion right now, so far as numbers are concerned, if we be but pure in heart. Is God still with us? Brother Walter [Smith] said he wished I would emphasize the idea of God being with us. I believe if you have not seen the workings of God with us right now, I ought to bring to your attention the text I took from Sir Oliver Lodge: Do not look for the manifestation of God only in the past, nor alone in the future, but equally in the present. If his action is not visible now, it never will be, and never has been visible.

Can you not see God moving upon the hearts of the people? Do you see no indication of it in the reapproachment of our people, and the people on the Temple Lot; or in the establishment of storehouses, or the gathering of the people, or the teachings of those Zionite principles which are being emphasized and brought to your attention, or in the purchase of lands?

Certainly, it seems to me that God is with us now. But the powers of evil are at work also. Those angels who are reported to be telling individuals here or there that they should leave the church are not identified in any sense with the angel that told Joseph Smith to organize the church. They bring a different message and come from different general headquarters. As one man bluntly put it, "They come up the ladder instead of down the ladder."

God did not begin his work so gloriously to abandon it at this late day; and I ask that your loyalty and support may sustain the brother who shall follow me, [President Frederick M. Smith] as they have properly reserved the best wine for the end of the feast. Let us sustain him, not only here, but hereafter.

Pardon a little personal testimony. If you want the revelations of God, then live for them, and deport yourselves so as to receive them. A few days ago, while sitting in my chair in the Presidency's office, the spirit of devotion came upon me, and I silently bowed my head, and prayed: "Lord, bless the man who sits opposite me at this desk. Make him strong with thy strength—make him very tender and compassionate that he may bear with the foibles and faultfindings of thy people. Give him, Lord, infinite patience. And give him thy wisdom, that he may solve their problems." Are you willing to join with me in that prayer?

Our Keynote: "Hear Ye Him"

BY T. W. WILLIAMS

Sermon delivered at Central Church, Kansas City, Missouri, April 11, 1920.

If ever there was a time in human experience when men should feel the occasion for a final word in regard to things religious, it is to-day. To have that final word it is necessary that the one who utters it speaks as "one having authority."

The Bible states that Jesus comes as the representative of God. If so, he speaks for God. From his pronouncement there is no appeal. His word is final. We stand as representatives for him—duly authorized to speak for him—empowered to represent him. The word which he has given to the world stands unimpeached. It has stood the acid test throughout the ages. It is our purpose to present the character and purpose of Jesus Christ and briefly outline some of his most vital utterances in regard to moral and spiritual conduct.

Humanity has wandered far afield in the last two thousand years. The church has followed after many things which are not vital to religion. It is gratifying, however, that, as a result of this great baptism of suffering growing out of this world war, there is a manifest tendency to get back to the basic truths enunciated by Jesus.

After all, Christianity amounts to nothing without Jesus. He is the great center. He radiates life. He was not so much a preacher as a practitioner. He demonstrated truth. We have almost made abortive the virile, simple truths of Jesus by our theological dissertations. Just to the extent that we discard these accumulated human traditions which have been attached to the teachings of Jesus and get back to basic truth shall we be entitled to real communion with God.

Jesus and Him Crucified

Our mission is to preach Jesus and him crucified. We are not sent out to preach any other man. The religion of Jesus is not a philosophy so much as a message. It is not dissertation or formula. It is not dogma or creed. It is relationship. It is fellowship. It is communion. The letter of his message is impotent without the spirit of his message.

The statement of the Apostle Paul is impressive. He said, "For I am determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ and him crucified." Paul makes the preaching of Jesus Christ impossible without the presentation of his crucifixion. Jesus is synonymous with crucifixion. In order to preach Jesus Christ we must preach Jesus Christ crucified or else the preaching of Jesus Christ is vain. It becomes us to study the purpose of God expressed in the life of Jesus. We must understand his mission. We must know him.

Jesus said: "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved." We have here presented the purpose of the Almighty in sending his Son into the world. Please note: "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son." God loved the world. He loved the whole world. He loved the sinning, erring world. His love moved him to give his only Son to help this sinning, estranged world. It was love, not justice which moved God. Jesus was a sacrifice not to God but for man. Jesus gave himself as a sacrifice to save man. He did not die to pacify God. He did not die to reconcile God to man. Christ died for all men. It is up to each man to determine whether this death will be efficacious or not.

Index of the Atonement

Herewith a clear index of the atonement. God recognizing man's helplessness, knowing his inability to extricate himself from the dilemma into which he had plunged himself, sent his Son into the world to do for man that which man could not do for himself. The human race had failed to comply with the divine law of life. Mankind had forfeited communion with God. Through sin all men were under transgression. Being in this condition it was impossible for man in himself to extricate himself. He could not rehabilitate himself with God without divine help. The love of God provided the means of grace.

God yearned over his creation. He desired that man, the crowning work of all his creative mind, should not prove a failure. He desired that this one product of his creative power which possessed reason and intelligence should not bring disorder and chaos in his otherwise harmonious universe. God determined to exhaust his divine power to make it possible that man should achieve and conquer. The divine spark which he had implanted in man was too sacred to be wholly lost. God could not admit failure. To admit failure would make him less than God. This was impossible.

The great mind of the world was able to sense conditions and to know that it was necessary that something must be done to close the big gap which had developed between man and God. God was not estranged from man; man was estranged from God. God did not change as the result of sin. It was man who had changed. God was and always is consistent with himself. He personified harmony. Man estranged himself from God. He became out of harmony with God. He was so estranged that no effort of his own could extricate him from the consequences of his sin. It was necessary that God should exercise himself to extricate mankind from the environment which man through sin had created and to make it possible for man to be rehabilitated and again come into communion with God.

Old Idea Passes

The old idea of sacrifice has passed. There is not an orthodox church in America, or the whole world for that matter, which holds to a literal interpretation of the old idea of vicarious sacrifice. The church once taught that the purpose of the atonement was to expiate crime, to appease divine wrath. This accomplished, God became sufficiently pleased to renew his love to the world. There is no place for propitiation in true religion. Man cannot help God. He cannot do God any good. He cannot change God's feeling or purpose. Nothing which man can do can in any sense work a change in God. The change is all on the side of man.

God knew that it was necessary for Christ to live as well as die in order to teach man what was necessary to bring him back into the presence of God. We talk about original sin. If the Bible is true there was a time when sin first came into the world. In fact this is true in the nature of things. Sin is not eternal. It had a beginning. It will have an end. Sin inures as the right of agency which God granted to man in the beginning—the right to choose for himself. This choice carries with it the sequence. Choice implies responsibility. As a man sows so shall he reap.

God said: "If you eat this fruit, certain things will happen." This means if you do certain things, certain other things will follow. The whole universe operates under the law of cause and effect. You cannot change this law. It cannot be suspended. God himself is amenable to this his law. I am not discussing the story of creation. I am not affirming whether it is a reality or only a figurative elucidation of the general truth of human and divine relationship. It is not pertinent that I do this now. Some of you may not believe the story of creation as recorded in Genesis. You may think it a myth. This does not altar the facts. My position as to the atonement is true whether the story of creation is actual or figurative. The man who places himself in rapport with the truth; who brings himself in unison with the universe; that man will liberate himself from the results of wrongdoing and will thereby become eligible to those blessings and favors which come as the result of right relationship in the world.

Sin Is Wrong Relationship

Sin is wrong relationship. The man who is out of harmony with himself, who is out of harmony with his fellow man, who is out of harmony with God, who is out of harmony with the universe as a whole, that man is a sinner. The man who is in harmony with himself, the man who is in harmony with the universe, that man is righteous altogether. Some men may be more righteous than others but righteousness means right relationship. Sin means wrong relationship. Sin is not doing something simply because some one told you not to do it, but sin consists in doing that which you know within yourself is wrong.

Man knowingly estranged himself from God. He persisted in his rebellion until he lost communion. Having no communion he fell into grievous and inextricable evil—inextricable so far as he was concerned. It was God's purpose to give man another chance—to make it possible for him to redeem himself, to regain his lost estate. God did for man what man could not do for himself. God did this because of his great love for man. He did it to save man. The atonement has nothing in it of satisfying the arbitrary demands of God. It does have in it the "satisfying of the demands of love." Liberty and justice are inseparable, and to save man God must be just. It became necessary that Jesus who was in the express image of his Father, Jesus who was God from the beginning, should come into the world and take upon himself the nature and body of Adam and through his effort claim dominion over the world, the flesh, and the Devil. Having conquered the forces of evil himself he was enabled to become in very deed a "leader, a commander, a witness to the people." He wrested from the Devil the dominion which he had over humanity and reserved to himself the right and power to help humanity to find itself. He blazed the way. He made new trails. He made it possible for humanity lost in the bogs and sloughs of sin and evil to struggle up on to firm ground.

Carnal Mind Cannot Comprehend

The carnal mind does not comprehend the divine purpose. Jesus came to show the way. God did not demand this great sacrifice to satisfy his demands of justice. He recognized that crucifixion was the only passport to power—that crucifixion was the only pathway to purity. Through crucifixion Christ came into his own. Atonement means at-one-ment. The atonement was the crowning act of divine love. It is entirely beyond the capacity of this crude brain of mine to rightly express the glory and power of God's purpose concerning man. Christ in his yearning for humanity said: "I will go down to earth and give myself for man. I will die to make man free, I will live so I can show man how to live. Humanity is battling against impossible odds. It is floundering in water and mud and marsh. It is sinking lower and lower every day. I will take upon me human limitations. I will environ myself with passion and appetite. I will put myself in the most difficult surroundings and through the power of my own will, I will overcome. I will thereby inspire courage and hope in the breasts of those who have given up in the struggle. I will inspire men with the thought that what I have done they can do. I will teach men to comprehend the means whereby I have overcome."

I can sense what was in the mind of this great soul. He knew what it meant to be good when environed by evil. He knew what a great struggle it was for men to fight against inherited evils and formidable wrong. No man is able to help others unless he senses and understands the conditions under which the man whom he would help is laboring. No man is really able to preach Jesus Christ unless he knows the conditions with which others have to contend. This does not mean that to be a leader a man himself must be a sinner. You cannot preach at people. We fail too often to get down where people live and look at things from their vantage point. The pulpit has tried to preach at people. Jesus did not do this. He went down where the lowest were, turned around face and looked at things through the eyes of weak humanity and, with this vision, he took hold of the hands of humanity and led it up and up and up.

Jesus said, "I will go down among men. I will sense their pain. I will understand their misery. I will comprehend their difficulties from actual experience. I will taste the bitter. I am going to know the difficulties which men encounter. I will then be able to lead them." As such Jesus is the leader of leaders. There has never in all the history of the world been a character like Jesus of Nazareth. No leader, no teacher, no human being, has ever put himself on the same basis as Jesus did.

Easy to Love Jesus

Reverting to the atonement: Jesus came into the world to save men; to help men; to assist them; to guide them; to teach them. Knowing Jesus as he really is, is it not an easy thing to love him—this person who came into the world; who came down, lived and died just to make it possible for us to be good men and women; to make it possible for us to overcome carnal weaknesses and to rise to that point where we could do right? No man could have anything but admiration for Jesus if he understood the great purpose of this big soul.

It is the life rather than the death of Jesus which stands out in such bold relief in the atonement. If Christ had not lived as he did his death would have been entirely ineffective. It was the consecrated life of Jesus which sanctified his death. It was his life which opened wide the gates of death and permitted him to go beyond the grave and say to the spirits of men in hell, "Go free." What is true of Jesus Christ, my brother, my sister, it true of each of us. It is not death or the conditions of death which bring about our emancipation. It is the life which precedes death. Christ lived to save men. Yea, he also died to save men. It was, however, his life which sanctified his death. Oh, if the world could only sense the truth of this statement, "Christ lived to save men." Too frequently men point to the cross and make it the Alpha and Omega of the atonement. His life gave him power to overcome death.

Jesus having lived a perfect life was not subject to death. He knew that it was necessary therefore that he lay down his life in order that he might enter the portals of the grave and wrest its power over men. He also knew that he must meet the enemy of souls on his own ground and vanquish him. He knew this and he surrendered himself to the hands of the emissaries of the Devil, who took him and nailed him to the cross—the badge of treason and blasphemy. He was made a "criminal" to save the world.

Unselfish Love of Jesus

There is no parallel in the universe to the unselfish love of Jesus. This vision which I have given you of Jesus banishes the old picture of an angry God and a Jesus dying to please him. God so loved the world that he sent his Son to save the world. Jesus so loved humanity that deprivation in life and suffering in death became sweet to him. Who can refuse to admire such a character? Who can fail to love him? Nothing but the love of Jesus Christ can bring you to God.

My dear friends, please do not forget that God first loved us. If God had not first loved us we could not love him. We must be as unselfish in our love for him as he has been in his love for us. We should love God for what he is. If God has sent his love into your soul and you really sense it, then you should in turn return to him love in kind. God loves you that he may bless and help you. He loves you for the latent good he sees within you. You should love God for himself.

Why do you love God? Do you love him because he has done something for you? Do you love him because he has done something to make you happy? Then you are not reflecting back to God the love which he has shown to you. A little fellow says, "Mamma, give me a piece of pie." Mamma quickly responds. The pie is forthcoming, whereupon the little fellow cries out, "Oh, mamma, how I do love you." A few days later the little fellow says, "Mamma, please give me some bread and jam." His mamma refuses. He persists. She insists that it is not good for him at that time. Whereupon he gets cross and cries out, "I don't love you any more." What is it the little fellow loves? His mother? No. He loves the things which his mother gives him.

Asking for Blessings

When you ask God for a blessing and he gives it to you do you feel that you love him? Would you love him just the same if he did not give you the blessing? The man who really loves God does not love him for what God gives him. He loves God for what God is and not for what God does. The real Christian loves God not for the things which God gives him but because he senses in God those qualities which he admires and would emulate. Though God might say to him, "My son, it is best for you not to have these things," he bows submissively and says, "All right, Lord, I love you just the same as though you would have given me what I asked of thee." He will say, "I am glad that you are good enough and wise enough to deny me. I would prefer denial to blessing if in this denial it will make me more like thee. Give me grace to enable me to translate this denial into an asset of grace and blessing."

When Jesus was in travail and Gethsemane his flesh cried out, "Father, give me this." His Father gave answer, "No, I cannot give this to thee." And God portrayed the path of crucifixion, the long, devious journey of denial and sacrifice. As Jesus contemplated the terrible ordeal through which he must pass if he chose the course outlined by God his flesh cried out, O Father, is there not some other way? God said, No. It was then Jesus rose to the occasion and said, Not my will but thine be done. He said, I only want what you want. I have no will but to do your will. Herein is portrayed the sublime character of Jesus Christ.

The Only Message

The only message that Jesus Christ brought to the world was translated into his life. One cannot understand his message unless he comprehends the Spirit which moved Jesus to make his supreme sacrifice. We must follow Jesus in his life or we cannot follow him in his death. We must tread the same pathway. We must start in the plains of self-surrender, here where Jesus started out. We must enunciate his renunciation: "I came not to do my own will but the will of him that sent me." This means self-surrender, self-abnegation, selflessness. We must be willing to relinquish everything; we must forget everything except to do the will of Jesus Christ. There cannot be any withholding of service, no mental reservation with a true follower of Jesus Christ.

We have been too lax in our admission of members into the church. We have been content to baptize people simply on their demand. We have failed to inquire into their conversion to Jesus Christ. I believe in genuine conversion. I believe in a change of heart. No man is worthy of baptism who is not willing to unreservedly consecrate himself and all that he is to God. He must renounce selfishness and selfish purpose. He must crucify himself. He must partake of the Spirit of Jesus Christ. He must be willing to be crucified, to suffer even unto death, not for the good that will come to him, but for the good of others. A man should join the church to be saved. He should put himself in a saved condition in order that he may assist in saving others.

Complete Consecration

We have baptized too many people into this church in the past who have not recognized that, at the very threshold, God demanded a consecration of their whole lives to the service of others. Many of these people must be converted. Let me urge any such to consecrate your life to God. Be willing to say: "Lord, here am I; use me as thou wilt." Christ did not give himself to any selfish purpose. His life was one of self-abnegation. Jesus never planned and schemed to see how he could take advantage of another. He never looked out for himself. He never labored to acquire anything. He lived to give, not to get.

The world is suffering to-day as a result of selfish striving for the things which perish. We are reaping the accumulated sowings of thousands of years. We must pay the price of our folly until we learn our lesson. You cannot sow selfishness and reap altruism. You cannot scheme and plan for self and realize the millennium. If you sow selfishness you will reap sorrow and strife and pain.

An impending catastrophe confronts the world. Men in all walks of life are apprehensive. The almost universal sentiment is that very troublous times are ahead. How could it be otherwise? So long as we sow to the wind we will reap the whirlwind.

Labor and Capital

We talk about the war between labor and capital. This is the law of the jungle. It is the rule of the hoof and the claw. It is the law of might makes right. Before we can bring about peace on earth we must each think about our fellows first and ourselves last. Jesus when he left the courts of glory did not reason: Lord, which will bring the greatest blessing to me, to remain here with you or to go down to earth? Hardly this. He did not consider his own comfort or reward. He reasoned: "It will be more pleasant if I remain here with my Father; but man will have more blessing if I go to earth. I do not want anything for myself."

The divine impulse throughout the universe is to give out—to bestow. When the sun shines and the water drops to the earth and when the earth yields its increase it is not with selfish purpose. Each gives unstintingly of itself to contribute more abundant life asking nothing in return but simply the opportunity to continue giving. It is a delusion that happiness comes through working for self. Life is a sacred trust. All life is correlated. There can come no lasting satisfaction to me unless I give of my energy to bring this blessing to all others who will appreciate and enjoy. The God who feeds the fishes and cares for the birds will care for you and for me if we will unselfishly trust him. The true followers of Jesus Christ must be selfless.

Hereafter, we are going to say to the man who asks for admission to this church: "Are you coming into the church to get something for yourself or to give yourself for the good of others? If you are coming into the church because you love God and desire to give your all to be of service to the world, then God bless you, come in." It is not quantity we need, it is quality. The church is cursed to-day with narrow, selfish people.

Must Live Our Religion

We must live our religion. We must get ready to live, not to die. God desires us to live our religion now. The people who are trying to build up the kingdom of God should square their lives with the life of Jesus. A failure to do this will forfeit to you the blessings of God. We talk of Zion. We are praying for God to establish Zion. Zion is a condition first and then a place. We must square our lives with God's divine plan or take the consequences. He will not wreak vengeance upon us for God does not show vengeance to men. He will withdraw his Holy Spirit from us. It behooves each one of us to be true to God for no greater calamity could come to us than to lose God's Holy Spirit. The call is urgent and the demand is clear that the membership of this church must hear and obey the commandments of Jesus Christ. Listen. Hear what he is saying to your souls to-night. "Give me your life." "Give me your heart." Are you willing to do this? Are you willing to make this surrender? Are you willing to say, "I'll do what you want me to do; I will go where you want me to go; I'll be what you want me to be"?

At the very entrance to the church stand the mighty symbols of regeneration, faith, repentance, baptism, laying on of hands, resurrection of the dead, eternal judgment. I need not define why God demands that we must have faith when we come into the church. "Without faith it is impossible to please God." Repentance implies a loathing of self and a longing to be like God. It implies a passion to get away from what one is and to become what one ought to be. Then there comes baptism. Jesus in instituting baptism practically has said: "My son, you cannot come into spiritual relationship with me unless you understand and apply the great symbolic act that memorializes my life's work."

Vital Point in Baptism

What is the vital part of baptism? Surely God had some special purpose in instituting baptism. Symbols are very frequently the most effective means of emphasizing truth. One of the best means to focus a truth upon the minds of people is to memorialize the same. The Stars and Stripes memorialize the Declaration of Independence and symbolize the unity of States and the common purpose of the people of these several States. Secret societies have their symbols and memorials. God knew the benefit of symbols and at the very threshold of the church he has established a memorial which commemorates the greatest thing in regard to religion—the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

Jesus died, surrendered his life—his physical life—he allowed the old man to die; this body was buried in the grave and under the power of God it came forth an immortal body. So those who desire to enter into life must at the very threshold appreciate the virtue of the great service of Jesus Christ in that he died, was buried, and rose again. They must die to the carnal man—die to sin and having died are buried so that as Jesus rose to life they will rise to a new life in Christ Jesus. What a beautiful symbol of the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus is water baptism.

The laying on of hands is for the reception of the Holy Ghost. The resurrection and eternal judgment are the means which God has for inducting us into the kingdom triumphant. All these are symbolic means which God has established to bring us to complete life. But if we comply with all of these symbolic means of grace and do not enter into the Spirit of Jesus Christ it will avail us nothing.

Biggest Thing in Christianity

The biggest thing in Christianity is unselfishness—service for others. The one thing which differentiates Jesus from all other teachers is his unselfish consecration to the weal of the world. He has set himself like steel against the whole purpose of the world. For centuries men have tried to run counter to Jesus and we see the results. Surely we have had our object lesson in this war. No nation can live of itself. No man can live of himself. No family can live of itself. No church can have life of itself.

We are not working simply for our church. We are working for humanity. We are working to bless the world. We must away with the spirit of get. This will never make you happy. Jesus came into the world to serve all humanity. Wherever there was a needy soul into whose life he could bring peace and joy he felt it a pleasure to help and assist. We are ambassadors for him and we must emulate him.

Fellow workers for Christ, let us be true to the spirit of Christianity. Let us disrobe ourselves of all carnal purpose and selfish intent. Let us give ourselves unreservedly to bless the world. Let us trust God. Let us shed forth that loving spirit and purpose which characterized the life and ministry of Jesus. Then indeed will we be able to retain the divine blessing and to impart it to others.

May God give us abundantly of his Spirit and may we, as the church of the living God, so let our light shine before men that they seeing our good works may be led to glorify our Father which is in heaven.

A Second Centennial Number

The HERALD this week is a Centennial Number, devoted principally to the progress of this country in the last one hundred years, showing the national development, and also the development in scientific knowledge.

Here is also the completion of Elder E. E. Long's article, and several fine articles on scientific progress, including one by Apostle John W. Rushton on "Medicine." It is not heavily illustrated, but will be well worth preserving, if for nothing else than for the data on Missouri and Jackson County by Elder Rannie.

But there is much material we cannot use now, so we are already planning a third number to be issued, probably in December.

Progress of the Past Century

This Centennial Number is largely taken up with a consideration of conditions existing a hundred years ago, and the progress which has been made since then.

Missouri

Missouri was just admitted as a State nearly a hundred years ago, but its settlements were principally along the Mississippi River. The counties along the Mississippi were relatively small in size. But south of the Missouri River several extended, beginning fifty miles west of the Mississippi River to the boundary line with the Indians. They were long narrow strips and rather remind one of the earlier grant of Virginia, from the crown, between parallels of latitude extending to the west sea.

North of the river many of the counties extended either from the Missouri River or near it, north. There were more people living along the Missouri River than there were away from it, either north or south. There were a few settled trading posts, one of the principal being at Independence, Missouri.

Some years ago we had occasion to look up the description of the counties of Missouri, and were surprised to note how few counties there were. If we remember correctly, both Clay and Ray Counties extended from the Missouri River straight north to the northern boundary.

As to the northern boundary, the description was rather uncertain. The western boundary was described as running north to the intersection of the parallel of latitude, which passes through the rapids of the River Des Moines, and thence east, along the said parallel of latitude to the middle of the channel of the main fork of the said River Des Moines. It was this description that caused the difficulty between Iowa and Missouri, for a more northern boundary was claimed by Missouri and contested by the Territory of Iowa. It was finally decided by the Supreme Court of the United States on agreement of the two States and act of Congress.

Iowa

Iowa was not even a separate territory in 1820, but as late as 1834, though part of the Louisiana Purchase, was made a part of the territory of Michigan, later of Wisconsin, and still later part of a separate territory. It was not made a State until 1847.

The first settlement was made in Iowa about a hundred years ago, and as late as 1838 there were less than 23,000 people in Iowa, and those in the narrow strip along the Mississippi River. It is strange to think that this vast domain of Iowa, estimated to have a present market value of six and a half billion dollars, in 1846 was valued at less than ten million, or thirty cents an acre, and prior to that at doubtless only a fraction of that amount.

While Iowa was not immediately connected with the earliest history of the church, yet a small settlement had been made there in the early forties. The population was given in 1844 as about seventy-five thousand.

It is also of interest to note the situation of the counties in connection with the regions round about Jackson County. Especially is this of interest in view of the claim of Missouri to this strip, which was about ten miles wide, where Lamoni is now located, even though this claim afterwards was not sustained.

Although Illinois was a State, there were many Indians to be found within ten miles of the city of Chicago. Saint Louis was by far the largest city in the valley, though there had been a time when it was described as being near Alton. The conditions were very primitive and Illinois and Missouri were truly frontier States, with the great territory to the west of Missouri undivided, though crossed by various trails.

A few years before, Lewis and Clark had started from Saint Louis for Oregon. It was then a long, tedious trip, such as caused statesmen at that time to question the advisability of an attempt to acquire Oregon, on the grounds that it was too far away to send delegates, as it would take more than a year to come from Oregon to Washington, and return again.

Because of these frontier conditions in Illinois and Missouri, military companies were commonly formed locally. It is for this reason that military companies were so readily formed at Far West and Nauvoo.

Transportation

Though the locomotive had been invented, it was still a very new and untried method of transportation. As late as the sixties it was still a rarity in the Mississippi Valley and especially in the West. In going to Gallands Grove in the sixties and early seventies part of the trip could be taken by rail, and then a long drive from the end of the railroad. There are people still living who can remember when Iowa was a vast prairie, and much of it undivided.

It is surprising to us to realize, if we do, how largely the mode of transportation was by steamboat, by ox team, or on foot, or occasionally with a team of horses. The introduction of the horse car in the city, then the cable, and the electric railway is within the memory of those still quite young in years. It is easily covered by the last thirty or forty years.

Now we have moved away from the rails, and have the development of the bicycle, the automobile, and flying machine, all of which are so recent as to belong to the beginning of the twentieth century, and represent a speed undreamed of a few years ago.

It is also surprising to many to realize how recent is the telegraph and telephone. Though the church was looking for young Joseph, yet when he assumed the leadership of the church at Amboy, Illinois, in 1860, it was not known in Saint Louis for over three years, nor in southeastern Illinois for four years, though in this latter place whole branches had been continued without change since 1840, and had held firm for the truth once delivered to the Saints.

Mechanical Development

But the mechanical developments of the past century are truly marvelous and exceed that of several thousand years previous to 1820. The same is true in the development of the sciences and our knowledge of this world in geology, paleontology, zoology, botany, and anthropology, physics, and chemistry. Our knowledge of the heavens in astronomy has also been wonderfully increased, to say nothing of the quite modern science of psychology, the father of which is still living. All of this development has also affected the principles of education, and has made for greatly improved school-work tools, improved methods, and higher ideals, even though much yet remains to be accomplished.

Light

As to artificial lighting, for two thousand years the tallow dip was used. Fifty years ago it was still in use. Abraham Lincoln studied by the light from a log blaze. Carnegie climbed a lamp-post in order to read. In the past century there have been developed the kerosene lamp and its improvements, and the gaslight, as well as special burners to increase its brilliancy, including for mechanical uses the Bunsen burners; finally in rapid succession we have the arc light, the incandescent light, and tungsten lamp.

It is true after two thousand years the hard tallow candle came into use as a substitute, though most people still used the tallow dip. In 1782 Argand conceived the idea of a lamp with a wick and chimney. Benjamin Franklin took a hand and discovered that two wicks together were better than one. Yet even to this day, kerosene lamps as a rule have only one wick.

This great progress, not only in scientific knowledge, but also in practical application, has been made within the past century and much of it in the past fifty years.

In the sixties it took three months to cross the ocean. Now it can be crossed in an airplane in sixteen hours.

Light Has Come to the World

All of this material development, this wonderful gain in human knowledge of the world in which we live, of the heavenly bodies, the human body, and the mind of man in a mechanical way, the methods of healing disease, are after all but the result of the fact that light has come into the world, the light that lighteneth every man that cometh into the world. Light has begun to shine forth out of darkness.

It is well to remember that the method of research is to ascertain the truth. It is well to remember also that as a result of these methods knowledge has greatly increased in the earth; and further, that our creed is not a narrow one, but includes all truth.

But above all else, that this light that has come into the world is the restoration of the gospel of Jesus the Christ. It is in him we have our trust. It is incidental in one way, though an important factor, that to this young boy, Joseph Smith, was given the great responsibility and privilege as a minister of God to be the prophet of these latter days, to restore the pure, primitive religion of Jesus.

Through this great intellectual advancement of the past century the way is opening the better for carrying quickly the message to all the nations of the earth, to prepare the way for his coming.

The Growth of Democracy in the Last Hundred Years

BY MAX CARMICHAEL

By an irresistible hand, God is bringing about a democratization of Europe to pave the way for the preaching of the gospel.

The beginning of the year 1820 in Europe found the forces arrayed against democratic principles in the ascendancy. The wave of democracy had receded far backwards in the onward progress of the rights of the common man. If it was to return, it would have to recover a great deal of lost ground. It must come back with redoubled force, else the cause of the common man was lost. Nowhere in Europe had a slight trace of democracy been able to withstand the assaults of autocracy except to a limited degree in Switzerland, and in England, where for seven centuries the sturdy Anglo-Saxon had been fighting for his rights. Indeed, but one spot upon the entire globe had seemingly been able to pass by the world disruption under Napoleon unscathed, and that, to be sure, was the United States of America. In fact, it stood brighter than ever in contrast with the situation in Europe.

Metternich Dominates Europe

The habits and thoughts of European governments were dominated by the will and spirit of Metternich, the then prime minister of the Austrian government. Even Insular England felt the influence of this man to a degree, although this country was several centuries ahead of any continental government in democratic progress. Metternich felt that the case of civilization depended upon the upholding of monarchial principles. His constant expression was that should the principles of democracy gain the upper hand, catastrophe for civilization would be the inevitable result. As prime minister of Austria, his entire policy was involved in those of the whole of Europe. We shall notice his instantaneous reaction at each attempt of the liberals to further democratic ideals. His recoil was immediate and strong. For a little less than thirty years he kept a sharp lookout on European politics. No doubt he was honest. He feared the masses. Had not his convictions been justified by the Napoleonic disruption of Europe following the storming of Bastille, the French citadel of tyrannical monarchy? The French democrats had shown their incapacity to act consistently with their democratic ideals. In the ascendancy, they were not to be trusted, but blindly followed a demagogue, Napoleon by name, to force their own ideals upon foreign nations; which act in itself relinquished all the principles of democracy and individual and national self-determination.

What gave Metternich this power to thus shadow Europe? To understand this question, a brief review of the case in the light of events preceding 1820 is necessary.

France Disrupts Europe

Up until 1789 A. D., the royal Bourbon dynasty of France had been able to ravage the French people with its corruption unmolested. It had been bleeding the French people with exorbitant taxes without mercy in order to satiate its voluptuous desires. Backed to the wall, the people broke out with a cry and with a decision that startled the entire world. Uncontrolled, and without forethought of consequences, they swept the Bourbons from the throne. Bastille was stormed and "taken," as Carlile says, "like Jericho, by miraculous sound." What next! Inevitable mob rule. Various leaders of various types arose to lead France, but only for the moment, and then they were hurried to the guillotine. No one could arise to such heights as to guide France by reason. Uncontrolled and without recourse to a solution of her own troubles by enlightened and cooperative action, France would only love him who would by the sword force her to a state of calmness.

In 1795 the leaders of the Republic found they had only four thousand troops to defend themselves against twenty thousand troops for the Royalists. Too, their own four thousand troops were without a leader. A young officer of twenty-five was chanced upon. With brilliancy he took charge and won. The bride, France, had found her spouse, who now courted her and dominated her until the famous battle of Waterloo in 1815. But even before Napoleon assumed his military ascendancy, France in her eagerness to share her joy of freedom with the rest of the world had started to annex bordering states. Seizing his opportunity, Napoleon with the enthusiasm of the entire French people behind him, started the conquest of entire Europe, with the ostensible purpose of bringing democracy into every state. We say ostensibly, because Napoleon soon assumed and exercised the absolute dictatorship of France. Yet everywhere he went, existing monarchies were thrown down, and his own set up. By the combined armies of Europe, he was finally overcome, captured, and sent as an exile to Saint Helena.

Europe Reorganizes at the Congress of Vienna

Europe had to reorganize. Their representatives met at Vienna. Their one thought was to undo the work of the French Revolution. To absurd lengths did they go to do this. Peoples were transferred from one prince to another as puppets. People were not represented here. Only the divine right of kings was represented. Self-determination, which figured so much in the last great peace conference was unthought of in this Congress of Vienna. The Bourbons were restored to the throne of France. The German people were divided, as before the war, among many royal principalities. The Spanish king was returned to his throne, and he immediately overthrew the "Constitution of 1812," which the liberals of Spain had instituted during the days when they could take advantage of Napoleon.

The Spirit of Metternich Receives Its First Rebuff

But it was around this constitution as a standard, that the first revolt came against the spirit of Metternich. During the Napoleonic control of Spain the Spanish colonies of Latin America had declared their independence. These the returning Spanish king resolved in 1820 to subdue, but he was confronted by mutiny among his own troops. Revolt followed, and the king hurriedly restored the constitution. This revolt was the signal for revolt elsewhere. The Neapolitans in southern Italy arose and exacted a constitution from their king.

Metternich was aroused. Something must be done. He persuaded the three absolute monarchs of Europe, those of Austria, Prussia, and Russia to join in an alliance to crush all such revolts, no matter where they existed. Metternich's doctrine was that revolutions were a "gangrene, to be burned out of Europe with red-hot iron." Thus came into existence the "Holy Alliance." England, up until this time a member of that group, refused to take part, and even protested, but further than merely to protest she refused. The Italian and Spanish revolts were put down. Metternich had succeeded.

His next step was to bring back the American colonies of Spain. But here he met the greed of England, backed up by the navy of England, which then dominated the seas. England's trade with the Spanish-American colonies had increased as a result of their revolt from Spain. England made it known that all attempts of the "Holy Alliance" to reach South America would be opposed by her navy. She suggested to the United States the advisability of united action in this matter. Curious as it is, we find a common interest between England and the United States, who but a half decade before had been at war with one another. President Monroe refused to act conjointly, but separately issued the famous manifesto, "The Monroe Doctrine," which stands to-day as the outstanding feature of our foreign policy. In a sentence, this "doctrine" is that no nation of foreign continents shall occupy further territory upon the Western Hemisphere. Thus did President Monroe stand in the way of Metternich, and thus did Metternich meet his first reversal. America is at least free from his influence.

The ways of our God are wonderful. We can see his hand working out the destinies of mankind in a way marvelous to behold. "Truth crushed to earth shall rise again." Who would say that the fruits of the French revolution were entirely obliterated by the work of the Congress of Vienna? None. Although Mr. Monroe refused to act conjointly with Great Britain in this matter, yet we can see a beginning of a union which has of late helped to trample down the last vestige of monarchy on the European continent. All unbeknown to man does God work among the nations of the earth to bring about his purposes. The gospel was being restored in the then most democratic nation upon earth, the United States of America, and slowly were her democratic practices becoming the practices of Europe.

The Revolution of 1830

In France Metternich's policy was unable to efface the fruits of the bloody revolution entirely. The Bourbon monarch, Louis XVIII, restored by the allied powers in 1814, gave to the nation a rather liberal charter, liberal at least for those times in which religious liberty, equality before the law, free speech, and freedom of the press were confirmed. These policies, along with suffrage constitute the inalienable rights of man, and are a part of all democratic reform. His younger brother, however, upon his ascension to the throne in 1824, attempted extreme reaction.

He first attempted to do this by securing fraudulent elections to the two houses of the legislature, which his brother had created. But even the liberal minority in this legislature was a great menace to his aims, so finally in 1830 he attempted the bold stroke of doing away with the charter, renouncing the freedom of the press, and restricting suffrage to those of his own kind. But France was not to be thus whipped. The die had been cast. "The plague spots" of the revolution, and of the charter of 1815, as Metternich called them, were not to be easily undone. All Paris was in revolt for three days. "Down with the Bourbons," became the cry, and at the end of the third day, King Charles fled to England. The doctrine of the divine right of kings was dead in France. The deed had been accomplished without any bloodshed outside of the city of Paris. Yet all France accepted it.

Louis Philippe was called to the throne by the late legislature upon the stipulation that he would accept the constitution drawn up by the legislature, by the terms of which he should rule "by the will of the nations," as well as "by the grace of God"; the legislature should have the right to introduce bills, and the qualifications for suffrage should be liberalized by lowering the age qualification from forty to thirty years, and the property qualification to all paying a direct tax of forty dollars yearly.

As before, this revolution was a signal for revolution elsewhere in Europe. Belgium succeeded in revolting from the Netherlands. Poland attempted to secede from Russia, and northern Italy from Austria, but these revolts were crushed by the hand of Tsar Nicholas of Russia, and Prince Metternich of Austria.

This revolution had its effect in democratic England. While England was free from the tyranny of her king, her parliament was in the hands of a few wealthy landowners all through the existing system of electing members to the parliament. No change in representation had been made for centuries. Many large towns which had sprung up in the meantime, as Manchester, and Birmingham, had no representation in parliament, while many 'boroughs' had lost their entire population, and yet the landowners of these 'boroughs' were permitted to elect members to parliament. The reform was obtained not without some violence. King George and his Tory landholders were determined that the reform should not be accomplished. The House of Lords repeatedly refused to accede. The king attempted to keep the present parliament from dissolving, fearing the results of a new election. He finally had to give in, and also had to grant permission to the prime minister to create enough new lords to insure the passage of the bill. Two principles were gained. The commons could control the House of Lords. The prime minister was really the servant of the commons, and not of the king. The reforms, however, were far from what they ought to be. Much was left undone. The great body of workingmen were still without suffrage, and if so in England, still more so in the other European countries.

The Revolution of 1848

This reference to the workingman gives us the cue for the next great revolutionary movement which swept Europe. A great revolution of much significance had been quietly going on in the world for the past one hundred years, a revolution apart from freedom of the press, free speech, separation of church and state, and extension of the suffrage. It is the change from domestic manufacture of goods to the factory method. The opportunity for this was occasioned by the introduction of the use of steam and the happily simultaneous discovery of the use of iron to make machinery. But we are chiefly interested in this article in the effect of this revolution upon the civic and political status and interests of the workingman. Industrially, the workingman found himself dependent upon the whims of the capitalist, the man with money, the only man who could get together and organize the large factory, to which the workingman had to go in order to find a job.

Being denied the ballot, the right of free speech, and free press, the workingman naturally felt that the solution of his problem lay in the political world. He felt that should he gain the ballot, free speech, etc., he would be able to solve his problems by due process.

France again was the kindler of a conflagration which spread over entire Europe. For some years prior to 1848, the year of this general conflagration, France had been dominated by Guizot, as prime minister, a man of extreme reactionary tendencies. The legislative body was in his hands and voted according to his nod. Guizot had three hundred government jobs, lucrative too, to which he could assign two hundred legislators. This was his secret. The Liberals found reform impossible by established governmental methods. Revolt only was possible. Revolt could be effected only by organizing the great mass of the people, and the workingmen of Paris were ready to be so affected.

The revolt of 1848 was the revolt of the working class, yet it was entirely unable to take advantage of its opportunity. The lack of education and experience made government by it impossible. After making many radical promises, the provisional government set up broke every promise made to the laboring man. The moderate republicans gained the ascendancy. Radical reform for the workingman was not yet triumphant. A moderate republic was set up, with universal suffrage. The vote of the people showed that they were not really emancipated. By an overwhelming vote, they elected Napoleon Bonaparte, the nephew of the great Bonaparte, president.

The unwarrantableness of their choice soon manifested itself. While professing to be a democrat, and, at first, attempting to give a show of democracy in his government, at heart he longed to obtain the same hold upon the people as his uncle once had. This had been the dream of his lifetime. He at once set about to court the favor of the people. Coming into contact with the legislature in 1851, he put the proposition up to the people which they would have, himself or the legislature. He was favored by an overwhelming majority. In 1852 he declared himself emperor, and under this title he ruled France until 1870, when France was defeated by German forces. Thus was the second republic of France eradicated. Yes, shall we say entirely effaced.

But back to 1848, to the conflagration kindled by France. The success of the revolt in France in February of that year was a signal for a revolt over the rest of middle Europe.

Metternich at last was forced to flee. He left Vienna for England amid the cries of a howling mob, "Down with Metternich." The emperor immediately promised reform. To understand the nature of events in the dual monarchy, we must remember that its inhabitants were made up of several nationalities, in which Austrians proper, who were of the German race, Bohemians, and Hungarians, or Magyars predominated. Their chief desire was a nationality built around their race. But in no one district did a race of people largely dominate. The influential Germans were scattered throughout the entire empire.

Hungary, populated with a majority of Magyars, still had quite a population of Croats, Rumanians, and Slovaks. These had no sympathy with the Magyars. The emperor promised a separate government. But the heterogeneity of race and language within the empire proved a veritable ally to the royal regime. These nationalities could not agree. They had no interest in one another. The royal emperor having committed himself to liberality resigned in favor of his youthful nephew, Francis Joseph, who felt no compunctions in working for extreme reaction. He was able by virtue of the petty jealousy between the radical elements to throw aside every reform that his uncle had initiated.

The revolt in Austria was the opportunity for the Italians in northern Italy to attempt to throw off the Austrian yoke. It became the signal for the small kingdoms in the Italian peninsula to revolt against their royal rulers, and institute republics. But their unwillingness to work together again proved the ally of Austria. One by one, Austria was able to conquer and restore the royal regime. In only one kingdom, that of Sardinia, was the spirit of Metternich not able to penetrate at this time. While Metternich's political life was over, his spirit still lived.

His escape to England was also the signal for the liberal element among the small German states to attempt to unite the German people, and to bring into this union the Germans under Austrian control. This was the great desire of the radicals among the Germans. They called a congress, which after two years of wrangling accomplished nothing, apparently. Dissension again was the reason.

Austria again took the initiative and frankly informed the congress that no confederacy of German states would be formed. In this instance, Austria had more at stake than the mere squelching of democratic reforms. She was afraid of the union, because it might give Prussia the ascendancy among German States. This was the motive that actuated the foreign policy of Austria and Prussia for the next two decades, when we shall see Prussia again in the lead.

The revolution of 1848 on the Continent failed to get a reaction in England. On the other hand it seemed to bring the radicals of England into disrepute. Prior to 1848, those dissatisfied with the results of the Reform Bill of 1832 started the so-called Chartist Movement. The six demands which were drawn up tend to show how far England still came from being a thorough democracy. They were universal suffrage, vote by secret ballot, payment of members of Parliament, abolition of property qualifications for members of Parliament, equal electoral districts, and annual elections.

In looking over this list one would wonder if England really was democratic, and yet she stood at this time far ahead of the nations on the Continent. The secret of her success lay in the people. They were prepared for what advances England had made. The Anglo-Saxon had been fighting for these principles for four centuries. Some of the people on the Continent proper had hardly conceived these principles in their mind. The Chartist Movement proved a failure for the moment at least, but not for long.

As early as 1867 we find further agitation in England, this time headed by the aged Gladstone, who had been reared a conservative, but had learned to exercise increasing faith in the fidelity and reliability of the masses. It is interesting to notice the details of the law granted. Suffrage was granted to every adult male in the larger towns "who occupied for twelve months, either as owner or tenant, a dwelling within the borough and paid the local poor tax, and to lodgers who paid ten pounds or more a year for unfurnished rooms."

The two decades succeeding the revolution of 1848 were taken up on the Continent with the union of two large modern nations, Italy and Germany. Both of these nations in 1848 did not exist, except as geographical expressions. They were not political entities.

Italy Becomes a United Constitutional Monarchy

The Italians were left from the revolution of 1848 at least a nucleus from which they could foster a national union. The King of Sardinia seemed to be the leader from whom they might expect results. There were, of course, as before, discordant elements, the extreme radical republicans, and the papists, but the King of Sardinia was sufficiently progressive and liberal to effect a working union. It was his liberality that gained the day, and finally effected a complete national union by 1870. It is not necessary for our purposes here to say much as to the methods used to effect the union. This one good effect it did have, that we must not pass by—it reduced the temporal power of the pope to the Vatican and its immediate ground. We cannot forget, however, that from now on, Italy acted as an entire nation, and hence, the stand that she took upon questions of world moment was of more significance. This will be of special interest to us when we think of the part she played in the last great World War, upon the side of democracy.

The German Principalities United Into One Federation

The union of Germany was actuated from two sources, the desire of Prussia to gain the ascendancy over Austria among the divided German people, and the desire of the merchants of Germany to effect an industrial union, whereby tariffs between petty principalities could be eradicated. The ambitions of Austria, of course, were in the way. She, herself, was unable to effect a German union, yet she did not want Prussia to effect it. Religion was also in the way. Prussia was Protestant, while southern Germany was Catholic. Yet commercial interests won over religious differences and prejudices. It is wonderful what reforms and movements the "bread and butter" question can effect.

But the one factor which put the German union across was a statesman, Bismarck by name. Bismarck used every possible means to effect the union. Nothing was too corruptible or contemptible for him, in order to do this. Sufficient it is for this article to say that he did accomplish it. The important thing for us is, what is the attitude of this new powerful nation toward the problem we are discussing, the growth of democratic principles? Bismarck's last stroke to form this union was the stroke which brought about the third republic for France.

This certainly was a queer interweaving of occasions and results. With his usual trickery, Bismarck involved himself in a war with Napoleon, who, we remember, was the emperor of France. Napoleon had just previously proposed to Bismarck that France be allowed to annex a part of southern Germany, in return for which Bismarck was to have a free hand in unionizing the rest of Germany. Bismarck immediately communicated this proposal to southern Germany, which was still holding off from the German union because of fear of Prussia and because of religious differences. Southern Germany was now willing to unite with Bismarck in an effort to crush France.

With his characteristic quickness to act, Bismarck was immediately upon France, to incite her to war. By altering a telegram Bismarck made it appear that King William of Prussia had insulted the French envoy. France immediately declared war. The French Government found its army corrupt and inefficient; but the German army exhibited an efficiency that surprised the world. Bismarck had been looking forward to this day for two decades. He had believed only in "blood and iron." Of the German army Carlyle wrote, "It took away the breath of Europe." One month after declaration of war, the entire French army, including the person of Napoleon, was captured at Sedan. France was stunned.

This was the opportunity for the French republicans. A mob arose in Paris and declared the Third Republic. A provisional government was set up that tried to obtain peace terms from Germany. But Bismarck was not to be put off so easily. Paris was besieged. It held out for four months, time enough for the enthusiasm to center around the Third Republic, which still stands to-day, and from all appearances will continue to stand. Germany, too, was united, but with an entirely different purpose, and with an entirely different attitude toward free government.

The Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71 is the starting point of the last great struggle (we hope) of autocracy fought out in the last great war. The Franco-Prussian war is the occasion for the growth of events leading up to the last great World War. Because of it, France and Germany are to be the leaders in the next great stand to be taken in history—France, the representative upon the Continent of Europe of the liberal element, and Germany, the representative upon the Continent of Europe of the reactionary element.

Development of the Third Republic

At this point we should notice the beginnings of the Third Republic. The monarchists in France did not easily give up. As soon as peace was declared with Germany, they started their machinations to restore the monarchy. The assembly which had been elected with the view of securing peace, elected Thiers president of the Republic. By the terms of the treaty, France had to pay Germany a huge sum of money. It was expected that it would take France three years to raise the money, but under the enthusiasm aroused by Thiers, it was raised in eighteen months.

At the end of this time, the monarchists of two different groups formed a coalition on candidates for the kingship, and seemed to be about to put the monarchy across. They split upon a seemingly trivial matter, whether France should have the white emblem of the Bourbons, or the tricolor. Thanks be to this quarrel, the assembly was able to make a constitution, which, however, was left open so as easily to make a monarchy. This constitution still stands to-day, with but single amendment to make it a republican form of government. This was the eleventh constitution France had had since 1789.

Was France ever to have a stable government? By 1879 the republicans had firmly established themselves. At the last the majority of France proved republican in heart. A century of revolutions and education was necessary to change the political thought of France, a century of intervals of bloodshed to emancipate their civic feelings and attitudes.

The one event which probably proves that the French Republic is here to stay, is the trouble which the state has had with the French Catholic clergy. The republicans felt that the Catholic clergy were preaching and teaching against the republic. Their first step was to make marriage a civic contract, to legalize divorce, and to forbid religious orders to teach in either private or public schools. In 1901-3 amid riots and bloodshed the government closed church schools. The pope interfered and the French recalled their ambassador to the Vatican. In 1905 the state took control of all church lands, promising, however, if the churches would reorganize under a "cultural association," they could have the use of these lands perpetually. The Catholics refused to do so. Hence their lands were confiscated. Finally in 1906 the arrangements whereby the state supported several churches were abolished.

Development of England

The six demands made by the adherents of the Chartist Movement in England have one by one been adopted except the demand for annual elections, which, of course, has proven relatively unimportant for democratic goals. The secret ballot was adopted in England in 1872. An extension of the suffrage was made 1884, but even yet, universal manhood suffrage did not exist fully.

We cannot leave out of this discussion with reference to England the clash which came between the House of Commons and the House of Lords. These two houses had been up to this time coordinate branches of the legislature, exactly after the pattern of the bicameral legislatures in the United States. A bill had to pass both houses in order to become a law.

We will remember, too, that the right to sit in the House of Lords was hereditary, and consisted of the peers of England, the well-to-do, and conservative. The clash came over Lloyd George's budget of 1909, in which he provided for a severe graduated tax upon large incomes, and made a distinction between earned and unearned incomes so that a higher tax was levied upon the unearned income. This amounted to a particular attack upon the incomes of the lords. The House of Lords continued to veto the bill, although the lords had not previously interfered with a "money bill" for years. A movement was then made in the House of Commons to restrict the veto power of the House of Lords. Upon appeal to the country, the program of the House of Commons was carried by a large majority, and upon threat by the ministry to create enough new lords to pass the proposed bill, the House of Lords yielded.

As provided by the new law, all "money bills" become law with or without the sanction of the House of Lords, and all other bills passed by the House of Commons in three successive sessions become laws with or without the sanction of the House of Lords. Thus at last, representative government in England has won out over any form of hereditary government.

Woman Suffrage

Woman suffrage must be given its legitimate portion of this discussion. In the United Kingdom the demand for votes by the women arose out of the new economic condition in which they found themselves by virtue of the factory method of manufacture. The agitation began as early as the middle of the nineteenth century. Yet conservative old England held out against it longer than many other more autocratic nations. Between 1906 and 1915, suffrage was granted to women in Finland, Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. New Zealand had granted it as early as 1893, and in the early part of the first decade of the twentieth century the various states of Australia granted it.

Many women of England believing the reform would not be accomplished without violent means, began under the leadership of Mrs. Pankhurst to destroy property and break in upon the sittings of the House of Commons. Finally after several attempts to pass such a law, Lloyd George proposed one in 1918, which became a law. The rallying of all women, suffragettes, and anti-suffragettes alike, for the duration of the World War to the cause of their country won the sympathies of men.

The United States has not been without history upon this all-important topic of suffrage. In 1820 almost every State had property qualifications for voting. Full manhood suffrage does not exist in every State of the Union at this date. By the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Federal Constitution, the various States were denied the privilege to discriminate against race, or color in granting the ballot. The movement for woman suffrage arose more or less out of the interest which women had in the prohibition movement.

Many of the same arguments which have been used against universal manhood suffrage have been used against woman suffrage. To the anti-suffragette, or to the man opposed to woman suffrage, we would say that if you wish to hear how you sound, go back to the arguments of the last half of the eighteenth century, one hundred fifty years ago, and hear the arguments used against the right of men to vote.

As early as 1869, a western State, Wyoming, granted the right to vote to women. As in all social and political reforms, the matter grew slowly at first. Washington was the fifth State, in 1910, to grant woman suffrage. As early as 1876, a movement was made in our Federal Congress to introduce a woman suffrage amendment to the Constitution. After repeated attempts, it finally found its necessary two thirds vote in both houses in 1919, after President Wilson had made a special appeal for it as a war measure.

The Movement in General

In our discussion so far we have left out of immediate and direct notice many of the nations of Europe and of the world. Switzerland had her complimentary reactions to the revolutionary spirit which spread over Europe in 1830 and 1848. She became a true federal republic in 1848.

Spain has undergone her series of revolutions and attempts to establish constitutionalism and to make the government responsible to the people. Portugal has now a republican form of government. Even in the Turkish Empire, a "Young Turkish" party began to urge constitutionalism. Even Persia has been distracted by attempts to establish constitutionalism.

The one great attempt to establish a republic which has elicited the most sympathy upon the part of the people of the United States is the attempt in China. China by her tradition would seem to be the one nation which would not be affected by this modern world movement. Yet her progress has been swift indeed.

To England may be ascribed the honor of starting representative government in the modern world. Thanks be to the character of the immigrants from England to the newly discovered western world, this country was able to establish a truly representative government, which has served as a model to the rest of the world. As late as 1830, England, Switzerland, and Norway were the only countries of the Old World which were not absolute monarchies. In 1913, Siam on the continent of Asia was the only country on earth that did not have some form of representative government, yet by no means were they all democratic to a very great extent.

Development of Russia

The history of democratic reform in Russia fills an interesting chapter in modern history. A detailed study of it is necessary to explain why Russia appeared on the side that she did in the great World War. It has appeared somewhat strange to many that Russia should be on the side of the more democratic nations in that struggle, and yet represent autocracy to the extent that she did.

Russia has had a series of liberal and reactionary Czars. The first Czar after the Napoleonic wars was liberal minded, yet he was soon won from his course by the persuasion of Metternich. The real reason for the slow growth of democracy in Russia can be explained by the same circumstances as are true in every other great reform. The leaders of the reform themselves have no great sympathy with the masses. Four fifths of Russia's population were slaves. In order to offset the influence of western civilization, a so-called Slavophil movement started, which had as its goal, the nationalization of the Slavs. The reactionary Czars grabbed hold of this movement and made it their ally in their designs to increase their territory and power. This policy has dominated Russia's attitude toward Germany and Austria.

Austria has many Slavic elements in her territory. Russia has always felt herself a protector of their interests. This policy combined with her desire to obtain control of Constantinople for commercial purposes is what put Russia opposite the aspirations of Germany and Austria in the last great war.

The conspirators for democratic reform in Russia have been known to the world as Nihilists. Their great opportunity came in 1905 after the Russo-Japanese war, by which the weakness of the Russian autocratic government was revealed. A mob of citizens stormed the palace, and they were mowed down by the royal troops. The intellectual class of Russia spoke out and demanded reform. The Czar promised to call a representative body called the Duma, which might advise him. This body has undergone various changes in its relative power and influence; but we are all aware that in the last great war the Czar was forced to resign, and that since that time Russia has been under the throes of a revolution.

Autocratic Russia was not true even to the Slavophil movement, when it saw that the issue of autocracy versus democracy was involved in the same movement, and that the autocratic fortress was endangered by the victory of their Slavophil movement, especially when the victory of that movement helped on by the western European democratic nations did not necessarily mean the enhancement of Russia's territory and autocratic power.

Germany Proves a Menace to Democracy

Fully to appreciate the relevancy of the last great stroke of the world for democracy, which was expressed in terms of a world-wide war, we must review some of the history of democratic reform in Germany. By the Franco-Prussian War of 1870, Bismarck had succeeded in uniting the German States into a federation with the King of Prussia as the hereditary president, with the title of emperor. The imperial legislature was the Reichstag, elected by manhood suffrage. Its power was only to accept or reject proposals put forth by the Bundesrath, the body which represented the persons of the various sovereigns of the German principalities, which because of Prussia's size, was dominated by the representatives of the King of Prussia. The federal ministry was responsible only to the emperor.

This autocratic tendency naturally had a reaction. Socialism grew by leaps and bounds under the teachings of a German by the name of Karl Marx. To offset this tendency, Bismarck accepted a policy of paternalism, that of accepting and putting into effect many of the reforms demanded by socialism, as state ownership of public utilities, workingmen's insurance, etc., which only served to strengthen the hold of the government upon the minds and attitudes of the German people. Thus was the German government able to foist upon the people its army program of extreme military preparation.

The last German emperor, Kaiser Wilhelm II, professing to rule only by "the grace of God," felt himself the protector of that great doctrine, and in the alliance which he fostered now with Austria, once Prussia's worst enemy, we see the remains of the "Holy Alliance" of 1820, against which we see England and the United States have common cause. It was the avowed policy of Kaiser Wilhelm to destroy England and weaken the United States. He hated the Monroe Doctrine, which had foiled him in his attempt to occupy a port of Venezuela, during the presidency of Roosevelt. He would have aided Spain in her war with the United States over the independence of Cuba, but he felt unprepared. Feeling prepared finally to extend his own power under the subterfuge to his subjects of extending German kultur, he finally began hunting around for a provocative of war.

We must be able always to distinguish between the cause of a war, and its occasion. The great cause for the World War grew out of Germany's desire to exalt her commerce, her learning, and her government about the nations of the world. An occasion she found among the Slavs of south-eastern Europe. A liberal-minded Serbian student had killed the heir apparent to the Austro-Hungarian throne. Reparation was necessary. Austria was encouraged to make huge demands upon Serbia, demands which no self-respecting nation could accept. As a result war was declared between Austria and Serbia.

Russia, acting by habit in accordance with her Slayophil policy, felt that she must come to the protection of Serbia, and began mobilizing. This event Germany used as an excuse for declaring war upon Serbia and Russia. Germany's course had been determined. No amount of effort upon the part of England's foreign minister to obtain a settlement by arbitration could now persuade Germany from her course. The die had been cast. She was out to dominate the world. It took but her action in Belgium to persuade England of her real intent.

America stood neutral for a long time, failing to realize Germany's intent. America being a republic must necessarily have its entire citizen body converted to a realization of Germany's intent, before she would take her part. At the eleventh hour she responded to the call that she had many times responded to before, the call of the masses for political freedom.

Shall we not say that God has had a part in her development? Shall we not say that God has had a hand in the history of Europe? Joseph's land was to be the birthplace of the restored gospel. In order that it might be carried to the world, the same freedom of conscience and of press and of speech must be provided among the nations of the world. It comes not without human struggles.

The Progress of Medicine Since 1820

BY JOHN W. RUSHTON

With the dawn of the nineteenth century the veil was lifted from the face of truth and man looked into the heart of mystery. As never before, men realized the power and greatness of that truth and saw its all-embracing unity in religion, philosophy, science, art, and politics. In this new concept of the unity of truth it is not out of place to briefly review the marvelous movements in the realm of medicine during this wonderful period of our history. The art of healing has always been closely and intimately associated with religion, priestcraft, magic, superstition, philosophy, and science.

The evolution of medicine from necromancy and superstition to the high place it occupies in the modern arts and sciences makes one of the most fascinating and romantic stories which the quest for truth can offer. Daring adventure, the wizardry of imagination, valorous enterprise, and hazardous, sacrificial toil, all have played a great and important part in the securing of the great benefits and treasures enriching the life and health of the race at large. Many stories, sculptures, paintings, and poems have enshrined the knightly chivalry of the past but the doctor has waited for Sir Luke Fildes before his patient, sacrificing, and noble art could be visualized in pigment and become immortalized by the artist's skill. The story of the evolution of medicine deserves our highest admiration and deepest gratitude, because it is a part of the whole story of man's triumph over many adversaries which has been crowned with success, making for health, strength, life, and happiness to our race.

Ancient Medicine

To get the proper perspective we shall be obliged to look very sketchily at the ancestral line of modern medicine's descent.

In some Egyptian papyri but recently discovered, we learn that the history of the art of healing is as remote as that of man himself, and cures which took place in the time of Cheops,

B. C. 3700, are recorded, and a book on medicine was written by King Athosis who lived six thousand years ago. The Egyptians had a god of medicine called I-em-Hotep, meaning "He who cometh in peace." Babylon and Assyria had a knowledge of this art, and in every land from Peru to China all nations seem to have practiced medicine in various forms. But until the time of Hippocrates of Greece, disease was regarded as demoniacal possession; the priest was the physician, pharmacy chiefly thaumaturgy, and medicine magic.

In the golden age of Pericles, the age of Socrates, Plato, Phidias, and others who laid the foundations of our own philosophy and culture and the main lines of our civilization, 400 B. C., Hippocrates by his methods of observation and interpretation lifted medicine from the low plane of superstition and dignified it as a science. As the "Father of medicine" his special work was the study of symptoms with a view to diagnosis and prognosis, and also the giving to the profession its high ethical principles some of which are fundamental to this day. For instance he said:

"The physician's duty is to help the sick according to his knowledge and power.

"It is his duty to rigidly abstain from evil and the criminal abuse of the means and instruments of his art.

"To keep an inviolable silence about the secrets which he learned in his calling and even outside of it.

"Where there is a love of humanity there will be a love of the profession."

After Greece medicine found its chief center in the school of Alexandria which became one of the greatest universities of the world. Here Erasistratus and Hierophilus were the first to practice and teach anatomy; here also surgery and pharmacy made considerable progress. While this school established by Alexander flourished until 414 A. D. when it came to a dramatic close following the death of Hypatia, who was murdered by fanatical monks, medicine had before this found a home in Rome. Galen, a Greek by birth and an Alexandrian by training, in the second century had made this center world famous. He is the founder of the physiology of the nervous system. Then came the period when Arabia was the fountain of art, culture, and philosophy and for several centuries medicine was under the nurture and care of this Islamic center until it seemed to culminate in Roger Bacon, the English friar of the thirteenth century. He is said to have been the discoverer of spectacles and to have theorized about the telescope and the microscope.

Modern Medicine

But it was in the fifteenth century that the dawn really broke for medicine. This was one of the most wonderful periods in the history of the Christian era. Adventurers gave new continents to man, and by their intrepidity doubled the world. Columbus opened the doors into the new world of America. Copernicus discovered the heavens and gave to man the science of astronomy. Newton laid the foundation of physics, while Caxton immortalized the thoughts of men by means of the printing press. Paracelsus in 1526 made his attack upon dogmatic medicine, which opened the way for the establishment of the Parisian school of medicine by the work of Sylvius who was followed by his pupil Vesalino and their work in anatomy made it the world center of medicine.

In 1616, Harvey discovered the circulatory system of the blood. Leeuwenhoek, the Dutch observer, made the single lens of high curvature and short focus which was the beginning of the compound microscope. By means of this simple instrument he made some important discoveries in minute anatomy and discovered the microbe, thus laying the foundation of modern bacteriology. In 1671 Malpighi actually saw the "cell" which formed the basis of Virchow's "Cellular Pathology."

The Nineteenth Century

But it is with the nineteenth century we are particularly concerned, and interesting as it would be to trace the developments and note the work of the different men in this field, we must let this brief review suffice and come at once to our main task. We pause long to observe that with the close of the Napoleonic wars access to various peoples and nations, together with mutual intercourse, was had resulting in communalizing the knowledge which each and all possessed and also stimulated all to further research and achievement. But so far as medicine was concerned, the early decades of the century found this art in a very unsatisfactory condition. Besides the chasm existing between pathology and surgery and the many sects and sectaries which abounded, charlatan-ism and quackery were prevalent. Doctor Gorton speaking of this condition says: "In the beginning of the nineteenth century medicine was in a state of impassibility. It was really worse than that. It had made no progress for a quarter of a century, and when a system or a science ceases to progress it retrogrades."

This condition was the result of faulty observation and inability to understand what they did observe. This was the fault of the ancient empirics who "saw without discerning, administered without discrimination, and concluded without reasoning." But there came a remarkable awakening for which the French must be given the credit. Marie Francois Xavier Bichat who was born in 1771 was the first to enter the field of minute anatomy and established the new science of histology. Bichat was succeeded by Flourens and de Mirbel, with Sir Charles Bell, Marshall Hall, and Prichard of England.

Psychiatry

Johannes Mueller of Germany made discoveries in the nervous system and laid the foundations of discrimination in the diseases of the spinal cord, and also led the way to the modern science of physiological psychology, upon which the modern alienist and psychiatrist conduct their work. To appreciate this advancement in medicine one has only to read of the shocking condition in which the insane people were placed before 1820. Probably most of the students of history have read of the brave stand made by Pinel (1745-1826) of France in the rescue of these unfortunate people from the awful state in which they were placed. The victims everywhere were regarded as demoniacal, and confined in cells, chained and treated like animals, without ordinary care, wallowing in filth, alive with vermin, forsaken by God, and despised by man. Such conditions existed down to as late as 1833 in France and England. How different to-day the condition of those who are mentally sick! The asylums, sanatoria, and hospitals provided for the care and help of these people, together with the new methods of discrimination and help witness the strides taken by medicine in this department of its work.

Vaccination and Isopathy

While modern medicine did not attain its full stride until well after the middle of the century, much valuable work was done by many observers in various lands and in many departments of science. Jenner's work in late in the previous century produced its fruit in the nineteenth, and smallpox which for many years had been the chief captain of the hosts of death was controlled, so that in 1802 over one hundred thousand patients had been vaccinated. To-day everybody admits the efficacy of vaccination which has reduced the mortality from that disease from two thousand per million of the population before that to a negligible quantity to-day. This work of Jenner's was the beginning of what we call Immune Medicine or Isopathy.

Mechanical Inventions

In 1819 Leannee, the most distinguished internist of the French school, invented the stethoscope which is described as the foundation stone of our modern knowledge of the diseases of the chest by mediate exploration. By means of this instrument and its improvements Doctors Forbes and Stokes revolutionized the treatment of these diseases.

The clinical thermometer was known in the previous century, but it was not the precise instrument of the kind we have to-day as a result of the work of Wunderlich. In the early years of this century the work of Richard Bright Addison and others in England together with the work of Samuel G. Morton in America who is credited with having done more for the advancement of medicine in America than anyone before him, the work of the New Vienna school in Germany, Skoda's improved method of auscultation, Rokitansky's work in morbid anatomy, and Schonlein's discovery of the parasitic origin of disease all were of tremendous value in preparing for the great work which was to come well after the fifties.

Bauth and Antitoxin

Besides these men there were others in different departments of science who were making great discoveries, such as Bassio whose discovery that the silkworms were the victims of a parasite, which he published in 1835, led to Pasteur's researches in later years. Tyndall, Huxley, and Darwin in England and Haeckel of Germany contributed much which was of immense value to medicine and found expression in the work of Schwann, Vichow, and Pasteur and still later, Metchnikoff. The old idea of "spontaneous generation" was disproved and cellular pathology established.

In 1880 Pasteur turned his attention to hydrophobia and has succeeded in minimizing that disease to the extent that in a series of ten years 18,645 patients were treated with but an average mortality of under five per thousand. In 1882, Koch discovered the bacillus of tubercle; and a long list of plagues, epidemics, endemics, and infectious diseases which is steadily and surely growing, have been brought under control, and the promise for the future is very bright with prospects of still greater victories.

Typhus fever is dispelled, enteric fever banished from large areas, cholera and yellow fever are yielding up their secrets, and malaria has been tracked to its origin by the work of Laveron, Manson, and Ross. The terror of diphtheria has been materially reduced so that no longer is it the menace it used to be and by the antitoxin treatment patients can be made immune to its attack. Typhoid fever and tetanus and spinal meningitis are practically controlled by similar methods.

Preventive Medicine

The school of preventive medicine initiated by Parkes, Smith, Richardson, Acland, Buchanan, and Von Pettenkofer deals with disease in its origin in cities, communities, and nations. The reduction of infantile mortality is the result of prophylaxis to a large extent. In 1875 the United Kingdom adopted measures for the establishing of medical officers, lay sanitary authorities, government laboratories, and control of infectious diseases among animals as well as human beings.

The same has been done in other countries with such splendid results as described briefly in the following account of the United States Public Health Service:

"Preventable disease cost the United States four billion dollars less in 1917 than it would have done if the same health conditions had prevailed as did twenty years ago. Four thousand deaths less in 1917 than would have been the case under the conditions of 1900. Yet in spite of all this one in three was found unfit for army work and annual sickness cost the country two billions of dollars."

In 1858 England established the Register of Qualified Practitioners and the General Medical Council by which was unified, organized, strengthened, and purified medical education and qualification, and the profession relieved of much quackery. Altogether these improvements together with inculcation of personal hygiene, sanitary housing, and the supervision of food, water, and drainage have demonstrated their efficacy in that during the latter half of the century the death rate has been reduced fifty per cent.

Surgery

In surgery the changes and progress are equally remarkable to say the least. Even down to recent days the hospital and operating theater were looked upon with horror, and to order a patient there was like a sentence of death to such unfortunate persons; for, besides the horrors of infection and the general lack of cleanliness and antiseptic conditions with which we are familiar to-day, the surgeon was hampered in his work by the scarcity of proper means, instruments knives, sterilization apparatus, and splints; everything was crude and unsanitary. There was no absorbent cotton, gauze, plaster, or bandaging. The hospital as we know it did not exist. The nurse and the hospital are very modern.

Up to 1870 there was but one training school for nurses in Christendom; that was Saint Thomas' Hospital in England, founded by Florence Nightingale. In 1872 there was a training school for nurses organized at Bellevue Hospital in New York City, the first in the country except perhaps the one at the Massachusetts General Hospital, Boston. However, there are a few names which deserve mention because of what they did in those early days of surgery, among them being Baron Lassez, Napoleon's surgeon in chief to whose genius we owe the ambulance, John and Charles Bell, Sir James Brodie, and Sir Astley Cooper in Britain. In America there were some daring and skillful men also, among whom perhaps the most famous is McDowell, who is esteemed as the first ovariologist and is called the father of gynecology, also Doctor Luzenberg who had remarkable success in operating for cataract.

Anæsthesia, Anæsthetic, and Asepsis

It was the discovery of anæsthesia which gave to surgery its greatest impulse. Nitrous oxide was discovered to have anæsthetic properties by Horace Wells in 1844. Then Doctor William T. G. Morton discovered the anæsthetic property of sulphuric ether and first used it for that purpose in 1846. However, Sir James Simpson of Scotland is the discoverer of the anæsthesia of chloroform inhalations and has the gratitude of all mankind accordingly.

In 1865, Lord Lister commenced his researches which resulted in what is known as "antiseptic surgery." He communicated his results to the Lancet in 1876. In a short time antiseptic methods gave way to "asepsis" which means the employment of such processes as will prevent any outside germs reaching a wound and thus setting up infection. Before Lister's discovery the fatal germs of pyæmia, septicæmia, gangrene, and erysipelas were rampant.

In the Krankenhaus at Munich the death rate following amputation was sixty per cent. In the Civil War of America almost all abdominal and head wounds proved fatal. During the Franco-Prussian war of 1870 the ambulance wards were infernos of suffering. At the Glasgow Infirmary before Lister began his experiments the death rate following amputation was 45.7 per cent and during the first three years of antiseptic treatment it fell to 15 per cent. Professor Müssbaum introduced Lister's antiseptic treatment into Munich at a time when 80 per cent of the wounds became affected with gangrene, and from that day gangrene ceased in the Krankenhaus.

The early years of this century were conspicuous also for the high death rate among women who functioned as mothers, and even in the Vienna General Hospital it was alarming, reaching as high as one in every six cases, puerperal fever being the cause. Semmelweiss concluded that this was caused by infection the cause of which was carried on the hands of the medical attendants.

Resulting from the discoveries of anæsthesia, antiseptic, and asepsis the progress of surgery has been little short of miraculous and operations never dreamed of as being possible have become commonplace. Even the heart has been squeezed through an abdominal incision and coaxed into activity when it seemed to have ceased action. The stomach has been entirely removed and the intestines joined on to the œsophagus; several feet of the intestines removed and the ends joined and life continues its course without any apparent interruption. Even lacerations and wounds in the heart have been sewn up and the patients have lived. Since 1867 general operations on the cranium, joints, abdomen, female pelvis, and isolated organs as the eye, and ear, are frequent which there was no sign of before.

The late great war is the first time in which the doctor has been given a free hand, with the result that disease was almost obliterated and the death rate reduced to less than that at home. Ninety per cent of the wounded were saved and eighty per cent sent back to the firing line within forty days. Altogether the death rate from all causes during this most appalling of all wars was the lowest ever known, barely three per cent per annum, and for the last two years it was under two per cent.

Before 1914 less than one twentieth of the wastage of ancient war was due to wounds or deaths in battle while the other nineteen twentieths were caused by disease, epidemics, and pestilences both in the field and at home. In the army itself the rate was six to nine deaths by disease to one in battle or from wounds. In this war the rates have been doubled and then reversed, sixteen deaths in battle to one from disease. Control over wound infections was so close that of the wounded who survive, ninety per cent have recovered. Of those who reached a hospital ninety-five per cent recovered; while of those who reached the base hospitals ninety-eight per cent recovered.

Anæsthetics and antiseptics have not only diminished pain and agony, but have made amputations rarer and grave crippling fewer than ever before in war history. Barely two per cent of the wounded were crippled or permanently disabled.

It is estimated that four hundred thousand lives a year were saved on the British western front alone and chiefly in three ways: antityphoid inoculations and other measures against infectious diseases, by surgical skill and superb hospital organization, and by the splendid way in which the armies were fed.

In this war the combined efforts of a French doctor named Carrel and an American doctor named Dakin resulted in a new method of treating wounds which is one of the triumphs of the period. The system called by their names consists of flushing the wound either continuously or intermittently with a carefully graduated solution of chloride of lime modified by boric acid. This kills the germs and aids in healing. Huge, jagged, pocketed, horribly infected shell wounds were healed up smoothly and painlessly with a minimum of scarring in about as many weeks as it used to take months.

The romance of modern surgery is still in the making and we could spend much time in describing many of its great victories but we must close. However, we must summarize briefly.

Summary

The progress in medicine is the result of many minds and influences embracing bacteriology, biology, pathology, chemistry which we have not referred to, though it is intimately connected with medicine and its evolution, embryology, natural history, and all the natural sciences. The treasures gathered by all men in these and any other field become confluent in this great field of human service, transforming the conception of the etiology of disease and developing a new pathology and prophylaxis.

Therapeutics also has been severely chastened and drugs are administered with greater intelligence and discrimination than ever before, the new diagnostics making for a much more scientific reading of symptoms and accurate interpretation together with the application of the agencies employed for alleviation and healing, gathered from every field of discovery in the true eclecticism of the discipleship of truth. The extension of medical science into the departments of public and private life as already referred to is making for a better race with better prospects of efficiency than ever before.

Religion and Faith

The true relationship of medicine to religion seems to be better understood and appreciated now and the therapeutical value of faith and mental poise with the intelligent ecstasy which religion does generate have lead to healing, redemption, and resuscitation which none can deny, who read aright the signs of development in this great department.

Much of crime and moral delinquency is being dealt with pathologically instead of punitively, and even social evil and disease are being regarded as largely the outcome of pathological conditions and it is estimated that two thirds of the unfortunate females trafficking in sex are mentally deficient and ought to be housed and sheltered as those unfit to be at large.

Doctors, it is not too much to say, are now esteemed as a splendid force united with the brotherhood of priests, ministers, teachers, and public workers who are dedicated to the "casting out of the devil, the healing of the sick," and the interpreting of the many tongues of life in terms of their experience, revealing the mind of the God of all goodness, virtue, and truth whom they, with us, all try in their way to serve for his glory and the saving of mankind.

"But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words, and seal the book, even to the time of the end; many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased."—Daniel 12: 4.

January 1, 1822, the first American settlers reached Texas.

January 3, 1820, Congress passed a bill to admit Maine as a State.

January 4, 1830, Illinois College, at Jacksonville, Illinois, opened.
